The first one, of course, which the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud spoke about, was this $600 million tax increase. I've got to say, it's kind of surprising, the chutzpah of the Premier, who literally made his career railing against what he called an insidious and pernicious tax grab, a sneaky tax grab. There's no way he didn't realize what he was doing. Certainly, there was no way he missed the part in the very long-winded platform, that I'm pretty sure he had a fair amount of input into, where they said: no new taxes. He understands – again, I'm not trying to attract 23(h), (i), and (j) here; I'm just using the Premier's language – the nature of the insidious . . .

Ms Phillips: Invidious.

Ms Notley: Invidious. Oh, sorry.

... invidious, pernicious, sneaky tax increase that is embedded in this budget and in Bill 20, wherein Albertans pay another $600 million over the course of four years. You add that up to the cost of the removal of their cap on electricity, and we're already at a cool billion that we've asked regular Albertans to pony up on over the course of the next four years. But wait; there is more, but that's not necessarily entirely covered in this bill, so I'll just talk about the $600 million.

What I will say – and really this goes to trust. Now, I think that people should endeavour to be as straightforward and up front with voters as they can possibly be. You know, it's hard. I get that when you get into government, you are suddenly overwhelmed. You talk about drinking – oh, what is the phrase?

Ms Phillips: From a firehose.

Ms Notley: A firehose.

... from a firehose when you get elected to government. You just have so much stuff that comes at you, so much complexity, so much import. So it's hard sometimes to completely stick with your promises that you made when you ran in an election.

But my view is that when you present yourself to an electorate – in this case, the people of Alberta – you should do so with the utmost honesty and do everything you can to be as honest and as up front as possible. For instance, back in 2015 we did two things on that front. The first one: many people will remember that we put out a platform, and in it we had a budget. It turned out that we had miscalculated. Now, not everybody would have noticed that. In fact, it's very possible that no one would have noticed that. But I remember thinking: no; there is no way that we are going to try to pull a fast one on the people of Alberta. So we came out the next day and we said: "You know what? Sorry; we made a mistake." That's what I think Albertans are owed when they go to the task of casting a ballot.

The other thing we talked about in that election was that we said, "Hey, we're going into tough times" – we knew we were going into tough times – "so some people are going to have to pay more because that's the way we come together when you're going into tough times." We said that corporations needed to go from 10 per cent to 12 per cent, and we said that we were going to get rid of the flat tax and make high-income earners pay a little bit more, and that's exactly what we did. Just to be clear, even having done that, we still enjoyed an $11 billion tax advantage over not the national average but just over the next lowest taxed province, adjusted for population. So I think we were okay.

Now, the reason I raise that, of course, is because the Premier has dedicated his whole life to being an antitax person. All he can do is go on about how taxes are bad, and all he could say in the last election was to talk about how taxes of any type are bad. That's all he ever said, Mr. Speaker, yet in his first budget, what does he do? He introduces a $600 million tax grab onto every taxpaying Albertan in the province. I don't know about you, but that sounds to me like a fundamental breach of trust with the people of this province.

I agree that there probably does need to be more taxes paid – I would argue, about $4.7 billion more taxes paid – in this province. But the point is that you can't run on one thing and do the opposite. That's what this is. On pure principle of supporting a broken promise, I can't do that. We can't vote for this because the members opposite were not honest with the people of Alberta when they last ran, in the spring election.

Now, the second thing that is embedded in this piece of legislation is the cancellation of the film industry credit, the AITC, the capital tax credit, the scientific research and experimental development tax credit, the tuition tax credit, the education tax credit, and the community economic development corporation tax credit. All of these were elements of the plans that we had put in place to diversify Alberta's economy away from being solely reliant on oil and gas. Of course, Mr. Speaker, this is something that people in this province have talked about for decades, but we'd never moved on it. All of these strategies were geared towards focusing on incenting certain types of diversification and economic development and growth.

You know, Mr. Speaker, I know that the members opposite love to quote a couple of different economists to argue that their $4.7 billion corporate handout is going to be the magical elixir from which many new jobs will suddenly appear in the province of Alberta. But I would argue just from an economic point of view – I mean, at least one of those economists developed their projections on the basis of national numbers, not Alberta's numbers, so essentially their economic modelling was incorrect. The other one, you know, also tends to pair his positions with respect to corporate tax cuts with an equivalent increase to a sales tax and an ongoing call for a sales tax. Somehow these folks have just managed to pick and choose the models.

I would argue that either way it's an outdated model because to the extent that anyone believes that an open-ended corporate tax cut is the way to incent economic development, the fact of the matter is that that is only the case when you are moving from a highly taxed scenario to a very low-tax scenario. As I've already outlined, that's not the situation that we were in. That also, you know, assumes that we have just this clean sort of model with no other factors in place. We're not dealing with the fact that many other jurisdictions are competing with us in a whole bunch of other ways, that we are actually playing on an international level, and that quite frankly our efforts to diversify our economy need to be far more sophisticated and far more thoughtful. As a result, this broad-based corporate tax cut is unlikely to be successful. Indeed, where we've seen it experimented with in other jurisdictions in the world, particularly south of the border, it has proven to be an utter failure.

I'd like to just read a few quotes from folks on the issue of the broad-based $4.7 billion corporate handout to already profitable corporations, most of whom are leaving the province, versus some of the targeted strategies that we had in place which are now being eliminated by Bill 20.

James Keirstead, president and CEO of Levven Electronics, criticized the UCP government for its plan to cancel targeted tax incentives like the Alberta Investor Tax Credit, choosing instead to reduce corporate income taxes.

'This is going back to the old way of doing things as opposed to targeted programs that can drive diversification,' Keirstead said. 'A broad-based tax decrease doesn't help drive the economy. It's really nearsighted.'

And get this:

'I can't believe I'm saying this but I kind of agreed more with the way the NDP were doing things... and I'm a staunch Conservative.'

That's what he had to say about this government's $4.7 billion risky corporate handout.

Keith Warner is in the digital media space.

'It was a bitter pill for me to swallow,' said Keith Warner, whose video-game studio, New World North, opened earlier this year and now employs 26 people, with other positions still unfilled.

'I'll be honest, I was pretty upset.'

Mr. Warner said he set up shop in Calgary over Toronto after being enticed by the province's tax incentives, as well as the affordable housing market and proximity to his company's headquarters in Colorado. Now, none of the provincial funding is available.

And then,

'I am absolutely 100 per cent questioning our decision . . . I would've made a different choice . . . I feel beat up on this one,' is essentially where he ends that.

Now, as far as the film industry credit, we have Emily Andras. She says:

I grew up in Calgary, now live in Toronto. I created a TV show, #WynonnaEarp, & chose to bring it BACK to Alberta to film (now in our 4th season). I am creating new series & also hope to make them with the best crews in Canada, #ABFilm. I can't if #ABPoli's disastrous cuts stand.

Finally, Bryan de Lottinville on the provincial budget.

'As one of the larger software companies in Alberta, we were disappointed by aspects of the Alberta budget, particularly as it relates to the need to support the burgeoning tech sector in this province,' de Lottinville told BetaKit. 'Both the removal of some of the tech-friendly tax incentives, and the comments of the finance minister to the effect that diversifying revenues is a "long term luxury" reflect, at best, a bit of short-sightedness and, at worst, willful blindness.'

That's what some folks have to say about the cuts that are embedded in this bill. They will not succeed in driving the kind of diversification that we need in this province. They will certainly – certainly – help shareholders who live in other parts of the country. But, really, how does that help our economy?

If you're talking about a 5 per cent rollback, if you take $5,000 out of the pocket of a nurse who lives in Camrose, then – guess what? – the people who have businesses in Camrose are going to find that that nurse has $5,000 less to spend in that community. Now, if you turn around and give that $5,000 to a shareholder with EnCana, as we just have done, that shareholder, likely living somewhere in Manhattan – let's face it; people who own shares in major companies like that do not tend to be, you know, Joe and Jane Average Person – that person could go out and buy themselves a lovely $5,000 purse, probably somewhere in Manhattan. That is great for the $5,000 purse industry in Manhattan; it is not so great for the small-business owners who needed that nurse in Camrose to spend her money in their businesses. I mean, that's a whole other element to this handout to wealthy corporations who have literally no obligation to demonstrate any loyalty to the province of Alberta and the businesses there.

What else was cut through this bill? Well, we see, of course, that this is the one that cuts the tuition tax credit. Again, that is something that is worth thousands of dollars a year to Alberta families, regular Alberta families who were counting on that credit to either help them pay for their kids' university or, alternatively, to help those kids themselves pay off their student loans once they finished borrowing money to get themselves through university, once again a direct hit at either the incentive or the support for people who invest in getting a postsecondary education so that they can be the people who are our greatest resource, that younger, better educated population than anywhere else in the country. That's our greatest resource, and that's who we are targeting through the efforts here in Bill 20.

What else are we doing here? Well, the minister talked about the merging of a number of different funds: the cancer fund, $450 million; the lottery fund, $50 million; the environmental enhancement fund, $150 million. All this money is being wrapped up and moved into general revenue. Now, the minister had made a lovely compelling argument for why that might make sense: oh, it's easier to administer, and we can save $13 million.

But I can only go to the quotes and the comments made by the members opposite about their view of the sanctity of commitments around how money within general revenue will be spent. Back when we had the carbon tax, we actually had it established by way of legislation, that made it very clear in that legislation that you could not spend it on anything that was not related to reducing emissions unless it was one of the exceptions; i.e., the rebate or the small-business tax cut. We said that, but they said: oh, my gosh, no; the general revenue fund is the equivalent of a slush fund; you can't . . .

Mr. Jason Nixon: It is.

Ms Notley: Oh. He says right now: it is; it's a slush fund. You should actually listen to what your Finance minister just said. He just said: well, some people accuse us of moving the lottery fund into a slush fund, but don't they understand it's general revenue? You folks should talk.

Anyhow, the fact of the matter is – yes, I will address you, Mr. Speaker; thank you for that reminder – that I know that general revenue is general revenue, but some of the folks over there, including the House leader, seem to believe that general revenue is a slush fund. Therefore, you can certainly understand – and, indeed, he just once again confirmed his belief that general revenue is a slush fund – why people who are very concerned about what would happen to the proceeds of the $450 million cancer fund or the people who are concerned about what would happen to the proceeds of the $50 million lottery fund, which supports community groups, nonprofit groups, charities throughout our province, why they might be a little nervous about these funds being released into general revenue, which, notwithstanding the lovely assurances of our Finance minister, appear to be perceived by other rather influential members of cabinet as the equivalent of a slush fund.

So people are worried. People are looking for answers. People are looking for guarantees. I certainly hope that when it comes to considering amendments to this legislation, in order to protect the sleep of those worried Albertans and to have them not worry about the statements made by the House leader, in fact the Finance minister will consider amendments we would put forward outlining restrictions on how those funds could be used within the general revenue fund.

The final thing I want to talk about, of course, is the extensive broken promises that have been made, delivered primarily by the Premier but certainly by anybody within the UCP caucus who campaigned under the platform that was released in the last provincial election. That platform said that the UCP supported the city charter. That platform committed that the UCP would fund what was inside the city charter. That platform suggested that they would support the green line and the west LRT. Now embedded in this bill we have a promise to break the city charter. We have a promise to reduce the funding that was part of the city charter legislation that we had put in place. We have a new regime that will ensure less certainty going forward for those municipalities.

All of these things are the exact opposite of what you can find in the UCP platform. I did have the page number of the platform somewhere. I don't have it with me now, but I'm sure my colleagues will do their best to remind the members opposite exactly where they need to be looking for the contradiction between what they told Albertans in the last election and what they are doing now. I mean, there's a lot of them; I get you. It's pretty much like reading the whole document. Nonetheless, we'll certainly try to find that particular page number.

Ms Phillips: It's 77.

Ms Notley: Page 77, the Member for Lethbridge-West tells me. Thank you very much for that.

Page 77 is where the members opposite committed to the people of Alberta, including the 70 per cent of Albertans who live in Edmonton and Calgary – is it 70 or maybe 60; I can't remember, whichever, the majority of Albertans who live in Edmonton or Calgary – where they said that they would respect the city charter and that they would fund the terms that had already been agreed on. Now they're going ahead to rip up the city charter and to not fund the terms that have been agreed on. That is there, and that is a broken promise. So, obviously, in the interests of integrity we couldn't possibly support that.

The other thing, though, is that the Premier and others, but specifically the Premier, promised Albertans that he would fund the green line and that he would fund the west LRT and that he supported those projects. Now what we see is this clause that allows them to back out of the deals on both of those projects with 90 days' notice and no other conditions necessary. Contrary to what the Transportation minister has been attempting to tell Albertans, those are not standard clauses. The reason they are not standard clauses is that if you put them in there, there would be an uncertainty premium of probably 50 per cent for anybody that wanted to actually sit down at a table and try to negotiate anything bordering on an honest agreement with the members opposite because they couldn't be counted on to be at the other side of the table for more than 90 days at any given time. That level of uncertainty means that any kind of contract becomes subject to a massive uncertainty clause.

It also means, therefore, with the level of uncertainty that has been injected into both of these projects by way of the 90-day clause, that the green line is very unlikely to go forward. The members opposite will try and say, "Oh, that's a decision of the city of Calgary," but that's patently false, Mr. Speaker. It is a function of a broken promise made by the members opposite. They promised the green line. They are now kiboshing the green line. They are responsible for it. They need to be accountable to Albertans for that decision.

Most recently we have heard from the mayor of Edmonton that they are concerned that now the west LRT is also in jeopardy because of the uncertainty that has been put in place with respect to this 90-day clause. It was interesting because originally, you know, I had heard from people at the city of Edmonton that even with the change to the city charter and the delay or the pause or the reprofiling or whatever word they want to use as opposed to "cut" that was put in place, the city of Edmonton thought they could still make the west LRT work. Then they discovered this 90-day clause, and they suddenly thought, their officials suddenly said: oh, now we are really not so sure because the uncertainty is just too much.

This is, effectively, a poison pill that these folks are injecting into the legislation for the sole purpose of killing these projects. I obviously think that is bad because I think public transportation is good for a multiplicity of reasons. I also think it's bad because it's what these folks promised Albertans in the last election, and now they're not doing it. I just think that with the level of cynicism that they are breeding in Alberta as a result of the disparity between the principles and the platform upon which they ran and the actual laws that they are bringing into effect now, it's just a sad day for our democracy, Mr. Speaker. That's a whole other reason why it's disappointing and why we obviously can't support it.

You know, as I said with respect to Bill 21, I suspect there are also a number of other very significant challenges embedded within Bill 20, but these are the ones that strike me as being the most critical and the most challenging for us as a caucus to even begin trying to support this. We will endeavour to make amendments that will minimize the damage that is contained within Bill 20, but I don't know if we can. I mean, we really are seeing some significant challenges being imposed upon municipalities, imposed upon innovators and entrepreneurs and those who wish to engage in significant diversification of our economy. We are seeing significant limits being imposed upon those who raise money for cancer research concerns, imposed upon those who raise money for a multiplicity of other charity groups. We're seeing, of course, as well, challenges being imposed on anybody who wants to get anywhere near a postsecondary institution. Then, finally, we are seeing a $600 million tax increase collectively on every taxpayer in Alberta.

These are things, of course, that are all being done in order to finance this ridiculous $4.7 billion handout, which we know is only making wealthy shareholders, most of whom reside outside of the province, richer while Albertans are being asked to make significant, significant sacrifices. That is the outcome. We're not making any more progress of any significant nature with respect to reducing the debt. We're certainly not making any progress with respect to reducing the deficit; quite the opposite. What we are doing is making life harder for Albertans and really undermining the hope that they would have for a more modern, forward-looking, diversified future and one within which we support important infrastructure projects that will attract additional investment and ensure a better quality of life for Albertans across this province.

This is a very, very poorly thought-out bill, just as the budget is a poorly thought-out budget, and, just as I said with respect to Bill 21, it reflects a series of choices that certainly do not reflect the values of people in our NDP opposition caucus and, I would argue, absolutely do not reflect the values of the majority of Albertans. That the members opposite attempt to crow about the outcome of the last election: really, there is so much divergence between what we see here and what we saw in the UCP platform, that, you know, if they want to go out and show us more polling, then have at 'er, but there's no way anyone could reasonably make the argument that the election was an endorsement of what we see here in bills 20 or 21 because this is a complete one-eighty on so many positions that were taken by this UCP government in the last election.

We will continue to stand up for those Albertans who believe that everyone should pay their fair share to help us all get through these tough times and that if people have a little bit more, they should do their share and that the most vulnerable Albertans are not the ones who should pay the freight for the most wealthy and that all of us need to come together if we are actually going to do that thing that Albertans do so well, which is demonstrate entrepreneurial spirit, dedication, determination, discipline, and the energy that we have shown for so many years in the past to lead the country's economy and what we need to do going forward to lead the country's economy combined with a modern approach to diversifying the economy while supporting everybody within our province.

Appreciate very much, Mr. Speaker, the opportunity to speak to this bill, and I look forward to the opportunity to engage in discussion of amendments that hopefully can make it a little bit more reflective of who we actually are as a province.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. The hon. Government House Leader has the call.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you for the opportunity to rise on 29(2)(a) to speak to the hon. member's comments. The hon. member, the only Premier who ever oversaw a one-term government in the history of this province, when you listen to her comments today, you recognize that she still hasn't realized the great mistakes that she made when she was the Premier and, in fact, the impact that those mistakes had on the people that I represent and, frankly, on the people that she represents. There is so much to unpack in what she said that I may even have to rise after the 29(2)(a) to talk about this bill myself, to talk about some of the things that she said. But I want to talk about a couple of quick examples and then ask the hon. member some questions.

The first is that she refers to our platform, specifically to page 80, in regard to this commitment: maintain key infrastructure commitments in the province's capital plan, such as LRT extensions in Calgary and Edmonton. That's exactly what the hon. the Finance minister and this government have done inside this budget, exactly that. Another promise made; another promise kept.

Mr. Speaker, it does not matter how much the former Premier of that one-term government stands up in this House and how much her party attempts to mislead Albertans about the facts, it doesn't make it true.

The hon. member glosses over, while she is using her record to compare to this bill that we're debating today, about some major things that the hon. the Finance minister is attempting to fix with this piece of legislation and with the budget, that the Premier is working tirelessly on to be able to fix, which, quite frankly – not quite frankly; it is the mess that that hon. member created when she was the Premier of Alberta. She wants to talk about broken promises or misleading Albertans. The largest misleading of Albertans that I have heard of in my time in politics is when that hon. member never told them that she was going to bring in the largest tax increase in the history of this province. She never told them about the carbon tax. You want to talk about misleading Albertans?

My mom called that something very different. I can't say it in here because it would be unparliamentary, Mr. Speaker, but I'm happy to go and do it outside of the Chamber any time, because that was misleading Albertans. That's that hon. member's legacy, who then went on her way to add to that legacy while she was Premier and do some pretty shocking things, if you ask me.

Under her supervision as the Premier of this province, she pushed $50 billion in investment out of this province then sat in this Chamber right here in the seat that is now right beside me, as the Premier of Alberta, and laughed at my constituents often in that seat. She did not care what happened to places like Rocky Mountain House or Drayton Valley under her watch. She didn't even bother to go there, Mr. Speaker, and recognize that those communities were dying under her watch, and did not bother to even take the time to come and talk to them. Over 180,000 jobs were lost under that hon. member's watch, and she wants to get up and talk about broken promises, Mr. Speaker.

How about this? That hon. member led a cheering party outside of this very building and spiked the football and told this Chamber and Albertans that she got two pipelines built under her watch. She didn't get two pipelines built under this watch. That hon. member has lost all credibility when it comes to this issue. I'm shocked that she continues to even be able to try to come here with a straight face and in any way try to defend her record, Mr. Speaker, because her record, in my view, is shameful, the way that she has treated this province.

How about some comments? This was very relevant to the budget because it fits with the direction that that hon. member was taking the province, and she wants to compare it to our budget. How about telling my constituents to take the bus? How about telling my constituents that they were Chicken Little, Mr. Speaker? How about telling the seniors inside my communities that they should hold fundraisers to pay their carbon tax? How about, while these galleries were full, people from all over rural Alberta who were being victimized by criminals, and that hon. member, while I sat in the seat that she's sitting in and asked her a question while she was Premier, laughed at them even while they were in the Chamber. You can come and see it on my Facebook page if you like. The tape is up.

Ms Sweet: Point of order.

The Acting Speaker: A point of order has been raised. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Point of Order

Allegations against a Member

Ms Sweet: Standing Order 23(h), (i), and (j): trying to cause disruption in the House, leading motives that – I need my book – trying to impute false motives to a member. Also, relevancy around how this relates to comments or questions in relation to the bill itself, not necessarily directly to the member.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: A couple of things, Mr. Speaker. First of all, we're dealing with a matter of debate. Second, however, it is a fact; you can go check the Facebook pages. The video of that dialogue between the hon. member and myself is public record, so it is on Hansard. And, third, it is relevant to this bill because that hon. member brought up her record in the context of this piece of legislation, Mr. Speaker, and that's the question that I am discussing with her. That hon. member brought it up in the context of this piece of legislation, and clearly the point of order is just an attempt to stop me from calling her out on that behaviour.

The Acting Speaker: Hon. member, at this stage I do not find a point of order. It's my understanding, based on my recollection of what has been stated in the last few minutes, that it would be a matter of debate with regard to the facts.

At this stage there are about 35 more seconds with regard to your comments. I would say that if you could please try to direct it back towards the bill, though I do understand that at this stage we are also just commenting on those comments. Those comments are directly related to the previous comments that were made on the general debate. If the hon. member could please continue.

Debate Continued

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, my simple point was that this was my question to the hon. member: how she can stand inside this place with a straight face and talk about this piece of legislation after she treated Albertans like that. Instead of continuing to do that when it comes to legislation like this, when's that hon. member going to stand up and apologize to Alberta for what she did to it? It's a simple question.

The Acting Speaker: With 15 seconds left on 29(2)(a), seeing none, are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill? I see the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West has risen.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise of course to speak to Bill 20, the Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, 2019, which is a very large piece of legislation designed to bring effect to many of the policy prescriptions that we see contained within the fiscal plan and within the government's overall budget. This budget, of course, will make a number of changes to a number of different programs and so on on the grounds that we are better able, then, to balance our budget and take action on debt.

Of course, the specific programmatic changes this budget will bring in will have great effect on a number of people. Certainly, when we were making budgets, we felt that way, too, and that's why we did things such as lift 40,000 children out of poverty. It appears that through measures such as those contained within Bill 20 and its associated legislation, those 40,000 children will be going back into poverty, Mr. Speaker.

Now, the reasoning behind this bill and behind a number of the choices that are made in this budget such as to reintroduce very high levels of child poverty, for example, is, of course, the debt and associated issues such as the deficit. Now, the Minister of Finance indicates that some different calculation method may result in a lower level of debt. Mr. Speaker, all I can really go by is what's in the budget papers, which is $93.3 billion. If the Minister of Finance would like to amend his budget papers, he should do so before November 19. Otherwise, I'm going to go with what's in front of me, which is $93.3 billion in debt, certainly, and a budget deficit that is $2 billion higher.

I'm quite certain that none of the people who sent us here, on either side of the House, would have expected, given all of the discussion of debt and deficit and taxes, for that matter, that three things would be so obvious in this budget: one, that the debt within the forecast period is within 3 per cent of the New Democrats'; two, that the budget deficit would be $2 billion higher; and three, that every single person would be paying more personal income tax, which is, of course, one of the measures contained within this bill that we are deliberating upon today.

I find it curious that we are raising taxes for every single person, that every single person will be effectively paying more in personal income tax and/or losing income to cost-of-living changes, whichever way you want to look at it. I have described this previously as a piece of budget trickery. However, after a couple of years, when each family is looking at approximately $300 more in personal income tax, it will not feel so trivial at that time. I find it curious that this measure is contained within Bill 20 and contained within the government's fiscal plans given that it is such a brazen measure to raise people's income taxes. I guess there is a certain amount of hubris that is guiding the decision-making.

Certainly, Saskatchewan undertook this initiative at the same time as they did other very cold-hearted things like applying a PST to children's clothing. They took away the funerals for people on social assistance. A number of other very unpopular measures in Budget 2017 Saskatchewan undertook, and they got away with it. They deindexed personal income tax.

I can only assume that this government looked east and went: okay; well, I guess we can just reach into people's pockets and grab 600 million bucks and claim that we're tax cutters, in the same way that we're going to borrow an extra $2 billion and claim we're better on the deficit when we're not, in the same way that we're going to have $93.3 billion at the end of the forecast period, which is within 3 per cent of the New Democrats but claim that we are such, you know, I guess, highly disciplined fiscal hawks. Anyway, the fact of the matter is that everyone will be paying more personal income tax at the end of this forecast period.

Now, I often think about the people who sent me here. Certainly, none of them expected to be paying more income tax because definitely nobody ran on that. But, you know, the folks who sent me here – Lethbridge is really known for two segments of population, seniors and students. Within seniors we have – many pension incomes are indexed to inflation. Certainly, the parliamentary pension is one of these pensions. People, for example, who spent 19 years in Parliament and who are in line for a six-figure pension in the coming months will have that pension indexed to inflation, as the hon. Premier is, for example. His pension, which is probably – I don't think it would be an exaggeration to describe the Canadian parliamentary pension as one of the most generous pension plans in the country. That six-figure pension that that hon. member will be receiving within the coming months is indexed to inflation. Many smaller, more modest private-sector and public-sector pensions are also indexed to inflation.

As seniors receive their CPP, their public or private defined benefit or even some that have defined contribution plans as well, but definitely if they have a defined benefit pension – those are indexed to inflation, but the personal income tax will not be, so seniors will see their effective income reduced as a result of Bill 20, the Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, 2019.

