Just to clarify, our caucus doesn't agree to 18 per cent. We just want some sort of limitation. I don't think that that's too much for Albertans to ask, and since the government seems to have no idea on how to get its spending under control, where do we go from here? Well, obviously, a 15 per cent debt ceiling was not enough, we will see. I think what's most frustrating for me and my fellow caucus mates is that we felt, when you set and when you voted for that 15 per cent, that it would be broken and that it was already rubber-stamped anyway and that you knew that the government had no intention of staying within that debt ceiling. That's extremely frustrating to those of us who could see that. We felt it, we knew it, and we knew that that was going to happen, and to be setting it with an unlimited ceiling at this point completely lacks in accountability to Albertans, that you serve.

There's no ceiling for this government now, so how are Albertans supposed to trust you? This is a question you should be asking yourself as you go forward with this because it will be one that you'll be answering in your constituencies once you surpass the 15 per cent. The 15 per cent was already really, really difficult for people to understand at the beginning.

This amendment is an attempt to help you understand the privilege you have in holding the trust of Albertans' money in your hands. I'd like to know and pose a question as to when the accountability of the government changed. When did you find that it was okay to do this? You've seen it in the past. I'm sure that many of you have probably been frustrated by past mistakes and have probably even stood up to previous governments about these same situations, and now you stand here defending a choice that is actually going to cost your constituents, our constituents, more money than any of us ever expected.

Just to give it a little bit of perspective, if you look at it from the point of view – and I mentioned this in my last talk – that in this province we pay right now per capita $2,000-plus more per man, woman, and child, I've already stated that already with just that, that's $8 billion a year we have extra per capita. Then if you add in the $2 billion in repayment, which is $2,000 per family per year, that is your deficit right there, just those two numbers added together.

I don't understand how it is that you go into your constituencies and explain this to the people that you represent. How is it that you're going to explain to them, going to the bankers, that you're not putting money into schools, that you're not going to be able to put it into hospitals, that you will not be able to put it into programs, and that you will not be putting it into infrastructure? You're going to be paying back a debt that you're saddling my grandchildren and yours with. This needs to be explained. I don't understand this kind of management. You're repealing it after only six months. This is an addiction to borrowing, and it's out of control.

You need to send a message to Albertans that you are responsible and that you have a plan to control your debt levels, hence the reason that there needs to be some sort of ceiling. Like I said, the 18 per cent was just a random number because anything at this point would be better than having no debt ceiling whatsoever. You are using people's needs against them to justify your lack of management. What is going to happen when you don't follow through? Albertans are wanting to know how high you're actually willing to go, and we are challenging you there. That's what that is. It's a question to find out how high you're willing to go, because if you're not willing to set a ceiling, the sky is the limit, as has been mentioned before me.

I literally begrudgingly support this amendment and only because there needs to be some sort of limitation to what is capable by the government. Honestly, the amendment as it is: I support it because we need a limitation. That's the reason why I'm supporting the amendment. Please consider, as you go forward, putting some limitations on yourselves and showing Albertans that you have the accountability that you promised when you were elected.

Thank you.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Battle River-Wainwright.

Mr. Taylor: Thank you, Madam Chair. I think that if you were going to put a name to this amendment, it would be called Manage the Damage because that's what we're trying to do. What we're trying to say here is that we want to limit the damage. I want to support the bill in the sense that we want to limit how much can be borrowed, how much this government can actually go into debt. We want to manage the damage on this one.

You know, when I had my kids, for, I think, everybody that's in here who has kids, if you didn't tell the kids that they had a bedtime, they'd stay up till 1 o'clock, 2 o'clock in the morning. Then they wouldn't get up in time for school. So you have to put limitations on them. Same thing with speed limits. We have speed limits there for a purpose. If a person is doing 200 kilometres per hour or 250 kilometres an hour in a 50-kilometre zone, pretty soon you're going to have an accident, and it's going to be a fatal accident.

That's what I'm afraid is going to happen with this Bill 10. We're not managing it if we just leave it open, so I'm for the amendment to have limitations put onto it. For me, I would like the limitations to be even lower, but we need to be pragmatic at this point in time because we're already at a place where we're going to be looking at 15 per cent. We're trying to give the government an out, somewhere to go to so that we can move on and give confidence to Standard & Poor's, to all these credit agencies, so it can help our economy in this province. That's a really important thing.

You know, when we looked at this – the Member for Calgary-Elbow was talking a little bit earlier, a couple of days ago, about a mortgage on a house and that this was about a mortgage. He said that the budget is like a mortgage, that going into debt and having these things is like a mortgage, and he said that some debt is good. If you look at Alberta, in 2004 this house that we have, Alberta, was paid in full. We were debt free. We didn't owe anybody anything. At that point in time going forward, we would be able to budget for what those things are. If you want to use the analogy of a house, you know that with a house you'll need shingles in five years, say, so over five years you would budget for that.

That's the same thing that the government should be doing, budgeting for these inevitable things that are coming up. You have to have a plan, a wise and prudent plan that goes forward, and that's with the government as well. We have to have something that would look at it. We had a rainy-day fund in place in case some catastrophe happened. We had a rainy-day fund to look after that. That's what a wise and prudent person would do, Madam Chair, the same thing as what the government should do. They have a budget. Our house was paid in full, and we had a rainy-day fund. We had something to look after these things.

Now we're removing all the debt ceiling; we have an unlimited debt ceiling. I don't find that wise. For that reason I'm going to say I support having the debt limit on this one and not having an unlimited debt ceiling. We just need to manage the damage.

Thank you.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Madam Chair. This is another amendment being put forward by the Wildrose that is showing our contempt for what is happening with Bill 10. The fact is that the 15 per cent limit to fund our operational spending is really an insult to Albertans. The fact that it's being removed is beyond contempt. The fact that we have to reinstate it with even a higher number is even beyond comprehension. Now, you're saying: "Why is this such a tragedy? Why exactly do you feel, Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake, that this one bill will hamper future generations for many, many years to come?"

Let's look at exactly what 18 per cent is. That's almost $66 billion, $66 billion that we are limiting Alberta to in its borrowing. Now, let's look at this number. It's a stunning number. The fact is that it's so large that we can't comprehend this number. It is so large that we can't even comprehend it. Let's break this down into something that we can comprehend, something that an average Albertan will understand. What we're looking at is that the government was projecting somewhere around $50 billion in debt. They had given themselves 15 per cent to GDP, which was about $50 billion, somewhere in there. Now, we said: what if your plan doesn't work? What if you guys eventually realize that you can't actually do what you're saying? That means that you're going to have to come back to us and raise the limit. In less than a year, less than six months you're back here again saying: "We need to raise the limit." No. Actually, why raise it? Why even put a limit in there when we can just obliterate it, get rid of it?

Now, let's bring this back down to what an Albertan can really move forward with as an example, something that we can actually work through here. Let's equate this to what it really is. It's a credit card. It's our line of credit to be able to pay to keep the lights on. Let's bring this from the limit of $50 billion down to $50,000, still a stunning number for any Albertan household – a stunning number – but we'll throw that out there: $50,000 for a normal Albertan household.

Let's say that you get into trouble and you need to bail yourself out for a few months. You know what? I can tell you that families in my riding right now are feeling this because they're out of work, and we understand that. We understand that right now a lot of people are probably using lines of credit and credit cards to get by. Is that the solution to their problem? Maybe short-term to help get them out of this no-work stretch that they're in, but I will tell you that it is not working as a long-term solution because in the end they know that they have to pay off that credit card. Now, $50,000, $80,000, $66,000, whatever the number is, they are limited to that number. They can't go beyond it because – you know what? – the banks don't let them go past what they can afford.

That's the nature of debt, but somehow this government has worked out that it doesn't have any cap. It doesn't need one because it feels that it's going to do better and be able to pay this off some day in the future, but they won't tell us when, and they won't tell us how. This is a mistake. Not having a cap is a mistake. We need to make sure that we go back to Albertans every time we need to raise our debt limit and say: do we have a plan to pay that money back?

Let's get back to my example of $50,000 for a normal person with a credit card just so we can understand this number. Now, let's say that on average it takes a family about $1,000 a month. That's five years to pay off that credit card. But you know what? It's not at zero interest. Credit cards go at 18 per cent, so we're looking at a perpetual circle that they can't get out of. Right now I hear this all over: "Well, it's low. Interest rates are low. Why not take advantage of these low interest rates? We'll pay it back later." You know what? All those credit cards do the same thing. They start off with 5 per cent, and they go after a year to 18 per cent because the intent is always to pay it off in that year. Always. So what happens is that that family is stuck with that $50,000 credit card.

Now, let's look at the options that family has. The option the family has is to take that debt and roll it into something they own, an asset, and finance that asset which has value. This is the route that a lot of families go, this temporary solution: get it into a mortgage that's held against an asset. We hear consistently from the government: we're going to borrow like it's a mortgage. The problem is that the mortgage doesn't have an asset attached to it. It has no house; it has no car; it has no boat. It has nothing attached to that asset. When we are looking at where we're going, we actually need to sell stuff to pay for this loan. Guess what? Unless we're going to start selling bridges and interchanges and schools and hospitals, that's just not possible. The fact is that we know that when we do sell this stuff, we never get the value we put into it. We sell it for a fraction. It is not a house.

When people get into debt with credit cards, they have an out. Now, what happens when you don't have that asset-backed liability is that you go bankrupt. That's the next step. When you can't get out of the cycle, you don't make enough money, you can't save enough, you go bankrupt. This is the direction that we see provinces and countries across the world going in. Is this a direction that Alberta should be going? No. The answer is no. The fact is that when we're looking for a direction for Alberta, it should never be: let's spend money and put it on credit and hope our children will pay it off. That is wrong.

The fact is that when we look at paying this off – we're looking at $60 billion, $70 billion, $80 billion, $100 billion – who is going to pay that off, especially when we can't sell the resources? That is an actual concern someday in the future. We're not going to have the ability to pay off those debts that we accumulate right now. That money isn't going to be there.

The fact is that we need to live within our means. If we can't live within our means, we're ensuring that our children someday will have to look at bankruptcy as an option. That means that someday when we start looking at what we're handing down to our children, what legacy we're handing down to our children, we're looking at debt. That's the legacy we're handing down. We're handing down credit card debt. What happens is that if you can't pay it off, it goes into something like a junk bond: 8, 10, 12 per cent interest, which is something that we're actually seeing in European countries right now. Somehow we think we can avoid this bullet, this magic bullet, because we think we're better.

Where is this magic income going to come from? Is it going to come from resources? Are resources always going to be there? I would say probably not. So where do we need to go with this? The fact is that we need to reduce our spending. If we are looking at the future, we need to set ourselves limitations, and that is where credit cards come in. They set limitations for us based on our earnings, based on what we own, based on the ability to pay that money back. Right now we're taking it and throwing it away. We are literally going in a direction that has no limitations on borrowing, and that is frightening. We're looking at massive junk bond status with our debt someday in the future, which takes money out of our social programs, takes money out of our schools, and it takes money out of our hospitals.

This is not a direction that I want to send my children. Our children deserve better. They deserve to be respected, and they need to know that we were good stewards with their money. That is not what we are doing right now. We are not good stewards. We need to be better. Now, we can point fingers at who we think is to blame, but in the end this government needs to make sure that it's accountable for the decisions it's making, and it is making a very poor decision right now.

Let's get back to credit cards. Credit cards: $50,000, $80,000, no matter what number you pick, in the end it needs to be paid back. We don't have the assets backed; we don't have the revenue coming in. We need to set limits on ourselves because we're the only ones that can do it. Nobody else can set these limits except for us here over this next little while. These limits are important because we need to be making sure that Alberta knows where it's going with its financial position, and we are not going in the right direction when we remove a debt limit.

It is like a bank saying: "You know what? We trust you. We're not going to set a limit. Why bother? We know that you're good for the money. You don't have the income, but someday maybe. Hey, you know what? Your house has no equity left because you took it all out, but we think it's going to grow. You know what? We think that maybe that time-share probably has a value someday. Even though – well, hey, you know what? – all of the time-shares in that condo unit have gone broke, we'll give you the credit. We're going to give you credit based on nothing." That is what you are asking for when you get rid of the debt limit.

We need a responsible government to move forward. That means debt limits. Now, whether it is 10 per cent, 15 per cent, or 18 per cent, we need to put something in place to ensure that Albertans know that we're at least holding some accountability. But all we hear is: "This is a mortgage. Albertans can sell stuff off someday to pay it, like what Greece is doing right now." That's sad.

It's truly sad that we are moving our children toward a decision on: how exactly are we going to educate our children, how are we going to have health care for our children, and how are we going to keep care of us when we become senior citizens because we've squandered the money? I do not want to put my little girls, Amelia and Charlotte, in the position that they feel they have to somehow have less of a lifestyle because we couldn't be responsible enough to move Alberta forward in the right direction. Yes, oil is low. Nobody will disagree with that, but the fact is that this isn't the only contributing factor when it comes to debt in this province. We need to be making sure that Alberta has the means to be able to pay this money back. When we actually have more debt than we can stomach, isn't it the time to change direction? It's already too late.

What I am asking is that we actually challenge the government. When are you going to balance the budget? How are you going to balance the budget? What time frame are you going to pay this money back on the debt that you've accumulated? I'm going to guess that the answer is: "We don't know. We don't know, Scott. We don't know." That is sad. Why is it that this government can plan on moving forward an incredible new spending spree yet can't come up with how it's going to pay back this debt that it's accumulating?

Now, when we start looking towards the future, I don't want to be the one sitting down with my daughters and explaining to them what bankruptcy means. Yes, there are countries across the world that have gone down this direction. But where exactly is it that we think that we're better than everybody else when we make decisions that have no actual business plan? We need to be looking forward to the future. We need to be setting goals. We need to be doing this stuff, yet we have a government right now that ignores what exactly we're trying to achieve here: responsible government. When we have interest outpacing our education spending, when we have interest outpacing our hospital system, where should those funds have been funnelled towards? Not interest.

In years to come we're going to have infrastructure that we can't maintain. We're going to have nurses that we can't pay. We're going to have union employees without pensions. This is what happens when bankruptcy happens. This is where we are going towards without any debt limits. This is why we have had four downgrades of our credit rating, because of irresponsibility. It is something that we need to change course. I am hoping that the government is actually listening to where we are trying to change the directions towards.

When we start looking at exactly what the goal here is, it comes down to tax, more tax, more tax, more tax. Eventually you have nobody to tax, and that is sad. That is the direction that we are headed because in the end we think that we can actually tax ourselves to prosperity. You know what the answer is? You can't. We've been through this enough times in other countries that we understand that in the end, when it comes to taxes, you can actually tax people out of your country. You actually can do damage to the base that you hold so dearly, to make sure they support the services that we have, to be able to provide for our most vulnerable, to be able to provide for our education system, to be able to provide for our hospital care. Why can't we see this now? There is a real opportunity that sees that we need to change direction. How many more warnings do we need before we actually take a step back and say that maybe this isn't the direction we're going in?

When it comes to borrowing, we're hoping that some day royalties are going to bail us out, but it appears that in every direction we're going, that's not going to happen in the near future. The only place next is to start taxing, taxing, and more taxing until . . .

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to the amendment? The hon. Member for Strathmore-Brooks.

Mr. Fildebrandt: Yeah. Madam Chair, I was really enjoying the member's speech. I was wondering if he would care to elaborate further.

The Chair: Just a reminder that there is no 29(2)(a) in committee, so . . .

Mr. Fildebrandt: That was just a speech.

The Chair: . . . he can continue speaking. No problem. Go ahead.

An Hon. Member: I think he left off at taxes.

Mr. Cyr: It's funny. I thank you. I have a reminder from the government that I left off at taxes.

In the end, it is a good point that the government has brought up, that we are actually trying to help. We don't want to see Alberta go down the wrong road. We don't want to see Alberta repeating the mistakes of prior governments. What we do want this government to do is to start using restraint. Start using restraint.

Now, we hear all the time that there is nowhere to cut. There is no room for spending less than $50 billion even though we're bringing in only $40 billion. There's no room. We've got to fire everybody. That isn't true. Wildrose has brought forward that we can surely find one cent for every dollar, two cents for every dollar of cuts. There have got to be places that we can start bringing some real change to Alberta. When we start looking at protecting Alberta, we need to start looking at how we can reduce our spending and bring it in line with what Albertans expect us to do.

Let's go back to the credit card. I'm sure everybody is thrilled to hear about the credit card. In the end, let's bring it down to something that I myself can quantify, because $50 billion, $100 billion, $300 billion like Ontario, are just huge numbers that we can't actually put any real number to that we can understand. It's just too big of a number. So let's go with $50,000. Let's say Alberta did, for instance, decide that it wants to sell off its assets. Let's use that. Let's use bridges. Let's use hospitals. Let's start using that. Now, the question is: what do we sell? What goes first? Well, the easy stuff, right? Greece is seeing that. They get rid of the historical sites, right? That seems to be the first place to go. The next one is toll roads. Why not go there, sell off those?

You know what? That's not even paying the principal. You're just doing it to pay off the interest, like what's happening with Greece right now. Greece is going down a spiral that we can't even imagine. They have incredible, huge unemployment with their youth, and we've got incredible expectations when it comes to the standard of living, and the two just don't go hand in hand.

With this credit card, even if I sold my car, sold my house that's fully leveraged, sold my boat, now I'm still on the street with no money to be able to support myself. I have no ability to be able to move forward to make sure that my children will be taken care of. I have no ability to be able to go any further. This is actually something that I am seeing in my riding. People, actually, right now are living in our shelters, they are living in people's basements, and because it's summer right now, they're living in their – well, I would like to say cars, but they don't have those either yet, so what do they have? Tents. Backyards.

These are very unfortunate times. These are circumstances that these men and women got into that are very unfortunate. What as a government are we doing to help? The fact is that when I continue to go to the ministers and say, "What are you doing to reduce the 10 per cent unemployment rate in my riding?" the answer is: a tax credit, a jobs program that failed. That doesn't help them pay off their credit cards. That doesn't help them get into a new place when they do finally find a job because in the end they can't get out of debt.

Now, here's the thing: this is summer. They're living in that tent. Lots of people are living in that tent, so what is the next thing they're going to do when winter comes?

Mr. Connolly: Winter is coming.

Mr. Cyr: Winter is coming. Thank you very much. Yeah. It's sad.

The fact is that they are able to get by in the summer, but when winter comes, what are they going to do to actually find a place to live? These places just aren't available.

Where are we going to find jobs? Right now the prospect of finding a job is nonexistent. They go to Alberta Works and spend three or four hours every day making up resumés, sending out e-mails, and getting out the message that they want a job. They send it to a hundred companies in the area, and you know what their response is: "There are no jobs. As matter of fact, not only are we not hiring right now, we are letting people go." That's sad. It's sad for these single mothers, these single fathers, for these people that are out of work, these families. They're coming to me, and they're saying: what can I do, Scott? My answer is: Alberta Works. That's unfortunate.

You know what? We've got the government right now saying: we extended your unemployment benefits by five weeks. Five weeks. Problem solved. That's no solution. When we're looking at moving forward and we're looking at our neighbours, Saskatchewan and British Columbia, why are they still growing and we're shrinking at a rapid pace? [interjections] Well, thank you very much. We do have a wonderful carbon tax, which I'm sure is going to help them.

Let's look at the neighbours. This is actually reality in my riding. People right now can't sell their homes because there's nobody to buy them, and you know what? These families are leaving an empty house in my riding and moving to Saskatchewan, moving to B.C. This is a tragedy because these are highly skilled people. These are people that are moving out of our province, and they can't buy houses in the provinces that they're moving to because they are stuck, anchored to a house that they can't get out of. This is a reality across northern Alberta. Maybe you haven't felt it in your ridings, but I know I have. This is a real tragedy, that we are losing – we are losing – Albertans at an alarming pace, and we're ending up with incredibly high vacancy rates.

What are we doing? We're creating instability. You want to know what's unstable when it comes to bills like this? It throws a question into what our government is doing. When you have bills like Bill 10 brought forward – let's just get rid of the debt limit – who's going to invest money in an unstable province? We are seeing that repeatedly. We are looking forward, and we're saying to the government, "Please, bring stability back," and you're doing anything but. We're looking at carbon taxes, we're looking at personal taxes, we're looking at minimum wage increases, and we're looking at wonderful taxes in every direction we're going.

What company is going to want to invest in Alberta right now? I can tell you that they are announcing projects in 2019, and you know why? Because they're hoping that there's a change in government. That, I can tell you, is the direction you guys are going towards.

Getting rid of a debt limit is only showing how irresponsible you are. We need to look both to the east and to the west and see that – you know what? – they have an incredible amount of money coming in from resource revenues, and guess what? Guess what? They still are growing. The only place we're growing is civil servants.

Mr. Hanson: And debt.

Mr. Cyr: And debt.

Mr. Fildebrandt: And taxes.

Mr. Cyr: And taxes.

An Hon. Member: And shame.

Mr. Cyr: And shame. I have a lot of people contributing here. This is great. A whole lot of sharing happening.

When we start looking towards – ultimately, what we're looking to do is trying to create an ability for people to get back to work that's through creating stable legislation. This Bill 10 is creating nothing but instability within Alberta. Let's bring a debt cap in. You're not happy with 15 per cent. What number are you happy with? Eighteen doesn't seem to be that number. We're not happy with either number, but you know what? There's at least some accountability that we can use. This is something that will bring stability back to Alberta.

I guess the question that you need to ask is: after we vote down this amendment, that you are planning on voting down, and once you vote in Bill 10 to remove – remove – the debt limit, are we going to see another credit . . .

Mr. Taylor: Downgrade.

Mr. Cyr: . . . downgrade? Thank you.

Are we going to see more interest paid, less ability for us to pay that money back, greater likelihood that we become junk bonds?

What are the east and west doing that we're not doing? They're bringing stable governments. I'll reiterate that. We need stable governments. We need to make sure that companies feel that they can actually feel safe with the money, prosper, make profits, pay taxes, pay their fair share, whatever you want to say. In the end people working is what we need in Alberta, which is what we need in my riding, and this is something that this amendment helps.

Does it make me sad that I would be voting for this amendment? Absolutely. Does it make me sad that my colleague, the shadow minister of Finance, had to actually bring this forward? Absolutely. The fact is that he was willing to say that we need some limitation. We need to make sure that there's something, some way of actually paying for our credit card debt. We need to have a payment plan. We need to move forward. We need to actually show that we are a responsible government.

We need stability. We need stability so that I can have jobs being created in my riding again. This is something that is fully within the government's control, yet it continues to let us down. This is something that you actually can move forward. Is there any reason – I know that there are northern riding and Calgary MLAs from across the aisle that are voting to ensure that this instability continues. That means no jobs – no jobs – and more debt because what happens is that this is a spiral out of control that you are creating, and you need to stop the spiral. You need to come up with a plan. You need to set limits for yourself. That's what a responsible government does. That's what a responsible family does.

We need to make sure that in the end, when we accumulate debt, we pay it back because what happens is that – this is a failure that we cannot accept because I want to actually know that I handed this province off to my daughters, Amelia and Charlotte, knowing that I actually gave it in a better situation than I received it, and right now I can't say that. I can say that my oldest daughter is 10 years old and is sad to see where our province has gone in the last 10 years.

We had rainy-day funds. We had contingency funds. We had all this money. We had the Alberta heritage trust fund. We had this money saved. Now, what happened to it? What happened to it? We can look at irresponsible government, and we can look at where you're going, which is the same direction. The same direction.

Some Hon. Members: Worse.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you. Worse direction. I have been corrected.

They are going in a worse direction because in the end socialism doesn't work. We need to have fiscal accountability, and what we need to be making sure is that – in the end a responsible, stable government is what we need to bring forward.

We have one of the biggest governments per capita in Canada. There's got to be a way that we can bring it down. There's got to be a way that as Albertans we can move forward and get through these tough times together. How can we do that when we've got no reason to because we can just get rid of the debt cap altogether?

In the end I am sad that either my children's children or their children's children are still going to be paying off what we've accumulated in this three-year period. That means that right now we are at the peak of Alberta's future. These next three years are at the peak of Alberta's future, and at some point once you hit the peak, you've got to come back down that mountain. That is where we're headed towards. We're headed towards less health care for everybody. We're headed for less education for everybody. We're headed towards a worse Alberta than I grew up in. This is unacceptable. This is something that – we actually have an ability to change direction.

I encourage everybody in this room to vote for this amendment. They need to be responsible. You are going to regret not voting for this amendment three years from now. I can tell you that three years from now today's recorded vote on this amendment will be held against everybody in this Chamber that didn't vote to make sure that we had an actual credit limit in place because in the end people will say: "Why? Why is it that you didn't have foresight. Why is it that you didn't actually speak a little louder in your caucus? Why are you not moving and doing anything that actually will move Alberta forward?"

How are we going to move? What direction are we going to move? I can tell you that the direction we're moving is more debt and instability. That means that not only is it sitting at 10 per cent unemployment in my riding, I can only expect that it's going to grow. There's no plan. There's no plan. You have no plan. How is it possible that we have, as a government that has got $40 billion a year coming in, no plan for that money? We absolutely have got a plan to spend more than we make. That isn't a plan. That is a route to failure, and that is the direction we're going. You will be held accountable for that decision that you are making today. You need to stop.

In the end you are going to find over this next three years that not only are you unable to meet the targets you're setting for taxes and continuing to raise the taxes, but you're going to find that you are making less and less taxes, which – guess what? – we saw. Now, everybody says: low oil, low oil. What if this cost for oil stays at $45 or $50 for the next 10 years? What's your solution? Fifteen per cent PST?

The Chair: Any other hon. member wishing to speak to the amendment? Lac La Biche-St. Paul-Two Hills.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much. I'll keep mine short, Madam Chair. Basically, it comes down to, you know, 7 per cent, 15 per cent, 18 per cent: whatever number you pick, it doesn't really matter. The real question is: how can Albertans trust this government to do what's right for Alberta? They won't even abide by their own legislation. They set the debt limit last fall at 15 per cent through legislation. They all voted for it unanimously. We sat here and watched it. How do they expect us to sit here representing Albertans and allow them to change this law and take away any accountability? Simply repealing section 3 without any maximum is irresponsible, and it's shameful. It is not what Albertans voted for last May. I would challenge all of you to go actually talk to Albertans and see what they really think of your limitless debt ceiling. I challenge you to do that.

Thank you very much, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to this amendment? Lacombe-Ponoka.

Mr. Orr: Yeah. You got it. That's right. Thank you, Madam Chair. I have to support this amendment but not because I agree with the number. The reality is that what's been proven here tonight is that it doesn't matter what the number is to the members opposite. Any number would always be unacceptable. My colleague from Bonnyville has challenged us a lot on the need to set a limit. My question is: what limit will you accept? There is no limit that seems to be acceptable.

I believe there's a reason for that. I believe that it's because the members opposite are afraid to set a limit. I understand that you're new to government. I understand that you're extremely inexperienced, that you have no knowledge of how to do these kinds of things. I also understand that none of you have ever come close to managing a $50 billion business, not to mention a $5 million business or even a $5,000 one. [interjections] Yeah. I doubt that.

Any limit is better than no limit. You cannot just appropriate to yourself any amount of money that you want to take. We said six months ago that 15 per cent was dangerous because it would not last, and obviously it hasn't lasted. It didn't last six months. We said that as soon as you had 15 per cent, you'd change it to 18 per cent. Lo and behold, here we are. Next time it'll be 20 except you skipped that. Now all of a sudden you went immediately to any limit. The sky is the limit. How prophetic was that? You didn't even need a crystal ball. The reality is that the members opposite have no understanding of how to create wealth, only how to spend it. They're like those who have won the lottery except that soon it's all gone.

I remember a story in the paper a few years ago of a glamour marriage from Hollywood ending up in divorce with a $20 million settlement offered, and within five years the $20 million was gone and they were filing for bankruptcy. That's exactly where you're taking our province. Those who have a DNA of dependency can't possibly be expected to manage the people's money well, who have a politic that the government owes me and all of us and that any amount will do forever and ever and ever.

There is this idea out there that the government has a limitless amount of money and they never have to pay it back. There are even theories out there that try and promote that. Well, I guess if you're a sovereign government and you actually have the ability to create money and print it with paper presses, you can try and delude yourself with that story, but subsovereign governments like provinces don't have that option.

What are the people of the province supposed to do when politicians break their own promises, when politicians say things and then completely do the exact opposite of that? The only thing the people can do is require laws to constrain them because the politicians won't constrain themselves.

Unfortunately, horses are like that. If you give horses the opportunity to eat too much rich food, endless amounts of grain, they'll stand there and they'll eat and they'll eat and they'll eat until they kill themselves, literally. They will eat grain until it founders them, and it is fatal. You have found yourselves a great bin of grain, and you think that you can just consume of it endlessly and there are no consequences, there are no results. There are consequences. There are results. There needs to be some sort of a limit to your spending or you're going to destroy yourselves and our province. So we must set some sort of a restraint on people who cannot restrain themselves.

I will vote in favour of this amendment.

The Chair: Any other speakers to the amendment? The hon. Member for Little Bow.

Mr. Schneider: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'll be short as I speak to this amendment. This bill is a dangerous precedent. The government put legislation in place a few months ago that would not allow them to borrow more money for this province than an amount that was equal to 15 per cent of the gross domestic product. That's called a cap. That's a cap, a cap that gives Albertans some kind of idea that their government can't and won't abuse their power and borrow more money than the math works out to in the formula that was presented.

However, Madam Chair, this government, before they rolled out their latest budget, came forward with newer legislation called Bill 10, which was presented and all of a sudden took away the cap, the 15 per cent debt-to-GDP formula. It took away the cap that Albertans had come to realize was their government's legislation to not borrow more money than 15 per cent of the GDP. All of a sudden the government decided that it was going to remove that cap and put no debt ceiling on their borrowing.

At this moment, of course, that means that the Alberta government can borrow any amount that it sees fit to run the government of Alberta, no restraint required. Alberta's debt will be about $58 billion by the next election. That's bad enough, Madam Chair, but borrowing for the operations of government is downright scary. The day-to-day operations of Alberta's government are now beholden to those that have lent money to this province.

You know, we used to have a phrase around here that Albertans were proud to use, that little buzzword, the Alberta advantage. For years Alberta had a favourable investment climate that helped make it an economic powerhouse. It became a place where investment dollars flowed because the possibility of return was expected. The policy choices that this government has made have made Alberta a less desirable place for investment, perhaps at one of the worst times possible. So long, Alberta advantage.

Large-scale debt is problematic for future generations of Albertans. Frankly, doing this to the next generation is simply immoral. By designating the next generation as the one responsible for paying off the debt, the government is willingly depriving them of those advantages that I spoke of a moment ago.

And now Alberta's credit rating is being downgraded, a development that has troubling consequences as well. But the credit downgrades of late are no surprise. We were warned early in January that a high borrowing agenda would lead to trouble. Our caucus pressed this government to try and rein in spending, and repeatedly we were basically laughed at. A moderate budget was an option that the government could have tried. They could have protected front-line workers while reining in spending to show creditors that there is some semblance of fiscal competence.

Now, I believe I have several caucus members that may want to speak yet today, so I'll take my seat, Madam Chair. But before I do, I must say that I have every intention of supporting this amendment and not because I believe that the government of Alberta should put forward a number of 18 per cent of gross domestic product as a limit for borrowing. I'm certainly not interested in suggesting that the government should impose that number.

I support this amendment because it suggests a debt ceiling. Bill 10 right now has no debt ceiling. The government turned down 15 per cent. What is the magic number? Is 15.5 per cent the number?

If it is, why not add it to the bill? If it isn't 18 per cent, please give us an indication of what the number is that would satisfy the government. That is what is behind this amendment, an outrageous number. If the government won't support that number, please tell us what that number is.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I have listened closely and with rapt attention, as I always do when I'm in the august presence of all of my fellow MLA colleagues. I hope to bring a little bit of perspective to this because, I have to say, I get frustrated listening to debate like this in this Assembly.

We have what seem to be two pretty polarized views of the world. On one hand, we have the Official Opposition, who believes that the government probably wants to destroy Alberta, that this is really some global socialist plot to ensure that our province finds its way to bankruptcy, and that probably it's the ghost of Che Guevara who's pulling the strings behind the scenes somewhere. But, you know, on the other hand, of course, we have the government, who's brought forward Bill 10. It's removed the debt cap that they put on themselves barely four and a half months ago. That shows, I think generously, a lack of experience and, perhaps less so, an inability to get a real handle on the spending of this government.

So I'm torn. I'm torn as to whether or not I want to actually support this amendment. While I believe that there should be some sort of cap, I find it interesting that our friends in Wildrose will rise and say: "We're proposing this amendment. We don't really like the number, but we're still proposing this amendment because it's better than nothing." I mean, I don't know if 16 is a better number than 18.

Mr. Fildebrandt: Yes, it is.

Mr. Clark: Yes, it is. Of course, it's a better number; it's less. Of course, that's wonderful.

But it's a bit of an odd debate, I have to say. It seems like it's a good opportunity, I suppose, to just stand up and continue to hammer on the government on the things they don't like.

I would love, actually, to hear from the government in greater detail why, in fact, they think that they can't find their way to meet their 15 per cent debt-to-GDP cap when they've only said that they're going to get to 15.5 at worst case. That's not a huge amount, actually, and I really don't think that that's too much to ask, for the government to constrain spending just that much.

It doesn't need to be incredibly painful. It doesn't need to mean massive front-line service cuts. You know, the Member for Calgary-North West and I were just having a bit of a conversation here about some of the small ways that this government can find efficiencies. Really, it comes down to looking after the pennies so that the dollars ultimately look after themselves.

I mean, something I'll put to the Minister of Health: one of your objectives is a youth mental health website. That's a great idea. We should do that. But you know what? Our friends in B.C. have already done it. The AnxietyBC website for youth and teens is a fantastic resource. Have we looked at licensing that instead of building our own?

I bet you there are countless examples like that all throughout government where we could simply reuse something that someone else has done. As a result, we could save at least tens of thousands if not hundreds of thousands if not millions of dollars all throughout government. Just because it's not invented here in Alberta doesn't necessarily mean that we don't need to find ways of doing things more efficiently and more effectively. I really think that that's something this government hasn't done well enough, challenging the public service to find ways of doing more with less.

I think that these debates are sometimes enlightening, often entertaining. But I think that at the end of the day I would like to see some sort of debt cap reinstated. Whether 18 per cent is an appropriate number or not remains to be seen.

Those are my comments, Madam Chair. I'll sit back and listen to the rest. Thank you.

The Chair: The hon. leader of the third party.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Madam Chair. Looking at this amendment, I have to say that I'm torn and for obvious reasons. I think even the mover of the amendment has already agreed with me on this, so I feel fairly confident in what I'm saying. I don't like the number at 18 per cent.

Mr. Fildebrandt: I'd like it zero.

Mr. McIver: Unlike the member that moved this, zero is the wrong number because debt is a tool that needs to be used judiciously in order to build infrastructure, but it also always has to come with a plan to pay it back that's credible.

Unfortunately, the current government has been using debt as something that's out of control, like a child whose parent pays their credit card every month and they never have to see the bill because somebody else pays it. In this case the government is actually responsible to that parent because that parent is the taxpayers and citizens of Alberta, and that's a terrible way to treat them, to take a cap off the debt. It's a terrible way to treat them. [interjection]

And right away the Health minister chirps in with the only solution the Health minister has, to lay off teachers and nurses, which actually speaks volumes about the imagination of this government. They only have one lever. They only have one lever. Every problem looks like a nail, and they only have one tool. It's a hammer, and the hammer is that either they're going to spend their brains out or they're going to lay off teachers and nurses. They have no other solutions. Yet they think that they are qualified to govern this province although the Deputy Premier has only one solution to every problem, to lay off teachers and nurses. Bad solution, Deputy Premier. Terrible solution, Madam Chair. That's what I'm saying.

Back to this. The government thinks that they should take all restraint off of borrowing. That is a terrible decision, and one that they've chosen to make. Incredibly irresponsible, incredibly disrespectful to Albertans, and really incredibly disrespectful to every child and grandchild in Alberta that's going to depend upon the government to deliver services to them in future years. While spending your brains out right now may buy lots of gifts for Albertans, Albertans are going to be sadly missing those gifts in a few years when the debt has to be paid back. They're going to need schools then, too. They're going to need hospitals then, too. They're going to need seniors' homes then, too. They're going to need roads then, too. The government of the day is going to be severely handicapped in their ability to provide those things because of the irresponsible financial behaviour of the current government.

There is one argument that says that any cap is better than no cap at all. I think I heard the mover say this, so I'm guessing the mover won't be offended by my saying that as well. On the other hand, we need to learn the lessons of history, Madam Chair, and one of the lessons of history, in my opinion, is to vote for what you want. Don't vote for what you don't want, because when you see something you don't want and you want to change it, so you choose to vote for something you don't want . . .

Mr. Mason: It could be a mistake.

Mr. McIver: You're right.

... it could be a mistake, Government House Leader. That's how we got an NDP government, people voting for what they don't want. Thank you. You finished my thought for me.

Madam Chair, the Government House Leader actually made my argument for me before I could even make it. The point that I was coming around to is that a year ago people were angry at the PC government – and I get that – and a lot of them didn't want to vote for us because of that. The problem was that they didn't like the other choices on the menu either, so what they did was vote for something they didn't like, and now they have what they have.

Madam Chair, I am left right now with a similar decision: vote for something you don't like or for something else that you don't like. I have to say that I don't like 15 per cent, and I don't like 18 per cent, and I don't like no limit at all. So rather than voting for something I don't want and repeating what the public did a year ago, on May 5, when they elected the current government, I think I am actually, with all due respect to the mover of the motion, going to be forced to vote against it.

Mr. Fildebrandt: But you'd said that you'd vote to make it less bad.

Mr. McIver: But it doesn't make it less bad. It's 20 per cent more.

Madam Chair, the Government House Leader actually has the courage at this point to wag his finger and say that it's reckless. His government is the epitome of reckless. If you actually open the dictionary and look under the word "reckless," you will see a picture of that Government House Leader or that Premier or surely some subset, if not the entire government, because that is the epitome of reckless.

What we have here, unfortunately, is also reckless. With all due apologies to the mover of the amendment, this is how we got an NDP government, folks. It's people voting for something they don't like. Today I choose not to vote for something I don't like, which is an 18 per cent debt limit. I don't like no debt limit either, but that's not on the menu. If it was, I surely wouldn't vote for it. This is a problem. The 15 per cent is a problem, and 20 per cent worse than the 15 per cent, which is the 18 per cent, is a bigger problem. It's reckless. It's harmful to Alberta. It will take us further down the debt rabbit hole, when we know we have a government with no intention of paying it back.

While I'm sure the mover's intentions are good, the last thing – the last thing – I want to do is to give this particular government any sort of licence to increase their borrowing by another 20 per cent, particularly when they've made it abundantly clear that they have absolutely no plan now or ever to pay penny one of it back. So out of respect for Alberta's seniors, that are going to need care in the future, out of respect for Alberta's children and grandchildren, that are going to need everything in the future from education to health care to roads to seniors' homes to social services, I cannot in good conscience vote for something I don't like because, as I'll repeat one last time, (a) I like saying it and (b) because I love how much the government dislikes hearing it, that would be the same as voting for the NDP, and I can't possibly do it.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Strathmore-Brooks.

Mr. Fildebrandt: Thank you, Madam Chair. I think we've hit that time of night where things start to get pretty loopy in here, which is when they tend to also get a bit more exciting. I'm very pleased to see that the Wildrose is starting to rub off on the leader of the third party. His aversion to giving the NDP an inch on debt certainly warms my heart. I really do appreciate seeing him take a stand against debt here. It might not be as hard as the stance of the Wildrose, but it is certainly a move in the right direction.

Now, there are two options in front of us right here. There are two options. One is to have a debt cap of 18 per cent, and the other is a debt cap of infinity. Those are the options that we have in front of us. It's not 15 or 18. If this was 15 or 18, the choice would be very clear to me. I think a 15 per cent debt cap is far too high. That's why every member of the Wildrose voted against the legislation which enabled the 15 per cent debt cap in the first place. We didn't believe in raising it to 15 per cent. We didn't believe in legalizing borrowing for the operations of government. We believe that you should balance the budget and not just the operational budget; the consolidated budget needs to be balanced.

But there are two options in front of us. One is an infinite level of debt with no restrictions on borrowing whatsoever, and the other is an 18 per cent limit on debt. Now, 18 per cent is about 18 per cent too high. I believe that we need to balance our budget and pay down the debt and be paid in full once again, but in the meantime it is the job of the opposition not just to criticize the government but to propose helpful solutions. It's to propose helpful solutions, and in the absence of any limit to borrowing whatsoever for the government, I believe that an 18 per cent limit is better than an infinite limit, Madam Chair. It's the job of the Official Opposition to ensure that the legislation is less bad than it would otherwise be. That is why the Official Opposition will vote for this amendment.

But regardless of what the government does, we'll be voting against this bill. Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to the amendment?

Seeing none, we'll call the question.

[Motion on amendment A4 lost]

The Chair: Moving on to the bill, are there any further amendments, questions, or comments with respect to Bill 10?

Then I will call the question.

[The remaining clauses of Bill 10 agreed to]

[Title and preamble agreed to]

The Chair: Shall the bill be reported? Are you agreed?

Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chair: Opposed? That's carried.

The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Mason: Madam Chair, I move that the committee rise and report.

[Motion carried]

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-South West.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Madam Speaker. The Committee of the Whole has had under consideration certain bills. The committee reports the following bill: Bill 10. I wish to table copies of all amendments considered by Committee of the Whole on this date for the official records of the Assembly.

The Deputy Speaker: Does the Assembly concur in the report?
Say aye.

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Deputy Speaker: Opposed? So ordered.

Government Bills and Orders
Third Reading

Bill 10
Fiscal Statutes Amendment Act, 2016

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It's my privilege to rise today and move third reading of Bill 10, Fiscal Statutes Amendment Act, 2016.

The act will allow our government to implement the Alberta jobs plan, creating the conditions to employ 100,000 people right across our province. By implementing this act and the Alberta jobs plan, we'll be supporting families, investing in infrastructure, diversifying our energy industry and markets, and supporting Alberta business.

Now is the time to act. Let's get Albertans working again. I ask all members of this House to support this bill.

With that, Madam Speaker, I move to adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Mr. Mason: Madam Speaker, I want to thank all hon. members for a very enjoyable, edifying, and entertaining evening.

I will move that we adjourn the House until 9 o'clock tomorrow morning.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 8:56 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

9 a.m.

Wednesday, May 25, 2016

[The Speaker in the chair]

Prayers

The Speaker: Good morning.

Let us each reflect in our own way. Today is the 30th anniversary of Canada's participation in International Missing Children's Day. Let us each reflect on our responsibilities to our children and ensure that child protection remains a high priority across our province and our nation. Let us pay respect and honour to those children who have been taken from their families and from their homes and send our thoughts to those families who are struggling with the loss that each of us can feel about the loss of a child.

Thank you. Please be seated.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders

Second Reading

An Act to Ensure Independent Environmental Monitoring

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Environment and Parks and minister responsible for the climate change office.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm happy to rise today for second reading of Bill 18, An Act to Ensure Independent Environmental Monitoring.

The bill will put in place the mechanisms required to ensure an environmental science program that benefits from rigorous scientific oversight and keeps Albertans and the world informed about the condition of our province's environment. Mr. Speaker, as one of the world's major energy producers we have a responsibility to monitor the impact of our activity on our land, air, water, and biodiversity.

In the past our province's approach to monitoring was sometimes questioned, so the previous government created an arm's-length agency, the Alberta Environmental Monitoring, Evaluation, and Reporting Agency, also known as AEMERA, with the aim of providing transparency and credibility to this important work. Mr. Speaker, I believe that the previous government had decent intentions, but the governance model they chose, which effectively outsourced the core government responsibility and work of environmental monitoring, which is important to public health or public safety, was inherently problematic. Indeed, monitoring involves both public health and public safety. It is a core government responsibility.

Last fall, as part of the government review of agencies, boards, and commissions, I asked for an independent review of AEMERA. The review was conducted by Dr. Paul Boothe, former Deputy Minister of Environment with the federal government and an expert in public administration. The review identified several concerns, including the fragmentation of scientific capacity within government, the diversion of dollars away from front-line monitoring and science to administration. In addition, there were rocky relationships with First Nations and with other levels of government. The review concluded that despite best efforts, AEMERA was a failed experiment in outsourcing a core responsibility of government to an arm's-length body and that Alberta should consolidate its environmental monitoring capacity within the Department of Environment and Parks.

The government has accepted the report's recommendations, and in April I announced the decision to return the responsibility of environmental monitoring back to government as a core function of government like public health and public safety. The environmental science program in this legislation will make government directly accountable for environmental monitoring. That is as it should be. It will ensure government can quickly address issues or gaps in monitoring and direct resources appropriately. These actions will also eliminate fragmentation of scarce scientific capacity and reduce costly administrative duplication.

Mr. Speaker, through this legislation we are taking the best elements of AEMERA, that supported independent scientific monitoring, and improving upon them. The act does this in several ways. For example, it outlines the duties of the chief scientist, a position in the Alberta public service that will have several key responsibilities to ensure our environmental science program is transparent, scientifically credible, accessible to the public. We've clearly written into the legislation the mandate that the chief scientist must make the scientific data public, must establish a schedule for public reporting, and must report according to that schedule on the condition of the environment. The chief scientist will have a legislated duty to ensure information is scientifically credible, and the chief scientist will have the power under the act to determine where peer review might be necessary.

The legislation also establishes a science advisory panel to provide independent advice to the chief scientist, periodically review the scientific quality of the research programs, and assess the scientific integrity of the overall program. I do note here, Mr. Speaker, that we have retained the science advisory panel as it was in the previous government's approach to environmental monitoring. We have retained the best aspects of the previous government's approach while eliminating the more costly aspects of governance and duplication. The panel will review the environmental science program to ensure it is scientifically credible and sound. I will also add that the individuals on the science advisory panel are remaining in their role.

The science advisory panel can also request to review a specific program or report, or the chief scientist can ask for their review and advice. The panel is empowered to publicly comment on matters of environmental science. This is an improvement over the previous act. The inclusion of this clause provides a guarantee for scientists that they can speak out on matters of public interest because that, too, is critical to ensuring credible and transparent scientific monitoring.

One more point, Mr. Speaker, is the composition of the science advisory panel. Members must be recognized experts in their field as evidenced by publications in peer-reviewed journals and by the record of scientific advice that they have provided. An important addition to the act, that we have included, is that future appointments will come from a list of qualified candidates provided by the science advisory panel. That way we are ensuring that the best minds are guiding us as we build up our knowledge and capacity to move forward.

Bill 18 also specifically mandates the minister to establish another panel to advise the chief scientist and the minister on how to incorporate traditional ecological knowledge into the environmental science program. We are taking the name for this program, the indigenous wisdom advisory panel, from the existing traditional ecological panel. This was their recommendation, and we took it. The indigenous wisdom panel will provide strategic advice and recommendations to the chief scientist and to the minister. That advice will have regard to meaningful incorporation of traditional ecological knowledge and inclusion of indigenous peoples within the monitoring, evaluation, and reporting system.

The indigenous wisdom panel will also provide advice on methodologies, cultural issues, and approaches. The panel will provide advice not only about traditional ecological knowledge and how to integrate it with western science programs but will also advise on how to best engage indigenous communities. This part is key. The relationship with the minister that the legislation establishes ensures that there is a nation-to-nation conversation and relationship around matters of environmental monitoring and reporting. This piece became difficult with a nation-to-agency relationship, Mr. Speaker, and this act seeks to address that.

Bill 18 also includes a number of transitional provisions that will help transition the dedicated agency staff back to government as well as move the property, assets, rights, obligations, liabilities, powers, duties, and functions to the Crown.

As I have mentioned previously, monitoring the environmental impacts of industry is a core government function. This vital work is to be the responsibility of the province directly. Bill 18 moves us closer to this goal by putting the right governance model in place and by maintaining the best aspects of the previous government's approach.

Mr. Speaker, I will conclude by indicating that this approach is supported by First Nations and by scientists because it maintains all aspects of scientific credibility and independence. For industry's part they wanted certainty and good governance. That is what this change affords them as well. Communities, particularly in the lower Athabasca, that I've had the privilege of touring since being sworn into cabinet last year, have told me over and over again that what they want is evidence-based decision-making. They want good analysis and good reporting to the public. They want an analysis of cumulative effects. They want to have input. They want to have a say. They want established, clear expectations of industry with thresholds and triggers, which is what the regional plan, in addition to our monitoring work, will undertake. First Nations over and over again have told us that they would like a new relationship with the province of Alberta, and that is what we are moving forward with.

This change, Mr. Speaker, is part of our overall approach to move forward on oil sands development in a thoughtful, more coordinated, more accountable way. It will ensure that Alberta's development is environmentally responsible, that it is credible, that it is backed by the best evidence and the best science. At the end of the day, this act will also ensure that we are accountable to the people of Alberta, to our trading partners, and to the rest of Canada.

Thank you. That concludes my remarks on Bill 18.

The Speaker: To confirm, hon. minister, you're moving second reading. Is that correct?

Ms Phillips: Yes, that's right.

The Speaker: Anyone wishing to speak? The Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to talk on Bill 18, an Act to Ensure Independent Environmental Monitoring. I'm quite confident that all present today believe that Albertans deserve a system of monitoring that not only provides world-class environmental monitoring but protects the independence and integrity of those involved. Ensuring this is a priority of the Wildrose Party, and to that end, there are aspects of this bill that deserve some questions being raised.

When it was announced last month that the Environmental Monitoring, Evaluation, and Reporting Agency, or AEMERA, was going to be disbanded under the ABC review, questions arose. What would replace it? It turns out that the body's main responsibilities would be brought back into the ministry and that many of the former agency's duplications of operations would be eliminated.

This bill will also establish the position and role of the chief scientist and goes further to establish a scientific advisory panel that would provide advice to the chief scientist. Of concern would be the autonomy of these members and the chief scientist. While the chief scientist has the autonomy to speak out in a public fashion, it is always a concern whether true independence while within a ministry is actually achieved.

The basis of this bill is a report by Paul M. Boothe, PhD, who was formerly Deputy Minister of Environment Canada. His report had three basic findings: AEMERA strained the province's limited scientific knowledge capital; two, bad relationships with the ministry in Environment Canada limited any scientific co-operation; and, three, high operating costs within AEMERA.

In his report Boothe pointed out that the former government failed to consider the limited capacity of the province's scientific community. The process of transferring the limited available scientific capacity from AEP to AEMERA became an arduous and stressful task. Furthermore, the report recognized that the scientific needs of Alberta Environment and Parks was not given due consideration, which considerably strained already poor relationships between the two.

Mr. Speaker, AEMERA was not, despite the findings of the Boothe report, a three-year failed experiment. In fact, numerous scientists throughout Canada opined that that was not the case. Many concerns of note include the fact that AEMERA had received the transfer of assets only in May of 2015, and this review began a scant three months later. This raises the question of whether other options existed. Could AEMERA's mandate have been better clarified, and would that have helped alleviate some of the friction between AEMERA, Alberta Environment and Parks as well as Environment Canada? Perhaps this clarification would have permitted the much-needed multijurisdictional co-operation, thus ending the turf war between agency, ministry, and federal government.

It is important to note that much of what the Boothe report cited as the high cost of AEMERA was derived from sole-sourced Alberta Environment and Parks contracts prior to AEMERA being established. Critics also point out the irony that this decision appears to be solely based on Boothe's report rather than making an independent scientific and financial peer-reviewed study.

While consideration of the government's position has merit, concerns do remain. AEMERA was initiated as an arm's-length organization for the government to refute accusations that the data that was being collected and the direction on environmental monitoring was somehow being influenced by politics. Of course, for the same reasons there are justifiable concerns with this government and the opportunity to taint the process with politics. Several times the members opposite have stated that one of AEMERA's flaws was that it was another example of the PC government taking core government and shipping it out to agencies with highly paid executives. As stated previously, consolidating power in the government's hands could be troubling, especially given some of the more radical views of this government's caucus and staff. It needs to be ensured that this body has absolute autonomy to present its position in a public manner.

Given Dr. Wrona's reputation we are happy to see that he will continue to lead the monitoring, and we hope that he and his panel will be given every opportunity to operate independently. With the monitoring taken within the ministry, it is now more important than ever that we ensure that these scientists are given free rein to operate independently. Without it, our energy sector's reputation may be at risk. This must not be allowed to happen. I will reiterate this point over and over. It is essential that we ensure the credibility and reputation of our environmental monitoring. Without it, we hamper our oil industry's vested interest in seeing that we have a world-class monitoring system. It's in these industries' best interests to track their environmental impact and mitigate it as much as possible. Hopefully, this will be achieved through this bill.

Another important facet of the Boothe report was the acrimony between the various groups. It's believed that much of the friction between upper management at Alberta Environment and Parks and AEMERA was due in no small part to uncertainty around accountability and roles between the two bodies. This exacerbated an already tense situation stemming from the poaching of scientific experts from the Alberta Environment and Parks ministry.

These poor working relations also factored into a much larger issue with Environment Canada. The report found that there was a distinct lack of collaboration between AEMERA and Environment Canada. It further found suggestions that there was a reluctance or unwillingness on the part of AEMERA to acknowledge that environmental monitoring is of a shared nature of jurisdiction. This lack of co-operation may have impacted the quality of monitoring as the exceptional resources and monitoring capability of Environment Canada were underutilized. This resulted in possibly inferior monitoring.

The last major point from this report was the concern of higher operation costs associated with AEMERA. While articles such as the April 7 one titled In Defense of AEMERA, written by half a dozen of Canada's scientists, dispute the high salaries that the Boothe report alleges, much of the high cost is due to sole-sourced Alberta Environment and Parks contracts before the formation of AEMERA. The report also found that AEMERA was duplicating government and administrative structures, most of which already existed in the public sector at a lower cost. As a result, Boothe recommended that the functions of AEMERA be brought into the Ministry of Environment and Parks, the result of which is Bill 18.

Criticisms aside, it does need to be acknowledged that within this bill's framework the minister does not have the ability to appoint board members directly, and that does further this panel's independence, in my opinion. As long as the board avoids the inclination of nominating too many insiders and strives for a broad selection of members, Albertans should have confidence in this panel. We need to also note that given this government's record on consultation, it was refreshing to see that there would be the establishment of an indigenous wisdom advisory panel to make sure that the perspective and concerns of the indigenous population are heard. While questions on who will populate this panel and what expertise they will bring remain unanswered, inclusion in the process is vital.

It is hoped that this bill will improve relations with Environment Canada partners, consolidate the scarce scientific expertise in one location in Alberta, provide the least costly solutions in that the bill would eliminate duplications and use public-sector salary comparators, ensure regular public reporting, ensure that the chief scientist can speak publicly without approval from the minister, and ensure no ministerial or government interference in the panel process or its functions. The goal in all of this is credible environmental monitoring that has integrity.

We have always had world-class environmental monitoring, and we want to continue to lead the world. That is what we need to do. No one should be allowed to say that we have nothing but the best environmental standards in the world. We can always do better, and we in the opposition will endeavour to ensure we do so.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake.

Mr. MacIntyre: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to address Bill 18, An Act to Ensure Independent Environmental Monitoring. As the title suggests, independent environmental monitoring is something we need some assurances about. Man-made and cyclical climate change are realities, and we need to understand the true extent of these realities. Therefore, there is nothing more important to Albertans and to the oil sands industry than the quality of environmental monitoring that occurs in our beautiful province. Alberta's oil sands industry is acutely aware that monitoring and mitigating their environmental footprint in Alberta's north is key to their continued operation in this province.

Mr. Speaker, at this stage I do plan to support this bill. However, I would like to take this opportunity to air some of my concerns and the concerns that have been expressed to me by the people in the magnificent riding of Innisfail-Sylvan Lake. Environment is very important to the magnificent riding of Innisfail-Sylvan Lake, especially Sylvan Lake, I might add. The constituents I've spoken to agree that environmental monitoring is a government responsibility every bit as important as public safety. Wildrose, furthermore, recognizes that splitting Alberta's scarce environmental capacities in a manner that impedes Alberta Environment and Parks' ability to fulfill their mandate undermines key provincial obligations to a problematic extent.

However, we understand that this Boothe report appears to be the foundation for the creation of this legislation, and I want to just address a little bit about Boothe's report. It identified a number of issues with the agency AEMERA. When it did that, the Canadian scientific community quickly made it clear that a number of accusations made within the report were questionable. For example, the wages of AEMERA's staff have been identified as actually being on par with the public sector's.

The claim that this agency is a three-year failed experiment drew heavy criticism from the scientific community as the finances for the organization had not been in place for those three years. Consequently, if you think about it, many of the agency's mismanaged expenses were, in fact, expenses of Alberta Environment and Parks, not the agency itself. It had not yet received its financing. These expenses, furthermore, were often a consequence of sole-sourced contracting rather than competitive bidding processes. We cannot blame the market for not working when you do not allow it to operate in the first place.

To anyone reading the Boothe report, it easily becomes apparent that any failing that AEMERA experienced operationally was really a failing of the government in control of it. They had the purse strings. The reality is that the mandate of the organization lacked clarity. It is furthermore evident that the broader organizational structure of the organization should have clarified the role that AEMERA was to play in its relationship with Environment Canada and Alberta Environment and Parks. In addition to that, data-sharing and monitoring capacities between the agencies of AEMERA, Alberta Environment and Parks, and Environment Canada could have easily been clarified within the mandates of these organizations, yet the previous government as well as this government did not do that.

Further irony is found as a consequence of this government's odd choice to support a sole-authored, bureaucratic report that was never peer reviewed in their evidence-based decision-making rather than having an independent financial and scientific review of AEMERA. Mr. Speaker, the evidence laid out in the Boothe report at times fails to be sufficiently compelling. I believe that it is in the Legislature's and Albertans' best interests if the government provides Albertans with an honest, independent assessment of why it is not only important but also possible to bring the activities of AEMERA in-house.

There are a handful of issues I must ask my colleagues to consider before casting their vote this morning. Question 1: can we in fact reconcile the consequences of dividing Alberta's environmental capacities to a point where Alberta Environment and Parks is impeded in their ability to accomplish the tasks required of them by Albertans? I believe that the answer to that question is no, not really. I furthermore believe that this House would be mistaken to downplay the importance of that factor in making their decision today.

Another question: can the independence of environmental monitoring be accomplished by a government, and if so, does this bill actually accomplish that task? There are scientists that are worried that the task of environmental monitoring is one that will be impacted by the ideology of whichever party governs. One of the biggest issues before the House today is the relationship between government, science, and perceptions of partiality. Not to be picky, but we do have a minister on this file that has been clear in the past about her radical anti-oil agenda. [interjections] She has been.

An Hon. Member: It is written.

Mr. MacIntyre: It is written.

While most Albertans support a position that recognizes the economic importance of our oil industry and mitigates common environmental concerns by supporting requirements to closely monitor oil extraction and transportation activities while mitigating the impact of these activities where possible, the book in question offers ideas to protesters looking to shut pipeline operations down. That's a reality. Albertans need assurances that any minister's – any minister's – personal disdain for the province's number one job-creating industry does not supersede common sense. Albertans want to know that this minister or any minister will not be interfering with the scientific process, silencing results that that minister might personally not agree with.

The minister has never recanted her past actions, and I'd invite her to do so. We all grow, we change, we mature, and the beliefs that we once so adamantly held in our youth are often changed when we come face to face with the hard realities. I would invite the hon. minister to give Albertans the assurances they need by acknowledging a change of heart in the ideology she has expressed in the past regarding her anti-oil stance. It would foster trust. It would provide assurances that Albertans need. I don't think it's an unreasonable request to ask of a minister of the Crown of a province whose number one industry is resource based.

I believe that we have some of those assurances in the bill that's before the House today. I look forward to further debate on the possibility of strengthening those assurances because they are very important to have. This bill's title really says it all: to Ensure Independent Environmental Monitoring. There is a perception amongst Albertans that that is not possible for a government to do.

There are scientists on the other extreme that see the writing on the wall for the Alberta NDP and wonder and worry that even if it is in capable hands now, these hands are likely to change. Letters on the matter of bringing AEMERA in-house have spelled out concerns that it's possible a pro-business government might not maintain sufficient environmental monitoring of oil sands activities, and I believe those were similar to statements made by some government members when they were in opposition. There were questions about the independence of monitoring. I want to take this opportunity to reassure those scientists that even pro-business politicians are entirely aware that environmental monitoring is the industry's biggest priority and must be.

Being pro-business is a position the politicians take because it is the clear path to help Albertans find the employment they need to meet and maintain their social and economic needs. Wildrose supports businesses because businesses support Albertans. Our support for these businesses is contingent upon them operating in the best interest of Albertans. Any industry that is harming Albertan waterways, soil, or air quality without any attempt to mitigate their impact is failing to act in the best interest of Albertans. Our oil industry knows this. Our oil industry understands that tolerance for their activities comes from their commitments to stewardship of Albertans' lands. Our oil industry knows that they need to be accountable, to monitor and take every available action to mitigate their environmental impact. Being pro-business does not make you anti-environment, nor does it make you anti-Albertan.

A sophisticated political party will not lose sight of the people whose interests must come first, Albertans. I do believe that this is the right move for Alberta's overall environmental reputation. I will be supporting the bill at this stage of its reading. I am hopeful, given the questions that I've raised, that the House will recognize this bill needs to go to committee. It desperately needs to be sent to committee so the scientific community has access to the lawmakers in our province, to bring their concerns before the committee so that this bill can be improved upon.

Thank you very much.

The Speaker: Are there any questions to the hon. Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake under 29(2)(a)?

The leader of the third party.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm happy this morning to rise to speak on Bill 18, An Act to Ensure Independent Environmental Monitoring. My concerns with the bill start with the very title of it. What the bill does, interestingly enough, is exactly the opposite of what the title advertises. It says, "to Ensure Independent Environmental Monitoring," and then the actual action of the bill is to take away whatever independent environmental monitoring is occurring right now and put it under the direct control of a minister, thereby making it dependent upon government and not independent, as the title of the bill falsely advertises. You can only imagine that from there there's not anywhere to go but downhill.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, this bill is a bit of a window into the mind of the current NDP government. It's a three-step process, it's cute, and it gets what they want. It just doesn't stand up to public scrutiny. The three-step process, as I see it happening over and over again by this government, is that, one, they decide what they want to do; two, they find any report anywhere or some part of some report somewhere that supports what they want to do; and then they latch onto that and call that the final word and do what they wanted to do in the first place.

We've seen it so many times. The most glaring example recently, as a comparator, is on the minimum wage policy, where the minister has actually said in Hansard that there are as many reports against that policy as there are for it, yet this government chooses the one report that is in support of what they wanted to do in the first place based on their ideology. They glom onto that, and they say: this is our excuse for following our ideology against all other reason and all other common sense. Unfortunately, this is another example of that.

The Boothe report actually isn't a bad report. It's been pointed out here that it hasn't been peer-reviewed and that only one person did it, but that by itself does not necessarily make it a bad report. The Boothe report gives several choices – several choices – that don't include bringing it under the direct control of a minister. You know what? It's just as bad to bring it under the direct control of a minister who is a pipeline denier and a minister who has written the preface for a book about shutting down the oil sands completely, that an action a day keeps the oil sands away or something of that nature.

I know the government side tends to think that's funny, and that actually is making my point. The fact that the government thinks it's funny that the person that's going to be in charge of monitoring actually wrote the foreword to a book about shutting down the oil sands completely actually absolutely kills any perception the public or the industry might have that the monitoring will be done in an impartial, balanced, unbiased way. [interjections] You can tell that the government side, Mr. Speaker, is trying to yell over me because they don't like hearing the truth. I know the truth hurts when it's against you, but I'm going to keep telling it. I'm going to keep telling it.

What we have here is a report to put the environmental monitoring under the direct control of a minister and a government that up until ever so recently were confirmed pipeline deniers. Now, they claim that they have seen the light and that they're going the other way, and that's a good thing until it isn't. It wouldn't be quite so bad if the minister in charge of this was the only one on the government side with a well-documented history of attacking pipelines and attacking the energy industry, but the fact is that the government benches are rife with, full of people that have protested against the energy industry. I see one of them shaking their head over there because they remember it.

The perception by the public of putting the environmental monitoring agency under the direct control of a government chock full of people that have fought against, protested against, written forewords to books against the energy industry really will do nothing but kill public confidence not only in Alberta but around the world, because around the world you cannot possibly take seriously the monitoring being under the thumb of someone who has a history of attacking the industry that the monitor is in charge of looking after. So it's the most irresponsible way in which you could possibly do this, yet the government has chosen this path above all the other choices available to them.

I could talk more, but I think that that is as big an indictment of this piece of legislation, Mr. Speaker – what's really interesting, once again, is that you don't have to make any of this stuff up. This stuff has already written itself. The members of the government side have already been to the protests, they've already written the forewords to the books, they've already attacked the oil and gas industry, and you don't have to look any further than Hansard to find a lot of it. If you look at that and you look at just common sense and credibility and compare it to the title of the bill, An Act to Ensure Independent Environmental Monitoring, and you see how completely divorced the subject matter of the bill is from the title of the bill, that tells you all you need to know.

I won't be supporting this. I understand there might be some amendments coming forward. I'll look at those, but they're going to have to be pretty special and pretty spectacular before they'll make this bill supportable because, Mr. Speaker, this goes in exactly the opposite direction that it should go.

The Speaker: Are there any questions of the hon. member under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, the Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I have some questions about this bill and some concerns. My concerns really revolve around the need to future-proof environmental monitoring. My real concerns on this bill are on the appointment process for the chief scientist. You know, it's a bit ironic that the title of the bill – and personally I am not a fan of the trend towards very political titles of bills – is An Act to Ensure Independent Environmental Monitoring, which implies that somehow this was not independent.

I know that later today we're going to be talking about Bill 1, which is, I think, the mother of all political spin on bill titles. But, you know, regardless, I think that, unfortunately, what it does is that it ramps up the rhetoric. We do love rhetoric in this place, but I think it does take away from fulsome and meaningful debate.

Without question, the Alberta Party are strong, strong supporters of environmental monitoring, of responsible development of all kinds in the energy industry, in the forestry industry, in manufacturing and agriculture, in anything and everything we do. Of course we are, because that's who Albertans are. Albertans believe those things, and that's our job in this place, to reflect that.

If I possibly can, I'm going to try my best to ramp down the rhetoric and really stick to the evidence. That's something the minister has said that she is trying to achieve here, a function that will be an evidence-based agency or department, a function within government, that not only will be independent but will be seen to be independent by Albertans. I think that is really, really important. If that is true and if she is striving and if the government is striving for an evidence-based approach, then why is it that the minister holds in her hands alone the ability to appoint the chief scientist? Now, she's given us assurances: "Well, there will be an open process. It will be fully transparent. We'll transition the group from before." My question is: how do we know? She's simply saying: "Trust me. Take me at my word. It will be fine."

I would ask all the members on the government side of the House . . .

Mr. McIver: Trust, but verify.

Mr. Clark: Exactly. My friend from Calgary-Hays said, "Trust, but verify." Absolutely. I think that's exactly the model that we need.

Let's put the shoe on the other foot. If you folks on the backbenches – I see that all of you folks on the backbenches are the only ones here at the moment – were in opposition . . . [interjections] Apologies, Mr. Speaker. I apologize. A slip of the tongue there. My apologies.

But let's put the shoe on the other foot here. Let's say that Bill 18 was proposed by a government, heaven forbid, that's run by our friends in the Official Opposition. Imagine that. Okay? Imagine that you're looking at this bill. But you're not on the government side; you're on the opposition side, and someone else is government. Would you be happy with this bill? Would you go: "Yeah. You know what? I trust that the minister of environment from that honourable party across the way is going to do the right thing. This is a bill I can enthusiastically support?"

When my constituents come to me and say, "Wait a minute; I'm not convinced that this is, in fact, independent; what I see is a minister who can appoint a chief scientist based on undefined criteria," you'll say: "No, no. You have it wrong. We trust this government. We trust this minister. It's okay." Would you really do that? I think that's the question that we need to ask ourselves about this because environmental monitoring, frankly, is far too important to simply leave up to trust. As my friend from Calgary-Hays said, let's trust, but verify.

What I would like to see is a panel that is a crossfunctional group – stakeholders from the environmental side, from government, from industry, from citizens at large – that perhaps vets candidates, presents a list of options to the minister, and she may choose from that vetted, independent, qualified list. Let's make this truly independent, and let's make that process open.

I have no concern calling this a core role of government – I really don't – whether it's an independent agency or it's the core role of government. I do think that AEMERA has done some good work with industry although the Boothe report does talk about potential cost savings and duplication and overlap. As I hope you know, I'm always on the lookout for those sorts of things. But I think that if it's going to be within government, the independence, the true independence, is absolutely critical.

Now, on the good side of the bill, I really do like the indigenous wisdom advisory panel. It certainly is an excellent idea and I think one that's time has come and an area that I will give the government praise for, engaging with indigenous peoples in a meaningful way. I think they have advanced that discussion quite effectively not just in this area but in others, and I certainly think they deserve some praise for that.

Again, the cost savings piece from the administrative side. I think there's a possibility that if we do the appointment process properly, it will promote the scientific integrity of environmental monitoring in Alberta, but that irony of the bill title being Ensure Independent Environmental Monitoring and then asking simply to trust the minister – "It's okay; trust me" – is a real concern.

I will be looking forward to seeing what amendments perhaps come out. We may consider some ourselves.

Mr. Cooper: Ourselves?

Mr. Clark: Yes, ourselves. My crack team of researchers are very capable of coming up with some really good stuff.

You know, I reiterate that concern around the true independence given what the stated objectives are of the government. I really do want to express that concern and look forward to hearing other debate, Mr. Speaker.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Under 29(2)(a) are there any questions to the Member for Calgary-Elbow?

Seeing none, I would call upon the Member for Barrhead-Morinville-Westlock.

Mr. van Dijken: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to speak to Bill 18, An Act to Ensure Independent Environmental Monitoring. It is always an occasion when a minister decides to rearrange the deck chairs within their portfolio, but it is a particularly poignant occasion when the minister needs legislation to move those deck chairs around.

Mr. Speaker, public servants are averse to these government reorganizations. It takes time for the new structure to take hold and for individuals to get used to the new reporting hierarchy. Whether or not an independent agency working at arm's length to government is any better than having those public servants employed as line employees of the department is always a good debate for the experts and academics of public administration. One can only hope that whatever conditions existed and necessitated the need to create the independent agency, those conditions have passed and that adequate regulatory enforcement will continue when brought back into the line department.

One difference between being arm's length and being back in the line department is ministerial authority. The minister can tell those public servants to do something, and essentially they have to do it. If they were at arm's length, there is a barrier in the way preventing ministerial interference. The question for Albertans becomes: can you trust the minister of environment to do the right thing? With this government's history of environmental radicalism such as the minister's foreword to An Action a Day: Keeps Global Capitalism Away, we are concerned about ministerial interference, but the opposite was the concern when you had political parties tied to big corporate donations. Thankfully, the NDP and Wildrose shared a common cause and eliminated corporate and union donations to lessen that possibility of interference.

If the public servants are spared interference, we trust Alberta's scientists will deliver the world-class environmental monitoring we rely on. It is vital to ensure that the scientists are given the freedom to operate independently in the public service environment. What I mean is: follow that rabbit down the rabbit hole. You never know where it might take you. Write those papers, get published, but also summarize and brief the minister on those papers. Without world-class monitoring the reputation of our energy sector is at risk. It is crucial that we defend the integrity and credibility of our environmental monitoring.

Co-operation between federal and provincial monitoring bodies is important to ensure we maintain world-class standards in Alberta. Early on it is going to be critical that federal and provincial scientists get on the same page and are able to share information back and forth without repercussions but also to stick to their constitutional roles and responsibilities when it comes to the environment.

I am pleased to see that a highly reputable scientist, Dr. Wrona, will continue to lead the environmental monitoring. We appreciate that the minister cannot appoint monitoring board members directly. That being said, it makes me wonder. Rather than pals of the minister being chosen, if the board is selecting nominees, it might become too much of an insiders' clique. Don't get me wrong; I've heard nothing to put into question any of these people's objectivity. But no one wants this group of scientists to be an offshoot of the Pembina Institute or the Sierra Club or Greenpeace or only hiring out of one university. We need a diversity of scientists from all backgrounds and walks of life with credible, scientifically peer-reviewed published papers, who work for Albertans. It is this credibility that ensures Alberta's world-class monitoring secures the longevity and reputation of Alberta's energy sector.

The oil industry is fully invested in seeing Alberta have world-class environmental monitoring. They know tracking industry's impact is a priority because for them mitigating their impact is a priority. The landscape that is already certified reclaimed and the grasslands populated by wood bison are such an example of industry mitigating their impact.

Mr. Speaker, Wildrose will be watching the government closely to ensure that political interference does not damage the quality or credibility of our monitoring. Wildrose will sound the alarm if government goes too far off track.

In the meantime I am prepared to support this piece of legislation.

The Speaker: Are there any questions under 29(2)(a) for the Member for Barrhead-Morinville-Westlock?

Are there any other members who wish to speak? The Opposition House Leader.

Mr. Cooper: Well, thank you. It's a pleasure to rise today and speak to Bill 18, An Act to Ensure Independent Environmental Monitoring. I know that it has been mentioned in the House already this morning, the unique title. When it comes to moving environmental monitoring from an independent, arm's-length body of government into what essentially is the minister's office—I know you'll be surprised, Mr. Speaker, but from time to time in this Chamber politics break out—the independence of the minister's office could potentially be called into question. [interjections] I know. It's a shock. To move monitoring from an independent, arm's-length body into the minister's office, it may be a bit of a stretch to call the piece of legislation that does that An Act to Ensure Independent Environmental Monitoring.

Before I continue, let me be clear that as a province we need to ensure that we continue to have independent environmental monitoring because the future of our province will be determined by how we go about engaging with our environment and with industry. It's important for all of us to ensure that we are using science to monitor our environment. It's important to all of us that we are conserving our environment while we engage with industry.

Alberta has been a world leader in finding that balance. I know that my hon. colleague from Calgary-Foothills is more than pleased to stand in this place and talk about that relationship that industry has had. Over a very short period of time industry has made incredible steps forward on this file, and we should all be proud of that. We should be proud that we lead North America on our environmental record, and we should be proud of the relationship that we have.

Let me be clear that as a conservative I believe we ought to conserve things, and that includes being responsible with our environment. Many Albertans who are conservative are some of the best environmentalists when it comes to conserving ranchlands and much of the grasslands that are in your constituency, Mr. Speaker, as well as the foothills and the forests. We all have a desire to ensure that we are acting appropriately.

I appreciate the comments from the independent member from Calgary-Elbow when he spoke about what the NDP opposition would say to a piece of legislation just like this, when the government is saying: "Trust us. We're bringing it into the minister's office, but we promise not to make it political. We promise not to make the appointments political. We promise to allow the independence to be a priority." This might come as a surprise to you, Mr. Speaker, but the NDP government of today will not be the government forever in our province. [interjections] I know. It's hard to believe. It's possible that future governments won't treat the independence of the chief scientist as this minister claims she will keep the independence. It's concerning when we move in this direction.

10:00

Now, having said all that, that's not to say that AEMERA was perfect. The Boothe report was released and identified a number of significant challenges around AEMERA, and my hon. colleague outlined a number of those in terms of the amount of resources that are available and the interaction between the ministry and AEMERA. It's not perfect, but to say that the only solution is to bring all of the monitoring into the minister's office is a little disingenuous. In fact, to say that, to bring all of the monitoring, and that you're going to make it more independent is certainly not a good reflection of the facts. So we have some significant challenges with that.

We've heard in the House this morning about some of the government's history around these types of issues and around potentials with ministerial interference, and we've certainly seen over the last year a consolidation of powers into the minister's office. I remember times when the Member for Edmonton-Strathcona would rise in this House and speak of draconian legislation that consolidates power.

Now we're really starting to get a bit of a track record that this government actually knows better than anybody else. They're making significant changes around the powers that ministers have or don't have, and it's a concern. It is a concern to all Albertans around the powers that ministers should or shouldn't have, around what I consider to be a step in the wrong direction when it comes to allowing the House to debate issues and not just consolidate powers into the minister's office. This is another step in that direction.

It is critically important—critically important—that should this bill pass, the independence of the chief scientist and all of the other panel members and folks who are going to populate the indigenous wisdom advisory panel have the ability to speak out because without that independence it puts significant risk to both, in fact, the environment and industry, which is not a step in the right direction. It's critical that we defend the integrity and the credibility of our environmental monitoring, and this step certainly can put that into question.

Now, I am interested in the debate because AEMERA wasn't perfect. We needed to take steps to rectify some of the challenges there, so I'm sympathetic to this piece of legislation at second reading while we move forward. I'm not sure if at the end of the day I'm able to support it, particularly because we've seen very good independent, science-based agencies and bodies, many of which this government supports, reportedly.

Just yesterday in the House the Energy minister spoke about the NEB and the approval process for pipelines, how it should be less political and removed from political decisions using independent, science-based monitoring bodies like the NEB, that has made some positive recommendations over the past few days. The government has said that that is appropriate, but now we see something that could put that sort of independence into question.

Perhaps more importantly than all of that, Mr. Speaker, while I think many of those points ought to be considered, one of the challenges that we have with this government's we-know-best approach is their seeming refusal to consult or to get dissenting opinions on this. While the Boothe report certainly is one of those reports and there are certainly some strengths there, there are a number of other voices in the public domain that aren't comfortable with the direction that this government is taking, this consolidation of power around the minister's office.

One thing that I am very committed to and passionate about is the use of committees in this House so that all members can have access to appropriate information and we can make the best decision for the whole province, not just for the minister's office or not just for an ideological bent of the government but to allow that discussion to happen. So I'm happy to move an amendment today, Mr. Speaker, that I would love to pass along, and this particular amendment will be an amendment that you are becoming quite familiar with.

If you don't mind, I'll just proceed with the amendment, if you're okay with that, or would you prefer to wait until it's distributed?

The Speaker: Just give them a minute to get it distributed.

Mr. Cooper: I see, Mr. Speaker, that the table has a copy now. Would you be okay if I proceed?

The Speaker: Sure.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, it's a notice of amendment on Bill 18, An Act to Ensure Independent Environmental Monitoring. I move that the motion for second reading of Bill 18, An Act to Ensure Independent Environmental Monitoring, be amended by deleting all the words after “that” and substituting the following:

Bill 18, An Act to Ensure Independent Environmental Monitoring, be not now read a second time but that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Resource Stewardship in accordance with Standing Order 74.2.

Mr. Speaker, there is a wide range of opinions on this piece of legislation, and what this Assembly should be able to do is to have those voices come to a table where we can all speak and all hear, quite likely, from both Dr. Boothe and I believe it's Dr. Wrona, from some of the other organizations that have been involved in the creation of AEMERA, from some of the folks who would like to speak specifically to the importance of the independence of monitoring, from some of the individuals in the environmental community that think this is a step in the right direction, from some folks in industry that think this is a step in the right direction as well as from those same folks who work in the environmental monitoring movement that really appreciate and are concerned about moving this inside the department. Having appropriate information is critically important to the decision-making process.

Now, I know that government members are going to stand up in their place and say, “Oh, Mr. Speaker, we don't have time” and, quite likely, “We've already announced that we're cancelling AEMERA.” But in this Chamber we must – we must – take a long view on decisions that we make, and if that means we need to pause so that we get the right decision this time, not just for this government but for the next government and the government after that and the government that some day I hope my children will be involved in, if that means we need to pause for three weeks, I'd say that it's worth it.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

We will refer to this amendment as REF1.

Are there any questions of the hon. member under 29(2)(a)?

The hon. Member for Sherwood Park.

Ms McKittrick: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, I'm so pleased that in this House we are spending so much time talking about the environment. I know it's something that maybe the House has not seen before. So through this bill that was introduced, Bill 18, An Act to Ensure Independent Environmental Monitoring, I am finding out that we all in this House are committed to environmental stewardship.

First of all, I wanted to speak and thank the members opposite who have spoken and agree that it is important for government to take environmental stewardship very, very seriously, and I thank you for your concern for the environment.

Because we have spent so much time talking about the need to ensure that we monitor the environment and the consequences of industry, I would respectfully suggest that we should not be supporting the amendment as proposed by the MLA for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills. I personally do not think that we have the time to refer this to a committee because we need to make sure that we continue to monitor the environment and then to set in place the systems to do so. Now, I do appreciate the intent of the amendment. That demonstrates, really, the commitment of the members opposite to making sure that as a government and as Albertans we do watch over the environment and that we carefully monitor the impact of our industry and actions on the environment.

Mr. Speaker, over 40 years ago, this is when I started wondering about the environment. Many of us do remember the famous book by Rachel Carson that warned all of us about the impact of what we were doing to our environment. So since we have been concerned about environmental awareness and environmental monitoring for over 40 years, maybe 50 years – I can't remember exactly when the book was published – I think it's important that we in this House vote down this amendment and that we continue the process to make sure that Bill 18 is enacted as an act of this House.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. leader of the third party. Not under 29(2)(a)? Is it a main question?

Mr. McIver: I was going to speak but not under 29(2)(a).

The Speaker: Proceed.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I thank the hon. House leader from the opposition for the amendment on An Act to Ensure Independent Environmental Monitoring. Of course, the amendment is a good one because the bill in its current form really goes in the opposite direction from where the title advertises that it goes. This will actually give all members of all sides of this House an opportunity to get together, hear expert evidence and testimony from Albertans who are well suited, well able, well educated, well experienced to give us advice on getting this right.

The environment is something that we all share. It needs to be monitored, it needs to be enforced, and it needs to be done fairly. It needs to be done in such a fashion that the future is protected for our children and grandchildren. It also needs to be done fairly and in such a fashion that when it's done well, those companies and those seeking to operate their companies, extract resources and undergo activities of that nature, that have committed to doing it right, doing it properly, doing it in a way that stands up to environmental scrutiny, will be allowed to do so. Anything else is not suitable. Anything else is not good enough for Alberta.

This amendment will actually give us a chance to get advice from people that will put us, I think, in a better position to have an environmental monitoring effort and organization and agency that can accomplish that, Mr. Speaker, and I would implore all members of the House to vote for this amendment. It can only make the legislation better.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Any other questions under 29(2)(a) to the Member for Calgary-Hays? West Yellowhead, under 29(2)(a)?

Mr. Rosendahl: Yeah. Well, I find this very interesting, in fact, that the third-party member talks about environmental issues. I've been involved in environmental issues for many years, hon. member, and I'll tell you that your record on the environment was probably down around in the category of an F, okay? That's where it sat. Whether you were talking forestry issues, whether you were talking air and water issues, they were all down there, right? They were there. I've argued with environment ministers over the years on these things, so I would like to know . . .

The Speaker: Hon. member, the comment, then.

Mr. Rosendahl: Sorry, Mr. Speaker. I would like to know exactly what his comments on that are.

Mr. McIver: Well, Mr. Speaker, the protest continues. Actually, the hon. member just made all my arguments from the first time I was on my feet. He actually gave them a resounding approval stating – in fact, even in his remarks here he talked about how he argued with environment ministers. Did you hear what he said? He argued with many environment ministers. Yet the same member is happy to put the whole environmental monitoring thing under the control of every environment minister from now on. You see how that just doesn't match up? Do you just see how exactly opposite of what is right the hon. member just demonstrated for this entire House?

There's a bill here that says to put the environmental monitoring agency under the direct control not only of this environment minister, which I or the House may or may not agree with – there are different opinions, I'm sure, in the House about how much we agree with this environment minister – but this bill doesn't just say to put it in control of this environment minister; it says: put it in control of every environment minister forever until the legislation changes. The government side member just stood up and said that there was a whole string of environment ministers that he fought with because he couldn't trust that they would independently do the right thing.

Then he asked me my opinion. Well, you know what? When I get served up a softball that slow and that easy, what could I do but hit it over the fence? He just made the argument. He just absolutely made the argument that this should go to committee to be improved. He just made the argument that the legislation in its current form is absolutely a disaster. I couldn't possibly give better evidence against this legislation than the hon. member on the government side just delivered.

The Speaker: Are there any other questions or comments under 29(2)(a)?

The hon. Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake.

Mr. MacIntyre: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. That's a hard act to follow.

Mr. Speaker, I think this amendment in sending this bill to committee is absolutely important. The hon. member from I believe it's Sherwood Park made the statement that she wasn't supporting the amendment because of the issue of time, that it would take too long. Well, the government has been in the saddle for a whole year, and they have rushed legislation after legislation through this House and then had to back up. Let's remember Bill 6. Let's remember what happened with Bill 6. It initially came out, and the government members over there applauded how great Bill 6 was and then ended up having to issue six pages of amendments to a bill they initially said was just fine. That's the problem with rushing legislation.

This legislation, Mr. Speaker, needs to go to committee so that the scientific community, the experts, which this government is not, can come and give their sound wisdom to the merits of this bill and the suggestions for change that they think, being the experts, this bill should have within it. It's called consultation. It is the Achilles heel of this government. In three years that one thing is going to bring this government down, their consistent lack of consultation with the people of Alberta, with the experts within our ranks in this province. This bill must go to committee. It is vitally important. Besides which, it will give the backbenchers on the other side something to do, and they need something to do.

I really support this thing going to committee. I would hope all members will. We need to hear from Albertans on this issue.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Are there any questions under 29(2)(a) to the Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake?

The Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Mr. Clark: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Just very briefly I want to speak in favour of this amendment. I've actually just been sitting here going back and forth with one of our researchers on perhaps how we may be able to cook up our own amendment here when we get to committee. But, you know, I just want to pick up on what the hon. Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake said. I think he made a really important point, that we're blasting through bills here. We're going a hundred miles an hour, and there's a real risk when we go this quickly through bills that there are unintended consequences, that mistakes get made.

There are 22 bills on the Order Paper. Fully 12 of them have been put on the Order Paper since May 2, in the last three weeks. While I have no trouble working hard – I'm willing on behalf of Albertans to work morning, noon, and night to do the important work of this Assembly – it is very challenging for any of us to actually give thorough review to important pieces of legislation that have wide-reaching consequences. I do have tremendous researchers on my team – I really do – and they do incredible work. They work long, long, long hours to help and provide me with the information I need, but frankly, my friends, it's risky, and I don't think Albertans want to see us blast through legislation as quickly as we're about to do here in the next perhaps as little as five or six days. There's a lot of risk in that, so I enthusiastically support this amendment and would encourage the government to do the same.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Are there any other members who wish to speak to the amendment? The Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to speak in support of this amendment. Let's face it; committee is the best place to gather information. We can have a myriad of different people come in with all the expertise they have and share information that can help us make decisions. Of course, that's what we're here to do. We're here to make informed decisions, and I don't believe we can make properly informed decisions without having all the information that's available to us. Obviously, committee is the place to get that. We don't know about all the different options. We don't know about all the different avenues that could be used to get us to where we want to be with environmental monitoring.

Now, there were some problems with AEMERA, but this is very important. This is very important to Albertans. It's very important to the world to show that we are world class at monitoring, so we need to have credible, transparent, world-class monitoring with integrity. By going to committee, we can gather the information we need to make informed decisions on the future of AEMERA and, of course, our environmental process here in Alberta.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Are there any questions under 29(2)(a) to the Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky?

Are there any other members who would like to speak to the amendment known as REF1?

[The voice vote indicated that the motion on amendment REF1 lost]

[Several members rose calling for a division. The division bell was rung at 10:25 a.m.]

The Speaker: We will now revert to discussion on the main bill. Are there any other members who wish to speak to Bill 18, An Act to Ensure Independent Environmental Monitoring? The Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Dr. Swann: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. With some caution because I can't remember whether I spoke to this before – I'm assuming that the table will tell me if I did – I would certainly like to raise the opportunity for this government to look at this again. It reminds me a lot of George Bush's clear skies bill and some of the decisions that he made around forestry, talking about a protective forestry act down there.

It's actually the opposite of what is being suggested in the name of the bill, ensuring an independent monitoring agency. In fact, we're taking away an independent monitoring agency and putting it into the government again, which it was in the past. It flies in the face of, I guess, what many of us in this House over the last 20 years were calling for at Environment, independent monitoring of the oil sands. People like Dr. David Schindler had to come up and somehow find the resources and do some independent monitoring and assessment of some of the impacts on the Athabasca River associated with oil sands activity. I'll reiterate what has been known for years about some of the groundwater leakage from some of these tailings ponds and the substantial changes that occurred in fish health as well as the potential for human health risk.

It may well be the case that this government will monitor in a more fastidious and evidence-based way. What many of us in Alberta have come to realize is that without some independence, without perhaps some federal involvement, which was initiated – in fact, the previous government were forced to set up an independent monitoring agency by the federal government and get independent scientists from across the country. Yes, you have to pay more for that, but there is a new sense of, I guess, credibility, not only locally but internationally, when you set up that kind of a monitoring agency.

It's unfortunate that we don't have the resources to do better than to bring it in-house again because a tremendous amount of thought and effort and investment went into AEMERA. It needed some stronger oversight. It needed more strict control in terms of its interference in some cases, as I've heard, with Alberta Environment and its attempt to actually control the agenda of Alberta Environment. Its specific role should have been defined very clearly on the oil sands and other aspects of environmental assessment – air quality, river flows, toxic emission measurements – that are properly the purview of the Alberta government but could have been maintained there. To abandon it wholesale and to have the temerity, I guess, to say that we're now going to ensure independence when the very act of creating AEMERA was an attempt to create some independence raises questions about the kind of communications we're dealing with here: very ambiguous and, in fact, misleading, I would argue.

While the decision has been made and it's clear that at least with this government this is the way it's going to go, to be fair, I see no reason why with a stronger environmental agenda in this government we're going to see better monitoring than we've seen in the past. It still begs the question: why destroy a body that has the credibility of the scientific community, who have protested loudly this change of direction? It also begs the question: if a future government comes in, would they be prepared to monitor it in an honest and evidence-based way and ensure independent reporting to the Legislature?

Again, an amendment that would be favourable, from my point of view, would be to have this body report independently to the Legislature. As long as a body is reporting to the minister, we know what happens over time. The minister does not like to be embarrassed. The minister does not like to see bad news. Reports get amended. Reports get polished, you might say, and we all begin to doubt the credibility of the findings.

I mean, on the face of it this suggests, again, that while one could couch this in terms of financial savings, one is doing a serious disservice to the whole scientific community, the aspect of independence, the recognition that this was progress three years or so ago when the federal government, provincial government, and industry came together to say: we will independently fund a body that will be directing the indicators, monitoring the impacts, and reporting independently to Albertans and to the world what's improving, what's not improving, and what changes need to be made to ensure that water and air quality in the area is second to none or at least not being adversely affected by the activities in the oil sands.

It's difficult to support this, given that it's reversing decisions that this Legislature made under national duress. This is a government that wants new pipelines built based on environmental credibility, yet they're dissolving an organization that a lot of preparation and investment went into. [some applause]

That's all I needed to say. Thanks, Mr. Speaker. I got the clapping I needed.

The Speaker: Are there any questions or comments for the Member for Calgary-Mountain View under 29(2)(a)? The Member for Calgary-Lougheed.

Mr. Rodney: Yes, please. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Hon. member, we've been in the Chamber a very similar amount of time. It's been close to a dozen years now. I've not had the opportunity to have you answer a question that I've asked, and unfortunately you haven't served in government yet.

I wonder if you're aware of a certain quotation from a debate exactly like this. It's a short quotation, and I'd be happy to read it to you and then get your reaction. It goes like this.

First of all, we've been calling for an independent body, a body that's arm's length from the government, to be able to make decisions that are completely free from political interference or any kind of interference. The challenge with this bill at the moment, with the way it's written, is that it's not going to be an independent, arm's-length body making these decisions. We're relying on the minister to appoint people to this process or to this agency who will then select the scientists to participate. The secondary challenge with that is: based on which credentials are these scientists going to be selected? How can Albertans be certain that they are independent, free thinking, and not influenced whatsoever by the very board that selected them?

This speaks to the problem of appointments, to begin with, in any capacity. When you don't have an independent arm's length, a distance between government and a body that they're selecting, questions arise, [and] questions [begin] about judgment.

Hon. member, you might recall this. You and I and just a few others were in the House on Halloween 2013, when the current minister of economic development said this. This is directly from Hansard on page 2661.

I wonder, Member: what word would you apply to the fact that on Halloween 2013 the minister was pronouncing this, which is the exact opposite of the bill that he is promoting and supporting at this time? Is it hypocritical? What word would you use?

Dr. Swann: Well, thank you for the question. One might call that a leading question. What word you use, I guess, is your call. I know that it's always different when one challenges from the opposite side of the floor and you're in government. We've heard that from the PCs for years as well, that it's always different: "You guys don't really know what it's like in government. You have to make tough decisions. There are finances. There are politics." I don't mean politics in the generic sense. I mean adverse influences.

Having said that, this is clearly calling for the need, at the very least, of an independent appointments commission, a commission that is based, perhaps, on some retired judges who've never had any particular party affiliation. If need be, if you can't find anybody who hasn't had any party affiliation, at least have a mix of party affiliations on this body, some thoughtful, senior, somewhat independent people who would make to the best of their ability independent appointments, whether it's to this Environmental Monitoring, Evaluation, and Reporting Agency or to the new energy efficiency agency that's now coming up. We would all feel better, I think.

Even the government would feel better if they had an independent agency such as they do in Ontario, where all appointments to agencies, boards, and commissions have to go through this body. This body weighs the evidence, weighs the CVs, weighs the partisanship of various applicants, and tries as best as possible to put together a merit-based appointment system so that all of us feel confident, whether it's the health board and we have some experienced health people or it's the energy efficiency board and we have people who have some strong engineering background and a recognition of the importance of energy efficiency and where the latest evidence is pointing, or in terms of the environmental experts, are at least recognized for their independence, that they're affiliated with a university, not in any way tied to government funding, and have not been shown to favour one party or another.

This is an opportunity, I guess, to take the next step, which this government has long called for when it was in opposition: an independent appointments commission. I think we would all recognize the value of that. The credibility of the government would be enhanced. Yes, you'd get some appointments that you didn't necessarily like, but on balance we would all end up with higher quality, more independent people who would enhance the reputation of Alberta in terms of its science-based, evidence-based decision-making. It would speak well of a government that is actually walking the talk, not just speaking about what a better system is but delivering on it.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. members.

I'd just like to use this moment to caution against the use of unparliamentary terms in the House. Be cautious when you are making comments.

Bill 19

Reform of Agencies, Boards and Commissions Compensation Act

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Coolahan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my pleasure to rise today to move second reading of Bill 19, the Reform of Agencies, Boards and Commissions Compensation Act.

The purpose of this proposed legislation is to address consistency and fairness in executive compensation levels for the public agencies, boards, and commissions, also known as ABCs, that are subject to the Alberta Public Agencies Governance Act. Alberta's public agencies play an important role adjudicating, managing, and delivering innovative programs and services on behalf of government. As such, they form a significant part of Alberta's public sector. However, these same agencies also count for a substantial portion of government spending on salaries, and compensation arrangements that are funded by public dollars need to be in line with the broader Alberta public sector and comparable jurisdictions. That's why our government is taking action. We are focused, and we are determined to increase both the transparency and consistency of how executives of provincial agencies are compensated.

Mr. Speaker, the 2016 Speech from the Throne signalled this government's intent to introduce enabling legislation to address the growing divergence in compensation practices between some public agencies and the core public service. The legislation before the House today is therefore a key deliverable in our government's commitment to Albertans. This legislation is meant to address the wide variance in the compensation philosophies, levels, and practices that currently exist in our ABCs.

With the divergence between some agencies and the broader public sector having grown over a considerable period of time, the time for action is now. Now is the time to begin the hard work of creating a consistent framework for executive compensation across our ABCs. Doing so is consistent with similar actions taken by other jurisdictions, including British Columbia, Ontario, Quebec, and Nova Scotia, and it is consistent with the recommendations of previous Auditor General reports that government provide direction on executive compensation practices for senior executives in our ABCs.

Mr. Speaker, let me be clear. This legislation will accomplish a number of items. First, it authorizes the establishment of compensation frameworks for designated public agencies and designated executives governed by the Alberta Public Agencies Governance Act, or APAGA. If this proposed legislation is passed, over the course of the summer the government will be contracting a professional benchmarking compensation firm to provide guidance on a rigorous and transparent set of frameworks for executive compensation. The government will also be reaching out to ABCs and the general public for feedback on the compensation philosophy that will guide these frameworks. I urge all Albertans and all members of this House to share your thoughts with the government through the online portal.

Second, this legislation will enable the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board to issue directives requiring agencies to provide compensation information, including employment agreements and compensation policies, plans, programs, and studies.

Third, this legislation will provide notice to executives and agencies affected by compensation frameworks. By adopting this approach, we are ensuring that we respect current contracts to the extent possible while also ensuring that public dollars are used responsibly.

Mr. Speaker, let me be clear that this legislation will enable the government to set, limit, or otherwise govern the compensation of designated executives or designated members through the establishment of compensation frameworks. This could include setting limits on variable pay or severance entitlements. This is a reasonable, responsible, and proactive approach by the government to deliver fairness and transparency for the people of Alberta.

Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of members present I should add that this legislation will apply to APAGA agencies whose chief executive officers or equivalents have current base salaries over $200,000 per year, excluding postsecondary institutions. This approach to addressing executive compensation in ABCs is aligned with the broader review of agencies, boards, and commissions. As members will recall, the government is nearing completion of phase 1 of the review, which applies to APAGA agencies, again excluding postsecondary institutions. As we announced in Budget 2016, phase 1 of the review will lead to the amalgamation or dissolution of 26 agencies, boards, and commissions, saving $33 million over three years.

Mr. Speaker, I want to re-emphasize that rather than implementing the frameworks immediately, there will be an interval between passing the legislation and introducing regulations to allow ministers accountable for the designated agencies to introduce the new approach and to have conversations with the boards and agencies that will be affected by the new compensation framework. This interval will also include an opportunity for Albertans to review our compensation philosophy and provide further comments through the government of Alberta website, and this interval will allow us time to consult with benchmarking professionals to ensure that we get this right.

Mr. Speaker, by moving forward with this legislation in the current session, we will have an aggressive but reasonable timeline for bringing consistency and fairness to executive compensation at public agencies. This is a priority for this government and for all Albertans. This is the right thing to do and the right time to do it. I ask this House for its support in moving this legislation forward, and I look forward to our discussion on this important bill.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Foothills.

Mr. Panda: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I actually like the title of this bill, reform of agencies, boards and commissions. It seems that the intentions are good here. I'm always surprised when this government does something that saves money but not in the way you probably might think. I'm not surprised that they're cutting expensive salaries for patronage appointments, and I'm not surprised that they finally found a few pieces of low-hanging fruit to cut spending.

What I am surprised at are the hidden gems in their announcement. When the wage freeze was announced in March for agencies, boards, and commissions, ABCs, the most entertaining exemption was added in. Let me read this section from the announcement: the government in March announced this salary freeze for ABC managers and non-unionized staff. That announcement had a nice hidden gem inside it. There was a salary freeze and now a cut for the executives. There was a salary freeze for staff except the unionized ones. Yes, just as everyone expected, the NDP has given preferential treatment to their union friends.

Mr. Panda: You broke many other things.

I wonder what would happen if all the executives decided to unionize. Would they be exempt from this salary cut if they were part of a union? The problem is not just the salaries of the executives at the top; the problem is the raises they're giving out to the tens of thousands in the entire public sector.

An Hon. Member: If they were unionized now, we'd be able to work through the contract.

Mr. Panda: Yes.

Congratulations. The salary cut for the executives will save taxpayers' money, but do not stop there. Do not stop on first base. Go for home. Score some real points, and save some real money. Use attrition to reduce the number of middle managers. Mr. Speaker, we are not asking them to fire anybody. We're asking them to just use attrition to reduce the number of middle managers.

Renegotiate the public-sector union contracts. If the government can hold the line for the top, they can hold the line for the middle. I haven't been at this job for very long, but I already know how easy it is to add fat in the middle, if you know what I mean. It needs to be slimmed down just as much as the bloated middle managers need to be slimmed down. A precedent is being set with this bill, a precedent that contractual wages can be altered. Union contracts are no different. They may represent more people, but the precedent will exist after this bill is passed. Union contracts need to be part of the wage freeze. Union contracts need to stop getting special treatment just because the unions hold huge voting powers within the NDP.

Mr. Speaker, over 100,000 people have lost their jobs. More are losing their jobs as we speak. The unemployment rate is in the double digits in some of my colleagues' ridings, like Bonnyville-Cold Lake. We cannot give special treatment to government workers. This special treatment costs Albertans in the form of higher taxes, which this government insists on spending instead of saving. We cannot give special treatment to unions because the NDP allows unions to have so much influence over them. The money being spent on these contracts and these unnecessary salaries is causing Albertans to cough up more and more taxes.

I'm glad that this government found some relief for taxpayers with this bill. I'm glad that they found a way to cut 0.00018 per cent or so. I think this cut will cover the cost to bring pandas, well, more pandas to Calgary, so that's great. That's the way of this government. They find a tiny, tiny amount of money to save and maybe turn it into a bill to get maximum mileage, but at the same time they're increasing overall spending 3 per cent.

Targeting the executives or the, quote, 1 per cent seems to be the mantra of the NDP when it comes to policy creation. I can't help noticing that when it comes to going after the big oil companies – not those four, but they go selectively – or the executives at the top, the NDP are loud and clear. But when it comes to giving charities exemptions from their carbon tax, they're silent, just like now. When it comes to reducing emergency wait times for Albertans, people are waiting to hear if anything will be done. When it comes to reducing school fees, like they promised, they will need to put that off. When it comes to raising taxes on the wealthiest, the NDP passed legislation in the blink of an eye. But when it comes to giving tax breaks to small businesses . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. members.

Mr. Panda: But when it comes to giving tax breaks to small businesses, Mr. Speaker, they vote it down repeatedly before finally deciding that maybe it will deflect attention from the way this carbon tax will hammer small businesses.

This government needs to look at the bigger picture. The previous government protected the salaries that this bill is aimed at. Now the NDP is protecting the unions, a group that costs far more than the fraction of a fraction of a per cent of our budget that this bill will save. I grew up before some of the members opposite were even born. There was a band during my college years called The Who. They had a great line that I would like to quote: "Meet the new boss, same as the old boss."

The Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner gave a great speech on that same subject during the Bill 6 debate. He quoted a famous author, George Orwell, who wrote Animal Farm. For a change, you should read that book. [interjections] I'm not talking about the book.

The Speaker: Hon. member, let's keep going on the topic. Speak to the Speaker, please.

Mr. Panda: Okay. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would suggest that the members opposite go back and give that book a read and that speech a read, though. Nothing has changed. NDP may be preventing the previous government's friends from becoming fat, but they just have a new crop of friends, that are more equal than others.

This government needs to be honest with Albertans and address bigger issues of financial prudence. This government needs to address the excessive spending, that it insists on perpetuating, of the previous government. There are many ways that this could be addressed along the exact same vein as this bill, yet this bill stops short. This bill does not go the distance. This government has at least set a precedent for what needs to be done in the future. I'm glad that this government is addressing some of the excessive spending that the previous government allowed to happen. I just hope that the NDP does not replace one set of excessive expenditures with another.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Are there other members that would like to speak to Bill 19, Reform of Agencies, Boards and Commissions Compensation Act? Calgary-Mountain View.

Dr. Swann: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'll be brief. I think the government deserves a lot of credit for this bill. It's long overdue. It's been decades that these boards, commissions, agencies have been packed by PC insiders and big donors to the PC Party. We've long been calling for this, and I think they finally have taken a hold on it and are really looking at it very seriously and trying to do it in a measured way and a sequenced way so that we're not actually damaging the quality of work that is going on in many of these agencies, boards, and commissions and not going to be sued for breaking contracts or agreements with people.

It's a thoughtful approach. It's going to give the government authority to standardize the compensation framework for the ABCs and compel them to disclose salary information. The pay grades will be determined over the coming months with the help of an independent consultant and will vary depending on the complexity of positions and the size of the organization. Very reasonable. Specifically, the Reform of Agencies, Boards and Commissions Compensation Act would apply initially to agencies whose executives have base salaries over $200,000 a year, excluding postsecondary institutions, and one can understand that this is going to take a little longer to review. Under the current system CEOs and executives of ABCs have the authority to set their own salaries, bonuses, and severances, with no government regulation or oversight. How did this happen?

Jurisdictions such as Ontario, B.C., Nova Scotia have already produced these kinds of changes. So it's very reasonable, very appropriate. I fully support this attempt to both rein in costs and provide some credibility to these organizations with standard compensation practices as much as possible. It will include organizations like AIMCo, Petroleum Marketing Commission, Alberta Gaming and Liquor Commission, Alberta Energy Regulator, Alberta Health Services. These are over 50 per cent of the spending in this province, and it's long overdue that we have a better handle and better control over these organizations.

To their credit again, this year the decisions that were made by this government saved $33 million. It brought some savings already by reducing the number of agencies and redundancies in agencies, boards, and commissions. So I give full credit for that. One example that was reported by CBC: Alberta Innovates' board salaries ranged from $338,000 to $479,000 a year. It's just incredible, Mr. Speaker, especially given the kind of challenges in this province today.

So I just wanted to applaud them. I wanted to say that I fully support this initiative, and my only caveat is kind of a broken-wheel comment. I hope you'll establish an independent appointments commission so that you won't be accused of the same thing in four years, that the agencies, boards, and commissions were stocked by party insiders or party donors, and you can look us all in the face and say: "We have an independent commission; there's no question about the appointments based on merit here," and we can all be satisfied that our money is being well spent in these critical agencies, boards, and commissions. I'll be fully supportive.

Thanks, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Under 29(2)(a) are there any questions for the Member for Calgary-Mountain View?

The Member for Calgary-Hays.

Mr. McIver: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm happy to rise and speak on Bill 19, the Reform of Agencies, Boards and Commissions Compensation Act. I'm only a little pressed to take a position on this because there's more unsaid in this bill than there is said. Certainly, taking a look at the compensation of the agencies, boards, and commissions isn't necessarily a bad thing, but some of the code words that the government member that introduced this today used leave me with a little bit of concern, talking about consistency and what sounds to me like making sure that everybody's paid the same.

When you look at the agencies, boards, and commissions listed in the legislation – and it includes Alberta Gaming and Liquor Commission, Alberta Pensions Services, Alberta finance services corporation, AIMCo, Alberta Treasury Branches, Alberta Health Services – there's a wide range of expertise on these boards. They, because of the marketplace, Mr. Speaker, have different values, and I sincerely hope that the government isn't going to treat them all the same. I hear a lot of people talking about how they would like to have Cuba's weather in Canada, but most people don't want to bring Cuba to Canada, where, of course, everybody makes the same no matter what job you do. I think it's $29 a month.

While I'm not saying that that's here, what I'm not hearing is if there's going to be any relationship between what the agency, board, and commission members are being compensated, if there's going to be some type of relationship between the skill sets, the education, the experience that are required. I hope so. What concerns me is that it doesn't say it in writing in the bill, in the introduction by the government-side member of the House that introduced it. It doesn't give me any comfort. So I'm hoping that at some point before we get to the end of this, the government side will clarify their intentions there because I think it's pretty fair to say that different jobs have different values in the workplace even in this House, Mr. Speaker, where you and the Premier and the ministers make more than the rest of us do and it's considered that the work they do has more value because they have more responsibility. I think that flows up and down the marketplace in Alberta in every line of work.

So I'll be looking for some comfort from the government side before we get to the end of this discussion, and I hope that somebody will clarify what method they're going to use or whether they are going to, as was – it wasn't explicitly stated, but there was talk about consistency. If somebody from the government side would clarify what level of consistency they're going to bring to this and, hopefully, some recognition of the skills.

The other part about this, too, Mr. Speaker, is that in a lot of these agencies, boards, and commissions traditionally, I think, we've had some pretty smart, pretty accomplished, pretty successful Albertans that have stepped forward to serve on these boards, that have actually given more of their own talents, skills, and abilities than they have received back in compensation. Probably you could find some cases where it could be considered that they were overpaid as well, which is why I don't mind that the government is reviewing this. I really don't. I'm just hoping, again, to hear some comforting words from the government, a little more description about how this review is going to happen and the payment of the people that serve on these boards.

None of us on any side of the House should have any doubt that these agencies, boards, and commissions serve a valuable purpose. They provide expertise that government needs, that serves Albertans. They provide arm's-length bodies within which to deliberate outside of the direct shadow of this House. They can actually put policies and decisions in place at these very important bodies, that actually handle a lot of Albertans' serious issues. I mean, if you talk about Alberta Health Services, every Albertan's health, I don't know what can be more important than that. If you talk about AIMCo and the Alberta Treasury Branches and Alberta finance services corporation, that's all the municipalities; that's hundreds of thousands if not millions of mortgages and personal loans. They're making policy decisions that are going to affect Albertans.

I am going to sit down and hope that someone from the government side is going to stand up and actually put a little more meat on the bones of this legislation because – I will finish my debate the way I started it – the most disturbing thing about this bill is that there's more unsaid about what it's going to do than there is said.

The Speaker: Are there any questions under 29(2)(a) of the Member for Calgary-Hays?

I recognize the Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat.

Mr. Barnes: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for allowing me this opportunity to speak on Bill 19, the Reform of Agencies, Boards and Commissions Compensation Act. With the current state of our finances, it's nice to see some attempt to rein in out-of-control spending. It would be nice to see the same prudent and shrewd attitude reflected in the appropriation and budget bill as well, but I suppose that would be just a bridge too far for this government.

In any case, Mr. Speaker, we're here to discuss Bill 19, an act that would provide the framework for tightening the public purse when it comes to the salaries of executives at our agencies, boards, and commissions, a welcome step in the right direction although it's a limited and small step but a step nonetheless. Albertans have known for years that the massive expansion of executive positions in our many ABCs, quite often beyond the reaches of public oversight and scrutiny, is hitting Albertans in their wallets. The Wildrose has spoken about the need for restraint at the upper levels at length. In the last election Albertans spoke as well.

Now, how far does this act go towards showing that restraint? Well, I suppose, it nibbles around the edges. It sort of picks around the margins to find some savings. In fact, it needs to be pointed out that this bill does not come with any built-in savings. It merely grants the government the authority to create the framework to review and standardize these salaries. So, Mr. Speaker, no. It's safe to say that the bill is not going to be the silver bullet that knocks out our massive deficit and gets a hold of our ballooning debt, but I would like to see some government analysis of what they expect to save.

Every time we spend taxpayers' money, I'd also like to see some consideration of value and firm expectations. In this House I've spoken at length about those two topics, and I'd like to bring them up yet again. I do this because it's critically important that value and accountability measures are considered. Value is, in short, what benefit we derive from a certain government action. It is the expected gain that we hope to achieve from a given expenditure of effort, time, or taxpayers' money. To that point, we must have some way of measuring the expected value, setting goals, and then going back and comparing the actual to those goals. Mr. Speaker, this is where accountability measures come in, and once again I don't see any of those here. I see a framework. I see a broad outline, but I do not see clear expectations.

What I do see when I look at this government's fiscal plan is a massive amount of debt and interest. We're looking at an incredible amount of debt, debt that by the end of this government's term will carry an estimated $2 billion annually in interest load. So where are we not getting value for this money? Is it exclusively in the executives and the executive salaries at ABCs? That's obviously a reductive and limited way to look at our problem.

I, too, am going to draw on the single largest example here, and that is Alberta Health Services, the largest single line item in Alberta's entire budget. In fact, Mr. Speaker, as a line item it is bigger than any other ministry. Now, we know from the latest annual report that there are approximately 15 full-time equivalencies – 15 full-time equivalencies – at the executive level. With total compensation, the salaries work out to $6.4 million.

We also know from a recent written question that there are 182 employees at Alberta Health Services making $200,000 or more, which, of course, was the threshold for that piece of legislation. Now, we don't know how much these 182 employees make in total compensation, but even assuming the bare minimum of $200,000, that's over $36 million. The actual number is obviously higher, probably by quite a bit. This 182 does not include a breakdown of jobs though we can assume that Alberta Health Services executives and many upper-level managers fall within it. I can't help but be reminded wherever I go in Alberta and in Cypress-Medicine Hat that good front-line health workers talk about five levels of bureaucracy to try to get an answer that usually doesn't come.

The point of this is to provide a sense of scale. When I talk about picking around the margins of the spending problem, it's important to put executive positions in perspective. Furthermore, under the executive level we see in the Alberta Health Services 2014-15 annual report that yet another 56 full-time equivalents in management directly report to the CEO. This level is significant because when the former government was called out for having so many AHS executives, several were just shifted down into another category. It wasn't saving anything. It wasn't saving a cent. It was merely a shell game. Under that, Mr. Speaker, we have 3,300 more in the other-management category. All told, that's over $500 million in various levels of management.

As a proportion of total management, focusing on just the executives at Alberta Health Services is, again, just a small fraction of the larger issue, showing how enormous this public spending problem is. Of course, AHS as a whole had expenses of $13.8 billion in the fiscal year 2014-15, and this government just passed a budget that allocates nearly $400 million more to the organization from the public treasury. Since its inception, Mr. Speaker, Alberta Health Services' spending has grown by leaps and bounds. We have averaged approximately 6 per cent annual growth year over year since it was created and in spite of many promises of efficiencies. Over 6 per cent annually compounded.

Mr. Speaker, that brings us back to the question of value. There's a great deal of bloat and waste and bureaucracy in government, wastefulness that has been cultivated through many years of never having to worry about it, but now we don't have the luxury of carelessness. We must be wiser with our taxpayer dollars. We need to see value at all levels and seriously examine all options for getting our spending back in line. On an age-adjusted, per capita basis we spend far more than any other province. We exceed the national average by 39 per cent. We exceed the average of comparable provinces like Ontario, Quebec, Saskatchewan, and

B.C. by even more than that 39 per cent. We must start to find value at all levels.

The AHS promises of efficiency and savings have not materialized. Picking around the edges is not going to be enough to pull us off the chart and put spending back into some semblance of reasonableness. We need to see action on public-sector contracts as well. We need to be getting all Albertans a better deal for their hard-earned dollars. Mr. Speaker, we need to find efficiencies throughout agencies, boards, and commissions. It appears to be just talk, though. Oddly enough, in the latest fiscal plan as part of the 2016 budget on page 41 AHS is "exempt from the cost saving measures related to supplies and services implemented in Budget 2016." I end that quote with astonishment. Why is Alberta Health Services exempt?

Mr. Speaker, getting value is not limited to executive compensation, and the government needs to get serious about that and about value for all of our hard-earned tax dollars. For the sake of the future and the ongoing sustainability of our services we need to get spending in line within a reasonable level. Yes, it's true that some of the runaway growth was due to a lack of transparency and accountability of these ABCs. That's why, ultimately, I will be supporting this legislation as one small step towards sustainability.

In closing, I want to caution the government: do not declare this as mission accomplished. Mr. Speaker, I absolutely believe that getting Alberta's per capita spending in line with other provinces is the first step to restoring investor confidence, that we need to rebuild our opportunities and our job market. It's created a level of unfairness between those that work hard in the private sector compared to those that work hard and are compensated in the public sector. This high per capita spending has been inflationary, and again, in closing, it has scared away investment and jobs.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, under 29(2)(a), any questions or comments for the Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat?

I'll call upon the Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I will just offer, as we close out the morning here, perhaps a few brief comments. I certainly do support Bill 19. I think it is a bill that is welcome. I do have some questions that I hope perhaps the government can help address at some point through debate.

Perhaps I'll start with what I like about the bill. I like the idea of the guidelines for public-sector compensation, bringing those in line with comparable positions in the private sector. I think that makes sense. I also think that as we transition, there's some logic, of course, in grandfathering those positions. I do have some questions about that, which I'll raise momentarily, and, you know, about ensuring that there's compliance as well.

It's important, if we're going to put rules in place, that people – in this case agencies, boards, and commissions – follow those rules and that if they don't, there are some consequences for not doing that. Other bills that this government has brought forward perhaps could benefit from some consequence to breaking the rules or changing laws – but that's a different story – and even some flexibility, allowing for that defence of due diligence if it can be proven that, in fact, due diligence was done yet compensation was still out of line.

You do wonder, of course, how much overhead this is going to present for ABCs, but in the grand scheme of things I do think it will save Albertans money, and I like the fact that it standardizes things.

One of the concerns I have, which is a concern in general with agencies, boards, and commissions, is a perception, I suppose perhaps not totally incorrect, that agencies, boards, and commissions are, as a comment from the Member for Calgary-Mountain View said, stacked with PC cronies. I think that there's some truth to that. I think that has been a problem in the past in this province. However, I don't think that every single person on every agency, board, or commission is there because of political ties. In fact, I think the vast majority of those people are dedicated public servants who are contributing to their community.

I think we have to be very careful, and one caution I would give to this government is that if you go into this process of refreshing and updating agencies, boards, and commissions assuming that your job as government is to simply put your people in place of their people, then I think we're just going to exacerbate a problem, maybe even make it worse. I think merit has always got to be the guiding consideration. These are institutions that do important work on behalf of Albertans, so competence and merit are very important, and please don't ever forget that.

Now, equally important, another consideration, of course, always must be diversity, and reflecting the wonderful diversity of this province in everything we do is important and should always be a consideration. But, you know, in considering those things, please don't just put your friends in place of what you think to be their friends. I don't think that's going to serve Albertans.

Just a couple of concerns. Section 14: there's no appeal process in that overpayment section. For ABCs, if there is a dispute around whether or not there's been an overpayment, is there any recourse for them to appeal?

I do wonder, you know, as we move towards the pay band in section 6 and the grandfathering in sections 7 and 8, is there a risk that we're going to be driving talented people out of ABCs? Is some of that compensation, in fact, appropriate for people to make sure that we've attracted the right talent to run what can be very complex organizations? Is two years of grandfathering enough under section 7 for executives?

Then I do have a real question under section 8 on grandfathering of members. That is to be determined by the minister. I'm always concerned and worried when a bill says: we'll figure it out later through regulation. That's, obviously, not the most transparent process. I'm a big believer that if you give people a heads-up and say, "You are grandfathered for two years," that makes sense. Why is it that executives are being treated differently than members of the boards?

I also have a concern with section 4(4), that private and confidential information may be disclosed by the minister at the minister's discretion. That's a concern. I think individuals who entered these roles, especially those who are there currently, did so on the understanding that that information would be kept private, and I would imagine, rightly, that people in those positions would be wondering what the difference is between section 4(3), which says that the minister must keep information confidential, and 4(4), saying that they may disclose. What is that personal and confidential private information that will be disclosed, and when will it be disclosed? I think those are open and important questions that need to be answered.

You know, I guess carving out agencies that require and would certainly need people with very, very specialized skills – ATB, AIMCo, the teachers' pension fund – I think, of course, makes a lot of sense. Those are people who earn very high salaries but have very, very unique skill sets and therefore should command those salaries, and I think it's right to have carved it out.

I do want to echo some of the comments from the Official Opposition that this certainly takes a step towards addressing compensation levels within the provincial government. We're edging ever closer to pay freezes for excluded and managerial staff, pay freezes for members of this Chamber, but we seem to be unwilling, this government, to tackle the elephant in the room, where most of the salaries are. It doesn't need to be done punitively, it doesn't need to be done in an unfair way, and it doesn't need to be done unilaterally. Negotiation and compromise and conversation are always going to get you better results than the stick. The carrot, I find, is always better than the stick.

The approach the Health minister has taken with the Alberta Medical Association and doctors' compensation I think is not a bad idea. In fact, it's a very good idea, done in a way of openly approaching doctors and saying: look, we need to have a conversation about how much it costs to provide your services. So far as I can tell, that's been an amicable process. The government could follow the same process with unionized workers throughout this province. Level with them about the exact fiscal situation of Alberta and that we need to get our costs under control without greatly impacting front-line services.

With that, Mr. Speaker, and looking at the time, I will return to my seat. Thank you very much for the opportunity to speak to this bill.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Wednesday, May 25, 2016

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Good afternoon. Please be seated.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-Glenmore.

Ms Kazim: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my honour to rise today to introduce to you and through you to all members of this Assembly the students, teachers, and staff from Calgary Jewish Academy. I'm very pleased that the students from the school are here today with us to learn about politics by actually experiencing it. I would like to request the students, teachers, and staff from Calgary Jewish Academy to rise and receive the warm traditional welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Hon. members, we have some visitors that arrived. With your permission I would now ask for the House's indulgence.

Government House Leader, I believe you have a guest today.

Introduction of Visitors

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise today and introduce to you and through you to all members of this Assembly a distinguished guest, Ian Waddell. Mr. Waddell served 14 years as a Member of Parliament for Vancouver Kingsway. He was later elected to the British Columbia Legislature, where he held three significant cabinet posts. He was Minister of Small Business, Tourism and Culture. He was Minister of Environment, Lands and Parks and Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs. As minister Mr. Waddell was instrumental in securing the 2010 Winter Olympics, and he championed indigenous participation, environmental sustainability, and athlete involvement in the early planning stages. Under his ministerial guidance the B.C. film industry grew into a billion dollar industry. He is a published author, a documentary filmmaker, and a TV and radio commentator. I would ask Mr. Waddell to rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Wapiti.

Mr. Drysdale: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's indeed a pleasure to rise and introduce to you and through you to all members of this House a former colleague and Member of this Legislative Assembly for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake. Hopefully he's less trouble in your gallery today than he was in the House. Mr. Luke Ouellette, please stand and receive the warm welcome of this House.

The Speaker: Welcome to both our visitors.

Back to Introduction of Guests. The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my pleasure to introduce to you and through you all of my students from the Kehewin community education centre. I would specifically like to mention their teachers Mr. Baptiste and Mr. McMaster. If they could rise, and all of the students as well, I would appreciate it if we could give them a warm welcome from everybody in the Chamber for them coming and visiting us today.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Are there any other school guests, hon. members?

Seeing none, the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my sincere pleasure to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly 11 interns who started their work in ministerial offices yesterday: Mayda Ali, Bashir Mohamed, Jacob Schweda, Dylan Williams, Katie Choi, Amelia Van Hoffen, Montana Cardinal, Karima Abubakar, Aydan Anderson, Chris Edwards, and Azra Samji. These interns will be busy supporting the work of various ministers until August 26. When they return to their respective and diverse university programs, they will take with them a better understanding of the work of government as it serves the people of Alberta. I would ask these guests to rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I've got two introductions today, and I'll go through them in alphabetical order so that they know that there's no preference, I guess, to my guests. It's my pleasure to introduce to you and to the Assembly a group from the Edmonton Dream Centre. The Dream Centre is a residential, faith-based addiction recovery centre for women located in my constituency of Edmonton-Gold Bar that has helped more than 500 women and their families. On June 17 the Dream Centre holds its annual Leap of Faith, a skydiving fundraiser. That's right: skydiving. Now, I won't be partaking in this particular fundraiser because I am a coward. However, there are a lot of members in this Assembly that I would pay money to have them go take a leap. If you're interested in that, please come and approach me after the session. I'd ask them to rise as I say their names so that they can be recognized. Today we have with us Mark Evans, Connie Spooner, Colleen Foley, Charles Evans, Mike Ferber, Dawn Himer, Dorine Kielly, Vivian Dersch, Marleen Gray, Jennifer Den Ouden, Sara Himer, and Greg Assaly. I ask that our fellow members please give this team a warm welcome to this Assembly.

Second introduction, Mr. Speaker. I'd also like to introduce to you and to this Assembly a group from the Alberta and Northwest Territories chapter of the MS Society of Canada. If they could please rise when I say their names. We have today with us Garry Wheeler; Julia Nimilowich; Julie Kelndorfer; a former member of this Assembly, Mrs. Judy Gordon, who represented the constituency of Lacombe-Stettler for a long time; Luwam Kiflemariam; and Amanda Cundliffe. Their office is located in my constituency of Edmonton-Gold Bar, and I've had the opportunity to meet the wonderful staff and participate in their events. Today marks World MS Day, and our province has one of the highest rates of multiple sclerosis in the world. I personally have two aunts who have bravely lived with MS. I encourage my colleagues to participate or donate to the MS walk happening this Sunday because I know that every step and every donation matters. I ask my fellow members to please give this group a warm welcome to this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to introduce to you and through you two leaders with Alberta Blue Cross. Those are President Ray Pisani and vice-president, government, Dianne Balon. If they could both stand. As one of our partner organizations in health care, Alberta Blue Cross is to be commended for the innovative approach it takes to supporting wellness of Albertans. While perhaps best known as a benefits provider, Alberta Blue Cross also takes a leading role in programs aimed at fostering an active lifestyle and promoting wellness amongst postsecondary students as well. This collaborative work by Alberta Blue Cross provides tremendous value in primary health care delivery in the province of Alberta. I'd ask that our guests now receive the traditional warm welcome of our Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Minister of Seniors and Housing.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's an honour to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly Bo Zhang and Savana Brown. Please stand. Bo is one of my constituency assistants. He is currently finishing up his bachelor of arts in political science and sociology at the University of Alberta. Prior to working in my office, he worked for the Ministry of Infrastructure and the University of Alberta Students' Union. We are thankful to have his support in our office. Savana is a social work student at NorQuest College, pursuing her diploma. She is in her final year and is doing her field placement at our constituency office. Savana is fortunate to have the opportunity for professional development working alongside the excellent support of my constituency staff. Bo and Savana are seated in the members' gallery, and I ask that you join me in giving them the warm welcome of the Assembly.

1:40

The Speaker: Welcome.

The Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's an honour to rise and introduce to you and through you to members of the Assembly Jim and Pat Bower from Red Deer. Jim and Pat are the parents of Joe Bower, who left us all far too soon. I'll be paying tribute to Joe this afternoon as a friend to me, a friend to the Alberta Party, and a friend to our province. Jim and Pat have very deep roots in Alberta. Jim is a fourth-generation farmer. Those of you who know Red Deer will be familiar with the name Bower. He's not just a farmer; he's an entrepreneur. Jim and Pat are a true embodiment of the Alberta spirit. I'd ask Pat and Jim, please, to stand now and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my pleasure to introduce to you and through you to all members of this Assembly Professor Annalise Acorn, who is a professor of law at the University of Alberta. Her mother, June Acorn, was ably assisted by her – June was unable to join us here today – in assembling a document endorsed by over 5,200 like-minded people. The document encourages the Alberta government to save and repurpose the old Royal Alberta Museum. I'd ask Professor Acorn to now rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the House.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The Member for Calgary-Northern Hills.

Mr. Kleinsteuber: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to introduce to you and through you to all Members of the Legislative Assembly four guests representing Vivo for Healthier Generations. Please rise as I say your names: Cynthia Watson, who recently became CEO, or chief evolution officer, at Vivo; Amtul Siddiqui, board member of Vivo – she works with the Red Cross, and her last few weeks have been spent working on the fire recovery effort in Fort McMurray – Nicole Dawe, manager of philanthropy with Vivo; and Sue Scott, the founding CEO of Vivo. We'll hear more about Sue and her contributions in my member's statement a little bit later. I now ask my colleagues to extend the fine, traditional warm welcome of this Legislature to our guests.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Minister of Environment and Parks and minister responsible for the climate change office.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to introduce to you and through you Vanessa Foran, president and CEO of the Asthma Society of Canada, who was honoured this morning to receive the 2016 Asthma Society of Canada's award for leadership and public policy for our government's climate leadership plan. I invite Ms Foran to rise and to be extended the traditional warm welcome of our Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Glenmore.

Ms Kazim: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my honour to rise today to introduce to you and through you to all members of this Assembly Mayda Ali, who worked as a volunteer research assistant in my constituency office of Calgary-Glenmore. Mayda Ali is currently an Alberta student ministerial intern in the Premier's stakeholder relations office, and she is in her final year of international studies at the University of Calgary. She was introduced to the group earlier, but I'm very pleased that she is here with us today. I would like to request Mayda Ali to rise and receive the warm traditional welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Members' Statements

Carbon Levy

Mrs. Pitt: Mr. Speaker, Albertans all across our province woke up this morning to news that life will be even more expensive for them because of the NDP government. Though no fault of their own, hundreds of thousands of Alberta families are finding out that the cost of living in our province will be more expensive because of a risky and ideological carbon tax. Let me be absolutely clear. This tax was not campaigned on, and it wasn't asked for, and I think that the NDP know it, too. Just like when my kids know they've done something really bad and have a million explanations for why they should get off the hook, the NDP have tried to show how great their carbon tax is by providing a list as long as a phone book of people giving lukewarm supportive quotes.

I love this province, and I will continue to teach my children how to be responsible stewards of this earth. I can tell you this, Mr. Speaker. Albertans are many things, but naive is not one of them. They will see clearly what this climate plan is: an excuse to tax everyday Albertans and make life more expensive.

The money that will be going towards the carbon tax will force families to make very difficult decisions about where to cut back.

It's all well and good for the NDP government to be pie in the sky, parading around with self-validation on how great the carbon tax is, but I know what the real cost will be for Alberta families. Families will have to cut back on their groceries and maybe go for fewer fresh fruits and vegetables. Families will have to have the difficult conversation with their kids to say that this year they can't afford the registration fees for their hockey or ballet. In total, the typical family will be paying at least an extra thousand dollars out of pocket because of this tax.

The facts are clear. This carbon tax will also disproportionately hurt the hard-working moms and dads who are on carpool duty, driving to soccer tournaments, or on snack duty for their playgroup. This carbon tax has been put together with no regard for these hard-working Albertans, and it must be repealed.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Joe Bower

Mr. Clark: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my honour to pay tribute to a man who dedicated his too-short life to education, to his family, and to his community. Red Deer teacher Joe Bower passed away unexpectedly from a heart attack earlier this year, leaving his wife, Tamara, and two young children, Kayley and Sawyer. We're joined today in the gallery by Joe's parents, Jim and Pat Bower.

Joe was more than your ordinary teacher. He taught for 15 years, including time teaching kids on a psychiatric assessment unit. He became known around the world for his education blog, For the Love of Learning, which influenced countless teachers and is still widely referenced today. He pushed the boundaries of his profession as an educator, advocating for an end to the traditional marking system, and preferred a more personalized, experiential, and holistic approach to learning. Now, this didn't always go well with the powers that be, but Joe stuck to his guns because he felt passionately that he was doing the right thing for kids. His writing brought widespread acclaim, and he was invited to speak at conferences all over the world.

After news of his death at just 37 years old, tributes poured in from around the world. On this past weekend Joe's colleagues remembered him as he was given a posthumous lifetime membership in the Alberta Teachers' Association.

Joe lived each day to the fullest and contributed tremendously to his home community in and around Red Deer. A fifth-generation Albertan, Joe, like the entire Bower family, knew the value of hard work on the farm and beyond, but he also knew how to have fun. An avid sportsman, he was a keen baseball player and a go-to goalie in pond hockey.

Joe will be missed by all of us but most of all by his family. To Tamara; Pat and Jim; Joe's brother and sister, Jeff and Jenn; and all of Joe's cousins and extended family but especially to Kayley and Sawyer: I want you to know that your dad was a very special man. He made a big difference in our world, and the world needs more Joe Bowers, more people willing to stand up for what they believe in, to stand up for what they think is right even if it's not popular. It's up to all of us to carry on his legacy. Rest in peace.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Energy Policies

Mr. Gottfried: Mr. Speaker, today I was close to focusing my member's statement on soft, soulful discourse around the incredible importance of seniors enriching our society. I then realized my obligation was not to blow smoke but to honour those same seniors by standing up, passionately and fiercely if necessary, for a better Alberta, and that is what I plan to do.

Members, today we face a new, daunting, and inescapable challenge in the face of what I have come to think of as an anti-Alberta, job-killing, investment-repelling climate leadership manifesto. I am saddened to see our province facing the real life- and livelihood-altering challenges of unbalanced, irresponsible, dogmatic, and ideological policies of this NDP government. I admit that Albertans were seeking change – responsive government, accountability, humility, and ethical behaviour – and so was I. My party had been hijacked, and I wanted it back, so I fought to represent the people of Calgary-Fish Creek, not in spite of what my party had become but because of it.

Today I fear that the will of Albertans has been forgotten, the steady hand of pioneers dismissed, the entrepreneurial spirit and work ethic diluted. To dismiss as an embarrassing scourge the rich and enviable natural resources that support our prosperity and that we all work hard to responsibly develop is just plain wrong, and I submit that Albertans will fiercely defend their development as key to the Alberta advantage, which has given so many great hope for a better life for them and future generations.

We are innovators, risk takers, problem solvers. We love the land and take care of those less fortunate. We are people of the soil, staunchly proud of our western heritage, our cowboy ethics, and of our passion for family, friends, and neighbours. We are comfortable with our simple, local way of life. We are also confident though not arrogant yet infinitely adaptable on the world stage. We carry pride in our counties, hamlets, villages, towns, and cities, but we are proud Albertans, patriotic Canadians, and citizens of the world. Mr. Speaker, this is who we are. Let's not screw it up.

Statement by the Speaker

Decorum

The Speaker: Hon. members, before we begin, I'd just like to respectfully request that you contain the volume in terms of hitting the desks as well as your verbal feedback to each other. I would just like to encourage each of you to take individual ownership for that, and we will have a much better time together today.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Foothills.

Carbon Levy

Mr. Panda: Calgary's downtown office vacancy rate has almost doubled in one year, and our unemployment rate is climbing towards 9 per cent. When families are anxiously crunching budgets around their kitchen tables, the last thing they want is the added cost of this NDP carbon tax. The full price tag just keeps on growing after the minister finally admitted the carbon tax will raise the price of everything else, but they refuse to release the full study. Will the Premier release the full impact study so it can be debated by all Albertans?

Ms Notley: Well, you know, Mr. Speaker, what the opposition is actually saying, both in their questions as well as in their members' statements, is that we shouldn't take action on climate change. That's not what our government is going to do. The opposition is more concerned about scaring Albertans with half-truths and bad information than they are about taking real action. Our government is going to invest in the very programs that will reduce costs for Albertans in the long term through energy efficiency, through reducing their heating costs over the long term, and through ensuring that our energy industry is able to compete internationally because our reputation has been redeemed.

Mr. Panda: Either there was no study, or they're hiding something.

Albertans will realize the full cost of the NDP's carbon tax when it hits their families. With hundreds of dollars out of pocket, that's the difference between hockey registration or dance classes. While everyone is suffering from a hurting economy, our charitable sector will be punished with higher costs to take care of our most vulnerable. Will the Premier release the full costs of the carbon tax on our charitable sector?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. You know, the opposition really is playing fast and loose with the facts here. Their goal is to scare Albertans, not to have a reasonable conversation about climate change and our actions to remediate it. Their claims about the indirect costs of our program are simply not true, and we know that they misuse the numbers because the author of the study that they rely on has gone public to say that they've been misusing the numbers. It would be very helpful for us to have a reasonable conversation, to begin by talking about the real facts.

Mr. Panda: Well, we are asking them to present the facts, real facts.

Albertans know this tax will not only have an impact on their pocketbooks but also on the charities they support. Numbers are rolling in from school boards across the province, and the carbon tax will mean millions of dollars out of the classroom. In our health care system it will be millions of dollars wasted that should go to our front-line workers. Has the government done any studies to find out how many millions will be taken away from health care, seniors, and education and . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Ms Notley: Well, one thing I'll say, Mr. Speaker, is that one study that's been out there as a result of the physicians against coal-fired electricity is that we will save roughly $200 million in our health care system as a result of not treating people for respiratory problems associated with coal. So there are some numbers, and I'm happy to give more as we engage in this conversation over the course of the next two weeks.

The Speaker: The Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Landowner Property Rights Legislation

Mr. Cooper: Both the Premier and the Government House Leader once fought against heavy-handed bills from the PC government that were a massive overreach and violation of property and privacy rights. The NDP House leader rallied against Bill 36 and its provisions, which centralized excessive powers into the hands of cabinet. Today the worst part of Bill 36 remains intact, with no suggestion from the government about amendments. Does the Premier still believe that it's wrong to give cabinet heavy-handed powers that trample the property and privacy rights of Albertans?

Ms Notley: Well, you know, Mr. Speaker, we recently had a conversation in this House about fearmongering. The opposition is taking language that has appeared in government legislation provincially and federally for years, and they are suggesting that we invented it to create a new right that, quite honestly, doesn't exist. If that's not fearmongering, I really don't know what is.

Mr. Cooper: We know that the NDP once launched petitions promising the full repeal of offensive laws like the old bills 19 and 24, that go too far in infringing on the rights of Albertans, but it seems that their principles have changed since they've taken power. Their commitment to property rights is wavering as they fail to put in any plan or vision to strengthen landowner rights for Albertans. Surely, the Premier would agree that any legislation that gives the government the right to enter virtually any property without a warrant is a step too far for any government.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, interesting that the member opposite talks about "any government." This type of clause exists in revenue legislation throughout the country, provincially and federally. Indeed, it exists in the very revenue-collecting legislation that the government, which the member opposite's leader was a part of, amended in 2006. Yet when the federal Conservative government amended that piece of legislation, that had exactly the same kinds of clauses in it, they never touched it, not a peep, not a change, because this is standard in revenue-collecting legislation across the country. So if it was okay for the Conservative government, why is it not okay here in Alberta?

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. Premier.

Mr. Cooper: This is the exact type of clause that you used to rally against.

The fact is that the NDP have introduced legislation that makes significant infringements on privacy and property rights of Albertans. The language the government is putting forward is something that no Albertan should support. They will want changes to any law that allows the government to go onto their land or check their computer without the protection of the courts. The expense of the carbon tax was bad enough. Will the Premier admit this type of overreach and scrap any provision in any law, including the one she mentioned, that . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Ms Notley: Well, you know, Mr. Speaker, it's really clear that the members opposite need to do better research. I would suggest that Google is helpful. I might refer the member to the Wildlife Act in Saskatchewan, where it also grants the government the right to enter land, and interestingly Saskatchewan is also not known as a police-friendly state. This kind of clause exists in revenue enforcement legislation across the country, and these guys are fearmongering over something that nobody else would believe is a concern.

Mr. Mason: A point of order.

The Speaker: A point of order noted by the Government House Leader.

I would remind you again, please, members, to keep the volume down.

The hon. Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat.

Drug Abuse

Mr. Barnes: Mr. Speaker, last Friday the Chief Medical Examiner confirmed that a man who overdosed earlier this year had heroin, fentanyl, and W-18 in his system. This is the first overdose linked to the extremely toxic W-18 here in Alberta. These powerful opioids of all types are streaming into our province and taking more lives every day while the NDP government struggles to even identify, measure, and track the problem. Why can't the minister provide a clear picture of deaths by opioid type, including oxycodone, hydrocodone, and heroin?

The Speaker: The Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, our hearts go out to any families or individuals who are impacted by death in a drug addiction or an overdose. Certainly, it's very heartbreaking. I do want to clarify that W-18 was present; it wasn't necessarily the cause. There was some overstepping initially on the assumptions there. When there are a number of different substances, opioids or otherwise, in somebody's system, there are great complexities. Certainly, I think it's important for us to identify what substances were present, but to be able to draw a conclusion between using one substance when many were used . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
First supplemental.

Mr. Barnes: Thank you. Last year the government boasted that it created a fentanyl response team to address this growing crisis. Since then the overdose rate has continued unchecked. The fentanyl response team meets just once a month and has no dedicated resources. The response team is now being lumped in with other groups implementing the mental health review recommendations. The opioid problem gripping Alberta needs a dedicated and highly prioritized response. How long will it take for your government to respond with the full commitment and urgency that this crisis demands?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, we do take these deaths very seriously. That's one of the reasons why we worked immediately to create the fentanyl response team and to launch a mental health and addictions review. We're proud of the work that happened there, and certainly we'll continue to work with the chief medical officer in ensuring our surveillance of drug-related deaths and that we continue to have increased oversight so that we can as Albertans work collaboratively to make sure that we address this. I am proud of the work that's happening across departments, across Alberta Health Services as well as with law enforcement.

Mr. Barnes: Opioids are a serious and pressing problem, but I have to wonder what else is falling through the cracks as the NDP still tries to get their feet underneath them. Last week it was reported in Medicine Hat that meth accounts for roughly half of all drug seizures, spiking from just 10 per cent a year ago. Given the province's slow and ineffective response to opioids it concerns me that we could be losing control of other street drugs as well. When will we see a co-ordinated, credible, and effective response to drug abuse in Alberta?

The Speaker: The Minister of Justice and Solicitor General.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. Well, of course, we know that different drugs can be challenges at different times and in different locations. That's why we work so closely with our partners in Health to ensure that we're increasing resources for drug addiction treatment across the board and to ensure that we're providing additional resources to ALERT. We just increased their funding so that they can follow crime where it goes and they can follow the drugs where they are a problem in different areas of the province. We're very proud of the work that we're doing, and it's really important to keep the commitment to front-line services that this government has demonstrated.

The Speaker: Thank you.
The leader of the third party.

Education Achievement Testing

Mr. McIver: Mr. Speaker, reports by the Calgary board of education on grade 6 math provincial achievement tests show that 90 per cent of CBE schools in one quadrant of Calgary, for example, are below the provincial average. To the Education minister: are you aware of these results, and what are you doing to support teachers and students to address this alarming trend in many areas of Alberta?

The Speaker: The Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, the ministry and the minister do monitor provincial achievement test results very closely. The number one thing that happened with this government when we were elected to make sure that we were supporting teachers and students was that we actually funded the growth in enrolment across Alberta. That resulted in 1,100 teachers in classrooms as well as 800 educational assistants, who were likely to lose their jobs, being maintained and about 260 more being hired. Certainly, having the right resources in the classroom is going to help.

Mr. McIver: Well, thank you for that.

Last September the Education minister, Mr. Speaker, publicly acknowledged the concerns about low math scores when the issue was raised by the Calgary Association of Parents and School Councils, CAPSC. The minister agreed that dollars reaching the classroom was an issue that the minister would address. With a whole school year behind us since that happened, to the minister: what have you done to get a higher percentage of the approved education dollars into the classroom?

Ms Hoffman: Unlike the plan that was put forward by the previous government, anticipated by the Official Opposition, our government is providing stable funding for education to keep our commitment to fully fund education enrolment. Certainly, that is a very big part of what we're doing, working to have appropriate oversight in collaboration with school boards – they are orders of government, Mr. Speaker – and making sure that they continue to find ways to put those resources in the classroom. There's also a curriculum department that is working on reviewing curriculum continuously, including the math curriculum.

Mr. McIver: Well, here I am talking about kids, and the minister is just throwing stones.

Mr. Speaker, parents through CAPSC have expressed concern that they have no method of knowing if their individual child is at grade level. CAPSC has suggested to the minister a set of 40 math questions, for example, for each grade that a child could answer for their parent so the parent could see if they're at grade level. Just one example. To the minister: when will you provide for parents a method that they could use at home to make sure that their own children are at grade level since parents are the primary caregivers and educators?

The Speaker: The Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, we want every child to get the supports that they need to be successful in life. That's one of the reasons why we put in place teacher supports and resources; we've clarified expectations for basic numeracy; we're working with postsecondary institutions to improve training for new teachers; and why it's so important for parents and schools to have an ongoing collaboration, including school conferences that are set up. But I have to reinforce how important it is to actually have teachers in the classroom, and that's why, instead of moving forward with rash cuts that were proposed by that very party, we reinvested in education, put money in the schools so that adults can be working with the kids to help them and their families.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Climate Leadership Plan

Dr. Swann: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. The climate change leadership plan has introduced another Alberta agency, this one with a laudable purpose: energy efficiency, demand reduction. This agency with undetermined staff or budget is at the sole discretion of the minister of environment. The environment ministry has now consolidated measurement, monitoring, enforcement, new program development, and significant financial resources under one ministry. To the Premier: can the Premier explain why she will not require that appointments to this new energy efficiency agency be merit based and an independent panel?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. We have every intention of ensuring that the people that are appointed to the energy efficiency board are absolutely appointed on the basis of merit. You know, they'll be the kind of people who, for instance, believe that climate change is real. They will also be very committed to improving energy efficiency, taking Alberta from being the last province in the country without an energy efficiency program to being a leader in the country with the energy efficiency program. So I look forward to it. I'm very excited about the many opportunities and the growth opportunities that we will enjoy as a result of that.

Dr. Swann: To the environment minister, then: what performance indicators will her ministry be monitoring? That is, how will the ministry know if we're conserving energy?

The Speaker: The Minister of Environment and Parks.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a good question. Thank you to the hon. member for that thoughtful question. You know, I think there will be a number of different metrics: in particular, uptake from individuals; the kinds of programming; the kind of emission reductions that we see from individuals, from small businesses, from institutions like schools, hospitals, and others. Certainly, the emission reduction and cost reduction will be some of our metrics that we will be using, and we'll make sure that we're making the right evidence-based decisions on what kinds of programming are available to homeowners and to others.

Dr. Swann: Mr. Speaker, again to the minister: on what basis did the ministry decide to give rebates to middle-income earners, who earn up to a hundred thousand dollars a year?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Once again, you know, we received some advice from the climate leadership plan, from Dr. Leach's panel last fall that indicated that approximately two-thirds of Albertans – that would be a good benchmark in terms of insulating folks from the extra costs and ensuring that they are rebated back the average amount so that if and when they do reduce their emissions through availing themselves of the programming that will be available through the energy efficiency agency, programming that, of course, our friends in the Official Opposition would cancel and cut. Once they can do that, then more of that cash will be kept in their pocket. We think we've achieved the right balance there in terms of protecting families and also ensuring that we're reducing emissions.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
The Member for Calgary-Northern Hills.

Employment Skills Training

Mr. Kleinsteuber: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The steep drop in the world price of oil has caused tough economic times in Alberta. This downturn is not only hurting families and employers in my constituency but, broadly speaking, Alberta's labour force as well. Under Alberta's jobs plan funding for skills training through the Canada-Alberta job grant has increased this fiscal year. To the Minister of Labour: why is the federal government important, and how will this funding be used to help Albertans get through these tough times?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Labour.

Ms Gray: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Skills training is one of the best investments we can make to ensure we have a strong and diversified economy. The Canada-Alberta job grant helps employers to train current or potential employees so that Albertans are equipped with the skills that they need to participate in the workforce. Employers use this funding to hire third-party training providers, which lowers their training costs during these tough times, while workers benefit from programs that boost their skills and abilities in their current or future workplace.

Mr. Kleinsteuber: Mr. Speaker, given that skills training is a priority in this downturn and given that our government is delivering this funding, again to the same minister: what qualifications do employers need to meet in order to access this funding?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Gray: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This program is available to private and not-for-profit sector employees of all different sizes across the province and, for the first time, First Nations and Métis settlements as well. Crown corporations will also be eligible for the grant if they are an employer in a community with a population of 100,000 or less. Minimum requirements for training to be eligible include: is the training 21 hours or over in length; is it delivered by a third-party training provider; does it result in a credential such as a record of completion, certificate, grade, et cetera; and is it completed within a year?

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Kleinsteuber: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that some members of this Legislature were clearly far more interested in announcing skills funding than delivering it, again to the Minister of Labour: can the minister clarify our responsibilities to the federal government on announcing the Canada-Alberta job grant funding?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. The announcement guidelines in the agreement show that we will work towards six joint announcements with the federal government. Our government has been in contact with the federal government, and all parties are in agreement that the first priority is delivering this funding to the Alberta employers and workers who need it. I want to be clear. We will live up to this agreement, and I certainly encourage all members of the House to stay tuned as we highlight this funding with multiple announcements throughout the summer.

The Speaker: Hon. members, I would remind you again about preambles on supplementaries.

Machinery, Equipment, and Linear Property Taxes

Mr. Stier: Mr. Speaker, yesterday we received new information on linear taxation. The Premier said that the government would be putting in place a new regime to oversee the distribution of linear assessment, which would lead to better solutions. This would appear to seriously contradict the Minister of Municipal Affairs' responses over the past several months. She has said that, quote, linear dollars will be staying in rural Alberta, unquote. To the Premier: will you set the record straight? What is your clear and exact plan for linear taxation?

The Speaker: The Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the opportunity to clarify that in no way did the conversation that was engaged with the Premier yesterday contradict anything that I have ever said. Linear taxation will continue to remain in rural Alberta. There will be no change in that. There will be no collection of linear taxes from rural Alberta going to the cities. I've said that before. I will say it again. It's absolutely on the record. It's not being pooled. It's not being delivered to the cities. Once again can I say that it's not going to the cities.

Mr. Stier: Mr. Speaker, I don't think that's exactly what was asked, nor was it asked of that individual.

Given that on linear assessment municipalities have heard nothing but unsubstantiated platitudes and innuendo from the minister in charge and given that at the AUMA and the AAMD and C conventions in the fall the minister said that there will be no redistribution of linear assessment from rural Alberta to the city of Calgary or the city of Edmonton or any other city, Minister, once again: will there or will there not be any changes to the assessment, collection, allocation and/or distribution . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.
The Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I believe that what the member is attempting to do is to have me reveal to the Legislature what the outcome is of the Municipal Government Act review and what the legislation is going to be. I look forward to providing those details to you very soon, and we can at that time have those conversations. However, I will continue to state for the record that any changes that may be coming to linear assessment will be about maintaining the health and well-being of communities outside the cities within this province.

Mr. Stier: Mr. Speaker, more platitudes, more innuendo.

Given that the Premier and her ministers have been saying one thing in the Legislature and another thing at the municipal conventions, let's clear up confusion on another important issue for rural municipalities, that being machinery and equipment taxes. Minister, will you give us a clear and honest answer at this time? What is the government's official position on the assessment, collection, allocation, and distribution of machinery and equipment taxes, please?

The Speaker: The Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Once again I will say that what I say to my stakeholders and what I say in the House all come from the very same place of honesty and integrity in terms of my respect for my municipal partners. I will continue to stand by that, that the outcome of the MGA review and what we present here will in no way contradict the work that I have been engaging in with my stakeholders. I look forward to those conversations with them, as I always do with my stakeholders, that I respect very much.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Opioid Use

Mr. Ellis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. When Alberta Health Services announced that 69 Albertans had died from fentanyl in the first three months of this year, it became crystal clear that this crisis is not subsiding. Five weeks ago B.C. declared a public health emergency because its opioid-related deaths are escalating, yet Alberta has refused to take the same measure. To the Health minister. Your government has taken my advice about funding ALERT, making naloxone more widely available, and regulating pill presses. Will you now accept more of my advice and declare this a public health crisis?

The Speaker: The hon. Associate Minister of Health.

Ms Payne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. To echo the statements from the Minister of Health, our hearts really do go out to the families and communities dealing with the heartbreak and tragedy of drug addiction. We have been listening to our health officials, and they are saying that we do not need to take the step of a public health emergency. They have access to all of the resources and the tools that they need to address this concern. Other provinces have different legislation and need to declare a public health emergency simply to give their public health officers the tools that our officers already have today.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, given that Alberta's internal data collection is likely different from B.C.'s and that declaring a public health crisis might make no difference on a strictly administrative level but given that there are other reasons for declaring a public health crisis such as raising more public awareness about the serious hazard, again to the Health minister: how can creating more awareness about a crisis ever be considered unnecessary?

The Speaker: The Associate Minister of Health.

Ms Payne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. Our team is working very hard around the awareness issue with a number of public information campaigns, including the drugsfool.ca campaign as well as others that we're developing in partnership with our partners in law enforcement. To be clear, in Alberta under Alberta's Public Health Act a public health emergency grants the Minister of Health and chief medical officer extraordinary powers designed to specifically stop a major outbreak of a communicable disease, including quarantining people against their wishes, seizing private property, entering into private homes without a warrant, and even conscription of Albertans into service. We do not believe that that is an appropriate . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
Second supplemental.

Mr. Ellis: Yeah. We're not talking about incarcerating people; we're just trying to make them more aware.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that this government acknowledges the seriousness of fentanyl and W-18 as a problem and given that the public wants certainty that its government will create a comprehensive strategy for dealing with this crisis and given the effectiveness of the Mental Health Review Committee, which was created to offer advice to the Health minister, to the same minister: will you establish a similar opioid abuse advisory committee to deal with this health crisis?

The Speaker: The Associate Minister of Health.

Ms Payne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. As the member mentioned, the mental health review panel did examine this problem of addictions and made a number of recommendations specifically related to opioid addiction. In addition to the work that we've done out of that, we're also working very closely with our indigenous partners to create an opioid strategy, particularly for our First Nation, Métis, and Inuit communities. All of the recommendations are in the mental health review, and we have teams responsible for implementing six priority recommendations of the review. I look forward to continuing to work with the member opposite as we take real action on this issue.

Mr. Fildebrandt: Mr. Speaker, last week marked Gas Tax Honesty Day in Alberta. Since the election of the NDP gas taxes at the pump have gone from 9 cents per litre to 13 cents. Now the ND PST carbon tax will compound this to 17 cents a litre. Come January 2018, those taxes will equal 19 cents a litre on gasoline alone, costing the average family of four $888 a year on gas taxes annually, double the years before. Does the Minister of Finance believe his promised carbon tax rebate will come anywhere close to compensating families for this tax grab?

Ms Phillips: Certainly, Mr. Speaker, middle- and low-income Albertans will receive a rebate of their average use, which, of course, was a calculation arrived at from Statistics Canada and other sources. You know, the fact of the matter here is that we will be using these revenues to reinvest fully in the Alberta economy and move Alberta forward. That is why the climate leadership plan is so broadly supported. It leaves Alberta as the lowest taxed jurisdiction in Canada, but what it also does is that it ensures new markets for our products. It cleans up our air and water. It ensures that we're doing the right thing.

Mr. Fildebrandt: The carbon tax is highway robbery that'll fund only corporate welfare, Mr. Speaker.

Given that truckers are now paying 13 cents per litre for diesel and will be paying 21 cents come 2018 and that most of our imports are distributed by trucks, that will pass these costs on to consumers, causing groceries and other sundry goods to rise, and given that the margins made by owner-operator truckers are slim and getting slimmer, putting truckers out of work – there is no rebate whatsoever for our truckers – how can the Minister of Finance claim that his ND PST carbon tax is revenue neutral for our truckers?

The Speaker: The minister of the environment.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, the opposition's approach is to not tell the truth about the carbon levy and the cost to both consumers and others. It is a fact that the indirect costs of which they speak are wildly inflated and are simply misrepresenting reality. That is why our approach is to reinvest in the economy, reinvest in efficiency, and have an honest conversation about climate change.

Mr. Fildebrandt: The truth hurts, Mr. Speaker.

Given that the NDP keeps calling its carbon tax a levy for some reason – on page 22 of the budget there is a table that shows the revenue coming into the provincial government from personal income tax, corporate income tax, education property tax, other taxes, and something called a carbon levy – and given, Mr. Speaker, that the title of this table, for the benefit of the minister, reads Tax Revenue, can the Minister of Finance confirm that I am reading the title of the table correctly?

Mr. Ceci: You know, we have done great work through the presentation of the budget, and we'll continue to do great work on behalf of Albertans. We have many things in that budget, many things that are identified. We will correctly label everything that we need to label. There are no errata coming. We have done the best job for Albertans, which that party and that party wouldn't have done.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo.

Seniors' Issues

Mr. Yao: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This NDP government is leaving municipalities in the lurch as they look for predictable and sustainable funding for affordable housing. As budgets tighten for our municipalities, they're looking to the provincial government to lead on how to best address this affordable housing crisis crunch. Given that Edmonton is considering slashing its affordable housing budget in half by 2018 and that according to the mayor, quote, council shouldn't renew that funding until it knows how much the provincial and federal governments will contribute, end quote, to the Minister of Seniors and Housing. Cities and municipalities desire a long-term plan for funding. Will you provide them with one?

The Speaker: The Minister of Seniors and Housing.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Unlike previous governments, our government is investing $1.2 billion over five years in seniors' lodges and housing. We're investing $582 million to support major replacement and renewal of existing social housing and seniors' housing. We're very proud. Our government is stepping up and doing things, and we're working with municipalities to make that happen.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Yao: Given that municipalities are looking for innovative ways to develop affordable housing, including that Edmonton is considering building seniors' affordable housing on top of new schools, recreation centres, or other city buildings, and given that these changes would require input from Alberta Education as well as legislative changes, what is this government's position on these proposed innovative social housing models?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you to the member for the question. We're working with municipalities and housing management bodies, and we're focusing right now on shovel-ready projects. There are lots of innovative projects that already have been presented to government, and these investments will move Alberta forward and create jobs locally. Unlike the opposition, who wants to turn back the clock, calling for reckless cuts, we're very proud of stepping up and working with our municipal partners.

Mr. Yao: Mr. Speaker, I've talked to a lot of seniors, gotten a lot of feedback about how important paper documents are to them. Given that moving to online registration and driver's licence renewals has been thrust upon those very same seniors and given that there can be stiff fines and penalties for those who don't have access to or are unsure how to use this technology, will this NDP government exempt seniors from the online registry system, or will this government simply tell seniors to get with the times?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Service Alberta.

Ms McLean: Thank you for the question, Mr. Speaker, although I'm not sure why the member opposite thinks that that is supplemental to the other questions he's asked. Nevertheless, I'm happy to inform the member opposite in this House again that seniors over 70 will be receiving their renewal reminder one last time to let them know on that reminder that they need to sign up online. I'm happy to inform the House as many times as the member needs me to do so. Again, please sign up online, please go to Service Alberta, get your renewal reminder online.

Thank you.

Premier's Office Issues Management Unit

Ms Jansen: Mr. Speaker, this government has a zest for issues management, so much so that they spent a cool million bucks staffing an issues management team even though they already have press secretaries to do that very job in each ministry. Now, I have spent many years listening to the folks across the aisle criticizing our government for having layers of bureaucracy and political staff, and now they're doing the same thing themselves. Can the Premier tell me why she hired press secretaries that she has so little trust in then needed to spend an extra million bucks to get the job done?

The Speaker: The Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm a little surprised that the question is coming from a member who's been part of government. Premiers' offices do have issues management regularly. This is not atypical. The number of political staff in the Premier's office is on par with the number of staff in the Premier's office under the last party, just before the last election. It's that we've aligned them in certain ways to make sure that we have seamless integration. For example, some of our issues managers are supporting the response to the Fort McMurray wildfires to make sure that there is seamless multiministry integration.

Ms Jansen: Mr. Speaker, given that most of the hires to this million-dollar team are former NDP staffers from British Columbia and Manitoba, it must have seemed like the Oprah show over there at the Legislature: you get a job, you get a job. Everyone gets a job except if you're an Alberta communications professional. Then you don't. Again to the Premier: when you said that you had a jobs plan, you didn't tell us that it was a Manitoba jobs plan.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much for the question. Mr. Speaker, let's remember what that party was saying right before the last election: you're going to get fired, public servant; you're going to get fired, public servant. Are you kidding me? You were going to cut a billion dollars from health care, multiple millions of dollars from Human Services, Education. Give me a break. News flash: when New Democrats hire, they want to hire people who understand New Democrat world views to help manage the government. [interjections] We had excellent people from all across the country, including Albertans, hired into that area. [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. members.

Second supplemental question.

Ms Jansen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Now we know that we're on track with the Manitoba jobs plan.

Given that I earned my master's only a few years ago specializing in issues management, I know a lot of folks in this province who would have been delighted and eminently qualified to do this work. In fact, I have binders of communications professionals . . .

The Speaker: Hon. member, get to the question.

Ms Jansen: . . . binders of them, that would have loved this job. Why doesn't the Premier want Albertans to have these jobs?

Ms Hoffman: I'm very proud that we have hired the best people in the country, including many Albertans, to be a part of this area as well as other areas within government. What's unusual is that the previous government also had issues management, but it was housed in the public service. Mr. Speaker, that to me is not clear, transparent, or respectful. Our staff structure may be different, but the number of political staff is comparable to what was under Prentice, and it's less than previous PC governments. Our structure is the same as one that existed under Prime Minister Harper as well as one that exists in other Conservative governments right now and, I believe, under Premier Pallister as well. We're very proud of the team we have. [interjections]

The Speaker: Quiet, please.

The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Indigenous Relations

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Alberta's indigenous people bring a long history of cultural practices, traditions, and health methods that differ greatly from nonindigenous Albertans. I'm grateful that our government supports traditional indigenous culture. Given the unique issues faced by indigenous people in Alberta, to the Minister of Health: what is this government doing to support the health of indigenous people?

The Speaker: The Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the very important question. Certainly, when you look at the health outcomes for indigenous and nonindigenous Albertans, it is an area where we as Albertans have a great deal of work to do to close that gap. In keeping with our government's commitment to strengthen relationships with indigenous people, we're partnering with First Nations communities, with their elected officials as well as those who are off-reserve, living in urban centres, to ensure that the range of health care services, including mental health supports, supporting addictions treatment and diabetes care, are well funded moving forward and well supported. Our goal is to reduce the disparity in health outcomes of...

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
First supplemental.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Indigenous culture in Alberta is unique and includes the use of traditional healing methods. However, given that these unique programs are often costly and therefore limited and inaccessible for those struggling with addictions, to the Minister of Health: what is this government doing to support people seeking traditional healing methods to manage mental health and serious addictions?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, our government respects the traditions of indigenous cultural practices, and Alberta Health Services' aboriginal health program develops, supports, and delivers culturally sensitive programming and services to aboriginal people. There certainly is more work that needs to be done in this area, and one way we can do it is by partnering with organizations that are working on the ground such as the Poundmaker's Lodge, that has a very strong reputation and is in the member's home riding. Additionally, indigenous leaders have provided direct input on the Valuing Mental Health report and the Fentanyl Response Team, and they are now providing guidance into the work we're doing around the implementation of those pieces as well.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to direct my second supplemental to the Minister of Indigenous Relations. Given this government's commitment to addressing the recommendations made by the Truth and Reconciliation Commission at a provincial level, what is this government doing to support these recommendations in real time?

The Speaker: The Justice minister.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. In the past year our government has apologized for not taking a stand against the residential school system, has joined the call for a national inquiry into missing and murdered indigenous women and girls, and has begun work on the implementation of the UN declaration on the rights of indigenous peoples. In addition, the current minister and I have worked very hard at building a new relationship with the indigenous people in our province and in the member's very own riding. I'd like to applaud St. Albert for its recent announcement of a new healing garden in response to the Truth and Reconciliation Commission.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Barrhead-Morinville-Westlock.