Students, too, or their families will see their effective income reduced through the elimination of the tuition and education amounts tax credits. Many students or their parents rely on these tax credits, in some ways to offset the high cost of postsecondary education. At no point did the members opposite campaign on this matter. If they did on either thing, it would have been noticed in Lethbridge-West, but there was no mention of any of these things. Certainly, the tuition and education amounts would have also been noticed by a number of parents in Calgary who send their kids to university at the University of Lethbridge.

I'm looking through this act, and there are a number of tax credits that have been rescinded as well and a number where there have been different changes made to them. I'm going to leave aside the other diversification tax credits although I believe them to be meritorious public policy, and I also believe – mark my words – that some of them will be back. I think that the government is getting an earful on this. There will come a time when they will have to take some of these measures in order to diversify the economy. Certainly, what they're doing right now isn't working as companies are fleeing this jurisdiction.

But the film and tax credit piece: there is a sort of as yet notional commitment to bring in a full film and tax credit situation as opposed to the production grant situation that we have now, which, I agree, in a small way, is not ideal to growing the kind of film industry that we want here in this province, and to really leverage our strength in terms of film and television productions. But I think what I would give the government is a piece of advice here, which is: hurry up and get it done. This is an important piece of diversification.

I know that in southern Alberta it has brought a tremendous amount of economic activity. I was talking to one of the new breweries in Fort Macleod the other night at an event. They had the Ghostbusters set in their microbrewery a couple of different times. Their bar was variously made into a Mexican restaurant, I think, and a store or something, but the amount of activity that that movie set generated for the town of Fort Macleod was considerable. I've had the pleasure to spend some time in the neighbourhood of High River where Heartland is also filmed. I know a few people on that set as well, Mr. Speaker. In its 10th going into 11th season, I believe, it is a tremendously popular show and could not be filmed anywhere else. I think that part is clear. The industry needs certainty.

If the government needs added impetus – I know they are very afraid of young people with political opinions and run around being very, very scared of them – my eight-year-old is a huge fan of Heartland and has pledged to become a one-man picket should that series be relocated or cancelled. You know, if you thought Greta Thunberg was scary, I will present to you my eight-year-old, who actually knows how government works. He even knows what a deputy minister is and will be seeking his meetings forthwith.

I think the last thing that I want to talk about, two things, on a much more serious note, Mr. Speaker – and that is this. The piece in here around the fiscal framework for municipalities is deeply troubling given that those commitments were made prior to the election and during. Many, many people rely on not just the infrastructure commitments but also the stable, predictable frameworks that the promise of the fiscal framework for the two large cities contained within it. I know that small municipalities were looking forward to finishing off similar arrangements. Now they don't feel like they can do that. That trust has been broken. That is a grave concern to those of us who rely on services in any of the smaller municipalities, of which there are many in this House. I don't believe that that trust will be easily regained.

Finally, on the matter of what we say we're going to do and then what we actually end up doing, you know, today we had more fines levied in the so-called kamikaze affair. We know of 15 people who have been fined a total of $207,000, which reflects a win-at-all-costs sort of mentality. Win for what? To raise personal income tax, as Bill 20 proposes that we do? Win for what? To run up a debt of $93.3 billion? To run a deficit $2 billion higher than the NDP's? Savage cuts to social services, to Children's Services, to AISH, to income support, to housing and homelessness? Win for what? That is the win-at-all-costs ethic that has imbued this House.

The members across the way are going to have to ask themselves why so much money changed hands – we found out through a judicial review that there were buckets, you know, bags of money, very tawdry – why the promises were broken that were contained within the platform. Why, at the end of the day? Was it to balance the budget? Well, that's not happening. Was it to take action on the debt? That's not happening either. Was it to raise personal income tax? I don't think so.

Mr. Speaker, I think that as we go back and discuss with our constituents – I know I will be talking to two groups of people, seniors and students, and many, many others who did not expect their income tax to go up, who did not expect the economy to stop diversifying, who did not expect instability with respect to funding of municipalities. They're going to have questions. They're going to have questions for a group of people who will do anything to win, clearly – $207,000 worth of fines – for a group of people who said one thing and then did another, for a group of people who raised their taxes and sold them a bill of goods on debt and deficit reduction, for a group of people who reintroduced a whole generation of children back into poverty. They're going to have to answer those questions.

With that, I think I'm going to move an amendment because it's clear that this needs to be debated more fulsomely. It's clear that none of these conversations were had during the election. I'm moving an amendment that . . .

The Acting Speaker: Just being conscious of the time, would it be all right if, in order to expedite things, we just passed this around? There are only 10 seconds left.

Ms Phillips: I'm happy to do that. Great suggestion.

The Acting Speaker: What I'll do, then, is that once I take a look at it, we'll see if we need you to read it in, or maybe I'll just read it in.

Conscious of time, if the hon. member would just give a quick summary of the referral amendment, then I will read it into the record, and we will go on to 29(2)(a) after that. If the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West would just quickly say generally what the amendment is.

10:00

Ms Phillips: Do you want me to actually read out the amendment?

The Acting Speaker: I'll read it out after. It's just that we're so short.

Ms Phillips: Okay. Well, I would like to move that the bill be not read a second time but that the bill be referred to the standing committee so that we can debate it later.

The Acting Speaker: Thanks.

I will just read it into the record very quickly. The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West has moved that the motion for second reading of Bill 20, Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, 2019, be amended by deleting all the words after "that" and substituting the following:

Bill 20, Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, 2019, be not now read a second time but that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Resource Stewardship in accordance with Standing Order 74.2.

With that, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, before 29(2)(a), if I could, I would like to move that we move to one-minute bells for the remainder of the evening.

The Acting Speaker: My understanding is that that would require unanimous consent.

The Acting Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. I see that the hon. Minister of Finance has risen.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I need to rise to respond to some of the comments that were made by the hon. member opposite and provide some clarity around our four-year fiscal plan and the amount of accumulated debt that we as a province will have under our plan. In our fiscal plan we were very transparent with Albertans. We were transparent that our plan includes the $3.5 billion of cash that we hold on hand at the end of each fiscal year, and because the last fiscal year will be an election year, it will require an additional $3.5 billion in cash to be held. The previous government's fiscal plan did not include that $7 billion cash balance that would be required.

Consequently, our fiscal plan is completely transparent with Albertans. We are wanting to ensure that they are aware of the entire amount of debt that we will have as a province at the end of our four-year fiscal plan. However, at that point in time we will have a balanced budget, and we can then begin down the road of paying down our deficit.

Mr. Speaker, the member opposite alluded to the fact that children would not be better off under this fiscal plan. I want to point out that under our new program, the Alberta child and family benefit, close to 70,000 of our most vulnerable families will receive more, not less. They will receive more. This budget actually ensures that we are protecting our most vulnerable in this province. On that same line I want to point out that this budget includes increases to Children's Services, it includes increases to Community and Social Services, and it includes increases to Seniors and Housing. Along with our commitment to maintain health care spending – in fact, health care spending is going up by $200 million – we have maintained our commitment to not decrease education funding.

This budget, more importantly, changes the trajectory of reckless, irresponsible, out-of-control spending that this government inherited and, in fact, provides a very credible path to balance within our first term, a path to balance that will not rob from the next generation, that will ensure that the next generation has high-quality programs and services.

There's been some discussion around postsecondary education. We recognize the absolute importance of postsecondary education in this province, the absolute importance of ensuring that the next generation has a high-quality education, an education that will allow them to pursue every opportunity, an education that will prepare them for the inevitable challenges that they will face as a new generation.

But, Mr. Speaker, the costs of postsecondary education in this province have risen at an exponential rate. In fact, these costs in this province average $36,500 per full-time student per year. That's close to $5,000 more per student per year than British Columbia and close to $15,000 more per student per year than Ontario. So this budget, along with the great work of our Advanced Education, will begin to turn that high dependency on government revenues, on government expenditures down for full-time students in our advanced education system. We need to ensure that students today, tomorrow, next year, and 10 years from now have access to a world-class, high-quality postsecondary education. I have every confidence in our Minister of Advanced Education as he works with our world-class institutions on providing even greater value. That was a MacKinnon panel recommendation.

With that, I will conclude.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

On amendment REF1, as it will be referred to, I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I speak with some interest in regard to the referral amendment that the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West brought forward. Really, using common sense and looking at the totality of this Bill 20, for the casual observer or if someone happened to be handed this, it's a real dog's breakfast. It goes anywhere from taking away tuition tax credits to ending the lottery fund to increasing taxes, individual personal income taxes, changing the access to the future, putting on ice, potentially, the LRT funding for Edmonton and Calgary. You know, it's just all over the place. Quite frankly, I've never seen an omnibus bill quite like this one brought forward to the provincial Legislature in the time that I've been here.

I think it demands more careful scrutiny by both the Standing Committee on Resource Stewardship and the closer scrutiny of the general public as well to absorb this information. You have these things dropped immediately after, I would say, a very troublesome budget, and then suddenly you have two omnibus bills that skate around everywhere from personal income tax to changing employment standards here in the province of Alberta. You know, it's always a wise choice to take a sober second look at these bills, and I believe that the hon. member's referral of Bill 20 to the Resource Stewardship Committee is a very wise and prudent and reasonable way by which we can move forward for what's best for Albertans.

Thank you.

10:10

The Acting Speaker: Thank you.

Hon. members, 29(2)(a) is available.

Seeing none, are there any other members wishing to speak to the referral amendment?

Seeing none, I'm prepared to put the question.

[The voice vote indicated that the motion on amendment REF1 lost]

The Acting Speaker: Are there any hon. members wishing to speak to the bill?

Seeing none, the hon. President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance to close debate.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This bill provides key provisions in order to implement our fiscal plan and budget that we presented to Albertans. This government has inherited a fiscal scenario that requires strategic action to clean up. This bill is part of that process. We inherited a spending trajectory of close to 4 per cent per year at a time when revenues remain flat. Our four-year fiscal plan, of which this budget bill is a key component, will turn our spending trajectory to responsible levels. It also includes our approach and our initiatives to attract investment and grow the economy. We're providing a credible plan to balance within this fiscal plan.

Mr. Speaker, I'm proud to close debate on Bill 20.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance has moved second reading of Bill 20, Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, 2019.

Technology Innovation and Emissions Reduction Implementation Act, 2019

[Debate adjourned November 4: Ms Pancholi speaking]

The Acting Speaker: I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar has risen to speak.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure for me to rise and speak to Bill 19. Of course, I wish to make it clear that I do not intend to support this legislation. I think it's no secret to any member of the Chamber that I and my NDP caucus colleagues believe that climate change is the most important threat that humanity faces today, and it's incredibly urgent that all of humanity take immediate action to avert this threat.

The Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change tells us that we only have eight and a half years before our carbon budget is depleted and we can no longer avoid the catastrophic results of warming more than 2 degrees Celsius. Our government, the federal government, has made a commitment under the Paris agreement to reduce our carbon dioxide emissions by 30 per cent below the 2005 levels by 2030. Of course, as a part of the country Alberta has to do its fair share in achieving those carbon dioxide emissions reductions. Under our government we were on track to do that. With the totality of the climate leadership plan we were on track to reduce carbon dioxide emissions by more than 50 tonnes over a business-as-usual scenario by 2030.

Under this piece of legislation we take a giant step backwards. We are committed to only reducing our carbon dioxide emissions by approximately 30 tonnes less than a business-as-usual scenario. I have to impress upon members that we do not have time to be taking steps backwards in this fight against climate change. As the IPCC has clearly said, we only have eight and a half years, and by shifting our climate emissions plan backwards, we are increasing the risk that we will run out of time and no longer be able to deal with climate change and prevent the worst effects of climate change from happening in our world. It's very concerning to me that this is the direction that the government wants to take.

Of course, it comes as no surprise. The government seems to be moving backwards in every area on the environment and environmental protection. We see in the budget, of course, huge cuts to air monitoring, water monitoring, emissions monitoring, land policy, fisheries and wildlife management. Every aspect of environmental protection is being cut back significantly, most concerning including climate change.

Now, I do want to say that even though the government is mostly wrong, they're not entirely wrong, which is a shock because I think this is probably the first piece of legislation that we've seen in this House where the government hasn't been entirely wrong. They've been only mostly wrong, so I do want to congratulate them on that slight bit of progress. There are the two things that they did get right in this legislation.

First of all, they've admitted, by bringing this legislation forward and in their announcements when they released the legislation, that the federal government has jurisdiction over climate change emissions in Alberta. The minister quite clearly stated in his announcement that in order to avoid federal jurisdiction being exercised here in Alberta, they needed to bring forward this piece of legislation.

I'm glad that the government has finally admitted that federal jurisdiction over this issue exists, and I sincerely hope that after coming to this realization, the government drops its unnecessary and expensive lawsuit against the federal government over the consumer carbon tax and just gets on with the issue of reducing carbon dioxide emissions. All of those dollars that are being spent on high-priced lawyers to argue in front of courts could be spent on producing real carbon dioxide reductions here in Alberta, and I urge the government strongly to recognize, realize what they've said, that the federal government has jurisdiction over this issue, that they have the right to implement a carbon tax, and that they should just get on with the job of reducing carbon dioxide emissions here in Alberta rather than fighting something that they've already admitted the federal government has jurisdiction over.

The second thing that the government has right in this legislation is the treatment of the electricity sector. I am very pleased that the government has recognized that the way we've treated the electricity sector under the carbon competitiveness incentive regulation, that was brought in under our government, was the right way to go, and they're not making any changes to that.

In fact, I'm pleased that we are still committed to phasing out coal-fired power here in Alberta, and I'm very pleased that, despite their protestations to the contrary, this government is also committed to phasing out coal-fired power in Alberta. That is the right thing to do for the people of Alberta. It's the right thing to do for the people of Canada. It's the right thing to do for everybody on this planet. Not only will we save significant carbon dioxide emissions from phasing out coal-fired power; we will avoid any number of respiratory illnesses that result from the burning of coal.

I want to take a moment to recognize at this point the significant contributions that coal miners have made to the province of Alberta. We have a long and rich history of coal mining here in Alberta. I worked for a summer in what was then called the MD of Badlands. It's now part of the town of Drumheller. In East Coulee you can visit the Atlas coal mine, which is the largest still free-standing mining tipple in all of western Canada, one of the first coal mines ever developed in Alberta. Coal has provided reliable electricity to the people of Alberta for a number of decades. I want to thank the people of Alberta who've worked in the coal mines for the personal costs that they've borne working in coal. It's often said, Mr. Speaker, that the cost of coal is blood, because coal mining is an incredibly dangerous profession; it's incredibly dangerous working conditions. Coal miners suffer unbelievable health effects from doing their work, all so that we could have reliable electricity when we went home and flicked the switch, and I am so grateful for all of those coal miners throughout the decades who have provided the people of Alberta with that reliable source of electricity.

That's why we owe it to them to transition them away from coal justly so that they can make this transition along with the rest of the province of Alberta without suffering any negative economic effects. I urge the government to honour the commitments that the government made to coal workers when we committed to phasing out coal, that they wouldn't be left behind, that they would be able to find employment, that they would be able to make good lives for themselves outside of the coal sector. I'm very concerned by recent reports that the government hasn't made any commitments whatsoever to coal miners in this province as to honouring the commitments that we made to them to transition them away from coal. I hope that in the coming days the members opposite do intend to let coal miners know what their future holds because that's part of the deal. If we're going to transition away from coal, which this government has committed to do, then we need to offer a fair and just transition for those coal miners and make sure that they can still contribute their time and their talent to developing the prosperity of the province of Alberta.

Those are the two things that the government got right. It should come as no surprise, Mr. Speaker, that everything else is wrong.

Of course, we've had a carbon price in Alberta since 2007, and all of that carbon price that's been collected has been historically funded to reduce carbon emissions. It's been invested in innovation; it's been invested in carbon capture and storage. It's been invested entirely in reducing the carbon footprint of the province of Alberta. Now, for the first time, the government has said: yes, we will implement a carbon pricing policy, but we'll take that money, and we'll turn around and give most of it back to them in the form of a $4.7 billion handout; we'll keep a small amount that will be invested in innovations to reduce emissions, and then some of it will be used to fund our Twitter troll farm to mock environmentalists, people who are concerned about climate change. Remarkable. It's truly remarkable, and I'm sure that Vladimir Putin is smiling and probably closely taking notes because I'm sure that he would like to have official government policy on the books to harass and intimidate his political opponents the way that the members opposite are creating with this legislation.

You know, the government has correctly identified that the price of carbon should be $30 a tonne. It's very concerning to me, though, that the government has not indicated with any certainty what the future price of carbon will be. The legislation provides for ministerial order to set the carbon price. So the Minister of Environment and Parks could wake up one day in a particularly bad mood, which I know is uncharacteristic for the Minister of Environment and Parks, always a pleasant and amiable person who is nothing but delightful to chat with in this House – but, let's say, you know, his disposition could change suddenly – and implement a $100 a tonne carbon price on one particular sector. Perfectly legal under the legislation. Or he could wake up and, feeling extra amiable, could lower the price to $20 a tonne or $10 a tonne because he wants to give his donors a break.

That's not what good climate policy is, Mr. Speaker. Industry needs to know what the price of carbon is going to be now and well into the future so that they can plan to make the investments that they need to achieve the carbon dioxide reductions that they have to achieve. So I would strongly urge the minister to amend that section of the legislation and provide the industry the certainty that they're asking for in what the future of the carbon price is going to be.

The second thing that I'm very concerned about, Mr. Speaker, is the fact that, of course, we don't see all of this money being invested into carbon dioxide emission reductions. Now, the members opposite have claimed that they have a magic wand called innovation, that the paltry $100 million or so that they're going to invest every year in innovation is going to achieve significant carbon dioxide reductions over and above what they are already suggesting they'll produce with the carbon price alone.

Well, Mr. Speaker, we already have a number of innovations that we know reduce carbon dioxide emissions. They're called solar power, they're called wind power, they're called public transit, and they're called energy efficiency. All of those things are things that the government has scrapped, so I'm not sure what kind of innovation it is that the minister knows about that the rest of the world doesn't that will create these carbon dioxide emissions. But I don't hold out much hope that we'll achieve the carbon dioxide reductions that the government says that they'll achieve through this innovation magic wand that they apparently have when they are outright refusing to acknowledge the capability of existing technologies, those things that were innovative 10 or 20 years ago, that we know work. They're just throwing those by the wayside. I guess they seem to be much more optimistic than I am in the potential for technology to achieve these emissions reductions.

I know that I would certainly – I don't want to throw out the possibility of innovations. There are lots of things that Emissions Reduction Alberta is doing that are improving the performance of large industries here in Alberta, but we also need to do the work of reducing carbon dioxide emissions with technologies that we know work. So I would recommend that the government go back to the drawing board on their spending plans for climate change, on the TIER dollars, and invest in the things that will achieve actual carbon dioxide emission reductions for the people of Alberta, and I would suggest to all members that there would be a significant benefit. We know that the carbon tax was incredibly unpopular, but we know that emissions reduction is incredibly popular.

The Acting Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. I see the hon. Government House Leader has risen.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to rise under 29(2)(a). So much to unpack there and such little time, unfortunately. I'm sure we'll have more time to talk about it in the coming days. Instead, I'll just focus for this 29(2)(a) on two key issues.

The first is around the NDP slush fund. The hon. member referred to that slush fund in his comments, Mr. Speaker, and then discussed how this legislation that I have before the Chamber right now compares with what the hon. member's government did when he was in power. The fact is this. This legislation at its core primarily deals with the fact that it makes it clear how we'll be renaming the funds and then how the money within those funds will be handled or allowing it or a portion of it to go to general revenue. The hon. member is correct about that. What the hon. member glosses over, though, is the fact that his government did exactly that. Every minister on this side of the House knows, as they went through their budget process – the Minister of Finance would know for sure – how much the climate leadership plan and the NDP's carbon tax were being used as a slush fund through the entire operation of government on the back of Albertans and certainly were not being used for emission reductions.

The fact is this. Albertans had a choice. They had a choice in this last election when it came to this issue. The NDP never told them about their carbon tax when they campaigned on it, but certainly by 2019 the NDP's carbon tax was well known by the people of Alberta. The hon. member even agrees. It was not a very popular tax. I certainly agree with him. I think that it played a large part in why the NDP lost government – maybe they agree with that; maybe they don't – but the carbon tax itself and how it was utilized within the province was known.

How this government would approach the large-emitter side of that equation was also clearly articulated in our platform. It was very, very clear that we would go with the TIER system. It was very, very clear within that how we would approach that from a regulatory perspective and, Mr. Speaker, most importantly, how it would be spent: the first $100 million plus 50 per cent of every dollar going to the TIER fund, the majority of the money going to the TIER fund – the hon. member is incorrect in his assertion that that is not the fact – and then the other 50 per cent going into general revenue towards deficit reduction to begin to fix the mess that the hon. member's government created inside this province.

Yes, a portion of that is going to defend what is commonly referred to as the war room, or the Canadian Energy Centre, as we now know, Mr. Speaker, to actually defend the industry, something that hon. member did not do when he was in power; in fact, he sold them out repeatedly to Justin Trudeau, to his federal leader in the NDP party, who was antienergy, antipipeline, and who they seem to have, according to their own leader, at least in her case, indicated that they voted for in the last election.

The fact is this, Mr. Speaker. This government has been clear on how they will use the large-emitter portion of that, going into TIER. He's right. That's been taking place in this province since 2007. Prices have changed, different variations of it, but the reality is that this is not a new thing inside this province. What is new is the transparency of the government on how they will utilize those resources going forward, which is the exact opposite of what that hon. member did when he was a minister of the Crown, just a few months ago, with his colleagues, where they told Albertans that it was going to go to rebates and it wasn't going to go to general revenue and they weren't going to use it for slush projects and they weren't going to do that. We now know that they did, in fact, eventually even admitting within their own budget that they were putting it into general revenue. They just didn't bother to go and change the legislation. They kept trying to back-door it.

Also, quite shockingly, they did not invest that money very well. We know that they spent significant portions of it, of course, on light bulbs and shower heads. I know as a rural Albertan that we always found it quite comical. First of all, I think that all Albertans found it comical, because we're more than capable of changing our light bulbs. I know that I'm extraordinarily taller than average, Mr. Speaker, but I think that most Albertans can also change their light bulbs. They didn't need the NDP's help, and they certainly didn't need the NDP to go and hire people from Ontario to change their light bulbs. But then they went forward and got shower heads that didn't even work in rural Alberta because they weren't able to survive with our low water pressure and paid again an Ontario company to provide those light bulbs and shower heads. That's just one example.

Our government's approach will be different. You know, Emissions Reduction Alberta, which the hon. member referred to, will help to partner with us on many projects – I was happy to announce several of them this past week – that have significant, immediate emission reductions as well as water use reductions and other environmental benefits, that this government is investing in, the complete opposite, Mr. Speaker, of that hon. member's approach.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to join debate?

Seeing none, the hon. Minister of Environment and Parks to close debate.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, I'm excited to see us vote on second reading and hope that everybody will support it, unlike what appears the NDP, who – I don't know; maybe they're climate change deniers. Now, I don't know what's going on. But they're on the opposite side this time, so it's quite alarming. But I do hope that my colleagues support the second reading of this important piece of legislation.

[Motion carried; Bill 19 read a second time]

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you, first of all, to all members of the House for what has been a great evening of progress. I'm always happy to see so much progress. As such, I think that it's time to call it an evening, and I will move to adjourn the House till tomorrow at 1:30 p.m.

The Acting Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 3(1.1) the House stands adjourned until tomorrow afternoon at 1:30.

Tomorrow morning the Standing Committee on Families and Communities will consider the estimates for the Ministry of Health in the Rocky Mountain Room, and the Standing Committee on Resource Stewardship will consider the estimates for the Ministry of Indigenous Relations in the Parkland Room.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 10:44 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Tuesday, November 5, 2019

[The Speaker in the chair]

Prayers

The Speaker: Hon. members, the prayer. Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and to her government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideas but, laying aside all private interests and prejudices, keep in mind their responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all. Amen.

Please be seated.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Hon. members, we have a school group joining us in the gallery this afternoon all the way from Edmonton-City Centre, grade 9 students from Oliver school. Please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Also joining us in the galleries this afternoon are guests of the Ministry of Agriculture and Forestry: Alberta Canola directors and staff from all over the province of Alberta.

Also, joining us as guests of the Member for Edmonton-Glenora, welcome Constance Scarlett, Steve Baker, Daryl Zelinski.

Last but certainly not least, a very special welcome to grade 6 students following along in their classroom at Meadowbrook middle school in Airdrie, including Molly Pitt, the lovely daughter of our own Deputy Speaker. Hi, Molly.

Hon. members, please welcome our guests today.

Members' Statements

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for St. Albert has a statement to make.

Budget 2019 and Poverty Reduction Strategies

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Cuts to rent subsidies, cuts to funding for affordable housing, cuts to AISH, cuts to supports for foster kids trying to get their lives on track: this government isn't doing anything to help pull Albertans out of poverty.

To make matters worse, the Minister of Community and Social Services had the audacity to speak at the National Conference on Ending Homelessness right here in Edmonton yesterday, and she claimed her government was committed to pulling Albertans out of homelessness. This doesn't line up with anything her government has actually done. Just yesterday I asked the minister about her decision to close one of two shelters in Fort McMurray, and all I got were empty words and her pointing to other areas of her budget in an attempt to distract Albertans. Her tactics won't work, Mr. Speaker. More and more Albertans are realizing every day just how bad this UCP budget is. This government has introduced a budget that will see Albertans pay for more and get less.

I was proud to be part of a government that helped cut child poverty in half, and I have every confidence that our leader would have led us to cut it altogether in a second term. Now we have a government that seems bent on driving people into poverty, and they're doing this while cozying up to big corporations, giving them a $4.7 billion handout. They're creating none of the jobs they promised.