Springbank Reservoir Flood Mitigation Project

Mr. van Dijken: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On May 11, 2016, in question period, when being questioned about the Springbank off-stream dry reservoir, the Minister of Transportation stated, "We're currently in the process of talking to the landowners about acquiring their land." Yet the minister also referenced the ongoing four-season environmental impact assessment. One of the government's arguments in favour of choosing Springbank over McLean Creek was the claim that Springbank would have less environmental impact. Can the minister tell us how the government knows that there will be a lower environmental impact if the study hasn't been completed yet?

The Speaker: The Minister of Transportation.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. A study was done before the selection of the Springbank site, and the study found that spawning would have been disrupted in McLean Creek for the bull trout, that it was a migration area for grizzly bears, that there were a number of other species that were potentially seriously impacted by McLean Creek. Compared to the Springbank site, it had a far greater environmental impact, particularly on various wildlife species.

Mr. van Dijken: Given that the Springbank off-stream reservoir is not designed to protect the communities of Bragg Creek and Redwood Meadows in case of a flood and given that both the Wildrose and the NDP supported the McLean Creek site during the election but the NDP has since broken their campaign promise – something has changed the government's mind even before the environmental assessment on Springbank is completed – to the Minister of Transportation: what is the government not telling us, and will these other communities be protected?

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much. Well, you know, if the hon. member would just check the capital plan, he would find out that there was significant – I think it's $30 million for flood protection for Bragg Creek, an additional $6 million to $8 million for protection of Redwood Meadows. It's in the budget, Mr. Speaker. We just passed it.

Mr. van Dijken: Mr. Speaker, given that it's possible the government will not be able to negotiate agreements with certain Springbank landowners and will have to invoke the Expropriation Act and given that the Minister of Transportation indicated in a Global television interview that the government is looking to get the best possible deal and given that just yesterday the minister stood and defended due process and compensation, will the minister commit that if land is expropriated, property rights will be fully protected and full, fair value for the lands will be given as compensation?

Mr. Mason: Mr. Speaker, I believe that the Expropriation Act provides completely fair and adequate recourse for landowners to ensure that they get fair market value for their land. We're prepared to pay that but no more.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Greenway.

Health Services for Immigrants and Their Children

Mr. Gill: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Any and all individuals in Alberta should have access to the highest level of publicly funded medical care. You would think that anyone born in Alberta would automatically receive this option. However, if a child is born in Alberta to parents who do not have resident status and are awaiting paperwork, that child is not entitled to Alberta health care. To the Minister of Health: this issue was raised within my constituency, and I'm wondering what we can do to fix this unfortunate and unfair loophole.

The Speaker: The Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, for the question. Certainly, according to our governing bodies, including the legislation that we pass here in the House, all Canadians have access to Canadian health care, so if there's a specific instance, that member could follow up with my office. If the child is a Canadian, certainly we'd be happy to follow up on that and make sure that they get the right health care services that they need.

Thank you.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Gill: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that individuals immigrate to Alberta from all over the world and given that when they do so, they often bring with them cultural differences and language concerns and given that in health care the relationship and understanding between a doctor and their patient is paramount to successful diagnosis and treatment, again to the minister: can you please outline for the House the steps that are being taken to improve cultural understanding and competencies within Alberta health care?

The Speaker: The Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much for the question. We'd be happy to arrange some follow-up opportunities to do some work if individuals in your office who are supporting your constituents on casework would like more information. Certainly, we have a translational phone line. We have work that's happening in Alberta Health Services both around newcomers as well as indigenous Albertans. There is much more work that needs to be done, but certainly being able to communicate in your first language and making sure that you're able to articulate what you're experiencing is number one as well as offering respect to anyone who walks through those doors.

Thank you for the question.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Gill: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that mental health issues are serious concerns for all Albertans and given that some immigrants who arrive in Alberta bring with them from their home countries mental health concerns for various reasons and given that stigmas still exist about mental health awareness in some cultures and countries, again to the minister: can you outline for the House specific programs in place which seek to increase the uptake of recent immigrants exploring and utilizing all mental health supports available to them?

The Speaker: The Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much for the question, Mr. Speaker and to the member for asking it. Certainly, this is an area of priority for our government and something that we're very proud to be moving forward on. In terms of specific pieces I'd be happy to table something in the House that gets to the level of detail that I think the member is asking for so that all members might be able to have access to some outlines and be able to share it with their constituents.

The Speaker: Hon. members, as requested, there's a supplemental answer by the Government House Leader from yesterday, I believe.

Landowner and Leaseholder Rights

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday I was asked a question by the Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat in connection to Bill 36, and I said at that time that Bill 36 had not been proclaimed.* That is incorrect. Bill 36 has been proclaimed. It has, however, been amended in many of its most egregious features by Bill 10 in 2011.

The Speaker: A response?

Mr. Barnes: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thanks to the hon. member for taking the time and the effort to clarify that. I greatly appreciate it.

I can't help but bring my thoughts back to when we shared opposition together in 2012, and we both spoke so strongly against Bill 36 and what the previous government had done to cause thousands and thousands of landowners, people who had been on their land for four and five generations, to actually rally and express such great concerns. I'm hoping that you thought it hadn't been proclaimed because deep down your government still intends to actually strike Bill 36 and ...

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Do you have another response?

Mr. Mason: Yeah. Thanks very much, and thank you very much for the question. Certainly, we did take a strong stand in connection to some of the legislation of the previous government, including Bill 36. I believe that this is really an issue about surface rights access. Mr. Speaker, we've always stood for the rights of landowners. We believe in due process, proper notification, and fair compensation if, in fact, land is required for legitimate public services. We're currently reviewing how the government approaches surface rights and the liabilities that flow from oil and gas development. It's important we have a process for dealing with compensation and disputes ...

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

In 30 seconds we will continue with Members' Statements.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Northern Hills.

Vivo Recreation Complex and Sue Scott

Mr. Kleinsteuber: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In Calgary-Northern Hills there is a nontraditional recreational organization that has helped shape the personality of a community. This organization evolved while a young, newly built community expanded. Together, both have defined Calgary's northern edge.

In late 1996 the Nose Creek Sports and Recreation Association was formed as a not-for-profit organization to spearhead the development of a community-oriented recreation complex. Community leaders and volunteers came together with the city to discuss the diverse social needs of the residents of north-central Calgary. They envisioned a multipurpose recreational centre that would provide opportunities for recreation, leisure, active wellness, and positive social interaction for every generation in the community.

Well in advance of the facility's grand opening they were seeking a general manager, and Sue Scott was an ideal fit. Sue had been involved with recreation for most of her life, beginning in her early days as a day camp leader. She earned a BA in recreation administration at the U of A in 1981 and later worked at the Lindsay Park Sports centre.

Cardel place opened in 2004, and from day one the facility had a strong social impact and has been financially self-sustainable. Sue has described the experience as opening, launching, and learning. Five years later the board of directors explored how the organization would evolve, and Sue was there to guide the why in that evolution.

In 2015 Cardel place was renamed Vivo for Healthier Generations. Vivo comes from Latin, meaning to live, and it reflects the new philosophy of the organization. The new name embodies the charity's mission and its commitment to helping individuals live their best life.

As of February 1, having led Vivo for nearly 14 years of growth and success, Sue Scott retired from her position as CEO, or more accurately worded, she has graduated to a life of play. In fact, she has already been appointed the CPO, which is the chief play officer, by her colleagues.

I wish Sue well in the future. In the words of its guiding principles: Vivo is a positive, encouraging, all-inclusive and inspiring place.

Thank you, Sue Scott . . .

The Speaker: Thank you. Thank you, hon. member.

The hon. Member for Sherwood Park.

Multiple Sclerosis

Ms McKittrick: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today is World Multiple Sclerosis Day, also known as MS day. The hon. Minister of Advanced Education talked about this while introducing six distinguished guests from the local MS Society.

Mr. Speaker, for the past few years I have cycled for the MS Society with some 2,000 supporters, braving weather, wind, fatigue, sore muscles, from Leduc to Camrose and back, all to raise funds for the MS Society through the Johnson MS Bike Tour. These cyclists come from different backgrounds, including many living with MS and their friends and families. These people are my heroes. MS affects your balance, your vision, your mobility, and your strength. On the second day, as the wind gets stronger and the path goes uphill, the journey gets tougher. It is a tough ride, especially for people with MS. Crossing the finish line is not only a fundraising success but, also, a victory of the spirit of perseverance.

Mr. Speaker, this year's MS day theme is to explore how people diagnosed with MS can explore independence. This can be a challenging step. As the MLA for Sherwood Park I have worked with a number of families whose adult daughter or son suffers from MS. These parents face the dilemma and challenges of allowing independence while also supporting and advocating for their children's MS-related needs. I am thankful to the MS Society for the support that they provide to people living with MS and to their relatives.

Mr. Speaker, our country has one of the highest MS rates. Our chance of being diagnosed with MS is 13 times more than the French and 278 times more than the Pakistanis.

Mr. Speaker, this Sunday is the Jayman Built MS Walk in Edmonton through which the MS Society hopes to raise funds to continue their much-needed research for advocacy and to deliver crucial programs and services.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Pipeline Approval

Mr. MacIntyre: Mr. Speaker, Albertans have finally received long-overdue recognition of something that Wildrose has continuously highlighted over the last several months. The Alberta NDP took a $3 billion carbon tax gamble, and they are losing. This government has asked Alberta's taxpayers to buy a multibillion-dollar international oil and gas industry its social licence, that the NDP have arbitrarily deemed the missing ingredient in pipeline approval, that it needs to gain access to tidewater.

As Albertans ready themselves to start paying this tax, the antipipeline, anti-Alberta lobby groups have only ramped up efforts to see Alberta fail to obtain desperately needed market access. In scathing breakdowns a former Alberta minister and the media have detailed the actions taken to prevent Alberta from obtaining new export pipelines in spite of our new, costly carbon tax. The Council of Canadians, Greenpeace Canada, and 60 other environmental groups called on the NEB to suspend the Energy East application process, calling it "a complete fiasco."

Just months after these ill-informed groups rejected the NEB's processes, which, by the way, have resulted in the highest regulatory standards in the world for pipelines, 70 environmental NGOs announced their opposition to any new pipelines. Later that week Montreal's mayor and 30 other municipal officials professed their opposition to Energy East. B.C.'s Premier has declared her continued opposition to Kinder Morgan, and Ontario's Premier recently rejected Alberta natural gas. Then the NDP's own national party members, of course, have voted in favour of the Leap Manifesto right in our own backyard. So where exactly is this social licence?

This government has placed the burden of buying social licence on the backs of Alberta taxpayers. This is clearly not the answer, and neither is it working. The answer is to support the findings of the NEB on key infrastructure projects. If the government is serious about market access . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As chair of the Standing Committee on Legislative Offices and in accordance with section 4(5) of the Election Act I would like to table five copies of the following: the report of the Chief Electoral Officer on the September 3, 2015, by-election in Calgary-Foothills and the March 22, 2016, by-election in Calgary-Greenway. Copies of this report will be provided to all members.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to table the requisite number of copies of an online campaign started by a constituent of mine in Edmonton-McClung, June Acorn, asking Alberta Infrastructure to save the Alberta museum building in old Glenora. As of printing, the site had attracted 5,244 digital signatures from around the world.

The Speaker: Hon. members, I believe there was a point of order that was raised earlier. The Government House Leader.

Point of Order Anticipation

Mr. Mason: Yes. Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I rose on a point of order. There were a number of questions from members opposite in connection with Bill 20, and I rose in order to just draw to the Speaker's attention Standing Order 23(e).

- 23 A Member will be called to order by the Speaker if, in the Speaker's opinion, that Member
- (e) anticipates, contrary to good parliamentary practice, any matter already on the Order Paper or on notice for consideration on that day.

I would note that Bill 20 is indeed on the Order Paper for today, and many questions from the opposite side were directly related to the contents of that bill.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Opposition House Leader.

Mr. Cooper: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise to the point of order today. I think that often in this place when politics breaks out, there is a bit of a track record of there being two different versions of the facts, one that the Government House Leader believes to be true and one that I actually know is true. Perhaps that was a bit unfair.

I do have just a couple of quick comments with respect to anticipation. The question that was asked by the Official Opposition House Leader spoke to government policy around legislation that included things like Bill 36, that the Government House Leader rose to speak to, and included things like bills 19 and 24. The question specifically related to the Premier and if the Premier would admit this is an overreach and scrap any provision in any law which tramples property and privacy rights. While the question may have been regarding government policy, it certainly wasn't specific to a clause in any bill.

I think there are a number of rulings on anticipation, including one on November 19, when you, sir, said:

I also would point out that the questions posed were not dealing with the specific clauses of the bill, and the practice in this Assembly is that the rule against anticipation is not violated by a question about government policy in relation to a bill that is up for consideration that day.

I recall you saying wise words at that time. I would again comment on the wise words of yourself, Mr. Speaker, with respect to the rule of anticipation.

These questions were clearly not out of order. It's my guesstimate that the Government House Leader's efforts are to rule all of the tough questions out of order that they wouldn't like to answer during question period as anticipation. In fact, if we look at the lengthy list of bills that are still on the Order Paper, it would be hard to find a question that we might be able to ask.

In this case, because it was not on a specific clause of the bill, I would suggest that you will find in your research that, in fact, this was not out of order and was not anticipation.

The Speaker: The hon. leader of the third party.

Mr. McIver: Mr. Speaker, it's my belief that clause 23(e), that the Government House Leader correctly read out, on anticipation – I've always believed that the intention of that was for items before they're introduced in the House, when they're on the Order Paper.

At any rate, what the Official Opposition House Leader said remains true. The question actually didn't refer to a specific bill. It asked in generic terms about government positions that would take a specific viewpoint. I don't remember the hon. member mentioning that particular one that's on the Order Paper today in any event.

The Speaker: Any other members?

I think I'd like to defer on this item.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 19 Reform of Agencies, Boards and Commissions Compensation Act

[Debate adjourned May 25]

The Speaker: Is there anyone wishing to speak to this?
Is there a member who would like to close debate?

[Motion carried; Bill 19 read a second time]

3:00 Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Ms Jabbour in the chair]

The Chair: I'd like to call the committee to order.

Bill 15 An Act to End Predatory Lending

The Chair: Are there any questions, comments, or amendments with respect to this bill? The hon. Member for Red Deer-North.

Mrs. Schreiner: Thank you, Madam Chair. As cosponsor of Bill 15, An Act to End Predatory Lending, it is a vital step to strengthening consumer protection within the payday loans industry. Currently payday lenders in Alberta rank amongst the second-highest rates in the country. Our ministry resolves to protect vulnerable Albertans from the exploitive rates on payday loans, contributing to the cycle of poverty. We recognize the trials that Albertans are currently experiencing, and Bill 15 will regulate the resources that they need without having to experience outrageous interest rates.

Madam Chair, our first step to understanding the vicious cycle that predatory lending can initiate was to engage stakeholder consultation. From October to December 2015 the government of Alberta reached out to Albertans to actively listen to their voices regarding payday lending regulations. The announcement regarding more responsible regulation was received very positively. We recognize the importance of this service and are moving to provide a more fiscally responsible resolution.

Her Honour Lieutenant Governor Lois Mitchell spoke of pursuing "a coherent and effective economic development strategy" in her Speech from the Throne on March 8, 2016. The current practice of payday lending percentage rates does not resonate as responsible, and we have the opportunity to bridge the gaps for those Albertans who are desperately in need of help. In her throne speech Her Honour the Lieutenant Governor spoke of the fact that Albertans need a government that will stand up for them when they are vulnerable.

To end these abuses, my government has introduced An Act to End Predatory Lending. As stated, Albertan payday lenders are charging the second-highest rates, and that translates into percentages as high as an annual percentage rate of 600. For repeat users, this exploitive rate encourages poverty, and we are committed to creating pathways out of poverty for those trapped in the vicious cycle of debt.

Madam Chair, we listened to over 1,400 Albertans, and this government is serious about protecting our consumers. We believe that well-informed consumers are in a far better position to make well-informed decisions that benefit them and their families. Some Albertans are trapped in the cycle of debt because they may not understand the complexities of payday loans. Some Albertans underestimate the impact of this high-cost borrowing approach, or they do not realize that there may be better alternatives available. Bill 15 addresses these concerns specifically.

Madam Chair, our government has listened to Albertans' concerns, and we recognize the need for short-term financial resolutions for those in need. We are reaching out to the lenders within federal governance to support viable answers. I am proud that both First Calgary Financial and Servus Credit Union have made a commitment to provide these short-term resources and make them available this year.

The impact of these predatory rates has been responded to with consultation amongst Albertan stakeholders, to work together to find the answers that our most vulnerable need. The introduction of Bill 15 could not respond more sensibly right now. With the precarious economy and in light of the recent wildfires, Albertans need a government that is going to provide options they can work with.

In 2009, when Alberta introduced its payday lending regulations, it lacked the conscience required to protect those using the services. It legislated the cost of borrowing per $100 at $23. Short-term loans are not expressed as an annual percentage rate due to their duration. When they are, Madam Chair, they translate to 600 per cent. The very nature of predatory lending makes our vulnerable the prey of circumstances.

I ask: how can we provide better options for better decisions for our Albertans at such a critical time? I am so very pleased that collectively we have drafted sound changes to provide Albertans with help rather than hinder their current economic challenges. Our draft proposals include items that maintain the accessibility of short-term loans. By reducing the fee per $100 borrowed from $23 to $15, we alleviate a substantial burden to borrowers, with a significant reduction in the APR. This will bring us from the second-highest rate in Canada to par with the lowest, and that, Madam Chair, is fiscal responsibility.

By mandating instalments, we can reduce the rollover loan occurrence. This will give people the opportunity to pay off smaller amounts so that the constraint they feel from rapid repayment is also drastically diminished. Rollover occurs when repayment in full hampers an individual's ability to maintain their current expenses with the reduction in expendable income. When we bring these measures together with the commitment from First Calgary Financial and Servus Credit Union to establish short-term credit options and financial literacy information requirements from our payday lenders, we balance the need for short-term loans with strong advocacy.

Madam Chair, I want to thank the Service Alberta ministry for opening their ears to the dialogue Albertans shared regarding predatory lending. The current practice provides the opportunity to bridge the gaps for those Albertans who are desperately in need of help.

Our proposed Bill 15 needs to validate two measures in order to suffice the best interests of our Alberta. Firstly, our changes need to meet the test to protect the vulnerable and reduce inequality in Alberta. Secondly, it needs to fit with the goals of reducing the incidence of poverty. I am confident that together with the input of Albertans we can construct a framework that speaks to a strong social policy framework and meets the needs of our Albertans.

I encourage all in the House to support Bill 15 to put an end to predatory lending. Thank you.

The Chair: Any other questions, comments, amendments? The hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Mr. Cooper: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. It's a pleasure to rise today and speak to Bill 15, An Act to End Predatory Lending. I'm pleased to rise and speak in favour of Bill 15.

This is a very well-intentioned bill that makes a number of very positive steps forward when it comes to assisting Albertans. Certainly, we've seen in this industry a cycle that individuals can fall into and become entrapped in the cycle of payday loans. Perhaps "entrapped" is a bit strong. The challenge is that when they get started, they may not realize the full consequences of the transaction. For the Legislature to be taking some steps on this is, I think, a net positive.

There are many things in the bill that are moving in the right direction. I think that issues around improving financial literacy are critical to ending the cycle of poverty, and there are certain organizations that are looking to fill a gap of small loans to high-risk borrowers. I think that's a positive step in the right direction. Well, if they are going to do that, perhaps the need for legislation wasn't in place. Typically I like to err on the side of educate, don't legislate, but I think Bill 15 is needed because there are certainly some organizations that wind up taking advantage of people, and it presents a real challenge.

I think that one of the things this bill does is, again, provides the opportunity for financial literacy. Requiring payday lenders to provide financial literacy information I think is a very positive step. However, there is no guarantee that borrowers will take advantage of this information. I think we all have a role to play in the financial literacy of Albertans. The government has a role to play in developing financial literacy programs, tools, publications that promote Albertans' financial literacy or at least provide a vehicle for those that would like to get that information.

Wildrose has long called for an increased focus on financial literacy in Alberta's K to 12 curriculum. I think it is an incredible opportunity that we have for those who have engaged in the school system, be it public or private or separate, a real opportunity to lay in a good foundation, to have students understand the risks and pitfalls that are out there, and it gives students a strong foundation on which to build their future life. So if we can do those things through the vehicles that are available, I think that is positive. Financial literacy around payday loans and other credit, both the benefits of credit and the risk of credit, I think is critically important. I think the opportunity to train and teach around core entrepreneurial principles is also a great opportunity that we have and should make better use of so that at the end of the day we aren't necessarily relying on payday lenders to provide that financial literacy information. While they also have a part to play, I think we all could do more around this issue.

There are certainly some potential risks with the legislation in limiting avenues by which someone may be able to have access to short-term loans. That does present some potential risks that we should all be aware of. That's not to say that we shouldn't move forward on a piece of legislation like this, but, you know, all pieces of legislation have both intended and unintended consequences, so there are some potential risks around here. I think that the benefits of supporting those who are taken advantage of and get into this very vicious cycle certainly outweigh some of the other unintended consequences, but I think that it's important that it is on our radar and on the government's radar, that we are watching for some of the other potential pitfalls that may exist because of the legislation. Certainly, no one in the House would say that 600 per cent interest is reasonable. This is a real barrier to individuals breaking the cycle of poverty.

I think that we ought to move forward on this piece of legislation. I think that there are a number of positive steps in the right direction. I look forward to seeing how the government is able to engage some other private lenders to ensure that some of the unintended consequences that I spoke about don't become a real, prevalent problem for folks that would have traditionally found themselves inside a store for a payday loan.

I think I'll keep my comments brief today and move forward. This is a positive step in the right direction. There are a few things we need to keep our eyes on as legislators. Certainly, the Minister of Justice may like to do some work around enforcement of some of the unintended consequences. I think that at end of the day this bill is certainly going to do a lot more good than harm, and that's why I'm pleased to support it.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to this bill? The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Chair. I am glad to be able to speak to Bill 15 this day. I know that when this bill was brought to our caucus and I had to sit down and look at it, I saw much to recommend to the people of Alberta in this bill. There are a few things that maybe cause some concern, but I rise today to speak in favour of Bill 15.

I realize that I've lived an incredibly privileged life. I had a mother and a father that loved me a great deal and still do, hopefully.

Mr. Mason: I'm sure they're not New Democrats.

Mr. Smith: Oh, if you only knew my father.

I knew as I was growing up that my parents worked very hard. They took care of me, and they taught me how to work hard. I've been privileged to grow up in a time in Alberta where I've never lacked a job, where I had the skills and the ability to find a job and to keep a job, but that's not the case for all people.

When I look at this bill, I think that we could all say that we have to step outside of ourselves and try to put ourselves in the position of somebody that is maybe less fortunate than ourselves. Poverty is a grinding thing. It's never easy, and it can overwhelm a person. When you're in a downward cycle, when you're struggling with that poverty, with trying to find a job, with trying to figure out where your next meal is going to come from or where you're going to stay for that night, in many ways it's almost overwhelming to the point of hopelessness.

The other day I was driving away from my office. I usually park in the back, and as I'm going down the alley, I see a pile of stuff and a young lady sitting beside this pile of stuff. I'm busy, and I figure I'll just drive by. I got two-thirds of my vehicle past this young lady, and I stopped. It was cold. I backed up, I rolled down my window, and I said: what's the problem? She said: well, I had a fight with my sister, and she's kicked me out. I said: is this your stuff here? She said: yeah. I said: "Have you got a place to go? Are you waiting for somebody to pick you up? Is there someplace for you to go?" "No. No, I don't know where I'm going to go." I said: "Well, listen; I'm not saying that I can solve all your problems, but I'm the MLA, and my office is two doors down that way. I want you to stop in, and I want you to talk to my assistant, Wendy. I have to go right now, but I want you to stop in and see what we can do. At the end of the day if there's nothing that we can do, I want you to phone my wife, and you can stay with us for the night if that's what needs to happen."

We don't all have the same advantages in life. We understand that. There are times when we can be in a situation where we just don't know how we're going to handle life. As a teacher I always had a huge amount of empathy for the kids in my classroom that came from broken families or came from families that were dysfunctional. I can remember going with my church to the Mustard Seed church in Edmonton and volunteering to serve several meals. I don't know if I've told the House this, but every time that I've gone to serve at the Mustard Seed, I've seen students of mine, at least former students, walk through the line. So you stopped your serving, and you took them aside, and you sat down with them and had a cup of coffee or hot chocolate or whatever, and you'd just say: "How's life going? What are you doing here? Is there anything that I can do to help?" You know, in each case that it's happened – and it's sad. You can't save people from themselves sometimes. You can't save students from themselves sometimes. We all make bad choices sometimes. Whether it was drugs or whether it was a dysfunctional family or they'd moved to Edmonton and things had fallen apart, every time you had to stop and you had to ask them: "Is there anything that I can do? Would a few bucks help? Would you like to come back to Drayton? How is your life going? Is there anything that I can do?" You see, that's what you do when you live in a community.

To a degree I look at this bill, and I see it as part of becoming a community that cares. I look at this bill, and I see that it wants to reduce the borrowing fees. I can see where in a worst-case scenario they can be exorbitant, but I also understand that these payday lenders exist for a reason. Sometimes when you don't have a steady job, when you don't have a steady address, when you don't know how you're going to handle life, when you're suffering from illness, perhaps mental illness, the banks aren't necessarily going to lend you the money that you think you need. Payday lenders meet a need. What we're trying to do here is just ensure that the need of these people isn't taken advantage of.

Payday loan companies can sometimes find themselves in situations where, because of the decisions of the people, they do have to charge them exorbitant rates of interest. In making sure that we take care of that situation, we don't want to put these companies out of business either. They do serve a need, and we want to make sure that one of the consequences of this legislation isn't lowering the interest rates or lowering the rates that payday loan companies can charge so low that we reduce their ability to take on any risk. So we need to find a balance here. I don't know if we've found that balance completely, but I believe that overall this bill tries to find the balance and maybe moves us a little closer to that.

I was reading an article the other day in the newspaper that was saying that even people that are middle income, higher, upper-class income have taken on mortgage debt that is so high that they often will have problems meeting the financial expectations of the month and that this is becoming a concern for the financial institutions, that Canadian debt is becoming too high. While I have concerns about that, I also understand that these people have jobs, that in many cases they have resources that allow them to be able to meet those odd occasions when they have less money at the end of the month than they have bills, that there are times when they can access more income. These people generally have the facility to be able to make wise choices when it comes to their debt load.

The thing that I like about this bill is that it requires lenders to refer borrowers to financial literacy resources. I know that my kids, when they went to university, came to me and said, "Dad, we're going to go get a student loan." I said, "Ah, jeez, guys, do you really need to do that?" "Yeah, Dad, we need to have more money; we need that student loan." "Well, you know, you're 20 years old; you're going to make your own choices in life. But let me tell you that it's certainly a lot harder to pay it off than it is to borrow it." So we had those conversations. You see, at least before they made that decision to go get that student loan, my kids sat down, and we had that conversation.

I'm not sure that sometimes the people that are living in poverty, even if they had that conversation, have the ability to make any other choices. They're desperate. I think it's important that we take the time, that we make sure that they have had the ability to ensure that the choices that they're making are wise choices, that they can try to handle them, that they can see how they can pay those loans off that they make, and that usually it should be, especially for payday loans, a short span before they have to repay that loan.

Overall, while I have some concerns with this bill, I believe that it's going to do the job, that it's going to make some changes that are going to be positive in the lives of Albertans. So I am pleased to be able to say that I speak in favour and that I will support Bill 15.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Madam Chair. I appreciate the opportunity to rise and speak to the bill and continue the debate on Bill 15. I appreciate the words from the gentleman across the aisle and everyone who has spoken so far today. You know, it really is my firm belief that one of the key roles of government is to look out for the most vulnerable and, when necessary, protect them from systems that, whether by design or circumstance, can serve to entrench poverty and vulnerability and that rather than simply tossing them a pair of bootstraps and abandoning them to what can often be the less than tender mercies of the invisible hand, we at times, when it is appropriate, take steps to regulate markets and ensure that individuals are protected. That's why I'm very happy to see this legislation coming forward. I'm very appreciative of the work that's been done by the minister and her staff on this, the consultation that they've had, and what appears to me to be a very thorough plan to address the issue and the challenges surrounding payday loans.

3:30

As has been noted by many who have spoken today, we know that individuals borrowing under payday loan agreements are often subject to very high levels of interest. This bill helps control that. But it also goes beyond just protecting consumers in the immediate future; it lays the groundwork for more significant changes and protections in the future.

Now, I appreciate the concerns that were raised by the members across the aisle that it's important that we include education; that we consider all of the aspects that are involved with this; that we ensure that when we are making changes to protect individuals and put in place appropriate regulations, we don't have too many unintended consequences; and that we keep a close eye on the effects that this has on the market. That's why I'm very happy to see that in this bill it does require the minister to collect key information from lenders and to report on the status of the payday lending industry and the development of alternative options as this goes forward, and that information will be shared with all members of this House. This is an excellent opportunity, I think, for all of us to be able to keep a close eye on how these pieces come into play, how they affect things, and to be able to make smart and wise decisions on how we move forward. That annual report is going to continue as we move forward.

The act really sets out a clear goal, and that is to create an environment where the cost of borrowing and repayment options help to alleviate some of the struggles that Albertans face. We have some excellent partners in this. Of course, when we go out to do this work as a government, it's extremely important, I think, that we work with both business and community groups to find the solutions that are needed. I'm very pleased to see that this bill is committed to working with credit unions and community groups to develop alternative options. I recently was at an event where I had the opportunity to chat with one of the leaders of Servus Credit Union, who shared with me their excitement to work with our government to create new lower interest options for those in need of short-term loans. As was noted by my colleague from Red Deer-North, First Calgary Financial has also stepped up to provide a short-term microloan program, which they are currently piloting in the city of Calgary.

It's great to see that we have all of these people who are coming together to ensure that we have other options and other opportunities. I think these will go some way towards addressing some of the possible concerns that were raised by some of the members that spoke today to ensure that individuals will still have access to short-term credit when it is needed, when they're in that position, but that it will be available at a significantly less barrier and be far less likely to cause a continued cycle of poverty that could continue to bring people down.

I appreciate the thoughts that were shared by the Member for Drayton Valley-Devon about this bill being part of a community that cares, and I truly believe that's what this is. Albertans are rallying around this legislation and showing their support. It has received high praise from community groups and individuals across the spectrum. It's something that I truly believe all Albertans support and believe that we can find better ways to provide those in need with the supports they need at far less burden and cost to themselves. I agree with the member, of course, that we want to ensure that people's needs are met without them being taken advantage of. That's really what it comes down to. When people are at their most vulnerable, we want to ensure that we provide them with tools and supports that are going to move them forward and not drag them further down into debt.

I'm pleased to see in this legislation that payday lenders will now be prohibited from offering different forms of credit to borrowers that still have payday loans outstanding. It's incredibly important, I think, that we ensure that people are not simply driven further into debt and not taken advantage of when they're in that vulnerable position.

Payday lenders will be specifically prohibited from attempting to process payments before their due dates. Having been in positions before where money has been very tight and I was at near poverty levels, I know what it's like when you get hit with that unexpected NSF charge or some of the other banking things that can happen. This provides further protection to ensure that people who are already short on money aren't losing even more due to unscrupulous practices.

It will also restrict payday lenders from actively soliciting individuals by directly contacting them through mail, phone, over the Internet, or through social media. Again, it's important that we provide the services that people need to help them through these difficult times. At the same time we want to ensure that we're not doing it in a way that pulls people into cycles of debt that they're not prepared for or that they don't fully understand.

I agree with the members that spoke today who noted as well the importance of the bits on financial literacy. Incredibly important. That was a lesson I had to learn myself, too, as a young man. Certainly, growing up, I had to learn how to handle my money, I had to learn how to deal with a credit card, and I had to learn how to look out for myself. You know, I had student loans. I had other things that I had to learn to deal with. It's incredibly important, I agree, that we try to incorporate that as much as possible in our schools but also in these situations where people are in that vulnerable place, that when they go looking for help, they're provided with full and transparent information both about the loans that are available, what effect those can have on them, their full options as part of the spectrum, and also further information about financial literacy to help them best navigate and get themselves into a situation where they don't need to rely on these sorts of supports in the future.

Again, I'd like to thank the minister for bringing this forward. I'd like to thank all the members who have expressed their support. I look forward to voting in favour of Bill 15.

Thank you.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Calgary-East.

Ms Luff: Thank you, Madam Chair. I just want to take a brief moment to really express my support for this piece of legislation. This is something that affects my constituency of Calgary-East a lot. I live in an area of the city where payday lenders have a tendency to cluster, lower income areas. There are maps that show that in my constituency. In the heart of my constituency, 17th Avenue S.E., we have 11 payday lenders on that one street alone, and there are other areas in my riding where they also concentrate. This is something that the 17th Avenue BRZ has been working on for a really long time. They've been working on trying to work with city council to put moratoriums on the number of payday lenders that can exist. I find it hard to believe that payday lenders are not making a lot of money when they have a tendency to proliferate so much.

I just wanted to take this opportunity to express sincere gratitude on my behalf and on behalf of the folks who live in my community who are going to benefit hugely from this piece of legislation, who are going to benefit from additional transparency and additional consumer protection, who are going to be able to access those financial literacy pieces.

We have great organizations. We have spoken about Momentum. Momentum is an organization in my riding that offers microlending programs. Also, Sunrise Community Link is another one that has taken the model from Momentum and uses it to help single women in my riding who are, you know, coming out of homelessness for the first time, helps them to save money and helps them be financially literate. There are so many groups doing great work, and this is a piece of legislation that will help those groups continue to do great work, continue to provide options for people so that they're not going to get stuck in a cycle of debt, they're not going to get stuck in a cycle of poverty. It's going to benefit folks who live in my community.

I just wanted to take a very brief moment to express my support for this legislation. Calgary-East is thankful for this legislation. I would hope that everyone in this House would vote in favour of this legislation.

The Chair: Any other hon. members wishing to speak to the bill?

Seeing none, we'll call the question.

[The clauses of Bill 15 agreed to]

[Title and preamble agreed to]

The Chair: Shall the bill be reported? Are you agreed?

Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chair: Opposed? That's carried.

Traffic Safety Amendment Act, 2016

The Chair: Are there any questions, comments, or amendments with respect to this bill? The hon. Member for Barrhead-Morinville-Westlock.

Mr. van Dijken: Thank you, Madam Chair. I rise to speak to Bill 16, the Traffic Safety Amendment Act, 2016. There are a lot of good things in this act. I'm not going to dwell on those. Instead, I want to talk about what is missing here.

One thing I do notice is that we are missing definitions, specifically a definition for transportation network companies. I had a meeting with the taxi industry, and they, too, noted the lack of a definition for transportation network companies in Bill 16. The taxi industry is leery that so much will get shoved into the regulations when it belongs in the legislation. Come to think of it, Madam Chair, the Traffic Safety Act doesn't even have a definition for taxi in the main part. Here Alberta Transportation has set up a potential conflict between TNCs, the transportation network companies, and taxis by not having a definition in the legislation. While a TNC cannot be a taxi, a taxi can be a TNC. Again, it comes down to definitions.

If the definitions had been opened, Wildrose would likely have had amended the definitions to include tow trucks as emergency vehicles. The tow truck industry would very much like this designation to help protect them as they do their dangerous work on the highways. But, alas, we are left hoping that the minister will take this feedback to his department for round 3 of amendments to the Traffic Safety Act on behalf of the tow truck industry.

That being said, the taxi industry is very interested in having a level playing field for TNCs and taxis. The taxi industry is of the opinion that nothing has changed, only the manner of dispatch. TNCs argue, on the other hand, that taxis are different. Taxis get a municipal licence, they are often part of a fleet, their cars are marked so they can pick up strangers on the road, their drivers drive as a career, et cetera.

Wildrose, of course, is cognizant of the need for a level playing field, but we are also cognizant of the need to reduce red tape. When you think about the reality of ride sharing, the ride-sharing technology and that sharing culture, it seems that a lot of these long-standing rules might be outdated, a lot of the red tape might be outdated and only put into place as a result of lobbying by insiders or political considerations and not genuinely because of safety.

We're all familiar with some of the ride-sharing services like Uber and Lyft, but a new development is taking ride sharing to the next level by having carpooling apps. In these cases the driver isn't being paid to drive someone around; the person is just carpooling with the driver. They help to share the costs of a shared trip, not paying for the time of the driver. The driver just happens to be going in the same direction as the passenger, and they are able to come together with this technology to work on that carpooling aspect of it.

This is very obviously not a taxi, but will it get caught up in the same regulations? This is a concern that I would have. The technology continues to evolve over time. I do not believe that we want to have overbearing regulations and government red tape that would get in the way of improving carpooling and of getting fewer vehicles on the road, to start removing some of those vehicles and having the ability for people to carpool in a more efficient manner.

The legislation enables a regulatory framework, and we do need one, however onerous or light it might be. But the bill could be improved by treating TNCs in a separate bill or at least by excluding package delivery, parcel delivery, or carpooling. So I have some amendments to propose along those lines. I have my first amendment here. I should keep one, I guess. Would you like me to wait?

The Chair: Just till I see the original.

Mr. van Dijken: Okay.

The Chair: This will be known as amendment A1.

Go ahead, hon. member.

Mr. van Dijken: Okay. Thank you, Madam Chair. The amendment moves that Bill 16, Traffic Safety Amendment Act, 2016, be amended by striking out sections 3, 9, and 13. Essentially, these are the sections that would be speaking to the transportation network companies. The title of the bill, Traffic Safety Amendment Act – all the other sections in here are essentially amending, repealing, or substituting sections of the existing act. What this amendment would seek to do is to take a look at the sections that are being added to the Traffic Safety Act with regard to transportation network companies. We are adding these sections to the act; we're not amending or repealing or substituting. So section 3 is: "Appeals re administrative penalties re transportation companies." Then section 9 is: "The following is added after section 129" with regard to transportation network companies.

Like I've said before, Madam Chair, the very fact that there is no definition of a transportation network company – this definition isn't in the legislation, nor is the definition of a taxi, so in order to recognize and clarify the distinction between the two, I do believe that, possibly, it would be better that we introduce transportation network company legislation in a separate bill. I believe there are too many loose ends here that will be covered off in regulations. That's left a lot of uncertainty within industry, within the taxi industry and what would be referred to as the ride-sharing industry, as to how far reaching these regulations will be.

This amendment will send the government, essentially, back to do their homework, possibly send it to committee, and ensure that there's more accountability here.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Transportation.

Mr. Mason: Well, thank you very much, Madam Chair. I'm a little bit surprised by this amendment from the hon. member. It essentially removes any reference to transportation network companies, ride-sharing companies like Uber and so on, from the act. That is certainly not acceptable to me. This has been a considerable amount of work, with discussions with the industry on all sides, to come forward with a workable regulatory framework for this new technology.

The objective, Madam Chair, always has been twofold; first of all, and most importantly, to provide for the safety of the public who are accessing ride-sharing companies. That is fundamental, I think. When you use your app on your phone to contact a ride-sharing company and a driver who you do not know and have never met shows up at your door to take you somewhere and you are going to get into that person's car, you need to know certain things. First of all, you know that it's a legitimate person that's actually working for the ride-sharing company, who has the proper licence so that you can be reasonably assured that the driver is a relatively safe driver; secondly, that the person has no recorded criminal activity, whether it's a record or current charges, that that person is going to be safe for you personally; and, finally, that if you do get into an accident, you're adequately covered by insurance.

We've not tried to be overly prescriptive. We've not tried to pick winners and losers. We've tried to put in place a level playing field – and that's the second objective, Madam Chair – that allows the market to work, allows for the development of new technology.

What the hon. member is proposing is, essentially, to take out any ability for the government to regulate these ride-sharing companies. Essentially, one of the key functions of this bill is being entirely gutted and removed. So on that basis, Madam Chair, in my view, it's very contrary to the intent of our department, the work that's been done, and of the legislation itself, and I urge all hon. members to defeat this amendment.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Barrhead-Morinville-Westlock.

Mr. van Dijken: Thank you, Madam Chair. Just for clarification, the amendment is coming forward in good spirit and for the fact that we are looking at a completely new way of doing ride sharing and rides for hire. There are a lot of loose ends that come forward in Bill 16, so what the amendment is intended to do is to essentially say: we need a little more detail here. Whether it goes to committee or whatever order it needs to do that, we need to have the taxi industry and the ride-sharing industry have the ability to come before a committee or before government to be sure that all interests are being protected and that we're coming up with sound legislation before regulation is necessary. We don't want to get into a situation where at the decision of Executive Council, the industry is concerned about what direction it goes.

The very fact that we don't even have the definition of what truly is a transportation network company: do we have the fact that the taxis will be included as part of that definition? That's unsure in this legislation.

It's not meant to take the safety aspect or the efforts of the government into question. All it is essentially saying is that possibly there needs to be more work done here.

The Chair: The hon. minister.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. Well, that's all well and good. What the amendment actually does, if you look at it, is that it removes the reference to transportation network companies under section 9. In 129.1, that would be added, it removes the words: “A transportation network company may only operate in accordance with the regulations under this Part.” Section 129.2(1) provides for administrative penalties to enforce the rules that we put in place. Section 129.3 gives the government the power to apply, through the registrar of motor vehicles, for an injunction against a ride-sharing company or a TNC that is in ongoing violation of the regulations. So this takes away any power to enforce the standards that we want to place on them. It actually gives a completely free ride to the TNC because it removes any ability to impose a penalty.

Section 3 would be removed as well. That deals with the right of transportation network companies that are subject to sanctions under the act to appeal to the board. That’s very important. If you impose these penalties, administrative penalties and so on, the people who are penalized have in natural justice a right of appeal. That’s why that’s there.

To take this out removes any ability to enforce anything. I don’t know if that’s the hon. member’s intention, but it can only be of tremendous benefit to a transportation network company like Uber because it allows them to completely ignore any attempts to provide regulations for the public’s safety. I don’t know if that’s the intention of the hon. member, but that is, in fact, the effect.

I will just add that the reason that the definition of TNCs is in the regulations is because the technology is very fast developing, and it is very difficult to put in legislation something that within a couple of years may in fact be inadequate or incomplete. That’s why it’s in regulation.

This is an act or an amendment to an act to allow the regulation of an industry in our province, a transportation industry, to protect public safety. That regulation of industries is not done through legislation. It’s done through administrative processes that are allowed and limited by legislation, and that’s what this is. So to suggest that we regulate through legislation would simply tie this place up in knots. It would be like every time you wanted to change a speed limit on a highway having to come back and get an amendment to the legislation. That’s not how government works, Madam Chair. It just doesn’t work that way.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Mr. Cooper: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. Just briefly in response to the minister, to imply that having a definition of what a transportation network company might look like is like changing a speed limit is perhaps a bit of a stretch in terms of what regulations should apply and shouldn’t apply.

Now, while the member may disagree with the amendment – that’s totally fine – I think that the intention was that portions of the legislation haven’t hit the mark. I might just say that I appreciate the work that’s been done, and I would suggest, just as many of my colleagues did at second reading when supporting the legislation, that it’s likely that we will continue to support the legislation.

One of the challenges or things that we are working to highlight is that there are some significant gaps, so the member is essentially making a recommendation that would require its own piece of legislation around transportation network companies. By removing that, we would then have that requirement moving forward.

Now, I can appreciate the position of the minister, that he feels that they’ve done enough inside this piece of legislation as it is presented to move forward, but I think highlighting a number of these potential risks and challenges can be very positive and helpful to the overall process.

I accept and recognize that the government and many of their members will choose not to support the amendment, but I think that some of the intentions of the Member for Barrhead-Morinville-Westlock are to try and highlight that we haven’t quite got there yet.

I think, with that, I’ll be pleased to support the amendment, and we can move forward through a couple of other amendments that I think are also important with respect to the overall direction of the legislation.

The Chair: Any other hon. members wishing to speak to amendment A1?

Seeing none, we’ll call the question.

[Motion on amendment A1 lost]

The Chair: Are there any further questions, comments, or amendments with respect to the bill? The hon. Member for Barrhead-Morinville-Westlock.

Mr. van Dijken: Yes. Thank you, Madam Chair. I’d like to move an amendment.

The Chair: This will be amendment A2.

Go ahead, hon. member.

Mr. van Dijken: Yes. Madam Chair, I move that Bill 16, Traffic Safety Amendment Act, 2016, be amended in section 9 in the proposed section 129.4 (a) by renumbering it as section 129.4(1); (b) by adding the following after subsection (1):

(2) Notwithstanding subsection (1), any regulations made under this Part concerning drivers who operate motor vehicles in connection with a transportation network company and the transportation that those drivers provide, shall be applicable only in circumstances where those drivers are accompanied by a passenger using a service offered by the transportation network company.

Essentially, the intent of the amendment is to look towards when the transportation network company is not necessarily transporting a passenger but, rather, a parcel.

The technology, as the minister has said, over time is evolving and improving, and we don’t want to necessarily get in the way of overzealous government regulation prohibiting individuals from being able to transfer and get their parcels from one point to the other. If I’m going from Westlock to Edmonton and can take a parcel that someone was going to have to make a special trip for, having this ability – and some of the apps available now have this ability where they can arrange to have someone take their parcel for them, again taking a vehicle off the road. Using somebody’s technology to effect that action I don’t necessarily believe needs to be regulated.

The technology is giving us the ability to connect and to become more efficient and more effective in the way we run our everyday lives. I do not believe that if I’m going to be transporting a parcel for someone from Westlock to Edmonton, I would necessarily need to have, then, the class 4 licence, a class 5 licence. To drive my pickup truck or my car to Edmonton to deliver a parcel to someone’s granddaughter or the like should not necessarily fall under this legislation. Without a true definition of the transportation network companies there is a possibility that the regulations would potentially prohibit and get in the way of individuals being able to find those efficiencies in how to run their everyday lives.

That’s the intent of the amendment, and I look forward to hearing discussion as to what the government feels is their direction on these types of apps.

Mr. Mason: Madam Chair, I'd just like to get a clarification from the hon. member about the intent. Is it the intent of this particular amendment to exclude transportation network companies that carry packages instead of people from any sort of regulation?

Mr. van Dijken: Yes. That would be correct. Essentially, a transportation network company – because we don't have the definition in the legislation, if they're transporting or helping to move parcels rather than people, are they going to fall under this legislation and then fall under the regulations that will be developed? I would suggest that that would be probably far reaching and overreaching the intent of this bill.

Mr. Mason: Madam Chair, that's what I thought, and I suggest that it's not advisable. It's true that certain regulations that could be made under the act might apply to people carrying persons but aren't necessarily applicable to vehicles on a commercial basis carrying packages or other cargo. But that does not mean that we should not have the authority to regulate those types of companies. There may be other factors that need to be taken into account. For example, insurance might apply in the case of cargo. I'll call it cargo rather than packages. We just don't know what those situations are.

That doesn't mean that we'll have exactly the same regulations for those kinds of operations as we do for operations that carry members of the public. But to exclude it entirely from the possibility of regulation, I think, is particularly risky because we don't know what those consequences are, so I would advise members of the House to vote against this amendment.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Mr. Cooper: Thank you, Madam Chair. Just to provide a little clarification for the minister, again, while he may not support the amendment, the amendment doesn't provide the opportunity for no regulation. It only speaks specifically to "regulations made under this part concerning drivers who operate motor vehicles in connection . . ." So the regulation would be around the driver. For example, a class 4 licence: if you weren't transporting a passenger, which is the requirement in the legislation as it currently reads, that you have to have a class 4 licence, this specific amendment speaks to the regulation of the driver. The licence would be an example of that. Again I say that while he may not support the amendment, to say that it would prevent any regulation is probably a bit of an overstep because that is not what the amendment says. It speaks specifically to the requirements of the driver.

The Chair: Any other speakers wishing to comment on amendment A2?

Seeing none, we'll call the vote.

Bill 16 Traffic Safety Amendment Act, 2016 (continued)

The Chair: The hon. Member for Barrhead-Morinville-Westlock.

Mr. van Dijken: Thank you, Madam Chair. I have an amendment with regard to Bill 16, the Traffic Safety Amendment Act, 2016.

The Chair: This will be amendment A3.
Go ahead, hon. member.

Mr. van Dijken: Thank you, Madam Chair. Amendment A3 will read: moved that Bill 16, Traffic Safety Amendment Act, 2016, be amended in section 9 in the proposed section 129.1 by renumbering it as section 129.1(1) and by adding the following after subsection (1):

(2) Notwithstanding subsection (1), any regulation under this Part shall include an exclusion from any applicable provision for transportation provided through a transportation network company where a driver will travel to the same destination regardless of whether the driver is accompanied by a passenger using a service offered by a transportation network company on that trip.

Madam Chair, the intent of this amendment is essentially to recognize that carpooling is a way to reduce the number of vehicles on the road and that the technology that is available to us today is very effective in bringing people together and allowing them to recognize, "Is someone going in the same direction to the same destination that I am?" and possibly putting the people together in the same vehicle as opposed to having to take a separate vehicle.

Carpooling itself is not a career; it's not even a part-time job. It's just about efficiencies and gaining those efficiencies through carpooling and enabling people to get that done through the technology that is available in today's apps for smart phones. We see in many jurisdictions in the United States, for example, where these technologies are becoming very effective in helping to reduce gridlock, helping to remove vehicles from the road. I look at it from the standpoint of rural Alberta, where we don't necessarily have the ability to have in place the public transportation systems that are available in the urban areas. This is a way where these applications help individuals find a way to get to certain destinations without causing a lot of safety issues.

They don't necessarily pay the driver for the services. They are sharing the cost of a trip. Under these carpool apps people will identify: is anybody going to Edmonton, and can I jump in and help share the costs? Through that, they don't necessarily transfer money by cash, but they are able to pay that through the application.

Carpooling, like I said, is taking cars off the road and helping to reduce gridlock. Carpooling saves the environment and lowers the air pollution. Carpooling, I think everyone in this House can agree, is something we want to encourage and not discourage. The legislation as it's being proposed is possibly forcing commuters to meet taxi standards. Possibly, that will be inhibiting, meaning less uptake and more cars unnecessarily on the road.

My concern with this legislation is that we are moving in a direction that will get in the way of the evolution of these carpooling apps from becoming standard in our everyday life. These carpooling apps that are available can definitely help us to reduce the number of vehicles on the road and even the need for people to have a vehicle if we continue to evolve this industry.

Thank you for that, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Any others wishing to speak to amendment A3? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Madam Chair. It's a pleasure to rise and speak to this amendment. We had kind of discussed the concept of carpooling earlier in the discussions on this bill. Of course, we had pointed out with regard to carpooling that if there's a website or an app or simply your neighbour saying that he knows somebody that's going in the same direction, "Yeah, we can all go together in one car, and here's $5 out of my pocket to help you pay for gas," that this does not address that type of thing. Whether you and your neighbour want to take the same car to go to work because you happen to be close, that's all fine.

What we are talking about, though, is transportation network companies. These are companies that provide a service for a fee. Now, if later on in their evolution they decide to add a carpooling section to their app, there is still be going to be a fee for that service that they're providing. I guess if folks want to choose to pay that same fee because that ride for hire happens to be going roughly in the same direction, that would certainly be up to the customer whether they're using that service. By taking this out, when that service does become available, if it becomes available, we risk not being able to regulate that part of the industry. Therefore, I can't support this amendment.

Like I said, that doesn't necessarily discourage you and your neighbour from carpooling together to go to work just simply because you happen to live and work close by to each other. If you want to help your neighbour out with $5 for gas, that's certainly up to you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Chair. Just in relation to the comments of the Member for Edmonton-Decore, I guess that speaks to the nub of the issue here. It's my understanding that this legislation doesn't necessarily do a very good job of defining what is a TNC and what isn't. We need to perhaps clarify with this amendment what we're excluding and what we're not excluding.

You know, my kids would laugh at me here. We have some visitors in the gallery that maybe could understand that some of this grey hair in this beard of mine does represent age, and when it comes to technology, I will be the first to admit that, like maybe some of the others in this House, Moses and I were probably on a first-name basis when we chiselled the Ten Commandments.

An Hon. Member: And parted the sea.

Mr. Smith: And parted the Red Sea, yes.

We have a little age on us. I'm not sure how I would even put an app on my phone to be able to access this kind of a service. I do have to speak perhaps for the younger generation and perhaps for my kids. I have a son right now in this city, in Edmonton, and when I sat down with him on Monday for some lunch and had a chance to see him for the first time in three weeks, all of a sudden my son had some explaining to do because he had this ring in his nose for the first time.

Mr. Cooper: Tattoos are next, and then that'll lead to dancing.

Mr. Smith: Yeah, then dancing. You can understand that for a Baptist like me that's really getting out there, okay?

When I start to talk about technology and my kids, this is the young son that is trying to work his way through university and so has decided to forgo the responsibilities and the cash that is necessary to have a vehicle. That means he's getting up at a quarter after 5 in the morning so that he can take Edmonton's finest public transportation to get to his job. He works for Edmonton parks and rec and makes enough money to, hopefully, by the end of the summer be able to afford to go back to school. Well, this is a young son that would absolutely partake of this service, Madam Chair, if he had that app on his phone and could find three or four other people to share the cost of that ride across the city. Being the good, conservative lad that he is, maybe not socially but fiscally, he is more than able to find a way of saving a buck or two, so this is absolutely a service that I know he would partake in.

I guess if we could clear up some of the confusion in this legislation by ensuring that people understand that this carpooling app, the ability to access this and to carpool and to make it convenient to do that, would be accessible to young people like my son or my daughter, then I would speak in favour of this amendment. I would suggest to all of the younger Members of this Legislative Assembly, who tend to populate the government benches, that this argument and this position that I'm taking here should have appealed to you and should be able to persuade you to the point of view that perhaps this amendment would be, if not in my son's best interests, maybe in all of our best interests for the younger generation.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. You know, I'm certainly not going to discourage your son from trying to save a few bucks, and I certainly hope he finds a great carpool to go with. Again, he can pass them five bucks, seven bucks, two bucks, whatever helps the driver accomplish that. Terrific.

For now, like you said, we're looking at the transportation network companies that do provide a service for a fee. I suppose we have talked a little bit – you want to see some clarity in the legislation, but the bit of the hang-up with that is that because these companies are so fluid and are constantly changing, if we put some of that stuff in here right now, for all I know, next week they could change something that now gets excluded. Do we now have to tell that company: "Sorry. You can't provide that service because it's not in the legislation, but we'll be back in the House next fall, and maybe we'll have time to talk about it"? By having that ability to make changes rapidly within the regulations, we will be able to help those companies to bring those services forward at a much faster rate but, at the same time, not prevent your son from hooking up with a couple of buddies and getting to work.

Thanks, Madam Chair.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Mr. Cooper: Thank you, Madam Chair. I guess I'd just like to elaborate momentarily on some of the concerns of the hon. Member for Barrhead-Morinville-Westlock around the definition of a transportation network company. If, in fact, the definition had been included in the legislation, then situations like this may not arise so readily. When we see the potential of a carpooling app or carpooling technology, that is not something that we currently see with ride sharing, which certainly functions more along the lines of what sounds like what a transportation network company is. In fact, a carpooling app is genuinely connecting two people going in the same direction. The lack of a definition prevents clarity and, in turn, potential challenges for people who just want to get to the same location or close to each other.

I know that members on the other side of the House may be surprised that people on this side of the House actually want to get vehicles off the road and actually want to provide methods so that we can have these sort of carpooling activities going on. What it sounds like to me, Madam Chair, is people taking care of people and not government taking care of people, and that is the key difference between a conservative and the other side of the House. We believe that people ought to best be able to take care of people, and many on that side of the House believe that the government is in the best position to take care of people, so there's this chasm between us. But I digress to something not necessarily specific to carpooling.

I am pleased to support this amendment. I encourage all carpooling members of the Chamber to also support this amendment so that we can ensure that people who are just wanting to carpool aren't caught up in the regulations of this bill.

The Chair: Any others wishing to speak to the amendment?

Seeing none, we'll call the question.

[Motion on amendment A3 lost]

The Chair: We're back on the main bill. Any further questions, comments, or amendments with respect to Bill 16? The hon. Member for Calgary-Greenway.

Mr. Gill: Yes. I would like to make an amendment, Madam Chair, to Bill 16.

The Chair: This will be amendment A4.

Go ahead, hon. Member for Calgary-Greenway.

Mr. Gill: Okay. Thank you, Madam Chair. I'd like to move that Bill 16, Traffic Safety Amendment Act, 2016, be amended in section 9 in the proposed section 129.4 by adding the following after clause (g):

- (g.1) respecting protection for individuals using the services of a transportation network company in the event of an absence of or inadequate insurance coverage;
- (g.2) concerning drivers operating vehicles for transportation network companies who fail to adequately disclose the circumstances of the provision of such services to the insurer of a vehicle and any recourse against such drivers by the insurer.

Madam Chair, first of all, I support Bill 16. We were going over the bill, and we thought that it needs to be made a little bit stronger, you know, for users' safety, Albertans' safety, or for whoever uses these services: ride sharing or TNCs and stuff like that. What it does is that it makes sure that the TNC drivers or the passengers or bystanders are covered by the proper insurance.

What we have right now in Ontario: one, the insurance is 10 hours, and then the second one is, like, 20 hours. If the TNC driver does not report properly to Uber or whoever their service provider is, their insurance is null and void. However, the passenger doesn't know whether the car is insured or not. So this amendment makes sure, gives the TNCs the authority to cancel the Uber driver's licence with their organization, and they have proper insurance all the time. That's the first part.

The second one is for public safety. They can monitor the hours and stuff like that, so every time they go from 20 hours to 20.1 hours, at any given time the drivers and the users are insured, all the time. That's basically what it is.

Thank you.

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Transportation.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I do wish the hon. member had shared his amendment with me in advance so that I would have had an opportunity to do my homework with respect to the department officials to ensure that there's not any unanticipated problem with it. I can't personally see any difficulty with what he's proposing. It adds areas that the act can regulate to protect people who may have been misled by a driver or who may be in a vehicle where there's inadequate insurance. It puts me in a difficult spot because I'm not in a position to be sure that there's not some unanticipated consequence of his amendment. Otherwise, I would be very pleased to consider that.

I wonder, not wanting to throw away what might be a good amendment, if we could adjourn debate and come back to this tomorrow. Is that something that would be acceptable? I really do wish, hon. member, that you had brought this to me in advance because I probably could have just said yes.

Mr. Gill: You know, hon. minister, actually, I did call your office, but we couldn't...

Mr. Mason: Okay.

Mr. Gill: But we're okay for tomorrow. Thank you.

Mr. Mason: I don't know if there's any more discussion.

The Chair: You could just move to adjourn.

Mr. Mason: I have to adjourn debate on the whole thing, right?

The Chair: Yeah. We'd rise and report progress.

Mr. Mason: Therefore, Madam Chair, I will move that we adjourn debate on Bill 16.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Mr. Mason: I move that the committee rise and report progress.

[Motion carried]

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Ms Sweet: Madam Speaker, the Committee of the Whole has had under consideration certain bills. The committee reports the following bill: Bill 15. The committee reports progress on the following bill: Bill 16. I wish to table copies of all amendments considered by Committee of the Whole on this date for the official records of the Assembly.

The Deputy Speaker: Does the Assembly concur in the report? Say aye.

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Deputy Speaker: Opposed? Say no. So ordered.

Bill 20

Climate Leadership Implementation Act

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. minister of the environment.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. It is my pleasure to introduce Bill 20, the Climate Leadership Implementation Act, for second reading.

Last fall our government took Alberta into a new era of responsibility and commitment to addressing climate change. The climate leadership plan makes Alberta part of the solution. It will prepare Alberta for the economy of the future while ensuring we build on our traditional strengths as an energy economy. The world took notice and is watching. The act I table for second reading today will put Alberta's climate leadership plan into action.

There are three parts to Bill 20. The first is schedule 1, which introduces the Climate Leadership Act. The act will implement the carbon levy. The second schedule of the bill creates energy efficiency Alberta, which is a new energy efficiency and community energy system agency. The third schedule amends existing legislation, including the Climate Change and Emissions Management Act and the personal and corporate income tax acts. The amendments ensure that the funds in the climate change and emissions management fund align with the direction of the climate leadership plan. Amendments to the personal and corporate income tax acts will provide the rebates to low- and middle-income Albertans and reduce the small-business corporate income tax rate by 1 percentage point.

I'll now take a closer look at each of these. The first and perhaps the most discussed part of this bill is the Climate Leadership Act, which will implement the carbon levy. The carbon levy does two things. It is an incentive for energy consumers to reduce their own emissions, and it provides the funding that will support Albertans in investing in opportunities to lower their energy costs, develop more diversified energy supplies, and further reduce their emissions. Section 3 of the proposed act specifically sets out that the carbon levy revenue can only be used to support initiatives or adjustments related to climate change.

Effective January 1, 2017, the carbon levy will apply to all fossil fuels used to produce heat or energy in Alberta that produce carbon emissions. As approved by cabinet, the format and structure for collecting the carbon levy under the Climate Leadership Act is based on Alberta's Fuel Tax Act. Consistent with that act, the carbon levy is generally imposed as high in the fuel distribution or supply chain as is administratively feasible. For example, a refinery will remit the levy to government on fuel sales and then recover the levy from retail gas stations, who recover it from customers. The end result is that the levy will be introduced in the price paid by consumers. For natural gas, natural gas distributors such as ATCO or AltaGas will remit to government and recover it from retail dealers, who will recover it from customers. Fuel distributors that are unable to recover the levy from their customers can receive a refund from the Crown for the carbon levy related to bad debt.

Sections 4 to 13 impose the carbon levy on fuel such as gasoline, diesel, natural gas, locomotive diesel, aviation fuel, natural gas liquids, and coal. The schedule to the act provides the specific rates that apply to each fuel.

Special rules are put in place for interjurisdictional carriers such as railways, commercial trucking companies, and buses. They will pay the levy on how much they use in Alberta instead of on how much was purchased in Alberta, which is consistent with how they are treated under the Fuel Tax Act. Airlines will only be subject to the carbon levy on flights that begin and end in Alberta. Interjurisdictional flights taken for commercial purposes will be exempt from the carbon levy.

Exemptions and the structure to administer those exemptions are outlined in sections 15 and 16. For example, farmers will not pay the levy on marked – dyed or purple – fuel used for farming operations. Other exemptions include fuel used on-site subject to the specified gas emitters regulation to ensure that users are not charged twice for the same emissions, fuel produced and consumed on-site by conventional oil and gas producers until 2023, fuel that is exported from Alberta, and fuel that is used in industrial processes where it is not combusted.

While the act sets out the broad authority for the exemptions, further details on exemptions will be provided for in the regulations. Consistent with the Fuel Tax Act, the regulations will provide the details for the exemption for on-reserve purchases by First Nations. Also, to minimize the amount of carbon levy payments and rebates to the extent possible, transactions where the fuel will not be consumed in Alberta or is primarily sold to exempt users will be exempt at the time the fuel is moved or purchased.

Other sections of the Climate Leadership Act provide authority to issue rebates as identified in the regulation or outline credits for the use of biomethane, prohibitions on the sale or use of fuel and on the possession of marked fuel.

The carbon levy's administrative provisions generally replicate those of the Fuel Tax Act but are updated for references, ministerial powers, and regulation-making authorities.

The second part of the Climate Leadership Implementation Act establishes a public agency to promote, design, and deliver programs for energy efficiency and conservation. It will also focus on the development of micro- and community-scale energy systems. The new agency, called energy efficiency Alberta, will raise awareness through education and outreach. It will promote an energy efficiency industry through energy audits, incentives, and financing programs, and it will support energy system development.

Under our proposed legislation the agency will develop programs to help Albertans reduce their energy costs and emissions by entering into and carrying out agreements with other agencies or governments, collaborating with public and private partners, working with enterprises and institutions to deliver and promote efficiency training programs, and designing and delivering financial incentive programs to support the adoption of energy efficiency, microgeneration, and community energy systems in Alberta.

The government will continue to provide leadership by setting the policy direction and establishing regulations, codes, and standards. The minister will direct the agency on specific items such as performance metrics. Government will also retain accountability for the agency by setting targets and reporting progress. The agency will operate in accordance with the Alberta Public Agencies Governance Act and the guidelines and directions of the public agency secretariat.

Undeniably, Energy Efficiency Alberta will follow the outcomes of our review of the province's agencies, boards, and commissions. Additionally, every year the agency will submit a business plan for the minister's review and input, and the minister will review the agency's annual reports and audited financial statements as will the public.

As I previously indicated, the third schedule amends existing legislation, including the Alberta Personal Income Tax Act, the Alberta Corporate Tax Act, and the Climate Change and Emissions Management Act. While the carbon levy is one of the most efficient ways to achieve Alberta's reductions in emissions, we understand that there are some impacts to businesses and households, and that is why we are taking steps to protect lower and middle-income Albertans and help small businesses adjust to the carbon price.

The Climate Leadership Implementation Act also amends the Alberta Personal Income Tax Act to enact the climate leadership rebate. The rebate will help offset the higher costs for lower and middle-income Albertans as 60 per cent of Alberta households will receive the adjustment rebate, and another 6 per cent will receive a partial rebate. The rebates will begin in 2017 and will be worth up to $200 for an adult, $100 for a spouse, and $30 for each child, to a maximum of four. Single parents will be able to claim the spousal amount for one child and the child amount for up to four additional children.

In 2018, when the carbon price rises to $30 per tonne, the rebate amounts will also rise to $300 for one adult, $150 for a spouse, and $45 for each child. The rebate will begin to be phased out at $47,500 in net income for singles and $95,000 in family net income for couples and families.

The legislation also amends the Alberta Corporate Tax Act to implement the reduction to the small-business corporate income tax rate from 3 per cent to 2 per cent on January 1, 2017.

Also in schedule 3 are some proposed amendments to the Climate Change and Emissions Management Act. Right now the Climate Change and Emissions Management Act is basically the province's only tool to address climate change. It establishes the administrative framework and authority to regulate greenhouse gas emissions in the province.

CCEMA, the Climate Change and Emissions Management Act, established the climate change and emissions management fund. The fund, established some years ago by the previous government, receives compliance payments from our large industrial emitters under the specified gas emitters regulation. It also stipulates that the fund only be invested in purposes related to reduction or climate change adaption but in a narrower manner than what is before the House today.

Our climate leadership plan makes significant advances to Alberta's existing climate policy framework. That means the fund needs more flexibility in how and where the revenue can be invested. One tool in our approach to reducing emissions and adapting to climate change is to provide Albertans with climate-specific information. In this way they will be better equipped to make decisions about where their energy comes from and how they use it. Under our proposed changes the fund will allow investments in outreach, education, and partnerships such as with the Alberta Energy Regulator. As well, the fund will be able to be used to implement the climate leadership plan.

The amendments under our new legislation maintain the fund's existing purposes for spending and add authority to fund expenses and other entities tasked with supporting the implementation of the climate leadership plan. This will allow funds to be used for the Alberta climate change office and for other departments and agencies, and funds can be used to support Alberta government partnerships with other governments, nonprofit organizations, and the private sector.

Madam Speaker, Bill 20, the Climate Leadership Implementation Act, sets a new bar for environmental responsibility in Alberta. The act is about our future. It is about the quality of the air we breathe, the climate that supports our economy and our quality of life, the innovation and results and jobs that will drive our prosperity. It's about ensuring our economy is resilient for a carbon-constrained future.

Madam Speaker, a word, I think, here in second reading and upon consideration of this bill on the divisive language and rancour that appears to have seized the political right on this continent and in this province in particular on the matter of this bill. I have heard this bill described as an assault on Albertans, as an anti-Albertan plan, as we heard this afternoon. Just today the climate leadership plan, a document authored by Dr. Andrew Leach, a distinguished economist and leading academic at the University of Alberta, was described as anti-Albertan by one of the members of the Progressive Conservative caucus.

Madam Speaker, here is a list of other supporters of the climate leadership plan, that folks believe is anti-Albertan: Canadian Natural Resources, Devon Energy, ConocoPhillips, Suncor, Cenovus Energy, ARC Financial, AltaLink, Total, Statoil, the Cement Association of Canada, BluEarth Renewables, the Mining Association of Canada, Co-operators insurance, GE Canada, ATCO, the thermal association of Canada, working people representing heat and frost insulators, the mayor of Edmonton, the mayors of Banff and Canmore, the grand chief of Treaty 6. Are all of these supporters of the climate leadership plan anti-Albertan? We do not believe so, and it is, in fact, a great vituperation and a great injustice to describe all of these groups as anti-Albertan, as if we do not all, everyone in this House, care about the future of this province.

I would submit to you, Madam Speaker, that we should not let the rancour that appears to have seized south of the border take hold here in Alberta as we debate these important matters of how we ensure that an energy economy like Alberta's is prepared for the economy of the future. Because these objections, rooted as they are in divisive rhetoric, that serves no one, really have in their root an assumption that we ought to do nothing on climate change.

What does that confine us to? It confines this province to a boom-and-bust economy, with no plan to diversify. With the climate leadership plan we are diversifying our economy and creating jobs. It confines us to not telling the truth about climate change or about the specific effects of the carbon levy. Instead, what we could do is to take that levy and all of that work and invest it back into our economy and ensure that we are putting Albertans to work.

Madam Speaker, doing nothing ensures that we are landlocked forever. What this plan will do is to ensure new markets for our product. Doing nothing on climate change means more dangerous pollution, but this plan will ensure for our children that we have cleaner air and water. Doing nothing on climate change means that we don't care and that we are in denial about what the future holds for this planet and for this province.

Madam Speaker, this government and this side of the House are doing the right thing.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo.

Mr. Yao: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today to speak on Bill 20, the carbon tax on everything. This carbon tax is something that comes with very poor timing as the world's and the Albertan economies suffer, especially within the energy industry.

To give this House a quick refresher on the economic outlook, I'd like to provide you a lengthy summary from your own fiscal plan. On page 61, titled Low Oil Prices Prolong Downturn, your document states:

The Alberta economy is experiencing a severe oil price shock. Oil prices have fallen more than 70% since June 2014, one of the largest declines on record. As a result, the downturn will be deeper and longer than previously expected. After contracting in 2015, real GDP is forecast to decline again in 2016 by 1.4%. Nominal GDP, a broad income measure, is forecast to fall by $57 billion between 2014 and 2016 and not return to pre-recession levels until 2019. The large income shock and softening outlook for oil prices mean that the recovery is forecast to be weak compared to past downturns . . .

Business investment is expected to decline again this year. Weakness in the energy sector is feeding through the economy, causing activity to slow in many other sectors, including construction and manufacturing. As companies reduce costs, the labour market is expected to deteriorate further, leading to a decline in migration. Households are responding by cutting back on spending.

In every single ministry – Tourism, Seniors, Human Services, Service Alberta, et cetera, et cetera – they list the low price of oil and the current economy as the strategic risk, yet now, when it comes to implementing its risky and ideological agenda, the economy and the fact that everyday Albertans are making less money or have lost their jobs is irrelevant.

Madam Speaker, families will see a 50 per cent increase, on the Alberta side, of taxes on gasoline. As many of my colleagues have stated, this is inevitably going to affect the bottom line of Alberta families. On average it is estimated that the typical family will be paying about $1,000 more a year. The government claims that this will be fully offset with a tax credit of $400. One only needs to do the math to figure out that this is going to cost everyone more. They claim the scheme they have concocted will address the problem they're creating, but the truth is that they seem to not have an understanding of the economy or how much they care about it. They don't seem to be able to make the painfully obvious connections that this will affect the cost of transportation, which is passed on to the grocery stores and every other type of goods that we buy. Albertans will bear the costs on almost every commodity, good, or service.

This cute language of a "carbon levy" isn't fooling anyone because, as everyone knows, this is a tax. It is important that this government use this terminology openly and honestly when talking with Albertans because we're talking about transparency and accountability. However, Madam Speaker, this government has a history of not being very good at talking or consultation. No. This

NDP government operates on its own manifesto, regardless or sometimes in spite of facts or reason.

In my portfolio of Seniors and Housing my stakeholders are turning to me to get answers on what the government's plans are to address the rising costs associated with providing social housing. Transportation, heat, electricity are some of the costs. When Wildrose questioned the minister in estimates on whether or not they had a plan, you can guess the answer: spin, rhetoric, and no answers. They either don't know the answers or they're too embarrassed to admit that their plans will actually negatively impact seniors and social housing facilities.

Many people are wondering how the NDP can force a program on Albertans without having any real research on the effects that this will have more broadly. Any good government would want to ensure their policies and legislation are going to have the outcome they intend. However, no such assessments or precautions have been taken by this government, most likely because they are counter to their agenda. Why has this government not conducted any market assessment? If it has, why has it not provided it to us in this Assembly in order to ensure a proper, thoughtful debate? I suspect, Madam Speaker, it's because any report conducted or any study produced will tell them exactly what their own fiscal plan is telling them: now is not the time to implement their risky and ideological carbon tax on everything.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other hon. members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise to speak on this government's Bill 20, the Climate Leadership Implementation Act. This bill is commonly referred to by many as the carbon tax, and let's be perfectly clear that it is a tax. In fact, the definition of the word "tax" in the Oxford dictionary is as follows. As a noun: "a compulsory contribution to state revenue, levied" – interesting word – "by the government on workers' income and business profits, or added to the cost of some goods, services, and transactions." Synonyms include duty, tariff, excise, dues, levy, toll, tithe, or fee.

This government insists on calling it a carbon levy, which, as the definition previous shows, is a synonym for tax. Let's just say, for the sake of argument, that it is a levy, the definition of which is, as a verb, to impose a tax, fee, or fine or, as a noun, an act of levying a tax, fee, or fine. They're simply wordsmithing to make a burdensome tax sound like it isn't a tax. At the end of the day, all costs ultimately are borne by us, the taxpayer. Calling it a levy is devious at best, but what can we expect from a government who states that this carbon tax is revenue neutral?

The Premier in her speech announcing the tax said:

We will put every penny raised through the carbon price to work here in Alberta – building our economy, creating jobs, and doubling down on efforts to reduce pollution and promote greater efficiency.

The Alberta carbon price will therefore be revenue-neutral, fully recycled back into the Alberta economy.

To that end, revenue will be reinvested directly into measures to reduce pollution – including clean research and technology; green infrastructure like public transit; to help finance the transition to renewable energy; and efficiency programs to help people reduce their energy use.

However, as economist Trevor Tombe noted in an article he wrote in November for Maclean's:

If by revenue-neutral she means they aren't going to toss the carbon tax revenue into the ocean but are instead going to spend the money on stuff, then okay. But the phrase "revenue neutral" rightly means total government revenue will be unchanged. (How could it mean otherwise?) That is, a carbon tax is revenue neutral if what's levied by the government is fully offset by reductions in other taxes elsewhere. This is basically what B.C. did with their carbon tax. They report annually in their budget how much came in from the carbon tax and how much went out through lower taxes, so it's all above-board.

He went on to say:

The Alberta carbon tax plan is not revenue neutral – not at all. Nothing in the report today suggests any existing tax will be lowered. Of course, that's a valid position to take, but the government shouldn't try to mislead people by misusing the phrase "revenue neutral" – it should advocate clearly for the policies it prefers, and let people decide.

If we want to see an example of a revenue neutral carbon tax, we have only to look to B.C., where their carbon tax now funds more than a billion dollars a year in other tax cuts, resulting in one of Canada's lowest corporate tax rates. As an aside, in B.C. by law the Finance minister is required to take a 15 per cent pay cut if the tax isn't revenue neutral for the government. Isn't it a shame we couldn't use that particular law to keep our Finance minister from breaking the debt ceiling law? Oh, that's right. I guess the minister doesn't even want a debt ceiling, so I guess that wouldn't apply.

Now, on April 19 the Member for Calgary-Currie said this in talking about the carbon tax:

Part of that is our carbon levy. What that levy does is that it allows every cent of it to be reinvested in the form of a rebate back to lower income Albertans . . .

Now, did you hear that? Every penny will be reinvested in the form of a rebate to lower income Albertans. Now, we could take that on its face value, but he goes on to say:

. . . and it also involves us to help diversify our economy by investing in energy efficiency programs, investing in alternative energy sources such as wind, solar, geothermal, and possibly other energy sources that we have yet to think of.

Just think of it. They haven't even thought of all the different things that they can do.

Now, herein lies the problem with NDP budgeting, I believe. You see, he said that every penny goes to rebates to low-income Albertans and also that money goes to help diversify the economy, investing in alternative energy sources. Madam Speaker, that's the problem with NDP finances. It's no wonder they can't get Alberta's finances in order and have to remove the debt ceiling, run massive deficits, bring burdensome debt and damaging interest payments. It appears that they are spending the same money two or three times over. Of course, that leads to some serious problems, to say the least.

Now that we have established what this bill is and what it is not despite the government's spin, let's get to the nuts and bolts of this. We are in an economic downturn bordering on a recession. Hundreds of thousands of Albertans are unemployed. Costs are increasing while real estate prices and economic growth decrease. This tax will hurt Albertans at a time when they can least afford it. Albertans have already been burdened with increases to business and personal taxes. Now this carbon tax is going to hit them with increases to the price of gasoline, diesel, and the cost of living.

This government's carbon tax will punish everyday families and businesses and will make life in Alberta significantly more expensive. Everything from driving your car to buying groceries to heating your home and shop will be more expensive, and 40 per cent of Albertans will see no sort of offset to these costs. The rebate was originally designed to cover increases in natural gas rates, gasoline, and diesel but ignored the fact that this tax will have a domino effect, hiking prices on everything from electricity to groceries, rent, and any good or service. And these extra costs will be absorbed by the taxpayer, the end user.

Despite the assurances by the minister of environment the other day that rebates are a little higher to help low-income Albertans deal with the cost passed on to them by businesses for goods and services, the government failed to bring up these extra costs before Wildrose started pointing them out. It's almost as if they hadn't considered it. Of course, had a proper economic impact assessment been done, perhaps Albertans could have been given a true idea of how much this tax will really cost. The government maintains that lower income folks use less energy and that they would actually come out ahead. Madam Speaker, that's hard to quantify without a proper economic assessment.

If costs go up, there are only a few ways in which to pay the piper; either increase prices, or increase fees. Rebate amounts are based only on the direct costs of heat and fuel, not all the other costs. The NDP's rebate scheme was only designed to cover increased natural gas and fuel costs. It ignores the fact that the carbon tax will hike costs on everything. Even families that get the maximum rebate will be on the hook for up to $400 a year in additional carbon tax costs. Furthermore, I remain deeply skeptical of the NDP's rebate scheme. We were told that these rebate amounts were calculated based only on direct costs of heat and fuel, not all the other costs. They ignore the fact that the carbon tax will hike costs on everything.

The Canadian Tax Journal did some analysis about the carbon tax. If it was national, it estimated that a $30-per-tonne carbon tax would send consumer costs for electricity up 7.5 per cent, costs for food up 2 per cent, and costs for shelter up 1.9 per cent. If you apply these increases to household expenditures from 2014, it becomes clear that families will be facing hundreds of dollars more in indirect costs than the government would like to admit.

Remember that this government's fiscal management has recently caused another credit downgrade, that will cost Albertans more as borrowing rates increase. These credit downgrades show that the financial marketplace has no confidence in this government's fiscal plan. This government likes to put the blame on the price of oil. Unfortunately, the facts don't support that. You see, the price of oil has been steadily increasing since the middle of January. Since mid-January the price of oil has increased about 50 per cent. Since then, the Alberta government has received more downgrades.

These indirect costs will come from many quarters, Madam Speaker. Municipalities, school boards, health centres will all need to find ways to offset the unanticipated costs of this carbon tax. One would think that the taxicabs and transit, which lower income people rely heavily upon, would have to increase prices to compensate. People are starting to realize how much this is going to impact them. One local municipality has estimated that gasoline will increase by $25,000 in 2017, diesel by $50,000, and natural gas by $120,000. It gets even worse in 2018, with those costs jumping to $35,000 for gasoline, $75,000 for diesel, and natural gas a whopping $185,000. This is close to an increase of a third between 2017 and 2018.

This is all consistent with what Mayor Nenshi stated in an April 16 article from the Calgary Metro. He states that a carbon tax isn't going to fly.

The City of Calgary fills many, many, many tanks of gas every single day. Our best estimate is that not being rebated the carbon tax on all those tanks . . . that we fill every day, the first year in 2017 will be about $2.6 or $2.7 million, rising to $6.5 million . . .

To put that in context, that's a half point increase on the property tax – only for paying another order of government its taxes.

Nenshi went on to say:

Unlike the provincial government, the city does not, cannot and will not run a deficit . . . Our goal would be to shave that amount somewhere else, but that's hard to do on fuel. Police cars, fire trucks, garbage trucks and buses have to be out there, so as a result the only thing to do is go to the taxpayer for it.

Yes, it seems that this government's solution to their inability to cut waste and bloat is to constantly tax Albertans. Wildrose have always maintained that we will not raise your taxes. The same has never been true of this government. This carbon tax will just be a further economic drain upon Albertans. A typical family will find itself out a thousand dollars every year once this punitive tax is levied. Based on the analysis from the Canadian Tax Journal that I mentioned earlier, it is realistic to estimate that a typical family will find itself out at least a thousand dollars every year once it's up and running.

Madam Speaker, this carbon tax is as flawed as any bill this government has put forth. It was not well thought out. The government failed to provide any economic impact assessment, and despite assertions by the government, it is in no way revenue neutral. This policy leaves the Alberta energy sector with a distinct disadvantage in competitiveness on the world market. It's simply another burden on the back of taxpayers at a time they can ill afford it. I cannot and will not support this tax that punishes Albertans for simply going about their daily lives.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) applies. Do you wish to ask a question of the hon. member?

Mr. Cyr: I do.

The Deputy Speaker: Go ahead.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Madam Speaker. To the member. I enjoyed your speech. I'd like to hear a little bit more about the fact that this bill just received first reading yesterday and we're already into second reading on this. How much time have you spent reviewing this bill, and how are you going to prepare going forward? Now, the reason I'm asking this question to the member, who is the shadow minister of environment, is that we're looking at about $3 billion – $3 billion – worth of money being brought in by this bill, which is a staggering amount of money coming in. Now, with the normal estimates, or the normal time when we go through budgets, we actually go through a time frame where we're able to look at a business plan, look at financial statements, and question the minister on exactly where that minister is going to take that money and utilize it for Albertans, how we are going to be responsible for that money.

To the member: is it possible with what we've been given, with just – what? – 30 pages, 50 pages, whatever it is . . .

Mr. Loewen: Ninety-five pages.

Mr. Cyr: Ninety-five pages. As the shadow minister of environment is it possible to take that information this quick and actually, I guess, be able to have a direction for all Albertans to see that we're going in the right or the wrong direction? From what I've heard from you, with the limited amount of time that you've had with that bill, you're already seeing that there are problems with this legislation. Do you feel that it is appropriate to be in second reading in just over 24 hours with this bill?

5:30

Mr. Loewen: Well, thank you to the member for the question. Of course, it is a little disconcerting to think that the government gave us this bill yesterday, and we're in second reading. I was actually up till 1 o'clock in the morning, and I was back up at 5 again this morning working on this. And, yes, this government seems to want to pound things through. Of course, anything that doesn't fit this government's ideology, well, they study it. They take time, they send it to committee, they do all sorts of things, Madam Speaker. But anything that fits their ideology, they pound it through as fast as they can. They don't consult. They don't ask anything. They just pound it through. It was a lot of information to have to go through.

Like I say, this shouldn't be the way business is done. This government committed to doing things differently than the previous government when it came to pushing things through like this, but, no, they've fallen into the same trap. I guess when you become government, maybe you become a little bit arrogant or something, and you think that you should be able to just do whatever you want to do at your schedule and to heck with everybody else, but that's not right, Madam Speaker.

There are a lot of problems with this bill. The problem that I'm seeing is that this affects every part of Albertans' lives, not just the families. It affects the schools, it affects the hospitals, and it affects the cities and the counties. Everything in our world requires fuel to produce or to transport. Of course, you're well aware, Madam Speaker, of the distances we drive in the north and the costs that this will increase. This government since it came into power has implemented two sets of gas tax increases and now this carbon tax on top of it all. That's a very big burden for Albertan families. Of course, like you're aware, in the north we travel greater distances. We have to. That's just part of living in the north. But there's no way that we should be punished for that.

Now, of course, a lot of people think that we live in this oil-rich environment, so why do we have to pay so much for the gasoline? Well, of course, the oil sells at the world market price. There's not much we can do about that. The only thing we can do for our people here in Alberta is to reduce the taxes on the fuel so that we actually have an advantage to living right on this resource here. But what does this government do? It increases the taxes higher and higher, and that's just not right, Madam Speaker. We have other ways to collect revenue. This government has no problem collecting taxes.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other hon. members wishing to speak to the bill? Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today to address Bill 20, the Climate Leadership Implementation Act. I want to start by saying that I think we're going to have to forgive Albertans for their shock and their discomfort when it comes to this bill.

It's my belief, Madam Speaker, that the results of the last election had less to do with the platforms of the individual parties, mine included, than with being a statement on the governance and the attitude of the Progressive Conservative Party after 44 years of rule. I believe that Albertans were speaking clearly that it was time for a change, and in many cases they were looking for the individual that could most likely replace the Progressive Conservative candidate.

The argument that has been proffered by the government at times in this House, that they were elected on their platform policies, has a modicum of truth to it, but only a modicum. The greater truth, I believe, lies in the fact that the people, the people of Alberta, were looking for an alternative to a Progressive Conservative Party that had betrayed the trust of the people. They were looking to see who had the best opportunity or chance of defeating the Progressive Conservative candidate in that particular riding, and whoever managed to convey that was the individual that was elected. I believe that was the case in my riding, and I believe that it is also the best explanation for the vast majority of the people that have a seat in this Legislature today.

Too often the NDP government tries to sell the idea that they were elected on their platform and their policies and that therefore there is a legitimacy to the bills they have brought forward into this Legislature. But even if you buy that argument, it doesn't explain and it doesn't justify the actions of this government when they have placed before this House Bill 20. This government never campaigned on a climate leadership plan. Never, Madam Speaker, in the last election did the people of Alberta have the opportunity to judge this party and to decide whether the people of Alberta would be willing to cast their votes for the NDP candidate that was running in their constituency based on their desire to see the implementation of a carbon tax or a climate leadership plan.

I suppose it would be one thing if this government could actually look the people of Alberta in the eye and say: "We campaigned on this. We placed this before the people. We offered you this option. You knew what you were buying." But they didn't. So the people of Alberta are just now beginning to wake up to the fact that this economic time bomb that Bill 20 is going to turn out to be is going to have serious ramifications for their personal lifestyles. It's going to have serious ramifications for the viability of many of their jobs. It's going to negatively impact the ability of many families to take care of their loved ones.

During trying economic times this NDP government has made decision after decision that has hurt the economy of Alberta. There is hardly an industry that has not lost jobs or been economically imperilled by the increased taxes, the dangerous borrowing, and the out-of-control spending of this government.

This bill is not some minor piece of legislation that will hardly impact the people of Alberta. If that was the case, I wouldn't be bringing this argument before this Legislature. Instead, it has been trumpeted by the government as a major piece of legislation. By your own actions and by your own words you understood just how important an impact this legislation will have on the province of Alberta.

Now, Albertans understand, and my argument would be, that not every piece of legislation that is passed in a Legislature, in a democracy is necessarily campaigned on. We understand that, you understand that, Albertans understand that, and the people that are sitting in this Legislature understand that. But when legislation, Madam Speaker, is considered in the House that is going to have a major impact on the lives of the people of this province, when it is brought before this House, in a democracy the bill must have some legitimacy behind it. The idea is that legislation should have had the ability to be vetted by the people during the general election period. That's one of the purposes of a general election. It's for the political parties to place before the people the ideas and the policies that they will pursue should they be elected. This is something that you did not do, and it affects the very legitimacy of this bill.

We have many examples, Madam Speaker, of governments that have understood this democratic maxim; for instance, the free trade debate between the Conservatives and the Liberals in this country. It's a great example of this political maxim. The free trade debate between the Conservatives and the Liberals was actually a debate for the hearts and minds of the Canadian people. During that federal election Canadians had the opportunity to listen to the arguments, to contrast those arguments, and to compare the visions of the two parties on this crucial issue. In the process of casting their vote, the Canadian people were providing legitimacy for that government to act on their vision and on their policies. They were providing the Conservative government led by Brian Mulroney with the legitimacy that was needed to enter into negotiations with the United States and to eventually pass the free trade act between our two great nations.

I believe that we need to start this debate by clearly stating that while this government has the power to bring forth this piece of legislation, I believe that it lacks the legitimacy to do so. Albertans understand this. We are a politically astute people. We are politically astute enough to know when to punish a government that is misusing its power and abusing that fine line of legitimacy and when it is not. When governments cross that line, as, ironically, the Mulroney government did later when it passed the GST, then the people respond with their votes. It's then that the people, when they speak, have a habit of letting governments understand that they've gone too far, and those governments have a habit of losing power in the next general election.

So I place before this government that you are walking a very fine line on Bill 20 and that it may turn out that Bill 20 is another example of a government that engages in the practice of campaigning on one set of policies and then passing legislation that does not have the support of the people, and therefore the bill lacks legitimacy. Regardless of the fact that the representatives in the government may have a majority and may be able to pass this bill, it will lack legitimacy because you did not campaign on this major piece of legislation.

Bill 20, the Climate Leadership Implementation Act, is actually, as the minister said, two acts. Okay; three, but two major ones. The first, the Climate Leadership Act, gives the government the authority to enact a carbon tax on Albertans and then to decide that some Albertans will be more equal than others and to decide who will receive consumer rebates on some of the various carbon taxes that will be placed upon the people of Alberta.

The second act is the Energy Efficiency Alberta Act. It establishes an agency to oversee the implementation of some of the various carbon programs and taxes that will make every Albertan in this province poor. Specifically, the legislation is called upon to raise awareness regarding energy use and the associated economic and environmental consequences. It's called upon to promote, design, and deliver programs related to energy efficiency, conservation and the development of microgeneration and small-scale energy use, and to promote an energy efficiency services industry.

I would place before this House and before the minister that not all of those things are bad, that the adoption of some of these things may even make our province a better province, but this agency, which is to administer somewhere around $170 million annually in loans and grants to support the purposes as already stated . . .

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake under 29(2)(a).

Mr. Cyr: I would like to ask my fellow member – I don't know if we've heard it, but I don't believe the NDP campaigned on the carbon tax. Now, had they campaigned on the carbon tax, do you think that Albertans would have been okay with the Alberta government taking money away from school systems? As the shadow Education minister, do you think that if they had platformed on taking funds away from students, that would have gone very far with Albertans, and would they be in government today?

Mr. Smith: Thank you to the member for the question. You know, I think that when we look at the whole issue of legitimacy, a democracy is built on transparency and on the people understanding the platforms of the political parties and the views of each of the individuals and having an opportunity to choose between those political parties and the visions that they represent. I believe that with a piece of legislation that is as significant as this piece of legislation and that will literally have life-changing consequences for the people of Alberta, to have campaigned on it would have been within the expectations of a democratic population and a democratic system of government. A government is always better having campaigned and having placed the vision that they have before the people when it wants to then go before the Legislature, go before the people's representatives, and pass legislation.

We would not be able to bring, perhaps, some of our concerns about this legislation with as much vigour and with as much justification before this Assembly if you had campaigned on this in the general election. You would have been able to come back and clearly say to us: "We campaigned on this. The people of Alberta heard about this. They knew that we would be raising the taxes on your gas by 4.5 cents," come this January, I believe, "and they understood that we would be phasing out coal early, that we would be starting to increase the costs of transporting every good that comes by rail."

You see, when the people are given the opportunity to understand what the platform is and then to make clear choices and decisions about those platforms, then the people have given their consent to that vision. The people of Alberta expect a democratic form of government to function in such a way that it respects the will of the people. It doesn't really matter whether you have a majority government or not. It doesn't really matter that the election is three years down the road. Just because we have a seat in this House doesn't mean that we have the right to ignore the wishes of the people.

That's one of the reasons why, as we go through this debate, I would hope that the members of this Legislature are actually listening to what the people are saying and what their constituents are telling them. I know that it is easy to be political. It's not always easy to be democratic. There's a difference. Each of us in this House needs to understand that difference, and when we forget what that difference is, then we end up like some other political parties, out of office. So let us all . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Speaking on the bill, I'll recognize the hon. minister of environment.

Ms Phillips: Is it under 29(2)(a)?

The Deputy Speaker: No. Standing Order 29(2)(a) is done.

Ms Phillips: Sorry. I thought I was under 29(2)(a).

The Deputy Speaker: Oh. You can't speak on the bill. That's right. You have spoken. My apologies.

Go ahead, hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Madam Speaker. The NDP is introducing another bill that appears to be purely ideological. The fact is that this is not the first time we've seen this. This is actually the second time that we've seen something that wasn't on their platform being moved forward by this government, with a massive lack of consultation. Now, if we hadn't already been through this with Bill 6, I could see that we probably would have a good reason to be going down this road again with this new government, but we're seeing the same mistakes made over and over again. The fact is that we saw massive outrage, and we're still seeing that outrage coming from our farmers and ranchers, our rural, our urban. Everybody was very unhappy with the lack of consultation done by this government, and we're seeing it now with this carbon tax.

The fact is that when we look at where the carbon tax is going, something that is so important, we put the carbon tax bill – we rushed this bill through. The fact is that this is something that needed some more time to be reviewed and debated, but we're not going to see that because we are putting up this bill right at the end of session. Now, we're looking at a bill that was in first reading yesterday, second reading today, 95 pages, going through something that we actually need to put some real thought into to make sure that our most vulnerable aren't impacted negatively.

Now, saying, "Let's just give them 500 bucks, and it's going to solve all our problems" – suddenly what we're looking at is a systemic problem of a government that isn't listening. The fact is that with Bill 6 we saw Facebook pages of 50,000 people putting their names forward to say: you didn't listen. We want to actually contribute to this law, but we can't do that because – guess what? – you're pushing through legislation too fast again. Why? Why does it have to be this fast? Why can't we at least look at bringing something like this, that is so important, obviously, to this government, to a standing committee? This is something that needs to be moved forward so that we can discuss it more thoroughly. Bring it to stakeholders. But you know what? We didn't do that with the farming bill. We're not going to do that with this bill because in the end – and again this goes back to my original point – ideology is what runs this government.

I do believe that there are good intentions with these bills. I don't believe that you're out to harm Alberta, but I do believe that the lack of consultation has effects that are very, very, very unintentional, yet we see that people are being affected by it. The fact is that through the carbon tax this will be levying, or taxing, depending on the point of view, more costs on families, charities, schools, hospitals. This is actually being levied on Albertans right now.

Now, we've heard already that this is only going to cost around $500. Now we're hearing: "Well, jeez, you know what? It's going to be an extra hundred dollars because of indirect costs." We've asked repeatedly, "Show us how you came up with the numbers," and all we get is nothing. There are no answers because you have no answers. How can you not see the fact that in the end we are going down a path where we don't know how it's going to affect our most vulnerable? Are we going to see seniors on the streets? Are we going to see children and single mothers put on the streets because of the fact that the unintended consequences of this carbon tax could really impede Albertans' way of life?

Again, when we look at ideology, this is not a good road for Alberta to go down. This is not what Albertans voted for. We have seen repeatedly the fact that when we put legislation through too fast, governments will eventually answer for it. The question is: are we going to end up with massive groups of people on our front doorstep again saying that we're going in the wrong direction? Again, sneaking in through the side door so you don't have to deal with them is not the answer. Not answering your phones at your constituency offices: not the answer. Getting rid of your e-mail: not the answer. That is a problem.

Now, let's look at the stakeholders here. If you had gone out to the stakeholders and said, "What do you think about this," they would have come back and said, "Could you bring us at least a framework of what you're looking to do?"

In the end what we are looking at is a bill that I believe was done on Friday of last week, introduced to us this week, yesterday, and today we're actually debating the second reading. This is ludicrous. Now, had they actually consulted, they'd have been aware that their ill-advised carbon levy or tax, whatever it is that we want to look at going towards . . .

The Deputy Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt, hon. member, but the Assembly stands adjourned until 7:30 this evening.

7:30 p.m.

Wednesday, May 25, 2016

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

The Deputy Speaker: Please be seated.

Private Bills Second Reading

Bill Pr. 1

Bow Valley Community Foundation Repeal Act

Mr. Westhead: Madam Speaker, I'd like to move second reading of Bill Pr. 1, Bow Valley Community Foundation Repeal Act.

Madam Speaker, as we turn a page on this incredibly valuable aspect of the community in the Bow valley, I'd like to reflect for members of this Assembly the excellent work that the Bow Valley Community Foundation did and the positive impact that it had.

The foundation was established in 2005 by a dedicated group of community leaders along with the support of the town of Canmore. A volunteer board along with representatives from various community organizations provided oversight and management of the roughly $450,000 in total assets, which generated grants of over $15,000 per year while the foundation operated. A short list of the many deserving organizations that have benefited from the Bow Valley Community Foundation includes the Canadian Association for Disabled Skiing for the Rocky Mountain Adaptive Sports Centre; local cycling, hockey, swim, climbing, and soccer clubs; and the Canmore Illusions gymnastics team, whose new foam pit I had the pleasure of jumping in only a few months ago.

Madam Speaker, as we say a farewell thank you to those who worked so hard to make the Bow Valley Community Foundation a tremendous success, we also start a new chapter on community fundraising in the Bow valley. I'm pleased to tell this Assembly that members of the foundation being dissolved by the bill that we have before us will be joining forces with the existing Banff community foundation to create the Banff Canmore Community Foundation.

Approximately two years ago the two separate organizations starting having conversations about how they might begin to collaborate and work together. August 2015 marked the official opening of the new home base for the expanded organization, where Her Honour the Lieutenant Governor of Alberta, the Hon. Lois Mitchell, presided over the ribbon cutting. Mayor Borrowman of Canmore and Mayor Sorensen of Banff held hands as they approached the podium to deliver a message: together we are really stronger; two towns, one heart. The mission statement of the Banff Canmore Community Foundation is: "Engaging hearts and minds to build a stronger community." They certainly do that, Madam Speaker.

In closing, I'd like to thank the hard-working volunteers and board members of the Bow Valley Community Foundation for the hard work that they did supporting many worthy causes. I wish every success in the future and give my sincere gratitude to the equally hard-working folks at the Banff Canmore Community Foundation. I look forward to the incredible projects and dreams that they will make possible.

On that note, I encourage all members of this Assembly to support this bill. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill?

Seeing none, I'll call the question.

[Motion carried; Bill Pr. 1 read a second time]

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Ms Jabbour in the chair]

The Chair: I would like to call the committee to order.

Bill 19 Reform of Agencies, Boards and Commissions Compensation Act

The Chair: Are there any questions or amendments with respect to this act? The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Ceci: Thank you. It's my pleasure to rise and to just say a few words this evening about Bill 19, the Reform of Agencies, Boards and Commissions Compensation Act. As members will recall, Madam Chair, from the discussion earlier this morning, this legislation is designed to address the wide variance in compensation philosophies, levels, and practices that currently exist in our ABCs. This legislation arises out of the first phases of our government's review of agencies, boards, and commissions and facilitates the creation of rational and consistent frameworks for executive compensation across the ABCs. I think that all members of this House will agree that this is a reasonable objective for the government, and many members of this Chamber expressed that sentiment similarly earlier today.

During the second reading debate a number of members raised issues, questions, and other things with regard to the legislation. I just want to take a few moments to address a few of those items.

First, a member raised some concerns that our government's objective is to create a consistent framework for compensation and, by way of implication, seemed concerned that we would create a single, unitary pay rate for CEOs of all ABCs. Let me be clear, Madam Chair, that we know that there are different ABCs of different sizes and complexity, so our intent in this legislation is not to ensure one single rate of pay for CEOs of ABCs but, rather, to create a framework with many pay bands that will include in the same pay band the same kind of size of ABC or scope or responsibility or complexity. The CEO will be slotted in that pay band, and there'll be a number of pay bands.

We are contracting the work of a professional benchmarking compensation firm to aid us in the creation of these compensation frameworks, and we're also seeking input from Albertans. This is the work we're going to be engaging in as part of this bill. We believe that the legislation is in the best interests of moving forward and creating some harmony across these CEOs' compensations. It will take some time to put in effect after we pass the legislation, but we're committed to moving forward, and as we gain the experience from this initiative with the 27 CEOs initially, we will be looking at others to engage in this.

As members of this House might know, we've completed phase 1 of the ABCs review. We are starting soon phase 2 of the ABCs review, and that will provide us more grist to look at the CEOs in those areas. Then we will be moving on to phase 3, which is the postsecondary institutions, and we will be undertaking that work in the fall.

That's just some of the background with regard to all of this. I'm sorry if it's repetitious, but it is certainly important work. Thank you.

The Chair: Any other questions, comments, or amendments with respect to this bill?

Seeing none, I'll call the question.

[The clauses of Bill 19 agreed to]

[Title and preamble agreed to]

The Chair: Shall the bill be reported? Are you agreed?

Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chair: Opposed? That's carried.

The hon. Acting Deputy Government House Leader.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I move that the committee rise and report.

[Motion carried]

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-East.

Ms Luff: Thank you, Madam Speaker. The Committee of the Whole has had under consideration a certain bill. The committee reports the following bill: Bill 19.

The Deputy Speaker: Does the Assembly concur in the report? Say aye.

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Deputy Speaker: Opposed? So ordered.

Government Bills and Orders

Third Reading

Bill 15

An Act to End Predatory Lending

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's my pleasure on behalf of Minister McLean to rise this evening and move third reading of Bill 15, An Act to End Predatory Lending.

You know, it's been quite heartening today to see the positive reception for this bill both in Alberta's communities and, as I said here today, in this Assembly. In particular, it was encouraging to hear from the members across the floor, many of whom spoke very thoughtfully on this bill. Madam Speaker, we've heard from Albertans from so many walks of life that this is change that they've called for and that they support. It's useful to remind ourselves that the consultation around this bill was robust. Almost 1,500 Albertans, including stakeholders, community leaders, and members of the industry, provided input. I'd like to thank the dedicated staff at Service Alberta for achieving such breadth and depth in their consultations.

Madam Speaker, I'd also like to just quickly draw attention — there was a poll of Albertans that was conducted in late 2015 by Abacus research as these consultations concluded, and when asked whether new regulations should be introduced to better protect Albertans, 83 per cent of Albertans agreed.

During tough times Albertans come together, and we support each other. The intent of this bill follows on that, to protect Albertans, to support their families, and help to ensure that all can be resilient and strong. As such, I'm pleased to move third reading and support this bill.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Just to clarify, hon. member, you're moving it on behalf of the Minister of Service Alberta?

Mr. Shepherd: That's correct.

The Deputy Speaker: Thank you.

Any other speakers wishing to speak to this bill in third reading? The hon. Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Mr. Clark: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I just want to rise briefly and offer my unequivocal and enthusiastic support for Bill 15. You know, as I said in my earlier remarks in second reading, if this bill results in payday lending companies being less viable and therefore less populous, there just simply being less of them, that's a good thing. That means that fewer and fewer Albertans will be finding themselves in an unsustainable debt spiral and will hopefully be on a path to being more financially sound.

You know, we heard in debate about many different institutions and organizations, credit unions like Servus Credit Union, First Calgary Financial, stepping up and creating microloan programs. That's exactly what I think the intent of this bill is, to create alternatives, lower interest alternatives for short-term lending, microloans. Momentum and others throughout the province have done tremendous, tremendous work.

The Member for Drayton Valley-Devon's sharing his story, I thought, was worth mentioning, and I think that he deserves a lot of praise for his work in the community and for, you know, doing what I think many Albertans will do, and that's to reach out to help their neighbour. You don't need to be the MLA to do that, but that's who we are as Albertans, and I think that says a lot about the character of the individual, but I think it also says a lot about the character of Albertans. We want to do the right thing because it's the right thing to do. Very clearly, Bill 15 is the right thing to do, so praise to the government for doing that, to the minister, and to all.

I'm pleased that this sounds like it's going to be a unanimous vote in favour. Thank you very much, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Red Deer-North.

Mrs. Schreiner: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Payday lending, like any industry, needs to be responsibly and properly regulated. Without the changes in this bill, the costs associated with borrowing payday loans will stay at their current high levels. These costs are simply outrageous. It's no surprise that these levels of interest can force Albertans into a cycle of debt and push them towards poverty. The individuals taking out payday loans are often financially vulnerable. This government is committed to promoting more responsible lending and to protecting Albertans who can least afford the high costs of these loans.

For these reasons, this bill has my full support. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) comes into effect if anybody has questions or comments at this point.

Are there any other speakers to the bill?

[Motion carried; Bill 15 read a third time]

Bill 1

Promoting Job Creation and Diversification Act

Ms Ganley: Sorry, Madam Speaker. I was going to move that we go to third reading on Bill 19 if I have unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. Cooper: You can just adjourn Bill 1. Just ask to adjourn Bill 1.

Ms Ganley: We'll adjourn debate on Bill 1, then, and move to Bill 19 if we have unanimous consent on that.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Bill 19
Reform of Agencies, Boards and Commissions
Compensation Act

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Ceci: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I would like to move third reading.

Again, we need this bill so that we can get better information and get a handle on executive compensation in public agencies. It'll authorize me to be able to do that as well as to set up a system of compensation frameworks. All of that will create greater transparency in our agencies, boards, and commissions, and it will address an issue of increasing costs in ABC compensation. I hope that all members of the House can support that.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, before we can proceed with third reading on Bill 19, we do need unanimous consent because it passed committee just a little while ago and second reading, so to go to the next stage, we need to have unanimous consent.

[Unanimous consent granted]

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other speakers to the bill?
Seeing none, the hon. minister to close debate?

Mr. Ceci: It's closed. Thank you very much.

[Motion carried; Bill 19 read a third time]

Government Bills and Orders
Second Reading

Bill 20
Climate Leadership Implementation Act

[Debate adjourned May 25: Mr. Cyr speaking]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake was speaking. You still have some time. Go ahead.

Mr. Cyr: Can we move to adjourn debate?

The Deputy Speaker: No. The clock ran out, and you still had some of your time left, and that should have been acknowledged at the beginning or dismissed. Go ahead. You still have I'm not sure how many minutes, about 10.

An Hon. Member: Start from the beginning.

Mr. Cyr: Start from the beginning. Thank you.

Mr. Cyr: All right. I left off with the ill-advised carbon tax, or levy, as the government is putting it forward. That is where we left off.

Madam Speaker, the NDP love to talk about how they are world champions of health care and that they would never hurt health care in any shape or form. Well, that's really interesting because the last time I checked, ambulances use diesel, and this raises the costs on all fuels. We see that this actually is a tax that attacks every part of Alberta and all of our civil services. How is it that we've seen such, I guess, incredible disinterest by the government in studying the actual results of implementing this tax?

Now, the NDP has been clear that there are no rebates for the health care centres, for the hospitals, for the schools, for the charities. These are functions that are integral to Alberta. How is it that when we are bringing in a tax that is going to actually make our civil services worse, they have been forgotten about when it comes down to making sure that this is tax neutral? The big thing here is that they keep talking about tax neutral, but the fact is that they don't understand what tax neutral is. Spending taxes doesn't mean tax neutral. It just means taxes are being spent. Tax neutral actually means that you put the money back towards the places that you're trying to incentivize, which in this case is green.

Now, when we're looking at this, have we actually talked with health care providers? Have we talked with the hospitals? Have we talked with the schools? Have we talked with the trustees? Have we talked with the different boards in Alberta? That answer is no. We all knew that it was coming, but we don't know what the effects are, and that is because of the fact that this government hasn't done its due diligence to ensure that the impacts are being identified so that we can actually make sure that it doesn't affect our front-line workers, which this bill, clearly, is going to affect. We're going to have to ensure that somehow these shortfalls that are being created right now are covered.

Now, Madam Speaker, I've talked about how it's going to impact our local hospitals and our local educators, our local seniors' homes – I talked about those – but let's talk about actual Albertans right now who are hurting. Let's go with the example of long-haul truckers. The fact is that when you look at long-haul truckers, there are some very tight margins right now, and these guys, because we have slowed down with our economy, are no longer working as much or at the same rates as they were before. So now is not the time to be raising the fuel costs for these long-haul truckers because, in the end, we're going to see that they're going to start failing. That means that in order to be able to make up that shortfall of long-haul truckers, we're actually going to have to see price increases.

Now, when we start looking at what this government has done, we're seeing massive increases in the fuel tax. How can we say that that is going to positively affect our most vulnerable? The fact is that it's not.

Now, there are things that are a real concern, and one of the ones that's really popping out for me is that we are imposing a diesel carbon tax. What will the effect on the truck stops selling the diesel be? This is an interesting, I guess, concern that I've got. To be honest with you, I used to do accounting for some of these bulk dealerships. [interjection] I know. They would actually tell me that the higher the cost of the fuel, the less fuel they sell. I know it's stunning to hear that.

An Hon. Member: Stunning.

Mr. Cyr: Stunning to hear that. That's because we're putting businesses out of business. That is what's happening.

Again, we start looking at this. I agree that we are going to see less fuel sold, but we're also going to see businesses fail as well. We're going to see businesses' costs to continue operating go up, so our burgers are going to go up, and our groceries are going to go up, the parts for our vehicles. The fact is that when we start looking at everything that's going to be going up, we are going to be actually making less from this fuel tax because we're selling less fuel. It's just like when we look at the corporate taxes, personal taxes, and minimum wages that are being brought in. The more tax you do, the less incentive there is to make profits and to hire people. That's what this carbon tax is going to do for fuel consumption in the area.

I agree that Alberta can reduce its carbon footprint by everybody moving out of Alberta. That seems to be a very counterproductive way of dealing with our carbon. A good example is that we are seeing astounding vacancy rates in my riding right now. That is because people cannot move forward without any work in my riding, with the wonderful 10 per cent unemployment rate that we've got right now. They are actually saying: we want to see stability. I brought this up last night when I was talking about Bill 10. I won't go down that road, but I will say that it is unstable government that brings forward the fact that I will continue to see no employment in my riding.

A good example that we need to be looking at, Madam Speaker, is what the actual impacts are. I keep bringing this up because it is astounding. We are studying an incredible number of different things like legal aid. We're putting reviews out consistently across this government . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a). The hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Mr. Cooper: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to briefly comment on the hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake's stirring remarks. I just have a couple of quick questions, and then I'll pass it to him.

I'm just wondering if he would be able to elaborate on some of the impacts with respect to jobs in the constituency of Bonnyville-Cold Lake as I know that it's something he is passionate about in terms of employment numbers in the region. Then if he wouldn't mind just spending a couple of brief moments speaking about if he has heard from constituents in Bonnyville-Cold Lake that are comfortable with the direction that the government is going on this particular tax given the fact that it wasn't something that the NDP campaigned on, that it wasn't something that was part of the agenda that was laid out for all Albertans during the May 5 election.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'll start with the first part of my hon. colleague's question here. When we're looking at jobs, going back to that specifically, I am seeing with a lot of the businesses anywhere between 25 and 40 per cent of their staff being laid off right now. This is an astounding number, but you know what? We have an incredible constituency. They want to get through this. They know that they can get through this. Why would we add more burden? That is what we are doing.

Already the businesses are having a hard time making ends meet. They're already keeping more staff because they know that these are mothers, fathers, single mothers, incredible people that they're trying to keep working. But you know what? They're not going to be working because in the end raising their cost to do business is going to mean that they're going to have to not make more jobs but actually lay people off.

I don't see how taxing $3 billion out of Alberta's economy right now is going to create any jobs. We've heard consistently that when you tax, tax, and tax — why is it that somehow people think that they can make more money out of that? What ends up happening is that you end up eroding your tax base.

Now, let's look at the fact that when we're looking at where our most vulnerable are, depending on the riding, right now they're going to see a wonderful $500 tax credit from this government. The fact is that the government right now is saying that it's only going to cost them an extra $500 or $600, but that's not reality for northern ridings. People know that it is more expensive to actually live in northern ridings. How is adding more burden to the northern ridings, to my hometown going to help anybody? It's not. The fact is that we're downloading an incredible burden on northern Alberta, on Calgary, and we're not going to see any results, in my opinion, of actually moving Alberta forward, which is something that right now we need to do.

We need to get investment back. That is what we should be focusing on. We should be focusing on, well, getting economic development, which has failed horribly, to actually start generating some interest in investing back in Alberta. We're not seeing any of this stuff moving forward. What we're seeing are steps backwards. We're seeing projects put on hold. We're seeing plants sitting on plant sites. In the end, what we're seeing is that they're just not willing to take a chance because with that money they put into it, they don't know if they're going to get that money back out.

The Deputy Speaker: Any others wishing to speak to this bill?

Mr. Dang: Madam Speaker, I move that we adjourn debate on Bill 20 at this time.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Government Bills and Orders Third Reading

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Bilous: Well, thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise on third reading here of Bill 1. I'll keep my comments fairly brief. I just want to highlight the fact that numerous members throughout the debate on Bill 1 commented on Bill 1 being a flagship bill, and I want to reiterate the fact that for our government the priority is the economy. The priority is getting Albertans back to work. Through Bill 1 that's one tool that our government will have to be able to respond quite quickly and nimbly to the current economic situation that Alberta is facing and to ensure that we have the tools to adapt and respond not only to the economic climate and conditions but, quite frankly, the economy, promoting diversification, looking for opportunities to leverage our strengths, and for Alberta to continue to be the best place to start and grow a business. It will continue to be one of our strengths, quite frankly.

I will say that I was a little disappointed that all parties in this House did not support the bill, and that makes me question whether the economy and diversification and promoting jobs within our province is a priority of all members within this Assembly. If it is, then I would have expected unanimous support of a bill of this stature and of this significance.

Quite frankly, as well, Madam Speaker, this is a priority of this government as seen through our budget, which we entitled the Alberta jobs budget, again, a significant number of tools that are going to set the right conditions for business and industry to continue to invest in our province, to provide supports to entrepreneurs and small-business owners so that we remain the best province in the country to invest in, to start and grow a business in.

I think it's worth mentioning, Madam Speaker, that Alberta continues to be the lowest taxed jurisdiction in the country. There are a number of factors which set Alberta far apart from every other province, including the fact that we've got the youngest population, one of the most educated populations. We have some of the most affordable real estate in the country when you look at comparisons to some of the other major cities across the country. We also have an incredible quality of life here in Alberta, from the mountains to the rolling hills up in Peace River. Alberta is the most beautiful province in the country.

I am quite proud to be an Albertan, Madam Speaker, quite proud of the work that our government is doing, and I will encourage all members of the Assembly to support third reading of Bill 1. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Calgary-Foothills.

Mr. Panda: Thank you, Madam Speaker. This Bill 1 was introduced on the 8th of March as a flagship bill. Instead of being a flagship bill, it ended up as a job description for the minister.

I appreciate the minister asking for unanimous support for the bill. In this House probably we debated a lot on this bill, and we were all eagerly waiting to hear from the minister what those tools are that he's looking for from this bill that will help him create jobs. We didn't hear any specific examples. When we looked at the Government Organization Act, it already provided him all the tools he has. We talked about that back and forth so many times. We haven't heard, even today, what those specific tools are that weren't there in the organization act but that he's looking for through Bill 1. So that's why I'm disappointed. He's just asking for unanimous support but not giving us the information on what new powers he will get. He already has the powers, and instead of using them, he just wants to relist them as a new bill in Bill 1.

Madam Speaker, we also talked a lot about the job situation here. A hundred thousand jobs were lost in Alberta. In Calgary-Foothills I got so many phone calls, e-mails, and I've been door-knocking, and I'm hearing from people that their priority is also the economy and jobs. They want to get back to work. I've been asking this minister to tell us how he's going to create those hundred thousand jobs. To create those hundred thousand jobs in three years: he should be in a real hurry to do something about that if Bill 1 is really that important.

I mean, it was gathering dust for almost three months now. We are at Bill 22 now on the Order Paper, and we're still talking about Bill 1. Hopefully, today we'll get through this. If that's how the government wants to represent it, if just to get this bill approved reflects how long it takes to create jobs, if the government takes so long and still can't figure out what additional powers the minister is going to get after implementing this bill, you know, Albertans really can't wait. They really want this minister to succeed and help create the jobs. We want him to be successful. Irrespective of what they say, that we don't want them to succeed, it's not true. We all have an interest, like my colleague from Bonnyville-Cold Lake. He said that the unemployment rate in his riding is more than 10 per cent now. There are so many Albertans looking for help, and we'll be happy if this government succeeds in creating a hundred thousand jobs in three years. That helps my neighbours, my friends, my colleagues, but even today we haven't heard it from the minister.

As a critic my job is to hold the government to account and also, you know, to help them, whichever way I could, by pointing out the pros and cons of this bill. That's why we wanted to make this bill better. Because there is nothing in that bill, we proposed amendments to make it better. Those amendments are very reasonable. Had they voted for those amendments, that would have helped to debate on programs by a committee of the Assembly, and that would have helped the minister to report the progress on the number of jobs he created, and that reporting would have been public instead of reporting in secret as per the bill. Most importantly, it would have cut red tape, which would have helped small businesses and big businesses, who would have created the many jobs that the minister wanted to create.

Madam Speaker, that red tape is one subject, you know, that I'm really interested in debating in the House in the future, too. When I worked in oil and gas, I experienced it first-hand. These work processes and all that take so long here to get anything approved. It's a waste of resources, a waste of time. You know, we could have approved that amendment so that this bill would have been better. We're all talking about creating jobs, but had we approved that red tape reduction, many companies would have actually advanced the construction of many projects. When we say to reduce red tape, we're not telling the government to ignore the safety issues or anything. We're talking about removing the roadblocks. Some of the government members made fun of that as if we don't care about safety or anything. We're not talking about that. We're talking about procedural delays and roadblocks which could delay the projects.

Anyway, all our amendments were shut down. Had they approved them, that would have really made this bill something worth while. Although it's not a flagship, it would have been something better than what it is now. That flagship we're talking about: the way it is now, it can be manned by only one person, by one person only. That will send false hope. If the minister is trying to send his resumé and expecting them to hire him as the saviour of the ship, it's not going to happen. This is just like a rubber dinghy that the government insists on describing as a battleship. It deserves to be sunk. Unless they think we are one-eyed pirates that can't see the uselessness of this flagship bill, this bill deserves to walk the plank and swim with the fishes, actually.

None of the arguments presented in defence of the need for this bill hold any water. All those guys heckling today: I didn't see any of them standing in this House and speaking in favour of this bill. I didn't. Today they had the opportunity, if they can, to convince all of us here to support that, which the minister couldn't do. If any of those members heckling can convince us, I look forward to that debate.

If we put this bill in a bottle and sent it out to sea, the message wouldn't make one single difference to whatever poor lost soul found it. There isn't even enough paper in the bill to try and eat it. If this bill was a treasure map, it would lead to the garbage can, where it belongs, and at the bottom of the garbage can you would find the failed jobs plan, which, coincidentally, is now under the same minister. This flagship should be sailed into the Bermuda Triangle and lost forever if it can't sail that well.

For the reasons I explained, Madam Speaker, I can't support this, and I don't want to waste our time and effort on useless legislation like this. Let's put it to bed and move on to focus on finding solutions for real problems and issues. I would prefer to be proven wrong by the hon. minister. I wish that after passing this bill, the minister will be really able to create jobs, real jobs, that are tangible and measurable. I hope he can update the Assembly each quarter on how many jobs he creates after being enabled by this bill.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) is in effect if you have a question. Were you going to speak under 29(2)(a), hon. member?

Mr. Gill: Since the flagship bill is about nothing and it's going to create no jobs, I guess I have nothing to say about it.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Yes. I really appreciated some of the analogy that you were making here. [interjections]

The Deputy Speaker: Through the chair.

Mr. Smith: Through the chair. I'm sorry. Thank you. I always forget that.

I was just wondering if the member could expound a little bit further on how this flagship bill is really running at half mast.

Mr. Panda: Well, we actually asked the hon. minister to withdraw the bill – that was the honourable thing he could have done – but he refused to do that. In our own interest, we tried to make it better. That's why we proposed those amendments, but they were all shot down. I don't know if there is anything we could do better. [interjection] Flagship, yes. Sinking ship. I encourage you guys to jump out of that sinking ship and find a safe haven soon.

We were all elected here to this House to bring bills that actually make sense, that actually help Albertans, that actually create jobs. This Bill 1: just show us, tell us, you know, which way it's going to help the minister. How is that going to help your neighbours, my neighbours, people in your riding, in my riding? How can they get back to work? Tell us one example. You all know. You guys are all smart. You know the math. To create a hundred thousand jobs in three years, that means he has to create 33,000 jobs each year. So 33,000 jobs divided by 12 months – you know the math. You figure it out.

Let's put this bill to bed today and enable the minister – with these new powers that he's going to get with Bill 1, let's wish him the best so that he can create the jobs, every month 500, 600, 800 jobs – so that he can come back and report to us by department: the Department of Finance, Energy, and all those ministries. He's going to report to us saying: this month in the Ministry of Energy we created 200 jobs; in Infrastructure we created 400 jobs. If he can show us that, we're willing to support the bill, but we haven't heard that. We haven't heard how many jobs he's going to create in Banff-Cochrane or Calgary-Hawthwood. We haven't heard that. If you are interested, you should be asking the minister: by month in each of the ridings how many jobs are going to be created? If he has answers, we'll be happy to support the bill. If not, let's not waste time and energy on this useless bill.

Thank you very much, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other comments under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, any other members wishing to speak to Bill 1? The hon. Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Mr. Clark: Well, thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I think it's remarkable that this is the best the government could come up with for their flagship bill, Bill 1. There are a lot of things that we need to deal with in this province, and, you know, to waste a flagship opportunity, really, on a bill that does nothing, that gives the minister no powers that he doesn't already have, that gives Executive Council no powers that they don't already have – it is singularly unambitious, and it really is a bill about nothing. It is the Seinfeld bill. I've been frantically trying to come up with a joke about Newman or George or Kramer. I'm afraid that I'm just not creative enough at this point in session to come up with anything quite so good, not nearly as creative as my friend from Calgary-Foothills.

I mean, in all sincerity, we have in this province right now an economic crisis. We have a hundred thousand or more Albertans who are out of work. Many of those people have tremendous skills. They're highly skilled engineers, technical professionals, oil field workers, and many of them have very limited job prospects. That's very serious. That is very serious business.

I think it's worth noting that I have a tremendous amount of respect for the minister, and I know that he's well regarded in the province in the economic development community and amongst chambers of commerce. I know that because I've talked with them, and they do speak highly of the minister. I think that's worth noting. I think it would be better, frankly, if the minister would get on with doing the job rather than passing legislation that does nothing that he can't already do.

It makes me wonder: what else did the government have lined up as Bill 1? When we got this bill, it was printed on eight and a half by 11 paper. It wasn't even a proper bill. Given that it was early on in a session that the government set themselves, surely it wasn't a surprise that you had to come up with a Bill 1? You had time to actually get to Queen's Printer and physically print the bill. I do wonder if at some point there's another shoe to drop here, if there's some other grand idea that this government is going to come up with.

You know, there are problems with the bill itself. The reporting is only from the minister to Executive Council, not to the public, not to the Assembly, not to Albertans, so that reduces transparency. Another thing I have a real concern about with this entire role and the bill is that it creates a risk that the government may get directly involved with investments in business, be that through Crown corporations or direct investment. That may happen not just with this bill. It may happen as a result of the climate bill. It may happen as a result of some other economic diversification strategy. You know, that introduces an entirely new level of risk. We've been down this road before, Madam Speaker. It was in the '80s, when the government of the day decided that that was a great idea, and it ended up costing Albertans hundreds of millions of dollars.

I'm not sure if this word is unparliamentary, but I'm going to give it a go. The road to hell is paved with good intentions. If that is unparliamentary, I will withdraw the term. We're familiar with it. [interjection] I've been informed by my hon. colleague that I'm not allowed to use the words "good intentions" when referring to the government of the day. [interjections] Perfect. I've been beaten to my Seinfeld joke.

You know, it's a great concern. Unfortunately, no, I can't support this bill either because I worry: are there other shoes to drop? Is there more to come here? Is this government going to enter into direct investment with Alberta taxpayers' dollars in private business, risking Alberta tax dollars? That's not what government should do. You know, government should create the environment where private business can thrive, where Alberta's entrepreneurial spirit can really, truly thrive. There was tremendous opportunity here. We could have done some great things. Sadly, this government and this bill just don't meet the mark, so I cannot support it, Madam Speaker.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any questions or comments under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, are there any further speakers to Bill 1? The hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Mr. Cooper: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise and speak one final time on this great accomplishment, this significant piece of legislation, not one final time in the House forever, much to the chagrin of many folks on that side of the House and fewer people on this side of the House but not all of them.

You know, Madam Speaker, we have seen many, many Bill 1s come and go, and as my hon. colleague from Calgary-Foothills mentioned, Bill 1 is, generally speaking, a flagship... [interjections] Danger, Will Robinson.

It's generally a flagship piece of legislation that the whole government can be proud of. Generally speaking, in fact almost exclusively, Bill 1s have been sponsored by the Premier of the day, and this particular piece of legislation, with all due respect to my hon. colleague for Economic Development and Trade and responsible for the MGA and a bunch of other things in there, former Minister of Municipal Affairs and former Minister of Service Alberta, not to mention all the other wonderful accomplishments he's had on this side of the House – while it's wonderful that he had the opportunity to sponsor such a bill, generally speaking, a government is so proud of the first piece of legislation that they put the Premier's name on that bill. This is the first time since Premier Lougheed that the government has made a decision to not put the Premier's name on Bill 1. I think it speaks to the quality of the legislation because this piece of legislation is not what Albertans were hoping for.

Now, while they're hoping that positive things can happen inside our economy, while they're hoping that the government will do its best job to get out of the way of job creators, while they're hoping that the government will play a key partnership role in the future of our province, they aren't just waiting for a piece of legislation that accomplishes nothing. In fact, at no point have I knocked on the door of the good people in the constituency, in the outstanding constituency I might add, of Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills when they've said: you know, what I'm hoping for is Bill 1, a bill that allows the minister to do his job. What they are hoping for is a government that truly understands the position that we're in, that truly understands the role of government in not making things worse, and we've seen time in and time out this NDP government making ideological decisions that at the end of the day aren't making things better. I think Bill 1 is a perfect example of it, and I, quite frankly, am glad that this evening is likely to be the last time that we have to talk about Bill 1.

I think it's unfortunate that there isn't more accountability to the Legislature in Bill 1 like this side of the House proposed in committee, a number of amendments that would have actually made the bill less bad. One of the things that those amendments had the opportunity to do was to ensure that this minister was held to account for this piece of legislation both in the form of programs that had to be initiated, that would have had some accountability through the legislative process, and also a requirement of the minister to report back to this Chamber on progress that's being made. While I know the minister has stood in his place on a number of occasions and said, "Trust me; I'll be reporting back; I will be reporting to this House on a regular basis," we have a little bit of a desire for those sorts of statements to be put in legislation so that we can ensure that they will happen because the government has been laying a track record of not being as accountable to the Assembly as they ought to be.

I think a perfect example of that is the lack of desire to have legislation reviewed at committee, the lack of desire to have the appropriate study of legislation. A perfect example of that is the introduction of Bill 20 on one day, a hundred pages of a bill, and expecting the opposition to debate it the following day. This is the sort of rushing through of legislation, the sort of lack of accountability that this government is building a track record for. Bill 1 is a perfect example of not being accountable to this Chamber and only being accountable to cabinet and to the Premier. That, Madam Speaker, is not the kind of change that Albertans were hoping for.

I hope that we have an opportunity to finally get this bill passed so that the minister can get on with doing his job and can be reporting back to the House, as he has assured us he will do on numerous occasions, even though the legislation says that he only has to report back once to Executive Council. I'll take him at his word that he will be reporting to the House regularly and that we will be able to see some wonderful results from this legislation although I'm highly speculative in this case.

So I certainly won't be supporting the bill – I know it comes as a surprise – but I do look forward to moving forward and seeing the results that may or may not come from it.

The Deputy Speaker: Any questions or comments under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, any other speakers wishing to speak to Bill 1? The hon. Member for Barrhead-Morinville-Westlock.

Mr. van Dijken: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today to speak to Bill 1. This bill does make me nervous. We lived through many decades of governments trying to pick winners and losers within industry and trying to create jobs, losing focus on the real job of government, which is essentially to create an environment for investment in private industry to create those real jobs. Bill 1 has been called lots of things over these last few debates. Most of all Bill 1 reminds a number of us of economic development policies and experiments that have gone awry. Tales of good money chasing after bad, decades come to mind. We don't want to repeat that. We have heard some pretty fascinating stories, stories about magnesium plants in High River and meat-packing businesses in Edmonton.

I have another tale to share. This tale comes from the shores of Nova Scotia. It involves something almost mystical, almost fantastical. This is the tale of heavy water. This is an instance where I did not know much about heavy water, so I went to others to give me an explanation about heavy water. For those who don't know, water is a molecule made from three atoms: one atom of oxygen, two atoms of hydrogen. Hence, you get H<sub>2</sub>O or dihydrogen monoxide. A hydrogen atom is made up of one proton, one electron. But sometimes that atom gets an interloper, a third particle called a neutron. A hydrogen atom made up of a proton, a neutron, and an electron is known as deuterium. One in every 6,000 hydrogen atoms is like this. Place deuterium in a water molecule, and suddenly you no longer have H<sub>2</sub>O; you have D<sub>2</sub>O, better known as heavy water.

By the early '60s Canada had decided that our nuclear reactors would be the CANDU variety, CANada Deuterium Uranium. This meant as uranium would react to produce the heat energy in nuclear reactors, the deuterium of heavy water would be used as the moderator to ensure the reactor wouldn't run out of control and explode. This is quite unlike the Soviet reactors, like those involved at Chernobyl, where flammable graphite was used as the moderator.

If Canada was to have CANDU reactors, Canada was going to need heavy water. Scientist Jerome Spevack arrived in Nova Scotia in 1963 and within six weeks had hammered out a deal with the government. His company, Deuterium of Canada Limited, had to pony up $18 million and the province's development arm, Industrial Estates Limited, offered up $12 million to have the $30 million for the plant in Cape Breton ready to employ out-of-work coal miners in thousands of construction jobs and 200 operating jobs. A make-work project. Sounds good.

But federal politics for the CANDU reactors demanded that in order for the company to get the CANDU contract, it had to be a Canadian company. DCL was American owned. It did not take long for the Nova Scotia government to make a decision to take on a majority ownership stake in DCL in order to get the jobs and the contract. Mysteriously, the requirement for DCL to raise $18 million disappeared. Coincidentally, scientist Jerome Spevack was given a 20-year management contract, a scientist given a management contract, but was not a good manager and had to be bought out when construction fell behind schedule and was plagued by cost overruns.

Bad weather; 24 strikes; late, faulty, and wrong-sized equipment arriving on site plagued construction. Two years after construction was started, the plant was $16 million over budget. The province's development arm, Industrial Estates Limited, tried to unload the plant to various buyers. When Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, the federal, taxpayer-funded Crown corporation, asked to double the order and thus double the plant size, Industrial Estates Limited foolishly agreed. Bad decision after bad decision after bad decision.

Then something disastrous happened. Someone tried to save $2 million by pumping salt water into the stainless-steel pipes to make the heavy water. The result: dangerous hydrogen sulphide, H<sub>2</sub>S, gas and a rusted-out plant. No one claims responsibility, but it doesn't take a scientist to make the connection between this disaster and government intervention in economic diversification, government intervention of the kind this government wishes to emulate and advocates in Bill 1.

By 1968 130 million taxpayer dollars had been spent on the heavy-water plant. It was costing the government $179,000 per employee per year. Job creation. The plant was turned over to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, who spent more federal taxpayer dollars, to the tune of $95 million, to fix the plant and make it run properly. The plant was closed in 1985, and it cost Atomic Energy of Canada another 2 and a half million dollars to clean up the site. To conclude, $228 million of federal and provincial taxpayers' money was spent on this one industry in Nova Scotia, and they have nothing to show for it.

Nova Scotia had another industry they sunk money into in the name of economic development, Sydney Steel. For close to 35 years Nova Scotia poured $3.2 billion – yes, $3.2 billion – into that money-losing Sydney Steel Corporation. I praise former Nova Scotia Premier John Hamm for making the bold promise to sell it or close it, and he did just that. No more bad money after good. He closed it. Madam Speaker, $3.2 billion over 35 years and nothing to show for it is an incredible waste of taxpayers' dollars. That doesn't count the cleanup costs associated with the site as the place is adjacent to the notorious PCB-laden Sydney tar ponds, that are now covered over as a park.

Now, these stories have a lesson to teach us. Bill 1 raises the spectre of these examples of throwing good money after bad, this time to create jobs in Alberta. Using taxpayers' money for business and job creation is not the role of government, I would suggest. That is the role of private dollars and the private sector. The economic development paradigm as represented by the current NDP government drives much fear and concern among Albertans that the NDP will make similar economic development decisions: taxpayer-owned industry, taxpayer-subsidized business, majority equity stakes in business, unproven technology, bad project management and cost controls. Those who pay no attention to history are doomed to repeat it. The NDP government needs to please pay attention to these tales and not repeat them. To repeat them will be to place a new financial burden on our children, gambling with our children's future and their children's at the expense of creating jobs in the future in Alberta.

For that reason, I cannot support Bill 1, which is little more than the government trying to give itself a mandate to pick winners and losers in our economy and possibly to repeat the economic development mistakes of the past. I believe this government needs to regain its focus on creating an environment to allow business to have the opportunity to move forward with investment and confidence in an environment of business-friendly politics here in Alberta.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Any questions or comments under Standing Order 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, any further speakers to Bill 1? We'll call on the hon. – the Member for Highwood.

Mr. W. Anderson: I'm not honourable yet, but maybe. You never know.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Connolly: You're honourable when you're in the House.

Mr. W. Anderson: Pardon me?

Mr. Connolly: You're honourable when you're in the House.

Mr. W. Anderson: Yeah. Thank you.

I rise today to speak against Bill 1, Promoting Job Creation and Diversification Act. I am unaware of any piece of legislation that contains so little substance. It totals three pages, and the only job it has created thus far is that of the minister. Since the bill was introduced over two months ago, I've had plenty of time to ponder the contents of the bill, and what I'm left with is how utterly lacking in substance this proposed legislation is.

This bill reminds me a lot of an airbag. According to madehow.com an airbag is, quote, an inflatable cushion designed to protect automobile occupants from serious injury in the case of a collision. The airbag is part of an inflatable restraint system, also known as an air cushion restraint system, or an airbag supplemental restraint system. End quote.

Madehow.com goes on to explain – and I'm paraphrasing – that an airbag is primarily comprised of a fabric bag, usually made of nylon, which is housed in a compartment in the steering wheel, dashboard, or door. In the case of an accident the airbag sensor is tripped, which then sets in motion a chemical reaction that results in sodium acetate and potassium nitrate, which produce nitrogen gas, inflating the airbag. In addition to the sodium acetate and potassium nitrate, the airbag also contains a powdery substance, usually cornstarch or talcum powder, which acts as a lubricant while the airbag is deployed in the vehicle.

According to howstuffworks.com the entire process from the airbag sensor being tripped to the airbag being deployed takes about one twenty-fifth of a second, or about the same amount of time it takes to read Bill 1.

Unfortunately, that is where the comparisons end. While airbags have a long and documented history of saving lives, the Promoting Job Creation and Diversification Act has yet to produce any quantifiable or measurable uptake in any job creation in Alberta, well, besides the job of the minister.

I would suggest that we dive right into the bill, but it's simply a little too dangerous to dive into something so shallow. Let's not dive into it. I will propose that we wade into the bill instead. Let's jump right to section 2, establishment of programs. This is a very important section since it clearly establishes that the minister could establish all of the different types of programs that the Minister of Economic Development and Trade could already establish without this ridiculous bill being enacted, things like creating partnerships that support entrepreneurship and focus on innovation or programs that increase access to capital or programs that help businesses grow and succeed. That is an interesting one right there, creating a program that helps businesses grow and succeed, because I've never heard of a small-business tax cut referred to as a program before. I guess, you know, each to their own.

Section 3 establishes that even if the minister really, really wants to establish an investor tax credit program or a capital investment tax program, he must still introduce a bill in the Assembly. I think we can all thank the government for their quick thinking on including this caveat. We wouldn't want the minister going rogue on establishing tax credits outside of this Assembly.

Alberta is facing the worst economic downturn in a generation. Unemployment is higher than it's been in decades. There are over 100,000 Albertans that have lost their jobs. This government could have done so many better things to provide a calming effect on a skittish and anxious economy. Is that the best that they could come up with, Bill 1? This just goes to show how out of touch this government is with the economic reality facing Albertans today.

For these reasons I cannot support this bill, and I expect my colleagues to do the same. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Questions or comments?

Seeing none, any further speakers to Bill 1? The hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo?

Mr. Yao: No. I'm fine, actually. Sorry.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other speakers to Bill 1?

Seeing none, I will call on the hon. Minister of Economic Development and Trade to close debate.

Mr. Bilous: Well, thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and close debate on Bill 1. I have a few comments which may address some of the comments that the Official Opposition made. First, I found that the debate was very interesting. We learned all about airbags and water molecules and different topics, nuclear facilities as well, which are not related so much to the bill.

I just wanted to clarify for hon. members that when we talk about diversification, I appreciate the fact that the opposition has examples, as have we, of the previous government's failed attempts at diversification by throwing a whole bunch of money at a sector which doesn't exist. This bill does not do that. That is not our definition of diversification, as most members in this House will know. I've spoken on it numerous times.

We're looking at building on our strengths within our sectors, within oil and gas, both value-added but also in other sectors that are very strong in the province of Alberta: our agricultural sector, our forestry sector, our tourism sector. Madam Speaker, I know that the Official Opposition doesn't believe in diversification, but the rest of us do, and quite frankly the rest of the world does.

This piece of legislation is an enabling piece of legislation. I do find some of the hon. members' comments interesting as far as what the bill will do. It gives the government tools, again, to respond.

The one point that I did want to respond to in closing, Madam Speaker, is that, really, to ask how many jobs will be created from a piece of legislation shows that members are naive in how the economy actually works in that a piece of legislation does not produce X number of jobs. The role of the government is to provide and set the right conditions to encourage the private sector, who are the job creators, to invest and grow their businesses or to start a business here in the province. That is exactly the approach that our government is taking. That's the approach that we've been doing.

The Minister of Finance's budget back in October 2015 had a number of tools, including increasing access to capital through ATB, looking at providing additional funding to the Alberta Enterprise Corporation, which invests in Alberta-based companies through venture capital. It's an equity stake, quite an incredible model, Madam Speaker. Again, asking questions about how many jobs a bill creates in one sector or in one city, to me, unfortunately, shows a little bit of naïveté as far as how setting the right conditions works and the role of the government. I am happy to clarify that for all members.

I do just want to mention, Madam Speaker, that, quite frankly, our government has taken this economic downturn very seriously, not only over the past 12 to 14 months. We recognize the hardship that many Alberta families and workers and communities have faced. That's why our government has taken action both through our budget and through legislation, looking at providing opportunities to get Albertans back to work, to get them working, and, again, looking at leveraging sectors that we are already strong in.

I'm quite proud of the work that the Premier and the government have done, and this bill will continue to build on our strengths and look at providing new opportunities for Albertans and providing the supports for our existing sectors. With that, I encourage all members of the Assembly to support this bill.

Madam Speaker, as Deputy Government House Leader I will request unanimous consent of the House for one-minute bells.

The Deputy Speaker: There's a request for reducing the bells to one minute. Is there anyone opposed?

Bill 9
An Act to Modernize Enforcement of Provincial Offences

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Justice.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It's my privilege to rise today and move third reading of Bill 9, An Act to Modernize Enforcement of Provincial Offences.

I would once again like to thank my colleagues on both sides of the House for a good discussion and for their support of this valuable legislation. We've had the opportunity to thoroughly discuss this legislation in the House, and it's clear from comments made during Committee of the Whole that members of the House are in agreement with the intent of this bill, including the modernization of key pieces of the justice system. The amendment, the proposed civil enforcement measures to enforce tickets for minor infractions and to enable e-ticketing, will do just that. The current system of using warrants to enforce tickets for minor infractions is not effective and hasn't been so for a number of years.

I'm pleased that many of my colleagues have expressed their shared views that these amendments will help focus law enforcement and court resources where they should be, on more serious crimes. I'm also happy to hear the members opposite support the intent of this bill.

Madam Speaker, almost 97 per cent of Albertans over the age of 16 use motor vehicle registry services, and for those who don't, other enforcement mechanisms will be available such as the filing of writs against property and garnishing of bank accounts, wages, and tax refunds. This will address enforcement in a much more effective way.

The EndPovertyEdmonton task force recently released a poverty reduction strategy that includes a priority aimed at decriminalizing poverty. This priority looks at how the justice system can work against the poor as they're often trapped in a perpetuating cycle. It indicates that fines for minor violations turn into arrest warrants, and there's no means of repayment, so these warrants turn into jail time, that can further dim these individuals' chances of acquiring the necessary resources to bring themselves out of poverty. The proposed amendments will ensure that this government and social agencies are in a better position to work with individuals who are coping with poverty.

Alberta Justice and Solicitor General cannot work in isolation to address social issues in our communities. People who are dealing with mental health issues need a wide range of supports. This is why I'm working closely with my colleagues in Alberta Health, Human Services, and other ministries to build on recommendations in the Valuing Mental Health report.

In February of this year this government released a report that includes 32 recommendations aimed at supporting mental health by strengthening service delivery for Albertans with mental illness and addictions. The Alberta government took quick steps to accept the report and begin addressing six recommendations that were identified as priorities. The recommendations in this report are guiding our government and our partners as we work to build a better system for addictions and mental health. We are continuing to evaluate the remaining recommendations and have been talking to our partners and Albertans who may be affected by them. The legislative amendments we were discussing today are one piece of the puzzle to help people who are in vulnerable positions due to homelessness or mental illness. I'm looking forward to the implementation of Bill 9 to better meet the needs of Albertans and to support forward thinking and modernization in this province.

Madam Speaker, I'm very excited today to be able to pass this particular bill. It's one step in a number of steps that my ministry is considering to assist in decriminalizing poverty so that individuals who are suffering from mental health challenges and who have fallen into poverty for whatever reason can be supported not just by social services agencies but also by the government. It's critical that we work with our partners going forward on this. I was incredibly pleased to stand up on the day this bill was first introduced with support from both the Edmonton Police Service and from the John Howard Society as we introduced this bill. I think that all Albertans can agree that this reflects our shared values that we should not be criminalizing poverty, and I'm glad to have had the opportunity to take this step.

Thank you very much.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake, followed by Edmonton-Centre.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Madam Speaker. When we look at this bill, it's about outstanding fines for minor offences, for penalties under $1,000. We'd no longer be having warrants issued, but we'd be compelled to get payment when it's registry time.

Now, this is something that has been brought to my attention as a shadow minister for Justice. It's good to see that not only was I getting it but that the Minister of Justice was getting that as well. To credit the minister, she moved forward with this, and it's good to see that we're actually putting some legislation through that will actually move Alberta forward in its ability to be able to deal with our homeless and Albertans without health. Giving credit where credit is due I think is important, and good legislation being moved forward is something that we need to acknowledge.

The fact is that I did bring up in Committee of the Whole that I had concerns that we may not be doing enough for those with mental health issues that are being missed now, but the speech by the Minister of Justice saying that she is collaborating with the Minister of Health is good to hear, and it's good to see that, in the end, we're all moving together to make sure that Alberta is helping people that need help.

A good example is that a friend of mine was saying that he got a jaywalking ticket in his early 20s and ended up at the wonderful Edmonton Remand Centre. That was a terrifying experience for my friend, and he said: it's all for a 10-dollar ticket. Now, unfortunately, he didn't have $10. This could have been easily reconciled, but in the end he needed to call for his family's help. There's always the question that they don't get there in time and that we have somebody that's stuck in a facility that probably shouldn't have been there in the first place because, in the end, we've got a system that was identifying people as criminals, and it maybe should have been using a little bit of foresight.

We needed to end the cycle for those who couldn't afford their tickets or who possibly may not have given the severity of the ticket the consideration it needed to make sure that that ticket was paid. Now, I do like the fact that we are still dealing with tickets because, in the end, there should be some accountability for somebody that has a ticket written for them. So I'm not saying: "Let's just let them all go. Forget about anything under $1,000." What I am saying is that we need to be moving Alberta forward and making sure that we actually put behind bars the people that belong behind bars.

This is where I believe – and I can support this bill – that this minister has done a very excellent job of answering our questions. I believe that, in the end, we've worked as a group and have been able to move this forward. I believe that the minister has listened to our concerns. She has done an excellent job, and she just needs to be commended on it.

Thank you very much.

The Deputy Speaker: Any questions or comments under 29(2)(a)?
The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to rise today and speak to third reading of Bill 9. You know, in my constituency of Edmonton-Centre there are a significant number of residents who for a variety of reasons have limited income. Some of these individuals are homeless, others are precariously housed, and for all of them every dollar counts, so when they lose even just a small amount of their income, that can sometimes mean the difference between feeding themselves and their family. It can mean the difference between having a roof over their head or them being out in the street. As we've discussed, when these individuals receive a fine, often due to circumstances that are directly related to their poverty or due to struggles with mental or physical health or addictions, it can begin a cycle of harm that can be very difficult to break.

Along those lines, I'd like to share a story that was shared with me through my municipal counterpart, Councillor Scott McKeen. He received an e-mail from a young indigenous man who works for a local organization that supports high-risk, marginalized youth. The young man had at some point in time received a transit fine. He wasn't able to both pay the fine and make his rent, so he decided to turn himself in. He didn't know where he was supposed to go or who he was supposed to deal with, so he turned up at the provincial courthouse, where the ticket indicated that the fine could be paid. He waited in line to see an officer. When he got to the officer, he was told: well, no, you're in the wrong place. He was told that he had to go over to another office in another building. So he went to that office in the other building, and then he was told there that that was also the wrong place, and he was redirected to yet another building.

After being redirected twice, he was questioning whether he really even wanted to go through with this, but he went anyway. When he got there, he found out that, yes, this was, in fact, the right place. He was processed, put in handcuffs, taken into a holding room, and then eventually escorted along with some other people by remand officers to another room to wait to be processed. He described the handling of himself and other individuals as being not the kindest. They were then escorted into another room. They were forced to strip naked in front of remand officers, who according to the young man offered critiques and their opinions of both his body parts and those of the person in front of him. He was then given a blue jumpsuit, placed in a cold room with others who had been through the same process. There they waited for several hours, were given a cold meal. He noted that at no time were they provided with an explanation of the process, what they could expect, or when they would be released. He was then put through the release process, allowed to dress in his own clothes, put in another room to wait, and then was finally released.

In summary, in his own words the young man stated, "My experience dealing with a [traffic] ticket was very degrading and dehumanizing." He also notes that at the organization he works at, he hears of similar encounters and experiences from youth even younger than he was at the time that this occurred. He concludes by stating that there must be a better way, a better process than what he endured for handling a simple transit fine.

Shortly after receiving that e-mail, I had the opportunity to meet with the Minister of Justice, and I appreciated that she took the time to listen and consider the situation. I was very pleased at that time when she told me that we would be introducing this bill.

You know, the process that that young man went through didn't have any benefit for anybody. There was no recompense to the transit service for the original infraction. There was no benefit to the police officers who were forced to spend their time processing, incarcerating, and then releasing these young men instead of being able to address more serious offences. There was no benefit to the public, to whom the young man presented no danger and who paid far more to incarcerate him for the day than the value of the fine that he wasn't able to afford to pay. These kinds of experiences, which, as he described, were degrading and dehumanizing, only serve to further alienate the men and women who experience them from the society that they struggle with. This increases their social isolation and the likelihood that they're going to continue to be trapped in these cycles of negative behaviour and the chances that they're again going to get caught up in the criminal justice system.

Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to see this bill come forward and the support that it's gained in this House. It's a practical, pragmatic, and, most importantly, humane step in moving us forward in how we handle minor crimes. Thank you again to the minister for bringing this forward. Thank you to all the members who have spoken in favour and who are going to support this bill. I look forward to passing it tonight in this House.

The Deputy Speaker: Any questions or comments under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, are there any other speakers to Bill 9?

Seeing none, the hon. minister to close debate.

Ms Ganley: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I will be brief. Just by way of closing comments, I'd like to thank everyone again, on both sides of the House, for the support of this bill, members of the public who have sent in supportive e-mails and other comments, the police services for being willing to work with us on this, and all justice system participants. I'm very excited we're able to move forward with this legislation. I think it will assist a lot of people, not the least of which are people who are victims of crime who are unable to come forward or unwilling to come forward to report the crimes that they have been a victim of because they are concerned that they have these outstanding warrants and don't want to present themselves before police.

I think that everyone is very excited to pass this bill. With that, I will just thank everyone for their support.

[Motion carried; Bill 9 read a third time]

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 20 Climate Leadership Implementation Act (continued)

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-South West.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today to speak on Bill 20, the Climate Leadership Implementation Act, because I think it's something that all of us in this House recognize is very important, that all of us in this House recognize is something groundbreaking. It's something that we are going to be able to be proud of. When I talk to my grandchildren – and, if you look at me, that's going to be quite a ways away, I hope – I'm going to be able to tell them that rather than being stuck in the past and in denial, like members of the opposition were, I made a difference. I did the right thing. We did the right thing. We as Albertans, we as MLAs voted to help the world, to take action today, and to make a difference.

Madam Speaker, I'm going to boil down the climate change plan to three really main themes for us today, three things that I find very important in the Climate Leadership Implementation Act, the first theme being diversifying our economy and how we're supporting Albertan jobs, the second theme being laying the groundwork for our future, and the third theme, finally, being protecting our children.

Let's get right into that first one, which is diversifying our economy and diversifying our job markets, because it's something that the opposition can't seem to wrap their heads around. It's something that they can't seem to understand. By using our Climate Leadership Implementation Act, we're going to be able to invest in programs like the climate change and emissions management fund, and we're going to be able to invest in programs like Energy Efficiency Alberta. What this is going to be able to do is to deliver efficiency programs to homes across the province. It's going to raise awareness about consumption and different ways we can find personal efficiency across the province, Madam Speaker. It's going to develop Alberta's energy efficiency industry.

The climate change report suggests that we will be able to support over 3,000 jobs, Madam Speaker, with these programs, that these investments will support 3,000 good-paying jobs for hard-working Albertans. And when the opposition speaks about picking winners and losers, I want the opposition to look those 3,000 people who have jobs in the eyes and tell them which one of their jobs is a loser, tell them which one of them is a loser for having that job. Those are things that we can do to help our communities. Those are things that we can do to help our economy and our environment today.

We can invest that money, we can use that money, and we can support our economy. Madam Speaker, by reinvesting these funds in renewables, in innovation, we're helping industry get the carbon out of the oil, get the carbon out of the barrel, and we are helping our industry move forward to an energy future that we can be proud of and that we can utilize as a province.

Really, that rolls right into that second theme, Madam Speaker, which is laying the groundwork for our future. I want to use this opportunity to talk about how this plan really is laying the groundwork for Alberta's future, because an Abacus Data poll regarding pipelines and politics in 2016 was released this morning, and over two-thirds of Canadians agree that new pipeline capacity should be built, with a renewables strategy and with a climate change plan attached to them. That's right. If we want to get market access for our pipelines, if we want to get our pipelines to tidewater, we absolutely need a renewables strategy, we absolutely need a climate change strategy, and that's what this government is absolutely presenting.

Madam Speaker, this nation-leading, world-class climate strategy, that has a methane implementation project being copied by the Americans, is now being looked at by the federal government as an implementation plan. These things are how we know that this plan will move Alberta forward, will lay that groundwork for us to be able to get our product to market, to be able to get our product to tidewater because we are laying these steps out today. We are doing the hard work that needs to be done in this House because we recognize that climate change is real and that if we are to remain viable in the future, we must act now as Albertans, as legislators, and as people who simply care about our world.

This is all very important to me because, as I spoke about at the beginning, I can look at my grandchildren years from now – hopefully, years and years from now I'll be looking at my grandchildren. That's the third theme, protecting our children and protecting our future. This morning the minister of environment received the 2016 leadership in public policy award for work towards air quality. That's right, Madam Speaker. This government received a leadership award because of the health benefits that this climate leadership plan will bring.

Madam Speaker, not a lot of people know this, but I have asthma, both when I was a child and as I do today because it's a chronic disease. Asthma is one of those things that when you go outside and you try to play in the field and you just want to play soccer with your friends, well, you have to stop. You have to stop and say: "I need to go take my puffer. I'm having a hard time breathing. Things aren't going well." That takes you out of that moment. It takes you away from your friends. It takes you away from your family.

Madam Speaker, what I want to do is to say to my grandchildren – when they ask me however many years from now, I want to be able to tell them: I made a difference in making sure that you would be able to play outside, that you would be able to play with your friends, that you would be able to do all the things you want to do without being inhibited by your health because we took action on something that works. We took action on something that we know is absolutely real. There are adverse health effects to not acting now. We absolutely will be harming our future. We'll be harming our children and our children's children and generations to come if we do not take action now.

Ensuring that this happens, ensuring that we take action on all these three themes – diversifying our economy, making sure that we have good-paying, hard work for Albertans today; laying the groundwork for our future, ensuring that we have an energy market to look forward to, an emissions reduction strategy to look forward to in the future; protecting our children and their health in the future – is something, Madam Speaker, that I must fight for in this House so that I can have a province that I can be proud of. When my grandchildren ask me, "Thomas, what did you do for the province? What did you do in your tenure as an MLA?" I'll have at least one thing I can point to. I can say: "The Climate Leadership Implementation Act made a difference. It helped Albertans. It helped Alberta."

The Climate Leadership Implementation Act does all these things. It diversifies the economy, it lays that groundwork, and it protects our children. I urge all members of this House to support this bill because it absolutely is something that when you are asked about it by your children, when you are asked about it by your grandchildren or your great-grandchildren, you will want to look them in the eye and tell them that you helped and that you made the right choice.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Any questions or comments under 29(2)(a)?

Mr. Rodney: This may be a question for you, Madam Speaker, or perhaps for the member. As you can tell by my tone, I am being collegial. The fact of the matter is that there were a number of rather inflammatory comments in the beginning, and aspersions were cast, not on our third party or those to my geographical left but on the Official Opposition. I think the question is simply this: is it fair to attack people or policies? Which one?

The Deputy Speaker: Are you raising a point of order, hon. member?

Mr. Rodney: As you noticed, I didn't want to waste the time of the House by doing that. It's simply a question of respect. I think it's fair that when we disagree, we use diplomacy, and we use information and fact. But to cast aspersions on people rather than saying, "I disagree with your policy," well, I have a big problem with that. I just want the member to know that I appreciate the passion. That's important. We need to balance the heart, though, with the head. Just as a reminder for all of us in this House, we would serve our constituents well if we would just temper some of the passion and use a little bit more compassion once in a while. That's all.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other questions or comments?

Do you wish to respond, hon. member?

Any others under 29(2)(a)?

Mr. Bilous: Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member was quite passionate in showing his passion for this groundbreaking bill. It really is putting Alberta at the forefront not only of Canada, but quite frankly this has really had an impact and will have an impact worldwide. I can tell you for a fact that our Prime Minister was meeting with the President of the United States and referenced Alberta and Alberta's climate leadership plan as a model and as something that has captured the attention of the world stage and that, quite frankly, was also something that was talked about in Paris.

You know, I appreciate the fact that the Member for Edmonton-South West is quite passionate about his remarks. I think that in his speech he was being respectful, not talking about any individual member, just talking about maybe some comments that have come from different sides of the House as far as trying to argue the impacts of carbon or of burning coal or of climate change. Quite frankly, I think it's a fair comment, and I just was curious if the member had any more comments to add on that topic.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I really do appreciate the comments from all members in the House today. I think it is really important to recognize that as we move forward and we are talking about the policy here – and the policy of this government is to absolutely take action on climate change – when the policy of opposition parties is to try to prevent that action on climate change or to not take action on climate change and to wait for it to go away or to sit on your hands and hope that everything is going to be okay, we simply know that doesn't work. We simply know that's not how it's going to happen. We simply know that the Climate Leadership Implementation Act is the best legislation that we have on the table today to move forward on these issues that matter to Albertans everywhere, these issues that matter to Canadians everywhere, these issues that we will need to be able to talk about in this House in a respectful manner going forward.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

Ms Phillips: Well, Madam Speaker, I'm wondering if the hon. member would like to talk a little bit about the consultation that went into this process and the climate leadership plan, which I know he has read. This has been a months-long conversation, of course, on behalf of this government, and I'm wondering if the hon. member would like to share his thoughts on how that process has unfolded.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'd like to thank the minister for her comments. I think it's very important to recognize that there was quite a comprehensive consultation program and quite a comprehensive panel that was assembled, that created a very lengthy report – I will note that it was very lengthy; I read the thing multiple times – and that in it we saw some citations from people like Cenovus, Suncor, CNRL.

We saw people supporting the climate change plan that you wouldn't necessarily call socialists or that you wouldn't necessarily call people who would traditionally side with this government. Madam Speaker, what we found was that people from across the aisle, people from nonpartisan sectors, people from partisan sectors, people from everywhere were supporting this plan because this plan is one that everybody could get behind, that everybody could be proud of.

Maybe I'll just read a couple of them for you, Madam Speaker. I'll look at this one here, which says:

Smart carbon policy means pricing carbon broadly, and this is exactly what Alberta's new carbon levy does. Carbon pricing is the most . . . effective way to reduce greenhouse gas emissions, and Alberta's strengthened policy will help the province support a strong economy and environment into the future.

This was said by Professor Bev Dahlby, distinguished fellow in tax and economic growth at the School of Public Policy and professor of economics at the University of Calgary.

We see other people such as Rob Harlan, the executive director of the Solar Energy Society of Alberta, saying, "The new carbon marketplace will automatically start to move Alberta toward a more sustainable, clean energy economy."

The Deputy Speaker: Any other speakers to Bill 20? The hon. Member for Barrhead-Morinville-Westlock.

Mr. van Dijken: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I will have less entertainment value than the previous speaker, but hopefully some level of reality might come into it. You know, we talk about our grandchildren, and the hon. member hopes to someday have grandchildren. The grandchildren, with regard to possibly another policy that's being put forward and plans that this government is doing, might ask Grandpa: "Why did you just sit on your hands and wait for your problems to go away? Why did you continue to just spend money, spend money, and leave us with all this debt that we have to pay?" I think that might be a question that their grandchildren will be asking them also. It's a completely different angle, but the grandchildren do have the right to ask that question also.

I rise today to speak on Bill 20, the Climate Leadership Implementation Act, which, if passed, will impose a carbon tax on Albertans. Madam Speaker, I understand the logic behind this bill, and like many bills that this government has put forward, it comes from a place of good intention. Climate change is an important issue and should no doubt be addressed. Unfortunately, like many bills that have been put forward by the government, legislation that is aimed at addressing an issue has become skewed by an ideological agenda that is placed above the needs of everyday Albertans, that we represent in this House, everyday Albertans that are struggling to make ends meet at this time.

Is climate change an important issue? Yes. Does it need to be addressed? Yes. Should it be addressed in the manner and format that Bill 20 proposes? Absolutely not.

Alberta is struggling. The days of $100-a-barrel oil seem to be a distant memory. For us, as we have seen, our once strong economy is now limping along. In the last year we have lost thousands of jobs, not just 3,000 but 100,000. We've lost jobs across the entire province, throughout the private sector employment insurance rates have skyrocketed, and social service and food bank use is at an all-time high. This is a reality of today. Alberta is facing its greatest challenge as a province in over 30 years.

What has this government done to help return the Alberta advantage? They have raised taxes, driving investment away, crippling businesses; they have moved to expand and then completely erased our province's debt ceiling; they have led us to have our credit downgraded by almost every major credit lender in the country; and now they are seeking to impose a carbon tax, a carbon tax that preys on the limited income that Albertan families are already struggling to get by on.

To date the NDP have not even been able to provide this House with a detailed economic impact study, a detailed study that would show us some of the impacts that are expected from this carbon tax. Yet again we see this government rushing ahead with ideological, untested legislation without any regard for the impact that it will have on Albertans today.

Rather than doing the responsible thing and waiting until our struggling economy has a chance to get back on its feet, the NDP have decided to kick Albertans while they are already down. This carbon tax targets the most vulnerable sectors of our economy, Madam Speaker, at a time when they are already barely scraping by. Families, charities, schools, hospitals will all struggle to offset the costs of this carbon tax.

Let's say, for the sake of argument, that I accept the NDP's math. They are estimating that the direct cost, the gasoline and heating costs, of this carbon tax for a family with two adults and two children is approximately $388 per year. The government will send those who qualify for the rebate a cheque for $366, which will mean they will be subsidizing some of the indirect costs of the carbon tax by $22.

But does this government really believe that in a full year of buying groceries, clothing their children, having them bused to school, paying municipal taxes, paying for after school activities – the list goes on and on, Madam Speaker – the average Albertan family will only spend an extra $22 because of this carbon tax? That is ludicrous and naive. This carbon tax will raise the cost of almost every single good and service made and sold in Alberta. Those costs will be downloaded onto Alberta consumers, that are already having to stretch their budgets to compensate for the lagging economy and limited employment opportunities.

Our caucus has done its own math, and the government's estimations are incredibly low. We estimate that the carbon tax, once implemented, will cost the average Albertan family an extra thousand dollars per year. It won't be the large chain stores and producers that pay the price for this carbon tax. It will be the people, the consumers, that will be paying this tax.

It will be people like Brenda from my constituency that will be paying this carbon tax. Brenda has three little boys that love to play hockey. Like many Albertans, Brenda spends several evenings a week in the car shuttling her kids to and from extracurricular activities. This carbon tax will now mean that the cost of these evenings in the car, driving, will increase substantially. It will mean that the cost of enrolling her kids in hockey will go up to compensate for the arena having to raise its ice rental prices to offset the cost of its heat and power bills and the money it will now take to run the Zamboni to clear the ice. It will mean that the snacks and the Gatorade that she buys her boys in between games to keep them fuelled will be more expensive, and that means Brenda may not have the money to be able to enrol all three boys in hockey next year. This is one of the countless examples of the real-world implications of Bill 20.