My message is simple. To the minister: next time you speak at a conference about ending homelessness, can you at least be honest that your government hasn't done a damn thing to eradicate poverty?

Speaker's Ruling Parliamentary Language

The Speaker: Hon. members, the use of unparliamentary language, no matter the context, is always unparliamentary. The hon. Member for St. Albert is more than welcome to stand, withdraw, and apologize to the dignity of the Assembly.

Ms Renaud: I apologize for using the word "damn." I take it back.

The Speaker: You apologize for the use of unparliamentary language. Is that correct?

Ms Renaud: Yes.

The Speaker: I would encourage you in the future to be much more careful with your choice of words.

The hon. Member for Leduc-Beaumont is rising to make a statement.

Remembrance Day

Mr. Rutherford: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As our government's military liaison to the Canadian Armed Forces it's my privilege to speak about Veterans' Week. Every November, from the 5th to Remembrance Day on November 11, we observe Veterans' Week, where we remember the service and sacrifice of the men and women who served in uniform since the First World War.

This year we mark the 75th anniversary of the Italian Campaign, held during the Second World War. From 1943 to early 1945 Canadian troops advanced north through Italy. As Canadians fought through Italy, one of the toughest engagements was the Battle of Ortona, where tight streets and large amounts of rubble prevented the movement of equipment, leading to house-by-house combat as troops moved through the town. After a week of street fighting, Ortona was liberated. Throughout the whole campaign Canadians encountered challenging mountainous terrain, harsh weather, and a bloody fight against battle-hardened German troops. More than 93,000 Canadians took part. There were 26,000 Canadian casualties, and almost 6,000 Canadians lost their lives.

The Italian Campaign exacted a high toll and stands as one of Canada's great contributions to the Allied war effort. From 1939 to 1945 the contribution of Canada was immense, with approximately 1 million Canadians serving in World War II. They, alongside the hard work of those on the home front, made a significant contribution to the war effort and ultimately the victory against the Nazi regime.

Of course, our women and men in uniform have continued to distinguish themselves with their service to our country. I urge you to take time during Veterans' Week to remember the service and sacrifice of those who served our country in uniform, including in Canada's longest war, in Afghanistan. Attend an event, say thank you to a veteran and to those who continue to serve in uniform, proudly wear your poppy, and take a moment to think of those who came before us who fought and died to preserve our way of life.

Lest we forget.

The Speaker: Lest we forget, indeed.

The hon. the Member for Banff-Kananaskis.

Family Violence Prevention Month

Ms Rosin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Hon. members and guests, November is Family Violence Prevention Month here in Alberta. It's our chance to show our support for the prevention of family violence. Family violence can happen to anyone regardless of age, ethnicity, gender, or sexual orientation. It happens in dependent and trusting relationships. It happens behind closed doors to people we least expect and even in the family of one of my closest friends. It takes a community to work together to prevent and put an end to abuse.

Our government is working hard to prevent domestic and family violence. On October 30 Bill 17, the Disclosure to Protect Against Domestic Violence Act, or Clare's law, received royal assent, which will allow individuals to easily access disclosure about their partner's history.

We want everyone in Alberta to be aware of where to turn if they are experiencing or are at risk of family violence. Awareness is an important step towards putting an end to family violence in our province. I'm proudly wearing a purple ribbon this month along with many of my colleagues here in the Legislature. The colour purple has been recognized internationally for many years to recognize family violence prevention.

We will also be reminding everyone what resources are available within our province. Our family violence info line is available 24 hours a day in more than 170 languages. Anyone can dial 310.1818 to speak to compassionate, trained staff who can provide information on how to get help. We also issue certificates through the safer spaces program so that victims of domestic violence can terminate a lease at no cost and leave an unsafe home. There are also many resources available at alberta.ca/endfamilyviolence, including fact sheets, posters, infographics, and more.

I encourage everyone today to get involved in Family Violence Prevention Month. Show your support on social media, attend family violence prevention events in your community, and let people know where they can turn if they are in need. We can all contribute to the safety of our fellow Albertans by raising awareness and supporting the victims.

Thank you.

2017 UCP Leadership Contest Investigation

Ms Ganley: Mr. Speaker, $211,723: that is the total of the fines issued by the Election Commissioner in the UCP's ongoing and growing kamikaze scandal. The fines just keep on coming as more and more illegal activities come to light. While the Premier and his inner circle continue to try to dismiss these serious allegations as Twitter gossip, that just isn't true. Interfering with an election goes to the very heart of our democracy, and the UCP's refusal to admit the seriousness of these allegations suggests they think that they are above the law and even democracy itself. Collusion, obstruction, prohibited contributions, contributions made with someone else's money, giving others money to make contributions – and the list goes on – offences which suggest a complete disregard for both elections and laws. UCP insiders seem to think that these fines are simply the cost of doing business. They think that the old-fashioned notion of no one being above the law just doesn't apply to them.

The public deserves answers. They deserve a government that thinks that democracy and the rule of law and other fundamental institutions of our country are important and worth protecting. I remember a time not so long ago, Mr. Speaker, when one of the fundamental principles that underpinned conservatism was a respect for institutions. I guess that that time has passed.

This government and this Premier need to stop hiding, demonstrate some leadership, and be up front with the people of Alberta. Our children are watching us. They deserve to see elected members who demonstrate through words and actions that democratic institutions are worth while. People once fought and died for these values. Those children deserve to know that we still hold them dear. They deserve better than this UCP government cheapening everything we stand for. They deserve honesty, and, Mr. Speaker, there are over 200,000 reasons to believe that they are not getting it from this UCP government.

The Speaker: Hon. members, if you could do the Assembly a favour and ensure that all of the sounds on your electronic devices are turned to silent, I certainly would appreciate that.

The hon. Member for Camrose.

Volunteer Firefighters

Ms Lovely: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Like so many other small towns across Alberta, the city of Camrose is served by a fire department made up almost entirely of on-call volunteers, and today I'd like to take my member's statement to thank them for their work. The city of Camrose fire department is over 110 years old and currently employs four full-time staff: a chief, a deputy chief, an inspector, and a public educator. Besides these four, the fire service has 40 trained volunteer firefighters.

I had the opportunity to meet with Peter Krich, the fire chief in Camrose for the last 19 years. This past week his congratulations to his volunteers was obvious and incredible. He made it very clear that without those dedicated volunteers and their heart for service, a city like Camrose would not have anywhere near the same capability to deliver quality of service to our area. These volunteers regularly risk limb and life, purely out of dedication to service of their community. These volunteers make up a huge part of the firefighting force all across our province. Over 80 per cent of Alberta firefighters are volunteers. These men and women are ready to jump into action at a moment's notice, whether to help at the scene of a highway crash or a house fire. Their service should set an example for all of us to aspire to.

There's another part of this equation, though, Mr. Speaker. These people have to be allowed to leave work whenever a call comes in for help. As such, businesses who employ them have to be onboard with this as well. This is especially apparent in small towns, where the body of firefighters and volunteers is quite small. To those business owners who see this as a way to give back to their community and send off those volunteers, thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Calgary-McCall has a statement to make.

November 1984 Violence against Sikhs in India

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to recognize the victims and survivors of the November 1984 Sikh genocide. During the first few days of November 1984 thousands of Sikh men and women were brutally massacred in broad daylight on the streets of Delhi and across other cities, and many more were displaced. They were all targeted and killed for one reason: they were all Sikhs.

Mr. Speaker, all efforts to save them clearly fell short. Civil society, the state's institutions, and the international community, who all share the basic responsibility of protecting everyone's dignity, everyone's rights, and everyone's life, liberty, and security, completely failed them. The Sikh community here in Alberta and around the world has been living with that pain and trauma for the last 35 years.

I have the honour of knowing many of the survivors and listening to their stories. They all see it as a genocide and a crime against humanity. They're all grieving. They're all still looking for answers. They are still looking for justice. Some believe that had justice been served in this case, the February 2002 Gujarat massacre could have been avoided.

Mr. Speaker, to all those who lost their lives in this extremely prejudicial tragedy, we remember you. To all those who are survivors of this tragedy, please know that we recognize your pain, we acknowledge the injustice, and we are ashamed of being bystanders. To all my colleagues here, let's stand together with our Sikh community as they seek justice and reconciliation and commit to ensuring that there will never be a November '84 again.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Property Rights

Mr. Barnes: To fully understand the importance of property rights to Albertans, we must first understand why they were created to begin with. Originating in Europe during the Renaissance, property rights developed as international trade by merchants gave rise to mercantilist ideas. This was only further supported in 16th-century Europe as Lutheranism and the Protestant Reformation advanced property rights, emphasizing the Protestant work ethic and religion views on destiny. These principles served as the underlying pillars of the capitalist system and the basis of wealth creation. However, the system we more closely resemble today is a result of demand for human rights in the 17th century in revolutionary Europe. This is where the right to private property truly emerged.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I've stood in this House time and time again to advocate for stronger property rights for all Albertans, property rights that aim to protect the economic and political desires of individuals and families and which protect people from the growing encroachment or misuse of government power or that of other citizens. I believe that a society that sees an erosion of property rights also sees the deterioration of other human rights. We are seeing this deterioration in Alberta every day as criminals continue to abuse the property rights, especially of rural Albertans, through trespassing, vandalism, theft, and so forth.

Mr. Speaker, rural Albertans do not feel safe. We hear horror stories every week about how people are attacked or threatened. We hear stories of criminals stealing equipment, trucks, and tractors, that rural Albertans depend on. People's lives and financial livelihoods are at risk. We need to take a hard stance against this kind of behaviour.

Not only have these hard-working men and women built our province, but they have also created wealth and prosperity for all Albertans. Mr. Speaker, they deserve to have their property rights and, ultimately, their freedom protected so they can create wealth on their land and live their life with their family safely.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Cross has a statement.

Child Poverty

Mr. Amery: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today I rise to speak about an issue that I'm very passionate about because it affects a disproportionate number of constituents in Calgary-Cross. Child poverty is an issue that many Albertans still have to deal with, and certain parts of our province have much higher rates of child poverty than the provincial average. Although Alberta has the lowest child poverty rate in Canada at 5 per cent, I think I can speak on behalf of everybody in this House when I say that 5 per cent is still too high.

The Canada census defines family poverty as being under a certain threshold of annual after-tax income. For a family of four that number is $38,920. Mr. Speaker, according to those figures, certain parts of Calgary-Cross have poverty rates as high as 70 per cent.

Families that face immense financial difficulties are not a problem that our government can simply avoid. Children that are raised in poverty are much more likely to resort to crime and self-harm later in life. This phenomenon can be seen when the maps of crime and poverty are compared. The results are nearly identical.

According to a study by the Urban Institute, nearly 30 per cent of children who grow up in low-income families never complete high school, chronic absenteeism is three to four times higher, and they are much more susceptible to bullying from their peers. This issue not only has consequences in the present times, but it will also have lasting consequences for generations if not addressed. Although the numbers are inflated due to the high economic recession in Alberta, northeast Calgary has always faced significantly higher rates of poverty than the rest of the city.

Mr. Speaker, I stand to urge our strong and united government to combat poverty and help struggling Albertan families. Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, prior to moving to Oral Question Period, the hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview has a statement to make.

Member's Apology

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I have great respect for the role of the Speaker and the traditions of this House. Yesterday my passion for defending Albertans who need us to stand up for them clouded my judgment. Out of respect for the traditions of this Assembly and the complexity of your role, Mr. Speaker, I apologize to you and to the members of the Assembly and withdraw comments in posts on social media made outside of this Chamber.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. member, apology accepted. I consider this matter dealt with and concluded.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The Leader of Her Majesty's Official Opposition.

Budget 2019 and Alberta's Current Fiscal Position

Ms Notley: This Premier's $4.7 billion corporate handout is a bust. In 2018 we were coming back: a 2.4 per cent GDP growth, 80,000 jobs recovered. Now every indicator is down. Business activity: down. Energy sector: down. Household spending: down. Labour markets: down. This Premier can now lay claim to Alberta's worst monthly economic performance since mid-2016. To the Premier: why not cancel your corporate handout and reverse your cuts before you trigger a second recession?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, it's true, as Albertans know, that this government inherited from the NDP a period of four years of economic decline and stagnation, a jobs crisis without precedent. In fact, it's pretty clear that in the first two quarters of this year under NDP mismanagement we were probably in a technical recession. We are doing everything we possibly can to turn that around with real action to demonstrate that Alberta is open for business, for investment to create jobs. Part of that plan, of course, is to get our finances back under control, and we will do exactly what we were hired to do by Albertans.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, this Premier is a master at blaming everyone else. Five-year-olds could take lessons. But this is happening on his watch. He was elected to take responsibility, so he should get to it. Oil drilling: down. Natural gas: down. Grain, manufacturing, wholesale trade, housing starts: down, down, down, down. Their budget is not an antidote; it is a poison pill. Why won't the Premier cancel his corporate handout and stop his heartless attacks on Albertans before he makes things even worse?

Mr. Kenney: Let's be clear about what the NDP would have us do, Mr. Speaker. They took Alberta's debt from $13 billion to $62 billion. They wanted it to go over a hundred billion. Why? Because they prefer sending billions of tax dollars to rich bankers and bondholders for interest payments. We instead prefer spending that on critical public services. But if you let debt run out of control, which is always the NDP plan – guess what? – you end up taking money from health and education to pay bankers and bondholders. We won't do that.

Ms Notley: A $95 billion debt under our watch, $93 billion under theirs, Mr. Speaker. Move on.

This Premier threw away every plan to diversify our economy. Energy value-add programs? Cut. Investment in tech incentives? Cut. Infrastructure projects? Cut. Now, last month the Finance minister justified this approach, telling the Calgary Chamber that economic diversification is merely, quote, a long-term luxury. To the Premier: do you agree with the Finance minister, and if you do, why does the economic development minister have a job, and if you don't, shouldn't the Finance minister lose his?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, the Finance minister did lose his job last April after having driven this province into a debt crisis, into a jobs crisis, after having presided over six credit downgrades, after having quadrupled the size of the provincial debt. You know, Albertans understand that we cannot run the province on a credit card forever, that if we do, we just end up enriching the bankers with interest payments. That's why with a 2.8 per cent saving, three pennies on the dollar, we are prudently bringing our finances back in order to guarantee programs for the future.

The Speaker: The hon. the Leader of the Official Opposition for her second main set of questions.

Support for Youth Transitioning out of Care

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked this government why, when there's money for $4.7 billion for corporations, they're cutting financial support for 480 kids who grew up in government care. What we heard was shameful. No compassion. The stories are heartbreaking: caseworkers forced into breaking the news to these young adults by reading from a script, young adults hearing these words and breaking down. This government is hiding what they're saving, but for these young people the cost is their lives. To the Premier: why is he doing this?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, every reputable economist on Alberta's finances has completely discredited this absurd $4.7 billion figure, which is nonexistent. In fact, this year the estimated revenue forgone from the job-creation tax cut is $100 million, not $4.7 billion. Adults will continue to have access to the entire suite of Alberta's social services, which are actually being enhanced in this budget as the budgets of Community and Social Services . . .

Mr. Bilous: Not if they're older than 22, they won't.

Mr. Kenney: . . . and Children's Services and supports for persons with disabilities are all being increased.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Point of order.

The Speaker: A point of order has been noted at 1:55.

Ms Notley: I see the compassion continues.

Quote: I was really upset and shaking. Quote: my first thought was that I'm going to be homeless because I can't pay my rent. Quote: I used to joke about how I considered the MLAs to be my parents; when I found out this, it felt like I was being abandoned again. Mr. Speaker, many of us are parents. How can this Premier hear from these youth who have been through the most traumatizing childhoods we could possibly imagine and still do this? Through the Speaker to the whole front bench: if your own children were suffering, would you cut them off?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, under this government and even with our balanced plan Alberta will continue to have by far the most generous social supports of any province in Canada, which is why even while trying to deal with the NDP fiscal crisis we're actually increasing the budgets for Community and Social Services, for Children's Services, for persons with disabilities. Those who are adults, those who are 24 years of age: they will have full access to the supports that they need. If they're aboriginal youth, they will have the ability to have postsecondary funded by the federal government and access to all of the social supports of the government of Alberta.

Ms Notley: I beg the Premier to learn this file, Mr. Speaker. The folks over there have betrayed their own conscience. Before the last election they heard from the Child and Youth Advocate, they heard from caseworkers, they heard from former kids in care, and they all agreed on the age of 24, except that at one point the Member for Calgary-West thought it should be 26. You used to care. Now you don't. This isn't about finances. This isn't about savings. You found $4.7 billion for corporations. Do you really expect Albertans to believe that you cannot afford to help these kids?

Mr. Kenney: You know, Mr. Speaker, the language of the NDP around this budget is grossly irresponsible, trying to instill fear in vulnerable people for a budget that reduces expenditures by less than three pennies on the dollar over four years, which will still end up with Alberta having the biggest spending government in Canada. We have to make some prudent choices to avoid jeopardizing the future of all of our social programs by sinking in a sea of debt. We won't do that.

Education Budget 2019-2020

Ms Hoffman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In June the Calgary board of education expected to receive about $1.3 billion for the current school year. They based that assumption on assurances that this UCP Education minister gave them. They could use every dollar that they're getting as they have a growing student population, large numbers of English-language learners, and students with special needs. Now documents have been made public showing that they have actually received $164 million less than they expected. To the Premier: why did your government mislead Albertans about the cuts that you were making to education?

The Speaker: The Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I too am surprised that a school board with a $1.2 billion operating budget, servicing 130,000 students is unable to find efficiencies in their overhead. This board has previously made a $9.1 million accounting error, signed into a 20-year lease in which they are paying $6 million more in rent than the total valuation of the building itself, and often projects deficits but ends the year with significant surpluses.

Ms Hoffman: Yesterday the minister said that she respected board autonomy. Today the minister comes in here and blames the board for the cuts that she's imposing on them and on Alberta's children. Edmonton public got $76 million less. Calgary Catholic got $97 million. Edmonton Catholic, $52 million less. Lethbridge public, $23 million less. St. Albert public, $3.6 million less. Fort McMurray Catholic, $3.3 million less. The list keeps growing. This Premier insists that the government funded education. Why do the numbers from school boards themselves make it clear that his government misled Albertans and continues to do so?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. Every single student that walks through our doors is going to be funded at the exact same rate as last year. Albertans overwhelmingly elected our government to start living within our means. It's the same for every school division, and our government expects all school divisions to live within their means. I expect CBE and other school divisions to do the same.

Ms Hoffman: During the campaign, when we raised concerns about his plans to cut education funding, the Premier brushed it off as fear and smear. He insisted that he would maintain funding, but now we literally see hundreds of millions of dollars being taken from our classrooms. It's our students who are suffering, Mr. Speaker. To the Premier: if I'm wrong, why are we seeing school boards laying off staff and speaking out publicly about how the UCP misrepresented the true impacts of their budget? Why is the minister continuing to say that school boards are lying?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last year, the 2018-2019 year, the overall Education budget was $8.223 billion. In 2019-20 the overall Education budget is $8.223 billion. Over the last 15 years operational funding has grown by 80 per cent when inflation grew by 33 per cent and enrolment grew by 25 per cent. This is not sustainable. We cannot continue to grow way above enrolment and inflation. We are funding every single student. Every single student in our schools will be funded this year.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview has the call.

Budget 2019 and Homelessness Reduction Strategies

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday the Minister of Community and Social Services spoke to the Canadian Alliance to End Homelessness. She spoke about how thousands of people are without homes in Edmonton and how she will help end homelessness in Alberta. What she forgot to mention is how this UCP budget slashes $44 million from rental assistance and another $17 million from housing management bodies. To the Premier: doesn't he think that this minister should have been up front about how this budget will actually increase homelessness?

Mrs. Sawhney: Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to say that this government is absolutely committed to serving all Albertans, including those who are experiencing homelessness. I can tell you that we have maintained our budget for homeless shelters and for homeless outreach support services. I'm working very, very closely with the seven cities and the community-based organizations to find out how we can work together to find innovative solutions.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Community and Social Services is going around telling people that she will help end homelessness. What she forgot to say is that this government is kicking 480 young adults off financial assistance, reducing seniors' benefits, and cutting AISH. To the Premier: if you're so convinced that your $4.7 billion corporate handout is necessary, can you and your minister at least stop pretending to care about Albertans at risk of homelessness?

Mrs. Sawhney: Mr. Speaker, my exact words were: I don't think it's aspirational to assume that one day we can end homelessness. Our government stands by that statement. In terms of the other comments made by the member opposite, we are working very closely with Children's Services, and we are taking a crossministerial approach to make sure that those who need supports will get those supports.

Ms Sigurdson: Mr. Speaker, homelessness can be ended. It just takes political will. In the regional municipality of Wood Buffalo alone there are 400 households who depend on rental assistance and housing management bodies; 190 more people are on a wait-list. These Albertans are living on very little. Tragically, this UCP government is making a 24 per cent cut to this program in order to pay for their $4.7 billion corporate handout. To the Premier: given all the issues I've raised here today, how can you actually claim to Albertans that your government is ending homelessness?

Mrs. Sawhney: Mr. Speaker, I would just like to reiterate that I'm working very closely with the seven cities and the community-based organizations to make sure that we're working together to find innovative solutions, leveraging the work that's been done, leveraging all our data, and, again, working with the municipalities to ensure that we do our level best to tackle the issues of homelessness.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Banff-Kananaskis is rising with a question.

Film and Television Tax Credit

Ms Rosin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The film industry is so important to Banff-Kananaskis. Films such as The Revenant, Superman, and series like Game of Thrones were all filmed in or around Kananaskis Country. These projects contribute to our economy and freely advertise our beautiful province on the big screen. But I've heard many concerns from film producers who operate in and around my riding about the future of the industry here in Alberta. I'm wondering if the Minister of Economic Development, Trade and Tourism can please explain the transition our government has made to a film tax credit and the rationale for doing so.

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Economic Development, Trade and Tourism.

Ms Fir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. The film industry is an important sector. It's important to our provincial economy, and we are happy to continue government support. As was committed to in our platform, our government is transitioning the screen-based production grant to the film and television tax credit. This change has long been requested by the industry and will allow our province to secure large film and series productions.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Banff-Kananaskis.

Ms Rosin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Minister.

Well, given that one film company recently left Banff-Kananaskis and moved to British Columbia because the previous NDP government mismanaged, overcommitted the screen production film grant budget by $92 million and committed $21 million of that just five days before the writ dropped and further given that Alberta is already in tough competition with other jurisdictions for film production despite having some of the most desired filming locations in the world, to the same minister: what is our government doing to clean up the mess the NDP left behind in our film industry and incentivize production in Alberta?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Economic Development, Trade and Tourism.

Ms Fir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. The Member for Banff-Kananaskis is correct. The NDP mismanaged the screen-based production grant and massively overcommitted the budget for the program. This reckless lack of fiscal restraint has limited access to funds for upcoming projects. As we are transitioning to a film and television tax credit, we are honouring commitments under the previous grant program and are providing funds to the film and television tax credit.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Ms Rosin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and again thank you, Minister.

Well, given that international and Albertan filmmakers are paying keen attention to the steps that our government takes to support this industry and further given that our tax credit, which we are implementing, will be very different from the previous screen-based production grant, to the same minister: how does our government plan to grow this new program into a much more scalable model to ensure the film industry is sustainable here in Alberta?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Economic Development, Trade and Tourism.

Ms Fir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. As we transition from the previous screen-based production grant to the film and television tax credit, we are maintaining the previous budget of $45 million between the two programs until we fully transition to the credit in 2022-23. In fact, not only are we maintaining funding for film; we're actually increasing it. We have the budget of $45 million plus an additional $1 million for the small production grant. The film and television tax credit will provide a 22 per cent refundable tax credit on eligible . . .

Ms Hoffman: Why are they so mad, then?

Ms Fir: . . . production expenses incurred in Alberta.

Speaker's Ruling Parliamentary Language

The Speaker: Hon. members, I would just provide some caution. When heckling, if you're using unparliamentary language, you would hate for Hansard to be able to catch that and that to go on the record. So I would just use some caution while doing so in statements outside of those who have been recognized to make them.

At this point in time, though, the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West has the call.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. A debt that's $93 billion, within 3 per cent of the NDP's debt; income taxes going up by $600 million – surprise; every single person is going to pay more income tax – tuition, electricity bills, insurance costs, all up. But surely all of this is being done to lower the deficit, right? Wrong. The deficit is $2 billion higher than it was under the NDP. To the Premier: will he admit that all of this pain for ordinary people is so he can dump $4.7 billion of our cash on the front lawn of his rich corporate friends' mansions?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, we did inherit that kind of a mess from the previous government, quite frankly. We are bringing Alberta's finances to fiscal responsibility. We've put forward a plan, a fiscal plan that will bring this province to balance within four years. We have inherited a $1.5 billion cost from the previous government's irresponsible crude-by-rail endeavour, that we will have to pay for this year. That's a minimum $300 million lower cost than had we continued with crude by rail under the previous government's plan.

Ms Phillips: Given that nurses, teachers, and municipal workers are all being fired as we speak, right before Christmas and the deficit is up, the debt is the same, the economy is stalled and given that economists are now saying that we're looking at negative economic growth and given that this is the UCP recession, with 27,000 jobs lost and counting, will the Premier admit that he is presiding over a recession so he can hand over $4.7 billion to his rich friends, that are maybe going to use that money to create jobs in Wisconsin, while all he is creating in Alberta is pink slips?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, I will tell you what we're not going to do. We're not going to follow the previous government's plan, where the economy was in trouble. They increased taxes on everything. They introduced a $1.4 billion carbon tax that they didn't tell Albertans about. They jacked up corporate taxes by 20 per cent and collected $5.8 billion less. That's a $5.8 billion hole in the budget for the next three years. We will not reperform that fiscal irresponsibility.