Charities are another sector that will suffer as a result of the carbon tax. Charitable organizations play a critical role in our society, Madam Speaker. They support the basic needs of our most vulnerable and are currently swamped trying to attend to the needs of the thousands of Albertans that have lost their jobs in the last year and need some extra help.

These essential services will now face even tighter budgets as they are not exempt from this aggressive tax. Facilities that provide housing for those looking to find a warm bed off the streets will now be paying more to heat their buildings. Charities that engage in community outreach will pay more to run their vehicles to deliver much-needed food and supplies to those that aren't able to be mobile. Facilities that provide meals will now spend more on groceries as the cost of delivery trucks increases and has to be offset by consumers on top of the fact that people who were previously in a position of having disposable income to donate to these charitable organizations will now have much less disposable income to donate or perhaps will not be able to donate at all. How can this government justify increasing the costs to charities when our province needs them now more than ever before?

This is an incredibly long piece of legislation, Madam Speaker, and given the immense impact it will have on all Albertans, I strongly encourage my fellow members of this Assembly to send this bill to committee for further review and debate. What we do know about the implications of this bill is already very concerning, and no substantial economic impact study has been done. I have serious reservations about debating this bill further without adequate time being granted to thoroughly comb through the intricacies of its 100 pages.

I think that in being given time to properly reach out to my school boards, businesses, the constituents in my riding, they could provide some essential insight into the needs of the people who will be living with the repercussions of this legislation. Consultation and outreach are critical components of our democratic system, and while I can respect that the minister has engaged in some consultations, I would request the right to do the same with the citizens of my riding to garner more feedback on the intricacies of this critical bill.

Madam Speaker, I appreciate that this government would like to have Alberta be a leader in the fight against climate change, and there are absolutely opportunities for us to be more environmentally conscious and make changes that will lead to a better, greener future for our children. No one is denying that. I do, however, feel that given the circumstances that we find ourselves in, with our economy in such a delicate state, now is not the time to be leading the charge when we are doing so alone and at the expense of our Alberta families.

Everything from driving kids to hockey practice to buying groceries to building a home will become more expensive as transportation costs are downloaded onto Alberta consumers. In the end, the carbon tax leaves less money in the pockets of families, schools, hospitals, and charities. It means fewer nurses, bus routes, extracurriculars offered in school, and opportunities for enrichment. It means that families already worried by the current economic climate and how they are going to pay their bills will now be spending more sleepless nights sitting at their kitchen table and wondering how they are going to stretch their funds even further.

I am hearing from constituents that feel like they cannot take much more, Madam Speaker. Albertans are the most hard-working, resilient people that I have ever met, but as of right now many of them are discouraged and disillusioned. Let's take the proper time to do our due diligence on this legislation and ensure that it is truly in the best interests of Albertans. After the struggles that they have faced in the last year, we owe them that at least.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. minister of environment under 29(2)(a).

Ms Phillips: Certainly, Madam Speaker. I'm curious about a number of things. We've heard this afternoon, this evening that this legislation will, quote, kick Albertans when they're down, close hospitals, that it's an ideological agenda, that it will put seniors in the streets, I believe. I guess my question is whether Alberta's largest employers are being accused by the Official Opposition of putting seniors in the streets, having an ideological agenda leading to more unemployment, and so on. These are companies, certainly oil sands operators and others, that form the backbone of our economy.

Certainly, the downturn in the price of oil has been something that has affected them very much, yet many of them have supported the climate leadership plan. We have Cenovus, Suncor, Total, Statoil, CNRL, Shell, and many others. Are they being accused of having an ideological agenda by the Official Opposition? In fact, they are the largest employers in the Leader of the Official Opposition's riding. Is the Official Opposition actually picking a fight with these corporate leaders and with these job creators in Alberta? I suppose that's my first question.

My second question, Madam Speaker, is: are the authors of the climate leadership plan similarly being accused of proposing policies that will lead to more unemployment, having an ideological agenda, putting seniors in the street, closing hospitals? Of course, the Albertans behind the climate leadership plan – the author, of course, is the distinguished economist Dr. Andrew Leach. Is he being accused of having an ideological agenda, of preying on people with a limited income, of kicking Albertans when they're down? Or perhaps Gord Lambert, who also served on the panel, a former VP of TransAlta and of Suncor? Or a current VP of Enbridge, Linda Coady? Is she being accused of this kind of activity? I guess I have those questions.

In addition, I do have questions around consultations. The hon. member and others have asked: where were the consultations? I'm just wondering if the hon. members could maybe remind us of what they did in their ridings around July, when we released the discussion paper, which, in fact, discussed different ways to price carbon and so on. It was a very thoughtful, very lengthy document. I'm interested in the hon. member's reactions to that document at the time when, of course, he read it.

I am interested also in the lengthy submissions that the Official Opposition made to the climate leadership plan when they had the opportunity to do so because I did not find any, and I read them all. I'm interested in that, Madam Speaker.

I'm interested in whether they at all, you know, took that discussion document to their ridings and held any kind of events. Certainly, we held events, which a thousand Albertans attended. I'm curious as to whether any of the Wildrose opposition reviewed the commentary on those public consultations. I am equally interested in their analysis of the 500 public submissions, including from every aspect of Alberta's industrial endeavour – cement, mining, fertilizer, and so on – and what they think of all of those submissions, which, in fact, supported most of the elements of the climate leadership plan. I am very interested in that.

I am equally interested, Madam Speaker, in consultations, how much they thought about, you know, speaking to all of the groups that participated in the technical engagement sessions – petrochemical companies, cement companies, oil sands companies, small oil and gas, fertilizer companies, innovation and technology companies, new renewable energy companies – how much they participated in those conversations with all of those groups that engaged thoughtfully and in an evidence-based way with this government on the development of the climate leadership plan. I'm interested in their thoughts.

Finally, I'm interested in the Official Opposition's thoughts on what it means to be middle-of-the-road in the acceptance of or one's understanding of the science of climate change, Madam Speaker. I'm very interested in the hon. members' views on the scientific consensus regarding climate change. There seems to be a bit of a nonconsensus happening here. Perhaps the right is not so united after all. Perhaps this is not an item in which 90 per cent agreement prevails over on that side of the House, because we do have a Progressive Conservative caucus that mostly accepts the science of climate change, but we seem to have rather a patchwork of views prevailing, so I'm interested.

The Deputy Speaker: You won't have an opportunity to respond as 29(2)(a) is done.

Do I have any other speakers to the bill?

Mr. Cooper: Well, Madam Speaker, if there's one thing I'm not going to win tonight it is the words per minute count because we have seen a couple of speakers from that side of the House who have certainly upped the words-per-minute ratio of debate, anyway. I'm not sure if the level of debate has been increased, but the number of words that have been used in a short period of time certainly have been. I had hoped that the government would have additional speakers this evening as we could learn more about this great plan that they have for the province. Unfortunately, there was no one around.

Anyway, I'm happy to rise and speak on a number of issues with respect to the bill. In fact, I'm just doing some math with some of the costs. [interjections] Well, you might think it's funny. I was speaking to a business owner in the outstanding constituency of Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills yesterday after this bill was introduced. We were speaking about the cost to this particular individual's business, and certainly he expressed some significant concern.

This particular individual is a small-business owner. He runs a transportation company. I think that the legislation defines his company as an interjurisdictional carrier. He contracts with a number of owner-operators, Madam Speaker, and then he also employs three additional drivers. All total, their small company runs sometimes seven trucks a year, sometimes six trucks a year, depending on what the economy is doing, and they have a number of significant clients in the constituency. They also have a number of smaller clients but predominantly just a couple of larger clients.

I sent him some information after the bill was released specifically around interjurisdictional carriers as well as the cost of the carbon tax to his organization, and he informed me that last year, Madam Speaker, his small trucking company utilized close to 600,000 litres of diesel fuel. This carbon tax is going to cost him almost $70,000 a year. I can tell you that $70,000 a year in a small trucking company makes a big, big, big difference.

I heard the hon. Finance minister yesterday say – and I'm paraphrasing here – with all due respect to the Finance minister: don't worry; businesses will essentially absorb most of the costs. Maybe I took some liberties with some of his comments. But I can tell you that a small business of just six trucks and the owner-operator can't just absorb close to $70,000 a year, so the business has some decisions to make. Do they employ fewer people? Do they pass the costs on to the consumer? What is the path forward?

I can tell you that he is struggling with what the future holds with respect to the carbon tax because the challenge with this carbon tax is that there is a real, significant pressure on many areas of the costs that get passed down to the end-user, and the end-user, Madam Speaker, is families. It's moms and dads. It's grandmas and grandpas all across the province. When we look at just this one business that has near $70,000 a year of additional costs that have to be passed on to somebody, that's going to make all of the goods that he ships more expensive. A lot of those goods are things that you and I and other members of this Chamber use. Not only is there the tax while he moves it. He's not the only individual who transports that particular good. There is additional cost from the wholesaler to him and then on to the retailer, and at every stage the cost of the good is increased.

While I've heard the hon. minister of the environment, who's responsible for climate change, or however that goes, say that the indirect costs are only $70 per year, nothing could be further from the truth because at every turn the costs of things are increasing. We heard the hon. Member for Barrhead-Morinville-Westlock speak about the costs to municipalities in terms of firing the ice plant that cools the slab at the arena. That makes hockey more expensive.

I spoke not that long ago in this place about charities in the outstanding constituency of Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills in the form of the Rocky View handibus. The Rocky View handibus: the costs are likely to increase in the neighbourhood of $6,000 to $8,000 a year, and all of those costs are absorbed by those individuals who utilize that service. The individuals who utilize that service are predominantly seniors, individuals from the PDD community, low-income individuals, and others who don't have their own form of transportation. So the cost of that service is going to be increased, and while I appreciate the fact that members on the other side have said, "Don't worry; the rebate is going to cover all those costs," at every single turn, Madam Speaker, the costs are increasing. It is putting a significant amount of pressure onto Albertans and particularly on Albertans that live in rural areas that don't have some of the benefits of access to public transportation, that wind up driving extensively around rural Alberta just to provide for their family.

I think of someone like yourself, Madam Speaker, who lives in the north, and in fact in this very Chamber you spoke about the additional costs that are associated with living in the north and travelling around the north. Thinking nothing of driving three or four hours to go to a music concert was, I think, the example that you used. All of those things are now more expensive to the people of the Peace Country because of this carbon tax.

Now, make no mistake, Madam Speaker. It is important that we act on the environment. This file ought not just be pushed aside. This file ought not be abandoned with blinders on our eyes. The environment is of critical importance and should be of critical importance to all Albertans. I can tell you that the people that live in the outstanding constituency of Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills care deeply about the environment, but one thing I can assure you is that those good folks in Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills are convinced that this carbon tax, the results of this legislation, is not the way forward. I have heard already – and the bill was only introduced yesterday – from many of the people in that constituency about their concerns.

I should just pause momentarily to express one of my concerns. Yesterday in this Chamber Bill 20, the Climate Leadership Implementation Act, was introduced. Madam Speaker, it is 95 pages long, comes with a royal recommendation, and as a result is a money bill that takes a significant amount of time to digest, and what does this government do? It introduces a bill one day and requires individuals in this Chamber to debate it the next.

Mrs. Littlewood: It's your job.

Mr. Cooper: You know what our job is? To cause careful consideration of legislation. I'm reminded on numerous occasions of when the Minister of Economic Development and Trade would rise in this House and express significant displeasure with the then PC government about introducing a bill one day and expecting what he often referred to as a small but mighty caucus to debate that legislation the very next day. What we all should be doing is reaching out to Albertans to thoughtfully consider this piece of legislation, and to expect reasonable debate the following day is not what creates good governance in this province. What creates good governance, Madam Speaker, is thorough review of legislation, not passing it in days but thorough review, which is why I'm pleased to propose an amendment that would allow for that thorough review.

10:00

Shall I continue, or would you like me to wait until the table has the documents?

Madam Speaker, I move that the motion for second reading of Bill 20, Climate Leadership Implementation Act, be amended by deleting all the words after "that" and substituting the following:

Bill 20, Climate Leadership Implementation Act, be not now read a second time but that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Resource Stewardship in accordance with Standing Order 74.2 and that the committee report back to the Assembly no later than October 31, 2016, if the Assembly is then sitting or, if it is not then sitting, within 15 days after the commencement of the next sitting.

Madam Speaker, we have seen a troubling trend from a government that wants to push through legislation. While I appreciate that the minister of environment spoke specifically about the consultations that the government has done, what hasn't taken place is an opportunity for members or individuals like Dr. Leach to come to a committee of all members of the Assembly. It's not just the government that's important to this province. It is the Assembly that's important.

The Deputy Speaker: Any hon. members wishing to speak to the amendment?

Mr. Smith: Under 29(2)(a)?

The Deputy Speaker: Oh, 29(2)(a) does apply, so go ahead, hon. member.

Mr. Smith: You know, I think that the hon. member that was just speaking was just starting to wind up, and I was quite interested in what he had to say, so I wonder if he could continue to let us understand why this amendment is an important piece of legislation to discuss.

Thank you.

Mr. Cooper: Thank you to my hon. colleague. I wasn't just winding up. I was just winding down, actually, and concluding my comments around why this is important. It is critically important.

One of the things that a committee would allow us to do is to provide a thorough review of the legislation. It would allow a venue for the government to table the vast amounts of economic research that they have done, the economic impact studies that they've done, and that committee could fulsomely debate those studies, that they, I'm sure, would be happy to bring to the committee and have a discussion around. It would allow the committee the opportunity to receive from government officials, from experts in the field the information around the indirect costs that the government now refers to, and it would allow the committee to have a much better grasp of the true costs. The government could come and defend their numbers, and expert witnesses could come and provide testimony on all sides of this. We could have a full and robust discussion.

I remember when the Premier first started speaking about this carbon tax as a carbon tax that would be revenue neutral. Now we understand that nothing could be further from the truth, but that's where they began. It would be a good opportunity for the committee to have a discussion around the merits of a revenue-neutral carbon tax.

Because the conversation has taken place from individuals to the government, it doesn't mean that the conversation has taken place from either individuals or experts to the entire Assembly. This amendment is just as much about respecting all members of the Assembly as it is about the government getting information from individuals. I know that the government believes it's not possible for them to be wrong. I think that an amendment like this is a great opportunity for them to bring the results of that conversation to that committee and have a discussion around those. An amendment like this can provide a vehicle for the best possible solution for all Albertans because so rarely in this Chamber does the best idea actually win. Almost exclusively in this Chamber the government's ideas win.

At committee we have seen a significantly higher level of co-operation, a real opportunity for all members of the Assembly to hear from individuals and provide the information first-hand so that all members of the Assembly can make the best possible decision. The vast majority of decisions that we make here in this Chamber are not just about today but are also about tomorrow. I recognize that the government's desire here in Bill 20 is a decision about tomorrow.

Now, there is a wide variety of opinions on whether it's the best way to get to that decision.

The Deputy Speaker: On the amendment the hon. Member for Calgary-South East.

Ms Luff: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm happy to rise this evening and speak to this amendment. Now, I think it will not surprise this House that I'll be speaking against this motion at this time. The Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills knows that I enjoy committees nearly as much as he does. I think we get a lot of productive work done there.

However, to say that this is a bill that requires more time and more consideration at this juncture, I think, is perhaps inappropriate. The minister outlined earlier some of the engagement and consultation that have happened already with regard to this bill. The climate leadership report to the minister was released last November, and folks in the House have had plenty of time to look at it, to see what was in it, to think about it. Much of what is going on in this bill is actually in the budget, which has been out for two months now, and folks have had time to look at it, to go over it, and to see what it involves.

You know, just for the sake of reiteration, the public engagement and consultation that happened on this bill and on this plan were open to all members of the public, and the members of the Official Opposition were certainly welcome to participate. If you look at it, the climate change panel had over 25,000 responses collected on an online survey. In addition, we had public open houses, which nearly a thousand people attended. It received 535 online submissions. The panel held additional sessions, with 350 different stakeholders representing diverse perspectives. There was aboriginal engagement, with 47 participants representing 30 aboriginal communities and organizations. There was a lot of consultation that went into this and a lot of thought and a lot of time.

Quite frankly, to say that more discussion is going to lead to a better case at this point is unnecessary. I have been waiting for this bill and I have been waiting for this legislation my whole life. This is something that we need; it's something that we need for our children.

An Hon. Member: That's unfortunate. Why didn't you run on it in your election platform, then?

Ms Luff: Well, you know, if we're talking about that, I believe what we said in the election platform was that we will take leadership on the issue of climate change and make sure that Alberta is part of crafting solutions with stakeholders, other provinces, and the federal government, and that's exactly what we're doing.

I would like to just say that I don't think that this is an amendment that is necessary at this time. There will be plenty of time for the Official Opposition to speak to this bill. We are only in second reading. We still have Committee of the Whole; we still have third reading. There will be plenty of time to read in full the 95 pages of the document although since you've been asking us questions about it since last November, I feel like you're all probably pretty familiar with the subject matter by now.

I'd just like to say that I don't want to wait any longer. My kids don't want to wait any longer. Most Albertans don't want to wait any longer. I'm sorry, but I'm going to have to not support this amendment at this time.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Well, this is another example of the government ramming legislation through as fast as it possibly can. You know, I truly believe that this government finished this bill on Friday and released it yesterday. The fact is that it was still working on consultation, that it says was out there being done by the thousands of hours, but in the end it was all in its budget. That's unbelievable. I really believe that this government is putting forward legislation at the last minute, hoping that we suck it back and don't complain about it or actually try to make it better.

Let's go back to this. The member brought up the wonderful budget and talked about how it was all explained there, so let's take a step back and actually address the fact that in the budget it is under taxes. It is not under levies; it is under taxes. This is clearly a tax, and if you look on page 22, for those that actually want to see it for themselves, instead of being very clear exactly what Bill 20 is going to be – the fact is that they don't even know. They didn't know then. How could we speculate on what Bill 20 was going to be until yesterday, which is when we got it, the whole 95 pages, speed-read it, and be able to come up with a wonderful solution that says: gee, we need to just trust the government because Bill 6 worked out so well for it.

You know, taxes have a horrible habit of being easy to impose and very difficult to remove. The fact is that if this doesn't work out and doesn't go in the direction that the government is hoping – and we've got examples across the world where the wonderful expectations don't meet what the actual results are.

We've got a government right now that's saying: "Well, we're going to give a little bit to these people, and we're going to give a little bit of money to these people, but we're going to take more, so in the end we're going to come out ahead. You know what? Why bother studying it? Why bother moving this forward? Why bother actually talking with actual Albertans? We'll talk to a few of our friends and actually do no real consultation." That is exactly what we are seeing here. We put out a couple of online things, and suddenly we say: "Hey, you know what? We've gone to Albertans. We've gone and consulted with everybody." But that just isn't the truth in all of this. What we need to be looking at is: how do we move forward? How can we make this bill better?

The fact is that we're rushing through it too fast, and it's $3 billion worth of income. You have demonstrated in the past that you have a record of ramming things through. Why can't you learn from that and take your time? The fact is that we need to go and actually study something this large. We need to bring it to a committee. We need to actually study what the effects are, actually do some real consultation, which, by the way, I don't actually believe that you have completed in its fullest amount. We need to be able to show Albertans that we actually are doing good for Alberta and not harm.

I will wrap this up just by saying that this is a responsible amendment. It is saying: you've waited your whole life, apparently, for this one bill; what are a few more months just so that we can go out to Albertans? I know that it's earth-shattering, that we can't wait a few more months for this just to make sure that we get it right, but – you know what? – in the end Albertans are expecting us to get it right, and I don't believe we're doing it right now.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, Member.

Anyone wishing to speak on 29(2)(a)? Okay. The hon. member.

Mr. Malkinson: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I just have a quick question for the member. He was talking a lot about an apparent lack of consultation. Maybe it was just because I happened to be sitting beside the Member for Calgary-East, who, just before you spoke, actually outlined what, to me, seemed like an extensive consultation with aboriginal groups and getting input from Albertans and from industry. To me, that sounded a lot like consultation that was brought together for that report. I was wondering. If that is apparently not consultation with all Albertans from all industry sectors, then perhaps he could explain what consultation would then look like.

The Acting Speaker: The Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Consultation actually doesn't look like Bill 6 – that is a fact – and that is exactly where you're going with this bill. You need to make sure that when you bring a bill forward, you do the proper consultation. The fact is that when we don't actually have the bill in front of us, how can we consult with the people that it's going to affect?

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Dr. Turner: Thank you. Under 29(2)(a). This is the 10-year anniversary of An Inconvenient Truth, which won Senator Gore a Nobel prize and is, I think, a landmark. I'm bringing this up because I sense a lack of urgency on the part of the opposition. They don't seem to understand that there is a crisis coming.

Just today in Scientific American they published sort of a memorial of these 10 years since An Inconvenient Truth's presentation. They actually are talking about the crisis that's going to happen by 2100 if we don't bend the curve on the emission of CO<sub>2</sub>. At the present time the United States has about 404 parts per million of CO<sub>2</sub> in the air, and that will actually cause an environmental catastrophe by the year 2100 if we don't get it under control. It's also interesting that the United States has recognized this along with China, India, and all of the industrialized countries in the world, who have signed on to a protocol to make sure that we're limiting this.

Alberta is leading Canada's response to this environmental crisis, and I would ask the member who just spoke what the plan would be from his party to make sure that this environmental crisis is averted. We have to be doing something.

We are going to reduce the amount of particulate damage coming from coal plants. This is going to have a remarkable effect on the health of Albertans. It's actually going to save, it's estimated, $200 million in health care costs in this province, and this will improve the health and the quality of life of all Albertans. It's going to improve the quality of life in my riding of Edmonton-Whitemud. We live under the plume of a coal-fired electricity plant in this city. My colleagues to the south of me have the same problem.

I'm actually, like my colleague from Calgary-East, very proud to have campaigned on a climate change platform, and I'm very proud to be part of a government that is doing it. I would ask the member opposite what his plan would be to bend that CO<sub>2</sub> emission curve.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to speak under 29(2)(a)? The Member for Calgary-Lougheed.

Mr. Rodney: No. Sorry. Not under (29)(2)(a). To the referral. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Okay. Thank you.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to the amendment?

Mr. Rodney: I'd like to speak.

The Acting Speaker: To the amendment?

Mr. Rodney: Yes. I'd like to have a short speech on the amendment.

The Acting Speaker: Please go ahead, Member for Calgary-Lougheed.

Mr. Rodney: Thank you.

Having gotten limited briefing on this, we are still working on what the ultimate outcomes could be with respect to this. However, there is no question that there are a number of very, very important issues at play here that are very, very important to Albertans. What is most important to Albertans, of course, is transparently ensuring the best maximization of our resources to the best interests of all Albertans and ensuring that we develop this resource effectively. Therefore, we need to know that there is more opportunity.

As a result, I'll be making a motion that . . . the subject matter of the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Resource Stewardship in accordance with Standing Order 74.2. If these comments sound at all confusing, let me just say that they are from Hansard, November 19, 2013, pages 2920 to 2921, by the current Premier.

Another quotation. I think it's very important that all members hear this.

I think that we should refer it to the standing committee, and I further think that it would be great if this bill could be subject to public input. Now, we haven't really mastered that in this Legislature since I've been here. Edmonton city council, if I can refer to another order of government, and, I know, other city and town councils make better use of their committees in terms of canvassing public opinion and allowing the public to speak and have input on decisions that are important to them . . .

Mr. Speaker, that's really the gist of my comments, my reasons for wanting to have this matter referred to the committee.

Who said that? The current House leader. That's from Hansard, November 19, 2013.

From May 8, 2013:

I do believe that it represents a good conciliatory opportunity for us to address in a more fulsome way a number of the very significant policy elements that appear in this legislation, and it gives us an opportunity to understand their consequences and to ensure that we don't go bowling forward simply because the Premier wants to have some deliverable that she can talk about on a campaign trail this summer.

You guessed it. That is from the current Premier.

I certainly concur with my colleague . . .

Again, it's this question of conferring with stakeholders that I would like to go back to.

From the current Minister of Education.

Great. Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and speak in favour of this motion for referral. I'll get into some specifics.

I think, you know, part of the issue and why this motion is very, very appropriate is because our democratic process is really contingent upon ensuring that voices are represented, that opinions are expressed, and that we debate and look at all different sides of an issue . . .

You know, I'd like to remind the Assembly that this bill is no small bill. There are quite a number of changes being proposed. This was only given to the opposition 24 hours ago or in that area, so it's challenging. All members, I believe, of the Legislative Assembly, both on the government side and the opposition side, want to ensure that they're doing their job to the best of their abilities and have the resources and tools available at their disposal to ensure that they can work to the best of their abilities and serve Albertans in the capacity that we were all put here to do.

It's very challenging to first of all go through a piece of hefty legislation in a very short period of time and to do it justice . . .

We need to ensure . . . that we give opposition parties and all MLAs an adequate amount of time to engage with Albertans to get their feedback and their ideas and their comments on legislation before it passes.

The current minister of economic development.

This is a motion to refer Bill 9 to the Standing Committee . . . [It's] very appropriate because this is, in fact, a question of hundreds of thousands of Albertans' economic future. It's important for them and their families and for their own piece of mind, but it's also a significant impact on the economy.

Hansard, April 23, 2014, the current Government House Leader.

You may be disappointed, but this is the last one. It's quite a doozy.

The purpose of this amendment, of course, is to begin by allowing for that actual consultation and negotiation and consideration of this issue that Albertans need to have. I know that a select group there in cabinet have convinced themselves that this is all okely-dokely . . .

That's what it says here. That is right here from Hansard, April 23, 2014. It goes on to state:

The fact of the matter is that most of the people who are impacted by this piece of legislation have not had an opportunity to really fully consider the implications of the changes, nor have they been given the opportunity to really fully communicate to this government, which is accountable to them by way of that trite, old, little institution we call democracy, to listen to what they have to say about this.

Because this has such an incredibly far-reaching set of consequences to the lives of so many Albertans, I would suggest that this not be a bill that we ram through . . . as this government is scrambling to get out of the Legislature so they can run off and slap a whole bunch of ineffective bandages over their broken political vehicle.

That indeed is a direct quotation from the current Premier.

With great respect I have two honest, humble questions. Number one: is it more important to rush this through using a majority, or is it more important to get it right? And the second question, simply: will the government members listen to the words of their own Premier and ministers and take your own advice to utilize the committee? Committees were created for experiences and situations exactly like this. We've learned a lot of things on this side of the House, sometimes the hard way. Just a couple of friendly suggestions.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Anyone wishing to speak to 29(2)(a)? The Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I appreciate that little trip down memory lane that the hon. member took us through. You know, what's interesting, though, is that we need to contextualize some of the comments. Sure, there were bills that the previous government did try to ram through. I would hardly call second reading ramming a bill through when the government has not invoked closure. We have not rushed this through. We have all the hours in the world. In fact, our government is quite prepared to sit in this Chamber until the Calgary Stampede if need be if that would satisfy the opposition.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

I do, though, also find it a little rich coming from the third party, Madam Speaker, as far as talking about rushing bills through. I recall as a member of the fourth party, when there would be six or seven or maybe more pieces of legislation on the Order Paper, being given very short notice, where as a very small party there were challenges to working through a bill. We are and will be providing ample time for debate.

I do want to come back to a comment from some other members that spoke to this amendment as far as referring it to committee. First of all, in my time in this House in three years as opposition I don't recall . . .

Mr. Rodney: Madam Speaker, that's not on 29(2)(a). He's referring to other . . .

Mr. Bilous: I'm speaking to his comments. Under 29(2)(a) I can make comments about his speech, or I could ask a question. I may be coming to a question, but at the moment I'm addressing comments that were made by the hon. member.

Quite frankly, Madam Speaker, you know, our climate leadership plan was announced last fall. A number of months have passed. There have been hundreds of submissions to the minister of environment where Albertans, stakeholders, community groups, and, in fact, even opposition MLAs have had the opportunity to provide feedback. There have been technical engagements, and there have been public consultations.

To the member's comments as far as motions that our caucus put forward in the past: quite frankly, it was around a failure to adequately consult the public on a bill which was then being pushed through the Legislature at breakneck speeds. I would argue that we are hardly doing that. We are happy to take the time in this Assembly and debate this bill to the fullest, as long as opposition parties choose. Again, we have consulted. There are a number of groups that have weighed in on our climate leadership plan. This is now the product of many, many months of work and consultation.

My question to the member is that if six months is not long enough for consultation and talking to the public to get feedback from Albertans, then I'd like to know: what is the magic number?

Mr. Rodney: Thanks for the question. There is no magic number, of course.

Let's face it. You said that they had six months. This was received on these tables yesterday. So that's a nonstarter, sir. It's nice that you're happy to be here till the Calgary Stampede. A lot of people think that part of our job is to be here, and that indeed is true. It's also to be in our constituencies as well, talking to people about bills such as this.

Now, we could debate this all day, all night, until the Calgary Stampede. That still would not allow Albertans the opportunity to give all of us the feedback that every one of us needs to have a truly informed conscience.

Mrs. Littlewood: What's the magic number?

Mr. Rodney: I said that there was no magic number, Member, and I'll be happy to address the chair.

The magic number that a lot of people are talking about, though, is $6 billion. That's been an estimated cost by the admission of this government itself. That was a $6 billion question that was not even asked during the election. Albertans have been telling me that that is completely unfair, and then the language gets a little bit personal. I don't like to go there, but it happens every day when people say to me that this is really just a wealth transfer, that it's not about the climate and it's not about helping the environment at all.

This is their concern. If you think they're wrong, take the time to talk to them. Take the time to allow them to come to committee to present as organizations and individuals, not just invited guests but all Albertans so that everyone can have a say on a $6 billion . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Any other speakers to the amendment?

Mr. Bilous: You know what, Madam Speaker, as much as I'm enjoying this debate – and I am enjoying this debate this evening – I think we've made very good progress, so I would move that we adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. Seeing the time and, again, the progress that we've made, I would move that we adjourn until 9 a.m. tomorrow.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 10:35 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

9 a.m.

Thursday, May 26, 2016

[Ms Sweet in the chair]

Prayers

The Acting Speaker: Good morning.

Let us reflect. As we conclude this week our work in this Assembly and head back to our constituencies, let us remind ourselves of our responsibilities to the people and the community we represent. Let's continue to focus on bettering our province through hard work, understanding, dedication, and commitment.

Please be seated.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Ms Sweet in the chair]

The Deputy Chair: I would like to call the committee to order.

Bill 18

An Act to Ensure Independent Environmental Monitoring

The Deputy Chair: Are there any comments, questions, or amendments to be offered in respect to this bill? The Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Madam Chair. We believe that Albertans deserve a system of monitoring that not only provides world-class environmental monitoring but protects the independence and integrity of those involved. Ensuring this is a priority of the Wildrose Party, and to that end there are aspects of this bill that deserve some questions being raised. Of concern would be the autonomy of these members and the chief scientist. While the chief scientist has the autonomy to speak out in a public fashion, it is always a concern that true independence while within a ministry be actually achieved.

AEMERA was not, despite the Boothe report, a three-year failed experiment. Numerous scientists throughout Canada gave their opinion on this, stating that that was not the case. AEMERA had only received the transfer of assets in May 2015, and this review began approximately three months later, hardly giving it time to really get established. Could AEMERA's mandate have been better clarified? Yes, it could have been. Could they have taken steps to alleviate some of the friction between AEMERA, Alberta Environment and Parks as well as Environment Canada? Yes. We could have had clarification that would have fixed some of the turf wars between agencies. We could have had better monitoring coordination between Environment Canada and AEMERA. The Boothe report found that there was a distinct lack of collaboration between AEMERA and Environment Canada, but that could have been fixed and still can be.

Now, AEMERA was initiated as an arm's-length organization for the government to rebuff accusations that the data that was being collected and the direction on environmental monitoring were somehow being influenced by politics. Justifiably, concerns with this government and the opportunity to taint the process with politics is just as much a concern as it was before. Consolidating power in the government's hands could be troubling, especially given some of the more radical views of this government's caucus and staff. It's more important than ever that we ensure that these scientists are given free rein to operate independently. It is essential that we ensure the credibility and reputation of our environmental monitoring.

Many of the high costs that were brought up in the Boothe report were due to sole-sourced Alberta Environment and Parks contracts that took place even before the formation of AEMERA. Could that be fixed? Of course it could.

We need to also take note that given this government's record on consultation, transparency, and openness we definitely have some concerns with having this brought into government.

Now, Wildrose has been trying, as always, to come up with common-sense solutions to make a better Alberta. We're taking a pragmatic approach. AEMERA can be better. Really, the question is how? Is it in government? Is that the best place to make AEMERA better? Maybe with proper control and consulting. Now, if this would have gone to committee, then people like Boothe and some of the other scientists could come and present, and the members in committee could have listened to many different views on how to make environmental monitoring better in Alberta.

Having a more independent view of this and having the government take control of this and having it being viewed as unaltered or uncontrolled by government seems especially unlikely after hearing the Deputy Premier get up yesterday and say that they had to shop across Canada to find people with NDP world views. I think that's alarming, to think that they couldn't have found Albertans with their same views. So I guess that says something about this NDP government. I guess it's apparent that there are not too many Albertans with their world views, which just shows how out of touch the NDP is with Albertans.

Right from the start we've said that if it's broken, it needs to be fixed. It's critically important to have credible, transparent, world-class monitoring with integrity. The world needs to be able to look at it and say: it's good. There's no room for ideology. There's no room for a turf war, protecting the past. That's why right from the start our minds were open to whatever is best. In fact, that's our default position all the time: be open minded to listen to the ideas of others, listen to our constituents, give our constituents the information we have and have them make informed decisions.

Now, we know that there were issues with the PCs stacking agencies with cronies, and we thought that this was worth hearing out in Committee of the Whole. We've decided that internal reforms are better than disbanding, so I will be voting against Bill 18 in Committee of the Whole.

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

The Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. You know, as per my comments in second reading I have some concerns about the independence of AEMERA as it's brought into a ministry department. Again, the irony, given the title of the bill. You know, one of the things that I'm most concerned about is that despite assurances that the independence of those would be upheld, the legislation doesn't really address this. There is still an awful lot of power in the minister's hands, and there don't seem to be appropriate checks and balances to ensure independence and transparency, especially around the hiring and appointment of the chief scientist.

The minister has said that she will follow a robust hiring process. In fact, she and I had a brief conversation in the hallway yesterday about that. Frankly, I don't have any particular concerns that this minister necessarily would do anything other than that, but I do think that it's important to future-proof this bill. Future ministers may not take such an approach. The legislation simply says that the minister has the power to appoint positions, and that includes the chief scientist.

With that, I would like to propose an amendment to Bill 18 if I may. I have the requisite number of copies. I'll wait till the table gets its copy, and then I will read it out.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, Member.

Hon. member, please proceed. This amendment will be referred to as A1.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I move that Bill 18, An Act to Ensure Independent Environmental Monitoring, be amended in section 2(2) in the proposed section 15.1 as follows:

(a) by adding the following after subsection (1):

(1.1) For subsequent vacancies in the position of Chief Scientist, the Minister shall appoint a person from a list of qualified candidates provided by the panel established under subsection (3).

(b) by adding the following after subsection (2):

(3) The Minister shall establish an independent appointment advisory panel to provide a list of qualified candidates to the Minister for subsequent appointments to the position of Chief Scientist and such panel shall consist of not fewer than 5 members with at least one representative from each of the following:

- (a) industry associations,
- (b) indigenous communities,
- (c) academia,
- (d) environmental organizations,
- (e) regulatory experts.

The rationale here is that although the minister would be asked to appoint such a panel, it adds one more layer of transparency. It adds a layer of rigour around the appointment of the chief scientist, and it provides transparency for Albertans around that process. Further, the panel would be asked to provide a list of candidates to the minister to avoid simply selecting a single person, so the minister may have some choice in terms of who would be selected as chief scientist.

Again, if this agency is going to be brought under the umbrella of the minister, I do think it's very important for a function such as this to have proper transparency, not just in fact but in perception, for Albertans. I think that by creating a panel of experts to choose the chief scientist – it would obviously be an ad hoc panel, struck as necessary. The position of chief scientist, we hope, would not be something that would turn over on a regular basis, which would therefore keep the cost of such a panel reasonable. I think it would add very much to the transparency and, therefore, the faith that Albertans and the world have in the quality of the work done by the agency, which would now be run internally by the minister, and greatly reduces, if not eliminates, the likelihood of political interference or the perception of the same.

With that, Madam Chair, I look forward very much to the debate. I would hope all members of the House would consider and support this amendment.

Thank you very much.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Is there anyone wishing to speak to amendment A1? The Minister of Environment and Parks.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Madam Chair. I appreciate the hon. member's intervention in this matter and his interest in ensuring that we have a good, solid environmental monitoring program in place in this province. Given that I know that he shares our government's view that high-quality environmental monitoring is an important part of public safety, public health, I'm also appreciative of the hon. member's, I guess, appreciation that the previous model was perhaps not the most efficient way to govern an environmental monitoring system.

You know, the role and responsibilities of the chief scientist are enshrined into law in this piece of legislation. The science advisory panel also has a number of different elements that ensure independence already, Madam Chair. The role of the chief scientist really is similar to the chief medical officer of Health, the chief provincial veterinarian, for example, the provincial apiculturist under section 2 of the Bee Act, the director of surveys under section 4 of the Surveys Act. These are all examples of where a professional expert recruited by the civil service in accordance with the merit-based recruitment process of the Alberta public service reports to the deputy minister for employee performance and is an appointment based on, in the first instance, merit and expertise. That is the appropriate role of the chief scientist, and it's the appropriate reporting function, to the deputy minister, in a merit-based civil service, which is, in fact, one of the underpinnings of a functioning democracy.

You know, the chief scientist also has the role of chief monitor, Madam Chair. As a result, the chief monitor is a position that not only ensures rigorous environmental reporting and monitoring but also ensures co-ordination with other government departments and so on. So that is the role of the chief scientist. It is someone who is very much within the Alberta public service, and we would not want other human resources processes interfering with what is already a highly professionalized public service. [interjection] I don't think that's a joke at all. I think it's not funny to deride the Alberta public service. We've had some wonderful examples in the last couple of weeks of the high level of professionalism exhibited by the Alberta public service, not the least of which are the folks in environmental monitoring who have worked day and night to ensure that it safe for the workers up in the Fort McMurray wildfire region. So to laugh at or to deride their professionalism is a very serious charge indeed, and it's certainly not one that the folks in this government caucus engage in at all.

Now, the other piece that's problematic about this amendment – so there are the HR pieces and the pieces on the proper functioning of the Alberta public service, Madam Chair, without interference from outside entities. I think that's really important. It's really something that I've taken very seriously as a minister and that I think all ministers take seriously and that I actually believe the previous government also took seriously. I have had very rare occasion to believe that anything other than the highest levels of professionalism under the previous government also prevailed with respect to the relationships with the public service.

However, this amendment also, in some ways, misunderstands the role of the science advisory panel. These are scientific experts in their fields. Some of them are here in Alberta, and some of them have had academic careers outside of Alberta. They are experts in monitoring. They are not experts in intergovernmental or interdepartmental, within government, co-ordination. The science advisory panel is not necessarily an expert in human resources matters, in reporting structures. [interjection] Is there something you'd like to share with the class?

Mr. Fildebrandt: I think she's giving up her speaking time, Madam Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Okay, Member.

Ms Phillips: I will go on, Madam Chair.

So the science advisory panel has that role – and that role is protected within the legislation – to speak to the public on matters related to science. However, we do not expect them to provide advice on matters related to recruitment and retention of highly qualified Alberta public service professions.

For that reason, I recognize, Madam Chair, the intent behind the amendment. I believe that the hon. member shares our intent for high-quality environmental monitoring and shares a level of seriousness about the environment and about orderly development in the oil sands, about the partnerships we have with industry, with indigenous peoples, with communities in the lower Athabasca. I know that the hon. Member for Calgary-Elbow also shares our government's view that we must refurbish and repair our environmental reputation, and a world-class monitoring system will help us to do that and to have those respectful and thoughtful conversations with our trading partners. I am aware that that is the intent of the hon. member, and I commend him for it. It is certainly not shared by all members of the House.

Madam Chair, while I recognize the merit of the amendment, I believe that we cannot support it at this time.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

The Member for Strathmore-Brooks.

Mr. Fildebrandt: Thank you, Madam Chair. I think that was a bit of a leap now, wasn't it?

Now, the Official Opposition began the debate on Bill 18 with an open mind. In fact, the Official Opposition voted for second reading of this bill in the hopes that we can improve the independence of environmental monitoring in this province. Unfortunately, we've been given no assurances whatsoever from the minister of environment and the government caucus that this is anything but an attempt to limit the independence of environmental monitoring in this province. This is an Orwellian-named bill, Madam Chair. We have serious concerns about the independence of environmental monitoring in this province. Now, there certainly were problems with AEMERA before, but the way to solve it isn't to make it even less independent than it was before.

We do not support this bill, but I will always support amendments that make bad legislation less bad, and that is why I'm pleased to stand up in support of the amendment put forward by the Member for Calgary-Elbow. I still don't think we can support this bill at the end of the day, even if the amendment is passed, but the amendment, if passed, would make this bill less bad than it is in its current form.

Now, this isn't that we don't trust public servants; this is that we don't trust the minister of environment to make the right decisions. I do not trust the minister of environment to appoint independent and objective people to these important positions when she wrote the foreword to a radical eco-extreme leaper manifesto, An Action a Day: Keeps Global Capitalism Away. We are trying to give the minister the power here to appoint the fox to guard the henhouse without any oversight whatsoever.

Now, we've seen problems with giving the ministers powers here to appoint important public servants without any oversight. The last one I can recall is when they appointed AUPE's senior negotiator, Kevin Davediuk, to go to the other side of the bargaining table and negotiate with AUPE, his own union buddies, for the government side. That is not a professional public service, Madam Chair. That is not independent. That does not give the Official Opposition and Albertans any confidence whatsoever that this government has the best interests of Alberta at heart with some of these positions. These are important positions. We have thousands of professional and independent public servants in this province, but some of the senior positions that this government has been appointing have been clearly political.

The chief scientist of Alberta is a critical position. Regardless of where you stand on the debate around how to properly regulate the oil sands and our oil and gas industry, everybody agrees, industry and environmental groups, that that position should be truly independent, independent from industry and independent from the radicals whose book the minister wrote the foreword to. It should be independent from all sides, and that means proper oversight and monitoring. I think that this amendment will go at least some way – some way – to ensuring this. It's important that we have checks and balances on the power of the minister here to make these important appointments.

So I'm pleased to stand up and support this amendment. I'm very disappointed – however, I'm not shocked – to see that the minister does not have any interest in limiting her powers to appoint her friends.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak on the amendment? The Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I just wanted to address a couple of the points raised by the Minister of Environment and Parks and minister responsible for the climate change office. You used a few examples: the medical officer of health, the chief veterinarian, those sorts of things. You know, I would just remind the minister that in the past, with the previous government, some of those positions have in fact succumbed to political pressure. In fact, I think that's probably one of the big reasons that the Member for Calgary-Mountain View is here, some of those sorts of challenges in the past.

You know, my concern – and this is a bigger discussion than just this single chief scientist position and something that perhaps the House may want to contemplate in the future in terms of how we address appointments to key positions generally. As I've said before, I think it's very important that at the very least we manage the perception risk around these sorts of appointments if not, in fact, the actual risk that appointments are political rather than merit based, if not in the present then at the very least in the future.

You know, the minister also referenced that perhaps this panel could be perceived as interference in the process. I think, in fact, it's entirely the opposite. It is to manage the risk that there would be undue interference in the appointment of such an important position to a role that is vital to the future of the province both for the environment and environmental monitoring but also for the perception and the overall economic well-being of our province. If the world perceives that Alberta's environmental monitoring is world class, and if, in fact, it is world class, that will only help, I think, ensure that we continue to develop the oil sands responsibly and reap the financial and social benefits from so doing.

The minister mentioned that this panel would not necessarily be qualified to perform a human resources role or do recruitment, you know, the mechanics of how the candidates are actually identified before the panel. I would envision them working with the public service, not purely in isolation, and plugging into those existing public service processes. It does add a layer of another check and balance and a layer of transparency. The goal here is to address that perception risk, and I would obviously hope and encourage the minister to reconsider.

I appreciate the Official Opposition's support for this amendment, and I would encourage all members, please, to support it.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak on the amendment? The Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Madam Chair. Yeah, I'd like to speak in support of this amendment. Now, this amendment doesn't take a lot of power away from the ministry. If we look at this, it says, "For subsequent vacancies in the position of Chief Scientist." So the minister will still be able to appoint the first one, but subsequent vacancies – and correct me if I'm wrong, hon. member – for that position would be chosen from a list of qualified candidates provided by the panel. Again, right off the start the minister gets to appoint the first chief scientist, and then down the road there would be an independent appointment advisory panel to provide a list of qualified candidates. This group would provide a list of candidates for the minister to choose from. That still gives a lot of power to the minister.

Now, this group of five members will have at least one representative from each of the following: industry associations, indigenous communities, academia, environmental organizations, and regulatory experts. This is a pretty well-rounded group of individuals to be providing a list of qualified candidates for the minister to choose a chief scientist from. Again, this provides just a little bit more independency – just a little bit more – and, of course, that little bit more provides a little bit more transparency to this whole process.

For those reasons, I would like to support this amendment. Again, just like the previous member noted, it will make, you know, a bad bill just a little less bad. Obviously, I think Albertans are the same as us in the opposition in that we have a hard time putting our full trust in the minister based on her history of anti-oil activism.

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

[Motion on amendment A1 lost]

The Deputy Chair: We will return to Bill 18. Are there any members wishing to speak on the original bill? The Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Madam Chair. I want to talk again on Bill 18, An Act to Ensure Independent Environmental Monitoring. Bill 18 returns the core function of environmental monitoring to the government. Under Bill 18 AEMERA will report to the Deputy Minister of Alberta Environment and Parks through a responsible assistant deputy minister. If passed, this legislation will outline the role and establish the position of chief scientist.

The bill requires that the minister establish a science advisory panel, intended to provide advice to the chief scientist. This panel will also be charged with conducting independent assessments and evaluations on the performance of the overall program. This legislation will require regular public reporting from the environmental monitoring agency. The chief scientist will be responsible for determining the necessity of peer review and has autonomy to speak publicly without permission from the minister. The bill will additionally establish an indigenous wisdom advisory panel to integrate the indigenous perspective.

Now, there are some good parts to this bill, things that it could do if it's allowed to, being under the purview of the ministry. It could improve relations with the Environment Canada partners. It could consolidate scarce scientific expertise in one location in Alberta. It could find least costly solutions, and it could possibly eliminate some duplications and use public-sector salary comparators. Hopefully, we would have regular public reporting, and hopefully the chief scientist can speak publicly without approval from the minister. The minister must choose the science panel members from a list by the panel.

Now, of course, there are some points about this bill that have us more than a little uncomfortable. We've tried to pass a couple of amendments to this bill that we feel would have made it a little bit more accountable, a little bit more transparent. We asked that it be sent to committee so that we could have this bill looked at and we could get information from a variety of sources. That's the great thing about committees. It opens up an opportunity to listen to more than just the government speak about the benefits of this bill. We could hear the other side of the story, too, from other scientists that have a different opinion on what AEMERA has done and what it can do.

Now, given that the NDP, including the minister, through their association with environmental radicals – it's a little concerning to have more authority for the minister. Again, there have been numerous members of the scientific community that heavily criticized the Boothe study, upon which this government has based its decision to bring the environmental monitoring back in-house, back into the government. While the Boothe review claims that the agency has been a three-year failed experiment, the transfer of resources establishing the agency occurred in May 2015, and the Boothe review was launched shortly thereafter. So this agency, AEMERA, never really had a chance to get going.

Of course, when you start up anything, there are always some growing pains. These growing pains could have been addressed. We've tried to address some of them here, and we'd like to have had an opportunity to hear about some of these things in committee and hear different ideas on how these concerns could have been addressed. Now, there were some accusations of relatively high salary levels within AEMERA – and there's been some disputing of that, too – but that's something that could have been taken care of relatively easily.

Now, much of what the Boothe report identified as the high cost of AEMERA was based on sole-sourced Alberta Environment and Parks contracts before the formation of AEMERA. These were contracts from Alberta Environment and Parks. So now, in order to solve this issue, the government's response is to bring AEMERA back into the government, the same government that sole-sourced these contracts that are an issue. That, you know, brings more uncertainty to this whole issue.

An Hon. Member: Perplexing.

Mr. Loewen: Yes, it's very perplexing.

Now, clarifying the mandate of AEMERA still remains an option, and doing so would improve relations between AEMERA and Environment Canada and Alberta Environment and Parks. That's something that could still be done without bringing it into government. Bringing the cost of AEMERA in line with the public sector still remains an option, too. That's something, again, that could be done without bringing this into government.

Clarifying AEMERA's mandate would permit increased multijurisdictional co-operation. Now, that's something that's pretty basic, having a clear mandate. Of course, mandates can be adjusted. If there's some portion of the mandate they had that wasn't working, then that could be corrected. It's not that hard. Critics of the decision find it ironic that rather than making this decision using results of independent financial and scientific reviews, the minister based this decision on a sole-authored bureaucratic report that wasn't peer reviewed.

I think there are several things here that could be done without bringing this into government. I think the most important thing is that Albertans are assured of world-class monitoring. We need monitoring that has integrity. We need monitoring that has credibility. We need world-class monitoring because it's fundamental to the reputation of our energy sector and in the eyes of our customers. They need to be able to see this, and that's justified. We need to have this kind of credibility and integrity in our environmental monitoring that will allow our customers to look at us and our energy products and know that we have world-class monitoring.

Our monitoring has always been better than our competitors', but we need to be telling the world that, not telling the world that we're embarrassing cousins. We need to be telling the world about our world-class environmental monitoring. The energy that we produce here is far better than what the competitors bring to the table. You know, the original intent of AEMERA was to create an arm's-length body to conduct environmental monitoring, which is sensible, particularly if the government is lacking in credibility. We see we have this same problem here now. The government is lacking in credibility. There are ways to solve these problems without bringing it into government. We need to have that credibility in the world's eyes.

Just in conclusion, I won't be supporting Bill 18 in Committee of the Whole. Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak on the bill?

Ms McKittrick: Madam Chair, I rise as a cosponsor of Bill 18, An Act to Ensure Independent Environmental Monitoring. About 47 years ago I graduated from one of the most prestigious universities in Canada, McGill University, with a degree in ecology. I am proud to have been a part of one of the first bachelor of science degrees awarded in ecology. We have come a long way since my graduation in understanding the impact that we have on the environment through our industries and the way we live. We have legislation at the federal, provincial, and municipal levels that ensures that we safeguard our air, water, land, and natural resources. We work hard on mitigating the impact of our dependency on cars; recycle cans, bottles, plastics, and paper; and ensure that we preserve spaces where animals have a place to roam and live. There is no longer a possibility to deny that climate change has impacted our planet and that we need to ensure proper monitoring of the environment and our impact on the Earth.

For my friends opposite who, like me, come from a faith background, I have been delighted to see faith-based groups such as Citizens for Public Justice and A Rocha remind us all of God's love for creation.

The vocation of being a "protector" . . . means protecting all creation, the beauty of the created world . . . It means respecting each of God's creatures and respecting the environment in which we live . . . In the end, everything has been entrusted to our protection, and all of us are responsible for it. Be protectors of God's gifts!

As the Minister of Environment and Parks explained in this bill, it establishes the roles and responsibilities of the chief scientist, including developing and implementing an environmental science program to monitor, evaluate, and report on the condition of the environment. It outlines in law that the minister must establish a science advisory panel to provide independent advice to the chief scientist and the minister. I want to point out that this panel can speak publicly when it considers it necessary.

This bill establishes an indigenous wisdom panel to provide advice to the chief scientist and the minister on how to incorporate traditional ecological knowledge into the environmental science program, and this is so important at the moment.

In addition, there are some transitional provisions to ensure a smooth transition of monitoring functions and AEMERA back into the department. Madam Chair, I believe that our government has taken a thoughtful and measured approach in accepting the recommendations from the Boothe report to bring these core functions of government back into the Department of Environment and Parks.

The new model is the best option moving forward because it ensures that the government is directly accountable for environmental monitoring and that issues or gaps in monitoring are responded to immediately. The new model also eliminates fragmentation of scarce scientific capacity and will eliminate costly administrative duplication. Those two things were identified in the Boothe report as issues to be solved.

As a government we have a responsibility to the public to ensure that we are providing the best possible monitoring and reporting system and that this information is shared with the public regularly. It is for this reason that I support the specific duties of the chief scientist to establish and make public a schedule for reporting on the state of the environment in our province and to report on it.

I also believe, as does my caucus, that the indigenous wisdom panel has an extremely valuable role to play in ensuring that traditional ecological knowledge is included in environmental monitoring, and I'm so delighted that we take this seriously now. Maintaining this panel, now the indigenous wisdom panel, recognizes that our indigenous peoples have lived in harmony with the land for thousands of years and that we have an opportunity to learn from their wisdom in matters of the environment.

A key focus of the indigenous wisdom panel will be to identify significant outstanding gaps in cumulative effects management and guide the work of the chief scientist to ensure that appropriate prioritization and focus is placed by the government and the division to support increased monitoring science and the public reporting of cumulative effects. This panel will provide advice not only about traditional ecological knowledge and how to integrate it with western science programs but also will advise on how best to engage indigenous communities.

Now, Madam Chair, I want to talk about this whole issue of peer review for the Boothe report. I have had papers that have been peer reviewed, and they're usually papers of primary research, therefore journals, or maybe you can be peer reviewed because you're going to be presenting a report at a conference. The Boothe report has nothing to do with an academic report that needs to be peer reviewed. I have gone through the experience of a peer review, and I'm wondering how many of the members opposite understand the concept of a peer review for an academic journal versus a report that has been written for a specific purpose such as providing advice to government.

Madam Chair, the Boothe report was very clear in its recommendations to bring environmental monitoring back into the department. Page 12 of the report states:

Like many complex system failures, the failure of this experiment had several causes. The first was the erroneous belief that the lack of public credibility attached to environmental monitoring in Alberta at this time (in particular, for the oil sands) was related to its close link with government rather than the weakness of its scientific underpinnings. The second was an inability to clearly articulate the relationship between AEMERA and AEP and to recognize the role of the department in coordinating portfolio activities on behalf of the Minister. The third was a failure to appreciate the public sector management impacts of stripping AEP of the scientific capacity it needs to fulfill its mandate of environmental stewardship.

We believe that the measures we're taking will not only improve front-line delivery of monitoring in Alberta but will ensure that scientific independence is maintained and even improved. Madam Chair, I support Bill 18 because I believe that it will provide the foundation for the most transparent, accountable, and scientifically sound environmental monitoring system.

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

The hon. Member for Calgary-South East.

Mr. Fraser: Thank you, Madam Chair. It's always an honour to rise and speak in this House to the hon. members. You know, I was just thinking that there was a film, I believe in 1986, a movie called A Time to Kill. It's about this southern girl – she's an African-American girl – who gets brutally raped. She's raped by these white what they would call, I guess, country boys. As the movie goes on, it is a commentary on race relations in the United States and obviously very contentious.

One of the pieces that was moving in that film, if you've seen it, was towards the end, when Matthew McConaughey, playing the lawyer for the father who goes out and avenges his daughter's rape, is articulating what happened. He asks the jury to close their eyes, and as he articulates what happened on that day, towards the end he says: now, I want you to imagine that this happened to a white girl. For me in that moment it said something: imagine that.

On this particular piece of the bill – and I see the chair thinking: where are you going with this? – imagine if it was our government who was now pulling AEMERA back into the ministry. Imagine the protest from what would have been the fourth party back then and the outcry that now it's coming into the minister's control.

Now, I'm not going to ask you to close your eyes, but let's start a little bit with the narrative. In the beginning the minister wouldn't meet with AEMERA's leadership, to start, and then starts to make decisions without doing that. Then as the minister's office and the ministry are doing that, there's an outcry from chief scientists right across the country in disagreement. Now, imagine all of that going on, and it was our government. There would have been this huge outcry based on perception.

Originally when we did it, when we moved and created the world-class environmental monitoring in 2013, it was because there was this perception that the governing party of the day was perhaps too close to the oil and gas industry, so we put it at arm's length to remove some of that conspiracy, to remove some of that perception. Now here we are in a new day, and the government of the day is doing something that they would have vehemently opposed if it were us.

The minister has an opportunity here to do some things. One of those things would be to send this bill to committee – right? – to have more dialogue on this, on exactly how it's going to work.

An Hon. Member: Why did you mention rape? It's not really appropriate.

Mr. Fraser: Then you weren't listening. However, it was perception. And I have the floor, hon. member.

An Hon. Member: What's your point?

Mr. Fraser: The point is that it's perception, and the point is that if the shoe was on the other foot, there would have been this huge outcry.

Members, we can't support this simply because there is a perception. It's already out there, and the minister now has the task of separating that out. We already have a challenge in the world today of making sure that we're doing everything we can on a social licence basis, but to pull the monitoring agency back into the minister's office is creating some concern for industry. We're hearing it from scientists. That's why I won't be supporting this bill. I think the minister has an opportunity to maybe refer this bill to committee to do some extra work on it. That's an opportunity. That's my suggestion.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

The Deputy Chair: Are there any comments, questions, or amendments to be offered with respect to this bill?

We have amendment A4, that was adjourned yesterday. Is there anyone wishing to speak to amendment A4? The Government House Leader.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much. Speaking as Minister of Transportation, I'm not sure what to do right now, Madam Chair. The hon. Member for Calgary-Greenway had submitted to my office three amendments, which included the one that's before us now. While I'm not prepared to accept the one before us now, I am prepared to accept two other amendments that he provided to my office. Unfortunately, I don't think we're in a position to deal with this right now. I don't know whether we should just put this back, adjourn again, and hopefully we can come back to it later today.

I'll move to adjourn debate.

Government Bills and Orders

Third Reading

Fiscal Statutes Amendment Act, 2016

[Adjourned debate May 24: Mr. Mason]

The Acting Speaker: Any members wishing to speak to Bill 10? The Member for Strathmore-Brooks.

Mr. Fildebrandt: Thank you, Madam Speaker. We're still debating Bill 10 in the House right now because we have not seen any reasonable justification from this government for the legislation before us here. We have not yet seen the Minister of Finance stand up in this House and explain why it is that he needs to repeal the debt ceiling that he imposed in legislation just four and a half months before introducing this. We have not yet seen any good reason provided by the government for why it is that they believe they will exceed 15 per cent of debt to GDP in just a few short years.

We've yet to hear a reasonable case put forward by the minister as to why the taxpayers of Alberta should believe anything he has to say about their plan to get us back to balanced budgets. We have yet to hear anything from the Minister of Finance or the Premier that would give an iota of comfort to our lenders, the people lending money to this province, to ensure that we are sufficiently credit worthy.

The last time that the Minister of Finance attempted to reassure the creditors of this province and our credit-rating agencies, he flew out east to meet with some of the credit-rating agencies. What did they do after seeing the minister? They downgraded the credit rating of the province. They had such little faith in the ability of the minister to put this province back on a path to balanced budgets that they figured, after a conversation with him, that the province clearly had no plan, that we are no longer worthy of our triple-A plus credit rating.

Literally less than one day, less than 24 hours, after the government introduced its budget, the credit rating of this province was downgraded, and that had nothing to do whatsoever with the price of oil. All they can do is blame the price of oil. But if it had to do with the price of oil, our credit would have been downgraded on the day of or a few days after a significant drop in the price of oil. Instead, they waited to see this government's budget. They brought down a budget, and it was so clear that they had no plan whatsoever to address the significant shortfall between revenues and expenditures here that they downgraded the credit rating of this province.

There was no significant change in the price of oil between the time of our last downgrade and the downgrade that happened the day after the budget. There was no significant change in the price of oil. In fact, during a lot of that period the price of oil actually went up. The price of oil is the only excuse that this government can banter about, hoping that Albertans actually aren't paying attention. But Albertans who are paying attention to this know that their excuse just doesn't hold water. They've blamed the price of oil for everything here.

Then they bring forward Bill 10, a bill that is extraordinarily reckless and irresponsible. While we were debating Bill 10, a bill that would remove any limit whatsoever to the ability of this government to borrow, while we were debating that very bill last Thursday, we got another credit downgrade by Standard & Poor's. Standard & Poor's downgraded the credit of this province while we were debating a bill that removes any limits whatsoever on the government to borrow. They didn't downgrade the credit of this province with a drop in the oil price. In fact, oil has had a significant recovery since Bill 10 was introduced.

Now, knock on wood, Madam Speaker, I'm not relying on that to bail the province out. Governments for a long time have relied upon the price of oil to bail us out of our problems, and we shouldn't rely upon that. The price of oil has actually gone up significantly since Bill 10 was introduced in this House, but the credit rating of the province has been downgraded significantly since Bill 10 was introduced in this House. Do you see the cognitive dissidence of this government? They will speak out of one side of their mouth and tell us that oil is the only reason for the fiscal problems of this government – the only reason – while oil prices are actually increasing and our credit rating is going down.

Our credit rating is going down for one reason, Madam Speaker. It's that the government has no darn plan, NDP. They have no plan whatsoever to get us back to balance. They have no plan to close the gap between expenditures and revenues in this province. Now, there are two ways to do that. They can increase taxes even more, or they can reduce spending. Albertans have had enough tax increases in this province. They have increased personal income taxes by up to 50 per cent for some earners. They've increased business taxes by 20 per cent. They've increased gasoline taxes, diesel taxes, home heating taxes.

They've introduced a massive ND PST carbon tax that is going to slam families and small oil drilling companies in this province with $3 billion of new taxes without coming anywhere close to compensating taxpayers for the cost of this. Their rebate is an absolute sham. It doesn't come anywhere close to rebating middle-class families for the actual cost of this carbon tax. The carbon tax has nothing to do with their stated goals around the environment. It is a tax grab, pure and simple. If it wasn't a tax grab, it wouldn't appear on page 22 of the fiscal plan under the table titled Tax Revenue. If it wasn't a tax grab, they wouldn't be spending it. They wouldn't be spending this money on new corporate welfare programs.

You know who is going to be here later today, Madam Speaker? The illustrious Premier of Ontario, who has bankrupted that province with these same kinds of so-called green energy subsidy programs, building a windmill on every corner, cancelling gas plants. They're now actually even talking about banning natural gas for home heating in Ontario. Period. The Premier of Ontario is going to be here today, and I'm sure she's going to impart her wisdom about fiscal responsibility and good spending programs on the environmental side.

I am terrified that some of this is going to rub off although we shouldn't be because the real crusaders for this are already here. We have an environment minister who helped write the foreword for a book, An Action a Day: Keeps Global Capitalism Away, radical environmentalists here who are bent upon imposing a huge green subsidy program in this province, paid for by taxpayers.

If this had anything to do with the environment and it wasn't just a big tax grab, they would have made the carbon tax revenue neutral. They would have cut business taxes. They would have cut personal income taxes the way British Columbia did. It would have been revenue neutral, and it wouldn't have brought the government one new penny to spend on subsidy programs like Kathleen Wynne is conducting in Ontario. But it's not, so they brought in a massive tax grab so they could increase spending even more on some of their pet projects.

It has done nothing to actually close the gap between expenditures and revenues in the province because all of the new taxes, the $3 billion of new taxes that this government is going to capture from Albertans in that carbon tax, all $3 billion there is going to be spent. They're not even going to take the revenue from this towards the deficit, nor should they because we should be cutting expenditures in this province.

Our creditors are looking at this province and saying that there is no realistic plan whatsoever to get back to balance, and that is why we have suffered our fifth credit downgrade. It's our fifth credit downgrade.

You know, a lot of us have seen a great video that was posted on YouTube about this guy who went to his bank. He's pretty broke. He makes about $30,000 a year, and he spends about $45,000 a year, roughly the size of the deficit, proportionately, that the Alberta government is running. He has no concern. All he does is to go to the bank, and he asks for an increase in his line of credit. The banker says: "We can't give you this money. You're no longer good for it. You're not good for this money. You're earning $30,000. You're spending $45,000. You already owe $30,000 on top of that. You already owe a lot of money, and you've got no plan to either bring in more money or to reduce your expenditures." The guy is dumbfounded: "Well, what do you mean? I need these things. These are great things. I like to do fun things with this money." The banker says: "Well, at the end of the day, we're not going to lend you money if you're not creditworthy for it." So what does he do? He carts in his kid and makes his kid sign a loan.

That's what we're doing here. We are making our children sign the loan for us. That is the advantage that government has over individuals when it comes to borrowing. I can't borrow more than I'm worthy for on my credit rating because at the end of the day I'm responsible for my own debts. We are not responsible personally for the reckless actions that we are taking here. Madam Speaker, if the politicians in this Chamber had to personally be responsible for the debts we are taking on, I guarantee you that we would never see Bill 10 before this House. We would never bring something as reckless and shameful as Bill 10, to eliminate any debt ceiling whatsoever, before this House if we actually had to put our own money on the line.

Instead, we're here for a good time, not a long time, aren't we? We're here for four years. Hopefully, you don't stretch it to five. We are here for four years. The worst thing that could possibly happen to the government is that they lose an election and have to get a job in the private sector. That's the worst possible thing that could happen to a politician. You lose your seat, and you move on with life. But you're not responsible afterwards for the decisions that you've made here. This is a short-term contract that we are on. We're on a four-year contract, and we don't have to live with the consequences of our actions, but the rest of Alberta does. Future generations have to live with the consequences of our actions.

We can do anything we want here. We can be as reckless with people's money as we like because at the end of the day not a single one of the 87 members of this House is going to be held personally responsible for those actions. I know – I know – for a fact that if at the end of this legislative term, if in the spring of 2019 all of us when we leave here had to take a share of the debt that we've taken on, I guarantee that they would never do anything like this. They would never do anything like this, but they're happy to kick the can down the road and let somebody else pay for it.

As I said, at an earlier stage of debate here I quoted Frédéric Bastiat, who said that government is the great illusion in which everyone tries to live at everyone else's expense. Well, that doesn't just go between regions of a country or regions of a province. It doesn't just go between classes of wealth or position in a society. It also goes between generations. What we're doing here, Madam Speaker, is that we are trying to live at the expense of future generations. We are trying to accumulate wealth for ourselves right now, paid for by our children and our children's children.

Of course, in the 1980s, when the Alberta government was on its last big borrowing binge, the government of the day said: "We owe this to ourselves. We need to borrow this money to diversify the economy and spend it on all these programs that we like." They weren't willing to pay the piper for what they were spending that day. They weren't willing to either raise the taxes or cut spending and actually balance their books. They were living at the expense of the next generation, and that's what we are doing here today. We are trying to live at the expense of our children and our grandchildren. It is irresponsible, and it is morally repugnant, Madam Speaker, and that is why the Official Opposition will vote against this bill.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Anyone wishing to speak to the bill?

The Member for Strathcona-Sherwood Park.

Cortes-Vargas: Thank you. I'm standing to adjourn debate on Bill 10.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Bill 18 An Act to Ensure Independent Environmental Monitoring

The Acting Speaker: Are there any members wishing to speak to Bill 18? The Minister of Environment and Parks.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Of course, I rise to move third reading of Bill 18, which is an Act to Ensure Independent Environmental Monitoring.

You know, the reason for that, Madam Speaker, is that environmental monitoring really must be the core business of government, just like public health and public safety. We have always said that we need to do a better job of monitoring the environmental impacts of resource development because Albertans demand it. The communities demand it. Certainly, our trading partners demand it as well, and industry demands it of themselves. That is why we accepted the recommendations conducted under the agencies, boards, and commissions review, the expert analysis provided to us by Dr. Paul Boothe to bring front-line monitoring functions back into the department and introduce this bill.

Of course, this bill enshrines a number of things into law that were not previously there, including the role and responsibilities of the chief scientist. The science advisory panel was there previously, but not the indigenous wisdom panel, and it enshrines in law that the science advisory panel can speak publicly when it's deemed necessary. These were really thoughtful and measured inclusions, Madam Speaker, that ensure the independence of the scientific data while being accountable to Albertans with respect to the analysis and reporting of data.

Madam Speaker, I believe, having been minister of environment now for about a year, that, you know, the previous government recognized that they had a problem with environmental monitoring. There were so many criticisms being levelled at their approach, and that was why they constituted AEMERA. I believe that the intentions were good, and I believe that they were trying to get it right and had come around to this idea that they had to get it right, that our international and national reputations depended on it. However, I believe that the governance model was a bridge too far. It was unnecessary, and it was administration duplication.

It pains me that some members of this House don't want to see this province efficiently expend environmental resources and scientific resources. In my mind, you know, our focus needs to be on those front-line monitoring services. So that's unfortunate, Madam Speaker. But what we've done with this, I would argue, is to keep the good start within the previous government's approach, with the science advisory panel and the appointment of the chief scientist and ensuring more regularized reporting. We've taken out the pieces that got in the way of achieving those objectives.

There were pieces of the agency that got in the way of an ongoing nation-to-nation relationship with indigenous peoples, for example. It's so crucial in the oil sands region in particular that we maintain and foster those relationships with the indigenous peoples for their traditional land use and the cumulative effects and so on. So the agency, despite, I think, very good intentions, quite frankly, had trouble navigating that relationship because it wasn't government to nation; it was agency to nation. It was awkward. It was tough to get off the ground.

But the traditional ecological knowledge panel was finally sort of lifted off the ground eventually under AEMERA. What we've done here is to not make it discretionary, whether that panel exists, but we've enshrined it into law. The minister shall ensure that those voices are heard, and that's really important.

You know, having spent quite a bit of time up there discussing development in the oil sands region, I think that there is a real desire for that nation-to-nation relationship and that really careful cultivation of an actual relationship and communication and to go beyond just ticking the box of consultation, that is required. So I think that through the establishment of the indigenous wisdom panel within this legislation, that requires this government and subsequent governments to engage in that respectful way – and that is a change, Madam Speaker. I think it's unfortunate that that piece and that respectful relationship will be opposed by some members of this House.

Finally, Madam Speaker, I think that some of the pieces that were contained within the Boothe report really speak to our government's desire to make sure that we are investing in front-line services, whether those services are to protect our public health through our public health care system or public security through, for example, emergency management response, which, of course, we have seen the results of very recently. Thank goodness, particularly in the lower Athabasca, we have all those folks working in environmental monitoring and all the folks working in the environment department in particular, that I know I can speak to, and their high level of professionalism and so on. Thank goodness those folks were not cut in Budget 2015 last fall or in this one so that we had the capacity to respond. It's so important that we be able to shore that up and that every extra dollar that we have within environmental monitoring is going towards just that. That's what this legislation does.

To conclude moving third reading, Madam Speaker, I do want to underline that there were some good parts of the previous government's approach around AEMERA. However, what it did was that it established a governance model that we don't see in other jurisdictions. It just didn't really stack up to an evidence-based approach to the matter, with an appropriate interjurisdictional comparison, with an actual careful eye to how we govern environmental monitoring and how we speak to the public about it. That's another really big piece. We need to make sure that that reporting is timely, that it contains an appropriate analysis. It is no good to just dump a whole bunch of data on the public and just say: here; look at these spreadsheets. There must be analysis. What are we looking at? What are the trends? Are we measuring the appropriate things?

The chief scientist will have to give those reports to the public, Madam Speaker. In addition, the science advisory panel is able to say to the public and to the chief scientist, you know, "Look, you need to examine this part" or "There is this monitoring for this particular emission that needs to be done now that we now have the technology to do," and so on. The science advisory panel can undertake that and can speak to the public about it. I think it's unfortunate that some members in the House would oppose such an approach and would oppose such an open conversation about science with the public. This is about ensuring that we have a robust, public approach to public science. Certainly, Environment Canada has quite a few boots on the ground, and they now are able to speak to the public, scientists as well, which is fantastic. We have allowed that same freedom through this legislation.

As I move third reading, I just want to underline for the House that, you know, when we were sworn in a year ago, we took a very methodical approach to some of these questions of governance. After 40 years, for better or for worse, for good intentions or for maybe not-so-good intentions, you end up with some frayed edges around governance, Madam Speaker. That's what we're looking to clean up here.

We're just really looking to make sure that when we go and speak to the public and we speak to our trading partners and we speak to those who have questions about orderly development in the oil sands, we have real answers, that we have evidence-based answers, that we don't have answers that are simply based on rhetoric or on thumping one's chest or on stomping one's feet or whatever other toddlerlike behaviour we think might get us to acceptance of our heavy oil products on world markets, that we are taking a substantive approach, a careful and thoughtful approach to the development of our energy resources, Madam Speaker.

With that I move third reading.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Any other members wishing to speak? I will recognize the Member for Lacombe-Ponoka first and then the Member for Calgary-South East.

Mr. Orr: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to speak to this bill. The challenge here, of course, is multipronged. Part of the issue why this bill is not acceptable is because it just continues to add to the problem of big government in our province. In many cases big government is not the solution and, in fact, is the problem. It just adds to spiralling budgets and to continually making a bigger and bigger and bigger bureaucracy that just interrupts what the people in our province need to do.

The other problem is, of course, that independent boards are independent for a reason. Independent boards need to have some independence. Of course, when the employees have to answer to the boss, they're no longer completely independent. The way it's being set up now – while there were problems before, this isn't the right solution. Big government, loss of independence is not a solution.

What we've got now is setting up a situation, a particular strategy of operation whereby the likelihood of manipulation and influence and control is extremely strong. In short, this is a conflict of interest. Now, I realize this government doesn't seem to understand the nature or the concept of a conflict of interest, but most of the independent boards and agencies and commissions in this province were set up with only three requirements to the government. The first was, of course, that they would receive their mandate from the government. The second is that they would receive a budget from the government. The third is that they would make an annual report to the government. Beyond that they were to operate with independent boards and independent decision-making and freedom from political influence and manipulation in the process.

I think this leads to secrecy. I think it leads to reports being vetted, a loss of transparency. The issue isn't the science. It's the fact that the science is being paid for by the government. It's the issue that science is being muzzled by the boss. Whistle-blowing will be squelched. I just think that in the end the reality is that the environment will suffer. This isn't about protecting the environment; it's about destroying the independence and the freedom of an independent monitor. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The hon. Member for Calgary-South East.

Mr. Fraser: Thank you, Madam Speaker. The minister makes a very interesting case, which I can agree with, that the environment is no different than any other front-line service like health care, like policing. But when we look at public safety – and we can use the Alberta Emergency Management Agency, that's arm's-length, to make decisions that are made by professionals. Police departments – city of Calgary police, city of Edmonton police department, RCMP and the detachments around the province – are funded by governments in some form but are independent to make decisions in the best interests of their citizens that don't necessarily have that political pressure or political oversight, that may be real or even perceived manipulation.

I guess the question for the minister as we move forward is – and I would agree that not everything in AEMERA was perfect; however, there were good things. I would also say that a good thing about the particular bill is the indigenous advisory council. I mean, I do believe that kings should be speaking to kings and queens speaking to queens, using that reference.

So there are some good parts of this, but, I think, going back to what I was saying before, it is the perception that now it's in the minister's office, particularly trying to initiate things like the carbon tax. You can see the perception from people that maybe the science can be manipulated by the minister's office. That's the problem. Again, it's not that there's any malintent; however, it's the perception. Now the minister's office is going to be tasked with that. You know, how often will the minister and this particular part of her ministry be in front of committee so that all members of this House, again, can see what's going on and fight for their constituents?

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to speak under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, any members wishing to speak on the bill? The Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Dr. Turner: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm pleased to rise today as I'm a cosponsor of Bill 18, An Act to Ensure Independent Environmental Monitoring. I'd like to provide the House with some context of how we arrived here today, debating a bill that will bring environmental monitoring back into government. As you know, our government committed to reviewing all agencies, boards, and commissions that fall under our purview. We undertook these reviews to improve services and ensure value for taxpayers. We also undertook these reviews to consider the role, mandate, board members, and governance structures of ABCs and to identify areas of duplication and potential savings.

As part of this process AEMERA was reviewed by Dr. Paul Boothe, who's a former Environment Canada deputy minister and currently the director of the Lawrence National Centre for Policy and Management at Western University's Ivey Business School. Dr. Boothe's report clearly identified some key issues, including that the private model diverted overhead costs away from monitoring, led to confusion around roles and responsibilities, and limited resources. The report stated:

Considering the body of information gathered through interviews and a review of key documents, it is hard to escape the conclusion that AEMERA is a failed experiment in outsourcing a core responsibility of government to an arm's-length body.

That's on page 12.

AEMERA's operational model is also more costly than public-sector models. I would think that that should appeal to those across the aisle, that we want to use governmental resources very efficiently. In part the high costs come because its governance and administrative structures duplicate structures that already exist at a lower cost in the public sector. In addition, costs are high because AEMERA has chosen private- rather than public-sector salary and benefit comparators despite the fact that many staff were previously performing similar functions at lower costs when employed by AEPEA.

Madam Speaker, the Boothe report recommended to transition monitoring back into the department under the guidance of a chief scientist. Our government has accepted these recommendations, and Bill 18 puts the recommendations into action. I urge all members to support it.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak on Bill 18? The Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Bill 18, An Act to Ensure Independent Environmental Monitoring. Ensuring that Alberta has world-class environmental monitoring is a Wildrose priority. Upholding the integrity of Alberta's monitoring systems is vital not only for our environment but for our industry. World-class monitoring secures the longevity and reputation of Alberta's energy sector. This is critically important. So we'll be watching what the government does to ensure that political interference does not damage the quality or credibility of our monitoring.

Now, this move will reconsolidate Alberta's scientific knowledge base, thus allowing Alberta Environment and Parks to better fulfill its monitoring mandate. So there are some good things about this. But we are wary of consolidating the power in the hands of government. Now, this government's history of environmental radicalism concerns us. We're most concerned about ministerial interference. If they are spared interference, we trust Alberta scientists will deliver the world-class environmental monitoring that we rely on and that our energy sector relies on. Dr. Wrona is a highly reputable scientist, and we were pleased to see that he will continue to lead this monitoring.

Now, even with operations taken in-house, it is vital to ensure that the scientists are given freedom to operate independently. Without world-class monitoring the reputation of our energy sector is at risk, and we can't afford to lose that. The oil industry is fully invested in seeing that Alberta has world-class environmental monitoring. They know tracking their impact is a priority because, for them, mitigating their impact is a priority.

It is crucial that we defend the integrity and credibility of our environmental monitoring. We appreciate that the minister cannot appoint board members directly but wonder if the board selecting nominees will make it too much of an insiders' clique. Co-operation between federal and provincial monitoring bodies is important to ensure we maintain world-class standards in Alberta. The Wildrose is committed to that.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to Bill 18? The Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm pleased to rise in support of Bill 18, An Act to Ensure Independent Environmental Monitoring. I'm sure that many in this House are aware that I worked for seven years as a groundwater specialist at Alberta environment, so I have first-hand knowledge of the process that the department went through in setting up the Alberta monitoring agency that we're now dismantling.

I have to say, Madam Speaker, that a number of our staff were concerned with the process. A number of environment staff were of course concerned with the quality, the integrity, the independence of the monitoring that our department was doing back when this was a function carried out by Alberta environment, and certainly many of us in the civil service were quite relieved when Dr. David Schindler pointed out some of the holes that existed in the monitoring program at that time and, of course, prompted the government of the day to undertake a review of how monitoring in the oil sands area, in particular, was undertaken and suggested some changes.

I think many in the civil service, it's fair to say, thought that perhaps the government of the day went a step too far, that rather than ensuring taking measures to just reform the way Alberta environment was set up to ensure the independent monitoring that we're trying to establish, they resorted to an old trick, let's say, of setting up an arm's-length agency because that seemed to be the solution to any problem that government faced at the time, that if you had a problem with something that was going on with government, you'd take that function out of government and you'd set up an independent agency, and magically the problem would be fixed. Of course, we see now, after three years of this experiment, that that didn't actually fix the problem, that the work that needs to be done wasn't actually getting done because there were so many problems with setting up the agency.

Madam Speaker, I saw first-hand the trouble that people had deciding whether or not they should work for Alberta Environment anymore or work for AEMERA because they weren't sure where their job naturally fit, right? I worked side by side with hydrologists, with limnologists who loved their job passionately and wanted to continue on doing the job in the organization that was going to continue doing that kind of work, but they were never sure whether that work was going to be continued under Alberta Environment or the monitoring agency. As a result, some of our monitoring staff were moved over to the monitoring agency; some of the monitoring staff stayed at Alberta Environment. They were often working on the same projects, just across different agencies, and it took a toll on the quality of the work that was undertaken by those two agencies as well as on staff morale.

The staff who did move over to AEMERA were never really sure how long they were going to be there. The budgetary questions that were asked about the certainty, the predictability, the sustainability of the funding of the agency had never been answered satisfactorily, so my friends who went to work for the agency were never really sure whether or not their next paycheck was going to come from AEMERA or from Alberta Environment or whether their jobs were going to be cut altogether.

Madam Speaker, I'm quite relieved that our government is taking action to establish the certainty in the role of Alberta Environment in carrying out this monitoring work. You know, the Member for Lacombe-Ponoka talked about big government, and if he gave this any more than just a passing thought, he'd realize that we're actually shrinking government because we're taking the work that's being done by two agencies now and shrinking it into one agency. That only makes sense. That's what the civil servants that I worked with wanted from day one. We warned our political masters of the day that by establishing this agency, we would be duplicating functions, that we would be delegating responsibility so that we weren't sure who was responsible for what. When you have those kinds of situations, it turns out that nobody is responsible for anything, and no work gets done.

I'm glad that we're proceeding with dismantling AEMERA and rolling those functions back into the environment department because now we know who's responsible for environmental monitoring all across the province. It's the government of Alberta, and our civil servants will know who they're working with, who they're working for, what their job is. I'm certain that as a result the work that will be done will be better than it has been over the past two or three years, when civil servants have been trying to do their job in spite of the chaos that's been happening at the management level.

I want to address a couple of points that have been raised by our friends from across the aisle here in this debate. You know, they have concerns about political interference, Madam Speaker, and I have to say that when AEMERA was set up, we had concerns about political interference. Of course, we know that Dr. Lorne Taylor was the chair of AEMERA, and we also know that Dr. Lorne Taylor is a confirmed climate change denier – right? – much like many of our friends from across the way. The Member for Calgary-Mountain View, in fact, lost his job because he had the courage to stand up and say that climate change is a real problem, that it's caused by human activity, and that the government needed to do something to fix it. [interjections] Thank you, Calgary-Mountain View. And the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood is causing me to doubt myself. I don't do that very often.

When you set up a confirmed climate change denier in charge of the agency that's tasked with monitoring the environment, of course you're going to have concerns, right? In fact, there will always be concerns around the political leadership and their ability to undertake scientific endeavours in the province, whoever the leader is, Madam Speaker. I think that the advantage of this bill is that we have one agency responsible for carrying out the monitoring.

I also want to address some comments made by our friends in the Wildrose Party about the fact that they don't trust the minister. I think that it's a convenient talking point for them, and they want to deflect from the reality, Madam Speaker, that they don't trust government at all to do anything. You know, in his response to a maiden speech in the last session of the Legislature the Member for Barrhead-Morinville-Westlock actually said that government was a negative force – I'm paraphrasing – that government was by its nature a destructive force. Of course, that reflects the Wildrose's view of government, that there is nothing that the government can do well because the government isn't supposed to do anything.

They like to say that they don't trust the minister, but what's at the heart of their argument, Madam Speaker, is that they don't actually trust government to do anything, and of course this is one of the many reasons why that party is not fit to run this province. We are certain that the people of Alberta see that, especially when it comes to the issue of environmental monitoring. There are no people in this country who are more concerned about the environment than the people of Alberta, and they don't want a bunch of people who don't understand science and don't believe that government has a role in protecting the environment running this province.

I want to touch on another subject that the members opposite have raised a number of times in this debate, Madam Speaker, and that is the fact that they are afraid that the minister will somehow politically interfere in the science that's involved, as if the minister herself is going to run around the Athabasca River and collect samples and then throw the ones that disagree with her preconceived notions out of the boat so that only the ones that support her hypothesis are the ones that are run in the lab, which is ridiculous.

Of course, if these people had any idea how government functions, which they don't – right? – they would know that our environment department is staffed from top to bottom with professional scientists, who abide by a code of ethics and will not let their work be meddled with by any political masters, Madam Speaker. One of the reasons that we have one of the best public services in the whole country is because we are staffed top to bottom with professionals who carry out their work without respect to what the desires of their political masters are.

On the issue of trusting science, Madam Speaker, of course, we know that there are a number of people in the Wildrose Party who frequently tweet about whether or not climate change is real, so of course they don't believe in evidence even when it's been presented by thousands of scientists who have been working on this for years and years.

Also, Madam Speaker, I recall a particular incident last summer, when Alberta Environment released air quality reports focused on Red Deer, on air quality issues in Red Deer. Of course, this was work that was undertaken by professional scientists, professional air quality monitoring, who have worked in the department for a number of years. The samples, I believe, were collected between the years 2011 and 2013, long before this minister was even present in this Chamber. The air quality results were quite concerning.

There were levels of PAHs, polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons for people who probably don't know what PAH stands for, that were concerning. These are air quality concerns that, if they continued on, would have legitimate health impacts. The Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky's response to the release: oh, this is political interference from a minister who's committed to phasing out coal. What was the Member for Chestermere-Rocky View's response? The same thing, that we can't trust the minister to present science.

Of course, what they don't say, Madam Speaker, is that they don't understand the science that was presented to them. It is human nature to fear what you don't understand, so out of fear they automatically attack the minister of the environment as somehow politically interfering with the independent work that's being undertaken by our air quality monitoring in the department. It's absolutely ridiculous that these people are even in this Chamber to talk about the quality of . . . [interjections]

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members.

I'd just like to caution the members in the House about the language that we use when we're speaking of members.

Would you like to continue? Okay.

Mr. Schmidt: I would just like to sum up, Madam Speaker, by saying that this bill improves the efficiency of government, it ensures clear lines of responsibility, and it enhances the work that our civil servants will do. This will significantly improve the quality of the work that the Alberta government will be able to do in the area of environmental monitoring.

I encourage all of our members to ignore what the other side is saying. They've demonstrated clearly that they don't trust government, that they don't understand science time and time again, and that they don't really know what they're talking about when they're debating this bill.

I look forward to this House passing this bill and our environment department getting to the work of protecting the environment for our future generations. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Is there any member wishing to speak under 29(2)(a)? The Member for Banff-Cochrane.

Mr. Westhead: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I think the member has a lot of unique experience and knowledge that he has shared with our Chamber today. I just wonder if he had anything more that he wanted to add to edify us here today.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, no. Madam Speaker, I appreciate the Member for Banff-Cochrane asking me the question. I believe that the lecture has ended for today. But I would offer my services as a professional scientist to any member opposite who would like to understand what science is about. I will provide them remedial tutoring so that they actually have the base level required to participate in these kinds of debates.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Under 29(2)(a), the Member for Calgary-Hawkwood.

Mr. Connolly: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker, and thank you very much, Minister. I really appreciated your lesson. I'm sure it was very helpful to many people in this Chamber on both sides of the House. We don't often get a scientist talking to members of the Official Opposition about exactly what climate change is. As some of them have said, science is really middle of the road or somewhere in the middle of the road. They're not really sure if it's real or not.

Could you kind of expand on maybe a couple of the things that members opposite have expressed recently about whether or not they might believe in climate change?

Thank you.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you to the Member for Calgary-Hawkwood for that question. I believe that this is perhaps not the right forum for debating those things. I am sure that when the debate on Bill 20 progresses, the members opposite will have plenty of opportunities to shoot themselves in the foot, Madam Speaker. I believe that that will be the appropriate time to hold them to task, to illustrate to the people of Alberta how they fundamentally fail to understand the science of climate change, so I will refrain from making any of those remarks right now.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View, would you like to speak under 29(2)(a)? No? Okay.

Mr. Nixon: I would like to move to adjourn debate.

The Acting Speaker: Well, are we finished with 29(2)(a) first? Are there any more speakers under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, there is a motion to adjourn debate on Bill 18.

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker: The Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Dr. Swann: Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Unfortunately, the question has been called, so I'll put the vote forward first.

[The voice vote indicated that the motion to adjourn debate lost]

[Motion to adjourn debate lost]

The Acting Speaker: We are back on the main bill.

Mr. Mason: Madam Speaker, I have a point of order.

The Acting Speaker: A point of order has been called.

Point of Order

Admissibility of Motion

Mr. Mason: Madam Speaker, I'm looking at House of Commons Procedure and Practice, pages 454 and 455. You know, I think the tactic that we just saw employed was new to me and, no doubt, to the chair as well. I just want to bring this forward so perhaps it can be ruled on tomorrow. It says under Guidelines:

The Chair has consistently ruled that the Government House Leader should be the one to introduce any motion pertaining to the arrangement of House business, and that the motion may be considered under "Motions" or under Government Orders, depending on where the Minister giving notice has decided to place it. The Chair has also ruled that while the rubric "Motions" usually encompasses matters related to the management of the business of the House and its committees, it is not the exclusive purview of the government, despite the government's unquestioned prerogative to determine the agenda of business before the House. Accordingly, the Speaker accepts certain motions put on notice by private Members for consideration under the heading "Motions", such as motions of instruction to committees and for concurrence in . . . reports. When private Members give written notice of other substantive matters, these motions are placed under Private Members' Business on the Order Paper.

Madam Speaker, I would ask that you take this under consideration, and hopefully we can have a ruling sometime early next week with respect to the use of this particular tactic by the opposition.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, Government House Leader. I will take it under consideration.

The Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul-Two Hills.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I can only assume that we're referring to the opposition whip calling for an adjournment. It's happened many times in the House before where members other than the Government House Leader have called for adjournment, so I don't see this as a point of order.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: The Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre.

Mr. Nixon: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's not the exclusive purview of the government to call those motions. It's also in the Government House Leader's agreement that it says that, so I don't think that there's a point of order here. Maybe some confusion but not a point of order.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. members. Thank you, Government House Leader.

However, at this time I will not be deferring the motion as an adjournment is always in order, so at this time there is no point of order.

Debate Continued

The Acting Speaker: We will return to Bill 18 for debate. The Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Dr. Swann: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I will be brief. I think I've come some distance on this bill since listening to the discussion, very healthy, robust debate, I must say. A little historical perspective might be helpful. When I started in this Legislature 12 years ago, it was, in fact, as a result of one environment minister, Lorne Taylor, who ensured that I got fired back in 2002 for the temerity to speak out on the importance of climate change to health, not only in violation of free speech, I guess I would say, but also disrespectful of a professional acting in a professional capacity on behalf of all the medical officers in the province, let me say, at a resolution of our association.

My only problem with this bill is the name. Clearly, like with George Bush's clean air policy back a decade ago and his momentum to bring coal higher and higher on the energy scene and call it clean coal, I see this kind of Orwellian disconnect between the name and the purpose of the bill. I can get over that given that for over at least 15 years I've watched the creation of an environment department get diminished in terms of its scope, its authority, its funding, and its stability from Ralph Klein, who was the first environment minister, through Lorne Taylor, through Rob Renner, Diana McQueen, Robin Campbell, who is now head of the coal lobbying group in Canada.

There was obviously clear conflict of interest in the kind of mandate that they were given. In fact, when I asked Rob Renner, then environment minister, what he thought his role was, he said: "It's not to protect the environment. It's to develop with a minimal environmental impact." I said: Oh. Okay. Well, who is acting for the environment, then?" "Well, it's up to the public." I think that was his comment. Well, frankly, it's government's responsibility to act on behalf of the public. I don't think any of us want big government or small government. We want the right size of government to do the job for Albertans for the long-term public interest.

The conflicting mandates that have come through this government, the neglect of the environment for at least a decade, very much a second-class order in terms of funding, the separation of sustainable resource development and forestry initially – and then, to their credit, they moved it back under environment and sustainable resource development, one of the last iterations before the change of government. I was, frankly, disappointed to see forestry taken out of environment again and put in agriculture. Be that as it may, environment needs a strong, clear, cohesive mandate and funding. I know that the organization internally has been struggling with the varying demands on it, the lack of resources, this new AEMERA, that's now sharing environmental responsibilities not only with environment but with the Alberta Energy Regulator. This cannot be sustained in terms of efficient and effective environmental monitoring and enforcement.

I've come full circle and will be supporting this bill. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to speak under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, would any members like to speak to Bill 18?

Seeing none, I will recognize the hon. Minister of Environment and Parks and minister responsible for the climate change office to close debate.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise, of course, to close debate on Bill 18. This has been a very good debate, and I think we've been able to hear some very thoughtful interventions, certainly from this side of the House and also on the other side of the House. I think we all, you know, through this debate can recommit ourselves to understanding the science that goes into monitoring and the conversation with the public that has to happen with robust monitoring. Data is one thing, but understanding that data and how it relates to our daily lives, to the cumulative effects on the landscape, and ensuring the best possible protections for our air, land, and water really must be a shared goal of this House.

What this act will do is ensure that all of the monitoring capabilities within Environment and Parks are properly aligned, that there is no overlap or crosstalk between an agency with a governance model that is not necessary and monitoring efforts that are overlapping efforts already happening in the department. We've eliminated some of those duplications, Madam Speaker. I'm very proud of that.

With that, I will move the bill for third reading.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

[The voice vote indicated that the motion for third reading carried]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Thursday, May 26, 2016

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Good afternoon. Please be seated.

Introduction of Visitors

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is an honour to introduce to you and through you to all members of this Assembly the Premier of Ontario, Kathleen Wynne. I am delighted that the Premier is in Alberta today. As I said this morning, Premier Wynne follows in a long line of Ontario Premiers interested in nation building through national leadership, working with Premiers across Canada in our country's national interest. Alberta and Ontario share extremely strong partnerships; for example, more than a thousand Ontario companies supply our energy industry, a relationship that is expected to be worth hundreds of billions of dollars in the coming years. We share common goals for growing our economy, protecting our environment, and addressing climate change.

Premier Wynne and I had a very constructive meeting this morning where we talked about issues of joint concern to our two provinces, including the need to promote jobs, prosperity, and responsible climate change policy, Mr. Speaker. We agree that economic growth and strong environmental policies go hand in hand and that through our transition to a low-carbon future our provinces can lead the way, securing jobs and prosperity for future generations. We were very pleased to announce an exciting collaboration between our two provinces that keeps us heading in that direction through the memorandum of understanding that will build on our history with respect to the Alberta Climate Change and Emissions Management Corporation and the Ontario Centres of Excellence. It's an excellent example of how we can work together to deliver innovation.

I also took the opportunity today – and I certainly hope that our colleagues here will join me – to personally thank the Premier and all citizens of Ontario for their support of our province and Fort McMurray in the face of the devastating wildfires. As fellow Canadians we share deep bonds of citizenship that entail responsibilities to each other in times of crisis, and Ontarians have shown tremendous generosity and support to the people of Alberta.

Thank you, Premier, for coming to Alberta today, thank you for your leadership that you have shown on issues that our two provinces share an interest in, and thank you to all the people of Ontario for stepping up when it counted.

I would ask the Premier of Ontario to rise to receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly. [Standing ovation]

The Speaker: Welcome, hon. Premier. Thank you to your people for their support.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Energy.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is indeed a great pleasure to introduce to you and through you today students, teachers, and parents from Worsley central school in my constituency of Dunvegan-Central Peace-Notley. This school as well as the community of Worsley are very near and dear to my heart as it was the last school I was principal of, for two years, before I retired. The students today were my preschool and kindergarten students at the time, and they are the grades 6 and 7 classes that are visiting us today.

Worsley central school is a small K to 12 school where students not only learn the basics, but they learn about the importance of community, and that goes through into the community of Worsley itself. Everyone at school looks after everyone else, and this is very true of the community of Worsley. The people at the school and the community of Worsley are some of the most genuine and good people you will ever meet, and I'm proud that they're not only my constituents, but many of them are my friends.

I would ask Ms Rowe and the parents and students of Worsley central school to rise and receive the warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Battle River-Wainwright.

Mr. Taylor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's truly an honour today to introduce to you and through you to all the members of the Assembly a parent, a teacher, and students, of course, from Forestburg school. Earlier this month I had the opportunity and privilege to meet with them and discuss what happens in the Legislature and what goes on. The students here are also very interested in what goes on because their town, Forestburg, is a coal-mining town, and it's going to be impacted by things that we do. They have clean technology out there. They want to know what's going on and learn more about the whole process. Please rise as I say your names: Mrs. Laura Pfeffer and Tracy Dietrich and the students of Forestburg school. Would my colleagues please extend the traditional warm welcome as we welcome them to the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The Member for Calgary-East.

Ms Luff: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm very excited to be able to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly a wonderful, intelligent, bright, enthusiastic group of students who I had the pleasure of speaking with earlier today. They're here from my magnificent and diverse constituency of Calgary-East. They are students of the Calgary Islamic school, and they were fortunate enough to be able to win a contest hosted by CTV. They made a video, and they won a week of Legislature school. I'm so thrilled that they are here with us today. They are here with their teacher, Mrs. Noreen Bashir; their principal, Mrs. Raiha Ali; and another teacher, Mr. Hassan Khalil. I would invite them to rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly. Assalamu Alaikum.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Hon. members, are there any other school groups today?

Seeing none, the Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much. It's my pleasure to introduce to you and through you to all members of our Assembly Dr. Carl Nohr, president of the Alberta Medical Association. You will know him yourself, Mr. Speaker, as a resident of Medicine Hat, surgeon, clinical teacher, and administrative leader. Before being elected as the Alberta Medical Association's president, Dr. Nohr was speaker of the AMA representative forum, so I'm sure that he's been to debates that rivalled that which we will have in the House today. I ask that Dr. Nohr please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of our Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Athabasca-Sturgeon-Redwater.

Mr. Piquette: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my great privilege to rise in the House today to introduce to you and through you to members of the Assembly five exceptional individuals from my riding. I'd ask that my guests rise when I call their names. Albert and Pirkko Karvonen are renowned naturalists and documentary filmmakers who have produced over 80 nature documentaries over the past 30 years and are the recipients of multiple awards. Dr. Martin Connors is a professor at Athabasca University's Faculty of Science and Technology and is the former Canada research chair in space science instrumentation and networking. Juanita Marois is a contract researcher currently with Athabasca University and one of the founders and co-chairs of the Long and Narrow lakes stewardship society. Koal Giberson is a grade 4 student at Landing Trail intermediate school in Athabasca and is the youth representative for the society. I would like my colleagues to please extend the traditional warm greetings of the House to my guests.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure today to introduce to you and through you a group of health care workers who often are the first on the scene of emergencies, performing life-saving procedures. This week we are paying tribute to Alberta's 10,000 registered paramedics during Paramedic Services Week. We are joined by Amy Benson with Edmonton's intercity paramedic response unit; Keith Makarowski, a paramedic from AHS, central zone; Heather Dutchak, a Calgary metro paramedic; and Nick Smiley, emergency communications officer with AHS EMS dispatch. Also joining us today is the director of operations for Associated Ambulance in Fort McMurray, Paul Kennedy, who was instrumental in assisting in the evacuation of the Northern Lights regional health centre.

Our paramedics are courageous, dedicated, and compassionate health care providers whose careers involve challenging hours and difficult circumstances. I believe I speak for all of us in expressing our gratitude to you all. I ask our paramedics here today to stay standing and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly. [Standing ovation]

The Speaker: Welcome and thank you.

The hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo.

Mr. Yao: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have two distinct introductions if you'll oblige me. First, it's my pleasure to introduce three long-time residents of Fort McMurray. This is their first time visiting the Legislature, and they've come to watch the proceedings of the House. They'd like to extend their appreciation to all members of this Assembly for the abundance of support and for all your thoughts and prayers during these stressful times. They are seated in the visitors' gallery. As I call your names, I ask that you please rise: Cora Johnston, Larry Johnston, and Merna Thompson. Hon. members, please join me in providing the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Mr. Yao: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is also my honour to introduce to you and through you volunteer members of the Tzu Chi foundation. These volunteers are here all the way from Vancouver to assist in the relief efforts for the citizens of Fort McMurray. The Tzu Chi foundation, under the leadership of Master Cheng Yen, offers compassionate relief to those in need. I ask that the following volunteers please rise as I call their names: Mac Miao, vice-CEO; Michael Chuang, also vice-CEO; Sophia Liao; Herbert Cheng; Snow Liu; and Lyndon Yu. I ask that this House please join me in providing my guests with the warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Wapiti.

Mr. Drysdale: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my honour to introduce to you and through you to all members of this House guests from War Amps of Canada. I ask them to stand as I mention their names. David Saunders is the chief operating officer of War Amps. Joining Mr. Saunders is a constituent of Grande Prairie-Wapiti, Shannon Krasowski, who is a regional representative for War Amps of Canada. Also here today are three young War Amps champs whose lives have been enhanced by this organization's services. They are Nathan Graham, Natalee Pon, and Marcus Ohle, who is here with his mother, Karen. My guests are seated in the members' gallery, and I ask them to stand and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Coolahan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to introduce to you and through you to the members of the Assembly Jim Vavra, a long-time constituent of Calgary's greatest constituency, Calgary-Klein, but for some reason he is on the constituency board of Calgary-Varsity. However, he did play a pivotal role in the election of the Member for Calgary-Varsity, so I guess we can forgive him. I ask Jim to rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Members' Statements

The Speaker: The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Service Dogs

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's funny in this job how you end up meeting people, the impact they have on you. Les Landry is one of those connections, and he continues to teach me the importance of service dogs.

Years ago Mr. Landry had minor surgery which resulted in life-changing complications, leaving him with extreme sustained elevated blood pressure, three strokes, and the development of epilepsy. His journey to get better made him learn about service dogs and how they are used to help lower blood pressure and detect seizures.

Miss Annie, the puppy, as she is lovingly called, first met Les when she was three months old, and they began their journey of learning and training. Within two months Annie, while she was still in training, helped lower his blood pressure and detect her first seizure.

Mr. Landry is also a survivor of PTSD. That, combined with epilepsy and the effects of strokes – he's one of the thousands of Albertans living with invisible disabilities who undergo a daily struggle to manage housing, transportation, and employment.

Annie, a service dog, is not from an ADI-accredited kennel as specified in the Service Dogs Act of Alberta, yet Annie makes life manageable. Mr. Landry knows he would not be alive without her and certainly reminds me of that every single time I communicate with him. People who need dogs like Annie often wait for many, many years, waiting for a life-saving dog.

Mr. Landry is the founder and president of Respect the Service Dog. This organization raises awareness of the value of service dogs and the integral role they play in the lives of people with disabilities, particularly those with disabilities we cannot see. There are only about 80 to 100 accredited service dogs in Alberta, but the demand is so much higher. Mr. Landry encourages all of us to advocate for people with disabilities who could live a better life with service dogs. I'm hoping one day access will be similar to access for other life-saving equipment such as wheelchairs.

I look forward to working with my colleagues to address this important issue. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre.

Stephen Harper

Mr. Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my honour to rise today to thank Prime Minister Stephen Harper for his leadership and service to our country. Principled leadership is far too rare in politics, and the Conservative Party of Canada has been lucky to have one of the most capable and principled leaders in Canadian history in Prime Minister Stephen Harper.

A statesman through and through, during his nearly 10 years as Prime Minister Stephen Harper championed policies to leave more money in the pockets of hard-working Canadians while being a responsible economic steward, creating an island of economic stability during the great recession, all the while cutting the GST and lowering taxes on Canadian families. Stephen Harper was able to move tax freedom day back by almost three weeks during his time as Prime Minister. He did that without cutting the services that Canadians need.

When the great recession happened, Stephen Harper introduced stimulus measures, he took Canada into deficit, and then he brought Canada back to surplus. He will go down in history as the only Prime Minister who actually had temporary deficits to deal with a faltering economy.

His government's fair but firm regulatory framework fostered a lasting legacy of pipelines that have been built during and after his tenure.

Internationally Prime Minister Harper elevated Canada's position as a protector of global security, anchored by the principles of freedom, democracy, human rights, the rule of law, and as a champion of free trade, opening new markets and creating jobs in Canada.

More than the successes that made up Mr. Harper's time as Prime Minister – and there were many – Stephen Harper is a man of integrity, and history will remember that. I am proud that Wildrose was Alberta's only conservative party to give its full support to Stephen Harper and the Conservative Party of Canada last federal election. Prime Minister Harper has dedicated his life to serving Canadians. As a card-carrying federal Conservative, as a Wildrose MLA, as an Albertan, and as a Canadian I humbly thank Prime Minister Harper for his service to this great country.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Athabasca-Sturgeon-Redwater.

Land Conservation in Athabasca-Sturgeon-Redwater

Mr. Piquette: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Joni Mitchell famously sang, "Don't it always seem to go that you don't know what you've got till it's gone." Luckily, that isn't always true. There are very few places in the world that are easily accessible, have world-class IT infrastructure, yet are pristine enough for the most delicate of optical and magnetic observations. The Long and Narrow lakes area in Athabasca county is such a place.

This is where you'll find the Athabasca University geophysical laboratory, where Dr. Martin Connors in co-operation with scholars from around the world does vitally important research on the aurora borealis and magnetic fields. It shows just how important locating research universities such as AU in rural areas can be and also how unique this place really is.

Dr. Connors is well aware of this fact, which is why he has joined others in the community to form the Long and Narrow lakes stewardship society, who are advocating for strong ecological protections for the area. This area features two of the most pristine lakes you will find in our province, and this group intends to keep it that way now and for future generations.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to recognize my dear friends Albert and Pirkko Karvonen, renowned documentary makers, ecologists, and naturalists. They're working tirelessly to protect the irreplaceable natural area around Amisk Lake, near Boyle. The Karvonens have generously set up a conservation easement on their land and are working with Alberta environment to have the adjacent Crown land protected for its vital wildlife corridor. It is my great honour to work with such responsible and visionary people, people who know what we've got and want to ensure that future generations will have the chance to know that, too. Alberta is in your debt.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Would you please stop the clock, Mr. Clerk?

Statement by the Speaker

Dress Code in the Chamber

The Speaker: First of all, I want to remind the members that if certain apparel is worn with slogans on it and you come into the House – and I note that there may be some here today – I would draw your attention to page 612 of House of Commons Procedure and Practice, that you seek the permission of the Speaker before doing that. I would suggest that all of the members of the House remind themselves of that practice.

Point of Order Anticipation

The Speaker: In addition, Members, I would like to now rule on a point of order from Oral Question Period yesterday, raised by the Government House Leader, concerning anticipation. This was raised in response to a set of questions that were posed by the Official Opposition House Leader. I deferred my ruling until today in order to review the exchange, which can be found on page 1144 of Hansard, May 25, 2016. The Government House Leader indicated that the questions were in connection with Bill 20, which was on the Order Paper for consideration yesterday and was therefore in violation, he argued, of Standing Order 23(e). That Standing Order reads as follows:

23 A Member will be called to order by the Speaker if, in the Speaker's opinion, that Member

- (e) anticipates, contrary to good parliamentary practice, any matter already on the Order Paper or on notice for consideration on that day.

Hon. members should be aware that the rule against anticipation has been interpreted to apply when questions pertain to the specific content of a bill that is up for consideration later that same day. This rule is not violated when there is a question about government policy in relation to the bill.

I have ruled a number of times on this subject, and I would refer any members to my rulings of May 18, 2016, page 1012 of Hansard; November 19, 2015, page 539 of Hansard; and June 17, 2015, pages 49 and 50 of Hansard. I've reviewed the exchange, and it is clear that the questions posed were not dealing with the specific actions of a particular bill. In fact, as I read Hansard, there is no mention of Bill 20. Accordingly, there is no point of order here.

However, I want to remind all members to be more aware of the rule against anticipation and to exercise due care when they are crafting their questions so as to not violate this rule as we move forward in this spring sitting.

With that, start the clock, Mr. Clerk.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The Leader of the Official Opposition.

Carbon Levy and Energy Costs

Mr. Jean: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. There is no doubt that the NDP carbon tax will put added costs on our natural gas industry here at home. By 2018 this government, actually, is pegging natural gas rates at $3 per gigajoule, and the carbon tax will add another buck-fifty per gigajoule. That's a lot of money. That's a 50 per cent increase for families, charities, hospitals, schools, businesses. Anyone in Alberta who relies on natural gas for heating or power will see their prices go way up. How does adding these extra costs help Alberta families or the Albertans who work in our natural gas industry at all?

Ms Notley: You know, Mr. Speaker, last week our government proudly announced the expansion of the Royal Tyrrell Museum, and it looks, quite frankly, like the Official Opposition needs its own wing.

The debate on whether climate change is real just rages on in the ranks of the Official Opposition. Just this week the Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo retweeted that climate change was a hoax. When asked about it, he could only say that he was pretty much in the middle of the road, somewhere between the science and the deniers. Our government is not in the middle of the road. We are with the scientists, and we will take action on climate change.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. Premier.

Mr. Jean: Tens of thousands of Albertans out of work as a result of this government, and that's the answer.

With the NDP's risky accelerated coal shutdown, we will need to be able to attract investment into our natural gas industry – and fast – if we are to help supply the lost power to our electricity grid that Albertans depend on. But the problem is that every time this government raises taxes, it puts Alberta at a greater competitive disadvantage with other natural gas producing jurisdictions in Canada and around the world. If there's no harmonization of carbon prices across North America, then it only hurts Alberta and Albertans. Why doesn't the Premier understand this?

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, if we continue the 10-year-long, failed policies of the past and refuse to deal with climate change in a responsible way, that, too, will hurt Albertans, and we are not going to go down that road. We are going to work with industry to work through the various elements of the coal phase-out. We will consult with them, and we will make sure it is done in a way that respects their interests and ensures that our industry and our electricity grid remain affordable for consumers.

Mr. Jean: When it comes to our power grid, the NDP is embarking down a risky path, and to blame the PC's terrible fiscal management in the past is not helpful. A report from FirstEnergy is pegging the cost to replace coal generation at around $16 billion without pricing growth or the addition of new facilities into the equation. In the meantime the NDP are making natural gas far more expensive. Altogether, it means either skyrocketing power prices or massive government subsidies. Either way, it's Albertans that will pay the bill. Will the Premier admit to the alarming amount of uncertainty in costs that this government's policies are having on our electricity grid?

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, by introducing a plan to phase out coal by 2030 – that is not alarming. That's not reactive. That's not happening tomorrow. We are working with industry thoughtfully, collaboratively, in a well-informed, evidence-based way. We are making a change because it is a change that is long overdue. We are the province that needs to act on coal, and we will.

Carbon Levy Cost to Albertans

Mr. Jean: The Premier knows that her carbon tax will make life much more expensive for Alberta families. Her environment minister stated that it would add another hundred dollars of indirect costs to families each and every year without any paperwork to back up these numbers whatsoever, I might add. The Premier refused to give any answers to these simple questions from the Member for Calgary-Foothills just yesterday. Alberta families deserve to know this information before the carbon tax is fully implemented. Will the Premier release her full impact study of the carbon tax, the financial information, and if not, why not?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Well, in fact, our climate change leadership plan is based on an exceptionally well-documented, well-researched plan by Dr. Andrew Leach, and it is within that document that the vast majority of the projections are included. They're available. I would suggest that the members opposite read them. That is the way we are going to go forward, and we're going to work with stakeholders throughout our province to ensure that this matter moves forward in a way that ensures affordability for low- and middle-income Albertans at the same time.

Mr. Jean: Clearly, Mr. Speaker, Albertans have every reason to be suspicious of this NDP carbon tax when the Premier refuses to release the full information to Albertans regarding the costs that this tax will have on families, businesses, charities, and all of our front-line services in Alberta. It's a big cost, and they deserve to know. Quite frankly, it's irresponsible. We know that the carbon tax means much higher prices for consumer goods, but it also will trickle down in higher costs to pay for municipal services and even education for our children. Did the Premier's analysis of costs of the carbon tax include higher property taxes, higher school and bus fees for children?

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

2:00

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. What is irresponsible is the members opposite walking around and throwing out numbers like a thousand dollars a year based on studies where the very authors of those studies have discredited the conclusions reached by the members opposite, telling them that they are purposely misinterpreting and miscommunicating the elements of the studies. It's that kind of fearmongering that just ruins the debate and makes it very difficult for Albertans to figure out why they should believe the opposition on anything.

Mr. Jean: Hiding information from Albertans is not helpful. This isn't difficult. The Premier says that the cost of the carbon tax will be well over $600 for the average family, but she is either failing to be up front with Albertans about all the new costs this carbon tax will have across our economy or she just never did the research. Which is it? This government should table their numbers and show Albertans their math so families can understand the full costs of this carbon tax. I will ask again: will the Premier release the full impact study of the carbon tax on Alberta families and the added cost to charities, businesses, and all of our front-line services?

Ms Notley: You know, first of all, Mr. Speaker, I've never actually used that number. Once again the member opposite is using incorrect numbers. That being said, what I would suggest is that members opposite, who are so fundamentally opposed to our plan on climate change, should tell Albertans what they would do differently because all we hear is: no, no, no; let's dig our heads further into the sand and pretend there is no problem. As the Official Opposition they have an obligation to tell people what they would do instead. [interjections]

The Speaker: Quiet, hon. government members.
The hon. Member for Strathmore-Brooks.

Government Policies

Mr. Fildebrandt: Mr. Speaker, today Alberta welcomed Ontario's Liberal Premier, Kathleen Wynne, to the Legislative Assembly. While I'm sure their talk session was valuable, we aren't sure what benefit Albertans can get from Ontario's emissions plan. For power consumers it's meant skyrocketing power bills, massive subsidies to unprofitable initiatives, and Auditor General reports into billions of wasted tax dollars. A few months ago our Premier praised the Ontario plan. Is the Premier still endorsing this plan, and if so, what part does she think will benefit Albertans?

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, I would suggest on the first point that the level of diplomacy that's being demonstrated by the members opposite demonstrates exactly why we've made no progress across this country over the last 10 years.

What I will say is that I endorse the leadership of any leader in this country who understands the need to take action on climate change and to move forward to protect the health of Canadians for future generations.

Mr. Fildebrandt: Well, let's talk about diplomacy with other Premiers. We can't help but notice that the Premier to date has not held a single meeting with one of our key allies, Saskatchewan Premier Brad Wall. Saskatchewan is not only a close neighbour and friend to Alberta but has very similar interests in promoting both our energy and agriculture sectors. They unequivocally support pipelines, free trade, reforming equalization, and advocating for all of our export industries. To date the Premier has only taken shots at Premier Wall. Will the Premier build a united front on these issues and invite the Premier of Saskatchewan here the way she is . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, once again the members opposite are simply incorrect. I've met with the Premier that they are referring to on a number of occasions. We've had conversations about Energy East; we've had conversations about carbon pricing; we've had conversations about disaster recovery efforts. We've done that, so quite frankly they should do their homework.

Mr. Fildebrandt: The Premier has never invited Mr. Wall here, Mr. Speaker.

Currently Ontario has the largest subnational sovereign debt on the planet. They're now even receiving equalization payments. It's an example of what happens when a government fails to get its spending under control. It means higher taxes, but it also means less services for those in need. This week the NDP is scrapping our already high legislative debt ceiling, and Alberta has suffered four credit downgrades in just five months. Will the Premier stop following the example set by the Ontario Liberals, put a cap on borrowing, and get control of our out-of-control spending?

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, I . . .

Mr. Cooper: Point of order.

The Speaker: Point of order is noted.

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, in the past when Alberta has actually been able to play a leadership role in the country, they have done so by being grown-ups, by having conversations with their colleagues across the country, by being respectful, and by finding the kinds of things in common that they can work together on. Just today we have had demonstrated to all Albertans very clearly why these folks over there are simply not ready to govern. [interjection]

The Speaker: Hon. Member for Strathmore-Brooks, would you please keep the volume of your responses down.

The Member for Calgary-North West.

Premier's Office Communications Staff

Ms Jansen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday I asked the government about the million-dollar political team they have assembled to deal with issues in the Premier's office. I asked why all these highly paid communication folks came from outside the province at a time when jobs are desperately needed inside the province, and the response was: well, when New Democrats get elected, they want to hire people who share their world view. To the Premier: why does the NDP world view have to be trotted out by out-of-work NDP staffers from Manitoba and not Alberta?

Ms Notley: Well, you know, Mr. Speaker, with the greatest of respect, I do realize that there are many members of the third party who wish that their friends could have kept their political jobs, but when you hire staff who are definitively working in political positions, it's important to hire staff that come with experience, experience governing and experience dealing with issues across the country, as well as people who can give you political advice. We hire people on that basis, which is exactly what the previous government did, which is exactly what the Harper government did, which is exactly what happens . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. Premier.
First supplemental.

Ms Jansen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's the Doing Things Differently Gang.

Given that this government claimed to be streamlining its Public Affairs Bureau yet added a number of new people whose sole task seems to be grinding out press releases, it appears to be sharing the NDP world view in a very pricey endeavour. Along with their million-dollar issues management team, how much of a bill are taxpayers sucking up so NDP spin doctors can preach your world view?

Ms Notley: To be perfectly clear, Mr. Speaker, the people in my office, who I believe is what the member is referring to, operate within a budget which is effectively the same as the budget that existed under the previous Premier and is extensively lower than the budget that existed under the Premier prior to that, a good friend of the member opposite, I believe. In fact, I believe that we're doing our job in a cautious and financially responsible way, and we will certainly continue to do so.

Ms Jansen: Mr. Speaker, given that we've endured so many lectures from the Doing Things Differently Gang about how they're bringing fairness and perspective back to Alberta for Albertans, it's startling to hear that they needed to go outside Alberta for the team to message that out. Again to the Premier: now that you've hung an Albertans Need Not Apply sign on your comms shop, what actions do you recommend for unemployed Alberta comms professionals other than to apply for EI?

Ms Notley: Well, again, Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the joy of exaggeration. You know, I probably did a little bit of it in my career in the opposition as well; there's no question. But suffice to say that there are many, many long-term, dedicated Albertans who are working in my office, and I very much appreciate the support that they give to our government each and every day.

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-Currie.

2:10 Publicly Funded Health Care

Mr. Malkinson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Copeman Healthcare Centre operates three private clinics in Alberta that charge membership fees for health services. Serious allegations are being made about this private medical facility's billing practices. To the Minister of Health: how is the minister ensuring that Albertans are not on the hook for any inappropriate billing?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the important question. The allegations being made are very serious, and the business is currently being audited by Alberta Health. If there are any findings that show that the company breached the Canada Health Act, we will act. In light of any of these new allegations of fraud, I've directed my ministry to take a more rigorous approach, and there is going to be an investigation. I want to be clear that we will not allow excessive billing practices that undermine Albertans' access to universal public health care.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Malkinson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the allegations include preferential treatment and inappropriate fees that appear to go against the spirit of the Alberta Health Care Insurance Act, which prohibits physicians from charging patients for insured health services also billed to the province, again to the same minister: what assurance can the minister provide that our public health care system is being protected?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I am incredibly proud to be a part of a government that believes public health care is a fundamental right that we must protect. I understand that we have a responsibility to safeguard our public health system from actions that undermine it, and the government takes the Canada Health Act seriously. We will investigate any alleged breaches to that act. You have my word.

The Speaker: The second supplemental.

Mr. Malkinson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that our health care costs continue to rise and given the economic reality that we are currently experiencing, again to the Minister of Health: how is the minister ensuring that public resources are being used prudently?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We will not allow excessive billing practices that undermine Albertans' access to universal public health care. This problem has persisted in Alberta for years thanks to the former government's inaction. We know that it can't continue, and that's why we are taking action.

Not only does the Official Opposition want to cut billions from health care, Mr. Speaker, but they'd love the idea of Albertans having to pay for it.

PDD Service Eligibility

Mrs. Pitt: Mr. Speaker, today I spoke on the phone with Rebecca Neel. She is a bright young woman who has been self-advocating for help. Rebecca is a dedicated student who is always studying hard, but due to her quadriplegic cerebral palsy she requires extra help with daily activities. She wrote to the minister's office for help and urged for severe cerebral palsy to be covered for services under persons with developmental disabilities, or PDD. She got a generic response back from your office, but she wants to know today, to the minister: will you commit to a firm timeline to give Rebecca a clear answer?

The Speaker: The Minister of Human Services.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Member, for the question. I will not speak to the specifics of this particular case, but when we get e-mails, we do provide a generic response, which is followed by a more detailed response. I may have acknowledged that I have received that e-mail, but usually a detailed response and follow-up is provided by the staff, and that will be the case in this particular instance as well.

Mrs. Pitt: Mr. Speaker, Rebecca hasn't received any further response from the minister.

According to the Cerebral Palsy Association in Alberta website this disability can be as mild as just a weakness in one hand ranging to an almost complete lack of movement. Given that for someone with this condition daily living activities wouldn't be possible without a caregiver or financial help and given that changes could be made to allow case-by-case consideration of who would be eligible for PDD services, will the minister commit to re-evaluating the current blanket ban for services if an individual has an IQ over 70?

The Speaker: The Minister of Human Services.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I can assure the member that our government is committed to providing needed and necessary services to those Albertans who need those services. That's why for PDD we have increased funding, and we are stabilizing the services instead of what the opposition would do: cut those services.

Mrs. Pitt: Mr. Speaker, it's completely unacceptable that this government thinks a Wildrose government would treat the vulnerable like this.

I have a real solution here today for the minister and cabinet. Given that this solution would ensure that people like Rebecca can live their lives independently and get assistance without constantly . . .

The Speaker: Hon. member, could I ask you to eliminate the preamble. You're past the group of five. What's your question?

Mrs. Pitt: Given that under 1(1)(c)(ii) of the persons with developmental disabilities act the cabinet has the authority under regulation to define eligibility, to the minister: when can Rebecca and other Albertans affected with developmental disabilities expect an answer?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Human Services.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Member, for the question. I said that I will look into this particular matter, but I will not speak to the specifics.

This program was there before us. We have done two things to this program. Whatever cuts were proposed by the previous government, we have reversed that and added funding to that program. The second thing: instead of imposing a solution on that sector, we have started consulting with them. I will work with the sector, work with the individuals, and work with the advocates to make sure that Albertans get the supports they need.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Motor Vehicle Registration and Key Tag Services

Mr. Ellis: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. During the Service Alberta estimates the minister indicated that work has finally commenced to update the Alberta motor vehicle system, or MOVES. Last year's budget did not include any capital dollars for updating this old and archaic system, but this year we are told that $4 million has been allocated to capital planning and that the department has already spent an additional $250,000 to get the ball rolling. To the Minister of Service Alberta: what progress has been made to facilitate planning to improve our motor vehicle system?

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much for the question. On behalf of the hon. minister I will take that question under advisement. I want to assure the member in the House, though, that the government is committed to making sure that we have the most effective system in all respects for motor vehicles.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you minister, and thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that I recently raised important concerns regarding challenges that are faced by the War Amps key tag program as it relates to MOVES and given that during estimates the minister stated that "we're in some initial considerations of how we can find other creative solutions to this issue," again to the Minister of Service Alberta: can you outline what creative solutions you are looking at to improve the key tag program?

The Speaker: The Minister of Economic Development and Trade.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and I'll thank the member for the question. As the Minister of Service Alberta indicated in estimates, there are a number of different options that her ministry is currently exploring. Before those options are presented, she's working with different stakeholders, including the Ministry of Transportation, to look at options to be able to provide to Albertans.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the key tag program is not only part of a charitable organization promoting health and wellness in support of Albertans who face special challenges as well as children and seniors and veterans and that it also provides a vital service to Albertans, to the same minister: will you commit today, please, to personally meeting with the War Amps organization?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and I'll thank the member for the question. Obviously, War Amps is a very important stakeholder as are a number of other organizations throughout the province. Our government is committed to especially working with our vulnerable populations to ensure that they have the same access as every Albertan throughout the province. So the minister will be engaging with a variety of stakeholders.

Thank you.

Blood Plasma Supply

Mr. Barnes: When a Canadian organization expressed interest in expanding into Alberta to offer paid blood plasma collection services, the Health minister immediately decided to get in the way. This is despite the fact that 75 per cent of our blood plasma is purchased from paid donors in the United States. When we asked in estimates why our blood collection budget has grown by nearly $30 million over the past two years, she blamed most of it on the exchange rate. Isn't it hypocritical and wasteful to choose expensive American products over plasma sourced here in Alberta?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to help educate the member opposite about the way the blood system works here in Canada. There was a tainted-blood scandal many years ago, in the 1980s, and a number of people contracted illnesses. As a response Canada worked to create Canadian Blood Services, and it's worked on a voluntary basis for many years very successfully.

There are plasma products that are purchased around the world from various organizations, and medications are added to that plasma. Even next door, where they are moving forward with paid plasma, there is no ability to use the systems that are required to be able to make them into the medicines. They will still be shipping them over the border and having to buy them back, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Mr. Barnes: Mr. Speaker, the minister likes to boast that she relies on evidence, but given that Canadian Blood Services has declared that paid plasma is every bit as safe and since they and Health Canada know that paid plasma is absolutely essential to ensuring adequate supply and protecting lives and given that the evidence has shown that paid and voluntary donation services can safely coexist, will the minister turn out her ideological buddies and start making sound decisions in the best interest of all Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I do use evidence, and the evidence is very clear that we have a system here in Canada that's focused on a voluntary basis. Yes, all blood products are absolutely safe, blood products that are bought from across the border or blood products that are within Canada. We have a voluntary system, and I am absolutely excited about working with partners, just as they've done in Ontario and Quebec, to try to bolster that voluntary system in any way we can. But we will continue to buy plasma products should we require them because it's important that Albertans have access to the products that they need to be safe and healthy.

Mr. Barnes: Mr. Speaker, the facts are that blood plasma donors are compensated in other Canadian provinces. Given that this is done safely and it ensures a sufficient supply of life-saving blood products and since we have heard that this safe, common, widely endorsed, and crucially essential practice makes the minister, and I quote, quite nervous, I have to ask: is it a feature of the NDP world view to deliberately cost Albertans tens of millions of dollars in the blind pursuit of ideology, or is it just an unfortunate side effect?

Ms Hoffman: Just to be clear, yet again what's being asserted by the member opposite is not founded in good research. Let me explain that next door, in the one province that is moving forward at this point with paid plasma products, they are not able to fractionate them on this side of the border. That product will still have to go south of the border to be fractionated and bought back, Mr. Speaker, so exchange rates would still play a role.

Let's remember that during the election the Wildrose said that they would ship people south of the border to get services. I'm sorry. If we have to buy blood products, so be it. We believe in a public health care system, and I'm proud to stand up for it.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Battle River-Wainwright.

Carbon Levy and Postsecondary Education Costs

Mr. Taylor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Feedback from postsecondary institutions indicates that they are having to cut back programs, services, and positions just to stay open. This is even before the carbon tax will be implemented. The carbon tax will increase costs for heating, electricity, transportation, and the list goes on. Institutions are concerned. To the minister: why are you imposing this devastating new carbon tax on postsecondary institutions at a time when they are already struggling?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Environment and Parks.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, this government restored funding to postsecondary institutions and froze tuition, making good on our promises. I know that this is a wildly innovative thing to do according to the Official Opposition; that is, to keep the pledges one makes during an election campaign. However, it has been done, and we have moved forward.

In addition, of course, we are going to be making a great deal of investment in energy efficiency so that all institutions, whether they're health care or postsecondary, can reduce their emissions and therefore their costs, which is exactly the point of pricing carbon.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Mr. Taylor: As I said, they are having cutbacks at this present time.

Given that tuition fees will be lifted next year at roughly the same time that the carbon tax will be increasing costs at postsecondary institutions and given that the combined impact of these two realities means that there will be a large increase in costs for these institutions, how can the minister guarantee that the cost increases caused by this government's risky carbon tax won't be just passed down to students, or does it even care?

The Speaker: The minister of environment.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, our budget contains within it a significant amount of investment in energy efficiency and also in renewables. We will have more to say about our plans for the energy efficiency agency going forward.

You know, what Albertans have asked us to do is to diversify the economy, use the carbon levy to reinvest in the economy to create good jobs and to make our economy resilient for the carbon-constrained future. Underlying all of that, Mr. Speaker, is that Albertans understand that climate change is real, which is not something that the Official Opposition has embraced at all. [interjections]

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Let us remember, Members, about saying things that might extend the volume in this room with the other side.

Mr. Taylor: You know, I asked about the costs that are increased for students.

Given that the Wildrose believes in protecting students from the rising cost of education by tying tuition increases to inflation and given that this government has already shown that their ideology-based budgeting process is leaving postsecondary institutions at risk, will the minister adopt a common-sense approach to tuition and stop exposing students and postsecondary institutions to the government's risky economic experiments?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I find it interesting that the Member for Battle River-Wainwright is talking about how he's interested in protecting students when, in fact, in estimates in November 2015 he was waxing on about how raising tuition would allow for a better quality of education here in Alberta. He obviously either doesn't remember what he was saying in November or he's flip-flopped on his policy. Regardless, nobody trusts the Wildrose to protect postsecondary education in this province.

The Speaker: The Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster.

Oil Sands Secondary Organic Aerosol Emissions

Dr. Starke: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. A Canadian study published in this week's edition of the prestigious scientific journal Nature has raised serious concerns. It indicates that the oil sands are a major source of secondary organic aerosols, or SOAs. Production rates of some 45 to 84 tonnes per day make the oil sands one of the largest anthropogenic sources of SOAs in North America. To the environment minister: what current methods are being used to measure and monitor the levels of SOAs in Alberta?

The Speaker: The hon. minister of environment.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for the question. Indeed, Alberta environment officials worked with the committee that published this study because we thought the findings would be valuable to how our province approaches air monitoring. The findings from this study will help us better understand potential environmental and health impacts of the oil sands. We're currently reviewing the report.

Thank you.

Dr. Starke: Mr. Speaker, given that the environment minister has previously told this Assembly as well as members of the AAMD and C that beyond carbon dioxide, all coal plant emissions, including NOx, SOx, and particulate matter, must be considered and given that these emissions were given as one of the reasons for the accelerated phase-out of coal-fired generation, to the minister: applying the same criteria, if SOAs from the oil sands are determined to be similarly deleterious to the environment, will you shut down the oil sands like you are shutting down coal?

The Speaker: The minister of environment.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, our energy industry continues to power the Alberta economy, and we know that industry wants to work with us to ensure that those resources are developed as responsibly as possible. That is why this government, for example, is moving forward with the joint oil sands monitoring agreement with the federal government, and it is why we passed new legislation just this morning to ensure that we have the most robust monitoring and that we have the most resources going to where they ought to go.

Dr. Starke: Well, Mr. Speaker, it appears that there's a double standard here. Given that the environment minister was recently given an award for promoting the health of Alberta – and I congratulate her for that – through the phase-out of coal and given that long-term exposure to SOAs can also result in significant health risks not unlike those attributed to coal, to the Health minister: you have said that the phase-out of coal was done in the interests of the respiratory health of Albertans. Does it fit with the NDP world view to use the same rationale to eliminate oil sands production?

The Speaker: The Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. Certainly, we are very proud of the fact that we have a climate leadership strategy. Our intentions are mapped out in that climate leadership strategy. As you'll see, we had support from oil sands producers. They stood on a stage with us. They believe that our vision for moving forward with a responsible climate leadership strategy is going to be good for Alberta, good for their companies, and that means it's going to be good for the oil sands.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for West Yellowhead.

Pipeline Approval

Mr. Rosendahl: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. With the drop in the global price of oil we know now more than ever how important it is that we diversify our markets for our energy products. I've heard from constituents and industry alike who've told me that if we want to increase our market access going forward, we need to ensure that these new markets see Alberta as one of the most environmentally responsible energy producers in the world. To the Minister of Energy: how is the climate leadership plan influencing the national conversation on pipelines?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Energy.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you for the question. Certainly, our climate leadership plan places us in good stead going forward in the conversation. The week after it was announced, I had comments from a national group that said that it had already turned the conversation around on pipelines. We're balancing the need for stronger action on climate change with sustainably developing our resources. Just recently an Abacus poll showed that two-thirds of Canadians support pipelines as well as a renewable energy strategy.

Mr. Rosendahl: Thank you, Minister. Given that the previous approach to pipelines and market access has not been working and given that we need to ensure that we are working in a collaborative way if we want to continue to move forward, again to the Minister of Energy: how has industry responded to our approach?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Energy.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you for the question. Industry absolutely understands that we need to work thoroughly and collaboratively as partners to get pipelines built to tidewater. That's why recently Murray Edwards of CNRL and Brian Ferguson of Cenovus published an op-ed on behalf of many companies. [interjections] They said:

It's time for a new conversation about building pipelines in this country . . . about how Canada can get full value for its oil production while also addressing environmental concerns, including climate change. This dialogue needs to take place . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

I want to remind members again. Keep the volume down, please. Hon. members, I'm looking at you.

Second supplemental.

Mr. Rosendahl: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that increased market access is not only good for Alberta but good for all of Canada and given that we've seen some hesitancy from parts of the country in getting onboard, to the same minister: are we getting through to our provincial counterparts?

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you again for the question. Mr. Speaker, just this morning I was pleased to hear Premier Wynne say that she supports our approach. She said: it is very important to me that within the context of the Canadian energy strategy we find a way to support the environmentally responsible transportation of fuel. We will continue to have respectful and thoughtful conversations with both our federal and provincial counterparts as we move forward with this important project.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Drumheller-Stettler.

Farm and Ranch Worker Regulation Working Groups

Mr. Strankman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last Friday this government finally announced the membership of the farm and ranch worker round-tables. Inevitably, there have already been complaints from producer groups and the public about the makeup. It is vital that farmers and ranchers and especially members of the round-tables have faith in this process. They must be assured there will be no political interference. To the minister: if your government disagrees with the input from these round-tables, will the government ignore those recommendations and arbitrarily decide the legislation?

The Speaker: The Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. I'm quite proud of the makeup of these tables. We've had a real good balance from various groups, including farmers and ranchers. With that balance, I'm looking forward to the recommendations they're going to make over the year. We need those recommendations. As I'm sure the member knows, agriculture is very diverse in this province. We need those recommendations going forward so government can write those regulations, and I'm really looking forward to that process.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Strankman: Thank you again, Mr. Speaker. Given that this legislative process has been flawed from the very beginning with the lack of consultation before legislation and given that we have seen very little openness and transparency from this government, to the minister: is there a framework or working documents of any sort that your mediators and round-table members will start with, and will you table them in the House?

The Speaker: The hon. minister of agriculture.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. There are going to be six technical working groups, made up, again, like I said earlier, from various interests right across the province, very balanced interests. I'm looking forward to the recommendations. It's going to give them the opportunity to have an open voice in any of these technical working groups going forward so that they have their input. I'm looking forward to the recommendations. As I'm sure the member might realize, these are recommendations, but it is the government's role to write regulations.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Strankman: Thank you again, Mr. Speaker. Given that nobody cares more about the safety of farms and ranches than those men and women that own them and given that a vast number of those already have private insurance equal to or superior to WCB levels, to the minister: if the round-tables come back to the government and the recommendations are that equivalent private insurance would suffice, would you act upon it, or has this possibility been completely negated from the start?

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. I might remind the member that the WCB, Workers' Compensation Board, is in effect as of January 1 of this year.

Mr. Nixon: It's ineffective. Yes. We know.

Mr. Carlier: It's been very effective. Thank you. It's been very effective. A lot of farmers and ranchers right across the province have signed up for it knowing the value to it, knowing that it protects their workers and themselves as well, Mr. Speaker. Like I said, the vast majority have signed up for it, and so far it's been a very good process.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Lougheed.

Indigenous Postsecondary Student Supports

Mr. Rodney: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The U of A has proposed several self-funded, shovel-ready projects such as the Maskwa house of learning which could provide great benefits to students within one year of construction starting. Alberta's indigenous population is young. It's growing at two and a half times the rate of Canada's general population and experiences lower educational and career attainment. To the Minister of Advanced Education: when will you commit to evaluating whether Maskwa house will be deemed worthy enough to be included in the capital plan?

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you to the member for the question. I appreciate his interest, that is shared by many in this Legislature, about improving indigenous participation rates at our postsecondaries across Alberta. This is something that our government takes very seriously, and I'm personally committed to making sure that indigenous members of our province start participating in postsecondary education at rates equivalent to other Albertans. To that end, Mr. Speaker, I'm looking at Maskwa house with great interest as well as a number of other initiatives that postsecondaries are taking to improve indigenous participation. We will make a decision on going forward with those things . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Mr. Rodney: Thank you for the answer, but the question was: when?

Given that the Advanced Education minister predicts postsecondary enrolment for 2016-2017 at more than 263,000 students and given that Maskwa house would be an incredible asset for both indigenous and nonindigenous postsecondary students, to the same minister: how much longer will all Alberta students be denied this visionary resource which would increase their access to invaluable cultural learning and economic opportunities across this province?

The Speaker: The Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, there are a number of interesting initiatives happening with indigenous education all across the province. The University of Lethbridge has been doing great work with the First Nations colleges in the southern part of the province to increase indigenous participation. Northern Lakes College in the Minister of Municipal Affairs' riding is also doing fantastic work increasing indigenous participation in postsecondary institutions. We're looking at all of the things that postsecondary institutions are doing across the province to increase indigenous participation, and we will implement the best practices so that we can encourage further indigenous participation in postsecondary education.

The Speaker: Thank you.

Mr. Rodney: Given that 10 other projects are proceeding in the adult education capital plan and given that an increase in enrolment is expected for indigenous Albertans and given the importance of ensuring that Alberta's indigenous students have equal access to developing the skills required to more fully participate in the opportunities available in our province, to the minister: it's one thing to talk about it, but specifically can you tell us exactly how you will support initiatives such as those at not only the U of A but at other postsecondary institutions across Alberta and when?

The Speaker: The Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, what we won't do is cut $4 billion from our provincial budget, which would necessarily impact the ability of postsecondary education all across the province to attract and teach students. Furthermore, like I said in my previous answer, we are working with our postsecondary partners all across the province to look at the best practices for increasing indigenous participation, and we are committed to furthering that work as we go along.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

2:40 Affordable Housing and Supportive Living

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In speaking with communities, municipal leaders, and social agencies, I've heard that finding safe and affordable housing is becoming more difficult as the economic downturn continues to affect families and individuals across this province. To the Minister of Seniors and Housing: how is the ministry addressing the long wait-lists faced by Albertans who are in need of affordable housing?

The Speaker: The minister of housing.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm proud to say that Budget 2016 includes nearly $1.2 billion in capital investment for Alberta's affordable and social housing portfolio. This significant investment will build more affordable housing and renew existing housing, meaning more people will be moved off waiting lists and into safe and affordable homes. Over the next five years we're investing more than $147 million into projects for new housing in communities of greatest need, more than $581 million for major replacements and renewal, and $120 million in new housing for indigenous people off-reserve.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that Albertans are aware that new housing units are needed across Alberta and given that we also have older social housing facilities that were left to deteriorate, to the Minister of Seniors and Housing: what is being done to protect these housing assets and bring them back into the system to add to the much-needed housing supply?

Ms Sigurdson: Mr. Speaker, the member has touched on a key challenge we face. Most of the government-owned or -supported housing stock is more than 30 years old and in need of significant maintenance and repairs. These units must be renewed and preserved so they can contribute to the system in the future. I'm proud to say that Budget 2016 invests more than $238 million to help maintain and preserve these existing social housing facilities and, as mentioned previously, more than $581 million for major replacements and renewal. These investments will create safe, affordable homes for Albertans who need them.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thanks to the minister for that answer. Given that evidence indicates that when Albertans have a safe place to call home, their quality of life improves dramatically and their economic security increases and given that some Albertans are facing adversity that requires more than just a home, to the same minister: how is our government addressing housing for individuals who require wraparound support?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to tell the member that my ministry is working with the Human Services ministry to develop new housing programs to support Albertans who are facing homelessness or have specialized needs. Budget 2016 earmarks $13 million in capital investment from the Ministry of Seniors and Housing towards this work. Projects will address the needs of individuals who require wraparound or comprehensive support, including Albertans with developmental disabilities or mobility challenges. Projects will also address the need for permanent supportive housing for homeless Albertans. I look forward to providing more details about these projects in the very near future.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

The Member for Livingstone-MacLeod.

Special Areas

Mr. Stier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Unlike most rural municipalities, Alberta's special areas were created in 1938, under the authority of the Special Areas Act, as a result of hardship brought upon southeastern Alberta during the drought of the '30s. Given that the minister is about to undertake a summerlong tour around the province, including a stop in Hanna, which is the administration centre for the remaining special areas, in an effort to consult and to gather feedback before passing the MGA bill this fall, to the Premier: will the MGA consultations consider changes to the administration and structure of special areas?

The Speaker: The Minister of Economic Development and Trade.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and I'll thank the member for that question. The Minister of Municipal Affairs will be travelling around Alberta throughout the month of June, doing extensive consultations on the existing MGA. I can assure the member that the issue that he's speaking of, the special areas, is a topic that, actually, I've spoken about with their hon. member who represents the area. We're wanting to work collaboratively with the existing board that's there to look at solutions for the long term.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Stier: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister for that response. Given that the government is conducting a comprehensive review of the act, as we've just discussed, and given that the government's 1961 Hanson commission recommended a return to locally elected municipal government, to the minister, then: what has been the justification for maintaining this agency known as the special areas for this long?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and I'll thank the member for the question. It's unfortunate that the third party can't respond because, quite frankly, "Why has it remained special areas since 1961?" is a fantastic question for the former government. I mean, the original reason that that area was designated special areas is because it's a huge amount of land, very sparsely populated, and there were challenges with that being represented as a traditional MD or county.

Again, the Minister of Municipal Affairs is open to looking at conversations as far as transitioning to a locally elected board.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
Second supplemental.

Mr. Stier: Thank you again, Mr. Speaker and to the minister. Given that in the Municipal Affairs business plan one of the key strategies is to "modernize the Municipal Government Act . . . to support Alberta's municipalities in governing in an accountable, collaborative, sustainable, inclusive and effective manner," to the minister: can you say today if the updated MGA will include any changes to the Special Areas Act?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I'll thank the member for the question. The member will know that we can't speak to legislation that hasn't been tabled in this House. But I will say, regarding the member's question, that the Minister of Municipal Affairs is open and has been open to municipalities in her consultations and is looking for solutions that not only our local officials want, but we're committed to working in partnership with our municipalities in furthering the best interests of all Albertans.

Thank you.

The Speaker: In 30 seconds we will start Members' Statements.

Climate Change Initiatives in Banff-Cochrane

Mr. Westhead: Just like our government, municipalities in the constituency of Banff-Cochrane are also taking their commitment to the environment seriously. I'm proud that the mayors of Banff and Canmore added their voices in support of our climate leadership plan. Banff Mayor Karen Sorensen said, "We applaud the direction toward climate leadership taken by the Province, which will help us sustain our tourism economy and provide a better future for all Albertans." Similarly, Canmore Mayor John Borrowman said: "The plan resonates well with the Town of Canmore . . . I am proud to see Alberta taking on this environmental leadership role nationally and internationally."

Facing the reality of a changing climate, we all have to do our part. Towards this end, Banff and Canmore have achieved a high degree of success with their Roam regional transit system, supported by provincial GreenTRIP funding. These two municipalities have also created solar incentive programs and have implemented anti-idling policies. Banff recently adopted a policy to reduce emissions from their vehicle fleet. The town of Cochrane is also taking a leadership role with its renewable energy framework, a commitment to significantly reduce per capita energy consumption, and a plan to divert 80 per cent of waste from landfills.

Another fine example is the municipal district of Bighorn, a founding and active member of the Southern Alberta Energy from Waste Association and the Calgary region airshed zone. These are groups dedicated to improving management of waste streams and air quality monitoring respectively.

Taken together, Mr. Speaker, it's clear that municipalities in Banff-Cochrane have taken a leadership role on the issues of climate change and environmental stewardship. They are valued partners in our government's provincial climate leadership plan as we position Alberta as the most responsible energy producing jurisdiction in the world.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-South West.

2:50 University of Alberta Science Hardware Hackerspace

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last week I was fortunate enough to be able to tour the Science Hardware Hackerspace, located at the University of Alberta. Lovingly called the Shack by its staff and students, it was established in 2015 by the department of physics as a space for undergraduate students to gain hands-on experience in their relevant fields. The Shack allows students to become familiar with tools such as 3-D printers, scanners, CNC mills, and other state-of-the-art electronics. A central focus of the Shack is peer-based learning, where students can learn new skills and pass those skills on to their peers as well.

It is becoming increasingly difficult for students to gain access to the types of technologies they will use in their professional careers, whether it's in research or in industry. We need to ensure that our students and researchers have access to spaces that allow them to experiment, that allow them to invent, and that allow them to explore new ideas, Mr. Speaker. As someone who has worked in research for start-ups, oil, and technology companies in the past, I understand the absolute value of having such a space for these students. These facilities are becoming more and more affordable, more and more accessible every day, providing great opportunities for students to become better creators.

Mr. Speaker, this is why I'm proud of this government for following through on commitments to fund and improve funding for postsecondary education. Well-funded education creates world-class graduates who live and work in Alberta, building on our economy and our innovation sectors.

I want to thank the staff at the Shack for giving me a great opportunity to come and learn about their space. I'm excited to see what's going to come out of their work.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Thank you.

The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

Everest Climb to Challenge Family Violence

Ms Fitzpatrick: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. How does one step up in their own way to challenge domestic violence? I've said many times that the community in which I live and the people in my community are incredible and worth me bragging about them.

Lethbridge is the home of yet another wonderful person, a person who as a child lived and grew up in an abusive home dominated by domestic violence. As a young boy he witnessed so much violence that he was terrified. It ended only when he got away. He has become an incredible advocate for an end to domestic violence as an adult and is doing so in his own way. Now at 45 years of age he has committed to raising money for the Lethbridge YWCA, with an eventual goal of $250,000. Doing one of the things he now loves to do, he has so far raised $27,000, approximately 10 per cent of his goal.

Mr. Speaker, he is Trevor Stuart. Trevor is a local realtor and has overcome one of his greatest fears, the fear of heights. He is bringing attention to domestic violence by climbing some of the world's highest mountains. Trevor is currently on an expedition to Mount Everest. He reached the summit last Sunday. I was very nervous when I heard about the tragedy on Sunday where four lives were lost and one was in serious condition. Lethbridgeans were praying and hoping that Trevor was safe, and I was incredibly relieved yesterday when I learned that he reached the summit and safely returned to a base camp in China and is now on his way down the rest of the mountain.

Trevor is a brave soul and a really fine man. He pays all . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member. Your time has passed.

Introduction of Bills

The Speaker: I would remind members on the introduction of bills to be brief with your introductory comments.

The hon. Minister of Culture and Tourism.

Bill 22

An Act to Provide for the Repatriation of Indigenous Peoples' Sacred Ceremonial Objects

Miranda: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I request leave today to introduce Bill 22, An Act to Provide for the Repatriation of Indigenous Peoples' Sacred Ceremonial Objects.

In bringing this bill forward, we are signalling our commitment to engage First Nations and Métis leaders as partners to secure critical input and advice on this piece of legislation. The legislation is intended to remedy the issues created by the failure to proclaim section 2 of the First Nations Sacred Ceremonial Objects Repatriation Act, otherwise known as FNSCORA. Bill 22 will build upon the intent of FNSCORA to provide a mechanism to facilitate repatriation of sacred ceremonial objects currently held in provincial museum collections to more indigenous communities in the province. We are making this bill available for consideration . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

[Motion carried; Bill 22 read a first time]

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Airdrie.

Mrs. Pitt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have the requisite number of copies to table of a letter from the hon. Minister of Human Services for constituent Rebecca Neel, a general form letter sending her elsewhere for services.

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I rise to table the requisite five copies of a report by Dutch consulting firm Deltares comparing Springbank to McLean Creek across 10 criteria. Five were in favour of Springbank, five were the same in both, and zero were in favour of McLean Creek.

Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-South West.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to table the requisite number of copies of a document showing the Wildrose MLA for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo reposting an advertising video reporting climate change to be a hoax, as referred to by the Premier in question period today.

The Speaker: Hon. members, there was a point of order today, but I've been advised by the Opposition House Leader that it's been withdrawn.

Government Bills and Orders

Committee of the Whole

[Ms Sweet in the chair]

The Deputy Chair: I would like to call the committee to order.

3:00

Traffic Safety Amendment Act, 2016

The Deputy Chair: On amendment A4, are there any comments, questions, or amendments to be offered? The Government House Leader.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. We're considering amendment A4, which was introduced yesterday, and I indicated to the House that I wished to study this amendment prior to expressing an opinion on whether it was acceptable or not. Subsequently the hon. Member for Calgary-Greenway has submitted to my office two other amendments, which I have also considered. I understand that they've been consolidated into an amendment that will be made directly following the disposition of this one.

However, Madam Chair, I am going to speak against this particular amendment. The way Bill 16 is written allows for flexibility in developing regulations to ensure that concerns like the one which formed the basis of the member's suggested amendment can be addressed. Under section 129.4

the Lieutenant Governor in Council may make regulations respecting any matter concerning the operation of a transportation network company, including, without limitation, regulations . . .

(h) providing for any other matter that the Lieutenant Governor in Council considers advisable for carrying out the [purposes].

Madam Chair, once the insurance framework is ready, our government would be happy to address the concerns raised by the member opposite in putting forward this amendment, but in the meantime I'd advise the members of the House to defeat this amendment.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Any other members wishing to speak to amendment A4?

Seeing none, I will put the question.

[Motion on amendment A4 lost]

The Deputy Chair: We'll return to the original bill, Bill 16. Are there any members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Calgary-Greenway.

Mr. Gill: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'd like to move an amendment.

The Deputy Chair: Hon. member, can you please provide the amendment first, and if I could just review it before you continue.

Hon. member, please go ahead.

Mr. Gill: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'd like to move that Bill 16, Traffic Safety Amendment Act, 2016, be amended in section 9 in the proposed section 129.4 by adding the following after clause (b):

(b.1) respecting requirements to be met by the owners of vehicles used to perform services for transportation network companies;

(b.2) respecting requirements to be met by drivers performing services for transportation network companies.

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to amendment A5?

Mr. Mason: I don't know if the hon. member wants to speak to his amendment or not.

The Deputy Chair: Oh, sorry. My apologies, Member.

Mr. Gill: Madam Chair, this amendment seeks to clarify that the drivers and the owners of vehicles operating within TNCs are being clearly defined within the legislation. By adding both drivers and owners, we're covering the various forms of business models found in this industry. This will result in increased safety precautions being implemented for TNC drivers and operators. These individual regulations would be up to the individual municipalities in which these companies operate. We're simply seeking to ensure protections for passengers and drivers in the event of an accident and just want to make sure that at the end of the day, you know, everybody is protected: the drivers, the passengers, whoever uses these services.

I really hope that we can get support from all parties on this amendment. Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Deputy Chair: The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. Well, I'd like to indicate to the House that I have accepted this amendment and will encourage members to support it. What this does is that it extends the capacity for regulation beyond the regulation of the TNC itself, which was the focus of the bill that was brought forward, to include owners of the vehicles used to perform services for TNCs and also drivers performing services for TNCs.

Now, I should indicate that it is somewhat at odds with the original philosophy of the amendments that I have brought forward to the Traffic Safety Act, which focused very much on holding the company accountable. The measures contained in the original bill before you focus very much on making the company accountable for ensuring that proper insurance is in place, that proper drivers' licences are being used, and that proper criminal information checks are conducted and for keeping those things on file, subject to audit by Transportation. That, in my view, is the best way to proceed because it puts the onus on the TNC and saves the government considerably in terms of resources to try and enforce this, and that is how we'll proceed in developing the regulations.

However, this gives additional tools to provide regulations for the owners of vehicles that do not necessarily belong to the company or the person driving – that's certainly a distinct possibility – and to provide regulation with respect to the drivers. If those things were needed, then these tools are here. It is not my anticipation that we will immediately draft regulations under these two sections, but it does provide flexibility in the future, if that is needed, to regulate in those areas.

That's why I have accepted this amendment, which has been consolidated from two amendments previously submitted to my office by the member. I would think that it strengthens the bill, strengthens the ability to ensure that the public remains safe, and that has been our entire focus. The focus on insurance, adequate drivers' licences, and criminal activity checks conducted by the police are all there to make sure that people have as safe a ride as possible, not to pick winners and losers in the industry but to provide a level playing field that ensures public safety as the highest principle.

With that, Madam Chair, I will encourage members of the Assembly to support this amendment.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. minister.

Are there any other members wishing to speak on amendment A5?

Seeing none, I will put the question.

[Motion on amendment A5 carried]

The Deputy Chair: We are back now on the original bill, Bill 16. Are there any members wishing to speak to the bill? The Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Madam Chair. I rise today to speak on Bill 16, the Traffic Safety Amendment Act, 2016. After reviewing this legislation, members of the Assembly can see that this bill seeks to accomplish a number of changes to the Traffic Safety Act. Some are straightforward while others are more convoluted and concentrate power into the hands of government, the executive, which means that important issues facing Albertans will be dealt with behind closed doors and away from Albertans. Other ideas work towards improving public safety and removing unnecessary penalties for people in our province.

I believe that the elimination of penalties for those who hold outdated insurance cards, or pink cards, is a step in the right direction. I know that there are a lot of people around Alberta who do hold these cards in their cars. They pay their insurance, get these pink cards, and then throw them right into the glovebox. Although the government would have us believe that it is sinister to drive a truck or car that isn't a Smart car, there isn't anything clandestine about putting your new pink card into your vehicle's glovebox and then driving that vehicle for work or pleasure.

As I look around the House today, I'm sure that I can see a few people who have done the exact same thing with no bad intent. In fact, I am sure that there are a lot of people in this Assembly and throughout Alberta that try to get their pink card into the glovebox as fast as they can before they lose it. Changing a law that is punishing people who are simply putting their pink cards into the glovebox before cleaning out last year's pink card is just an easy decision. It's about time that this law was corrected. It's simple, straightforward, and it's about to be rectified.

We can also find some positives in this legislation when we look at how the bill tackles a loophole that currently protects impaired drivers. As I understand it, the way the law is currently written allows for a loophole to exist which gives an individual who is accused of multiple charges of impaired driving a way to avoid escalating penalties that would typically apply to repeat offenders. Again, Madam Chair – and please correct me if I'm wrong – the loophole exists if someone appears before the court on several unrelated charges on one day. They can avoid those escalating charges because their trials are on one day but would not be able to skirt around those penalties if they had different charges being tried on different days because their mounting convictions would continue to push them further along the repeat offender list, which has increasing penalties.

This seems like a ludicrous loophole, and repeat offenders of such dangerous criminal acts should not be able to fall through these cracks. I don't have the number in front of me of how frequently this happens, but in my opinion once is too often. This is not justice for the families who experience heartache every day over the loss of a loved one who has been taken by the hand of a drunk driver. Organizations like MADD, or Mothers Against Drunk Driving, and countless other public awareness campaigns go through great effort to explain the risks and damages that are caused by impaired drivers. Their selfish actions put our communities in harm's way and create irreparable damage to the lives of thousands of Albertans. There's absolutely no reason why people who are accused and convicted of these reckless acts on numerous counts should not be facing the strictest penalties possible.

The same can be said about another proposed change to the Traffic Safety Act, and that is concerning the punishment for first-time impaired drivers so that their punishment reflects the same reprisals faced by repeat offenders. Of course, we cannot change the Criminal Code in this Assembly, but what we can do is enforce the participation in the ignition interlock program. This program makes it so that when someone is charged and convicted of their first drunk-driving charge, they have to install what I'm informed is essentially a built-in breathalyzer before they are able to drive again. The vehicle's ignition does not fire up until the device checks the blood alcohol level of the driver. I believe that this is a needed addition to the legislation.

As mentioned moments ago, the past couple of decades have seen a rise in public awareness campaigns and a greater public understanding of the adverse effects of impaired driving. People know the dangers of drinking and driving. People know that they are putting themselves and the entire public at risk when they consume alcohol over the legal limit and get behind the wheel. It's time that the punishment fits the crime. It's not just about the punishment; it's about creating a way to encourage healthy habits for first-time offenders. I believe that we must create a system of laws to discourage repeat offenders as a part of helping offenders learn sober habits when they are allowed to drive again. This bill would encourage these habits and improve the safety of our communities.

The same can be said for the provision in this legislation regarding illegal street racing. Drag racing, drifting, street car racing, whatever you want to call it, can cause serious harm to those who are participating in it and to the public at large. My brother had a long street in front of the beach, and we had youth abusing that long stretch. There were children in front of the beach at all times. This is looking for a tragedy, looking to actually creating a situation that puts our children and adults at risk. It's good to see that we are actually looking at reducing the number of street racing offences that happen. Street racing often causes bodily harm or death, and the perpetrator should be punished accordingly, plain and simple.

There are benefits to this legislation, as I have laid out, but there's also a serious problem in Bill 16. This bill writes the government a blank cheque to regulate transport network companies, an area of the industry that is becoming more predominant in Alberta. This is a policy area that should include public consultation and should be governed with the utmost transparency, not regulated behind closed doors. This is something that the government knows. But to protect itself from public scrutiny, they have decided to bury this amendment to the act, that we have not passed at this last one, that I've already spoken to a while ago. The government has consolidated power away from this Assembly, leaving everything to be decided by regulations, which is something that we have seen in Bill 6 and we are going to probably see with Bill 20 that comes through.

Madam Chair, this government hasn't provided any clarity whatsoever on what the regulations of transport network companies will look like. They haven't even defined what a transport network company is under the act. A simple definition will go a long way. In the end we have not even been provided with that, a simple thing as saying what a wonderful transport network company is.

We know and Albertans know that this is the government's back door to regulate certain ride-sharing companies out of the market. If it isn't, then why won't the government level the playing field? They are going to regulate ride sharing behind closed doors at a provincial level while leaving taxis to be regulated by municipalities. Can the Minister of Transportation explain why there is a double standard for companies that are seeking to provide the same service? Albertans expect that their government doesn't make it harder for people with good ideas to enter the marketplace. They expect a fair handshake or a fair share. Now, we expect the government to get out of the way when they're trying to build a future for themselves and their families.

As some of my colleagues in this House have already mentioned, how will the impending regulations affect carpooling? This is something that we brought up with an amendment. Madam Chair, I am certain that this government will come back and say: of course we're not going to regulate against carpooling. I'm sure of this because I'm certain that they already know what they plan to put into the regulations on this bill. That's why it really erodes the accountability of this act. It's unfortunate that the government, who continually touts itself as the leadership, doesn't have the political wherewithal to have an open and transparent debate as to what the future of ride sharing will look like in Alberta. Instead, they would rather ignore the rallies and protests that have been happening in front of the Edmonton and Calgary city halls. They would rather kill off the ride sharing in other regulations. This bill may pass, but I can guarantee that as the Official Opposition we are going to be holding our feet to the fire to stand up for Albertans that are trying to carve out a living for their families by making a little bit of extra money on the side.

I call on this government to make the process surrounding ride sharing more transparent. I see that I am running against the clock, Madam Chair, and I will stop there.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak? The Government House Leader.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. Well, you know, there's a lot in that last speech to respond to, I think.

First I want to congratulate the Member for Calgary-Greenway. I was in opposition for 15 long years, and I only ever got one amendment accepted by the government. I think it took me about eight years, and this is only his first session, Madam Chair, so congratulations to him. That was, I think, a very positively directed set of amendments.

I want to respond to the Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake. I do reject his assertion that we're trying to kill TNCs and that we have some secret plan and regulation to do that. That's completely unfounded, and I don't know why he would stand and say that with absolutely no evidence. I've said all along that the focus of the regulation will be on three things. It will be on ensuring that there's proper insurance, that there is a criminal check done by the police, and that the drivers will have adequate licences to operate commercial vehicles. I've said that those are the three things that we're going to regulate, and that's what we're going to do, so for him to say that, you know, we haven't said what we're going to do is just not right.

To the fact that he makes statements about how we're doing this in regulation and taking it away from the House, you know, the hon. member should realize that there are actually hundreds and hundreds of regulations that already exist, and you don't do regulation by legislation. In most cases you do regulation in regulation, and that's why they call them regulations and not laws. The laws provide for regulatory authority, and regulations are made under the legislation. There are hundreds and hundreds of sets of regulations in this province, other provinces, and federally that regulate all sorts of activities: hunting and fishing, agriculture, motor vehicles. The list goes on and on. The hon. member should probably avail himself of the MLA library and have a look at the regulations that are there.

I want to, you know, indicate that we have not defined – and I mentioned this yesterday – the TNC in the legislation because TNCs are constantly evolving. We know that Uber is coming forward with its carpooling ride-sharing app, which was, I think, the reason why we saw the amendment that we did yesterday from the Official Opposition. They've just announced today their food pickup service. There may never be a reason to regulate some of these things, but the fact of the matter is that this is rapidly evolving technology, and we don't really know what it's going to look like in the future. We can't keep coming back to the Legislature every three months or every six months in order to change the legislation to deal with those technological developments.

The hon. member did say one thing that kind of revealed his hand a little bit at the end, that they would stand up to protect TNCs, people trying to earn a living by earning a little money on the side. That's an interesting way to talk about earning a living: a little money on the side. I couldn't live with a little money on the side, Madam Chair. I don't think he could. I don't think anyone can earn a living by earning a little money on the side.

It really references one of the problems, the social conflicts that have been unleashed by this technology, and that is that there are groups of drivers who have been operating on a full-time basis and have made a living out of it, and these technological changes change the equation. We've resisted the temptation to wade in here and say that we're going to protect the traditional taxi industry because the technology does change, and we do have to adapt to it. We respect people's right to earn a living.

So it's important not that we pick winners and losers but that we protect everyone from being undercut by a complete lack of regulation that jeopardizes public safety. Companies are operating, then, you know, so far inside the margins of anything that could support an income. It comes at the expense of the public safety. There is a role for regulation, there's a role for government, and I think we've chosen exactly the right path. We've picked safety as the focus to make sure that some people are not undercutting others by sacrificing the safety of the public, and I think that's a legitimate role. That is the focus of this legislation. It always has been, Madam Chair. We're not trying to pick winners and losers in this approach. I think that we've hit the right note, and I urge all hon. members to support the bill.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. Government House Leader.

Anybody else wishing to speak to Bill 16? The Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Chair. You know, I've appreciated listening to the comments of the people back and forth on both sides of the House on this issue, and I will confess that there are times when I think that my age sometimes catches up with me. I guess, maybe I look at some of the . . .