Ms Phillips: Given that it's been seven months since this Premier's been on the job but he hasn't created a single job and given that this Premier also has a six-figure pension coming to him – it's not the retirement security for teachers, nurses, firefighters, that he's going to raid, but his gold-plated entitlements for himself are safe – to the Premier. Given that our debt is the same, our deficit is up, our taxes are up, our jobs are down but our no-growth, recession-creating corporate handouts are up, perhaps he wants to change his jobs, economy, pipelines slogan to unemployment, recession, and debt.

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, we are confident that our four-year fiscal plan will return this province to fiscal responsibility. We've had many, many commentaries that will prove just that. TD Economics says, “The government’s budget plan strikes a good balance between addressing the deficit in a reasonably timely fashion but not at such a hurried pace that it could knock Alberta’s still-fragile near-term growth . . . off track.” We’ve had several banks and financial institutions endorse this government’s plan for fiscal responsibility. We will not repeat the previous government’s error.

Drinking Water Quality

Mr. Schmidt: On Monday Global News released the results of a year-long investigation into drinking water safety in Edmonton and Calgary. The results were shocking. In Edmonton 3 out of every 10 test results exceeded the federal guideline for lead in drinking water, and some results were as high as 120 times the limit. In Calgary some tests reported levels of lead that were nearly four times the federally accepted limit. Even more shocking is that Alberta Environment and Parks has never requested the data from EPCOR, and EPCOR has never provided it to them. To the minister: will you commit right here and now to launching a provincial review into this issue?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, we’re happy to have adopted the federal standards, starting in January. Our government will continue to work with municipalities, homeowners, schools, and other areas that have water that we’re concerned about to be able to move forward in a productive way as set out in the federal guidelines. We have a plan to do that. That’s the direction that our government will be headed in.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, given that the minister has committed to implementing a plan and given that the cost of replacing lead service lines in Edmonton is only $14 million, the cost of replacing the lines in Calgary is $11 million, a fraction of their $4.7 billion handout to the corporations, can the minister provide us with more details about what exactly his plan entails?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, we have adopted, starting in January, the federal guidelines around this important issue. We will work in partnership with our municipal partners, homeowners, and other infrastructure areas of this province to be able to adopt those federal guidelines going forward. We think we have a plan going forward that makes sense, and we’ll involve all the partners that matter in this important issue.

Mr. Schmidt: Given that adopting the guidelines isn’t the issue, given that water is exceeding the already-in-place guidelines, and given that some Global News reports say that lead plumbing fixtures are still on sale in Edmonton, meaning that new-home buyers are potentially exposed to toxic lead, will the minister commit today to banning plumbing fixtures containing lead?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, as I’ve already said twice today, we are committed to adopting the federal guidelines and making sure those are implemented across our province. That’s the plan that we have going forward. We will work with municipalities. We will work with homeowners as well as school boards and other facilities within this province to make sure that we can adopt those federal regulations this coming January.

Alberta in Canada

Mrs. Pitt: Mr. Speaker, recent events have turned neighbour against neighbour and shaken the perception of many who have made this province and country their home. Many Albertans are feeling frustrated with the results of the recent federal election and Prime Minister Trudeau’s, the NDP’s, and the Green Party’s consistent lack of respect for our province, its resources, and the economic engine that is Alberta to the rest of the country. Albertans don’t feel heard. What does this government say to those that are struggling to wave a Canadian flag in this beautiful province?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Transportation.

Mr. McIver: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you to the hon. member. Our government was sent here to stand up for Albertans. We will fight for fairness within Canada on equalization, on access to Canada’s coastlines, and on a number of other issues. I would say to the hon. member that Alberta now has a government that hears them, that will fight for them, and that will take action.

Mrs. Pitt: Mr. Speaker, given that the people in this province need to be able to know that the rest of Canada respects us and given that Prime Minister Trudeau can no longer turn a deaf ear to the needs of our province while demanding that Alberta continues to foot the bill for the needs of Ottawa, Montreal, and the rest of the east, as this province is Canada’s economic backbone, how will this government ensure that Alberta gets a fair deal that we certainly deserve?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Transportation is rising.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our government, through our Premier, has served notice to Ottawa that Alberta will proudly take our full place in Canada, that we will no longer be a doormat for Ottawa, as the previous NDP government was, and that we will stand up for the interests of Alberta. We have a lot of work to do, but I would say that Ottawa has promised to listen. They said that they’d build Trans Mountain, and we will hold their feet to the fire. We will hold them accountable because that’s what Albertans expect us to do, and we’ve actually put pressure on Ottawa to make that promise already.

Mrs. Pitt: Mr. Speaker, given that Alberta has already dealt with the consequences of four years of western alienation and given that we must stand up for our province while not giving in to excessive concessions to the east and other provinces who do not have Alberta’s best interest at heart, what does this government say about our relationships with our neighbours and with Prime Minister Trudeau?

The Speaker: I’m sure you’re referring to the government policy that that would apply to.

The hon. Minister of Transportation.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our policy, unlike the NDP’s policy and their leader, is to no longer be a doormat and sell out to Justin Trudeau but to stand up for Alberta, stand up for Alberta’s interests going forward, to fight for pipelines, to fight for fairness in the federation. The dark years are over. Albertans know now that they have a government that actually hears them, that is actually listening to them and will fight to make sure that Alberta’s place in the federation is respected, and I believe that the rest of Canada is already starting to listen.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Edmonton-Meadows has a question.

Human Rights and Multiculturalism Grant Program

Mr. Deol: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. A letter has surfaced online stating that this government has cut the Alberta Human Rights Commission's human rights and multiculturalism grant program. This program provided support to community projects that foster equality and reduce discrimination. Now the grant is gone. To the Minister of Justice: how do you feel about cutting funding to combat racism to pay for a $4.7 billion corporate giveaway that isn't creating jobs?

The Speaker: The Minister of Culture, Multiculturalism and Status of Women.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you for the question. Our goal here in Alberta is to make sure that all people feel valued and respected. There is a broader agenda to make sure that any grants and anything that comes forward has the ability to actually grow the amazing, amazing multicultural pieces that we have in this province. This is actually about bringing people together and not dividing like those folks would like us to do.

Mr. Deol: Given that the acting manager with the Alberta Human Rights Commission makes it clear in the letter I referenced that the human rights and multiculturalism grant program was established in 1988 and had worked to, quote, advance human rights and principles of equality, multiculturalism, and inclusion in Alberta, to the minister. This program has been helping community groups for 30 years. How do you feel about being the one to end it, and what message do you think that sends to Albertans?

Mrs. Aheer: Well, actually, Mr. Speaker, what I'm absolutely incredibly proud of is that this is the first time in 25 years that we have a ministry dedicated to multiculturalism, that is working along with platforms that have been brought forward. Did you know that we are bringing forward policy to provide security, especially in places of faith – mosques, synagogues, churches – to make sure that when you are down on your knees praying or on the ground, you do not have to look over your shoulder? We build capacity in this province to come together, not to divide like those folks.

Mr. Deol: Given that cutting this program is wrong and given that it comes at a time when we see concerns that discrimination is on the rise and given that my understanding is that the program accounts for less than $1 million in the provincial budget every year, to the minister: will you do the right thing here and now and reinstate the human rights and multiculturalism grant program?

Mrs. Aheer: We have actually consolidated the grants. This is going to give us an opportunity to use that lens to be able to make sure that grants are appropriately put into communities, especially, if you can imagine, because this government is actually listening to folks on the ground and what they need to do to build capacity in their communities. In fact, we're continuing to invest. We're extremely excited to be able to talk to folks in their communities to find out where those dollars are best used. We're not making the decisions, Mr. Speaker; it's actually folks in their communities.

Thank you.

Affordable Housing

Member Irwin: Housing is a human right, yet this UCP government seems to think that it's a luxury. Recently I told the Seniors and Housing minister about the lack of affordable housing in my riding. Tent cities have sprung up across our neighbourhoods, the problem is only worsening, and we now see that these tent cities are being torn down. Folks are being criminalized and pushed further into the margins. I pleaded with the minister to stop talking about debt and efficiency, yet she repeated those same tired lines. These are real humans who are suffering right now, Minister. So to that minister: I ask you again to acknowledge the desperate need for housing. What are your plans to address it?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Seniors and Housing.

Ms Pon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, definitely, housing is important to seniors and vulnerable Albertans. Our government supports seniors to age in their communities and also all the vulnerable Albertans, so we make sure that those are all aging in their communities through the funding for building, operating, and maintaining housing for low- to moderate-income seniors and vulnerable Albertans.

Member Irwin: Mr. Speaker, given that one constituent who called my office is on AISH and after spending almost all of his AISH money on rent, he has only $300 left every month for food and medication and given that he's been looking for more affordable housing but has had no luck and given that his story is a story of many – I fear it will become even more common due to this government's cruel and heartless cuts to AISH and housing – to the Minister of Community and Social Services: what do I say to this constituent and to all of the others who are struggling right now? And please, be specific.

Mr. Kenney: You know, we hear so much bizarre disinformation from the other side. I think that every now and then we have to stand up and bring this back to the facts. The fact is this. The budget for AISH, presented by the Finance minister two weeks ago, is actually increasing by $143 million. It is going to go from being by far the most generous income support for persons with disabilities in the country to by far the most generous income support for persons with disabilities in the country, one-third more generous than any other province, with a full suite of other social supports available to those folks.

Member Irwin: Mr. Speaker, given that I suppose the message that I'm supposed to give that constituent is that they're already getting too much and given that I'm so proud of the vibrant indigenous communities in my riding – in fact, we have one of the largest urban indigenous populations in Alberta – and given that now we see the indigenous housing capital program has been killed, not only leaving a number of important projects in the lurch but also putting more indigenous folks in my neighbourhood and across the province at risk of homelessness, to the Minister of Indigenous Relations. Your cabinet colleagues, the Premier, they're not willing to stand up for folks in desperate need of housing. So my question is simple: will you?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Indigenous Relations.

Mr. Wilson: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I care deeply for the indigenous people, as you know, and our government is working hard to help them with various options. I attended the Homeless Connect here earlier. I believe I was the only member to attend that. It was very important. There were a lot of great initiatives going on there. I attended Ambrose Place. It's a shelter that provides culturally sensitive housing for the indigenous population. The sad reality right now is that the homeless population is drastically over-represented, and our government is dedicated to improving the lives of the indigenous community. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. Member for Calgary-South East has the call.

School Construction

Mr. Jones: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that our government was elected with a clear mandate to continue to build schools and given that on Friday the Minister of Education announced 25 new capital projects, including a new K to 4 elementary school and a grades 5 to 9 middle school for Auburn Bay in my constituency of Calgary-South East, can the Minister of Education please provide this House with a breakdown of the 25 projects she and the Minister of Infrastructure announced last week in north Calgary? [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. members, it's important for the Speaker to be able to hear both the question and the answer.

I'd like to hear from the hon. Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd first like to thank my colleague for his tireless work and advocacy for his constituents. Budget 2019 honours our commitment to continue to build new schools across this province. Promise made, promise kept. This year's capital plan includes funding for 15 new schools, six replacement schools, and four modernizations and additions. These projects will touch all areas of the province and demonstrate our continued commitment to building schools across Alberta.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-South East.

Mr. Jones: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that tweets don't build schools and given that this announcement of 25 projects is 25 per cent more than were announced in 2018 and given that communities across Alberta have been waiting years for some of these projects, including the Calgary north high school, and given that the minister stated on Friday that she views these projects as important investments in our future, can the minister please tell this House about how our government prioritizes projects and chooses which schools will be built?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education is rising.

Member LaGrange: Absolutely. Thank you so much, Mr. Speaker and hon. member. For capital projects to be considered for funding, school divisions must first submit a proposal to the government outlining their request. Once received, my department analyzes the request and prioritizes applications as a result of a series of metrics. We focus on a few key areas, including health and safety concerns, constitutional obligations, and high need for enrolment growth. Albertans can be assured that our government is funding projects that have demonstrated high need for their communities.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Jones: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you again, Minister. Given that the previous government tied playground funding to a separate pool of funding and given that playgrounds are essential for the development of our youth, especially those in grades K to 4, and given that parents across this province have been forced to fund raise hundreds of thousands of dollars for playgrounds beyond the taxes they already pay, can the minister please explain how playground funding will work moving forward?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was very pleased to share on Friday that moving forward, any project that is approved by our government which includes a K to 6 component will include a playground. Our government views playgrounds as essential for the development of the K-to-6-aged youth, and we do not believe the burden should be on parents and communities to raise funds for these projects. Moving forward, parents and communities can be assured that they will no longer need to fund raise hundreds of thousands of dollars for these essential projects.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Edmonton-City Centre has a question.

Physicians' On-call Pay and Rural Health Services

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Now, pay for on-call doctors has been cut by nearly 40 per cent, and that's fuelling concerns that there will be a serious shortage of doctors able to perform surgeries in rural Alberta. Dr. Noel DaCunha, a Westlock-area physician and board member of the Alberta College of Family Physicians, said that it could take three times as long to perform an emergency Caesarean section. He said that, quote, almost certainly there could be a life put at risk. To the minister: are you really ready to risk lives in rural Alberta by demanding a nearly 50 per cent reduction in on-call pay to fund your $4.7 billion corporate giveaway?

The Speaker: The Minister of Health.

Mr. Shandro: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Physicians were notified of these changes on September 30, and the changes came into force on October 1. The physician on-call program funding was reduced by $10 million as a result of an agreement that was reached between the Alberta Medical Association, the Ministry of Health, and Alberta Health Services. The revised on-call program reduces the number of billing categories from five to three and reduces the hourly stipend pay for each category. Officials advise that these changes will not reduce the availability of on-call doctors or impact local care.

Mr. Shepherd: Now, given that Dr. Gavin Parker, a physician in Pincher Creek, said that the $18 paid out per hour to doctors is barely enough to cover the time and travel commitments that come with providing on-call rural health care and given that that pay has now been cut to $11.50 per hour and given that there is no obligation for doctors to take these on-call shifts, to the minister: how can you stand in this House and declare that this somehow won't cause issues with offering quality care in rural Alberta? Is it that you don't actually understand the issue here?

The Speaker: The Minister of Health.

Mr. Shandro: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I said in my previous response, officials advise that these changes will not reduce the availability of on-call doctors or impact the level of care delivered to patients and families. I encourage that any physician with questions or concerns regarding these changes and how they will be impacted should be directed to contact their respective zone clinical department head or zone medical affairs office. I would also like to stress that this was a result of an agreement that was formalized through the decision-making body, that includes the Alberta Medical Association.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Now, given that this reduction in pay for on-call doctors will reportedly save Alberta Health Services about $10 million but given that that is a small price to pay for the peace of mind amongst Albertans who may need emergency care in rural Alberta and given that providing health care in rural Alberta has been a decades-long challenge even before this government implemented its short-sighted cuts, to this minister: have you talked with the members of your caucus who represent rural ridings about how they feel about these reductions that could put their constituents at risk?

Mr. Shandro: Mr. Speaker, you know, I'll mention as well Dr. Ted Braun, the vice-president and medical director of central and southern Alberta for AHS, in a CBC story, where he's quoted. It was posted today, and he made it very clear that he does not believe that the quality of care provided in rural hospitals will change in any way as a result of this. As well, I'd point out that in Alberta the average physician earns $116,000 more than the neighbouring physician in British Columbia. As I said, next year we'll be conducting a review of the physician on-call program.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning is rising.

Child Mental Health Services

Ms Sweet: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's been nearly two weeks since the Minister of Health made the inaccurate, hurtful claims that there wasn't a crisis in children's mental health, and it's been just over a week and counting with the minister refusing to apologize for this horribly hurtful and blatantly false claim. Now that the Minister of Health has had some time to think on the hurt and confusion his words have caused families and children dealing with mental health issues, will he finally and sincerely stand up and apologize?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Shandro: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have been asked this question by our hon. colleagues on the other side a couple of times. I think I made it very clear in my supplemental answers that I was talking about hospital beds in public hospitals. Obviously, this government is spending a significant amount of more money in our budget on mental health and addiction. Obviously, mental health for our children and our adolescents is of great concern to us. I look forward to the members opposite, if they agree with us and this being a concern, voting with us on our budget.

Ms Sweet: Well, given that it doesn't cost anything to say sorry and given, Mr. Speaker, that our government took the idea of addressing mental health concerns seriously and invested $200 million for the child and adolescent mental health centre, to be completed by 2024, and given that the centre would have included 101 in-patient beds, outpatient clinics, mental health programs, and family resources but given that this government has given a $4.7 billion gift to profitable corporations while claiming there's no crisis in children's mental health, can the minister explain why this project doesn't appear in the capital plan, or have you just cancelled it?

Mr. Shandro: I'd like to correct the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, and point out that this project was actually only going to have five net new beds for this $200 million. What we are doing is making sure that we're going to use the new council that was appointed by the Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions to be able to make sure that the capital spending that we spend is going to be in line with our government's priorities, and that's going to include making sure that we're going to continue to have community resources for our children and adolescents for their mental health and addictions.

Ms Sweet: Well, given that this morning the minister said 101 beds and given that the child and adolescent mental health centre appears nowhere, again, in this government's capital plan and given that, written on page 144 of their fiscal plan, this government's corporate giveaway is exactly $4.7 billion and given that the mental health needs of Alberta children should come ahead of corporate profits, can the minister confirm that this oversight will be addressed and that the CAMH centre will be funded, built, and staffed, or does the zero-jobs corporate giveaway take precedence over the mental health of Alberta's youth?

Mr. Shandro: Mr. Speaker, this morning, when I spoke in estimates and answered that question by the hon. member, before I was cut off, the point was that, yes, it was 101 beds, but it's five net new beds, because it was going to be taking beds from the community and placing them all centralized here. That was our concern, and we want to make sure that what happens in our capital spending on mental health, especially mental health for our children and our adolescents, is going to be in line with our priorities and making sure that it's not $200 million for just five net new beds.

Ms Sweet: It's 101. You already said that this morning.

Mr. Shandro: Five net new beds.

The Speaker: Hon. members, we will come to order.
The hon. Member for Drumheller-Stettler has the call.

Rural Municipality Funding

Mr. Horner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Municipal officials in my riding of Drumheller-Stettler are relieved that finally they'll be getting the predictable, long-term capital funding they need, but they have some concerns with the built-in reduction in funding. With reductions on the horizon, they're wondering how they're going to provide the services that residents require while keeping taxes reasonable. Can the Minister of Municipal Affairs outline how this budget will impact rural municipalities in ridings like mine while at the same time ensuring that residents have the core services they deserve?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. We are keeping our promise to maintain funding to municipalities for the 2019-2020 year, and we are keeping our promise to deliver predictable, long-term funding for all municipalities by way of the local government fiscal framework act. It took the NDP four years to almost get the job done. We got the job done with the help of our rural partners like the RMA, who recently said that this budget "represents continued support and collaboration between the province and municipalities."

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Drumheller-Stettler.

Mr. Horner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister. Given that this reduction, while modest, will certainly pose challenges for officials in my riding and others as they seek to provide world-class services without raising taxes and given that many of our rural municipalities are not only already finding it difficult to balance the books but remain viable and survive, can the minister explain what the rationale for these modest reductions was?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The NDP miscalculated the state of Alberta's finances by more than $6 billion. They tried to cling to office with these bogus numbers but were fired by Albertans. We are cleaning up their mess, and that's exactly what we are going to do.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Horner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister. Given that the NDP spent months fearmongering about 30 per cent reductions in infrastructure funding, library funding, disaster relief program funding, et cetera, and given that the budget is now finalized for all to see and given that I've been hearing constituent concerns that $3.25 billion of the approximately $6 billion provincial capital plan is to be spent in Edmonton alone, can the minister explain what areas of concern he's hearing from rural municipalities now that the budget is public?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The member is correct that the NDP spent months spreading misinformation about our budget. The truth is, however, that we are maintaining funding for libraries, 911 centres, disaster recovery programs, and we are delivering on predictable, long-term funding, that all municipalities asked for.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

Provincial Fiscal Position

Ms Armstrong-Homeniuk: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Albertans know how poorly the previous government managed the people's finances. We know they overprojected revenues by billions of dollars. They promised hundreds of millions in the dying days of an election. They always knew they were going to lose. They made promises that they knew full well they could not and would not be able to keep. They left the people holding the bag. To the Minister of Finance: just how bad were the books left to you by the previous, fiscally reckless government?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, when we formed government, we knew that things were tough, but when we actually got a look at the books, they were much worse than we anticipated. The previous government had overprojected revenues by as much as $6 billion in their fiscal plan. We brought forward a budget that brings realistic, credible revenue numbers forward. We have turned down the irresponsible spending trajectory of the previous government to provide a budget that will balance in our first term.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

Ms Armstrong-Homeniuk: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister. Alberta was left with one of Canada's worst fiscal deficits. Given the size of the deficit, tens of billions of dollars in new government debt, six credit downgrades, a tax grab on everything, higher taxes that scared away investments, a job crisis, and the worst economic record since the Great Depression, can the minister explain how our province finds itself in this position?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, the members opposite, when they were governing, had this province with the largest per capita deficit within North America amongst all states and provinces. That was the trajectory that we inherited as a government. We will turn that spending trajectory down 2.8 per cent. It will not be drastic, but it will be enough to bring a credible fiscal plan that will balance in our first term.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Ms Armstrong-Homeniuk: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Alberta finds itself in its worst fiscal crisis since the Great Depression. [interjections] Given that the previous government broke its promise to balance the budget during its mandate and given that they continued to increase spending and continued deficits and added to the provincial debt, that generations of Albertans will be paying for, can the Minister of Finance explain the simple, measured, and realistic steps that he is taking to correct years of mismanagement by the previous fiscally reckless government? [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Hon. members, we will have order.

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, Albertans elected this government, again, to bring our fiscal house in order. The previous government during a time of flat revenues increased spending by 4 per cent per year, leaving us on a trajectory for $100 billion of accumulated debt. This is debt that would have ensured that the next generation of Albertans would not have had access to world-class front-line service delivery. We presented a four-year fiscal plan that turns down operating spending, that will continue to deliver high-quality services, but we'll do it in the most efficient and effective manner.

The Speaker: Hon. members, if we don't take a break, we will finish in approximately the same amount of time, so if you'll stick with me, we will move immediately to the rest of the Routine.

Correction. In 30 seconds or less we will proceed to Members' Statements.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland has a statement to make.

Skilled Trades

Mr. Getson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today regarding National Skilled Trades and Technology Week. I was recently asked how I felt about the trades and if they were important. Quite honestly, I was taken a little aback. I couldn't imagine what our province or our country would be like without skilled tradespeople. I was reminded of a quote that Doug Stanyer, a construction manager and mentor of mine, gave one time. What he had said was: before there was construction, there was nothing.

My first big job was on an industrial project, the Ekati diamond mine, which was in the middle of the tundra in the Northwest Territories, as a project co-ordinator with Ledcor Industrial. This was my first real exposure to the skilled trades, and I learned so much. With winter closing in up north above the tree line, getting that superstructure up was critical. The ironworkers scooped me up as one of their own, and we were troubleshooting and coming up with solutions on the fly to meet schedule.

I also once worked for a pipefitter by the name of Brian Kientz, who was a superintendent. He saw me one night staring at a set of piping drawings as I was trying to understand them. I had never been taught about piping drawings or mechanical drawings in college. He asked me what I was up to, and I explained that it looked like a pile of spaghetti that was thrown on the page. He just laughed and took time out of his day to show me how to read them. Wayne Huddleston, a boilermaker, taught me about conveyor sections and setting crushing equipment. Don Fedun, another boilermaker, taught me about tank construction. John Madsen took the time to teach me about safety and rigging for heavy lifts and how to efficiently manage men to get the job done.

Skilled tradesmen have been my mentors my whole life. Now that I'm on the skilled trades task force and vice-chair of the skilled trades caucus I have a chance to take all that I've learned from these folks and help break down the barriers that have been built up on how the general public perceives tradesmen.

To all the skilled tradeswomen and -men in the province, those working in technology to make our lives better, a heartfelt thank you. After all, before there was construction, there was nothing, and nothing is built without skilled tradespeople.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar has a tabling.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have three tablings today. I rise to table the requisite copies of two letters from teachers around the province who are concerned and speaking out against the decision of the government to take control of the Alberta teachers' retirement fund by transferring the assets to AIMCo.

I have a letter from Jennifer Krauskopf, who is concerned about the minister's statements on child mental health. She says, "I see evidence on a regular basis that the high need of services for child psychiatry in Alberta is greater than current services provide."

I have a letter from Doug Sparks, who is opposed to wage rollbacks for the public sector. He wants me to convey his "most heartfelt disgust to this weasel corporate shill of a government."

The Speaker: Hon. member, you might do that in a member's statement or someplace other than tablings.

The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. Madu: Thank you so much, Mr. Speaker. I have three reports to table before this House today. The first is the Safety Codes Council 2018 annual report.

The second is the Alberta Elevating Devices and Amusement Rides Safety Association 2018/2019 annual report.

Lastly, Mr. Speaker, is the Petroleum Tank Management Association of Alberta 2018 report.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview has a tabling.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have two tablings. These are from teachers that are outraged and shocked that this UCP government is blindsiding them by moving their pensions out of their existing fund. They're worried about some nefariousness that might be going on here.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to table a document entitled Alberta Government Scraps P3 Funding Model for New Schools, where Conservative Minister Wayne Drysdale iterates how P3s cost the government extra money.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud has caught my eye.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On behalf of the Member for St. Albert I would like to table the requisite number of copies of an article titled World Scientists' Warning of a Climate Emergency, signed by 11,263 signatories of scientists from 153 countries.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have three sets of tablings. The first is the requisite number of copies of nine letters that I've received from teachers who are deeply concerned about the implications of this UCP budget on their classrooms.

Next, I have the requisite number of letters from 40 teachers also writing in about how concerned they are about the decision and political interference of this government with regard to the teachers' retirement fund and transferring the asset to AIMCo.

The last set of tablings I have are the supporting documents for the questions I asked earlier today, that being the budgets that were submitted to the provincial government by the Calgary board of education, Calgary Catholic school district, Edmonton public schools, Edmonton Catholic schools, St. Albert schools, Lethbridge, Fort McMurray, and also the five copies of the October targets that were sent out to those boards to show the difference in funding.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre, followed by the Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to table the requisite copies of 21 letters from teachers across the province who have written to me with their concerns, speaking out against the decision and political interference of this government in taking control of the Alberta teachers' retirement fund and forcibly transferring the assets to AIMCo.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Ms Ganley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I also rise to table the requisite number of copies of a letter from a teacher concerned and speaking out against the decision and political interference of this government to take control of the Alberta teachers' retirement fund.

The Speaker: Are there other tablings? The Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise this afternoon to give the requisite copies of 40 letters from teachers around the province concerned about the government's choice to take over the Alberta teachers' retirement fund and transfer it over to AIMCo.

The Speaker: Are there other tablings today?

Seeing none, hon. members, we are at points of order. The point of order by the hon. Government House Leader at 1:55 has been withdrawn.

As such, we are moving to Orders of the Day, Ordres du jour. As hon. members will know, the daily Routine has now concluded and – we might just wait for the Speaker to conclude before exiting – pursuant to Standing Order 59.01(5)(b) the House stands adjourned until this evening at 7:30.

The legislative policy committees will convene this afternoon for the consideration of the main estimates. This afternoon the Standing Committee on Families and Communities will consider the estimates for the Ministry of Health in the Rocky Mountain Room. The Standing Committee on Alberta's Economic Future will consider the estimates for the Ministry of Infrastructure in the Parkland Room.

Hon. members, the House stands adjourned.

[The Assembly adjourned at 2:51 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

7:30 p.m.

Tuesday, November 5, 2019

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, please be seated.

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019

[Adjourned debate November 4: Ms Notley]

The Acting Speaker: Are there any hon. members looking to join debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise this evening to respond to Bill 21, the Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019, which is implementing much of the terrible budget that the UCP government has brought forward. Now, Bill 21, like the other bill, Bill 20, that was introduced on the same day, is an omnibus piece of legislation. What that means is that it touches a variety of different pieces of legislation that exist in different ministries, so in my remarks, brief as they will be at second reading, I'm going to be touching on many of the different aspects of Bill 21.

Let me begin just by stating that I will not be supporting Bill 21, Mr. Speaker, because there are a number of very, very hurtful to Albertans measures within Bill 21.

I'd like to just start by speaking to the various pieces within this bill. I'll start by talking about the changes that impact advanced education, our postsecondary sector. Bill 21 is going to lift the cap on tuition for three academic years and set an alternative cap in regulation. Now, we already know, Mr. Speaker, because the government has told us, that the new cap will be 7 per cent for each institution but up to 10 per cent for individual programs. That means that students in our province who have benefited from a cap on tuition, who've benefited from moving from one of the most expensive places to go to university to now something more close to the national Canadian average, can expect to see their tuition rise by 7 per cent a year for the next three years, 21 per cent. Or if you have registered in a particularly expensive-to-deliver program, perhaps you may see tuition increases as much as 30 per cent, essentially making the cost of postsecondary education more expensive for students in Alberta.

There are so many different problems with this, Mr. Speaker, but I'll highlight one that strikes me. Having the cost of tuition dramatically increase here in the province might mean our Alberta children choosing to go to school in other provinces where it is more affordable for them. The problem with that, as we know, is that a very high percentage of students who go away for university will often stay away. I'm concerned that we are making tuition here in Alberta less affordable, that we are making life less affordable for those students.

Now, also contained in Bill 21 is the increase to the interest rate on student loans by 1 per cent, again costing students significant money, adding up over the term of a student loan. We all know how difficult – well, perhaps we don't all know. Many of us know how difficult carrying student loans can be when you're just starting out in your career. Making sure that you have that debt paid off is often a top priority for new graduates, and what this change does is change the Student Financial Assistance Act and make life more expensive for students.

The government's priority on lifting the cap on tuition and increasing the interest rates on student loans are two changes in Bill 21 that I completely disagree with. I don't think that this is what students asked for, despite what the minister responsible, standing in this House, had to say, and I know that there are university students at universities across this province who are concerned and are talking about organizing protests to try to communicate to this government how hurtful this change in policy can be.

At the same time, this government has cancelled the STEP program, which was often used by young people to find employment in the summer months.

The next section that this Bill 21 impacts is Community and Social Services, in pausing the indexation for people who rely on the assured income for the severely handicapped benefit. As well, Bill 21 moves the eligibility rules to regulation, making it easier for the government in the future, through regulation changes, to change who is eligible for AISH. Both of these changes are incredibly concerning because, of course, what this does is make life harder and more expensive for our most vulnerable, people who rely on the very modest amount of roughly $1,600 per month – that is the amount I've heard discussed in this House – and who will now no longer be receiving the indexation.

What is indexation, Mr. Speaker? This is so that as the cost of living goes up in our province – we know it does each and every year – it offsets that cost of living by providing just a little bit more to the people who rely on AISH. I understand that to be roughly $30 per month. When you are somebody who is living on an extremely fixed income, that is a critical amount of money. Thirty dollars per month can make a huge difference to someone who is living on very, very little. I feel like this government has not understood the argument as to why we should not be pausing the indexing of AISH, why it is important for those who are living with the very least to not essentially have the government balance the budget on their backs. Thirty dollars per month can make the difference between someone being able to get more bus tickets, possibly even go see a movie. Someone who is living on AISH deserves to have that normal life, to be able to afford to maintain a reasonable standard of living, and pausing the indexation completely removes that.

Pausing the indexation: there is also in this legislation no indication as to when the pause will be lifted. I can tell you, having seen it happen when, for example, we froze the price of tuition, that it makes a big impact very quickly. It's $30 a month next year, but that becomes $60 a month in two years, $90 a month the third year. It starts to really add up, and it starts to put a lot of pressure on someone living on a very small fixed income. I do not think that we should be targeting our most vulnerable Albertans, those living on a fixed income, when looking at balancing the budget, especially given the fact that this government's budget still has $2 billion of higher deficit spending than the one planned by our government, especially when we are still ending up at $93 billion of debt at the end of this government's term.

I do not agree with the choice to pause indexation here as well as on employment and income support benefits. Again we're talking about vulnerable Albertans, Albertans who are very much down on their luck. As we all know as MLAs, we have many people who come to our constituency offices in desperate situations, needing help. I'm so grateful that we have Service Alberta and the income supports that we do here in the province, and I see Bill 21 as weakening that.

The energy change included within Bill 21 has to do with removing the regulated rate option cap, tied in with a bunch of other changes with the electricity system. I certainly know that with the move to an energy-only market, with the likelihood of power spikes and price spikes impacting Alberta families, having that regulated rate option cap removed is something Albertans are going to notice.

Now, within Bill 21 there are a number of changes to Health. It includes giving the Minister of Health the authority to place conditions on obtaining a practitioner identification number, a specific piece of policy that I understand two other provinces have very recently moved away from because it doesn't work. The interesting thing to me about this piece of policy is that essentially the government is trying to use a stick to tell doctors where they need to go and practise. By taking ownership, by giving the minister that responsibility of being able to say where somebody can practise, he also has essentially the liability or the responsibility when there is a town that doesn't have a doctor. His phone is going to be ringing off the hook now because he's directly responsible for whether a doctor might set up shop and practise in a rural area, not to mention the constitutional issues with telling someone where they have to live.

I suspect that this piece of poorly-thought-out policy, that other provinces are moving away from, will be a thorn in this government's side should Bill 21 be passed. But I hold out hope, Mr. Speaker, that the reasoned arguments that the opposition is making will break through to the government members, and perhaps some amendments which we will be proposing in Committee of the Whole will be accepted. Hope springs eternal: that is my motto for tonight.

In the Health file it also includes provisions for changes to the doctors' master agreement with the Alberta Medical Association. Essentially, I see this as a further indication of how this government treats partnerships, relationships, bargaining, and that is with a complete lack of respect. Essentially, the government is trying to tilt the bargaining table in their own favour, giving themselves an emergency pull bar, where they can just cancel the agreements that currently exist. That's a bargaining chip. When they are sitting down to talk to doctors, they now have a card that they can more easily play in this game of negotiating, that should be based on respect. We've talked a lot about bargaining in good faith when it comes to the labour relations world. But, really, treating people as adults, going into any negotiations with respect, looking for those opportunities where there is win-win-win: this is all very important. Instead, what the government is doing is giving itself the ability to instead pressure and add bargaining pressure onto the AMA.

I see that as being very similar to the Labour and Immigration change where they are reversing the replacement worker ban in the public sector, essentially tilting the playing field in favour of employers. I strongly disagree with the reversing of the replacement worker ban in the public sector, Mr. Speaker, for a number of reasons. We know that replacement workers tend to escalate situations.

We also know that an essential services agreement is required in so many of our critical workplaces. Now what's going to happen is that the two parties are going to sit down and say, "In the event of a strike at this hospital, how do we make sure that those things that are essential, that are critical to patient care, that are critical to running the facility – to make sure that none of the equipment is damaged in a strike or lockout, let's work out how that is." On this particular ward, perhaps there are normally 10 nurses that are working. In the event of a strike or lockout, there will be two. Well, now those two nurses are going to come to work and replacement workers will also be there, people not familiar with the area, people who need to be trained, potentially, and it's going to escalate the tensions.

It's not going to help lead people to resolve in a respectful labour relations world, the way collective bargaining is designed to do. Think of essential services as a bargain between the two parties, entered into as adults, with respect. Now one side can bargain essential services and then throw that out the window and bring in replacement workers. It does not make sense to me, Mr. Speaker, and I have not heard a good case for why this replacement worker ban is included in Bill 21.

On the Justice and Solicitor General side, Bill 21 creates regulation-making authority and outlines the responsibility of specified municipalities to pay a cost for policing if required by regulation, something that I imagine has many municipalities concerned given the conversations we've been having with policing and the lack of respect that we've seen between partners in something that we should all be able to talk about and work on collectively, because it's all to our benefit. But we're not seeing that out of this government.

Under the Seniors and Housing piece, pausing the indexation of the seniors' lodge program and pausing the indexation of the Alberta seniors' benefit program: this ties into where we started, talking about pausing the indexation for people who rely on AISH. I think an aspect of having a healthy and strong economy, that seems to be lost on this government, is the idea that those who make the least are an important part of our economy. I can tell you that that $30 that someone on AISH is receiving or that little bit more that someone on the Alberta seniors' benefit would get because of indexation gets spent in our local economy. When you start starving these Albertans from the funds that they need to live and survive, when they're not spending, that starts to stall the economy.

Similarly, when you ask for wage rollbacks from the public sector, when you start firing people: these are all things that harm the economy. In so many ways I disagree with how this government is proceeding.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you.

Hon. members, 29(2)(a) is available should anybody – I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung has the call.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I really was interested in what the member was saying, and I know that she probably has a few more minutes to expound upon the topics that are at hand. I wanted to know if there was anything in particular that affected her constituents that has come up recently with respect to the proposals in Bill 21. Quite often we do have constituents come to our offices with concerns that would directly result immediately upon the announcement or introduction of a piece of legislation in the Legislature. I know that's happened to me with respect to Bill 21. It wasn't just simply a matter of a delayed reaction; it was immediate. We had people phoning the office and appearing in person, wanting to tell their stories about the hardship and the harm and the fear they had as a result of the imposition of proposed legislation.

I would like to know if this is widespread in her constituency as well and if indeed she could provide one or two examples of individuals who specifically expressed the fear that this legislation was going to hurt as much as many of the members of the former opposition talked about when they suggested that rectifying what they thought were the problems with Alberta's economy was going to take measures that were going to hurt. Ultimately, now they're sitting in government, and the Ultimate Cuts and Pain Party is true to its word. It's hurting, and I wouldn't mind hearing the member talk a little bit about some of the individuals who come to her office with their stories of ultimate cuts and pain.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, and thank you to my colleague for that question, because he's absolutely right, through my response to Bill 21 – the impact to my local community is very real, and it's something that I've already heard from constituents about. One of the reasons why I'm so proud to represent Edmonton-Mill Woods is that it's a very unique area. It's a community designed during a housing shortage, during boom times in the '70s. Very interestingly, because it's not that common across Alberta, every neighbourhood in Mill Woods has affordable housing. As a result of having affordable housing in each of the neighbourhoods in my community, I do have a lot of people who are on AISH. I have people who are on fixed seniors' benefits, fixed-income seniors in my constituency, and we have received phone calls, one or two walk-ins, similar to what the member was referring to, people who are really concerned.

One of the things that has not been lost on people coming in is the fact that members of this government voted in support of the indexation of AISH when that was brought forward. They spoke passionately in support of this policy. The UCP, in their platform discussions and in interviews, said that reversing the indexing of AISH is not something that they were going to do. What I've heard from constituents who have stopped in to talk to me is a sense of betrayal and a sense of fear about how already difficult budgets to manage are going to be made worse with the changes in Bill 21.

I really want to emphasize that we are talking about people who rely on a very small amount of money to survive. I find it very difficult when I hear the Premier talk about how we have the most generous benefits now, how we will have the most generous benefits, because we are incredibly privileged as MLAs with generous salaries, and we are talking about people who are living on the bare minimum. That $30 does make a big difference when somebody is working with so little. I know this because I have talked to the constituents that this impacts: to the seniors; to the people on AISH; to the university students who are concerned about rising tuition; to the parents who are concerned that they may not be able to send their son or daughter to university and have that be fully paid for, instead relying on loans. The interest on those loans is going up. There are so many different measures here that are quite concerning.

I've also, not only at my constituency office, watched a lot of the discussion on social media with a lot of anger and a lot of surprise. I've seen more than one comment from somebody who voted UCP who says: this is not what I thought I was voting for; this was not what they said during the election. In fact, again, they specifically said that they would not do these things.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there other members looking to speak to the bill? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung has risen.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It gives me pleasure this evening to rise to speak to Bill 21. I first started off by speaking a little bit about the size of the document and what it actually means to have a bill of this size containing measures of this kind. What it means is that we're facing what's commonly known as an omnibus bill, a bill that has, presumably, many measures that have some relation to one another, but that's not necessarily the case.

I don't recall, when we were in government, that we ended up in an exercise such as this, where we had a bill as large and with so many disparate parts coming together. This one is a prime example of what many, over time, in parliamentary parlance would deem to be a rather elephantine piece of legislation that realistically could have been divided into many separate parts, that would have allowed much more defined and, I think, intelligent debate. Not to denigrate any of the words that have been spoken in the House so far on this piece of legislation, but the dissection of some of these pieces of legislation, which bear no resemblance one to the other, probably would have been in the interest of healthy debate and also in the interest of the people of Alberta, who really have a right to fully comprehend exactly what the intent of the legislation is in its small components.

I think that a lot of the measures are intended to be sort of hidden by their own volume. It's unfortunate that the government has chosen to operate this way with such a large omnibus bill. I won't beat that element to death. I just wanted to register my thoughts on the strategy the government has used, to stack numerous measures that are proposed in Bill 21 so that they can employ the principle: if you throw so much against the wall, people won't have an opportunity to fully digest it. That, of course, Mr. Speaker, is what we intend to assist with in our debates here, including tonight, on Bill 21.

The bill is an omnibus bill, as I mentioned, that I think attempts to create a smokescreen and looks to follow the theme of the government's war room where they create and pick fights with people and divide them. I would caution members of the government that when you do pick fights and divide people and create a smokescreen, you play with fire and you can get burned. People who feel that they're under attack will fight back.

I think evidence of that is shown by the number of constituents who are visiting our offices or who are calling and e-mailing, very upset and distraught in many cases, over the effects that they see Bill 21 proposes and will have on their livelihood, their life, their ability to live, and in particular over how much of an effect it's going to have on their children, particularly children of low-income families and particularly where there's a single parent involved, most often a mother. The stresses that these families are under already are burdensome right now, and the government is piling on to the costs that these families face. The stress that I sense in the phone calls that I'm getting is nuanced by many different elements of the government's policy that are now coming to bear on their budget, on the family budgets of low-income people, who seem to be the favourite target of this government. It's shameful, in my view, that they would see fit, in what many have deemed very petty ways, to nickel and dime families who are least able to afford to pay more in their strapped position.

For example, we've talked in this House already about the so-called temporary suspension of the indexation of benefits for AISH, the assured income for the severely handicapped. That is something that is unthinkable, is unconscionable, and many in the province – many pundits, many commentators, many letters to the editor, certainly every MLA in the opposition on this side of the House – can't believe that the government saw fit to actually go ahead and do this, to deindex the benefits for assured income for the severely handicapped, especially in a situation where that was something they just recently achieved and fought for.

We finally, as a government ourselves, were able to make that happen and give a small increase to AISH payments. It still wasn't as far as we would have hoped to have gone to increase and improve benefits for those who are really at the bottom rung of our economic spectrum, yet this government saw fit to dial that back. Perhaps you're hearing those individuals coming into your offices, MLAs' offices for members of the government, the desperation in the voices of these people who are wondering aloud how in the heck they're going to make ends meet. How are they going to see their way clear to ending up having around $30 a month less in actual dollar power and spending power as a result of this deindexation? That's on an annual basis, and it's ongoing.

It's interesting to note that if one does a bit of research on other governments in the past in this country who have temporarily deindexed the benefits for those on low incomes, no matter what they happened to be, whether it was direct benefits of assistance or whether it was tax bracket alterations or, to use the word the government likes to use, to pause the indexation of such benefits or tax brackets, the average length of time which these pauses tended to last seems to be about 15 years. Some pause. These people can look forward to a long period of time of suffering from loss of this indexation if indeed history is any indicator on this topic.

Now, I would suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that if indeed the government changes in this province and we were to assume power once the next election is over, we would see a lot shorter period of time when this measure was in place. We would once again put in place the indexation of benefits for AISH recipients and, hopefully, also improve the actual benefit itself.

It was surely a shock to everybody on AISH in this province and all the family members who know somebody or who have a family member on AISH and everybody in the province who tried to imagine living on under $1,700 a month that this government saw fit to yank the carpet from underneath the feet of these folks and deindex them. It's attacking the people with the lowest possible income and income supports. It was an expression in letters to the editor that I hope resounded at the cabinet table and in the caucus room of the government very, very strongly, because this is a measure that I really think the government has an opportunity to save some face on and to rescind as part of this proposed Bill 21.

I really strongly believe that it will be an Achilles heel for this government and it will be wise for them to recognize that it probably wasn't the smartest thing to do, to deindex AISH. It really doesn't bode well for them.

What it does is hurt people; it hurts the people that really need our help. This government purportedly was one that was looking after individuals who needed help in the face of growing jobs and the economy, yet that's not what they're doing. They're basically balancing the books on the backs of our poorest people. It leaves a bad taste in the mouths of Albertans, who have a great sense of fair play. Certainly, people in this province are proud of the hard work that they do, but they also recognize that not everybody is born equal, with equal abilities to sustain themselves, and we have a responsibility to help individuals who do need it and rely upon it.

Yet to do what we've done in this measure alone is something that's a stain upon the record of this government and, I would dare say, in the history of this province. Hopefully, they recognize how brutal this is appearing to be as a behaviour on the part of the government and decide to rescind at least this measure; if not others, at least this measure. Every government has some Achilles heel, and this one, I think, is something that will really be damaging. It's not going to die down. It won't go home. It's a chicken that's come home to roost, and roost indeed it will in perpetuity unless the government sees fit to rescind this motion.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that you get the drift that I'm very, very upset that this indexation has been suspended or paused, and I intend to keep hammering on it until I see some movement on the part of the government. If they don't, I'll be one on this side of the House, joined by all my colleagues, who will rail against it, a nonstop campaign on behalf of those individuals who are suffering as a result of this very heartless – heartless – measure.

I also wanted to talk a little bit about the income support for the seniors' lodge program. It's something that we've grown to rely upon in this province, and it's something that I know back from the days when my own grandmother was a village councillor and deputy mayor in Thorhild, where they were in a big battle to get the lodge as the county seat in Thorhild versus Redwater, who wanted it as well. Thorhild ended up getting that lodge, and that was a huge feather in their cap.

The ability for people to live in place in their own village after retirement is something that people cherish. It's a right, it's an opportunity that people cherish, especially in Small Town, Alberta, in rural Alberta, which this government so happily purports to represent and whose interests they have at heart, according to them. Yet here they are in their retirement years, when people want to retire in their community, close to home, close to perhaps where they were farming, and supports for the seniors' lodge program are being cut back by measures contained in Bill 21. That leaves people in villages like Thorhild and Redwater or Spedden or Warspite or wherever you happen to be in Alberta where there are found these seniors' lodges, which are really the pride of the province – they were something that was a job well done in the past by past governments to provide these affordable housing locations within the local residential areas of rural Alberta, in particular, and now they're being threatened.

People are scratching their heads, basically asking the same thing as those who have had their AISH indexation suspended. They're asking: "What the heck did I ever do to you? What did I do to deserve this kind of treatment?" They didn't expect this kind of behaviour from a government that was elected to look after those who are least able to look after themselves but is now simply paying lip service to that claim. In real terms, they're going backwards. They're backsliding on those promises when it comes to AISH recipients and our valued seniors who are looking to retire with dignity in their home communities.

Mr. Speaker, I'm doubly disappointed on these two measures alone, but there are many, many more. This omnibus bill goes on at length, and it spares no age group or no pocket of our population when it comes to them facing the axe from the Unending Cuts and Pain Party.

The tuition freeze that we had in place as a government for three years is something I'll talk about a little later on today.

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, I see the hon. Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction has risen under 29(2)(a).

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I just wanted to comment on some of the things the hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung said. In April of this year Albertans had to make a decision. They had to make a decision on whether or not they were going to follow a plan presented by the NDP to get our financial house in order. They rejected that because they did not believe that the NDP were serious or that they could. In fact, they took a look at the past record of the NDP: six credit downgrades in four years, an all-time record; going from $13 billion to $63 billion in debt; some of the highest deficits that this province has ever seen. I think that what they asked was: really, do we feel like these wraparound services are in jeopardy under an NDP plan? They recognized that they were in jeopardy in terms of sustainability.

So this government said: in order for us to be able to provide these wraparound services, that we hold so dear in Alberta, for those people who need them, we have to be able to get our financial house in order to be able to have those wraparound services for future generations. We are not a government just for today. We are a government for our future generations, and when we spend their inheritance, what they have as wraparound services – education, health care – we do a terrible disservice to our children and our grandchildren.

Unfortunately, the NDP continue to talk about how bad this is, but let's be realistic. The truth is that there are $1,400 AISH payments that go out every month to individuals. This is a third higher than the closest jurisdiction to us. [interjections] Sorry; $1,700. I appreciate that.

Really, again, the position that the NDP have taken is a position where they say that this deindexing is actually pulling money away. The truth is that we have never had indexing in this province – never – since I believe 1979. Now, the members opposite – this is actually considered in their argument as a smokescreen. They're angry at us for having a real, credible strategy and plan to get ourselves in balance so that we can have sustainability of these wraparound services. This is the reality that Albertans were faced with on April 16, and this is the reason why a million Albertans gave us a mandate to get our financial house in order, because they do feel that it's important to have these wraparound services. Because of that, the NDP are upset with the decision that Albertans made.

We have a reasonable, credible plan to get ourselves back to balance so that we have sustainability in this province, and this is the reason why Albertans have chosen us to carry forward the flag for Alberta and to work for our most vulnerable.

It is disingenuous for the members opposite to continue to talk about how we are destroying the future of these programs when, in reality, we are making them sustainable. It's sad to see them grandstand on this issue, especially on the most vulnerable people of our province. For them to do that is deplorable, Mr. Speaker, and I don't believe that it serves those people who are in these positions well at all. We can talk about disagreements with our budget. That is exactly what we're supposed to be doing in here. But to grandstand on the people who are on AISH, our seniors: this is the worst kind of politics. What we should be talking about is who has a credible plan to be able to help get Alberta back on track for the sustainable programs that we have. That's really what we need to be doing.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you.

Hon. members, are there any other members wishing to join debate? I see the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West has risen.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to offer some of my thoughts on Bill 21, which proposes to do a number of things, including suspending indexation of benefits for the assured income for the severely handicapped income support and the seniors' lodge program.

I find it interesting to be following the Member for Taber-Warner who, not a year ago, on November 28, 2018, speaking to the matter of indexing AISH in legislation, that very member: "We believe that this is actually a fairly good, common-sense amendment and that the bill was good and that it's something that needs to be done, yet here we hear once again how bad we are for accepting it, supporting it, and voting for it." Less than a year ago, Mr. Speaker, this particular MLA voicing support for Bill 26 at the time, An Act to Combat Poverty and Fight for Albertans with Disabilities. I guess we are not combatting poverty and fighting for Albertans with disabilities anymore, and for what, precisely? A deficit that is $2 billion higher than the NDP, a debt that is coming in within 3 per cent of the NDP, for personal income tax hikes on every single one of us, and a number of other measures in Bill 21 that will make life less affordable, including ending the tuition freeze, increasing student loan interest rates, and increasing people's electricity bills.

Now, the Member for Taber-Warner was not the only person to speak in favour of indexing AISH at that time. We also had the Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul:

This indexing to CPI will greatly benefit all support recipients who have been waiting for years for an adjusted amount that reflects today's cost-of-living increases.

I guess we are no longer going to be giving those amounts. I will go on.

We've heard, devastatingly, from AISH advocates that some cannot even afford basic necessities. This is absolutely unacceptable.