Mr. Mason: I resemble that remark.

Mr. Smith: You resemble that remark.

I can honestly say this. There are many things that, as we've had them discussed and as we've done some reading and reflecting, I can appreciate about Bill 16, the Traffic Safety Amendment Act, 2016. I, too, would echo the comments of some of the members here when they say that we are sometimes very human people and that we can be fallible and we can have pink slips in there that can be sometimes years old, quite a collection. For some of us in this Legislature maybe we've just received our driver's licence, but for most of us we've had them for many, many years, and there can be piles of that. So I appreciate a law that actually addresses in a reasonable fashion an issue that could have been cause for losing, once again, a little bit more money to the Traffic Safety Act.

As far as the TNCs, I will plead a great deal of ignorance when it comes to these, coming from a rural community where we don't have any of these Uber or Tapp or any of those kinds of operations. Much of my knowledge comes from simply listening in this House and having discussions with my own family and friends that actually live in the city. You know, I think that in many ways the discussion with regard to safety is an important one to have, and I think that moving to put some regulation on these TNCs, as they're called, these transportation network companies, seems to be a reasonable thing.

I guess the conservative in me, though, also realizes that we do need to have a balance. We can often use safety to overregulate. I would hate to see us regulate to the point where some of these individuals who are choosing to use and to be a part of this service would no longer be able to do that. I applaud the safety concerns but would want to make sure that we have found the right balance. While I still need a lot of educating on this issue, I think we can move forward, and we can address any issues in the future if we need to.

Again I'll plead some ignorance here. I've lived a life of 56 years as of May 11 of this year and had made the decision early in my life that I would not partake in alcohol and have never personally regretted that decision after having seen family members who have struggled with that all of their lives. So when it comes to a discussion on impaired driving, it's not something that I'm overly familiar with, but it is one where I believe the safety issues that have been brought up by some people are of valid concern.

I believe that we as a society do need to ensure that people that struggle with alcohol in their lives are held to account but held to account in reasonable ways. I look at the amendments that will strip the exceptions for first-time offenders and ensure that they are participating in the ignition interlock program, and it seems like a reasonable step from this perspective. However, having never had to think in those terms before in my own personal life, these things do seem reasonable, I would suggest. I never really realized before looking at this that you could avoid escalating penalties by showing up for all of it on the same day.

Mr. Mason: Smart lawyer.

Mr. Smith: Well, I guess.

To me, again, it just seems reasonable that you would face each of these charges and be responsible and accountable for them.

I look at these things in this bill, and I see some things worthy of support here. So I guess I would thank the House for the opportunity to become educated and to learn a little bit more about some of the rules and regulations that are a part of the Traffic Safety Amendment Act.

I will be voting in support of this bill.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak?

Seeing none, are you ready for the question on Bill 16, Traffic Safety Amendment Act, 2016?

[The remaining clauses of Bill 16 agreed to]

[Title and preamble agreed to]

The Deputy Chair: Shall the bill be reported? Are you agreed?

Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chair: Opposed? Carried.

Mr. Mason: Madam Chair, I move that the committee rise and report.

[Motion carried]

[Ms Sweet in the chair]

Government Bills and Orders

Third Reading

Traffic Safety Amendment Act, 2016

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Northern Hills.

Mr. Kleinsteuber: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today to speak to Bill 16, the Traffic Safety Amendment Act, 2016. [interjections]

I'll move third reading. Sorry.

The Acting Speaker: Hon. minister, I believe you need to.

Mr. Mason: Okay. I was just trying to delegate. That's all.

Madam Speaker, it's my honour to move third reading of Bill 16, the Traffic Safety Amendment Act, 2016.

The Acting Speaker: Are there any members wishing to speak to this? Calgary-Northern Hills.

Mr. Kleinsteuber: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Talking to Bill 16, take 2.

I rise here today to speak to Bill 16, the Traffic Safety Amendment Act, 2016. This bill proposes amendments that will reflect current and future traffic safety issues and objectives. In total nine amendments are included in Bill 16, and they are part of the government's ongoing efforts to update the Traffic Safety Act and to make sure these updates align with other legislation.

One of the most significant changes will affect private vehicle-for-hire operations, or ride-sharing companies, and will define how these transportation network companies, or TNCs, will operate in Alberta. Some of the current well-known TNCs are Uber, TappCar, Cowboy Taxi, and Lyft, spelled L-y-f-t, to name a few. This bill will give the Transportation minister the authority to define TNCs through regulation. This definition will be shaped through consultation with stakeholders. This is a rapidly evolving industry, and this provides flexibility to tailor regulations to best suit the safety needs of Albertans on our province's roads and highways.

There are three public safety concerns related to transportation network companies that this bill addresses. The first is that drivers should have an appropriate driver's licence. Whether full-time or part-time, commercial drivers have a responsibility for their passengers, which requires greater skill and road knowledge than other drivers. Those people that would like to drive for a TNC would need to upgrade their licence to a class 1, class 2, or, at a minimum, a class 4.

Two, drivers would need the appropriate insurance. This will have the effect of not only protecting the passenger but the driver as well. We expect that the superintendent of insurance will have an appropriate insurance product ready for the market in July.

The third concern relates to a police information check. This must be conducted by law enforcement agencies and will help ensure the safety of the TNC passengers. As the Transportation minister said last week: when you call with your app for a stranger to come pick you up, you need to know that that person has not got a criminal record and that they are capable of driving you safely and that if you do get into an accident, you're going to be protected with the requisite insurance.

Madam Speaker, under these rules a TNC must not allow any of its drivers to operate under the company unless the driver has the appropriate insurance coverage, driver's licence, and a police information check. The TNC must make these records available to peace officers and/or government of Alberta staff for review upon demand. Any violators would be fined a maximum of $50,000 per offence per day. There is also a provision in the bill to allow TNCs to appeal penalties to the Transportation Safety Board.

Madam Speaker, the government has received many comments from Albertans on this topic. This input has informed the common-sense framework being brought forward.

Another significant amendment included in this bill will strengthen impaired driving legislation. This will be done by removing the ability for first-time offenders to apply for an exemption from the ignition interlock program. To be more specific, in the ignition interlock program the driver must blow into a breathalyzer device before their car will start. As the legislation currently stands, first-time offenders can apply to be exempt from this successful program. The proposed amendment will remove this exemption except for individuals with a specific medical condition that would prevent them from blowing. Research has clearly proven that the alcohol interlock program reduces recidivism among first-time offenders.

The issue of impaired driving continues to have heartbreaking impacts on drivers, passengers, and their loved ones. As a society we must continue to work to prevent this from happening, and this is the intent of this amendment.

Madam Speaker, the current legislation has a technical loophole which allows drivers to avoid lengthier suspensions by appearing in court on the same day for multiple impaired or drunk-driving charges. This loophole is unfair and is clearly not in the best interest of Albertans. It defeats the intent of the law to apply stiffer penalties for repeat offences. An amendment included in this bill's legislation will close that loophole.

Other amendments are strictly administrative. For example, the bill will change the spelling of "motor cycle," making it one word, to align with the federal legislation and to ensure it's consistent throughout the legislation.

In total nine amendments, as outlined in this bill, are expected to clarify regulations in the Traffic Safety Act. It will also clarify the framework under which the transportation network companies operate.

Madam Speaker, I personally believe the initiatives in this bill will help make Alberta roads significantly safer. I'll be supporting this bill at third reading, and I encourage other members in this Legislature to do the same.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The Member for Barrhead-Morinville-Westlock.

Mr. van Dijken: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Thank you to the minister for the good work that's been done.

Mr. Connolly: Do you want two words for motorcycle?

Mr. van Dijken: Radical changes. Anarchy in the language.

It's good work that's being done here. I think the minister has brought some very common-sense solutions and common-sense amendments into the Traffic Safety Act, and I wanted to thank him for that. We have several amendments here, even down to consistent spelling throughout the act, some very common-sense housekeeping things done.

We also do see the addition of the transportation network companies. I would be remiss to not speak to that and the fact that we in opposition are putting great faith in the minister and in Executive Council to come up with the definition that is going to be able to carry us forward in a way that we are intending with regard to these new technologies that have been coming forward.

As the minister has stated, these are continually evolving technologies. I do believe that we are going to see more and more functions with regard to these technologies, and I think they have a lot of potential for improving day-to-day life for Albertans and improving the way we can get things done more efficiently in our transportation networks and more effectively to make life just a little bit easier for all Albertans.

Of course, public safety is first and foremost. The hon. minister has brought that forward as the criteria for bringing public transportation, these transportation network companies, into the legislation. The focus is on public safety, yes, but I will have to put faith in the minister and Executive Council to bring forth a definition that is not going to stand in the way of the ability for this technology to evolve and provide further services in Alberta.

We talked a little bit yesterday with regard to parcel deliveries, with regard to the simple activities of carpooling. That is going to be a difficult definition to get an understanding of in situations where the ride sharing is not necessarily a ride for hire but a ride for the sharing of costs and just carpooling. How can we move forward on that? As the minister stated even today, we see that we have food delivery coming forward in these transportation network systems.

We largely are focused here on, of course, passengers. I know the taxi industry. In our consultations with the industry, both transportation network companies such as Uber and Lyft and TappCar but also with the taxi industry, the taxi industry has assured us that if they are treated in a way that is fair and amiable and on a level playing field, they will be able to adjust and compete. There is a balancing act there.

Again, I will encourage all members of this Legislature to support this bill as I will be voting in favour of Bill 16.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to speak on 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, are there any members wishing to speak on the bill?

Seeing none, I will ask the Minister of Infrastructure and Minister of Transportation to close debate.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I want to thank all members for the excellent contribution to the discussion on this bill. I appreciate all discussion, even that with which I disagreed. I think it brought forward important perspectives.

I think this bill is about balance. It's about making sure that we improve safety on our roads, that we close loopholes that could be used potentially by impaired drivers, that we tighten up our enforcement in that area. I think that's something that all members agree to.

There are some minor housekeeping pieces there, that have been pointed out, like the spelling of motorcycle. I don't know if the hon. member knows that there were actually three different spellings. There was motorcycle as one word, which is the correct spelling now; there's two words; and then there's a hyphen . . .

Mr. Cooper: By whose definition?

Mr. Mason: We are legislating in the English language, I'll have you know, hon. member. [interjections] We need to be consistent in our own spelling. You may spell it however you wish. You may even use a hyphen, hon. member, but we're not going to.

There are very serious things in this bill as well, and I appreciate that people have made comments with respect to that.

I think I neglected to respond to one point made earlier, during committee, by the Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake, and that was that we were treating the taxi companies and the TNCs differently, leaving all regulation of taxis to municipalities. That's not entirely correct. We regulate for taxis in the area of what licences drivers must have and in the insurance coverage that they must have. We are doing it a little bit differently with respect to the – I think the part that's a little bit different is the police record check, but we are making sure that there's some consistency there as well. That's something that's currently done by municipalities and will now be a provincial requirement. We're leaving that piece, in the case of taxis, to municipalities. So there is a slight difference there. But fundamentally on the major points we're treating the taxi industry and the TNCs the same. We already regulate taxis in 2 out of the 3 areas at the provincial level. That's not currently being done by municipalities.

In closing, I want to thank all members for this. There is going to be another round. This is the second of three rounds of changes to the Traffic Safety Act as we get into strengthening the coverage that we have to make our roads safe. This is actually the highest priority of the Transportation department, safety on our roads. We've set the goal. It's been a little bit controversial in terms of our internal discussion about: do we go with a goal of zero fatalities on Alberta roads? And we've decided that that is the goal that we're going to aim for. We may not ever quite get there, but that is the focus and the goal that is driving much of the department's work. It is something that I think all Albertans support.

There are many interesting things coming in transportation, I want to say. It's a very interesting field. I guess I will leave people with the thought that the rate of technological change in transportation is accelerating almost exponentially, and I don't believe that people will recognize our roads in 10 or 15 years from now. It's coming much faster than I think most people believe. Electric cars are already here, autonomous vehicles are right around the corner, and we don't know what's going to happen after that. All of that is very interesting.

I know the joke has been made that some members may have thought that The Flintstones was a documentary, but I actually admit that I thought that The Jetsons was a documentary. I think we can all look forward to lots of change. The one thing that's going to stay the same is that the rate of change is going to continue.

I thank all members for their support for this bill. Madam Speaker, if we could now go to the vote, I'd be happy.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. Government House Leader.

[Motion carried; Bill 16 read a third time]

Bill 10 Fiscal Statutes Amendment Act, 2016

[Adjourned debate May 26: Cortes-Vargas]

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Strathcona-Sherwood Park.

Cortes-Vargas: No, thank you. I'll cede my time.

The Acting Speaker: Are there any other members wishing to speak? The Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul-Two Hills.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I wish to put forward an amendment to Bill 10.

The Acting Speaker: Please go ahead.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much. I move that the motion for third reading of Bill 10, Fiscal Statutes Amendment Act, 2016, be amended by deleting all the words after "that" and substituting the following:

Bill 10, Fiscal Statutes Amendment Act, 2016, be not now read a third time because this Assembly has not received satisfactory evidence or assurances that the government is prepared to take the necessary measures to see Alberta's triple-A credit rating restored by the credit-rating agencies.

The Acting Speaker: The amendment will be referred to as RA1.

Are there any members wishing to speak to the amendment? The Member for Spruce Grove-St. Albert.

Mr. Horne: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm just waiting on a copy of the amendment, but I firmly believe that the hon. member is mistaken in saying that there is not sufficient evidence in that this government is completely and totally committed to building the infrastructure we will need to grow our economy moving forward. We are committed to investing in our education for our students, which will lead to the economic growth and prosperity that Albertans deserve and expect. This budget is about choice. We have made that choice.

Quite frankly, I find it a little concerning that the opposition is so committed to cutting the services that Albertans expect while we are investing in the public services, in the infrastructure that Albertans deserve and expect.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The Official Opposition House Leader.

Mr. Cooper: Why, thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise, particularly following whatever just happened here. It's a pleasure to rise and speak to this reasoned amendment, that I know members in this House will be surprised to hear that I think is quite reasonable. We have seen over the past number of days and weeks a consistent downward spiral in the credit rating of this great province of ours. What this amendment actually does has nothing to do with the choices that the government is claiming they've made in their budget and has everything to do with the credit rating of this province and the negative impacts that this government is having on that credit rating.

Let's be clear. This isn't about spending choices; it is specifically about the credit rating here in the province. What the amendment does is that it provides very sound reasoning as to why the bill should not be read a third time. That reason is that the Assembly has not received satisfactory evidence or assurances that the government is prepared to take necessary measures to see Alberta's triple-A credit rating restored. This reasoned amendment is about the evidence and assurances that the government hasn't provided the Assembly.

But, Madam Speaker, what is equally as important as providing assurances to this Assembly that the government is serious about protecting our credit rating is that the government is serious about communicating to the credit-rating agencies about what the plan is here in Alberta. What they have done is the exact opposite of that. In fact, on the day after the budget was introduced, which included some significant challenges in the path forward for our province, our credit rating was downgraded, and the government did nothing to reassure Albertans, this Assembly, or the credit-rating agencies that they had a clear plan that took the financial future of our province as a key priority for the future of our province.

Then we moved along with the introduction of this bill, Bill 10, that puts the debt limit of our province on the path of infinity and beyond, with not just a 10 per cent debt limit, not just a 15 per cent debt limit, that the hon. Minister of Finance said just last fall gave us plenty of room, but no debt limit. What happened was that the hon. Minister of Finance reassured this House: don't worry; I'm going to be talking to the credit-rating agencies about our plan. So he went ahead and met with a number of those agencies, and only hours after that meeting – I'm not entirely sure what took place – our credit rating was downgraded again.

One of the significant reasons that those credit-rating agencies referred to, Madam Speaker, was this Bill 10 and removing all of the debt ceiling that was in place here in the province. One of the key issues that they pointed to was removing all accountability when it comes to spending and debt to GDP in the province of Alberta.

What we're suggesting here today, in order to provide assurances to the Assembly and, equally as important, to Albertans and to the credit-rating agencies, is that this bill, which played a significant role in additional downgrades, be not read, that we ought not proceed down a path that we know is creating pain and uncertainty amongst the investment community, amongst the credit-rating community, and, in turn, creating uncertainty for Albertans, creating uncertainty for Albertan families when it comes to not having a clear understanding of what the financial future and the financial viability of our government looks like because of the significant amounts of debt that this piece of legislation, Bill 10, allows the government to take onboard.

I encourage all members of this Chamber that are serious about protecting the financial future of our province to support this reasoned amendment. What this reasoned amendment has the potential to do is to send a message to those folks who go ahead and provide the credit ratings for our province, a message that the government, that the government members, that the front bench is serious about the credit rating in our province, not because it's great for us to go around and say, "Hey, we've got a triple-A credit rating; we're a pretty big deal" but because that triple-A credit rating means a significant amount of savings for our province.

That triple-A credit rating means that when we need to borrow money – and we all have our opinions on how much money we should or shouldn't be borrowing – when there is a need, we then can borrow at the best available rate, and that triple-A credit rating saves money for our province, saves taxpayers' money. Every downgrade that we receive costs the taxpayer of Alberta. That means that every downgrade costs the moms and the dads, the truck drivers, the plumbers, the butchers, the bakers, the candlestick makers, and the mechanics. Let's not forget the mechanics.

Ms Renaud: Don't forget the bakers.

Mr. Cooper: I already got the bakers. And I even have the Joneses.

Madam Speaker, the downgrading of our credit is a significant risk to all Albertans and to a number of those I have pointed out already this afternoon. Unfortunately, we don't have enough time to read into the record all of the types of folks that this has a negative impact on. And while from time to time here in the Chamber we can enjoy some humour amongst peers and colleagues and foes – I think that's important – that doesn't mean that what we are dealing with isn't a very serious issue, because it really is.

This is a serious issue that has a significant impact on the direction of our province. It has a significant impact on our ability to compete across this country and on the world stage. Not only does it cost taxpayers money with increased borrowing costs, but it also costs municipalities a significant amount of money. One of the reasons is that municipalities engage with the provincial government to borrow and utilize that tradition of the strongest possible credit rating to receive wonderful rates to borrow for very important projects that happen, the very projects that the government is supporting, whether it's roads or schools, all of those things, the important key infrastructure projects. Particularly in the case of municipalities, when they borrow to do other projects that are the municipal responsibility, be it reservoirs or waste water, they have the benefit of borrowing through the provincial government to receive those triple-A credit ratings.

For some of those small municipalities – I think of the outstanding constituency of Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills and communities like Cremona, that are just a couple of hundred people, communities like Beiseker, that are just under a thousand – without the benefit of the provincial government being able to provide financing to them, on their own they would pay a significantly higher credit rate.

4:10

The challenge is that when the provincial government doesn't take care of its responsibilities and the areas of jurisdiction which it presides over, it has a negative impact down the line to our municipal partners because the cost of borrowing is going to go up for our municipal partners. Whether it's a recreation facility or a road in their community that they bear responsibility for or a sidewalk or a seniors' facility, all of those are going to cost more because this government hasn't laid out a clear plan that allows credit-rating agencies and Albertans to have faith in the long-term financial viability of our province.

I would strongly support this Assembly to send the right message to those agencies, to Albertans, that we take seriously our credit rating, that we are willing to do what it takes to lay out a plan, and to not create something so ambiguous as no debt ceiling. We even proposed that a debt ceiling is better than no debt ceiling, and the credit-rating agencies have said that that would be a step in the right direction.

I know that the government doesn't love to take tips or pointers from the Official Opposition – and I don't begrudge them that, although I think they would be a lot better off if they did take a few more of our ideas – but they should at least listen to the credit-rating agencies and the investment community, that say that the direction of Bill 10 is not the right direction for this province. That's exactly why all members of this Assembly should send that message by supporting this amendment, and I encourage everyone to do so.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member. It's always interesting what you can throw into your argument.

The Member for Strathcona-Sherwood Park.

Cortes-Vargas: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise today to speak in the House against the amendment being proposed. Throughout the last few months I've spoken to many of my constituents, and the constant topic of conversation is: how are we going to respond to our economic circumstances? Strathcona-Sherwood Park makes up a large section of the Industrial Heartland, an area that contributes to Alberta's overall GDP, with operating investments of $3 billion, and a lot of my constituents are employed in the heartland businesses and are experiencing these setbacks from the oil prices.

I mention this because we have a choice in this House, and the members opposite are proposing, without a shadow budget, in explaining where they would cut, to cut drastically, to do the things that have been done in the past and have drastic social effects. The members on this side of the House are looking for a choice. They're looking for a plan, investment, and the Alberta jobs plan provides just that.

Not only that, but I've been continuously talking to the Industrial Heartland as they contribute to a lot of the work, and I tabled a few weeks ago a quote of their response to our budget. I'm just going to read it out here for the record. This is from Alberta's Industrial Heartland Association. It starts:

Job creation and economic diversification remain a key focus for the Alberta Government as indicated in the release of Budget 2016, The Alberta Jobs Plan. Most notably, the Petrochemical Diversification Program will stimulate investment and employment in Alberta's value added sector, helping to diversify and strengthen the province's economy.

See, we have a plan. We have a plan to respond to what's happening. It is not to cut and slash budgets, which is the only thing that the members on the other side are proposing, and they don't have even a shadow budget to explain where they would take this from. So until they are able to produce those kinds of details, we will continue to say that that will come out of front-line services, that that will come out of teachers, that that will come out of educational assistants, and that is what the voters of Alberta rejected in the last election.

We have a choice. Right now we're facing a drastic drop in the price of oil, and it affects how much revenue is gained in Alberta revenues. We have to make sure that we make a choice to reinvest in our economy, to reinvest in jobs, make sure that we are able to address the issues that are facing everyday Albertans. That is why I reject this. In order to do that, we need to put these tools in place, put these actions in place in order to make sure that we are able to address the immediate issues that Albertans are facing.

Madam Speaker, I'd like to thank you for this opportunity to speak against the amendment and to strongly recommend that members in this House reject the amendment.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to speak under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, I'll call the question – oh, on the amendment. Sorry. Please go ahead, Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Speaker. When I stand up here, I want to stand up to support this amendment. I want to stand up to support this amendment because I have a feeling that we must be living in two different Albertas. I say that in all seriousness because while I do not doubt the previous member's rendition of the quote from the Industrial Heartland group, if that's what its full name was, I can tell this House that in Drayton Valley they have measured this budget, they have measured this government, and they have found it very wanting.

When I talk to the people that have lost their jobs and lost their businesses, it's not solely because of a drop in the price of oil. There are many things that this government has done that have sent economic signals across this country and literally across the world and have scared capital and businesses out of this province.

Madam Speaker, this amendment is suggesting that until this Legislative Assembly and until the people of Alberta can be given some assurances, some plan, something that can show us that this government has some recognition that debt can cripple a province, that debt will and always has crippled economies, then business and financial institutions will indeed refuse to invest in this province.

I don't know what you're hearing, but I know that I have had many, many local and international businesses come into my office that are shaken to the core by the actions of this government. I have had vice-presidents of international corporations in my office. I will not name them, but they exist nonetheless. They have talked about risk profiles. When they go to the heads of their companies, when they go to their boards, when they make financial plans, they must provide a risk profile for any economic venture that they choose to try and bring into this province, and when they have to talk about the actions of this government, the risk profile gets longer and longer and longer and longer, to the point . . . [interjection] I'm not lying. They're telling me this.

I have no investments in these companies. I have no dealings with these companies. I've never worked for these companies, but these companies employ my citizens, my constituents. These companies pay the taxes in my community. These companies make investments in the future and the lives of the kids with their donations. They're telling me that they will not invest their capital. They can invest it anywhere they want in the world, and they will not invest it in this province. You can shake your heads, and you can roll your eyes, but it's a fact.

There are companies started by entrepreneurs in my town that have been successful for 30 years. They have worked in and around Alberta, in western Canada. They've invested in other countries. Now they're shut down. Now they no longer employ anybody. That's not simply, solely because of the price of oil. It's because of the economic decisions of this government, and we see that happening and affecting our credit rating. Debt has consequences.

If you wonder why I get a little frustrated and upset sometimes, it's because I do care about those people that are in poverty. I do care about our education system. I do care, like all the members in this House, for our seniors. I do want to see social housing and the social licence being extended to the people of Alberta, and I know that that can only occur when we take care of the finances of this province.

I met the other day with the ATA local down in Wetaskiwin, and they said: well, what would you do? And I said to them: I'm not suggesting that this is an easy answer. There's a reality that we all face. Whether it's personal, whether it's a corporation, or whether it's this province, when you accumulate significant debt, many of the answers are no longer available to you. The options that you face are very limited, and often the options that you have to pursue are going to hurt and hurt very badly. If you really want to have small class sizes and you really want to have teachers and you really want to have aides in the classrooms, then control your debt. If you want to see cutbacks, don't control your debt. There will come a time – and it will not be too long from now – when financial institutions will simply start forcing you to make decisions that you don't want to make.

We are in serious financial trouble when we have a government that does not seem to understand how they are going to control the debt. That's what this triple-A credit rating being downgraded time and time and time again is doing. It's telling our financial institutions that we've got a problem. It's telling our corporations, it's telling our businesses that we have a problem. This is why I would speak to this amendment. Until this government comes out and is able to explain how it is going to cut back its spending, how it is going to start to pay back its debt, we are going to be in trouble.

Nobody wants to see front-line workers cut. Nobody wants to see nurses cut. As much as you want to say that that's what we want to do, it is not the truth. We did not campaign on that. We did not campaign on that. I think we know what we campaigned on. [interjections] I'll let you explain what you think you campaigned on. Allow me the same ability to be able to explain what we campaigned on.

We know that if we continue to go on down the path of unending spending and borrowing, our interest payments will soon be the third-largest expenditure of the government. That is a wise use of taxpayers' money?

While I understand that there may be, Madam Speaker, some people in this Legislature that don't want to support this amendment, this amendment has a great deal of validity because it has allowed this House to have a conversation about what is important when it comes to our financial situation. I would argue that those people that want to see a reasoned, rational discussion about how we can control our spending while minimizing the social impact to the best of our ability – that is in the best interest of the people of Alberta, and this amendment has allowed us to be able to pursue that direction.

Downgrading a triple-A credit rating, once you've achieved it, is never a very good idea because the benefits that come from that triple-A credit rating, Madam Speaker, are immense. It means that we do have the ability to pursue a modicum of debt, pay a modest rate of interest, that allows us to be able to get the best bang for our dollar. But it's always wise, when you're borrowing, to have a path forward to paying that debt off. We would love to be able to hear from this government how they are going to do that. What kind of measures are they going to take to see a renewal of that triple-A credit rating, which is so beneficial to Albertans? You cannot continue to borrow and spend forever – you can't – so how are you going to get off that track? What are you going to do? I think it's a reasonable thing.

Albertans, financial institutions, the other members of this Assembly, all would love to be able to see a clear plan for getting control of our spending and for stopping the accumulation of our debt. I think, Madam Speaker, that we have an opportunity, by voting for this amendment, to pause, to consider how we can set a debt limit and make it an effective one. We've tried before. It wasn't an effective way of doing it. Obviously, this government underestimated its need for only – only – a 15 per cent debt limit. So let's take the time. Let's vote for this amendment. Let's make sure that we've received satisfactory evidence, satisfactory assurances on how we're going to move forward. Let's take that time, by supporting this amendment, so that the people of Alberta will be the winners as we move forward in this province.

I think that I've probably pursued this to the extent that maybe I've changed minds, perhaps? Hope springs eternal in the breast of this . . .

The Acting Speaker: Sorry. I hesitate to interrupt you, hon. member, but pursuant to Standing Order 4(2) the Assembly will stand adjourned until Monday afternoon at 1:30.

[The Assembly adjourned at 4:30 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Monday, May 30, 2016

[The Speaker in the chair]

Prayers

The Speaker: Good afternoon.

Let's bow our heads and reflect, each in our own way. We often find ourselves trying to be understood when we should firstly try to understand. We sometimes act when we should listen. We sometimes listen when we should act. Finding the balance can be difficult at times.

Hon. members, ladies and gentlemen, we will now be led in the singing of our national anthem by Mr. Robert Clark. I would invite all of you to sing in the language of your choice.

Hon. Members:

O Canada, our home and native land!
True patriot love in all thy sons command.
Car ton bras sait porter l'épée,
Il sait porter la croix!
Ton histoire est une épopée
Des plus brillants exploits.
God keep our land glorious and free!
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.

The Speaker: Thank you. Please be seated.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Hon. members, I'll just remind: given the scarcity of time, keep the introductions as brief as possible.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Dr. Turner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my honour today to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Legislature 37 special guests from my riding of Edmonton-Whitemud. These are students from the French immersion class at l'école Monsignor William Irwin Catholic elementary school. They are accompanied by Mme Carol Dyck, a teacher, and Mme Carrie Lefrancois. I would ask them to rise and receive the usual warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly 32 people from l'école Father Jan in St. Albert. If I could get them to please rise when I say their names: Mme Natalie Jurick, Mme Lise Dunn, Mlle Ann Heggart, Mlle Annette Perreux, and all the students. Please welcome them.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Athabasca-Sturgeon-Redwater.

Mr. Piquette: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my privilege today to introduce to you and through you to the members of this Assembly 28 grade 6 French immersion students from Landing Trail intermediate school in beautiful Athabasca. They are accompanied today by their teacher, Jennifer Jones, and a parent volunteer, Melanie Giroux. If the class and teacher could please rise and receive the customary warm welcome of the House.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Hon. members, are there any other school groups today?

Hearing none, the Minister of Labour and minister responsible for democratic renewal.

Ms Gray: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm really delighted today to introduce to you and through you some of my former colleagues and friends from Iomer Internet Solutions. Prior to the election I worked at Iomer for seven years. They are a locally owned and operated information technology consulting company. They are located only two blocks away, but I have to say that it has felt like worlds apart since I became elected. They provide emerging technology solutions for business and government and help customers to realize their goals and expectations, and they're definitely known for innovative solutions. I would ask my guests to rise as I say their names: my former colleagues Joanne Knox, Kerry Wiebe, Jeff Mah, Kael Nicholson, Kaleb Dell, Scott Johnston, and Caitlin Smart. Thank you for joining us here today. I'd ask all members to give them the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Bow.

Ms Drever: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my pleasure to rise today to introduce to you and through you the executive board of the Sindhi Association of North America southern Alberta division. This organization dedicates itself to fostering friendship and understanding between the Sindhis and other nationalities and educates people about Sindhi culture, philosophy, language, and heritage. In Calgary they have created a place for the Sindhi diaspora to celebrate and gather together as a community. Joining us in the gallery – and I'd ask you to rise as I say your names – are Mashhood Qazi, president and head of the delegation; Max Memon; Fayyaz Gajani; Jameel Ahmed; Ms Najma Fayyaz; Zulfiqar Ali; and Shahzad Qazi. I would ask my guests to rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Leduc-Beaumont.

Mr. S. Anderson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's an honour to rise and introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly today some constituents from my fantastic region of Leduc-Beaumont. Today I have with me four people. If you would stand when I say your name: John Slomnicki, a proud IBEW electrician; Kim Slomnicki, his wife, who is one of my CAs; her daughter Amber; and Kim's mom, Barbara Toews, who's joined us today to have a tour of the Legislature. I would appreciate it if all of you would give them the warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Are there any other guests, hon. members? The Member for Calgary-Hawkwood.

Mr. Connolly: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly my mother, Linda Davies, and my sister Chantal Connolly. My mother has been a teacher with the CBE and an ATA member for 29 years now, and my sister will graduate from the education program at the U of C next week. I'd now ask my guests to rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Now Edmonton-Meadowlark.

Mr. Carson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my honour to rise in the Assembly today and introduce to you and through you a fine school group from the Premier's riding of Edmonton-Strathcona. There are 24 visitors altogether: Karri McKinnon, teacher; Jennifer Soon, educational assistant; as well as parent Renata Brunner Jass. I would ask the teachers and parent as well as the students to rise and accept the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.
The Opposition House Leader.

Mr. Cooper: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's an absolute pleasure to introduce to you and through you a very faithful member of the Wildrose team who supports one of the biggest players on this side of the House – she recently was travelling around the southern United States and has just returned home to Canada to make sure that he's at work – Mrs. Tiffany Nixon, wife of my good friend and colleague the Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Drumheller-Stettler.

Mr. Strankman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's an honour to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly, from the diverse constituency of Drumheller-Stettler, Mr. Cody Borek. Mr. Borek, if you'd stand, please, and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Members' Statements

Rural Health Service Providers

Mr. Hinkley: Mr. Speaker, today I have the privilege to read a précis of a letter thanking St. Mary's hospital of Camrose and, in particular, the early discharge stroke team as well as other rural health service providers. St. Mary's has been earning a fabulous reputation among Alberta Health Services for its excellent patient care.

This letter comes from the Hoffmans of Viking. Mr. Hinkley:

My husband suffered a severe stroke . . . He was very well cared for . . . at the Camrose Hospital. The staff . . . were very efficient. They did their work well but they also were good at an important part of recovery – they really cared . . .

Every one of the [early stroke discharge] team members were enthusiastic, kind and respectful. They were never hurried or impatient. They kept in contact by phone whenever we had questions . . .

The team members are very capable in their professions . . . Don was impressed by the variety of therapies they introduced. The teleconferencing with the Glenrose . . . was very successful.

We believe that without this program Don would have found coping with his limitations very difficult. The team introduced to him many techniques to help himself, they gave him hope . . . They also helped us with other medical contacts and equipment. I know that both Don and myself as a caregiver would have been floundering in all the details that come with coping at home if we hadn't had this help.

An important part of Don's care was the emergency service we received . . . We are so thankful that we have competent emergency care in Viking.

In closing I have to say that we are very thankful for the care received through the long 6 months of recovery. From the ambulance to the care at Camrose, to the physiotherapy at SAGE, to the Early Stroke discharge team, to access to neurologists and the Glenrose . . . we have been blessed.

Mr. Speaker, this letter provides one more reason why investments in health care are more important than making drastic cuts to balance our budget or gain a credit rating.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The hon. Member for Lacombe-Ponoka.

Canadian Hockey League Memorial Cup 2016

Mr. Orr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Hockey is the best sport in the world. It brings Canadians together. It brings out the best in us Canucks. All over the world we're known for saying, "I'm sorry," and for being great at hockey.

This weekend central Alberta was proud to host the Memorial Cup, at which the London Knights took home the coveted trophy. They fought hard. They won it in four straight. In every game their game finesse impressed me and amazed the crowds.

The crowd was treated not just to a great hockey series but to the famous hospitality that central Alberta is known for. Along with the arenas set up for the main events, there were additional arenas set up for family games and kids' games. Everybody got to participate in the festivities as the greatest game on Earth was played by people of all ages and skills. And true to our country roots there was live country music.

On top of everyone having a blast and enjoying themselves, the people were also contributing to the economic well-being of the central Alberta region. People from all over Canada travelled to participate in the festivities. They ate at the restaurants, stayed at the hotels, visited local vendors, and explored the greatness of central Alberta.

I'm looking forward to the next games, when, hopefully, an Alberta team can actually take home the cup. I'm also looking forward to the other major tourism events that are coming to central Alberta. This summer the Tour of Alberta and then in 2019, specifically, the Canadian Winter Games will be economic and festive boons for the region.

It is events such as these that bring Albertans together in celebration and bring out our competitive spirit, but hockey does score high above all the rest in bringing out the best in Canadians. Some days I think that hockey might be the answer to all our problems. Life seems so much simpler when you're with friends enjoying an ice-cold drink and watching hockey.

I would like to thank the sponsors, the planning team, everybody who hosted the Memorial Cup, all the volunteers, and everybody who participated. Everyone who was at the Memorial Cup had the best weekend possible. I tip my hat to the great people of central Alberta.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Hays.

Office of the Premier

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. A veteran recently said to me: in my time in service I met some generals that I would not cross the street to say hello to, but I will salute every one of them out of respect for the rank they hold. Every party in this House would like their party leader to occupy the office of the Premier. Because of this, we must remember to respect the office even if we disagree with the party in government.

In this Legislative Assembly, where we are all equals, the Premier is the head of the House. When the head of any household invites a guest, common decency and good manners dictate that all members of the House greet invited guests with at least a minimum level of courtesy and decorum and do so in a dignified fashion. The Premier's job is to build bridges with other jurisdictions, some of whom we may even disagree with. We hobble the Premier's ability to build those bridges when a simple, positive introduction cannot be achieved. Last week, when the Premier had a guest come in from another province, that guest and the office that guest holds were not given the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly by some members. The Premier of Ontario was greeted by bad manners by some members of this House. Bad manners can reflect on the entire province and the office of Premier.

It is about respect for the democratic process. We don't have to like the politics of every guest that comes into this House, but we have to give the Premier a chance to work with them for the betterment of Alberta. We routinely greet each other's partisan guests warmly. We didn't pick the Premier's party; the voters did. That is part of the democratic process, and if we can't have the core amount of respect for the democratic process, for what brings all of us here, maybe some of us should think about who we work for.

The Leader of the Official Opposition and some other members did not stand for the Premier of Ontario. The hon. members who cannot bring themselves to live up to the most minimum levels of respect and courtesy for democracy maybe – just maybe – ought to consider if this is really where they want to work.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-St. Albert.

Public Transit

Mr. Horne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm honoured to share with you and this Assembly the joys of my daily transit ride from my constituency, beautiful Spruce Grove-St. Albert. As many of you are aware, I often take rush-hour transit with many of my constituents. Commuting by bus is a fun commute and gives me an opportunity to interact with my constituents. It's a great way to avoid dealing with the rush hour traffic, and I can get some reading done or respond to some e-mails while en route to and from the Legislature. Commuting by bus has also proven a great opportunity to connect with my constituents. As an added bonus, busing reduces my carbon footprint and eases congestion on the road.

My community is serviced by St. Albert Transit, a well-established system, and the city of Spruce Grove, which is currently serviced by Edmonton Transit, is moving forward with establishing their own network with the help of GreenTRIP funding.

Mr. Speaker, public transportation is an investment in our future. As green infrastructure, public transit creates permanent jobs in our communities. It reduces carbon emissions and makes our communities more accessible to Albertans.

Often the challenge in sprawling cities such as the Edmonton region is to find an affordable solution. I am glad that our government has taken steps to address this crucial issue in Edmonton. As part of their joint efforts to reduce and prevent poverty, the city and province are developing a cost-shared, low-income transit pass to increase access to public transit and connect families to community supports and resources. Eligibility for Edmonton's pass will be based on 100 per cent of the low-income cut-off. The city of Edmonton estimates that 20,000 people each month will be eligible for this pass and will make use of a low-income transit pass program. Mr. Speaker, this is good news for families and individuals who would like to use transit but simply cannot afford to buy a monthly pass.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Peace River.

Curtis Marshall Memorial Skate Park

Ms Jabbour: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Suicide: it's difficult to talk about and often kept hidden. When someone has died by suicide, we speak of it in hushed, almost embarrassed tones. The notion of young people so filled with hopelessness that they see no option but suicide is profoundly disturbing. In my constituency suicide is far too prevalent.

But I'd like to share one particular suicide story. Curtis Marshall was a talented young man from Peace River. Friendly, outgoing, and kind, with a great sense of humour, Curtis cared about people. He was an avid reader and loved writing. Everyone thought he'd become a social worker or a journalist. But Curtis also suffered from depression. Although he managed to hide the pain of his illness for a long time, it eventually took his life.

Curtis's story, however, has become a positive and hopeful one. Wanting to honour his memory and find ways to heal, his family and friends embarked on a special project. Curtis loved skateboarding. He was good at it. Not only was it an active, creative sport; for Curtis, it was a way to belong to the community. His dream was to have a place in Peace River where young people could gather and share his passion for skateboarding. That dream is now reality. Through the generosity of people and businesses in the community along with contributions from local and provincial government, work on the foundation is scheduled to begin this summer.

Initially, some were reluctant to support the project, feeling it would glorify or idealize suicide. This is wrong. The Curtis Marshall memorial skateboard park will allow us to speak Curtis's name aloud and recognize that depression is an illness that is sometimes fatal. Perhaps most importantly, the park will help the community have open, honest conversations about suicide, about how we can encourage mental wellness in our youth and ensure that adequate mental health treatment is available when needed. The Curtis Marshall memorial skate park will be a social meeting place in Peace River where young people and families can exercise, enjoy the outdoors, and hone their skateboard skills, a place where the community can heal and grow together.

To Curtis's mom, Elaine, to Kris, and to all those who have worked so hard on the project: thank you. I'm proud to have the Curtis Marshall memorial skate park in my constituency, and I'm looking forward to taking my grandchildren to skate there this summer.

Thank you.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The Leader of the Official Opposition.

Restaurant Industry Support

Mr. Jean: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. One hundred and fifty thousand Albertans are directly employed in the restaurant industry. These are the entrepreneurs, the business owners, the cooks, the butchers, the bakers, the baristas, the servers who now more than ever need a job. What they don't need are new experiments that put their livelihoods at risk, but that's exactly what this NDP government is doing. With higher beer taxes, a massive minimum wage increase, and a new carbon tax, our restaurant industry is being hit hard. Why isn't the Premier at all concerned about the livelihoods her policies are putting at risk here in Alberta?

The Speaker: The Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As was mentioned in the member's statement earlier by the leader of the third party, the people of Alberta had a choice. They had a choice between a number of different leaders, and they chose a party that had an increase in the minimum wage so that people who are working full-time can afford to live, you know, and do not have to stop at the food bank on their way home from work. Certainly, they gave us direction on where they want to see us moving forward. They want to make sure that people can afford to work full-time and buy food and pay the rent. That's what we're going to be consulting with Albertans on the specifics of how to get there in the weeks and months ahead.

Mr. Jean: Quote: there are many restaurants who are really surviving on a knife-edge right now. End quote. That's from Mark von Schellwitz, the VP of western Canada for Restaurants Canada. He's speaking on behalf of men and women who invest their lives into their small businesses and local restaurants. A bad exchange rate, a slumping economy, and bad NDP policies are making things much worse for Alberta businesses. How can the Premier stand there knowing that her policies are directly hurting those families who rely on a successful restaurant industry?

Ms Hoffman: Like, I'm sure, many members of this House, hopefully all members of this House, I have been engaging with business owners in our area. When I say, you know, "What could help your business?", they say, "If people had more money in their pockets and if they could be out spending it." That's why they want to make sure that we work to diversify our economy. That's why they want us to get a pipeline to tidewater, so that we have people working diligently on that pipeline, we're getting the best price for our product, and Albertans themselves can have a good revenue, good money in their pockets and be spending it in local business, Mr. Speaker. We'll continue working on all of those areas to move forward and strengthen our economy.

Mr. Jean: Albertans aren't going to have it in their pockets if you keep taxing them and taking it out.

The fact is that this government is experimenting with people's lives. While they get to sit in their nice, comfy chairs for the next three years, there are actually people in this province very much hurting; 75 per cent of restaurant owners expect their sales to drop even further than they have over the next six months. But all this government has to offer them is a new carbon tax and a drastic hike to the minimum wage, that will punish them. At a time when unemployment is at its highest in nearly two decades, how can the Premier possibly stand beside and behind these reckless and harmful policies, that really hurt Albertans?

Ms Hoffman: The fact is that we are dealing with a once-in-a-lifetime drop in the price of oil, Mr. Speaker, and that's impacting all of us in Alberta in a significant way. We have been working with our partners, including small business, by cutting their taxes by one-third this year. We're very proud of that. We're going to continue to work with Albertans to make sure that those who are working full-time can afford to spend that money in the local economy. Study after study shows that when low-income citizens have money in their pockets, it typically gets spent in the local economy as opposed to purchasing online or out of province. So we're really proud, and we're going to be moving forward with business and with workers.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. Deputy Premier.
Second main question.

Carbon Levy and Energy Costs

Mr. Jean: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Despite natural gas being a clean, low-carbon fuel that will be essential in efforts to reduce global emissions, the NDP government is increasing the price of natural gas by 50 per cent under the carbon tax. It's hard to imagine how jacking up added costs on this industry will help any Albertans whatsoever. It makes heating houses in the winter more expensive. It hurts job creators across the province and the economy and risks putting even more pressure on our electricity grid, which is already out of control under this government's policies. Why doesn't the Premier understand that this action, these extra costs on families, businesses, and our natural gas industry are damaging? They're just hurting us.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.
The Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. In terms of moving forward, we're really committed to our climate change leadership strategy. We've had validators from all sorts of different industries stand up with us on that, and they are saying that it's positive to move forward with one-third of coal generation being replaced by natural gas to keep prices stable. The report, the FirstEnergy report that I believe is being referred to, also talked about how Albertans will be paying $28 less per megawatt than they did in 2013.

Mr. Jean: Shirley's Greenhouse in Didsbury grows local produce like lettuce, bell peppers, and tomatoes. They sell in farmers' markets right across southern Alberta, including in Calgary. They told CTV news that they will see their natural gas bills climb an extra $30,000 per year. For families it's hundreds of dollars gone. Businesses will see their costs certainly escalate, and for our industry it's even more uncertainty. How can the Premier stand behind this tax on a clean, low-carbon fuel when Albertans simply can't afford to pay the price?

Ms Hoffman: Thank you for the question. Mr. Speaker, certainly, for people who are nervous about what's happening moving forward: it's no wonder, with some of the misinformation that's being spread by the members across the aisle.

To go back to the facts, performance standards are being drafted for natural gas power plants to ensure that prices remain competitive for consumers. The report itself, again, predicts that when a carbon price is fully implemented, Albertans will still be paying $28 less per megawatt than they did in 2013, Mr. Speaker. This is good news for consumers, it's good news for the environment, and it's good news for Alberta.

Mr. Jean: Across all industries and sectors this hike on natural gas is going to hurt Albertans a lot. Charities will see natural gas costs skyrocket, especially those who provide shelter for our most vulnerable citizens. As schools and hospitals see their natural gas costs climb, it will mean less money going towards classrooms and emergency rooms – it will – and for businesses across the province it will mean less money to hire and to invest in Albertans. With this in mind, how can the Premier possibly justify this massive tax increase on every Alberta family?

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much for the question. Mr. Speaker, we've been connecting with lots of stakeholders, and they have said that they're really grateful to have a government that's committed to stable, predictable funding, as opposed to what's being proposed opposite, which is the cutting of billions of dollars from public spending. With that stable, predictable funding they will find ways to do their part in terms of reducing emissions. Everyone wants to except the members opposite, who want to pretend that climate change isn't actually a problem, or maybe they're middle of the road, or maybe they're on the far extreme of denial. We're not really sure. But do you know who is? The mayor of Calgary. He says: it was interesting to hear someone say that things are going to help Canadians' investment and moving forward with the fact that Canada is making real steps in pricing carbon.

The Speaker: Thank you, Deputy Premier.
The hon. Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner.

Essential Services Commissioner

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Essential Services Commissioner wields significant power over Alberta's labour agreements. It's imperative that they be fair-minded and independent because they make final, binding decisions that impact public-sector employers and employees. But this government has hired a long-time NDP supporter who has personally donated to the NDP over a dozen times, giving that party over $20,000. How can Albertans be sure that the Essential Services Commissioner hired is going to represent Albertans' best interests and not just be the latest supporter getting a return on their investment?

The Speaker: The Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. Certainly, I think our track record on making sure that we're pulling in the best experts from across the country is proven: for example, former Bank of Canada governor David Dodge, who advised us on our $34 billion infrastructure plan; Joseph Doucet, University of Alberta School of Business dean, chair of the Premier's Advisory Committee on the Economy. The list goes on, and I'm very proud of our latest appointment. She certainly brings forward great expertise, both from Saskatchewan and Alberta, in terms of labour relations and will be a tremendous asset in this role.

2:00

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, she forgot to mention Manitoba in there. This same government gave a sole-source contract for a staggering $25,000 of taxpayer money to a former NDP MLA to share lived experience. Not sure what that means. This same government demonstrated blindness to conflict of interest in their hiring of a top labour negotiator. This same government couldn't even commission a simple report on media accreditation without a conflict of interest. Will the Premier make public why other applicants for this position were turned down and who made the final call for hiring?

The Speaker: The Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The applicant was chosen by a search committee which conducted a thorough talent search for the best possible person for the job. For example, Andy Sims, who's been commended in this House as being of excellent character and understanding this file very carefully, said that he knows the woman, he knows that she has personal integrity, and she is a first-rate person. We certainly stand behind the process that was put in place to select the best person for this panel moving forward.

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, it's integral that the Essential Services Commissioner be fair minded. The new Essential Services Commissioner personally donated $5,000 to this Premier's leadership campaign. That same Premier's government represents the employer's side in any dispute brought before the Essential Services Commissioner, and the same government had a say in the hiring of that commissioner. When the NDP were elected, was this the change the Premier championed?

The Speaker: The Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Albertans certainly elected us to put forward the best work possible, and Gwen Gray and her experience and expertise as an Alberta labour lawyer will serve us well as the Essential Services Commissioner. Commissioner Gray has more than a decade of experience, again, in Alberta labour, employment, human rights, and law. In addition, she also previously served as chair of the Saskatchewan Labour Relations Board. Of course, again, as I've said, we've appointed people from all sorts of different backgrounds, including ATB president Dave Mowat, who we chose to conduct our royalty review. We're bringing the best people forward to help do this work, and Ms Gray is certainly one of those.

The Speaker: The hon. leader of the third party.

Job Creation

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Premier and cabinet talk a lot about job-creation programs, yet when you ask them for specifics, they never have any. Nearly every week this government issues a news release about creating jobs, yet Albertans are not finding new jobs. In fact, Alberta government stats indicate increasing unemployment and falling job vacancies. Alberta lost 20,800 jobs in April alone. To the Premier: other than giving jobs to one minister and some out-of-province, NDP-world-view hacks, how many new jobs for Albertans has your government actually created?

The Speaker: The Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to respond to this question. There are two approaches to dealing with economic shock caused by the drop of price in oil as well as natural disasters, including the wildfires. The opposition would have us turn back the clock. Actually, they spoke philosophically about how great it was, the 1990s, when they fired thousands of teachers, nurses, and public servants. Instead, we're using a very balanced, reasoned approach, moving forward with a number of different economic stimulation plans. We'll continue to support public service.

The Speaker: So far so good, but I remind you again: keep the volume down, please.

Mr. McIver: That would be one job less tens of thousands of energy jobs.

The economic development minister has said that 80 per cent of contracts for the Fort McMurray rebuild have gone to Fort McMurray businesses, yet I've heard the number is false. The Fort McMurray Construction Association has said that workers from the community are being overlooked for jobs. Since the minister said that there's information out there, I'm going to give the minister a chance to clear that up. To the minister: will you commit to tabling a list of the 532 contracts signed, who they were awarded to, and where those employers will get their workers from?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Economic Development and Trade.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'll thank the member for the question. Being a former municipal leader, the member should actually know that the bulk of these contracts – in fact, the government of Alberta has only issued five contracts. The over 500 contracts the member is speaking of were issued by the regional municipality of Wood Buffalo. It is up to them to decide if they would like to disclose the list, but I can tell you that 80 per cent, or 4 out of 5 contracts, of the 500 that the regional municipality has issued have been to Fort McMurray workers and owners.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. A vibrant and viable Fort McMurray is critical to the successful rebuilding of the economic structure of the region. We know that the province has already contracted an Ontario company to map the fire damage using unmanned aerial vehicles. Can the minister explain why the contract was outsourced away from the province without hiring somebody from Fort McMurray or even Alberta?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, as the member will know, under extraneous circumstances there are times that governments use sole-source contracts. In the example of the Fort McMurray fire the five contracts that have been issued were a combination of the fact that they needed to be done in a very critical, timely manner. As well, our government will only look outside of Fort McMurray and outside of Alberta when there are contracts that cannot be filled by Alberta-based companies. But I can tell you that we are working with the regional municipality to ensure . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
The Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Renewable Energy Strategy

Dr. Swann: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Well, this government has made it clear that it's phasing out coal-fired electricity, and I believe this is the right thing to do. Less clear is how quickly coal electricity is going to phase out and what mix of natural gas and renewables will replace coal and the impact of that on the public. We're already seeing a massive public debt burden and an oversupply of electricity in this province, so this energy shift will not come cheap. Can the government provide Albertans and the House with a cost-benefit analysis for the optimal balance of renewables and natural gas replacing coal?

The Speaker: The Minister of Energy.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you for the question. Our government is pursuing the long-term phase-out of coal-fired plants in the best interests of Albertans, including the health and economic impacts. We're building on robust climate leadership panel recommendations, and we have tasked the AESO to consult with energy industry experts to recommend the program to bring on more renewables. The AESO has already consulted with hundreds of companies, experts, and citizens on how we can keep costs low while bringing on renewables. We expect this report to be here soon, and we will make the . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
First supplemental.

Dr. Swann: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. It would be nice to know what the cost-benefit analysis was before we make the decisions about the pace of phase-out.

What impact will the decisions have on consumer prices?

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Well, unlike our former government, we are putting the protection of ratepayers first. A key part of the AESO's analysis is to achieve this important transition away from coal at the lowest possible cost to consumers. We look forward to their recommendations. For the first time ever we will be investing in programs through Energy Efficiency Alberta that will help Albertans reduce their electricity consumption and reduce their bills.

Dr. Swann: I guess that's why they call this question period, Mr. Speaker.

Given that the cost of implementing renewables is likely to be high but potentially able to earn attractive and stable long-term returns, has the government considered creating a publicly held corporation similar to the Alberta Energy Company under Premier Lougheed, allowing individual Albertans to invest in their renewable energy future? [interjections]

The Speaker: The Minister of Energy.
Quiet, please.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. At this time our focus is to carry out our first renewable energy auction within the context of Alberta's unique electricity market. We have had significant interest from renewable energy companies around the world, who are looking to invest billions of dollars in Alberta. That's the work that is under way right now. It's on time, and we are on course to hold our first renewables auction this year. Our intention is transitioning our electricity system away from coal towards a cleaner, healthier, and more stable mix of renewable power and natural gas. We will continue to listen to the advice of . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
The Member for Banff-Cochrane.

Forest Industry Issues

Mr. Westhead: Mr. Speaker, Alberta's forestry industry is the third-largest industry in our province. Forestry supports good jobs and is a renewable resource. But concerns have been raised about the impacts of clear-cutting on the landscape. Can the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry explain what his department is doing to address these concerns?

The Speaker: The Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member. Our government is committed to the protection of the land, water, and environmentally sustainable industry practices. We'll continue to monitor harvest operations to ensure companies maintain high standards. In cases where communities have raised concerns over operations in their areas, my department officials have worked closely with concerned citizens and the industry to modify operations to increase buffers for habitat, watersheds, and other valuable parts of the landscape. We're also looking at changing the directive on structural retention in harvest areas. This will clarify what portion of trees and large stands are expected to be left in a cutblock. This directive remains under consultation with stakeholders.

2:10

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
First supplemental.

Mr. Westhead: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that a significant amount of timber harvesting in our province occurs in the traditional territories of indigenous Albertans, to the same minister: can you tell the House how our government is partnering with indigenous groups to ensure their valid issues are addressed?

Mr. Carlier: Mr. Speaker, our government made the bold decision to implement the United Nations declaration on the rights of indigenous peoples. As part of this government's commitment to renew and improve its relationship with indigenous peoples, we are examining ways in which we might find a common and practical understanding of how to implement those principles. That work is ongoing. This will be an evolving conversation with our indigenous partners. The department has also awarded timber quotas to a number of indigenous communities. I am heartened to hear of new partnerships being formed between forest companies and indigenous communities.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Westhead: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the softwood lumber agreement expired last October and given that this is a very sensitive issue and many in the industry are relying on Alberta's leadership on this file, can the minister tell the House what his department is doing to ensure Alberta's interest is looked after?

Mr. Carlier: Mr. Speaker, the Canada-U.S. softwood lumber agreement expired on October 12, 2015. Discussions have begun between Canada and the U.S. to negotiate a new agreement. Canada's forest industry relies significantly on exports. It is very important for our province that Alberta's companies have secure markets for their lumber. Alberta would support an extension of the recently expired agreement. There is currently a one-year standstill agreement where we can negotiate the softwood lumber agreement. We'll continue to work with the federal government, our lumber industry, and other provinces. We want to see a long-term solution. It is in the best interests of all parties and of Alberta.

The Speaker: Thank you.
The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Carbon Levy and Education Costs

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The carbon tax is going to have severe implications on costs for school boards as well as for families. This government knew that they wanted to pass a carbon tax that would impact transportation and heating costs for school boards, yet the Education budget has minimal increases for heating costs and only minimal increases for transportation funding. Why did the Minister of Education not do an economic assessment of the carbon tax regarding education and build in the costs of the carbon tax into his recently passed Education budget?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you very much for the question. Certainly, our climate leadership plan has an integral connection with our schools. We know that education, teachers, and students are very interested in reducing our carbon footprint, and what greater place to start than schools across the province. Now, we are working very closely with all of our school boards to make sure that that analysis is done and that we are taking our carbon tax money – yes – and we will invest it back into the school boards so that they can have projects that will reduce their carbon footprints.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. An impact assessment might have solved the problems this next question is going to bring up.

Given that we are hearing from school boards that they are preparing to lay off aides and other front-line staff to reduce costs and given that school boards are facing hundreds of thousands of dollars in additional costs to their budgets due to the carbon tax, is this minister content with laying off front-line workers in order for school boards to be able to afford this government's downloading of the carbon tax onto schools?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you very much for the question. Certainly, we are working very closely with all of our school boards to make sure that the cost of the carbon levy is affordable and that they can work through it in the most expeditious way possible. Certainly, this notion that they are going to actually be laying off any workers is absurd.

Mr. Smith: The minister needs to talk to his school boards.

Given that school boards are able to raise funds only through school fees and other fundraising opportunities and given that the carbon tax is going to have a major impact on school board funding and given that school boards like Rocky View school division are increasing their transportation fees and since the Minister of Education seems to be stalled in giving school boards direction regarding school fees, is this minister supportive of passing on the carbon tax to parents through increases in school fees?

Ms Phillips: Well, Mr. Speaker, of course, on this side of the House we embrace the science of climate change. We accept it as a fact, unlike the other side of the House, where we have many, many different examples of folks who deny the science of climate change outright. They call it a hoax. On the other hand, we have 500 schools that have signed up to be powered by wind, 25 school boards that have signed 25-year contracts with Calgary-based BluEarth Renewables, and here's what the teachers had to say: instead of just talking about how green energy can be, we can actually do it right here. That's because they understand climate change.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Wapiti.

Carbon Levy and Agriculture Costs

Mr. Drysdale: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I've heard concerns from Alberta's ag producers about what the carbon tax will cost them. Unlike this government's record on consulting with ag producers, I hope that there's a plan for consultation with farmers about the new carbon tax. To the minister of ag: I know it's been said before, but will you clearly state today that marked fuel for farmers will be exempt from the carbon tax?

The Speaker: The Minister of Environment and Parks.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you for the question. I'm happy to reiterate what we said on November 22, 2015, when we indicated that marked fuel would be exempt. It is also contained within Bill 20. In addition, we've had a number of conversations already with the agricultural sector, through last fall, the technical engagement and consultations we did, and since then the minister and I have met with a number of different groups and interests, including the irrigation districts and others. We're happy to work with them going forward to reduce their costs and therefore their emissions.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Drysdale: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that there are a lot of input costs for ag producers on farms that will be affected by your government's carbon tax and given that the carbon tax will not only impact the cost of fuel to transport fertilizer but also impact how much fertilizer will cost to produce since fertilizer production uses large amounts of natural gas, to the minister: have you calculated how much more fertilizer will cost farmers because of your carbon tax?

The Speaker: The minister of environment.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for the question. Of course, last fall's consultation included technical engagements with the fertilizer sector in order to move forward on a series of performance standards for the fertilizer sector as we move them from the specified gas emitters regulation to the performance standard system, which, of course, will phase in in 2018. We're going to make sure that we design those policies in consultation with them so that we do not adversely affect our energy-intensive, trade-exposed industries, of which fertilizer is one.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Drysdale: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It may not affect the fertilizer industry because they just pass it on to the farmer.

Given that there are not just input costs but also output costs that affect Alberta farmers, that they'll have to absorb, and given that when farmers sell their products, they'll have to pay higher transportation costs, which means farmers get it both ways, coming and going, to the minister: how much more will farmers have to pay to export their products because of your government's carbon tax?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, there are a number of different inputs as well as outputs in agricultural production. We are working with the sector to ensure that we've got the right set of policies for farmers, ranchers, and others to ensure that we can move forward on bioenergy and other innovative solutions and work with the agricultural sector. This has formed a large part of our consultations to date and will continue to do so.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lacombe-Ponoka.

Tourism Industry Support

Mr. Orr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This NDP carbon tax on everything will systematically hurt each and every industry in our province, including tourism. Plain and simple, this tax will make things worse going forward. Albertans understand that international flights are the gateway to tourism in Alberta, and now on Thursday we heard that international flights are being permanently cancelled. The carbon tax will apply to all flights in and out of Alberta. It'll be another blow to the industry. Why is this NDP government damaging our province's tourism potential by taxing Albertans and the aviation industry?

The Speaker: The hon. minister of environment.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for the question. Interjurisdictional flights are not subject to the carbon levy. They're exempt.

Mr. Orr: Just fuel.

Building a tax bubble is not going to help tourism. Given that tourism is a significant economic driver for our province, particularly during this economic downturn, and given that the NDP government on the one hand talks about diversifying the economy but on the other hand is taxing everyday Albertans, hotel owners, tour outfitters, visitors even, will this government acknowledge that you can't have it both ways, that you can't tax the people out of business that you are relying on to grow the economy?

Miranda: Thank you to the member for the question. I'm happy to report to the House the positive growth in tourism, both in spending and visitation, in 2014, with 900,000 visitors actually travelling to Alberta, which is up 17 per cent from the year before. We have seen an increase in tourism. We will continue to support the industry. We're very excited about what we've seen so far.

Thank you.

Mr. Orr: Given that this NDP government is going to make hotel owners and operators feel a double whammy of both a carbon tax and a mandatory increase to the minimum wage, those in the tourism industry are rightly worried. Now we actually begin to see signs that it is not growing as supposed. These risky policies will have a profound impact on communities and tourism across the province. Will the NDP government commit to cancelling both the carbon tax and the minimum wage increase since to date they have refused to provide any form of an economic impact assessment?

The Speaker: The Minister of Environment and Parks.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, the hon. member is incorrect. Interjurisdictional flights are not covered by the levy. Now, additionally, on these matters of economic impact, this is why we have reduced the small-business rate by one percentage point. It's a one-third reduction in the small-business tax rate, and we're very proud of that. In addition, because we accept the science of climate change and we do believe it is real, we will have a series of energy efficiency programs that will be available to small business and to medium-sized business as well. We, unlike the Official Opposition, do not deny the science of climate change.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

The Member for Little Bow.

Educational Delivery Choices

Mr. Schneider: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Many of my constituents are concerned about continued parental choice in education. I was pleased to see unanimous consent supporting the original wording of Motion 504 earlier, but there are ongoing concerns in the home education community about financial clawbacks. Many families make major sacrifices in order to home-school their children. Can the minister clarify this and reaffirm that funding for home education isn't being clawed back?

The Speaker: The Minister of Education.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you very much for the question. Certainly, it's important that we look carefully at the funds that we put to education in all forms. Certainly, it's true that we have not clawed back home-school funding. In fact, we increased funding for enrolment right across the board in all forms of education here in the province of Alberta, so the ongoing rumours about clawing back the home-schooling money are simply not true.

Mr. Schneider: Mr. Speaker, given that this Assembly has recognized the right of parents to make decisions on educational delivery for their children and given that there are lengthy waiting lists for some charter schools in our province and given that some hostile special-interest groups are publicly calling charter schools an outdated idea that should be rolled into the public system, can the minister reaffirm that the current government will not cut funding for these educational institutions in this or any future term?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you very much for the question. Certainly, our side of the House is very happy to know that he recognizes there'll be many terms of this current government here to serve. Certainly, I have made a very solid commitment to each of the forms of education delivery that we have. I was just at the Westmount charter high school graduation last week, where they were very happy to know that I had extended their charter for another 15 years. They are certainly doing a great job, and I think that our caucus here is doing a great job affirming education.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Schneider: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that a recent report showed that independent schools saved taxpayers $750 million over five years, between 2010 and 2014, and given that the cost to taxpayers in private schools is less than half the public school cost, can the minister reaffirm that private schools save public money and that the current government will not cut funding or change this model in this or any future term?

Mr. Eggen: Well, certainly, as the minister now for just over a year, I've seen lots of really good work in all forms of education delivery that we have here in the province of Alberta. Certainly, independent schools exemplify a lot of good work as well. Certainly, the 70 per cent funding, in fact, that we do give to independent schools has remained with the increase in enrolment right across the province. I think that the organization that represents that has affirmed to me that they're very grateful for that, and they recognize the good work that we're doing to make sure that education is properly funded in this province.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
The hon. Member for Calgary-Greenway.

Fort McMurray Wildfire Economic Recovery

Mr. Gill: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our caucus is glad to see the rebuilding efforts begin in Fort McMurray. Local businesses are ready and willing to help, which is why I was concerned when the Fort McMurray Construction Association stated that they were told by this government that the contractors would need to have a previous contract with the province to be included in the rebuild effort. To the Minister of Municipal Affairs: will contractors looking to assist with the rebuilding efforts need to have a previous GOA contract to be considered?

The Speaker: The Minister of Economic Development and Trade.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and I'll thank the member for the question. There are no prerequisites as far as contracts for companies bidding in Fort McMurray. In fact, we have been working with the regional municipality, the economic development committee, a number of organizations up in Fort McMurray, including the chamber, and encouraging all companies from Fort McMurray and Alberta-wide, if they are interested in contracts, to register at the regional municipality of Wood Buffalo website, rmwb.ca, and they will be eligible companies.

Thank you.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Gill: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the minister of economic development stated that external companies would only be used in complicated, specific projects where no local expertise was available and given that the complicated nature of these projects may require subcontracting, to the Minister of Municipal Affairs: what mechanism has your government put in place to match up out-of-work contractors with external companies who may need extra labour for their projects?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'll thank the member for the question, a very good question, but it goes back to the same answer. First of all, the government of Alberta is working with the regional municipality. In fact, the Minister of Municipal Affairs and I had a very productive meeting with a number of local businesses, local business organizations just last week to look at ways the government of Alberta can support the rebuild effort. We've committed to using local companies wherever possible – I know that's the will of the mayor of Fort McMurray as well – so I would encourage any interested company to go to rmwb.ca and register.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Gill: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that these projects will be going on for some time and given that local contractors will be looking to help rebuild their community until the job is done and given that the government has committed to providing support to an on-the-ground small-business support centre, again to the Minister of Municipal Affairs: what is the dollar amount allocated to this support centre, what types of staff will be assisting small-business owners, and when will the facility be operational?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Bilous: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and I'll thank the member for the question and for drawing attention to the fact that our government has committed $750,000, $500,000 of that to go to an on-the-ground support centre that will provide supports for businesses, including a space for them to get access to information, a workspace. We're doing that working in partnership with the municipality of Wood Buffalo's economic development organization in addition to the chamber of commerce, the Canadian Red Cross, the Athabasca Tribal Council, the Northeastern Alberta Aboriginal Business Association . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
The Member for Edmonton-Centre.

Support for Low-income Albertans

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In Edmonton-Centre we're certainly well aware of the challenges that are faced by lower income Albertans, and my office often works to help provide supports to individuals, students, families who are struggling to get by, so I'm proud of the work that our government has been doing in freezing tuition, increasing the minimum wage, investing in affordable housing, and protecting Albertans from predatory lending. Still, there are many who need help in accessing the supports and services that they need in their communities, often because their monthly budget leaves little room for transportation. To the Minister of Human Services: how are you taking action to ensure that lower income Albertans can access . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.
The Minister of Human Services.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Member, for the question. I was pleased to announce last week that as part of our effort to reduce and prevent poverty, our government and the city of Edmonton are developing a new low-income transit pass to make public transit more affordable for families. We are also cost sharing half of the existing program with the city of Calgary. The government will provide Calgary with $13.5 million and Edmonton with $12.4 million over a three-year period. This project and this new investment will make sure . . .

2:30

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
First supplemental.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, I'm proud to hear that we're making it easier and more affordable for lower income families to get around the city.

To the same minister: could you give us a sense, then, of what kind of impact this initiative will have on the lives of these families?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you again to the member for the really important question. Low-income transit passes make it easier for families to get around the city to access jobs, education, their appointments, health care, community resources, and government services. The city of Edmonton estimates that the fully implemented program will benefit 20,000 lower income people in Edmonton. The Calgary program provides services to 25,000 Calgarians.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. An excellent reminder that even seemingly small supports like access to transit can have large impacts on reducing poverty.

To the same minister: what other such initiatives has your ministry put in place to help improve the lives of lower income Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you again to the member. Our government wants everyone to have the opportunity to contribute to and benefit from their communities. The low-income transit passes in Edmonton and Calgary are just two pieces of our ongoing work and commitment to helping Albertans. Other notable initiatives include the Alberta child tax benefit, which will begin this summer. Under this program a single parent who makes $25,000 a year with two children will get $1,650 this year. Our government is committed to supporting . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Coal-fired Electric Power Plant Retirement

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Unemployment in my riding of Drayton Valley-Devon has hit an all-time high. Coal-powered plants like Genesee 3 will close early under this government's early phase-out of coal, causing hundreds more people to lose their jobs, despite the fact that in my constituency overall air quality is the best it has been in 30 years and all measured concentrations were below Alberta ambient air quality objectives. Can the minister of environment explain to my constituents why she's pushing her party's risky economic manifesto and killing jobs by closing plants even when air quality . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.
I believe the question was to the minister of environment.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yes, it is true that post-2030, 14 years from now, some plants will close early, and that will be over and above the current federal schedule that begins in 2019. Of course, it is well known – the science is well established – that pollution from coal-burning power plants is harmful to our health, is costing Albertans hundreds of millions in additional health care costs and lost productivity. We understand that on this side of the House because we understand that climate science is real . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Mr. Smith: Mr. Speaker, given that the Genesee 3 plant in my riding is on the cutting edge of clean-coal technology and that it received a special exemption from the federal government to operate beyond 2050 for this reason and since retraining and unemployment insurance are feeble replacements for good jobs with stable wages, can the Minister of Economic Development and Trade please explain what industry he intends to replace the coal industry with that will provide an equivalent standard of living and quality of life for the people in my riding?

The Speaker: The minister of environment.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, our government has made a commitment to investing in training and other opportunities in coal-fired electricity affected communities, including out by Genesee, Wabamun, and elsewhere. That is because we know that phasing out coal is the right thing to do. We know that across the industrialized world this is occurring in order to avoid both greenhouse gas emissions and harmful effects from coal pollution. We understand this because we understand the science, and we accept the science, unlike the . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
Second supplemental.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that new major economic projects in our province are required to conduct environmental assessments to measure their impact and given that these assessments are a crucial step in the process and are a way to ensure legitimacy and stability in Alberta's energy sector, when the future of so many Albertans, including my constituents', is at stake, why is this government still refusing to conduct an economic impact assessment on the early phase-out of coal?

Ms Phillips: Well, Mr. Speaker, you know, it's very clear that the world's global financial markets, big banks and others, have moved away from the financing of coal-fired electricity. One only needs to read the New York Times to know this.

Every 150 megawatts of wind energy capacity represents $316 million in new investment. Every solar project of that scale creates 2,000 full-time construction jobs. We accept the science of climate change, and that's why we are moving this province forward. The Official Opposition would have us stuck in the past.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Bail Process Review

Mr. Ellis: Great. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. A few weeks ago the province finally released its review into Alberta's bail hearings system. The majority of the recommendations will make our streets safer by ensuring that thorough reviews of bail applications take place to safeguard against another tragedy occurring like the murder of Constable Wynn in St. Albert. However, during budget estimates I was surprised when the minister said that her department does not have a time frame for implementing the potentially life-saving recommendations. To the Justice minister: can you now please give us an idea of a timeline for acting on these recommendations?

The Speaker: The Minister of Justice.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the important question. Well, of course, we know that this report is critical, which is why our government moved forward with it in an expeditious way. This is a report which balances the rights of the individual when they come into conflict with the justice system along with the safety of the public in general. We need to consult with a number of our partners because, obviously, police will be significantly impacted by this. Once we have had those consultations with our partners and once we understand our responsibility, we will move forward with a plan. You know, the Official Opposition really needs to understand that consultation is a thing . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
The hon. member.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that during my time as a bail hearing officer with the Calgary Police Service I took pride in ensuring that public safety was of utmost priority and given that I received push-back from some elements within the bail process about the increased use of section 524 of the Criminal Code, which can ensure that repeat offenders are held to account, and given that section 524 is a critical tool for keeping repeat offenders off our streets and maintaining public safety, to the minister: how will you promote and facilitate the use of section 524 in order to save lives and protect the public?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. Well, one of the recommendations that came out of the report was to ensure that all presenters, whether they be Crown presenters or whether they be police presenters, are given the appropriate education. We have moved forward already on taking steps to ensure that there is education around section 524 of the Criminal Code, which, as the member noted, is a really important provision when considering judicial interim release. Those education programs are already under way; they're starting to move out. We will be working with our partners going forward to make sure that that education is ongoing.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Minister, this is not rocket science; it's a two-minute refresher course at best. Thank you.

Recommendations 1 and 3 of the bail review report recommended using prosecutors for all bail hearings, and the federal Crown has already acted on these recommendations by ensuring that its prosecutors are available for all bail hearings. To the Justice minister: what are you doing provincially to address this critical recommendation? To my knowledge nothing has occurred, so what are you waiting for?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. Well, I think I'd like to first point out, in refuting the premise, that section 524 of the Criminal Code is actually a fairly legally complex mechanism, and that's why it's important that we ensure ongoing training for our Crown prosecutors. I think that the bail review report made that pretty clear, and the hon. member ought to go ahead and read it.

In terms of moving forward with Crown prosecutors, we are consulting . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. Member for Calgary-Hays, your voice is too loud. I didn't hear that.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-South West.

Tourism Promotion

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As we work to get Alberta off the resource royalty roller coaster and its constant boom-and-bust economic cycle, the government has made its commitment to diversifying the economy a top priority. Given that we all know that in this current economic climate the tourism industry has a critical role to play in our future and our economic diversification, we need to ensure that we're strengthening this industry. To the Minister of Culture and Tourism: can the minister please update the House on the growth of the tourism sector in Alberta?

The Speaker: The minister of tourism.

Miranda: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thanks to the member for the question. Of course, tourism is an important tool to both economic diversification and the development of jobs in our province. I'm delighted to report that both tourism spending and visitation from 2014 has increased to almost 900,000 visitors from overseas travelling to Alberta, representing about a 17 per cent increase from the year before. Visitation from the U.S. has increased to more than 770,000 people, with $34.7 million being added to the economy. I think that's pretty exciting.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This is encouraging news for our province.

Given the combination of Alberta's diverse landscape offering various tourism opportunities and the low Canadian dollar making our province an attractive tourism destination, can the minister please inform the House on the economic contributions this increase in tourists has had on Alberta's economy?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Miranda: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thanks to the member for the question. As I mentioned, there's been a billion dollars to the province, an increase of 22 per cent from the previous year. There was a 12 per cent increase as well in tourism spending from U.S. visitors from 2013 and $8.3 billion in 2014. This is very great news for our province.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that Canadians are currently enjoying national Tourism Week and given that similar partnerships are needed in Alberta to both maximize tourism opportunities and bring in tourist dollars, can the minister please provide some examples of Alberta's new initiatives when it comes to tourism development and promotion?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Miranda: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thanks to the member for the question. We're working very closely with airports, destination marketing organizations, and industry associations to deliver tools to the new direct flights between Calgary and Beijing. We're also as a ministry leading the development of the Castle region tourism strategy. In addition, we are assisting in the development of tools to assist both municipalities and operators to develop and enhance tourism in the province by the tourism entrepreneurship program, which is an initiative that will provide tools and services to help entrepreneurs start new tourism businesses and help existing tourism entrepreneurs innovate . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Firefighter Service Award

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, the events that have transpired over the last several weeks have reinforced how important firefighters are. While the rest of us are running from the flames, they're running towards the flames. Firefighters are running towards the inferno that threatens to engulf our cities, our homes, and our lives. They train to fight a force of nature that cannot always be contained.

This weekend I had the honour to be present at the ceremony celebrating those firefighters with exemplary fire service. The Lieutenant Governor of Alberta and the Alberta Minister of Justice gave awards to those who have gone above and beyond in their duty to protect Albertans. Considering what these men and women do on a regular basis, I do not know how they choose who goes above and beyond. To me, they all deserve to be honoured.

I was not able to greet him in person at the event, but I would like to congratulate the constituent from my Calgary-Foothills riding who received an award, Mr. Bruce Barrs. Thank you for everything you do for the people of my riding.

I would like to congratulate every single firefighter who received an award. It is a job that we're not all cut out for. It requires nerves of steel, that I do not have. It requires a calm focus and trust in their team while in the midst of a burning building. It requires an aspect of humanity that very few have. It requires the willingness to risk your life for another. For that and for so much more I would like to thank every single firefighter for everything they do for Albertans. My special thanks goes out to the firefighters who have travelled all the way from South Africa and other countries and other provinces of Canada.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Notices of Motions

The Speaker: The Associate Minister of Health.

Ms Payne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would like to give oral notice of a motion for tomorrow's Order Paper, that motion being as follows:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to implement measures to regulate medical assistance in dying consistent with the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Carter versus Canada (Attorney General) and any legislative measures approved by the Parliament of Canada to ensure that Albertans can benefit from the orderly implementation of this court decision so that (a) Albertans may exercise their rights to access medical assistance in dying; (b) appropriate safeguards be put in place to protect vulnerable Albertans; (c) conscience rights are respected while ensuring the rights of patients to access this service; and (d) the practice of medical assistance in dying is closely monitored and measures regulating medical assistance in dying are reviewed within one year.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. On behalf of the Minister of Municipal Affairs I would like to give oral notice of a motion for tomorrow's Order Paper, that motion being as follows:

Be it resolved that pursuant to section 18(4) of the Emergency Management Act the Legislative Assembly continue the state of emergency declared in the regional municipality of Wood Buffalo on May 4, 2016, Order in Council 107/2016, up to and including June 30, 2016.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Banff-Cochrane.

Mr. Westhead: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to table the requisite number of copies of a May 26, 2016, UNESCO report entitled World Heritage and Tourism in a Changing Climate, which states that important UNESCO World Heritage Sites like the Statue of Liberty and Old Town Lunenburg are being threatened by climate change.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-South West.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise today to table the requisite number of copies of various documents showing Conservative MP and leadership candidate Michael Chong; B.C. Premier Christy Clark; the Ontario PC leader, Patrick Brown; the Newfoundland and Labrador PC leader, Paul Davis; and Manitoba PC Minister of Sustainable Development Cathy Cox endorsing carbon pricing to combat man-made climate change.

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Environment and Parks.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to table the requisite number of copies of two documents to which I referred in question period today: one indicating that wind power will now supply 500 schools, 25 school boards; and another indicating that Alberta can forge its own energy future, including with agriculture, wind, and solar.

Tablings to the Clerk

The Clerk: I wish to advise the Assembly that the following documents were deposited with the office of the Clerk. On behalf of the hon. Ms Hoffman, Deputy Premier and Minister of Health, Alberta Innovates: Health Solutions annual report 2014-15; College of Midwives of Alberta annual report for the year ended December 31, 2015; pursuant to the Health Professions Act the College and Association of Registered Nurses of Alberta annual report 2014-2015; College of Licensed Practical Nurses of Alberta 2015 annual report; College of Medical Laboratory Technologists of Alberta 2015 annual report; Alberta College of Combined Laboratory and X-Ray Technologists 2015 annual report.

[Unanimous consent granted]

Public Bills and Orders Other than Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 206 Post-traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD) Awareness Day Act

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would like to start by saying thank you to all the members in the House today.

It is my absolute privilege to rise today and move second reading of this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I'd like to share with you a little bit about why this bill is so important. As a social worker that has practised in a variety of roles for 20 years, I have seen first-hand the impact of trauma on individuals. Children, youth, adults, and seniors can all be affected. I have worked with both the individual that has been directly impacted by trauma and then those family members, support people, caregivers, and professionals that are in their lives.

As a front-line worker, Mr. Speaker, I experienced direct trauma along with some of my co social workers. Initially, although upset, we minimized the situation and talked about this being part of the job. Our manager and supervisors were aware of the situation and within a few days brought in trauma support workers to do a debrief with our team and any other staff that were indirectly impacted. I remember being so thankful to have the opportunity it gave us to talk about this experience.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, it wasn't enough for me. After a few weeks I still wasn't feeling myself. I cried uncontrollably. I couldn't sleep, and every time I closed my eyes, the situation was on a reel. I continued to come to work and gave the usual expected response with my peers when asked how I was doing. It wasn't until a friend and co-worker intervened and suggested that I might benefit from seeing a professional and my doctor – I didn't see the symptoms in myself and was so grateful for her help – that I was able to get treatment and was supported by my workplace to take care of myself. Because of this early intervention, I was able to get to a place where I was no longer suffering from the symptoms that were making everyday life absolutely unbearable.

Mr. Speaker, most of us have heard the term posttraumatic stress disorder, also known as PTSD. It's a disorder caused by a traumatic event that is outside the normal realm of human experience. With PTSD symptoms continue for more than one month and may include flashbacks, nightmares, severe anxiety as well as uncontrollable thoughts such as reliving the event. PTSD causes significant distress, which can result in impairment of the individual's social interactions, decrease in the capacity to work, or impairment of other important areas of functioning. Some jobs and occupations place people in situations of higher occupational stress. Military personnel, first responders, doctors, nurses, and other front-line workers experience higher rates of PTSD than other professions.

Repeated abuse and trauma such as that experienced in domestic violence and war can also result in PTSD. According to the Canadian Mental Health Association posttraumatic stress disorder is a mental illness involving exposure to trauma, including death or the threat of death; serious injury; sexual violence such as rape, assault, torture, being kidnapped or held captive; military combat; severe car accidents; and natural or man-made disasters.

The Canadian Forces mental health survey for 2013 says that PTSD symptoms include repeated reliving of the event, disturbance of day-to-day activity, avoidance of stimuli associated with the event, irritability, outbursts of anger, or sleeping difficulty. Veterans, front-line workers, emergency personnel, rescue workers, and first responders are some of the Albertans who are vulnerable to developing PTSD. The Canadian Forces mental health survey for 2013 says that within Canadian Forces personnel the rate of PTSD doubled between 2002 and 2012, with about 5.3 per cent of military personnel being affected. As well, according to the Canadian Mental Health Association PTSD also affects women almost twice as much as it does men. Refugees are more prone to PTSD, and aboriginal people who attended residential schools have higher chances of suffering from PTSD.

Mr. Speaker, when I decided to bring forward this legislation several months ago, I started consulting with groups and individuals who have worked with PTSD issues directly, individuals with PTSD as well as family members whose loved ones have PTSD. I feel truly honoured to have had the incredible opportunity to hear from so many Albertans who in some way have been impacted by posttraumatic stress disorder. The courage and the trust that it takes to share their story is something that I really admire, knowing that telling their story is part of breaking the stigma that for too long has been associated with PTSD.

In the last two months I have reached out to over 40 stakeholder groups comprised of front-line workers, including corrections officers, social workers, workers with child and family services; Alberta Health Services emergency; RCMP; Edmonton fire services; the Edmonton Police Service; people from the Canadian Forces health services; Veterans Affairs Canada, the Canadian military; military families resource centre; a spouse who has run peer support groups; the Faculty of Rehabilitation Medicine; indigenous community representatives; members of the LGBTQ-plus community; unions; settlement and immigration agencies serving refugees and newcomers; journalists; emergency roadside assistance workers; as well as physicians and psychologists.

The list is endless, Mr. Speaker, and the powerful truth is that anyone can be impacted. PTSD can affect our parents, our siblings, our children, our grandchildren, our co-workers, and our neighbours. I have heard that individuals affected by PTSD will struggle to identify that they are suffering and often blame themselves or see this as a weakness when really, as Brigadier General Eyre articulated so well in his statements to me, this is a normal reaction for many when facing abnormal circumstances.

These stakeholders from diverse backgrounds have all indicated one common understanding, and that is that we need better awareness and advocacy for PTSD. Mr. Speaker, that is what this bill intends to do. By dedicating a day, June 27, as PTSD awareness day in our province, we will raise awareness and educate the general public about PTSD, its causes, symptoms, who is most affected, and how to find supports in Alberta.

Mr. Speaker, a lack of awareness is increasing the stigma associated with PTSD and putting people's lives at risk. Through this piece of unique legislation we will create a day to raise awareness and educate the general public about PTSD, its causes, symptoms, who is affected, and how to find supports. The day would highlight those most affected, such as veterans, front-line workers, emergency personnel, rescue workers, and first responders as well as those who have experienced trauma, such as survivors of residential schools and refugees who have escaped war. It would educate the public about the long-term effects and triggers and recognize the importance of accurate and early diagnosis.

Given the shame that still exists for those suffering PTSD, the day would serve to raise awareness and aim to reduce the stigma amongst those with PTSD and their friends and families and within Albertan communities. June 27 is national PTSD day in the United States. In Canada we do not have a PTSD awareness day act yet. We might be leading the way here in Alberta.

The fire in Fort McMurray is still prominent in all of our minds. The fast action, dedication, and hard work of the first responders has saved 90 per cent of the structures in the city of Fort McMurray. Mr. Speaker, while PTSD has a relatively high profile, it is only one of several possible operational stress injuries, OSI. The government of Alberta is addressing OSI among its workforce and first responders through a crossgovernmental OSI working group. This group is led by the fire commissioner's office, Municipal Affairs, and includes Labour.

The bill will create a bigger picture in constructing awareness and a support mechanism. Now is the time to legislate a day dedicated to PTSD awareness. It's the right thing to do. I encourage all members of the Assembly to unanimously support this bill.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat.

Mr. Barnes: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thanks to the hon. member for bringing this bill forward. Thanks to all for the opportunity to speak on Bill 206, the Post-traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD) Awareness Day Act. It, of course, is very, very timely in the wake of all that has happened in our northern communities to be discussing PTSD and the various ways in which it impacts the lives of Albertans. There were a great deal of people in these cities and towns who had to evacuate at a moment's notice and endure some incredibly harrowing and stressful circumstances to be able to escape with their lives. There were also many dedicated first responders who stayed to fight the fires that were sweeping across and to maintain order amongst the chaos. Their courageous actions are to be commended and remembered.

However, I do think we have a tendency to gloss over the tremendous emotional impact that these stressful and dangerous situations have on these brave men and women. Perhaps it's because we see them as heroes and we forget they are also people with very human needs. Who helps a person who helps the rest of us? Like many of us here, I was struck by the photos of firefighters in Fort McMurray lying on the grass, exhausted from many continuous hours of strenuous work saving a city and preserving Albertans' lives. I was struck by the image of such sheer physical exhaustion and commitment, literally going until the body could not go any farther. But behind the obvious physical exhaustion, the signs of which were clearly evident, what is the emotional and mental toll, which is less obvious, in the minds of those who serve us so well?

Mr. Speaker, PTSD has a long history but with not such a great understanding of it as we have today. In the First World War it was commonly referred to as shell shock, which gave way to battle fatigue and other related terms. Today we call it PTSD, but the nature of the affliction is the same. Severe psychological shock or injury can cause persistent mental and emotional strain. This can in turn manifest itself as physical symptoms such as insomnia, anxiety, or loss of concentration. The condition is often treated more successfully with early intervention. Finding an exact number of sufferers is a little difficult because studies of other North American populations peg the lifetime prevalence at approximately 8 per cent and the 12 month prevalence at 3 and a half per cent. I think it's safe to say that a high number of these are people who respond to emergencies as a career.

I do know people who have difficulty returning to work after a PTSD diagnosis, and these personal experiences form part of the Wildrose mental health recommendations, which included improved access to mental health supports for PTSD sufferers and increased awareness of their plight. I'm also happy that in Alberta front-line workers who receive a PTSD diagnosis from a physician or psychologist are presumed to have suffered it on the job and, unless proven otherwise, automatically qualify for workers' compensation benefits. I was pleased to vote with my Wildrose colleagues in support of that approximately three years ago, and I'm especially glad that we do take this seriously as a workplace injury.

Now, my understanding is that this bill would have Alberta's PTSD awareness day coincide with the American version of the same name introduced by the U.S. Senate several years ago. Mr. Speaker, I think this is a common-sense move that we're all behind.

In closing, I will be voting in favour of this bill, as I'm sure all of my Wildrose colleagues will be as well. Thank you.

Ms McKittrick: Mr. Speaker, I'm delighted to speak in support of Bill 206, the Post-traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD) Awareness Day Act. I want to thank the MLA for Edmonton-Castle Downs for initiating this bill. Posttraumatic stress disorder, also known as PTSD, is a disorder caused by a traumatic event that is outside the normal realm of human experience. These symptoms continue for more than a month and may include flashbacks, nightmares, and severe anxiety as well as uncontrollable thoughts such as reliving the event. It causes significant distress, which can result in the impairment of the individual's social interactions, a decrease in capacity to work, or impairment of other important areas of functioning.

I would have really liked to have known about PTSD when I worked with refugees in the early '90s fleeing the war in Vietnam, Laos, and Cambodia because if I had known about it, then I would have understood why the people I worked with were acting the way that they were, especially their inability to move forward and to think of their future and what they could be doing rather than remaining in refugee camps.

Some jobs, occupations place people in situations of higher operational stress. Military personnel, first responders, doctors, and nurses experience a much higher rate of PTSD. Veterans, front-line workers, emergency personnel, rescue workers, first responders, and families of victims are some of the Albertans who are also vulnerable to developing PTSD. Repeated abuse and trauma such as experiences with domestic violence and war can also result in PTSD.

Mr. Speaker, while we in Canada have been fortunate not to have experienced war, bombing, or armed conflict on our soil, many Canadians have, either through their service in our military, RCMP, or as peacekeepers with United Nations operations. Others in our midst have experienced armed conflict, bombing, war, killing, rape, starvation, terror, and torture. They have come to our country as refugees and immigrants. Many find it very, very hard to speak about their experiences, about their loss of friends, family, possessions, careers, and hope for the future and about the sheer terror that they have faced.

Mr. Speaker, I've only had one moment of terror in my life, the day that I was shot at while on an international election observer mission in Bosnia. I still remember lying on the floor of the van, wondering what would happen if the shooters would hit the tires of the van I was in, immobilize the van, and capture us. Would they kidnap us, rape us, or kill us? I will forever be grateful for the UN peacekeeper base that was not too far away, where we were able to safely flee to. My one and only moment of terror reminds me daily of the reality of many in our communities who have had many, many moments of terror in their lives, that they cannot forget, that prevent them from sleeping, loving their families, thinking of the future, not feeling guilty about the actions that they committed or the actions committed against them. This haunts them hourly. Victims of torture find it particularly challenging to move on from their experiences. They need qualified and fully accessible support and counselling. We need to be sensitive to crosscultural issues in counselling and family dynamics as we support these Canadians who have come to our country from places that have seen so much destruction and horror.

Mr. Speaker, I have seen the impact on the lives of many and on their families. PTSD can impact a person in many different ways, and many different things can trigger an episode. It can prevent a person from working, going to school, being a parent, and it does not go away. Given that shame still exists for those suffering with PTSD, the day that is proposed in this bill would serve to raise awareness and aim to reduce the stigma among many in our communities that suffer from PTSD. Too many in our communities have been impacted by PTSD, either directly as sufferers or indirectly as their friends and families.

I would therefore urge all members to support this bill that would raise the awareness and educate the general public about PTSD, its causes, symptoms, who is the most affected, and especially how to find support in Alberta. No one should be alone suffering from PTSD.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member. I continue to be amazed and feel privileged to hear stories every day in this House that I have not heard before.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Dr. Swann: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I am very pleased to endorse this important initiative. Mental health is clearly an issue that affects every one of us, our families, our friends, our co-workers.

Trauma is something that comes in many forms, from childhood through to senior citizens in their final days. I guess one of the things that has become very clear to those who research mental illness and addictions is that if we don't identify it, if we don't help people to come to terms with it, talk about it, and find solutions to the disability that comes out of trauma, to the disease that comes out of trauma – indeed, some people with PTSD coming out of the armed forces say that this should not be called a disorder; it should be called a disease. It's a lifetime disease according to some of the veterans.

Some of them have found tremendous help, for example, with companion dogs. They've talked to me about just how profoundly dogs have influenced their ability to be present, find some kind of sense of control, which is part and parcel of the healing process, getting back control over your own life and feelings and the thoughts that keep creating tumult. Many different approaches have been tried over the years, and indeed a research-oriented program has come up with some evidence-based approaches that have made a huge difference in some of the most seriously affected people. The key is to get in early. If one doesn't identify it early, if one doesn't recognize it, if the family doesn't bring that person forward, if the person is isolated, it only gets worse and it becomes intractable, in fact, and impossible to treat if it goes on for years and years. Maybe not impossible – maybe that's the wrong word – but extremely difficult to treat.

If drugs are used inappropriately, they become more of a problem than a solution because they fail to address some of the cognitive and reactionary issues, even biochemical changes that have occurred in the brain. I'm afraid some therapists go through repetitive exposures to the trauma as an attempt to try to desensitize persons to the trauma. It may actually aggravate the problem in some situations. The evidence suggests that a combination of cognitive behavioural therapy and a recognition of not only the seminal event, the trauma, but previous events and how they have built a capacity or an incapacity to address some of these emotional and physical changes that occur either on re-exposure or memories coming back, the sleep disturbance that occurs, and the cycle then of stress and distress – on and on it goes.

I guess my point is that one of the major reasons we don't identify it early, one of the major reasons we don't treat it is that people are shy to bring it forward. This identification of a day for PTSD hopefully will increase people's level of understanding, acceptance, willingness to reach out to someone who has clearly been in a traumatic experience, willingness to facilitate some kind of therapy, whether it's financial help or transportation in the case of some people who don't have transportation, or whatever it happens to be.

The key barrier, it seems, is still stigma: I can't admit I have a serious problem, I can't admit that I am incapable at certain times in the day or certain times in my life, and I can't admit that I have a problem that's interfering with my life, my relationships, my work, my self-esteem, my capacity to be a full human being. Anything we can do to help both – well, since it's so widespread and all of us have experienced traumatic events in our lives, I think we can recognize that at some level that has to be dealt with, and if it isn't, it continues to impress itself and interfere with day-to-day life. I see the importance of this day in helping educate everyone that it's okay to have this condition, that it's okay to survive a trauma, that it's okay to talk about that. Indeed, it's important that one reaches out for the kind of help that one should be able to receive under these circumstances.

Stigma is alive and well. I know health professionals who've been through traumatic events, EMS workers who have seen decapitations and dismemberments of people in motor vehicle accidents who somehow feel they have to carry on and not seek or be provided with the supports they need to deal with their continued nightmares or the inability to be present to their family, the inability to be actually present and find any kind of inner peace themselves.

I really congratulate the government on bringing this forward, especially at this time, obviously, with the fires, with some of the recognition that's come forward through the mental health review, the recognition that we don't have the supports we need, necessarily, either the number of professionals or the competence of the professionals, to deal with what's called trauma-informed therapy. It's now got its own name.

Trauma-informed therapy is a special branch of mental health that has prepared people, based on the evidence, to be able to provide the kind of mental and at times spiritual supports as well as a recognition that physical symptoms are part of it and that they have to be properly assessed in a holistic way. A physician often needs to be involved to make sure there aren't any other physical problems. There may well need to be a counsellor; almost certainly there would need to be a counsellor. There may need to be peer support, with peers in that particular profession who understand what the individual has gone through and can be there over the days and weeks and months and years that it may well involve, with the families engaged, and perhaps if this person is involved with a church, the spiritual leader of that church would be involved.

There is a tremendous need for, I guess, widespread recognition that this is very much a whole-person experience, and it needs to be dealt with in a whole-person way, not simply with a prescription and then "Come back in six weeks, and we'll see how you're doing," that sort of thing. No, this has to be a very planned, comprehensive approach, and the first step, as I say, is in engaging the public and the community in recognizing that it's a real issue. It has to be identified, and people have to be encouraged and supported in that experience.

I'm fully supportive of this initiative and will be voting so. Thanks, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Culture and Tourism.

Miranda: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my honour and pleasure to rise and speak to this bill, in favour of this bill. I thank the Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs for bringing this very important piece of legislation forward.

As I've talked in this House in the past, I've talked about my experience in this country as a refugee. Although the questions have been asked, I haven't really before talked about that part of my life. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that it was not a very pleasant one, and I distinctly remember the sound of gunfire. I think that the smell of war is one that no one ever forgets. It's something where, as I remember, the sound of airplanes overhead meant the real possibility that a bomb could drop on our house, and in several locations bombs did drop very close to our house. Unfortunately, one person that was living with us during the worst part of the war was killed, and unfortunately we could not take her body outside. It was not a very pleasant experience, needless to say.

I remember also leaving our home and getting to the border between Guatemala and Honduras, and I very clearly remember my mother holding my hand, pointing to the river, and saying to me, "Grab your sister, and if they won't let us through, run across because we need to get to the other side in order for us to not be deported back to Nicaragua." All those things: they stay with you for many, many years.

I was very lucky when I came to Canada. I found the help of somebody who was keenly aware of the effects that those kinds of things had on me as a child, on the family. Dr. Christine Grabenstetter, our family doctor, often told me many years after how she agonized over the fact that at the age of 12 she had to put me on antidepressants because she did not think that it would be wise for me not to be on them. With her help and the care and support that she and many other people from the health professions provided me, I eventually stopped being afraid of the sound of cars coming behind me. I stopped being afraid of the sound of fireworks during the Stampede. The first few years were not pleasant ones for me because the sounds, you know, triggered memories that were not very pleasant. Now I can tell you that I do enjoy it, but it took a while for me to get over those. As I said, it was an extremely paralyzing fear of sounds, and sometimes those kinds of things prevent you from growing as a person, but as I mentioned, I was very lucky.

Not too long ago I had the chance to speak to a Syrian family that moved about two blocks away from where my constituency office is now. In speaking to this family – I spoke to the mother – and sharing my experience and my story with her, she showed me the scar on her son's neck, where a bullet had grazed him and nearly took his life. I remember having this conversation with her and telling her how important it is to get the support. It is only at that point, when you feel safe, that you have the opportunity to deal with all the emotions and all the things that come out as a result of being in such horrible experiences, especially as a child. I do believe that she understood what I was trying to say. I do have the opportunity to go back and see how I can be of assistance. I guess that by sharing that experience, I gave her an understanding of the resources that are available to her and her family to bring people out of the sheer horror that you have to share when you live through that experience.

Like I said, I'm very supportive of this bill. It's one that recognizes not just the shared experience that we have and the lived experience that we have, but it is a lifelong experience as well. Like I've mentioned, it's something that comes up every so often when we see things and we experience things.

In my previous life I was a union organizer, and I had the opportunity to organize several EMS units in Alberta. When I had the opportunity to talk to them and hear about their stories, I definitely heard familiar experiences, saw emotions on their faces that were very familiar to me, and I understood that we shared a common experience, that of trauma, and how you deal with it.

Again, these are the people that run to danger when most of us are very much in survival mode and needing to get out of the way. But I'd like to say that these people have often shown the best side of them, and I think it is up to us to ensure that when the danger is gone and the emotions come in, we provide the support and that we recognize how this is a lifelong issue and illness that you need to deal with, and it's something that takes a long time to process. It's not something that you're, I think, ever able to get over.

Having said all that, I thank the member once again for bringing this very important piece of legislation forward. I will be supporting it, and I would encourage all members to do so as well.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Fish Creek.

Mr. Gotfried: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm happy to rise today to speak about Bill 206, Post-traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD) Awareness Day Act, and thank the hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs for bringing this bill forward. You know, a lot of the conversation here has of course been around the first responders and those brave people that step up, as the previous speaker reflected on, and who run towards danger instead of running away from danger. There are members of the public, obviously, who have had to run from danger here recently, and we see that, whether it's floods and fires and other things like that, both natural disasters and man-made disasters but also, of course, vehicular crime and things like that.

Mr. Speaker, I'd like to speak and just recount some of my own personal experiences, never really having addressed, maybe, some of the impact of some of those things that may affect all of us, but most certainly we see it most prominently in our military and our first responders. You know, when I was very young, in growing up, I spent five years in Lagos, Nigeria, during the Biafran war and was subjected to a lot of what was going on at that point in time. In October 1968, towards the end of the war, a last-ditch attempt was made by the Biafran air force to bomb Lagos harbour. That plane blew up over our house, essentially at very low altitude, and shattered all the roofs and all the windows and bent metal-frame French doors as if they were made out of plastic. We were lucky, but the occupants of the plane did not survive, and pieces of the plane, from the cockpit, which was four houses away from me between two houses, to pieces of the wing to the shrapnel rain, rained down upon us for what seemed like a matter of minutes. It was an experience, at the ripe age of nine years old, that I'll never forget.

Having lived through that, I think that at the time it seemed like it was a very curious thing and something that maybe a nine-year-old got a little bit excited about because there were pieces of airplane, which we then gathered up and which were seized by the Nigerian army later. It seemed just like an experience to have a bit of an impact. Maybe you don't realize, when you think through things like that, how unusual those might be, but you take it onboard and turn it into a great story, and you move on with it. But you don't know at the time that there are some of those things that the first responders and those other people address. You do what we do sometimes in our society, which is not a good thing, which is that you suck it up, and you turn it into a story and move on with it, not recognizing that there may be PTSD, post-traumatic stress, associated with that, as I think the previous member mentioned, that you don't even know is affecting you until that is brought forward.

Some may say that I might be a little bit accident or disaster prone, but in 1999 I happened to be on a cruise ship that caught fire and sank, and we had to abandon ship in the middle of the Strait of Malacca just as the sun was setting. We ended up in some rather dilapidated lifeboats bobbing around in the Strait of Malacca, which I later found out were shark-infested waters, for about nine hours and finally were rescued by a Russian freighter and made it to shore another seven hours later. Abandoning that ship was another interesting experience and, again, has given rise to comments by many of my friends that they don't really want to take holidays with me.

But all joking aside, four years after that, I also happened to have the interesting timing of being in Phuket, Thailand, on Boxing Day 2004. We were, luckily, not on the beach when the first wave hit in Phuket but were looking for two missing friends and travel mates at the time. When the second wave hit, which was about 12 feet higher than the first one, I managed to make it up a set of stairs with my three children, who were 11 and eight and five at the time, with my wife just behind me, about 30 seconds before the wave hit. We all know what happened, a quarter million people lost, yet we came home, and we were safe.

A small group of us came back and saw the devastation. We were safe and, I think, took that mentality of: we were safe, and we were okay. In hindsight, there was a group of us, and we kind of brushed it off, and we probably should have gone for some counselling at the time to find out about post-traumatic stress. I've since found out, on the anniversary of that occasion, which we recognized every year as a family, really, just to say on Boxing Day of every year how lucky we were. It's interesting that these things tend to fade and disappear. It was the 10th anniversary, of course, two years ago of that particular event, which was one of the largest losses of life in recent history. Again, when I reflect on that, I can feel it physically. I can know that there is trauma there from having experienced those things.

3:30

I think this is an opportunity for us to not only recognize it but to raise awareness and to reduce the stigma, as was mentioned by the hon. member from the Alberta Liberal Party. We need to raise the awareness, and we need to remove the stigma so that people can address these issues, whatever they may be. It may be something that somebody doesn't think is a particularly pronounced trauma, or it may be something that is extremely traumatic. I think we need to do that.

I'm encouraged to see that there are things like EMDR, eye movement desensitization and reprocessing, going on. There are many unusual treatments that may not be what we would think of as traditional treatments, but I'm glad to see that that's happening. I think this day will give us an opportunity to increase the focus, increase the awareness, and perhaps increase the research and funding around such issues.

Mr. Speaker, because of that, I will be pleased to support this bill. Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to rise and speak to Bill 206, establishing a posttraumatic stress disorder awareness day, put forward by the Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs. I commend the member for bringing this forward. Posttraumatic stress disorder is an issue that should concern all of us. As conservatives we believe in the dignity and value of human life. That someone should have to deal with PTSD alone and with inadequate support is an affront to those values.

Ensuring adequate access to mental health supports is an issue that greatly concerns my colleagues and I in the Official Opposition caucus. Earlier this year our caucus released a report detailing 10 common-sense recommendations that the government should take into account as part of their mental health strategy. One of those recommendations was to improve mental health services available for front-line workers. The report reads:

The Workers' Compensation Amendment Act, 2012, was an important first step in removing the burden of proof from first responders afflicted with PTSD because of their job and streamlining the claims process for them. Reducing the stigma, and making debriefings standard practice following a critical call, is the next important step to take. Increasing awareness of available supports through an education campaign will ensure that no one feels that they are alone in their battle with PTSD.

Now, the establishment of an awareness day doesn't solve the availability-of-services issue that we identified. However, having an awareness day does at least provide an opportunity for us all to look at what issues still exist and ask if adequate services are being provided to those affected by PTSD.

For us here, the PTSD awareness day that this act seeks to establish should be an opportunity to look back on what progress has been made on this issue and whether or not Albertans are being provided with adequate supports for PTSD. This legislation should be an invitation for action, not passive showmanship. It would be profoundly disappointing if all this act did was to ensure that we have a new ribbon to wear on our lapels for this cause on a particular day without any actual examination of whether we are ensuring that services are there for those Albertans who need it the most.

As the Official Opposition critic for jobs and labour I am particularly concerned about PTSD that arises as a result of workplace trauma. Figures from WCB show that last year alone WCB accepted 79 claims for PTSD. Understandably, these claims came predominantly from front-line professionals. Paramedic occupations accounted for 31 claims, Mr. Speaker, followed by firefighters, and then followed by police officers. These are professions that are generally under the category of essential services because we recognize that these professions are integral as a safety net to our day-to-day existence.

About eight years ago, in 2008, researchers at McMaster University released the results of a national survey they had conducted. Their results appeared in academic journal CNS Neuroscience & Therapeutics. Their survey looked at responses from almost 3,000 Canadians, so the results can't be dismissed as results from an inadequate sample. Those results found that approximately 1 in 10 Canadians say that they have suffered PTSD at some point in their life.

The survey found that 76 per cent of Canadians agreed that one single traumatic event was sufficient to cause PTSD. This shouldn't be a surprise to anyone, though, if you consider the types of horrific events that can cause PTSD: the death of a loved one, witnessing serious injury, witnessing murder, sexual assault. The list goes on. It's no surprise that these sorts of events would seriously impact and affect someone. Developing PTSD comes from a variety of factors. How severe was the trauma? What social supports are available after the trauma? Did the trauma occur during childhood? Were there other traumatic events in the person's life? The availability of supports for those suffering from PTSD is something we should be mindful of, and when PTSD awareness day comes each year, we should be able to assess what progress has been made.

I support what the member is trying to achieve with this bill. It has long been our caucus's position that mental health services for front-line workers need to be improved. We recognize that PTSD has significant implications not only for those who have experienced trauma but for their communities as well. Establishing a particular day to raise awareness is an important step. It's certainly not a solution in and of itself, but it's an important opportunity to raise awareness about an important issue in our community.

I commend the Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs for putting this legislation forward. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Creek.

Ms Woollard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I applaud all the things that my colleagues on this side and the other side of the House have said about this bill. I think it's very timely and important.

There are just a few things that I have to add to the conversation. When I was very young – and I was born just after the end of World War II – I used to wonder. It seemed like a strange thing, but my father would have nightmares, and everybody in the house would be woken up. Our house was very small. We didn't think too much about it; we certainly didn't question it. It was just one of the things that happened, and I knew that there were other fathers who had the same experience. Of course, that went on for quite a long time because nobody knew what it was, and nobody knew what should be done to help the person with it. Clearly, it was PTSD or shell shock, whatever you call it. I think back as an adult on what these people suffered. You know, these were our parents, and they were only young adults at the time, but they were going through this day after day, night after night while fulfilling the requirements for having a home and family.

If we can do anything to help people who have had similar experiences, witnessed or were part of a horrendous experience that caused them to have PTSD, the more we can do to help them get back to normal functioning, the sooner the better.

Just a couple of things that I've been reading about. One is that if the event is a human-intentioned event, a person is much more likely to get PTSD. Natural disasters, just for interest's sake, are less likely to cause it because you know that it's not a person wishing you harm. So bombs being dropped on your house are much more likely to cause PTSD than a flood. It may be horrendous, but that could be a helpful factor in helping people through the aftereffects of the Fort McMurray fire. This is, hopefully, not linked to human action, although there may be a link back there.

The other thing that is really important to be aware of, that we should know about, is that children show the effects of PTSD differently than adults. We know it with depression. I remember first learning about how children suffering from depression are more likely to display anger and irritability; they're not going to show signs of sadness so much. The same with PTSD. You get a child who's witnessing horrendous things – we may not even think that they're noticing, but if they're witnessing harsh actions of, you know, traumatic events, and we see this kind of irritability, touchiness, being very easily annoyed afterwards, it could very easily be a symptom of PTSD.

Even with adults one of the indicators and one of the symptoms can be that hyperawareness that people get when they're not very secure. That hyperarousal, being very worried about things, being anxious, having difficulty falling asleep, difficulty staying asleep, and being annoyed and irritable are all part of the PTSD disorder, and it kind of sometimes may help people to identify what it is. Instead of somebody, a family member or a friend, just being easily annoyed and touchy, they may really have something going on, and it would help to steer them toward some professional help.

On a better side, on a more positive side, the more we decrease the stigma and shame, the more we encourage people to speak out and to go and access some help for the disorder, the likelihood is, the prognosis, that with appropriate help – and it's usually psychotherapy and medication because there tends to be depression in an awful lot of the cases of PTSD – people have their symptoms reduced to the point where they're functioning pretty effectively within a couple of months. About half of the people who have PTSD and do get help are quite improved within a few months. That's the good news.

Sometimes one of the problems is that some people who do witness or are subjected to some brand of shock don't even show symptoms for months, so they don't relate the symptoms that they're displaying with the action that happened, but they could be just delayed in showing it. Basically, every individual who sees an event or is part of an event or is the subject of an attack, a victim of a crime, is likely going to show it differently. By keeping it out in the open and making people feel comfortable, being aware of it and being aware that people we know well may have it, we can be helpful and we can be supportive and we can help people get through this.

I think it's a tremendous act, and I will support it completely. I hope every one else will. Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I want to offer my sincere thanks to the member for bringing forward this bill. I really want to thank all of the members who have shared their personal stories with the House and with Albertans here today. I think that that act alone helps end the stigma, helps deal with the stigma of posttraumatic stress and, I would hope, by extension, of mental health in general.

Without question, I support this bill, and I hope that not only does this end the stigma around posttraumatic stress but that it starts a catalyst for a conversation to increase the support for people suffering from not just posttraumatic stress disorder but from all mental health challenges. You know, when I think of posttraumatic stress, I think of many of the first responders who have to deal with the tremendous danger in their line of work, and in that first-responder group are all medical professionals, social workers, people who deal with traumatic child welfare cases. There is any number of front-line personnel who deal with very challenging situations as part of their profession and have to deal with the fallout from that, which in cases can be posttraumatic stress.

Many members of this House have shared their personal stories. I think of the first responders, the people who work in the Legislative Assembly Office, many of whom are former police officers, military personnel who have made tremendous contribution to our cities, our province, our country and perhaps come home to their homes with the scars from that. We as legislators on behalf of Albertans have an obligation to support the people who have stood up for us and to do so through their lifetimes over the long term. This bill, I would hope, is one of many steps that we can take to do exactly that, certainly not the only thing but one of the many things we can do.

I'm reminded of a conversation I had with the Member for Calgary-West about how the city of Calgary police handle traumatic situations and how that's changed over his career. Quite recently there was a very challenging situation where an officer had come back from a very difficult case and was told by the supervisor: "Now that we've gone through the details, how are you? Here's how you access psychological services." My questions to him were: "Is that common? Is that what happens in police forces?" He said no, that that was something that Chief Rick Hanson brought in, who was very strong in his leadership in changing the culture within the Calgary Police Service.

Those psychological services: perhaps there is still some stigma – I can't speak to the specifics of exactly how the culture works – but the stigma is in the process of being removed, and that is very encouraging. I think that's a model that I would hope can be followed in other police forces around the country, around the province, in Canada's military. The fact that we're standing here talking about it is a positive step. The fact that these things are starting to change also is a positive step.

What can we do, beyond that, as legislators? Well, in our everyday lives we can identify and learn to identify what posttraumatic stress looks like. We can ask ourselves: have we gone through a traumatic situation? Trauma is whatever we define it as. Trauma is whatever is traumatic to us. There is no limit to what trauma is. If it leaves you with feelings of depression, if it leaves you with a sense of reliving an event, whatever that happens to be, if it's flashbacks, if it's a difficulty forming long-term relationships, if it's insomnia, a sense of hopelessness or depression, lashing out at others, avoidance of a certain situation or of even a certain memory, including avoidance through substance abuse, all of these things can be signs of posttraumatic stress. It's important that we're aware of our own mindset and things that we have all gone through and that we're also on the lookout for those sorts of signs in others and that we do our best to help them get support.

For people we know who have PTSD, be supportive of those people in your life, whether they're family members, whether they're friends, whether they're neighbours. Do what you can to be empathetic and supportive in making sure that they're getting the help that they need and that they're getting the help they need not necessarily always just from someone else but that you're offering that help to them as well. That's something that they will likely need through their entire lifetime. That will vary. Sometimes you may need more help than others. Sometimes there are good days, and sometimes there are bad.

I think, of course, about the people from Fort McMurray, who had to flee through the flames. You know, I think of parents who are there being strong for their kids, making sure that their kids are feeling safe, and that's absolutely what every parent, I think, will do as an instinct. I would encourage anyone who's gone through that to look out for yourself as well, to be on the lookout for how that trauma has impacted you, and to not be afraid of what that means.

I can tell you that it's now going on almost three years after the flood, and I'm still trying to unpack what all that means, you know, whether some of the feelings I have are, in fact, posttraumatic stress, whether they're just day-to-day things we deal with in our life. But I know that that's had a real impact on my neighbours, on family members, on my constituents, on the community as a whole, and that's not something that goes away quickly. I can tell you that every year about this time the stress level really ramps up. I've been trying to be self-reflective on what that means for us, trying to keep an eye on how our daughters are faring, and in our own case I think that it's mostly so far so good.

I think that's something that we need to be very aware of, especially for all of our friends in Fort McMurray. This is not something that is healed right away. This is a challenge that the folks who have gone through that traumatic experience are going to have to deal with not just starting Wednesday of this week, as people start to go home, but over the coming months and the coming years. I would sincerely hope that the resources are available for people who are experiencing that. What's encouraging is that I think that, by and large, they have been. Those resources have been available for folks in the short term.

I really hope that that continues to be the case going forward and that we use opportunities like this bill, which I enthusiastically support, to continue this conversation, that we're gentle with one another, that we're compassionate with one another, and that we're very aware of what the trauma that people have gone through means to those people and how it will manifest.

Again, thank you very much, hon. member, for bringing this forward. It really is, I think, a positive step forward, and I hope that this does mark true change.

Thank you very much.

3:50

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Lougheed.

Mr. Rodney: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to speak to this bill. I would like to start by commending the hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs for spearheading what is truly a crucial bill. I do support it completely, and I do encourage unanimous support for this private member's bill because – let's face it, colleagues – this is one of those issues that transcends any party line. Sadly, it also transcends all boundaries. PTSD can affect anyone anywhere at virtually any time, as the name, posttraumatic stress, indicates.

For the moment, though, I would like to concentrate on our military who are affected by PTSD. I'd like to quote a soldier that I have a great deal of respect for. He shared with me in the past that in many cases PTSD actually takes many, many years to manifest itself, and many soldiers don't even realize that they have it. It's tough for them to come to terms with, and there's still this ethos of soldiering: we can tough out anything. That, again, is why we need an awareness day like this.

He points out that the Canadian armed forces have made great progress in removing that stigma of PTSD and mental health in general, and many soldiers do benefit from peer support programs and other great initiatives that have been introduced in recent years, so here, again, a great initiative that I believe we should all support not just within this Chamber but beyond these walls to all corners of our province.

The last point he makes is that these are examples and models that other emergency professionals, including paramedics and police, could look to to inspire their own programs. I'm sure the hon. member would say that this goes to social workers and all sorts of other professionals and the people that they serve as well.

I also have a fine constituent by the name of Barry Ashton. I've talked about him before in the House, and I'll talk about him again. It was in reference to Reaching the Summit for Mental Health and Wellness, this Mount Buller climb that we're doing for PTSD for those affected in the military. For the moment I'll just concentrate on the fact that Barry e-mailed me a couple of articles earlier today that give full support to this sort of thing, at least indirectly.

The first one is from Michael Wilson, and I'm guessing that you've heard of him, a PC member of the federal cabinet and a Canadian diplomat. Again, this transcends all party lines. I've met with him on a number of occasions, including when he and I delivered speeches at the Canadian embassy in Washington, DC. If you noticed, in the Globe and Mail, Alberta edition, there was an article on Wednesday, February 24, of this year on public health. It was entitled Aid for Suicide Prevention Must Be Part of Federal Budget. Again, the hon. member has pointed to the fact that down south they recognize it nationally; it isn't being recognized nationally here at this point. But good on you for leadership here in Alberta.

Michael writes:

We can no longer ignore the alarming evidence: Every day, at least 10 Canadians die by suicide. Do we have the courage to face down stigma and get help into the hands of those who need it?

As a former finance minister, I understand the tough challenges Prime Minister Justin Trudeau and Finance Minister Bill Morneau face in preparing the 2016 budget and allocating spending.

If you're wondering how this is related, the Mental Health Commission of Canada, MHCC – by the way, I reported to them when I was the chair of AADAC and was proud to do so – are asking the government to commit funds for a far-reaching national suicide prevention project, based on a plan that accounts for fiscal reality and maximizes the use of existing community resources to help those at risk of suicide.

As a father . . .

And it gets personal here, sir.

. . . the rate of suicide in Canada isn't just an alarming statistic, it's a deeply personal matter. We lost our son, Cameron, to suicide in 1995. I know the devastation it leaves in its wake.

The article goes on, Mr. Speaker, but it concludes this way:

Too often, suicide is the tragic end in the fight against . . . [PTSD]. More than half of military veterans and first responders who seek help for mental illness from a primary-care provider leave without effective solutions. That is why, alongside our partner Mood Disorders Society of Canada, we are asking for modest funds to give primary-care providers and gatekeepers the information they need to recognize PTSD and help people sooner.

Again, how does this relate? This day will draw people's awareness to this to make the services more widely available, Mr. Speaker, better funded, better accessed, with better treatment.

It goes on:

The Ontario government . . . recently announced a plan to help first responders – such as police officers, firefighters, and ambulance attendants – deal with PTSD as a result of employment. But before workplace claims are initiated, PTSD needs to be recognized and diagnosed.

High rates of mental illness and suicide are also found in indigenous communities . . . We will invite and partner with indigenous communities and work with them to develop a culturally safe and respectful approach to reduce suicide rates.

As advocate for indigenous relations for the PC caucus, obviously I support this as well.

The funding we seek pales in comparison with the $50-billion that mental illness costs the Canadian economy each year in health care and lost productivity. As priorities are weighed for this year's budget, we can no longer ignore the alarming evidence that we need stronger [investigation and] investment in suicide prevention. And we need to use the critical resources already place to effectively diagnose and treat PTSD.

You may have noticed, Mr. Speaker, that the beginning of the article deals with the very personal side of things, the middle is about the professional aspect of it, and at the end, yes, there is the political or economic, but it's in that order for a reason. There is a number attached to this, but that is, by far, not the most important thing.

The last words:

We must knit together as communities so that when people are at risk, help is within their grasp. Addressing suicide is no small task. Each one of us can and must help because, truly, it takes a village.

Perhaps the member would actually agree that in this case it takes a province. Now, I do know that hon. Mr. Wilson would be fully supportive with respect to this private member's bill.

Now, Barry Ashton also sent me something from Legion Magazine, back in the March and April 2013 edition, entitled PTSD: We've Got to Do More, and this is from the editors themselves. They state:

The extent of the problem is overwhelming. It is estimated that over the next five years approximately 30,000 personnel will leave the Canadian Forces, and about one third of these men and women will have mental health issues such as depression, anxiety, addictions, and sleep disorders. Of those, nearly 3,000 will have . . . [PTSD]. Often these problems do not show themselves until many years after the incident or incidents which caused them.

While the Canadian Forces has – in the last decade – made great strides in improving the diagnosis and treatment of PTSD and [other] operational stress injuries (OSIs), it must continue to move forward and not lose any of the ground it has gained, for there is a real fear – that through budget slashing – crucial gains can be lost. National Defence and Canadian Forces Ombudsman Pierre Daigle points to this fear in his recent report on Canada's military health-care system, titled Fortitude Under Fatigue.

I really do encourage members to read the rest of this because they really bring it home in not just political or professional but very personal ways.

Speaking of that, we use the term, hopefully more than once a year – in fact, I wish we'd use it every day – “lest we forget.” That's the title of an article in which a number of our veterans are quoted – the subtitle is The Shocking Crisis Facing Our Wounded [Soldiers] – just to let you know, again, some of the personal sides of this. Andrew's last name has been withheld to protect his identity – remember, Mr. Speaker, that this was a few years ago, when there was still a great stigma attached to this – but still the content of this excerpt is entirely intact.

He writes:

I thought it was normal to be angry all the time, going through life basically holding it in to the point after so long where I would explode ... I would have given my life for my country ... and I would rather have done that than have experienced this.

That's how serious it was for him. He's lived half of his life with PTSD, starting with his first tour at the tender age of 19, when he was in Bosnia in 1993.

He and a buddy were injured by what they then called a booby trap and what we now today would refer to as an improvised explosive device (IED). The other soldier had serious shrapnel wounds and was airlifted to hospital, then back to Canada. Andrew was around the corner of a building, protected from shrapnel but not the blast wave, which knocked him unconscious. He awoke with a terrible concussion headache, ringing in his ears and blurry vision. They wanted to send Andrew home, too. “But being 19, I fought tooth and nail,” he said. He was a small-town boy with big dreams. [He was] proud of his uniform. After a few days his vision cleared, and the headache disappeared.

[A timer sounded] I'll quote more later.

4:00

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members who would like to speak to Bill 206, Post-traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD) Awareness Day Act? Peace River.

Ms Jabbour: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Just very briefly I wanted to add and reinforce that I'm glad that we're talking about this issue and looking at ways to encourage the dialogue and raise awareness. When I was working in mental health as a therapist up in High Level, I learned that with the First Nations communities up there PTSD is huge, and a lot of it is related to the high rates of sexual abuse that occur within the communities. A lot of people have come to equate PTSD with first responders and those kinds of trauma, but we're starting to really learn that any kind of trauma you experience, particularly when you experience it as a child, has a dramatic effect on you as you get older. I'm glad that this bill helps open up those dialogues so we can start to understand why people are behaving the way they're behaving. It's often because they're being triggered by some horrific event that happened to them when they were a child.

That's all I wanted to say. Thank you.

The Speaker: Are there any members who would like to speak to the bill?

Seeing none, I would call upon the Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs to close debate.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I just want to say thank you to all members for sharing their very valuable input and for sharing their personal stories. It really is important.

That's all. Thank you.

[Motion carried; Bill 206 read a second time]

The Speaker: The Government House Leader.

Mr. Mason: Mr. Speaker, I rise to seek unanimous consent to waive Standing Order 8 in order to proceed immediately to Committee of the Whole for consideration of Bill 206, Post-traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD) Awareness Day Act.

[Unanimous consent granted]

Public Bills and Orders Other than Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Ms Jabbour in the chair]

The Chair: I'd like to call the Committee of the Whole to order.

Bill 206 Post-traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD) Awareness Day Act

The Chair: Are there any questions, comments, or amendments with respect to this bill? The hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Mr. Cooper: Thank you, Madam Chair. It's a pleasure to rise today and speak to Bill 206, Post-traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD) Awareness Day Act. You know, it's always great to be in the Assembly on days when we can find common cause for the betterment of many, and today seems to be one of those days. I would like to just briefly thank the member for bringing this bill forward. The very fact that we're speaking to the bill is already doing some of what the bill is intended to do. It's unlikely that without this bill we would have been able to hear from the hon. Member for Calgary-Cross and the hon. Member for Calgary-Fish Creek, I think, on so many of their personal stories.

It always amazes me how the Assembly is often a reflection of the province, and it should be a reflection of the province. While the government and I will disagree on whether some of their policies reflect what the people of Alberta want, my point is that the people inside the Chamber often are a reflection of the province, from so many diverse backgrounds. We had the pleasure of having the good doctor from Calgary-Mountain View preside this afternoon and speak specifically about some of the challenges around this issue. We just see these unique perspectives on both sides of the aisle, and all of the histories and the stories and the experiences that make up individual members of this place really reflect a strength.

While we disagree a lot of the time, sometimes I feel on days like today – I think it's the Road Runner cartoon. They punch the clock at the beginning of the day, and they chase each other around and fight and scrap and try to get the better of each other. Then at the end of the day we punch the clock and we walk down the stairs together and say: “Have a good day. We'll see you guys tomorrow.” On days like today we have this opportunity to reveal little bits of the story that has brought us here. Because I'm such a strong believer in the strength of democracy and the strength and the merits of the Assembly, it's great to be able to hear those things here in the Chamber, the things that have brought us here and the things that strengthen the Chamber.

This bill has shed a new light on those things. It's shedding a new light on the issues surrounding PTSD and the mental health issues that come along with that. There are so many things about the mental health system in our province and across this great land of ours that need both awareness and repair. I think of the impact that people like Clara Hughes and Rod Black have had in the form of the Bell Let's Talk Day. Who would have thought just a few years ago – and I don't actually even know the dates – the impact the Bell Let's Talk Day would have in terms of discussion around mental health? It's this sort of thing, a bill like this, that has the potential of doing that same thing.

Of course, with a piece of legislation like this there's always the risk that we put a mark on the wall and say, "Oh, look. We've done so many wonderful things to bring awareness to PTSD," but it stops there. There's always this risk that we can go home at the end of the day and feel really good about ourselves because we've done something positive but not go the extra mile to make sure that those who are suffering, those who are in pain, those for whom every day can be a struggle because of the horrific events that have happened to them, be it internal, external, as a child, whatever those things are, not provide the supports that go the extra mile. Now, I know that's not the intention of this bill. The very fact that we are raising awareness is a critical step in the process, but we need to ensure that we look at root causes, that we look at the way the health system and the mental health system are engaging with those on a go-forward basis.

I'm pleased to support Bill 206. Most days I feel honoured to be here. Today is certainly one of those days where we can reach across, reach beside, and move things forward in a manner that ultimately, at the end of the day, will help Alberta and help individuals suffering and raise awareness of a very, very important cause.

Before I close, let me just say a very heartfelt thank you to our men and women who serve around the world, many of which experienced things that no one should have to, the service that they provide for our country, a true public service, a commitment that they make that often puts the needs of their nation ahead of their own personal safety. Many of them know that they may in fact get into situations that are likely to cause significant stresses and damages that will affect them for a lifetime. Certainly, on behalf of myself personally and the constituents of Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills I just want to say a very special thank you to those men and women who serve our country and make it great.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

Mrs. Littlewood: Thank you, Madam Chair. To start, I would like to actually draw off what the member opposite, the Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills, was just saying. The MLA who previously represented that constituency actually spoke in favour of including corrections officers with presumptive PTSD coverage about four years ago. Some of those reasons are why I want to speak about it today. I have a lot of corrections officers that work in Fort Saskatchewan. They are a group of people that get overlooked quite often. They work day in, day out. I've gotten to know a couple of them and am proud to call them my friends. I'm proud to actually look up to them.

I would just like to share something from a letter that one of them shared with me.

To start, I would like to thank you for taking the time to discuss this issue with myself and others that have been affected by this. I thank you for taking it forward and attempting to fix a situation that needed to be fixed with the old government.

I was a correctional peace officer for 13 years before I had to retire. I was 33 years old at this time. I enjoyed my employment at the Fort Saskatchewan Correctional Centre for the first couple of years until my life changed. In 2007 I attempted suicide by attempting to slit my throat. I was lucky and did not fully cut deep enough, and I woke up on my kitchen floor.

At this time I made a decision to seek help. I was wrongfully diagnosed at that time with bipolar and was treated as such. For three or four years I accepted this diagnosis and used the medication I was prescribed. They had little or no effect on me, and I still to this date suffer from side effects from them.

I have since been reassessed and have been diagnosed with PTSD due to the years I have worked as a correctional peace officer.

There are a few things in here that I would like to highlight from what he shared with me.

One of them is that often people go misdiagnosed. I think that it's a laudable thing in this bill being put forward by the Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs to raise awareness of what the symptoms are. I know that often what we talk about is that we are our own best advocates for our health. Knowing what those indicators are so that we can identify them or a family can identify them or friends can identify them can help prevent people from getting lost in a health system, where ultimately they end up falling through the cracks.

Something that I take from this also is humility. He goes on to talk about how what he did in the normal course of a day was no different than another correctional peace officer that he worked with. These are not things that we normally see as human beings. They are murder, suicide, brutal self-harm, hostage-takings, people being shot at, people seeing physical and sexual abuse of one another, riots. These correctional peace officers put themselves in harm's way to enforce the laws that we put in place, ultimately, that put people behind bars. When I think of us as a society and I think about being a legislator, I know that I am responsible for the laws that I help create and that I vote on, and if it means that I'm asking someone to help enforce those on the other end, then I need to ensure that I am giving them the proper tools, the proper resources necessary to address those mental health issues that they unfortunately end up incurring.

Deanna Lennox, who is a former RCMP officer, is someone who has been tireless in advocating for front-line workers to be able to have good access, access they know where to find. She helped start a group called Help through the Front Door. You know, often what we struggle with in society is the stigma. It doesn't matter how many resources you put in front of a person until you start as a community, as a whole to address those issues that create the stigma, that prevents people from going through that front door and asking for help. That's what we really, really need to address.

The members from the Official Opposition spoke, you know, very eloquently, very passionately along with the current Premier of Alberta and the Minister of Education. They both spoke about how correctional peace officers are in a closed environment with people that can seek to do them harm all of the time. It really strains a person's mental well-being, and we need to make sure that we are finding ways – and this is a fantastic first step. I know that there are members in the House that would like to perhaps do a redo of Bill 1, which extended presumptive coverage for PTSD to people, including correctional peace officers, would like social workers to be included along with our firefighters, our police officers, our sheriffs, and our ...

Mr. Shepherd: Paramedics.

Mrs. Littlewood: Paramedics. Thank you.

We have people that are constantly in harm's way that we need to make sure that we're taking care of, because there are people that put themselves in harm's way all of the time, and then they don't feel supported at the end of the day when they go to access help. One of the phrases that I hear over and over again when I talk to corrections officers is that they feel like they are thrown away like garbage. They do it because they feel that they are called to do it, and we need to make sure that these people are still able to provide for their families, that they don't have to retire early from careers that they have chosen because they have a passion for doing that job.

That is why I'm happy and proud to stand in support of this bill. I think it's an important first step, but I do hope, along with the Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills, that we work forward on putting more supports in place that make sure that these individuals can have easier access to the supports that they need so that they can ultimately get the help that they are seeking for jobs that we ask them to go to. It's my pleasure to stand in support of this bill, and I encourage all members to do the same.

Thank you.

The Chair: Any further questions, comments, or amendments with respect to the bill? The hon. Member for Banff-Cochrane.

Mr. Westhead: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. It's an honour to rise here today and speak to this very important bill. I'd like to thank my colleague from Edmonton-Castle Downs for putting forward this very important bill.

Many of my colleagues here today know that my background is as a registered nurse. You know, I just wanted to share some of my experiences as well. I found it very moving to hear all of the different stories that have already been shared here today by my colleagues, and it just goes to show how prevalent posttraumatic stress disorder or those types of experiences can be. Just in a small room here with only 87 or so people we have a lot of members who have gone through these types of experiences.

I wanted to talk about the experience I had in nursing. Within the first year of becoming a nurse, I had a patient who passed away. I was working – it's called a neuro step-down unit – at the Toronto western hospital. It's kind of like an ICU but with not quite as critical patients there.

Of course, things can change very quickly. It was late at night. You know, working on the night shift is always kind of an interesting dynamic. You're up in the middle of the night, when most of the rest of the city is sleeping, and you're there safeguarding these patients. One of the routine tasks that we would do at night was to give patients their baths. It was a good way to sort of settle them down for the night and make them feel a little more comfortable. This particular patient had been there for quite some time. In the step-down unit the patients wear monitors all the time, so we've got the ECG heart monitors, the blood pressure monitors, and those kinds of things. When those things stay on a patient for a long time, they feel really yucky. They get sicker, and goo is all over them, so I wanted to give this patient a really good bath that night.

Just as I was finishing the bath – I had been chatting with him and settling him down for the night – I was about to put the ECG stickers back on. Sometimes neurosurgical patients can be confused, and he started saying, "Oh, my chest, my chest." And I said, "Oh, what's the matter?", and he just said, "My chest, my chest." So I, you know, put the stickers right back on him and called for help. We had to call a code blue just like that. It happened immediately. It turned out that the patient actually suffered from a thoracic aortic aneurysm. One of the major blood vessels in the chest just basically tore apart instantly, and he died right in front of our eyes.

You know, being a fairly new nurse and having this experience, it stayed with me all the time. I don't think about it constantly, but it's something I'll never forget. I always wonder: should I have taken those ECG leads off the patient? I was trying to give him some comfort and make him feel a little better. Knowing what I know about the condition that he passed away from, I know that having those ECG leads on wouldn't have made a difference in that case, but it's still something that stays with me. Maybe I should have left them on.

Another thing that I wanted to share was that when I was a student nurse, one of my first experiences was on a plastic surgery unit. This was probably the first patient I'd ever seen in a hospital. I walked into a room, and a woman had had plastic surgery on her face. I think it was for some kind of mandibular cancer. She had been fixed up, but of course plastic surgery isn't perfect, and the woman was quite disfigured. She had, you know, large scars on her face. Being the first time I'd ever seen a real patient – and there she was with a disfigured face – I had an immediate body language reaction. I knew that was wrong because I knew that the patient was watching me. The patients watch what their care providers are doing because they want to see: "What's it going to be like when I get out of the hospital? If the nurses react like that, how are regular people going to react?"

I felt horrible about that, but it also really made me conscious of the fact that as a health care provider I had to take care of my emotions and have full control of my emotions at all times. It's a very difficult thing to consider because of the range of situations that we find ourselves in, but patients and families look to us to be the ones that are solid as a rock. When things are going badly, the health care providers can't say: "No. I can't deal with this right now. I'm going home."

Our job is to take care of that patient no matter what the circumstances are, and I know that that's the case in all different sorts of occupations. You know, in one instance we can be discharging a patient. He or she has had a long course in the hospital, and they've gotten better. They've made progress, and they're about to go home. Having a multiple patient assignment, you might then go to the next room, and that patient is about to die. You've got to go and change your emotions all of a sudden, from one patient having a great news story – they're going home; they've gotten better: "Good for you, Mr. Jones" – and then a minute later having to shift your emotions to match the mood in the room of the next patient. Controlling a person's emotions like that can take a toll on a person.

I'd also like to talk a little bit about how, you know, we often think of front-line workers as suffering from this the most – and it certainly is the most common – but there are other health care providers that aren't necessarily thought of as front-line workers that also can suffer from posttraumatic stress disorder. After having worked in the operating room, I think of a lot of the housekeepers. In the operating room we start with a nice, clean, sterile room, and at the end of a surgery, depending on what it is, there can be blood everywhere: blood on the ceilings, blood on the floor, blood all over the bed, like, you name it. Some surgeons will joke: if you don't get blood on the ceiling, you're not doing it right. It's kind of morbid, but sometimes that's how we have to deal with those scenarios. The people that have to mop the blood off the ceiling can also suffer from these types of disorders, so I want to acknowledge those people.

The people that do the laundry get laundry soaked in blood, and they have to think about the story that may have resulted in that situation occurring. I think there are a lot of unsung heroes that we have in our public services that are put at risk of these kind of emotional experiences that we also need to make sure that we acknowledge.

I just want to use the last few minutes of my time here to talk about, as the Member for Calgary-Elbow had mentioned earlier, the impact of the 2013 flood on constituents. Certainly, the constituency of Banff-Cochrane was widely hit by the 2013 floods. Bragg Creek, Lac des Arcs, Exshaw, Harvie Heights, Canmore, Benchlands: almost all of the communities in Banff-Cochrane were affected to some degree. Still to this day when it starts to rain at this time of year, people get nervous. I know I was at the post office the other day saying: isn't it good that it's rained in order to sort of combat the risk of forest fires? That was something that was top of my mind. The person behind the desk at the post office, of course, reminded me that, you know, rain also makes people nervous, so there's a balance between events, and people perceive them in very different ways.

I know that people are getting to the point where it's close to three years after the fact, but some people have just finished fixing their homes, and now they're at the stage where they say: I've fixed my home, but now I've got to deal with the emotional stress of what I've just been through. They've been so busy fixing up their homes or repairing their businesses and dealing with those kinds of things that they're just now realizing what they've been through. You know, the effects on people that have been through the flood are so far ranging, and we need to acknowledge and support the experiences that people have been through and ensure that supports are available for them on an ongoing basis.

Just in closing, again I'd like to thank the Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs for bringing this very important bill forward. I'd also like to thank all members of this Assembly for granting unanimous consent to allow this bill to move forward in such an expeditious manner.

Thank you very much.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Dr. Turner: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I rise to speak in favour of this bill. I really want to echo the comments made by the Member for Banff-Cochrane. I truly appreciate the spirit of co-operation that exists in the House today. I know that all of us have the same goal in mind, and that is to basically change the world's view of this very important illness.

Like the Member for Edmonton-Mill Creek, I was born shortly after the Second World War. My father was a veteran, and he came back from the war without any symptoms of what at that time was called shell shock. But I do remember that there was a stigma that he unwittingly associated with his comrades who did suffer from what was called shell shock. I actually feel very badly for my father. I'm sure he didn't mean to do this, but it was a societal thing at the time that this was seen to be a form of weakness.

In fact, it was only in 1915 that the term "shell shock" was first used, apparently. In the First World War the British Expeditionary Force executed several dozen soldiers for running away from battle or for failure to follow orders or for basically becoming withdrawn. There was, obviously, little understanding at that time. They thought that it was due to some effect of shells exploding. In fact, if a person exhibited the symptoms – and they called it neurasthenia – after a shell explosion, the British Expeditionary Force actually awarded the equivalent of a Purple Heart, what's called a wound stripe. But if the soldier hadn't been exposed to an explosion, it was considered to be some failure of his resolve. They actually took the pension away from those individuals, and they probably discharged them dishonourably.

I can say that in 1950, which is about as far back as I can remember, that sort of attitude still persisted. I think what the Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs is doing today and all of us in supporting it are doing is trying to change that historical stigma that has come about. It is not weakness. It is not shirking of duty. It is not cowardice. This is a mental health issue, and it's time that we recognize that it is something that needs to be known about. We need to publicize what the symptoms of this condition are. We need to increase awareness, which is, I think, the prime purpose of this bill. We need to basically advertise this. We need to join with our American colleagues in having a day that recognizes or increases awareness of posttraumatic stress disorder.

I want to actually turn to my own personal situation. I can say that I'm actually, in an ironic way, envious of many of the people that have spoken today. I don't have any of these kinds of great stories to tell about surviving some horrific disaster. I've led a charmed life. I'll cross my fingers that nothing comes down the road any time soon. I really do admire the pluck and the courage and the resolve that my MLA colleagues have shown in their lives.

I am a physician, and I do have stories like the MLA for Banff-Cochrane has just relayed, and I want to tell a few stories of that. Like the MLA for Banff-Cochrane, I am actually more concerned about my support colleagues: the nurses and the cleaners and the lab techs and the psychologists and all of the people that support us physicians in the work that we do. We get the glory for treating patients, and these other people are left dealing with the aftermaths very often.

One of my clearest memories on this, that I still think about, is that back in my first year in medical school I was on a surgical rotation, and there was an amputation. Somebody had diabetes and needed to have their leg amputated above the knee. It's a fairly straightforward surgery. It maybe took half an hour for the surgery to be done, and I was enjoying myself because I was getting to watch this very good surgeon in action. It wasn't until after the surgery that I realized that the operating room nurse was desperately wanting me to help her basically unwrap this devitalized leg so that the specimen could be sent to the lab. This operating nurse, who was a superb individual, always in control, always very professional in her actions, was obviously devastated by having to deal with this rather unsightly and smelly specimen. To this day I feel badly that I didn't have the sense to step in and do it because it wasn't bothering me; it really was easy. But that's the sort of thing that goes on.

Now, in our health care professions, whether it's nursing, I think one of the things that we have to realize is that posttraumatic stress disorder must be a lot more prevalent than is recognized. It is a fact – and the Member for Calgary-Mountain View can back me up on this – that suicide is much more prevalent among physicians. It's also prevalent among nurses and EMS folks, other folks like this. It isn't just suicide that's more prevalent; it's marriage breakdown, use of illicit drugs, a whole series of things that belie chronic depression and probably some aspects of posttraumatic stress disorder.

Now, I'm making some loose connections here that haven't been proven scientifically, but it is certainly my impression that health care delivery in particular is very prone to posttraumatic stress disorder. I think that having a special event that basically validates the experience of some of these individuals, allows them to seek the appropriate help – and, hopefully, we can also bring in some measures that will help the mental health of these folks in general, you know. I think this is of real benefit for this disorder.

I also want to turn back to the history a little bit. I mentioned that I've been in medicine for 40 years, and I can tell you that 40 years ago it was still called shell shock or, you know, that basically it was considered to be a form of a reaction. "Conversion disorder" was one of the terms that it was called. The patients were marked by things like not being able to speak, mutism, or they were bothered by loud noises, or they had ringing in their ears all the time, or they basically withdrew from social interactions. There was very little we could do for those patients. In medical school the treatment that was most often given – I went to McGill University. The psychiatry department there favoured the use of electroconvulsive therapies and . . . [Dr. Turner's speaking time expired] I'll end it there.

Thank you.

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Human Services.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Madam Chair. It's my pleasure to rise today to speak in support of Bill 206, Post-traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD) Awareness Day Act. First of all, I would like to congratulate my colleague the MLA for Edmonton-Castle Downs for bringing forward this important bill. Also, I would like to acknowledge and congratulate all of my colleagues from all sides of the House who participated in this debate.

While I was sitting listening, I think it was an opportunity for me to reflect on my past, on my present, and on what I'm dealing with today. If I speak to my past, I was raised in Kashmir, which is a disputed, divided territory between India and Pakistan. From a very young age we heard that it's a flashpoint for nuclear war, which hasn't happened yet, fortunately. That was the constant fear we had to live with. Every once in a while troops would mobilize close to borders. While I didn't live very far from the border, 20 to 25 kilometres, you could hear the emanations, those rounds of shots, and planes moving here and there. All I want to say is that was the constant fear we had to live with.

To this day, even living in Calgary, whenever those fighter jets pass through Calgary, that will still give me flashbacks, remembering those planes passing over the airspace in my area. As the Member for Calgary-Elbow said, that is something that I am still unwinding, trying to understand what my life would have been like had I not been through that stress, had I not lived under that constant fear of war, that someday there was going to be a war between Pakistan and India on this Kashmir issue. That's one thing that's still, I guess, left with me to date. I'm pretty sure there is some stress that's attached to my upbringing, living with that fear of war.

The second thing is that my area is also prone to natural disasters. In 2005 there was a huge earthquake. Many people died. Many people suffered through that, and my family suffered as well. My sister was injured in that earthquake. After that, I visited Kashmir a couple of times. My home is such that where I live, that side usually stays closed by a main gate, especially towards where my room was. Just remembering the devastation of that earthquake and not knowing about my sister for three or four days during that earthquake never, I guess, went away. When I went there, I was not able to sleep in my home, having that door closed. What if there is an earthquake? There are studies out there that they are on an active fault line and that there is a bigger earthquake that's expected to happen.

All I want to say is that those are the things, I guess, that need to be dealt with, that need to be talked about, and there need to be better supports and treatments available. That bill certainly puts those issues at the forefront of the discussion, and that certainly will lead to better supports and the discussion of better supports.

The second thing is that as the Minister of Human Services for the most part my ministry deals with vulnerable Albertans. All those files are very important ones, but I want to mention just one file, and that is the child intervention file. As the minister I do receive alerts of serious injuries, deaths, and I think that's something that has an impact on myself as well, that I have to deal with on a daily basis. When I think of that, I do think of my front-line staff who are on the ground to deal with that. I think it's important for them to know that these events can have traumatic impacts, and this bill will help us bring those discussions to the forefront and make supports available to them.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Mason: Madam Chair, I rise to seek unanimous consent to waive Standing Order 8 in order that such debate on Bill 206 continue past 5 o'clock and furthermore to seek unanimous consent to waive Standing Order 8 in order to proceed – no. I'll do that one later.

Thank you.

The Chair: Hon. member, to seek unanimous consent on that kind of a motion, we have to be in Assembly. We can't do it in Committee of the Whole. So we have the option that the committee can rise and report progress.

Mr. Mason: Well, we've got a few minutes. Let's see how we do.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Madam Chair. I rise to move an amendment this afternoon. I do have the requisite copies, and I have the original for you.

The Chair: This will be amendment A1.
Go ahead.

Ms Goehring: Thank you. Do you want me to just read it?

I move that Bill 206, Post-traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD) Awareness Day Act, be amended in section 1 by striking out "2017" and substituting "2016".

When the original bill was presented, we weren't anticipating that we would have unanimous consent and be able to move so quickly through this. Due to the importance of this day, we're requesting that we celebrate this day and acknowledge it this year, in 2016. I would ask for unanimous consent for this amendment.

Thank you.

The Chair: Any others wishing to speak to this amendment?
Seeing none, I'll call the question.

[Motion on amendment A1 carried]

The Chair: We're back on Bill 206. Are there any further speakers to the bill? The hon. Member for Calgary-Lougheed.

Mr. Rodney: Thank you, Chair, and thank you, Member. The reason I'm getting up and speaking in committee is because it's in reference to a motion that I will ask the member if she'd be open to. But I promised that I would finish the story of Andrew and just two other excerpts from soldiers. Again, I have full support, so there is no question about this. I am still seeking unanimous support for the passing of this bill not only in committee but in third today, to get this done. It's that important.

I ended last in second reading with the fact that they wanted to send Andrew home, too – and this is a continuation of the quotation – but being 19, he fought tooth and nail.

He was a small-town boy with big dreams, proud of his uniform. After a few days his vision cleared and the headache disappeared. Then the nightmares started.

It's a long story, but I'll just end with this part about Andrew.

Little was known then about the damage a blast wave can do to the human brain, or that it increases [the] risk of PTSD. The nightmares accumulated, got progressively worse. Andrew was serving in the Medak Pocket during the bloodiest period of the civil war in Bosnia.

The second excerpt that I wanted to read:

A veteran in Calgary said it doesn't matter where he is or what he's doing, he spends part of every day back in Afghanistan. It's as if they're PTSD prisoners of war, denied the luxury of ever coming home completely. It's not just that they've been changed by the experience; some describe it as losing a piece of themselves. The public is used to seeing military amputees with prosthetic legs and arms – but who can fashion a prosthetic for a missing piece of self?

The last example, again concentrating at this point on the military:

Second World War veteran Stewart MacDonald has soldiered on alone with PTSD for more than six decades.

Many details I'll skip past but add this:

As for most combat soldiers, death was ever close. Machine-gun fire stitched through the backpack worn snugly against his spine, a soldier walking near him stepped on a landmine, a shell pulverized men in the next room of a sheltering house. He was given the job of searching through basements, to roust out enemy troops. He found none, but he did find . . .

And it gets graphic, but this is what we're talking about.

. . . bodies of mothers, their arms in futile protective embraces around their dead children. He saw more dead mothers and children along roadsides, in fields. He saw Germans, young men his own age, shot as they tried to surrender. All this before he turned 20.

MacDonald returned to Canada and peacetime, but the war never left him. "I had bad dreams for years and years," he said. "The nightmares were horrible. Bombings. Shootings . . . I'd be fighting with myself. I was afraid to stay in boarding houses or hotels. It went on even after I was married. My wife, she had to put up with a lot." A teetotaler all during the war, he climbed into the bottle when he got home. "I don't want to talk about them days. They were my worst, worst, worst days ever." He didn't know where to go for help, so like thousands of others, he went to the beer parlours and Royal Canadian Legion halls to share his stories and ask buddies what they were doing about the nightmares. He was advised [simply] to put a bible under his pillow.

That was a long time ago, Madam Chair. We've come a long way, and this is a great initiative to take us further down that road.

Now, earlier today I spoke with the Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs about a friendly amendment. I had concerns about the dates. At the very end of June, of course, students are either gone from or leaving school. A lot of folks that work aren't at work. They might be thinking more about vacation. So a weekend day, a Saturday, might be a lot better in terms of actually getting people to attend events. I thought we had an agreement to move it to the last Saturday.

There's always the argument – and it's fair – that it could be next to Canada Day, but that's once every seven years. I would argue that that actually makes this a lot stronger, that coupling with Canada Day to raise the awareness. The fact of the matter is that there are all sorts of great activities already going on. I'll refer to one.

I'll just ask the member, and you can give me a nod if you want. I was going to move that the PTSD awareness day act be amended in section 1 – very, very short – moving it from "the 27th day of June" each year and substituting "the last Saturday of June." So I'll ask the member: is this something that you'd be open to? No?

That's unfortunate. Again, how about the 3rd or the 2nd? Just not moving it at all? Okay. Well, that was in the spirit of all-party co-operation. That's a little unfortunate because, again, we just want as many people participating in this as possible.

You know, folks, I'm looking at the clock. I want this to pass . . .

The Chair: Hon. member, I hesitate to interrupt, but pursuant to Standing Order 8(6) the committee will now rise and report progress.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Leduc-Beaumont.

Mr. S. Anderson: Thank you, Madam Speaker. The Committee of the Whole has had under consideration a certain bill. The committee reports progress on the following bill: Bill 206. I wish to table copies of all amendments considered by the Committee of the Whole on this date for the official records of the Assembly.

The Deputy Speaker: Does the Assembly concur in the report?

Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Speaker: Opposed? So ordered.

Mr. Mason: Madam Speaker, I rise to seek unanimous consent to waive Standing Order 8 such that debate on Bill 206 continues past 5 o'clock.

[Unanimous consent granted]

Public Bills and Orders Other than Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Ms Jabbour in the chair]

Bill 206 Post-traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD) Awareness Day Act (continued)

The Chair: Are there any other further speakers, comments, questions, amendments with respect to the bill?

Seeing none, I gather you're ready for the question, then.

[The remaining clauses of Bill 206 agreed to]

[Title and preamble agreed to]

The Chair: Shall the bill be reported? Are you agreed?

Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chair: Opposed? That's carried.

Mr. Mason: Madam Chair, I move that the committee rise and report.

[Motion carried]

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Leduc-Beaumont.

Mr. S. Anderson: Thank you, Madam Speaker. The Committee of the Whole has had under consideration a certain bill. The committee reports the following bill with some amendments: Bill 206.

The Deputy Speaker: Having heard the report, does the Assembly concur? Say aye.

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Deputy Speaker: Opposed? Say no. So ordered.
The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Mason: Madam Speaker, I would rise to seek unanimous consent to waive Standing Order 8 in order to proceed immediately to third reading of Bill 206, the Post-traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD) Awareness Day Act.

[Unanimous consent granted]

5:00           Public Bills and Orders Other than Government Bills and Orders
Third Reading
Bill 206
Post-traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD)
Awareness Day Act

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I want to thank all of my colleagues in this Assembly for their valuable contributions in this discussion and for their unanimous support of this bill. It's encouraging to see co-operation and agreement from all members that raising awareness around posttraumatic stress disorder in our province is critically important. By recognizing June 27 as posttraumatic stress disorder, PTSD, awareness day in Alberta, this bill will raise awareness and help educate the public about PTSD, its causes, symptoms, and where to find support.

Bill 206 is important to me on a personal level. I spoke previously of my background in front-line social work and, through it, my exposure to trauma and its profound effects on families. My current role as liaison to the Canadian Forces and MLA in a constituency with a high concentration of military families has heightened my awareness of the effects of PTSD on our veterans, their families, and their communities.

Consultation on this bill drove home that PTSD affects all segments of society. Posttraumatic stress disorder awareness day will recognize the lived experience of those suffering from PTSD, including refugees, survivors of residential schools, victims of crime, veterans, front-line workers, emergency personnel, first responders, and corrections officers.

Madam Speaker, this bill supports Albertans suffering from PTSD to access the support and treatments that they need. That is why I'm proud to move Bill 206 and receive the unanimous support of this Assembly.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other speakers to this bill? The hon. Member for Calgary-Lougheed, followed by Calgary-Bow.

Mr. Rodney: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and again thank you to the member. Just for the knowledge of the House, I was actually happy to pull the amendment that I wanted to make in the spirit of all-party co-operation – this bill is too important to stand on any kind of political pulpit – even though I really believe that a Saturday would make for better attendance at events. I don't think we need to piggyback on what America is doing – no offence to them – and there's nothing particular about the date June 27. It happens to be my birthday, so I'd have a different reason to celebrate, to be honest with you. It is a celebration of how far we've come.

I know that in a couple of my prior careers, sadly, I've had the situation of dealing with picking up dead bodies and what's left of bodies as well. I will restrain from sharing part of that – it's very personal – but this issue has touched me very deeply personally and professionally, let alone politically. Thankfully, I guess I've been in the right place to be a Sherpa for my Sherpa friends and carried them on my shoulders to rescue them, and I know that they would have saved my life if that was required as well.

But, again, this is never about me; it's about the people that we represent. That's why I was bringing forward the recommendations of others that really wanted to celebrate this day in the biggest way possible. For the sake of time, I thought: let's pull this. It was right before 5 o'clock. We're not going to talk to an amendment; we're not going to bicker about a date. We could make arguments all the time, colleagues and friends, about how there's always a good reason to say no to something. I mean, we talked about this, hon. member, you and I, that there is always going to be a conflict. We're living in an age when we recognize all sorts of causes. There's the day of this, the week of that, and the month of these things. It happens all of the time.

I've always thought that there's never a bad time for a good idea. Whether it's June 27, one of the Saturdays in June, or any other day, the idea is to bring awareness and action to PTSD no matter what the root cause is because we're not talking about money and staying at home because of mental illness or wellness; we're talking about people's lives, their very existence. I want to thank all the hon. members for sharing personal stories and stories from their own profession as well.

I will take what time is left for me, Madam Speaker, just to make a point of one of the activities that's already going on. We know that there are a lot of great initiatives going on for awareness already. I've mentioned this, and I'll just read a couple of paragraphs. Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry, or, as many of us know it, the PPCLI, the foundation, and Calgary Health Trust are pleased to collaborate on Reaching the Summit for Mental Health and Wellness. It's an initiative aimed at heightening awareness and raising funds for veterans and their families suffering from the devastating consequences of depression, PTSD, and other forms of mental illness.

As you know, 2016 marks the 100th anniversary of the death of Lieutenant Colonel Herbert Cecil Buller, DSO, who was killed in action leading the PPCLI at the Battle of Mount Sorrel in Flanders, Belgium, on the 2nd of June 1916, so in just a few days. In 1922 Mount Buller and several other nearby features were named to honour the memory of Lieutenant Colonel Buller. To honour the memory of Colonel Buller and commemorate the 100th anniversary of his death, 25 climbers, including a small team of military climbers, will climb to the summit – a return journey, by the way, of 12 kilometres, let alone the vertical up and down – and 50 hikers will reach the summit of Buller Pass, and that's a journey of almost 16, a little bit less, vertical kilometres. Two of the climbing teams will be led by a dear friend, Laurie Skreslet, the first Canadian to climb Mount Everest. It's my great honour to lead the other team of military climbers, although climbing up and down the Leg. steps isn't much exercise for climbing a mountain. It's been a little while, and I'm afraid that the soldiers might have to short rope me to the top. I don't think I'll be leading them in this circumstance, but we are in this together.

I do want to make this point – and this is what it's leading up to – that all the proceeds will be used to support mental health and wellness for military veterans and their families. For further information or if people want to join as a climber or a hiker or perhaps contribute to the cause, if you just go to calgaryhealthtrust.ca and follow the links, you can get there. Hopefully, we'll see some of you on this day. They are hoping to make it an annual event, and that's part of the reason why I think they were also suggesting that perhaps we could move it to a Saturday in June. But that's water under the bridge. Again, any day is a good day for a good idea.

I think we can leave it at that, from my perspective, Madam Speaker. I really appreciate the foresight of the hon. member and government members. I do believe we're heading towards unanimous support, and I think we all want to get this done before this House rises, whenever that will be. I would not necessarily ask for the question, but let's find out if any other members have anything to add. Let's get this voted on, and let's congratulate this private member on the passing of her first bill. Cheers.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Bow.

Ms Drever: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm pleased to rise today to speak to Bill 206, Post-traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD) Awareness Day Act. I would like to thank the Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs for bringing this bill forward in the House.

Many members have already touched on various facts about PTSD, but I would like to expand on some of them. Posttraumatic stress disorder is caused by a traumatic event such as witnessing a violent death, being a victim of torture, sexual assault, domestic violence, anything that falls outside the range, the normal realm of human experience. The extent of PTSD varies from person to person. It can last for a short time, or it can remain for years. With PTSD, it's very different for each individual. Some of the symptoms with it are flashbacks, dreams, nightmares, sleep disturbances, numbness and emotional blunting, detachment from other people, unresponsiveness to surroundings, emotional numbing, acute bursts of fear or panic, depression, anxiety, or suicidal thoughts. These are only a few. Having said that, some people may not experience some of these. Like I said, everyone reacts differently.

Looking back to when I was doing my private member's bill, Bill 204, I did a lot of consultation with individuals who experienced domestic violence. Many of them shared with me their stories. I remember them talking to me about some of the symptoms that I mentioned earlier.

I just want to take this opportunity to share some of the research that was done on PTSD and domestic violence. As some of the members have talked about already, it's about getting rid of the stigma around PTSD. It's about spreading the discourse and reaching out to individuals who possibly need help. This is why we're standing here today and talking about these things.

Having said that, I want to talk about domestic violence right now. According to the report Women, Domestic Violence, and Posttraumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD) by Margaret J. Hughes and Loring Jones the severity of the violence, the duration of exposure, early-age onset, and the victim's cognitive assessment of the violence intensify the symptoms. This report also found that women who resort to taking refuge in shelters as a result of domestic violence are at higher risk for PTSD than other victimized women. In any given shelter they found that 40 to 84 per cent of the residents are victims of domestic violence or survivors of domestic violence.

Domestic abuse is more prevalent than injuries sustained in accidents. Domestic violence tends to be repetitive and endurance based. The physical effects of this type of trauma on its victims are often obvious and acute – lacerations, bruises, broken bones, head injuries, internal bleeding, chronic pelvic pain, abdominal pain, frequent vaginal and urinary tract infections, sexually transmitted infections, and HIV – but it also can manifest through long-term and chronic physical problems like arthritis, hypertension, and heart issues. Existing medical conditions can simply be aggravated by sustained physical abuse, and often it's the emotional component of domestic violence that leads to a chronic state of PTSD. Depression is, by far, the most common symptom of domestic violence, and it's also one of the chronic effects of PTSD caused by abuse. The feeling of helplessness and hopelessness that many victims – sorry; I don't mean to say "victims;" I want to say "survivors" – fall prey to has a profoundly undermining effect on their mental and emotional well-being.

It is often extremely challenging for survivors of domestic violence to escape the cycle of abuse. Even those who have managed to move on from crippling, abusive relationships can suffer the aftershocks of abuse.

Having said all that, Madam Speaker, this bill will create a bigger picture in constructing awareness and support mechanisms. Now is the time to legislate this important piece of legislation. I support it, and from what I can see, I think everyone else in this House supports it, too.

Thank you very much.

The Deputy Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) comes into effect. [interjection] Oh, sorry. It's private members' day. My apologies.

Go ahead, hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to rise in this House and speak about Bill 206, the Post-traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD) Awareness Day Act, as put forward by the Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs. As the discussions here today have already shown, there is agreement among us here in this place that PTSD is an issue in our communities, in Alberta, and in Canada.

From the fact that PTSD is an issue that we need to raise awareness of and that the support needs to be made better available to those who face PTSD, my caucus colleagues and I are pleased to support this bill, but if we do pass this bill, we owe it to Albertans that it's not merely the designation of a day. PTSD changes lives, not only those who suffer from it but their loved ones as well. It would be hypocritical and an inadequate statement if the day created by the act passed without any genuine action to increase the availability of support.

As I noted earlier, my caucus colleagues put forward mental health recommendations to this government. I do want to commend my colleague from Cypress-Medicine Hat, in particular, for his work on that report. One of the recommendations was to increase the availability of support for front-line workers suffering from PTSD. As I noted earlier, it's front-line workers like paramedics, firefighters, police officers who make up the vast majority of PTSD claims to the WCB. I'm hopeful that before this debate is over, someone in this government can update us on the steps that have been taken by this government on PTSD.

The reality is that health care costs in this province have been soaring, but the quality of services available remains questionable. When it's not concern about the faltering economy, my constituency office hears from those concerned about health care, concerned about long waits, concerned about availability of services. It would be helpful to know if and how access to PTSD has improved under this government. Further, it would be helpful to know, in particular, what vision the member responsible for this bill had for PTSD awareness day and whether there were any discussions with the government on what that could look like.

The issue of those affected by PTSD, of course, is not a partisan matter. There have been many good steps taken on this matter. The U.S. Senate designated June 27 as PTSD awareness day. This legislation would recognize the same here in Alberta. Thankfully, Alberta is one of the few jurisdictions where PTSD was diagnosed by physicians and psychologists and is presumed to be a workplace injury for emergency front-line workers like firefighters, police, and EMTs. The previous government here deserves praise for their action. Removing the burden of proof for those afflicted with the aftermath of a major trauma is just good, common sense. Of course, it's extremely difficult to track down many Albertans who are actually affected by PTSD. There are numerous issues in tracking given that some of those facing trauma are often hesitant to speak about what happened to them.