I guess it's acceptable now for people to not be able to afford basic necessities. It's $30 a month, roughly, in the first year, but through the power of compounding it will be more in subsequent years. We know it's not temporary. The fact of the matter is that maybe we should go back to the Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul one more time:

Every Albertan, as a base, should be confident in their ability to afford personal hygiene products and necessities. There is absolutely no one who should worry if this will be impossible for them.

Now there will be thousands of people who are thinking about their meal planning for the week. That's what AISH recipients in my constituency of Lethbridge-West have told me. That's what indexing means to them. That's why we did it, and that's why a little over a year ago this bill passed with the support of many of the members in this House, including the member who just stood up and said that we were the ones grandstanding. Well, it sounds to me like voting for Bill 26 a year ago was the dictionary definition of grandstanding, of saying one thing to get elected, to tell a story to people, a disingenuous story as it turns out, and then doing exactly another for the most vulnerable people. It is completely unnecessary. The actual number of dollars we are talking about pales in comparison to other matters that have been made a priority by the members across the way.

I notice here, too, that we have changes to the seniors' lodge program, the seniors' benefits. There are a number of seniors' lodges in Lethbridge and surrounding area. Free political advice: these folks vote. I have met with many of them. Some of them are in Lethbridge-East; some of them are in Lethbridge-West. Some of them are in Coaldale; some of them are out in Picture Butte and elsewhere. I don't remember ever going into a seniors' lodge and seeing a piece of UCP literature that said that rental supplement programs were going to change, saying that people were going to get less on seniors' lodge programs, saying that older Albertans were going to get kicked off the seniors' drug program or any of the other seniors' initiatives that we find in this budget that are enabled by Bill 21. I don't recall anyone ever campaigning on that to the thousands of seniors who live in Lethbridge-East and Lethbridge-West.

But you know what, Mr. Speaker? They're talking to me now. They are not impressed. They are not impressed at all, and there are a great number of them in Lethbridge-East who are wondering exactly what they were sold by this UCP government. They're wondering why they are the ones to have to pay for a $4.7 billion tax cut. I'll continue to talk to them in Lethbridge-West and Lethbridge-East because somebody has to stand up for seniors. Somebody has to stand up for adults with severe disabilities and complex needs.

Somebody has to stand up for students, too. Lethbridge is known for two things, as I shared with the House last night, seniors and students. We have a number of students who come from elsewhere to do their undergraduate degrees at the U of L, and it is also a place where many folks who come from rural communities come in, and they end up settling in Lethbridge. They are not amused that their student loan interest is going up. I don't remember ever seeing that in the volumes that were produced as part of the UCP platform. They were not honest about that at all. I don't remember ever seeing anything for the parents who are sending their students to the University of Lethbridge about ending their tuition and education tax credits either. So we have a number of pieces here that are going to have consequences, Mr. Speaker.

You know, Lethbridge-East elected a Liberal from 1992 to 2012, and Bridget Pastoor served in this House for many, many years. She has been a good friend and mentor to me. She was enormously successful in politics, both at city council and at being an opposition member from Lethbridge, because she spent an awful lot of time talking to seniors in Lethbridge-East. You know, those folks have a lot of voting power. They show up to vote, and no one ever told them that they were going to be losing these kinds of benefits within seven months of this government taking office. They made haste to go after seniors and their pocketbooks.

You know, it's really interesting, some of the rationale for Bill 21. One might find it on page 131 of the business plan, in which in some ways it sort of says that it's a problem that seniors' incomes are higher than in the rest of the country. I'm hoping for this particular performance indicator that the idea here isn't to push that performance indicator down by pushing down the incomes of the lowest income seniors. It will be noticed. It will be noticed in southern Alberta. It'll be noticed at the Alberta Rose Lodge, which is in Lethbridge-East. It'll be noticed at the Blue Sky Lodge in Lethbridge-East. It'll be noticed at the Heritage Lodge, right in downtown west Lethbridge. It'll be noticed at the Pemmican Lodge in downtown west Lethbridge. It'll be noticed at the Golden Acres Lodge, which is in Lethbridge-East. It'll be noticed at the Piyami Lodge in Picture Butte. It'll be noticed at the Sunny South Lodge in Coaldale.

Mr. Speaker, there are political consequences for going after low-income people's standard of living. The hubris is still strong. It's wafting from the other side of the House, but I have a feeling – I have a feeling – that when Albertans get a good sense of what this government is doing through Bill 21 and who they are targeting to bear the brunt of their $4.7 billion tax cut, the tone will begin to change, or perhaps the arrogance will become more hardened. I'm not sure.

Anyway, moving on to allowing the Health minister to place conditions on new practitioner identification numbers: of course, this is unconstitutional. You know, barely a bill goes by where this government doesn't take the opportunity to find a way to back up a dump truck of cash onto some lawyer's lawn because it contains within it something that will be challenged. In this case, it will be that because it has already been struck down in two provinces, Mr. Speaker. Now, there are ways to work with the Alberta Medical Association, without abrogating people's Charter rights, to ensure that we have rural health care. These things can be done. We have some experience with this on this side of the House. Certainly, the Albertan Medical Association probably has some good ideas for how to affect that particular public policy and those outcomes as well, but we're not finding that in here. We're just finding an affection for the hammer of doing things that are against the law.

Of course, next step, we have changes to the master agreement with the Alberta Medical Association, going back to seniors, who are folks who use the health care system. Now, there is no question that reform of physician compensation was a matter that took up a lot of bandwidth for the past four years and even prior to us, because the physician agreements were something that was grappled with in the Stelmach and Redford governments as well. There is no question about this. Having said that, allowing unilateral changes to the master agreement will prompt a war with doctors, and who will suffer? It will not be the people in this House. It will not be the wealthy donors and the people who were funnelling money through dark-money PACs to elect the members across the way. No. It will be patients. It will be seniors who live in the lodges that I just listed into the record, Mr. Speaker.

Now, finally, I don't ever recall anyone campaigning in the election on having fewer cops on the street. That is not something that I remember anyone taking a position on. It would have been a rather alarming position to take, especially given some of the issues we've seen in particular with drug trafficking and so on in southern Alberta. I don't ever remember anyone taking a position that we should have fewer police, certainly not the party of so-called law and order.

We see neither thing in this bill. We've certainly seen an unconstitutional move around physicians: so not so much enamoured with the law. Allowing changes to the master agreement: not so enamoured with order. Certainly, many of the changes in terms of changing through regulation how municipalities pay for policing: also not terrifically orderly. I'm noticing out there that that the municipalities aren't exactly going wild for this proposed change in Bill 21, Mr. Speaker. I'm not seeing a parade of validators for the minister's news conference in which he takes a victory lap on some of these changes that are hidden in Bill 21; in fact, quite the opposite. I am seeing a number of municipalities wondering how they are going to make sure that those police stay on the street and how they're going to fund that, given the changes that are also contemplated here in terms of changing how the province uses fine money that it collects on behalf of municipalities.

So, Mr. Speaker, I'll conclude my remarks with this. I think there are a number of things in this bill, and that is by its very nature. It is an omnibus bill designed such that there are so many different things in it that, you know, the opposition will stand up and they will say their piece, but a lot of the things will get lost in the shuffle. So I think, at the end of the day, what's going to be noticed are the things that hit people on their bottom line and the very, very cynical moves, in particular doing things that nobody campaigned on. Nobody really campaigned on higher electricity rates, although that is what this bill contemplates. Nobody campaigned on more of your disposable income after graduation going to student loan interest. Nobody campaigned, certainly, on ending indexation of benefits to AISH; in fact, quite the opposite. Both parties campaigned on indexing AISH. Apparently, only one had the intention of doing what they said they were going to do.

You know, in politics I have noticed that a lot of people have a lot of time for politicians regardless of their political stripe if they just follow through on what they said they were going to do. I can't tell you how many times I've had this conversation with Albertans, and I'm sure many of the folks in this Chamber have, too. You know, "Say what you will about Ralph Klein," people used to say, "he did what he said he was going to do."

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar has risen on 29(2)(a).

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I want to thank my friend from Lethbridge-West for her comments on this legislation. She spent a lot of time talking about the impacts that this legislation will have on a number of people in her community, and I want to thank her for that.

I want to know if she would like to expand on the impacts that she sees to Lethbridge with the increases in tuition that this government is foisting upon students. Given that Lethbridge is a city of higher learning, with both the University of Lethbridge and Lethbridge College in a city of about a hundred thousand people, the student population is a significant portion of the population. We know that a lot of the students who attend university or college in Lethbridge come from out of town, so I'd like to know what impact driving students away from Lethbridge College and Lethbridge University, through these tuition increases and other ways that this government is making life more expensive for students, will have on the economy of Lethbridge now and on the future of Lethbridge. What will Lethbridge look like if it can't train people with skills for jobs for the future and can't train people to be citizens who are engaged in public life, the way that our government did? I'm eager to hear the Member for Lethbridge-West's thoughts on that issue.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West, with three minutes, 20 seconds left.

Ms Phillips: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. In the limited time I have, I think the biggest thing to underline is that when students have disposable income, when they have a summer job, when their tuition costs are under control, then you really do see in the months from September to the end of April quite a large uplift in terms of activity, particularly in the shoulder seasons – of course, in the winter it's a little bit different – in the downtown, for small businesses in the downtown. You see young people out and about a lot more, and when you talk to small businesses that are part of the business revitalization zone, the downtown BRZ, they will tell you the kind of purchasing power that both students, faculty, and support staff at the university and the college have, and that is really keeping a lot of the small businesses alive, quite frankly, in Lethbridge. So I think any reduction in FTEs that comes as a result of cuts or a reduction in disposable income that comes as a result of skyrocketing tuition will have an effect. There's no question. It will very likely have an effect as well on the housing and rental markets, and it will certainly have an effect on other associated services such as food banks, the health care system, counselling, and so on.

You know, the multiplier effects, in a positive way, of these two institutions, the college and the university, are very easy to see in the city and, in fact, the public service more generally; 20 per cent of the GDP of Lethbridge comes from the public service, about 1 in 5 dollars. That is an important driver of the economy because it is a regional health care hub, it is a regional seniors' care hub, as I described, and it is a regional education hub as well.

It bears noting that it's not just the tuition changes, but the changes to agricultural research will have a profound effect on the city's economy as well. At the end of the day, the moves around postsecondary and, in particular, to put ever more of that burden on students will mean a decreased amount of economic activity in the downtown. There's no question about that. Indeed, the University of Lethbridge Students' Union wrote a letter today expressing their dismay with this government's choice to, quote, put the debt on the backs of students. Too bad for them: the debt will still be on their backs, but they will also be paying more.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadows has risen to speak to second reading of Bill 21.

Mr. Deol: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my honour to rise in the House to speak to Bill 21, Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019. I just wanted to say that indeed I will not be supporting this bill. The reason why I'm not supporting this bill is not really based on philosophical articles or readings or my point of view. My arguments that I'm having against this bill are coming more from real life, what is exactly happening, the feedback in my riding and in my communities.

To put this into perspective, when I was looking at the bill, you know, I tried to visualize what exactly we're trying to address in this House with regard to, I will say, the fortune of Albertans. The last few days I tried to visualize exactly what we're seeing with numbers like $4.7 billion, those billions. I tried to actually visualize those numbers: what do those numbers look like? When I came up with the information, I was surprised. When we were discussing every time a $4.7 billion cut, a giveaway to big corporations, something came up on the Internet like this: one of the demographical visualizations will show that this is something like, in weight, 94,000 pounds or that this is a stack of bills 600 kilometres tall or long. So you can imagine, when we're talking about $4.7 billion, what we are discussing here. Many of the members of this House, I'm very sure, probably would not have experience handling practically $4.7 billion. That's why we will probably not see the direct impact, you know, of what we're trying to discuss here.

The other thing is it's not only the $4.7 billion, that amount of money that I'm talking about, all the way from here to probably past Lethbridge, the stack of bills, the amount of money, but also the government's path to address, to fund that money, you know, on the backs of the not even, I would say, average Albertan. Looking at Bill 21, it's the most vulnerable people who need that very support, the ones that the government, I think, has determined to help, the people of their jurisdiction, in this case Albertans, the people who would expect the government to stand up, to have their back. But in this case the government actually picked those people to fund all those big corporations in the name of creating jobs.

In fact, it has been proven not only in Alberta. We have seen in the past six, seven months that my colleagues the members of this side of the House have been arguing that, you know, this experience has already been proven in many jurisdictions in the world that it does not really create that so-called trickle-down effect. All that happened is that the corporations were happy to put the money in their pockets and then probably find a place where they see that it is maybe more reasonable and wiser for them to go to do business and make a bigger profit.

That's exactly what we're seeing here in Alberta with Husky Energy: $233 million. In fact, I will come to the point where the members on this side of the House are trying to discuss the effect on AISH recipients, students, and other vulnerable people. The one company that pocketed $233 million from this government, all they did was handed out pink slips to their workers, and now they are announcing that they are going somewhere else to invest.

One more company, EnCana: $54 million. Those kinds of amounts we can never imagine in our life, and you can expect what those most vulnerable people would probably understand about those amounts. EnCana has already pocketed that money, and they are not entrusted to create jobs. They are just looking at where they can make much more profit easier. They have made an announcement to move out of the province.

Given the evidence, it is not just us. It's everywhere, and I think that the government members also acknowledge this. The biggest problem is that the government is still not willing to listen. To fund that $4.7 billion, the very painful thing we're discussing here is that the government picked the people that are called the severely handicapped. You know, when I'm discussing this, the severely handicapped, "severely" is a key word in this.

I am emphasizing "severely" because I have been involved in such a real case for the last two months, where an individual is suffering from multiple sclerosis and is completely in a wheelchair. His wife is trying to look after him 24 hours and somehow managed to get two hours of a job to maintain her household expenses. She lost that very job a month ago. So I'm working with that family. They sold their car – they cannot afford their car anymore – and they can hardly pay their rent. Last month she asked me: "Please, find me a job or find a solution. We do not really have money for groceries this month."

This is what this government is doing. When it comes to serving your people, that is the duty we have in this House. This is what this UCP party had actually committed to those people in the election. They did not actually run the election on the agenda that they would come after those very vulnerable people and make them pay $4.7 billion that they weren't campaigning on.

It's not only this. I'm also, you know, involved with another family. They have a special-needs child, and their whole family style has been changed. The mother cannot go to work anymore. She cannot, you know, afford to be the same person anymore even though the child has grown to be 10 or 12 years old. But it's not time that the mom can tell the child to get up and get ready, we're going to go the store or we're going to go to the school.

Those are the people who need support mostly, and the government turns their back to them. The government is still thinking that by funding $4.7 billion – it has been proven in the last seven months that Alberta has lost 27,000 jobs, instead of creating, instead of helping anything in Alberta.

The other thing I just wanted to discuss is not only what the government is trying to address in this Bill 21. It's not one sentence of those lines, I would say, when they said that they're ending the tuition freeze, you know, suspending the tuition cap. You need to see the direction and the systemic moves they're making.

It was not long ago when they rolled back the youth worker wage. We argued that the youth worker wage is very critical for those young people to save money for their higher education, to maintain the expenses. Sometimes the parents are not able to support, and in many cases they help the family with earning that little money.

The government so badly went after those people, and they didn't stop there. I can see the move in this bill. I don't know what's going to be next after this. Now the government suspended the tuition cap. Not only that, they have also raised the interest on their loans. So the average student will probably end up paying $4,000, $4,500 more in their yearly tuition fee. So that is a move.

The government, I think, failed to understand about all those young people. It's not only the future of those young people; it is the future of this province. When those people go to universities, join programs, they are not only trying to progress their own career. They're trying at the same time, you know, to contribute to their own field with the expertise they will get to make this place better for all.

This is the key point I think this UCP government has failed to recognize: the funding of our schools, the funding of our universities. Standing behind these young people is not only critical to help those people, but it's also very crucial to save the future of our province and the future of our country.

The other thing I really wanted to mention is something that Bill 21 is trying to address. Bill 21 will give more powers to the minister to intervene and make decisions with regard to the family physicians and doctors, where they can work. I don't know. The government probably is trying to do it with good intentions, but I would expect that on this, then, the government has a whole lot of resources when they're looking into something and coming up with the decisions to change the direction, to move to help the province. They would have, actually, the work done.

I'm coming from places where the governments have moved in that direction, but it had in no way helped the people, the young people and the people of those jurisdictions. That had become more and more, I would say, part of controversies where these kinds of powers are mostly used to penalize your opponents when it comes to – it has opened the way to corruption even, in many cases.

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, 29(2)(a) is available. I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora has risen.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member for his comments. I really appreciate the stories he's been telling so far. I was wondering if during this exchange he might be able to elaborate on some of the things he heard from folks during the election campaign. Did he hear from any seniors who said, "You know, I understand our drug coverage is too rich; maybe it should be rolled back"? Did he hear from anyone on AISH: "You know, I understand that we get about a third more than other provinces, so I think my AISH should be rolled back"? Did he hear from seniors who live in his riding: "You know, I understand that maybe my own income shouldn't be indexed"? I definitely didn't hear any of those things, and I'm wondering if the member could talk about that. Did he hear from students who said: "You know, I think my student loan payment should go up. I think that my tax credit should be eliminated"? Did he hear any of those things when he was door-knocking? If not, what are some of the things that he did hear from those groups that he would have liked to have seen addressed in a government omnibus bill about the budget?

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadows.

Mr. Deol: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. That's the biggest thing I just wanted to emphasize. During the election the UCP in this case did not really – I just wanted to find the parliamentary word. Did they campaign on what they intended to do after winning the election? This is the biggest thing.

When I was going door to door, yes, in fact, jobs were biggest of the concerns in my riding and probably in most parts of Alberta. When the leader of the UCP rented or bought a blue truck, travelled from one corner to the other corner, there was only one slogan: They Will Create Jobs. There was no discussion that when we get in power, we will fund those big corporations, and the ordinary Albertans or the most vulnerable people of this province will be obliged to pay those big corporations, because somehow, you know, the leader of the UCP kind of had, I would say, the passion or something he thought about, that this was something, his obligation to do so.

But now, seven months into the government, when we talk to the students, when we talk to the seniors, the people are worried. The people probably differ from the UCP's ideas on a lot of stuff, but now they're angry. Now they're scared. This was not even something in discussion, so what's going to happen now?

As the Member for Edmonton-Glenora, you know, asked me about this, I just wanted to mention that during the break today I was trying to address the issue where a senior right now actually needs to go to a facility, but the facility cost will be approximately $2,000 to $2,100, and he's not in a position to come up with that kind of amount. So during this afternoon for a few hours I was just working on that case. I was trying to see what kind of help is available, how I can just be involved in this to help that individual and family.

This is the reality I'm bringing on. I'm not just discussing bringing the philosophical debate here, the articles or writings from one or the other journal. This is the reality. This is what is happening on the ground. The government members need to realize.

Then, talking to youth. My own son, you know, goes to NAIT, and this is his second year. It was quite challenging even paying for his fees last year, and when he is looking at this increase, he is looking at me.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you.

Hon. members, I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo has risen to speak.

Member Ceci: I appreciate that, Mr. Speaker. You know, I have of course looked at this bill in detail along with my colleagues and listened to debate and want to touch on some of the things that have been mentioned tonight but also to kind of put my own spin on things.

First of all, you know, we all got into politics to help Albertans out. Politics is absolutely about choices. I can tell you that when I got elected in 2015, it was when things were crashing in our economy in this province. People remember that. They started before the election in May of 2015. In late 2014 the economy started going downhill pretty rapidly and led to Premier Prentice at the time pulling the trigger one year early on an election so he could get in front of all of that, Mr. Speaker. He wasn't successful, and the leader of the NDP captured the hearts and minds of Albertans. We were a government, and 54 or 55 of us sat on that side. It's about choices. During the most difficult recession Alberta has had in two generations anyway, we made choices that would have the backs of Albertans. We made choices that would protect Albertans through one of the deepest, darkest economic times in this province.

Former Vice-president Joe Biden says, when people come up to him and say, you know, what they value and all of that sort of thing, "Show me your budget." I would argue that we could show him this bill and we could show him the budget presented by the government, and he would judge that to be wanting. He says, "Show me your budget, and I'll tell you what you value." I don't think it takes very much investigation to see that the other side values a $4.7 billion corporate handout more than they value the struggling Albertans who need their assistance. I've heard repeatedly from that side over the last several weeks: we will be there for the most vulnerable. Well, Mr. Speaker, they are going to put more and more Albertans in that position as a result of what they are doing.

I want to put on the record that when we came into government, the economy was going down, as I said. There was a retrenchment or a retraction of the GDP, about 4 per cent in 2015 and about the same amount in 2016. But in 2017 and '18, Mr. Speaker, the economy came back in this province, and it came back by about 4-plus per cent in 2017 and about 2.8 per cent in 2018. Now, this year, it's less than half a per cent, and that side has overseen the disinvestment in this province that's resulting from their $4.7 billion corporate handout not stimulating the economy. In fact, it does stimulate shareholders of EnCana and Husky and every other energy company. Some are staying here, and others are leaving to make their domicile in the United States or other places. It does stimulate them, but it's not stimulating the economy. As a result, Albertans are worse off as a result of the actions propagated by the UCP government.

Before I go too much further, let me also put on the record that, you know, contrary to what we hear from the other side all the time,

Alberta under the NDP government had the lowest net debt to GDP of all the provinces and still has the lowest net debt to GDP of all the provinces. We would have balanced one year later than they propose that they're going to balance. At that point, Alberta under us would have still had the lowest net debt to GDP. Independent economists, Mr. Speaker, when they look at Alberta's balance sheet, say that it's the healthiest in the country. It was under us; it's still the healthiest in the country.

But the issue that will make it problematic going forward and problematic for our economy is that Bill 21 makes life more expensive for Albertans, all sorts of Albertans. I'll just touch on some of those areas where I disagree profoundly with what's in Bill 21. The bill takes off the legislated cap on tuitions. What we know about tuition is that it forms a substantive part of the cost of going to postsecondary school. When I went, there were grants and loans, and those things have been eroded and will be eroded by this UCP government. Tuition, for instance, can go up 7 per cent per year – and I think that in this bill or the information we've received from the budget over the last couple of weeks, it can go up 7 per cent per year – and it's likely to go up 21 per cent over three years. Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker, young people looking at their futures and trying to decide if they can afford to go to school?

You know, this province is blessed with great natural resources, and when we say that, in many cases people focus only on oil and gas, maybe agriculture, too. They focus on what's under our feet in this province. Of course, we didn't have anything to do with that. That was put there by God and geology.

But the other natural resource that gets overlooked all the time is our population, our people, our young people in particular, Mr. Speaker. Young people are what drive this province forward. We're the youngest province of all the provinces in the country. We have the most talented people in education, and we want them to continue to be able to afford to go to postsecondary education so they can be the sources of solving the difficult conundrums or wicked problems that we're experiencing in this province and in this world at this time like climate change, like poverty, like how best to address the health issues that all people experience, like Alzheimer's and dementia. We need young people to be our greatest natural resource, and they can't be that greatest natural resource if they are burdened by huge costs to go to school.

When parents have children, Mr. Speaker, they very much start planning right away for those kids. Of course, what parent doesn't want their child to go to college or trade school or postsecondary to make the best life for themselves as they can possibly make and be fulfilled and have fulfilling lives? But it's going to be challenging under Bill 21 and this UCP government to ensure that all Albertans who want to get to school have that opportunity.

Universities are expensive enough, Mr. Speaker, and that side is making them more expensive. During our time in government, when the legislated cap was on for tuitions, for the whole time we were in government, we were able to see our most expensive universities, the most expensive in the country, come down in price. During our time we saw our universities become the third-least expensive in the country as a result of our work. You know, that promise that parents make to their children when they're born, that promise that we should all have with the young people coming up and having their backs, that's being eroded as a result of Bill 21.

This bill hurts families significantly, Mr. Speaker, not only in the education area that I've just talked about but also because it creates greater inequality amongst Albertans in this province. Families, for instance, need access to health care. When parents have young ones, there are so many times when they really need to be getting the comfort and direction of a doctor or a primary care nurse or other sorts of things.

This bill, as André Picard in the Globe today indicated, is bound to fail because of the restrictions it places on where doctors can work. It breaks the contracts, essentially, that we have with doctors. You know, with doctors, it's: you come to our province, and if you want to set up practice and you want to work within the system the AMA has, that's totally okay. André Picard talked about the unconstitutionality of these actions that have been taking place. [interjection] It's alarming that people come in here and don't have the decorum of the House. I would just say that it's alarming that this bill breaks the contract it has with doctors and tells them where they can work, essentially, by restricting payments to doctors.

Mr. Speaker, that is bound to fail. It's failed in other provinces, and it's bound to fail here. It's no way to work with people. When we had, through the former Minister of Health here, a need to work with the doctors, she went and consulted with them. This bill does not consult at all with doctors. In fact, we're finding out more and more things that are in this bill and other bills that have been brought forward by the government that they've not been upfront about, that we're only digging into now and alerting Albertans about the bad bills that are before them.

I want to say that with regard to breaking contracts, as is proposed in this bill, our former Health minister was able to go and get monies back from AMA, and she was able to do that because of discussions with them. We were able to get two zeros, Mr. Speaker, with the broad public sector as a result of discussions with them and essentially saying, you know: work with us. Nothing in Bill 21 is a "work with us." It's our way or the highway, and it's an enforcing kind of action.

The other promises that have been broken that have been made by the other side: it's interesting, Mr. Speaker, if you look at the platform that they ran on, you'll see all sorts of areas where they have made promises, and those promises are broken. One of those areas is in terms of police funding. We see that this bill pulls more than $40 million out of the two major cities alone over the term of the budget. It does that by increasing fine revenue and jacking up prices that we on this side made sure that were paid for, things like forensic testing. That side seems to nickel and dime and take money out of the hands of police forces across this province while at the same time saying that we're increasing funding. Well, you can't have it both ways; it's one or the other. And the truth of the matter is that they're making life more expensive for families and for institutions like police services in this province.

One area I'm extremely disappointed to have to stand up and talk about, because we were so pleased to put it in place for Alberta and to know that Alberta was leading the pack in this area, which is being retreated by the other side again, is in the whole area of indexation of important social programs, income support programs in this province. What we also hear from the other side is, you know, that this side only got to it, I think, in the fall of 2018, and: "Why did you wait so long to do that? You know, if it was so important to you, why didn't you do it sooner?" Well, I can tell you that there's nothing further from the truth, Mr. Speaker. When we, in fact, did it, we made sure that we had essentially indexed from 2015, when we became government, up to 2019, when it started. We did that first by increasing rates.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I look forward to talking some more.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you.

Hon. members, 29(2)(a) is available. I believe the individual who caught my eye was the hon. Member for Red Deer-South.

Mr. Stephan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It always helps to see the clock.

I'd like to stand and just respond to my friend across the way. I can remember, of course, when we had the election in 2015 and I was surprised, of course, to see the NDP elected. At that point I wasn't involved in politics. I was practising as a corporate tax lawyer and serving many central Alberta businesses. I had a lot of respect and admiration for those taxpayers that contributed to the economy.

You know, as we kind of witnessed over time – and I'm glad that the former Finance minister just spoke before me. One of the things that really motivated me to run, frankly, was the horrible record of the NDP. In particular, the thing that really troubled me is that I don't feel that the NDP were actually ever serious about living within their means. They had a reckless disregard for that. You know, I always like to deal in facts. I don't like to deal in hyperbole. I like facts, so we'll share some facts with my friends across the way because it's important that all of us learn from our mistakes. You know, I know that our failures can be very valuable teachers, and hopefully we can be better from that.

What happened is that in 2015 the NDP took over government, and the government actually posted in the year in which they were elected a surplus of $1.1 billion. Then, well, unfortunately, what happened is that in the next year – and I hope they have these numbers memorized, because they should. I expect our former Finance minister – I mean, I certainly hope he remembers these numbers. In '15-16 there was a $6.4 billion deficit; the following year, '16-17, a $10.7 billion deficit. You know, it's like they were shooting for the moon. Then we had an $8 billion deficit, and then in the year that they got turfed, they had a $6.7 billion deficit.

As I met other individuals in my community, individuals... [interjections] Yeah. I'm going to actually talk about that. In the NDP platform for 2015 they actually said that they were...

Statement by the Speaker

Interrupting a Member

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, I hesitate to interrupt the hon. Member for Red Deer-South. I just thought that I would bring it to the whole House's attention that obviously individuals should speak through the Speaker. Actually, everybody has a copy of the Standing Orders. If you'd like to look at 13(4)(b), when a member is speaking, as in this case with the hon. Member for Red Deer-South, no person shall "interrupt that member, except to raise a point of order." I think that order and decorum is obviously paramount to this House, and I would like to ensure that I can hear the speaker. There will be ample time for all members in this House to debate. There will also be further 29(2)(a)s, so please.

If the hon. member could please continue, with about a minute, 52 seconds left on this 29(2)(a).

Mr. Stephan: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. I'm used to interactive conversations so sometimes I need to check myself on that as well.

I just want to talk about the NDP platform and a couple of things that kind of show their inept ability, unfortunately. They said that they would balance the budget in their platform, by 2018. So what happened? Well, we actually had a $6.7 billion deficit, so a little bit off there. They don't really understand corporate taxes at all. In their platform they thought, based on their 20 per cent corporate tax increase, that they would actually have $3.7 billion more in corporate tax revenue. Guess what happened actually? In terms of their actuals they were $8.4 billion off, so an overstatement on their corporate tax increases.

You know, I'm concerned that the member opposite suggests that Joe Biden should be our moral compass. I'm not so sure that he's my moral compass. I do want to do what is right, though, and serve the public interest by balancing the budget. That is the best thing that we can do for our children. We need to live within our means; we need to set a good example.

I know I don't have much time, but the member opposite also talked about education. The best thing we can do for our children when they graduate is have a strong economy so that they can graduate and have jobs.

The Speaker: Hon. members, we are back on the main bill, Bill 21. Is there anyone else wishing to join in the debate this evening? I see the hon. member – I'm certain that the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo wouldn't be moving around the Chamber while the Speaker is on his feet. Oh, my.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View has the call.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. On behalf of my hon. colleague from Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview, I would like to move the following motion. That second reading of Bill 21 be amended by deleting all the words after "that" and substituting the following:

Bill 21, Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019, be not now read a second time but that the subject matter of the Bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Families and Communities in accordance with Standing Order 74.2.

I will take my seat until that is distributed.

The Speaker: Thanks very much.

Hon. members, the amendment will be referred to as REF1.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. The amendment I am moving is to refer the substance of this bill to committee, because I think that there is an enormous amount in this bill, and I think that there's an enormous amount in this bill that requires deep consideration. I take that, myself, as an incredibly serious responsibility.

Of course, having heard recently from the Member for Red Deer-South – he obviously thinks he knows everything about government and everything about the world and everything about everything and doesn't need to consider anything seriously, but I disagree. I think that all of us in this place are well served by taking some time to consider the things that we say. I actually think that that hon. member would be extremely well served by a little bit of humility in light of his clear lack of understanding of what's going on.

In any event, on to the bill. One of the reasons I think this ought to be referred to a committee is because there is an enormous amount in this bill. It affects a number of acts. In fact, I believe one of my hon. colleagues before me tried to read into the record just how many acts were amended and ran out of time. A lot of these things are very substantive.

Obviously, the changes to indexing of benefits are incredibly substantive. We've heard a lot about the changes to AISH, and that's a huge concern – I absolutely agree that that's a concern – but I think I'd like to talk also about a number of other benefits that are impacted by this. It isn't just AISH that's not being indexed; it's also seniors' benefits. For a lot of people who aren't in a position to work, won't be ever in a position to likely work in the future – this applies to AISH; it applies to seniors' benefits and a couple of other programs – this is a huge concern because their income is going to erode over time and for potentially an indefinite period of time, and that makes it very difficult to be able to afford basics. That's certainly a concern. [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. members, the Member for Calgary-Mountain View has the call. If you'd like to have conversations, you're more than welcome to do so in the lounges.

Ms Ganley: Thank you, sir.

Certainly, that's one of the things that I think is definitely a major concern in this bill.

In addition to deindexing those benefits, there are also Alberta Works benefits, both for expected to work and barriers to full employment. Those often apply to individuals who may ultimately qualify for AISH but don't qualify currently or else individuals who are able to work fully but are just still seeking employment. Those benefits are actually, believe it or not, even tighter than AISH. In a lot of cases Alberta Works payments – well, obviously, in all cases, because it's statutory – are even lower. Those are individuals who have lost their job.

The individuals in barriers to full employment are often individuals who ultimately will qualify for AISH. They're just still in the application process. Certain disabilities sometimes make it more difficult to qualify for AISH. If you have certain types of disabilities, you're less likely to qualify, so those individuals will spend more time in those other programs. Those programs, believe it or not, have an income – not only is the benefit lower than the benefit for AISH, but they also don't have some of the other surrounding supports that impact your rent, subsidies to rent, or that impact your drug costs, those sorts of things. That's, I think, a huge concern, and I think it's worth taking the time to consider.

Obviously, I would be remiss if I didn't reference changes to the Police Act. I certainly think – obviously, we've heard concerns about those. Essentially, the changes themselves within the legislation just enable the Lieutenant Governor in Council, or cabinet, by way of regulation to determine what percentage of policing costs those communities will pay. We have of course heard from a number of communities about their concerns with respect to that because in some cases what we're talking about is potentially a situation where they'll have to raise the property taxes on rural residents by up to $400. If some of those rural residents are also, at the same moment, on, say, seniors' benefits, which have just lost their indexing, that's a huge cost at the same time that their cost of living is going up and their income is remaining fixed for an indefinite number of years. I think that those are impacts that should be more fully considered.

In addition, the alteration here with respect to funding for municipal police is, I think, a concern. Certainly, in the context of Calgary it's a big concern because city council in Calgary has been under a lot of pressure, and they were forced to make some reductions. So the Calgary police have already taken a $7 million reduction, and they've managed to absorb that internally, which is a serious concern for them. In addition to that, this additional $13 million is going to be more than they can absorb without losing personnel. I know that the members opposite like to talk at length about finding efficiencies. Well, if there were efficiencies to be found, they were already found with the $7 million. You know, at a certain point the efficiencies have been found.

I think what's worth noting as well – certainly, one of our big tasks when we were in government was to ensure that we were keeping the rate of growth of spending below CPI plus inflation. It was something that was very important to us because prior to our coming into government, the sort of spending curve sort of looked like a porcupine. It was up and down and up and down with the price of oil. We decided that we didn't want the porcupine anymore, and we sort of wanted to stick to a CPI plus inflation kind of a model, which, I think, is important, and I think it's sustainable.

You know, keeping those costs down: there were areas that were more challenged than others, I guess, is what I'll say. Health, for instance, was a big challenge. I will forever be grateful to my colleague from Edmonton-Glenora, who worked incredibly hard to keep that budget under control and had to make some very tough decisions to make that the case. The reason that health spending grows at that rate is in large part – well, part of it was a contract that my hon. colleague from Edmonton-Glenora was able to fix with the help of the doctors, who very helpfully came to the table and reduced the cost of those contracts by over half a billion dollars a year, which is pretty impressive if you ask me. One might wonder, given their willingness to negotiate, why the current government is doing it this way rather than another, which is just another reason. But my point is that some things have a growth pressure higher than that. The reason the growth pressure is higher than that: in the case of health, a lot of it had to do with the doctors. As I've mentioned, my colleague addressed that.

But another big area of spending was an area of spending having to do with the availability of drugs. The costs of those drugs were going up and, particularly, new biologic drugs that come online. They have some amazing treatments for diseases like hepatitis C, that used to be a lifelong condition that had to be managed. That's actually a good thing, that the growth pressure is higher than CPI plus inflation, because what it means is that we're saving more lives. We're able to diagnose more things, we're able to treat more things, and we're able to save more lives.

I actually think that saving more lives is a good thing to spend money on. I actually don't think that that's something that should be frowned on, and I think, honestly, most people would agree. I think that if it was your loved one, you would absolutely agree. I think that if someone said, "There's a treatment available for your loved one, but we're trying to keep health spending under control, so we're unwilling to approve this new drug, that we know, scientifically, could save that person's life, because of costs," I mean, I don't think anybody in this Chamber would agree to that. That's one of the reasons that there is that kind of pressure.

Policing, interestingly, has similar pressures. They have a tendency to have a pressure to grow a little faster than inflation. That's for a couple of different reasons. One is that police are dealing with sort of more and more complex issues. Again, we understand more things. We now have a much greater understanding of drug addiction issues and issues surrounding mental health, which means that it behooves the police and is, in fact, I would argue, their duty, now that we understand those things, to respond accordingly. That makes their jobs more complex than they otherwise would have been.

Another thing is court decisions that come down that have a tendency to impact the way they do their work. For instance, I can remember that a couple of years ago there was a court decision with respect to production orders and warrants having to do with Facebook. A lot of evidence, obviously, is now on the Internet, on Facebook, that sort of thing, so that decision had a huge impact on the number of hours of work. It massively increased the number of hours of work that go into any investigative file because now they have to write all those warrants, and they take a very long time. Actually, I think it was a production order. In any event, the point is that it increases the amount of work necessary to go into each and every case, and that's what tends to drive those pressures.

Ultimately, rather than having a silly conversation about, "Well, you know, it's just ridiculous to let the budget grow ever," we should have a rational conversation about: as a society, what do we think is worth paying for? These things do cost money. Saving more lives costs money. Protecting more people costs money. So I think that we should take the time to step back and have a reasoned conversation about that because it's important. It affects us all, and I think that at the end of the day, if you asked everyone in the province, "Would you be willing to pay a few more dollars to ensure that your loved one gets the medication they need or has the police able to respond to them?" I think most people would be okay with that. Those are just a few of the issues in the bill.

Now, one of the things that I've just referenced obviously has to do with practice licences and where a physician can practise. Setting aside for a moment the issue of the potential constitutionality, which I think is genuinely in question in that instance, this is potentially a really big concern because it's not clear on what basis those will be doled out, to be perfectly honest. It's not clear where they're going to go or what they're going to do. You know, if they're over the budget line and someone retires in a certain area of the province, are they going to allow another practice licence there? What if people are having to drive farther for care? I think that's a huge concern. You know, there are people already, especially in northern Alberta, who have to drive quite a long way, potentially, to access care. That impacts the relative quality of their care compared to, potentially, other people in the province. I think it's important to know on what basis those decisions are going to be made, so I think it's worth taking the time to consider those decisions.

It's important to know: what are the things we're going to measure? How are we going to determine whether another specialist is needed in an area? How are we going to determine with certainty, you know, how much health care people can have access to, and how do we know? I mean, I've just detailed the reasons that health care, much like the cost of policing, tends to grow faster than population and inflation growth. What if the government, in trying to keep the budget flat, is essentially going to start restricting health care services in certain areas of the province? I think that's worth knowing.

There are a number of other changes in this bill as well. Some of them having to do with the Employment Standards Code have to do with restricting the definition of "employee." That doesn't, for instance, sound particularly interesting on its own, but that defines who can and can't access services. Actually, it's a pretty big deal because it means that something could happen to you that's contrary to the Employment Standards Code, and because you're an excluded person, it doesn't matter. It takes a group of people and potentially excludes them from access to certain rights. I think that that is a big concern.

I have many more, but I'm sure I'll get another opportunity at a later point.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. I see the hon. Government House Leader has risen.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, thank you for the opportunity to rise on 29(2)(a). To the hon. member, in regards to her referral moment – referral motion, I should say – I'll have more to say about this amendment shortly when I rise to speak on it.

But on 29(2)(a) I'd like to ask the hon. member a couple questions. She referred often in her remarks to when she was a cabinet minister, the Minister of Justice, in the province of Alberta just a few short months ago, when her party was in power. In comparing it to things within Bill 21 here and then to the context of why, she was explaining why she wanted to move a referral amendment in the House today, Mr. Speaker.

I do notice that she kind of glossed over the fact that what that would really mean is that she would be sending this important piece of legislation off to committee so that it could not pass this Chamber, Mr. Speaker, in the next several days, which ultimately would stop many of the budget implementation measures that the hon. the Finance minister is putting in place in large part to fix the mess that that hon. member and her colleagues made of this province when they were in government.

Now, I often moved referral amendments when I was in opposition, Mr. Speaker, as you know. Often I would tell a story about my horse Tank when I would move referral amendments. The hon. members that were in government back then are aware of it. Mr. Speaker, I know that you, as my benchmate, side by side a lot, would listen to my Tank stories. I would often tell a story about Tank. He knows when you're in the house. I don't know what it is with him, but he just knows that you're in the house, and he's got this thing for grain. First of all, my horse is a big horse. I mean, look. His name is Tank, and he likes his grain, and he likes oats, and he likes to do his thing. When you get in the house, he'll sometimes pick up his oat bin, and he likes to shake his head with the oat bin. I don't know. He seems to think that's magically going to make you leave the house to come out and give him oats. He gets so excited that he sometimes gets himself stuck in the corner of the corral in the fence and he scrapes himself up trying to get you to come outside and do it. You have to go out there finally, because he's cornered himself, and say: "Whoa, Tank. Whoa." Often I would say that when we wanted to refer a piece of legislation to committee. I'd say that we have to go: whoa.

But in this case, Mr. Speaker, I think another Tank story is more appropriate. [interjection] I don't know if the hon. member is laughing because my horse is named Tank. That's a good name for a horse. I'm proud of Tank, and you can come by the office after we rise today and see a picture of old Tank. But when you're crossing the river, when you're out for a ride with Tank, sometimes he's got this habit of just pausing in the middle of the river, and your boots start to fill up with water, and the saddlebags start to fill up with water, and it just becomes a mess, and that's one of those moments when you don't want Tank to go "Whoa." You want him to hurry up and get across that river because you're getting wet and you're taking on water.

The fact is that we have inherited a province that is taking on water because the NDP have been taking on so much debt, have messed up our system so badly, causing so many negative consequences to the people of Alberta, Mr. Speaker. This is not the time for them to send an important piece of legislation, to go "Whoa," and send it off to a policy committee to not actually pass this Chamber. This is a time to get across that river and stop taking on water. This government promised that we would stop taking on NDP water and, instead, we would get to work for Albertans balancing the budget.

So of course not. We're not going to support the hon. member's amendment. She wants to continue doing what, Mr. Speaker? Taking us down the road of record-breaking debt, record-breaking unemployment, devastating the people of this province, which is her legacy as a member of the former NDP government, probably the worst government. I certainly believe it was the worst government in the history of this province, the only one-term government in the history of this province, who want to come and spend their time trying to stop budget implementation bills that could begin to fix the mess that they created for Albertans. Not a mess that we created; a mess that they created, and they still haven't apologized to the people of Alberta. This is not the moment to go "Whoa," and continue with the NDP policies. This is the moment to get across the river, stop taking on water, and start fixing the problem that is before this province.

That hon. member should explain why she wants to continue the path of devastating the people of the province, Albertans. It's shocking. I think that she should rise with the time that she has left and explain her behaviour.

The Speaker: I was struggling to see the relevance of the Tank story, but I'm glad that you got it back there in your very brief question or comment.

Are there others wishing to join in the debate this evening? The hon. the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise in support of this amendment. It of course comes as no shock to me to hear the Government House Leader say that he won't support this amendment, although I suspect that it's not because of the reasons he stated. He knows full well, just like every member on the government side does, that the deficit that they're projecting is $2 billion higher than ours was and that the debt is the same as it would've been under us. So to say that they're fixing the mess is flat-out wrong. What they are doing is shifting the benefits of the public services from the people who need it the most to the people who need it the least, with their $4.7 billion corporate handout that is going to be paid for off the backs of AISH recipients, children in care, and students.

Of course, I'm not surprised that they don't want to talk about these things at committee because none of these things are things that they ran on in their election platform, so they just want to make sure that this bill gets passed as quickly – here we are at 9:30 at night, when nobody is paying attention. If they could shut the lights off and conduct the session in the dark so that nobody else knew what was going on, I'm sure they would, Mr. Speaker, because they didn't run on any of the elements that are contained in this legislation.

There's much to talk about, but I do want to focus my limited time on the issue of tuition increases and why I think that this bill needs to be sent to committee just to study the aspect of tuition increases that are contained in this legislation.

I will say flat out that I believe that education is a right. I think that education, especially higher education, is key to providing Albertans not just skills for jobs, which I recognize is important, but the knowledge and critical thinking skills that people need to live a full life and to engage in the public life of our province. Because of those reasons, I think that every Albertan should be able to go to the postsecondary institution of their choice, and they shouldn't face any kind of barrier, much less the kind of financial barriers that this government is intent on putting up in front of students.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we've gone through a number of periods of history in the province of Alberta where we've built and expanded upon what is probably the best university and college sector in the entire country and alternating with periods of significant damage to that sector. When Alberta was first created as a province, one of the first acts of this Legislature was to create the University of Alberta in 1906. Alberta was an incredibly small province populationwise at that time, a few hundred thousand people at the most, but they recognized even in 1906 that the future of Alberta relied on having a vibrant and dynamic postsecondary sector, that Alberta couldn't forge a future for itself without high-quality higher education in this province.

That's why one of the first acts of this Legislature was to create the University of Alberta. That was followed shortly thereafter by the creation of a number of agricultural colleges. Of course, you,

Mr. Speaker, are well aware of Olds College, that was founded in 1913, along with Lakeland College, Fairview College. These were important institutes of higher learning, dedicated to the advancement of agriculture, which was at the time the most important sector of the economy in Alberta. That's because we recognized that we couldn't just leave things the way they were, that we needed to continue to train people in how to do their work in agriculture better. We needed to conduct the research to improve agricultural techniques, develop new crops, develop new livestock, develop value-added products. From the very beginning of Alberta's history we recognized that a successful postsecondary sector was the key to Alberta's future.

Now, after the founding of the province we went through a significant period of stagnation in the postsecondary sector, but in the late '50s and '60s the Social Credit government at the time went through a tremendous expansion of the postsecondary sector. In fact, most of the universities and colleges that we know today were founded in that time: the University of Calgary, the University of Lethbridge, Lethbridge College, Medicine Hat College, Portage College, Athabasca University, Grande Prairie Regional College, NAIT, Red Deer College, and on and on, Mr. Speaker.

All of those institutions were founded in the late '50s and during the '60s and early '70s under the Social Credit government because even they had the foresight to recognize that the tremendous resource wealth that Alberta was benefiting from at the time wasn't going to last forever and that the key to making sure that Alberta was sustainably successful in the future was to invest in its people. That's why they expanded the postsecondary sector so significantly, so that it wasn't just people who lived close to Edmonton who could get a postsecondary education. They had a vision for providing postsecondary education to every citizen of the province regardless of where they lived. I think that the creation of those institutions went a long way to bringing higher education to the people of the province, people in every corner of the province, and I am grateful for the contributions that that government made to the higher education sector.

Now, that was followed by some years of treading water under Peter Lougheed and Don Getty, and then Ralph Klein and his Finance minister, Jim Dinning, took the axe to the postsecondary sector. They cut the budgets by almost 30 per cent in the early '90s. In fact, I had the opportunity on a number of occasions to meet Jim Dinning at University of Calgary functions, and he told me that that was always the first place that Conservative governments looked for cuts, the postsecondary sector. In my time as Minister of Advanced Education I used that as a warning to everybody in the postsecondary sector that I talked to. I said that should the UCP get elected, the first sector that they will look at for cuts is the university and college sector. Of course, unfortunately, I was right.

Jim Dinning wasn't the only Tory who took the axe to the postsecondary sector. Of course, Thomas Lukaszuk was Advanced Education minister, and he cut the budgets by 7 per cent under his watch. Then Jim Prentice's final budget, the last budget that he brought forward, projected 5 per cent reductions in grants to universities and colleges every year. Now, we all remember what happened to the Prentice government when they brought that budget forward. They were soundly rejected by the people of Alberta, and I think it was in no small part because he did what this government is doing, shifting the costs of services onto the backs of the people who can least afford it while refusing to make those who have the ability to pay for public services pay for them.

Now, he didn't go as far as this government does. He left corporate taxes flat. He left those untouched, which was incredibly unpopular. This government, of course, is reducing corporate taxes all the way to 8 per cent, which is a huge mistake. Unless you're a corporate CEO or a shareholder, you end up paying more and getting less from this budget.

Now, under our watch the university and college sector went through significant growth and improvement. We brought stability to the system after a long period of instability. We increased funding to each institution by 2 per cent a year over four years. We brought in a tuition freeze. We brought in a fees freeze, which was really important because, as members opposite have said, the tuition alone in Alberta, in the province, wasn't the most expensive, but the combination of tuition and fees at universities and colleges in Alberta was the most expensive. Even though the old Tories pretended to regulate tuition, they created these massive loopholes that allowed universities to charge fees and market modifiers for programs that drove up the cost of higher education in this province to the point where it was the most expensive in the country.

On top of freezing tuition fees and freezing additional fees, we provided student mental health funding. We provided funding for up to 3,000 tech seats. We provided new scholarships for indigenous students, and I want to address a remark that the Member for Calgary-Lougheed made during question period today. He said that indigenous students would be able to get free tuition from their bands, which is flat-out false. He should know as a former member of the federal government that not every indigenous student is entitled to postsecondary education. Each band is given an allotment, and once that allotment is gone, potential postsecondary students who would be eligible but can't get the money are left in the cold. I sincerely hope that he apologizes for spreading this mistruth that every indigenous student is entitled to free higher education in this country because that's not true.

We also created for the first time in many decades new universities in the province of Alberta. We changed the Alberta College of Art and Design to the Alberta University of the Arts, and we also put Red Deer College and Grande Prairie Regional College on the path to becoming universities, which is important for improving access to a university education in Alberta. All Albertans in all parts of the province have the right to a higher education, but the fact is that the farther you have to go to receive that education, the less likely you are to do so. That's why it was important to us as a government to put Red Deer College and Grande Prairie Regional College on the path to becoming universities, so that potential university students in central Alberta and northwestern Alberta had the same opportunities that students near Edmonton and Calgary and Lethbridge had to get a university degree if they chose to do that.

Now, the issue of access, that I've mentioned, is a significant one. During the estimates debate the Member for Calgary-Bow expressed his concern about the low participation rates in postsecondary education here in the province of Alberta, and that's a concern that I share. He continued to point to the MacKinnon report, which insisted on making comparisons of our postsecondary sector to the postsecondary sectors in British Columbia, Ontario, and Quebec. It's important to note that if we had the same participation rates in postsecondary education in Alberta as the province of B.C. enjoys, we'd need room for 80,000 more students. That's 50 per cent more students than are currently enrolled in the university and college sector in Alberta right now. How on earth this government thinks that they're going to be able to increase access to postsecondary education by cutting the budgets, cutting the grants to universities and colleges by approximately 5 per cent this year and increasing amounts over the next three or four years boggles the mind. We need to create spaces and hire staff and faculty to teach 80,000 more students to meet the Member for Calgary-Bow's own stated goal to have postsecondary participation rates the same as British Columbia's, but we can't get there with the budget that this government is bringing forward.

That's why I think it's important that we send this bill to committee to look at this issue of access and look at what this government is proposing with tuition in combination with what they've proposed in the budget, in combination with all of the other things that they've done to students to make postsecondary education less accessible to them. Not only are they raising tuition, not only are they cutting the budgets that will lead to scrapping programs, firing hundreds of staff and faculty all across the province – they scrapped the STEP program; they're scrapping tuition and education tax credits; they're raising student loan interest rates; they're cutting wages for public-sector workers so that many of the students who graduate from university or college and go on to work for the public sector will have less of an ability to pay off student loans that will be bigger and more expensive. On top of all of that, they're doing nothing to create jobs in the private sector.