I do want to read out something I came across recently in a Statistics Canada report on anxiety disorders. This is a long quote. Bear with me. I will have to say that it may not be as long as Calgary-Lougheed's. But I did enjoy his articles that he read to us. It's a very good job there.

Lifetime prevalence of PTSD... is approximately 8% in the population, 12-month prevalence in the U.S. is 3.5%. Women are more likely to develop the disorder than men. PTSD... can occur at any age, and can be a chronic condition. Immediately following the traumatic event, the individual becomes estranged or oddly unaffected because they are generally in shock. Soon thereafter, the individual experiences recurrent images or thoughts of the traumatic event through nightmares or flashbacks. These may be triggered by a simple ordinary occurrence such as a car backfiring (resembling the sound of gunfire), and tend to be so realistic that the individual believes they are reliving in the situation. Symptoms typically begin within three months of the traumatic event, and last at least one month.

This is to say that those affected by PTSD are affected greatly. This is not a short-term affliction.

Establishing PTSD awareness day, as the Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs seeks to establish, is an opportunity to educate Albertans on this matter, but it also is an opportunity to evaluate what steps the government is taking to ensure that the adequate supports are being taken for those who are afflicted.

In conclusion, as we have established today again, adequate support for those afflicted with PTSD is an integral matter. Establishing a PTSD awareness day isn't a be-all and end-all solution, but it's an important opportunity to raise awareness and look at whether adequate supports are in place. My caucus colleagues and I support this legislation. Again I commend the member for putting it forward.

Thank you.

5:20

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other speakers to this bill? The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

Ms Fitzpatrick: I wasn't going to stand and speak to this because I knew lots of people were, but I spent an hour on the phone this morning with a woman who is a victim of domestic violence, and 18 years later she's still in hiding. I looked at some stats. There were 7,600 complaints of domestic violence last year. Only 2,600 were prosecuted. I'm going to speak to this because it's one thing for us to support a day that acknowledges PTSD – and I think that's fantastic, and I thank the Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs for putting it forward – but I think with that we also have to look at our actions abiding by that.

I say that because after I gave my statement in November, a day after, I was at a meeting. I was sitting in that meeting, and something happened and triggered my own PTSD. I was sick, had nightmares that night, and the following day I confronted the person who made that PTSD come to the surface. When I was told that they were sorry for my feelings, I felt that, obviously, that person did not have any real understanding of what PTSD was or what domestic violence was. I just want to say that along with this bill our actions need to show that we also support what's going on.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other hon. members wishing to speak to the bill in third reading?

Seeing none, I will call on Edmonton-Castle Downs to close debate.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I would like to close debate on Bill 206.

[Motion carried; Bill 206 read a third time]

[Standing ovation]

Motions Other than Government Motions

Cyberbullying Awareness

507. Mr. Dang moved:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to take steps to increase awareness in Alberta's schools of the effects of cyberbullying.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-South West.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's my honour today to bring this important motion to the floor for debate because bullying has real and serious impacts not just for our students but for many Albertans across the province. Bullying can lead to anxiety and depression. Studies have shown again and again that bullying negatively affects student achievement in schools. We've seen that over the last few years the nature of bullying has changed and is ever evolving. Cyberbullying is now becoming more common every day with today's technology.

In preparing for this motion I consulted extensively with students, teachers, principals, and schools in my constituency. They shared over and over again with me that everyone needs more tools and that we absolutely need to be having a larger conversation about the effects of cyberbullying in our schools.

According to a 2009 Statistics Canada survey, approximately 40 per cent of adults and 50 per cent of youth have experienced cyberbullying. The most common form of cyberbullying against children is receiving threatening or aggressive e-mail or instant messages, at a staggering 74 per cent, followed by hate comments, at 72 per cent, and 16 per cent of the youths surveyed reported that they had experienced someone using a child's identity to send threatening messages.

Madam Speaker, most children are bullied by someone they know, usually a classmate, a friend, or an acquaintance, and among cases of child luring as many as 60 per cent are by a stranger. One of the most important statistics of this entire conversation that stood out to me was that only 14 per cent of all child cyberbullying or child luring cases known to adults were reported to police. This chronic underreporting is why we need to be working to increase awareness about the prevalence and to increase the awareness of the effects of cyberbullying.

Madam Speaker, promoting relationships and eliminating violence network, or PREVNet, Canada's leading researchers on preventing bullying behaviors, reports that 1 in 5 youth have experienced cyberbullying and 1 in 3 have seen it taking place. Nearly half of Canadian youth in distress report involvement in traditional bullying or cyberbullying, and half of Canadian students believe that bullying is a problem in their high schools.

Madam Speaker, bullying can now follow a student wherever they go, whether they're at home, in class, or hiding in a washroom. Whatever it is, it is now as easy to pull out your cellphone as it is to bully somebody and make fun of them in their privacy.

This constant bullying can have serious consequences for our young people, Madam Speaker. We have all seen the stories, the news of students or young people taking their own lives as a result of cyberbullying. This needs to change. We have a responsibility to promote healthy relationships and prevent bullying in our schools, our workplaces, our homes, and communities. Promoting inclusion and ensuring welcoming, caring, respectful, and safe environments are priorities for Alberta, and they should be for this government.

As part of this goal we need to ensure that we are working on preventative measures that will change the conversation we're currently having around bullying in schools. As part of this conversation we need to ensure that programming is developed to target specific students at all grade levels, and we must remember that what we say to a student at grade 1 is different than what we say at grade 3, is different than what we say at grade 6, is different than what we say in high school. All these students have different access and relationships with technology.

We must work on creating positive relationships between our students and the technology that they use if we want to curb the prevalence of cyberbullying in our communities. In my consultations, Madam Speaker, I heard again and again that good digital citizenship is an ongoing relationship and conversation between students, teachers, parents, and administrators. We need to ensure that we're using positive messaging on how to be a good digital citizen rather than the negative or prohibition-style antibullying messaging that we've resorted to in the past.

Madam Speaker, it's because of this that I'm happy to note that the previously amended School Act does include a greater emphasis on bullying in general and bullying prevention with the inclusion of a bullying prevention week, and it includes requirements for students, parents, and school boards to create welcoming, caring, respectful, and safe learning spaces, where diversity is respected and a sense of belonging and a positive sense of self is nurtured. There are also some specific protections for our students that are being bullied that are currently in place in legislation as well. The School Act also requires that school boards address bullying when it occurs within the school building or during the school day. This, however, only works if the bullying is reported to the school, which is one of the reasons that we need to be increasing awareness of cyberbullying and the supports that are available to our young people.

The government is committed to promoting welcoming, caring, respectful spaces that respect diversity and nurture a positive self-image, Madam Speaker. That's why the government has taken a multipronged approach to combating bullying in Alberta. Through Human Services, Education, Indigenous Relations, Health, Culture and Tourism, Labour, Advanced Education, Justice and Sol Gen, Seniors and Housing, and corporate human resources the government has been working to prevent bullying and promote healthy relationships in Alberta's schools, communities, and workplaces. Through the ministries the government is working to raise awareness regarding cyberbullying and do things like increase mental health supports for individuals affected by bullying.

Madam Speaker, for this to work, I'm also happy to see that Budget 2016 included $1.9 million in bullying prevention in schools and in our communities. I hope that this motion will support this work and be an extra tool for the government to continue to create healthy, supportive, and inclusive environments for our youth. The government provides specific supports for those dealing with bullying such as the 24-hour bullying helpline, which is available in over 170 languages. There is a chat line available, which is available from noon until 8 p.m., and the government of Alberta's website provides online resources available for children, youth, parents, and other caregivers. I'd like to say to anyone who's listening at home today or is reading this in the future and is ever in need of assistance or is feeling overwhelmed due to bullying that the helpline can be accessed by calling 1.888.456.2323 or by visiting alberta.ca/bullying.

Madam Speaker, I've heard from students and young people in my office and people who've reached out to me directly with stories of their experiences of cyberbullying. Some of these stories are harrowing, which is why I've brought forward this motion today. We must do everything that we possibly can do to increase the awareness of the effects of cyberbullying, and we need to ensure that Alberta students know that their government supports them and that we will continue to work every day to ensure that their schools are welcoming, supportive, and inclusive spaces.

There are examples of schools in my riding which are taking a leadership role in this fight against cyberbullying. Monsignor Fee Otterson, for example, has had great success in providing educational programming for parents around cyberbullying.

I've heard from students and parents who've told me that often parents simply don't know or don't understand what cyberbullying is or that it is going on at all. Many of them are completely unaware of what technologies are being used and how these technologies can be used in a negative manner, Madam Speaker. That is why it is essential that we do our work here in the Legislature to ensure that there is an increased awareness among all parents, among all educators, whether that's teachers that we're teaching today or teachers that have been teaching for many years, and that these cyberbullying incidents are caught and handled. We need to equip our educators and our parents with the tools that they need so that they can help to foster safe learning environments for our students.

Madam Speaker, I personally am committed to preventing and ending bullying across this province. I believe that I can speak for all members of this House when I say that this Assembly should be committed to ending bullying as well. I look forward to the conversation on this motion this afternoon because I know that every person understands that we must have the best possible learning environment for our students and that cyberbullying can end with us.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-North West.

Ms Jansen: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise to speak to Motion 507 and thank the member for bringing it forward. I think it's an important motion. It builds on a lot of the work that I was doing as associate minister of family and community safety and the first minister that had bullying and cyberbullying in a portfolio. Certainly, I learned a lot from the work we did in that area about bullying and cyberbullying. We felt that it was an important issue in our government and an issue that we wanted to devote time and resources to.

I was very happy in our ministry to be the first minister tasked with that responsibility to not only tackle bullying and cyberbullying but violence against women and sexual exploitation. In that role, I introduced the first homophobic and transphobic bullying fact sheets as well as tips for students who wanted to start GSAs. We know that GSAs have an enormous impact in cutting down on incidents of bullying in schools, and that's why we think they are so important. When I was associate minister, we launched three bullying prevention websites, including the 24-hour helpline that the member talked about, as he said, available in 170 languages. We invested $72 million in the area of prevention of family violence and bullying.

Now, I would add to that as well that I am the parent of a 16-year-old, and what I see in terms of social media from her is a teenager that like most of her friends, if not all, is glued to their phone almost 24 hours a day. They'd probably look at it in their sleep if they had the ability to. One of the concerning things – I found this when I did the ministry work, and I see this now, watching her – is that these sites where bullying can occur crop up so frequently and some of them are so new that just as soon as you get a handle on one of them, another one comes up.

For instance, I just found out a couple of months ago that a lot of the high schools in Calgary – there is a site called Whisper, where the kids from the school can go and they get a nonstop array of rumours put out by other kids, which the kids can pile onto one individual. When I heard about this, I was shocked. Some of the things they put. They can put absolutely anything on there. They can be rumours about perceived sexual activity. They can be rumours about people's behaviour, about how they're perceived by other people, I mean, incredibly damaging, harmful things to kids, and they're being floated out on a website like this.

Whisper is only one of a number of opportunities that kids have to go online anonymously and talk about other kids and God knows what else. It's the Internet. We don't even know that these are all kids. We have no idea who's on these websites. So when I see this happening and I see these teenagers trying to negotiate their teen years and then having to do that with the added spectre of having absolutely anything floated out about them, whether it's a scurrilous rumour or anything else, and having absolutely no power over it, it's alarming to see and incredibly discouraging.

You know, one of the things that we found when we talked to people about legislation – and we looked at legislation crossjurisdictionally. We looked at all sorts of different places where people have brought in antibullying legislation. And it just doesn't work because you're not trying to get rid of the bully; you're trying to get rid of the bullying behaviour. The only way to do that properly is to take a look at the people who are doing this and to try and find them help so that they don't do it anymore. When the member who brought this forward talks about education, I think that is the most important part to me. It's having that conversation. It's getting to the root of the problem.

You know, we had a statistic that we talked about when we went out to talk to different schools about this. When you step in and stop bullying when it first happens, the incident can be over in as little as 10 seconds, and kids move on. They move on to something else, and it's forgotten. If you don't step in, that bullying can take years and years, can erode a child's confidence over the course of a lifetime. That's what happens when someone steps in. So in the area of education we have to empower bystanders to get involved because when they do step in, they create enormous differences both in the life of the child who's being bullied and in the school or the environment in which they all exist, and that's an important thing, too.

I think that when we have this conversation ongoing – and I hope we do because for all of us with teenagers who are on social media, I think we know that every day that our kids are exposed to damaging things like this is a day too many. You know, when we talk about building partnerships with schools, I think that's a hugely important thing.

We also have to talk about building partnerships with law enforcement, who have fantastic programs. I was talking with a law enforcement official about one particular program where they went into a school where they had a child who was in grade 3. He had been bullying for three years, just on an incredibly massive scale, and at a certain point he was incredibly difficult to manage in the school. His younger brother started kindergarten and was starting to model the same kind of behaviours. The police went into the home with a social worker, and they discovered that the children had a mom who was raising them on her own, who suffered from severe depression, who couldn't get out of bed – there was no food in the house; the kids were existing on Ensure diet drinks – and these kids were in a terrible place.

So the police got involved within the program they were running as did the social worker. They got involved with the family. Within six months this grade 3 boy had not only stopped the bullying behaviours, but he was getting straight As in school, and his younger brother was modelling the same behaviours. They got them hockey equipment, and the kids were involved in sports. All of a sudden you had not only erased the behaviour; you had given these kids – these kids had been flagged. They had been helped. They moved on to actually start enjoying the process of school. But it wasn't just them. It was every child down the road that they would have bullied if no one had stepped in to help. That is an incredibly powerful thing.

There are so many great programs that we could look at supporting out there in the communities, not just in the schools but in conjunction with the schools, that I think we have to make sure that we keep them top of mind. The folks who are doing this good work: we want to make sure that they can continue to do this work.

I also want to mention Kids Help Phone because I think they're absolutely fantastic. I wish – and I'll give them a plug – that they could get more funding. One of the things that I hear from a lot of LGBTQ youth is that the first time they ever come out, oftentimes they will come out to someone on a help phone because sometimes that is the only way they can find someone they can actually feel comfortable enough having that conversation with, especially in Alberta, you know, that has so many rural areas. Oftentimes kids in small communities have nothing in the way of resources in their schools that they can rely on, so the help phone concept is a hugely important concept.

I know that Kids Help Phone has LGBTQ-trained counsellors. I couldn't believe how many people I spoke to out in the community who actually talked to me about Kids Help Phone and said that 10 years ago or so they actually came out on Kids Help Phone with a counsellor and were able, then, to move forward with a little bit of perspective on what they were going through and some help and some people who were there to listen to them. You know, I can't say enough about Kids Help Phone and the kinds of things they've done.

I want to finish by saying that, you know, I think that when we look at these issues and we look at the fact that the cyberworld is changing every day, our ability to stay on top of some of these websites like some of the ones that we've seen – I've had many conversations with someone who is a dear friend of mine, Carol Todd, whose daughter was Amanda Todd. Unfortunately, I think everybody knows the Amanda Todd story now. Carol and I became friends when I was working on these issues. We spent many nights talking about what she had gone through with Amanda, and . . . [Ms Jansen's speaking time expired] Okay. Sorry.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Athabasca-Sturgeon-Redwater.

Mr. Piquette: Okay. Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm very happy to be able to rise on this critical issue. I would like to thank our member for proposing this motion. I'm very impressed with the comments that the member across the floor has stated. I think that's excellent information. She was talking about, you know, that she hoped this conversation would continue. Well, I mean, we're having that conversation right now, and I think that was the intent of the motion, to get this going. I think that it's already working. I mean, this is something that, I think, can't be stressed often enough, so I would like to speak strongly in favour of the motion.

Now, studies have shown that bullying in general affects student achievement in school. That's been shown to also apply to cyberbullying. We are talking about real and serious impacts. As other members have mentioned, this can include anxiety and depression, but unfortunately sometimes these types of impacts can be things that you can't recover from. I mean, we have had suicides as a consequence of this. It's an incredible tragedy when a young person has their entire life ahead of them and reaches that type of a state where they think it's not worth going ahead with. Sadly, I mean, this is a situation that occurred in my own riding not very long ago. We had a young lady who, unfortunately, took her own life, and cyberbullying was a factor in it. Unfortunately, this is something that seems to be becoming more common and easy with today's technology.

You know, there's a bit of a sad irony in how school administrators and educators kind of approached this originally. Until about 2011 I actually used to teach ethics and law for beginning students in Education at the University of Alberta. We did do a section on social media, but at that time – and that's not very long ago at all – the main concern that we had was actually the teacher's reputation. The concern was that, well, what if the teacher put something on social media that's not appropriate, and what type of harm can that do to the teacher's reputation? We didn't really imagine that, although this is an issue, this was, you know, really the main issue at all. That issue was really what, you know, youth would do to each other through these new means. Obviously, that understanding is something that does need to change.

Now, however, of course, it's not as if bullying at school, in and of itself, is a new issue. It certainly is not. Schools have long been actually legally liable if they fail to take reasonable steps to prevent bullying and to deal with it when it does occur, so some of these things had already been in step.

What makes cyberbullying any different from conventional bullying? This is something as well that both the mover of the motion and, you know, the member across the floor has pointed out. The biggest issue, I think, with it is that it follows young people wherever they go, and there really is no safe space.

Now, even speaking from my own long-distance experience as a precocious child – I was the shortest in my class and had all kinds of odd manners when I was young – this is something that I had to experience. However, I could leave school, and I could get home, and then I had a supportive family. I had friends. I had a, you know, different place to escape to. I just can't imagine what these young people must go through when the place that they would normally escape to is also poisoned – right? – and that there are some places that they can't escape.

I also like that the member from Calgary there brought up the particular issue with rural children. I mean, this is something for rural kids who might have difficulty fitting in, where something like social media could be a place for them to be able to express themselves freely. It's really, you know, kind of tragic that they find themselves in situations where what should be an ally for them is something that is the absolute opposite. This is something that intrudes everywhere, so how can they escape?

Now, the School Act does require the school boards to address bullying, whether it occurs within the school building during the school day or whether it occurs by electronic means. However, this is something that schools certainly cannot do on their own. I mean, we all have responsibility to promote healthy relationships and to prevent bullying, whether the traditional type or cyberbullying in our schools, workplaces, homes, and communities.

I think another kind of a side issue here is that, unfortunately, in the adult world cyberbullying is something that is accepted or people look the other way far too often. I think that this is something, you know – if we want our young people not to be engaging in this type of behaviour, I think that we need to help set the example. I'm afraid that, unfortunately, I don't think that we've necessarily been the best example. I'm speaking specifically of us in our role as political leaders in this province. I mean, we all have a part to play in making sure that people understand that this is not something that is acceptable. Promoting inclusion and ensuring that welcoming, caring, and respectful environments are available for our schoolchildren, should be, for all of us, our priorities for Albertans and especially for our government.

I really thank the member for bringing this up. I think this is, you know, a valuable thing to keep talking about and to take the broad view of what it means to educate people. I also agree with the member across the floor in the sense that I don't think that the punitive measures are necessarily always the best. Sometimes we need to start with what is happening in the young person's life where they feel they need to bully another child, whether through cyber means or through traditional ones.

I'd like to speak in favour of supporting this motion and thank the member for bringing it to the House's attention. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Over my years as a teacher I've had my share of students in crisis, so I am very pleased to rise and speak in favour of Motion 507. Often the students that I taught who found themselves in this kind of a position didn't always come with nice, clean lives and situations. Often there was chaos, and their lives could get a little messy. As a teacher I always did my best to try and help them find in my classroom or on my basketball team a place of safety and of security. In many cases I was successful, but in some I was unable to break through the chaos and the pain in these kids' lives. For one or two of these students the consequences were quite serious in the extreme. They left myself and the school and my colleagues and their friends and their loved ones looking for answers as to how we could have reached across the gap of their pain to try to bring hope and to try to answer their questions.

Perhaps one of the most heartbreaking and, if it's appropriate to say so, crushing situations that some of my students faced were when they were bullied. I think over an extended career any teacher would be able to remember a student or two or three that faced extreme hardships as a result of that bullying. I can remember one student who was subjected to physical violence when he was beaten up by three students, who then denied that they were involved until suitable camera evidence was forthcoming.

Bullying has, to some degree, changed over the course of my tenure as a teacher. Bullying has always, though, entailed intimidation, whether it was physical or verbal or emotional. Cyberbullying was not even a consideration when I started teaching, but it was definitely a part of the educational equation by the end of my teaching career. Cyberbullying, I believe, has become a serious problem for some students within our school system. By the end of my career so many of the students – indeed, I would argue that the vast majority of the students that I taught in my classes all had cellphones, and there's absolutely no doubt in my mind that the readily available access to this kind of technology has helped to create this problem of cyberbullying.

It was because of this that I know that educators and my staff and I'm sure staff in educational institutions across the province met. We talked. We discussed. We looked at the evidence and the suggestions for how to deal with cyberbullying, and then we would take that to our kids. We would take them to our classrooms. We would take it in to the students just to remind them that an inappropriate use of this technology could hurt, it could hurt the kids that are in their school, that it wasn't just playing around, it wasn't just joking, that the pictures that they took and posted from the party on the weekend or the student that vented about the character of another student wasn't just joking around, that it could have very serious consequences. We would have to remind them that not only would it have serious ramifications in the life of the student, but it could also have legal consequences for the person that was involved in the cyberbullying.

Now, I've been witness to the often traumatic events that have accompanied an act of cyberbullying. Relationships between friends become strained or even break out into open hostility. Students begin to take sides. Classroom environments, which should be safe and caring, can quickly become places of stress and strain. As a teacher you're caught in the middle of all of this, trying to figure out how you can repair relationships, how you can keep students safe, how you can teach and encourage learning and engage your students when this is occurring.

Students become wounded. Some will lash out in anger, and others – well, they'll retreat into a world of loneliness, and they'll try to find some place in the school where they can just hide.

Parents, upon finding out that their children are bullied or cyberbullied, in trying to protect their child, will often, in turn, become the focus of attention as they confront the bullies. The circle gets wider, and the school and the students and the community become enmeshed in an ugly situation where the power to get your way is often more important than the lives of the students that are involved.

Alberta Education and organizations like the society for safe and caring schools have a wide variety of resources that can be used to address bullying, but often these resources may not focus on cyberbullying. You've got events like Pink Shirt Day, a national antibullying campaign. Last year, I believe, we saw 6.4 million Canadians take part in a bully-free lifestyle, and if you log on to the antibullying website online, you can find resources on cyberbullying.

Madam Speaker, it's been my experience, in the time that as a teacher I've had to be a part of these kinds of events and these situations, that the best prevention against bullying is relationships. Positive, loving connections that build trust are the best way of ensuring that bullying doesn't take place. As a teacher, an educator, I always believed that it was one of my jobs to try to create those kinds of relationships not only between myself and the students but between the students themselves.

This motion raises awareness regarding cyberbullying, that will set a positive example for parents and for schools to continue developing targeted and preventative measures against cyberbullying. There is much to support in this motion, and I would thank the member across for bringing it forward.

As I've said, while you can have all sorts of programs, I really think the best thing that we can do is to encourage within our education system and within our communities the willingness to make positive relationships and to look beyond the individual student.

You know, I can think of one individual in our school who could have been bullied, a prime candidate. He had a disability that, in many cases, could have kept him from establishing positive relationships. Yet we invited this individual onto our basketball team. Over a three-year period of time that individual became a part of our team and became a part of the lives of the kids on my basketball team. That's the best way to stop bullying.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, it's now 6 p.m. The House stands adjourned until 7:30 this evening.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

7:30 p.m.

Monday, May 30, 2016

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Please be seated.

Government Bills and Orders

Third Reading

Bill 10

Fiscal Statutes Amendment Act, 2016

Mr. Hanson moved that Bill 10 be amended by deleting all the words after “that” and substituting the following:

Bill 10, Fiscal Statutes Amendment Act, 2016, be not now read a third time because this Assembly has not received satisfactory evidence or assurances that the government is prepared to take the necessary measures to see Alberta’s triple-A credit rating restored by the credit-rating agencies.

[Debate adjourned on amendment May 26: Mr. Smith speaking]

The Speaker: The Member for Drayton Valley-Devon is not present yet.

Are there any other members that would like to speak to Bill 10, amendment RA1, I believe? Is that correct? The Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner.

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak about the amendment to the Fiscal Statutes Amendment Act, and I would like to talk about the issue here, which is that this government’s fiscal record is in free fall. We have a situation where investor confidence, business confidence is at an all-time low. We’ve had four credit downgrades in a year, and the reality is that these downgrades don’t come just because of the price of oil, as the opposite side likes to say, but they come because there is no foreseeable plan to stop this spending spree. There is no plan from this government set forward to be able to fix the financial straits that this province is in. In reality, we have a spending problem in this government, and it is a chronic problem that needs to be addressed. Until this problem is addressed, I believe that these credit ratings will continue to be downgraded. This is disconcerting, to say the least.

Just to look back at what we’ve seen in the last year, it wasn’t long ago that this government touted their 15 per cent debt limit, that it was the right limit, that it was what was sustainable, and that it would be palatable to the credit agencies. Now we’re in a situation where we’re not talking about 16 per cent, 17 per cent, or 20 per cent. We’ve removed the limit. Again, even at 15 per cent, which they said was acceptable to all the pundits – now we’re in a situation where they seem to have complete disregard to our financial situation, complete disregard to the fact that these credit agencies will not continue to put up with it and that we are losing businesses right, left, and centre.

You know, being in the position I’m in, the critic for jobs and labour, I get up-to-the-date information about the businesses that are not investing, up-to-the-date information on the businesses that are leaving, that are going to Saskatchewan, that are leaving the province, the place that they’ve called home for decades. This is concerning and should be concerning to this government. It should be concerning to the government because these are the people and the jobs that they supposedly are championing. I don’t understand – and I have tried to understand over the last year – how this government plans on creating all of these jobs when all we see is a continual loss of jobs.

Now, the reason why I am in favour of this amendment is because we need to get back to listening to the professionals and back to the people who understand how to be able to create jobs and create opportunities in this province. This government needs to start listening. If we can get the professionals and the people who have done this for a living for decades and we can get the collective group together that has the best practices and understands how economies work, we might be able to figure out some ideas about how to bring back the Alberta advantage again.

Now, I know that you call it the Alberta way, but there was a time in Alberta, called the Alberta advantage, that really was a prosperous time for Albertans. You know, we made mistakes. We had issues in Alberta. It’s true we made mistakes and we had issues, but it was a place where people still had jobs. It was a place where we had excellent growth. We competed with juggernaut states like Texas in terms of growth rates. Now we need to get back to that, Mr. Speaker. The only way that we’re going to be able to do that is if we put a plan together. Right now this government has no plan in order to be able to pay off debt. Racking up debt without a plan is foolhardy. It is not something that Albertans voted this government in to do.

Now, they’ve talked about an infrastructure deficit. I agree. There’s an infrastructure deficit in Alberta. This is something that we need to address. In order to be able to address this problem responsibly, we need to be able to say to Albertans that if we invest this way, this will be the return on your investment, this is what will be able to help the society we live in, but we’re going to tell you how we’re going to pay it off.

We have asked questions in this House numerous times, Mr. Speaker, about what the plan is to pay off the debt. What is the plan to be able to get your financial house in order so that you can say that we don’t have a deficit this year? This is something that this government and, quite frankly, the last four sessions of the previous government were not able to do. That’s something that Albertans are saying: look, it’s expected of us in our own homes; it’s expected of the government.

Mr. Speaker, Bill 10 is one of many bad policies that this government has brought in that has shaken consumer and investor confidence. We have to get back to allowing these investors and consumers the confidence that they need in order to be able to provide these jobs that we need.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think that it is completely reasonable to send this to committee, to send this bill to a body of individuals, of business owners, of economists that can be able to put together, restructure, or, as the minister of economic diversification and whatever that is likes to say, pivot from a system that didn’t work to a system that will work. You know, we’ve seen the government do this in the past. I’m glad that they recognized the fault in their first jobs plan and have pivoted to another jobs plan, which I don’t really buy into. But wouldn’t it be a good idea now, at this point, for the government to say that we need to pivot to a plan that will provide investor confidence and consumer confidence, which is at an all-time low?

I think that’s a prudent approach. I think it’s something that would instill, maybe, some confidence in this government, which seems to also have gone down in the confidence polls amongst Albertans because they’re also looking, Mr. Speaker, for a government that will be careful with their money, that will not spend their children’s and grandchildren’s future into the poorhouse. This is something that I’m concerned about as a grandparent and as a father, what we’re giving to our children and grandchildren. We all need to be concerned about that.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I would like to just reiterate that I am in favour of this amendment because this amendment provides us with an opportunity to reflect, an opportunity to step back from the edge of the cliff, an opportunity to provide businesses and economists and professionals and the gurus of our society to be able to step up and help us to be able to mitigate the problem that we're in right now. This is where this gives this government the opportunity to do that, and that is why I will support this.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there any questions under 29(2)(a) to the Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner?

The Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat.

Mr. Barnes: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I, too, would like to stand up and speak in favour of this amendment. I'm very, very concerned about what the added interest and the added debt is going to do to our position for the services we depend on, for the jobs and the industry we need to attract. Why I think this is very reasonable, to go to committee and slow things down just slightly, is the opportunity to be more open and be more transparent for Albertans.

You know, I almost hate talking about bond ratings and whether we're double-A or double-A plus or triple-A minus, you know? What the heck does all this mean? I'm just sitting here trying to get my calculations as to how much extra interest it could be. If we lose .0015 of a percentage, if we have to pay that much extra interest on a $60 billion debt, that's $90 million. What does $90 million mean to the average Albertan? Well, it's some side of 750 or 900 teachers, nurses. My goodness, we all stand up in here and talk about the mental health workers we need, the home-care professionals we need. You know – and I've said it in this House before – this money is just going to end up going to rich people, rich corporations, rich pensions instead of to the people that need the services. If the government will listen and take this reasoned amendment and give us some more time, we can certainly get Albertans more engaged as to where their hard-earned tax dollars are going to go.

The hon. Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner talked about it initially, I think, you know, very succinctly and very accurately. So much of what I've read starts with Alberta's problem being the high per capita spending. We have the youngest population, should need the health care services the least, but some side of 20 per cent, some side of $2,000 per year per person, we spend more than other growing provinces – B.C. and Ontario also have growing populations – so you wonder why.

I've had many people say to me when I've said this to them – they realize that we don't get extra value for this money being spent. You know, as health care critic I recall from a month ago we discovered that – my goodness – we'd slipped to ninth or 10th on organ transplants from fifth or sixth even though we're spending the most. We all don't have to sit in our constituency offices very long to see the litany of things that are broken: people that can't access mental health facilities or a mental health person for their loved one, detox, health care. You know, again, yeah, it's important to spend the money on it. It's important to keep the money on front-line services, but it's also important to get it right.

A lot of people suggested to me, too, that this high per capita spending is only inflationary. It puts a burden on the private industry, the private market, making it harder for them to compete for materials, for subtrades, for the things that they need. Again, I agree with my colleague from Cardston-Taber-Warner that it starts with getting our per capita spending in line.

When we're accumulating all this debt – it's been said by many, many people that debt and high per capita spending are just a future tax waiting to happen. Smart businesspeople are aware of this, so it drives them out of your jurisdiction. What are we losing? I've read a number of articles that suggest that we are losing at least $50 billion a year in annual investment because of this new taxation, because of this continued high spending, you know, because of the interest that is going to occur, and because of the future tax. I'm hearing about individuals who have switched jurisdictions, who are in low-tax jurisdictions and who will be saving tens of millions of dollars. Well, maybe that's un-Albertan, but it's their option. In a free society it is certainly their option.

I've said it before, and I just can't help but say it again. I, too, want to take one more swipe at the previous 44-year government, just one more. It's back, hon. minister, to the fact that they didn't save any of those $250 billion in royalties that went through their fingers. It's back to the fact that they couldn't say no and spent all of the accumulated interest that could have compounded. Even that original $17 billion that they started with in 1976 could have compounded and accumulated to over $200 billion. My understanding today is that with that fund AIMCo makes us about 7 to 7 and a quarter per cent a year. Oil and gas royalties on a good year are somewhere around $9 billion or $10 billion. If they had just let it compound to $120 billion, $140 billion, that money, hon. Finance minister, would replace your royalties. We wouldn't miss a beat.

An Hon. Member: We've been saying all along that it's their fault.

Mr. Barnes: I'm not disagreeing, hon. minister, that up until May 5 a year ago it was their fault. [interjection] It does now. It does now, sir, and please get the per capita spending in line and get taxpayers value for their money.

I've seen some provinces, hon. member, where the interest expense . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. member, stay on topic here, okay?

Mr. Barnes: I've seen some provinces now where interest expense is the third most expensive line item . . . [interjections] I should be quiet so I can hear better. I missed that.

Once we're $60 billion in the hole . . .

Mr. Mason: He's running for Finance critic.

Mr. Barnes: Oh, is that available?

Three years from now when we are $60 billion in the hole, at 3 or 3 and a half per cent interest that's $2 billion a year that could be spent on front-line services that instead is just going to make the rich richer, that is going to drive away investment, which drives away jobs. To the government: please consider this amendment to get this in a situation where all Albertans will have a further chance to talk about the mistakes of the past and the mistakes of the present.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Are there any questions of the Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat under 29(2)(a)?

Hearing none, are there any other questions or comments with respect to amendment RA1? The Member for Sylvan Lake . . .

Mr. MacIntyre: Almost.

The Speaker: Close.

Mr. MacIntyre: Don't forget Innisfail.

The Speaker: Innisfail-Sylvan Lake.

Mr. MacIntyre: You'll be getting letters.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to speak today to this amendment, that

Bill 10, Fiscal Statutes Amendment Act, 2016, be not now read a third time because this Assembly has not received satisfactory evidence or assurances that the government is prepared to take the necessary measures to see Alberta's triple-A credit rating restored by the credit-rating agencies.

The Minister of Finance has repeatedly blamed low oil prices for the credit downgrades, but frankly this is simply not the case. The credit-rating agencies in their reports all say similar things. They look for a debt repayment plan, which isn't there. They look for controlled or constrained spending. That isn't there. They're looking for, in short, financial discipline, which isn't there, and this is the reason, they are telling us, that they are downgrading Alberta's credit score. In other words, the province of Alberta, the government of Alberta, is becoming more of a financial risk simply because the government has not demonstrated financial discipline, that we would expect of anybody, really. This is the fourth downgrade. We lack a repayment plan, which is, frankly, just irresponsible.

Now, this minister assured this House and Albertans that a 15 per cent debt-to-GDP ratio was plenty good enough. Over and over again we in the Official Opposition questioned the Minister of Finance on this issue, and he over and over again assured us all: "No, no. Fifteen per cent is plenty good enough. That gives us lots and lots of room." Here we are four months later – just four months later – and we're taking the lid off now. Not only is 15 per cent not good enough, but there is no constraint whatsoever.

The credit-rating agencies are not done with us yet. In another four months or five months when this government starts reporting on revenue shortfalls – which are going to happen; mark my words – the credit-rating agencies are going to come after us again. We're going to experience another downgrade. Those downgrades will continue to happen quarterly, biannually until such time as this government starts demonstrating some financial discipline. Investor confidence has been shaken in this province.

Now, I pointed out before that using even a 15 per cent debt-to-GDP ratio as some kind of acceptable limit, comparing Alberta to Ontario, is rather deceptive because on a per capita basis if you compare debt to GDP per capita, that 15 per cent here in Alberta, because our population is so small, looks like about 30 per cent in comparison. That is simply unacceptable, totally unacceptable. This government has got to start reining in.

It was interesting to note that upon coming to power, this government immediately started increasing taxes and spent no effort whatsoever looking for efficiencies within government, within the bureaucracy, none whatsoever, as if to say that the bureaucracy of the province of Alberta is running like a well-oiled machine and there just is no place for improvement, no place for cost saving, no place at all. Then budget after budget after budget we see increased taxation, increased spending without constraint. This credit rating is vitally important to our province, to our municipalities. It will ultimately cost Alberta's taxpayers more in debt-servicing costs, and this government is not listening to the requests or the demands of the bond-rating community, of the bond-issuing community, of the financial experts that are out there, who are all saying the same thing: get your house in order. This government is not listening. Instead they're blaming the low price of oil. Well, guess what? That just doesn't wash with anybody.

This minister has travelled down east to talk to these bond-rating agencies. Every time he goes portraying his plan and telling us how great his plan is and how he's going to convince those bond-rating agencies and that he's going to come back with a better rating – what happens? – they downgrade us again. My advice is: Minister, stop travelling down east because every time you come back, we take another hit. We take another hit.

In short, I support this amendment. I think that this amendment is prudent. I think it is timely, it is necessary, and I believe that unless this government can provide the kind of assurances that this amendment is asking for, then this government needs to – well, frankly, they just need to accept this amendment and start demonstrating some financial discipline. [interjections] To keep him here? Maybe we should have an amendment that the Minister of Finance cannot leave the province of Alberta to go talk to bond-rating agencies because every time he does, we take another hit. I think that might be a good amendment. I don't know what legal counsel would say to that one, whether we can constrain him, but I did like the amendment the other day where he would lose his ministerial stipend if he couldn't rein in his spending.

Mr. Mason: Go out and get your Finance critic.

Mr. MacIntyre: Don't be talking about members that are not in the House here, Government House Leader.

In short, if I may wrap up, Mr. Speaker, this is a wonderfully good amendment. It brings some discipline to this government, which they obviously need, and I support it wholeheartedly.

Thank you very much.

The Speaker: Hon. members, the front row on this side seems to be very robust.

Are there any questions of the Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake under 29(2)(a)?

Mr. Connolly: Would you like to be Finance critic?

The Speaker: Would the member mind putting his comments through the chair? Thank you.

Are there any questions under 29(2)(a)?

Are there any members who would like to speak to amendment RA1? The member for Grande Prairie-Smoky.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to speak in favour of this amendment. There's a saying that says: no plan is a plan to fail. I think that's very relevant here today when we're talking about removing the ceiling on our debt. Now, the problem we have here in Alberta is a spending problem. If we look back to the previous government, where we went through $100-barrels of oil, that government spent more than it took in through that period of time. Since 2008 I believe every year we've spent more in Alberta than we've taken in.

This government here, of course, is even spending more. If they choose to spend more than the previous government, that spent more than we took in at $100-a-barrel oil, the question that begs to be asked is: how much does oil have to be in order for this government to balance its budget? It's obviously very high. We haven't been able to get an answer from them. They should actually figure it out so they can be straight up with Albertans.

Now, we warned this government about their spending problems and about how they're managing the debt. They, of course, said: "Alberta can afford debt. That's no problem. Alberta can afford it." But, obviously, the creditors don't agree with them. The creditors are obviously concerned because they keep repeating doing downgrades to Alberta's credit rating.

Now, of course, we've heard that the Finance minister went to talk to these creditors. I'm not sure what he expected to do. This is how these guys make their living. This is what they do for business.

I'm sure they know about credit ratings because that's what they do. Obviously, when the minister came back, we got another downgrade, so that was a very inefficient use of taxpayer dollars, running down there to talk to them. I think it would have been better spent just coming up with a better fiscal plan.

Now, we keep hearing about the price of oil and that that's the cause of all the government's woes. Well, since the middle of January the price of oil has been steadily increasing. And what's been happening since the middle of January? Consistent downgrades in the credit rating. So that does not hold water. That is not the truth. The truth is that the people that do the credit ratings are concerned with debt repayment. They're concerned with the spending of this government. They're concerned with fiscal mismanagement. Now, these downgrades in the credit rating will cost Albertans, will cost all of us. We're on a program here, a fiscal program to be up to $60 billion in debt and have annual interest payments of $2 billion a year. That's not a great plan, Mr. Speaker.

This government has a huge spending problem. They raised the debt ceiling last fall to 15 per cent, with all sorts of assurances that this was great, that this was prudent, that this will show that we're serious about government finances. We received all the assurances over and over and over again that the 15 per cent debt ceiling was very sufficient, that it was wise, it was prudent, all these different things. But, Mr. Speaker, here we are, not six months later, and we're removing the debt ceiling now. We're not just raising it; we're removing it, so there's no plan. This approach to debt is irresponsible because it burdens future generations with the debt that this government is going to dump on them. That's not right.

Now, Alberta already spends more per capita on government operations than B.C. or even Ontario. This government did inherit from the 40-plus-year government, that was already spending far above the national average – we recognize that – but that doesn't mean that you can continue the same mistakes, that in fact you accelerate those mistakes. It seems inconceivable that the new government couldn't find some ways to cut some waste.

Now, we've heard from the Energy minister that she cut 2 per cent out of her budget somewhere and didn't lose one front-line staff. Of course, when we in the Wildrose talk about a 2 per cent reduction, all we hear are the wails and cries that we're going to have to lay off all the teachers and doctors and nurses and everything, and that's not true. How could it be true for a member of the NDP cabinet and not be true for us? If it can be done, it can be done.

It isn't that we've just had one credit-rating downgrade; we've had multiple credit-rating downgrades. We know what happens when the credit rating drops. Interest rates rise, and that costs us even more dollars. This government has yet to tell us exactly how much the rating decrease is going to cost Albertans. It should be able to figure that out for Albertans and tell them. Just be honest. Tell us what the cost is going to be.

Again, we keep hearing about the price of oil. I want to reiterate that the price of oil is rising, but the credit rating is going down. There are two different angles to that graph, the price of oil going up and the credit rating going down, completely different.

The Premier said that she knew that Alberta's credit rating would get downgraded after the budget was released, so why didn't they table a budget that at least gave some semblance of fiscal restraint and possibly stave off another credit downgrade? She called their first budget careful, moderate, and conservative. She called it fabulous. She said that credit downgrades were unlikely and then went on to claim that it's not the role of the government to drive into the ditch to try to find a different path forward. Instead, Mr. Speaker, we're looking at driving off an economic cliff. Why would we want to do this to ourselves? Why would we want to do this to Albertans? That's not what we were elected here to do. We were not elected here to cause suffering for Albertans down the road to pay for mismanagement today.

This isn't exactly a record to be proud of: the credit downgrades, the debt, the record deficits, job losses like we've never seen before. The more money Albertans pay in taxes and the more money we have to pay in interest, the less we have to help the economy. Families have less money to do the things that they need to do.

Mr. Speaker, it seems that the problem is fiscal mismanagement. There has to be a way that this government can come up with a better plan, and removing the debt ceiling, again, is not a plan. It's a plan to fail.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Are there any questions to the Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky under 29(2)(a)?

Are there any other parties who would speak to amendment RA1? The Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I wasn't sure if I spoke on this one. Tuesday night I went a little long, and I wasn't sure if this was part of it. [interjection] Quite a bit of time.

I talked about credit cards, and I talked about irresponsible government, unstable government, to be clear. The fact is that I went on at length on why exactly getting rid of a debt limit is bad for Alberta. The government won't listen to me, but maybe they'll listen to some of their own members. I have two quotes that I would like to read out and see if at the end of the quote this wonderful House can actually guess which member said it.

8:10

I would like to quote that member at length. If that same member was here or not here today, would he vote with his party on this? Let's start the quote.

One of the things I'd like to talk about is that when we're talking about this 15 per cent threshold, to me, that threshold is reasonable. I mean, even at 15 per cent Alberta's government's debt-to-GDP ratio would be half the weighted average of the other provinces combined, which to me seems reasonable. Also, the 15 per cent ratio . . . is the ratio that's regarded as a reasonable and manageable limit by our credit-rating agencies.

Mr. Speaker, that member continues on with the following:

I believe that the 15 per cent number is reasonable.

This is a very strong, very directed quote. This isn't something where maybe the member went one way or maybe the member could have meant something else. It was very clear. The member was very clear that 15 per cent was the number that the government would live by.

Now, the member has very high praises to sing about the 15 per cent cap on our debt to GDP. The 15 per cent cap was labelled to be reasonable over and over by this person. This member was quoted that the 15 per cent cap on our debt-to-GDP ratio was something that the Alberta government needed and would stick by.

When we start looking around, why would this member suddenly be so adamantly against 15 per cent? And for those that are wondering still, that member is Calgary-Currie. I know that this is surprising. I don't know why this MLA hasn't spoken up against Bill 10. What happened to the Member for Calgary-Currie when we started this debate and we've gone through this debate? Is he not allowed to speak? Is he being whipped into voting with his party?

You know, this contradicts what all of the government is saying right now. We need to be very clear that when it comes to government members, this is a member from the government being muzzled. That is just the truth. He thought a 15 per cent cap was appropriate six months ago but not now. Not now.

Now, I would love to hear from this member again as to whether he thinks that lifting the cap, that he repeatedly called reasonable, is the right thing to do or not. Did this member change his mind over the course of four months? I find it very difficult to believe that his mind could have been changed so quickly. Apparently, this is a difficult decision when it comes to moving the government towards stable government. This is an important thing, that I'll go back to.

I keep saying that in my riding of Bonnyville-Cold Lake stable government means jobs. Right now I've got a 10 per cent unemployment rate. That is unacceptable, but it is what it is. Now, the more unstable we are, the less likely we're going to have jobs, and that is a fact. Businesses and corporations, individuals, societies: why would they invest in an unstable – unstable – economy?

Now, every single member from the Wildrose: we haven't changed our minds in the last four months. You can expect the Member for Calgary-Currie to change his mind every four months? You know, the fact is that when we start looking at where the government is going, it keeps changing directions. Again, this brings instability. Bill 6 is another good example of instability. Now, what changed the heart of the Member for Calgary-Currie, a fundamental change? Will we expect him to change his mind again and again, and will be he certain of what he truly wants? Did the constituents of Calgary-Currie change their minds in the last four months? Is that why the MLA changed his mind? Did he actually go to his constituents and say: is it good for us to be without a cap? I am certain that if he goes to his constituents now and says . . .

Mr. Mason: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Point of order.

Point of Order Imputing Motives

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much. Standing Order 23(h), (i), and (j), Mr. Speaker. The hon. member is not addressing the issue before us. He is focusing his attention on one member, who is perfectly capable of standing for himself. The hon. member is abusing his time in order to target a particular MLA, and if it's this one this evening, it might be another one another evening. It's important that members, when they rise in their places, speak to the matter at hand, and that is the amendment that the Wildrose caucus has put forward to not now read the bill a third time, and I wish the hon. member would focus on that.

Mr. Cooper: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise and speak to the point of order. I think we'll find that Standing Order 23(h), (i), and (j) makes allegations against another member, imputes false motives of another member, or uses abusive or insulting language likely to create disorder. I've been listening intently, and while I don't have the benefit of the Blues, my hon. colleague in fact isn't making allegations, only speaking specifically to words that the member himself has used in this very Chamber. There certainly has been no abusive or insulting language used by my hon. colleague. What we have here is clearly a matter of debate because the hon. colleague is utilizing information that has been said before here in this House. He's speaking to the importance of this particular amendment in terms of the challenges that removing the debt cap has, and in my opinion there is no point of order.

The Speaker: Government House Leader, what was the subsection of 23 that you cited?

Mr. Mason: Well, Mr. Speaker, in actual fact I think the most relevant one is to impute false or unavowed motives to another member. He's talking about the hon. member's motives for voting the way he did or speaking the way he did in the past, and I think that's perhaps the most on point. But (h) also. He's also making allegations against the member. By the way, he's also violating, in my view, 23(c), persisting in needless repetition.

The Speaker: Hon. member, I'm not sure there's a point of order. Nonetheless, to the speaker: could you please get focused on the amendment and proceed. Stay on the topic. Stay on the amendment.

Mr. Cyr: I apologize if I've offended.

Debate Continued

Mr. Cyr: I will say that I was getting to a point, the fact that when we start looking at where the government was going with the 15 per cent cap, this was reasonable four months ago but unreasonable now. This is where our reasoned amendment comes forward, saying that it is still something that we need to continue as at least maintaining some sort of accountability for Albertans.

Now, voting in favour of this bill would be wrong. As a fiscally responsible conservative I feel that we are responsible for taxpayers' money, and that includes money that we are spending that isn't collected yet. That means debt. We're responsible for debt. Now, when we start seeing instability or flip-flopping, we need to ask ourselves: what direction are we actually going in? How can this be the right direction?

Now, I have another quote, and I will let you again decide on which person in here or which member said it.

We have a prudent plan to look at bending the curve on expenditures and spending. We have a plan to invest in capital development throughout this province to stimulate our economy. We are going to stick to 15 per cent of GDP. That is sound. That is the lowest in the country. That is a debt cap that is calculated to help us get to where we need to go.

This member is Calgary-Fort. The 15 per cent cap has been recorded as being sound, yet for some reason now we are looking at just getting rid of the cap.

Now, it's this comparison of the different ways of looking at this wonderful 15 per cent cap – it's not night or day. It's not black or white. There is a lot of contrast here. The fact is that when we start looking at what direction this government is going in, it is clear that it's going in the wrong direction. It's a swap that we need to make sure that we are continuing in a forward direction, but it appears that we continue to move backwards. That is something that is unacceptable.

Now, when the member that made this statement is taking us so deep into the red and was convinced four months ago that this was the right direction, this actually is offensive. I want to know where the members who voted in favour of the 15 per cent debt cap went because it appears that they're no longer in the House. I want to know where the members who argued in favour of this cap disappeared. I was not aware of any by-election that replaced representatives for either of the two members that I quoted. I'm not sure that they are physically or mentally the same people that they were five months ago. I really hope that these people come back and vote the way they did before and that what we start looking at is supporting this reasoned amendment.

We need to actually look at the debt cap and the debt limit, find out what is appropriate for Alberta. Getting rid of it just seems to be unreasonable. In fact, I hope that everyone in this House votes in favour of this, for a fiscally responsible Alberta. By voting for this amendment, you're voting for that.

Now, if this amendment gets voted down, then we need to vote against Bill 10 because it is irresponsible. I hope that the members continue to see where they are going towards, because in the end each and every one of my colleagues at this point has pointed out that we are headed down the wrong road.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Any questions for the Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake under 29(2)(a)?

Are there any other individuals that would like to speak to the amendment RA1?

[Motion on amendment RA1 lost]

The Speaker: We are back to the main motion.

Cypress-Medicine Hat.

Mr. Barnes: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise and talk on the main motion and speak against Bill 10, the Fiscal Statutes Amendment Act, 2016. Of course, we've been discussing at length the long-term ramifications of debt, the impact it will have on the sustainability of our services that are delivered in the province. I prefer to call it the consequences, the consequences of billions and billions of dollars in debt. Of course, those consequences will be fewer front-line workers, less infrastructure, less opportunity to leave money in people's pockets so they can take care of their family members, take care of their communities, and do what they wish with their hard-earned tax dollars. I would like to reiterate to the government caucus that unlimited debt is not a reasonable way to govern. You simply cannot borrow your way to prosperity.

You know, 15 per cent of GDP is, again, a formula that – oh, I think GDP has been around for a while, but I wonder how many Albertans would really understand the significance of 15 per cent of GDP, so I just took a quick look as to what GDP is comprised of. It's comprised of four things: consumer spending, investment, government spending, and then net exports.

When I look at the consumer spending drop, the unemployment rate in Cypress-Medicine Hat is an incredible 9.7 per cent. Thank goodness a lot of good employers and wonderful employees have worked out job-sharing arrangements and ways to make things as fair as possible for as many Albertans as possible, but obviously it takes disposable income out of the economy. Obviously, the NDP government's and the federal Liberal government's tax increases take disposable income out of the economy, so one of the four components of GDP is dropping.

Investment, the second component. Whether the number is the $50 billion that I spoke of in the amendment that is being invested less in our industries because of high per capita spending, because of debt, because of higher taxation, it's less. The number is going down.

Government spending, of course, although the cost curve is being bent, is the one that is constant, but that's the one that's being borrowed. That's the one that has to be paid on the backs of the productive side of our society or the next generation.

Net exports, again, as the economy and the price of oil has dropped – thank goodness for our good agriculture industry. It's uncertain, but the cumulative effect – Alberta had been a leader in Canada with GDP increasing 3.2 per cent a year. That alone would have given your 15 per cent more room to grow. Now I'll say to the hon. Finance minister that I understand Alberta's GDP is actually shrinking by 1.1 per cent this year, the combination of consumer spending, investment, net exports, and the government borrowing more money to spend more. It's still shrinking, not sustainable.

The consequences of eliminating the 15 per cent gross debt-to-GDP ratio are going to be severe. What does the average Albertan think about this? I guess I said it earlier in here two or three weeks ago. My point in saying this is that I remember when Premier Getty was forced out of the leadership of the Progressive Conservatives for $22 billion in debt. Three years from now I wonder what Albertans will think of $60 billion in debt. I look forward to that debate. Mr. Speaker, kicking the can down the road is not leadership, and it will not provide better lives for future Albertans.

Government spending problems. As much as this government likes ideology, I again want to remind this government of the current bad spending habits before we go to a final vote on this bill. We don't have a revenue problem even with the drop in royalties. We spend currently $10 billion more on government than B.C. or Ontario on a per capita basis, and one of the reasons I like to see those two provinces continually quoted is that they have growing populations. It could be said that people that move to B.C. or Ontario don't bring their roads or their schools with them either.

What does this number really mean when we look at how the province is administering its public services? When we break this number down, Mr. Speaker, we see that Alberta is spending almost $2,400 more per person than neighbouring B.C. Again, I'll remind the House, I'll remind the government that we have a younger population. Our demands on health care, our demands on seniors' services, our demands on certain government services should be a lot less because our age per capita is lower.

Instead of finding ways to rein in spending and find efficiencies that would lead to more support for our front-line staff, this government's solution is simply writing itself a blank cheque on the backs of Albertans. Alberta has a chronic spending addiction, and removing the debt limit is the ultimate enabler. Again, that reminds me of Premier Getty when he hit the $22 billion mark, and Albertans said: that's enough.

This is not responsible or sustainable governance, and Albertans deserve a government that can get to work and find solutions for this out-of-control spending. We've talked about how just three years from now we'll be at $2 billion in interest from our $60 billion debt. I think now we're just under $1 billion in interest. I wonder if the government fully appreciates the consequences of this long-term debt. Debt is a cycle. It removes our options. It's a chain around our economy. I've seen stuff that talks about how interest and debt are actually an abrasive drag on the economy's efficiency. The more you borrow, of course, the longer it will take to pay back. If it leads to more credit-rating downgrades – and I've heard this government time and time again say, "Oh, we can afford to go into debt because we have the lowest debt-to-GDP ratio in Canada," like it's okay to run up debt and interest as much as you want as long as you can find somebody else that's slightly worse.

Let's be leaders, government. Let's not look at the bottom. Let's look at the best. That will be a serious drain on our economy's efficiency. That will be a serious drain on our government's ability to earn taxes and to provide services.

Of course, we all remember that less than 24 hours after the NDP budget – not your jobs plan, but the budget – we were downgraded. DBRS downgraded Alberta from a triple-A to a double-A rating, which is going to cost millions of dollars in extra interest. I prefer to say that in the millions of dollars that's fewer mental health workers, fewer home-care workers, fewer nurses, that's fewer teachers, fewer doctors, fewer schools, fewer hospitals, less money for people to take care of their families if we just left it with them.

You know, Albertans are entrepreneurs. They understand that at times it's necessary to borrow money to invest, but again that's not what this government is doing. You are spending to the hilt, you are maxing out the credit card to do it, and you are not looking for the efficiencies that hard-working taxpayers deserve. You have no plan to reduce the spending, no plan to right the ship, no plan to restore Alberta to where we have the opportunity to provide jobs, to pay taxes, and to have strong communities, urban and rural. You're content to increase our taxes, put our province at record debt levels, and turn around and blame it all on the slump in oil prices.

Mr. Cooper: Or the previous government.

Mr. Barnes: Or the previous government. Not that we would do that.

The amount of debt being taken on by this government is astounding, and this bill indicates that you have absolutely no intention of slowing down. I obviously hope that we don't get our credit rating downgraded. I obviously hope that the price of oil can return. I obviously hope that we can get our per capita spending in line. Albertans and future generations deserve every opportunity.

We suggested some amendments. We tried to put a cap on your spending habits, but again we'll remind you that you charged ahead with your insistence and zero restraint. I hear it in the coffee shops in Cypress-Medicine Hat. People are fearful of what we're leaving for the next generation. People are fearful of the debt that they have to manage through their government. At the same time for many in the private sector it's been very, very difficult times.

This NDP government's financial mismanagement, Mr. Speaker, has the potential to saddle future generations with debt in the billions. Ultimately, it is the Alberta taxpayer who will have to pay for this government's bad debt. Fifteen per cent debt to GDP is roughly $50 billion of government debt, and as I initially pointed out, the GDP, other than government borrowing, is decreasing. The limit is increasing, so interest and the drag on the economy is going to get worse.

How does this government plan on paying for this debt? The only plan I've seen is more taxes on everyday Albertans, more fees. That will make it harder to start a business. That will make it harder for parents to save for their children's education. It will make it harder for families to provide the necessities for their families. I've said it before, one of my favourite stories is my friend who makes the same as he made a year ago, but because of the increase in taxes provincially and federally he now takes home $800 a month less. This is a person who shut down his business down, which employed two people, because he was fearful of the drag. Thank goodness, he still pays to take care of his parents. If the tax burden gets any worse, I would absolutely hate to see that quit.

Instead of hiking taxes across the board, this government should be looking at what could be done to spend taxpayers' money more efficiently. In the Wildrose we've talked many, many times about eliminating corporate welfare. We've talked many, many times about eliminating not front-line workers but high-level bureaucracy. In Cypress-Medicine Hat as the health care shadow minister . . .

Mr. Bilous: Critic.

Mr. Barnes: I'm sorry. Critic. Thank you.

Mr. Barnes: . . . I hear about five layers of bureaucracy between the front-line worker and getting an answer, an answer that generally doesn't come back. How inefficient. What a waste. What a hardship on Alberta's families and workers.

When will this government draw a line in the sand and tell Albertans when enough is enough? I ask the government: what is too much debt?

An Hon. Member: The sky is the limit.

Mr. Barnes: The sky's the limit. I don't doubt it. But there will be limits enforced by the voters in the next election and not too harmful on the next generation.

Why is it so hard for this NDP government to get its act together and actually build a plan to get our province back on track? To the hon. Finance minister: that plan starts with getting our per capita spending in line. That plan starts with showing when we'll be back in balance.

Mr. Speaker, I'm sad to say that Bill 10 is nothing more than this government removing all accountability from budgeting, from planning by writing itself a blank cheque. Removing limitations on debt levels will undoubtedly lead to more provincial debt, which will undoubtedly lead to fewer services and increased taxes.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Any questions of the Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat under Standing Order 29(2)(a)?

Mr. Cooper: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yes, I do have a couple of quick questions. He spoke specifically of the people of Cypress-Medicine Hat, and I know that my hon. colleague is a very good representative of the good people of Cypress-Medicine Hat. I know that he spends a lot of time all across what is a very vast and diverse constituency. I'm just a little bit curious to know. A good portion of your constituency includes a section of the city of Medicine Hat and then a good section includes parts of rural southeast Alberta, so I'm just wondering if there's much of a variance from the people in the rural portions of the constituency to the more urban portions of the constituency about some of their concerns around this reckless spending that is the NDP government.

Mr. Barnes: Thank you to the hon. member for the question. I appreciate it. Yeah. I'm very, very grateful to represent Cypress-Medicine Hat. Of course, I share Medicine Hat with the hon. Speaker.

I would have to say that in the rural part of my constituency, which is Cypress county and Forty Mile county, which is probably 200 kilometres by 200 kilometres, there's a great deal of concern for what the carbon tax is going to add to their transportation costs, for the fact that they have seen their level of services downgraded over the last few years and at the same time have seen debt and taxes increase. What is very, very true about the people in Medicine Hat and the people in Cypress, Forty Mile county, Foremost, Bow Island, and Redcliff is that they are all very, very concerned about what kind of shape we're going to leave this province in for our kids and our grandkids.

When you see that the cost of interest goes up, when you see that, unfortunately, our credit gets downgraded – and they know that that means fewer services – they're concerned about what their kids are going to have to do to dig their way out of this. You know, family values are very, very strong in all of Alberta, and that is true in Cypress-Medicine Hat. They want their kids to have opportunities. They want their children to be able to stay in Alberta and flourish and have opportunity. They know their kids will be happier if they have more control over their lives, and that means opportunity.

You know, I guess, hon. member, I hear time and time again that people call and say for the 10th time that there's still this problem with trying to park at the hospital because Alberta Health Services hasn't done it right, and we're handling it for the 10th or 15th time and are going through that level of bureaucracy, and they hear that there are two good front-line professionals at the hospital that can't get an answer because it goes up the chain to Edmonton and the answer never comes back. They're crying out for local decision-making. They know that these debt levels and this interest will make it all the harder for that to happen.

When the previous government in 2008-2009 enacted the royalty review, they saw the effects of what bad governance can do to an economy when we lost many jobs and we lost investment. You know, as the debt, with the interest, gets bigger and bigger, they're concerned that they are going to lose more opportunities for their kids and their grandkids.

Thank you very much.

The Speaker: Are there any other questions under 29(2)(a)?

Anyone prepared to speak to the major point? The hon. Member for Battle River-Wainwright.

Mr. Taylor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to speak on Bill 10, the Fiscal Statutes Amendment Act, 2016. There is no way that I can support this bill. I don't believe Albertans as a whole could ever support this bill either. I've talked to many of my constituents, and they're frankly appalled by this bill when I explain what the bill intends to do, or not do, depending on how you look at it.

What this bill intends to do is to allow the NDP government to run operational deficits, something which, I believe, if the government had run as one of their platforms during the election campaign, they would never have been elected, not to have this kind of money thrown to the wind. This bill intends to allow this government to borrow somewhere north of $60 billion or more. We don't know because there's no cap or ceiling. It's just open now, so there is nothing there.

It was only in November, Mr. Speaker, that this government gave themselves the ability to borrow up to 15 per cent of GDP. They were asking for around $48 billion, and less than half a year later they've increased this by another $12 billion. I have no faith that we'll see restraint at the $60 billion range, and neither does this government. Otherwise, they would have put a cap on how much they could borrow. Instead, they want to remove the cap, that they themselves voted in, and shoot to the sky when it comes to borrowing, that is.

I am so unimpressed with this bill. I have to ask our NDP counterparts: what about the children? What about the grandchildren? Seriously. They're the ones that are going to have to pay for this in the long run. [interjections] This is not funny. I don't mean, "What about the children?" in a slight way. I'm serious when I talk about that because they are the ones that are going to be paying off this debt. Money that we are spending right now: they will have to pay that off. Our children, our grandchildren, our great-grandchildren, perhaps, will have to pay that off. This is an astounding amount of money that we're talking about.

The Wildrose Party has tried all year long to help this government find ways to find savings. You know, frankly, we've given common-sense solutions to save money. We last provided this government with suggestions just about a week or two weeks ago here when we asked for cost-cutting savings through amendments during the estimates. In fact, I put forward four different amendments, so I had my part in trying to ask the government to curtail some of this spending. We want to see if this government can find ways to save money.

Two billion dollars of interest payments: that's what we're going to be looking at. I think that we all need to stop and think about how big $2 billion really is because, frankly, it's huge. If you look at $2 billion, what does that really mean? How many schools does that mean? You know, if you look at the government of Alberta site, which I did, I saw that you had put up something where you were talking about 19 schools being built, and these 19 schools being built were – I forget exactly the number – 500 and some-odd million dollars, roughly $530 million dollars. If you extrapolate that and put that over $2 billion, which is just going to interest, you're looking at 68 schools that could have been built just on the interest alone but won't be built because we're just paying interest. To me, it's a huge amount of money. When you look at it, $2 billion is, well, $2,000 million. That's just a huge amount of money.

This unlimited debt ceiling that this government is proposing: the payments come with it each and every year, and they have implications across the board, like I was saying with the schools, so from K to 12 education because of the loss of potential to pay for additional teachers or to build new schools.

You know, I went to payscale.com. This is another interesting one that I looked up. I looked up payscale.com, and I asked: what is the average wage of a teacher in Alberta? The average wage of a teacher in Alberta according to payscale.com is $70,000. Well, it's actually just short of $70,000. It was 69,800 and some dollars, but I'm just going to call it $70,000. Well, if you divide that number, $2 billion, by $70,000, you're looking at over 28,000 teachers that could have been hired. That's each and every year. We're talking about teachers. These are really effective jobs that should be out there in the system, but we've lost them.

The health care system. We look at the health care system, and we talk about nurses. How many nurses could you hire with that?

Now, I couldn't find a wage comparison for nurses, so what if you just said $100,000 for each nurse? That's a nice high number, and that's probably going to be adequate. You're looking at 20,000 nurses that could be hired at $100,000. It's just an astounding number of jobs and the potential lost. So that, frankly, just scares me.

We're looking at hospitals in my constituency. A hospital for Wainwright is around $240 million, but let's round it up to $250 million. We'll give ourselves bells and whistles that we shouldn't have and make it $250 million. How many hospitals would that be? Well, Mr. Speaker, that's eight hospitals that you could be building across this province each and every year. But, no. We are going to be paying $2 billion in interest. It's just an astounding amount of money.

Roads and bridges are going to be lost, roads and bridges that could have been done. You know, it costs about a million dollars a mile to do a road. I'm using miles, yes. I'm using the old system, not metric.

An Hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Taylor: I know. It's shameful not to use metric, but a lot of people my age understand miles quite well, so it's okay.

If you wanted to find out how far, well, I looked it up. I said: how far is it from Alberta to Mexico? Well, it is only 1,371 miles, that distance, so even if you're looking at it from Edmonton all the way to Mexico, we're still not at that 2,000 miles of road that you could build, based on it being a flat road. But on that theory, we could build a road all the way to somewhere in Mexico with this. It's just an astounding amount of money, that we're simply paying in interest.

With that in mind, it's not just what we can't buy now; we have an additional $2 billion in interest payments. After the dust settles and the NDP government has gone through roughly $60 billion, the very same $60 billion that has put us in a position of giving banks $2 billion — that's banks that we're giving $2 billion in payments to, to show for this. I'm going to have to ask the question: who are you friends with? [interjections] Do you have a social conscience where you're hiring more teachers? No. You're going to be losing teachers and nurses based on this plan, or you're losing hospitals or schools . . .

The Speaker: Hon. members, through the chair.

Mr. Taylor: Thank you.

You know, we're losing all that potential out there, and frankly I'm afraid of what's going to be happening with that. The question needs to be asked. Can the government answer: what exactly do we have for that $60 billion? In the end what do we have, Mr. Speaker? I would like to know. What is the end game? Are we going to have those eight new hospitals this year? I don't think so. Are we going to have an extra 28,000 teachers, 20,000 nurses? Do you want to pick one of those things where you could say that? That's what I would love to see.

How much savings is there in the rainy-day fund that you have right now? What do we have to show for that? What are we going to show for that $60 billion that we're borrowing? What is the legacy that this government is leaving Albertans with other than debt piled upon debt, that we have to pay back?

Not only will this hurt generations to have to pay this back but, again, also our children and our grandchildren. I have to go back to that because one of the main reasons I got into politics is because I care about my children and the direction the government was going. At the time I was concerned about what the government, now the third party, was doing, and now I'm very concerned about what this government is doing. At that time we were looking at $12 billion that we were going to be in debt, and now we're going to be looking upwards of, at the end of this period, $60 billion. Programs can't help but be affected. Either programs that are currently free will be cut or will have to be charged for, or the programs that are being charged for right now will have to face steep increases.

Which infrastructure projects will be left in the dust as a result of this? What money is there going to be to pay for them? In the end, when we're paying this $2 billion, how much deferred maintenance will we see in the future because we're paying interest rather than fixing our schools and roads and postsecondary institutions? Frankly, I've been talking to people that are in the schools, you know, and they're concerned. They're concerned about how much or how little has been able to get done in postsecondary institutions, in the public school systems. I've been talking to superintendents and such. They're, like I say, frankly, very concerned about what's happening and what's going to go on with them.

What this bill doesn't intend to do is have any fiscal restraint, any concern for future generations. We're opening the gate to spending, and there's nothing in this bill to stop the spending. That's why you're removing this lid on it, and it goes into infinity and beyond, as you've heard a couple of times, I'm sure. I believe that reasonable amendments to this bill could make this bill better. Unfortunately, this government voted down these amendments. Credit downgrades, as we've all seen, are a direct consequence of not having a ceiling on the amount of money you can borrow, which is what this bill will do. There is nothing in this bill that states that they can curtail spending. Consequently, credit agencies like Standard & Poor's look at the potential to borrow and the amount borrowed and the amount projected through their budgets that they will borrow, and they give us more credit downgrades. I believe that if they pass this bill, we'll be shortly looking at another credit downgrade because it'll be passed and the potential to borrow is unlimited.

Mr. Speaker, that is why we continue to see credit downgrades. This government borrows more without a clear plan to pay back money other than to tax more. Increased taxes make provinces and jurisdictions less desirable to live in, and consequently more people leave the province, which as a consequence leaves us with, you know, fewer taxes that you can draw on: fewer people, fewer taxes they can levy on people, if you will, and the province ends up in worse shape as a result. The province would go into a downward spiral as a result. It's obvious how this spiral works, and Alberta can make a difference and take out one of the factors that leads to this downgrade spiral.

We should not, by any means, pass this Bill 10. Governments need to have a budget constraint to work with in order to keep the economy healthy, and Bill 10 just does the opposite of this. You know, if you look at towns like the MD of Wainwright, they are by law restricted to running a balanced budget. This government just doesn't see the need for that. Frankly, the towns are able to make do with their budgets when they have to run a balanced budget. They can't spend more than what they have.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The Opposition House Leader under 29(2)(a).

Mr. Cooper: Thank you. Under 29(2)(a), Mr. Speaker, I just have a quick question for the hon. Member for Battle River-Wainwright. He was speaking about municipalities and their guidelines around running balanced budgets and not being able to carry year-over-year deficits and a number of other guidelines that they meet under conditions laid out by the government.

9:20

I'm just a little bit curious to know if he has any comments with respect to: if the government thinks it's reasonable for municipalities to function under a set of parameters that include, essentially, debt limits, would it be reasonable for the province to also have some parameters set out for themselves with respect to debt limits? Are there any other comments he might like to add to what was a very stirring and convincing speech?

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Taylor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you for the question. You know, I believe that governments at all levels need to have a restraint, something they can't go past. In the past it's been a practice, it seems like, for Alberta to have a restraint on how much it could spend. This is the first time that they've been able to borrow an infinite amount of money. Could it be a hundred billion dollars? It could be. We don't know because there is no cap on how much that is.

In my riding I have six counties and MDs, and they're all restricted by, you know, that limit. They have to run to a budget. They have to be very fiscally responsible, Mr. Speaker. I have roughly 25 towns. Actually, two of them ceded their governance just recently. They became too small and weren't able to continue with it. But they had to balance budgets. They had to live within that budget restraint.

This government is no different. If the Wildrose was the governing party, we would like to see restraints on this so that we could see in the future that there would be no more borrowing to infinity and beyond. This has been a good practice in any level of government. I don't want to see Alberta go down the path of Greece because Greece is in trouble, and it could go belly up. It's causing such a strain on Europe, right across all of the European nations. It's a terrible thing to see, and it's just because we don't have fiscal responsibility to put in a cap, to put in a limit, to stop the borrowing, to stop the bleeding. The more we borrow, the more debt we incur and – the problem – the fewer services we can actually offer as a result of it, so fewer doctors and nurses and teachers because you'll be spending money on just servicing that debt.

Going back to what I was talking about before, that $2 billion is 28,000-plus teachers. But what if it becomes $3 billion? Or what if our interest rates increase and interest rates just go up 1 per cent more? It's going to cause a huge problem for what this government has budgeted going forward. I don't know if you've looked at that unintended consequence. That's an unintended consequence of what's been happening with this. We've got to look at all the different avenues. I don't see anything good coming out of this.

I would implore the government to restrict how much they can borrow and to get rid of this Bill 10. Bill 10 is, frankly, not good for Albertans. It's not good for the shining beacon that this province once was. We had the Alberta advantage. We were paid in full. We had no debt. Now, by the end of this mandate we're looking at $60 billion. You can't tell me that there were $60 billion worth of infrastructure needs that had to be met. There were not $60 billion worth of infrastructure needs that had to be met.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Barrhead-Morinville-Westlock.

Mr. van Dijken: Yeah. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to speak to Bill 10, the Fiscal Statutes Amendment Act, 2016. A more apt name for Bill 10 would be the Debt Ceiling Removal Act, but given that there are scatterings of other things in here, that might be a little unkind. Ineptitude is defined as the lack of a skill or ability, and "inept" is precisely the word needed to describe Alberta's NDP government. Last fall the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board brought in a debt ceiling at 15 per cent of GDP, and here we are, six months later, repealing it. That is inept, a complete lack of foresight, an inability to plan properly. This inability creates an environment that leads to instability, lost confidence, and credit downgrades. Removing the debt ceiling is also incredibly irresponsible and, I would suggest, immoral.

The bank is not going to invest in or provide credit to my business, my farm, if I show no discipline in my borrowing and spending practices. The bank actually has ratios in place to curtail that problem, and they're there for a good reason. They're there to keep the business sustainable, to keep the business viable so that it can actually succeed.

If I'm looking to partner with someone to grow my business, if I went to them with this lack of debt discipline, I believe that would definitely kill the deal. I believe the credit agencies are sending that message at this time, that this is a lack of planning and a lack of discipline that most investors would shy away from. This is the kind of management that drives investment away.

This government continues to blame low oil prices for their inability to rein in this growing debt mountain. This government has given no indication they are willing to rein in their spending problem. Without any goodwill or discipline in this government's spending habit, their irresponsible and reckless behaviour is driving investors away. The very partners they need to drive the economy are partnering with other jurisdictions that understand the need for a stable partner. These individuals are quickly losing confidence in a government with no real plan. The NDP gamble is a path to unmanageable debt.

It's also increased our personal taxes, our corporate taxes, carbon tax. Debt-servicing costs will go up. We're gambling with the accelerated phase-out of coal. It is irresponsible, immoral, reckless, all without doing actual economic analysis.

The Speaker: Hon. member, I would prefer that you not use the word "immoral."

Mr. van Dijken: Okay. I'm fine with that.

Purely ideological choices with no understanding or concern for damaging consequences: this is akin to Premier Mom and Finance minister Dad whipping out their credit cards, racking them up, only to have to cut the children's allowance to pay the bill when it comes due. It is irresponsible to allow this intergenerational transfer of money from Alberta's children to the current government. Today's spending debt is tomorrow's taxes.

This compulsive reliance on credit cards and racking up the bills has been recognized as an addiction. A spending addict needs intervention in order to break the cycle. The first step is stopping the denial of that addiction, and the NDP are very much in denial. The NDP claim to be ready to invest. But how? With someone else's money, taxpayers' money. So, of course, this NDP government believes the debt ceiling has to be removed.

Instituting a licence for unlimited, reckless spending is not the same thing as having a real financial investment plan. A licence to spend is exactly what eliminating the debt ceiling means. The government is floundering along, blaming the low price of oil for their bad financial management and hoping someone or something is going to come and rescue them. Without admitting to their spending problem, they are risking the future of all Albertans in much the same way a chronically addicted gambler puts his or her family at risk by blowing all the money on the slots or the horses or playing poker. The NDP are not investing; they are gambling. They are gambling with Alberta's future. We are headed toward $58 billion in debt, and it is not acceptable to be giving that to our children and their children.

9:30

The truth of the matter is that the NDP is putting the heavy burden of debt on all Albertans. Mr. Speaker, that is no way to live. All of this debt needs to be repaid, and that will mean that when a hospital needs to expand, the interest payments on the debt will prevent the nurses from being hired or that piece of highway that needs to be six lanes won't happen because of the weight of debt and the interest payments it requires. This unlimited borrow-and-spend agenda means that soon enough government won't be able to provide services for Albertans because government and Alberta taxpayers will be so chained to servicing the debt.

A debt ceiling forces some measure of discipline on a government, and it seems to me that the current government definitely could have benefited from following their own law here instead of introducing this bill to render the debt ceiling null and void. We have an inept, irresponsible, and reckless government stuck in denial of an acute spending addiction without a real plan, hoping for a miracle but in the meantime gambling Albertans' money away.

We can and we must do better, Mr. Speaker. Thank you.

The Speaker: Any questions under 29(2)(a)? The Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, I was very interested in the word that our hon. member used. He did use a word that you had asked him not to use, "immoral." There are some synonyms of that word. I'd like to ask him what part of this plan that they have is more like these synonyms: unethical, bad, wrongful, wicked, unprincipled . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. member, I think you're pushing the envelope a little bit.

Mr. Hunter: Sorry. I can't hear you.

The Speaker: I think you're pushing the envelope a little bit in terms of the use of the word. What specifically would you like the member to comment on?

Mr. Hunter: I'm actually asking him which one of these synonyms would best describe this bill.

The Speaker: Why do you feel the need to have synonyms on the question of "immoral," which I've already asked that we not use?

Mr. Hunter: You know what? Because I think that he needs to describe it, and I think that it's important to make sure that people understand the description of this bill.

The Speaker: And that's your question?

Mr. Hunter: My question is: which one of these synonyms best describes this bill? Corrupt . . .

Mr. Bilous: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hunter: . . . disreputable, nefarious . . .

The Speaker: A point of order has been noted.

Point of Order Parliamentary Language

Mr. Bilous: Clearly, Mr. Speaker, I rise under 23(j): "uses abusive or insulting language of a nature likely to create disorder." I believe that word is actually unparliamentary, quite frankly. I could dig up the list, but I'm sure you'll have it at your fingertips.

Clearly, the member is not trying to ask a question or comment on the contents of the bill. He's clearly, first of all, ignoring your requests to move past a word that the previous member used and instead is wasting the House's time trying to incite disorder as opposed to speaking to the merits of this bill. Again, the term "corrupt," I believe, is unparliamentary. I would love the Opposition House Leader to try to speak to this.

Apparently, a new source just came in. It's on page 149 of Beauchesne's parliamentary procedures and practice. Yes, Mr. Speaker, the word "corrupt" from Debates, 1980-83, was ruled in the past as unparliamentary.

The Speaker: The Opposition House Leader.

Mr. Cooper: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and speak to the point of order just on one very brief point. I think that the hon. member will be able to speak for himself, but I might just add that during the point of order the Deputy Government House Leader made some accusations about the member and what his intentions were. I just might add a bit of caution to my colleague on the point of order. It is not an ideal scenario when during a point of order we make accusations about what his intentions were or weren't, the reasons why he was using those types of words or why he wasn't. I'm certain that the hon. member will be able to speak for himself with respect to those exact comments.

The Speaker: Any other comments?

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, I would like to withdraw that statement.

The Speaker: Thank you.

Debate Continued

The Speaker: Are there any other questions under 29(2)(a) to the Member for Barrhead-Morinville-Westlock?

Hearing none, the Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Dr. Swann: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to speak in third on Bill 10, Fiscal Statutes Amendment Act, 2016. You know, it's so interesting to hear one side talk about ideology and another side talk about ideology. They're both ideological. They both have fixed beliefs about how to manage a declining economy. One says that austerity doesn't work. The other says that austerity works.

Well, why don't we ask a few experts like Nobel prize winner in economics Paul Krugman? He talks about the delusion of austerity and, when an economy goes south, how much damage it does to children, to the vulnerable, to families, to health care. In fact, from 2009 to '13 he compares various countries in the OECD that approach a declining economy with strict fiscal constraint and those that actually borrow and invest. He shows in graphic form how they have debunked the whole notion of cyclical spending, and now most of the world has embraced countercyclical spending. You borrow at the time when the economy goes down because interest rates are low, people need support, infrastructure is needed, maintenance hasn't been maintained, low prices for labour, low prices for infrastructure building.

You guys are way out of date in your reading. I don't think you've read any of the economists because you continue to harp on the same notion, that austerity at a time of suffering will somehow improve the economy and build a new economy. Well, clearly, that has been shown repeatedly to be wrong. Countercyclical spending is the norm of the new economies of the world.

Mr. MacIntyre: With a plan to pay it back.

Dr. Swann: Yeah, with a plan to pay it back. That's the missing ingredient, a plan to pay it back. I agree with that, but stop pushing austerity.

The Speaker: Through the chair, please, hon. member.

Dr. Swann: I got a bit animated there, Mr. Speaker. I apologize.

Debt is a serious liability. There's no question. Capital is an investment. Operating costs must be questioned. Capital investment is a good investment. I don't mind seeing debt around new infrastructure. Maintenance of falling infrastructure: excellent; we need that. Ongoing operating costs: we have to find another way, and we need to find that through a plan.

It would be very helpful for all of us here, I think, to hear some options about what this government is thinking about beyond an alternate economy that we're trying to build. I think we need to talk about other sources of revenue: user fees, all kinds of new creative investments on roads, and making sure that we are all paying our way because, truly, we are passing on this massive debt to the future.

Having said that, you put in an artificial debt cap, which was well, well below the rest of the country. For whatever reason you now have to rescind it. I don't hold you too much at fault for that. You were trying to demonstrate to the world that you recognize the problem of debt. Well, clearly, with the rest of the country in the 30 and 40 percentiles for a debt-to-GDP ratio, you're a long way from that, but obviously we would like to see you put in some limit. I mean, not just lift the cap. What is it you're actually going to try and target? It would give us all some confidence.

I've talked about Paul Krugman and his countercyclical spending. A Nobel prize winner, he received that because of his excellent research around austerity and the damage it has done around the world. Spending during surplus aggravates labour costs, building costs, and, in fact, creates the boom-and-bust economy that we have been struggling with all these years. You guys – I'm talking about the ND government – have indeed inherited a massive infrastructure deficit. You've inherited a maintenance deficit. You've inherited an economic decline unprecedented in at least the last 20 years.

You have made a new commitment to addressing climate change, which is laudable, but that means necessarily challenging your budget. You've made a commitment to shift to a new economy and made a serious commitment in terms of looking at ways to stimulate new energy and new businesses in general. To your credit, I guess, you embraced the notion that small business needs a break, that capital investment tax deductions are probably a good other way to invest in new business. So you're learning. I appreciate that. What I would like to see and that I think many people would like to see: if not another cap to replace this one, at least a plan to repay. That's been missing.

Having said those things, I have come around to actually moderate my opinion of this lifting of the debt cap. I can live with this because of what you've inherited and because of the countercyclical spending, that is not ideological but is based on evidence from around the world that you spend during a decline in the economy and that you take care of people and that you invest in new infrastructure, especially with low interest rates. This is the time when we might get a real stimulus for a very broken economy.

I will be supporting this bill although initially I was planning to vote this down. I look at the history of this debt cap. You're the first ones that put a debt cap on. It's a third of what most of the rest of the country has for a debt-to-GDP ratio. According to the Fraser Institute the only province spending a little less than us in the next four years is Saskatchewan in terms of program expenses per GDP and general expenses per GDP. Let me say that most of the eastern provinces are up to four times higher in debt to GDP. So it's not like we're way out of line with the rest of the country.

No, we don't want big debt, but let's look at it relative to the country. Let's look at it in the context of an economy that has really gone south and recognize that in 2018 the Fraser Institute predicted that only B.C. and Saskatchewan would have slightly less debt to GDP than Alberta. We're still ahead of the rest of the country based on our projected budget for 2018 according to the Fraser Institute. I mean, let's get serious and get on with the business here.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Any questions under 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-St. Albert.

Mr. Horne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Under 29(2)(a)?

Mr. Horne: Yes, 29(2)(a). Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was very interested in the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View's comments on Bill 10. In particular, I was encouraged by his interest in infrastructure spending. I've been thinking about this a lot lately, and the best way I can characterize what I have learned through my political science studies about the position we were left with, coming out of former Premier Klein's days, was that we may have paid off the mortgage and championed the paid in full and had the mortgage-burning party and everything that went with that, but the roof was falling down, the door was off the hinges, and we had a kid on the way.

An Hon. Member: And no food in the house.

Mr. Horne: And no food in the house.

So I was very encouraged by that.

Another point that the hon. member made that I was particularly interested in was in talking about some of the prominent economists who are currently taking a slightly different position than the Official Opposition. Earlier today I saw a report from the IMF, the International Monetary Fund, which is noted for historically pushing austerity, especially in Africa and developing countries, although earlier they came out and said that austerity isn't working and that we need to start looking at different options.

I was wondering if the hon. member would like to expand on those thoughts.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Dr. Swann: Well, thank you very much. I think that it's a relevant comment. The IMF has for a long time championed structural adjustment, which means bringing budgets into line with western countries, meaning that when you get into a debt problem, you cut services. Indeed, what they have come to is that they cause much more damage and increase the debt load, in fact, because people were no longer able to work, didn't have the supports they needed, were dying at a higher rate, infant mortality. Indeed, injury standards in the workplace fell with the very cuts that were supposed to improve a budget. But, in fact, it was a just a number on a page while people and systems suffered drastically.

I think the evidence is in. If people will look at the evidence on a global level and look at the way that cyclical spending has caused damage to societies, countercyclical spending has stimulated growth and sustainable growth in many cases. They're even looking at this in Greece. They're looking at it in Spain and finding ways that they can both restrain inappropriate spending and corruption, for sure, but ensure that the dollars go into the purposes for which they're intended, will actually stimulate jobs, the economy, provide stability in the social services, and actually provide a basis for renewal and stability.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-Foothills under 29(2)(a).

Mr. Panda: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I heard the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View talking about the plans to repay the debt. Many of his Liberal colleagues like Hon. Paul Martin also had the same views. Their view was, you know, that we had to maintain the deficits to a reasonable extent and that we should have a good debt repayment plan so those interest monies are not wasted.

The hon. member is a good doctor. We also heard from people here that spending is an addiction; if there is no control, you know, it could go out of control. As a doctor what would he prescribe for the addictive spending by this government? I would like to ask him.

Dr. Swann: Well, I don't know that addiction can be associated with borrowing any more than austerity. I think what the member is talking about is dogmatism. It's dogmatic in your particular brand of conservatism that you cut services and you cut spending during a time of austerity.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Any other members that wish to speak to Bill 10? The Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake.

Mr. MacIntyre: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today on behalf of the magnificent riding of Innisfail-Sylvan Lake.

Mr. Cooper: The incredible riding.

Mr. MacIntyre: Incredible? Yes.

An Hon. Member: Outstanding.

Mr. MacIntyre: Outstanding.

To address Bill 10, the Fiscal Statutes Amendment Act, 2016, the intent of this bill is somewhat troubling. The elimination of Alberta's debt ceiling will reduce government accountability. This piece of legislation is an attempt by this government to avoid the scrutiny that will come from Albertans when the NDP outspend the 15 per cent debt-to-GDP ratio that they themselves amended just a few short months ago. In just three short years this government is projected to outspend its own legislated debt ceiling.

9:50

Just a few short years ago Alberta was a debt-free province, and now we have a government that without regard for the fiscal health of our province wants access to unrestrained borrowing. This is, quite simply, intergenerational theft if you think about it. It is burdensome upon people who are not yet even born. The generations who are not yet born in this province are going to bear this debt. That is unfair to them. If one of the foundations, one of the pillars of democracy, is no taxation without representation, in a way we are taxing future generations who aren't even here yet. They're not being represented properly.

Our province's once pristine triple-A credit rating has already been downgraded by Moody's, DBRS, Standard & Poor's. If we look closely at this government's and the previous government's management of Alberta's assets, there is no reason left to wonder why numerous credit agencies have used their credit ratings to express their concern about this government's plan to spend Alberta off the debt cliff. The ability for our province and this government to enter into unconstrained debt is worrying to our creditors, and justifiably so.

A little over a year ago the NDP was promising Albertans that they would be tabling balanced budgets three years into their term. Do you remember that? Just three years into their term they promised balanced budgets. Now the NDP are projecting they would not be able to balance the budget until well after they are out of office, in 2024. This government did not take the extent of Alberta's troubled financial position seriously when they ran to run this province in the election. The previous budget maintained fantasy projections which have done little more than showcase to worried creditors and Albertans that there is no real plan except to spend and tax, spend and tax.

Just six months ago, in October 2015, the Minister of Finance had us all in the House debating raising the debt ceiling to 15 per cent debt to GDP. Now here we are today, just a few months later, and the government now realizes that raising the debt limit isn't enough, and they need to remove it entirely. The quotes from those debates are telling. A few short months ago, on October 29, 2015, the Finance minister told this House:

Our government takes seriously our role as stewards of Alberta's treasury. That means managing debt in a prudent manner. To that end, Bill 4 proposes a legislative debt cap based on a nominal debt-to-GDP ratio of 15 per cent.

He said, "Our government takes seriously our role as stewards of Alberta's treasury." He said, "That means managing debt in a prudent manner."

It's obvious to all Albertans now just how little those promises meant. There is no lingering intention on behalf of this government to show fiscal restraint or prudence for the serious role of stewarding Alberta's financial position. Instead of prudent fiscal management, the minister now wants the members assembled in this House to make the irresponsible and rash decision to abandon their commitments to leaving the next generation of Albertans in a strong financial position.

In addition to a manageable debt-to-GDP ratio, our creditors require assurances that borrowing will not get out of hand. Our own Finance minister told Albertans that raising the debt cap to 15 per cent was the way to do so. Just a few short months ago the minister told the Speaker:

The bottom line, Madam Speaker, is that a 15 per cent debt to GDP is a prudent benchmark for limiting government debt. With this cap in place, Albertans can be assured that the government's borrowing will not get out of hand.

The Finance minister has himself stated that a limit on our debt is a way to ensure that his own government is not borrowing in an unrestrained fashion. The minister himself spells out the case against the bill before this House today in his own words. The government, a government that has already committed itself to not balancing the books during their elected term, is removing the legislative entities he praised as protecting Albertan interests.

Again, October 29, 2015, the Finance minister told the members:

The debt cap provides sufficient flexibility to the government as it implements its financial plan while maintaining a manageable limit on the amount of debt government can take on. Comparatively speaking, the proposed limit of 15 per cent is one half of the average debt-to-GDP levels weighted by each province's nominal GDP. For your information, Madam Speaker, two out of three credit rating agencies that rate the province report net debt to GDP as a measure of their credit reports. Dominion Bond Rating Service states that a triple-A rated province should have debt-to-GDP ratio of less than 15 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance was told by the credit-rating agencies, by Dominion Bond Rating Service, that "a triple-A rated province should have debt-to-GDP ratio of less than 15 per cent."

The Minister of Finance himself has admitted that he knows full well that to exceed a 15 per cent debt-to-GDP ratio endangers our credit rating, yet he insists on doing it anyway, in spite of the warnings of the credit-rating agencies. Mr. Speaker, I submit to this House that that is irresponsible. Credit agencies have been clear about their expectations of a resource-dependent economy. Ours is not a unique economy, but in a global sense it is. A debt-to-GDP ratio of 15 per cent is, in and of itself, too high for a resource-dependent economy like Alberta's seeking to maintain a triple-A credit rating. That was clearly expressed by the bond-rating agencies. Again, this minister disregarded those warnings and forged on ahead, now taking the cap off.

The province's recent downgrades are not because we have exceeded the 15 per cent nominal debt-to-GDP ratio. We are actually three years away from that. It is in part because there are higher expectations on an economy that is blessed with resource wealth. If you read the parameters that the bond-rating agencies publish, the metrics that they are looking for when they grade jurisdictions are really very clear. I mean, they're very transparent about the metrics that they use to grade every jurisdiction. Whether it be a city, a state, a province, a nation, there are those metrics. Any Finance minister, any business manager, any provincial government person can go and read those metrics, can say: "Aha. Okay. This is what the bond-rating agencies judge us by. Let's make sure we don't exceed those." Yet it would appear that this government has completely disregarded those metrics time after time after time. We just experienced our fourth downgrade. That is irresponsible management, Mr. Speaker. Irresponsible.

The commodities market is volatile, and the debt and revenue of an economy such as Alberta's requires prudent management just by virtue of the volatility of resource commodities. This is not new news. Alberta has gone through boom-and-bust, boom-and-bust, boom-and-bust ever since Leduc No. 1 came in. This is not new news. Governments have a responsibility to think ahead, to forward plan, and to plan for the unexpected, and this government is not doing that. Their answer to problems that arise fiscally is: well, we're going to spend anyway, and we'll just tax to make up for it. Well, news flash: when the economy is going down, down, down, there's less tax revenue coming in to this government. You're going to have businesses that will not be paying tax because they are not making any profit. You're going to have restaurants not paying any tax because they don't have customers coming in to buy those meals anymore. People are out of work.

It is not just the Finance minister that has failed to be transparent with Albertans about what creditors expect of Alberta. The Member for Calgary-Hays took the Finance minister's lack of transparency even a step further. In spite of numerous early warnings from our creditors that Alberta was on the wrong trajectory financially – and let's be clear, Mr. Speaker. We were warned in advance by those credit agencies. They issued warnings. The member, in my opinion, made questionable statements to constituents just a few short months ago while we were debating the NDP measures last fall to implement a debt ceiling. Let me quote that.

The 15 per cent ratio... is the ratio that's regarded as a reasonable and manageable limit by our credit-rating agencies. During other debates in the House that comes up rather often, and we still have a triple-A credit rating, and there's been no indication that this 15 per cent plan would do anything to harm that.

Yet we were warned by the credit-rating agencies that we were at risk of experiencing a downgrade.

What is so troubling to Albertans is that this government has consistently demonstrated its refusal to heed warnings when they are given to them. Shortly after these remarks Alberta lost its triple-A credit rating. The near $58 billion of debt that the NDP government has committed the province to by 2019 will now cost Albertans even more. Losing our credit rating and allowing unchecked debt to rack up has serious consequences for Albertans. Our ability to provide services to the next generation is being compromised. For any person in this House, Mr. Speaker, myself and yourself included, when we have bank charges or debt-servicing charges, that's money we can't spend on things for our family. You and I both know that. The same is true for governments.

This government has Alberta on a trajectory to hit $58 billion of debt by 2019. Interest payments, as we've heard time and again, will be over $2 billion, and that's at today's credit rating and today's interest rate. If we get into an inflationary cycle or, rather, an interest-increase cycle – Mr. Speaker, you and I are old enough to remember 1981, 1982. Those interest rates were killing jobs, killing companies. People were losing their houses just because the interest rate went up a point or two. If that starts happening, that $2 billion will seem like pittance compared to what the interest rates will be. That's a lot of schools. That's a lot of medical centres. That's a lot of teachers, nurses, and other things that we need in this province. That's a lot of infrastructure maintenance.

This year alone this government has already chosen to completely draw down our contingency account and add $5.4 billion in new borrowing just to cover ballooning operating costs. That means borrowing to pay for the day-to-day operations of government. Operating costs are not a good or a service that Albertans will be passing along to the next generation. Unborn Albertans themselves will not derive any benefit for operations that precede their birth, yet we are callously saddling that generation with this generation's debt.

Back in November my colleagues warned that a piece of paper that tells the government that they cannot exceed a 15 per cent of GDP debt level is, frankly, not worth the paper it's written on. Exactly what Wildrose and Albertans feared would happen is now happening.

We have an onus, a solemn onus, to our children and our grandchildren to pay for the services that our generation consumes as we consume them and to not put that on their backs. Spending away their future is repugnant. It is the wrong choice. Alberta needs to get back on the right track and commit to maintaining a manageable deficit during times of great financial pressure. Albertans don't need this NDP plan to throw budgetary caution to the wind.

A number of years ago I saw a bumper sticker. Mr. Speaker, you've probably seen the same one. It said something like: I'm spending my grandchildren's inheritance. That's...

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The Member for Calgary-Foothills. On 29(2)(a)?

Mr. Panda: On 29(2)(a). Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was quite impressed with the way the hon. Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake was trying to educate us on the downside of continuous borrowing and paying higher interest rates. He was also trying to explain that this credit downgrade will, you know, limit our ability to borrow in the future and will also cause us to pay higher interest. I just want to ask the member: what are your thoughts to get our credit rating back to the previous level, and what should we be doing different than what the government is doing now?

Mr. MacIntyre: Thank you, hon. member, for the question. I think it is crystal clear. The metrics that I was talking about, that the credit-rating agencies have, are very clear. They're very concise. They make it known world-wide what they expect. And let's understand why the credit-rating agencies have these metrics in place. You know, some of the largest investors in the world are not rich people that jump into a pile of dollar bills at the end of every day. Some of the largest investment groups in the world are union pension funds. Union pension funds. They are some of the single largest investment groups in the world, and those people are relying on those investment managers to make sound investment decisions so that when those union workers retire, they have something to retire on. Those fund managers are expected to make those funds grow year by year.

So in the world of investment those investment managers have metrics that they're looking for, and they do a risk analysis on every investment that they make. One of the metrics in the risk analysis that fund managers look at is the stability of what they're investing in, whatever that may be. It could be a bond for a province, like this province is going to be doing. They look at the stability, the safety because all investors are what's known as risk averse. They're all risk averse. They want safety, safety, safety because they are managing other people's money, and it is so important, then, for them to trust in the safety of the investment that they're making. If they distrust the safety of the investment, they require a higher rate of return.

When Standard & Poor's and these other rating agencies are looking at a particular jurisdiction like Alberta, the investment community is looking at the rating agencies and saying: "How do you rate them? Is this a safe investment for our union pension fund, our union retirement fund?" And the rating agencies are going to come back and say: "Well, actually, you know, Alberta is not looking too good because they are not doing anything to rein in their spending. In fact, they've taken the limit off spending." This is a danger signal to fund managers, and they have a solemn responsibility to those investors, which are future retirees, to protect that investment. This government is disregarding those metrics, basic financial metrics that every jurisdiction has to abide by.

In the end, Mr. Speaker, when this Legislature passes this bill, I'm expecting another downgrade. I think it's inevitable, and that is sad and very unnecessary. All this government has to do is to get their spending – their spending – in order. Really.

Thank you very much.

The Speaker: Any other questions under 29(2)(a)?

Are there other members wishing to speak to the bill? The Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Bill 10, the Fiscal Statutes Amendment Act, 2016. Really, what this bill is about is accountability. That's what a debt ceiling does: it makes the government accountable. But, of course, having no debt ceiling removes that accountability, so there's nothing to keep the government in line, nothing to keep them from going even further in debt. It's about taking responsibility for your actions, taking responsibility for your fiscal plan.

Be assured that this will cost Albertans money. This will cost in increased taxes, and of course it'll cost us in the credit-rating downgrades that we've already had. And we're likely to have more. It's all about credibility. These agencies that rate the credit of Alberta want to see some credibility to Alberta's finances. They want to make sure that there is a plan in place. But, again, there's no plan here; therefore, this is a plan to fail.

Now, one of the previous speakers talked about spending money in bad times. That was a good plan, he figured. Well, an even better plan would be to save money in good times, and then when you do have bad times, you have some money. But that money is all gone, Mr. Speaker. It's all been spent, and there's no plan for anything, with this government, as far as fiscal management other than to spend more and tax more.

Now, it seems like Alberta has a spending addiction, and removing the debt limit just enables it to continue. We're not even at six months after the 15 per cent debt limit was put in place, and already we're removing it. The government's projection was 15.5 per cent. Why couldn't they at least have put the limit there, at 15.5 per cent? Instead, they take away the limit altogether. Of course, that takes away credibility. That's something that these debt-rating agencies worry about. That's what their job is, to rate governments on their financial worthiness.

Basically, the government has lost control. They don't appear to have any interest in trying to regain it. Alberta spends $10 billion more on government than B.C. or Ontario on a per capita basis for operations. It's not right to just keep borrowing and borrowing for day-to-day operations.

Now, government debt has consequences for Alberta families and for the government's ability to deliver the services they rely on. With a 15 per cent debt limit, which is going to put us into debt $58 billion to $60 billion by 2019, that will be $2,000 a year per family just to cover interest payments. There's no way we can support a bill that opens the door to increasing that number to that degree. This government's approach to debt and deficits is not responsible. It's wrong. It's passing the buck not only to Albertans now but to their children and grandchildren. They'll be expecting them to carry the tax burden of this government's choices, and that's not right.

First, the government says that we can afford to go in debt because we have the lowest debt-to-GDP ratio in Canada, and they talk about the weighted average and all those sorts of things. But the fact is that deficits and debt are like a ball and chain tied to our economy. They don't help our economy; they hurt our economy. The more we borrow, the longer it'll take to pay it back. And the more we have to put our credit rating at risk of being downgraded, the more interest we have to pay.

Now, less than 24 hours after the budget was released, we'd already been downgraded from triple-A to double-A. That was less than 24 hours. We can't blame that on the price of oil, Mr. Speaker. That's clearly as a result of the budget. Clearly, that's exactly what they said. They didn't say: oh, the price of oil is low; therefore, we had to downgrade your credit. They used examples from the budget and said: these are things that need to be done. These are things that worry the credit-rating agencies. They actually warned that the budget will exert growing pressure on Alberta's credit rating, and that will cost us. That's exactly what they said, "will exert growing pressure" on our credit rating.

Now, anybody who's ever had a mortgage or has financed a car knows that a lower credit rating means higher interest rates because there's more risk for the lender. The higher the risk, the higher the interest rates. We've talked about the predatory lending bill here. The higher the risk, the higher the interest rates. So why do we want to put ourselves into that position? I don't know.

A deficit budget means that the government is borrowing more than it's making. It's simple math that way. If you spend more than you take in, that's a deficit. When borrowing costs go up, the government, with no plan to rein in spending, will have to seek out further revenue sources. When royalty revenues are low, finding revenue sources, of course, means hiking taxes on Albertans. Here we're talking about a carbon tax, so it's already happening. And it's not just the $3 billion carbon tax. This government has hiked personal, corporate, and other taxes in the last year. They've hiked more fees. It's just a continuous cycle of tax and spend.

Now, I wish the government could at least tell Albertans how much more they'll have to pay in interest once Alberta is fully downgraded. Even at this point can they tell us how much more we'll have to pay in interest? The Premier had said that she knew Alberta's credit rating would be downgraded after the budget, so why did she not choose to present a budget that showed at least some restraint so creditors might have a little more faith in Alberta? Why not have a debt ceiling limit?

The NDP government inherited a 44-year-old, dynasty-run government that was spending far above the national average and far above our neighbours, as in British Columbia. Are Albertans really to believe that there wasn't considerable waste to be found?

Now, when the government says that it refuses to exercise fiscal restraint for the sake of helping Albertans and then has to turn around and tax Albertans to cover the cost of its short-sighted borrowing habits, it's hurting the very people it claims to want to help, and that's just not right. That's misleading Albertans, and it's something that we won't tolerate here in the Wildrose. The Wildrose savings suggestions actually protect teachers and nurses not only by strategically hiring more of them but by keeping the cost of government sustainable so deeper cuts later are not needed.

Ultimately, Albertans will pay for the government's debt, and the cost will be more than just financial. Now, one of the members on this side went through some figures as far as what we could do with the $2 billion a year in interest that we're going to be paying: how many hospitals we could build, how many teachers and nurses we could hire. But that money is going to be gone. It's not going to go to Albertans; it's going to go to interest. It's going to be gone. Now, the more taxes Albertan families have to pay, the less money there is for after school activities for the kids, less money to save for college or university or to save for the future of a child with developmental disabilities. These are the costs of debt and irresponsible spending. It's wrong to pull Albertans into a debt spiral.

Now, interest payments on debt will soon be one of the biggest government expenses after health, education, and social services. Can you imagine? We'll most likely be spending more on debt than we will on transportation. That says something, I think. That's huge. They'll be spending more on debt servicing than protecting our environment or keeping our streets safe.

The bottom line is that in the long run unlimited debt hurts those it pretends to help because it not only drains money from Albertans' pockets, but the interest payments suck government resources away from important services that Albertans need and expect. Higher taxes don't just mean less money in your pocket at the end of the month. They don't just mean less money to put your kids in soccer, dance, gymnastics or less money to save for their education either. They mean higher prices for everything because businesses will be forced to pass higher costs on to Albertans. Everything from gas to groceries to school supplies and sports equipment will cost more if taxes go up. It will reduce our competitiveness. It will reduce tourism. As people come to this province, they'll have to pay more, and that's on top of the increases that will come from the NDP's massive carbon tax, which will cost a typical family an extra thousand dollars a year already.

Now, if this bill is passed, our debt could be even higher than the $58 billion that it's projected to hit before the next election. There won't be any limit, so they'll have no encouragement to keep it below. Reckless debt accumulation does not bring you back to balance. We have to attack wasteful spending while protecting front-line services, and it can be done, Mr. Speaker. Wildrose laid out its plan to save $2 billion a year in its budget savings recommendations without losing any front-line staff.

Let's be clear. This bill is about enabling higher taxes and more debt because this government refuses to reduce our bloated spending. Eliminating the high debt we had in 1992 was part of the Alberta advantage. It allowed for lower taxes. More debt means more debt-servicing costs.

I just want to mention something. We talk a lot about the infrastructure deficit. The government is always talking about that. Well, the other day here in the Legislature one of the members on this side asked the Transportation minister about his cuts to highway maintenance. He talked about dangerous cracks, potholes, and missing shoulders . . . [that] can easily pull a vehicle travelling at highway speeds off the road. Why is the Minister of Transportation putting Albertans at risk by making dangerous cuts to core public safety functions like road maintenance?

Now, the Minister of Transportation says, "This is not an ideal choice, and I am hopeful in the future that as the financial position of the province improves, we will be able to restore this funding." So even with this massive amount of spending, we can't even take care of our infrastructure, Mr. Speaker. How much money do we have to spend to be able to help take care of our roads, too?

Obviously, there's a problem with spending. If we're spending all this, $14 billion more this year than we're going to take in – $14 billion in one year more than we're going to take in – and we can't fix potholes and cracks in the highway that will help reduce our infrastructure falling apart down the road, that doesn't make sense, Mr. Speaker. It doesn't make sense at all.

I'll get back to debt-servicing costs. Debt-servicing costs could be spent on schools, hospitals, roads. That's where the money could be spent. Debt servicing is just throwing away money on interest payments caused by bad economic policies. The debt interest payments will soon be $2 billion a year and threaten to erode our services.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Opposition House Leader.

Mr. Cooper: Thank you.

The Speaker: Under 29(2)(a)?

Mr. Cooper: Yeah, under 29(2)(a). Our colleague was speaking about debt-servicing costs. I'm just curious to know if he's given any consideration to the impact that those will have down the road with respect to monies that we might not be able to spend on hospitals or schools or nurses or doctors or teachers and, additionally, if he would like to provide any other comments on the impacts that he might be concerned about in having no restriction on the amount of debt that this government can carry to his grandkids. I know he is a good, good grandfather and is concerned about the future of our province, so I wondered if he might be able to provide some comment on that.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you for the question. Yes, it's hard to sit here in this House and listen to the fiscal plan, which is basically a plan to fail because there isn't a plan, and think about our children and our grandchildren. What are they going to do? We sit here and think about the $2 billion and what could be done with this. How many more things could be bought with it or paid for with it than just giving it away in interest?

Again, we have a government here that seems to talk the talk about spending money on infrastructure and taking care of this infrastructure debt that they were left with, but they can't even fix the potholes in the road. They can't even fix the cracks in the road. They're cutting that. If that's what $58 billion worth of debt – and of course that's projected debt. Just a few months ago what was the projection then? It wasn't $58 billion; it was substantially less. It just keeps going up. Every time they come up with a new budget, the number is higher and higher. Obviously, why they don't want to put a debt ceiling on is because they don't have any confidence they could keep within it anyway.

Interest can work for you, or it can work against you. When you have money in the bank, when you've saved in the good times, then interest can work for you. You can do things with that interest. You could leave it in the bank and let it compound. That would be a good thing because then you would have money when you need it.

The government back in the day created the rainy-day fund, the sustainability fund. At one time it was $17 billion, $18 billion. Well, it appears that in Alberta it's been raining for eight years. That doesn't make sense. How does it make sense that for the last eight years every year we've spent more than we've taken in? It doesn't make sense. We've had $100-a-barrel-plus oil through that time period, and we still spent more than we took in. We've blown our rainy-day fund. It's been raining for eight years in Alberta according to this government and the past government.

Let's be clear: a $14 billion consolidated deficit. In the next year $14 billion more will be spent than is taken in. Just that one year would have wiped out that whole sustainability fund if it wasn't gone already, but unfortunately it's gone, and now we're going to be sitting here with $58 billion of debt. Our financial position from when we had $17 billion in the bank in the sustainability fund to what it'll be in three years, in 2019, is probably $70 billion or more. That's the difference between what we had and how far into debt we're going to be. That's enormous, and it's not necessary.

This government needs to take this seriously. The bond-rating agencies have spelled out the facts, they've spelled out what this government needs to do for them to have some confidence in their fiscal responsibility, but this government hasn't taken any of that advice. They haven't taken any advice from the Wildrose either. We've tried to make amendments.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there members that wish to speak to Bill 10? The Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today in this House to speak to Bill 10. [interjection] Pardon me? Sorry. Did I miss something important?

May I continue?

The Speaker: Please.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

It will remove Alberta's recently raised debt ceiling. I know we've been talking about this a lot. Just to bring to light some of the things that the Member for Calgary-Mountain View had said earlier about deficits and about helping the vulnerable, about making sure that we're able to protect people and that we have the money to do that – I don't think anybody in here would dispute that.

I think the consideration that we have to think about, too, is not just right now but the longevity of those plans as well, right? I know you're laughing when we talk about our grandchildren. It's not a particularly funny aspect to me. I'd really like to be able to leave them something and know that we were part of a legacy of something that we're building.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you for the reminder.

I would just like to mention that I don't dispute that anybody in this House has any ulterior motives with regard to that, but the overspending is an issue, and that's the direction that this discussion needs to go. Anybody who can't see that is not understanding the mismanagement that has happened in the past, that we can't learn from our mistakes, taking that forward and making changes as a result of past mistakes. I say that lightly because I'm new to this, and this is relatively new information for me as to how to move forward, and I'm not the government. I don't cast any aspersions as to the things I don't know, but what I do know is that there are things that are happening with this government that are showing absolutely no changes and no thought process to things that have happened in the past, and that's not acceptable.

We keep speaking about how Alberta spends $10 billion more on government operations than B.C. or Ontario. Ontario does have some economies of scale, but there are 13 years of big-spending Liberal governments in the Toronto region, and the Toronto region is hardly cheap to operate in. B.C.'s population is only a little larger than ours. The province is bigger, the roads have to be built through mountains, and Vancouver is very expensive to operate in as well. So one might think that Alberta's government would be able to spend less than our neighbouring provinces on political operations, not more. One would think that our per capita expenditures should be lower than British Columbia, yet we spend $2,400 per capita more.

Why is it that the government refuses to consider why this might be? We're asking legitimate questions of why. It can't just be oil. It's not possible. There are mismanagement issues here, plain and simple. The refusal to consider the why is so strong that the government would rather permanently remove a cap that actually holds you to account. The very things that you campaigned on, something that you can be proud of, where you say something and you stick to it and you work within that premise that you started with: that's accountability. It takes thoughtfulness and management and forward thinking to understand how you can work within something that you have already made a decision about how you are going to go forward. That's accountability.

A $10 billion difference, Mr. Speaker, is a significant amount. I think what's worse is that we are not receiving any answers as to why it costs so much more to build roads in Alberta, to build schools in Alberta, and to build hospitals in Alberta. British Columbia has mountains to contend with. It has oceans. That means for many residents in the mainland that B.C. is only accessible through bridges or ferries from its islands. There are clear infrastructure challenges due to B.C.'s innate remoteness that come as a consequence of their mountainous terrain, and B.C. still manages to provide its residents with world-class services in spite of its vast isolation created by mountain ranges, oceans, and islands. There are communities in northern British Columbia where road access is so limited that you can only fly or ship products there, and these challenges seem to be managed and mitigated. It's just something to look at, an opportunity to see what is being done differently. The challenges are managed, and adequate services are provided, and they're paying much less per capita to do so.

On the other hand, I would assume that we have a far less challenging terrain – and please correct me if I'm wrong – yet we can't manage our infrastructure spending. I don't understand. The mismanagement can only be attributed to a misunderstanding of how to spend money appropriately. It's been called an addiction. It's been called lots of other things. Call it what you will, at the end of the day that falls on your shoulders, your legacy.

We spent during the boom times way beyond our means, and we've spent during bust times way beyond our means, and Alberta taxpayers feel betrayed. They feel betrayed by entitlement and the fact that a government can think that it can recklessly spend taxpayer dollars. It is not our money. Every time that we step into the ring to decide where that money is going to be spent, the priority has to be that this is not our money. They are not our dollars. We have a responsibility to spend taxpayer dollars in a way that is going to benefit Albertans not just today but in the future as well. Albertans see that this new government is doing nothing different and has not learned anything from the past. We're asking you to take a look inward and try things a little differently. Massive overspending is alive and well.

Balanced budgets aren't ideological. Every government should be trying to do this. It's the right thing to do regardless of party politics. Again, we're talking about our kids and the future and our grandchildren. I just can't imagine how anybody in this House could not see that as being the imperative directive of how we move forward, forward thinking, because it takes us out of the mix. It's about the future.

With the debt today, that we're talking about, there's a social responsibility that comes along with being that arbiter of those hard-earned tax dollars, especially right now. All of us know how our constituents are suffering right now. All of us know. We have such a tremendous responsibility to be so careful with those tax dollars that are coming in. We have people that are earning a third less than what they were earning a year ago. That's a tremendous difference in the tax dollars that are going to be coming in for this government to spend. That's an important – important – responsibility to consider when you are having the responsibility of spending those dollars on behalf of Albertans.

Albertans are asking for answers, and instead the government looks to be reducing their accountability. The government is making it such that you don't even want to face the questions from the Legislature as you spend us off the debt cliff. My colleagues and I have stood in this House emphatically and detailed for the government what the consequences of this bill look like, I would wager to say, over and over and over again. The Wildrose has said that releasing this government from its obligations to manage debt is a course that will lead all of us into a situation that I don't think any of us quite understand.

Fifty-six billion dollars: after you say it enough times, it doesn't resonate. You just get used to the number. You get used to that horribly humongous number, and then it becomes a justification. The number has to mean something. That huge number, $56 billion, needs to mean something. It needs to mean something to every person in this House as you go forward and spend those dollars and have to justify to Albertans where that money is being spent.

This shows Albertans and our creditors that the government has lost control and has no plan and no direction. For Albertans this bill unleashes the NDP from the burden of sensible financial management, Mr. Speaker. The government will be permitted to spend Alberta off this fiscal cliff, increasing the debt burden for every single Albertan without a single clearly laid out intention of how to manage the debt.

The government holds responsibility to more than just the Albertans of today; the government has a responsibility to the Albertans of tomorrow. The government's commitment to stable funding is nonsense if the government can't figure out a way to sustain the levels of funding it seeks to provide. It seems like a common-sense mentality. How are you going to provide these programs that are so important without understanding how you're going to sustain them? On the backs of whom? I'd like to know.

10:40

The longevity of services and programs is paramount to the success and happiness of Albertans and of their communities. Communities and citizens come to depend on these programs. What's going to happen when you're promising programs and the government will not be able to sustain those? People will be depending on programs that this government cannot provide. It's the government's job to make sure that the level of service being provided is sustainable and fluid and that the services that are being provided are quality services and that it doesn't ebb and flow with the amount of cash flow that's coming through the government.

It can't fluctuate with economic times. You can't all of a sudden have a service that depletes as a result of economic times. Are you going to justify that because the economics are low? That means you have to have a sustainable plan in order to make sure that that program is sustainable. The only way to make sure that the levels of service are maintained through this time is to work at providing them efficiently. That's what Albertans are asking for. They want to know, Mr. Speaker, how that money is going to be spent, how those services are going to be provided, and how Albertans, that we take these taxes from, are going to pay for this. The bill provides little more than a licence to spend without constraint. The government refuses to look inward and find inefficiencies within the bloated bureaucracy.

Most provinces in Canada are paying significant sums in debt servicing. Debt servicing comes from all of the costs of providing new schools and new hospitals for their citizens, and we do not want to see Alberta follow along in this path. Confidence in Alberta's ability to manage this government's budgetary commitments is failing and falling. Since the government has taken power, numerous credit agencies – and I will repeat it again; I'm not sure how many times we've all said this, but I'll say it one more time, though – have downgraded the rating. This will make Alberta's high debt load even more expensive in the future. That's where we need this plan. We need to understand how that's going to get paid back.

Loyola: Look up the definition of triple A and double A and see what the difference is.

Mrs. Aheer: If it's not a significant difference to you, therein lies the problem. If a downgrade is not a significant enough difference, Mr. Speaker, for that to be a reasonable reason to look at the debt, therein lies the problem. That's the problem right there.

The NDP government, just like any other NDP government that has ever governed, is embarking on a course that will leave future generations of Alberta grappling with disastrous and unconstrained debt. This is the wrong course. As a mother and, hopefully, future grandmother I worry about the future of Albertans. In fact, my worry based on this bill is that my sons and their generations to come will live in an Alberta that is burdened with debt, Mr. Speaker, to the extent that taxes must be raised and the quality of services will diminish. The current generation of Albertans needs to do a better job internalizing the consequences of financial mismanagement today. This does not set Alberta on the right track.

I cannot support this bill, and I implore my fellow members of this Assembly to do the same. Thank you.

The Speaker: Are there any questions under 29(2)(a) to the Member for Chestermere-Rocky View?

Are there any other members who would like to speak? The Opposition House Leader.

Mr. Cooper: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise today and speak to Bill 10, a bill that makes significant changes to the path forward for our great province, a bill that reverses a lot of sacrifice and hard work that was done not only by previous governments but by Albertans right across this province that recognized we needed a competitive advantage, that recognized we needed to be able to attract the best and the brightest, that recognized fiscal accountability, stability, and a world-class environment for business to grow and excel, work that was done by many Albertans to see that come to reality. As such, it saw hundreds and thousands of Albertans here grow and flourish with an entrepreneurial spirit that was the envy of many around the world and also saw hundreds and thousands of people move to our great province and make their own contribution to the future of our province.

Now, what we see in Bill 10 is a real unwinding of a lot of that very good work. What we see this government doing is putting us on a path that's reckless, that's dangerous, that's ideological, one that they promised not to put us on, which I think is the most concerning. This government promised just a couple of months ago that 15 per cent debt to GDP would be more than enough. I think my hon. colleague from Bonnyville-Cold Lake did a very good job of discussing and exposing some of the comments made in this House by a number of members on the other side about just how reasonable 15 per cent debt to GDP was.

They made a promise, they made a commitment, and Albertans expect people to keep those. But that's not what's happened. That's not what this NDP government has chosen to do. They've chosen to go in an entirely new direction, in an entirely different direction. The one that I think Albertans are most concerned about and certainly disappointed about, as I travel around the outstanding constituency of Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills, is this decision that the government has made to not be accountable at all. It's possible although unlikely – there is the potential – that Albertans could have accepted some other form of debt limit, although I don't think that would be the case.

Here's what I know for certain. Albertans demand a level of accountability, a level of transparency from their government. The truth of the matter is that one of the reasons why this NDP government is in the seat of government is because the now third party had lost track of some of those core things. The challenge here is that Albertans wanted a government that was going to be more accountable. They wanted a government that was going to chart a new course when it came to levels of accountability. In fact, Mr. Speaker, that's what this government ran on. They ran on being more accountable, more transparent, respectful of the voters of Alberta. What voters got was a government that, certainly in this case, hasn't come anywhere close to keeping its word, and because they're having a problem keeping their word, they have decided to not even set the parameters that would require them to keep their word.

10:50

We've seen this in other areas, certainly through the estimates process, where there's been a history of not including comprehensive performance measures. One thing that a government will do is to remove performance measures or loosen performance measures so that it's much more difficult to measure, and that's exactly what this does. It removes all levels of accountability. It removes any transparency when it comes to the debt limit and the amount of spending that Albertans think is reasonable or acceptable, and I don't think that's the kind of change that Albertans were hoping for on the 5th of May last year. What we see here is an incredible amount of opportunity for the government to drive up spending, to drive up debt, and to increase the weight of government on future Albertans.

I know that when I chat with my kids, I talk about the direction this government is going, because that's what all dads do with their nine-year-olds, and we play games like Monopoly so that they can understand . . .

Dr. Starke: Stock Ticker.

Mr. Cooper: . . . and Mastermind, and the nine-year-old beats me.

I talk to my kids about the future of our province, and they certainly have concerns, particularly because together with our children my wife and I are saving for our children's future, and with the work that our children do to earn, a portion of that is being saved so that from an early age they can understand this concept of the importance of how we manage our resources. The same should be said here, but we see the government giving themselves a blank cheque to spend significant amounts of money, so much so that the weight of government is going to be a true burden on our children, because the government isn't taking steps to manage today's realities, on the back of tomorrow's future. I think that is more than a little disappointing.

There's been a lot said in this Chamber with respect to the challenges around our credit ratings, the very real costs that are associated with credit downgrades, and the very fact that the presence of this bill is one of the reasons that our credit has been downgraded. I think that that is more than a little disappointing because if the government was just willing to put in some parameters around this piece of legislation, if the government was willing to get serious about the path back to balance, we could stabilize what is one of the aspects of the Alberta advantage, and that has been a triple-A credit rating over so long.

I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I have absolutely no challenge when it comes to voting against this bill because this bill does not move Alberta closer to what I believe Albertans are hoping for. This bill doesn't move Alberta closer to accountability, this bill doesn't move Alberta closer to transparency, and it certainly doesn't do anything to preserve what so many in this province have worked hard for in the form of our credit rating. I will vote against this bill every time that this sort of reckless legislation comes before the Assembly.

The Speaker: Are there any questions under 29(2)(a) to the Opposition House Leader?

Are there any other members that wish to speak? The Member for Airdrie.

Mrs. Pitt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Are you under 29(2)(a)?

Mrs. Pitt: No. I'd like to speak to the bill.

I'm grateful for the opportunity to speak to Bill 10. I have some personal experience that I'd actually like to offer to this debate. When I was 18 years old, I got my very first credit card. It was exciting. I'm pretty sure I had a co-signer on this thing. It was a very exciting moment, a thousand dollars in my hand. My boyfriend at the time, who is now my husband, and I went: "Oh, this is amazing. We've got to go put something on this credit card. We've got to use it because we're going to build credit. That's a good thing, right? You know, we've got some money. We don't really have to take it out of our bank account right now. We're going to worry about that later." We went out for dinner that night, and I think we spent, like, $50. It was a high-spending evening for us, and it was such a nice evening that we had. A couple of months later we did pay that off, I think, in very small increments, maybe $10 at a time. It took a while, and, you know, I paid a little bit more than I should have because the interest kicked in. That wasn't pleasant.

We got engaged a couple of years after that.

An Hon. Member: Congratulations.

Mrs. Pitt: Thank you very much. It was a wonderful engagement at the top of the ski hill at Sunshine. It was a beautiful moment. You know, I was so scared I was going to lose my ring in the snow as I went down, and that was when I was a good snowboarder. That's probably not the case anymore.

However, Mr. Speaker, my fiancé at that time and I were at Liquidation World, and they had this beautiful kitchen set. You know, that was when the high stuff was really at the peak of being popular, and it was a beautiful, beautiful wood finish. It was just absolutely wonderful. We thought: "Oh, my gosh. This thing is on sale. Oh, my goodness, only, like, $800. This is on sale." This was, like, the newest, coolest table you could buy. We had one, I think, probably from around the garbage dump behind our building because it was free, and that's sort of what you get. "Ah, this is awesome. Our first brand new piece of furniture. We're getting married. We've got to get this."

That was my first real big piece of debt. That was the beginning of what I would call a very slippery slope. To this day this is still the kitchen set that we have. It is rickety. It is falling apart. I've been married for 10 years this summer. I hate this table. I just hate this table. It is not only a reminder of the beginning of what was a very horrible, terrible path of debt for me and my husband, but now it's falling apart, and for the life of me I can't justify buying a new one. I just can't do it.

When I say that was sort of the very slippery slope of the debt game path that we went down, shortly after that, we sort of teetered around the limit of this credit card, this thousand-dollar credit card. Lo and behold, they kept upping my limit. I couldn't believe it. This was fantastic. I had even more money that I could access without really having to pay it back. You know, there weren't any major purchases after that, but there were little ones. It was a little bit more. I hit that $2,000 mark, and this is before the legislation changed.

Mr. Panda: You had a triple-A rating?

Mrs. Pitt: I had a triple-A rating.

I said: man, this credit card company just loves me, right? "We're just going to give her a little bit more because, you know, she makes her payments on time. She pays it back. We're just going to give her a little bit more." You know what? Before we knew it, Mr. Speaker, this credit card was at $12,000.

Mrs. Aheer: Double wowzers. They loved you a lot.

Mrs. Pitt: They loved me a lot. We made the minimum payments, and the debt kept climbing.

Mr. Speaker, I am a fiscal conservative because I learned some lessons along the way. We had to go to the bank and say: "Help. We can't get out of this situation. We just absolutely cannot get out of this situation." We kept making more money – we did – and our income had increased, but so had the payment levels. It was a situation where there was just no way out of paying off this credit card. It was to the point where we thought: if we put 50 bucks on this credit card, we can use 50 bucks in three weeks. It made no rational sense, but we just kept doing it, and there was just that point where we couldn't get out of this. It's horrible when you have to go to your bank and say: "Please help me. I'm in big trouble. My credit is going to take a hit. I get that, but I really need help." You know, we didn't file for bankruptcy or anything like that. We were able to sort of ask for help at the right time. But you know what? That really sucks.

What a small scale that is compared to the situation we're in right now, but it's absolutely relevant. As the stewards of taxpayer dollars in this province it's irresponsible for us to be borrowing like an 18-year-old with a first credit card. It's absolutely irresponsible. These aren't just numbers on paper; these are portions of people's paycheques. These are single mothers who are putting their tax dollars in our hands to be responsible with, to make sure that, you know, when they have a horrible, horrible accident and can no longer work, AISH is available to them. These are really important things that people rely on, and we need to be responsible with the money that's been entrusted to us.

I think we all have really big hearts in this House, Mr. Speaker, and we want to take care of everybody. We really, truly do. There is a path for that. I just really, really don't think that this is the way – I really don't – until we're able to look at the health care system and say: "What is your job? What do you do? How can we make this more efficient? How can we make sure that you are making a fair wage, that your work environment is conducive to productive behaviour that takes care of the patient?" I think we can all agree that that's really not happening right now because there's so much inefficiency within the system.

If our last-ditch effort is to borrow money on an emergency basis and that's all we have left, this is a very different conversation. Right now we are only throwing money at the problem without trying to figure out how to solve the problem. There is a way to do it. There is a way to encourage the private sector to create more jobs and not always rely on the taxpayer jobs. The taxpayer jobs are so extremely important.

I am so grateful that I have access to a doctor. I am grateful for that, but it is not prudent of us to be looking for more money while putting so many other things at risk. We've already seen this with – what? – four or five credit downgrades. That's what happens when you don't pay your credit card and the bank has got you at $10,000 and you're not paying it anymore. Your interest rate was 9 per cent, and now it's 12 per cent, 18 per cent. Actually, back when I was 18, I think that interest rates were much higher. Those are extremely dangerous situations.

You know what? We talk about the payday loans, right? We talk about the traps that people get into when they're borrowing money, predatory lender or not. These are the traps that people get into, and this is the trap that we're in right now. We need to be very, very prudent about that.

You know, this is not what we should be teaching our children. This is not responsible behaviour. There is a way to take care of the people that we need to be taking care of but to also be very responsible with the money, the hard-earned dollars that we're entrusted with.

I really think that we need to take a step back. You know, this is now the second time we've asked to borrow more money. That's scary. We're only a year into this thing. We've seen unprecedented natural disasters that need our immediate attention, and these do require dollars. Is there going to be a point where we're not going to be lent any more money? Then what? Then you're really scrambling. Is that when we're going to find efficiencies? We need to really take care of this situation right now.

It's really frustrating, I think. Prior to being in this job, I found it really frustrating when we saw government waste, heard the scandal stories: the $8 orange juice, you know, the exorbitant car wash charges and car detailing, $300 car detailing. I get that these are allowed under the rules – I get that – but it's really frustrating as a taxpayer when I'm going to work for 40, 50, 60 hours a week and I pay my taxes, like I'm sure everybody here does. I contribute to the pool because I do like health care, I do like education, and I do like the social safety net, but I get really frustrated when it's not spent appropriately.

For us to go back to the taxpayer and say, "Hey, we have another situation," where we're asking for more from the taxpayers, and then to say, "We don't really care about what you do; the taxpayer dollars that you bring in don't really matter because we're not going to be responsible with them; we're really not" – we've gotten to a spending situation that's going to be very hard to get out of, and it's going to be embarrassing. I don't think anybody here wants that. I believe that everybody here wants to do the best thing for Alberta. There is a way back. There is absolutely a way back. It's going to take a group effort. It's going to take us all together to figure this thing out. We've got to really, really sort this out.

Is it one side versus the other, or is it: we are here to represent our constituents and all of the people of Alberta? We want to do the best job that we can do. One of the biggest things that we're entrusted with is their tax dollars. I know for a fact that Albertans are very concerned about what this government does with their dollars. I know that people in Airdrie are very concerned about all the tax dollars that they contribute, yet they cannot get access to a doctor in our area after 10 p.m. It's absolutely unacceptable. It's so heartbreaking to see that there are almost favourites. That's an issue for another day.

The issue here is really, truly being responsible stewards of the taxpayer dollar. We are the examples for future generations. When you get into a situation that is out of control, it is a boulder rolling downhill, picking up steam. The path back is a very dark one, and I don't think anybody wants to go there. But at some point you have to address your debt. At some point you have to really, really consider what the consequences are.

We've been punished already. We've been punished with credit downgrades. You know, the number of dollars that we no longer have access to because we're paying just the interest is appalling.

I had a visit with AARC – it's an adolescent addictions recovery centre – and they need some help with the demand. Of course, donations are down, and they're looking for some help from the government for the wonderful program that they run there. They're asking for $500,000. Wouldn't it be fantastic if we could support youth?

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Any questions for the Member for Airdrie under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, the Opposition House Leader.

Mr. Cooper: I'd just request unanimous consent for one-minute bells.

[Unanimous consent granted]

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on Bill 10. I am very interested in . . .

The Speaker: Hon. member, have you not spoken to this bill?

Mr. Hunter: No. I spoke to the amendment, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: We have a record that, in fact, you may have spoken twice, once at 9:14. I'll take it on good faith, hon. member, that you have not spoken. Please proceed.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think it's important for the people of Cardston-Taber-Warner that I rise to speak on this issue of Bill 10. I just wanted to point out really quickly that I don't think the Wildrose would be upset if the government was spending, as they say, to decrease the capital project deficit in this province. If that was really what they were doing here, then we would probably say: "You know what? We have a capital project deficit in this province that we need to address." Maybe we wouldn't say to do it all in one year, but we would say that that needs to be addressed.

The real problem, Mr. Speaker, that I face and that I've talked about with the constituents in my riding is this. The government is spending far too much on operational deficit. They continue to neglect the fact that we spend $2,000 more per person in our province than the province next to us does. What they're saying is that this operational deficit, this operational spending that this government is doing, is unacceptable.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there was a comment made by the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View, a concept about Keynesian economics. You know, I find it interesting that a well-versed man and a doctor, no less, would say something like that. There is mounting evidence to show that this is a failed economic experiment. The reality is that with Keynesian economics, what happens is that you spend when you are in the lows in order to make it less of a low and then you save when you have peaks. The problem is – and the evidence shows it – that very few governments actually curtail spending when that peak comes. The reason why that is is because government's main role is to be able to earn the votes of the people. So rather than actually curtailing that spending, they ramp it up. That economic experiment of Keynesianism is actually very suspect. I find it surprising that the whole premise behind this concept that you can spend without any kind of curtailing, that this government talks about, is completely erroneous. It's absolutely erroneous.

I just wanted to point out, Mr. Speaker, that, look, we are trying to make reasonable arguments here so that this government realizes that we are very interested in building up Alberta and building up a strong, vibrant Alberta. This is something that we believe in very strongly on this side of the House, and I believe that that side of the House believes it as well. The problem is that they are protecting their union buddies. [interjections] Absolutely. That's what's happening. This is what concerns us. There cannot be a duplicity in this province. I hear it everywhere I go. [interjections] We have a situation . . .

The Speaker: Remember that the hour is getting late. Hon member, be conscious of the hour and the time. Please proceed.

Mr. Hunter: I will.

Mr. Speaker, we have a situation in this province where there are private-sector workers who feel that there is a double standard in this province. It's unacceptable. This province needs to be fair to all, to everyone in this province, union and non-union, and this is the problem. This is the reason why we can't get our spending under control.

Mr. Speaker, the reason that I am speaking not in favour of this bill is because it is flawed at its core. The concept that you can continue to spend and have no kind of spending restraints at all: there is no place in the world that can do that unless you have a tree that you can grow money on, and there's no such thing. How can we allow the government to continue to kick the can down the road and say – you know, now it's going to be 2024 or something. Well, it's great to make those promises, but the promise was also made at the last election that they were going to balance the budget in this term. Now, unfortunately, because they don't recognize the value of the money and recognize that they need to be careful with the money, we're in a situation where we don't have a debt ceiling anymore. We're destroying it.

Mr. Speaker, I am adamantly opposed to Bill 10, and the people in my riding wanted me to say that. Thank you very much.

The Speaker: Any questions under 29(2)(a) to the Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner?

The hon. Minister of Finance to close debate.

Mr. Ceci: Yes. Thank you very much. Bill 10, the Fiscal Statutes Amendment Act, 2016, is in service of our three-year fiscal plan, the Alberta jobs plan, Mr. Speaker. The Alberta jobs plan carefully manages spending. The Alberta jobs plan will invest in Alberta now through capital projects across this province, and it will diversify the economy, and it will support Alberta businesses.

I was heartened by the words of Calgary-Mountain View as a representative a little while ago because he clearly understood where this budget is at. Our fiscal plan, our budget, published and passed last week, is available for all Albertans to see and to judge. We are proud of this budget. It is what Albertans voted for on May 5 when they looked at the various platforms. They did not support the platform of that party over there.

The opposition wants to balance the budget. They want to do it. There's an approximately $8 billion drop, we know, from the resource royalty revenues from about two years ago to this year. That's approximately 80 per cent of this deficit this year. To balance the budget, the opposition would have to make extreme cuts to the public service. They would have to fire teachers and nurses, they would have to cut supports for seniors, and they would have to abandon the most vulnerable in this province.

That is not what the Alberta jobs plan will do, Mr. Speaker. We will stand by Albertans. We will support families and communities. We will invest in this province and its infrastructure. We will diversify our energy industry in the market. And we will support Alberta businesses. Our government will balance the budget but not on the backs of Alberta families like they will. The opposition wants to return to the mistakes of the past with reckless and extreme cuts to health care and education. We're not going to do that. We are going to invest. We want to build Alberta. They want to tear it down.

We heard lots of talk about restraining spending. Well, let me just tell you, Mr. Speaker, that in the short time we've been here, we have carried on the restraint in hiring that the previous government instituted in late 2014. We've carried that on. It means that all approvals for new hiring have to go through the DM's level and through CHR, the corporate human resources department.

We have instituted an ABC review, agencies, boards, and commissions. We are in the first phase of that. The first phase has either reduced or amalgamated or eliminated 26 boards and agencies, for a savings over three years of $35 million. That's the first phase of the review. We have two more phases to go, and we're involved in those at this point in time.

With regard to a wage spending restraint let me just tell you something that we've done that they wouldn't have done because they don't even – that they wouldn't have done. Addressing operational spending, we looked at wage reviews of politicians' salaries. We froze them for the length of this term. Political staff are frozen. Managers and opted-out people are frozen, and their salary grids are frozen as well. The CEOs of 27 ABCs are in the first group that we're looking at, to assure ourselves that those people are getting the right wages, and we're going to track those along the lines of the public service managers. We are doing significant work.

You know, we're going to be doing more – more – restraint work as we go forward. That doesn't seem to fix on the radar of the opposition at all, but we will be doing that work.

On the topic of credit ratings or credit downgrades or adjustments just let me tell you that Alberta is not unique in that. What I mean by that, on that point, is that you only have to look at the newspaper, Mr. Speaker – you only have to look at the newspaper – on any day, and you'll see that credit reviews are happening everywhere. They're happening everywhere in every energy-producing company, many of them in this province. They are all getting reviewed by credit-rating agencies. Other provinces, states, and territories: the same thing. Sovereign states and countries: the same thing. Yet this opposition looks at us and says: wait; Alberta is something different and unique from the rest of the world. Well, I can tell them that that's not accurate. What is accurate is that every energy-producing company, state, and country is being downgraded because of the price of oil. The price of oil.

One of the things that the bond-rating agencies identified in their report was that, you know, if you look at – Alberta, you have the ability because you can take some steps on the fiscal measures side, so if you want to address this more rapidly and not get downgraded, you can do that. I said to them that that would put rather severe restraints on our public services. Those rather severe restraints on our public services would mean that those same children that they're talking about and future children would not have the high-quality program supports that Alberta has been known for and continues to have, and that's not what Albertans voted for.

If the opposition is saying that we can address the deficit more rapidly, then they're saying one thing, and they're not saying anything that Albertans want. They're saying that we can bring in a PST. That is not something we are going to do. We are only going to address this in a reasonable way. We are not going to address it on the backs of Albertans, with a PST, because taking any more money out of the economy is not what Albertans need at this time.

Lastly, Mr. Speaker, I will say again that this government has a responsible plan in front of Albertans. They can read the plan. We are doing the work that Albertans need at this time, and that is to have a shock-absorber budget so that they don't suffer the effects of that party over there. This party will stand with Albertans.

Thank you very much.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

10 a.m.

Tuesday, May 31, 2016

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Prayers

The Deputy Speaker: Good morning.

Let us reflect. Let us reach into our creative minds and think outside the box in looking for new and innovative solutions that'll lead us to new opportunities, ideas, and thoughts. May we continue to work collaboratively in this Chamber, always remembering that we're working towards making Alberta a better place for future generations.

Please be seated.

Orders of the Day Government Motions

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs.

State of Emergency

18. Ms Larivee moved:
Be it resolved that pursuant to section 18(4) of the Emergency Management Act the Legislative Assembly continue the state of emergency declared in the regional municipality of Wood Buffalo on May 4, 2016, OC 107/2016, up to and including June 30, 2016.

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Madam Speaker. This extraordinary emergency requires co-ordination well beyond the boundaries of Wood Buffalo. This can be best accomplished under a state of provincial emergency. Evacuees are currently spread throughout the province and, in fact, throughout Canada. The careful, orderly return of 80,000-plus people to Fort McMurray has to be a responsibility taken on by the province. Extending the state of emergency will allow the province to provide a greater level of co-ordination and support to evacuees and the municipality and bring provincial assets and resources that are needed throughout the initial re-entry phase.

The council has been consulted and supports extending the state of provincial emergency. As soon as this re-entry phase is complete and the municipality feels that it has the capacity and ability to take on the responsibilities, we will transition authority for this work back to the regional municipality of Wood Buffalo, with the full knowledge that provincial resources and support will still be available and provided where and when they are needed.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other hon. members wishing to speak to the motion? The hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Two Hills – Three Hills.

Mr. Cooper: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I feel like I may have been discounted a hill there. It's not a significant challenge. The good people of Three Hills will be happy to have an extra hill. You should come sometime. It's lovely there. You can see all three of them.

In all seriousness, it's my pleasure to rise to speak in favour of the motion that the hon. minister has brought forward. I'd just like to take a couple of moments to thank so many in the regional municipality of Wood Buffalo, to thank so many of the first responders, firefighters, individuals who've been literally working around the clock to prepare for tomorrow's events and the staged re-entry.

There have just been so many heartwarming stories. I think of the story and the video footage, that's been making the rounds, of the 300 South African firefighters who are coming to the aid of our province. There really has been much about a horrific situation that has brought out the best in people.

I appreciate the government's decision to not enter into this motion lightly. I appreciate that they reached out to the council. I think that given the circumstances that surround this and the significant number of logistics that still remain, particularly in light of getting folks of Fort McMurray back home from all around our province and our country as we continue to serve those folks who have been evacuated to evacuation centres and as we move to see a number of those close as well, this is a reasonable motion.

Obviously, any time the province declares a state of emergency, it should be done with the fulsome thought and discussion of the severity of that. In this case members on this side of the aisle also agree that it is a step that needs to be taken, so we'll be happy to support this motion.

The Deputy Speaker: Thank you, hon. member. For the record I've spent time in Two Hills, in Hairy Hill, in Blue Hill, but I've never visited Three Hills, so I look forward to that opportunity soon.

Any other hon. members wishing to speak to the motion? The hon. Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I just wanted to take a brief moment to thank the minister and all of the staff within Municipal Affairs, within Transportation, within Environment, all of the emergency responders, first responders for the remarkable work that's gone on. It's been amazing watching the outpouring of support from Albertans, from around the country, and from around the world for what is, you know, the single greatest natural disaster in our province's history, I'm sure, and perhaps even our country's history. The scale of what has gone on is truly remarkable.

So, of course, I support the extension of the state of emergency. It's not something, I think, to be taken lightly when we're establishing a provincial state of emergency, and I know it's something the minister and her team have thought very hard about. When we have a situation where we're working in consultation with the municipality and they've made that request, for the provincial government to then respond to that request, especially as we move through this very important milestone of moving back into the regional municipality of Wood Buffalo, getting people back into their homes in a safe, controlled manner, I think the state of emergency will give us the tools that are needed.

But I do want to take this opportunity just to express again to the people of Fort McMurray that we in this Assembly and Albertans and, I know, Canadians are with them through this challenging time. It's going to be a long road; there's no question. It's going to be a long road, but it's an important milestone tomorrow as we finally start to see people back in their homes. That will be an important day.

You certainly have my commitment to provide whatever support we can over the months and years as people resettle and rebuild. Fort Mac will fight back. We've got your back Fort McMurray.

Thank you very much to the minister, and thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) comes into effect should any hon. members wish to take advantage.

Seeing none, the hon. leader of the third party.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I just wanted to rise in favour of the motion that the Municipal Affairs minister is leading on and just say that I understand that it's going to take a little bit longer and that to give the province the authority to do what they have to do right now seems like a completely reasonable thing. My only encouragement would be for them to be careful and to use that power for good wherever they can.

I had the opportunity to spend some time with some of the folks from the Fort McMurray Construction Association last evening, and they remain concerned that too much of the work to restore the municipality and the region is going to people outside of the municipality and the region. When the government says that they're trying to include people from the municipality and the region, I'm not doubting that, but I would ask the government to use these extra powers, amongst other things, to look to see if you can have the work to restore the community done by people that live and work in the community because what will actually put the community back to work is putting the community back to work.

I would respectfully ask the government to be very careful and to make efforts in that direction when and wherever they can and to carefully consider definitions that might be in use right now for what is a Fort McMurray company. As I understand, the common belief is that the definition is that if they have one employee from Fort McMurray, that's a Fort McMurray company, which could explain, if that is indeed the case, why some people from Fort McMurray feel like there are a lot more people from outside doing the restoration work than from inside. Again I will respectfully ask the government to consider these things carefully.

With that, I shall sit down and prepare to support the motion before us.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other hon. members wishing to speak under 29(2)(a)?

Any members wishing to speak to the motion?

Seeing none, I'll call the question.

[Government Motion 18 carried]

The Deputy Speaker: I apologize, hon. minister. I didn't ask you to close debate. It's early in the morning.

Ms Larivee: I'm okay with that.

The Deputy Speaker: All right.

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 20 Climate Leadership Implementation Act

Mr. Cooper moved that Bill 20 be amended by deleting all the words after "that" and substituting the following:

Bill 20, Climate Leadership Implementation Act, be not now read a second time but that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Resource Stewardship in accordance with Standing Order 74.2 and that the committee report back to the Assembly no later than October 31, 2016, if the Assembly is then sitting or, if it is not then sitting, within 15 days after the commencement of the next sitting.

[Adjourned debate on amendment May 25: Mr. Bilous]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul-Two Hills.

Mr. Hanson: This is speaking to the referral motion?

The Deputy Speaker: Yes.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you. I want to stand and just reiterate our position on bills like Bill 20, that are very, very important, that have far-reaching consequences for all Albertans. The importance of referring this to committee is so that people will have a chance to stand up and speak and have their input on it.

I was at a meeting last night. We spoke to a gas distribution company, one of the major ones here in the province. They're very concerned as a distributor and a consumer because of the staff that they're going to have to hire just to implement this program, that is going to be onerous.

I've talked to a municipal leader. You know, with the removal of the grants in lieu of taxes and some of the MSI funding that they've lost and now this carbon tax on top of that and the fact that they've had no input into it, they're very concerned and haven't been properly informed on where the government is going with this and how it's going to affect these companies. They only have one other source of income, and that is to pass any of their costs on to the ratepayers in their communities. There's a very big concern about that from my communities.

Albertans are very concerned about the priorities and the time that was given to a bill of this magnitude and why it has been slid into the back end of this session. You know, we've gone through 19 bills prior to this one, and some of them have been referred to as Seinfeld bills, which are bills about nothing, such as Bill 1, which has been on the books and off the books and carried all the way through session. Our feeling is that Bill 20 should have been brought in much, much earlier in the process here in the spring session and a lot more time given for debate. We would like to see it put to committee so that we can have some input from Albertans and have a chance for Albertans to better understand it.

I really do feel that we have another Bill 6 on our hands going forward. I'm starting to hear the rumblings. More people are getting concerned. More people are contacting my office. More people are calling me and sending me e-mails. Facebook is starting to rev up again just like it did with Bill 6. I really, really, you know, would recommend to the government that we not read this a second time or put it to third reading but that we send it to committee and have it properly studied and allow Albertans a chance to have some input into this before we commit them to a $3-billion-a-year carbon tax.

Again, I find it kind of surprising that the government wants to go down this road again after what happened with Bill 6. It all came down to not talking to communities, not talking to people, not letting stakeholders have their input into the process. I really think it's a mistake for this government to push this bill through, to force it through at the end of the spring session without allowing us adequate time to debate it and allowing us the chance to go and talk to our communities before we have to make a decision on this.

So that's my position. I think we should refer this to committee and carry on with that. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, are there any other members wishing to speak to the amendment? The hon. leader of the third party.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm happy to stand and speak in second reading of Bill 20, which is titled the Climate Leadership Implementation Act. We've heard from a number of members already that there are significant flaws in the bill, and indeed on this side of the Assembly we still wouldn't mind seeing it sent to committee. We think that would be a better outcome to deal with the multitude of flaws in the bill.

The starting place is probably with the title of the bill because this particular bill doesn't really do anything for climate change. We know for sure that it's a wealth transfer program that will tax every member of society. [interjection] Of course, the government has said that themselves, so it's kind of funny to hear a government member laughing at a provision that her own government put in the bill. It's a wealth transfer process, where 60 per cent of Albertans will, in the government's words, get the money back.

Now, the government's words there aren't accurate either because they'll get some of the money back, not nearly as much as they'll pay. While the government hasn't admitted this, which is kind of weird because it seems as obvious as the nose on any of our faces, they won't get it all back. The government's own policy says that people will get back the amount they spend on gasoline in their vehicle and that they'll get back roughly the amount that they spend to heat their home. The assumption that the government seems to be making is that nothing else will be affected by this, that nothing else they buy will be more expensive. Of course, nothing could be further from the truth since almost everything else they buy arrives at some point on a truck or a train.

Consequently, essentially every family in Alberta will be poorer because of this bill. Sixty per cent of Albertans will get some relief from the additional taxes that the government is heaping upon them but surely not full relief, and consequently most families will be short somewhere between $1,000 and $2,000. It depends upon how much their family budget is, but it'll surely be light a bunch of money at the end of each and every year for whatever period of time Bill 20 is in effect, should the government still decide to forge ahead with this and not take a more reasonable approach and look for a climate change bill that actually does something for the environment. This one, clearly, is heavy on wealth transfer and light on the environment, and these are issues that certainly our caucus is concerned with.

Now, the government, unfortunately, in their debate has tried to make this, "You're either with us, or you're against the planet," which, of course, is a ridiculous argument. I think we've all accepted that climate change is a real concern. This bill, that headlines itself as doing something for the planet, actually doesn't, and that's one of the biggest concerns. There is very little of anything in this bill that actually does anything for the environment.

On the tax operations, if we look at section 4(2)(c), the part that deals with the carbon levy on certain fuels, that part doesn't address if the tax will apply to transformation of fuels into other substances. For example, if somebody transforms methane into synthesis gas and then into methanol and other fuels, how is that taxed? It isn't completely clear. While it looks like it is partially covered under 1(1)(hh), the definition of "rebrand," there remains an open question about carbon-emitting substances that can be used as fuel but which aren't generated or consumed using the processes set out in the schedule beginning on page 74 and following. Governments around the world, Madam Speaker, have learned the hard way with drug laws that careful attention to chemistry and processes is crucial in preventing criminals from getting around the law through technical modifications. This bill seems to fall short in protecting against those concerns.

10:20

Also important, there's no solid definition of a fuel system. We can hope that the regulations will define a fuel system, but the question remains if a fuel system can be decoupled or otherwise circumvented to avoid being captured by this provision. What about other systems where the fuel is not intended to produce heat or energy such as vehicles that carry refrigerated goods where the intent is to provide cooling and where any heat produced is a by-product? It's not clear how that's treated.

Section 26(2): this part deals with recovery, refunds, and credits. It's not clear if Albertans will be taxed on fuels that leak during transport or transfer. It's probably a small amount of fuel overall and should be addressed proactively, but it's in Albertans' best interest to be open to the possibility of disruptive and expensive assessments and court proceedings under part 2 for reporting errors due to leaks. Let's find a way to make this clear while we choose to aggressively tax fuel whether it's leaky or not. This is one of the many things where the legislation falls short of being complete or being clear or being in Albertans' best interest.

In the legislation itself in section 34(1) the clause makes outstanding carbon levy payments the most senior class of debt in a bankruptcy, which is pretty interesting. Banks and other lenders that provide business financing capital would be lower on the list of creditors, potentially increasing their risk as lenders. Once again, the government is being insensitive to business, making it harder for business to get the investment they need to create jobs. They called their whole budget the jobs-creating plan though it doesn't create a single job that we can see, surely not as many as it kills, that's for sure. This is just one more example of another piece of this government's legislation that's hard on business, making it that little bit tougher for businesses to get loans from the banks by reducing the banks' interests below that of the carbon levy tax in a bankruptcy situation.

Similarly, it's not clear where Alberta's municipalities are on the list for outstanding property taxes, et cetera, nor where the Canada Revenue Agency would fit in on unpaid taxes, EI, GST, et cetera. It's kind of interesting that the province has put themselves above the federal government – it certainly appears that, anyway – on the recovery of their carbon tax, potentially before the federal government does. I'm not sure whether this is begging for a lawsuit or whether there is some precedent that sorts this out or not, but I haven't heard any explanation from government ministers or members to see where this all lands. This section needs to provide better clarity about where other creditors fit in during bankruptcy so that the government doesn't unwittingly do harm and jeopardize the interests of investors or other tiers of government even.

Section 43(1) deals with a notice of objection. This part does not outline how the grievance process will be administered; what type of administrative body, if any, will be needed to create and deal with these types of concerns; and at what cost. How much of the carbon tax is going – again, we haven't really found anything that is going to help the environment. How much of it will be soaked up in administration to deal with these newly formed processes that the government is creating through the potential passing of this legislation?

What kind of consideration did the government give to implementing the carbon tax within an existing tax system rather than building what appears to be a parallel tax system as envisioned in this bill? The government is acting as if this is the first day the world existed instead of trying to fit the legislation into the world as it has existed, as it does exist, and with the history that's here. Madam Speaker, it really shows, frankly, the immaturity of thought in creating this bill, very dogmatic and not at all pragmatic.

Madam Speaker, we cannot support the bill in its current form. Over time we will be bringing forward amendments that attempt to address some of the issues that I've raised just now and other things that we find in the bill as we go on. Clearly, Bill 20, the climate change leadership plan, isn't leadership, it doesn't address climate change, and it surely isn't a plan because it hasn't been thought through. So the government has really gotten this wrong on almost every count.

It's really unfortunate that in Alberta, a place where the citizens care about the environment and care about the economy, there's a bill brought forward that isn't going to do anything for the environment, it is going to significantly damage the economy, and the government sponsoring it doesn't seem to be able to explain it in any reasonable way at all. In fact, even in this House they're ignoring the most obvious, glaring inconsistencies and things that are wrong in the bill.

I'll go back to something I said earlier. It's so obvious, when a household is only going to get rebated for the gas in their car and the heat in their home and everything else they buy has a tax to it, that they haven't put a lick of thought into how much it's going to cost families outside of that. If they have, they surely haven't admitted it in this House, Madam Speaker.

When you think about it, this bill is not ready for the Legislative Assembly. It's probably worthy of the status of a discussion document, of something that could be worked on and that perhaps someday, with a major rewrite and major reconstruction, has the potential to do something for the environment, maybe even do something that the government says all the time but actually never puts any action into. It could actually be something to help spur more diversification of the economy. Instead, what it's going to do is kill the economy. I think what most Albertans know, although the government seems oblivious to it, is that it's a lot easier to diversify the economy when there's money in the economy, moving around through jobs and businesses and investment and things like that.

Bill 20 will actually decrease jobs and businesses and investment and at the end of the day will be a huge hindrance to the diversification of the economy because it will weaken the economy. A strong economy actually helps bring in the brain power, the people with specific training and skills that would be more able to be part of Alberta diversifying the economy. Unfortunately, under Bill 20 and the consequences, both intended and unintended, it already has started, just the threat of it, to drive people out, drive the skill sets out that we need to diversify the economy. We believe it will continue to do that, and we believe that if the government is misguided enough to put this bill into legislation, it will have long-lasting negative effects on Alberta's economy, little to no positive effect on Alberta's environment, and will be a hindrance to the quality of life for Albertans for a long time to come.

For that reason, I will sit down now, and we will look forward, later on in the proceedings, to where our party will bring forward some amendments to try to improve what is, sadly, a very damaged, ill-conceived, really not ready for prime time piece of legislation.

The Deputy Speaker: Under Standing Order 29(2)(a), any questions? Go ahead.

Mr. Cooper: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I know that the leader of the third party has served in public life for quite some time, a number of years here in this Chamber and then has a very well-established record as a leader in the city of Calgary. Over that time, I just wonder if he might be able to provide the House with some comment on the types of good work that can take place at committee. This motion intends to send this piece of legislation to committee for a ton of great reasons, including Albertans being able to provide testimony. I just know that he has experienced some successful process at committee. I'm just curious to know if he might be willing to share with the House why that might be a reasonable thing to do with this piece of legislation.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you to the House leader from the Official Opposition for the question. He'll be happy to know that I can report that there can be a lot of good work done at committee. In this House right now, as it should be, there are the 87 of us here, and we are all here to discuss and debate issues. But let's face it. We are politicians, and, yes, each of us has individual skill sets and experiences from our life previous to politics. But at the end of the day, our job is really not to be experts at anything except understanding what's good for Albertans, combining that with what the professionals in the public service bring forward for recommendations, and applying the public interest to either accept those recommendations if they're good for the public or reject those recommendations if they're bad for the public. And there's nothing wrong with that. That's a good process.

But one of the things that can make the process stronger is being in a committee setting, where you can actually have professionals with high levels of expertise, where all sides of the House would have respect for their experience, their expertise, and their background and be able to ask them questions together. It goes a long way towards depoliticizing the process when we can have a known expert ask and answer questions and give testimony and give advice to members from all sides of the House in a less formal, more free-flowing committee structure and can actually help to bring consensus to all sides of the House in the decision-making process. I've seen that over the years. Certainly, on city council it happened over and over and over again and even here at the Legislature.

I haven't done a lot of committee time. But, interestingly enough, during the one committee that the House leader for the Official Opposition and I sit on with members of the government and others, the family-friendly committee, I think we have – you know, at the last meeting, just as an example, we had in the meeting with us by telephone the Speaker of the House of British Columbia, who talked about some of the things that they're doing there to create a family-friendly atmosphere while controlling costs and actually making it work for members of the Assembly there that have young children. That was one of those areas where I think it really brought us all together, gave us a common understanding of the issue.

I dare say – I'm always open to being corrected, but I think I'm pretty safe on this one – that when the committee meeting ended, as a result of that truly external expert advice and information given, we left there with a common understanding and a common purpose and will at some point be ready to come back to this House with a recommendation that I'll be surprised if not all members of that committee support and probably, by extension, all parties in the House support.

That's one example. I've got a limited amount of time. Lord knows, you're all well aware that I can go on for a long time when required to. But the hon. member, Madam Speaker, asked me for an example of when committee work could actually improve the process. I've tried to provide that, and I hope that's helpful for the hon. member and all of the House.

The Deputy Speaker: There are still a couple of seconds under 29(2)(a).

Any further speakers to the amendment? The hon. Member for Barrhead-Morinville-Westlock.

Mr. van Dijken: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise to speak to the referral motion on Bill 20. Just some reflections on the previous member talking about the good work that committees can get accomplished and depoliticizing it: I would also agree. My experience on the Ethics and Accountability Committee, that has been struck to try and improve some of the processes within our democracy here in Alberta – I believe that last week we had a very constructive meeting, with members from both sides of the House being able to have good discussions about how to best move forward in the interests of all Albertans. I thought I should highlight that as another example of where committee work can have a great impact on the confidence that all Albertans will have in the work that's being done in this Legislative Assembly.

I do believe that legislation as substantial as this legislation – some 95 pages long, I might add – needs to go through due process, needs to be sent to committee for study, to call in the expert witnesses, that all members of this Assembly can be exposed to and ask the necessary questions of so we can get both pros and cons with regard to moving forward in a direction such as this. I think it helps to alleviate the fears and to create possible amendments to improve legislation. By improving the legislation, we make it better for all Albertans, and we can build in Alberta a sense of moving forward together.

Wildrose has had a proud history of offering up solutions to environmental problems and to greening the economy. Wildrose members believe in responsible, fact-based stewardship of the environment, so much so that it is part of our member-driven and member-adopted policies. Taking Bill 20 to committee ensures that this is a fact-based exercise, not just some ideology-driven agenda. I refer back to the very fact that we can as Members of this Legislative Assembly take the information from all sides and from many stakeholders and as individuals and as members representing diverse constituencies throughout Alberta discuss the pros and cons of the directions that are being taken and bring forward legislation that possibly is more robust and that addresses some of the concerns that we would have on this side of the House with regard to the legislation that has been put before us at this time.

Some facts, like Genesee 3, a clean-coal technology, electrical generating station: it is a model of technology that needs to be exported. This type of technology needs to be exported to other jurisdictions – China, Japan, Germany – in order to lower their greenhouse gas emissions, clean up the NO<sub>x</sub> and the SO<sub>x</sub> and particulate matter emissions. I believe that this is one area where Alberta leads in many different aspects of this type of technology, an area where we can export that good knowledge and that good experience to many other jurisdictions throughout the world, that possibly could have a bigger effect on total global greenhouse gas emissions, maybe more so, probably more so, than this taxation policy that this government is proposing to move forward on. China needs technology like Genesee 3 to help clean up their local air quality. Japan and Germany need Genesee 3 technology in order to replace the baseload of electricity being lost as nuclear reactors are shut down.

Natural gas in these countries has to be imported either as LNG, liquefied natural gas, or by pipeline – they can get it by pipeline from less friendly regimes – or a combination of both, but this leaves them in a situation where they are relying on other jurisdictions to fulfill their electricity needs and to make sure that they are in a stable position to move forward with fulfilling the needs that their citizens are looking for.

Madam Speaker, we know that the sun does not always shine and the wind does not always blow. Battery technology is not there yet, and there needs to be a baseload available. Wildrose members want to make sure that an internationally competitive regulatory and fiscal regime that attracts and retains both upstream and downstream investment exists in Alberta. Not only this, but Wildrose members want to ensure that Alberta's standards for CO<sub>2</sub> emissions and pollutants fall in line with national and international standards. Again, Wildrose policy: there we are again, Wildrose members thinking outside the box and knowing that we have to get along with our neighbours in Confederation, with other countries to make a difference in the environment.

This is a big question of the carbon tax and of Bill 20. Are we going to be in line with national and international standards, and if so, will we be able to attract the investment in both upstream and downstream oil and gas development? We do have to recognize the need to be globally competitive, the need to not put our jurisdiction at risk in the ability to compete in the global trading that we are in at this time. We need to be able to have those discussions in an open and transparent way in committee and to be sure that we are not only going down a route that allows us to address greenhouse gas emissions and that type of thing but that we are also addressing the impacts of the taxation that's being proposed and how that possibly will impact our competitiveness, especially if it's not being embraced throughout the world, where our competitors are also producing.

Are we going to be in line with those national and international standards? I would suggest that going to committee will allow us to get the experts in to answer these questions for us, to help us develop legislation so that we'll be sure that we are able to hold the standards on both sides of the equation, that we continue to be competitive and that we continue to address greenhouse gas emissions globally.

There are parts of Bill 20 that play into Wildrose's policy to examine ways to move electricity generation closer to the end user so as not only to improve efficiency and reduce total demand but also to promote and encourage microgeneration of electricity by all parties. This would include industry, microgeneration within industry, individuals that might see an opportunity to have this to help support their electrical needs but then also to sell back into the electrical grid if that can be made possible, and to possibly – I have a long history of involvement in different co-operative movements. Co-ops are a very effective way as a community to come together and to recognize the need for some of this and to embrace these opportunities and to be able to recognize that it's an opportunity that can benefit a whole community.

I think that by referring this to committee, we allow that we can examine some of these Wildrose policies also and see where they can help achieve good results through Bill 20. For these reasons and many others I will be supporting this referral motion and would like to see more committee work being done, where we can, as the Member for Calgary-Hays stated, depoliticize many of these decisions going forward and come to an environment where we can feel that there's been good, wholesome discussion and input from all sides of the House before the legislation comes to this floor and that we have a good understanding of it before we see it come to us as a bill 95 pages long, and we have a week to digest it.

I guess there are a lot of dynamics within the bill with regard to how it affects the day-to-day administration of this taxation and how we do the nitty-gritty, I'm going to say, of the bill. Can we do it in a way that is going to benefit all Albertans? Are we going to be able to benefit the competitive side of individuals in industry as well as do our part to address the greenhouse gas emissions globally?

This is a discussion that needs to be done around the table and as we develop legislation, not after legislation has been developed. I think that all of Alberta is best suited and best served when we are able to do that in a very transparent and open manner in committee, relying on experts and relying on witnesses. Stakeholders will be affected and will have consequences that they will need to try and address in their day-to-day lives.

Thank you for that, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a). The hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Mr. Cooper: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise. I'd like to thank the hon. member for his support of this motion to refer to committee. I know, because he's a good colleague of mine, the importance and the value that the member puts on the feedback of his constituents.

I also appreciate a lot of the work in terms of outreach that the government did prior to writing the bill. They went out and spoke to a lot of Albertans. But there is a significant difference between speaking to Albertans to get their feedback before a piece of legislation is written and then going back out to Albertans and asking: "Is this a reflection? Is this what you were looking for when we came and asked for your feedback? Did we get it right?" The actual feedback from constituents on what is before the Assembly is of critical importance, and I know that the hon. member values that input from his constituents.

This particular piece of legislation, as he mentioned, is some 95 pages, around 100 pages, comes with a royal recommendation, and it was introduced exactly one week ago, on Tuesday, the 24th of May. The government required debate on the bill the day after, so on the 25th and the 26th the bill was debated. Then on the 27th, being Friday, many of us were back in our constituencies. Again, I can only imagine that the hon. member was in his constituency over the weekend.

I just wonder if he would like to provide some comment on whether that's really a sufficient amount of time to discuss a piece of legislation that has major, major, major ramifications for the future of our province in terms of the direct and indirect costs both to families and industry. I wonder if he might provide some comment on whether or not that seems to be a reasonable amount of time or whether sending this bill to committee would then extend that time and allow his constituents to have feedback not only directly to the committee but also directly to him on some of the discussion and debate that might take place at committee.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. van Dijken: Thank you. I want to thank the member for the questions and the opportunity to reflect a little bit on the constituents that have approached me, some of the constituents. They're very involved in the agriculture industry. I myself am a farmer. Many of my neighbours have approached me and others throughout my constituency have approached me with concerns about how the carbon tax is going to affect the inputs that they are faced with in their businesses and how that's going to affect the food production costs in Alberta, whether that be, you know, in the livestock industry, the grain industry, the greenhouse industry.

All farmers, all agriculture rely on energy to actually get their products produced. We have a marked fuel exemption. This is diesel fuel. Gasoline is a very small part of the costs of energy within the agricultural community compared to some of the other inputs that we're going to see rise significantly, I believe, based on this carbon tax. One of the biggest costs in the manufacturing of nitrogen fertilizer is natural gas. When we see that we have natural gas pricing at $2 a gigajoule and that we're going to bring that up by another $1, $1.50, this will have a significant impact on the costs of that nitrogen fertilizer, the production of that nitrogen fertilizer. The fertilizer industry, as they produce this, is also trying to export it onto the world market.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Elbow on the amendment.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I rise to support the motion on the floor, but before I go any further, I want to be really clear with the House, with Albertans that I support action on climate change, significant action on climate change. I believe there's absolutely no question that it is a fact that climate change is real; it is a fact that it is human caused, human exacerbated. I support and I'm on the record as supporting a carbon tax. I'm not sure, however, that I can support this carbon tax. There are far too many questions.

You know, it is interesting. There are two sides of this discussion. We've before us a bill that's 95 pages long, that, as the Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills mentioned, was introduced in this House barely a week ago, but ironically there's actually very little detail in this bill. There's very little information that I feel we don't already know or details we didn't already have laid out in the budget of April 14. We knew there was going to be an energy efficiency agency. We knew there were going to be rebates. We knew there was going to be a carbon tax. We knew what level it was going to be introduced at. We knew when it was going to be introduced and how it was going to be phased in. We knew what was going to be happening with the Climate Change and Emissions Management Corporation. We knew there would be some sort of energy efficiency plan.

But there are no details in this bill, ironically enough. What this bill really does is it gives some legal weight to all of the things we knew were already happening, but there are some very significant gaps in this bill. I'm going to talk through many of those, and I'm going to talk through many of the questions that I have, that my constituents have asked me, that various stakeholders have put out as public feedback. These are questions, I think, that we need to study in more detail in committee or that, at the very least, this government needs to answer in great detail before I can get to a point of feeling like I can support this bill, because the gaps are significant. We're essentially in many ways being asked to sign a blank cheque here, and I'm very uncomfortable with that.

I want to reiterate that the Alberta Party caucus and the Alberta Party have a strong belief that we must address climate change. We are the only party in the Assembly on the opposition side to have proposed our own climate change plan. It's a comprehensive, thorough plan. You can find it on our website. I happen to have several copies here if anyone on either the opposition or the government side... [interjection] I'll ensure that the hon. Member for Calgary-Hays is given a copy. I have many here and am happy to hand them out to anyone.

In all seriousness, we do take this issue very seriously. I believe that addressing climate change is not only a moral imperative for us in the province but, in fact, if done right, is a significant economic opportunity because if there's anything that Alberta does very well, it's innovate. We have remarkable engineers, we have remarkable technical people, we have remarkable finance people, and we have an entrepreneurial culture. All of those things should allow us in this province to prosper greatly by helping the world address climate change and, in so doing, to continue to support our traditional industry in oil and gas. That's the vision. That's what possible from action on climate change, but we need to have the right mechanisms to do that.

There might be some of the right mechanisms in this bill. I don't know because all of the detail is going to be ironed out in regulation. So I have questions. What are the hard targets for carbon emissions? There's been some talk of peaking at a certain point and then starting to reduce over time. What happens if we find that we're not on track with those targets? What happens if we find that we're under those targets? Do we say: well, that's okay; we can approve more projects and increase our emissions? Do we take that as an opportunity? What about the fact that we've had an economic downturn? How does that factor into our carbon calculations? And what's our path to get there? What specifically is going to happen along the way to ensure that we actually reduce those carbon emissions?

What is the dollar value of the new companies and the new jobs that are purportedly going to be created as part of this climate plan? There's a lot of talk, a lot of hand-waving from the government: we're going to create jobs; this is opportunity. How many jobs? What specific areas are those jobs going to be in? What skills are the people who take those jobs going to require? How are we going to ensure that Albertans have the skills to occupy those jobs and that we're not simply importing people from somewhere else? Are those jobs going to be high-paying jobs? Are they going to be low-paying jobs? Are they going to be construction jobs? Are they going to be operational jobs? Are they going to be office jobs? What are they? I've absolutely no idea. There's a vague, general sense that somehow this is going to create jobs, and I don't doubt that action on climate change can create economic opportunity. I need to know: what are those details?

How are we going to pivot our action on climate change and environmental stewardship into market access for pipelines, market access for Alberta's products via pipeline to tidewater? There's talk that this government wants to do that, and that's a great idea. I absolutely and enthusiastically support that. How do we know that this plan has a straight line towards ensuring that we get pipelines built, and what happens if we don't?

You know, we have to do our part in this province. In fact, I'm enthusiastic about the opportunity that action on climate change brings, and I like the idea that there's mention of trade-exposed industries in the Leach report and that this government seems aware that that is a risk. We have to be very careful not to be too far ahead of the rest of the country or the rest of the world. We have to be careful that we don't just displace emissions from Alberta to other jurisdictions, therefore not addressing climate change and having an adverse impact on our provincial economy.

The Edmonton Chamber of Commerce has contemplated this issue, and I will quote from a paper they released on April 5, 2016, entitled Reducing the Burden of the Carbon Tax on Small and Medium-sized Businesses. They say:

If the carbon tax makes Alberta-based businesses un-competitive, those businesses will either lose customers to companies that aren't covered by a carbon tax, or they will relocate to another province or country where there is no carbon tax. This is commonly known as "carbon leakage", and does nothing to help the global fight against climate change.

Now, they propose a solution to this. They propose to provide relief to small and medium enterprises while still incentivizing a decrease in greenhouse gas emissions using an output-based rebate system. That's an interesting idea. Perhaps the mechanism they suggest would be to use an average carbon tax for a particular process. Those companies whose processes would generate a higher level of carbon tax pay over and above the average rate. Those whose processes generate a lower level of carbon tax actually get a rebate. They actually make money from the carbon tax. Now, there are some pros and some cons. There are some consequences of this, both intended and unintended. This is precisely the sort of thing that we can discuss in committee. We can ask stakeholders to come in, we can ask for their input, and we can decide whether or not this actually makes some sense.

They also talk about revenue neutrality. That's something that in the Alberta Party's climate change plan, called Alberta's Contribution, we talk extensively about, the fact that although we support a carbon tax, we believe that it must be revenue neutral, truly revenue neutral. I've never heard the term "revenue recycling" before. That's new. By that definition, revenue recycling would mean that every dollar that's collected via income tax is, quote, unquote, recycled into the economy and is not, in fact, government revenue, that income tax is revenue neutral.

Well, that's silly. Of course, it's not. It's a source of revenue to the government in the same sense that a carbon tax that collects more than it spends is not revenue neutral. That's exactly what this is. So I think it's important that this government be honest with Albertans about what this is. If you feel that you need to collect revenue for certain purposes, be it innovation, be it rebates to Albertans, that's fine. Just be honest with Albertans that that's exactly what you're doing and that's exactly what this is.

The Edmonton Chamber of Commerce talks about revenue neutrality, seeing every dollar collected from small and medium enterprises go back to small and medium enterprises in that industry. They talk about creating carrots and sticks for business.

The most efficient producers would receive more in rebates than they paid in carbon tax, seeing a net benefit . . . The least efficient producers would receive less in rebates than they pay into the tax, realizing a net loss. This creates a strong incentive to produce their goods more efficiently.

Again, there are some consequences of that, I'm sure, both intended and perhaps unintended, but that's absolutely worthy of discussion and further consideration.

11:00

Really, what this government is saying is: "Through Bill 20 we're going to do a bunch of stuff through regulation in these general areas. Trust me. Trust me. It's going to be fine. Wait until you see the regulations. It will be wonderful." I am not comfortable, Madam Speaker, in signing a blank cheque for any government, this government or any other. That's what this Assembly is for. It is for us to consider these ideas.

I want to talk more about revenue neutrality and what it actually means. Kenneth McKenzie, at the University of Calgary School of Public Policy, in April 2016 talked about making the Alberta carbon levy revenue neutral, the basic idea of a price on carbon emissions, which at least partly reflects the social cost of emissions. What I like about a carbon tax – call it a tax or call it a levy, but let's not get stuck on the language – is that we are putting a price on something we don't want. We don't want carbon emissions; therefore, we're going to price that externality. That means that people and businesses will choose to emit less, but it also creates a frame for innovation. If we do that properly, Alberta can lead that innovation, create companies and technologies that we can sell to the rest of the world, therefore diversifying our economy and creating economic activity in Alberta. That's the principle of a carbon tax.

I like that idea in general terms if, in fact, it is revenue neutral. If it is simply a tax grab from the government, then we don't achieve that objective. What we've done is that we've created another revenue line item for the government.

The price on carbon emissions reflecting that social cost in emissions incents firms and individuals to change their behaviour, just like I said, moving towards less-carbon-intensive activities. That's the first view, and that's the view that I'm certainly very supportive of.

[The Speaker in the chair]

There's a second view of a carbon tax, which is that a carbon tax is a broad revenue generation tool just like I said. Professor McKenzie said that this is not a very good, or efficient, way of generating revenue . . . [and that] the basic idea is that the carbon tax is applied to a [far] narrower base than broader-based taxes. Broad based taxes generally impose lower costs on the economy than narrow based taxes [like carbon tax]. Moreover, and I think as important if not more, carbon taxes interact with other taxes in the economy, exacerbating the economic costs associated with those taxes. Those taxes can be quite high, and this is the important and essential point of why revenue neutrality is so, so important. The total cost to the economy of raising an additional $1 in revenue through the corporate income tax ... is $3.79. Raising an additional dollar through personal income tax is $1.71. Professor McKenzie says:

These taxes therefore impose higher costs on the economy than they raise in revenue. Swapping revenue from the carbon levy for these taxes in a revenue neutral [way] would lower these costs, generating a substantial return to the provincial economy relative to other uses.

Now, that's a lot of economics. The bottom line is that corporate income tax is bad. It costs money. If you take the carbon levy, the carbon tax, and use that to offset personal and corporate income tax, that means to reduce personal and corporate income tax.

The other thing that does is that it creates a frame for investment because now Alberta is an even more attractive place to invest. Investors realize that they will pay fewer taxes and therefore realize greater return, therefore invest more money, therefore create more jobs, therefore create more economic activity. That's a good thing. Albertans benefit from their honest effort in the jobs that they take. They receive and get to keep more of their money, and less of it is taxed away, but there's no net revenue loss to the provincial government. That's a good thing.

But that's not what this government has done. Instead, you've chosen to rebate two-thirds. Two-thirds of Albertans, based purely on income, will receive a rebate. It also reduces their incentive to reduce their carbon footprint. That seems to be a bit of an odd trade-off there. If the idea behind a carbon tax is that it costs too much and therefore you make alternative choices, yet on the other hand you're getting a rebate and it therefore doesn't cost you more, will you still make those choices? Now, my economist friends will tell me that those are separate things in theory, and I do understand that. But I can't help but think that if at the end of the day your bank account is no different and you still have not reduced your carbon footprint, have we actually achieved the objective that we set out to achieve?

I have many more questions. I'm going to just keep going here until my time runs out. What is the total cost and benefit? That's not just the total cost but the benefit. I think this government should share with us detailed economic models of not just the cost but the benefits.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The Member for Drumheller-Stettler under 29(2)(a) to the Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Mr. Strankman: Yes. Thanks, Mr. Speaker. My comments are related to the Member for Calgary-Elbow, who makes some very good points. This past winter I spoke at a rural convention for farmers, and what they wanted me to speak to them about was due diligence. The title was due diligence in legislation. When I sat down to make my comments or think about what I was going to present, it struck me that maybe I could change the whole tone or the whole implication of my presentation by changing one word, so from due diligence "in" legislation to due diligence "for" legislation. Just one word, two to three letters, changes the whole implication.

The Member for Calgary-Elbow talked about revenue-neutral tax and also unintended consequences. I was wondering if he could expound as to what he feels are some of the potential unintended consequences of simple, small nuances or words that he has read in this legislation in that regard. It's very important because in this Chamber the actions that we take do have consequences, whether or not they're unintended. So I was wondering if he could expound on some of his perceptions regarding the revenue-neutral tax, as he describes it, and also the potential for unintended consequences.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Member. Well, I'll try my best to answer that question. I actually think that you've hit on an essential point as to why I think it's important that we go to committee. I think we do need to have some more thought about exactly what the consequences of this legislation will be: intended, unintended, positive, and negative. You know, one of the biggest risks here, of course, is that any time we're adding costs either to a household or to a business, the point of doing that is to change behaviour. Well, sorry. Let me flip that around. Perhaps the point of doing that may be to raise revenue, or it may be to reduce carbon emissions. Those are, on the face of it, what we're trying to do.

The unintended consequences may be people or businesses saying: "Well, I'm not going to be in this jurisdiction anymore. I'm going to file my taxes elsewhere." So now you have tax leakage, which is a risk of raising the tax rate. You may have heard of the Laffer curve, which says that if you have a zero per cent tax rate, you're going to collect zero dollars, and if you have a 100 per cent tax rate, you're going to collect zero dollars because there will be no economic activity. Then the bell curve is in the middle and everywhere in between. So on the face of it, maybe, we are trying to reduce carbon emissions: (a) the government is trying to do that, and (b) they're trying to generate some revenue, but (c) the consequence may be that businesses and Albertans choose to operate somewhere else.

Now, the flip side of that is that the outcome may actually be desirable. Alberta never ceases to amaze me in our ability to innovate and adapt. So it is very clear that we should not do nothing. This is absolutely in no way a do-nothing argument. But I believe it's important that this government not see this as an opportunity to grab revenue to put into infrastructure projects that they ought to be putting money into anyway, specifically transit projects, as one example, or things like climate change adaptation type projects, firebreaks, flood mitigation. Those are things the government ought to do. If all you're doing is finding a rather sneaky source of revenue, being a carbon tax, to offset or displace what should be funded as a fundamental core government service, then it's just another tax, and you're not actually achieving what you're trying to achieve.

I do think there's some opportunity here and, in fact, a need to do something. I'm not convinced, but I remain open to being convinced, and I would love to hear from the government side. I am willing to be convinced. I would like to know. Perhaps at second reading or another opportunity – I have many questions here which I will read into the record. I'm happy to talk with any members offline as well about my specific questions.

I encourage everyone to read Alberta's Contribution: The Alberta Party Climate Change Plan because there's some very interesting information in there. Some of it is absolutely consistent with what this government is trying to do; some of it is not. I come back to that essential point that any carbon tax in Alberta must be revenue neutral, and it must be very clearly delineated to Albertans how that is achieved.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

11:10

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other individuals who would like to speak to the amendment? The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'll pick up my piece of paper first. I am pleased to rise today to address the referral amendment to Bill 20, the Climate Leadership Implementation Act. I believe that we need to take some time to consider the parts of this bill. As previous members have stated, it's 95 pages long, there's a great deal in it, and we need to perhaps take the time to pick this apart a little bit, to digest it. Maybe one of the best ways of doing that is to send it to committee, where that committee can do its job, which is to reconsider the parts of this bill and perhaps suggest and make some revisions to parts of this bill that will make it better.

As you go in life, sometimes if you want to understand things, using analogies is good. I would almost take Bill 20 and use an analogy that it's played out in three scenes. In this thing we call life, as actors in this play called life, we have in this bill three scenes. Perhaps we could call this play or the company that we're a part of the theatre of the absurd. This play that we're looking at is dealing with some issues that make you scratch your head and wonder if you really understand what's going on with this bill.

We understand that this bill in the first scene rolls out and tries to enact a carbon tax. Many have spoken eloquently in this House about the impact that this carbon tax will have on the lives of Albertans and on the tax-paying citizens and the businesses of this province. This first scene sets out who will receive consumer rebates and who will not, who will be the winners and who will be the losers in this NDP carbon tax roulette that we see happening in this play, in this scene. I would suggest that perhaps a legislative committee would do a good job of reviewing who those winners and who those losers should be, if any.

You know, one of the concerns that I think we really should have – I believe it's part 1, section 6 – is with the locomotive carbon levy, or tax. This tax, by any other name, is going to be applied to locomotive diesel. I don't think it takes many of us very long to realize that the locomotives and the rail industry in this province are essential for the transportation of all goods from food to parts to technology of all sorts. We depend on our rail to deliver large amounts of goods cheaply to consumers. How can you expect to place a carbon tax on locomotive diesel without, Mr. Speaker, seeing everything that we purchase go up in price? I would suggest that perhaps a committee could review the wisdom of just that one example of a carbon tax that we find in this piece of legislation.

In this play of life that we are established in, there's a second scene. In this second scene of this Bill 20 we see that it's called the Energy Efficiency Alberta Act and that it's going to create this agency. This agency has great intentions. You know, as we begin to build the tension in our play, as we begin to look at the conflicts that are in this scene, we see that this agency is almost like the character that wears the white hat and is going to come to the rescue. It's there to raise awareness regarding energy use. It's going to look at the environmental consequences of the climate leadership plan and the economy in this province. It's there to design and deliver programs related to energy efficiency, conservation, develop microgeneration and small-scale energy use. It's there to promote energy efficiency. These are all, in many ways, very good things.

This corporation is going to be able, like so many of the good guys in the films that we watch, to do this with very few resources. They'll MacGyver it to be able to come up with the final great solution. Well, I look forward to seeing how this corporation with a $170 million budget in annual loans and grants will be able to support the energy efficiencies and the microgeneration and the conservation and the ability to overcome the incredible costs that the first scene in our play has created through its carbon tax. I would look forward to seeing how this agency will have the ability to find the billions of dollars in efficiencies and in savings that will supposedly make this carbon tax revenue neutral or allow businesses not to be negatively affected or consumers not to be negatively affected by the costs of these taxes that they are placing on all Albertans.

I would suggest that it might be worthy of sending this bill to committee to research and to consult and to create a clear picture of how this agency is going to move forward. Just how is it going to be able to find the energy efficiencies and the cost savings that these characters in our play are going to need to be able to find if they are indeed going to be the good guys?

Scene 3 rounds out this amateur production by altering the mandate of the Climate Change and Emissions Management Corporation from using industry-accepted, rigorous standards of research and development to replacing that with feel-good education initiatives and outreach initiatives. We are just a little concerned. Perhaps a committee would be capable of laying some of those concerns aside.

To say that Albertans are concerned about this carbon bill is an understatement. I've heard many people refer to this as the most ill-conceived bill that this government has yet put before the House. It follows, in their minds, the same pattern of a lack of consultation with Albertans. There's been a lack of time for proper debate in this House, and it justifies Albertans' concerns that this government is – how do we say it? – not sticking to the script that Albertans would like to see followed and not even sticking to the script that this government campaigned on.

I spoke earlier to this House about the problem, I believe, from the get-go that this government has with this bill. Because it did not campaign on it, it lacks the legitimacy. It does not lack the power. It has a majority. It has the power to pass this bill, but does it really have the legitimacy to take something as important as this bill and bring it before this House when it hasn't campaigned on it?

We've heard that people are concerned. It would be my suggestion to this Legislature that if there is a concern with legitimacy – and I believe that there is – by sending this to committee, by bringing Albertans to talk to this bill to provide consultation and review of the 95 pages of the portions of this bill, this committee would actually allow the government to be able to come back to this House and say: "You know what? We've talked to Albertans now, we've brought them into this committee, we've exhaustively looked at the parts of this bill, and now we can legitimately have the right to be able to introduce this to the House with the expectation that Albertans have had a say."

You know, the minister has proclaimed in question period time and again that the economy-destroying taxes that are outlined in scene 1 will be offset by the efficiencies, the energy efficiencies, the green efficiencies, that will be found and that will be fostered by the new agency in scene 2, that the seniors and the hospitals and the health care system and the schools and the school boards, the students won't be negatively affected by the increased costs that will inevitably be placed on them by this bill, that they will be able to find efficiencies that will offset those burdens. I've listened to the Minister of Education; I've listened to the minister of environment. Both with great sincerity tell me that the expenses for heating will be offset by the efficiencies that will be built into schools.

I'd like to see the studies. I believe a committee would be the appropriate place to place those studies, allow the members of this Legislative Assembly to review that information. I could be wrong. I don't want my wife to hear that, but I could be wrong. Maybe there are those kinds of efficiencies out there, but the point is that this government has not done its job in showing us that there are or that there is a reasonable chance of there being those kinds of efficiencies.

I have a very serious concern. I'm very skeptical, I guess I should say, that $170 million in annual grants and subsidies is going to be able to offset the billions of dollars of increased costs that these taxes will bring to hospitals and schools boards and seniors and to all Albertans as they struggle through an economy that is stretching all of us. I think that until you can show me differently, this is simply a monumental tax grab, a PST by any other name, that is not revenue neutral but is designed to try to manipulate businesses and Albertans into a view that many of them would not support.

You know, stage makeup can only go so far, Mr. Speaker. It can only do so much. Dye can only take this old, grey beard and make it black for so long, can only cover up the bald spots that are coming on the top of my head.

Mr. Eggen: You can get a hat.

Mr. Smith: You can get a hat. You know, you can only do so much to make this persona look any better than it already does. You know, you've got what you've got, and you've got what God gives you, okay?

Stage makeup can only go so far in covering up the basic flaws that we all have. In this bill so much bafflelegab can only go so far to try to cover up the basic flaws and the miscalculations and the outrageous assumptions that undermine this bill. I think as a Legislature we await further details on the forecast costs of this agency.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Under 29(2)(a), the Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I enjoyed that speech, and I have to say that I'm encouraged to see that the member is concerned about where Alberta is going and that we are actually seeing that the government is bringing forward taxes that are not revenue neutral and that these taxes are going to be weighing down our entire public service. Now, the right answer would be to hear from that public service, from the school boards. I would like to hear the member's thoughts on bringing this to committee and bringing forward a collection of school boards to discuss how this will impact them. Their input would be important in this.

Thank you.

Mr. Smith: Thank you to the member for his question. I was half expecting a question that would ask me how I can do such a good job of making this visage a little bit more presentable to the public, but I would be glad to address the member's question with regard to the impact of these taxes on schools, school boards, all of Albertans for that matter. There is absolutely no doubt that this carbon tax is going to be making absolutely everything that we purchase across this province by all strata of the population more expensive.

The goal may be a laudable goal, and I don't argue the goal at all, to reduce, to cut 20 megatonnes of emissions by 2020 and 50 megatonnes of emissions by 2030, a laudable goal. I don't argue that at all. I support it. Most Albertans, I think, are asking: but is this the plan that will do that and do that efficiently and effectively in a way that doesn't hurt them so badly that they can't afford this new tax even though the goal is laudable?

You know, beginning in 2017, Albertans will pay an additional 4.5 cents per litre of gasoline, and on top of that there'll be another 2.5 cents per litre tax in 2018. Now, I realize that not everybody is where my family is at right now, but I've got three university-aged kids: one that can't afford to have a car and uses public transportation to get around, one that hasn't been able to afford to buy a car and has to depend on friends, and a third that has a rundown, old beater that he's not going to know how he's going to put the gas in the tank when these new taxes come to play. It's maybe not a serious problem for the members that sit here, where we get paid really well. We'll all be able to afford to put gas in. As a matter of fact, we can even use a government credit card to put that gas in the tanks. But for a kid like my son: how is he going to be able to afford that?

Similarly, natural gas will increase by a dollar per gigajoule and by another 51 cents per gigajoule the year after that. Diesel is going to increase 5 cents per litre in January and then 8 cents per litre the following year. How is this going to impact businesses? That's what a committee could do. It could start to visit and revisit the consequences that these taxes are going to have to this economy.

11:30

One of the members stood up and talked about the bureaucracy of having to collect all these taxes, that the costs for that are nowhere outlined in this bill. Nowhere do we know what the consequences to the size of government are going to be or the increased taxes that we're going to have to pay in order to pay for those bureaucrats. Perhaps a committee could look into that concern and come back to us.

You know, one of the concerns that I have . . . [The time limit for questions and comments expired]

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other individuals wishing to speak to amendment REF1? The Member for Highwood.

Mr. W. Anderson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to speak to the referral motion. You know, the other day I was listening with interest to the Minister of Environment and Parks when she commented when she introduced Bill 20 for second reading. I found the comments fascinating, particularly her explanation of how the carbon tax, or the levy, would be imposed. I think I'll quote it. "As high in the fuel distribution or supply chain as is administratively feasible." Okay. She went on to explain that "a refinery will remit the levy to [the] government on fuel sales and then recover the levy from retail gas stations, who recover it from consumers."

That's interesting, Mr. Speaker. I find it interesting because this government has been very, very skittish about using the nomenclature that gives the slightest impression that the Climate Leadership Implementation Act introduces a new tax on Albertan families. For some reason or another, I fathom – and it must be at least something to do with the fact that all the folks they hired from out of the province have been advising the members opposite: don't call it a tax – instead, they continue to refer to it as a carbon levy. Okay. Well, I took the liberty of looking up the word "levy" in the dictionary. Lo and behold, what it says is that, quote: a levy is the imposing or collecting of a tax by authority or force or the conscription of troops. End of quote. That was interesting. While I've read the bill front to back at least twice, I can't find a single reference to the conscription of any troops. So I think I'm safe in assuming that the government is using the term “levy” to refer to, and I quote: imposing or collecting of a tax. End quote.

Now, I don’t think the members opposite believe that Albertans are dim witted. I certainly don’t believe that, and I know that my Official Opposition colleagues don’t believe that. As I said, I don’t think the members opposite believe that either, so let’s stop trying to be cute, and let’s call it what it is. It’s a tax. Plain and simple.

Those following along at home can probably see why I found it so interesting that the minister was so open – or should I say cavalier? – when discussing how the carbon tax would be applied and who would ultimately bear the responsibility when it comes to paying this new tax. As I mentioned earlier, the minister during her introduction of the bill said, “The end result is that the levy will be introduced in the price paid by consumers.” For whatever reason, the members opposite refuse to call it a tax. I have no issue admitting, proudly, I might add, that it’ll be paid for by consumers through higher prices for everything they consume.

“Consumers.” That’s an interesting word chosen by the minister. The dictionary defines it as, quote: a person or thing that uses a commodity or service. End of quote. I think it is natural for us to initially see consumers solely as individuals within the economy making purchases and being impacted by the increase in prices. We forget that “consumers” can also refer to an organization such as a restaurant, a convenience store, or even a homeless shelter or a charity. Unfortunately, the proposed carbon tax doesn’t differentiate between either.

When it comes to individual consumers and the yearly cost of their fuel and their vehicles, according to Transport Canada the average Albertan pays $1,629 per year for gasoline. With the carbon tax the average Albertan can expect to pay $1,704 in 2017 and $1,741 in 2018.

According to Alberta Energy the average Alberta household uses 120 gigajoules of natural gas every year. The average Alberta household can expect to see their yearly natural gas increase $121 by 2017 and $182 by 2018.

The cost of driving the kids to hockey practice, Girl Guides, karate, or any other lessons has gotten more expensive because of this government’s carbon tax. The cost of heating your home has gotten more expensive because of this government’s carbon tax.

Now, when you consider the organizational consumers, the cost of heating a restaurant, a convenience store, shelters, or anything else is going to increase substantially. In the case of a convenience store or restaurant they have some level of choice in how they want to pay for their increased heating. They can pass the cost on to their consumers, or they can cut their services. Maybe they can cut their hours of operation, or they can lay off staff. When it comes to the homeless shelter, they don’t have much choice. They don’t have a paying customer, and at the end of the line they provide a free service. Their only option in this case is to cut services. Either they lay off staff or they reduce the number of beds or whatever the case may be.

At the end of the day, this government is increasing the cost of everything for everyone. The minister made that point crystal clear. This carbon tax is set to increase the cost of heating and powering our children’s schools. As a consumer of energy what are the schools going to do in order to offset these costs? The government talks about its commitment to cutting school fees out of one side of their mouth while introducing a new carbon tax on schools that will ultimately result in increased school fees for parents.

This government assures Albertans that as long as they make less than $47,500 per year, they’ll get a rebate to offset the increase in their costs due to the carbon tax. What the government fails to mention is that the credits are offset to direct costs of the carbon tax, that being the increase in natural gas and gasoline taxes. They fail to include the indirect costs, where the majority of consumers will see most of their costs increase. This bill is ill conceived and further exacerbates the hit that Albertans are facing in a slowed economy.

Sending this bill back to committee can have a lot of value. What I mean by that is that you can bring in levels of expertise to go over the details and the specifics. None of this has been quantified or qualified. In the private sector if you want people to invest in you, you have to ask for people to invest in you and you have to be able to provide specific returns on their investment. Nowhere have I seen any cost-benefit analysis done on this bill.

Nowhere is there any example of any success in any other jurisdiction in Canada nor in North America, where this bill is going to take effect. They talk about the carbon footprint being reduced by 20 to 30 megatonnes, in reality no carbon-neutral tax but 20 to 30 megatonnes in three to five years in Alberta. Yet in British Columbia, where this revenue-neutral tax has been implemented, they’ve only reduced their carbon footprint by two to three megatonnes. What makes this bill so special? Ten times the reduction in carbon footprint: how do you qualify that? Where are the specifics?

If we send this bill back to committee, it gives us an opportunity to bring in levels of expertise. We can look over the specifics and look at a true cost-benefit analysis for all Albertans. What’s in it for them if they invest in this? What’s in it for them? They don’t know what the true cost is to taxpayers.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Any questions for the Member for Highwood under 29(2)(a)? The Member for Barrhead-Morinville-Westlock.

Mr. van Dijken: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I’d like to ask the member what his views are with regard to, possibly, the increased cost to our food production in Alberta and how that might impact our ability to compete globally, if the cost benefit will be able to be recouped by these food producers.

I know I talked earlier with regard to nitrogen fertilizers and natural gas being the largest component of producing nitrogen fertilizer. When we see that we’re going to add a dollar per gigajoule to natural gas on January 1, 2017, and then $1.50 in 2018, these are very large increases when we consider that the price of natural gas today is around $2 a gigajoule.

We’re also going to see that where we use natural gas to dry our crops, whether that’s the forage industry – I have an alfalfa plant in my constituency. They’re very concerned about this. They harvest the alfalfa and put it through large dryers in order to be able to make a product that they can export and sell to the Asian market primarily. This is going to have a serious impact on their operations, possibly serious enough that it could shut that plant down. I use natural gas for drying my crops through grain drying, and this extra tax is going to affect the ability to have my products put into storage in a way that they will continue to stay and be able to store them until such time that they’re being sold.

11:40

The concern is that we are adding costs into food production that is sold not only within Alberta. We have to compete throughout the world. We have greenhouses that use a lot of natural gas, and we have greenhouses that are shutting down based on the fact that they are being taxed higher on their input costs. If the member could reflect a little bit on when he talks about net return, what’s in it for those greenhouses, for those agricultural producers.

The Speaker: Thank you.

The hon. member.

Mr. W. Anderson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thanks to the member for the question. What's interesting is that he mentions greenhouses. In my own constituency once this carbon tax comes into effect, several greenhouses are now considering shutting down their facilities and moving outside the province. It's sad to see that happen. These are great constituents and hard-working individuals. They've hired several people, and now those individuals potentially could be out of work.

Moreover, several transportation industries are located in my constituency as well. What I've noticed in talking to several of the executives there is that they realize the cost of diesel tax for them is going to be horrendous, and they're planning on laying off more people now as a result of this. It's just not something that I think anybody has thought out.

When I talk about return on investment, what I mean is that, you know, in a cost-benefit analysis if you go out into the investment community and you request capital for any sort of expansion, as I've done in my past business, they expect you to come up with physical assets to offset that debt load but, moreover, a forecast of what the true return on investment is. Fortunately, I had a chance to take one of my companies public at one time, and when I did, I had to go through a lot of scrutiny regarding the physical assets in the corporation, projected sales, long-term contracts, and the development of my expansion strategy into the U.S. market.

When I received my capital and took out my first IPO, it was quite a challenge because at that time another company called Bre-X was on the market, and Bre-X was offering a 25 per cent return on investment based on some spectacular gold investment in the Philippines. My return on investment was around 6 to 8 per cent, very conservatively, of course, and we developed that strategy and we moved forward. We had several investors say: we're not going to invest with you; we're going to invest with Bre-X because it's such a wonderful opportunity. And I said: well, consider the source of the information. They had a science-based, fact-based organization that said that there was so much . . . [The time limit for questions and comments expired] I apologize.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members who wish to speak to the amendment? The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake. I'm advised, hon. member, that you've already spoken.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to amendment REF1?

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Tuesday, May 31, 2016

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Good afternoon. It's a beautiful, sunny day out there. I know we would all prefer to be out there in the sun, but since the sun is out there, I'm sure that all of you will help make this a sunny place together.

Please be seated.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Peace River.

Ms Jabbour: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As always, I'm thrilled to have visitors from my amazing, wonderful, fabulous constituency of Peace River. Today I have a school group from Good Shepherd school. There are 37 in all, led by – I'm going to say the names, and I'll ask them all to stand – teacher Mr. Terry Hogan and parent helpers Mrs. Christine Bowman, Mrs. Tamara Belzile, Mr. Jason Penner, Mr. John Kuran, and Mrs. Courtney Brown. Would the class please all rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Greenway.

Mr. Gill: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would like to introduce to you and through you to all members of this Assembly 75 grade 6 students from Monterey Park school in Calgary-Greenway. They are joined by their teachers, Mrs. Heather Kis, Mr. David Ellen, Mrs. Laura Tennesco, and Miss Rita Kohli, and parent volunteers. These teachers and parent volunteers do great and amazing work at the elementary school. I would ask them to rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Hon. members, are there any other school groups today?
Seeing none, the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Dr. Turner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a real honour for me today to be able to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly the grandparents of two of our current pages, Azan and Samir Esmail. Joining us today in the Speaker's gallery are Khatoon and Haider Esmail and Shelly and Firoz Charania as well as our pages' mother, Yasmina Esmail. All of them came to Canada as refugees from Uganda in 1972. Khatoon and Haider moved to Edmonton from Winnipeg in 1994 and currently reside in the beautiful riding of Edmonton-Whitemud. Shelly and Firoz have lived in Edmonton-Castle Downs since their arrival in Edmonton in 1977. They are here today to observe Azan and Samir in their roles as pages in the Assembly. I would ask them to please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this House.

The Speaker: Welcome. As a grandparent I can feel the pride that you feel for these children.

The Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would like to introduce to you and through you to the members of the Assembly two very important teams from my department as well as one of my very valued stakeholders. They are the MGA review team, the legislative projects team as well as the president of AAMD and C. Since 2013 the MGA review team has worked tirelessly to consult with Albertans on the Municipal Government Act. They conducted numerous consultation sessions across the province and gathered feedback from approximately 1,500 people at 77 community meetings. The legislative projects team worked with the incredibly dedicated group at the Legislative Counsel office to turn the policies we talked about during the MGA review into the act that will be introduced today. They've worked tremendously hard to develop this legislation and made sacrifices along the way to meet goals and timelines.

Mr. Speaker, I've been continuously impressed by the work that these two groups along with the entire Municipal Affairs staff have done on the MGA. As well, I want to thank Al Kemmere from the AAMD and C for all his hard work on the MGA review. We wouldn't be moving forward today without the valued contributions of both the AAMD and C as well as AUMA, who couldn't be here today. I would ask that Al along with Karen Pottruff, Jeremy Schiff, Katie Nault, Linda Lewis, Angela Markel, if she managed to make it; Laura Klassen Bullock; Abdel Ahmed; Ida Dei; Men Yi Leong; Alex Nnamonu – and if I really did not get your name right, my apologies – Erin Foster-O'Riordan; Michelle Freethy, if she managed to come; Melinda Steenbergen, who's my ministerial adviser, along with little Mr. Jasper, who came with her; and Brandy Cox from cabinet co-ordination receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Thank you. Welcome.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my honour to rise and introduce to you and through you to members of the Assembly Sandy Simmie. Sandy is from Stony Plain. She is a keen organizer for the Alberta Party in Stony Plain, in Edmonton, and, in fact, for the entire province. Sandy was instrumental in helping us at our recent policy convention this past weekend. If I can ask Sandy to please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Stony Plain.

Ms Babcock: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise today and introduce to you and through you to all members of this Assembly Mr. Bill Almdal and Fangfang. Bill is a true community leader in Stony Plain. He is the president of Almdal Consultants, a Rotary member, involved with NeighbourLink, and incredibly gracious. Fangfang is on the Rotary youth exchange from Thailand this year and is attending Memorial composite high school in Stony Plain, and I hear she is very beloved by the other students. I'm pleased that they're here to join us today, and I would ask that they receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Loyola: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my honour to rise today and introduce to you and through you to all the members of the Assembly the Vaisakhi Nagar Kirtan committee, whose hard work I'll be speaking about more in my member's statement later this afternoon. Joining us in the public gallery above me are Pal Singh Purewal, chairman of the committee; Sakattar Singh Sandhu; Baldev Singh Sandhu; Davinder Singh Bains; Mehar Singh Gill; Gurcharan Singh Sangha; Harpreet Singh Gill; Charanjit Singh Dakha; Bahadur Singh Bahra; Harkamalpreet Singh Panesar; Inderjeet Singh Viridi; Parminder Singh Viridi; Sohan Singh Grewal; and Nirpal Singh Sall. I'd ask all my guests to now rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Minister of Indigenous Relations.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am pleased to rise today to introduce to you and through you Ako Ngu. Ako is a student in the NorQuest social work diploma program who is completing her practicum at the Edmonton-Rutherford constituency office. She's been a valuable member of our team, and in her time with us has put emphasis on ensuring that our services are easily accessible to constituents whose first language is not English. She is excited to learn about the strong link between social work and politics, and we welcome her. Accompanying Ako today is Vicki Anderson, who was previously introduced to the House as a caseworker for the Edmonton-Rutherford constituency. I would ask that they rise and receive the warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Economic Development and Trade.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly a distinguished guest from the Socialist Republic of Vietnam, Consul General Mr. Pham Manh Hai. He is accompanied today by his colleague Mr. Nguyen Manh Hung, head of consular section, consulate general of the Socialist Republic of Vietnam in Vancouver. Mr. Hai is visiting Alberta to build on the growing relationship between Alberta and Vietnam, which spans trade and investment to strong cultural ties.

1:40

Mr. Speaker, approximately 32,000 Albertans are of Vietnamese descent. Their heritage adds to the dynamic and diverse culture we enjoy here in the province. Beyond those close community ties, Vietnam is also a growing trade partner. We have exported significant agriculture and agrifood products and are well positioned to provide significant energy services and equipment to this emerging energy producer. We are honoured to have Mr. Hai, an accomplished career diplomat, as consul general. I would ask him and Mr. Manh Hung to rise and accept the warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Members' Statements

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Vaisakhi Nagar Kirtan

Loyola: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to recognize the organizers of the recent Vaisakhi Nagar Kirtan, a procession held annually in south Edmonton in the constituencies of Edmonton-Mill Woods and Edmonton-Ellerslie. I'd also like to thank the broader Sikh community of Alberta who host the Nagar Kirtan not only in Edmonton but also in Calgary every year. The Nagar Kirtan is an important tradition commemorating special occasions in the Sikh calendar.

Traditionally the procession is led by the saffron-robed Panj Pyare, who are the spiritual and temporal embodiment of the collective Sikh community. They are followed by the Guru Granth Sahib, the holy scripture, which is placed on a float. Commonly members of the procession are unshod in deference to the displayed scripture. Bystanders bow their heads to the holy scripture as it passes. They also receive food and candied sweets from the floats. The procession concludes at the gurdwara with prayers.

I'm always encouraged when hearing the three pillars of the Sikh faith: to constantly remember the oneness that unites us all, to work with integrity while earning an honest living, and to share our wealth with all those in the broader community. Mr. Speaker, it is the sharing of our cultures that makes Alberta a great place to call home. As a Canadian not born in Canada I give thanks that we have a culture of respect and understanding.

Mr. Speaker, as we walked in the procession wearing orange head scarves with the rain pouring down from the sky, I thought of the cultural diversity that we all share here. If we dig deeper into the cultural identity of all who call Alberta home, we discover that we have much more in common than we have in difference. The diversity of perspectives helps us to strengthen the values we hold in common, values such as dedication to one's family, profession, and community, while at the same time being compassionate to those in need. We are stronger when we are united.

I thank the organizers of the Nagar Kirtan for sharing their values with us, values that we hold in common as we continue to build Alberta together.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Drumheller-Stettler.

Hand Hills Lake Stampede Centennial

Mr. Strankman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm proud to be a farmer. The second Friday in June used to be a designated holiday recognizing Farmer's Day. Agriculture is the second-largest industry in Alberta, and it's the lifeblood of many Albertan communities. Producers know how to work, but they know how to have fun, too, when the time comes. For many Albertans there's nothing more fun than the sport of rodeo.

This weekend, on June 3, 4, and 5, the Hand Hills Lake Stampede will be holding their 100th anniversary annual rodeo. Located in the picturesque Hand Hills, the community comes together, as they have for a century now, to celebrate one of Alberta's signature rodeo events. In 1917 Jack J. Miller organized the inaugural rodeo as a fundraiser for the Red Cross to aid in their effort during World War I. Since that time Mr. Miller's fundraiser has become a legacy that is still growing strong an amazing 100 years later.

This event is only made possible thanks to volunteers, spectators, and participants, who step up year after year to make this event possible. Alberta is all about the families and friends who work together to keep a legacy from the past alive for the future.

Like so many of the small community events across the province, the Hand Hills Lake Stampede has become an important part of Delia in Alberta's history. As we all know, it's our unique western culture and heritage that draws people from around the world to Alberta and further enriches our lives with this important connection to our history and roots. It will be my great honour to participate in their parade taking place this weekend.

Please join me in wishing the organizers, competitors, and spectators all the best as we continue to celebrate the legacy started by Jack J. Miller a century ago.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Alberta Heritage Savings Trust Fund

Mr. Ellis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Two weeks ago our Progressive Conservative caucus toured the Li Ka Shing centre for health research, a world-class facility, where renowned cancer researchers are refining life-saving cell transplant surgery. We were proud to learn about the state-of-the-art centre and the globe-leading professionals it has attracted to our province. When one of the scientists told us that the heritage fund is the reason for the centre's existence, I felt a surge of pride for a government that had the vision to create this kind of fund. Then I grew concerned because I'm all too aware that many people have misrepresented the heritage fund. So let me offer some facts to clear up the record.

Alberta's heritage fund was always used to invest in Alberta for Albertans. Revenues earned by the fund were invested in many ways, including to develop projects like the Li Ka Shing centre for health research innovation, the University hospital, the Tom Baker cancer centre, and Kananaskis Country, and the list goes on and on and on. Today these quality-of-life investments that exist all around us continue to provide value and have helped keep Alberta's taxes low. And there's more, including millions of dollars in endowment funds to support medical research, educational scholarships, addiction programs, energy research, and much, much, much more.

It is provincial lore that Premier Lougheed had the vision to establish our fund and set Alberta on a course that has earned envy around the world. This is not a myth; this is the truth. As a member of the heritage trust fund committee I will guard against misrepresentations that can be used to change the fund's course. Mr. Speaker, the $18 billion in this fund today belongs to Albertans. They need to know that its true worth over the decades has been much, much more, and they need to value it accordingly. I hope to help them do that.

Thank you, sir.

Climate Change

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, our Official Opposition has a difficult relationship with the truth about climate change. Their leader would have Albertans believe that their party has finally accepted that the planet is warming and that just maybe humans have something to do with it, or at least that's what gets said on camera. But outside this House members opposite continue to peddle conspiracy theories claiming that climate change is a hoax.

Recently the Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo retweeted a video claiming the multitrillion-dollar global climate change scam. When questioned on this, he stated that he's simply in the middle of the road on the issue. Well, Mr. Speaker, perhaps it's time he crossed over because 95 per cent of scientists are on the other side.

It seems that our opposition wants to have it both ways. It seems that despite what they've been told to say, in their heart of hearts many of the members opposite still don't believe climate change is real, and that just gets the better of them sometimes, like the members for Cypress-Medicine Hat, Airdrie, and Barrhead-Morinville-Westlock, who've happily retweeted the so-called Friends of Science, an organization that supported a declaration saying that there's no convincing evidence that the CO<sub>2</sub> from modern industrial activity has or will cause climate change and, instead, places blame for climate change on the sun. On the sun, Mr. Speaker. With friends like those, who needs enemies?

Meanwhile the Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake has posted articles arguing that global temperatures are cooling and ice caps growing while the Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner has posted articles disputing the reality of man-made climate change. Perhaps he feels that polar bears are too entitled.

Mr. Speaker, man-made climate change is real. As the opposition leader has stated, it "is, indeed, one of the biggest threats to our environment, to our people and to the future of our earth." I hope he shares the concerns of myself and many Albertans that members of his caucus continue to use their positions to promote conspiracy theorists and climate change deniers, behaviour which will only ensure that Alberta is mocked and vilified while facing more roadblocks to diversifying and supporting our energy industry.

Our government stands with science. Our climate leadership plan will reduce emissions and protect Albertans' health. We're moving Alberta forward. Let's hope the opposition stops holding us back.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Red Deer-South.

Canadian Hockey League Memorial Cup

Ms Miller: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As many of my colleagues in this House know, last week the Memorial Cup championship was held for the first time in Red Deer. It was last held in Alberta 42 years ago. This was an amazing event which would not have been the huge success it was without Red Deer's amazing volunteers. Over this last week I fielded many questions from people wanting to know: why was the military present at every game, and why did the cup get flown in on military helicopters? So I'm going to give you all a little history lesson on the Memorial Cup.

The Memorial Cup is the junior hockey trophy awarded by the Canadian Hockey League following a four-team round robin tournament between the host team and the winners of the WHL, the OHL, and the QMJHL. Next year the cup will be held in Windsor, Ontario, and hosted by the Windsor Spitfires.

Donated by the Ontario Hockey Association in 1919, the trophy was originally known as the OHA Memorial Cup. The Memorial Cup was proposed by Captain James T. Sutherland, the president of the OHA, who was serving overseas in France. He submitted the idea to present a trophy to honour two of Kingston's greatest hockey stars, who died in World War I – Alan Scotty Davidson, lost in battle in 1915, and Captain George T. Richardson, killed in action in 1916 – and all the other Canadian hockey players who died in battle.

The trophy was designed and then dedicated to honour all the soldiers who died fighting for Canada in the war. During the 2010 tournament it was rededicated to honour all soldiers who died fighting for Canada in any conflict. For almost 100 years the military have been acknowledged for their sacrifices with this trophy.

Through the generosity of some very special organizations in Red Deer I was able to spend . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

Carbon Levy

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We know the NDP carbon tax is going to take a heavy toll on core services Albertans rely on, all so the government can fill its carbon tax slush fund. It's been well documented that many things, including heat and transportation, will cost our health care facilities millions more after this new tax comes into effect, costs that would otherwise go into hiring front-line workers or delivering critical patient health care. Why is this government putting millions of dollars away from critical health care services under the guise of the new NDP carbon tax?

Ms Hoffman: Honestly, Mr. Speaker, nothing could be further from the truth. We are the government that actually campaigned on protecting public health care, on protecting education and funding it accordingly while other parties were proposing massive cuts. We also said that we take climate change seriously. We know that members opposite continue to perpetuate misinformation about climate change not being man-made. It is man-made. We respect the scientists and the children of this province, and that's why we're moving forward on making sure that we can be proud and that our world can be here for future generations.

Mrs. Aheer: Future generations are exactly what we're concerned about on this side of the House.

This government said that it would stand up for education, but this new carbon tax only hurts schools and students. Like in Health, this carbon tax will cost our school boards millions of dollars just in heating and transportation costs alone, costs that will either be passed along to parents in the form of new fees or taken from students in the form of cuts to services like arts and lunch programs. Why is this government putting this carbon tax above the needs of students and parents?

The Speaker: The Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. We have an Official Opposition that is constantly advocating for significant cuts, cuts that would actually negatively impact the children and the very schools that we're standing up for. Albertans will benefit from the climate leadership plan through programs like energy efficiency, and we want Albertans to know that they can be a part of the solution and that that's how they can also lower their carbon prices. Certainly, we're proud of the possibilities that we have moving forward and of the investments that we will be making to support the very schools that the members claim to care about.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Only a small portion of this tax is going to end up in the hands of Albertans, and meanwhile this new $3 billion tax will put millions of dollars away from services that actually help Albertans on a daily basis, services like PDD care, policing, road maintenance, just to name a few. Funds directed to these important public services will actually be funnelled back into this government's carbon tax slush fund. How can the Premier justify compromising the quality of core services by sending precious dollars from the front line into the climate fund?

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, just another math lesson. Two-thirds of Alberta families are going to benefit from a direct rebate. That is a significant number of Alberta families that will be benefiting. The opposition likes to pretend that they're arguing about these little things when the truth is that we all know that they are continuing to question the science. They want to bury their head in the sand and pretend that they can continue with the ways of the past. Our children, our scientists, our families expect more from their government. They expect leadership, and that's what they've got.

The Speaker: I want to urge the House again to control the volume. The hon. Member for Livingstone-Macleod.

Public Service Size

Mr. Stier: Mr. Speaker, these NDP risky economic policies are compounding the effects of low oil prices, and businesses and workers are paying the price. Everywhere you look, businesses are cutting back their hours, laying off their staff, or finding new ways to reduce their costs. Meanwhile in government times have never been better. In fact, this government added over 1,413 jobs since being elected. Albertans understand that times are tough, and they're making the hard choices to get by. Why isn't this government doing the same?

Ms Hoffman: Thank you for the question. Mr. Speaker, I think Alberta families are very proud of the fact that we've hired teachers, educational assistants, health care staff. That's what Albertans voted for, and that's what they're getting. There have been 257 full-time equivalents added across government, very different from the number mentioned by the member opposite. That's because we're investing in an office for Status of Women and a climate change office, facts that we know are very important to moving our society forward, and I will not apologize for that.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Stier: Again, Mr. Speaker, thank you. The Premier was already running the most expensive government in all of Canada. Now she's making the same government even bigger and more expensive by hiring 3,260 more full-time equivalents in the '16-17 calendar year. Last year the Alberta economy shrank by 4 per cent, and a hundred thousand taxpaying Albertans lost work in the private sector, all while yet more manager positions were added to the government payroll. Will the Premier commit to putting an end to bloated ranks of managers and only hire when it's necessary for front-line workers?

The Speaker: The Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much. Mr. Speaker, 3,013 front-line workers for universities, colleges, school boards, and AHS were hired because this government was elected and the cuts being proposed by the members opposite did not go ahead. We also have invested in economic development and economic diversification, the status of women, and climate change, three priorities we know that the Official Opposition is not keen on because what they want to do is to sit on their hands and pretend that the ways of the past are somehow going to bring us forward. Albertans voted for change, and this is exactly how we're delivering.

Mr. Stier: Well, Mr. Speaker, people are losing work. When they look to this government for support, they're told to go somewhere else, to apply for EI, or to wait for one of their many failed job-subsidy programs to stick, unless, that is, they possess the NDP world view. Then there's a cushy job waiting for them in the government. In reality, Albertans are bracing for yet another year of economic contraction. To the Premier: will your government face the facts and realize that fiscal restraint and managerial hiring freezes are absolutely necessary when Albertans are losing work and businesses are suffering?

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, we have demonstrated fiscal restraint. Hiring positions needs to be approved by the deputy minister. We are certainly making sure that we are operating a lean, efficient public service, but that doesn't mean that we have to turn back the clock, like members opposite have advocated for, to the positions of the 1990s, when teachers were laid off, educational assistants were laid off, nurses were fired, and the public service was shrunk to a deficit so significant that we have hospitals and schools across this province that have been ignored for far too long. I hear the members opposite saying that they want new schools and new hospitals. We need people in the public service to help us deliver.

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-Foothills.

Provincial Fiscal Policies

Mr. Panda: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Albertans know that we are in the depths of an economic recession, and new numbers released this month back that up. Alberta is feeling the pain of this downturn, and the NDP government's policies are making things worse. In 2015 Alberta had the most contraction, with the GDP shrinking the largest amount in Canada, by 4 per cent. With the state that our economy is in, why does the NDP government continue ahead with policies like the carbon tax, that will only make things worse?

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much for the question. Mr. Speaker, the reason why we're moving forward with a price on carbon is because of organizations and people who are going to benefit from it. For example, the director of Vibrant Communities Calgary, a community member from the city the hon. member is an MLA within, said:

We applaud the government as it tables the legislation to mitigate the impact of climate change. We especially appreciate the rebate of the carbon tax for the working poor in our province. Coupled with other key initiatives such as the Alberta Child Benefit, it will help to reduce poverty in Alberta.

We're very proud of that.

2:00

Mr. Panda: When you look at our neighbours in B.C. and Saskatchewan, they're not in the same boat as we are. While the NDP government has been removing reasons for businesses to invest in Alberta through their higher taxes, raising the minimum wage, and the $3 billion carbon tax, B.C. and Saskatchewan have opened their doors to investment. Will the Premier acknowledge that the Alberta advantage is flatlining and economic impact studies must be completed before plunging ahead with these policies?

The Speaker: The Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Economists from a variety of different areas across the country have made it really clear that the best way to actually have the free market play a role in addressing climate change is to make sure that there's actually a price on carbon. There are incentives for businesses and individuals to take personal responsibility, something I know the members opposite often tout. There are conservative governments, more conservative, certainly, some would argue, than the alternatives, like B.C., that's had a carbon tax for many years, and there are other provinces across Canada that are doing the same. Actually, many conservative leaders have said that this is the right way . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. Deputy Premier.

Mr. Panda: Well, Mr. Speaker, everyone does a cost-benefit analysis before they bring any risky policies. GDP data released today for 2016 doesn't reflect the impact that the Fort McMurray wildfire will have. The fire, on top of the economic downturn, means that we need reasons for businesses to invest in Alberta more than ever. Aside from a failed jobs plan the NDP are dropping the ball on ways to create jobs and growth. Wildrose developed a common-sense, 12-point jobs action plan to get Albertans back to work . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The Minister for Economic Development and Trade.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and I'll thank the member for the question. As opposed to the opposition, that is just talking, our government is taking action. We've issued a number of initiatives, including the largest infrastructure spend the province has seen, over $34 billion over five years. As well, our government has introduced two different tax credits, which are incentives that the business and industry communities province-wide have been asking for, an investor tax credit that's going to help spur investment in Alberta businesses right here at home. We also dropped the small-business tax by one-third. Our government is committed to working with businesses province-wide.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

The member of the third party.

Springbank Reservoir Flood Mitigation Project

Mr. McIver: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. There have been several questions asked in this House about the Springbank flood control project and, in my view, not enough information provided so far. I'd like to give the Infrastructure minister an opportunity to provide answers and clear up whatever misunderstanding might be there. To the Infrastructure minister. I believe your ministry is building the project. Have you consulted with all of the landowners, all of the municipalities, and all of the First Nations adjacent to the river, and are they fully informed about your ministry's plans?

Mr. Mason: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I can tell the House that we've held over 40 meetings already, many of them under the jurisdiction of the previous government, and 15 meetings are yet to be scheduled. We've had six open houses. We've had with the Tsuu T'ina two formal letters, three phone calls, three meetings, including one with myself, and 28 e-mails. The Tsuu T'ina has met with the Minister of Environment and Parks and had a technical briefing with administration staff. The Stoney Nation has had three formal letters, 20 e-mails, and three meetings, including one with the Minister of Transportation and Infrastructure on the phone. Rocky View county has had four meetings . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

First supplemental.

Mr. McIver: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's June tomorrow, so the construction season has begun. In my view, the government ought to know how they will proceed with the Springbank dam project, the project of a dam. To the Infrastructure minister: are you planning on taking away land from people through expropriation or some other legal process, or are you going to make arrangements where they can keep the land, with the government then able to use it for flood control only when the situations arise, where that's necessary?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. On the contrary, I think it's a fine project.

I've asked the question that the hon. member has just asked. We are intending to acquire the land in order to build the project. There are a number of issues, including liability issues and so on, that I think would make what the hon. member is suggesting an imprudent move.

Mr. McIver: Okay. Well, Mr. Speaker, not only the local residents but all Albertans are curious, I believe, about the costs for the Springbank dam project. By now, again, the government ought to know the cost for the land compensation, construction, operation expenses, and other things. So to the Finance minister or Infrastructure minister or whoever can answer questions about money because I'm hoping for an answer with a number in it: what is the current cost estimate for the Springbank dam project? Please give an answer in the form of a number. What is the overall project budget?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member, having been a Minister of Transportation and of Infrastructure, knows that if you give out prices in advance, that's what your contracts will come in at, and if you try to predict the price of land, that's probably what you're going to pay. These are matters of open tenders and a fair, negotiated process, and it's too early to say what the cost will be.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Renewable Energy Strategy

Mr. Clark: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. This past weekend the Alberta Party held our policy convention, and members voted in favour of a price on carbon as part of our overall electricity and climate strategy. The Alberta Party knows that climate change is real and human caused, and we know that Alberta should take action, but the more we learn about this government's carbon tax, the more questions we have. To the Premier: are you committed to a 30 per cent renewable generation rate even if a different mix of gas and renewables would achieve similar carbon reductions at much lower cost to Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Environment and Parks.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for the question. Certainly, we have set the 30 per cent target because we believe that it is achievable. It's a good mix between natural gas and various renewables that we know are very cost competitive, both wind and utility-scale solar. We are in the process of designing those programs right now and that competitive procurement process. We believe it's a good target because it plays on Alberta's strengths and ensures that we are open to all of that new renewable investment that is waiting to make those investments here in Alberta.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Now, as I've said, the Alberta Party believes in a carbon tax, but we're not sure that we can support this carbon tax without more detail. The role of Energy Efficiency Alberta is unknown even though the budget allocates $645 million to this agency over five years. Again to the Premier: what specific programs will be delivered to recycle revenue? Can Albertans expect a home renovation tax credit, low-emission vehicle rebates, incentives for geothermal energy, something else, or nothing at all? When will we learn the details of this so-called revenue recycling?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is a good question because it comes from an area of the House where there's an appreciation for diversification and also the science of climate change. We will have more to say about the various programs that will be delivered through the energy efficiency agency very soon.

We're going to ensure that we conduct the right amount of consultation on this matter and the right level of conversation with Albertans of all kinds: individual homeowners but also small businesses, municipalities, indigenous communities, and others.

Mr. Clark: In other words: trust me; we'll let you know later.

Mr. Speaker, I want to reiterate that the Alberta Party believes in a carbon tax, but we're not sure that we can support this carbon tax without more detail. I'll try one more time. Investors are ready to commit now to renewable energy projects, but they're frustrated that the government's plans to date have been so short on details. There are literally billions of dollars on the sidelines waiting to be invested. To the Premier: when will investors know the details of your renewable energy plan so that they can build the capacity we need and get people back to work?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a good question. It's a thoughtful question. We have said that the AESO is conducting its consultations on the large-scale renewable competitive procurement process. Those details will be available by fall. As we move forward on the energy efficiency and the community energy systems piece, that part will be consulted on over this summer and fall period, and those programs will be available by January 1, 2017.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Bow.

Domestic Violence

Ms Drever: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. New statistics show a concerning rise in the number of domestic violence incidents in Calgary. To the Minister of Justice: what kind of investments is this government making to ensure that survivors have the support they need?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the absolutely critical question. This government knows that no one should have to feel unsafe in their own home. Our government recognizes that we as the government have a role to play in ensuring that survivors of domestic violence are able to feel safe. In the fall we increased funding to women's shelters by $15 million to create protective spaces for women and children affected by family violence. We've also committed an additional $3.5 million to the family violence framework to support programs that protect women and girls.

Thank you very much.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Ms Drever: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that police officers are dealing with more domestic calls this year compared to last year, to the same minister: what supports are in place to ensure that officers have the tools they need to respond to these calls?

The Speaker: The Minister of Justice.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Our government recognizes that police have a critical role to play in supporting victims of domestic violence. That's why, in addition to creating guidelines which govern the way that domestic violence survivors are handled amongst the police services, my ministry also provides training, which is offered four to five times a year to front-line officers as well as supervisors. In addition, there's mandatory training for Crown counsel to ensure that they're able to support the victims throughout the system.

Thank you very much.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Ms Drever: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the volume of these calls has increased, again to the same minister: what other provincial agencies are able to assist municipal police forces when it comes to domestic violence cases?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and again to the member for the critical question. We're very proud in this government to have invested additional funds to make up a shortfall experienced by ALERT. One of the programs that falls under that ALERT umbrella is the Integrated Threat and Risk Assessment Centre, or I-TRAC. I-TRAC helps to develop assessment of risks to domestic violence victims as well as developing risk-reduction plans to ensure that everyone can feel safe in their own home.

Thank you.

Alberta Health Services Decision-making

Mr. Barnes: Mr. Speaker, the use of nonambulance transport for low-risk facility transfers can save money and save lives by freeing up vital ambulance resources. Unfortunately, while a wise idea in theory, we have obtained data showing system resources still being managed by the NDP. In all Alberta Health Services zones ambulances are overwhelmingly used to do the most routine patient transfers, transfers that could often be done by nonemergency vehicles. Why is the Health minister so slow to implement something we know can alleviate pressure on an overstretched EMS system?

The Speaker: The Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the important question. Absolutely, when there are opportunities to do a transfer and it can be done safely without a functioning ambulance but still with proper medical oversight, that is the right direction to move in. I actually tabled some documents in the House, I believe just two weeks ago, in response to questions from estimates that talked about an increase of five vehicles in the central zone alone, and we continue to find ways to move forward on that. Absolutely, this is an area where we can continue to improve, and I expect so from AHS.

Mr. Barnes: AHS has talked about this for years but only moves at the speed of bureaucracy. Given that advanced life-support ambulances are in short supply in our towns and smaller cities and given that these advanced units are crucial for complex emergencies and saving lives and seeing as there are AHS zones where our most highly equipped and advanced ambulances are doing the majority of the lowest risk facility transfers, why has a centralized approach to EMS failed to allocate resources more efficiently, as you promised Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. Obviously, there is nothing more important than knowing that when you do call 911, help is on its way and you'll get the right supports. The best way to organize first responders, we know, varies from community to community, so assertions that it's all being done from one central place isn't actually the truth. From rural areas to urban centres there are different nuances. That's why we have five different zones, and they do work with their local leaders to make sure that they find ways to operate efficiently. There still are areas for improvement, and we're continuing to make those stronger.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Mr. Barnes: Mr. Speaker, while I hope that the NDP finally takes this important issue seriously, I couldn't help but notice that they have just hired a new AHS CEO, Dr. Verna Yiu. Given that we wish her great success implementing some common-sense changes to AHS's broken centralized management and while, you know, they do say that the eighth time is the charm, I have to ask the minister at the head of AHS: how many applications did you receive for such a highly coveted role?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As the member should know, AHS is run by a board. We named that board several months ago, and I'm very proud of the work that they're doing. The board itself oversaw the search and recruit process, and they certainly did have a number of well-qualified applicants. I couldn't be more excited about working with Dr. Yiu for many years to come. She has proven herself to be a leader both at the university as a children's pediatrician as well as at AHS as a fantastic interim CEO, and I wish her the most success possible.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Affordable Housing

Mr. Gottfried: Mr. Speaker, it's a stone cold fact that the carbon tax will increase the cost of building, operating, and maintaining seniors' and affordable housing units in Alberta. In estimates this government publicly stated a preference to build and operate such facilities themselves, with increased costs then being borne by taxpayers, delivering fewer beds from debt-funded coffers. To the minister of seniors: how much is the carbon tax going to increase the average capital cost of delivering affordable and seniors' housing on a per-unit basis?

The Speaker: The hon. minister of environment.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, the carbon levy will be reinvested and recycled back into a number of different programs, including energy efficiency retrofits and other initiatives, to make sure that we've got our affordable housing stock up to snuff with respect to efficiencies. That's why we are investing $45 million this year and $645 million in the next five years on efficiency programming. That is something that the previous government failed to do, leaving us as the only jurisdiction in North America without an efficiency program.

Mr. Gottfried: A simple calculation not yet done.

Mr. Speaker, given that the downturn, job losses, and demographics will see growing demand for low-income and seniors' housing and given that the carbon tax will increase capital and operating costs on the shoulders of either taxpayers or renters, again to the minister: what new projects, over and above the 2,000 re-announced from the PC ASLI program, have you put on the books since October 2015, and when will we get a fresh list of publicly owned and operated housing planned by this government? When?

The Speaker: The Minister of Seniors and Housing.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. This government is very proud of their $1.2 billion commitment in our capital plan. We're working with housing management bodies across the province, working with seniors' lodges. We've also committed $60 million to, you know, put fire suppression systems in. We have a billion dollars in deferred maintenance that we're also investing in, which we inherited from the previous government. We are committed to working on affordable housing and supporting seniors in this province.

Mr. Gotfried: One wonders what will happen when your inheritance is spent.

Mr. Speaker, given that this government's carbon tax will increase the cost of building both affordable and seniors' housing and given that private and nonprofit organizations are efficient, innovative, and bring capital to the table, keeping unit costs down and accelerating use of green technology, again to the minister: why, then, did you publicly state a preference to move away from working with experienced, proven, and community-spirited builders and operators, and are such partnerships in the crosshairs of the NDP world view?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. We're working with housing management bodies and municipalities to determine the needs of the communities in Alberta. The priority for capital funding will be direct investments in government-owned and -supported housing units rather than capital grants to others. I've said that the private sector will benefit from this significant investment because, of course, we'll need planners, architects, builders, so everyone is working together.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Little Bow.

Carbon Levy and AISH Recipients

Mr. Schneider: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have received a number of concerned calls from my constituents who rely on the income supplements from the assured income for the severely handicapped, or AISH, program. Now, they're not only concerned that the carbon tax will raise the price of consumer goods but also that the rebate might actually work against them by increasing their nonexempt income, disqualifying them from receiving the full benefit. To the Minister of Human Services: what are you doing to ensure that this benefit will not be calculated against AISH payments, which support our most vulnerable?

The Speaker: The Minister of Human Services.

2:20

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Member, for the question. Requirements of the AISH program still remain the same as they were before, but we have increased funding to the AISH program so that we can manage the per-case growth, the cost of the case, and more people coming on to that program. We will make sure that in the new program they have benefits available throughout.

Mr. Schneider: Mr. Speaker, given that the carbon tax will mean that many people have to spend more on basic shelter and food needs and given that Alberta's most vulnerable, especially those who have to live on fixed incomes, will be hit hard by this ideological tax, again to the Minister of Human Services: have you actually conducted any analysis at all on how this punishing carbon tax will affect those receiving AISH?

Ms Phillips: Well, indeed, Mr. Speaker, the climate leadership plan that was released in November discussed this matter of rebates, ensuring that there's adjustment for low- and middle-income Albertans, which is precisely why 60 per cent of Albertans will receive the full rebate and 66 per cent a partial rebate. In fact, many people who have the lowest income will come out just a little bit ahead because we know higher income people use more emissions. That is a well-documented fact, that is in the climate leadership plan.

In addition, we have had these conversations with community groups and others all through last fall. It was this Official Opposition that took a pass on those conversations because they don't...

The Speaker: Hon. minister, thank you.

Mr. Schneider: Mr. Speaker, given that under the AISH program policy there is currently no fully exempted income provision for money received as a carbon tax rebate and given that this government, clearly, did not think of the most vulnerable when they crafted their poorly timed and punitive carbon tax, will the minister commit to adding funds received from the carbon tax rebate into the fully exempted income list in the AISH policy manual?

Ms Phillips: Mr. Speaker, the adjustment rebates are in fact not subject to a clawback of any kind. Any suggestion otherwise is simply trying to misinform the public and foment fear among people given that it is a policy that will move us forward, accepts the science of climate change, and wants to diversify the economy, which are all goals that the Official Opposition does not share.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky.

Grande Prairie Regional College

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In many aspects of life succession planning is just a smart idea. It's a concept not just limited to business. The Grande Prairie Regional College is trying to do just that. Unfortunately, with the recent ABC review their board lost three members last year, who are yet to be replaced, and will likely lose three more this year as terms expire. To the Minister of Advanced Education: what are you doing to ensure that this board has the members in place to properly ensure the smooth transition of the board?

The Speaker: The Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. I'm proud to say that our government is committed to an open and transparent process for recruiting and appointing public members to boards. I'm aware, of course, of the three vacancies that the Grande Prairie Regional College currently has. Applications for the recruitment for those positions closed April 26. My office is currently working with the board to shortlist and interview candidates, and I'm looking forward to working with the board and the community to find the right people to serve in these critical roles.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you. Given that the Grande Prairie Regional College has recently submitted a proposal seeking polytechnic university status in response to a demand for trades training and degree completion, again to the minister: can you help facilitate these growing demands for trades training and degree completion at the Grande Prairie Regional College?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you again to the member for the question. Of course, our government is well aware of Grande Prairie Regional College's aspiration to gain a polytechnic university designation. The proposal that they have put forward will be considered in the broader context of the postsecondary system in the province. There are many factors, of course, including ongoing funding pressures, that would need to be examined in detail before we make any decisions on this proposal, but we'll continue to meet with the Grande Prairie Regional College to discuss the implications of their proposal and make sure that the needs of the students at the Grande Prairie Regional College are met.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you again. Given our economic uncertainty GPRC was forced to reduce its transitional vocational program. This program offers adults with special needs a bridge between living at home and living and working in the community. Given that this program focuses on the key areas of employment training, independent living skills, work placement, and graduate follow-up, again to the minister: will your department work with related ministries to find a way to restore this incredibly worthwhile program so that all Albertans have an equal chance to succeed?

The Speaker: The Advanced Education minister.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. I had a meeting with the Grande Prairie Regional College president and board, and they brought this issue to my attention, as the member has done today. I understand how important the program is to the community of Fairview and to all of northwestern Alberta. We've asked Grande Prairie Regional College to submit a proposal regarding the transitional vocational program to identify a sustainable budget plan, and we continue to work with the college to make sure that the supports for students will be in place where they're needed.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster.

Tick-borne Diseases

Dr. Starke: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The government prides itself on acknowledging the science of climate change and responding. It also prides itself in saying that its decisions are thoughtful and science based. So let's look at some science. Several studies have shown that climate change is causing an increase in the incidence of vector-borne diseases. A study published in the journal EcoHealth predicted that the geographic range for the principal vector for tick-borne diseases such as Lyme disease would significantly increase in Canada because of climate change. To the Health minister: what adjustments has Alberta Health made to improve the monitoring and diagnosis of tick-borne infestations?

The Speaker: The Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, those who have contracted Lyme disease: this is very difficult for them and their families. We know that there are ticks in Alberta that have been confirmed to have Lyme – that's very troubling – or to have the same components. We want to encourage everyone to take preventative measures and make sure that when you're walking off path, you're wearing long sleeves, long pants, and protecting yourselves. I'd be happy to hear advice from the hon. member around further monitoring as we move forward.

Dr. Starke: Well, Mr. Speaker, it's on the way. First of all, tell your chief officer of health that the disease exists in Alberta.

Given that many Albertans have experienced needless suffering because of delays in the diagnosis of Lyme disease and given that Alberta Health continues to maintain an attitude that it is nearly impossible to contract Lyme disease in Alberta and given that diagnostic delays caused by this attitude of denial cause both untold expense and needless suffering, to the minister: why won't you direct Alberta Health to adopt broader diagnostic criteria needed for the early diagnosis and treatment of Lyme disease?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much for the question. I wonder if the same question was asked by the previous government, that was certainly dealing with this issue for many years. Certainly, we are continuing to move forward. I think I was very clear that there are ticks that we suspect could have Lyme in Alberta. We want people to take precautionary measures to protect themselves. Certainly, the diagnosis piece is very complicated. The pieces that are happening south of the border are different than north of the border. We certainly take leadership from Health Canada as we continue to move forward in finding the best way to diagnosis, treat, and remediate.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Dr. Starke: Mr. Speaker, climate change has increased the range, so given that Alberta Health's attitude that it can't happen here coupled with an inadequate diagnostic protocol is causing Albertans suffering from Lyme disease to seek treatment out of province and given that the exportation of patients to other jurisdictions in order to obtain medical care not available in Alberta is surely not part of the NDP world view, to the minister: will you commit today to the development of a comprehensive provincial strategy for the prevention, diagnosis, and treatment of Lyme disease?

Ms Hoffman: I believe in the last question I just talked about the prevention, diagnosis, and treatment. Certainly, we are going to work with Health Canada to make sure that across Canada we have the very best up-to-date measures to make sure that we're protecting citizens. Once again I want to remind all Albertans that if you're spending time in a situation where you could be encountering ticks, please take preventative measures. Obviously, an ounce of prevention is worth far more than a pound of cure. We want to make sure that we are keeping ourselves and each other as healthy as possible, so remember to wear those long sleeves and long pants, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Glenmore.

2:30 High School Completion

Ms Kazim: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Graduation season is in the air as we have seen thousands of students flock to the grounds of this Legislature to revel with their peers. Given that this is also a time to celebrate the quality education this province provides to students and the commitments our government has made to future generations, to the Minister of Education: what part have you had in helping our students mark their graduation?

The Speaker: The Minister of Education.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you very much for the question. High school completion is a very important part of our K to 12 schools here in the province of Alberta. I've had an opportunity to go to a number of graduations. I certainly recommend that all members get a little glimpse of a much more hopeful and optimistic future by attending graduations in their own constituencies. I went to one, for example, for Anzac, which is about 45 kilometres south of Fort McMurray, that had to be here in Edmonton, to see the nine graduates there. They were full of that fervour and sense of hope and vigour for the future which we all need at this time.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Ms Kazim: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that we know that high school is imperative to supporting students' future goals, to the same minister: are more students completing high school, and what are the reasons for this?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Eggen: Yes. Thank you for the question. Certainly, we've seen high school completion and graduation rates going up over these last five years. I learned quite an interesting point from a number of schools that I've been at recently, which is that the dual credit career and technology programs are aiding with both retaining high school students to complete within three years and also graduation rates and the choice to move to postsecondary. Mr. Speaker, I think these are programs that we all need to get behind in order to see our graduates succeed.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Ms Kazim: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that we must improve high school completion rates among our First Nations students, whose rates fall below the provincial average, to the same minister: what are you doing to support those students?

Mr. Eggen: Thank you very much, Member, for the question. Budget 2016 sets very ambitious targets to eliminate the education achievement gap. To that end, we've committed $28 million to close the gap between indigenous students and other students, adding to an existing grant of $48 million. As partners in First Nations education we will continue to work collaboratively with the federal government and First Nations across this province to close the gap between First Nations students and all other students here in the province. We're making progress, but we have a lot of hard work to do.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Battle River-Wainwright.

Crime Prevention in Rural Communities

Mr. Taylor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last month I asked the Justice minister about addressing rural crime. She spoke about getting supports in place to discourage potential criminals. Well, last week the crime wave continued: armed robberies in Holden and Amisk in broad daylight. My constituents want to feel safe in their communities, but in Amisk the armed robbery happened right across from a school, and families are worried. They want to know: what is the Justice minister actually doing to keep our communities safe right now?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Justice and Solicitor General.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. Well, of course, all Albertans deserve to live in safe and resilient communities, which is one of the primary functions of my ministry. That's why I'm very proud to say that this province invests over half a billion dollars a year in policing, which is more generous than any of the provinces around us, to ensure that we have the right on-the-ground supports for municipalities going forward. Our police partners work very hard and do an excellent job in preventing crimes.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, I think that whether the member recognizes it or not, it's really critical to address those underlying drivers of crime like poverty, that lead people into these sorts of lifestyles, and that's what our government . . .

The Speaker: Thank you.

Mr. Taylor: Given that the people who robbed these banks had the same MO and were clearly committing premeditated crimes, weighing their prison times against RCMP response times in rural communities since our hard-working police officers are often spread very thin, and given that criminals convicted of armed robberies often have their prison sentences reduced, is the Justice minister willing to advocate for stiffer penalties for armed robbery as a way to keep our communities safe?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Ganley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. I certainly know it's the case that, you know, ensuring that we invest in front-line services, which this side of the House is committed to doing, is the first critical step in ensuring that police are available to respond to these incidents.

In terms of the sentence in this particular matter, Mr. Speaker, obviously, it's inappropriate for me to comment on any particular case. But as the hon. member should presumably be aware, the federal government does have jurisdiction over the Criminal Code, so if those are the updates you're looking for, I would suggest that you speak to your MP.

Mr. Taylor: I was asking you if you were willing to advocate for these people.

Given that our communities need real solutions and that immediate action should be part of a larger strategy to address the rising crime rates and given that initiatives such as crime watch programs and video surveillance can serve as effective deterrent measures in small towns, would the minister consider supporting the expansion of rural crime watch programs into vulnerable communities to protect Alberta's families and to crack down on crime?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. Well, of course, as I've said, we are very proud that this province invests more in front-line policing per capita than the provinces around us. We invest over half a billion dollars a year in ensuring that front-line services are available, and we didn't cut back on those funds as the members opposite would have advocated.

I think that in terms of, you know, moving forward, certainly, we are doing a review of the victims of crime program, and we have a number of grant programs available. We do work quite closely with community crime prevention programs. In fact, we fund them, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
The hon. Member for Calgary-South East.

Economic Competitiveness

Mr. Fraser: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Alberta receives only the Canada health transfer and the Canada social transfer, of Canada's five transfer funds. Unlike earmarked health and social transfers, provinces can spend equalization funds however they choose, and they are subsidizing industry and businesses. We've heard a lot about diversifying the economy, and here in Alberta steel fabricators and industries are competing with companies from Ontario and Quebec. We add the carbon tax, unclear climate change regulations, and increased minimum wage, and industry becomes less competitive. To the economic development minister: what are you doing to help these companies become more competitive?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Economic Development and Trade.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I'll thank the member for the question. There are a number of initiatives that our government has embarked on to support our small to medium-sized businesses here in the province. In addition to two different tax credits that we've recently announced, which have worked in other jurisdictions and will now make Alberta even more competitive, I do want to point out the fact that Alberta continues to be the lowest taxed jurisdiction in the country, with no PST, no payroll tax, and no health care premiums.

Thank you.

Mr. Fraser: Given the fact that we've heard that the Ontario government may not see natural gas as a part of their future power generation and given that this government is implementing a carbon tax, which affects the transport and cost of equipment such as solar panels and wind turbines, which are not yet produced in Alberta, to the Energy minister: are you concerned that there will be a rush of investment in renewables in Ontario rather than in Alberta based on those factors, which would leave our energy grid short?

The Speaker: The minister of environment.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, our phase-in of renewables will be commensurate with the phase-out of coal-fired electricity. The AESO is right now examining how that competitive procurement process will proceed. However, I want to caution the member on this sort of negative, doom-and-gloom outlook. There is so much investment just waiting to invest in Alberta in energy efficiency, in microgeneration, in medium-sized enterprises of all kinds, in innovation and technology. This is a good time to . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Mr. Fraser: Minister, I'm glad to hear that. I mean, that's hope.

Given that we've actually heard from investors who are not opting out but are also not opting in to your renewables plan, there seem to be more questions than answers. I know it's easy to blame the Official Opposition for the doom and gloom and fearmongering, but, Minister, these are your policies creating part of the problem. Will your government adapt to the economic circumstances, address the fear and uncertainty that is clearly being stated by investors in natural gas and renewables, or will you stick by your plan, that could ultimately hurt Albertans not just today but for many generations to come? My hope is that there is room for movement here as you guys move forward.

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. On this question of natural gas, of course, we have said that it will be 30 per cent renewables in terms of our energy grid over time, and it'll be 70 per cent natural gas. That's a good mix. It puts us in the middle of the pack with respect to what's happening in the rest of North America. All of this plan is very carefully thought out. It's been laid out since November for everyone to see. It is the product of very robust consultations, consultations that the Official Opposition did not participate in. But the rest of Albertans were only too happy to help us move this economy forward, diversify our economy, and create jobs.

The Speaker: Thank you.
The hon. Member for Stony Plain.

Indigenous Relations

Ms Babcock: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have heard from many First Nations citizens that they're dissatisfied with the consultation process historically in Alberta. Given that many First Nations feel that the current consultation policy does not meet the needs of their communities or respect First Nations' constitutionally protected treaty rights, to the Minister of Indigenous Relations: what action is this government taking to improve First Nations consultation in Alberta?

The Speaker: The Minister of Indigenous Relations.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for the question. Well, last week, we're very happy to say, royal assent was given to Bill 12, which repealed the previous government's Aboriginal Consultation Levy Act. One of the big problems, of course, with the previous bill, Bill 22, was that First Nations weren't adequately consulted at all, the irony of which has been remarked on many times in this House: a consultation without consultation. We look forward to working with the First Nations community to restore respect to the process.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Ms Babcock: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to hear about the government's plans to revisit consultation. To the same minister: what is this government doing to ensure the participation of First Nations in this important review?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for the question. Our approach will welcome and encourage the full participation of First Nations as well as the participation of industry and other stakeholders. I have of course met with First Nations all across the province and with industry stakeholders both here and in Calgary, representing Fort McMurray as well. We believe that that consultation will lead to something meaningful, which did not happen in the past. The budget in 2016 includes $750,000 for enhanced consultation. We look forward to working with the First Nations communities in the future.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Ms Babcock: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that respectful dialogue is a central pillar of proper consultation and that this was clearly lacking in the previous legislation, what steps is our government taking to ensure that we avoid the problems created by Bill 22?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. We have already initiated a process where I have had an opportunity to meet with the grand chiefs of treaties 6, 7, and 8 and engage in the process of moving forward. We're taking to heart the words of Senator Murray Sinclair, who called the old bill a charade. As Senator Sinclair said, if consultation is to have meaning, it has to have consequence. That is what we are seeking to achieve. We're committed to the new legislation. We're committed to aligning it with the United Nations declaration on the rights of indigenous peoples. I look forward to updating the Assembly on progress in the future.

The Speaker: In 30 seconds we'll continue with Members' Statements.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Little Bow.

Feedlot Alley

Mr. Schneider: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to speak of a very interesting area within the Little Bow riding known as Feedlot Alley. It is the nickname of an area that covers about 500 square kilometres and resides to the northeast of the city of Lethbridge. This area is known globally for its world-class livestock operations. The climate and topography of the region are conducive to intensive value-added feeding operations. The area is home to over 2.3 million cattle and 180,000 hogs. Over 60 per cent of all Canadian beef is produced in Feedlot Alley. Animals are fed here at home and processed here at home.

The advent of irrigation and the formation of the various irrigation districts combined with the construction of the Oldman River dam, which was completed in 1991, have helped to diversify agricultural operations in southern Alberta. Much of the grain and hay that feeds the beef in this region is raised under irrigation pivots close to the feedlots.

This small portion of the province is a haven to free enterprise. Every day of the week, 52 weeks a year there is a requirement for feed products. Producers of those feed products have a nearby market that is guaranteed. Because of the volume of barley that is required to feed such an enormous number of cattle, the cash price for barley in southern Alberta is set FOB Lethbridge, and barley markets that expand out from this area are all worked back to the Lethbridge price less freight. The highways in my riding have become the avenue of transportation for animals and feed to different feeding operations in the area as well as to the different livestock processing facilities.

Within this famous area has grown a respect for the environment and a commitment to food safety, animal care, and production of a quality product. Alberta beef is known throughout the civilized world, and I am proud as the Member of the Legislative Assembly that represents this area to give a feather in the cap to those that work year-round to raise this superior and unique product, that helps put Alberta on the map.

Introduction of Bills

Bill 21

Modernized Municipal Government Act

Ms Larivee: Mr. Speaker, I request leave to introduce Bill 21, the Modernized Municipal Government Act.

The Municipal Government Act, or MGA, creates the framework in which municipalities operate. It touches the lives of every single Albertan by setting a foundation for how the municipalities they live in are governed, funded, and developed.

Mr. Speaker, I am tabling this bill today so that hon. members and all Albertans have time to review the changes, ask questions, and provide their feedback on our proposed amendments. Municipal Affairs will be seeking input from Albertans over the next few months, during a tour of 20 communities across the province as well as through web-based consultation. We will then return to the Legislature with any amendments necessary to reflect the feedback we hear and for a fulsome debate in this Assembly.

I'm proud on behalf of all of Municipal Affairs to table Bill 21, the Modernized Municipal Government Act.

[Motion carried; Bill 21 read a first time]

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Banff-Cochrane.

Mr. Westhead: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm tabling today the requisite number of copies of a fact sheet from the International Monetary Fund, which argues that "broad-based charges on greenhouse gases, such as a carbon tax, are the most effective instruments for encouraging cleaner fuels and less energy use." I encourage all members to read it.

Tablings to the Clerk

The Clerk: I wish to advise the Assembly that the following document was deposited with the office of the Clerk: on behalf of the hon. Ms Gray, Minister of Labour and minister responsible for democratic renewal, responses to questions raised by Mr. Hunter, Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner; Mr. McIver, Member for Calgary-Hays; and Dr. Swann, Member for Calgary-Mountain View, in the May 2, 2016, Ministry of Labour 2016-17 main estimates debate.

Orders of the Day
Government Bills and Orders
Second Reading
Bill 20
Climate Leadership Implementation Act

[Debate adjourned May 31]

The Speaker: The Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat.

Mr. Barnes: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to speak against Bill 20 and the implementation of this terribly misguided carbon tax. There are a host of reasons to oppose such a bill, many of which have been well argued and discussed on this side of the House, but I'd like to focus my attention on three of the most flawed, faulty, and foul elements of this proposed legislation. Firstly, this tax is horribly regressive and punitive. Secondly, it chokes out economic growth at a time, particularly in southeastern Alberta, when we are already struggling. Thirdly, it catches a number of organizations in its sprawling web, organizations which this province depends on.

Mr. Speaker, Bill 20's taxation powers and targets are so misguided and repellent that the government cannot even bring itself to use the word "tax." I suspect they avoid it because they know how punishing this will be on Alberta families and communities. But let's call it what it is. Let's talk about the regressive nature of this tax. Let's talk about how badly this tax will hit people who cannot – who cannot – avoid it. The most obvious place to start is with this massive hike on natural gas. This is overwhelmingly the number one source of residential heating in Alberta, and in fact it is one of the cleanest, most efficient forms of doing so.

To establish some context, I'm going to provide some statistical figures. The average household, Mr. Speaker, according to the government's estimates, uses about a 120 gigajoules of natural gas per year. The current market price is right around $1 per gigajoule. The projected natural gas price for 2018, two winters from now, is approximately $2.50. Here's the kicker. The carbon tax begins at $1.01 per gigajoule, rising to $1.52 in 2018. Unfortunately, it is so. At current market prices we're talking about a 100 per cent increase in the cost of natural gas across all Alberta households. Even if natural gas prices recover somewhat as predicted by analysts, by the time that happens, the carbon tax will still represent a 60 per cent increase. Not 2 or 3 per cent but 60 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, let's go back to the average household using 120 gigajoules. They will be hit with $184 in new costs for gas usage alone when this tax comes into its full effect, not to mention that because natural gas is so efficient and so clean, many people have switched other appliances to it. Gas heat is very popular for cooking, especially in Cypress-Medicine Hat, in Medicine Hat. I understand that gas clothing dryers are becoming more popular, too. Paying more tax. In any case, here we have Alberta families that made smart choices, have tried to be economical and efficient for the betterment of their households, and what does the government do? It steps in to heavily tax it.

I spoke to one of my constituents this past weekend, who informed me that they had purchased and installed a high-efficiency furnace just a year or two ago. The old one had started to fail; there was no choice. The constituent is now asking me what he is supposed to do to avoid the tax. He has invested a very large amount of money into a clean, efficient, new technology, but alas, Mr. Speaker, he'll be hit all the same by the NDP's new tax. His gas use falls right into the 120-gigajoule-per-month range. He'll pay the $184 dollars per year no matter what he does. Or I guess he could turn off the furnace. How feasible is that in Alberta over the winter? It doesn't take much imagination to know that's not an alternative. This is why this tax is so regressive. It is planted firmly on people who cannot avoid it, on essential goods and services they cannot change. Heating your house in Alberta in December and January is not optional.

Perhaps one could argue that this should encourage my constituents, as the Premier said, to change their behaviour and invest in further efficiency upgrades, but the reality is that upgrades like windows and new insulation are massive one-time investments that result in marginal gains at best, that takes years to pay for themselves, if ever, massive one-time investments. After investing in something like a new hot water system or a furnace, not many people, Mr. Speaker, have tens of thousands of dollars more in liquid assets sitting around to put into their home.

I could go on more about the regressive and harshly punitive nature of this tax, whether from increased utilities or increased food costs or increased transportation costs, but I would like to move on to my second major objection; that is, that a tax of this scope and this breadth will absolutely suppress economic growth, opportunity, and prosperity at a time when things need a shot in the arm.

Mr. Speaker, I know there's a lot of glowing reference to the work of J.M. Keynes on the other side of the House, but taxing in the middle of a recession is downright anti-Keynesian. Even he agreed that taxation suppresses growth. As job losses mount and as we continue to see home values and average wages fall, this tax is likely throwing an anchor to somebody desperately treading water. The NDP government is taking a bad situation and making it much, much worse.

Already I'm starting to hear the projected impacts of the carbon tax on local businesses. We have asked the government many times to produce an economic impact assessment across all sectors, but the reality on the ground is that businesses are doing it themselves, and the news that I have heard is bleak indeed. Whether a big or small business, this tax will put a large burden on local companies in Cypress-Medicine Hat. Some of our good fertilizer and value-added companies have mentioned higher input costs, anticompetitive, that other jurisdictions don't have to pay, so they've looked at relocating, looked at producing less. They've looked at the production of these things going to more competitive, higher carbon jurisdictions.

Mr. Speaker, we have a great greenhouse and packaging and value-added food business in Cypress-Medicine Hat in Redcliff. The cost of transportation – you know, in the southeast corner there are not many of us down there. We need access to bigger markets. The cost of transporting these foods has to be borne by the consumer or in job losses. Way to go.

Finally, I have serious concerns about the impact that this will have on organizations, governmental and nongovernmental alike, that contribute greatly to our local communities. Mr. Speaker, I absolutely believe that it's volunteers that built our communities, that built our province. I absolutely believe that we need to encourage our volunteer community to be stronger or as strong as possible. This carbon tax is a step in the opposite direction.

Most obvious in a vast riding like mine is the issue of school boards and transportation costs, though. I've mentioned natural gas, and that will certainly play a huge part in costs to school boards, but

I think mostly of busing when I consider the impacts in Cypress-Medicine Hat. Many students in southeastern Alberta live on farms or ranches 10 to 20 miles away from schools and cities, and transportation forms a huge part of the expense for school boards.

I've had it estimated by my local rural school board that they are facing $275,000 in added costs through the NDP carbon tax just on gas, and of course I don't think this factors in all the hidden secondary costs on all the other products and services. Mr. Speaker, $275,000 in added costs right up front is staggering. How many teachers is that? Three? Four? How many teaching assistants? Four? Five? Good front-line workers are desperately needed and add value. Instead, we're paying tax. These are real social and human costs of this tax.

Furthermore, we have groups operating in my constituency that offer great benefit to the community, charities and nonprofits of all stripes. They will be taking a severe hit on their operating costs, and we all know that they're already operating on the razor's edge. Again, I love the not-for-profit sector, the volunteer sector. Sometimes I feel guilty. They're so efficient, they're so good that I think that as a society we take advantage of them, and now we're going to be punishing them. These organizations are as lean and streamlined as they could possibly be, especially, as they are today, operating on declining donations.

You know, Mr. Speaker, in Medicine Hat and Bow Island and Redcliff I bump into people with Meals on Wheels, people helping people get to the hospital to visit, and the United Way doing all their tremendous work. Of course, we just had the CFL alumni tournament in town again this last weekend. It's going to be harder and harder for these volunteers to be able to afford to do what needs to be done.

Mr. Speaker, in closing, due to the regressive, economically crippling, and overly broad nature of this carbon tax I will stand opposed, and I encourage every member of the House to listen to the people of Alberta, that will be paying this tax, and to do the same.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lacombe-Ponoka. Under 29(2)(a)?

Mr. Orr: No.

The Speaker: Are there any questions for the Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat under 29(2)(a)?

Hearing none, the Member for Lacombe-Ponoka.

Mr. Orr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to speak to this bill. The question is: how is the tax going to be administered and collected and used? Clearly, this tax is going to make everything more expensive for everyday Albertans. That's what my concern is. I'm aware of this fact. My constituents are very aware of this fact. Every newspaper seems to be aware of this fact. The only people who don't seem to be aware of this fact are the members opposite. They're insistent that their rebate will cover the costs for Albertans, yet it seems they're missing something again. Just like when they were a few billion dollars off in their budget, it required them to push back their balanced budget to 2018. Then they thought they could run right up to the 15 per cent debt limit without going over, but now they've realized that with their free-spending ways they can't do that either.

Let's just go over some of the numbers. The Edmonton Journal on May 25 published an article titled Alberta Families Will Pay More under Climate Change Bill's Carbon Tax. In that article the Journal quoted the NDP press release.

A typical Alberta family will pay between $70 and $105 extra per year for consumer goods and services as a result of the province's new carbon tax, the NDP government said Tuesday in introducing its new climate legislation.

It's the first time the government has put a figure on such "indirect" costs of the new levy, which will increase the price of transportation and heating fuel for most Albertans starting in January.

I'm only going to use three items – there are many more but just these three – that the NDP say will affect Albertans: heating, fuel, and the government's vague lowball estimate of indirect costs. I will show how far off their expectations are by examining the typical Albertan. I will not cover the multitude of other costs that will affect Albertans, which would put costs soaring to close to a thousand dollars or maybe more. Instead, I'm just going to use the typical cost to the typical Albertan to heat their home and fuel their car. I'll also use the lowball indirect cost that the NDP provided. Since it's difficult and controversial to debate indirect costs and since they haven't shown us how they got them, for this speech we'll just give them the benefit of the doubt on that and go with the numbers they provided.

I want to examine that $75 to $105 in indirect costs by adding it to the cost of, first of all, just transportation alone and see if we can stay under the rebates for a single or a couple. I will exclude heating for now, but don't worry; we'll come back to it.

The lease on a car is usually for 24,000 kilometres a year. Car companies choose that amount because they know it's the average kilometres that the average person drives. They also use that number of kilometres to estimate the value of the car at the end of the lease and, hopefully, still make some money when the lease expires. Now, the average vehicle in the last several years gets a fuel consumption pretty close to 10 litres per 100 kilometres. This is a combination of city and highway driving, an average for vehicles. The average for Alberta would be a little higher since we have a higher population of trucks and mid-size SUVs, but for calculations we'll stay with 10 litres per 100 kilometres. That'll do.

To do 100 kilometres with 10 litres means that one litre will go for 10 kilometres. If we take the typical distance travelled per vehicle at 24,000 kilometres a year, we come out to a vehicle that will be using 2,400 litres of fuel a year. Now, the gas price according to the carbon tax is going to increase 4 and a half cents per litre, so if we take the average amount of gas used by the average Albertan, the 2,400 kilometres, and multiply that by the 4.5 cents, it comes out to $108. Wow. We're over already. That's the amount of extra money it will cost to operate one vehicle that drives a typical lease allowance distance.

Now, referring back to the Edmonton Journal article, it says that the NDP quoted that the average household will incur $70 to $105 in indirect costs. If we take an average between the two, we get an average or midpoint or median of $87. If we take $87 and add that to the $108 we just calculated for fuel costs, we're already at $195. The rebate for a single person is only $200, which barely covers these costs.

We haven't even talked about heating costs for their house yet. Not only that, but before we get to the heating, let's finish with the fuel costs. That $108 is for one vehicle. But, honestly, how many Albertan families do you know that have only one car? Most people have two cars. The wife has a car. The husband has a car. In many cases kids have their own cars. The average family house in Alberta has a two-car garage. I wonder why. Why do houses come with two-car garages instead of a one-car garage? Well, it's because the typical family in Alberta actually has two cars. That means we need to double our math. That means that two-car families driving a lease allotment are covering 48,000 kilometres. That means we're using 4,800 litres of fuel. That means that due to this carbon tax the typical family will spend an additional $216 on fuel a year. Add that to the average of $87 that was given, and you're up to $303. That's higher than the NDP estimate for a couple, and we have only accounted for fuel and lowballed indirect costs and no heat.

For those who say that they should only drive one car, the average Canadian family today, the Albertan family, is a two-wage family, a two-income-earning family. I'm sure I didn't hear from across the hall that they want the wives to stay home and not work anymore, so I don't know how they're supposed to get there if they're not allowed to have a car.

Of course, not everyone drives the average. Some people drive a lot more than the average. We live in Alberta, where everything is very spread apart. My riding is extremely spread out. There are people who live outside the city and drive in to work every single day. Even here in the city some people drive to and from St. Albert or from Leduc every day to work in Edmonton. There are trades workers who have to drive between each job and put hundreds of kilometres on their car every single day to get to work, unless they're not supposed to go to work.

There are countless people who live in my riding that can't just start walking down the country roads to the grocery store or taking their kids to the bus stop, which maybe, actually, is several miles away, or to any kind of social event or anything. They can't take nonexistent public transit from their acreage to get into the city. There are people who will be far above this $216 for gasoline who are actually quite average, everyday Albertans.

When these issues have been brought to the attention of the government, the answer was to buy a more fuel-efficient vehicle. Well, do you think my constituents are going to trade in their farm truck for a Prius? Do you think a Prius can tow a horse trailer? How many farm animals do you think you can fit in the back of a Prius? Not anywhere near enough to replace a work truck, I know that.

To recap, so far we are above the rebate amount for a family that doesn't even have any children, doesn't drive more than the average, doesn't heat their house. I took a look at some of the energy bills for houses around the 700-square-foot range, and their heating costs were fairly close to the estimates on page 96 of the budget. If the average family lives in a 700-square-foot house, we can use the $124 amount quoted in the budget. If we take the $1-per-gigajoule increase and add it to our $303 cost, we come out to — whoops — $427.

But let's not use the underestimated NDP numbers for heat. Let's get some average numbers since it's the average Albertan who is going to have to pay all this and who we're talking about. A CBC article published last year, in April, said that the average home price in Canada was $440,000. In Edmonton that gives you a 1,600-square-foot home with an attached garage. In Calgary you'd get a 1,321-square-foot condo with two bedrooms. The realty executives website says that the average square footage of a house in Sherwood Park is 1,688 square feet. The average square footage of a house in Red Deer is 1,100 square feet. See, we live more modestly in central Alberta according to Red Deer real estate professionals.

All the numbers point out that 700 square feet is not the average size for a house in Alberta. In fact, the numbers point out that the average is 50 to 100 per cent larger than that amount. In other words, I'd estimate that a typical family can expect about 50 per cent more to the cost of heating their house. That means that instead of $124 extra to heat the average Albertan house, we're looking at $186 extra.

If we add that $186 to our average fuel cost and our lowball indirect cost of $303, we come out at $489 extra that families will have to pay in 2017 as we phase in the carbon tax, not even the $338. Even taking their lowball indirect cost estimate, which they won't show us the math for, we're looking at 40 per cent more than the amount the NDP says this carbon tax will cost the average family.

That $489 does not include all the other extra costs that Albertans will face. Are property tax increases included? We've already heard from municipalities that they're going to have to just add it onto their taxes in order to pay their portion of the carbon tax. Are school bus fees included? School boards have already said that school buses are one of their biggest expenses. They're going to have to add that into their tax fee in order to pay the carbon tax. So now we're in a situation where people have to pay taxes for their own carbon footprint but are also going to have to pay it for the municipal government's footprint. They're also going to have to pay it for school fees. We've got taxes on top of taxes here.

There is just so much uncertainty around this for Albertans that I can't believe the government are just ramming it down our throats through the whole economy at a time when our economy is struggling. This carbon tax will hurt families when they're down and when they need help. Albertan families do not need the government dipping their hands into their pockets to fund their risky ideological spending sprees. This government needs to rein in spending instead of raising taxes on the backs of families.

Now, the reality is that this carbon tax is supposed to be a bill to change behaviour. That I accept and understand. My question is: how many of you have actually changed any behaviour yet? That I have yet to see any example of or any word of.

Let's talk about natural gas. What kind of behaviour changes are we expected to produce here? What kind of behaviour change is it that we want? Natural gas is what heats your house, so the only way that you can change your behaviour on that would be to turn down the thermostat. How far do we turn the thermostat down? What kind of an impact is that going to have on seniors, people with disabilities, families with small children? In fact, for people who are unemployed or people who are in serious economic straits, will they turn their furnace down so much that it becomes an issue of health impacts that will end up costing the health system? Has the government calculated that in? Oh, I know. They won't think there's anything to that.

Actually, I was doing a lot of research on it. It's interesting that the World Health Organization has done a number of significant studies over the years on the health impacts of low indoor temperatures. I have a copy of one here from the Europe office of the World Health Organization in Copenhagen. They've done a significant amount of study on the health impacts and the complications of lowering or having low temperatures in indoor living environments. It relates to acute respiratory diseases, that are among the leading causes of death in Europe. The fact is that these respiratory infections do actually take the lead among all communicable diseases in Europe.

There are significant environmental risk factors related to poor indoor climate. The improvement of the indoor climate of dwellings is recognized as an efficient means of secondary prevention of acute respiratory infection, especially in risk groups such as preschool children and the elderly. So here now we're supposed to change the behaviour of folks. We're taxing their natural gas, which is the essential service by which they're to heat their home, and now we're going to be pushing them to turn their thermostats down to the point where we may be actually causing health impacts. It is considered useful to review the health impact of low indoor temperature and to recommend some lower limits to protect human health, especially of the very young and the elderly.

Here we have a very ideological approach to climate change, which in fact is going to hurt mostly the people who are most vulnerable and who are most at risk. This was an unplanned, unthought through, and foolish . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any questions of the Member for Lacombe-Ponoka under 29(2)(a)? The Member for Edmonton-South West.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today on 29(2)(a) to briefly make some comments and get to a question for the hon. member across the way there. The hon. member spoke quite heavily about some of the health impacts that he perceived there may be or some of the health impacts he was worried about. Frankly, I think some of these concerns may be unfounded or, at the very least, absurd in some ways. I do want to comment that there are significant health impacts that we are going to see from the climate leadership strategy, and those are the health impacts we are going to see in the air and breathe in the air every day with the coal phase-out program so that we can have Albertans be healthy.

I would ask the hon. member what he thinks about those children who will have to live with asthma if we do not move with this program, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to ask the hon. member what he would say to those families that have to live with the adverse effects of these lung and cardiovascular diseases for the duration of their entire lives.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member also spoke quite a bit about how we were balancing the budget and doing climate implementation on the backs of families. I do want to re-emphasize that absolutely there is going to be a rebate that two-thirds of Albertans will see, and two-thirds is a majority of Albertans. I would like to ask the hon. member about these programs. Some of the funding that's not being used for these rebates is going to be used on things like $6.2 billion invested directly into the economy; $3.4 billion for large-scale renewable energy and bioenergy tech; $2.2 billion for green infrastructure, like transit; and $645 million for Energy Efficiency Alberta.

I'd like to ask the hon. member: which of these programs is not important? Which of these programs, like the Energy Efficiency corp. or the large-scale renewables programs that we are rolling out, and green infrastructure, like the transit that the hon. member was saying was insufficient, should we not fund? Which of these programs does he not want in his own constituency for his constituents? Mr. Speaker, I think some of these questions are very important around health and the economy and these infrastructure priorities and the spending priorities, that we do find that we need to be looking at in a very tangible way. I want the hon. member to maybe answer and see where we're going with this.

The Speaker: Hon. member, why don't you give him a chance to answer?

Mr. Orr: Thank you to the hon. member. Yeah. I don't argue that there are health impacts to our climate around us. The point of the matter is that the way this particular carbon tax and attempt is put together creates just as many problems as it attempts to solve. I would like to continue with an answer exactly to that issue.

This isn't my fancy dreaming this up. This is from the World Health Organization. "The effect on health of low indoor temperatures, especially in dwellings occupied by the elderly, the sick, the disabled and preschool children" is a risk. There are problems here when people are going to be forced to change their behaviour – and this is a bill meant to change behaviour – that is going to put people in situations where they will make risky choices that are in fact going to put them back in just as much a health risk as what they came out of. I mean, if the health risk is outdoors and you just push it indoors, what have you gained?

This was put together by a group of 10 specialists and public health environmental scientists. They have significant concerns with this. I'm not going to go into all of the inner details of it because it's extensive, but I will go to some of the conclusions. They say that, clearly, for certain groups, such as the sick, the handicapped, the very old, and the very young, a minimum air temperature of 20 degrees is recommended. So now if we create a carbon tax that in fact says to people, "You need to change your behaviour and use less of the very thing that heats your home," the only behaviour choice possible is to lower the temperature of your house, and the World Health Organization says that that is dangerous.

I'll read the next one for you. "Ambient air temperatures below 12° C are a health risk for groups such as the elderly, the sick, the handicapped and preschool children." Does this government not realize that they are targeting the most vulnerable people in our society by creating a regulatory regime that is going to push them to lower the temperature in their house as the only way to deal with creating a behavioural change, which is the whole point of all of this if we're going to change behaviour?

I'd like to read the next one.

At air temperatures below 16° C, relative humidities above 65% impose additional hazards, particularly from respiratory and arthritic diseases and allergic reactions [exactly your issues] to moulds, fungi, house dust mites and allergens . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The hon. Member for Calgary-South East.

Mr. Fraser: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's an honour today to rise and speak to the second reading on Bill 20, the Climate Leadership Implementation Act. Again this reminds me of a time during the Cuban Missile Crisis. There was a particular general, General LeMay, who was advising President Kennedy at the time. As they were discussing and deliberating on the issue at hand, General LeMay said to the President: you're in quite a fix, aren't you, Mr. President? The President turned around, and he said: pardon me? He goes: you're in quite a fix, aren't you, Mr. President? And the President said: well, if you hadn't noticed, you're in it with me. I think it's very timely. For us in the Progressive Conservative caucus we absolutely do believe that climate change is real. We believe that humans definitely have an impact on that.

Now, most definitely we have to reconcile what normally would happen in climate change and the science of the impact of humans and what humans have on the climate. Without a doubt, I think any kind of logical thinking would say that for humans we can definitely improve our usage of fossil fuels and other combustibles, how we interact with the environment in terms of bettering the environment and trying to leave it somewhat better than when we found it, which likely won't be the case. At least we can reduce as much harm as, you know, we may cause to it, Mr. Speaker.

However, that being said, a number of the strategies under this plan as a whole are not necessarily reflected in the bill before us. The bill doesn't specifically outline how the 100-megatonne emission cap on oil sand activity will work in practice. The bill doesn't necessarily touch on the methane reduction strategy. It doesn't cover all the aspects of the government's climate leadership plan, and it brings me back to the whole message of what I was talking about before. The environment: we are all part of that, we are in it together, and we have to figure out a path together.

I would go back. I should rephrase that. I guess we all should rephrase this. While the government may be implementing this plan, this is Albertans' climate leadership plan that they will be affected by, and we're seeing that in business and in industry, Mr. Speaker. It's important because we still need to feed families. We still need to grow business, and we still need to have a role not just in Canada but around the world. One way to do that is to have a strong economic foundation to stand on and, of course, along with that, a healthy record on the environment. I would remind the House that it was the governments of the past that actually introduced the price on carbon for industry a number of years ago. So there was a plan.

Let's take a look at the bill. The first part, the Climate Leadership Act – sorry, Mr. Speaker. Let me back up a little bit. One of the things, as we think about that, I talked about was the environment, and I talked about the economy. I believe and our caucus believes that you don't need to sacrifice one to have the other. I think that it would be important to be able to look at this bill in greater detail to understand the total effects of that on the economy, on industry, and what that looks like. I don't think that anybody here in this House can necessarily predict the future, but we can certainly try to create an algorithm of what we think it might be and be able to create an algorithm that: if this particular part of the plan is not working, what do we move to next?

The parts of the bill are the Climate Leadership Act, which basically enables the carbon tax. The second part of the bill is the Energy Efficiency Alberta Act, which creates another organization at an arm's length for energy-efficient programs and a few other things. The third is the amendments to the Climate Change and Emissions Management Act, my guess is so that it's more aligned with the government's climate leadership plan. So as we move off kind of on the first part of that plan, I guess, again, because we're all in this together, including Alberta families and municipalities, what is the impact this tax really will have for families and communities? We shouldn't assume that one-third of Albertans can afford it in the sense of, yes, maybe that's what is coming in, but we don't know what's going out in terms of supporting their elderly parents or helping kids they have in their families with disabilities and those sort of things, to make that assumption and to assume that for all municipalities this may not affect it. That's why I say that it's important to maybe have an algorithm and to take a look at: maybe now is not the time to institute a tax in its current form.

I do believe that having, you know, a revenue-neutral tax can work. I think we've seen it work in B.C. We know that there has been roughly a 19 per cent reduction, albeit a 19 per cent reduction in CO<sub>2</sub> emissions, albeit in heavy industry, but I think there are some merits. I do believe there are merits to this plan. But, again, is now the time to be taxing Alberta families when we're hurting so bad and when we need investment to stay? I'll talk about that in a little bit.

Then the second is that we talk about the energy efficiency strategy. Again, I think it is a good initiative, but we as members in this House collectively need to form an algorithm. I think that far too often – and many people in this House would recognize that – when we look at sectors of our government, ABCs as we would call them, perhaps they're not necessarily reaching the outcomes that we've asked them to reach. I think part of that is because perhaps we haven't determined or said to them that this is the outcome that we want to see, that this is the outcome that Albertans want to see, a timeline to meet those deadlines and to come back with sound information, particularly when something like this is so important. We're taxing Albertans, we're taxing industry, and as much as the government would say what they think it may be in terms of what they think it's going to cost, they can't promise that for every family. They can't promise that for every industry and every business. There will be an impact. For every action there will be a reaction. So we need to define those targets and those outcomes.

Third, we talked about changes to the climate change and emissions management fund. Will these changes prevent things like research and development from happening, the changes to this particular part, or will that help improve CO<sub>2</sub> emissions or NO<sub>x</sub> and SO<sub>x</sub> emissions? In fact, Mr. Speaker, just recently the federal energy minister has said that carbon capture is viable and a good plan to help reduce carbon emissions from coal-fired generation.

Mr. Speaker, I think it would definitely be important for the government to take a look at what's happening around the world. We are seeing in all jurisdictions the development of more coal-fired generation plants. I'm not talking about India, and I'm not talking about China. We're talking about Denmark, Germany, European countries that have already beat us to the punch on renewables, and some places – I believe it's Holland – are maybe stepping away from more of their wind generation.

Now, it's always interesting to me, Mr. Speaker. I've been a part of that, and I haven't always been not culpable. Let me put it that way. Being in government and now not being in government, I recognize sometimes where I probably should have been listening a little closer to certain things, and I'm happy, like I said before in previous members' statements, to stand on the ground that when I learn a lesson, I'm happy to own the lesson. But over here, when we talk about some of these things, that perhaps the decisions that this government is making today – I'm not here to blame the government. I'm not here to stop you from what you're doing, but perhaps we can encourage the government to look at other options.

Of all things, perhaps on this particular bill the government will look at amendments that are reasonable amendments, that don't change the plan's direction but, hopefully, improve it, and I hope that there is a robust debate on that and why and not just political speech one way or the other because this is what we believe to be the case. Now, I guess the other government members – and everybody is nose deep in reading and everything else. Fair enough. I've done that myself. But I guess the question is: what if we get it wrong? We're in a global economy now, an economy that's super competitive, and everybody wants to be the new Alberta, as it were.

Mr. Speaker, I look forward to hearing what some of the coming amendments might be from other members of the House. I thank you for your attention today and the House's attention. I think that there are many areas where we can improve, a collaboration, and nothing would please me more than to see the government get this right versus wrong, but of course they have to be open to the idea of improvements from this side of the House.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Under 29(2)(a)?

Mr. Dang: Under 29(2)(a).

The Speaker: Edmonton-South West, please proceed.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise again under 29(2)(a) to make some brief comments and remarks on what the hon. member across the way said and maybe to ask some questions as well. I noticed he focused really heavily on three pieces, and one of the big pieces he said was: what if we get it wrong? What if we get it wrong? He started that off with some things about the economy-wide price on carbon, that it is not the right time right now, that right now is not good for that.

Mr. Speaker, I have to question: if not now, when? We know now because right now is the best opportunity for Alberta to be able to make those investments in renewable energy, investments in Energy Efficiency Alberta, and investments in different areas. I ask the hon. member across the way: if not now, when?

When we are looking at these things, we have to look at them and say that we've done a very exhaustive consultation on this with the climate leadership implementation plan. We've done a very exhaustive panel that has gone out and spoken to industry, spoken to communities, spoken to Albertans and, really, come back and compiled a very comprehensive list of people they've talked to and made very tangible recommendations that say that now absolutely is the right time to be phasing in an economy-wide price on carbon. We know that as a result of man-made climate change we need to use that as a tangible way to decrease those emissions that we are creating as people and as Albertans.

Mr. Speaker, I have to ask the hon. member across the way: when would be the time if not now? The very comprehensive panel has determined that now is the right time; the very comprehensive review has determined that now is the right time.

He also spoke quite extensively about the energy efficiency corp. and how the energy efficiency corp. wasn't going to accomplish anything or didn't have any tangible goals, Mr. Speaker. I challenge that. I challenge that and say that the energy efficiency corp. – if I can find my note on it here – absolutely is going to make a difference. We are the last province in the country, I believe, to not have an energy efficiency agency, and I think that is something that we need to shed as quickly as possible. I think that the hon. member would be remiss if he didn't support the creation of this organization because I think it is very important that we establish a program that delivers energy efficiency programming, raises awareness among Albertans about their energy consumption, and helps develop Alberta's energy efficiency services industry.

I think the hon. member might have some comments to make. I'd like to ask him: what would he like the structure of that to be, and what types of programming should we be seeing? We do know that Albertans of every stripe in the province do need to reduce their consumption. Perhaps the hon. member might have some insight into how we can do that or moving forward what might be . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-South East.

Mr. Fraser: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thanks to the hon. member. Well, it's true. I mean, in the beginning I did say that we're all in this together, and I do believe that there needs to be an economy-wide price on carbon. I did not say that we didn't. I just asked if now would be the right time. I'm not saying that you can't start now, but I'm saying that perhaps there is a scale. The way I say scale is that we can start now based on the way the economy is performing, and over time you can see increases, and that could be set by the expert panel based on the economy.

Again, we don't have to sacrifice the economy for the environment, or vice versa, but I think that there can be reasonable amendments and reasonable approaches to how we tackle that. We can all come up with that in this House. We all represent Albertans. We were all elected here, and that's such an honourable thing. You know, everybody here is proud to do that. We want to see good work on this. We want to see good work on the environment. We want to see good work on the economy.

Perhaps it's a scale of tax, right? Perhaps it's reducing some of the additional taxes even for those folks who have extra income to spend, because, you know, we want to drive the economy by spending. Those folks that can spend: we don't want to deter them. My guess is that the very folks that the NDP and this government champion – we seem to hear: teachers, nurses, and doctors. Well, guess what? Those folks are going to be paying additional carbon tax because they're going to be above that income. That's good, but we don't necessarily want it to be a penalty. Again, maybe it's a phase thing. So that's one of the things.

On the energy efficiency I'm not saying to not have the arm's-length body, but what I'm saying, based on past experience, is that sometimes in these agencies, because we are not clear on the outcomes or the targets we want set, again, which can happen here in this House, determined by all members – so we can all see this progress.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Bilous: Yes. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my honour to rise and speak to second reading of Bill 20. You know, I want to acknowledge the previous member and some of the comments he made. First of all, I appreciate the fact that he and his party recognize climate change is real. I also want to recognize that the member had some thoughtful comments to make on this bill, and I appreciate his interest in wanting to move on climate change. I appreciate that he has some concerns, so hopefully in the course of what I'm about to share, I can dispel some of his concerns.

I want to start off, Mr. Speaker, by saying first of all how proud I am of the work that the environment minister and the Premier have done on this historic bill. Quite frankly, I'll share with you a vision or an image that will stay in my mind for the rest of my life. That was last November, when our Premier and our Minister of Environment and Parks were on the stage to make the announcement of our historic climate leadership plan, joined by members of industry, CEOs of CNRL, of Shell, of Suncor, joined by indigenous leaders, who were also joined by representatives from world-leading environmental NGOs. It was historic in the sense that all of them shared a stage and had the same message, which is that this is absolutely the right way to move forward, that this is action that Alberta has been in need of for decades, and that this was really going to help jump Alberta to the front of the pack.

Frankly, Mr. Speaker, I have a few anecdotal stories to share with the House. In my travels and in my time as Economic Development and Trade minister the international attention that this piece of legislation and our government's historic climate leadership plan have brought to Alberta shouldn't be overlooked.

Quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, in my recent trade mission to China I can tell you that at every meeting with every official – and I met with both provincial and state officials – one of the top three issues that they are interested in and that China wants to take action on is climate and the environment. They were keenly interested to learn what we are doing here in Alberta. I can tell you, you know, that despite the fact that China is struggling still with emissions, from coal-fired electricity to heating and cooking with coal to other forms of energy, they are starting to pivot and move toward a greener environment. Frankly, that's a trend that we are seeing world-wide.

As I mentioned, I think, once in this House, I think it was also an incredible moment when our Prime Minister was speaking with the President of the United States, who directly referenced our Premier and Alberta and Alberta's climate leadership plan as being a robust plan that makes Alberta a leader internationally when it comes to action on our climate. It shows that our government not only has a vision for where we want to go but is acting on it.

I find it interesting, you know, when some members and some folks try to pit the economy versus the environment. Frankly, Mr. Speaker – and for years I've been saying this, even when I was an opposition member sitting in the corner of the House – the environment and the economy are two sides of the same coin. They are not opposites of one another. They do and can work quite well together. With my ministry and with my lens of job creation and economic diversification, one of the things that excites me the most about this bill is the fact that we are investing in not only energy efficiency, which is going to create jobs, but we're also investing in innovation and in clean technology, which, quite frankly, is something that internationally countries and different jurisdictions are investing significantly in. I do think that Alberta has been a leader when it comes to some of the innovation around our oil and gas sector.

I think that this bill will give the right incentives for companies to reduce their emissions and, quite frankly, to reduce them through innovative technologies, through best practices. And they will be rewarded in the sense that when they drive down their emissions, they can in fact earn credits that they can then turn and sell. What it does is that it incents our industry to do better, but it also rewards those that are leaders. Those that decide that they want to drag their feet and do little to address it, whether it's greenhouse gases or methane emissions, well, they're going to have to pay for it because, quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, we all pay for it. We pay for it through the air that we breathe, through the water that we drink, and through our environmental costs. This bill and this climate leadership plan does in fact incent those companies.

As well, Mr. Speaker, the environment minister has talked about a number of jurisdictions world-wide that are turning to a price on carbon because that is one of the ways that we are going to get meaningful action. I appreciate the previous speaker's comments about not now, but the challenge is: then when? You know, it makes me think of any new habit or new event that we want to do in our lives. It's very easy to put off, to put off, to put off for a better day. Well, you know what? There's no better day than today. Again, moving forward with this, I'm excited about the opportunities that we're going to have throughout our province.

I know some of the members opposite spoke about seniors and our most vulnerable and low-income Albertans. The environment minister has been very clear, but I'm happy to reiterate that two-thirds of Albertans will be receiving a rebate. So to talk about low-income seniors and how this is going to hurt their pockets: they are going to be rebated. This is not going to hurt their pockets. Outside of the rebate, again, we will be investing and reinvesting every dollar that's collected through this levy, whether it's into renewables, energy efficiency. There will be programs and opportunities for every Albertan to participate in should they so choose.

Again, you know, we are going to be driving the clean tech and innovations piece. I do want you to know, Mr. Speaker, that my counterpart the federal minister of innovation and science has through their budget signalled that innovation and investing in clean tech is a priority of our federal government. Now is absolutely the time to be investing in our province, and I can tell you that I will be working with my counterpart in Ottawa and the minister of environment to ensure that we are leveraging federal dollars for all of our initiatives around innovation and clean tech.

The other day our Premier signed a memorandum of understanding with the Premier of Ontario, looking for opportunities to collaborate on energy efficiency programs, on investing in clean tech and innovation. Mr. Speaker, that is how we are going to continue to not only move Alberta forward but how we're going to move Canada forward. It's become clear to me that investing in technologies and in people is absolutely critical.

You know, it's sad when members on the opposite side of the House want to do nothing and will reluctantly admit that there is an issue here that we need to address. What's frustrating is that when we look at, you know, our future generations and we look at our schools – and I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, being a teacher, that one of the number one issues that students bring up, that is near and dear to their hearts, is the environment and what we are doing to protect our environment, to ensure that when we pass it on to our kids and our grandkids, it is just as pristine as the way we found it. I can tell you that there are many, many school groups and many students across this province who are proud of the fact that their government is taking action, taking meaningful action, that is going to result in a far better and cleaner province for future generations.

If you would just indulge me for a second, Mr. Speaker. I'm just trying to find – here we go – a couple of other points that I wanted to make. Again, there were lots of concerns coming from the other side of the House as far as farmers, you know, getting their product to market. I recognize that market access is a challenge within our province. That's why I'm working diligently with the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry and the Minister of Transportation to come up with some solutions to help ensure that we are getting our product to market. But I do want to clarify for our farmers and ranchers that the minister of environment has been very clear that there will be purple gas, that they will not be paying the carbon levy on, to ensure that we are not unnecessarily burdening our agricultural sector and our farmers.

The other thing, Mr. Speaker – and I think this is maybe one of the reasons the Minister of Energy is so excited about this climate leadership plan – is that inaction for many, many years has resulted in zero pipelines to tidewater. Alberta is landlocked. We need to get our product to tidewater. At the moment we have one buyer who sets the price. We have a significant differential where we're losing about $15 per barrel on oil we're selling to the United States. If we want to reduce that differential, if we want to open up new markets, we need to get pipelines both east and west. I can tell you that this is climate leadership plan, despite what the opposition says, that the rest of the world has taken notice of and is interested not only in investing in Alberta but is interested in working with Alberta.

Again, our Premier had some very positive conversations with the Premier of Ontario, and they are interested in moving our products. They recognize that, you know, a pipeline like Energy East does not just benefit Alberta; it benefits Ontarians, it benefits Quebecers, it benefits those in the Maritimes, the prairies, and because of the tens of thousands of jobs that would be created from that project, the billions of dollars in GDP, it will benefit all Canadians. I can tell you that the Minister of Energy and myself and the Premier, at every opportunity we have in speaking with our federal counterparts and our provincial counterparts both east and west, talk about market access and that Alberta is doing its part. We need to co-operate with the rest of our country, so they see that we are taking meaningful action.

You know, I can't tell you, Mr. Speaker, how many times I stood in this House as a member of the fourth party, in opposition, frustrated to hear of the number of trips that the previous government took down to the States to try to promote pipelines, yet they refused to do anything about changing our reputation and the perception of Alberta. The rest of the world has been waiting for action. Well, they need not wait any longer because our government is taking meaningful action through this bill.

Mr. Speaker, as you probably well know, I could talk about this all day and all evening because it excites me quite a lot. But I just want to say that this bill is the right thing to do. It's the right thing not only for today and for tomorrow, but it's the right thing for our future generations. I am proud to support this bill.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Under 29(2)(a)?

Mr. Hanson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, the hon. minister mentioned all of the representatives from big industry that stood with the Premier and the minister of environment on the stage when they made the announcement. I'm just wondering if they were all so happy to do that because of clause 3(2)(a). I'll just read it quickly here for you.

3(1) The purpose of this Act is to provide for a carbon levy on consumers of fuel to be effected through a series of payment and remittance obligations that apply to persons throughout the fuel supply chains.

(2) The revenue from the carbon levy may only be used . . .

And I'll just read you the first one.

(a) for initiatives related to reducing emissions of greenhouse gases or supporting Alberta's ability to adapt to climate change.

I'm just wondering if this means that the carbon tax paid by average Albertans will be paying to subsidize big industry in their research and development to implement initiatives to reduce emissions and if any of this money from this carbon tax will be going to big oil companies like Canadian Natural Resources, Shell, et cetera.

Also, if we're going to be supporting big industry and the implementation of initiatives to reduce emissions, if the coal industry reduces their emissions to the point where they're at acceptable levels like natural gas, will they back down on the job-killing plan to shut down all of our coal industry in the province?

Thanks.

The Speaker: The hon. minister of economic development.

Mr. Bilous: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I don't think it's beneficial to the debate that the member is trying to clearly drive a wedge between some of our largest employers in the energy sector and Albertans. Quite frankly, this price on carbon is economy-wide. We've been clear on this. It is not just industries or the producers that are going to be paying this price on carbon. It is absolutely everyone who is contributing to polluting our environment. In fact, again, that is, quite frankly, the most equitable way to price carbon, where you're not penalizing one industry. I mean, I can tell you that I would imagine that had we chosen to only put a price on the producers, the opposition would jump up and down and talk about how we are anti-oil and -gas. Well, you know what? We believe everyone has a part to play, everyone shares in the responsibility, and therefore everyone will pay for their carbon footprint.

Again, there are numerous examples that the minister of environment has shared as far as whether it's economists or environmentalists world-wide who have talked about how pricing carbon is one of the most effective ways to drive innovation and efficiency. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I've spoken with a number of economists who have said that that part is fantastic. We also need to ensure that we're investing not only in energy efficiency but in innovation, which is exactly what our government is doing. I'm quite proud of the fact that innovation fits under my ministry, but I'll be working very closely with the minister of environment and CCEMC and all of the organizations that are working toward that.

Toward the tail end there the member talked about coal. Well, Mr. Speaker, we have talked at length about phasing out coal-fired electricity because of its detrimental effects on our health. Again, I'll reiterate the fact that out of our 18 coal-producing facilities, 12 of which, due to federal regulations, are set to close pre-2030, starting in 2019 – we made a commitment, and I made a commitment both to this House and outside of this House that I will be working with all affected communities throughout the province of Alberta. We want to work with those communities, especially those that, because of our actions, are phasing out before their end-of-life date.

We know, Mr. Speaker, that there are many opportunities for Albertans, whether it's through retraining, whether it's through opportunities for facilities to possibly repurpose to natural gas, or looking at other opportunities for workers within this province.

I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that what we're not going to do is to continue to do nothing. Quite frankly, this is one of those issues that is not just going to go away. Through our actions not only are we developing a social licence, but we are opening up new opportunities. We are transitioning to 30 per cent renewables, which – I can tell you that there are many that are quite exciting.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

The Member for Calgary-East.

Ms Luff: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm really excited to get to stand and speak to Bill 20 today. I feel like I'm going to probably echo a lot of what the Minister of Economic Development and Trade has said, but I am just thrilled about this bill. It's a bill that firmly establishes Alberta as a leader in climate environmental policy. It's a bill that will develop our economy, and it will create jobs. It's a bill that will protect my children and all Alberta children from the negative health impacts of low air quality, a bill that will allow Alberta to reduce our greenhouse gas emissions, which is the right thing to do because they cause climate change, because it is real.

A lack of action by the previous government on climate change is actually one of the main reasons I got involved in politics in the first place. Had the previous government chosen to take firmer action on climate change, had the federal government chosen to take more action on climate change, I might not have felt the need to run for politics and I might not have ended up here in this House. I got involved as a millennial, as a person with a science degree, and as an educator. I was tired of living with governments at both the provincial and federal level who just didn't care. They did the minimum amount required. They regularly received the fossil of the year award at international climate change meetings, meetings that have been happening more or less on an annual basis since the early 1990s.

I had said earlier in this House that I had been waiting my whole life for this legislation. I may have been exaggerating. I think that, more accurately, my desire for governments to act on ensuring that we have a clean environment started in about the fifth grade, when I first learned about the greenhouse effect and the depletion of the ozone layer. This, remarkably, is an area that we can draw on as a success story. The global scientific community noticed a problem in the '90s with the depletion of the ozone layer. The international political community acted, and we were able to reduce CFCs and subsequently slow the thinning of the ozone layer. The world did not stand idle on this. They did not allow things to continue as per the status quo.

Now, this is what the Official Opposition would have us do on the issue of climate change. They would have us do nothing. They spend a lot of time talking about increased costs, additional taxes, and that these are bad things because, seemingly, this is all that they know to talk about. It prevents them from having to talk about the real issue here, the issue that is climate change. The real issue is ensuring that our children – mine, yours, the world's children – have a planet to live on in the future.

I spent seven years of my life teaching, and if there's one thing that I know to be true, it's that kids know what's important. When I talk to kids, they ask me what we're doing to combat climate change. They recognize that climate change is the defining issue of our time and that if we don't do something about it, they're going to be in trouble when they grow up. I don't want to have my kids ask me when I get older: "Mom, why didn't you do anything? You were in a position where you could have done something, and you chose not to."

The longer we bury our heads in the sand and the longer we ignore the reality of stronger storms, more extreme temperature swings, acidifying oceans, melting glaciers, limited freshwater supply – I could go on – the harder it will be for our children to fix if they can fix it at all. We're not waiting. This government refuses to wait and see on the fundamental issue of our time. This government is moving Alberta forward.

This bill does several important things. It implements the carbon levy, which will provide incentives for people to reduce their emissions. My colleagues have tabled multiple articles that state that an economy-wide carbon price is well noted as the best way to reduce emissions.

It also puts rebates in place for two-thirds of Albertans that will help to offset costs. I'd just like to note that approximately 80 per cent of folks in my riding, Calgary-East, will receive this rebate. I have a lot of low-income seniors. I have a lot of folks who take public transit, who live in smaller homes, and these are people who are most likely going to have extra money in their pockets because of this rebate. They're going to be able to spend that money in the local economy: at our local co-op, cafes, restaurants.

Thirdly, what this bill does is that it creates Energy Efficiency Alberta, which will mean that we're no longer the last jurisdiction in North America to have an energy efficiency strategy.

I talk to people every day who are thrilled that we are moving forward with this policy. I was at a conference in Calgary recently on community solar development, and I spoke with people who had moved back to Alberta from Vancouver specifically because of our policies, specifically because they saw an opportunity here in Alberta that didn't exist elsewhere. They were going to be able to start a new business because of our government's climate change policy. They have hope for the first time for an industry here to grow that's outside of our traditional area of strength. I spoke to engineers who are starting residential solar companies, and lots of folks are interested in community solar development and, you know, residential solar development. They're excited that the possibility exists to be able to do something about having a cleaner future.

The Official Opposition continues to talk about companies running away because of this policy, but I'm going to have to disagree with them. This plan will help to create a modern and diversified economy. It's going to reinvest $6.2 billion directly right here in Alberta: $3.4 billion for large-scale renewable energy, bioenergy, and technology; $2.2 billion for green infrastructure, more transit; and $645 million for Energy Efficiency Alberta, which will deliver a variety of energy efficiency and microgeneration plans. I mean, together this is expected to create at least 3,000 new jobs. To deny that this plan will have any positive impact on the economy is its own kind of risky ideology.

You know, I have a friend who runs a company called urban green energy. He grew up with me, graduated high school, and he saw the opportunity in renewables and was able to start a company that makes little wind generators. They've installed them all over the world. They've installed them on the Eiffel Tower, football stadiums, Whole Foods in Brooklyn. By all accounts he's been very successful in renewables.

I've also heard the other side talk about a social licence as being a thing that we've created, that doesn't actually exist, but there are various occasions when I've heard positive results on this climate change policy from folks you might not expect. I sat next to the former Leader of the Official Opposition at an event not long ago, and she told me that the response she has received from business leaders and folks across Canada has been very positive, that they feel that this policy will help in getting our product to tidewater.

I've spoken with legislators from the United States, with Congressman Jeff Morris from Washington, who's done some amazing work on solar in his state, and Senator Arnie Roblan from Oregon. These are two gentlemen who represent a large swath of the west coast, which is an area that's very susceptible to climate change, and they're acutely aware of the need to act on it. They also both have pipelines that end in their ridings, pipelines that come from Alberta and end in Washington and in Oregon, and they're aware of the economic benefits they bring, the jobs that these pipelines provide. So they're very pragmatic on the need to balance economic benefits of fossil fuels with the needs of the environment, and they were both very positive and very excited to talk to us about our climate leadership plan.

The Leach report notes that "Alberta's fossil fuel resources will have lower value if we cannot develop them with lower emissions impact," that we need to develop processes which allow for value-added conversion to noncombustion products, which is something that we're doing through our petrochemical diversification program. For too long in this province and in this country we have put the environment at odds with the economy. I've heard the other parties state that this isn't something that we have to do, but when they were presented with the option to grow the economy and to help the environment, they didn't do it. They didn't recognize that the economy and the environment are fundamentally intertwined and that a global movement is in place to move to a carbon-constrained future. It's vital that we have a plan to move Alberta into that future, and this is that plan. I am so proud to support it, and I would urge all other members in the House to do so as well.

I've enjoyed listening to the debate so far. I believe that we have made good progress on Bill 20, so I would move to adjourn debate at this time.

[Motion to adjourn debate lost]

The Speaker: Are there any questions under 29(2)(a) to the Member for Calgary-East?

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to rise in support of Bill 20, a bill that I believe marks a historic step forward for our province. Now, we've heard a lot of criticisms since the introduction of our climate leadership plan. I'd just like to make one thing clear. A carbon levy is good public policy.

As noted by Dr. Andrew Leach, who chaired our Climate Change Advisory Panel, a wide consensus of economists around the world supports implementing a price on carbon. In the words of Canada's Ecofiscal Commission, a nonpartisan commission of economists whose advisory board includes such radical socialists as Preston Manning, former Alberta Finance minister Jim Dinning, economist Jack Mintz, who members opposite have called on for his nonpartisan expertise – they're all part of this group, and they state:

Carbon pricing makes economic sense for Canadian provinces. It reduces [greenhouse gas] emissions at the lowest possible cost... help[s] position Canada to better compete in carbon-constrained international markets by sparking low-carbon innovation [and] by representing a transparent and credible climate policy, and one known to be effective, [that] may help to secure... market access for our abundant and valuable natural resources.

There is no argument. All experts agree that placing a price on carbon is the best way to reduce emissions.

4:10

Now, it's important to note that in doing so, it is not the imposition of a new cost; it's the removal of a subsidy. For years economies around the world have failed to take into account the environmental and health impacts of business operations. The costs generated by these activities have instead been borne by all orders of government, who have simply absorbed the direct and indirect costs generated by the burning of fossil fuels. The costs realized through a price on carbon are not new ones that are being imposed from outside the economic system. They're costs that have always been there. The price on carbon simply makes them explicit and transparent as part of the cost of consumption. This provides an economic incentive to reduce those same costs by reducing the amount of carbon produced.

I apologize for the basic carbon tax 101, Mr. Speaker, but it seems to be something that's needed for some members of this House.

Currently there are about 40 countries and over 20 states, cities, and regions that have all stepped up to put a price on carbon, and now with this bill Alberta will lead Canada in joining this forward-thinking coalition. Our climate leadership plan was put together based on the advice provided by Dr. Andrew Leach and our Climate Change Advisory Panel. It has the support of industry, environmental advocates, municipal and federal partners, economists, health professionals, and investors. As recommended by economists, every dollar that is raised through this levy will be fully recycled.

Now, I was surprised earlier today to hear the Member for Calgary-Elbow state that he had never heard the term "revenue recycling." A quick Google search shows that this is, in fact, the common term that's used when discussing how government should make use of the funds raised through carbon pricing. Canada's Ecofiscal Commission released a report specifically on this issue entitled Choose Wisely: Options and Trade-offs in Recycling Carbon Pricing Revenues.

They make four recommendations on how governments should recycle carbon revenues. First, they suggest that governments should use revenue recycling to address fairness and competitiveness concerns surrounding carbon pricing. Second, they suggest that governments should clearly define their objectives for revenue recycling. What is it that they intend to do? What purposes do they intend to achieve? Third, they recommend that governments should use a range of approaches when recycling revenue. They feel that it's important that we have a variety of options and utilize many different levers to address the various issues that surround the issue of both climate change and the effects of putting a price on carbon. They note that each approach comes with particular strengths and weaknesses and that no one approach on its own can meet or address all of the important factors involved, which include things like maintaining household fairness, supporting business competitiveness, and also improving economic and environmental performance.

In this they note that governments have six main options for how they recycle carbon revenues: first, direct rebates to households and consumers; second, reductions in personal and corporate income tax; third, investments in low-carbon technology; fourth, investments in infrastructure; fifth, reduction of public debt; and then lastly, transitional support to industry. Now, interestingly, in this report they actually go through and look at various provinces across Canada, and they make some recommendations on how those different options should be prioritized. In the province of Alberta they placed a high priority on household transfers, on investments in low-carbon technology, and on transitional support to industry. They placed a low priority on cuts to personal and corporate income tax, perhaps recognizing that Alberta, of course, still remains the lowest tax jurisdiction in Canada.

An Hon. Member: You're welcome.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you. A tradition we're proud to continue.

They also place a low priority on reduction of public debt. They place a moderate priority on investments in infrastructure. Lastly, then, they recommend that all revenue recycling priorities should be monitored and adjusted over time.

Mr. Speaker, our plan meets all of these criteria. It calls for us to recycle $6.2 billion in revenues directly back into the economy through several channels and clearly outlines our objectives in doing so. Our plan calls for us to recycle $6.2 billion back into the economy. We're investing $3.4 billion in large-scale renewable energy, bioenergy, and technology. This, as has been noted by my colleagues ahead of me, will help to create jobs in the province of Alberta while moving us to a more secure energy system that will cause fewer problems and difficulties in terms of health. We're investing $2.2 billion in green infrastructure like transit, and we're investing an additional $645 million in Energy Efficiency Alberta.

At long last, Mr. Speaker, as has been noted by some of the members ahead of me, we are finally bringing an energy efficiency program to the province of Alberta. On that point, I'd like to note that I hear members opposite that are expressing all kinds of concerns about the effects this may have on businesses, the effects it may have on nonprofit groups and communities, on our schools, our hospitals. We're taking bold action. Alberta is a province that's known for bold action. We are a province of innovators. We are a province of people who step up and face a challenge. Through Energy Efficiency Alberta we will be standing alongside all of our community partners. We're not abandoning them. We are going to work with them to help them find the efficiencies that members of the opposition seem to believe are everywhere to be found except when it comes to climate change or in trying to reduce the use of carbon.

We will work with our partners in communities. We will work with them. We will help them. We will provide programs that support them to help achieve the energy efficiency that we need and that will assist them ultimately, Mr. Speaker, to reduce their costs and to pay less than they currently pay.

With that, I think we're going to have more opportunity to further this debate. I'd like at this point, then, to make a motion to adjourn debate.

[The voice vote indicated that the motion to adjourn debate carried]

Introduction of Guests

(reversion)

The Speaker: The Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to my colleagues for this opportunity. Given that we have two guests in the audience that I've worked with over a number of years, I thought I'd take the time to introduce them. They're above the opposition members, facing the government side, and they are Mary Martin and Dave Coburn. Mary is the chair of the Calgary Catholic school board. Dave was the chair of the Edmonton public school board when I first became a trustee. They're both strong advocates for children and comprehensive school health. Please rise. Please join me in welcoming them.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Government Motions

Medical Assistance in Dying

17. Ms Payne moved:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to implement measures to regulate medical assistance in dying consistent with the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Carter versus Canada (Attorney General) and any legislative measures approved by the Parliament of Canada to ensure that Albertans can benefit from the orderly implementation of this court decision so that:

- Albertans may exercise their rights to access medical assistance in dying;
- appropriate safeguards be put in place to protect vulnerable Albertans;
- conscience rights are respected while ensuring the right of patients to access this service;
- the practice of medical assistance in dying is closely monitored and measures regulating medical assistance in dying are reviewed within one year.

The Speaker: The Associate Minister of Health.

Ms Payne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Supreme Court of Canada has decided that existing federal criminal law violated the rights of Canadians to avail themselves of medical assistance in dying. This coming Monday that ruling comes into effect. For that reason, it is important that we move forward with our regulations. The federal government has the primary responsibility for legislation in this area, and we intend for our regulations to fit within their legislative framework, which isn't yet set and actually may be subject to court challenges.

In the meantime Alberta needs to be prepared. Today I am rising to introduce a motion that outlines the principles that will guide our government as we move forward on providing medical assistance in dying. Our government will seek to ensure that Albertans may exercise their rights to access medical assistance in dying, that appropriate safeguards are put in place to protect vulnerable Albertans, that conscience rights are respected while ensuring the rights of patients to access medical assistance in dying, that the practice of medical assistance in dying is closely monitored, and that measures regulating medical assistance in dying are reviewed.

There has been much debate at the federal level on this important and deeply emotional topic. Our government has undertaken significant consultation with the public to get their feedback related to medical assistance in dying. We are ahead of other jurisdictions in terms of the consultations we've undertaken. Through these consultations Albertans clearly told us that they generally support medical assistance in dying but expect strong safeguards to protect the vulnerable and ensure the safety of patients and health care providers.

We heard from more than 15,000 Albertans, and they told us that just slightly more than half supports eligibility for those under 18 as long as they are mature and competent enough to understand the request. All agreed that for a request to be valid, the person must have made the application while still cognitively competent enough to make the request. All submissions agreed that special cautions are needed for those with mental health and addictions issues. These are just a few examples of what we heard about this complex issue when we talked with Albertans.

Our government also completed extensive consultation with the medical community and other key stakeholders. Further, Alberta is the only province outside Quebec where our Legislature will have the opportunity to provide feedback on this deeply personal and difficult issue. That's what we're doing by putting forward this motion in the House to outline the principles that are framing our regulations. We will also be making the draft regulations public so that the opposition can provide input in this House on those regulations if they wish to do so. Our draft regulations are in line with the Carter decision. We look forward to a respectful debate with our colleagues on an issue of such importance to Albertans.

Mr. Speaker, we know that medical assistance in dying will be a practice and a process that will evolve over time. Our responsibility in this matter is actually quite small and specifically relates to the framework for medical providers and patients. We are committed to supporting the rights of patients who wish to use their right to access medical assistance in dying as laid out in the Carter decision.

At the same time we are interested in enabling this in the way that is the least polarizing and intrusive. We are not taking a heavy hand in enforcement. We do reserve the right to change our approach if it becomes unmanageable and patients wishing to access this right cannot do so, but we are moving forward in a way that is as respectful as it can be to all people in Alberta. This framework will allow enough flexibility to adapt to issues as they arise and to ensure a seamless transition once the federal legislation is passed. It will ensure that Alberta takes a responsible approach to providing access to those who qualify in this new area of law and medicine while protecting health care workers, patients, and vulnerable Albertans.

I invite my colleagues to begin this important conversation today and to work with us to make sure that the framework is in place to support Albertans who make this choice starting June 6. I look forward to tabling the draft regulations in the House.

Thank you.

4:40

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat.

Mr. Barnes: Mr. Speaker, thank you very, very much. I guess I want to start by saying that I heard the associate minister talk about the opportunity to have Albertans fully, fully involved in this, the most important of areas: end of life, family, you know, areas that are crucial and sometimes very hard to talk about. So I hope that the NDP government means what they say when they talk about listening to Albertans, when they talk about allowing the opposition to do our outreach to all Albertans as well and to ensure that everyone, all faiths, all ideas, good front-line health workers, family, and community builders, all legitimately get heard.

Yeah. I heard that a few minutes ago from the associate minister, and I'm grateful. I heard that at 10 after 3 in our prebriefing upstairs, and I'm grateful that that was said. But, Mr. Speaker, I'm concerned, and I want Albertans to know that, you know, like, yeah, we knew that June 6 was set by the federal government a long time ago. Of course, we don't know what the framework is. This has started off in a way, though, that hasn't made it easy for the opposition to be involved, and that is this government's fault. We were given the first draft on Friday. That was changed yesterday, and at 3 o'clock today I was told about a meeting at 3 o'clock. So I hurriedly went to it, and, yeah, the information and what was shared were a start, but by a quarter to 4 a different NDP minister was knocking on the door, wanting the room. The meeting was over, with so many questions unanswered. Okay.

Associate Minister, this is a start. This is a framework for all Albertans – all Albertans – from all communities, all faiths, all ideas to be heard. Mr. Speaker, we haven't started that way, so I hope that we finish that way. I hope that we truly, truly mean that this is going to be, you know, one of the key areas that we can get Albertans involved in. In my four years as an MLA very fortunate and grateful to represent Cypress-Medicine Hat, about assisted dying – it's called other things – I have had countless people e-mail me and call me. Albertans want to be involved in this because we have ideas, because we're loving and caring, because it's one of the most important parts of life, and it's one of most unknown. It comes down to protecting the vulnerable. It comes down to protecting the conscience rights of top-notch front-line health workers. My assistant said it to me this way: the closer you get to this, the harder this is.

Let's make sure that everyone has a chance to be heard. Let's make sure that everyone has a chance to be respected. Mr. Speaker, I think we're off to a bad start, though. You know, here we are talking about regulations as opposed to legislation. Would Albertans be better serviced, would the voice of Albertans be heard better if we, the 87 of us in this House, the 87 representatives of 4.3 million Albertans, had the opportunity, in a full and fulsome and respectful way, to debate all the things, the assisted dying legislation and the regulations that the province is going to put in, and what all that is about? I think yes. I appreciate that it was a very short, quick meeting that had to end, but there were some things that weren't in the regulations that the government released to Albertans at 4 o'clock and to me at 10 after 3 that greatly concern me. The words "mental health" weren't in there. Yeah, there's maybe a mechanism through a committee of doctors in a referral motion but maybe not.

Oh, my goodness, a cooling-off period. Once people are in that terrible, terrible situation where they think that this is the best option for them, I guess – we've talked to many experts and stakeholders that we've reached out to that talk about a 14-day or longer waiting period. I don't see that anywhere in here.

Back to my opening remarks, it's incumbent on you across the floor to make sure that these ideas are heard and listened to and are actually – actually – done in a way that protects Albertans. It's not in here. Again, that argues to me that we need legislation, where we can all stand up in second reading, Committee of the Whole, and third reading and give it a full, robust discussion.

I didn't see the word "terminal" before one can go through the process and the mechanisms, and I was told that that was because of the Carter court case and some of the implications around that. I think the word, instead, was "irremediable." I don't know, guys. Colleagues, I think Albertans need a chance to understand what all this means. I think we need a chance to ensure that people are protected.

You know, it's difficult to speak on behalf of my constituents as well, the people who elected me to the House to represent them and their concerns, when I've only just been provided the relevant materials mere minutes ago.

I want to talk about protecting the vulnerable, and I'll be frank. That concerns me greatly, but I have no idea. You know, as a four-year MLA, before that as a businessperson, a rancher, a real estate person, and, most importantly, as a father, as a husband, I don't even know what the word "vulnerable" really means when it comes to something this important and who qualifies and who doesn't, but I'll tell you, Mr. Speaker, that 4.3 million Albertans do. Many, many experts out there will be able to help us frame that in a way that I think only legislation can do, only the opportunity to have this on the floor of the Legislature for a considerable period of time.

Mr. Speaker, we have to have a full and robust and understanding talk about conscience rights. As I said, my assistant talks about how the closer you get to this, the harder it is, and he's absolutely right. What do conscience rights mean? Does it mean that if you don't want to be involved in the process, you only have to refer? Should a person not have the right or the obligation to refer even if it's just to a committee or a provider of assisted death, euthanasia, assisted suicide. My God, what is the right thing to call it?

Mrs. Aheer: Medical assistance in dying.

Mr. Barnes: Medical assistance in dying. Okay. Thank you.

Let's see what 4.3 million Albertans think the obligation should be on good health care providers. I personally think that they should have the right and the opportunity for full and complete conscience rights. I'm only one of 4.3 million Albertans. Let's take the time to hear from them. Let's take the time to do it right.

4:50

In closing, you know, our time in here: a lot of it is about respect. It's respect for Albertans. It's respect for getting these laws as good as we can. I mean, I think the first thing to realize about being in here is all the unintended consequences, how often our good intentions go south. That's why it's important, Mr. Speaker, to ensure that our conscience rights are protected, that all vulnerabilities of people and aspects are protected, that all options are protected. I think the best way to do that is a full legislative process, not a regulation process as undertaken by well-meaning, qualified bureaucrats. This may be the most important thing even with the overriding court jurisdiction and the overriding federal legislation. Getting this right for the day-to-day Albertan, for the health care professional, for our communities and our families may be the most important thing that we do here.

Mr. Speaker, thank you very much.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Lougheed.

Mr. Rodney: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. What I'm about to say comes with the greatest of respect personally, professionally, and politically. I trust that it will be taken in the way in which it is given. That said, I must say that I believe it is shocking that with fewer than 72 hours left in the spring session as scheduled, the NDP has tabled crucial documents directly related to the life and death of Albertans and dedicated a mere six hours to the most important decision of any person's life.

However, with humility, it may be said that in certain ways I've been preparing this speech for a long, long time in that my introduction to public speaking was in grade 7, when I was asked to deliver a speech to 555 junior high school classmates at a joint public and Catholic high school, and the topic was nothing less than the importance of the Hippocratic oath, for the medical profession to do good and do no harm.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to read the entire oath into the record, but since the government is granting limited time to this debate, I will refer to two excerpts only. The first:

I will use treatment to help the sick according to my ability and judgment, but never with a view to injury and wrong-doing. Neither will I administer a poison to anybody when asked to do so, nor will I suggest such a course.

Secondly:

Into whatsoever houses I enter, I will enter to help the sick, and I will abstain from all intentional wrong-doing and harm, especially from abusing the bodies of man or woman.

Mr. Speaker, quoting the Hippocratic oath in that public-speaking experience led to a couple of related degrees and a master's as well as a few decades in the school of hard knocks, which leads us to this day. When I couple experiences like these with reliable and trusted research, I'm actually quite calm and confident with what I am about to share with you here and now.

I'll start with this: Alberta's Overdue Assisted Dying Debate Is Too Little, Too Late. Not my words, Mr. Speaker. This is the dramatic headline from an article by Paula Simons in today's Edmonton Journal on the website. She uses phrases like "jaw-dropping" in reference to answers recently provided by the Health minister with respect to assisted dying.

She goes on:

It's a telling comment, not just because of its seeming insensitivity, but because it underlines just how ill-prepared Alberta is . . .

We are about to embark on a social, scientific and ethical experiment that redefines power relations between patients, doctors and the law. It's a tectonic cultural shift that may change, forever, the way we define self-determination, personal liberty and quality of life. Yet legally and politically, we're just not ready for this transition . . .

But this debate? This is too little, too late . . .

[The government] had a chance to show real moral and political leadership . . .

Instead, we're getting some vague, rushed symbolic debate of "high-level" principles, principles that will allegedly guide regulations that have already been drafted.

After that . . . it may take . . . another two to three weeks to get those regulations to the cabinet table, to be debated and passed by order-in-council. Assuming C-14, which doesn't even conform with the Carter rule, fails to get through the Senate before then, we'll be left in regulatory limbo.

Again, not my words. This is from the article in the Edmonton Journal.

Mr. Speaker, if that does not give members pause, perhaps this headline will: Experts Warn against Rushing Assisted Dying Bill through Parliament, by Colette Derworiz of the Calgary Herald from just yesterday.

Experts gathered at the University of Calgary for Congress 2016 . . . suggested the law shouldn't be rushed, during a panel called The future of end-of-life decision making in Canada.

Their words:

"It's unconscionable that the federal government is looking to put in a bill that will have to be challenged," said Jocelyn Downie . . . a professor of health-care ethics and law at the University of Dalhousie.

Mr. Speaker, the same applies to this provincial motion. It fails the fine people of our province, and I understand why Albertans will be outraged. It is unacceptable that the NDP is just now contemplating its plan for creating critically important parameters around medically assisted dying. This government has known for a year that creating parameters around assisted dying ultimately would fall to it, yet here we are, mere days before the Supreme Court deadline and at the very end of our spring session, cobbling together regulations for this most serious of acts. It's shocking. I dare say that if our former government tried to do something like this, the current government, perhaps the Official Opposition, other parties, and all Albertans would be screaming about this from the rooftops.

Let me be clear, Mr. Speaker, if I haven't been already. Whether or not the Supreme Court's decision takes effect after June 6 is a question that has already been answered. I am not debating that whatsoever. Instead, the issue at hand is whether or not the appropriate safeguards are in place to protect vulnerable Albertans; to ensure that health professionals who have a conscientious objection to participating in any way with assisted death are respected and protected; to respect faith-based care facilities, which may have concerns with the practice; and to respect indigenous communities, which may need special assistance in dealing with spiritual concerns. Obviously, that's a partial list. Albertans may have many more concerns. Those are just some of the issues that Alberta needs to grapple with as it develops measures for implementing medical assistance in dying.

What about mental health support for families who will go through this extremely highly emotional and potentially psychologically damaging experience with their loved ones? What about ensuring that similar supports are available for doctors, nurse practitioners as well as nurses, pharmacists, and professional caregivers? There are many other outstanding issues such as: without national legislation in place, will Alberta's regulations more closely align with the federal government's plan for a more restricted and conservative approach, which offers greater protection to vulnerable Albertans? The federal legislation also proposes to restrict assistance in dying to those for whom death is reasonably foreseeable.

On the other hand, Alberta's regulations could run closer to the Supreme Court's liberal approach, which opens up assisted dying to mature minors, people whose mental illness causes them extreme anguish, and other Canadians who live with severe discomfort from a physical condition. The discrepancy is extremely troubling.

We cannot take these questions lightly, and we must take the time to answer these questions. A rushed debate in this House with the end result giving cabinet permission to make the final decision behind closed doors and then releasing it to Albertans as a fait accompli is unconscionable.

There are more hard questions, and I say this with respect, but it's true. This new cabinet does not have a great deal of experience. It's simply a matter of time. Other questions they will have to ask and answer include: what about whether patients can administer lethal drugs themselves or whether a physician has to perform this procedure? What about access to medically assisted dying outside of our large cities? The rural dynamic is completely different. A patient may have trouble finding two doctors in a small community to approve a request. Does this set up a double standard within the province of Alberta?

What about doctors who would prefer to see palliative care improved for their patients rather than having to offer them this choice? If their patient seeks a referral to a doctor who will perform the procedure, will they have to provide that referral? My heart is troubled when I think about this next question: does that make them complicit in their final act, and is this fair to them? These are extremely important questions, that Albertans are just starting to think about. So, colleagues, please: why shut this conversation down so quickly? Why limit it to just us, here and now, in this House?

Mr. Speaker, this government has already drafted these regulations. There is no way it could have started from scratch a year after it received notice that it was going to have to develop them let alone days before they are to be approved. So today this may be the most important question: why did the government choose to release the draft regulations for all Albertans to see and ponder and discuss only this afternoon? There can be no reason not to have made them public and to seek input on what was tabled today before today.

Yes, there was a panel. They didn't present these. We're not talking about a proposed text for a directive, a ministerial order, an order in council. We're talking about people's lives. We're talking about the loved ones of those Albertans facing an emotionally difficult experience. We're talking about professionals entering a new world of health care, if you want to call it that.

As legislators we understand the task at hand. It relates to determining the parameters of delivering this service to Albertans. What we in the Progressive Conservative caucus cannot accept is that this government left it so late that we are now pressured to offer cabinet carte blanche to ensure that they are done right and on time. Again, with great respect, Mr. Speaker, for many, many reasons, that I've been hearing about for a year, I do not think that Albertans – I'm going to phrase this very kindly – have had the time to build the trust in this government to make decisions like this for them at this time. I trust I'm being fair in that comment. So I ask again with great respect: will you please let all Albertans have some time to digest this? It's only fair.

Isn't it true, colleagues, that a short time ago no one referred to this as assisted dying? It was euthanasia or mercy killing. At the very least, our society needs some time to figure this out. To emphasize a reason for this, I quote a surprising source from a recent article in the Ottawa Citizen. The quote begins:

While the Liberal government says time is of the essence in passing its assisted-dying legislation, former prime minister Paul Martin says what Canada needs is "a good bill," and that debate on the proposed law should not be "bound by arbitrary timelines."

"I am like a lot of Canadians," Martin said.

That was on Thursday.

"I think it's a very, very difficult subject. And if I just look at myself, I'm still just thinking it through. I think it's important we get it right, and that we don't be bound by arbitrary timelines."

That's the former Liberal Prime Minister of this country.

This goes far beyond any party lines, colleagues. Mr. Speaker, this is good advice for the federal Liberals, the provincial NDP, all Canadians, and all Albertans. I acknowledge that Alberta is legally required to develop regulations surrounding medical assistance in dying; however, I completely disagree with giving cabinet sole authority to develop the final regulations in secret and without fulsome debate in our province and in our Assembly.

As such, I cannot support the motion. Getting this wrong can be catastrophic for our society. I implore all members of our House: do the right thing and vote with . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Under 29(2)(a), the Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to engage through 29(2)(a) and to ask questions and also respond to some of the questions that were asked. First, I want to say that while the member complains about the debate starting today, I share his frustration that we are at the point where we're starting within the House today the discussions around this. Part of my frustration is caused by some of what's happened through the federal government in terms of delays. They themselves are debating their legislation this afternoon, but certainly their Senate process hasn't unfolded yet.

It certainly was my plan A that we take the time following Carter, which was decided under the previous government, actually. There was a timeline set by the Supreme Court on that, and then the extension, and then the federal legislation for ours to flow. Because the "what" is not to be debated in this House. The "what" has been decided by the Supreme Court, and most of the questionable points that have been raised already so far are, again, federal jurisdiction around the “what,” around criminal charges and so forth. The “how” is the provision of the health care service.

Certainly, there have been many discussions. I’m very pleased that the associate minister along with the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud and the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View were part of a committee that gathered feedback and met with many stakeholders throughout Alberta. There were over 15,000 Albertans who shared their feedback and did engage in a dialogue and discussion around this. As a response to those 15,000 submissions as well as the targeted stakeholder meetings there was a report created that was released publicly last week. It’s the What We Heard report. It is 100 per cent sure that this is a very personal and very difficult discussion and decision, but the Supreme Court has made it very clear that the decision rests with the individual.

In terms of my questions, I guess, one of the questions that I would like to ask the hon. Member for Calgary-Lougheed is: did he engage in the last nearly 18 months since the Supreme Court decision with some of his stakeholders, constituents, and so forth either when he was on the government side or the opposition side to gather their feedback? Has he had a chance to review the What We Heard report, which I think is a very thoughtful synopsis of where Albertans stand on these issues today?

Clearly, we wanted to make sure that we had opportunity for debate. Yes, I wish we were in a position where the federal legislation had passed two months ago and we had two months in this House, if we needed it, to have that discussion. But the federal legislation is only being considered, finally, this afternoon. The Senate still has to do its process.

Certainly, I’m proud of the fact that we are having a public debate. Quebec and Alberta are the only two jurisdictions to actually have had a public debate before the June 6 scheduled deadline. I think we should be proud of that.

I think we should take this opportunity to talk about how the provision of the health care service is best to be delivered in Alberta, honouring that this is a very personal issue. We need to protect the vulnerable. We need to protect conscience rights, which means that nobody will be required to provide this service, only those that put their hands up. But I’m very proud that we have over 80 physicians included in every single zone across this province who have put their hands up saying that they are absolutely willing to be partners in supporting the individuals who do make this choice. They are not pushing this choice. Certainly, in terms of palliative care and home care that was in our platform, and those are areas that we intend to move forward on as well, Mr. Speaker.

I’m happy to hear the remarks from the Member for Calgary-Lougheed.

Mr. Rodney: And I’m so happy to respond. Sadly, time dictates that I have 70 seconds to answer these questions on life-and-death issues.

The “what” I’m not debating for a second. I made that clear in my remarks. The “how” is what I have a problem with. Yes, there were 15,000 people that responded to an online survey. With great respect, Madam Minister, they did not have hard copies of this. If they did, we would have a completely different conversation.

Yes, I have engaged many constituents not just over the past year but over my lifetime. I can say that honestly. Again, though, we didn’t have these. This is the issue.

Have I had a chance to review the What We Heard report? Yes. It was tabled a short time ago. Again, that is based on what we see here. We need to move forward on this, and the fact is that there has not been time for this Assembly to even read these documents let alone for the public in Alberta to.

I have great sympathy for the fact that you’re in this situation, but I believe that you have put yourself in this situation. If these had been drafted a long, long time ago, as you could have – you knew that this day was coming – then we would have a different conversation here. I honestly, with great respect, wish that we did have that time.

With that, I believe that we’re out of time. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Dr. Swann: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Obviously, a very critical piece of legislation, in this case in the form of a motion, which was a surprise. But given the realities that we’ve faced in the last couple of years, in fact, I would echo some of what the minister has said. The previous government knew that this was coming three years ago. I raised it with a couple of former ministers of Health. They didn’t want to touch it. They wanted to wait. The Supreme Court made a decision 18 months ago. Still no sign of action from the government of the day. What we’re left with is a federal government that has not done its job in terms of making a timely decision and a provincial government that is also late in making the decision.

The reality is that Monday Alberta is going to change with the rest of Canada, and we’re all going to be – as the minister says, the “what” is clear, that doctor-assisted dying will be a reality. The question is: are we going to have enough guidelines and regulations in place that both the physicians and the patients and their families can be confident that they know what to do, who to contact, how to go through the process and have confidence that if something goes wrong, there will be a process for accountability for the something that might go wrong?

What doctors have been doing for all of history is making decisions with their patients about whether assisting them with medical interventions is improving their dying or enhancing their living. That is a decision that every doctor has been making for eons. Do we intervene? In what way do we intervene? That is a discussion with every patient that is coming to those difficult, difficult end-of-life times. So this is really a question of prolonging living or prolonging the dying process and adding to the suffering of a person that has actually made a conscientious decision to stop the suffering or to stop living, in fact.

I was pleased to see these guidelines today, the regulations. That’s the part that I think has created a lot of consternation. I, too, would love to have seen these last week or last month. We got them today.

Let me just say that the proposal that will amend the College of Physicians & Surgeons’ standard of practice looks comprehensive in many respects. It deals with the essentials of who can give permission, who can give consent, what qualifications the physician must have. Again, it doesn’t indicate a nurse practitioner, and there was a national discussion that nurse practitioners could also be involved with this. That’s something we’ll have to address at some point in the future. But the essence of these guidelines will require a physician – two physicians, in fact – to certify that the person is of sound mind and making a decision conscientiously.

The period of time for reflection isn’t indicated here, but I can tell you that any physician that I’ve talked to wants to have a period of time when everything can be reviewed so the family and the individual and the appropriate health professionals can assure themselves that this is not something that is being made lightly and that there are proper opportunities for the person to reverse their decision.

Issues like a medical examiner being involved in these unnatural deaths – any unnatural deaths are supposed to be referred to the medical examiner to make sure that it wasn't murder. Those are part and parcel of the regulations.

An annual review is identified in the regulations, which, again, gives me some assurance that the review committee after a year will look at the process and receive complaints from family members who say that it went poorly or that it went well but it could be improved. As in all cases of legislation and policy all of us want to see improvements over time.

What we know is that the majority of Canadians and Albertans want this support, and they want to have a clear path to get to the destination, which in rare cases will be physician-assisted dying. It may or may not be necessary in this document to specify whether the doctor has to be present at the time of death or whether just the family can be present and the medication self-administered. I don't see anything here to say whether the doctor's presence is required.

The other area that is so critical – I think others have brought this up – is protecting the vulnerable. Who are the vulnerable? They're people who could be coerced, that could be undermined by those in family or in close association who are after their money or after their estate or want to be relieved of the burden of caring for them. There has to be some real, rigorous attempts by the health care team to assess whether there's any degree of coercion on this individual to make a decision that they don't really want, that they're not really wanting doctor-assisted dying. That has to be properly reviewed and assessed.

From everything I've read, you know, people in palliative care – most of us will end up in palliative care in the last weeks or months of life. It's a very small proportion, perhaps 4 per cent, of those who are suffering and in the process of dying that actually avail themselves in the areas where they can in the world. Only about 4 per cent of those in terminal stages want assistance in dying. So this is not going to be, I would venture, a very common event, but it's something that we have to accommodate not only because of the Supreme Court but because, I think, the majority of Albertans and Canadians have said: we want more control over the nature and the timing of our death.

The final thing I want to say, I guess – and I will be supporting this motion, recognizing that there may be some gaps, there may be some improvements we can make, and that this will be an ongoing process of review. The final thing I want to say is that this can never be an excuse for weak palliative care. We have pockets in this province where there is almost no access to palliative care. We have an unequal system around the province and around the country. I think it's fair to say that there will be unequal access to palliative care and there will be unequal access to physician-assisted dying. We have to make this as equitable as we can.

In the first instance we have to have top-of-the-line palliative care, which will prevent many requests for doctor-assisted dying. There's no question that if people are suffering mentally or physically or massive indignities because they can't get the proper nursing support for their bodily functions or they become so dependent and are not getting the supports that they need, then they will be more likely to ask for a quick death.

Having said that, there are clearly ways that we can support excellent palliative care. There are dedicated professionals whom I know are in palliative care and will not be involved in physician-assisted dying. Their role, their training, their focus is entirely on relieving suffering and helping people to die with dignity as much as possible but with all the supports that are possible now through the medical system. It is in fact rare that people would suffer in pain given the current drug regimes that we have. It's rare that people would not have the basic technical and material supports that they need, but it still happens.

I guess I would welcome the palliative care society, palliative care physicians and nurses, to weigh in on this and make sure that we as legislators, the Health minister particularly, know where the problems are in palliative care and that we do everything possible to ensure that people are not making this choice because it's a default from inadequate palliative care.

Dr. Starke: Experienced everywhere else.

Dr. Swann: Yeah. Exactly. It is an experience that all of Canada and all of the world struggles with.

With those comments, Mr. Speaker, I will take my seat and look forward to hearing other perspectives on this.

The Speaker: Are there any questions of the hon. member under 29(2)(a)? The Member for Banff-Cochrane.

Mr. Westhead: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I just want to ask the hon. member: as the longest serving member here this evening in the Chamber how often has he seen the government give opposition members a technical briefing and a copy of draft regulations on a government motion in his experience?

Dr. Swann: This is unusual. Along with many of my colleagues we appreciate the fact that we can see some of these regulations and start to iron out some of the differences and have some debate, inadequate debate as it is. Possibly it will be inadequate no matter how long we spend at it. But to be fair, I guess we can debate this just as long as we choose.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Under 29(2)(a)?

The Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Dr. Turner: I'm speaking to the motion, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Yes.

Dr. Turner: Thank you very much. The Supreme Court of Canada has decided that existing criminal law violates the right of Canadians to avail themselves of medical assistance in dying. By this coming Monday that ruling comes into effect. For that reason, it's very important that we move forward with our regulations now.

In its February 6, 2015, ruling, Carter versus Canada, the Supreme Court of Canada unanimously declared unconstitutional the Criminal Code prohibitions on physician-assisted dying as violating the individual's right to life, liberty, and security of person. We are committed to supporting the rights of patients who wish to use their right to access medical assistance in dying, as laid out in the Carter decision, while at the same time we're interested in enabling this in the way that is least polarizing and least intrusive. We're not taking a heavy hand to enforcement, and we must protect the vulnerable populations. This motion supports physicians who will be providing this service and supports patients who wish to exercise their right to medical assistance in dying. This is a deeply personal decision, and we will ensure that patients and their families are supported in getting the information they need.

In an effort to design a regulatory framework that meets the needs of Albertans and health care professionals, our government created an MLA consultation panel to gather input from Albertans. I was on that as well as the Member for Calgary-Mountain View and the Associate Minister of Health. We collected feedback through online surveys, written submissions, and meetings with stakeholders while recognizing that medical assistance in dying is an important, sensitive, and very emotional issue for Albertans. As was said, the consultation included an online survey with over 15,000 responses and a request for submissions from stakeholder groups and community advocates, some of whom also met with the committee. Consultation varied across the spectrum of stakeholders, including medical professionals, religious groups, First Nations, legal professionals, and the general public.

The work was completed over the past year, and it was done so that Albertans had options and directions regardless of the outcome of the federal bill. Consequently, in creating Alberta's regulatory framework, our government will also collaborate with other provinces, territories, and the federal government. The public and organizational feedback and submissions will be considered, and we'll be engaging with Alberta Health Services, the College of Physicians & Surgeons of Alberta, and others to develop the standards, measures, policies, and practices that meet the needs of Albertans and Albertan health care professionals.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Any questions for the Member for Edmonton-Whitemud under 29(2)(a)?

Dr. Swann: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the hon. member could clarify for me one of the elements of the proposed standards, which I had hoped to raise and forgot. Subsection (4) under point 3 in the proposed text for order in council suggests that a regulated member [a physician] who receives an oral or written request from a patient for medical assistance in dying and who declines for reasons of conscience or religion to provide or to aid in providing medical assistance in dying must ensure that reasonable access to the Alberta Health Services care coordination service is provided to the patient without delay.

What is the care co-ordination service referred to here? Are you aware if there is an existing care co-ordination service, or is it just the 811 number that people dial to find a doctor who will participate? Are you aware of a care co-ordination service?

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Dr. Turner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. This is not the 811 Health Link number. This is, to my understanding, something that Alberta Health Services is developing to ensure that all Albertans have – in whatever part of the province that they live, whatever circumstances they are in, in whatever form of institution or in their home – access to this service when it becomes appropriate under regulation.

The Speaker: Any other questions under 29(2)(a)?

Dr. Swann: One of the issues that we must discuss at some point, I guess – the conscience rights of physicians is clear. If a physician is not prepared on the basis of conscience to participate, they should not be forced to. However, all publicly funded institutions, it seems to me, should be providing the service that the government of Alberta has provided on the basis of equality across the province. Can the member make some statement himself about how he feels about that issue and how we might have that discussion here and give some direction to the minister about how we as a Legislature feel publicly funded institutions should address the question of participation in physician-assisted dying?

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Dr. Turner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you for the question. I'm really not prepared to talk about the substance of your question. I would actually refer you to the standards of the College of Physicians & Surgeons of Alberta, which deals with this situation quite clearly.

The Speaker: Any other questions under 29(2)(a)?

The hon. Member for Calgary-South East. I have your name here.

Mr. Fraser: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's an honour, once again, to rise and speak to this. You know, it's oftentimes that we see in this House the best things of your elected officials. We can refer to things like the fire, and we can refer to things like the flood, where people come together because people's lives are immediately put at risk. We care deeply about our constituents most of all and this province and the reputation of the democratic process in choosing your elected official to speak on your behalf on the matters that are near and dear to your heart. You saw some of the emotion, my colleague from Calgary-Lougheed, and I think anybody in this House who doesn't think that this is an emotional debate – it would be interesting to hear why you would think it's not an emotional debate. Now, I hope, with the new minister that was named in terms of democratic renewal, that this is not the democratic renewal that you'll be imposing on this province for years to come, when we receive something like this, in a matter of hours to debate some crucial elements to these regulations.

5:30

I can speak as a front-line advanced care paramedic working in different regions of this province where we see the effects of mental health and how they play out. We can speak to it and, Mr. Speaker, I can say this: we can go back and blame everybody along the way, but this is your time. This is your watch. We watch it with you, but ultimately you'll make the decision. Now, there are front-line care providers out there that make the decision every day with do-not-resuscitate orders. Imagine a do-not-resuscitate order when you're there with that family – and some of my colleagues across the way in here have seen that – if you don't think that that has an impact on your mental health and the mental health of families and that it doesn't matter and if you think that those types of regulations and rules don't matter to families to make sure that they're properly implemented.

We are talking about now, in this era, something that you have done some good work on with other colleagues from across the aisle, like the hon. colleague from Calgary-Mountain View, on mental health. I can't imagine that we would live in a province where we would say and are saying that mental health is an incurable disease. Would we say that? I can tell you and based on personal experience that there are people out there today who want to end their suffering and their pain. What do we want to do, especially if they are our loved ones? We want to reach out and do everything we possibly can to help them, and this motion and these regulations play a big role in that. But now we are limited in that debate. It is not a matter of who is to blame; the time is now. These regulations will go on forever.

I'm discouraged by that, Mr. Speaker. I just can't imagine. But, yes, at the same time, I've been there and have watched the person pass away in front of my eyes with the loved ones around them, and it is not easy. It is not something easy to watch. It is not easy to watch somebody who is suffering in pain because of an illness that can't be cured, to watch them take the last breath of their life, to watch the light of their spirit pass away.

Here we are, and again I don't know if it's lack of experience. You know, I spoke to a group earlier today about kind of what we do in government and how the challenge of a leader is to understand, and it starts with knowledge. With knowledge, hopefully, you gain some wisdom, and with wisdom, hopefully, you have understanding. But we are bypassing some of those things to ultimately understand every aspect of how this will affect Albertans' lives and future generations to come.

Again, we need to make sure that we're doing everything we can before we get to that point. This, in my mind, limits that ability. We can change that. You can change that. Just like we've seen in the floods and previous disasters and times of crisis, we can come together. We can make it better, but we have to have an understanding of how you feel, how I feel, how families feel. Our constituents expect us to fight for these very things. Quite frankly, the federal government can do what the federal government will do, but I'll stand up for Albertans. I'll stand up for my constituents even in the face of federal law because we need to make it right for Alberta, for my children, for your children. This is important, and it reaches beyond regulations. It reaches into people's faith and their spirit and their soul. Six hours of debate on this issue: I think we can do better. I think we should do better.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Any questions under 29(2)(a)? Member for Calgary-Lougheed, under 29(2)(a)?

Mr. Rodney: Yes. It is under 29(2)(a). I want to thank my hon. colleague for his service not only in this Chamber but out there in the real world as an incredible leader and as a first responder. I don't know if in his time – part of this will be a comment, hon. member. I remember as a kid reading the book Death Be Not Proud. If you've read the book, you know it's about a young man, a very young man, in fact a boy, who had inoperable cancer. Everyone around that young boy was lamenting, moaning, sobbing. It was the worst thing ever. They wondered if the right answer was to ease his pain by taking it away. That little boy actually wrote what became a book about the incredible things that he learned through the experience of pain and suffering. He taught the people around him invaluable lessons that they will never ever forget.

A short time ago, this month as a matter of fact, a dear friend was in a terrible accident and was paralyzed from the waist down. The first days were very, very difficult. I think many people would not have blamed him if he had asked for this in those first few days. We've had incredible conversations in the last number of weeks now, and we've talked about people like Rick Hansen. We could talk about a gentleman that occupied that chair right there, the Hon. Kent Hehr. We all have dozens of examples of people who have done amazing things after getting through that time of incredible mental, physical, emotional, spiritual, cultural pain. Do we end things early, or do we allow the opportunity for people to deal with this? Do we get better as a society in assisting people through this time rather than ending this time?

The hon. member has been in the right place at the right time to save countless lives. In a couple of my professions I've had that opportunity as well, something I'll never ever stop thanking God for. I've also been there too late and picked up dead bodies and pieces of bodies. These are crucial realities that we face. Is there enough experience in this room to deal with issues like these without going to Albertans to consult with them?

The hon. Ed Stelmach introduced something called constituency week. The reason for that was so that people could get out from under the dome. The hon. Ralph Klein referred to it as dome disease. So deal with the policy as we must when trusted to do that, when it's incumbent upon us, but take what is an idea and deal directly with Albertans to find out if they think that we're on the right track or not, to be held accountable. I guess a question I'd have for the hon. member is: do we rush this through with less than 72 hours left in the spring session? What is the path forward in the time that we have left? I ask the hon. member with respect.

Mr. Fraser: Thank you for the question. You know, I looked at some of the people who were consulted on this very issue, and I notice the College of Physicians & Surgeons, the college of registered nurses, and the College of Pharmacists. One of the people left out, Mr. Speaker, was the College of Paramedics. We do know that there are general practitioners out there. We're called to those offices all the time when something goes wrong. There's nothing to that. In terms of that, we see that this process is flawed just in that very piece, particularly when you think about rural Alberta because if something goes wrong in a rural physician's office on this issue, who is going to get called? Paramedics. So they need to be consulted.

Further to that, we know that the government has been doing some good work on the Health Professions Act regarding paramedics. That would also be an important thing to pass along with these regulations to ensure that that regulatory body can deal with it because ultimately, like the member said . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Mr. Cooper: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Before I begin, I want to speak about the seriousness and just how incredibly important this debate ahead of us is. I want to just take a moment to reiterate some comments around the Legislature that we've heard already today about how disappointing it is, about how we got here. It seems that there's been one misstep after another, and while the government may have been trying to do the right thing, it appears, or I get inside of me a real concern, that this issue isn't getting the respect that it deserved.

You know, we have members from the government asking about technical briefings and how often it ever happened in the Legislature in the past. We're talking about a technical briefing that happened less than 30 minutes prior to the start of the debate, a briefing that the minister had to leave so she could go do a press conference on the regulations. So while I hope to take the government at their word that they are trying to reach out, all of their actions are not communicating respect. They're communicating rushed, poorly thought out lack of respect on such an important issue that is so personal to so many in the Assembly. I have to be honest. I didn't think that I would be rising to speak about this issue in this way.

Listen, I have heard a lot on this issue from constituents of the outstanding constituency of Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills, who elected me here – and I take pride and am humbled by that – to represent their concerns. I have chatted with them about the issue, but they don't know any of the parameters of the debate that's currently before us. That's because the information wasn't made available. The very first we had heard about this particular motion was in the middle of last week. Then we had the opportunity to see a draft of the motion on Friday, and then that motion changed over the weekend. This is a significant issue, and how we respond to some of the Supreme Court ruling and the federal legislation is of critical importance to so many who will be potentially accessing this service. The opinions are wide on how that should or should not happen. But there are so many important things that we ought to consider that we shouldn't enter into this hastily, and we should enter into it respectfully.

This is an issue of magnitude, and the fact is that we've only just received this information on the specific regulations and the ministerial directives. I haven't had any chance to speak to constituents or stakeholders about some of the potential challenges. I want to try and do my best to share with the House some of the personal experiences and perspectives that some of those people have shared with me. I'm glad to at least have the opportunity, so I will thank the government. As mentioned, not every jurisdiction debated the issue at all, so I am thankful for that, and I'm humbled because the issue is of such significance for what's ahead. It's an issue that affects all Albertans. It affects all families and indeed society as a whole.

Since the debate began to unfold in the public sphere, I've heard from countless people expressing powerful and heartfelt opinions about this very issue and the impact that it will have. One thing that's become more clear to me as I've encountered so many personal stories and opinions about this topic is that it evokes personal convictions and deeply held beliefs. There are so many complexities and nuances to this decision that each deserves to be heard and explored. The gravity, the scope of the changes coming from the Supreme Court and the federal Parliament: it is essential that as legislators we do our best to get this right and represent all Albertans.

I think it's also important to note that every member of this House has likely agonized over the weight of what we have here to decide because even if an individual is speaking in favour of such an important motion, they also know full well that there are wide swaths of opinion inside their own constituency. Such open and free debate is perhaps the most important thing we can offer Albertans on this topic. We owe the province a transparent conversation that fully explores all facets of the issue because this is a matter of personal conviction and conscience.

I'd like to express my personal desire to see those conscience rights protected for health care professionals. I've spoken to so many physicians and health practitioners with moral and ethical objections, and certainly those need to be respected. I understand that there was recently a poll commissioned by the Canadian Medical Association that showed 63 per cent would personally refuse to perform the procedures themselves, and even more recently 29 per cent of those doctors surveyed by the CMA said that they also don't believe in referring. What we saw literally at 3 o'clock today is significant confusion inside the regulations about whether or not there is a requirement to refer. If in fact there is, are the conscience rights of that individual being compromised?

There are so many challenges around the administration of this choice that Albertans can make. I had the opportunity just recently to speak to a doctor who is a chronic pain specialist, and he spoke specifically about how there's no spot in any textbook that teaches you how to perform this act as part of care. So the question surrounds: are we, through the administration of this legislation, going to be creating new sets of standards for our health care providers, those that choose to engage in this? What are we doing to assist those that choose to provide the service, and how are we ensuring that it is done in the most appropriate ways possible? There are certainly going to be a lot more questions than answers, particularly given the parameters of how this debate has been set out.

We cannot ignore the input from our quality front-line practitioners, who work in the medical field day in and day out and see things with their very own eyes. I have to say on a personal note that I have spoken with doctors and health professionals who have told me that they cannot in any good conscience be part of any of this process.

I also had the opportunity just recently to speak to some professionals and community leaders in the area of palliative care. They are good, honest, hard-working health care workers who are anxious and worried and fearful about how they may or may not have to be involved in the process. When it comes to this process of palliative care, the Member for Calgary-Mountain View spoke about the challenges that we face in palliative care around this province. I can tell you that in the constituency of Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills there are, fortunately, groups of volunteers and individuals who are working in this field and taking on some of the burden of palliative care from the province. That's because they believe in that.

We need to ensure that those who are facing such an important decision also have the other options available to them so that this doesn't appear to be or doesn't become the only choice or feel like the only choice that Albertans have. Access to good palliative care and doctors and nurses who have good palliative care training as well as providing the tools that are necessary to our chronic pain doctors: sometimes in rural Alberta there isn't that opportunity, so it seems that assisted death is their only option. That is deeply, deeply concerning.

There are so many challenges, Mr. Speaker, and we've already come to the total amount of time that I will personally have to represent the constituents of Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills. The amount of time that any member of this Assembly can speak to a government motion is 15 minutes. We are nearing the end of that time, and I didn't even have the opportunity to speak more in depth about the palliative care aspect and the grief counselling that goes along with that. Palliative care workers have spoken to me about the fact that people that have lost loved ones say that they just wish they had one more day. How does that interface with a family member's choice and the rights of all involved in the process?

Unfortunately, we've seen the government make some decisions around this motion, which isn't a piece of legislation. If it was legislation, the debate would have been able to be much more robust and fulsome. I get that there are timelines and issues that are imposed by other jurisdictions, but June 6 comes on June 6 every single year. To try to rush this into just a few hours – you know, those palliative care individuals and doctors weren't even able to see the wording of the motion prior to providing comment to myself and to many of our colleagues.

Mr. Speaker, you need to know that this is an important issue that, it appears, is not going to get the respect that Albertans deserve on the issue. I believe that the government was trying to do the right thing by bringing it here in front of the Legislature, but all of the process other than that commitment has been flawed. I have to say that it's disappointing because there's a great group of constituents inside the constituency of Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills that are passionate about this issue on both sides of the debate. I haven't even had the opportunity to speak to some of those folks. I personally might not share their opinions, but I would love to be able to bring their opinions here to the Chamber on their behalf. But there isn't the amount of time that there ought to be.

I look forward to hearing my colleagues and members from the government speak about this issue, to seeing if there's a way that it can be unwound so that it can be treated in a way that puts the needs of Albertans ahead of the needs of the government.

The Speaker: Questions under 29(2)(a)?

Mr. Rodney: Yes. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I believe that the hon. House leader of the Official Opposition may have been in here at 3 o'clock, when the briefing occurred. I know that his colleague rushed in just after it started because he had just found out about the briefing, which had been on and off and back on again. I wonder if this hon. colleague knows that at that time we were presented with three documents: proposed text – again, it was stressed that this was proposed – for a ministerial order on a medical assistance in dying regulatory review committee; a second document, proposed text for a directive on medical assistance in dying care co-ordination service, June 2016; and proposed text for an order in council to amend the College of Physicians & Surgeons of Alberta standards of practice on medical assistance in dying.

Mr. Speaker, I don't know if you're aware of this or not, but only one of my colleagues has received these documents. I ask this hon. member: did you receive these documents tabled here today? Did all of your colleagues? It is this that we're actually referring to, that Albertans wouldn't even have seen. That's question one. Have you received the documents that have been supposedly tabled today?

Secondly, you asked for – well, there is a need for more time to discuss palliative care and grief counselling. With great respect I'd ask: what are your thoughts on those three topics – the documents, palliative care, grief counselling – and whatever else you'd like to cover, hon. member?

Mr. Cooper: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to my colleague for the question. You know, I haven't seen those documents at all. I personally haven't. With respect, I know that my colleague from Cypress-Medicine Hat has received those documents. I do know that those documents were not tabled in the Chamber during the daily Routine today. I do find it a bit surprising, certainly, that that took place.

I know that the discussion around regulations and their presence here today will be a robust one because, you know, in the government it is rare for them to provide regulations. It's possible – and I'll take the government at their word on this one as well – that they say "draft" because there is the opportunity for feedback here in this place and then an opportunity to have those regulations changed.

Having said those fair statements, I think it is also fair and true that if that was the intention of the government, then there's no reason why we needed to do this on this timeline. So that is a significant concern, and again it runs the risk of this lack of respect for an issue that is so critically important, an issue that really reaches into the hearts and minds and souls of Albertans. In fact, I didn't even realize that there were three documents. I thought that there was only one document. To be in a situation where we're speaking on behalf of our constituents on information that's been shared inside the Chamber – how can we possibly debate this type of motion when there are lots of details around this issue?

When it comes to palliative care . . .

The Speaker: Hon. member, I hesitate to interrupt, but it is 6 p.m.

The House will stand adjourned until 7:30 p.m.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

7:30 p.m.

Tuesday, May 31, 2016

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Please be seated.

Government Motions

Medical Assistance in Dying

17. Ms Payne moved:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to implement measures to regulate medical assistance in dying consistent with the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Carter versus Canada (Attorney General) and any legislative measures approved by the Parliament of Canada to ensure that Albertans can benefit from the orderly implementation of this court decision so that:

- (a) Albertans may exercise their rights to access medical assistance in dying;
- (b) appropriate safeguards be put in place to protect vulnerable Albertans;
- (c) conscience rights are respected while ensuring the right of patients to access this service;
- (d) the practice of medical assistance in dying is closely monitored and measures regulating medical assistance in dying are reviewed within one year.

[Debate adjourned May 31]

The Speaker: Anyone else wishing to speak to Motion 17? The Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Mr. Clark: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I very much appreciate the opportunity to speak on this very important motion. I want to thank the government for the opportunity to debate. I hope that perhaps with the opportunity here to speak first this evening, I can set perhaps a little bit of a different tone than the tone we had earlier this afternoon. You know, unfortunately, I think it got a little political this afternoon. So I'm going to spend just a minute or two sharing my thoughts on whether or not I feel like we've been given enough time here to debate and discuss what is a matter of great importance and interest to Albertans.

I have to say that I have some sympathy for the perspective that perhaps this has been rushed and that perhaps it would have been nice to see these regulations sooner, but I have to say that this is an issue that is evolving on a not even daily basis but perhaps on an even more often than daily basis here as we get towards the deadline on Monday. The federal government has yet to pass their legislation. It made it through the House of Commons today but has yet to make it through the Senate. As a result my sense is that this government is working up its regulations as it goes, as it responds to the changing landscape, Bill C-14, that's coming from the federal government, and as a result it has had a challenging time getting much more information to us ahead of time.

This is the first time in my relatively young political career here in the Legislative Assembly that I've actually seen a regulation, an order in council, before it's passed. I think it's important that we recognize that the government, I believe, has the best of intentions in sharing this information with us ahead of time. I think that represents some new ground for a governing party, at least in recent memory, so I think they deserve some credit for doing that. The one suggestion perhaps, if we were to go back a few months in time –

I'm sure we all wish we could do that at times – would have been to spend some time a few months ago having this debate in a more general sense.

What I can say, though, is that when I found out from the Opposition House Leader that we would be having this debate this week, when I found that out last week, I went and started talking with stakeholders in my constituency. I started talking with stakeholders in the palliative care world, and I did my own research, and I did some thinking about this issue. I would hope that in that time, between about a week ago and now, other members would have done the same thing. We were given the draft motion on Friday, so that gave us a sense of the frame under which we would be talking about this issue today. You know, on balance, frankly, I think we have had enough time to review this.

It is an issue where we're up against the clock. Whether we like that fact or not, that's the situation we're in. This law will change on Monday of next week, so we have a need and a requirement to have these discussions.

Let's, then, talk about medical assistance in dying. That's the issue before us. As I said previously in my member's statement of March 17 of this year, we know medical assistance in dying will now be legal. I am philosophically supportive of the idea that people have control over their own medical decisions all the way through life, up to and including death. But now that it is legal, I believe we need to emphasize the fact that medical assistance in dying ought to be rare, exceedingly rare. When I hear people ask for medical assistance in dying, what I believe many of them are really saying is that they want to be comfortable. They want to know that they remain in control. They want to know that their families will not suffer or worry unduly. That is what palliative care offers to Albertans. That is the purpose of palliative care.

We, I think, should use this debate as an opportunity to have a discussion about how we maximize the availability of palliative care for Albertans everywhere in this province, that we talk about alternatives to medical assistance in dying, prevention, reduction, the request for medical assistance in dying. It will become legal on Monday, and my personal opinion is that it should be legal. The Supreme Court of Canada has told us that it will be.

It's important, then, to know that Alberta Health Services has developed a provincial palliative care and end-of-life framework. That framework exists and has been in place since I believe 2014, but that framework has not been properly and fully funded. What that framework talks about is improving access for patients and their families to palliative home care, and it talks about the need for early access to palliative care. The objective is to achieve a quality of living, to reduce the desperation that people feel that leads to that sense that the only way out, to relieve that suffering, would be medical assistance in dying. There are other alternatives where you can maintain control, where you can choose, where you can maintain quality of life to the end of life. I would encourage this government, please, to consider the importance of expanding palliative care throughout the province and ensuring that all Albertans have that choice.

As I look at the specific regulations, there are a few things, I think, that it covers that I am supportive of. I do have some questions around exactly how that mental capacity will be determined. It sounds like physicians and psychologists will be involved in that. I'm glad to see that mental illness is excluded.

The question that was raised earlier this afternoon is the question of the time delay. In talking with people in the palliative care world, who work in palliative medicine, they say that there are cases where someone may be in great distress on a given day and feel like it's time to end it all and want to make that choice but where, given 24 hours and some pain relief, they're sitting up, drinking a cup of tea, talking with their family the very next day. I think we need to ensure – and I would encourage the Associate Minister of Health and the minister and all members of the House, anyone who may be involved in this process, to please consider working in some sort of even brief delay from the time the request is made to the time that medical assistance in dying actually happens.

I recognize that there is an opportunity all throughout the process for the patient to change their mind, right up until the very last minute, right up until the drugs are administered, and I appreciate that fact. But I would suggest that we perhaps look at building in some sort of formal delay mechanism. It doesn't need to be a matter of weeks but perhaps a matter of 48 or 72 hours. It doesn't need to be, necessarily, a long time, but I think it's important that a decision such as this, an irrevocable decision such as this, is taken with real caution.

The rules in place talk about the safeguards that would be in place. I just want to read some of those into the record to make sure it's understood what those safeguards will be. The College of Physicians & Surgeons of Alberta have included several safeguards: the patient must be made aware of all of their medical options beyond medical assistance in dying but including that as well; two separate doctors must meet the criteria as set out by the Supreme Court; any questions about mental state raised at any time must be referred to a psychologist or a psychiatrist; two people must witness the patient's request but may not be related to them, may not be their physician or the owner or operator or an employee of a health facility where the patient is receiving treatment, to ensure appropriate independence; and, as I've said before, the patient must be advised at each step that they may change their mind, including immediately before the procedure.

Now, we had a good discussion earlier this afternoon about the text of the proposed order in council, about that perhaps those same conditions would be included in provision (2.2) of the order in council, which allows for another person to sign and date the request should the person requesting medical assistance in dying not be physically able, not mentally incapable but not physically able, to sign. Someone over 18 years of age may sign on that patient's behalf, but I would suggest that perhaps with the safeguards that I have just discussed, we may want to consider putting those in place as well for anyone who may sign such an order on behalf of the patient.

I want to talk momentarily about the protection for vulnerable people. That is something that I think is, without question, vital to this discussion and one that I think we must not take lightly. It is something that in the regulations and in the standards of practice as put forward by the College of Physicians & Surgeons, I know, has been given a lot of consideration, and I think it will be covered, I would hope, by both the professional ethics of the physician and other medical professionals who would be involved in the process around medical assistance in dying. The specific service, the medical assistance in dying care co-ordination service, I know will consider that as an important part of what they do as well. But that is something that must absolutely not be taken lightly because there's always a concern that that risk could be raised.

The words that are often used are "conscientious objection." I actually take a bit of issue with the term "conscientious objection." It somehow implies or can, I suppose, in some interpretations imply that there's an objection to something that is broadly seen as a good thing, so that language I struggle with. That language doesn't appear everywhere, but I've seen it in a few different places. I prefer a discussion about adherence to moral commitments. I would say that all people on the medical side who have anything to do with medical assistance in dying be a participant in the medical assistance in dying care co-ordination service that Alberta Health Services is putting together. A physician or other medical professional who chooses not to be a part of this: they're adhering to their moral commitments as they understand them. It is not up to us to judge that person or their motivations, but it's important we honour and enshrine their ability to act in a manner consistent with their moral commitments as they interpret them in their role.

Fortunately, the College of Physicians & Surgeons has considered exactly that in their standard of practice on moral or religious beliefs affecting medical care. They've laid that out, I think, very clearly and succinctly, and it is following, I think, an established practice that already exists within the medical profession for areas that extend beyond medical assistance in dying.

I'm going to take my last 90 seconds here, Mr. Speaker, to just talk one more time about the importance of having conversations with your family, with your loved ones, with your care providers all the way along the process and to have those conversations now, while you are fit and healthy, about what quality of life means to you. When decisions need to be made, perhaps you will be able to speak for yourself, but perhaps you will not be able to speak for yourself. I encourage you once again to visit the AHS website conversationsmatter.ca. These are very difficult discussions to have, but they're very important discussions so that, in particular, your family and your loved ones and your care providers know what quality of life means to you. There are a series of templates and documents and conversation guides that you can use on that website to help you work through these challenging but very important conversations. That advanced care plan is a very important gift that you can give to your family.

I'll end by saying that death is a natural part of life. Living a good life involves having a good death. Palliative care, advanced care planning can ensure that your choices and your loved ones' are respected. As I say, advanced care planning truly is a gift to your family.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any questions or comments to the Member for Calgary-Elbow under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none wishing to speak, the Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would like to just take this opportunity to say thank you for having this discussion. It's a difficult and very complex subject, and I think it takes a tremendous amount of courage to even have the discussion. I wanted to thank other hon. members for their incredible and insightful discussions about this to help everybody understand. I truly believe that this is a situation – it's a thumbprint, and every single situation is going to be unique and different.

I know, for myself, I've had that privilege of being there at that time. I don't know why that happened. I don't know why I had the privilege of being there at those times when I've had friends and family pass away. We never know for sure when that's going to happen, but when you have that privilege of being there, it changes you forever. I think that maybe it will become more apparent how important this is to me personally, based on my personal experiences, but also to explain to the government about why we're a little dismayed by the speed at which this is happening.

If you were able to describe to your family and to the people that you love what you would foresee as your own death and how you would like to leave this world – none of us really have that choice.

To be able to have the decision at this point and to talk about what the opportunities are, to actually have a say, potentially, over how you die, is such an important discussion that really, really, really deserves the respect and the time necessary in order to describe and understand how that would happen for a person who has the choice to have that happen.

As for me and my personal experiences, recently, last year, I lost a very, very good friend to pancreatic cancer. We watched him for 18 months fight this unbelievable fight. Mr. Speaker, I have to tell you that even just watching him go through that with his young daughter and his young wife, that experience, and seeing his strength and the valuable time that he spent with his family – he was suffering in a way that I will never understand, at least not at this point. Like I said, none of us know how our lives are going to proceed or where we're going to end up. But I saw him. I saw what he went through. I saw how his life changed in front of our eyes. Obviously, his daughter and his wife were important to him before he was diagnosed, but after he was diagnosed and we knew what he was going through, you could see the alteration in this person and what he was able to contribute to his young daughter's life before we lost him, what he contributed to my life and the people around him.

Truly, with all my heart, the aspects have changed me forever, and this is just one of a couple of experiences. Like I said, I don't know how I got this privilege to be there when a person leaves this Earth. To actually physically be there and watch that happen is one of the most tremendous privileges I've ever been part of, let alone seeing babies come into the world. It has an equal effect on your person.

My point is that as we saw him go through this process, there were many, many times when he was in such extreme pain and extreme suffering. What his wife and his child went through was extreme, the amount of stress and duress. They had us, and they had their family and everyone around them to help them get through that process. The question of medically assisted dying never came up, obviously. I don't know if it ever crossed his mind. It was never a discussion that we ever had.

One thing I want to bring forward – and this is to the discussions of palliative care – is my understanding, like I said, my personal perspective of what palliative care means to me and my family personally. In this particular experience, we were in the palliative care centre at the top of the Tom Baker. The room was small. All the family was around him. The experience was so emotional. But I have to say that I think what resonates the most with me, what I remember the most, if I was to pick one particular idea from that night, is that the ER nurses and doctors and palliative doctors and care workers that were around him sat with him, right here, like this close to his face, when he was in his last breath and asked him what he wanted right then and there. They were right in his face. They said to him: you know, we can intubate you and keep you alive for a little bit longer if you want, but you won't be able to tell your wife you love her, and you will not be able to hold your child, but you'll be here on this Earth presently for a little while longer. Then they said: "Or what we can do is make you comfortable. You can tell your wife you love her. You can hold her hand. You can be together with your family in your room." That's what he decided at that time. It wasn't an easy decision.

I remember standing there watching this conversation. You know how sometimes you're in a conversation and you feel so privileged to be there because it's like a personal moment, and you almost feel uncomfortable for being there, but you know you're supposed to be there. I stood there watching this interaction happen between husband and wife, making that final decision as to what he was going to do right then and there. It still makes my hair stand up to think about it.

My husband was at the end of the bed, and he was rubbing his feet. We were just talking to him. And then he piped up at the last minute – my friend forgets codes and everything a lot; she's a lot like me, actually – and all of a sudden spouted out the code for the computer and their security deposit box number. This is in the last throes of this beautiful man's life, you know, remembering all of these little bits and pieces that all of a sudden he thought she should know and where he had put the key for this. It was one of those crazy, surreal moments that I'll never forget as long as I live. Anyway, they were going through that, and then it was like he was given permission to finally let go. We were all there. We only had him for another four hours. We didn't know. We didn't know how long we'd have him. We thought we might have him for a day or a month. We certainly didn't know.

I can honestly say that those palliative nurses and doctors and care workers are heroes. To look at it from the point of view that – and again this is not in any way to say which way is right here. This isn't a decision of yes or no. I don't think any of us are supposed to make that decision.

I suppose where I'm going with this is that that option – when you're in that traumatic space, I don't know if any of us are anything less than vulnerable. I know how vulnerable I felt. He was my friend. It wasn't even my husband. If it was my husband or my child, I don't know what I'd do. Even thinking about it throws me into a space of absolute disbelief. Watching her go through this with the grace and compassion that she had at that moment, what she was able to bring to my life – and I know that sounds ridiculously selfish, but it's the honest truth: how much it altered me as a human being at that moment.

I don't ever, ever, ever want anybody in a House like this, where we have the opportunity to make these laws and rules and regulations and everything that comes along with it, to be the purveyor of a decision that somebody might regret one day. Can you imagine if we're a part of that and you have to sit in this chair one day knowing that a law and something that you brought here took somebody's life before they were ready? I don't think any of us could survive the mental impact that would have on any of us. That's what needs to be considered.

It's not a yes or no. It's not "I agree" or "I disagree." I truly believe that there are probably people out there that deserve the right to have that. If I was to look at myself in the mirror, I can honestly tell you that from day to day that could change. One moment I'd be, like: "Yes, I'm one of those Type A personalities. I'm going to plan it. I'm going to be ready to go." This is what my situation would be for me to have to make that decision. But if I had to make that decision with my great-grandchildren sitting around me, knowing that I could have one more day, I might flip-flop at that last minute. I think it's my prerogative and my right to do so.

But if there's pressure or undue stress from family or any other things that are going on or your desire as an elder person or a sick person to not put a burden on your family, those are the kinds of things we actually have to consider in this type of legislation. I know that for my friend who lost her husband last year, never once did the idea of burden ever come forward. Not once. We watched this woman. We watched everything she did. She tried everything. I mean, if she could have physically kept him alive herself, she would have. It was beautiful. It was beautiful to watch this happen. I know that's not everybody's experience, but that was mine.

On the flip side, when my own grandmother passed away, I was with her. I held her. If I hadn't been given that opportunity because my grandmother decided at that moment that because she was so sick – I have to tell you that my grandmother always slept on her side and on one particular side of the bed. She was getting close. She'd asked to not be resuscitated. She was in her bed and all of those things had been done for her so that she could pass on her own, but she was really uncomfortable, and you could tell. I was in university at that time, and I said to the nurse that day: you need to turn her over onto her side because she always sleeps this way. Well, I swear to God, we flipped her over onto her side, and within hours of her being comfortable and in her space and in that comfortable zone, she quietly – I use the term loosely. If anybody has been there at end of life, every single person I've ever had the privilege of being with, they fight for that last breath every single time. She turned over, and she was in that space, and again it was like this permission to go was there.

I would never want to take that away from anybody because they were under stress or pain. As we go through this process, as hard as it is to go through that process, I hope that everybody will have the opportunity to be with somebody when they choose to leave this Earth, if it is your privilege to be there when somebody you love is in that situation, because it is a humongous privilege. I would not want to ever take away that journey from somebody. As difficult as it is, it gives you the empathy and the understanding with which to come forward and look at legislation and regulations like this with a very open mind and a sense of humility and lack of judgment, which I think is very important.

I really, really appreciate the opportunity to speak to this, and thank you so much to everybody for their stories in here. I've been very impacted by everybody's stories.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there any questions or observations under 29(2)(a) to the Member for Chestermere-Rocky View? Calgary-West.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Medically assisted dying, of course, is complex. It is a particularly difficult subject to discuss because of the sensitivities and emotions that are involved. The Supreme Court's decision to allow assisted dying in Canada has changed our society, and as Alberta prepares to make it permissible, these changes will filter down to our province. I certainly respect and appreciate the government for putting forward this motion, however. That is why the regulations that Alberta establishes to outline the processes for medically assisted dying are so important. That is why I am very appalled that this government is allowing just six hours to discuss these draft regulations. Then, on top of that, it seeks consent from us to approve the final form of these regulations behind closed doors.

Mr. Speaker, that this motion has come before the House so that members can make a few speeches is not the kind of consultation required for an issue of this magnitude. That the public consultation that has occurred simply involved an online survey, especially when a component of the population particularly affected by this process is seniors, is typical of this government's lack of ability to actually consult with the people of this province. That is what is greatly disappointing to me. Only 15,000 Albertans participated in the survey, and 15,000 out of 4 million represents .38 per cent of the provincial population.

Mr. Speaker, as Members of the Legislative Assembly we need to see the proposed regulations and take them to our constituents for feedback. That is part of our job. Instead, this government's plan is to talk in the House for six hours. But even if we debated for 60 hours, it's only the 87 of us talking to each other. The rest of Alberta is not part of this discussion. This is a profound, life-changing issue, and you're only asking 87 people in Alberta to talk about it.

This government did not even table the documents under discussion so that they could be handed out in the House for each one of us to read. You act like you're doing us a favour by inviting us to speak about them, and we only found out about them a few hours ago.

Mr. Speaker, by telling us that these regulations must be in place by Monday and that we have to provide cabinet with permission to do it behind closed doors, this government is hobbling us from doing our job as MLAs. It is making us neglectful of our constituents. What do I say to my constituents when they hear about the regulations – and I stress “the regulations” – and ask me why I did not communicate with them about this issue? I can only tell them that the government had a year to draft the regulations, which it could have made public to gain more feedback, but it instead chose to take this route. It preferred to wait until the last minute and then pressure the Members of the Legislative Assembly to allow cabinet to make the decision itself.

Mr. Speaker, the people of Alberta have not been served by this government because they have been blocked from playing a part in this process. For that reason alone – for that reason alone – I will not be supporting this motion.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Any questions under 29(2)(a) for the Member for Calgary-West?

Seeing and hearing none, I would recognize the Member for Lacombe-Ponoka.

Mr. Orr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I do appreciate the opportunity to speak to this motion. In some ways it strikes me as being a bit of an earthquake motion. The social terra firma of western society, which has been stable for centuries, all of a sudden, well, on Thursday, without warning, gave a little bit of a rumble and today, without warning, split wide open.

Now, it is an issue that is hugely significant to the people of our province and to individuals and families. While I fully agree that changes in medical technology over the last decades have really changed the landscape and that there is room for some discussion here, people are suffering and are near death, and when they're in that state, they should be allowed to die a natural, non interfered with death.

Medical practice has become so advanced and so technological that it literally is possible to keep people alive with chemicals and machines and extraordinary means for long, long periods of time, that really is wrong and really does prolong the experience of death in, probably, negative ways. My concern is, though, that while I think there needs to be some adequate response to that reality, I think that you don't correct that problem by authorizing medics to become doctors of death.

So I have to speak to this from what I understand my constituents would feel about it, although I am deeply troubled that we've had no opportunity whatsoever to actually discuss it with them. People do want some control over their life. They want to be able to limit dragging out death in medically induced kinds of ways, but when it becomes an act of an aggressive killing, society will in fact grieve. People will grieve deeply.

What I would really like to speak to is the process by which we find ourselves here. I guess I truly have to ask the question as I think Albertans are going to ask the question: why the rush? We have known about this for quite a time, and one could say that it was accidentally left to the end. Some people are going to think it was deliberately left to the end. I don't know what the answer is there, and I don't even care to speculate. I have no idea. I recognize that the government feels some sort of obligation to govern, but the reality is that measured and considered progress is most important in social conversations and especially with issues of conscience, that are deeply personal to individuals.

The truth is that we can really only speak to the actual motion itself. The other stuff was thrown out there late this afternoon, 30 minutes before we started to debate this. I still don't have a copy of it personally. The reality is that those aren't even up for debate. There is something that cabinet has shown us. I'm not sure why. We have no influence or say on it. Maybe that's their way of gaining social licence on this. I don't know. But the truth is that we don't even know yet what the federal legislation will look like in the end or if there will actually even be any yet because, quite frankly, the Senate may just reject it and send it back.

Then the difficulty is that the local provincial court decision may have impact on it. We may find the whole thing back in the courts again. So we have no idea where this is going, and I don't understand the rush to try and create guesstimate motions that authorize this cabinet to make decisions when we really don't even know what it is that we need to respond to. This is a motion that essentially takes the decision-making out of this House and empowers and validates an NDP cabinet to decide at their will, at their whim, whatever they want to do, and they want us on behalf of the people of Alberta to give them carte blanche so that they can do whatever they think seems right to them.

Now, I'm not sure that they're not necessarily going to try to do what seems right to them, but that may not be right to other people in Alberta. So for them to think that they can have complete authorization, empowerment, freedom from the people to just go behind closed doors, without public debate, and create what they think will be right: quite frankly, I'm not sure this caucus has yet earned the trust or the respect of the people of Alberta to give them that kind of huge trust and freedom on such an important motion as this, especially, for instance, when there are no safeguards listed in this motion. There is lip service to the idea of safeguards. There is a little bit of nice talk about the importance of safeguards. But what safeguards? There is no definition in the motion of anything to do with safeguards. So we are supposed to trust them to make it up, that it will be the safeguards that the people of Alberta want.

8:10

I don't understand the rush at all on this, because a doctor that I spoke to recently pointed out that from his point of view – and he's an Alberta doctor, in Calgary, who specializes in chronic pain management. He expressed the opinion that there is enough regulation with the medical association and others that we could take the time to get this right and the world would not end. Things would carry on. We'd be fine. So what is the rush towards suicide, whether it's assisted or not?

It puzzles me that on the one hand we grieve those who lose hope, who lose their way, who want to give up on life. We grieve the youth on reservations that commit suicide. We grieve youth in all of Alberta who get lost, who get caught in the trap of drugs and in that difficult state or who are struggling with mental health and want to commit suicide. Siblings grieve their brothers and sisters who go ahead and commit suicide, and now we want to encourage them to do it. Spouses feel abandoned by a spouse who commits suicide, and now we want to validate him or her to go ahead and do that. Parents grieve the loss of their children, children grieve the loss of their parents, yet we want to empower them to go ahead and commit suicide.

If you take this to where it goes, why should anyone who wants it not be helped? The reality is that if we're going to just let cabinet decide, it becomes a completely subjective decision. Who's to say that my right to choose suicide is less than the rights of somebody else? A subjective decision. Who's to say that the rights of an older person are more important than the rights of a mother with children or the rights of a 16-year-old or whatever? What basis do we have to say that one person's suffering is more real – therefore, it's more justifiable – than another person's suffering? How in the world can you decide those kinds of things except for purely subjective feelings?

Many Albertans will view these things from different perspectives. I suspect many in this House will view them from different perspectives. There is absolutely no ground – there is no intellectual framework, there is no moral foundation, and there is no social licence at all granted here – by which people can decide whose suffering validates the right to suicide and whose doesn't. But the truth is that it's my right if we go this way, and everyone has the right.

How do you pick the age of 18 years old? On what grounds is it besides the subjective: well, that maybe is a nice number? I mean, what's wrong with 21 or 16 or 12 or, in fact, six? Why should a child of six years of age have fewer rights? If it boils down to my rights and my experience of my suffering and my experience of my pain, who can tell me that I don't have the right to that?

The whole thing becomes an utterly and totally subjective, groundless, unfounded piece of personal preference, and now we want Albertans to let a cabinet that they're not sure they trust express their personal preference for all of them. Do we now have a death wish, where we don't actually wish to help people through their struggles, through their mental illness issues, through all of the different things that disturb them? How is a parent to feel whose child in puberty – and many young people go through issues of self-identity and self-rejection and struggling. How are they to feel if that child decides that their pain and their suffering, because of what's happened to them at school or whatever, is great enough and strong enough that they should have a right to suicide if they choose to end their life? Because my suffering and my pain is too great, and nobody can say that my suffering is less than your suffering. It's utterly subjective.

I can't help but think also that if this is just entrusted to the decision of cabinet without any legislation, without any fulsome discussion, is it possible that another cabinet down the road would decide that a best practices situation would be that if a student from school speaks to a teacher about the wish to kill themselves, the teacher would have to refer them to a medical professional and would be forbidden to talk to the parent? The next thing you know, the child – it's their right; their suffering is undeniable; their pain is incontestable – would commit suicide without the parents ever knowing. There are no grounds, there is no foundation, there are no limits on any of this. It's entirely subjective.

Has our society – and I just ask this as a question; I realize it's not just here, but I think we have to ask ourselves this – become so confused, so nihilistic that now we want to die in a twisted psychosis of self-cutting and harm and the sleep of death? We rush headlong towards suicide. Why? In this bill there is no motion, no money to address chronic pain, to provide better mental health care. There's no motion, there's no money for better health care. There's no motion, there's no money for palliative care. Do we actually care about people, or do we want to just let them go? It's their wish. It's their will. That's what they feel today. It's their right. You cannot challenge their suffering. Who says that their suffering is worse or less than others'? Are we in such a rush to a society of nihilism and a culture of death and necropolitics that this is where we end up? I think these are questions that many people in Alberta are going to ask.

Cabinet wants the power to decide or maybe to tell all without consulting or wanting to even hear. They want to do it themselves. This is a terrible, terrible process. This is not democratic participation. For those reasons, I absolutely cannot stand before my constituents if I vote for this motion, and I will not.

The Speaker: Are there any questions under 29(2)(a) for the Member for Lacombe-Ponoka?

Hearing none, the Member for Battle River-Wainwright.

Mr. Taylor: It's not under 29(2)(a).

The Speaker: Yes. Proceed.

Mr. Taylor: Okay. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to voice my opinion on Government Motion 17, Medical Assistance in Dying. You know, this is such an important topic. I can't express how important this is, and I can't do it in just a few words about the opinions that I've heard over the past week or 10 days.

I've really been trying to determine what people think about this. You know, frankly, the response has been varied from the people that I've talked to. Some people have been in support of this and the idea of assisted dying in this province. Many told me that they're opposed to assisted dying in any way, shape, or form.

You know, there's a third camp. They sit on the fence. They're not sure what decision to make. They're waiting to see what comes out of the discussion. They want to hear more. They want to hear something from us, from their doctors, from people that actually know what's going on.

The conversation is now just beginning. It would be a shame if we only spent six hours talking about this and these voices that people have, these opinions that people have are, frankly, muted. Like I said, this is way too important a subject.

You know, personally, I struggle with this one myself. I've listened to both sides of this argument, and it's not clear in my head which way I'd go necessarily. I am still rolling this around. I myself still want to be able to have more discussion. I've heard great arguments from different members in this House. Again, I would love to be able to hear more arguments and more discussion and more opinion from, frankly, more people right across this province, whether it be on one side or the other side.

I've talked to friends, doctors, associates, and they've all had mixed feelings on this. You know what? They've told me, Mr. Speaker, that in the end we need to take time. That's what I've heard, that we need to take time to make sure that we get this right. I can't agree more, that we need to take that time.

Each member, as it stands, has got 15 minutes to be able to speak on this, plus whatever time if there's a 29(2)(a) on it, but really is that enough time when you're talking about something of this magnitude? I don't believe it is. You know, if you exercise your right to speak honestly and consider all the questions that arise out of this, this is, frankly, not enough time.

You know, I only saw these amendments – I was looking at the clock, and it was about 4:45 – at a quarter to 5, something like that, when I saw these regulations come over here. That's not enough time to read them and digest them and to understand what's in there and what the implications are. Then we have three hours tomorrow. That's, frankly, just not enough time. This is truly life and death that we're addressing. We've got to take it that seriously. It's life and death.

You know, on the whole, the language that was put into this motion seemed fairly cautious, so I was very optimistic about that. But I have some concerns, and I want to spell them out for you. The motion speaks of ways "to implement measures to regulate medical assistance in dying." To regulate, Mr. Speaker: that means this important document will be taken out of the hands of legislators and Albertans and not be given to a panel to represent the views of all Albertans, right across all sections. It needs to be. That concerns me greatly. This topic of assisted dying needs to be brought back here, into this House, and to have a debate, an opportunity to talk to stakeholders, your fellow Albertans, your fellow constituents, who can represent their views, not just giving six hours to review and discuss it.

At the very least, Mr. Speaker, if we go the route of regulation, it should not be until we have federal legislation that's actually on this matter. Then we can actually see exactly what that says. It's not being settled until June 6. Why are we rushing ahead of this? At that time we'd know exactly what we're up against with the federal legislation. Then we could make more of an informed decision.

I have a concern that I've heard from doctors, so I want to speak on behalf of the doctors that I've talked to. It has to do with conscience rights. You know, you take a look at this material we were provided, an order in council to amend the College of Physicians & Surgeons of Alberta standard of practice, medical assistance in dying. I go to section (4) here:

A regulated member who receives an oral or written request from a patient for medical assistance in dying and who declines for reasons of conscience or religion to provide or aid in providing medical assistance in dying must ensure that reasonable access to the Alberta Health Services care coordination service is provided to the patient without delay.

For the doctors I've talked to, that would be raising red flags. I obviously haven't had a chance to talk to them specifically about that one. I know from the conversations I've had that that would bring them up, so I want to express some of their feelings.

Their conscience tells them they cannot assist in ending someone's life in any way, shape, or form. That's what they told me. Even though they might not act or assist the patient to, you know, end their life, they must ensure the rights of the patients, so it would be referring them to a doctor who will. They have to refer them to a doctor that will provide them with this.

Passing this responsibility to a doctor who they know will consent, from what I've heard, is the same as assisting them themselves because they know what the outcome will be. In listening to what they have to say, they want the ability for doctors – they need to have the right to say no, period. They don't want to have to refer that person on because that, to them, is part of their conscience rights. They don't want to have any part of that. They don't want to be terminating that life. That's not what they got into medical practice for.

That leaves us with the situation where only doctors who feel okay with this are the ones who sign off or give consent to this. If all we're left with are doctors that are doing this, are we now in a position where we'll hear these doctors say yes in most cases instead of having a pragmatic approach, a balanced approach? That's a direct concern for me.

There are many conflicting views that truly need to be discussed more thoroughly with all Albertans to ensure the rights of patients and physicians are truly respected and that the patient's view does not supersede that of their doctor's conscience. Doctors are in much of a patient's life. In the case of my family doctor – well, I guess I know pretty much every doctor in our town – he's brought my children into the world, and now my oldest is 26. They've helped them control pain when they've had injuries, and they've looked after injuries for all these patients right across. Doctors get this way, very personal with their patients, and they see them through difficult times. They never became a doctor to terminate life, and now, as a consequence, this is just what they're being asked to do.

This brings me to another point: “The practice of medical assistance in dying is closely monitored and measures regulating medical assistance in dying are reviewed within one year.” In one year it’s going to be reviewed, this medical assistance. That’s point (d) on the original motion that we had. If we look at it after one year’s time, who’s going to look at it in one year’s time? What will it look like in one year’s time? Will they be able to make all these changes, so it doesn’t look like it’s nice and tight, and be considerate, for the most part, of both parties and not weigh heavily to one side? Again, I ask that we as legislators have the opportunity to look at this, and we should be looking at this as legislation rather than just regulation. Instead of just giving it these six hours, we need to give it a fulsome discussion so that people can actually have a chance to review it and talk about it.

You know, I only heard about this motion yesterday and saw the regulation three or four hours ago, I guess, and frankly I don’t believe that this is enough time. The federal government has had more time. They, frankly, have had 18 months to look at this and have discussions about it and ruminate and talk about it and decide what’s going on. There’s been a lot of heated debate on this subject, and now we’ve got these two three-hour portions on these two days to be able to talk about that. It’s just not enough time when you consider the enormity of this topic.

This topic is so important for everyone here, for everyone in my constituency, for all Albertans. We have this moment in time – this moment in time – and we need to get it right. As it stands, I can’t support this motion. There are simply too many questions and concerns and just not enough time to consider the implications of this motion.

Finally, I’ll say in conclusion: will you please give all Albertans more time to look at this and engage all Albertans in this process? Thank you.

8:30

The Speaker: Are there any questions under 29(2)(a) to the Member for Battle River-Wainwright?

The hon. Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre.

Mr. Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. This is a tough motion to rise to speak to. I think for any member in the House this is a tough topic. Just part of being human is death, and it’s something that, I think, most of us sometimes would like to forget, that all of us will face that one day.

I think that, for myself, my experience on this has primarily been around watching and going through journeys with loved ones who have had to face terminal illnesses, going on that journey with them through their treatments and through their time as they leave the earth, as I know many members on all sides of the House will have experienced with loved ones, and watching them go through pain, the fear, and those things that are associated with death and sharing that pain with them. That’s a hard thing to watch.

By no means am I an expert on what legislation you would need, what regulations you would need, what safeguards need to be put in place, what types of things we need to do something like this. I can recognize the need or the concerns and why there would be discussions on why there may have to be bills like this. But at the end of the day, Mr. Speaker, MLAs are not supposed to be experts at everything. We’re supposed to be advocates. We’re supposed to advocate for our constituents. We’re supposed to try to bring their views to this place and advocate for them as best we can. That’s not an easy thing when you have as many constituents as most of us do back there, but that is our job.

Now, inside this Assembly we have many experts in many things. I see that inside this Assembly we have doctors, who may understand some of this stuff a lot better than some of the other members in this House. I know that my experience in life has been primarily around working with homeless people, as people know, as well as some time as a CFO. So while I could talk to you about accounting or how to work with a methamphetamine addict, I don’t, you know, have a lot of information about this, and it would take time for me to understand.

Again, Mr. Speaker, it’s our job to go to our constituents and to the people that can help us understand this and then be able to come back and advocate for what’s best. By bringing forward a motion, as some of my colleagues have already brought forward, and then limiting the debate before MLAs can speak to the people that they represent that know about this, can figure out what the views of their constituents are to be able to come and articulate it right, to help get it right – this is serious stuff. This is serious stuff. We are talking about something that is very serious and certainly has the potential for abuse if we do not get it right. I think every member on every side of the House will want to make sure that we can protect anybody vulnerable from being abused in a situation such as legislation or regulations like this – it’s serious.

Now, one of the things that I find appalling – and I don’t think most of the public knows it, Mr. Speaker, unless they’ve had the experience of being an MLA or working around this place – is how fast we move legislation, particularly in Alberta. Not all jurisdictions are at that speed. But particularly in Alberta, how fast we move stuff like this through the Assembly – and I recognize that this is a motion – is staggeringly fast.

If you talk to the average person back in our constituency, they would be shocked that the people that represent them received a document at 3 o’clock or so today and are standing up in the Assembly attempting to figure out what’s best for their constituents and for the province of Alberta in that timeline, without having an opportunity to return to the constituents they represent, to speak to the doctors that they work with, the medical associations, and many of the experts that we have in this province that are available to us, that would certainly be able to provide us appropriate feedback for us to do our job.

Now, it’s one of the reasons why the opposition, as you know, Mr. Speaker, has risen many times to speak of concerns, not just on this motion but on several bills in the past, about the way we do things in the Alberta Legislature. We had hoped and we still do hope that with the new minister of democratic reform we will see some of those reforms so that we can do legislation differently, and we can get it right.

While this is an important subject – and I certainly think that the government’s heart is in the right spot by bringing it forward and trying to attempt to deal with the situation that they have to face and get this right – bringing it forward in a rushed way doesn’t do any of our constituents any good. I think that’s important. I think that’s something that we have to recognize.

You know, we have a short time on this, and I don’t want to take the floor for too much time and prevent other members from being able to speak to it.

But, again, we see it time and time again, particularly since this government has taken power, Mr. Speaker. We are bringing forward pieces of legislation that have significant impacts on our society, on the people that we represent, the people that have sent us here to do a job, and not providing opportunities for the other side of the House, the opposition, to be able to communicate with the people they represent, to get the feedback and the knowledge and the information so that you can make sure that you get things right – this is serious. For what possible reason would we want to limit it to six hours of debate? Can the government truly, with a straight face stand up and justify to Albertans and an Assembly of 87 people: we're going to limit this to six hours of debate, and we're only going to give you the information several minutes before you start to debate it. I think most of the constituents in Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre would be appalled by that.

Now, Mr. Speaker, you know that I spent a significant time working in the nonprofit field. In the nonprofit field we have, of course, a board of directors. That's important for governance. I recognize that. I worked with many great boards over the years. But sometimes when you work with a board of governors all the time, you feel like you're working with people for whom it is their hobby, and it's your life. You have to interact with the board. You're trying to do that. This is something you do all day, and then they just come in, often on a volunteer basis in that world, and it's kind of their hobby. It's important. I'm not knocking the governance side of it. But that's sometimes how you feel when you're the executive director working with a board.

In some ways we are a massive board of directors for this province. The experts that have to execute this, the experts that are going to have to face the realities associated with the decisions that are made because of this and other pieces of legislation that we move through this fast, must be looking and going: "What? Is this a hobby for you guys? This is my life. This is important. I am the doctor who's going to have to stand in the room and get this right." "I'm the nurse that's going to have to deal with the realities of this, and you took so little care in it that you slammed it through the Legislature with only six hours of debate and never gave the MLAs the opportunity to speak to the people that it affects, to speak to the people that it'll impact."

That's very disappointing, Mr. Speaker. The government can't even say that with a straight face. There's no justifiable reason for that to happen, and it keeps happening in this Assembly. I for one am very disappointed about that, and I know the people of Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre are very disappointed about that.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I will yield the floor to the next speaker. But I certainly hope that this government starts to consider working to bring forward good legislation, working with the people of Alberta to get it right the first time and helping the people that the rules and the legislation and the processes that we make here actually impact rather than trying to rush things through in the middle of the night, with very little notice and very little time for debate.

Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Are there any questions of the Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre under 29(2)(a)?

Hearing none, hon. Member for Calgary-Greenway, did you wish to speak to the motion?

Mr. Gill: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As we all know, this is an extremely important debate. The government has decided to speak to it tomorrow as well, so I look forward to delivering my speech tomorrow and, you know, hearing other members' speeches as well.

Therefore, I move that we adjourn the debate on Motion 17 until tomorrow.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 20 Climate Leadership Implementation Act

[Adjourned debate May 31: Mr. Shepherd]

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre.

Mr. Nixon: Well, thanks. It's great to be back up so quick with you. I'm sure you're excited to see me back up. Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

Well, I have the privilege, of course, of rising today to speak to Bill 20, the Climate Leadership Implementation Act. Now, this bill – let's be clear on this – is going to make Alberta families worse off, and it's going to lighten their wallets. It's a bill, Mr. Speaker, that takes money out of Albertans' pockets at a time when they need it most.

8:40

If this government right across from me would open their eyes and take a look at the state of the economy in our province right now, they would see that Albertans are hurting. If they would take the time, Mr. Speaker, to travel with me back to Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre and walk the streets of Rocky Mountain House or come to Rimbey and visit with the mayor or go to Sundre at the A&W – one of my favourite places to get political advice is the Sundre A&W; if you ever read any columns with me, I often refer to what they say – you would hear that people are hurting. You would hear that they're losing jobs and that they are suffering in my communities and communities right across this province.

Now, Mr. Speaker, last year our province lost close to 100,000 jobs. You have to think about that: 100,000 jobs.

Mr. Rodney: How much?

Mr. Nixon: A hundred thousand jobs last year.

That is a staggering number, Mr. Speaker. That is a staggering number of kids right now who are in homes where at least one parent and sometimes both have lost jobs. That is a staggering, staggering number.

Those who still have work right now are facing a reduction in wages or hours. Now, I hear that often as I travel around my constituency right now. People are having to take less hours or less money to be able to keep working, and that has another staggering impact on families all across this province. It's making it harder for thousands of Alberta families to pay their bills and keep food on the table. That's making the problem worse because the next people you start talking to, Mr. Speaker, are small-business owners and people in our communities who can't get the bills paid because these families are suffering, and then that causes small-business owners' families to start to have trouble, and it spirals out of control.

Again, 100,000 jobs, Mr. Speaker. Adding to this downturn is the hardship that – what now? What is this government's response to that hardship, that I just said? What is this government's response to 100,000 people out of jobs? What is their response? What is their solution to get Alberta's families a leg up? What is their solution to get the families in Rocky Mountain House or Sundre or Rimbey a leg up? They're out of work. What's their solution? They decided to add an extra tax – an extra tax – to those families. Think about that: 100,000 people out of work, and this government comes here and adds an extra tax to those families who are trying to make ends meet.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I'm genuinely curious: what are these people supposed to do? What are they supposed to do? How are they supposed to mitigate the costs that are going to be put onto their families? Albertans are smart people, and they are already trying to reduce costs in their households by every means possible. We hear it every day when I'm talking to constituents. How is this tax going to help make Alberta families incentivized to leave less of a carbon footprint? How is it?

In 2008 Stephen Harper's Conservative government mandated that all newly installed furnaces, whether it be in a new home or a retrofit installation, be a high-efficiency furnace with an efficiency rating of no less than 90 per cent – 90 per cent efficiency, Mr. Speaker. Ninety per cent efficient furnaces that have direct-current fan blowers use less natural gas and less electricity than any other furnaces that have ever been created. Due to the average lifespan of most of those furnaces this means that in less than 10 years – less than 10 years – almost every single furnace in this province will be high efficiency. Consumers will already be burning the least amount of energy possible to heat their homes and businesses. So despite what these government members are saying about increasing efficiencies to decrease the carbon footprint, almost all Albertans will already be burning the least amount of natural gas possible.

Albertans have also had their backs up against the wall for some time when it comes to the price of gasoline. [interjections] Now, I know, Mr. Speaker, as you can tell from the hon. member, that they find it quite interesting that constituents in my riding are going to have to pay so much more for fuel, but I don't, and I can tell you that they don't. Now, although the price of oil dipped down to its lowest state in late 2014, gasoline was well above the $1.10 a litre mark for most of the time since 2012 and even shot up beyond $1.20 several times. Being the fiscally prudent people that Albertans are, people have also taken measures to reduce their fuel inputs as much as possible.

What this government may not understand is that a lot of people in this province must drive vehicles that consume more fuel than the average family-sized sedan. The average family-sized sedan, the average small car that we might see in Edmonton and Calgary, won't get down my driveway. That's the reality of where I live, and that's the reality of where many of the people in our province live. Heavy industry in this province relies on pickup trucks and heavy equipment. The people that work in my constituency rely on pickup trucks. They have to. They rely on heavy equipment to get done jobs that we depend on them to get done.

As much as companies and consumers would like to only have to pay for a Smart car's worth of fuel every month, the reality is that to move tools, to move equipment and personnel from remote work site to work site often means that they need a vehicle that can handle a heavy load. That's the reality of the jobs. What are those people supposed to do, just bite the bullet and pay the extra price at the pump?

Mr. Speaker, last night I returned home to Sundre to speak at a 4-H sale. The show had been earlier in the day, when I was with you guys, but I managed to arrive in town to be able open up the auction. It's something that I enjoy doing. I often like to go to 4-H sales. As I looked at the families all across there – and I was in Sundre, which is my home in the constituency – and I looked at all the children coming to something that is extremely important to our communities, the entire parking lot was trucks and trailers. How does this government think that the people in my communities get cows to auction sales? How do they think we get horses to the things we do?

An Hon. Member: In a Smart car.

Mr. Nixon: We use trucks. We don't drive Smart cars where I come from. I know that the member across the way who is getting very upset about that doesn't realize that they don't drive a lot of Smart cars in Sundre because it doesn't work where they live. That's the reality.

What are these people supposed to do? What are they supposed to do? Are they just supposed to bite the bullet, or are you saying that those people can no longer take their kids to 4-H, that they're going to have to cut costs? Moms can't take them to hockey. Maybe my kids can't go to the rodeo anymore; we shouldn't drive to that. That's the reality. You have to at least accept that there are those constituencies.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is certainly the message that this minister and this government is sending to the hard-working people of this province that actually make the income that the NDP is taxing. The people that actually pay the bills around here are not us. They are the people of Alberta, and it's something that this government seems to often forget.

When a parent has to take their kid to hockey or soccer practice, this tax will not impede their decision or make them think twice about taking the best care of their child. That's actually just the reality. The reality is that my community is not going to stop going to 4-H because this government raised its taxes. We're not going to stop living the lifestyle that we live there. We're not going to be able stop going to work. And I certainly ain't going to be able get a Smart car down my mile-long driveway in the snow. That's the reality.

Parents will keep taking their kids to sports, dance recitals, and other activities because they love their kids, Mr. Speaker. That's the reality. You know that. I've seen you with your grandkids. You love your kids. You're not going to stop because of a tax. All that this bill will do is to penalize these parents for encouraging their kids to live healthy lifestyles, to participate in extracurricular activities.

Mr. Speaker, I'm asking these questions because I believe that they genuinely require answering and my constituents say that they genuinely require answering. We haven't seen anything substantial from this government that tells Albertans how much this will cost their families and how these changes are going to affect the Alberta economy. Back to that 100,000 jobs that we've already lost, 100,000 families where at least one person with a job has lost their job.

Mr. Speaker, this is just another policy that is driven by an ideological view rather than empirical evidence. Why hasn't this government conducted an economic assessment of how this carbon tax is going to directly impact every family and business in this province? Why haven't they? That seems like something that you would do when you're bringing forward this big a piece of legislation, that is going to cost Albertans billions of dollars.

I met with a constituent this past week in a restaurant in a hotel in Rimbey. Now, this hotel's manager wrote me a letter a couple of weeks ago about how worried they were about what the NDP's minimum wage policy would mean for the staff at his restaurant, that are already getting paid close to the $15 per hour mark.

This time he came over and gave me an earful about what the carbon tax would mean for his business. This is an owner operating a hotel, and like most small businesses, they are running a pretty small margin to begin with, Mr. Speaker. That's a fact. He asked me questions similar to the questions I just proposed to the government members of this House. Throughout this conversation I was asked what businesses like the hotel are supposed to do when they are already using high-efficiency boilers, high-efficiency hot water tanks, high-efficiency LED light bulbs, and even economizer cooling units, that use fractional amounts of electricity by using outdoor air to cool occupied spaces. What are they supposed to do when they're already doing all of that?

Like most Albertans in their homes, this business operator was also doing everything that he could do to use the least amount of energy. Already doing it, Mr. Speaker. This government has already made it hard enough on small operators like this independent restaurant and hotel in my riding by increasing sin taxes, increasing the minimum wage, and now increasing an enormous part of small-business overhead by increasing energy prices. That's what this bill does.

When the government moves forward with nontangible data on how their ideological economic policies will actually affect the economy, small-business owners like the hotel operator in my town often get forgotten. It is truly surprising that this government believes that it can march forward with what will be a massive tax increase without providing justification for how the economy will really be impacted, for how the small businesses in my riding will really be impacted, for how the families in my riding will really be impacted.

The NDP's rebate scheme was only designed to cover increased natural gas and fuel costs but ignores the fact that the carbon tax will hike the price of electricity. That's pretty important. Has this government given any thought to what this will do for grocery stores, that consume a large amount of electricity to keep their refrigeration equipment running, or the cold storage facilities that store every single frozen food that enters our major cities? Guess what, Mr. Speaker? These cold storage facilities consume the least amount of energy possible because like the hotel operators and everyday moms and dads, they already use energy-efficient equipment.

What will the increase in electricity prices lead to? What will it lead to? It's not going to stop them; they're already using it. It will directly lead to an increase in prices in every single grocery store that requires refrigeration, and that's all of them. I'm sure that even this government can understand how many grocery stores require refrigeration. How many do you think? All of them, right? That's right.

Mr. Speaker, let's do a quick recap as to what this carbon tax will really mean for Albertans. One, it's going to be more expensive to heat your homes, and since we live in the north in Canada, this just might be a significant cost to families that are already struggling. I would think that would be fair to say. Two, small-business owners that are already trying to optimize their energy efficiency will be getting slapped with increasing energy prices, and there isn't one thing they can do about it. This government has provided nothing that they can do about it at a time when we've already lost 100,000 jobs. Three, basic goods like milk, eggs, beef, and yogourt will all be more expensive.

This government, Mr. Speaker – let's be clear – is going to institute a tax that will have sweeping effects on all aspects of the economy but is asking us to trust them despite there being no economic assessment on how this tax will really be carried out. Albertans can't trust this government to take in massive amounts of tax to sit in a slush fund somewhere with nothing more than a promise to redistribute it later. The people of Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre won't stand for it, and I won't stand for it.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is incomplete and needs further study, and I look forward to voting against it. Thank you very much.

The Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake.

Mr. MacIntyre: Yes. Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for the magnificent riding of Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre. That was riveting. I enjoyed every moment of it. I do have a question for the hon. member, though, because I got a really clear visual of this friendly giant trying to cram himself into a Smart car in the middle of winter in order to save money.

Now, hon. member, correct me if I am wrong, but I believe there are some 49,000 farmers in this province. I believe that energy costs are already a significant input in agriculture and that, as any businessperson would, they try to minimize and save on those costs. In your mind, is there any way you can think of where an electric vehicle or even some of these hybrid cars could possibly be utilized to haul cattle, feed, salt, and other things for our poor farmers, who have been told, "Well, just go buy another car"?

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Nixon: Well, thanks, Mr. Speaker, and thanks to the hon. member for the question. It's a good question. If you have not spent a lot of time in communities like the hon. member's and mine – particularly mine as I live in the Rocky Mountains. To answer his question about the vehicles he is talking about: never mind hauling cattle or horses or trailers or equipment or tools or men and women to work, but the cars you're talking about can't get up some of the hills we drive down. They would struggle on my driveway at certain times of the year. We struggle on the road, once I leave pavement, to get to my home. I live in a really nice spot. I hope you get to come one day and join me in Bergen, just outside of Sundre. We have a lot of very, very steep hills. It's great to live there, and that's why we like it.

We need bigger vehicles just to get through our daily lives there. Just to get kids to school, we need bigger vehicles. Certainly, when we're hauling equipment, when we're hauling kids' calves to 4-H stuff and we're hauling kids' horses to rodeo things, when farmers are hauling stock, they need bigger vehicles. We also drive very, very big areas. Just for me in my constituency alone, from the top of my riding, just north of Rimbey, in Bluffton to where I live in Bergen, just south of Sundre, is two and a half hours one way.

We can't drive the vehicles that this government has suggested these farmers should just replace their trucks with. It is such a ludicrous assertion to the people of my community, and it shows that whoever has been writing this and this government when they speak about it, Mr. Speaker, have no idea about the reality of the communities that I represent. They have no idea about it.

I strongly encourage the government members, and I often invite them – I have the privilege of representing some of the finest people in this province but also some of the finest landscapes in the entire province of Alberta – to come west of Rocky Mountain House or Sundre. It's a pretty nice place. I hope you come to Ya Ha Tinda, one of my favourite places, one day. You are not getting to Ya Ha Tinda in a Smart car. You're not. That is the reality. You are not getting to Ya Ha Tinda in a Smart car. Those are the roads that my neighbours in my community and my family have to drive every day. That's the reality.

The government stands up and says: well, just buy a different car. That's what the Premier said, Mr. Speaker: just buy a different car. Is she suggesting that I should go back to Rimbey on the weekend here and meet with some farmers and say: "Oh, don't worry. I talked to the Premier. She said to just buy a different car to haul all of your stock."

You know, it's going to raise the cost of everything on vehicles. Vets, who often do calls inside my constituency, are going to have to burn extra fuel driving everywhere, and I'm telling you that they're not going to be in a Smart car.

So it is actually an insulting thing to say, and it really shows – it really shows – that this government often appears to not be leaving Edmonton and coming out and seeing what is the reality of driving in constituencies like Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre. As always, I keep a standing invite to the Premier and all of her cabinet. Any time that they would like to come to Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre to see the realities of the roads we drive, I'd be happy to take them on a tour and show them what's going on and show them the realities there and maybe take them to the A&W. I'd like to see them explain to the farmers at the A&W having their coffee every afternoon that they should just buy a new car and that that's going to help them with all their problems on their farm.

Mr. Speaker, you know that's a ludicrous thing to say. I know that you wouldn't say that to the farmers anywhere near your constituency. Of course not. You're not going to say that. The Smart car is not even going to get into the field to go check the cows. It's not.

This government just shows how little they have thought about the impact on all Albertans, and that's just one issue, just driving. The reality is that this bill is going to stop some kids from going to hockey. Think about that.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member. I wondered, hon. member: if maybe you made the offer to the Minister of Advanced Education, he could come out and give some accordion lessons to people there.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Foothills.

Mr. Panda: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today I rise to speak about Bill 20, the Climate Leadership Implementation Act. I would like to begin by acknowledging the challenge the world is facing to reduce global emissions. There is no doubt that it's a challenge that must be met with the ingenuity and entrepreneurship that have marked the people of this province for generations. As my party said in the last election, climate change needs action and solutions. The members opposite can try and waste their time arguing this point instead of the point Albertans want us to be talking about, the impact this bill will have on their daily lives.

I would like to get the following on the record, Mr. Speaker. I would like to get this on the record so that the members opposite cannot say otherwise. Before the members opposite attempt to get themselves into hot water with a point of order, I would like to say that I believe in climate change. I believe in climate change. It is real, it is happening, and it is affecting the entire world. I want to put it on record.

I can assume that we can all agree on that point. I can assume that there is no point in arguing over a point we all agree on. That would be a waste of everybody's time. I will also be calling a point of order every single time that anyone accuses me or my caucus of believing otherwise. If the members opposite would like to get this bill through in a reasonable time, I would suggest they not cause us to debate a point of order and increase debate time.

The fact is that Alberta is a petroleum producer, and we have nothing to be ashamed of. We sit on the world's third-largest oil reserves. The world needs our environmentally produced oil. We also produce natural gas and other fuels the world relies on. If we are to keep Alberta a friendly place to invest in, we have to make sure we remain competitive with the world and that we do not send investment outside of our province.

Mr. Speaker, I really want to put on record that I believe in climate change. I will not debate the merits of climate change for the remainder of this debate. It does exist, and we can move on from that point.

What I will debate is the following. I will debate that a punitive tax will not change people's way of life other than to reduce the amount of money they have to spend. I will debate that this tax will hurt people more than the rebate will help. I will debate that this government did not run on a province-wide tax, that this is not what Albertans want. I will argue that this tax is not revenue neutral when compared to B.C.'s neutral carbon tax.

Now, let's begin, Mr. Speaker. How am I supposed to sell this tax to the residents of Calgary-Foothills? I am my constituents' representative, and I have to represent their interests in this House. Additionally, if there is something worthy that this government deems necessary for the people, my job is to bring that issue back to people in my riding for their input. Not only am I asking for their input, but I am asking them whether or not I should back this bill. If this bill is worthy enough for me to attempt to convince my residents that it is in their interest, I need to convince them to back me in voting for this bill. To do that, I need to have a solid argument to convince them that this is a good idea.

Except there is one very major difference with this bill and the reason I was elected. I ran on zero increases in taxes. This bill increases taxes. Asking my constituents to back a decision to vote yes on a bill that increases taxes will never fly with my constituents because I didn't campaign on that. Asking people in Calgary-Foothills to allow me to back a bill that raises taxes would be the equivalent of an MLA promising one thing and delivering the complete opposite. Members opposite have been accused of doing things they never ran on, such as with this very bill, but I'll not do that.

I will not vote for something that I did not run on. I would not trick my constituents into increasing taxes just because I was not fiscally responsible with their taxes. I would not create a province-wide policy that was not in my platform. As long as there is a punitive tax in this bill, I will not vote for it. I will not vote for something I'm explicitly against, which my constituents do not want me to vote for.

The NDP keep quoting a poll that shows the majority of Albertans support a carbon tax. If that was the case in my riding, I would support it as well since it is my job to represent them. What the NDP refuse to admit is that the poll, that came after they announced what their carbon tax would actually include, shows that Albertans are against this tax. People are happy to help the environment. People want to stop climate change. People want to make the world a better place, but Albertans do not think that this carbon tax is a good idea. A Mainstreet Research poll showed that 66 per cent of Albertans were against the incoming tax. That is well past a majority. That is Alberta speaking loud and clear, Mr. Speaker, that they are against this tax.

It is amazing how people will vote when people have all the facts. If I told Albertans that I will come out with a climate change plan that will solve the world's problems, I would imagine that every Albertan would be in favour of it, which is exactly how this climate change plan was advertised. The thing is that Albertans are not stupid, Mr. Speaker. Once the details of the plan were announced, that same Mainstreet poll showed that 68 per cent of Albertans opposed the plan altogether. Yes, once the details of the plan were announced, people opposed the plan.

It seems that this government is again falling prey to the same mistakes over and over and over. They refuse to consult Albertans and find out what they actually want. The NDP seem to think that they know best. They seem to think that they know how to best implement policies, without consulting Albertans. They don't even have their offices staffed with Albertans to even have the resemblance of Albertan thinking within their policies. It's not acceptable.

The poll continued on to show that Albertans are smart. Albertans know, first of all, for example, that the NEB, the board that approves pipelines, does not care what this government does. The NEB will approve or not approve a pipeline based on the economic and environmental impacts of the pipeline itself. The NEB will not approve a pipeline if a province taxes their people to death under the guise of being nice to the environment. The poll by Mainstreet Research showed that 62 per cent of Albertans believe that this climate plan will not help with future pipeline approvals, and they're right. The NEB approved a pipeline, and this plan has not yet come to pass, complete and utter proof that this plan has no effect on pipelines being approved or not approved.

Let's continue on now to the economic impact of this bill, Mr. Speaker. I would point to the details of the economic impact of this plan if I had them. I would point to the economic impact study that was done for this bill if the government actually did one. I do not understand why this government refuses to complete or to table their economic impact study of this carbon tax on Albertans. Alberta is having a difficult time right now. Our economy is far different than it has been. Over a hundred thousand people have lost their jobs. Many people in Calgary-Foothills have lost their jobs, and they want to get back to work. Oil field companies are going out of business, and people are leaving the province in droves, yet this government refuses to evaluate our current economic situation and how this bill will affect Alberta's situation.

Is this government hiding something that they do not want Albertans to know? I'm sure that this government was afraid of giving Albertans more information, knowing that they would oppose this tax even further if they had more details. Maybe this government knows that the economic impact of this tax will be so detrimental to the people they advertise it will help that the government will do anything it can do to suppress that information. If that is a false statement, then prove me wrong. Release the information. Release an economic impact study done in Alberta on this tax.

The number of questions that I have over the fact that this government refuses to release this information would last us until the cows come home, but I have other questions that I would like addressed as well, questions surrounding the cap on emissions. I want to know how the quota for the 30 megatonnes is divided up. When this emissions cap was decided, was the intention of increasing this cap to pick winners and losers?

9:10

Let me expound before members opposite become too upset. When the NDP was sitting on this side, on the opposition benches, they accused the previous government of picking winners and losers. They accused the previous government of awarding contracts based on who donated the most money, but this government is appointing people who have donated lots of money to their party. This government is starting to look a lot like the previous government. That's why I question whether this cap is to pick winners and losers. Who will get to use the rest of this emissions cap? We're already consuming 70 megatonnes, and the cap is at 100 megatonnes, Mr. Speaker. There are only 30 megatonnes left, so who will be allocated that? Nobody knows. This bill doesn't speak about that.

Mr. Orr: I bet you they already gave permits to the big four that bought out . . .

Mr. Panda: Well, that could be the reason. That's right. They're supported.

Will this government pick who gets to use the rest of the allotted emissions? Will this government pick winners and losers like the last government did? Will there be an independent body that will determine who gets to use the allotted emissions cap? What's being done to ensure that this government divvies up the allotted emissions to whoever would be the best for Alberta instead of a friend of the NDP? These are the questions that the residents of Calgary-Foothills want me to get answers to. I hope that the minister can answer these questions during this debate.

Also, Mr. Speaker, we are rushing through all these bills. Bill 20 is a 95-page bill, you know, in contrast to Bill 1, which is supposed to be the flagship bill of this government, that gathered dust for three months. We didn't rush that through. Now we are at the end of the session, and we have to debate day and night on Bill 20, which is 95 pages. We didn't have enough time. People are questioning . . .

Mr. MacIntyre: Integrity.

Mr. Panda: Yeah.

. . . the thinking process and the integrity that goes into this thinking that we can just rush the bills through this House without quality debate. People want quality debate. We're not getting enough time.

It's the same thing when we were talking about the other motion just now, that the previous speakers were mentioning. We're bringing in bills and motions just 72 hours before the House is going to adjourn for summer. Albertans are wondering: what are the motives of this government? When they sat on this side of the House, they criticized the previous government for rushing through bills like that, but now it seems that it's acceptable to them.

This carbon tax, Mr. Speaker, like Bill 6, has really unsettled people in my riding because the premise is . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Questions to the Member for Calgary-Foothills under 29(2)(a)?
The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was intrigued by what the Member for Calgary-Foothills had started to say about consultation and the importance of consultation within the legislative process. He brought up the fact that the job-creation bill, Bill 1, was introduced – what? – the first week of session, something like that, and I'm guessing that during the time that it had been sitting on the Order Paper, the government must have been doing a ton of consultation to work out exactly what that's minister's responsibilities were to create jobs for ridings like Bonnyville-Cold Lake, the one I'm from, and Calgary-Foothills, like my honoured colleague here is from. Now, this is an interesting thought, that we give a one-page bill three months, and we give a 95-page bill a week, maybe a week and a half, that is a lifestyle change for Albertans. It's going to impact everyone across Alberta whereas Bill 1 really only impacted the one specific ministry.

I would like to hear from the member on how he feels the consultation process for Bill 1 versus Bill 20 went, the differences between the two, and how he feels that this could have been handled better had we been given more time to look through this bill, to be able to go stakeholders and discuss this bill instead of rushing something through that probably will have massive unintended consequences because of the fact that we haven't taken the time to go through it.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Panda: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you to my colleague from Bonnyville-Cold Lake. If his question is about the consultation process adopted by this government, I didn't see any consultation for Bill 1. They claim to have consulted industry leaders for Bill 20, but, like my colleagues here, I was wondering if that consultation was with only very few of the industry representatives. And if they broke ranks with their other industry colleagues and just supported this bill, were there any promises made to them in terms of allocating that remaining 30 megatonnes?

I don't know. Those are the questions. If the government can throw light on that and educate us in the next few hours and few days of debate, I'll be grateful.

Mr. Speaker, the premise of this bill is to decarbonize the economy and, you know, to improve the environment, and for that, what they're trying to do is to put a price on carbon. All those industrialists who supported the bill: in their regular business they do a cost-benefit analysis for every decision they make. In this very case there are costs, but there is no benefit. The benefit is supposed to be gaining social licence for pipelines, and we haven't seen that yet. The NEB doesn't care about the social side of that; they just look at the environmental and economic impacts of the pipeline and also the benefits of that. Based on that, they make their recommendations.

I expect and Albertans expect this government to do the same thing, that they will do a thorough economic impact study of this major environmental policy they're announcing. They haven't done that. This was supposed to be revenue neutral, and that's not the case. Mr. Speaker, at the end you really wonder why this government is rushing this bill.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Anyone wishing to speak to Bill 20? The Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

Mrs. Littlewood: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my honour to rise and speak in support of Bill 20, the Climate Leadership Implementation Act. The title is the core of this NDP government and this NDP caucus. It recognizes the responsibility we have to the environment, Albertans, Canadians, and the world, and it acknowledges the impact that climate has on it. It asks that we do what Alberta does best – that is, to be leaders – and it commits to implementation, which was sorely lacking from the previous government.

You can't just talk about how great it would be if you could do something about the environment. Every day is precious time that we are losing. The world evolves and adapts with time, periods of time that we cannot contemplate, billions of years, not thousands of years, as some in opposition would plug their ears and try to believe. What we have done since the Industrial Revolution is to attempt to force this planet to expedite this process in a way that it simply cannot bear. This problem is not going to be addressed in any sort of meaningful way without strong leadership, leadership under a minister that has shown resolute strength and integrity.

This government asked Dr. Andrew Leach to undertake extensive consultation and to engage communities and to lead a panel of experts. All of this work culminated in the Climate Leadership report. The report states that climate change is one of the greatest challenges facing us today and directly affects the health, environment, and economy of our province.

9:20

The consequences of a changing climate are already being experienced around the world and right here at home. There are few jurisdictions that experience this as acutely as rural Alberta: wildfires, severe drought, heavy flooding. This past spring was extremely dry. What some here may not know is that when you go to the outlying areas of Alberta where we have farms, people obtain licences to burn different materials on their property. One of the challenges is that these fires don't always go out under the soil. In fact, these fires can burn underground all winter and spark in the spring. Counties have service people that use a heat-seeking radar to find hot spots in an attempt to head off forest fires at the beginning, but the spots they miss will take a larger life in the spring when conditions start to dry.

This spring I had the opportunity to visit a constituent's cow-calf farm, which under normal circumstances would have been a lot of fun. The tragedy is that I was visiting their farm because there was a forest fire, a fire exacerbated due to very dry conditions, a dry winter followed by a March and April almost free of rain. This fire took 75 per cent of their fence, all of their buildings save for their house, the husband's entire tool shop, and all of their feed for their cattle. They were devastated. They had three generations at home with them, including two very small children, one just a baby girl. They had invested everything they had into their farm. I sat at their kitchen table and watched the treeline, that was 50 feet away, still billowing smoke. One of the buildings they lost was sitting in melted pieces right beside their house. As I sat there, I asked myself: when is this going to happen next? How are we going to support these families, that are a vital part of the identity of Alberta? How am I going to help them up?

Mr. Speaker, this province's economy was built on agriculture. The New Democrats know that. Our party roots lie in farming communities. When we are faced with challenge, we innovate and we adapt. That's why we are acting today. This is why the government has made a crucial decision to exempt marked gas and diesel from the carbon levy. Agriculture will play an integral role as we work on economic diversification in this province.

Farming has been the most sustainable part of our economy for over a century. In 2014 it made up 1.3 per cent of our GDP. By focusing on how we can support our farms as we grow both local and international markets, we can work to grow that part of our economy. By exempting fuel used on farms, we recognize that modern farming is a challenge. Struggling with increasingly variable weather, our agricultural community contemplates whether they will keep fighting the good fight, that ultimately puts food on our table.

Farmers are always looking at how to innovate and lower their costs. They regularly consult with experts to make their operations more efficient. Farms are already putting solar on their buildings. They don't want to be subject to the fluctuating costs of energy when they know they can make themselves self-sufficient. The government announced this past February a new solar program for agricultural producers, on-farm solar management, providing $500,000 in provincial and federal funding towards solar energy systems on Alberta farms. This is just one of the first programs that will assist farm operations in generating their own electricity.

Programs such as these can be administered through the second part of this act, that will introduce a lean agency named Energy Efficiency Alberta. We are the last province to establish this sort of agency, that has a mandate to promote, design, and deliver programs that carry out other activities related to energy efficiency, energy conservation, and the development of microgeneration and small-scale energy systems in Alberta.

This mirrors the values that Alberta farmers have, and it is long overdue, Mr. Speaker. Thank you.

The Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a)?

Mr. MacIntyre: May I, Mr. Speaker? Regarding farming, I'm just wondering if the hon. member can illuminate the House here with any data that her government has done on the actual costs to farming of this carbon tax, something in the order of an economic assessment study, the real thing.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mrs. Littlewood: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the question from the hon. member. The cost is that person's farm. The cost is the feed that that person needs to now replace, the tens of thousands of dollars that it will cost to get that farm back up and running: all of the feed, the buildings, that person's tools, that they had just bought, to have a business that would supplement their farm income.

It is very difficult in today's world to make a good living at farming. That's why we have so many people that have off-farm jobs in oil and gas. That's one of the reasons why we have this climate change implementation act. We need to find market access because while we need to grow farming in Alberta, we are still dependent on oil and gas. Most of the farmers that I meet either work off-farm in oil and gas or their family does. So those are the costs.

The cost of doing nothing is to continue to sell our resources at a discount by shipping it by rail. The real cost is the emotional burden on these families that put everything, their entire lives, into their farming operations, and when they lose it, it is very difficult to get their feet back underneath them. That's the cost.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Under 29(2)(a). I don't think the hon. member actually even came close to answering the question. I think the question was about the cost of the carbon tax on the particular farm she talked about. Now, she went on to also address other costs, but she didn't talk about the carbon tax, the cost to farmers, and whether there was any economic assessment done on that.

She did also mention something about the title, that the core of this bill is in the title, the Climate Leadership Implementation Act. When I look through this Bill 20 here, I see three things: the Climate Leadership Act, the Energy Efficiency Alberta Act, and then other acts under schedule 3. Now, let's just look at schedule 3. In that is the Alberta Corporate Tax Act, the Alberta Personal Income Tax Act, and the Climate Change and Emissions Management Act.

Now, if we look at the energy efficiency section of the bill, when I look at the table of contents, what I see – and this is a question to the member – is that we talk about the board. We talk about the duties and functions of the board. We talk about the chief executive officer. We talk about bylaws, business plans, reports, directives, regulations, the coming into force. I see all sorts of things about organization and structure, but I don't see a plan here. I don't see anything here that actually talks about climate. All we see is plans here.

Now let's go to the Climate Leadership Act. What I want to ask the member is this. When we start in here, we see the carbon levy on certain fuels. I guess my question is really: where is this climate leadership? To me this looks like it's a tax bill, purely a tax bill. If we go down, we're talking about the carbon levy in items 4 through 10. Then we talk about the mixture of fuels, rebranded fuel. We talk about carbon levy exemption certificates. We talk about prohibited sale, prohibited use. We talk about assessment of carbon levy to be remitted. We talk about overpayment of carbon levy, assessment of penalties, interest, payment by a third party, liability of directors for failure to remit. We talk about irregularities. We talk about warrants. We talk about offences and penalties.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Anyone else wishing to speak to Bill 20? The Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

9:30

Dr. Swann: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to speak to Bill 20, Climate Leadership Implementation Act. This truly is a shift in government policy. I think many of us welcomed the need for serious action on climate change. It proposes to create two new statutes: the Climate Leadership Act and the Energy Efficiency Alberta Act. The Climate Leadership Act will give government the authority to establish the carbon levy and consumer rebates. The Energy Efficiency Alberta Act establishes Energy Efficiency Alberta, a new agency that will provide programs and information to help people reduce their energy consumption, which would have it operating January 2017.

The bill also proposes to amend the Alberta Corporate Tax Act to reduce the small-business tax rate, which will help some small businesses adjust to the price of carbon. Effective January 1, 2017, that rate will be lowered from 3 per cent to 2 per cent. The bill also proposes to amend the Personal Income Tax Act and the Climate Change and Emissions Management Act. All of this points to a recognition that a carbon tax is a recognized international approach to reducing people's use and burning of carbon, by many counts the fairest, the simplest, the most equitable approach to producers and consumers of carbon-based fuels in shifting the priorities for fuel use to lower carbon and zero carbon emissions.

Clearly, this is an important step and one that, in principle, I fully support. The question, I guess, for many of us is: that, along with some of the other changes that have been made, will have exactly what impact on carbon and what impact on people's residential, commercial, industrial costs? Given the decision to phase out coal, the decision to target, at least, 30 per cent of renewables as part of the energy mix replacing coal by 2030 – and it's not clear whether that is 30 per cent of generation capacity or 30 per cent of generation. Those two are very different in terms of what they would require. Obviously, a lot more renewable energy would be required to provide the generation as opposed to having the capacity, because with just the capacity we'd have to have a lot of backup. We'd have to have a lot of, presumably, natural gas backup.

One could argue that this is an optimal time for making this transition: low prices in natural gas, the importance to the economy that we maintain some of our operations and some of our commitments to the fossil fuel industry, which has produced such surpluses of gas now and also, in the past, surpluses of our financial resources to build the schools, the hospitals, the roads, all that we have come to appreciate in this province.

Having said that, I think part of the challenge in this bill is the related policy decisions around the coal phase-out and the timing of the coal phase-out, the options, then, for a renewable with a backup fossil fuel secure base of electricity. Given that we are producing already 4,000 megawatts over what is actually required in Alberta today, there doesn't seem to be a lot of incentive to build new technology in this province, so the business case, the investment case, unfortunately, isn't here today. This is an unfortunate, I guess, convergence of a lot of different issues that now challenge... [An electronic device sounded] Who was that?

An Hon. Member: You.

Dr. Swann: Thank you. If I could continue, Mr. Speaker.

An Hon. Member: That's okay. It's your first day.

Dr. Swann: Yeah. I haven't been here for very long. The first time that's happened to me, actually.

The question of the balance between renewable energy, which is clearly needed and is clearly the future, and the backup, the balance between those two and how that either creates the business case for investment or discourages investment I think is a critically important one. That's why in the House I've been asking questions about what the cost benefit is of investing in the next 15 years, in what proportion of renewables and what proportion of gas-fired electrical energy, what impact that would have on the carbon levels that we're trying to achieve, how that would impact the cost of electricity in Alberta, and indeed what jobs would be created by that.

Where is the sweet spot there in terms of the balance between renewables, natural gas fired electricity, and the results that we all want to see: lower carbon, more jobs, and an alternate economy here? It doesn't look like the government has yet done that work, which makes it difficult. I mean, obviously, every bill has some incompleteness to it, but I would have thought that the climate change panel would have some of those numbers. It's not clear to me, throwing into the mix some of the changes that have occurred, that we know enough about what the appropriate mix is.

Having said that, one of the most fundamental things that we could ask of the government is that they put in place performance targets in this bill. How will we measure over the next year to three years whether this climate change bill is achieving its purpose in terms of carbon reduction, the cost of electricity, the jobs created? I will be suggesting an amendment in due course, not today, to that effect. Recognizing that all the pieces are not necessarily in place, we have here a bill that is taking us a good deal of the way towards less dependence on fossil fuels, a stronger connection to the climate and our commitment to future generations, and a recognition of the science that has been ignored in this House for the 12 years that I've been here and much longer by some measures.

We could learn from the B.C. example, where they brought in a carbon tax eight years ago. They have monitored that, and they have got, I would argue, the economic benefits from that, the job benefits from that, and the carbon reductions that may or may not be totally associated with that carbon tax but that have been associated with the balancing of the other elements of appropriate public policy around electrical generation and job creation. Hopefully, we can learn something from the B.C. example.

Again, this is part of a national approach to climate. I'm delighted to see the federal Liberal government taking leadership there. This province is taking leadership together with the other provinces. Hopefully, we can find some common ground and start making some real impact on the carbon emissions coming out of Canada and showing some leadership.

Obviously, Canada isn't the big producer of carbon emissions on the planet. China and India are the big ones with the U.S., but Alberta on a per capita basis puts out more carbon than any other country in the world. I think we have to acknowledge that. On a per capita basis we produce far more carbon than almost anywhere else in the world.

Leadership is what the world is looking for. If not Alberta, who is going to start to show some real leadership on this critically important issue that relates to health effects, water issues, extreme weather events, new infectious diseases? It may not be entirely due to human activity, but surely the indications are that a very substantial part of the warming going on on the planet is related to human activity and carbon-based fuels.

Methane is another big source. Of course, methane is something like 25 times more potent as a greenhouse gas, and we have lots of leaking wells, as far as I'm aware. I don't think we're taking that as seriously as we should and could. I hope that the Alberta Energy Regulator and Alberta Environment are looking at that as a very serious part of a climate change plan that will actually have an impact, and I'll be pushing very much for that, especially in northeastern Alberta.

My understanding is that with the soft soils, the tundra, there is a very significant amount of methane leaking, and testing hasn't been assiduous. Accountability hasn't been strict. The cost of remediating small leaks is significant relative to some returns on some wells, and that makes it much more difficult for both the industry and government to get serious about some of the leaking that's going on across the province but particularly in the northeast.

9:40

Those are some of my comments. I appreciate the leadership, but I think we need to know much more than we do. I think the government has some of this information. I would ask that they put it out there. Let's have more discussion around: what is the appropriate balance to get the optimal results in terms of the economy, new jobs, carbon reductions, and electricity costs?

Thank you.

The Speaker: Any questions for the Member for Calgary-Mountain View under 29(2)(a)?

Anyone else that wishes to speak to Bill 20? The Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake.

Mr. MacIntyre: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, this bill that we're looking at right now, Bill 20, as my hon. colleague pointed out, really is nothing more than a tax bill. There is really nothing in there that one could call climate plan leadership whatsoever. There's no plan. It's all about taxing: how they're going to collect the tax and how they're going to punish anyone who doesn't pay the tax. This carbon tax is really nothing more than a tax on everything. It is implemented in the midst of one of the deepest economic recessions this province has experienced since the Dirty Thirties.

This NDP government has not bothered to conduct an Alberta study of the massive implications this tax will have on indirect costs or even direct costs. I have asked repeatedly in this House for economic impact assessments. I don't know if the hon. members on the other side are just playing silly or if they really don't understand what an economic assessment looks like, but I have yet to get a straight answer. I will take the evasive answers as meaning, no, they have not conducted any economic impact assessment on any sector of our economy, and that is intellectual laziness.

The estimates place the direct and indirect costs of this tax conservatively at $1,000. That's not our estimate. Those are numbers based on the people who understand these things far better than I do. Now, for the typical Alberta family, resultantly, the necessary cost corrections for this regressive, inequitable tax are entirely insufficient. This tax is regressive because low-income and fixed-income Albertans pay a higher proportion of the money that they earn satisfying their family's needs. As a percentage of their overall earnings, Alberta's most economically vulnerable will be paying more towards this tax increase than a family of higher means. This government is imposing punitive taxation measures on Alberta's poorest in this horrifyingly regressive redistribution of wealth. That's really all this tax is about.

Mr. Speaker, this government should be ashamed of themselves for implementing this tax that will increase the cost of everything. There really is only one taxpayer in this province. That's the people of Alberta. In my speech right now I'm going to detail for the assembled members just a few examples of the uncalculated, indirect cost increases, just a few examples of the uncalculated indirect social and economic cost increases for Albertan businesses and families that this government has refused to calculate. I've been reaching out to stakeholders in my community, in the magnificent riding of Innisfail-Sylvan Lake. You must come to the lake, by the way. I have a couple of school districts in my riding. One is Chinooks Edge, and the other one is Red Deer Catholic regional schools. They sent letters to the hon. Minister of Education outlining their concerns with this carbon tax, and they quantified. They did something the government did not do. They actually ran the numbers. Specifically, because the riding is large and we have a large rural population, busing students is a major expense for school boards.

With their projections, Chinook's Edge said in their letter to the hon. Minister of Education:

Our early projections show that there will be an impact to our Transportation and Facilities 2016/2017 budgets for the six month period of approximately $70,000 which will increase to $105,000 the following year. Although difficult to predict, there will also be significant increases to operating costs across the Division as our suppliers pass on the levy [that they experience to us]. We fear that with already tight budgets, this will have a direct impact to student learning in the classroom as staffing reductions may be necessary.

We have heard repeatedly from this government how they are the only people on the planet protecting front-line services. Well, news flash. According to Chinook's Edge school division, this carbon tax "will have a direct impact to student learning in the classroom." They have to bus the students. That is not an option. Buses take fuel. Children in the wintertime, in the very cold weather, need to be bused in. Their parents pay for that busing. Chinook's Edge is saying that it's going to cost them another $70,000 just in the six-month period of that budget year on account of the carbon tax, and that's just them.

This does not even cover the cost of heating in the schools, which is another major expense. The cost of natural gas is going to go up, and school divisions, as we know, are already squeezed when it comes to budgets.

Well, another letter, this one from Red Deer Catholic regional schools, again sent to the hon. David Eggen, Minister of Education.

Some Hon. Members: Names.

Mr. MacIntyre: Sorry. My apologies.

Sent on May 19, here they say that for the calendar year our projections show that there will be a significant impact to our Transportation and Facilities operational 2016-2017 budget . . . [of] $78,000 in carbon tax and $122,000 in 2018. The direct impact to our budget will grow even more in future years as we open several new schools.

And what else do they say?

We are very proud of the efficient way that we operate our Division and work very hard to balance our budget every year. It will be exceptionally difficult to absorb the cost of the carbon tax and hear this again, without negatively impacting the student learning environment in the classroom as staffing reductions may be necessary.

Furthermore, they go on to say:

Placing this additional financial pressure on school boards by taxing back funds that they have been provided with to operate is not responsible.

School boards in this province operate on tax dollars, and they're questioning the sanity of the government taxing back tax dollars. It's ridiculous.

It is going to impact classrooms directly, and this is from the experts. This government failed to take the time to do a proper economic assessment to see just what this tax was going to do to every sector of our economy, to our way of life. This bill is so invasive that there isn't a portion of our economy, of our population that isn't going to be adversely affected by this thing. That's just schools and school busing.

9:50

Now, how about hospitals? You know, years ago, when I was involved in consulting, I did some energy efficiency consulting for some hospitals. They are what's known as energy intense. To give you an idea of how energy intense hospitals can be – I'm going to get technical on you; hang on – an operating room is required to ventilate the air coming into and out of the room. A typical operating room has about 2,500 cubic feet of air per minute. So picture five feet by five feet by 100 feet long every 60 seconds going through that OR. It has to do with biological security within the OR. All of the air that goes out must have air coming in. When it's minus 30 outside, that air coming in at that rate must be elevated to a temperature of at least 18 degrees Celsius. So you have a 48-degree temperature rise that you have to accomplish in 60 seconds for a volume of air of 2,500 cubic feet. That takes an enormous amount of energy. Your solar panel isn't going to get to do that.

Mr. Orr: Just lower the temperature.

Mr. MacIntyre: Right. Let's have our OR staff working in parkas. Then we can solve that.

Mr. Taylor: Or the patient.

Mr. MacIntyre: Or the patient. Right. They live longer when they're frozen.

However, Mr. Speaker, that takes an enormous amount of energy. The carbon tax is a behavioural modification mechanism. Please, tell me how we can modify the behaviour of a ventilation system in a hospital like that when by law they're required to move that much air that fast and warm it up that quickly? It's simply not going to be the case.

Hospitals and hotels are energy-intensive environments. They require a fuel to burn. Solar panels will not do this. Wind turbines will not do this. They will have to use natural gas to do this. It's not an option. They have to use it, and they are going to be penalized. Our hospitals are going to be penalized. Again, our hospitals are operating on tax dollars. So now the government is taxing it back. It's ludicrous. It makes no sense whatsoever. None whatsoever.

I could go on, and I know you want me to. I do. I know you really want me to. I could keep going, but there's always tomorrow. So, Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment that I would like to introduce.

Shall I wait?

The Speaker: Do you have copies? Please, pass them around. Just give us a minute until it gets distributed.

Please proceed, hon. member. We will refer to it as amendment RA1.

Mr. MacIntyre: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'll read the amendment. Notice of amendment to Bill 20, Climate Leadership Implementation Act. I move that the motion for second reading of Bill 20, Climate Leadership Implementation Act, be amended by deleting all the words after "that" and substituting the following:

Bill 20, Climate Leadership Implementation Act, be not now read a second time because this Assembly has not received satisfactory evidence or assurances that a full economic impact analysis has been completed detailing any potential negative impact on the economic well-being of Albertans.

Mr. Speaker, as I have mentioned before in this House I don't know how many times now, an economic impact assessment is an extremely important instrument. It tells us what the impact of something is going to be upon us. In a democracy it just seems to me that we have a responsibility to act compassionately whenever we are introducing anything that will impact our people. I like to think sometimes that if I was on the government side and I was introducing law, it just seems to me that I would want to enact legislation always with the thought in my mind as to how this is going to impact my wife and children, my mom and dad, my grandchildren, you know, my sons and cousins and uncles, the people that I know, my neighbours down the street. How is a particular law going to impact the people I care about?

In a democracy the people are the government. It's government of the people, by the people, for the people. Everything that we do impacts the ones we love, the ones we care about. So everything that we vote on should, in my opinion, always be done with this thought in mind: is this what I want to do to the people I care about the most?

An Hon. Member: It's not an ideology?

Mr. MacIntyre: No, it's not an ideology.

Is this what I want the people I care about to experience going forward now, not just for a year, maybe a whole generation. The things that we do in this House sometimes impact future generations for a very, very, very long time, multiple generations. Long after you and I are gone, the stuff that we do in here – and it's closer for some of us than others, I know – is going to impact for a very, very long time.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any questions of the hon. member under 29(2)(a)? The Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky.

Mr. Loewen: Yes. I would like to ask the member to expand a little bit more on this amendment that he's bringing forward. He talks a lot about doing a proper economic assessment. Of course, the government didn't do any economic assessment on this. If they did, then at least they never provided it to us or anybody in Alberta, the House or Albertans anywhere. I think this amendment makes sense, and I'm just hoping that the hon. member could just take a little bit more time and express just a few more opinions and concerns that he has, why he thinks it's a good idea to have this amendment.

You know, we look at this bill, and of course it's called the Climate Leadership Implementation Act. I think we've established fairly well, though we can go into it further down the road here, that it's really just a tax bill. The Climate Leadership Implementation Act is really a misnomer because I don't see anything in here where it talks about the climate. All I see is about taxes and collecting taxes and penalties for taxes and offences and interest.

I would like to hear the hon. member just continue on a little bit, talking about this amendment. Hopefully, he can provide just a little bit more information to us because I'd definitely be interested in hearing more from him.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake.

Mr. MacIntyre: Thank you to the hon. member and great bear hunter. Regarding this amendment and an economic assessment, when we were drafting the curriculum for NAIT's alternative energy program, we took a look at, I think, a total of nine different technologies. In the process of looking at those technologies, we realized that one of the really important things we were going to have to impart to students was that it's all well and good to, you know, feel warm and fuzzy about a particular technology, but at the end of the day that technology has to be technically feasible and economically viable, those two things. If it failed on either one of those, then it fails. It doesn't even have to fail on both. But if it failed either technically or economically, then that technology failed in that particular site.

10:00

We devised some courses to teach students assessment of various kinds. One was site assessment because some technologies work here but not over there. Some technologies work well in that industrial environment but not in that one. Some of it is geographic. There are all kinds. Some of it is regulatory issues. Some work in this regulatory environment, and some don't work in that regulatory environment. Assessment, from a technical point of view, was really important to teach them. As I said, we were teaching them some nine different technologies, so there was a lot of course material about how to make an appropriate technical assessment.

Then we came to the economic assessment, the economics of renewable, alternative technologies. Now, as a result, we actually developed an economics course that was built specifically for economic assessment of alternative or renewable technologies. There wasn't one out there, so myself and another instructor built it. It was a great economics course.

We also did a life cycle analysis course, again determining at the end of the day whether this thing was financially feasible to do, regardless of which technology we're looking at. We were looking at fuel cells, microhydro, microgeneration, combined heat and power, ground source heat pump technology, solar and wind, both utility scale and small scale. I can't even remember them all anymore.

Economic assessment was vitally important. Without doing an economic assessment, you don't know what something is going to cost, nor do you know what its economic benefit is going to be to you, to the industry, to the region, wherever you're putting this thing. So we taught them how to do these assessments and not just here in Alberta because we recognized that the students would end up going all over the world. In fact, in the very first cohort of students that we had through the program, only a third were from Alberta.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there other members that wish to speak to amendment RA1 to Bill 20? The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise on this occasion to support my colleague from Innisfail-Sylvan Lake's reasoned motion on Bill 20, the Climate Leadership Implementation Act. The hon. member's amendment is entirely reasonable considering the government has once again pushed forward with ideology trumping due diligence. Asking for an economic impact assessment on this bill is in the best interests of all Albertans. After all, it's a tax bill. It only makes sense that you'd have an economic impact assessment on it.

As we have seen numerous times in this House, this government has a disturbing habit of not engaging in a robust consultation before implementing a significant piece of legislation. We saw it in the Enhanced Protection for Farm and Ranch Workers Act and again with Bill 18, An Act to Ensure Independent Environmental Monitoring. In both instances the government chose to ignore any reasonable motions brought forth by the opposition and instead relied on what could be considered a one-sided argument that supported their own position.

We simply cannot afford to allow a piece of legislation with such huge implications for all facets of Albertans' lives to simply be pushed through without proper economic review. To do so, as my colleague from Drumheller-Stettler is fond of saying, could have unintended consequences. In fact, up until it was mentioned by this side of the House, it appears that the government hadn't even considered the notion that there may be some trickle-down effects from this burdensome tax.

As we have mentioned before, had a proper economic impact assessment been completed, perhaps Albertans could have more faith in the government's numbers. Well, Mr. Speaker, they didn't, and the public doesn't. While the government maintains that lower income Albertans use less energy and with the rebate they could actually come out ahead by about $22, that's really hard to be certain of as this government chose not to do their homework. Rebate amounts were based on direct costs of heat and fuel, not any additional costs, not to mention that different people use energy differently. Some travel more, burn more gas, therefore would have a larger impact on their wallet, on their pocketbook. The idea was only designed to cover increases in natural gas and fuel costs. By some estimates even families that get the maximum rebate will still be looking at $400 a year in additional carbon tax costs, a number far above what the NDP came out with after the fact.

Now, I'm sure what members opposite will clamour is that Committee of the Whole provides the chance for more robust discussion. While it may indeed provide for discussion, the process favours the government as no independent verification or economic studies have been brought forth. Committee, of course, allows a much greater in-depth discussion because we can bring in witnesses, experts on one side of the issue or on the other side of the issue, both, so that we can get a well-rounded debate. We're here to make informed decisions. In order to make an informed decision, we have to have information. Instead, all we get are platitudes and ideological arguments from the ministers and NDP backbenchers.

Accepting and voting for this amendment would give Albertans time to get a much better understanding of the financial and economic consequences of the legislation.

I just want to remind everybody here that – I think it was just last week – we were debating Bill 1 and Bill 20 on the same day. Doesn't that seem a little odd, that we'd be debating the first bill and Bill 20 on the same day? Obviously, Bill 20 was thrown in at the last; ram it through as fast as possible and get away for the summer break.

[Mr. Sucha in the chair]

Committee of the Whole deals primarily with the proposal of amendments to bills under consideration. During Committee of the Whole consideration most often only general comments are made on bills. This bill has too many nuances and far-reaching implications to simply jam it through the House simply because the government has a majority. To do so would solidify the public perception of an ideological-based approach by this government rather than show the ability to listen and consult before legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I spoke at length last week on why this bill is a bad idea. It's based on ideology and is in no way revenue neutral, but that's what it was sold to us as when it was first announced: revenue neutral. Those people that stood on the same stage as the Premier and environment minister sat there and listened as the people in the audience heard the minister and the Premier tell us that it was revenue neutral. Well, it clearly wasn't, so I'm not sure how they feel about their support for this bill, standing on the same stage and realizing afterwards that it wasn't what it was said to be.

There seems to be very little regard for any unforeseen consequences. This bill will harm everybody: charities, nonprofits, the agriculture industry, the manufacturing industry, and food processing, just to name a few. If this government honestly believes that there will be no passing on costs to the end user, we the taxpayer, then they clearly have chosen not to understand.

It's hard to trust a government that can't or won't be upfront with Albertans. We saw it with the flawed rollout and implementation around last year's Bill 6, and we are seeing it again with this carbon tax.

While the government claims that it will diversify the economy through green efficiency programs, which is scant comfort to those unemployed Albertans whose employment insurance will be running out all too soon, we look at this bill, and we don't see anything of a plan for the communities that are going to be affected by this. It's just about taxes. It's a tax bill. It's collecting taxes, penalties, punishments. Taxes. There's nothing in here that's going to help Albertans. There's nothing at all.

This is the second or third promise of jobs being created by this government. The first, much-hyped job-creation plan was an absolute failure, and the government is already distancing itself from it. It didn't create any jobs except, of course, the minister's. It was something that we told the government over and over again: this isn't going to work. Industry told us: this isn't going to work. Everybody said that it wasn't going to work. The government doubled down, tripled down, and said: yes, it's going to work; trust us. But it didn't.

They also promised jobs to compensate for the acceleration of no coal-fired generation and the numerous employment losses from that. These plans have yet to be shared with an already worried province. Now the promise of green jobs to replace those lost on this ideological journey, but when are these green jobs coming? Where? Who will they hire? There are lots of questions, but there are no answers. The problem is that how many Albertans will actually be employed still remains a mystery. I'm sure we will need to hire people to pick up the dead bats and birds off the windmill farms and sweep the snow off the solar panels so that they can work, but I doubt there will be enough employment to compensate everyone who has lost a job as a result of this government's misguided economic policies.

Quite simply, Albertans don't trust this government to get it right. Trust is everything in government, and right now trust for this bunch on the opposite side is on the low end of the scale. I believe that it was an Insights West poll that saw that nearly 63 per cent of Albertans polled thought that the current government was doing a bad job on employment and the economy. I don't think that this carbon tax will help those numbers, Mr. Speaker. In fact, it's hurting those numbers.

Again, I can't possibly stress this point enough. This carbon tax will be harmful to all Albertans regardless of their economic situation. In fact, based on analysis from the Canadian Tax Journal, it is realistic to estimate that a typical family will find itself out at least a thousand dollars every year once this punitive tax is up and running. Hundreds of thousands of Albertans are unemployed. Costs are increasing while economic growth decreases. This tax will hurt Albertans at a time when they can least afford it. Albertans have already been put upon by increases to business and personal taxes. Now this carbon tax is going to hit them with increases to the price of gasoline, diesel, and the everyday costs of living. This government's carbon tax will punish everyday families and businesses. It will make life in Alberta significantly more expensive.

[The Speaker in the chair]

It is more important now than ever not to rush this bill through, Mr. Speaker. Let's take the time to get this right and make sure that what gets passed doesn't hurt the very Albertans that will ultimately pay for this tax. I urge the members to take every effort to consider what is at stake here and vote for common sense over ideology. Let's give our support to the hon. Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake and vote for this reasoned amendment.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the members talk about the report that was done that they based Bill 20 on, but I'm not quite sure. There doesn't seem to be a lot of things they've taken from the climate leadership report other than taxes. When I look through this, on the very first page of the executive summary, in the very first paragraph, second sentence, it says:

The implications of climate policies – be they provincial, national or international – are significant. They will impact employment, future economic growth and stability, the government's ability to pay for social services, and Albertans' prosperity, opportunities and health.

So here in the very first paragraph of this report this group has its first warning for the government. It says: "They will impact employment, future economic growth and stability, the government's ability to pay for social services." Social services: those are set up so that we can help the vulnerable, the people that can't help themselves. That's one of our basic duties in society, and that's in the first paragraph. We're just going to ram this through. We're going to put it right to the end. We're going to ram it through.

Now, we could go on to paragraph 5, still on the first page.

We have taken great care to ensure this is a progressive policy that offsets impacts on most Alberta households and small businesses, [most] while protecting our core industries and supporting the transition needs of affected workers and communities.

It talks here in paragraph 5 about how they're going to protect our core industries and support the transition needs of affected workers and communities, but if you look at Bill 20, there's no plan here for our core industries. There's no plan here for supporting transition needs of affected workers and communities. There isn't. It's taxes. That's all it is.

I'll carry on. Still on the first page of the executive summary here it says that "Alberta is an export-oriented economy and changes to greenhouse gas policies will inevitably have an impact."

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Any questions under 29(2)(a) for the Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky? The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Now, the hon. member, who is a colleague and a friend, has brought some very good examples of why we need to reconsider this bill. We need to be supporting this amendment because of the fact that it is important to show exactly where we're going with Alberta.

Now, the member brought some really good points forward, really showing that there are parts of this act – he's pointed them out very specifically, and I commend the member for being so thorough in going through this 95-page document. It is remarkable that we have such a short time frame to be going through this document, yet to his credit he has taken the time to go specifically section by section and look to identify some of the concerns that he has, and he's bringing those concerns forward. My question to that hon. member is: do you have any more concerns with specific sections in this bill? Especially revolving around the fact that Alberta is going through an economic downturn, is it appropriate that we are taking more taxes out of my riding, Bonnyville-Cold Lake, and yours in northwestern Alberta?

Thank you, hon. member.

10:20

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you to the hon. member for the question. Obviously, the worst time to tax people more is when they have the least amount of money. We have unemployment skyrocketing. This government, of course, wants to blame everything on somebody or something else. They want to blame the previous government for everything. They want to blame the price of oil for everything that's happening when they're in charge. We know that that's not the whole problem. The price of oil is a problem, but that's not the whole problem.

We've spent a lot of time talking about the downgrades that the bond-rating companies have done on Alberta, losing our triple-A rating. We've had five downgrades, and since January 15 the price of oil has been going up, but we're continuing to be downgraded. That doesn't make sense, Mr. Speaker. That doesn't hold water.

Now, I just want to carry on with this climate leadership report that the government says has inspired Bill 20, the tax bill. I was talking about the first page of the executive summary, paragraph 2. I mean, we talked about paragraph 1 already and paragraph 5. We'll go back to paragraph 2. Again, it says that "Alberta is an export-oriented economy and changes to greenhouse gas policies will inevitably have an impact." In just about every paragraph in this report they're warning us, they're warning Albertans about what could happen with this.

Now, they go on to say here – and this is very important, too – that "Alberta has arguably paid a steep price for the perception that our economy, resources and investment climate are not compatible with action on climate change." Now, the most important word here, Mr. Speaker, is "perception" because we know it's not reality. We know we have the cleanest and best environment. We have a great environmental record compared to all of our competitors. Can we do better? Of course we can. We want to always do better. There's nobody more concerned about the environment than the members on this side of the House, bar none.

But it says right in this report, like I said, in paragraph 2 that Alberta has "paid a steep price for the perception that our economy, resources and investment climate are not compatible with action on climate change." Here's an admission that it's just a perception. Now this government is going to charge Albertans $3 billion in taxes for that perception.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Anyone wishing to speak to amendment RA1? The member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul-Two Hills.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Thanks for the wake-up call. It has been a long night.

Thank you for the opportunity to rise and speak on this reasonable reasoned amendment. The hon. Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake has put forward an amendment asking for "assurances that a full economic impact analysis has been completed detailing any potential negative impact on the economic well-being of Albertans." How anybody could find that an unreasonable statement is, you know, kind of beyond me.

This is about restoring confidence in Alberta with our investors, the people that come in and spend their money. A lot of the big unions represented on the other side are also big investors in our economy. The minister may claim that investment dollars are pouring in, but we're hearing a totally different story. We know that companies are planning on moving because of this crippling carbon tax. This carbon tax puts Alberta companies that rely on natural gas for processing at a severe disadvantage to their competitive neighbours. They are also not confident that this carbon tax will be the end but probably just the beginning. This does not instill confidence in investors.

We're hearing that this government's policies and ideologies are causing very real concern in the investment community: an undefined debt ceiling with its accompanying downgrades, increased corporate tax, and now a new carbon tax. It is not just the carbon tax on their business interest; it involves the lifestyle of their employees. When you are planning a big project or planning on moving your head office, you want to attract the best people that are going to help your business survive. They want to live in an economy, a province, that has all of the advantages, the lowest tax regime, all that stuff. Attracting good companies to an area that is unstable and expensive means that they have to offer a premium over neighbouring jurisdictions just to get them to come up there. Now, we see that up in northern Alberta all of the time. In order to get people to work north of Fort McMurray, which is miles and miles if you're driving – it's a five-hour drive from Edmonton – we have to fly people from all over the country, pay for their flights, just so we can man those projects. So something that businesses look at is where the projects are going to be and how much it's going to cost them to get quality employees there.

One of the things that gave us the Alberta advantage was a good, stable, predictable government – I guess I shouldn't say all of those words together – predictable taxation, and one of the lowest tax regimes in the country. People could count on the fact that they were paying a flat rate of 10 per cent tax in Alberta. They knew how much was going to come out of their pocket. This made it easy to attract investment. This made it easy for companies to attract top employees. That's no longer the case. We had a call today and some discussion about companies that are actually planning on leaving the province just because of the carbon tax on natural gas on their processes. For some of the companies this tax alone will increase their costs by a million dollars a year. One tax, just the natural gas tax.

All we have seen in this past year is unpredictability, tax increases, bills being dropped in at the end of session and rammed through this House. We've seen downturns in the past. I've been through more than my share in my lifetime. The main difference this time is that there is zero confidence in this government to help the situation. Quite the contrary, as a matter of fact.

There are many concerns and issues that could very easily arise resulting from these taxes, and they need to be considered before we move forward. We here in this House need to be adequately satisfied with sufficient evidence and assurances by way of a full economic impact analysis when being representatives for our constituents. We owe it to them. It's our job to make sure that any bill that surfaces is adequately studied and that we have the time to make sure that it is a just cause for Albertans.

Wildrose does not disagree that climate change is happening, and we do know that Alberta must help bring about changes to improve conditions. However, this bill may be too much too soon, and proper process should always take precedence. The financial impact that it will have on society could be very detrimental. Albertans will be paying the toll, and it will be way too much, especially now when Albertans are out of work. Alberta needs to recover, and I don't think this government gets that. I asked the question earlier in the evening under Standing Order 29(2)(a) to one of the ministers about why normal Albertans are footing the bill and have to suffer through a carbon tax to help supplement research and development for bigger companies. It doesn't make any sense that they're exempt from the same carbon tax that their employees and regular Albertans will have to pay.

This government is so focused on their risky, ideological ideas that they appear to have lost focus. The rebates that the government has promised to those who qualify will not be made available to nonprofits, schools, charities, and small and medium-sized businesses. [interjections] That's quite funny isn't it? Apparently. They'll have no choice but to either pass the bill to Albertans or to reduce their services. It's always enjoyable to stand up here to talk and listen to the members of the government laugh about people paying taxes and losing their jobs. It just makes my night.

What will that look like when municipalities have no choice but to reduce services or increase their taxes because of the increase? Will this continue to escalate every year when the carbon tax increases? How will Albertans be able to rebound from the financial mess that they're in now, and how can this NDP government continue to keep the blinders on and not see what Albertans are going through? These are the kinds of things that should be taken into account, and this government should be held to account and be required to do an economic impact study on this carbon tax. Part of that economic assessment should also include how this will affect the school boards and health centres. How will they keep up with the rising costs when they often struggle with resources? The schools will have to pass the extra fees on to parents, some of whom are already struggling.

I was at a meeting in St. Paul last night talking to people from AltaGas. They're a supplier as well as a customer, so they've got a very complex accounting system that they're going to have to put in place just to deal with this carbon tax.

Unfortunately, the NDP government has not only proven that it will not eliminate mandatory education fees but that, on the contrary, it will be increasing costs to these schools through tax increases. Schools will not be able to bear the burden alone, and fees will have to be increased to parents. Unfortunately, those who are elected to municipalities and school boards are the ones who will be blamed when they are forced to increase the fees. They'll bear the brunt of it, just like the municipalities did when they pulled the grants in lieu of taxes, when they pulled the $50 million from the MSI funding. Municipalities have no choice but to pass those expenses on to regular ratepayers.

What about health care centres? Will the government be giving them the extra funding they will need when their costs increase from this tax burden to make sure that patient care is not sacrificed? The money has to come from somewhere. You have to cut somewhere.

The trickle-down effects of this tax will cause a huge burden to Albertans in more ways than can be imagined. I cannot express enough how imperative it is that an economic assessment be done. I still don't understand how anybody could not understand the need for an economic impact study to be done before you implement a tax like this.

What about those who invest in our economy? Our competitors are not facing the same carbon pricing, yet investing in Alberta now will be that much more expensive. As I said earlier, we're already hearing that people are backing away. They're holding off because they don't trust this government. They've seen nothing but increases in corporate taxes, carbon taxes, and just the instability and unpredictability of this government. They don't know what's coming next. Is this a time for us to be gambling with reducing our competitiveness for investors? Once the oil prices rebound, will investors even be interested in bringing jobs back to Alberta with all the increases? They'll have other options, B.C. and Saskatchewan for one.

These are all things that this NDP government needs to take into account before barreling ahead with such risky taxes. The NDP budget will make things much worse, and now, with all the extra taxes, families will be hurting.

Yes, climate change is happening – I agree – but let's work through all of this systematically and make sure that all of the bases are covered and that we are not creating more problems than we are solving. We need to be sure of the cost impact. We need to be sure of the costs alluded to by my friend here from Grande Prairie-Smoky.

You know, our province is very clean. I've worked in the oil and gas industry most of my life. I know that we have a very responsible group of companies up there. The AER follows them. ERCB inspections are done all the time. The people that live up there, work up there don't want to pollute their own lakes and rivers. I can be very confident of that.

We need to be sure of the impact. We need to be sure of the cost. How will this tax improve CO<sub>2</sub> emissions? According to this bill they actually get to increase the carbon by 30 megatonnes. It's incredible. Carbon dioxide is the primary greenhouse gas emitted through human activity. We agree with that. Is the cost going to outweigh the impact, and can you prove this? During a severe recession is not the time to be introducing it. Waiting until the economy recovers is beneficial to all.

One of the issues is how the funds that will be collected from this tax will be redistributed. British Columbia has a completely revenue-neutral tax in that all the funds collected go to tax cuts. This government is not willing to do that. As I alluded to earlier, when I was asking a question, the revenue from the carbon levy may only be used for initiatives related to reducing emissions of greenhouse gases or supporting Alberta's ability to adapt to climate change. Again, is innovation in the oil and gas industry going to fall on the backs of the average Alberta taxpayer? That's what I read from that. British Columbia has a completely revenue-neutral tax in that all the funds collected go to tax cuts. This government is not willing to do that.

This bill will make the poor poorer, and Albertans will suffer those consequences. Next year Albertans will be paying extra for their natural gas, $1 more per gigajoule – that's actually $1.05 – and the year after that, it will rise to $1.52. I'm not sure how those that are struggling will deal with these extra costs. They will have to make detrimental choices one way or another. You know, it may cut into their food budget or into what their kids do after school.

Gas prices are one thing, but to heat people's homes is not optional during harsh winters. In Alberta we had a mild winter last year, but maybe next year it's going to be – we've had 30 days in a row at minus 40. I've had to work in those conditions, and you just don't turn your heat down.

All we are asking for is that Albertans be adequately satisfied with sufficient evidence and assurances by way of a full economic impact analysis to ensure that no one suffers because of this tax. We are not saying that climate change is not happening. We are just asking this government to make sure they know the full impact this tax will have on Albertans who are struggling the very most. They can't afford it at this time. We need to look at it and make sure that we know exactly how much it's going to cost each family and each business. We do not need any more job losses in this province.

Thank you very much.

The Speaker: Any questions to the Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul-Two Hills under 29(2)(a)? The Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would like to thank the hon. member for educating us about exactly what we're looking at in the bill that's coming forward. Now, I did hear the member talk about loss of jobs and that the direction this province is going in is probably not conducive to what we've been used to in the past. I am proud to say that the Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul-Two Hills is a neighbour of mine. He is feeling a lot of the same difficulties within his riding that I am feeling in mine.

You know, the fact is that when we start seeing the difficulties coming forward from this bill – and this has affected the oil sands because the oil companies didn't know where Alberta was going with this carbon tax until it actually had been released. Having worked in the oil fields for a long period of time, I believe there's a real experience that we can draw on from my colleague because he's been working within the industry for a long time. He's worked with the different companies within the area. He's had a lot of experience with them. Now, this is where I believe that that experience in working within the industry, having worked with other employees that have worked in the industry and having been a diligent follower of the environmental guidelines – to the member: do you feel that adding costs onto our oil sands at this time, maybe not directly but through the gas tax, is appropriate? And do you think that this is actually going to shut down more businesses within your riding like it is going to in mine?

Mr. Hanson: Well, actually, I think it will have an impact. We're already seeing, especially up north of Bonnyville, in the air weapons range area that I worked in, that a lot of the companies I worked with and had working for me and a lot of the employees – you know, you get to know these guys after working with them for 15 to 20 years, and you get to know their families. A lot of these guys are hurting. Some of them have lost their homes. Some of the businesses have had to close down. They've had the cutbacks. The oil companies have forced them to reduce rates to the point where they're just barely getting by. They're trying to bid on jobs at bare-bottom dollars just to keep their employees working because for a lot of these guys it is family. They've had these employees for 20 years, some of them, so they don't want to let them go. They know how difficult it will be to get them back, especially if they have to move away to a different centre.

So adding a tax onto these companies and these employees at this time is just very distasteful to me. Some of the companies up there have taken a 30 per cent cut just to stay in the industry. Like I said, they're bare bones and are sometimes dipping into their expenses or having to sell equipment just to keep their crews going. So, yes, it does have a detrimental effect on my area for sure.

I know the St. Paul area, and all the schools that I've talked to are putting together pricing right now to get me the numbers on exactly how much per school and per school board it's going to cost. I've also asked some of the medical centres and the seniors' homes for that. You know, it's pretty easy. You take all your bills from last year, see how much fuel you burned, and apply this tax to it. All these people are starting to do that, and we're starting to see on Facebook and Twitter and in the papers that the concern about this carbon tax is actually starting to boil. We will see people get as excited as they were about Bill 6 when they finally get the gist of exactly how much this carbon tax is going to cost them, how it's going to affect their families and their businesses.

I really think that we need to take a step back and do some proper analysis of this. We shouldn't have to ask the hospitals and school boards how much this tax is going to cost them. We should be able to tell them: "This is how it's going to affect you. This is what we're going to do to help you out so that you don't have to lay off front-line workers to make it happen."

Thank you very much.

The Speaker: On 29(2)(a), any other members?

Hon. Member for Edmonton-South West, are you speaking to the amendment?

Mr. Dang: To the amendment. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think it's really good to be able to have this fulsome debate here in the House on this amendment. The amendment is about the economic impact and why there hasn't been an impact analysis done on the effects of the Climate Leadership Implementation Act. I want to really set the record straight on some of these issues because what some of the opposition are saying is simply absurd when we look at the realities of what the Climate Leadership Implementation Act actually does. What the act does and what the plan will do is that it will diversify our economy and create new jobs.

I know that members across the way talked quite heavily and quoted quite extensively – they cherry-picked but quoted it quite extensively – from the climate leadership report that was commissioned by the government, and I want to speak a bit about that. Members spoke about the climate leadership report, and that's exactly why we commissioned that report, Mr. Speaker. That report was done so that we would understand in a fulsome manner, in a whole manner, what the issues were surrounding carbon pricing in this province and how we were going to move forward in a tangible way to reduce emissions because we understand that man-made climate change is real.

We can look at the Climate Leadership report and at what the panel did, which was to consider over 25,000 online submissions, over 920 people attending public open houses, and 535 commissions from NGOs, industry, and academics. When we take all of these things together, we can try to piece this together and say: who was doing this analysis and generating this report for us? Who did the government commission to do this analysis and to do this assessment so that we could receive this data and move forward with the climate leadership plan?

Some of these were people like Dr. Andrew Leach, an economist here at the University of Alberta who does economic analysis as a daily part of his job; people like Linda Coady, who's an expert on corporate sustainability and economic interdependence; and people like Gordon Lambert, who's the Suncor sustainability executive and is a member of the Ivy Business School. We see that the panel that did all of this analysis and did all of this research and compiled the report for the government to use as we move forward with the climate leadership plan was filled with industry experts, filled with economists, and filled with people who really understood the business implications of what was going on.

Mr. Speaker, I want to quote from one of the submissions to the climate leadership report, which was from an economist that many people in this House might know or know of, Jack Mintz. He said that when you're making investments in very expensive technologies, you tend to like carbon taxes because you do get price certainty for carbon. We know that Jack Mintz isn't necessarily always one of our friends here on this side of the aisle, but even Dr. Mintz understood the gravity of this and understood that there absolutely was a reality that we did need a carbon levy to get price certainty for carbon.

I think that really speaks to this amendment. The opposition would like you to believe that no economic analysis was done at all, when we see world-renowned economists from all across Alberta and across the world, quite frankly, looking at this document and saying that there are tangible things that we need to be doing and very realistic things that are positive coming out of this legislation.

If the opposition believes in climate change and really wants to help, I want to refer them to another quote from that report that they were talking about, which is that we need to be framing this as "carbon competitive." That's an interesting quote because we can look at that and say: well, the report speaks to being carbon competitive in a global market. What does that mean? It means that the report did extensive analysis on how we can be competitive in a global market with a carbon pricing model. What that means, Mr. Speaker, is that we did have analysis done and presented to the minister and presented to government and presented to the public in the very report that they were reading. They read some of those economic effects themselves as I saw them quoting it right in front of me. It's going to be in the Blues and in Hansard.

They spoke, and they had very specific, cherry-picked quotes. I want to go on and explain to you a bit more about what those quotes really meant. They spoke about how there will be an impact on future economic growth and stability [and] the government's ability to pay for . . . services [in this province].

Well, the very next line, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had decided to keep reading instead of perhaps taking a break from doing whatever it was he was doing, is:

It means market demand will rise for low- and no-carbon energy sources and fall for high-cost and emissions-intensive resources. Technologies capable of separating economic growth from energy use and energy production from carbon emissions will prosper. This is the future for which Alberta must prepare.

Mr. Speaker, it is very clear that this report that they were quoting from intends for Alberta to prepare by doing things like implementing this legislation. What the opposition has done is that they have presented an amendment which impedes Alberta's ability to prepare in a timely manner for this very realistic and low-carbon future, that we must move towards.

Mr. Speaker, the opposition also quoted a line that I believe was from the fifth paragraph, from what he was saying. But the very next line, when he spoke about how there would be realities of how the carbon levy would affect the economy, was: "However, it is important to note that we are already experiencing real impacts from the status quo." What the report speaks to and what this government understands and what some members opposite don't seem to is that we as a society are feeling real economic pressures from not doing anything.

While some members of the opposition may decide that the best way to get around not doing anything is to yell and scream at our friends and our neighbours, that we're having to work with to make sure that we can get our product to market and to make sure that we have a realistic economy that we can grow here in Alberta, I don't think that that would be a very tangible and good thing to do. If they were to commission an economic assessment themselves, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that that economic assessment would suggest that they go and yell at the people you are trying to do business with and complain to the people you are trying to do business with and then disrespect the people you are trying to do business with. In my opinion, I do not believe that that would be a very tangible way of accomplishing your goals.

We look at some of these things, we move forward, and we say: well, how do we know that this government is keeping a very close mind and a close eye on this legislation doing very tangible things to ensure that we have a positive economic outlook and going back and making sure that this economic impact assessment isn't really going to push forward this legislation? Well, what we can look at and say is: what is this legislation doing? It's enabling things. Like, this summer we'll be bringing in a large number of engagements on issues such as performance standards, innovation and technology, the methane emission reduction strategy, and energy efficiency. As we move forward in the summer, once we pass this legislation, there are going to be lots of very tangible ways that this government is moving forward to make sure that our business is competitive on a global scale.

When we look at things like the performance standards measures, we're seeing that this report and this legislation were crafted in a very delicate manner, were crafted in a manner very cognitive of what the realities of the economy were and what the realities of the economy today are, Mr. Speaker, which is why there are things like phased-in carbon pricing and things like looking at performance standards so that we will not be double-impacting people with the carbon levy.

We'll be absolutely making sure that we do ensure that businesses which are trade exposed will not be adversely impacted by a carbon levy. That's why we're looking at things like making sure that certain industries that will fall under the performance standards legislation will be able to have those movements and fluidity because we understand that there absolutely are economic realities in this province, Mr. Speaker. We absolutely understand that there are things that are going on that are outside of the control of this province and that there are things that are going on that are outside of the control of this government, quite frankly.

When we move on that, we can look and say: we shape legislation to ensure that we do the best job we can. We shape legislation to ensure that we do the best job we can to implement this report, which has done great economic analysis. It's done great social analysis. It's done great analysis in all sorts of aspects, Mr. Speaker. They speak about, for example, that we didn't do an economic impact analysis on what this would mean for certain types of families or certain types of low-income earners. That's why the report recommends and the government implemented things like the rebate program, where 60 per cent of Albertans will receive a full or greater than full rebate, and two-thirds of Albertans will receive some rebate altogether. I think it really does speak to the thoughtfulness and the fullness of this legislation. It's being rolled out in a very meaningful way.

We can look at how there are endorsements from industry such as Suncor, CNRL, and Cenovus, Mr. Speaker, that have looked at this piece of legislation and said: "You know what? We can work with this because the economics of this legislation and what we're doing here is something that we can get behind, and we recognize that in the global marketplace it's something that we must absolutely do." I can quote the Suncor Energy submission to the panel here, which says:

An efficient way to quickly target a significant and growing amount of end-use emissions would be the application of a natural gas, electricity, gasoline and diesel carbon price at the point of sale. There are various mechanisms for levying a carbon price, which combined with revenue recycling . . . could protect lower income Albertans while sending a clear price signal to change choices and energy use habits.

Mr. Speaker, what we're looking at here is a very large player in the Alberta economy. Suncor is a very large oil company that is trade exposed in some cases and does deal with a lot of large industry and a lot of large business across the province and many jobs. We can see this, and we can see that this is absolutely something that Albertans can get behind, that the industry can get behind, and that we have done a meaningful analysis on this.

Mr. Speaker, really, in closing, I do want to emphasize that the government has done extensive analysis. The government has commissioned an extensive report, that is over a hundred pages long. I would know. I read it multiple times. We looked at this, and we can say that there absolutely was work done from the get-go. From the very beginning the work was done, and from that we can move forward on this legislation.

This amendment is nothing but a parliamentary trick the opposition is trying to do to hold up the progress of this government. I would urge all members of this Assembly to vote this down.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have to say . . .

The Speaker: Under 29(2)(a)?

Mrs. Aheer: Yes. Thank you, sir.

. . . that the passion is overwhelming, and it's appreciated at this time of night especially, so good on you.

One thing I'd like to say is that there are a couple of little things that are in here regarding an economic analysis or economic benefit or any of those things that we're bringing up. It is absolutely the responsibility of any government bringing through this type of legislation, that is going to alter the way that business is done in this province, to make sure that that's appropriate and that that's there for people to see. That's part of transparency. I do believe that you ran on that the same way that we did. It should be something that you look at. You take advice from us, and be proud of that, and bring it forward. It's a huge ask. We realize that. But it's an imperative ask when you're going forward in an economic situation like we are in right now.

I'd like to talk about the thoughtfulness comment and also about economic realities. I'd like to share a small story about economic realities with you for the last four minutes that we're in here. I have – it's an absolute privilege – in the beautiful and diverse riding of Chestermere-Rocky View a little coffee shop in Chestermere. Very, very, very good friends of mine. I have to say that as impassioned as the speech was that just came across the floor, what it lacks is the added imperative behind that passion, and I wish the passion was as much about what it is that you say on paper and what actually happens in real life. I wish that there was that wisdom, that understanding, and maybe that life experience in that speech and passion . . . [interjections] I don't understand why that's – it's straight across the board.

I agree, but I am saying that there is something in there, in that passion, that, if it could expand to understanding what's happening in his constituency, in my constituency, in the businesses in these constituencies, if a little bit more went into actually the businesses that are being impacted by this particular piece of legislation – you know what? – it would be such an impactful thing coming from that side of the room.

What I'm saying is – I'm talking about my little coffee shop, and I'm sure that the member has places in his constituency that he can relate this to and perhaps take some of my thought process and go forward within his constituency and ask the same questions that I've posed in mine and actually received from many, many, many people in my constituency. This little coffee shop we're talking about is a small, family-run business. Even at the best of times, especially in a place like Chestermere-Rocky View, approximately 90 per cent of the population – I mean, that's a guess – empties out into Calgary every week to do their work there. A lot of the work that is done in Chestermere by the small businesses is supported only during certain times of the day, as you can imagine, because most of the people empty out and work in Calgary.

So not only are we dealing with a specific time frame when people can work; there are other challenges that go along with that. We're dealing with small businesses that are not only incorporating what's going to happen with this carbon tax but a minimum wage and corporate taxes and personal taxes and everything else, all of that accumulation of things that goes on there. Honestly, to the member across the way, if you could take that passion and actually apply it to the realities of what is actually going on in this province at a small-business level in any aspect outside of just what is written on paper – the model on paper hasn't shown any transference to real life. Those of us who have small businesses and are actually seeing what is happening on the ground know what's happening. We're being impacted directly every single day. [interjections] I'm not saying that you don't.

The Speaker: Hon. member.

Mrs. Aheer: That's what I'm saying . . .

The Speaker: Hon. member, make your comments through the chair.

Mrs. Aheer: I'm sorry, sir. I apologize.

My point, Mr. Speaker, is that I know that they have small businesses. That's why this is so hard to comprehend. I understand that all of the members in this House have as diverse a region as I have. I completely respect and understand that. That's why I don't understand why that conversation does not come back to what we're actually talking about here, the impact on people, the economic realities, that the member so passionately spoke about. That's what I'm asking about. So the question to the member is . . .

The Speaker: Through the chair.

Mrs. Aheer: Sorry.

Through the chair, could the member please explain what economic realities he's speaking of in his constituency that he can relate to?

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The hon. Member for Leduc-Beaumont.

Mr. S. Anderson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. [interjections]

The Speaker: It's getting late, folks. Let's stay focused.

Mr. S. Anderson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Focus is hard at this late time of night.

Bill 20 is a huge step forward for Alberta, Canada, and our position on the world stage, Mr. Speaker. It puts in place a framework that will substantially change our society for the better. One of the opposition members likes to ask: what about the children? While I enjoy that, that is also a huge reason why we're bringing this forward. We're trying to create a better future for our children and our grandchildren, not only in terms of protecting the environment they will grow up in but also creating more diverse economic opportunities.

We've seen the research on climate change. We have read the research on climate change. We've heard the voices of scientists, academics, business leaders, and political leaders the world over, and they're all saying the same thing, that climate change is real and the best way to address it is to put a price on carbon. Should we ignore them? I think not. We know that this is real and that wishful thinking is not going to make it go away. We will use this knowledge to make a positive difference in the world around us.

11:00

As Albertans we will not shy away from our responsibilities to future generations. We will do our part, and we're going to help Albertans to do their part. As part of the climate leadership plan we're establishing Energy Efficiency Alberta, a first-of-its-kind agency in Alberta which will help families, businesses, and communities reduce both their energy costs and their greenhouse gas emissions. That is a very important part of this bill, and we need to make sure that no one is left behind.

Mr. Speaker, we're also going to work to transition Alberta's electrical system. There are a growing number of indicators that suggest growth in the world's demand for electricity, particularly renewables-based electricity. As prices continue to fall, renewables are starting to outpace conventional energy types around the world. In fact, it was reported that in 2015 renewable energy was the largest source of new power added to the U.S. electricity grids last year. Technology is always evolving, so we know that costs will most definitely continue to go down. Albertan companies and communities have already been early adopters and investors in these technologies, and this government will make sure that we will not fall behind. Wind and solar systems, in particular, are appealing to all sizes of communities as they are highly scalable and distributable even without an existing electrical grid. While many jurisdictions are likely to have at least one or more options to produce electricity from renewable sources, Alberta is ideally suited for many of these sources, whether that be solar, wind, geothermal, bioenergy, cogen.

Mr. Speaker, we'll be needing hydrocarbons for some time to come, and Alberta is blessed with strong natural gas resources, which can help us reduce our dependence on coal and integrate with renewable options. Hydrocarbons will also have a bright future as more than just fuel. They are needed for plastics, agricultural chemicals, waxes, and asphalt, just to name a few.

As Albertans we need not fear this transition or ignore it, as our colleagues across the aisle would have us do. Rather, this is about seizing an opportunity, an opportunity to transition to more diverse sources of energy, an opportunity to create new jobs, an opportunity to take advantage of the vast amounts of natural renewable resources we're blessed with, and an opportunity to make a cleaner, more sustainable world for our kids.

Mr. Speaker, I'd like to speak briefly to a project that exemplifies what this bill embodies, a project I'm incredibly excited about that speaks to comments from other members who voiced disbelief that anyone would invest in renewables here or that companies would come to invest in our province. I represent Nisku, where proud oil firms are hurting. But this slump also offers an opportunity. There's a solution that can create many, many jobs for oil workers, and it's starting at the centre of my riding, at the site of Leduc No. 1, a discovery that transformed Alberta's economy.

Leduc No. 1 has launched the living energy project, which combines oil and renewable energy industries in a way that has never been done before, the green and the black, and it does it in a way that gets oil workers back to work. This flagship project will change Alberta and Canada, cutting carbon emissions and power bills while lowering the cost of producing oil. That's why the oil industry supports it. It showcases gas, oil, wind, geothermal, solar, energy storage, and smart energy management systems all working together. It's a project built by oil workers and designed by Alberta energy entrepreneurs.

The living energy project will boost economic diversification, innovation, and agriculture. Alberta's energy industry is a world-class innovator, and we're proud of it. This project pioneers and showcases a unique Albertan invention that will cut fuel bills. It creates ultrasmart geothermal systems and intelligent combined heat and power units. The platform controls on-site energy reduction and power storage to cut the transmission tariffs that make up half of our energy bills. This designed and built in Alberta energy platform allows oil companies to slash their power usage and carbon emissions, pushing back at those who block pipelines, and it saves them money. Farmers have been using wind turbines for decades. They understand the economic benefits of renewable energy better than anyone. This living energy project will blaze a regulatory path for the use of the next generation of made-in-Alberta renewable energy.

Geothermal heat from wells that have already been drilled. Alberta only has 148 hectares under greenhouses, so it imports food from California. Ontario, in contrast, has thousands of hectares of land under glass. But we have a unique Alberta advantage: nearly 80,000 suspended oil wells that contain trapped geothermal heat. All they need is a permit for a change of use, a pump, and a heat exchanger, and that's 80,000 greenhouses or fish farms, let's say, supplied with free heat. This project includes Canada's first abandoned oil well to geothermal conversion using innovative, hydrocarbons-renewables bridging technology, and as I speak, its technical proposal is making its way to Alberta Energy, who will work with the Alberta Energy Regulator to test and issue this game-changing permit that won't cost taxpayers a cent. It will create a boom in, like I said, horticulture or fish farms or many other things. It's a groundbreaking innovation that will allow land and well owners to put abandoned and suspended wells back to work producing energy, farming and oil working together, the green and the black.

Under the regulations set by the previous government, when low prices forced an oil firm to stop producing, the regulators could seal up the suspended well and abandon it, which costs hundreds of thousands of dollars. There are approximately 230 small producers staring into the abyss of bankruptcy, and these regulations can push them over the edge. Allowing them to convert a well to geothermal cuts out the abandonment costs, keeping them in business, and preparing wells for geothermal puts the drillers back in my riding to work. At this very moment the oil firm is transferring the well to Leduc No. 1 and is preparing the well for conversion. Its contractors are local oil service firms suffering in the recession, but they are donating their services for free, proudly driving this project. They want to change Alberta, and they want to get back to work.

Methane escaping from producing oil wells into the environment is a wasted resource. This living energy project showcases an innovation that captures this free methane to power a horsehead pump, which is normally driven by an electric motor, and this cuts production costs and gains carbon credits. This lowers the cost of producing oil, and it saves small oil firms from the receiver, slashing oil's carbon footprint. As I said, the green and the black working together.

The coming renewables support program in this bill will create Alberta jobs. The living energy project's solar systems, made by Albertan oil workers, are cheaper than the Ontario systems that Alberta imports today, and these rugged, extreme-temperature, renewable systems are designed for Alberta's climate. They actually tilt to dump the snow off them, so you don't need somebody to brush that off. They are built by Albertan oil workers and are used by Alberta's great oil industry in oil fields that are off the grid. Free sunshine is cheaper than trucking in diesel for generators. It's designed in Alberta, it's made in Alberta, and it's an Alberta solution, a renewable hydrocarbon hybrid system for the oil patch.

The project has already attracted German technology and Swiss capital. A Nisku steel fabricator, CCI, which is partially First Nations owned, was hurting in the recession and let go most of its workers. When Leduc No. 1 on my advice looked for local oil service firms to build its system, CCI stepped up. It got Swiss capital to develop a renewables division and transferred German technology and started hiring again. CCI is a proud Alberta oil services firm. It will export these systems to B.C., the self-proclaimed kingdom of green energy, and Nisku will be its export hub.

As well as steel, renewable systems need cement, electronics, aluminum fabricators, and laser cutters, and all these systems can be made by Alberta firms. This project is expanding Alberta's manufacturing base and will proudly showcase these made-in-Alberta solutions. The site was a centre of the first major discovery in energy and now will be the second discovery in a century. The living energy project will establish this great province as Canada's undisputed leader in green energy. Its systems are better than Ontario's, and we will export them to B.C. Alberta's proud oil industry will show these provinces yet again how to do energy as it transforms the province into a total energy powerhouse, the complete energy capital of Canada. The project is by the oil industry and for the oil industry. It will help us get pipelines built. It will change Alberta. It will change Canada. It's a win-win-win: a win for oil workers, a win for the environment, and a win for taxpayers.

Mr. Speaker, I'm proud to be a part of the project, and this and many other projects to come are part of the reason why Bill 20 is being brought forward. We want to spur entrepreneurs and businesses from all over Alberta, Canada, and the world to come see this great province and to continue to make it a great place to live, work, and innovate. This is the right thing to do for today and for future generations.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Are there any questions under 29(2)(a)? The Member for Little Bow.

Mr. Schneider: If I could, please, Mr. Speaker. There are so many unintended consequences with this tax that aren't spelled out. The Member for Leduc-Beaumont lives in a rural area or his constituency is rural. Farmers that grow grain other than to feed their own or feedlot cattle mostly ship that grain for sale. That means that it has to run through an elevator, and then it has to be shipped. Rail already saw an increase in diesel fuel in the last NDP budget. I would assume that rail will take another hit on fuel with this carbon tax.

A farmer may have his product hauled to town to that elevator, and that sometimes means hiring a trucker. That is a commonly used form of getting grain to town. I mean, some folks have spent their money on their farms on other priorities. It's hard sometimes for farmers to have the ideal piece of equipment that they need for every operation, so farmers hire truckers quite a bit throughout this province to haul their grain to the elevator.

The elevator itself has a lot of electrical motors and such that elevate that grain. I've talked to one of the last independent grain elevators in western Canada. The amount of electricity used in their Alberta elevators is 111 megawatts of power per month. That's an average amount of power. Multiplied by 12, of course, it's 1,332 megawatts in a year. That cost has to be passed on to someone. They aren't going to eat that cost. It'll be passed on to the producer.

The price is poised to increase anyway as a result of the wind-down of coal-fired power. Even though we don't know exactly how much that will be, the estimate in the Canadian Tax Journal was that a $30-per-tonne carbon tax could increase the consumer price of electricity by about 7 to 8 per cent, a bit less in the first $20-per-tonne increase, about 5 per cent. That may not be the correct percentage at the end of the day. I haven't heard what it may be, understanding that the regulations are still in the process of being written. If I was handed Bill 20 today and had to read it, I would understand that electricity is going to rise by that much.

What if a farmer irrigates? He has a cost for electricity for running those pumps that actually get the water to the crop, and he has a cost for electricity to run the pivots or whatever kind of irrigation equipment he uses. Only one person pays for that. Only one person pays that extra cost.

Sure, the purple fuel on a farm is exempt. That is great, that this government took the initiative and was determined to help out the number two industry in Alberta.

But do you see the unintended consequences that appear as we dig a little deeper? So many costs have to be passed on to the producer. I'm only talking about one industry here. A producer that cannot dictate the price of his grain: he's at the mercy of a global market. That's something that farmers worked for a couple of decades ago and wouldn't change now for anything. Now he's going to be charged more to grow his grain, more to get it to the elevator, more to get his product to the coast in export position because locomotives will be paying more for fuel and will have to pass the cost on to the user.

An Hon. Member: Just when they go through Alberta.

Mr. Schneider: Just when they go through Alberta. Well, this is where we are.

Mr. Speaker, for the member: do you understand the costs passed on to this one industry in Alberta? Producers in this province will have to pay more to get the same. I just wonder if you understand the unintended consequences.

Thank you.

Mr. S. Anderson: Unlike what opposite members continue to say, we do completely understand. That's all I'm going to say about that.

The Speaker: Any other questions under 29(2)(a)?

The Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Seeing the time and the progress we've made this evening, I move that we adjourn debate on Bill 20.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, we've done a lot of good work on both sides of the House – I enjoyed the debate from just about everyone – so I rise to move to adjourn the House for this evening until tomorrow morning at 9.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 11:15 p.m.]

Prayers

The Speaker: Please bow your heads. Let us reflect, each in our own way. Let us remind ourselves of the privilege and the responsibility to advocate on behalf of the constituents who elected all of us. Let us remember to respect and accept each other's point of view although we may differ from time to time. Let us understand that the price of success is often the result of hard work, dedication, an unwavering determination, and a commitment to public service.

Please be seated.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 20

Climate Leadership Implementation Act

Mr. MacIntyre moved that the motion for second reading of Bill 20, Climate Leadership Implementation Act, be amended by deleting all the words after "that" and substituting the following:

Bill 20, Climate Leadership Implementation Act, be not now read a second time because this Assembly has not received satisfactory evidence or assurances that a full economic impact analysis has been completed detailing any potential negative impact on the economic well-being of Albertans.

[Adjourned debate on amendment May 31: Mr. Bilous]

The Speaker: Anyone wishing to speak on RA1? The Opposition House Leader.

Mr. Cooper: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure this morning to be in the House on such a glorious day and to represent the outstanding people of Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills, working to defend the issues that are important to them and to represent individuals right across the constituency. And not only in the constituency but right across the province people are reaching out to the Official Opposition and expressing deep concern.

Now, I want to be very clear, Mr. Speaker, that of those same people who are expressing concern about the direction of this government, particularly around Bill 20, including myself and the Official Opposition, many of them are concerned about our environment and ensuring that our environment is cared for and managed in a way that leaves a legacy for our children and our grandchildren that they can be proud of and that also manages the other very important aspects of our province in conjunction with both of those things.

It's one of the reasons for this amendment, that my hon. colleague from Innisfail-Sylvan Lake proposed. It is an amendment that seeks to ensure that the right balance is being struck. What we're discussing here this morning is a reasoned amendment, a reason why Bill 20 should not proceed at second reading, and I think it's a very, very solid reason, that

Bill 20, Climate Leadership Implementation Act, be not now read a second time because this Assembly has not received satisfactory evidence or assurances that a full economic impact analysis has been completed detailing any potential negative impact on the economic well-being of Albertans.

Now, we know that many in this House have read what some refer to as the Leach report. That particular report, while it is a fulsome report in many respects and makes numerous recommendations – some of them the government likes to adhere to, others not so much – they hold this report in such high esteem even though they don't want to listen to all of it. While this report has been presented and is the principal piece that the government likes to use to say that all of the study that should be done has been done, one of the things that there is a big hole in is an actual economic impact assessment. While, certainly, that report addresses some of the economic issues around the implementation of this carbon tax, it doesn't in fact detail all of the costs that may or may not be associated with this tax.

I can think of hundreds – maybe that's a bit of a stretch. But tens . . . [interjection] Maybe it is hundreds, actually. If I had the time – and I know that over the next couple of days we're going to have an opportunity to spend some significant amount of time together discussing this piece of legislation. I'm going to start, myself, a bit of a tally to find out if I do get to hundreds of items that that particular report didn't consider and how it potentially has a negative impact on the economic well-being of Albertans.

As I mentioned, Mr. Speaker, it is critically important that we leave a legacy for our children both on the environmental file as well as the economic file because both are critically important to the success of the future of our province and to future generations that will continue many of the great things that this province has become.

I look at the economic impact of this particular carbon tax, and initially the government had said that the total cost that any family could ever incur on this particular tax is approximately $800 a year. Then later the government said, "Oh, okay; it's possible that there may be some indirect costs," while initially saying that there were going to be no indirect costs and that the total cost would be $800 a year. I'm getting a bit of a sense of the track record on this bill with this government. Initially they very proudly pronounced to the House that this bill would be revenue neutral, and now we all know that that's not true. Even the government acknowledges that that's not true, even though that is what they'd said. Then they said that there were no indirect costs and that all of the costs would be included in the number that they provided. Then late last week or early last week – I don't remember exactly when it was – they said: "Oh, okay. Maybe there will be $70 to $100 of indirect costs." We see this pattern of saying one thing, another proving to be true, and then the government saying: "Oh, okay. You were right. We didn't really mean it."

From all across this great province of ours people are contacting the Official Opposition, and the good people in Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills are contacting me, asking questions like: what about this cost; what about that cost? Just this week in the constituency of Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills we saw the Rocky View school division raise the cost of busing to families in the southern half of the constituency of Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills, Mr. Speaker, and the specific reason cited was the carbon tax.

An Hon. Member: It doesn't kick in till January.

Mr. Cooper: The reason they're increasing the cost of busing is because of the carbon tax, and while it might not kick in until January, school starts in September, and they need to be prepared for the carbon tax that comes in on the 1st of the year. While the tax may not be in place until January, significant costs are going to be incurred by school divisions, that are going to be handed down directly to parents. This is an indirect cost, one that the government hasn't considered or, at least, hasn't provided any evidence that they have. So all this amendment does is that it asks the question. It states that this bill should not be read a second time until such time as the economic well-being of Albertans has been studied. Busing is one of those indirect costs.

Yesterday in the House my hon. colleague from Chestermere-Rocky View spoke specifically to the increased costs that other departments and other areas of government are going to incur. I had a good conversation with one of the municipal leaders in the constituency, in the community of Olds, that was focused around this issue and the cost that municipalities are going to bear because of the increased costs for them, whether it's the cost of running municipal vehicles or the significant cost that there's going to be in increased heating that they will see in their facilities, particularly around recreational facilities like pools. The amount of natural gas that's used in those facilities to provide recreation and to ultimately increase the health and well-being of the citizens of that community is going to have significant cost increases.

As we know, Mr. Speaker, there is one taxpayer in the province of Alberta. Now, fortunately, there are about 4 million of those ones, but there's only one person that fits the bill. The municipality doesn't have many levers, many revenue levers, as the former Premier used to like to say, at their disposal, so their fallback is to increase taxes to residents of that community, constituents of ours and Albertans.

Now, I specifically mentioned Olds, and I'll just clarify that in that conversation, we didn't have a direct conversation around whether or not the community of Olds would be raising their taxes, but it is a concern to municipal leaders that that may be a decision that is ultimately downloaded from the province onto municipalities. We continually see downloading of provincial responsibilities onto municipalities and then, at the end of the day, onto the taxpayer of Alberta. While the government might like to hide behind the downloading of costs, they're still very real at the municipal level. So the increase in indirect costs in municipal taxes has not been considered because sufficient, satisfactory evidence and assurances that a full economic impact analysis has been provided: that has not been done before this Assembly. It presents a major, major concern to Albertans that this hasn't been addressed.

I think of other provincial bodies and institutions and organizations and departments. I know that in central Alberta there are some provincial correctional facilities, and while I don't have the exact numbers, those facilities require a significant amount of natural gas to heat, and the increase in the tax on natural gas is close to 50 per cent. So the heating costs for our correctional facilities are going to increase by 50 per cent. If I am not correct, the challenge is that a full economic impact assessment hasn't been provided, and as a result, we would have the information, but we don't.

There is one thing that the government cannot dispute, and it's this: the costs for heating correctional facilities will increase. At the end of the day, those costs have to be paid by someone. I know that my hon. colleague from Drumheller-Stettler has spoken about the increased costs. [Mr. Cooper's speaking time expired]

The Speaker: Under 29(2)(a)?

Mr. Loewen: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky.

Mr. Loewen: Yes. I'd just like to ask the hon. member to continue on with his comments there. There seems to be a lot of discussion on this bill. Of course, we've talked about this before, but I guess we need to keep talking about it because this Bill 20 was just set in our hands – what? – a couple of days ago. So the people that it affects are just learning its full effects now. Now, of course, we've had this Climate Leadership report, but that's not Bill 20. That's not what we're discussing here today. This is what they say is where they've gathered information for Bill 20, but there's a big difference between these two documents and what they discuss.

I think the communities and the people of Alberta haven't had time to go through this document. They haven't had time to figure out the full effects of it. It's a tax bill. It talks nothing about the environment. All it talks about is taxes. So I guess I'd like the member to continue with his thoughts on this and maybe expand a little bit more on how this is affecting everyday Albertans.

I noticed one of the hon. members yesterday from the other side was talking about how all these financial experts had looked at this. Well, I guess one question I would have is: when did the financial experts look at this? We've only had it in our hands for just a couple of days. I don't believe it's within parliamentary procedure to have been giving this document to other people outside of this House before us. So if that's what they're saying, then maybe they need to clarify a little bit more. Who's seen this before this Legislature has seen it?

But anyways, we'll allow the member to carry on with his comments. Thanks.

Mr. Cooper: Well, thank you, colleague. I appreciate your comments, particularly around the impact to Albertans, and that is at the heart of what we're discussing. This reasoned amendment asks that question because we actually don't know and the government doesn't even know what the answer is.

Now, they have provided numbers that have changed as the opposition has asked more questions and provided more evidence of some of those increased costs, particularly around these indirect costs. Just two days ago the Leader of the Opposition asked a question in this Chamber about a very, very good local business that employs a number of local folks right in the constituency of Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills, Shirley's Greenhouse. The increased costs to that business alone are going to be $30,000 a year in increased heating costs. That is a significant amount of money. One of two things is going to happen to their produce. They are going to produce less because they have to lay off a person because they can't afford it, or they're going to increase the costs of production and pass those along in the form of indirect costs in the cost of our food increasing.

The third very possible option is – I could tell you that when you run a smaller greenhouse in the province of Alberta, the margins are thin, but many small businesses just like Shirley's Greenhouse are passionate about producing local food and producing high-quality food, and the challenge is that this has the opportunity to prevent that from happening. I love the fact that when I go to my local Co-op, I can purchase local produce, but this sort of tax, that is going to increase the costs to Shirley's Greenhouse by $30,000 a year, is the type of tax that runs the risk of putting that small business out of business.

Something else in terms of indirect costs, particularly to the vulnerable and charities: I had an opportunity to speak with the Rocky View handibus in the constituency of Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

You wish to speak to amendment RA1?

Mrs. Pitt: The amendment? Yes.

The Speaker: Please proceed, Member for Airdrie.

Mrs. Pitt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I value the opportunity to speak here to the amendment.

... be not now read a second time because this Assembly has not received satisfactory evidence or assurances that a full economic impact analysis has been completed detailing any potential negative impact on the economic well-being of Albertans.

Mr. Speaker, I think it's admirable that we take our environment seriously. I really, truly do. Many years ago, when bottled water had first come out, some may have thought that to be strange, very, very strange. Now it's a part of our life. That certainly in itself has an environmental impact. Plastic waste is phenomenal for our environment. However, it's a part of our life, and I don't think that we want to be in a situation where we need to be buying bottled air, and I understand that. I get that, and my colleagues here absolutely understand that we need to be responsible for the world that we live in, the food that we eat, the air that we breathe. These are extremely important to everybody, and we've been given this Earth to take care of. But we've also been given this Earth to live, and I think that's very, very important for everybody here to remember.

This carbon tax bill has an impact on the way we live our lives, and I don't think it's that far of a stretch to say that this carbon tax bill affects not only the way we live and how we live, Mr. Speaker, but I think it could very well diminish the things that we not only want but the things that we need.

Mrs. Littlewood: Fearmongering.

Mrs. Pitt: It's very unfair for the members opposite to call this fearmongering because they have yet to actually do an economic impact study, yet the individual, the school boards, the businesses, everybody that will be impacted by this tax are starting to calculate the cost that will be incurred from this piece of legislation, from this tax bill.

Rocky View schools, that is responsible for the busing in the constituency of Airdrie, has already said: your bus fees are going up for each child this year, and then they're going to go up every year afterwards. Do you understand what that means for a family that is already struggling to find the $200 for each child to pay for that bus pass? It's significant. There are so many people where $10 – just $10 – is extremely significant, and this, Mr. Speaker, is just an example of the dangers at play when we haven't done a full economic impact study. I would bet that had we had an economic impact study, the evidence – the evidence – that would come from this study would certainly reveal the dangers and the harm to the human beings in this province. I will bet that nobody wants to see that happen. There has to be a balance here between people and the environment. I'm really not quite sure this is the appropriate way to go. This isn't balanced. This is very dangerous, very, very dangerous.

I think, you know, Mr. Speaker, as an example, libraries in our communities will be impacted by this. Many of our libraries have interprovincial sharing systems that are wonderful because we have such an opportunity to access so many different pieces of literature. This is wonderful. We should be encouraging this. But the cost to transport those books from one library to another have now increased. What does that mean? What does that actually mean? I'm really not quite sure they can eat that up. Either the municipality that houses the library will have to increase funding for the libraries, and we can follow that chain upwards, or the library is going to have to increase the membership fees, which again is another indirect cost to the consumer, to the children again. Maybe that's another five bucks a kid. I mean, just right there I get five bucks for a library pass; I've got another 20 bucks on a bus pass, just one kid. In my household I'm at 50 bucks just with those two costs. This is a phenomenal, phenomenal impact, and I think we're just scratching the surface as far as the impact goes.

But we have the resources here to actually delve in deep, Mr. Speaker, and really, really study what this is going to mean, and then the rebate program could be targeted more fulsomely and actually address these issues. I really, truly believe that. You have time right now to step back, stop this now. Let's go back and do some research. Let's get some evidence. The NDP government always talks about evidence-based, evidence-based, evidence-based, yet on one of the most impactful pieces of legislation in this House we have yet to see what the evidence is.

9:30

Mrs. Littlewood: There's an entire report.

Mrs. Pitt: The report has yet to actually address the costs associated to the consumer.

You know what? Every single one of us is going to see the danger when our constituents come into our office and say: "I don't know what to do. There is no possible way I can make ends meet anymore. There is nothing else I can do." Then we get to winter, and what happens in winter? You will get your first heating bill, which is likely going to be outrageous. Then you go: "Okay. Well, I've got to turn this thermostat down. What's the lowest point I can put this thing at without actually putting my life at risk, my children's lives at risk?"

We have winter here, folks. Until you can turn up the heat in winter outside, you need to understand that there are things that we absolutely cannot change, and that is heating a home. I have energy efficient windows. I'm fortunate enough where I can put the money into my home to afford that. I can afford the expensive lightbulbs that bring down my electricity costs. Those are very expensive. Most people can't do that. Heck, I've been slowly doing this for years, you know. I've got weatherproofing on all my windows and all my doors, and I check those every year. I mean, those are almost luxury costs. There are so many people that can't afford this.

We all want to do what's right for everybody here, but there is a better balance between the environment and the people that live on this Earth. I get that you want to be the leaders and the champions of environmental protection because there are many, many areas in this world that do a really poor job at carbon management. Trust me, we're nowhere near the levels of some of those countries. I would implore everybody in this House to find the balance. We have an opportunity right here to put this on hold, and there would be no fault anywhere in saying: "Wait a minute. We've actually got to look after the people. It's about the people." One is not exclusive of the other. They work together.

This is about making sure that we can get children to school, Mr. Speaker. It's about making sure that our children have the opportunity to play hockey. Hockey is a very, very expensive sport to be in, and it requires a ton of travel. I know many people in hockey programs. I played basketball growing up, and we carpooled as much as possible for so many different reasons. I'm sure that hockey parents today do the same thing, but they still have to get their kids to the game. They still have to get their kids to practice. This doesn't mean, you know, that they have one less Starbucks a week to pay for the carbon tax. That's not what this is about.

This is about the impacts that have yet to come forward as evidence fully, and this is where that work should be done. This is the work of the government, to do a full economic impact study. This is our job. This is your job. We're willing to work together on this. It's about balance. It's about the people. I really, really, truly thought – there are a lot of stereotypes about the NDP government out there. One of them certainly is that they talk about caring about people. I think that's one that you would probably want to make true. This is, Mr. Speaker, a very dangerous path to go down until we have the evidence. I don't know if I could implore anybody enough to do this.

Mr. Speaker, another example is the grocery stores. Our food costs will go up. You can't tell me that they won't; you absolutely cannot tell me. Everything comes in on a truck. Until we can create a giant bicycle and hire 20 people to ride this thing down the road, we've got to truck this stuff in, and those costs are certainly going up. There's no way around this. So guess what? These grocery stores, who are businesses, who employ people so that they can pay their bills, will have to let some workers go and/or they will increase the costs of the goods in the store. These are fruits and vegetables. These are things that keep us healthy. You're going to play the health card, but you're going to make fruits and vegetables more expensive? I think that's absolutely inappropriate. [interjections]

The government laughs. They think this is funny that there will be longer lineups at the food bank, with probably emptier shelves. Mr. Speaker, the food bank: let's talk about the food bank costs. Guess what? Everything still comes in on a truck there. It goes out on a truck. Heck, the people who pick up food from a food bank usually come in a car. For a vulnerable person who is down and out, who needs some help from the food bank, it will cost them more.

An Hon. Member: Buses.

Mrs. Pitt: Oh, buses. Let's talk about buses, Mr. Speaker. That's an excellent point. The NDP government wants everybody to only ride around on a bus, but the last time I checked, they didn't run on unicorn farts. It is completely irresponsible of this government to say: "Don't worry about your car. You're not going to drive anymore. We're going to put you on a bus, but we're not really sure if they run on gasoline or diesel."

I'm pretty sure they burn fuel still. This, again, is why we need a full economic impact study. We need the evidence because, clearly, the NDP government is not aware that buses run on fuel. I can't even believe this, Mr. Speaker. We need to see the evidence. We need to see the impact. I think that more than ever the NDP government needs to see the impact that their carbon tax bill is imposing on the people.

This is inappropriate behaviour from a government. Amongst other things, Mr. Speaker, I'm so disheartened to hear laughing about the impact on vulnerable people. "Don't worry. If you need the food bank, you can take the bus. But don't worry; I'm pretty sure your bus fees aren't going to go up. No. They're not going to go up." Are you kidding me? This is unreal.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Questions to the Member for Airdrie under 29(2)(a)?

Mr. Dang: Under 29(2)(a), Mr. Speaker, I'd just like to make some comments and get to some questions about some things that the hon. member across the way was saying. I am very concerned with what the member across the way is saying because the member has been quite impassioned in how she has portrayed and shaped this image and message about how the climate leadership bill is attacking children and is dangerous for families and so forth.

We understand that the vast majority of Albertans – 66 per cent of Albertans, Mr. Speaker, two-thirds of Albertans – will actually be receiving a full or partial rebate on the carbon levy. We actually understand that if you do the math, if you look at the economics, you can say that these people that she's talking about will be supported by the government. The government will be stepping in to make sure that we are helping our vulnerable, helping our families and communities, and that we won't be making any drastic cuts to those services that these people are providing, like some members might be endorsing. Instead, what this government is doing is investing in those communities.

The hon. member across the way also spoke quite heavily about health impacts and how the costs of the food in your grocery store would go up and that the food bank lines would increase. Mr. Speaker, let's be very frank. There is a world scientific consensus that the adverse impacts of climate change will drastically harm our communities and drastically harm our families. What we are looking at right now are the adverse health effects of coal, the adverse health effects of climate change on things like food production in the world. What we are looking at right now is that we absolutely need to act to ensure that we will be able to have a tangible difference moving forward.

What the hon. member across the way is speaking about, using these terms I would like to say are fearmongering, may be speaking to a certain type of constituency, Mr. Speaker. What the hon. member across the way is doing is simply not looking at the facts of what this bill does. What this bill does is that it implements a plan to take tangible action that this government has plotted out through the Climate Leadership report, with very thorough in-depth analysis and very thorough and fulsome research that economists have done and experts in the industry have been a part of.

I'd like to ask the hon. member across the way: in the hon. member's opinion, are these economists wrong? The experts, the 25,000 Albertans that were consulted, the 920 Albertans that were involved in public open houses, the over 530 Albertans that were involved in the industry submissions: are all of these people wrong? These people were all consulted. The things that we are hearing about: the 25,000 Albertans spoke about those. That's what the experts on the panel like Dr. Leach and Linda Coady were speaking about, Mr. Speaker, when we saw the experts on the panel and they compiled this information and they came up with this tangible report.

The tangible report we've seen today and we've seen for weeks and months already. This bill has been out for weeks now, Mr. Speaker. What we've seen is that these are very realistic things that we can talk about. When we look at this, we can say: are we attacking Alberta's most vulnerable? Absolutely not. That is a ludicrous assertion. It is something that we as members should be ashamed to even be bringing up in this Chamber because it is something that is simply untrue. It is something that this government is full-heartedly against. We are here to support Albertans and to make tangible differences in their lives by doing things like taking action on climate change so that we can live healthier lives, so that we can live more fulsome lives in our communities, so that we can have an environment we can be proud of moving into the future.

As we look at all of this, I really do have to wonder of the member what the intention of this amendment is, whether it's to actually get that economic impact assessment. I don't understand if that's the intention or if it is for some reason to delay this bill in other ways. Mr. Speaker, I do wonder since we've seen all these very comprehensive submissions; we've seen this very comprehensive report, that consulted with thousands of people, quite frankly, that was analyzed by some of the top minds. We received submissions from top economists in Calgary, for example, like Jack Mintz.

We've seen the analysis. We've seen the expertise. Frankly, I don't believe that what the member across the way is doing is necessarily, in my opinion, something that they are being fully truthful about in the sense that they do not believe in the notion of this amendment in the way that they are doing it. I have to ask that member: what really is the intent of this? We are trying to move forward on climate change.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Anyone who wishes to speak to amendment RA1? The Member for Calgary-Foothills.

Mr. Panda: Good morning, Mr. Speaker. I'm speaking to the amendment. This House has not received satisfactory evidence of an economic impact study on the effects of this bill. To prove this, I'll talk about a subject that has not even been mentioned once in the House.

This carbon tax is going to hurt families. I hope we have made that clear. If this is not clear, don't worry; we'll bring more clarity to that subject. Beyond the carbon tax, this will hurt initiatives this government has been trying to implement to diversify the economy. Let's take a look at some of the initiatives the Minister of Economic Development and Trade has been trying to do in order to diversify the economy and how those initiatives will be affected due to this carbon tax.

Mr. Speaker, on the 1st of February the Minister of Economic Development and Trade announced a $500 million royalty credit program to build petrochemical plants. He hopes that this subsidy will convince corporations to build petrochemical plants in the province. Now, just to refresh the House's memory, this program only comes into effect after the plant is built. This subsidy, this corporate welfare, was designed to compete with the Gulf coast, where most of these plants are built. The reasons they are built on the Gulf coast as opposed to Alberta are numerous, but the major hurdles that Alberta needs to work on in order to compete for this business are the upfront costs to build these plants.

But don't take my word on that. Let me read for you what the Minister of Economic Development and Trade said when asked a question regarding the increased costs to build in Alberta as compared to the Gulf coast.

There are some challenges that we face here in Alberta in order to attract investments like this, I mean, from our climate and the fact that construction costs are typically higher than on the Gulf coast. But what is interesting is that once a company gets into the operational side, we're quite competitive with the Gulf coast. So we believe, just as previous governments have done 40 years ago, that by incenting value-added in the petrochemical streams of methane and propane, which currently we don't have in the province, in the country, it will incent investment that will lead to long-term benefits for Albertans and, therefore, all Canadians.

That's what the minister said.

He continued later on in the press conference to say:

Alberta faces some challenges when trying to compete for projects like value-added on methane, propane versus our biggest competitor, which is Texas and Louisiana, but once we get over the hump of construction and we are actually into the operational side, Alberta is quite competitive.

The ministry is well aware that building costs in Alberta are, quote, a challenge and higher than on the Gulf coast. The minister, with all his powers granted by Bill 1, Mr. Speaker, which just passed after several months of debate, is able to do absolutely nothing about the construction costs. Instead, the minister promises that if they absorb the high construction costs, he will give them some corporate welfare after the fact. Now that this carbon tax is out, we know how the minister plans on recouping that corporate welfare. The ministry is going to back this bill, Bill 20, which will increase construction costs even further in the form of a tax. This minister is going to back this bill that, instead of attracting investment, will scare investment away due to the ever-increasing construction costs.

Now, members across the aisle are probably wondering how construction costs are going to increase due to this climate plan tax. Well, let me lay out several factors as to why construction costs will increase. First and most obvious, every single construction vehicle runs on gasoline or diesel. The cost to run each of those vehicles will increase, obviously. Those bulldozers, backhoes, and work trucks cannot be replaced by a Prius. Those vehicles cannot be replaced by public transit. The people operating those vehicles cannot choose to lift the blocks of cement with their hands as if they were building the pyramids, Mr. Speaker. I guarantee that those vehicles were not sold because of their fuel efficiency. They were sold because they could be used to build efficiently. In construction you have to achieve productivity. They look for safety; they look for efficiency. So the cost to build these petrochemical plants is increasing due to this tax.

Second, every person working on those plants needs to drive to work. Public transit does not exist at the locations where a petrochemical plant would be built. Those people are going to want their costs covered. No one wants to work for free. The party opposite is not advocating for people to work for free; they're supposed to be the champions of workers and peasants and all. So if the cost of gas increases, the cost of labour increases to cover their costs. There's a direct correlation there, Mr. Speaker.

Now, how are the building materials getting to the work sites? Teleporters don't exist yet. In the future they will, but today we have to build these projects. A Prius cannot haul steel beams to your work site. Large trucks will have to drive to the work sites, hauling the building materials to build the petrochemical plants. I'm sure that these companies who are thinking of building anything in Alberta are having to rework their costs because they have budgets to meet. To make these projects feasible and viable, they have to do economic impact studies. They will do a cost-benefit analysis, and they have to trend the costs. I've been there; I've done that. That's how the industry works.

Wait. There's more. The roads to get to the building sites do not exist. They have to be built. And what is one of the materials used in road construction, Mr. Speaker? It is something that will become more expensive thanks to the climate leadership plan. The material is fly ash. Now, according to a search for "fly ash" in Hansard documents this has not been mentioned once. Therefore, I'll give a little explanation as to what fly ash is, and then I will explain why it will become more expensive thanks to the NDP's carbon tax plan.

The definition of fly ash reads, quote: fly ash, also known as pulverized fuel ash in the United Kingdom, is one of the coal combustion products composed of the fine particles that are driven out of the boiler with the fuel gases. The ash that falls to the bottom of the boiler is called bottom ash. In the modern coal-fired power plants fly ash is generally captured by electrostatic precipitators or other particle filtration equipment before the fuel gases reach the chimneys. Together with the bottom ash removed from the bottom of the boiler, it's known as coal ash. Yes, it's called coal ash.

For those who haven't understood why this will become more expensive, let me break it down for you even more. Coal ash comes from coal. And what does this government want to phase out? Coal-fired power plants. Now that the House has an understanding of what coal ash, or fly ash, is, I'll get back to my explanation as to why petrochemical plants will become more expensive to build, Mr. Speaker.

Fly ash has been used for many years in road construction as a fill material in concrete, lean mix subbases, and in more recent years as a binder and aggregate in hydraulically bound materials. That means that the roads that would need to be built to get to the construction site would need to use fly ash. If there are no coal-fired power plants in Alberta, then there will be no way to get fly ash locally. So then we'll have to import the fly ash from either out of the province or out of the country, which will come with the added cost of increased fuel to truck the fly ash into the province. Now the fly ash will cost more to buy, Mr. Speaker, and more to ship. The costs for building these petrochemical plants is just increasing by the moment.

Wait. There's more to come. The buildings will be largely composed of concrete. Does the House remember how this carbon plan will increase the cost of concrete? The cost of concrete will increase because fly ash is a part of concrete. Fly ash will be more expensive because the NDP wants to get rid of the power plants that create the fly ash.

These are just a few reasons, Mr. Speaker, why the NDP is making the cost to construct buildings in Alberta increase higher and higher thanks to their risky, ideological policies. Instead of trying to attract business investment and growth, this government is scaring them away by increasing their start-up costs.

Of course, the costs don't stop there. Once the building is built, it will need to be heated. Another reason why the costs to operate in Alberta, according to the minister of economic development, will be only competitive is because heating costs are higher in a winter climate than a tropical climate. Now this government is increasing the already high heating costs compared to the tropical Gulf coast, with whom we are competing to attract investment. How is increasing the cost to build and to operate in Alberta encouraging diversification? The minister needs to explain that to the House, Mr. Speaker.

This government created a whole new ministry that is in charge of diversifying the economy. Encouraging new industries to invest in Alberta cannot be done by giving a subsidy with one hand and increasing the costs with the other hand. Is this government's plan to out subsidy their own taxes in order to make Alberta competitive with other jurisdictions? I don't know. Only the minister can explain that.

A higher tax is not the way to encourage investors. A hike on necessary operating and upfront costs is not how to encourage investment. Thanks to this tax and thanks to this carbon plan the cost to invest in Alberta will increase more than it is already. The Minister of Economic Development and Trade already has admitted that government subsidies, corporate welfare, is needed to attract investment. Otherwise he would not be giving $500 million worth of it away.

The cost to invest will only increase thanks to this tax and to this plan. How in the world is this helpful for our economy? It is ridiculous that for one moment a member across the aisle can say otherwise. This carbon tax is horrendous for business investment, and for the reasons I explained, it's becoming increasingly difficult to do business in this province even before this tax. Now this tax is adding fuel to the fire in terms of businesses that are fleeing the province. Investments are fleeing the province and going to other jurisdictions like British Columbia or Saskatchewan.

As stewards of the economy what are we supposed to do? We have to make it easy for the entrepreneurs to do business in this province.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The hon. Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat under Standing Order 29(2)(a)?

Mr. Barnes: Yes, please, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to thank the hon. member for his strong words about Alberta families, about Calgary families, about everyone's concern for the environment, the timing, the impact, and the unintended consequences.

The city of Medicine Hat has a 9.9 per cent unemployment rate right now. My goodness. Two years ago you could get six jobs in the same hour. Has that changed? I'd like to hear from the hon. Member for Calgary-Foothills how Calgary is doing economically, the impacts and the challenges that this new tax will have on businesses, on families that need to pay their bills and need to provide opportunity. I'm especially concerned that Calgary, with this new carbon tax and its impact . . .

The Speaker: Hon. member, I wonder if you can direct your comments through the chair.

Mr. Barnes: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the hon. member through the Speaker: I'm very concerned about tourism and how this new tax is going to have huge implications and drags on our interprovincial travel. Of course, Calgary is in such a wonderful spot in Alberta, close to Banff and close to skiing and close to many strong, strong tourism industries. Are you also concerned that this will be a drag and further increase our unemployment rate?

Thank you.

10:00

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-Foothills.

Mr. Panda: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to my hon. colleague from Cypress-Medicine Hat. Like Medicine Hat or Bonnyville-Cold Lake, most Calgarians are impacted by this downturn in the economy. Most of them, actually, are very proud Calgarians who care about the economy. Not that other Albertans don't, but Calgary is in a unique situation. You know, when I worked back in downtown Calgary, most of our morning meetings started with the sustainability movement, and we did safety topics. We used to do the sustainability movement. Everyone in that office or in that meeting would reflect every day like we reflect here every day when we start the business.

In most of the offices in Calgary, they think about the sustainability movement: what can I do to protect the environment? I mean, nobody has a monopoly on protecting the environment, as one of the other members on the other side claims to have. Everybody is responsible. Every parent wants to protect the environment that they want to put their kids into. We see if we can print less in a day. Instead of printing, is there any other way of communication? Instead of driving to work, can we take public transport? At home can you have energy efficient windows or doors and all that to preserve the heat without consuming more fuel? In the summer how do they conserve? You know, there are stories, Mr. Speaker. I can go on and on and tell you how proud Calgarians are.

Most of those people work, actually, on the projects for the oil patch, so they are the leaders in finding technologies to take carbon out of the air. Government doesn't do that. The government, all of us, the politicians here: we can lecture the people, but we talk more and do little. Those engineers working in downtown: they are the people who find the technology. I mean, they are the innovators of the technology to separate oil from the sands. They are the proud engineers that are going to find the technology tomorrow to take carbon out of the air in a cost-effective manner. We haven't stopped doing that; it's an ongoing process. But this government tax is not going to help Calgarians, for sure, when they are down, when they are looking for jobs, staying home.

Now, with these additional taxes, it's not helping Calgarians in any way. I mean, I heard comments from the . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat. You're speaking to amendment RA1?

Mr. Barnes: To the bill, please, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: We're on the amendment.

Mr. Barnes: I'm sorry. To the amendment, yes.

The Speaker: You haven't spoken before?

Mr. Barnes: I have not spoken before, no.

The Speaker: Please proceed.

Mr. Barnes: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thanks to the House for the opportunity to rise and talk for a few minutes on the amendment. I appreciate and I'm pleased that the hon. Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake has brought this motion forward, that second reading of Bill 20, Climate Leadership Implementation Act, be amended by deleting all the words after "that" and substituting the following:

Bill 20, Climate Leadership Implementation Act, be not now read a second time because this Assembly has not received satisfactory evidence or assurances that a full economic impact analysis has been completed detailing any potential negative impact on the economic well-being of Albertans.

I know that a crucial step that the NDP government missed was the economic changes in our province since their election, over the last couple of years. I spoke briefly in a question to the hon. Member for Calgary-Foothills about how the economic situation has changed in Cypress-Medicine Hat: a year and a half, two years ago, jobs everywhere, now a 9.9 per cent unemployment rate. I'm told every day that that does not include a lot of our good oil and gas workers because they're actually not employees. They're actually independent contractors who are small-business people, the lifeblood of the Alberta economy, the type of people that built the province of Alberta.

My goodness, is it the right time? Is it the right time for the implementation, which will make it harder for them to provide jobs, to create opportunities, to pay their bills, to build wealth? I would absolutely believe that an economic impact analysis could outline all of that and leave the NDP government to look further at where their ideology direction takes them.

In my four years as an MLA many, many people have cautioned me to be concerned, Mr. Speaker, about the unintended consequences of any legislation. There are a lot of smart people in government, a lot of smart lawyers and people that draft these things, but, my goodness, history is littered with examples of unintended consequences. I think back to the royalty review in 2008, 2009, that the previous government did in an effort to get Albertans what was deemed their fair share. Service industries were driven out of Cypress-Medicine Hat. Jobs went with them. Investment and wealth went with them. They went to Texas, the northeastern United States, South Dakota, Saskatchewan, and B.C., where royalties were more competitive, where costs were lower. I think the previous government's intention was to – well, actually, I don't know what their intention was, but the absolute result was to start this downturn in the southeastern corner of our province, where today we're looking at a 9.9 per cent unemployment rate. My goodness, the empathy I have for those people.

There are some other things that an economic impact analysis could have shown. I want to talk about the carbon leakage. A former

Finance minister put out an article a week or two ago detailing this. To me, it was tremendously interesting, the unintended consequences, that it could actually backfire. I'm sure that's not the NDP government's intention, but it kind of speaks to the fact, Mr. Speaker, that if we make our industries less competitive, if we make it so our industries can't compete and all that happens is that these carbon-producing industries move 200 miles, 400 miles to an area that doesn't have the same tax and is even more likely to have these types of emissions, we're looking at a situation where you're actually giving incentive for these industries in nearby jurisdictions to be more competitive and produce more carbon and actually do the opposite of what your ideology or what your good intentions might be. [interjection]

10:10

Now, I'm hearing from one of the members, "Oh, yeah, we have to be the most responsible people," and maybe we do. We do not want to be on the wrong side of this. But, my goodness, sir, an economic impact analysis would at least let us know what we're getting into.

Mr. Speaker, the economic impact analysis could take a full look at what this carbon leakage would be. You know, there's a saying in life that perception is reality, and the reality of the situation is that your good intentions may make it worse. Is that what you want? Keep going the way you are.

Back to the value of an economic impact analysis. I was Infrastructure and Transportation critic two or three years ago, and I found it a very interesting portfolio, with a lot of stakeholders reaching out. I remember the Macdonald-Laurier commission reaching out to me about the fact that in government in Canada so often infrastructure and construction are taken on by – we have the best intentions. Our heart is in the right place, but government doesn't go the step of looking at the costs versus the benefits, and we end up with boondoggles. We end up with many situations where hard-earned tax dollars get absolutely wasted – that's the worst scenario – or more often than not we don't get the value for the investment. We don't do the right thing.

Properly engaging some experts, some people that spend their time and their lives looking at these things, could absolutely direct not only the best way to do it but, Mr. Speaker, the best time to do it, and the best time may not be when we have a 9.9 per cent unemployment rate and rising. Now, they gave some good examples. You know, the one that I think of is the Montreal subway, where millions or billions of dollars had been spent and they ended up without a proper, cohesive cost-benefit plan. One instance where they said that it was done and did work was the bridge to Prince Edward Island, the Confederation Bridge. So I guess why I present a pro and a con – I'm not saying this; the Official Opposition is not saying this – is to say: "Let's look at all of the information. Let's get the experts. Let's look at both sides of this."

I've also had the opportunity to read a little bit about New Zealand. I think it was 25 or so years ago now, somewhere in there, that unfortunately the country of New Zealand got themselves into a heck of a situation. I don't know that they went bankrupt, but certainly all the steps were there, where they couldn't cover their interest, they couldn't cover their debt, and they couldn't make the payments on their social programs and actually had to break their economy down to the basics and eliminate government interference.

One of the steps that they took was a full, complete economic impact analysis on everything they did. It included things like sinking funds for infrastructure when infrastructure was going to be built so that they could ensure that they always had the money to maintain the things that don't pay revenue like schools and hospitals and those kinds of things. It made sure that the consequences of what they were doing were fully, fully understood, as best as people can.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, the result for New Zealand has been that their economy is back on track. They've become the leader in their area again. They've become a jurisdiction and an economy that can afford to pay for their social programs. The consequences of the big spending and the big taxation and the government interference were very, very hard on the New Zealanders, I understand, but through proper economic analysis, through involving experts they were able to maintain the services and the front-line workers and the things in our economy that we all want and we all rely on.

Mr. Speaker, I've been given a list of the uncalculated indirect social and economic cost increases for Albertan businesses and families. I'm told that it's not comprehensive, but, my goodness, it's already four pages. It looks like about 80 different strong elements of everyday Albertans' and Alberta families' lives are going to be affected by hidden costs. Yeah, we can rebate some of this, but we'll never get it all. We'll never be able to cover the jobs that are lost, the opportunities that are lost. Hey; an economic impact analysis could outline some of that for us, so why does this government not want to do it? Why does this government not want to take the proper time, engage the proper experts in making sure that we get this as good as we can?

Mr. Speaker, about halfway down page 1 I see how food production is going to be impacted. Of course, I see that greenhouses are on here, and I had to circle it immediately. In my constituency, in the town of Redcliff and throughout large parts of Medicine Hat and Cypress county, the greenhouse business is very, very strong. I remember that the previous government, when natural gas rates got high, rebated the industry. They felt that the industry was so important that they had to ensure that when gas prices were high, those jobs were protected, that keeping the cost of food affordable for all Albertans, especially seniors on fixed incomes, especially people starting out, had to be protected.

What is this government doing instead? The carbon tax will begin at $1.01 per gigajoule and in 2018 will rise to $1.52. At the same time the projected natural gas price in 2018 will be $2.50. Natural gas is easily – easily – the biggest input other than labour, Mr. Speaker, in the greenhouse industry, so if they see a tripling of their natural gas costs, you know, my tomato sandwich is going to cost triple.

An Hon. Member: Tomatoes are terrible anyway. A bacon sandwich . . .

Mr. Barnes: Bacon. Who doesn't like bacon?

Mr. Speaker, I mean, you know, the industry has become a value-added industry. It's added packaging. It comes into the Calgary farmers' markets and sells to all Calgarians. It's in Medicine Hat. My goodness, you can walk into a lot of greenhouses in Redcliff, and there's nobody there, but you can leave your $2 or your $4 in the box and take a cucumber or a tomato. I guess the next time I go I'll have to leave a tenner.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The Member for Airdrie under 29(2)(a).

Mrs. Pitt: Yes. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you to my hon. colleague for his insights. I very much enjoyed hearing this. It's unfortunate that the government side still thinks it's funny, the rising cost of food. They're not quite understanding the correlation, which is why an amendment like this is so important right now. It's important that we do the studies, that we understand the impacts because I truly believe that once this House understands the impacts of this carbon tax, they will take a pause themselves as well. That's absolutely what I believe, so it was really great to hear your words.

The constituency that you represent in this House has a lot of greenhouses in the area. I'm not actually quite clear if it's the greenhouse capital of Alberta or the greenhouse capital of Canada, but I know and, Mr. Speaker, you would certainly know – I'm sure I'll be corrected here by my colleague or yourself – that there are many, many greenhouses in that area. We're really grateful for the products that they produce for our province. I like the flowers; in particular, the potted plants that come about this time of year for our gardens, and I'm a little concerned that next year those plants that, you know, make my house look pretty and my neighbourhood look nicer – there will certainly be fewer and fewer of them out there because those costs are going to go up because those, of course, are transported from Medicine Hat to Airdrie in a truck that uses fuel, which, of course, will have tax associated with it. Again, that's another study.

I was wondering. I'm certain that you've had conversations with these organizations in your constituency, and they've probably reached out to you on the impact of this. I know that there was a news story not too long ago where there was a greenhouse in that area that actually shut down because of the impending impacts of this government's policies, the minimum wage hikes and the carbon tax and, of course, the business tax hikes as well. That's certainly concerning, I mean, being the greenhouse capital of Canada or Alberta, which I'm hoping you will correct me on because now I'm actually really quite curious. It would be very good to hear.

I mean, these are direct food costs – direct food costs – and these are the fruits and vegetables that I had referred to earlier. You've certainly touched on this. I mean, a $10 cucumber is outrageous. Not too long ago we had a broccoli crisis, did we not?

An Hon. Member: Cauliflower.

Mrs. Pitt: A cauliflower crisis, right? I mean, it's unfortunate that we're going to have a full on fruit and vegetable crisis here next year.

I don't know if the members opposite are aware, Mr. Speaker, but we are building, developing residential properties smaller and smaller nowadays – right? – and it's a reaction to reduce the carbon footprint here in our environment. With those smaller properties, obviously, you have a smaller yard, so you have less space where you can even grow your own food. I'm not sure if you're aware, but we actually are not able to grow a lot of things in this climate, especially when you have no space to even do it in your own yard. You know, I don't know what you want. You want everybody to live in apartments but somehow try and feed themselves, but they don't have any space to grow their own food. I don't know. This whole thing is just, like, this chaotic, rolling thing.

But I was hoping that my hon. colleague from Cypress-Medicine Hat would be able to let me know what the producers in the greenhouse capital of Canada or Alberta have been concerned about.

Mr. Barnes: Thank you for the question, hon. member. They are very, very concerned about the increase in costs. They are very, very concerned about being able to keep their businesses viable and going. They do employ hundreds of people. They do produce all kinds of vegetables. There are many of them that grow the seedlings, the small trees, for reforestation, and there are many of them that grow the flowers that you talked about.

The Speaker: Are there any other members who wish to speak to amendment RA1 to Bill 20?

Cortes-Vargas: He has already spoken.

The Speaker: Hon. member, we'll decide that over here.
Hon. member, you've not spoken?

Mr. Cyr: Not to the amendment.

The Speaker: To the amendment. I don't believe you have. Please proceed.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have been doing a lot of speaking, so I understand the confusion on the government side. I thank them for trying to make sure that I'm aware of which ones I have and haven't spoken to.

But to get to this amendment. It always is the job of opposition to try to make legislation better, and if they're not given the opportunity to or don't see a way that legislation can move forward, then they use something that's called a reasoned amendment and say: let's stop it now, and then we will work on bringing forward information that we need, and then we will take that information and maybe, possibly, bring forward a new act that we can actually all work with and move forward with.

Now, I'd like to be clear on exactly what it is that we are looking for in this reasoned amendment. This Assembly has not received satisfactory evidence or assurance that the full economic impact analysis has been completed detailing any potential negative impact on the economic well-being of Albertans. Now, to be clear, Bill 20, the Climate Leadership Implementation Act – I would like to actually refer to it more accurately as either the carbon tax act or the Alberta consumption tax. This new tax that is being brought in by the NDP is one of many, and I would like to just be clear here because this is important. We're still reeling from the changes that have already been brought in, and it's important to say: what other taxes are we looking at here? Have we actually yet felt the full impact of these other tax increases that we have brought in?

My question to the government is that before you start bringing new taxes in, maybe we should see what the old taxes have done. How can we know what the increase in minimum wage is going to look like in Alberta? How are we going to know what the personal income tax increases, the 50 per cent increase on the highest marginal tax rate, are going to do to Alberta?

The corporate tax increase that we saw, that just happened: now, I will give the government credit. They did listen to the Wildrose. We specifically said: "We need to make sure that the small businesses in Alberta during this time frame are looked after by doing something, just a small thing, but it is something. Let's reduce the small-business corporate tax by 1 per cent." And you know what? To their credit they listened to us, and they implemented it. Thank you very much. I appreciate it. But this still doesn't change the fact that corporate taxes as a whole went up, and we still don't know what the impact of those corporate taxes going up is going to be on Alberta.

Now we are seeing a gas tax go up with this bill. That is going to have an impact on Alberta by itself. A natural gas tax is going to be added in this. Now, all of these increased taxes are going to be compounding on each other. We don't know the results of taxes you've already increased – we don't know – and you're adding more taxes to this.

Let's look at my next point here. Let's look back to the election on May 5, just over a year ago, that we have gone through. The platform of the current government was: we need to bring environmental responsibility back to Alberta; we're going to increase taxes. This wasn't a secret. I fully agree with the government. Their platform was on the website. They were clear that the environment was important to them. It was important to me as well, Mr. Speaker. I believe that we need balance. They were saying that we need to make sure that we do this responsibly, and I agree. We do need to be making sure our environment is protected, but in the end what we're seeing here is a radical shift with the Alberta government right now.

We have been known for years to have the Alberta advantage. That is to mean that we have promoted business and individuals throughout Alberta to move forward with their earnings and be able to be contributors to the social system that we have in place. The Alberta advantage. You move to Alberta, you're going to get an advantage, the Alberta advantage. Now what we've seen is a transition away. The government has brought in the Alberta way. What is the difference with the Alberta advantage? What we're seeing is higher taxes, which brings higher unemployment. These two go hand in hand. What we saw with the Alberta advantage was stability. What has the Alberta way brought? Instability. When we start looking at what the Alberta advantage and the Alberta way are, you're seeing a chasm between the two ideologies. We're transitioning from Alberta advantage to Alberta way.

The next one was that on the NDP platform it was environmental responsibility, which most Albertans would agree with, to carbon tax, that wasn't on the NDP's website or platform. This is a different transition. This is where we actually see a change in phrases again: environmental responsibility to carbon tax. We all want to protect our environment, but the question that I have for the government is – we want to see Alberta in the forefront of environmental responsibility. There's no doubt, and I believe we were there. I believe that we actually were there. We actually need to be promoting ourselves as a province that is in the forefront of this area.

Fine. Okay. We're moving towards a different ideology. This is a government that has been fairly elected. Right now what we're looking at is this carbon tax. Now, that wasn't brought into the platform. Right now what we're not seeing are any actual goals, any actual way of getting to any achievable result other than: we want to bring in a tax. My concern here is that we've already had minimum wage increases, personal tax increases, corporate tax increases, a gas tax increase, a natural gas increase, potentially, and now we're going to increase carbon tax, which, in the end, like all of these, will increase the taxes.

When we start looking at what it is that the government is trying to achieve, the results here aren't being given any metrics that we can measure. What are we trying to do with this money? Now, I would say that the hon. colleague from the third party from Vermilion-Lloydminster brought up a very good point during estimates. We have a hundred per cent funding on all the environmental initiatives that are going forward. Does that mean that every one of them had a business analysis done? Or do we just have so much money coming in that we can't spend it fast enough? This is a concern because in the end we need to be picking what the best route for Alberta is, not just spending money, throwing a dart at the dartboard and hoping that it actually achieves what we're looking to do. That is obviously not the right direction.

Let's start again. Let's go from the top down here. Alberta advantage to Alberta way. Environmental responsibility to carbon tax. Then if we look at when this first was promoted, this wonderful carbon tax, it was promoted to Albertans as revenue neutral. They were saying: "You know what? We are going for every dollar we take out of the economy. Every dollar we take out of the economy through this new tax is going to have a result of tax reductions." That is what tax neutral means: tax increase, tax decrease. That is essentially what it is, and then you meet in the middle ground. That is what B.C. is doing. That is a true carbon-neutral tax. But you know what? That's changed now. It's no longer revenue neutral that they're promoting, but that was the original message that went out. That's what people in Alberta still hear. That's what they already know.

This new term that we've seen pop up is "revenue recycling." Wow. That sounds like environmental recycling, doesn't it? We're responsibly spending our money. We're recycling it back into the economy. Every dollar that we bring in – guess what? – is recycled. Every dollar is recycled. If we want to be environmental stewards, let's treat all of our taxes that we have coming in, personal, corporate – they're all environmentally friendly now. Isn't that great? Let's be clear. This is not revenue neutral. We have an actual tax. That means we're collecting money, and we have no plan for that money other than we're just going to throw darts at the dartboard and make sure that when we are done spending the money and in the end putting a whole lot of debt onto our children – we've seen with Bill 10 that we are actually getting rid of the debt cap. We are leaving a legacy of failed experiments and debt for our children. That is not a legacy I would like to leave for my two little girls, Amelia and Charlotte.

How can we look at moving forward with this? Something that I would like to mention is that over the last five months the Premier has actually said that it is not time to reach out and make a big money grab because that is not going to help Albertans right now. That is exactly what this is. We have no direction for the money. We have no expectation of results for this spent money. We do know, by what the hon. Member for Airdrie has said, that it is going to affect Albertans. Even the government admits that. They admit that there are going to be direct and indirect costs for Albertans. This is not something that is in dispute. What is in dispute is the amount – the amount – of that impact.

Now, the government is being very clear, saying that it's going to cover all of the costs for the low-income Albertans. Well, we had one of the MLAs from Calgary southwest say that this is a partial – partial – payment back to Albertans. I agree with that fully. It is a partial payment back to Albertans because in the end – and let's go back to the amendment – without doing "a full economic impact analysis," we have no idea what the end result is. This is, again, bringing back the fact that we already don't know what the effects of the other taxes are going to be on us.

Now, I have been told by my colleagues in my last profession, which was in accounting, that they have given instruction to the clients that they needed to pay out all of the money that was sitting in their corporations before December 31, 2015, because they needed to take advantage of the lower tax brackets, which is tax planning. This is tax planning. This is tax planning at its finest. We actually will see a higher amount of taxes collected in this last year, that we won't see this year because we've already gone to the farthest extent when it comes to taxes. So we're not only going to see an increase in this carbon levy, bringing in a wonderful bit of money to make up for the personal taxes that the companies aren't going to be paying out because it paid out massive lumps in 2015 just to make sure . . .

10:40

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Under 29(2)(a), Innisfail-Sylvan Lake.

Mr. MacIntyre: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to my hon. colleague. Not being an accountant, I'm very interested to understand a little bit more about this. If I understand the hon. member correctly, because of the massive payouts made in 2015, those funds are not going to be paid out in this fiscal year or calendar year; therefore, the amount of revenue collected by the provincial government is going to be less than it might otherwise be. I would like to know from the hon. member if he could illuminate us a little bit on what that might mean to the government's own projections on just how much revenue this government is actually going to then net if these corporations made that payout last year. We have seen repeatedly that this government's projections both on costs and revenues have never been anywhere close to being reality, not even in the same galaxy sometimes.

I'm concerned that this government, which is already putting us deeply in debt, hasn't even done the appropriate study of revenue flows and cash-flow projections that a business would do. I'm concerned that they have not taken this into account, again, because they didn't do economic impact assessments – and they're just so straightforward – and they're unaware of it. They are forging on ahead under a false notion that there's a pot of money coming their way, which, in fact, if I understand you correctly, is not true. Would the hon. member please illuminate us a little bit more about that?

Mr. Cyr: Thank you for the question. The fact is that when you bring in more taxes, there always are diminishing returns that are attached to these things. Now, we have an Alberta government that is bringing in significant tax increases. We have a federal government that has brought in significant tax increases. Now, this means that we had all of the smaller businesses paying out the cash in their companies last year, which means that this year they're going to go back down to their normal earnings that they would have had before. There are no corporate taxes that are going to be made in this next year even though the government is very clear that they're pushing forward all these great big tax increases, and the reason is that there are no companies out there making profits.

Now, we do have some of the companies that are related to government or government activity still out there, and they're still bringing in and generating income. I understand that putting money in right now to build Alberta up while Albertans aren't working, while we have an infrastructure deficit is something that probably will get more out of our dollars. But we were building at an astounding rate before. What happens here is that we're going to find that the personal taxes are going to decrease because, in the end, we had that big lump that was paid out, we have no profits or low profits coming in for the corporations, we have minimum wage increases, which will drive down the profits of these businesses within Alberta, and that means that fewer wages are taken by the owner or fewer profits are being made.

Now, I know that we're insensitive to the fact that profits are a driver for businesses. Somehow we've come to the conclusion that businesses in Alberta wanting to make money have become a detriment – a detriment – to Alberta. That is just not true because without a good, strong source of income, a good return on money, businesses don't thrive in Alberta. So what happens is that we've got a government right now saying: "You know what? They can just charge more. They can just charge more." You know, I've heard this argument consistently from the government: just charge more.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I think we've completed 29(2)(a).

The hon. Member for Little Bow.

Mr. Schneider: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. [interjection] Sorry for all the jocularity that goes on in the back row here.

I appreciate the opportunity to rise today and speak regarding the amendment to Bill 20, an amendment to a bill which seeks to impose a carbon tax on Alberta. Now, I support my colleague's amendment to this bill, an amendment that states that "this Assembly has not received satisfactory evidence or assurances that a full economic impact analysis has been completed detailing any potential negative impact on the economic well-being of Albertans." I support this amendment. It is a little bit incomprehensible to me that in a delicate, frail economy such as this one, the government would wilfully inflict a policy that has the potential to be economically damaging. Worse is that they would do so without any sort of credible economic impact assessment, which this amendment speaks to.

Simply put, it is the very definition of reason that this debate pause until we have this economic impact study to demonstrate that there are no consequential economic impacts. Not only would the government's carbon tax increase costs to companies and job creators but also to everyday families. This legislation as presented will make life more expensive for Albertans.

Of course, as conservatives we recognize the inherent need to preserve, to conserve, to leave an environment for our children that is at least as good as the one that we ourselves inherited.

Now, speaking solely in the abstract, the concept of a carbon tax has been championed by numerous experts over other alternatives. But this government's carbon tax tends to go beyond a simple behavioural change incentive. Theoretically, the carbon tax is meant to discourage behaviours that produce emissions, discourage behaviours that use fuels that create those.

Mr. MacIntyre: What about greenhouses?

Mr. Schneider: Greenhouses, too.

But the broad-based application of the tax suggests that it's really more of a revenue tool than anything else. How else to explain the broad-based application? By definition the carbon tax is to modify behaviour to discourage heavy emissions, but what on earth does this government intend to modify within the behaviour of a nonprofit company, I wonder. Goodness knows that the nonprofits that serve this province from one end of it to the other often stretch the value of any given dollar further than anyone else is capable of, and we thank them very much for the abilities that they have in making that dollar go further to help those that are a little less fortunate than some of us.

10:50

To quote from the Calgary Chamber of Voluntary Organizations:

Furthermore, while impacts of the new carbon tax will be mitigated through a rebate program for individuals and a tax reduction for small business, no provisions were announced for the nonprofit sector. We are disappointed that the impact on the nonprofit sector fails to have been considered in two of the hallmark initiatives of this budget.

Likewise, a large segment of my constituency, as you know, Mr. Speaker, is involved in farming operations, as I said in my member's statement yesterday. I talked about Feedlot Alley, which is right dead centre in my constituency. Every day of the week for 52 weeks a year there is a requirement for feed products to feed the cattle, for feed products to feed hogs that are in Feedlot Alley. Now, my question is: what behaviour does this government intend to modify within the farmers in my constituency? The fuel for farm equipment is essential. It should go without saying that in rural Alberta not everything is as close in proximity as it would be in the city. The ability to drive is essential. To get from one portion of your farm to another at times takes miles and miles of required driving. Precisely what behaviour this government intends to modify within farmers is, again, unclear.

What the carbon tax will likely do is increase costs, making life more expensive. These are the sorts of issues an economic impact assessment, as proposed in this amendment, ought to be in place to address. Of course, the legislation presented does include an exception for farming operations, an exemption to the fuel increase, but the definition of what is allowed in farming operations is left to the regulations, which we haven't seen yet.

I want to state something which I had long thought was self-evident. Farmers feed cities. Farmers feed the world. Farmers all over the world feed the rest of the world – that we've known for ages – and the food that comes from farms needs to be transported. If the carbon tax is raising the cost of fuel, raising the cost of transporting food, the invariable consequence is that food itself becomes more expensive. I can't think of a more ill-conceived idea than to make probably the most basic necessity of life more expensive.

In simple terms, if those on the government benches are so certain that their carbon tax will not cause major economic consequences for Albertans, they owe it to Albertans to demonstrate it through an economic impact assessment because as it stands, companies in my constituency are understandably worried. One trucking company that my office heard from expressed concern that big farming operations will have an unfair advantage since they are exempt from the carbon tax and they are also able to use purple fuel in all their trucks. The carbon tax will have an effect on his business, but it will also give bigger farmers a bigger advantage. It seems like it picks winners and losers at times.

Another trucking company I spoke with expressed concern that they are not getting exemptions. They run trucks up and down the road to these feedlots, actually. Their trucks would be hooked to trailers that would haul grain or trailers that would haul the livestock that is picked up at an auction market and taken out to a feedlot or picked up at a rancher's yard. Now, for this particular fellow, his costs were exceeding a hundred thousand dollars when he was running 16 trucks. Sixteen trucks is a pretty big fleet. That fleet has now dropped down to seven trucks due to the recession. Everybody feels the pinch of the recession; that's understandable. He told me that they were already charging 30 per cent less than what they should be and trying to figure out what they're going to do to absorb what is passed on as a result of this tax and what is passed on to clients with the tax. How much further, I wonder, will they be able to eat this cost so that they can stay in business?

Another company trucks most of the milk in southern Alberta from the dairies for processing. Their added costs will be directly added to the consumers' just because of the way their business works. They charge for the increased costs when they invoice. When it's delivered, that cost will be directly passed on to the processor, which, of course, will be directly passed on to the grocery store that sells the product, right back to the consumer, right back to Alberta families again.

It's a reasonable amendment that this carbon tax be delayed until an economic impact assessment is completed. Simply put, the bill is poised to make life more expensive for Albertans. In a time like this it's simply the wrong tax at the wrong time. It's bad timing for anyone who has to try and make a living in this economy. Things will change; we know that. It's just that it appears that this government is unable to demonstrate that there will not be economy-wide consequences.

I did just want to talk about a few other examples of uncalculated, indirect social and economic cost increases for Alberta businesses and families. You know, when I went to school – my goodness; I can hardly remember that – I do remember that if it was hot in class, the windows were all openable, if that's a word. We threw those open when it was hot, and if it started to get cool, we closed them. That was a different time, of course. Buildings today are climate controlled, which means that there are heating and cooling elements within the structure which use electricity, probably natural gas, for heating and cooling. I hear from constituents all the time about school fees, that they kind of turn their nose up at. Nobody likes to pay those school fees, but because it's their children, they pay them. And they'll pay these extra costs that are brought on by this bill as well. It's just another burden to Alberta families.

Last night I brought up unintended consequences of this bill. My colleague from Leduc-Beaumont talked about the costs that, you know, seemed like they're unintended for agriculture.

School boards. That's another kind of a weird consequence of the carbon tax. The province of Alberta funds the school boards, gives them money for operations. Those dollars that are given are tax dollars from Albertans. The school boards pay for busing and heating and cooling, et cetera, and the dollars that school boards pay include increased expenses for the fuels that are part of operations. As an example, I read an article where the Edmonton public school board was talking about the additional costs of busing as an effect of this carbon tax.

Beginning Jan. 1, 2017, the government will charge consumers $20 per tonne of carbon dioxide . . . produced by the combustion of gasoline, diesel and natural gas. The levy translates into 4.5 cents per litre on gasoline, 5.4 cents per litre on diesel and about $1 per gigajoule . . .

Or GJ as I've been told it's affectionately called.

. . . of natural gas. Those rates rise again on Jan. 1, 2018.

In 2017, filling the tanks of the 500 school buses that transport Edmonton public students daily would cost an extra $6,000 to $10,200, depending on the size of the diesel bus's tank. Administrators haven't yet determined the potential cost to the [entire] district.

It goes on to say:

Heating public schools, however, will cost an estimated $630,000 more for the eight months the carbon tax would apply, said Todd Burnstad, acting managing director of finance for Edmonton Public Schools.

11:00

It appears that all this government is doing is shifting dollars from Education into another government department. There's no gain in imposing a carbon tax onto a school board whose funds already come entirely from taxpayers. Those dollars are labelled for education, so it appears that funding for schools will have to increase in order for school boards to operate unless, Mr. Speaker, this is one of those consequences of the bill that hasn't been written into regulations yet.

As I said last night, if I hand the Bill 20 document to any person that wants to take the time to read it, they may have difficulty finding within the proposed legislation a portion that explains how the increased cost of electricity, the increased cost of diesel or gas for buses or the cost of natural gas for heating and/or cooling will be exempted. At the end of all this, will the school boards be given more money for their budgets to cover these expenses, and who comes up with the money for the province to increase these expenses? Would it be the Alberta taxpayer, shifting dollars from Education to a different government coffer?

I just want to talk about hospitals for a minute. Hospitals . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member

The hon. Member for Airdrie under 29(2)(a).

Mrs. Pitt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you so much to my hon. colleague from Little Bow for the wonderful words of wisdom, so to speak. Basically, you crafted a good argument and gave really great examples about how this NDP carbon tax is literally a carbon tax on everything. You gave really great examples about the increases in the busing fees in your constituency and the concerns.

Certainly, we know there's going to be an impact on families. Those are, again, just examples of the indirect costs that haven't been calculated and that nobody seems to want to do any studies on. But, you know, barrel through, and pass this very damaging carbon tax bill.

I actually haven't heard any arguments at all from the government side about the environmental impact of their carbon tax bill. Like, what would be the purpose? I have to pay more for my heating costs in my home, yet what is the output on the other side? What are your measurables on the other side?

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Lower carbon emissions.

Mrs. Pitt: I'm not even quite sure if you understand what less carbon emissions means, because you have yet to actually put anything down. We've asked for a lot of this evidence to be tabled. What is your outcome here? If you're trying to make a sales pitch, Mr. Speaker, if the government is trying to make a sales pitch, you would present an argument. If you want to sell Alberta on your plan, you would present a valuable argument. It's sort of like sales 101. I get that there is very little real-world experience on the government side – I get that – and it's unfortunate, but we are where we are.

I'm not quite sure if there is an appetite on the government side, Mr. Speaker, to actually go out and get some information, you know. So far I hear evidence that this government watches movies about climate change. I know that unicorns aren't real, but I don't think that this government does. [interjections]

The Speaker: Please proceed.

Mrs. Pitt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was really hoping that my hon. colleague for Little Bow would be able to tell me about the conversations that he's had with the constituents in his constituency and about the impact that this will have on his community. I'm really concerned that my hon. colleague is going to be in a situation, that I do believe every single one of us is going to be in, where our constituents are literally desperate because they just can't afford the costs here.

We could help to mitigate these damages if we had the research in place beforehand, but we don't have that, and there doesn't seem to be a willingness to do so. Before we go about impacting people's lives in a significant, magnificent way, let's do some research. That's it. Then your sales pitch is right there, and this would be a whole heck of a lot easier, and everybody would feel good and warm and fuzzy inside.

Instead, we're here asking so many questions, and we have so many concerns, and so do the people that elected us to be here to represent them. These are the questions that they're asking, and these are the concerns that they have. I think it would be extremely prudent for us to do our jobs, put our heads together, and move forward with a plan that everybody can buy into. Wouldn't that be just easier, Mr. Speaker?

I'm hoping that my hon. colleague for Little Bow would be able to give us some insight into what his constituents are saying.

The Speaker: Are there any other members who wish to speak to amendment RA1? The Member for Lacombe-Ponoka.

Mr. Orr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity. The importance of an economic impact assessment here is extremely important. While I realize that there are a number of scientists and academics on the government side, it causes me to think that surely they would value rigorous economic analysis. Now, I understand that there would be great value to this, in fact. It would certainly take arguments away from the opposition if they had a serious economic impact analysis. It would be an undeniable argument to Albertans, who would be able to look at it and understand it and make sense of it. It would make for a perfect bill. But just presenting it based on emotion and ideology and rhetoric: that may be their karma, but it really isn't real science or good academics, for that matter.

Economic impact assessments should be required for every major government program. We require environmental impact assessments. I understand that accounting is not nearly so sexy, but it would actually help to have the economic side of this as well.

The truth is that this is just a tax grab bill. That's what it's all about. It's not even an environmental – there is no environmental assessment. There's no real indication per industry of tonnes of CO<sub>2</sub> in reduction targets. There are no measurements of money that it will cost. There's no monitoring of the emitters or payers. It's all about payers. It's all about money. It's all about the fact that they want to create this tax grab, essentially. That is what it boils down to. I think that's why they're avoiding the actual economic side of an assessment. It's just not suiting their particular purpose, and that's troubling because I think an economic analysis would help to identify some of the incredible inequalities that are being put forward with this bill.

We listened just a couple of days ago to a carbon trade expert and business that works on reducing carbon in industry across Alberta. He pointed out to us that there's a huge gap between the specified gas emitter regulation and the carbon that those companies – 109, I think it is – are committed to and then the fact that there's a small-business tax credit for small businesses. But there's this massive gap for a whole bunch of mid-sized businesses in Alberta that don't qualify for the small-business tax credit, that are not part of the specified gas emitters regulation, and there is absolutely no protection or forward movement for them in this bill.

They have specifically said: "Fine. Charge us a million dollars, but what do we get for it? We don't get any help with improving our environmental footprint. We don't get any kind of tax credit. We don't get any kind of support in any way." There's this massive gap with these mid-sized industries across Alberta, which are actually significant employers, significant contributors to our GDP. I'm speaking particularly of food processors, food production; for instance, our malting companies in this province, one of which is in my riding, the kinds of businesses that actually use a fair bit of energy, a fair bit of natural gas in heating food products in order to sterilize them, in order to process them. They use a lot of natural gas. Part of the difficulty of this equation, that maybe an economic impact analysis would have identified, is that many of these companies, unfortunately – I'm not thrilled about this – actually have their head offices outside of this province. They are owned by others.

They are coming back and saying to us: "What kind of government have you guys got going on there? Why should we stay there?" One of them, in fact, said: "We could take our business, relocate it across the border, buy gas for export, which would be cheaper, and actually make more money if we relocated ourselves." This is called leakage. The Climate Leadership report actually tried to address this, but the government overlooked it. The reality is that businesses are actually saying this. They said it to us two days ago. They are willing to relocate. Even worse, some of them that are looking at expansion or even were considering coming into the province are at the point now where they're saying: "It isn't worth it. I mean, I'm charged with a cost that I don't have to pay in other jurisdictions. It makes it unprofitable for me. I'm not coming there till this gets all sorted out."

Another aspect of this is the fact that these mid-tier companies, who are expected to reassess their environmental impact, which is good and great, have not been given any kind of an adequate time to do that. As we were speaking with the expert on this the other day, he pointed out to us that the time to retrofit in order to actually meet the deadline of January 1, 2017, is impossible. He said that most of the projects where we go in and recover heat energy, where we install lower footprint equipment, where we cogenerate electricity from recoveries and losses take two years from design to installation to actually being able to use it. We've got – what? – eight months, and these companies are supposed to have this all done. There's no help; there's no guidance; there's no timeline. There's nothing on this for them. So they are extremely frustrated, and the inequalities that are being created are just unbelievable. I think an environmental impact assessment would have helped with that kind of thing in a very, very real way.

I want to refer also again to the Climate Leadership report that was put out. On page 24, the second and third paragraphs, they talk about the fact that Alberta companies will need to find ways to reduce costs. Good. I agree. They will need to find ways to reduce costs. How is it, then, that the government is not giving them the time to be able to do that nor giving these mid-tier companies any assistance in doing that and, on top of it, while telling them to reduce costs, is piling taxes on top of them? It's just a complete contradiction of realities.

On page 21 of the same report it says that a two-degree "transition will require a significant change in energy use globally, but perhaps not as dramatic or as quickly as some [thought]." Here we have the report that is the mandate for all of this, the very thing that's supposed to be guiding it, yet they're not following it. There's such a headlong rush that, quite frankly, we don't believe they've got it right. In fact, we believe they've got it very wrong, and an economic impact assessment would in fact probably help a great deal with that. It would be very valuable if that were to happen.

The point of an economic impact assessment is the fact that it needs to address the actual costs that are being forced upon people. The Climate Leadership report doesn't address those economic impacts. I understand that it's your mandate. I've read it all. It does outline direction. It sends out signals, to use a phrase out the report, but the economic impact of costs is not really addressed there.

There literally is no risk assessment for businesses. There's no business plan to how to actually move this thing forward. While I applaud the idea of creating new green industries and new green forms of energy, anybody who's an entrepreneur understands that if you're going to launch a new venture, a new business, take a new direction to create a business, you need a significant and serious plan, and it usually takes at least three to five years to get to the point where you get a cash flow that is sustainable, that actually works. Up until that point in time you're putting investment into the company. Hopefully, you can get to the point where you are able to generate cash flow and become viable.

I know that there's some great encouragement, that there are companies out there wanting to create new industries. That is true. Unfortunately, the reality is that many of them are there – and I hate to have to say this, but I've heard it in my own riding. Companies wanting to create new green industries are waiting until they can find out how much money they can get from the government to fund it. There are people standing in line all over looking for tax breaks, for funding, for incentives. This is exactly what happened in British Columbia when the NDP were there.

As long as the government is handing out money or incentives or benefits or cash flow in some form or another, there will be lots of people. I mean, these business guys are smart. They know how to get money out of government. They know how to play all of the games, they know how to speak the right language, they know how to put together the business plans, and they know how to get the cash in their jeans. That troubles me. I'm not going to say that every single one of them is like that, but the reality is that it is a huge, huge risk. Over and over and over again governments end up, basically, in fiascos over millions and millions of dollars of taxpayers' money just getting siphoned off from smart business guys who know how to play the game. That bothers me. I think that's a huge risk in this situation, and I think that there needs to be a great deal of care on this. An economic impact assessment would help in that regard.

For that reason, I entirely support the motion. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there any questions under 29(2)(a)?

The Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As we've kind of been going through this debate here, I just want to start by saying that I appreciate the member's comments. I think he brought up some very good points. It's interesting what we hear from the other side. I mean, a lot of the time it's just kind of sniping and chirping and stuff like that.

You know, when we use the word "tax," they like to throw out the word "levy." I'd like the member's comment on this word "levy." Now, if I were to be just a little creative with the word "levy" and use a different spelling, it says that it's an embankment or a dam. Though some people may use some of those terms to describe this bill as being, you know, expensive, I just wanted to point out that the Don McLean song American Pie starts off with "So bye, bye, Miss American Pie. Drove my Chevy to the levee but the levee was dry." So that actual spelling of "levee" might be more accurate because in his song he's referring to a ditch. I think that's probably right. This here is a bit of ditch that we're going to be throwing money into.

Now, the proper definition for the way that the word "levy" is spelled, how the government is using it, is that as a verb it's to impose a tax, fee, or a fine. As a noun it's an act of levying a tax, fee, fine. Synonyms to levy are tax, tariff, toll, et cetera. So it's very clear what a levy is. A levy is a tax.

Now, sometimes the government likes to use the word "price." Synonyms for price are cost, charge, fee, fare, levy. I'd like the member to maybe comment on this word "levy" that the government likes to use. I think it's pretty clear that levy is the same as tax.

Now, the definition of tax: "A compulsory contribution to state revenue, levied by the government on workers' income and business profits, or added to the cost of some goods, services, and transactions." That's obviously what's happening here. It's a cost added to goods and services. Another definition included words like "burden," "load," "weight," "demand," "strain," "pressure," "stress," "drain," "imposition." They are some definitions of the word "tax." I can see why the government doesn't like to use it, but when they use the word "levy," obviously it's the same thing.

The government, of course, sits on the other side. They like to laugh when we talk about the cost to individuals of this tax, but it isn't funny, Mr. Speaker. It's not funny at all. I'd like to have the member actually comment on that, too.

Now, another word we hear is "fearmongering." Well, we have a chance here to get the facts on this, to have an actual study done on what this actually will cost Albertans, cost business, loss of jobs. I mean, there are multiple things that can be the result of this tax bill, and we don't know what they all are. We're doing our best with the information we have to gather things together, see what this cost is going to be on individuals, on families, on businesses, how many jobs will be lost, but we really could use a proper, full, in-depth study on this.

The Member for Edmonton-South West got up and talked about full and partial rebates. At this point, by now, we're starting to realize that there are more costs involved than what the government or the report has identified. He talked about full and partial rebates. I'm going to suggest that it's, at best, partial rebates and possibly no rebates. In fact, depending on your income there will be no rebates.

Another thing that the Member for Edmonton-South West said was that this bill has been out for weeks. Well, I hope that's not true, Mr. Speaker, because we've only had it for a week.

I mentioned before about the day last week when we were debating Bill 1 and Bill 20 on the same day. Now, let's look at Bill 1. Bill 1 is basically three pages long. It took 80 days from the time it was first introduced to the time it was passed, 80 days for a three-page bill . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members speaking to amendment RA1? The Member for Battle River-Wainwright.

Mr. Taylor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you for the opportunity to rise and speak on this reasoned amendment to Bill 20, the Climate Leadership Implementation Act. I think that it's a very reasonable reasoned amendment. I'm just going to go over it to help start this off and actually read it.

Bill 20, Climate Leadership Implementation Act, be not now read a second time because this Assembly has not received satisfactory evidence or assurances that a full economic . . . analysis has been completed detailing any potential negative impact on the economic well-being of Albertans.

I know we've heard people talking about that. This Climate Leadership Implementation Act does not speak about a climate leadership plan in any way that I could find. It talks about tax. It talks about how they can tax people, tax Albertans more, tax us on, frankly, everything for all Albertans. This is a tax plan. It's not a climate leadership plan. I hear the government say that it's about the environment and why the environment is so important, but why does this bill only talk about taxes? There's not a plan there.

If it's behaviour modification, if that's what you're trying to create out of that, if that's the tool – the Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake talked about it last night, a behaviour modification tool – why are we going after hospitals? They have surgery rooms, which they have to have. They have surgery theatres that they work in. They have to have the air exchange. In the middle of winter that temperature has to be raised so it can be at least 18 degrees Celsius. It takes a huge volume of natural gas energy to do that.

This continues throughout the province. It's not just in my riding. It's not just in Edmonton or Calgary. It's in so many different towns throughout this province. They have the same concern. What economic impact assessment has been done? What studies have been done? I'd love to know what studies have been done.

What's going to happen in my riding? When you take a look at specifically what I have, we have a food processing plant in my riding that processes canola seed. To get canola seed from a grain to an oil takes a huge amount of energy. It's not just simply: squeeze, do this, and something comes out. It's using a large volume of energy day in and day out. As a result, the carbon tax that's going to be put on this food processing is going to raise the price of the oils, your canola oil that you use and enjoy. It's not just what you use at home. They have it in deep fryers at McDonald's, if that's where you go, or any restaurant that deep-fries. Chances are that they're using canola oil that was produced locally, and it's going to be going up in price.

You know, Mr. Speaker, when they take the canola – the farmers have gone to the work of growing the canola and then putting it into a truck to transport it down to one of the grain terminals. Then the grain terminals will pick up that seed and put it onto trains. Well, we know that there are more taxes on the trains. We know that that's going to be going on. What's going to happen there is that if it's on a train and they're shipping it to Wainwright to be processed, well, it's going to cost that company. They're going to lose sales because somebody in Saskatchewan can make that same oil for 10, 15 per cent less, and consumers want to buy the product that's 10, 15 per cent less. So why wouldn't that train – that train only has to go another 30 miles from Wainwright to be in Saskatchewan, Mr. Speaker. It's literally that close.

If we just take this line of logic – and I know they have places to process the canola across the border in Saskatchewan. How hard would it be for them to now transport it just a little bit farther? It's going to cost them, really, next to nothing insofar as the cost of transportation. The processing of this canola is going to be huge as a result of this carbon tax. We're going to see the cost of goods go up, the cost, like I said, at McDonald's. And bakeries use it. They use it for so many different products.

Are we supporting Saskatchewan? Is that what we're doing? Saskatchewan doesn't have any regulations, so we're going to still get the carbon. If they're going to have the plant in Saskatchewan and the plant is going full tilt – it was going three-quarters and now it goes full tilt, so they doubled their capacity – the carbon still floats up in the air and comes back to Alberta. We're not any better off. You have not changed or modified any behaviour. You've just lost jobs for Albertans.

Mr. Orr: That's why it's wrong.

Mr. Taylor: That's why it's wrong. That's why I'm just so against what's happening here.

When I was growing up, you know, my dad always preached to me about: we leave the campground cleaner than when we found it. He wanted to have it at least as clean, if it was a really clean campground, or leave it cleaner once we left.

Wildrose believes that, you know, we've got to look after this environment, so I have no problem supporting having a cleaner environment. I remember back in the '70s, as will many of the members, we watched the terrible use of the processing. They didn't clean any of the coal. They didn't clean any of the gases that they were using. We all remember watching the fish floating up in the Great Lakes.

Canada got better. They understood that you can't do that. The message got across the United States, and they were able to change it. They didn't have to have all these tax regulations. The industry was told: you have to clean this up. You don't have to tax more, but you can make it so that you have these agreements to be able to go to this level of how much you're able to pollute. They slowly were able to pollute less and less, and now the fish populations have returned to the Great Lakes and returned... [interjections] Unfortunately, you know, I hear the chirping from the other side.

The government's policies on the fish. You know, we've got fish that are dying in lakes here in Alberta. They're the ones that have this environmental... [interjections] But we're the ones that are saying that we need to do something so we don't kill fish.

The Speaker: Hon. members.

Mr. Taylor: You know, we believe that you need to keep the campground cleaner. So any time you can do things that help – we slowly talk to the industry, and we find ways to help the industry become cleaner – that's just an advantage for everybody, not just Albertans but the world.

As we find technologies that help Albertans, we're able to export those technologies across the world, and places across the world are able to use those technologies and slowly become cleaner. We'll find places right now. We know that China and India have bad records from what they're doing, but they will slowly be catching up to what we have and using technologies that we currently have.

You know, Mr. Speaker, we just don't need another level of bureaucracy, and that's what we're getting. That's what we're trying to fight against. This carbon tax is just another level of bureaucracy. How much money is it going to cost us to implement it and run it and be able to do it? How much money is actually going to be going to what you really want it to go to? It takes a certain amount of money to be able to collect that money from that consumer, then to be able to take it to the government, and then the government has a slush fund. They're going to be able to use and move that money around. We're not sure where it's going to go to, what's going to be happening with it. Unfortunately, we're not sure. So we've just got more bureaucracy, without results.

Wildrose has been calling on this government to slow down this head-on collision course in tabling and passing this ill-founded legislation. We have seen their approach lead to huge conflicts with taxpaying Albertans, who deserve to be part of the discourse about how our province will grow and change under their government, the first new government, well, in 44 years. You know, you have a chance to make a difference in what you're doing.

We want to see what you're doing with this cost-benefit analysis. How are you working this cost-benefit analysis into what you're producing, into the money that you're collecting? If you could show us the cost-benefit analysis, if it was brought into this Bill 20 and shown, that would make a huge difference to our being able to decide what we think about it. Frankly, I don't like anything I see about this Bill 20, but it is what it is. If you want to make it a better bill, I'm suggesting that you have things like a cost-benefit analysis, impact assessments that are at least attached as addenda to it.

After this first year that you've had, we see the NDP government still going full tilt ahead on yet another bill that poses huge threats to our economy. This bill and Bill 10 are huge threats to our economy. Taken together, this legislation, passed this year, has fundamentally changed our economic standing and leadership in the world and, certainly, our country. We are moving rapidly from a have to a have-not province.

I had one of my constituents text me, and he said: you've got to tell them that we're changing; it's not the Alberta advantage but the Alberta disadvantage. He wanted me to be able to say that to you. That is how he's feeling about what is going on, and he's very passionate about this. He has a small business. He runs a gas station, which I know will be having to bring down taxes on everybody that comes to use his place. He also has a C store. He has refrigeration units to be able to sell ice cream and slushies and everything else. How is he going to change that? How is he going to make the ice cream warmer? It's just going to melt. You know, how is he going to make a slushie go a few degrees higher? Nobody is going to buy his product if he tries doing that, so how is that behaviour modification going to work there?

Albertans are broken-hearted, and they're concerned. You know, they're looking for assurances that they'll be able to enjoy the standard of living that we've all come to enjoy. Then we add the effects of the NDP's economic policies to the overspending that we've seen through the last two budgets and the interim supply bills and to the unprecedented low price of oil, and we arrive at a very bleak picture for our province, for our economy.

Well, this government, obviously, cannot impact the price of oil. We know that. It's set as a world price. You're stuck with what the world is willing to offer. But they can do and should have done something to restore investor confidence . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.
The Government House Leader.

Mr. Mason: Thanks very much.

The Speaker: On 29(2)(a)?

Mr. Mason: Yes, 29(2)(a).

You know, I understand that the hon. member and his party are very concerned about the impact of the carbon levy on individual households, on small business, on charities, on our health system, on schools, and so on. I understand that they feel that this will make these services very difficult to deliver and put people out of business and bankrupt households and so on.

I'm just curious because the price estimate for the carbon levy in terms of a litre of gas is about 6 and a half cents. A couple of years ago gas prices were around $1.10, and now they're at 80 cents, so it's about a 30-cent drop in the price of gas in a couple of years, I think. By my math, using 30 cents less nets out to people paying 23 and a half cents less for a litre of gas than they were a couple of years ago.

The question is: how did those businesses, services, schools, and so on survive when gas prices were 23 and a half cents higher than they are going to be once the carbon levy is fully implemented in a couple of years? Why were they able to survive and even thrive at that time? Suddenly this spectre that you're raising of a collapse in households and small business and public services is going to be the result of a 6 and a half cent increase on gas that's 30 cents less a litre?

I can make the same case with natural gas prices, for example, Mr. Speaker. We're headed for one of the lowest natural gas prices in history. You know, some are projecting $1 per . . . [interjections] I'm getting some chirping there from the hon. member.

The Speaker: Hon. members, please.

Mr. Mason: The price of natural gas is going to go to, like, $1 per thousand cubic feet, you know, just a fraction of what it was even a few years ago, and these prices will of course benefit consumers if not exactly the gas companies. How is this burden, then, going to cause all of the devastation that the hon. members opposite are suggesting when, in fact, fuel prices for natural gas and gasoline are actually considerably lower than they were a few years ago, when everybody did very well, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Taylor: Well, I was very happy to recognize the fact that you don't control the world prices of fuel and gas. They've come down, and unfortunately that's a fact. I recognize the fact that you don't control that, but God bless us that we actually have gas prices down at this level right now because the economy is in such bad shape. The only way that Albertans will probably even be able to make it by is because we have gas prices down. It goes back to the question of cost analysis. Why didn't you have a cost analysis done prior to this? That's all I have to say.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Any other questions under 29(2)(a)?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I have a question under 29(2)(a) for the Member for Battle River-Wainwright. I've been listening intently this morning, as I always do. You know, I have expressed some concerns with this particular carbon tax, but I'm very clear that I'm in favour of a price on carbon – yes, a carbon tax – the idea being that we want to disincen the things we don't like and incen the things that we do want.

I've heard a lot from the Official Opposition here over the last couple of days about all the things they don't like about this carbon tax. I understand that. My question is: one, do you believe that climate change is (a) real and (b) human caused? Two, what would you do about it? What would you do about it? What would Wildrose actually do? We have our plan. It's called Alberta's Contribution, and I will share a copy with the hon. Member for Battle River-Wainwright. The Alberta Party has a plan. Our job on this side of the House is not just to oppose the government; it's to propose ideas. What would you do, if anything, about climate change?

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there any other individuals who would like to speak to amendment RA1?

[The voice vote indicated that the motion on amendment RA1 lost]

[Several members rose calling for a division. The division bell was rung at 11:44 a.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Wednesday, June 1, 2016

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Welcome. Please be seated.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Dr. Swann: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's a real honour for me today to introduce to you and through you to the Assembly Mr. Jagjeet Singh Sekhon. Mr. Sekhon is a prominent personality in the Ludhiana region of Punjab. He was elected to public office as a councillor, served for the past many years in various positions in the milk industry of Punjab, a major part of the Punjab economy. Mr. Sekhon is presently serving as director of Milkfed, a major milk production subsidiary. He is accompanied today by Charanjit Singh Dakha, who is a Sikh community organizer here in the city. They've risen. Let's give them the warmest welcome from the Legislature.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Greenway.

Mr. Gill: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think I will let the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View introduce first.

Dr. Swann: Thank you very much for that gracious passing of the buck.

An Hon. Member: Torch.

Dr. Swann: Torch. Sorry.

Mr. Speaker, I'm especially pleased because this is the second time this year I've had a school come to the Legislature, in this case the fantastic school of Langevin in northeast Calgary. I want to introduce 53 students and six teachers and teacher helpers. Please stand when I mention your name so we can recognize you. The teachers include Kate Logan, Brianne O'Sullivan, and Clark Reid, and the parent helpers include Ms Rani Wong, Mr. Kaushik Banerjee, and Mr. Alex Himour. And all the students: please rise, and we'll give you a warm welcome to the Legislature.

The Speaker: Now the hon. Member for Calgary-Greenway.

Mr. Gill: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was trying to locate my son over there. I would just like to make a quick addition to the Member for Calgary-Mountain View's introduction. I would like to introduce to you and through you to all members of this Assembly my son Arjun Singh Gill, who is with his class from Langevin science school. The school is amazing. The teachers and the volunteers do a great, great job. You know what? Thank you very much to the teachers for taking care of my son because I couldn't do this, right? He always beats me at Xbox and all those funny things. Thank you very much. I would ask that he, his classmates, and their teachers again rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome. Welcome to all.

The hon. Member for Little Bow.

Mr. Schneider: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today it is my privilege to introduce to you and through you to all members of this Assembly an exceptional class of students from Calvin Christian School, just north of the town of Coalhurst. These young folks, a couple of teachers, and some of the parents are from the marvellously outstanding constituency of Little Bow. I had the honour of meeting with these students and parent volunteers just a few minutes before the House opened. There are few greater honours in this job than meeting with students and speaking with them about the important work that we do here in this House. I also want to acknowledge the teachers and volunteers that made today's visit possible. I ask that you rise as I say your name – I know you're behind me – Mr. Trevor Aleman, Mr. Johannes Gerardus Jacobus Lock, Mrs. Jennifer Moens, Mrs. Michelle van Velthuisen, Mr. Maas van Velthuisen, Mr. John Vande Merwe, Mr. Derk Vossebelt, Mrs. Jackie Vossebelt. I apologize for the pronunciations if I was a little off there. I would ask that the students of Calvin Christian rise and that all them please receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Minister of Economic Development and Trade.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my honour to rise and introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly 35 visitors from Belvedere elementary school in my riding of Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview. I can tell you that on a yearly basis I visit Mrs. Bogner's class, and it's one of my favourite parts of being an MLA, returning to a classroom to engage with our future politicians, future leaders of our great province. With Mrs. Bogner today are teaching assistant Mrs. Arntson and parent volunteers Kim Nguyen and Ms Ginther. The parents, staff, and students all are doing amazing work at Belvedere elementary school, and I'm very proud to represent them. I'd ask them to rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Hon. members, are there any other school groups today?

Hearing none, the Minister of Culture and Tourism.

Miranda: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my honour to rise and introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly two guests joining us from Edmonton Northlands. Tim Reid is the president and chief executive officer, and Cathy Kiss is vice-president of corporate relations. Edmonton Northlands is a not-for-profit organization that has been at the heart of Edmonton since 1879. At the beginning of May Northlands demonstrated the depth of those roots when it stepped up to the plate and quickly, efficiently provided a place where evacuees could find rest and safety as they fled the devastating Fort McMurray wildfires. The organization, its leaders, staff, and volunteers epitomize the generosity of spirit that Alberta is known for, and for that I want to personally extend my heartfelt thanks. I would ask them to please rise and receive the traditional welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome. Thank you.

The hon. Minister of Infrastructure and Transportation.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise today and introduce to you and through you to all members of this Assembly three members of the very strong and active Alberta Avenue Community League in my constituency of Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood. I would like to ask Nicola Dakers, Margaret Larsen, and Adam Millie to please stand and receive the traditional warm greeting of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a real honour today to rise and introduce to you and through you to all members of this Assembly the Edmonton Northgate Lions. The Lions' contributions to Edmonton-Decore are countless. I know I could easily spend the rest of the afternoon telling you about all the wonderful things that they do for our community, from sponsoring community groups and sports teams to raising money and volunteering time with those in need. The Lions are certainly a pillar in northeast Edmonton. Joining us today are Rod Zohner, Marge Berry, Wanda Coates, Greg Clark, Dawn Harper, Harry Clark, Darnell Addley, Ainslie Bovee, Brian Sieben, and Tom Scott. I would now ask all my guests to please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Coolahan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am pleased to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly two CFL players from the league's greatest franchise, the Calgary Stampeders. Jabari Arthur spent eight years with the Stamps and has two Grey Cup rings. Randy Chevrier spent 11 years with the Stamps and has three Grey Cup rings. They're both in Edmonton supporting the Telus Days of Giving. I ask Jabari and Randy to rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

1:40

The Speaker: Welcome.

Someone told me that in this city there was another team. I can't remember the name.

The hon. Member for Leduc-Beaumont.

Mr. S. Anderson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure to stand today and introduce to you and through you a group of people that have been outside helping with the Telus Days of Giving. First off, though the Stamps are a good team, the Eskimos are the Grey Cup champions. First, I will introduce two people from the Edmonton Eskimos. I wish you would stand as I call your names: Adrienne Bridgeman, who's director of partnership servicing, and Jed Roberts, who is a former defensive end and linebacker who played 13 seasons for the Eskimos. [interjections] Not done yet. I had a whole list, but everybody was so excited about the Eskimos that they just couldn't hold themselves. I understand. I understand.

The other group that I have here today was instrumental in putting together the kits for kids outside there that most of us contributed to. If you would stand, please: Andrea Goertz, Zainul Mawji, Shadi Sakr, Nicholas Cartmell, Japman Bajaj, Ramiro Mora, and Dan Campbell. I wish you all to give the traditional warm welcome to these people.

The Speaker: Welcome, and thank you.

It seems to me that the two colours seem to be pretty friendly up there.

Lacombe-Ponoka, another guest?

Mr. Orr: Yes, if I may. Sorry if my staff didn't get the notice to you. My apologies.

Anyway, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would like to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly Thalia Hibbs and her son Harrison Hibbs. Harrison Hibbs is a grade 6 student at Father Lacombe Catholic school. He also plays Canada's two national sports as top peewee defenceman for the Lacombe Rockets this past hockey season and as pivot for his peewee lacrosse team, the Lacoka Locos. Thalia is currently vice-chair of the St. Thomas Aquinas Roman Catholic school board and a two-term trustee.

She's active in her community and her parish, sitting on various committees, and coaches. Please rise as we give you the warm traditional welcome of this House.

Thank you.

Members' Statements

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

End-of-life Decision-making

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On rare occasions we have the opportunity to experience moments so profound and precious that they leave permanent marks on us, fleeting moments that provide not only a glimpse into the human condition but a deep and immersive understanding. These moments etch themselves into our very being and shape who we are. I have been blessed and humbled to be present as lives leave this world, to experience something so awe-inspiring that it reaches into a person and touches their heart and soul.

It was last year when a close family friend, Jeff, passed away from pancreatic cancer. I will forever remember the small and intimate room, the sounds of those final conversations, and those by his side. I was there when the palliative caregiver sat close to his bedside and asked him how he would like his final moments to proceed. They said to him: "You know, we can intubate you and keep you alive for a little bit longer, but you won't have the same capacity. You won't be able to speak to or hold your family." Then they said: "What we can do for you is to make you comfortable so you can pass naturally. You can tell your wife, Katie, that you love her. You can hold her hand. You can be together with your family." That's what he decided at that time, and it wasn't an easy decision.

I remember standing there, watching this conversation so personal and so surreal. I almost felt uncomfortable being there, yet it felt right, that I was supposed to be there. I never spoke with Jeff or Katie about assisted death or even whether it crossed their minds. But I was so grateful for the work that the palliative care team gave them with such comfort and respect and for every moment that I got to spend with him. We are all grateful for what he was able to contribute to his family and his young daughter's life in his final months.

The issue of assistance in dying is one that transcends mere politics and policy. It touches not only our heads but our hearts and our very souls. It is a discussion of grief and loss and pain and life and ultimately is a discussion of our shared humanity . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Calgary-Mountain View.

Fort McMurray and Area Wildfire Recovery

Dr. Swann: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Today it's more than appropriate to acknowledge our amazing province. Four weeks ago in an orange haze of smoke and flame an entire city fled by a single road, some north, some south. After reaching hastily prepared reception centres, many were forced to flee yet again as the wildfire continued to grow into a multiheaded beast. In other parts of the world this might have been an enormous human tragedy as well as an urban disaster, but here in Alberta it was the prelude to an astonishing story of courage, compassion, hard work, determination, a story that showed the world who Albertans really are.

Against all odds 90,000 people were evacuated safely and found shelter in cities and towns across the province. Against all odds

Albertan and Canadian individuals and businesses, already struggling with the financial crisis, answered their neighbours' need and made the Fort McMurray donation campaign the largest in the history of the Red Cross. Against all odds the fire was pushed away from much of the city and surrounding infrastructure. Firefighters toiled day and night to save the city while uncertain of their own families and homes. Their courage has been shown to the world on TV and social media, their bravery inspiring, offers of help from around the world.

Today, four weeks later, against all odds thousands are being allowed back into the city because of the laborious work of restoring essential services in record time by workers from across Alberta.

I join with all members of the Legislature to wish the returnees to Fort McMurray the best possible return as they rebuild their lives and their city, and we mourn with the families of Emily Ryan and Aaron Hodgson, who died in a car accident fleeing the fire.

Albertans are strong, but the strong also suffer both short and long term from the mental trauma of this disaster. It is not weakness to express the need for psychological supports. I urge those who have experienced unprecedented loss and devastation to speak up and reach out over the coming months and years as needed. You deserve the best that our province can give you.

You are not alone. All Alberta, all Canada stands with you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Wapiti.

Farmer's Day

Mr. Drysdale: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm proud to rise in this Assembly and celebrate Alberta farmers. Almost 100 years ago the United Farmers of Alberta recognized the importance of setting aside a special day to celebrate and honour our farmers, so now the second Friday in June is Farmer's Day in Alberta. On June 10 farmers in farming communities will celebrate the hard work and contributions that our Alberta farmers make to this great province.

As many of you know, I grew up on a farm just outside of Grovedale and have been proud to be part of a farming community my whole life. Alberta farmers produce food sustainably through value-added production in developing new products that balance increasing food production with being good stewards of the land. Farmers understand that in 20 years the world will still be looking for Alberta to feed them and that we need to take care of our resources today to continue to produce food for generations to come.

Alberta farmers are savvy businesspeople who are accountable for every aspect of their business, including inputs, outputs, value, and quality of products. These farmers take the greatest pride in their products being world class. Alberta farmers are incredibly innovative, and they're always finding new and enhanced ways of producing the food to feed the world.

Alberta's agriculture producers are working with the Climate Change and Emissions Management Corporation, founded in 2009, to reduce the greenhouse gas emissions that are attributed to managing biological systems. They have been consulting with industry to create the most sustainable farming practice to further reduce greenhouse gas emissions.

On June 10 I encourage everyone to take the time to celebrate and show their pride for our Alberta farmers. They are producing the food to feed the world, and they are doing an incredible job of it.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Bow.

Gender-based Online Harassment

Ms Drever: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In the last year there has been a growing awareness of online gender-based violence. Hundreds of thousands of women face online harassment because of who they are and what they say. Women sports journalists and broadcasters, provincial and federal cabinet ministers, even our own Premier have been trolled online with hateful messages and name-calling due to their gender and public profile.

Mr. Speaker, as you and others in the House already know, shortly after I was elected, I experienced hate messages that were explicitly sexist and subject to taunting and online harassment because I am a woman. In May 2015, after forming our government with near gender parity in our caucus, an individual posted publicly on Twitter using the ableg hashtag, "Pretty confident things'll run smooth with so many broads' ladyshipping over the #ableg. Aren't you? Guys? Don't you want broads mitigating?" Another example is a comment directed at a federal female MP: "What a C you next Tuesday. Like seriously just go back to your house and run your car in your garage while you think of another anti oil campaign to attend."

Mr. Speaker, these are hateful comments. They're nasty, gender-based, and demeaning. They are not constructive, and it's no wonder so many women fear choosing politics as their career. In no way do they provide a constructive conversation on policy or political action. For many women things often escalate further. Name-calling, violent messages, rape, sexual assault, and even the threat of targeting family members are sent through online threats to feminists regularly. The practice has become so common that the process of reporting these has become second nature. The intersections of harassment get even more intense for women of colour, queer women, indigenous women, and women living with disabilities. They are targeted even more intensely, and the language used to attack them is almost unrepeatable.

Online communities are working to stand up against gender-based attacks online. Mr. Speaker, as a woman in politics I stand with all women who have experienced gender-based harassment. You are not alone in your struggle. I encourage all members of this Assembly to respect us and treat us with dignity and equality.

Thank you. [Standing ovation]

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

Carbon Levy

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This Premier and NDP government refuse to be honest with Albertans about the full cost of this carbon tax. They know it will make everything more expensive for families at a time they can least afford it. They know that a carbon tax while everyone is hurting will just make everything worse. This is a mess, and Albertans are extremely upset. The Premier claims that indirect costs will only add up to a maximum of $105 a year but gave no details. Will she tell Albertans if her vague estimates include higher prices on groceries because of increased transportation and heating costs?

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, it's my pleasure to rise in this House and update the Assembly on why exactly a price on carbon is good public policy. People from both sides of the House, including conservatives such as a former PC Finance minister, somebody who, I expect, many respect, wrote in an op-ed that “carbon pricing is cost effective – meaning that it achieves emissions reductions at the lowest possible cost to the economy.” He also said that “the legislation is offering sensible ecofiscal policy for Alberta.” I’m proud of the policy, and I think members opposite should be as well. Again, that was Jim Dinning, former PC Finance minister.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
First supplemental.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I love the word “sensible.” Let’s try applying it here because families are seeing the value of their homes go down. Their wages are dropping, and they have lost their jobs altogether. Rocky View school district has reported that busing fees are already going up, the Calgary school board is raising fees for next year, and the full force of the carbon tax won’t even come in until 2018. Across the province schools will be losing hundreds of thousands of dollars because of the carbon tax and, as a result, will be raising fees. Now, how can the Premier continue to insist that the indirect costs this tax will impose on Alberta families at a time when they can least afford it will only be . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, Albertans are proud of the fact that we are moving forward. The government that they elected knows that climate change is real. We acknowledge the science, and we are taking meaningful action. In terms of other orders of government, again, Naheed Nenshi, the mayor of Calgary, said that it was interesting to hear someone say that the thing that is going to help Canadian investment going forward is the fact that Canada is making real steps on pricing carbon. That’s Alberta. That’s a mayor in a major city in our province, and we are very proud to have the support of them and others, again, including conservatives from across the country, who know that this is the most meaningful way to move forward on addressing carbon.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
Second supplemental.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I agree that investment in Alberta is a top priority, so let’s make things a little bit better for Albertans. This carbon tax means less money for families. It taxes charities, and it takes money out of hospitals and schools to pay for the NDP slush fund. This government continues to refuse to be honest about the full cost of the carbon tax, and it nickels and dimes families in every corner of their lives. It will mean less money for municipalities, which means less services and higher property taxes. Can the Premier come clean on whether she’s included higher property taxes, school fees, and transit fees in her estimates?

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, it’s really nice to hear the Official Opposition say that they care about health care, education, and children’s services because during the past election we heard that there were going to be deep cuts in those areas, far greater than the impacts of being responsible in addressing climate change. Actually, in the televised address just prior to the budget the Leader of the Official Opposition talked about how great the 1990s were. Albertans said they don’t want to move back in time; they don’t want to bury their head in the sand. They want a government that’s going to stand up for health care, education, and our climate, and that’s what they’ve got.

The Speaker: The Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Assisted Dying Regulations

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, we know the challenges the province is facing in responding to new legislation put forward by the federal government on assisted dying. On an issue of such severity, emotion, and gravity to so many Albertans it’s important we get this issue right. It’s why I was so disappointed at the last-minute presentation of regulations to a few MLAs as the government asked us to sign off on their motion. Why on an issue of life and death for so many Albertans is the NDP trying to push this motion and regulations at the last minute?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Just to recap, there was a Supreme Court decision well over a year ago, and the extension to that Supreme Court decision is coming up on June 6. Alberta is the only province in Canada right now that’s actually having this debate, and I’m very proud of the fact that we presented this to the Assembly. Albertans, I think, expect their elected representatives to engage in this topic seriously and responsibly, and rather than criticizing the timing, I would encourage all members of this House to embrace the opportunity, give the feedback, and consider the very draft regulations that we’ve brought forward for discussion.

Mr. Cooper: What matters here is that the government seemed completely unprepared to release the regulations until the very last minute and almost with no debate. As columnist Don Braid put it, “There’s rarely been such obvious proof of a panic rush at the legislature – and never in a matter so important.” Issues of life and death certainly deserve a lot more thought and care from any government. Will the Premier commit to giving all Albertans a chance to provide feedback on this motion and these regulations before they’re implemented?

The Speaker: The hon. Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the 15,000 people who took time to give feedback on this over the many months leading up to today. Once again, let’s be clear. This is the only Legislature in the country that’s having this debate right now. That’s because we understand how important this issue is, and we genuinely want to hear from the opposition. The opposition can choose to make their views heard, or they can choose not to, but the fact remains that Albertans would be well served to hear from all sides of this House, and that’s why we are giving this opportunity.

Mr. Cooper: How much feedback did you get on this motion?

As the government has already acknowledged, it is important to ensure that the conscience rights of all physicians and medical staff are protected under the new provincial rules. No one should have to be forced to perform a procedure that they have an objection to, but over the past few days many medical professionals would like clarity on whether or not they will be obligated under the provincial rules to provide referrals on this issue. Will the Premier please clarify to all Albertans what the provincial stance is on the issue of referrals?

The Speaker: The hon. Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. We certainly take the responsibilities that are being passed on in terms of the provision of the health care service very seriously. We are ensuring that we protect the vulnerable as well as those who don't want to provide the service. Certainly, they're expected to respect people's choices, as the Supreme Court has granted is their right, by arranging for a timely transfer.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

2:00 Education Administrative Workload

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Education announced his intention to tame the Wild West of school fees. He said that knowing more about the range of school fees and how they are spent would help his ministry lower those fees, but gathering that information has school secretaries, teachers, principals, and coaches bogged down with massive amounts of trivial administration, what they call administrivia. There's still no report on how much parents spend, and the plan meant to lower fees actually is costing schools time and money. What will the minister do to solve the problem he created and get on track to actually reducing school fees?

The Speaker: The Minister of Education.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you very much for the question. Certainly, we are very interested in making sure that we can reduce school fees over time. We made a decision, because of the current economic situation, to put that in the out-years' budgets, not this year's, but it's very important. You know, school boards are using this information to determine and to distill what are instructional school fees. This is the target that many school boards have taken the initiative on, which I'm very proud that they have done, and this is the target that I seek to aim for as well.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In April, in an ATA survey teachers reported that their primary classroom-focused tasks are being overshadowed by constant administrative work. Being overwhelmed by administrivia is taking a toll on teachers' morale and ability to work with students. Comments include, and I quote: due to the workload and expectation of a teacher now it is a ridiculous career choice, and I would never recommend it. End quote. This is unacceptable. What will the minister do to ensure that teachers are able to focus on the work that Alberta families rely on them to do instead of being caught up in endless administrivia?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, as a teacher myself I'm very conscious of making sure that we have kids in classrooms and making sure that the schools and teachers are there to look after them. So the very first thing that we did, right from the beginning, was to fund for enrolment. To be able to do that, we have made sure that we've put more than 1,100 new teachers into classrooms, more than 1,200 support positions. Certainly, that's far better than what this opposition would have done, which is cutting schools . . .

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. More teachers and more NDP administrivia.

School boards now will be required to submit financial reports every month, but they will still be expected to align these reports with government quarterly reports. Several school boards have cited serious concerns with this increased administrivia and increased workload. One board estimates that these onerous and unnecessary reports would require the equivalent of a half-time staff position, and they're worried that tax dollars intended for education should be spent on education. To the minister: how will you reduce administrative burdens to ensure that Albertans' tax dollars are used . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Mr. Eggen: Well, you know, it's interesting, Mr. Speaker, because, of course, we disburse about 97 per cent of the Education budget to school boards. What better way to make sure that we're spending efficiently than to make sure that they are getting the message to spend the money carefully? That's what we're doing, and certainly it's a mechanism by which we can make sure that every dollar is spent in the classroom, for teachers in front of the classroom. That's what our government has done, in fact, every step of the way.

The Speaker: The leader of the third party.

Coal-fired Electric Power Plant Retirement

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The environment minister uses selective information to support her crusade against hard-working Albertans in the coal industry. An air quality study by the University of Alberta School of Public Health released in November 2015, more recent than the minister's 2012 report that she waves about all the time, shows that coal plants are a minimal source of Edmonton air pollution. To the minister: before you destroy the livelihoods of 10,000 Albertans working in the coal industry based on selective evidence, won't you consider all evidence and rethink your attack on Alberta workers and families?

Ms Phillips: Well, Mr. Speaker, we have an Official Opposition that likes to deny the science of climate change. Apparently, we have a third party that also likes to reject the science of pollution and health effects of coal-fired electricity, which are well known. There is no end to the science on this matter, that NOx and SOx and particulate matter are a problem. That is why, for example, the Asthma Society of Canada has just gifted this government, honoured us with a leadership and public policy award this year, and the reason for that is that all Albertans will breathe a little easier as we phase out coal-fired electricity.

Mr. McIver: Well, Mr. Speaker, the minister is proving that she is using selective information to support her crusade against hard-working Albertans in the coal industry. The fact is that we know that the Liberal minister was in Saskatchewan last week praising carbon capture technology as a way to reduce emissions. The federal Conservative minister exempted some of Alberta's best coal plants due to modern technology use. We know that climate change is real; we just want to fight against things that cause damage to people. Since both sides in Ottawa recognize new technology, why can't this NDP government in Alberta get in touch with science?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, the consensus around coal-fired electricity is broad. It's throughout the industrialized world. Most other jurisdictions are also looking at these policies. What we are doing is proceeding with a thoughtful plan for the six plants post-2030 that were not captured by the federal Environment Canada regulations. This is a thoughtful plan that will proceed in negotiation with the electricity providers and with the communities in question.

Mr. McIver: Well, there you have it, Mr. Speaker. The minister is hanging with the Leap Manifesto party in Ottawa instead of the ones that consider science.

Mr. Speaker, 10,000 jobs will be lost because of the environment minister's demonization of an industry committed to operating in an environmentally responsible manner. To the Premier: since we know that your minister is committed to killing 10,000 jobs and you choose to call your budget, quote, the jobs plan, please describe the 10,001 jobs you will create to undo the damage your minister is determined to do.

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, the overdramatization of what's happening in this House, if it wasn't so serious and if the misinformation wasn't so out to lunch, would actually be quite funny. But it is so out to lunch and so inflammatory and not honest. Let's remember what conservatives are saying about climate leadership and the work we're taking.

Dr. Starke: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Point of order noted.

Ms Hoffman: Again Jim Dinning: "The legislation is offering sensible ecofiscal policy for Alberta." We're moving forward in a sensible manner, and we should conduct ourselves accordingly in the House.

Speaker's Ruling Decorum

The Speaker: Hon. members, we have very few hours left, we hope, in this time together, but please be conscious of the tone of the conversation in this room, in the exchange that's taking place. It's not helpful to the meaningful discussion and debate, and I would ask all sides to have respect for the institution.

The Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Electricity Power Purchase Agreements

Dr. Swann: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Well, in one short year this government has proposed massive changes to energy and electricity in Alberta. Despite repeated questioning, the details of what, how, and the economic impacts that we'll have have been vague at best. Albertans deserve to know the options, and they deserve to know the impacts on their cost of living. For example, consumers are now bearing the risk and subsidizing the cost of the power purchase agreements. To the Energy minister: now that all the power purchase agreements have been returned to the Balancing Pool, why will she not at least return the high-cost power purchase agreements to their owners, which would be best for consumers?

The Speaker: The Minister of Energy.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you for the question. First of all, I need to be clear. These PPAs were not handed back because of the increase to the SGER. These PPAs were unprofitable, and the issue is that the power companies believed in what previous governments agreed to. They believed that they had signed contracts that send profits to them and losses to Albertans. We are taking necessary steps to protect the ratepayers. We're initiating an appropriate proceeding shortly, and all the facts will be before the public as the issues are adjudicated. This is no small issue, and we are being very . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Dr. Swann: Once again, Mr. Speaker, the question wasn't answered.

With extremely low-cost electricity, what level of financial subsidy will the government provide to incentivize new renewable energy projects?

2:10

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you for the question. Mr. Speaker, we've tasked the AESO to consult with industry experts to recommend a program that will bring on renewable generation, keep costs low, and ensure the reliability of our electricity system. We have received that report and are reviewing the recommendations that the AESO has put forward to us. We will have a system in place to bring renewables online, with our first auction this year. We are pleased that 138 companies participated in the first round of the AESO consultation, and we're excited that companies are interested in doing business in Alberta.

Dr. Swann: That certainly remains to be seen, Mr. Speaker.

Given that uncertainty is exactly what Albertans and businesses don't need, why won't the minister transfer risk back to the power purchase agreement owners and allow them to make the business decision about whether to operate or decommission the coal plants?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. When I have more to say, I will be happy to update the hon. member and the rest of the Assembly. What I can say now, however, is that we will be taking the necessary steps to protect ratepayers. We will be initiating an appropriate proceeding shortly, and all the facts will be before the public as issues are adjudicated. Again, this is no small issue, and we are being very, very deliberate about how we proceed.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Fort McMurray Re-entry Health Concerns

Dr. Turner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As you know, the fire in Fort McMurray has raised many safety concerns. When wildfires burn homes and businesses, toxic chemicals can be released into the local environment. These toxins may be a health concern. To the Minister of Health: how can we assure residents of Fort McMurray that it's safe for them to return to their community?

The Speaker: The Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member for this important question. The re-entry timeline was built on the advice of experts, particularly the advice of our independent chief medical officer of health, Dr. Karen Grimsrud. Her recommendation is that it's safe for people not in the at-risk categories to return to Fort McMurray according to the phased re-entry, with the exception of Abasand, Beacon Hill, and Waterways, as long as people follow the proper precautions, outlined by Alberta Health Services. Certainly, we've conveyed that information to the individuals.

Thank you.

Dr. Turner: Mr. Speaker, given that the residents of Fort McMurray are anxious to return home and that air quality and water quality may become a health concern, to ensure that residents are safe, can the minister update residents on air and water quality?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. There's an app that we can all actually download on our phones. I've been doing it regularly and find it very helpful. It monitors the air quality and conveys that information to you from a variety of communities across Alberta. I'm pleased to report that this morning the air quality in Fort McMurray was a 2, which is really quite good, although it's important to note that there is smoke in the air today. This can cause some irritation in the lungs or eyes, but the air quality is quite good. A great deal of work has been done on the water treatment facilities as well, but a boil-water advisory does remain in effect until further notice.

Again, on the chief medical officer's advice people with medical conditions, including seniors and children under the age of seven, should not return right away . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
Second supplemental.

Dr. Turner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the returning residents may have health concerns or may need to access emergency health care after their return, again to the Minister of Health: how can you reassure residents that they will have access to health care during the re-entry?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, access to the urgent care facility is very important. Basic services at the hospital are up and running, and we have established an urgent care centre to complement the services being provided in the hospital itself. The health care team at the hospital includes doctors, nurses as well as a surgical team to handle any urgent, life-threatening conditions, and we're also ensuring that there are mental health supports in those facilities and throughout the community.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Airdrie.

Carbon Levy and Vulnerable Albertans

Mrs. Pitt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday my colleague from Little Bow asked pointed questions about the impact of the carbon tax on those who rely on supplements from the assured income for the severely handicapped, or AISH, program. Based on the non answers that were received, it sure does seem like the NDP government hasn't considered the unintended consequences of their carbon tax, so I will ask the question again. Will the minister commit to adding funds received from the carbon tax rebate to the fully exempt income list in the AISH policy manual?

The Speaker: The Minister of Human Services.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The answer is yes. These payments that they will get from rebates will be exempt.

Mrs. Pitt: Great news, Mr. Speaker. Thank you.

Those on AISH, though, are certainly not the only Albertans who have to worry about the unintended consequences of the carbon tax. Given that I am also worried for those Alberta seniors who rely on the guaranteed income supplement, or GIS, from the federal government and given that these seniors are provided a monthly nontaxable benefit based on annual income being below a maximum annual threshold, will the minister promise these seniors that he is working with his federal counterparts to ensure that an unintended consequence of the carbon tax will not be a loss of the GIS?

The Speaker: The minister of seniors.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. Certainly, we care very much about seniors, and we're making sure that they will not have any clawbacks, anything like that, regardless of their income going up because of federal changes. We've already moved forward on some of that new regulation to ensure that.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mrs. Pitt: Mr. Speaker, I could go all day long bringing up scenarios that the government hasn't thought of yet.

Given that we've already seen how little this government likes to consult and consider the impact their legislation and ideology – sorry: world view – will have, will the minister commit to cancelling their carbon tax until a full economic impact assessment has been completed?

The Speaker: The minister of the environment.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, there has been an economic impact assessment. It's called a six-month-long review process, chaired by University of Alberta business professor Dr. Andrew Leach and with a number of other very esteemed panelists. We have examined the effect of carbon pricing across the Alberta economy, and that is why a broad cross-section of economists support carbon pricing and what we are doing to reinvest those levy revenues. [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. members, I'm trying to think of something very positive and humorous, but it doesn't come to me. Please, let's try and be a little more cordial and keep the volume down.

Calgary-North West.

PDD Service Delivery

Ms Jansen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We have seen a pattern in question period of answers from the government that claim that whatever they're doing is okay because our government did it, too, or that we can't ask about a problem because we didn't fix it ourselves. It is the antithesis of leadership, and people are getting tired of it. So I will ask once again on behalf of the PDD community about the supports intensity scale. It is humiliating, it is wrong, and, yes, our government didn't fix it, but your government promised to do just that. To the Premier: will you get rid of SIS . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member. [interjection] Hon. member, if you would please keep confined to the time, and when I ask you to sit, if you would sit, I'd appreciate it. Thank you very much.

The Minister of Human Services.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our government believes that everyone deserves to live with dignity, safely, and with access to supports they need. As the member acknowledged, that's the issue created by that member's government. I didn't find anything on record when she was in government where she said anything about SIS, but having said that, I commit to reviewing all previous government policies, and SIS is no exception.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Ms Jansen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, it is exactly as I suggested, the same answer every time.

Given that in Alberta in the absence of any comprehensive information from our government the only way we can measure the effectiveness of the transformation plan is a wait-list for PDD services that is growing at a frightening rate, will the Minister of Human Services commit to an open and comprehensive review of the PDD system? A real answer, please.

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Member, for the question. I would like to remind all Albertans that the previous government was cutting $40 million from PDD, and we have added more money into the PDD. Since being in government, I have reviewed standard 8, I have reviewed contract alignment, and no policy of the previous government is an exception. We will review all policies in due course.

2:20

Ms Jansen: Mr. Speaker, given that our current Premier had previously suggested . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Ms Jansen: Mr. Speaker, given that our current Premier had previously suggested that our government was only keeping SIS to measure how much they could cut in that department, can we assume that the only reason you're keeping SIS right now is so that you can make cuts?

The Speaker: The Minister of Human Services.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I previously said, we have reversed the cut made by the previous government to this sector, and we are not keeping the SIS. We are reviewing that process. It's a huge undertaking; 11,000 clients have been put through by the previous government. In due course I will review the SIS. I am committed to reviewing the SIS and bringing in a policy that's more respectful in gauging the supports that people with developmental disabilities need.

Thank you.

Sage Grouse Protection Order

Mr. Barnes: Mr. Speaker, the provincial government dropped the ball on the sage grouse strategy, forcing Ottawa to implement a protection order in southern Alberta. The citizens in my riding care about the sage grouse and are good stewards of the land, but the order is creating havoc and standing in the way of sensible development. To the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry: as attempts by successive federal and provincial governments have been unsuccessful, will you empower my constituents to implement some locally driven solutions so that these restrictions on economic development can finally be lifted?

The Speaker: The minister of the environment.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for the important question. It is true that many landowners down in southeast Alberta have struggled with that federal protection order, and there have been struggles over time to recover that species. There's no question about it. So we are committed to working with private landowners, to working with grazing lease holders on how we can improve that system. I would be happy to meet with those constituents, maybe over the summer, in southeast Alberta to see if we can work together with the federal government to solve the problem.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Barnes: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the NDP government claims to be all about diversifying our economy and given that tourism is an important part of the economy at the Elkwater resort in the Cypress Hills, can the Minister of Culture and Tourism please explain the impact the sage grouse protection order is having on recreational opportunities in the Cypress Hills?

The Speaker: The minister of the environment.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and, you know, thank you to the hon. member for the question. It's a good question. I will happily meet with his constituents on this matter and see if we can speak with one voice to the federal government on this and ensure that we are moving forward in a way that recovers that particular species and in a way that ensures good stewardship of the land from private landowners and, of course, the grazing lease holders in the area.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Barnes: Thank you. Given that highway 61 is on the tentative three-year highway construction plan for widening and overlay of 15 kilometres east and west of Etzikom but that the other 30 to 35 kilometres of widening and overlay heading east to Orion and Manyberries are left untouched and given that the road condition is decaying with truck and bus traffic, to the Minister of Transportation: is the federal sage grouse protection order preventing highway 61 from being repaired?

Mr. Mason: Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Foothills.

Education Property Tax in Calgary

Mr. Panda: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The current government hiked property taxes for Calgarians when they increased the Education budget and left the property tax formula unchanged. There is no doubt that education funding is important, but increased property taxes will hurt Calgary. They're already facing job losses, increased personal taxes, and the looming threat of a carbon tax. Why did the government choose to increase taxes and make things worse for Calgarians instead of finding funds for education through savings elsewhere?

The Speaker: The Minister of Finance.

Mr. Ceci: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We were clear that the Education budget is increasing by 2 per cent plus enrolment. That was our commitment, and we followed through on that. We use the same formula for the education property taxes that's been used since 2013, which is that 32 per cent of funding for education comes from education property tax. For some context, in the past, 20 years ago, it was 51 per cent, so it's gone rapidly down over that time period. The formula for distributing this education tax between municipalities has not changed. The amount of money, the provincial mill rate for education . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Mr. Panda: Given that Calgary has been able to cut costs for homeowners without reducing services or raiding reserve funds and since it's clearly possible to reduce costs by being financially prudent without what the government likes to call massive cuts, why does this government think it is impossible to lower costs through efficiencies while protecting front-line jobs when municipalities like Calgary are obviously able to do it?

Mr. Ceci: We are lowering the cost of government. This year we're at about 2 per cent growth in that, so the operational spending is lower than population plus inflation growth, far lower than the previous government's 4.6 per cent. We are keeping the mill rate down. This year it's $2.48 per $1,000. Last year it was $2.50. We understand there's some frustration, of course, from municipalities, in Calgary in particular, but we have a $10.4 billion deficit, and we can't meet all the needs that everybody has. We are going forward with a plan to increase spending on capital.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
Second supplemental.

Mr. Panda: Thank you. The hon. minister used to be a municipal leader, so if Calgary can do it, the government of Alberta can do it.

Given that we have asked the government time and again to reduce costs while preserving front-line jobs and services and given that we have provided the government with 10 different ways to do that, when will the Finance minister take our suggestions to lower costs and help Albertans instead of racking up debt, introducing taxes they didn't campaign on, and hurting Albertans?

Mr. Ceci: You know, going back to what we're doing to assist municipalities, a number of things, including work on the MGA – we are working with them on that – on linear assessments, and potentially on MSI. So municipalities have us working with them as a government across many platforms, and they will see a stronger, more predictable funding cycle going forward with this government.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Bail Process Review

Mr. Ellis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On Monday I asked the Justice minister three questions about implementing the Alberta bail review recommendations. The review arose, of course, out of the terrible tragedy in St. Albert that saw an offender out on bail shoot and kill RCMP Constable Wynn and injure Auxiliary Constable Derek Bond. I did not receive even one answer to any of my three questions, so I'm just going to ask again. To the Justice minister: when are you going to implement the recommendations?

The Speaker: The Minister of Justice and Solicitor General.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question yet again. Apparently, no matter how many times I say it, the member can't understand that things like improving the justice system and educating our employees are ongoing things that will not be finished at some point. We will not at some point have educated every Crown prosecutor or every police officer because those people are still being born.

2:30

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I suggest the minister and I move beyond our elementary debate about the simplicity of section 524, but given that what is not in question is that the review includes numerous recommendations about better use of section 524 and given that one recommendation is that prosecutors always consider seeking bail revocation when an accused on bail allegedly commits an indictable offence, again to the minister: how are you going to ensure prosecutors always consider bail revocation for alleged repeat offenders?

The Speaker: The Minister of Justice.

Ms Ganley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the hon. member for the question. Perhaps he can listen to the answer this time. Section 524 is part of our Crown education, which, again, is ongoing. We have sent instructions to all Crown prosecutors to always consider the use of section 524, and we continue to provide ongoing education on this. So that's how.

Thank you.

Mr. Ellis: It wasn't so hard to answer that question.

Given that recommendations 1 and 3 of the bail review report recommend using prosecutors for all bail hearings and given that the federal Crown has already acted on these recommendations by ensuring its prosecutors are available for all bail hearings, yet nothing has occurred provincially, again to the minister: what are you waiting for?

Ms Ganley: Again to the member: this is a complex and complicated issue. It impacts many of our stakeholders, which means that we're going to go out and we're going to have conversations with those stakeholders. We have already struck a working group between the Crown prosecution service and police services throughout the province to discuss this issue and to figure out what works best going forward. I outlined in the press release originally, you know, a detailed plan of which things we had moved on already, which things we were moving forward on, which things we needed to work with stakeholders on, and which things were not in our purview. I might suggest that the hon. member give it a read.

The Speaker: Hon. members, I want to draw your attention to again be cautious. Maybe just a reminder to all of you of Standing Order 23(j), to be conscious of that phrase "of a nature likely to create disorder." I encourage you all to think about what that might mean.

Fort McMurray Economic Recovery

Mr. Carson: Mr. Speaker, the cleanup and rebuilding of Fort McMurray is no doubt going to be a long process. Luckily, the people who live and work in Fort McMurray are extremely qualified and are in the best position to ensure this work gets done. To the Minister of Economic Development and Trade: what opportunities do Fort McMurray residents have to participate in rebuilding their city?

The Speaker: The Minister of Economic Development and Trade.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I'll thank the member for the opportunity to update the House on the incredible work Fort McMurray residents are doing to rebuild their city. Residents of Fort McMurray are leading the process of contracting for recovery and cleanup, and they have done an excellent job in ensuring that local employers are being used whenever possible. Both the province and the municipality will continue to give preference to local companies – that's local workers, local businesses – whenever possible, and we are also strongly encouraging private companies who award contracts to do the same.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Carson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that businesses in Fort McMurray were already struggling from the prolonged collapse of the price of oil and given that the fire and evacuation have only made things more difficult for these businesses, again to the same minister: what supports will be available for these businesses as the recovery efforts progress?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I'll thank the member for the important question. In addition to preference being given to Fort McMurray businesses during recovery and cleanup, we're launching a small-business support centre in partnership with the regional municipality of Wood Buffalo. The small-business centre will provide small and medium-sized businesses with a one-stop shop to help get the support they need to get their businesses back up and running as soon as possible. We'll continue to work in partnership with the regional municipality, the chamber of commerce, the economic development, their local construction associations, and small and medium-sized businesses.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Carson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that some businesses may have been lost in the fire and that these employees will be looking for work and given that we need to make this process as easy as possible for local residents, again to the Minister of Economic Development and Trade: what support is available to local residents and businesses as they return to work?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Bilous: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I'll thank the member again for the question. The sooner people can get back into their homes and complete any needed cleaning and inspections, the sooner they can get back to their jobs and businesses. There is a range of supports available through the information centres in Fort McMurray to help make this happen. There are over 700 insurance adjusters and staff on the ground in Fort McMurray and more on the way to help process business and residential claims as quickly as possible. These are just some of the initiatives that we've begun to undertake, but we commit to working with the regional municipality and all partners in Wood Buffalo.

Thank you.

Carbon Levy and Education Costs

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, over the past few weeks I've been hearing concerns from school boards all across my riding about the carbon tax and what it will mean for the operation of their schools. School boards are worried about the combined effect of increased heating costs and the cost of fuel for school buses. To the Minister of Education: will schools be expected to reduce other programs and extracurricular activities to cover the cost of the increased utility prices that you are forcing on them?

The Speaker: The Minister of Education.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you very much for the question. Certainly, I've been working very closely with school boards to ensure that we get the maximum effect of the carbon levy and to make sure that they understand that it's a way by which you can increase efficiency as well. It's a call to look at your systems, be it through transportation or heating and so forth, and increase that efficiency. We will make investments to help them increase that efficiency. What a great lesson opportunity for kids, and what a great way to ultimately save money for schools.

Mr. Nixon: It sounds like you're going to be building a lot of new schools.

Given that some school boards in my riding are forecasting seeing an increase of over a quarter million dollars in operating expenses over the next two years and given that these increased expenses will come directly from higher natural gas and electricity prices and since Albertans are already struggling to cope with an economic downturn, will this government commit to conducting an economic impact assessment of the carbon tax before downloading these costs onto our schools?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, over these next few months we will be working very closely with schools boards. I'm meeting with them over the next few days as well to talk on these and other issues. They recognize the educational component of this, which is very important. It's a good place, a good ground zero to start turning our economy, diversifying our economy, and reducing our carbon footprint. Who wants that more than anybody else? The children of our province. There are mechanisms by which we can do that. I think in the end we are doing the right thing.

Mr. Nixon: Given that Alberta's winters are some of the harshest our country has to offer and given that our schools already have high-efficiency boilers, furnaces, and programmable thermostats to reduce natural gas consumption and given that students and teachers need a comfortable classroom to both teach and to learn, again to the minister: the NDP speaks about finding efficiencies, but what are schools supposed to do to mitigate the added cost of the carbon tax that this NDP government is forcing on them?

Mr. Eggen: Well, you know, it's very interesting language, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, we are working together with school boards in regard to a strategy which includes education for the kids, for families, for school boards, and for communities as well. It's a question of taking an opportunity here to learn more about how we diversify our economy, increase jobs, realize efficiencies, and ultimately do something for the kids who are actually in those schools in the first place.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Wapiti.

Agricultural Environmental Practices

Mr. Drysdale: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This government likes to pretend they are the white knight and say that they're the only ones who ever have tried to decrease carbon emissions in Alberta and that nothing was done before they were the government, which is not true. Ag producers have continuously been reducing their carbon footprint through advanced technology such as zero till and increased production per acre. Does any minister – ag, environment, or economic development – know what the ag industry has done to reduce their carbon footprint?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, our fall process of engagement included engagement with the agricultural sector, and that engagement is ongoing as we find ways to ensure that we've got an efficiency program that fits with Alberta's particular agricultural output and particular agricultural mix. I've had many meetings myself with grazing leaseholders, with the Alberta Beef Producers, with the irrigation districts, and with many others on this matter of their greenhouse gas emissions reduction record so far. We know that we are going to move forward in partnership with that sector to ensure that we are all achieving our outcomes together.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Drysdale: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday the development minister said that nothing had been done before.

Given that Alberta was the first place in North America to place a price on carbon and given that the climate change and emissions management fund has done great work to reduce carbon in Alberta since 2009 and given that agriculture absorbs more carbon than it produces, to the minister: do you know that agriculture in Alberta is actually a carbon sink?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, it's a good question. It's a thoughtful question because we've had these conversations about carbon sequestration and about the excellent practices that do prevail in our agricultural sector. However, we know that we can do more. We have some energy-intensive production that also happens within Alberta. We're going to work with those sectors to reduce their emissions and therefore their costs as we move forward and make sure that we reinvest all of that carbon levy within this province to diversify the economy and create good jobs.

The Speaker: Second supplemental

Mr. Drysdale: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that we agree that climate change is real and that humans have an effect on the climate and given that we have done more to actually reduce carbon than this government's carbon tax will do, to the minister: why does this government insist on punishing ag producers with extra tax when they have done way more to reduce carbon in Alberta than this government's carbon tax will do?

The Speaker: Madam Minister.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, we recognize that there has been some good work done in the past, and we're going to make sure that we build upon that work and ensure that we reinvest the carbon levy within various aspects of the Alberta economy, including agriculture. We look forward to working in partnership with various aspects of the agricultural producers in order to ensure that we're making the right efficiency investments, that we're partnering with folks on renewables as well, which is a very exciting part of this package, and ensuring that we're investing in innovation and technology as well.

The Speaker: Hon. members, it may well be that some of you would like to leave the room. We have 30 seconds, and we will continue with Members' Statements.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie.

Louise Dean School Program for Teenaged Fathers

Mr. Malkinson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to share about the Louise Dean school, which I recently had the privilege of visiting. The Louise Dean school is not a typical school. It provides a supportive environment for new and expecting teen mothers to continue their education while at the same time learning many skills they will need as young mothers.

In the ongoing effort to support teen mothers, we often overlook a significant factor in their situation, teen fathers. Bringing teen fathers into the discussion and taking them in and supporting them as well as mothers is hugely important. Study after study has shown that children attain greater success when they come from a supportive environment where both parents are present. They are less likely to end up in poverty. They are less likely to be caught up in addictions. They are less likely to end up in the justice system.

As we've increased the supports available to teen mothers, we have seen a marked improvement in measurable outcomes, yet at the same time we have too often let down the fathers. They have often been stereotyped and pigeonholed as deadbeats, called uncaring or not wanting to be there for their kids, all the while ignoring that these are young people, still teenagers, and in most cases not even entitled to vote for the members in this room.

What we need are programs and services to support them in making better choices and finding success. Government needs to support this happening. An ounce of prevention is always more valuable than a pound of solution. That is why on March 24 I joined the Minister of Human Services and the Minister of Status of Women to help address this very issue. I was honoured to be involved in the event where, together with the Louise Dean school and Catholic Family Service, our government took concrete steps to help address this gap in the care of Albertans: helping fathers.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to recognize the dedicated team at the Louise Dean school for working to improve the lives of young people in this province. Thank you for all the work that you do. Thank you, Louise Dean.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Drayton Valley-Devon Job Losses

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was talking to an upset constituent, Perry May,* the other day, and he wants this government to know:

I think with the direction the NDP is heading in, Alberta is headed for an economic disaster. Companies in Drayton Valley have moved out, shut down, and laid off people. A lot of people are not working, some for a long time. Some are on unemployment; some people do not qualify for unemployment. Housing prices have dropped a lot. I have renters that are behind in their rent and are facing eviction with little kids. We have been slow all winter with my company, and in March my company had one job for 12 hours. I built a multimillion-dollar company with no debt, and I think it is not worth being in business in Alberta anymore.

Since my discussion with him I've seen business after business close down in my constituency. Just last week the cogeneration power plant, that ran on wood chips from the Weyerhaeuser mill, in Drayton Valley was shut down, throwing many people out of work and creating a problem for the Weyerhaeuser mill that before Christmas was wondering what it was going to do with all of the wood chips if the cogeneration plant shut down. Of course, many jobs will be lost due to the early phase-out of coal at the Genesee power plant. A former student has had to seek employment in British Columbia, and another gentleman I bumped into at Pigeon Lake said that he had to find work in Yellowknife.

*This spelling could not be verified at the time of publication.

To be fair, some of the lost jobs are the result of low oil prices, but many are also the result of the policies of this government. Whatever the reason, it is cold comfort to the people that have lost their jobs in my constituency. While this government promises jobs, my constituents seem to simply be losing theirs.

It is imperative that this Legislature carefully consider the consequences on the economy of legislation like the carbon tax. The decisions made in this House are not without consequence, and every time we raise taxes and borrow billions of dollars and see business capital driven out of our province, these actions have real consequences to real people like my constituents of Drayton Valley-Devon.

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: Proceed, Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake.

Mr. MacIntyre: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have here three letters that I would like to table. Two of them I referred to yesterday. These are the letters from Red Deer Catholic regional schools and also Chinook's Edge school division, where they outline the significant impact that the carbon tax is going to have on classroom educational environment and the reduction in staffing.

The Speaker: The Associate Minister of Health.

Ms Payne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to table the requisite number of copies of the government's draft regulations for medical assistance in dying, which were released yesterday in response to the opposition's request for more information on the debate on Motion 17.

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-Shaw.

Mr. Sucha: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to table five copies of an article referenced today in question period on behalf of the Deputy Premier. The article titled Alberta Takes the Lead with Carbon Pricing Policy just happens to be authored by three individuals, including former PC Finance minister Jim Dinning, who is also the former MLA for the gorgeous constituency of Calgary-Shaw.

2:50

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-Hays.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I made reference today in my question to a report from the University of Alberta, Investigation of Fine Particulate Matter Characteristics and Sources in Edmonton, showing that coal is a minimal source of Edmonton's air pollution. I have five copies.

The Speaker: Hon. members, I'm pleased to rise and table five copies of a letter received in my office on May 31 from hon. Barry House, MLC, president of the Legislative Council, and the Hon. Michael Sutherland, MLA, Speaker of the Legislative Assembly of Parliament in Western Australia, expressing their sympathy to the people of Alberta on the devastation caused by the recent fires in Fort McMurray. As I introduce this to table, I think with pride as we as Albertans – the world has been watching us. There are 300 South Africans that are helping our province as I speak.

The Member for Banff-Cochrane.

Mr. Westhead: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I've got five copies of the World Bank's 2015 annual report titled Carbon Finance for Sustainable Development, where the World Bank president argues that a price on carbon is one of the best ways to reduce pollution, “improve people's health, and provide governments with a pool of funds to drive investment in a cleaner future and to protect” vulnerable individuals.

Tablings to the Clerk

The Clerk: I wish to advise the Assembly that the following document was deposited with the office of the Clerk. On behalf of the hon. Mr. Sabir, Minister of Human Services, response to WQ 1 asked for by Mr. Cooper on May 2, 2016: How many adoptions of children up to the age of 18 years were finalized in each of the fiscal years from 2008-09 to 2014-15 and from April 1, 2015, to December 31, 2015, and of those, how many were children in permanent care of the government prior to being adopted?

The Speaker: I believe, hon. members, there were some points of order made today. The first point of order was, I believe, by Calgary-Foothills.

Point of Order Language Creating Disorder

Mr. Panda: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm just referring to Standing Order 23(i). When the minister was responding in question period today, like, she has been calling us out as climate deniers and has been quite regularly calling us – me and my caucus colleagues here have been subjected to that every day in this House. I brought it up to you a few times. Yesterday, unfortunately, the minister was not in the House ... [interjections]

Mr. Cooper: You can't refer to her absence.

Mr. Panda: No. I'm saying ...

An Hon. Member: You can't refer to her absence. Apologize.

Mr. Panda: I didn't mean that.

The Speaker: Hon. member, to the chair, please.

Mr. Panda: Yeah. I'm sorry.

What I meant to say is that when I spoke about Bill 20 yesterday, the bill that this very minister is piloting, I put myself on record. You don't need the Blues for that, Mr. Speaker, because you sat in that very chair and heard me saying this. For the benefit of this honourable, wonderful minister I'm going to read this again. I said, “My party said in the last election, climate change needs actions and solutions.” Then I went on to say, “Before the members opposite attempt to get themselves into hot water with a point of order, I would like to say that I believe in climate change. I believe in climate change. It is real, it is happening, and it is affecting the entire world.” This is what I said. I repeated it a few times.

I also said that I wanted to clear the air here. If I am being assaulted verbally and insulted verbally in this House every time she speaks up, I said that I will raise this point of order. That's the reason I raised this. I'm referencing, too, 23(i) which “imputes false or unavowed motives to another Member.” So, Mr. Speaker, I brought it up. I don't know. How do I protect my own rights and privileges in this House if I am constantly – constantly – being assaulted?

I studied science. I believe in science. I worked in an industry for 30 years which has world-class monitoring of the environment. I now depend on myself, and I never drained public dollars to make a living. I am a proud Albertan who believes in science and climate.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Mr. Panda: I don't want to be subjected one more time to this abusive language.

The Speaker: Hon. member, I think I have the essence of your argument.

The hon. Minister of Environment and Parks.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This is a disagreement over facts. Certainly, when many members of the Official Opposition caucus share information on the Internet that calls into question the science of climate change and outright denies that the science exists, including claiming that climate change is a hoax, there's a good basis for that assertion of fact. Those statements have been made by Cypress-Medicine Hat, Strathmore-Brooks, Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo, Innisfail-Sylvan Lake, Drumheller-Stettler. Many members have shared such information.

The Speaker: Are there any other members who would like to speak to the matter?

The House leader for the Official Opposition.

Mr. Cooper: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to thank my hon. colleague for raising his first point of order in the House. I think what we saw is a passionate member of this House who's tired of having words that aren't true shared about him.

I would just like to highlight. He indicated 23(i), and I would just like to add to the debate today 23(j), using "insulting language of a nature likely to create disorder." It's very clear that this type of language, whether it's deemed parliamentary, unparliamentary, or not, creates disorder in this House every single time it is used. The hon. member has stated his position. He has clearly laid out the facts on this issue. Every time that he is insulted in this House by the language used by the environment minister, it's going to create disorder. I think it seems very reasonable that the member have the respect that he and all members of this House deserve in not having this type of language that's creating disorder in the Chamber or imputing his motives.

The Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Mason: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I guess I would make a couple comments. First of all, I think there's some clear evidence that some of the members, not all and certainly not including that member – I take at face value his statement that he believes in the science of climate change and believes that it is human caused, and I believe that some members opposite do believe that. I also do believe, as I think does the environment minister and most of our side, that there are some in the Official Opposition that are very doubtful about the scientific view of climate change as being caused by human activity. I think that that is a reasonable and fair statement to make in the context of the political debate that's now taking place. Furthermore, I believe that it is a matter of opinion or a difference of opinion between members as well.

3:00

In terms of the Official Opposition House Leader's second point, that it is language that is likely to create disorder, Mr. Speaker, we've seen lots of disorder on that side and not always provoked by anything said on this side. Often someone is simply trying to answer a question. To argue now that the disorder is caused by the statements made by the minister, I think, is perhaps a bit rich. I think that all of us have a responsibility to try and control the passions that give us our reason for being here when from time to time we enter into some serious disagreement in the House. I think that the best form of restraint is self-restraint. I would suggest that hon. members on the other side should remember that.

The Speaker: Hon. members, I believe that the matter that is being addressed in the House today is, as I see from the Blues, the statement that says:

We have an Official Opposition that likes to deny the science of climate change. Apparently, we have a third party that also likes to reject the science of pollution and health effects of coal-fired electricity, which are well known.

On the point raised by the Member for Calgary-Foothills, first of all, I recall the statements that were made by yourself and noted them before. Certainly, under subsection (i): I don't believe that applied because there was no specific reference to a member.

However, I have ruled, I think, at least once or twice with respect to the climate change matter. If I've learned anything in this House, it's that making decisions such as this is with respect to the context and timing of the way comments are made. If we truly do, as the Government House Leader suggested, have self-restraint, I think in this instance, while I may not rule that there is an official point of order, to the minister of the environment, I think that you need to appreciate the point made by the other members. I would caution you on future use of that particular word, please. It clearly does on occasion create disorder, and I would ask that in the future you be more conscious of when and how it is used.

With that, I would hear the second point of order.

Point of Order Parliamentary Language

Dr. Starke: Well, Mr. Speaker, if I'm not mistaken, I believe the second point of order raised today was by myself at the time of approximately 2 o'clock.

The Speaker: Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster, please proceed.

Dr. Starke: Well, Mr. Speaker, as I was saying, at approximately 2 o'clock, during an exchange between the hon. Member for Calgary-Hays, the leader of our caucus, and the hon. Deputy Premier and Minister of Health – the Minister of Health and I have been waiting, and I've been scanning the Blues, but unfortunately that particular time period has not yet been put on the Blues. I've been waiting for it. But I do know that the Health minister used the phrase "not honest." Now, I've been waiting for the Blues to determine whether that was made in reference to something that the hon. member said or whether she was referring directly to the hon. member. But it really matters not whether it was referring to something that he said or whether it was referring to him personally.

Imputations of dishonesty are perhaps the most frequently found in the long list of unparliamentary language which starts on page 142 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules & Forms and does not conclude for some eight pages further. Certainly, anything suggesting dishonesty by a member is perhaps the most serious use of unparliamentary language in our House. Furthermore, on page 618 of Canadian parliamentary rules and practices, under Unparliamentary Language one of the first things that it talks about is the suggestion of dishonesty by an hon. member.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I understand – and I think that I'll very quickly have another opportunity to speak to this – that at times in the House we have very heated debates, but the suggestion of a lack of honesty on the part of another hon. member, either in what he or she says or, in fact, in what he or she is, is in fact the most egregious form of unparliamentary language that we have in this place, and I would ask the Deputy Premier, the Minister of Health, to withdraw the comment and apologize to the hon. member.

The Speaker: The Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Health minister was expressing nothing more than a difference of opinion. It was in no way meant as a reflection on the hon. Member. It's just that, a difference of opinion, which, of course, is part of this House's tradition of healthy debate, and that was nothing more than a healthy debate. I hear the hon. member's comments and, you know, take them to heart. Actually, I have a lot of respect for this member for his knowledge of parliamentary tradition, but I do believe that at this time he is wrong and that it was nothing more than a difference of opinion and should be treated as such.

Thank you.

Dr. Starke: Mr. Speaker, if I could just add to that. I'm actually shocked that the hon. Deputy Government House Leader . . .

The Speaker: Hon. member, if you could wait. Opposition House Leader, were you wishing to speak to this?

Dr. Starke: Okay. I'll cede the floor.

Mr. Cooper: Why, thank you, Mr. Speaker and my colleague. I am surprised that we've arrived here. From time to time we see people make errors in the words that they choose to use here, particularly when referring specifically to another member in the Chamber and their honesty. There are numerous cases that we could cite on honesty. Oftentimes as temperatures rise inside the Chamber, the best path forward and the most appropriate path forward is to withdraw comments and apologize.

Now, from time to time we will have a matter of debate, and two versions of the facts can exist, and politics can break out, but what we ought not have in this Chamber is an environment where we call each other or individuals inside this Chamber dishonest or not being honest. So it is disappointing. We certainly could have moved on from this. I hope that the Deputy Premier will be able to be present tomorrow to correct this problem because if, in fact, that is what has happened today, it is not appropriate and not becoming of any member of this Chamber to imply that another member is dishonest.

Mr. Mason: Mr. Speaker, I don't know if the Blues are present yet, but may I ask: who or what was the term "dishonest" directed to? Was it directed to a member or a statement?

Dr. Starke: Mr. Speaker, again, I have been waiting on the Blues and scanning them. The term was not "dishonest." It was "not honest."

3:10

The Speaker: I do not have the advantage of the Blues – none of us do – nor did I hear the exchange because there was too much noise in the room at the time, so I didn't have an opportunity to hear what, in fact, took place. I'm having difficulty making a decision not knowing what the facts are. I think on this point, much to my chagrin, I will need to defer until I do see the Blues.

I think there was another point of order raised by the hon. Minister of Human Services.

Point of Order Insulting Language

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I must start by saying that it's with profound disappointment that I have to rise on this point of order. I will refer you to 23(j), abusive and insulting language.

During question period the hon. Member for Calgary-North West asked me a question, and to the best of my ability I answered it. During that answer the hon. Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster made a comment clearly directed at me, stating, quote, what a loser.

I said that it's disappointing. Ever since I've been in this House the member in question is one of those members whose debate, whose knowledge on different procedural matters, whose articulate arguments on different matters I really look forward to, and I try to learn from those things. Hearing those comments from the member, who is among the most, I guess, experienced members in this House, is really not only against all kind of parliamentary language procedures, against this section, but it's personally offensive to me as well.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Dr. Starke: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments on behalf of the hon. Minister of Human Services. While it is true in Canadian parliamentary rules and procedures that if either the Speaker did not hear the term or if the term does not appear in the Hansard debate records, then there can be no ruling on it.

I will save both you and the hon. member – I think this is a good example of how sometimes in the House things can become heated. I will tell the hon. member that I apologize for the comment that was made. I in no way wish to offend him, and I wish to withdraw the comment although it probably won't show up in the record anyway. But I do apologize.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Orders of the Day Government Motions

Medical Assistance in Dying

17. Ms Payne moved:
Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to implement measures to regulate medical assistance in dying consistent with the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Carter versus Canada (Attorney General) and any legislative measures approved by the Parliament of Canada to ensure that Albertans can benefit from the orderly implementation of this court decision so that:
  - (a) Albertans may exercise their rights to access medical assistance in dying;
  - (b) appropriate safeguards be put in place to protect vulnerable Albertans;
  - (c) conscience rights are respected while ensuring the right of patients to access this service;
  - (d) the practice of medical assistance in dying is closely monitored and measures regulating medical assistance in dying are reviewed within one year.

[Adjourned debate May 31: Mr. Gill]

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Greenway.

Mr. Gill: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's an honour to stand today to speak to this government motion, to debate such an important issue. As echoed by many of the members in this House, my colleagues here today, it's unfortunate that we're rushing through this important debate. Not only are six hours too short for this fulsome debate, but I think these are the wrong six hours. First, in my humble opinion, as members we should have consulted with Albertans and then maybe given six hours to debate on this important issue.

I want to be clear: this Progressive Conservative caucus is not here debating the issue of medically assisted death. The Supreme Court has made this decision. It's the law of the land and has been decided for over a year now. This government knew this deadline was approaching. They knew it a long time ago, but they left it to the eleventh hour so that we don't have a chance to discuss it with Albertans. That's pretty sad.

Nonetheless, our responsibility here this afternoon, in the time we have been given, is to debate a basic set of draft regulations to implement that decision in Alberta. Actually, our responsibility as legislators is more than to debate. It is to provide the government with the information it needs to build a first but functional set of regulations that enable patients who meet the Supreme Court criteria to be able to receive the medical services they need.

Our job as good legislators is to ensure that the regulations enable physician-assisted death for a competent adult person who

- (a) clearly consents to the termination of life, and
- (b) has a grievous and irremediable medical condition [including an illness, disease, or disability] that causes enduring suffering that is intolerable to the individual in the circumstances of his or her condition; that the regulations enable doctors to perform the required services in Alberta; that the regulations enable and protect doctors to act in accordance with their professional and personal obligations; and that the regulations protect, most importantly, vulnerable Albertans. What we're not here to do right now is to develop or acquire a full set of regulations that cover every conceivable circumstance under which a patient might seek medically assisted death.

This is new ground in Canada. It's new ground for us as Albertans to request physician-assisted death. We will learn what it means as family members, as physicians, as legislators to experience, perform, and regulate this important medical service. It will only be from actual experience in Alberta and in other jurisdictions that we will have the knowledge to develop a full set of regulations, practices, and safeguards about how to enable and deliver this service effectively and responsibly. Let us receive the guidance and expertise of medical experts, ethicists, and stakeholders. As we take this journey together, let us not use uncertainty about the future as an excuse to not comply with the Supreme Court ruling.

I have been an MLA for only a few months, but I am learning that it's an honourable job. It comes with an honour and a duty. A duty is to do the right thing, to be the voice for people who don't have a voice. An honour is to be morally responsible. I'm here to say to members that we have two moral responsibilities today, right now. One is to speak on behalf of Albertans, which many members have carried out by asking to pump the brakes on something of such incredible importance instead of trying to rush through something that will have such a drastic impact on the lives of Albertans. The other responsibility is to those people who are truly without a voice, to those Albertans who are suffering, making it difficult to live and enjoy a decent quality of life each day, let alone track down a busy MLA's and minister's schedule to share their views on such an important topic.

I'm proud of the robust debates we've had during this session as members. Debate on the environment, debate on the carbon tax – and we all remember the debate on Bill 6 – debate on a record deficit in our budget, and the debate on payday lending: issues that impact the lives of Albertans on a daily basis. They all received adequate debate. However, this topic, in our opinion, is more important than all of those topics. This is the most important thing in the universe – it's human life we're talking about – and we're getting six hours?

I'm proud to represent my constituents in this House by pointing out that many people in Calgary-Greenway were left out of the survey, despite the government's best efforts, due to language barriers, cultural barriers, barriers with technology, and even barriers with the way that the concept of death is framed in one of the most diverse ridings in Alberta. While medically assisted death impacts all walks of life, the majority of it impacts our seniors, who don't have iPads or online and tech-savvy knowledge. They don't plug into, like, online surveys and portals. We must ensure that we get their feedback and their comments on this issue.

As proud as I am to represent my constituents here, I am even more proud to be able to help reduce the suffering of Albertans. This is a privilege usually reserved for physicians in their treatment of illness. It is rare for that privilege and responsibility to be extended to us. We must exercise that responsibility with sound judgment and good intent.

Fellow members of the House, I urge you today – I urge you – to, yes, consider the objections, questions, concerns that you and your caucuses have received from your constituents and do your best to represent those concerns. Take every day this summer to consult if you want to. But let us also remember to represent those Albertans in our constituencies who don't want to suffer one more summer, those Albertans who have been waiting for us, or some government, to act to let them enjoy the right that the highest court in our land has affirmed for them, the right to end their own suffering.

Those Albertans who are most affected by this decision will never be the majority of our constituents, but those Albertans are the ones who need us most to represent their views, so let's listen to them. Although their individual circumstances are different, as legislators we can remove a common barrier for the clearest cases first, while we work out fair and just mechanisms to address the concerns brought up by other members of this House.

In summary, I'm just going to say that this topic means a lot to Albertans. This needs to be consulted on with all of the stakeholders: the seniors, the doctors, the physicians, the families. Six hours on this debate? It's embarrassing. Please, give it another thought, consult with our constituencies, and maybe we can visit this topic in the next session.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Under 29(2)(a), hon member.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It would be interesting for me to hear a little bit more about why you really believe that six hours is too short of a time.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Gill: Thank you, and thank you, hon. member. The reason why I said six hours is too short is because, you know, we haven't consulted with anybody. We have not consulted anybody. I mean, an online survey of – I don't know – a few thousand people . . .

Mr. Rodney: Less than 1 per cent of the Alberta population.

Mr. Gill: Yes.

. . . out of a population of over 4 million Albertans: I'm not a mathematician by any means, but that's not a passing mark. We need to consult with Albertans.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Any other questions under 29(2)(a) for the Member for Calgary-Greenway?

Anyone else who would like to speak to Motion 17? The Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to speak to Government Motion 17. I believe that as a Legislative Assembly the citizens of Alberta through us may never speak on a more important issue than the one we are addressing today. In this motion are two important questions: how best should this Legislature address the issue of physician-assisted death, and how can we best implement physician-assisted death in Alberta? Both are important questions.

Physician-assisted death is about ending a person's life, and there is no more important issue that could come before this Legislature than the state-sanctioned, state-supported ending of a human life. For that reason, anything less than allowing the people a full, democratic opportunity to address this issue through a bill put forth by the government in this Legislature is unacceptable. It is an abrogation of our responsibility as legislators to pass on this responsibility simply to Executive Council. We are charged with the duty to choose a path that will ensure that whatever decision we make on the implementation of physician-assisted death, it will represent the will of the majority of Albertans while respecting the rights of all Albertans.

I do not believe that any Executive Council should be given the power to draft regulations on the safeguards around physician-assisted death or conscience rights of physicians and medical institutions without a fulsome debate in this Legislature. That is what democracy is all about. Each of the provisions that are brought forward in this motion and each of the regulations so recently provided to this Legislature, only yesterday, deserve a robust discussion and consultation with the people of Alberta. Albertans will have to make a decision on just how citizens will exercise their right to access medical assistance in dying.

The Supreme Court has ruled that Canadians have a right to access physician-assisted death, but it did not answer whether the public health care system must provide it or whether taxpayers must pay for it. That is a provincial decision. This will be a decision that Albertans will need to make through this Legislature, and it would appear that this government has already made that decision for the people of Alberta through these regulations of Executive Council.

Albertans should have the right to debate and decide through their elected representatives in this Legislature whether or not they choose to spend scarce health care dollars on physician-assisted death. Instead, should those same scarce resources be put towards increasing the availability of palliative health care that would work to ensure a loving, dignified death rather than create a medical system intent on redefining health care in such a way as to include physician-assisted death?

Built into the preamble of this motion is a reference to Carter versus Canada. This preamble says that Executive Council will seek to bring consistency between the recent Supreme Court case and the Carter case. Bill C-14, put forward to address the Supreme Court decision, says that physician-assisted death could only be accessed by people who face a terminal illness and who are close to death, whereas the Carter case sought a much broader interpretation on who would be able to access physician-assisted death.

This government created a huge problem when it brought to the Members of this Legislative Assembly only yesterday the regulations that will be used to govern physician-assisted death. There is a wise pattern that should be followed by this House. A bill is put forward and debated. If passed, then regulations are written to carry out that legislation. This process ensures that both the legislation and the regulations represent the wishes of Albertans.

By proceeding straight to regulation, this Legislature will not have the opportunity to discuss the underlying issues and to come to a consensus on how physician-assisted death should be codified and then regulated. Albertans and various groups and societies that represent the vulnerable will never have the opportunity to come before a committee of the House to review the legislation and to make recommendations or to try to amend and make the legislation better.

This government, under the guise of a motion, has limited this debate on the breadth and the scope of who will be able to apply for physician-assisted death to simply six hours. This government has chosen a process that will limit the people's representatives to six hours and a process that has completely frozen out the people of Alberta to have any direct impact on physician-assisted death. This action is the equivalent of invoking closure after only six hours of discussion in this Legislature on a motion that will regulate the death of Albertans. I cannot find the words to express my level of dissatisfaction with this process and with the direction of the regulations put forward by this government.

These regulations are unsatisfactory in the extreme. For instance, regulation 2.1 states:

Before a regulated member provides a patient with medical assistance in dying, the regulated member must

- (a) be of the opinion that the patient . . .
  - iv. has a grievous and irremediable medical condition that causes enduring suffering that is intolerable to the patient in the circumstances of their condition and that cannot be relieved under conditions that the patient considers acceptable.

3:30

This does not bring consistency between the recent government case and the Carter case. This regulation completely ignores the narrow and restrictive approach to physician-assisted death being legislated at the federal level. It opens up the debate of whether physician-assisted death should be available to Albertans who are not simply terminally ill but also now for almost any mental condition. It opens the door to vulnerable Albertans suffering from depression, fear, and anxiety, all treatable medical conditions, as candidates for physician-assisted death.

As soon as you say "in the circumstances of their condition and that cannot be relieved under conditions that the patient considers acceptable," as soon as you say those words, you open the door to any Albertan suffering from a mental illness or phobia that concludes that life is no longer worth living. If you believe this is too extreme, then I would encourage you to educate yourself for there are individuals that have been euthanized in European nations that have adopted the very open set of regulations to govern euthanasia that are seeming to be happening here in Alberta. People that should be receiving help will now be able to choose physician-assisted death, and under these regulations there is no waiting period for those considering physician-assisted death.

I've had two family members in the past 10 years that have found themselves with what was diagnosed as cancer that was believed to be terminal that are alive today. Both went through the cycles of depression that accompany these kinds of struggles, and under these regulations both would have had the opportunity to apply for physician-assisted death. I will speak against this motion because it is my belief that this motion would have made it so much easier in their depression to have sought out physician-assisted death, and it is very possible that both of them would not be alive today had these regulations been in place when my family was struggling to cope with their illness.

Next, this motion highlights the need for appropriate safeguards to be put in place to protect vulnerable Albertans, yet it has torn down the walls that those safeguards could have provided Albertans. I am very concerned. There is evidence out of countries like Belgium, that have already adopted physician-assisted death, that the safeguards built in to protect vulnerable people there have not been sufficient to stop the deaths of innocent people who had not given their consent.

We have the chance to do this right. When we do not get this right, innocent people will die. The least that should occur is that these safeguards are vetted through a process that puts forth a bill before the Legislature and where these safeguards are reviewed by a legislative committee that will consult with stakeholder groups and everyday Albertans. When the Legislature arrives at a consensus on the appropriate legislation and it is passed, then regulations will be drawn up that will help to carry out that legislation. We must get this right. Too often the safeguards do not ensure that the clinically depressed and the old and the vulnerable are safe, where the safeguards are manipulated and ignored for a whole host of reasons.

In Alex Schadenberg's book Exposing Vulnerable People to Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide, using studies from Belgium, he concludes that in Belgium there is evidence that nurses are participating in euthanasia with or without explicit consent and that the demographic group that is dying without explicit consent tends to be those patients whose families want to get on with the death or where the patient is seen as a bed blocker.

I do not believe that the regulations, received only yesterday, will be able to keep vulnerable Albertans safe. Will these regulations have the consent of the majority of Albertans? We will not know because we have not used the proper legislative process that would allow us to consult with Albertans. Will these safeguards be viewed as reasonable and effective before they are placed into regulation? We will not know, nor with this motion are we being given the time to consult and find out. Consultation must occur. We must educate ourselves as a society and as a Legislature.

This motion and the regulations that have accompanied it do not go far enough in protecting the conscience rights of physicians, nor does it respect the rights of religious institutions that provide health services. Conscience rights is a hugely important issue for this Legislature to discuss. Personally, I do not know how any Albertan, government, or any professional college could be allowed to mandate that any doctor or nurse could by regulation, law, or professional duty be forced into either participating in or referring a patient to someone that would provide physician-assisted death. The right to freedom of conscience and how it should be applied and balanced with the right to death should not be decided by Executive Council alone through regulation, nor should the College of Physicians & Surgeons be able to force a doctor to participate in or be forced to refer to another professional a patient desiring physician-assisted death.

Regulation 3 outlined by the government states:

A regulated member who receives an inquiry from a patient with respect to medical assistance in dying must ensure that contact information for the Alberta Health Services care coordination service is provided to the patient, or to another person identified by the patient, without delay.

How can we even consider passing a motion that will enable a regulation like this? Many doctors across this province have made it very clear that they will not participate nor refer a patient to anything that would allow that patient to access physician-assisted death. Not only do I believe that position is reasonable under the Charter rights, but we have not even been allowed to consult with physicians to see what they would like. On a practical level this could throw whole communities into chaos. In a conversation with several physicians in my town they have said that they are personally unwilling to administer physician-assisted death and even to refer.

In passing this motion, we are willing to place physicians in a position where the only way that they can continue to practise is to leave Alberta. With rural towns already begging for doctors, on a simply practical level these regulations are about to throw our rural communities into crisis if these fine physicians decide to leave in order to preserve their conscience rights.

Our caucus has heard from palliative care facilities that the people that work in them will leave their calling if they are forced to introduce physician-assisted death into their facilities. In an already underaccessed part of our health care system, where only 30 per cent of Albertans have access to quality palliative care, are we really willing to support a motion that will leave dedicated doctors, nurses, and volunteers the only option of leaving their calling to palliative care in order to protect their conscience rights? This government has shown a complete lack of understanding on many issues regarding legislative process and respecting the will of Albertans. Now it is attacking physicians' conscience rights.

The actions of this government on this motion and the regulations that accompany it are out of line. This government needs to step back from this and reconsider this motion and the accompanying regulations so that due process and consideration are applied to physician-assisted death. Anything less, once again, sidesteps the democratic process.

I must conclude by saying this. Euthanasia and physician-assisted death are often a dangerous answer to the very real problem in society that we can call a lack of love. That may sound strange when you listen to the death with dignity arguments, but it is nonetheless true. Why do most people seek physician-assisted death? It's not because of pain. Pain specialists tell us that 97 per cent of pain can be controlled. Talk to physicians that specialize in pain or palliative care, and they will tell you that people seek physician-assisted death not out of pain or the fear of losing control or a lack of personal autonomy but because they fear becoming a burden to loved ones. Yet when people have access to proper palliative care and when they have the appropriate psychosocial counselling and when they know that they are loved, it is then that they choose life until natural death. It is surrounded by love and with the appropriate palliative care that they choose to die naturally, surrounded by the ones that they love.

Love, not this motion, not these regulations, not physician-assisted death, is the answer. Love, it is said, heals all wounds, and I can testify on that issue. Love finds the resources for palliative care. Love supports life. Love does not force the health system and physicians who up to now have preserved life to become physicians who administer death.

It is for all of these reasons that I must and will heartily vote against this motion.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Under 29(2)(a) for the Member for Drayton Valley-Devon?

The hon. Member for Calgary-Hays.

Mr. McIver: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today on Government Motion 17. I'm going to open by talking for a couple of minutes about what this isn't because I think that's as important as what this is. What this is not is this Legislative Assembly making a decision on physician-assisted death. That's been done, and I think it's important to make that clear. That was done a year ago by the Supreme Court of Canada, and at that point the Supreme Court of Canada served notice to Canada's national government that they had a full year, till June 6 of this year, to put in rules around physician-assisted death or it would be done for them. So we're not talking about whether we agree with physician-assisted death because we have no authority over that. That is done.

Nonetheless, Mr. Speaker, this is a watershed moment in Canadian history. While I'm not a big fan of the courts making law, I think what's often true, not always true but often true, is that when the courts end up making a law because of a dispute that gets to the Supreme Court of Canada, very often those decisions change the course of history in Canada and change things permanently that may not have been changed if those decisions were made through any type of political process with any type of government with any Legislature, including the Parliament in Ottawa.

This is important, as my colleagues that have risen have said, because it is life and death, and it can never be taken lightly and never should be. This is exactly where, unfortunately, my unhappiness with the government's actions really reaches a peak. Knowing for a year that this was coming, the government dropped this motion on the table yesterday, seven days – seven days – before physician-assisted death would become the law of the land, two days before the scheduled end of the Legislative Assembly. I couldn't think of anything less disrespectful that this government could offer up to the citizens of Alberta than to leave on the table a life-and-death issue that they've known about for a year without bringing it forward till this late, late date. Incredibly disrespectful to Albertans.

Now, when we asked – and we did ask – to the government's credit we got some of the potential draft regulations around it. Here's the problem. These regulations should have been out in public circulation six months ago, Mr. Speaker, because regardless of what they decided in Ottawa on how to do it, the fact is that the court was going to make this happen. This should have been out for all 87 members of this House to discuss with our constituents months ago, probably six months ago. While this isn't the final word on it, looking at the proposed text for directive from Alberta Health Services – I'll read some of it to you because it's relevant. "Pursuant to section 8 of the Regional Health Authorities Act, I" – and it names the minister, but I can't say the minister's name in the House – "Minister of Health and Minister of Seniors, direct as follows." That minister hasn't been the Minister of Seniors since Groundhog Day, since February 2, four months ago. I'll be looking for an explanation from the government.

If indeed the government and the cabinet had these draft regulations in their hands four months ago, why the heck didn't Albertans have them in their hands? Why didn't Albertans have four months to talk to their Members of the Legislative Assembly to say: "I don't like this. I do like that. This is really important; thanks for including it. Have you thought of this? This could cause an unnecessary death or unnecessary pain for someone who is qualified." Disgraceful. Disgraceful. I can't imagine, Mr. Speaker, anything more arrogant than a government who inflicts upon Albertans the conditions under which they or a loved one of theirs might receive physician-assisted death with two days to discuss it in the House, seven days for all Albertans to really discuss it, and most of that after the House has recessed. Disgraceful, disgusting, disingenuous, political manipulation. I know that's a terrible thing I just said, but I believe it. To have something like this and drop it on the table at the last day without any chance for Albertans to give their opinion on a life-and-death matter is probably the worst and lowest form of political manipulation that I've seen. Terrible. Absolutely terrible.

Mr. Speaker, you can't excuse that. You cannot excuse that. I know the folks in Ottawa have been – you know what? They left it to the last minute. But that is not an excuse for our province. That is not an excuse for our government, who knew this was coming. This was not a surprise. They had a full year. In fact, it would seem, by the documents, that at least four months ago the government had drafts of potential regulations in hand. Even if a minister stands up later and says, "Well, this was done last week, and that's a typo," that's still not an excuse.

They should have had something in hand six months ago. They should have shared it with Albertans. This should have been a nonpartisan, Albertan discussion about our future. No matter what political party you belong to, and if you don't belong to a political party, no matter what religion you belong to, and if you don't belong to a religion, no matter where you come from in the world, no matter what your sexual orientation is, no matter what your nationality is, no matter where you were born, it's personal. When someone in your life is considering their options at death, it gets personal, which is why I am so very offended by the fact that the government left this to the last minute when they knew it was coming. They knew it was coming.

You know what? Unfortunately, it's indicative of the government's attitude that "we know better than Albertans," consistent throughout the entire time they've been in government. "We know better. Do it our way. You don't need to know any of the facts. There, there, little Albertans. We'll just pat Albertans on the head because we know better." Albertans know better. They always have, and they always will, and they surely know better about the things they're thinking about during the end of life for a loved one.

Mr. Speaker, I could not be more offended, and the saddest thing about this is that it's too late to fix it. If the government did something really rare for this government and admitted they were wrong – and I don't know if they will or not – even if they did, it's too late. It's law in six days from now. It's done. It's over. You blew it. There's no coming back from this one. There's other legislation that they've made mistakes on that they could come back from by talking to the public. There's not time to have a province-wide, decent debate.

I know I heard the minister today talk about: 15,000 people answered the survey. Well, good. They might have gotten that little bit right.

Mr. Rodney: Less than 1 per cent of the population.

Mr. McIver: That's less than 1 per cent of the population, but that is about what they'd like to see.

But in terms of the draft regulations: zero Albertans. Well, maybe the ones on the government side, but outside of this House zero Albertans were consulted on what the regulations are. Zero. On a life-and-death matter, zero Albertans outside of the political process were shown the regulations. Zero. Zilch. Nada. None. On a life-and-death issue. This isn't whether we're going to paint the house blue or red. This is about life-and-death decisions about our loved ones. This is about the pressure that medical staff are going to be under to do or not do these procedures. This is about the incredible pressure that families will be under, and with all of that, this government says: "We know better than them. We know better than the doctors and the nurses and the other staff in the medical facilities. We know better than the families and the loved ones. We know better than Albertans because we have the power, and we're wielding it, bless our hearts, to put these regulations in place,” with zero time for a decent discussion.