I was flipping through the debate in Hansard when we brought in the tuition cap, Mr. Speaker, and I certainly hope that I can provide some additional comments under 29(2)(a).

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. I see the hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika has risen.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Don't hold your breath, hon. member.

I appreciate this opportunity to rise under 29(2)(a). I wanted to just kind of address some of the things that have been said tonight in the Chamber, particularly by the members for Edmonton-Gold Bar and Calgary-Buffalo. Now, when we hear the language used by the NDP in this Chamber, I think it's actually a bit dangerous. It's dangerous because while they might be posturing or trying to put on a bit of a show, the people who watch their clips on their social media or Twitter or whatever don't know that. They contact MLA offices in an outrage with all this misinformation about what this government is actually trying to do. The reality is that it's trying to make things better.

Now, the Member for Calgary-Buffalo has said that, you know, their government was trying to do what was good for the kids, for the children. To suggest that we're not is just blatantly outrageous. We have to make some difficult decisions as this government, and I would like to look at things with a glass-half-full kind of attitude. An example is the Member for Calgary-Mountain View. We may disagree on a number of policy issues, but I can tell by the emotion that she has when she talks about members in the gallery that come to visit that she genuinely cares about her constituents. She genuinely cares about this province, and I admire that. I do. The Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar has been pegged, I mean, multiple times as having a very crusty exterior, but as a geologist I'm certain that he cares genuinely about the environment. I don't doubt that.

But I also care about the future of this province and leaving something better for my kids, Mr. Speaker. I don't want them to come to me in 20 years and say: "Dad, why didn't you do something when you had the chance? Why did you saddle me with all this debt? Why did you make it so unaffordable in this province now because of the massive debt load you left upon us as kids?" The members opposite can go ahead and try to package this however they want, but the reality is that the bill of goods that they're selling is a crock of crap. I apologize. I withdraw that remark.

If I may continue, you know, when I was younger – I think I was probably 10 or 11 – I wanted to get a Christmas present for my brother. I didn't have any money, so what I did was that I took a textbook, a math textbook, and cut out the middle. Don't worry; it was discovery math. I cut out the middle and put this note inside and closed it and wrapped it up. He opened it up on Christmas Day, and he thought it was going to be this nice gift. He sees that it's a textbook. Then he opens it up and finds a note, and it was me just calling him a dummy. I mean, honestly, you can package anything as much as you want, make it look really nice, but no matter how nice you make that package look, it's still just a crock if there's nothing really of substance inside. That's the bill of goods the members opposite are selling.

They're trying to tell Albertans that in some convoluted way we're trying to destroy this province and we're trying to take from the most vulnerable. The reality, Mr. Speaker, is that right now Alberta is quite vulnerable. We are in a very precarious state in this province. We are careening down the tracks towards a hundred billion dollars of debt. Based on the way that the members opposite do accounting, I suspect that number is a lot higher, but we'll go with the hundred billion because, well, they're sure stuck on this $4.7 billion, which is interesting as well. I'd be curious to see one of the members opposite actually break that number down instead of just using it as a talking point. I mean, really, like, the term has been thrown around in this Chamber a lot lately, that math is hard. Well, I'll leave that to them, especially to the worst Finance minister in the history of this province.

There are a couple of important numbers that I wanted to mention to him before my time expires. He talked about why the NDP got elected. There are a couple of things. My time is expiring, and I will sit down.

The Speaker: Hon. members, anyone else wishing to join in the debate? I do recognize that there's a government member who's risen to speak, and we have heard from a number of opposition members in succession, so I think it's reasonable that the government has the opportunity to join debate.

I would just caution the hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika that the use of words like "crock" and the other word that you've apologized for certainly is likely to create disorder and they are unparliamentary. So I encourage you in the time that you have before you to use appropriate parliamentary language.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I apologize for not sitting down while you were standing. I kind of got caught up in the moment there for a second. I will be mindful of my language. As passionate as I get, I don't mean to create disorder. I just get passionate about the issues.

I just want to continue along. There are a couple of numbers I wanted to mention because the Member for Calgary-Buffalo had said why the NDP got elected. Well, one important number here is 28. Twenty-eight seats in this Legislature in the previous government went to the NDP caucus as a result of vote splitting. To suggest that simply because there was an unpopular budget or an unpopular government prior, which I don't necessarily disagree with – there were some things that Albertans were upset with and they had a right to be so. There were 28 seats, Mr. Speaker, where the vote total between the Wildrose and the PC would have been more than enough to fill that seat for a Conservative member of this Chamber, not an NDP member. So the Member for Calgary-Buffalo should recognize that. That's an easy number.

Another one is 100, $100 billion. Now, I did already mention this a little bit, but I need to reinforce this point, that I think that number is actually low. Now, I'm going to stick with it, but $100 billion is where we are going, and they want to sit there and say: "Oh, you know, your debt is going to be 90-plus billion dollars. Really, what's the difference?" You're still talking about $6 billion or $7 billion in difference. Now, if that doesn't matter to you, I don't know what does. You're just throwing around numbers like you don't care. Like, that's crazy talk. I mean, seriously, it's like I'm taking crazy pills here. So I think about that number. I think: oh, my goodness. Like, you know, the difference of $6 billion, $7 billion, as if it's nothing. It's significant.

Six, a really important number here. The number six. Six credit downgrades, Mr. Speaker. Six credit downgrades by the worst Finance minister in the history of this province. Now, again, that number gets thrown around a couple of times. It may have lost its lustre. But think about that for a second. Think about how bad your credit goes in four years with six credit downgrades. Try borrowing money from your neighbour to start a lemonade stand after six credit downgrades in their credit book. They're not going to give you a dime. They probably wouldn't even let you have the dime that fell on the ground in front of their house because your credit is so bad.

Now, what about another number: two. Two billion dollars in interest payments to bankers and bondholders in foreign countries. Now, let's think about how many teachers, how many nurses, how many doctors, how many schools could be built with that interest money alone. The majority of that interest was piled on by the members opposite.

They sit here and they tell us how much we don't care about public-sector workers, which, again, I believe is, in itself, offensive. You know, I've used unparliamentary language today, and I do apologize, but that is offensive; that creates disorder. I'll tell you why. Saying that we don't care about the front-line workers while you pile on debt and increase the amount of money we pay every year in interest payments that could be going to these front-line services: that's offensive. That's offensive, right?

There are a couple of other simple numbers here: 63 members of the government caucus. It's an important number to recognize, you know, that we were voted in in April primarily because people were sick and tired of not having a government that listened.

I can tell you right now that I have constituents telling me all the time how responsive this government has been. The Minister of Environment and Parks: some people, you know, have seen him so many times, and they're just shocked that they couldn't even schedule a meeting with the Member for Lethbridge-West. I don't know if she was too busy or just overly dismissive of what mattered to people at the time; that's for that member to explain. But that's the kind of mentality that this government is taking, to be responsive to the constituents who hired us, because, make no mistake, Mr. Speaker, we work for them, right? They pay our salaries. We don't forget that. This budget, these bills: they're all the commitments that we made, that we're fulfilling to them.

Now, another number that's really important, that relates a bit back to what I just said, is 1,040,004. Now, if anyone from the opposition side wants to chime in as to what that number means, I'd be happy to hear you. You were very vocal during question period. I don't hear a pin drop over there now. That's the number of votes for the UCP in April, a historic number, Mr. Speaker. Like, think about what that is. That many people were so disenfranchised by the previous government that they came out in droves both in the advance polls and on general election day because they demanded change. Some people go out and they vote, you know, for years, they just kind of cast their ballot. It's their civic right. I bet people voted so hard that they ripped right through that paper for that Conservative candidate. I had people come up and tell me they couldn't wait to vote. They were lining up to vote in advance polls just to be able to say to all their friends, to brag as a point: I voted to get rid of the NDP. Holy smokes. One million plus people sure did that. If we can do the math on that, that's 58.88 per cent of the vote. That's a pretty big number. I will say so myself.

You know, I'm done railing on the members opposite, but, again, I sit here and I listen to what they have to say. Again, I do believe they genuinely care, but they need to be careful as to what they say because while the language they use may be parliamentary and permissible in this Chamber, it creates disorder in the public, and that disorder leads to misinformation being spread across Alberta, and that's completely unacceptable. That's not the job that they were hired to do. We were hired to come in this Chamber and raise the level of debate to the highest level in this province, increase decorum.

If you'll notice, Mr. Speaker, during question period, as I'm sure you do, on this side of the House we allow the members opposite to ask their questions. [interjections] Well, let me rephrase. I'll rephrase that. But I'm sure you're going to clip this and put it on Twitter because Twitter is so cool. It is their right to ask the questions, and it's our job to take those questions. But I will say this. We don't heckle – we don't heckle – because it's their job to represent their constituents, and it's our job to answer the questions, the ministers' jobs. We don't heckle, right? We don't do that. We're raising the level of decorum. I guess I'm just trying to get the point across that Albertans have spoken loud and clear with their votes on what they want from this government. They have been very clear on what they didn't want.

I'm hoping that they're taking some lessons from that because what you see before you is another piece of legislation that is fulfilling campaign commitments to get the province back on track, to put our fiscal house in order.

I look at my three kids, and while they're young and they don't know what I do really for a living, really what politics is in general, there will come a time when they will. There will come a time when they will talk to me about what I do. They'll want to know what I do, and I want to be able to proudly look them in the face and tell them that I am doing what's best for this province and what's best for their future because that's what matters.

You know, I would feel terrible if I had to look my kids in the eyes in 20 years and tell them: "Sorry. I had an opportunity, and I blew it. I blew it because, you know, I was afraid. I was afraid of what the members opposite would say. I was afraid of what the Twitter trolls would say." I don't even have Twitter. You know, I don't have time for that. But I will say this, Mr. Speaker. I do have time for my constituents, I have time for debate in this Chamber, and I have time for feedback from the members opposite because I really, truly value input from different perspectives. But what I don't value is the kind of language used there to create disorder within the public.

Mr. Speaker, before I close, I do want to qualify one thing. The Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar did mention Thomas Lukaszuk in relation to us. He's not one of ours. I just want to get that one on the record. No one on this side spent $15,000 on a cellphone bill, but I digress.

I will say this. I am proud, Mr. Speaker, I am so proud to stand on this side of the House and help to fulfill the mandate of this government, to speak in favour of these bills, to stand with each and every one of the members on this side of the House because I know that their hearts are in the right place, just like the hearts on the other side. They are. I disagree with them politically, but they're in the right place. I will say that it brings me such great pride to know that when the time comes and I sit down with my kids, I can tell them that I did everything I could for them.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar has risen.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure for me to rise and respond to some of the remarks that the Member for Cardston-Siksika had to share with the Chamber. First of all, I want to take issue with his characterization of me as somebody with a crusty exterior. I don't think there's anybody in this House that would agree with the member when he says that. But should there be anybody who says that I have a crusty exterior, I would say that, you know, I'm like a croissant; perhaps crusty on the outside but soft and . . .

Ms Hoffman: Flaky.

Mr. Schmidt: . . . yeah, flaky. I'm flaky. With friends like that, who needs enemies? Thank you, Edmonton-Glenora. I have completely lost track. Mr. Speaker, can I raise a point of order or something?

You know, I do want to respond to some of the things that the Member for Cardston-Siksika did have to say, not about my personality but about our characterization of the budget and his response to what his children will say to him 20 years down the road. It's instructive to me, I think, to share with him that – you know, I think it's widely agreed that perhaps, in retrospect, what the Klein government did to the budget of Alberta in '93 and '94, those early years, was probably a bit too drastic. I certainly spoke to a lot of people, a lot of people who worked in both the public and the private sector, who recognize in hindsight that the Klein budget cuts of the '90s were far too extreme, and that if they could turn back time and do things differently, they would probably choose to administer the finances of the province of Alberta differently.

I suspect that 20 years from now the member opposite along with all of his government colleagues will probably think the same way because, certainly, they are in fact taking money from the most vulnerable Albertans and giving it to the people who need it the least. It might take them a few years to realize that, but I'm certain that with 20 years of hindsight they will look back on this budget and the other fiscal measures that they've brought in and realize that it did very little to benefit their own children, to benefit my children, to benefit most of the children in the province while doing a lot to benefit the Hong Kong billionaire who owns Husky, the projects in Wisconsin and Newfoundland that Husky is using our taxes to finance.

You know, I hope that the members opposite look back on the lessons that Alberta learned going through the Klein budget era and realize that that was going too far. I think the Member for Calgary-Lougheed admitted as much when he spoke to the AUMA in September. He did recognize that those budgets affected municipalities very harshly and said that this budget wasn't going to be as bad as the ones in the early '90s. I don't know what the actual numbers turn out to be, but I know that the AUMA folks are severely disappointed.

I think that the members opposite like to talk about the million Albertans who voted in favour of them in April, and I can't help but wonder how many of those million are disappointed with what this government has done to the province so far. As we know, the economy is no stronger and, in fact, it's weaker now than it was on election day, in April. Jobs aren't coming back. I hope that the members opposite take this opportunity to make their children look fondly on them in the future.

Thank you very much.

The Speaker: We are back on REF1, the amendment. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora has risen.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the members for what I would say is quite an enjoyable debate this evening, including the little bit of banter. I want to assure all my colleagues and you, Mr. Speaker, and all Albertans that I in no way meant to disparage my hon. colleague the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar. I think that he has been a very strong advocate for the people he represents, and I think he's a fine man. I want to be on record saying that.

I also want to say that when I read some of the remarks from past debate and I hear some of the remarks that are being made here tonight, it's hard for me to make sense of how one person can say one thing not even a year ago and then say something that seems quite contrary a year later. I'm going to start with the remarks from the Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre, also known as the Government House Leader, who less than a year ago said:

I rise today to speak in support of Bill 26. I'm glad to see a piece of legislation of this kind here in the Assembly. I actually think it should have been here a long time ago, quite frankly . . . I, like other members in this Chamber, have heard from many people who are AISH recipients, heard about how tough it is to currently live under the current numbers. We've heard from AISH recipients who cannot afford basic necessities, as the hon. member just described, I mean, basic hygiene necessities.

He goes on, Mr. Speaker, to say how difficult it is for people to live on AISH at the level it was. Then here just a few months later we hear the same hon. member equating freezing AISH compensation with something that is being done to prevent taking on water.

When I hear these comments – and I hear the humanity in the comments less than a year ago. I hear the humanity around people living on such a fixed, limited income not being able to afford things like shampoo and how nobody should be in a position in a developed society such as ours, such a rich society and such a rich province, where we think it's okay for people who don't have the ability to work a job for income to live in those kinds of conditions. When I hear, earlier in question period, exchanges about, "Well, this is being done because we just pay people too much here who are severely handicapped" and then I read the comments from members who are now sitting in cabinet making those decisions to fail to increase payments for somebody who is living in these conditions, I find it very troubling. I think that I agree with the Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre a year ago – a year ago – when he said: you know, we should have done this sooner.

Here we have a government caucus in this place tonight with the ability to at least stop this bad thing from happening. I will say that in my experience and in my conversations with Albertans, things like having a tuition rate cap, things like ensuring that your interest payments don't go up – we spend a lot of time talking about interest payments of government, and I want to remind everyone that in this bill we are making decisions about interest payments for students who have recently graduated who are on their path to repaying their student loans. Why are we okay with putting this burden and downloading this burden onto Alberta students, recent graduates who are doing their best to get a good start in life? We already know that there are 27,000 fewer jobs than there were when they were in school a year ago, on election day, in fact: 27,000 fewer jobs now. They have fewer jobs, and we're going to be asking them to pay more in their student loan payments.

I think taking a pause, saying to Tank or whatever analogy you want to use: "You know what? Let's pause. Let's go to a committee, a committee that's still two-thirds government members" – it's not like we're sending this to somewhere where we think it's going to wither and die; we're sending this to the Standing Committee on Families and Communities. I'll tell you that I know there are many competent members on this committee. There are 15 members total, chaired by the Member for Fort McMurray-Lac La Biche. I think that this committee has the potential to look at the implications of this bill.

Something that members in opposition used to say a lot that I found a little patronizing, so I don't mean it in that way, was: you know, you should have considered the unintended consequences; you should have considered the unintended consequences of your decisions.

What I have to say is that when we look at goals that are being set for increasing postsecondary participation in one sentence and then very shortly thereafter we see, "Well, we're going to eliminate the tuition rate cap, we're going to eliminate the tax credit, we're going to eliminate the summer temporary employment program, and we're going to increase loan repayment rates" – I'll tell you that when I knocked on the doors of Edmonton-Glenora, when I talked to folks in the community, low- and middle-income families are some of the least likely to be willing to take on debt, period. It's low- and middle-income families that need to be able to access student loans more than anyone else. So saying to them, "Okay; you're already less likely to participate in postsecondary, and now we're going to increase your rate of interest payments": it really does download a lot onto those families and those individuals.

I think our students in this province deserve an opportunity to attend a postsecondary of their choice. I think the Member for Cardston-Siksika and his children – I imagine he wants them to have the opportunity to go to a postsecondary institution one day, one of their choosing. I would hope that they'd feel confident choosing one in Alberta and know that their government isn't going to increase their tuition significantly, is going to ensure that they invest in the faculty that are there, and that they have an opportunity to pursue a variety of careers here in the province of Alberta.

I fear that one of the consequences, whether it's intended or not – maybe it is – of this legislation that we're asking the government to take a pause on and consider referring to committee, because committee can have an opportunity to look through it and grapple with some of these decisions, will be dismissed. I think that that's problematic.

In terms of Community and Social Services and seniors that have been mentioned, some of my colleagues have talked about AISH, and I, too, agree. Some of my colleagues who were members of different caucuses not too long ago said that they thought it was really important that AISH be indexed and that folks who have such a meagre means of income have the opportunity to have just a little bit extra in their pockets to go from month to month.

In terms of employment and income support benefits, again, this isn't something that people are really keen to apply for. They aren't really keen to put their hands up and say: "You know what? I need income support." But when they do, they deserve to have a government funding at a rate for today, not a rate for years ago. Again, failing to index this fails to acknowledge the reality. The reality that we have: the Conference Board of Canada, 2 per cent inflation this year; in education, which is where I've spent a lot of my focus as of late, 2.2 per cent enrolment growth. Anything that doesn't see 4.2 per cent growth in education would definitely be a cut.

But it goes even deeper than that. We also have the seniors' benefit. This is something that a lot of Alberta seniors rely on to help them get from month to month on things like – at McQueen lodge in the beautiful riding of Edmonton-Glenora there's a tuck shop. The tuck shop is open a couple of days a week. You can go down, and you can buy a word search. You can buy a stuffed animal for your kid or grandkid or whatever it might be. Having a few dollars in your pocket to be able to buy something from the volunteer-run tuck shop might not seem important to members of this House, but I can tell you that to my constituents it is deeply important as well as the seniors' lodge program.

In terms of eliminating the regulated rate cap, this is something that – I know there is a bit of an ideological bent, but I would have thought that making electricity prices more affordable, not less, would be a priority for all members of this House.

I've already spoken in a previous opportunity to some of the changes to physicians, so I probably won't go on about that right now.

In terms of Municipal Affairs, Justice and Solicitor General: enables provincial government to retain a greater portion of fines collected on behalf of municipalities. Wow. We already put it on the municipalities to collect these fines, and then we're going to ask that this money not be rightfully given back to those municipalities for infractions that are happening in their communities. This has the potential to be significantly devastating to our policing budgets and to those particularly in the two large centres.

Of course, enabling legislation where the minister has the ability to change the police costing model or change currently exempted municipalities: again, I know that there was a platform and I know that people were elected, but I can tell you that this was not in the platform. This was not in the literature that showed up at my house or any of the houses in any of your ridings. This wasn't something that you advertised you were going to do, so I think that, at a minimum, taking the time to consider the implications before rushing through would be fair and responsible.

In terms of labour, giving the minister greater authority to define an employee, setting restrictions on unionized employees for what services they access from government, repealing essential services and the worker replacement ban, reinstating specific bargaining unit exemptions, and prescribing limits on termination and severance paid to nonbargaining unit employees: these are things that, again, were not in the platform.

Here we are, only on Bill 21 of a new government and its first cycle through spring and fall session, and there's an opportunity to implement the platform. Instead, what's being implemented are a bunch of what I would say are really nasty cuts, nasty cuts that are going to really deeply hurt some of those who are most vulnerable in our society.

The Member for Cardston-Siksika asked about the $4.7 billion no-jobs corporate handout, as I like to refer to it. It's on page 144 of the fiscal plan. I remember that because it's 12 squared. I like numbers, too, so for anyone who forgets: page 144 of the fiscal plan. We were saying originally $4.5 billion because when we did the math, we estimated that it would be $4.5 billion. But when the fiscal plan came out, we read the documents, we did the analysis, and we saw that it was right there in black and white, $4.7 billion. That is, again, around the corporate tax reduction.

As was mentioned by one of my colleagues, the Member for Edmonton-West Henday, the announcement was made about this $4.7 billion giveaway in the EnCana building. Of course, now we have the devastating news for so many families and so many people who've relied on EnCana for their livelihood for many, many years that they are leaving Canada. That is something that I think speaks to the fact that that $4.7 billion giveaway was rushed into.

Now the government is asking us to rush into this Bill 21, a significant omnibus bill that attacks so many different areas within a variety of budgets, and what we're doing as an opposition is saying, "Whoa, Nelly" or "Whoa, Tank" or Nabra or whatever metaphor you want to use to say that we need a little bit more time to have an opportunity to review this and consider the real implications of this. I think that all private members deserve that opportunity.

When members accuse us of sharing misinformation, we're actually not. We're reading the budget, we're asking questions in estimates, we're finding out what the implications are, so I think that it's fair for us to all have an opportunity to do that on a deeper level through this committee. I think that it's the responsible thing, and I think it's something that we owe to our constituents, whether they live in our ridings or not.

I often say: you know, I work for you, I work for the public, and that is my job. I think that for government to say out of one side of their mouth "We respect folks who are low income" and then out of the other side say "But we're taking away your meagre $30 AISH increase this year to keep up with inflation because we are 'taking on water'" is not just disrespectful; I think it's actually inhumane. I think it's a really unfortunately way to speak to one another about things that our constituents rely on for meeting their basic human rights.

I think that saying, "You know, I know we said last year that we thought you should be able to afford toothpaste and shampoo and those kinds of things, but we got into government, and we decided that it was just so much more important for us to give $4.7 billion to corporations; we've got to make that up somewhere, so you're going to have to do your part," while major employers have not created any jobs that the government had promised they would – this is not a discussion that I enter into lightly, nor is any bill, but this certainly has, I think, negative ramifications.

That's why I support the motion to refer to the exceptional committee on family and community services. Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. I see that the hon. Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat has risen.

Ms Glasgo: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I mean, I love getting up on 29(2)(a), and I love having the opportunity to address this House. I think it's important, especially when we're talking about the Families and Communities Committee. I'm very happy to be able to be on that committee. It's a very productive committee. We do a lot of really important work. We've been overseeing estimates, just like the other standing committees of this House have.

One thing that's come up, over and over and over, is the job-creation tax cut and what it is or isn't. While the opposition likes to cite whatever page they do, if they go to page 64, it has a revenue comparison that actually shows what happens when you implement a job-creation tax cut, which is: create revenue, create jobs. When that happens, it offsets what it takes out of the economy. If they wish to look at a balance sheet, not like they really have in the past, they would see that there.

You know, what I can really tell you about is what happens in my constituency. In Brooks-Medicine Hat I hear all the time, time and time again, everywhere we go: you guys are doing a great job; keep up the good work. I mean, that's not to say that there isn't any criticism. Of course, there's criticism, and I think that's the best part of democracy, that there is criticism and we can hear it. Actually, it makes it better, makes us better. For me, I get to hear from the great people of Brooks-Medicine Hat. I mean, we have the opportunity through e-mail, through whatever else. Even in committee we had some people come into private members' public bills. It's been a great pleasure to hear from people about our plans and how that affects them.

I know that for the people in my riding the most important thing is jobs because in southern Alberta we've been devastated by the downturn in oil and gas prices. I mean, under the previous government there were 170,000, I think, jobs lost. That's concerning because I know that a large portion of that would be in my riding, anecdotally, of course. I talked to so many people. I talked to grown men who were crying on their doorsteps, and I know that the Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat referenced this yesterday, too. It's really unfortunate when you see this. You see families devastated by a loss of income, and the members opposite get up and talk about – you know, they just basically squash any opportunity for those people to get back to work by grandstanding on a tax cut that actually will help our province. If they continued to read or if they read all of the fiscal plan instead of just one line, they might know that.

Of course, I'm responding to the Member for Edmonton-Glenora, so I will get back on topic. This shouldn't go back to committee, Mr. Speaker. This is a plan that's costed. This is a plan that has been endorsed by millions of Albertans, as the Member for Cardston-Siksika has said, and this is a plan that we believe in. It's a plan that Albertans believe in, which is why it should go forward. Any impediment to that, any thought of more time to drag this on – we need to get people back to work, and that's exactly what we're doing with our plan.

With that, I will resign my time. Hopefully, the Member for Edmonton-Glenora can explain to us why she seems to have read every single page of the fiscal plan except for page 64.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora is responding.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member for her questions. Again, page 144 of the fiscal plan is the page that I continue to refer to. I'm happy to answer that question about where the $4.7 billion number is.

I'll also remind the member that cabinet ministers have said that it hasn't resulted in job creation and how much that disappoints them because it certainly isn't working. It also hasn't worked in that 27,000 fewer Albertans have jobs now than had jobs when they were elected. I agree that people absolutely voted for more jobs. They one hundred per cent voted for more jobs. Instead, what is being brought forward here in Bill 21 is a plan to cut payments for AISH recipients, to cut payments for seniors living in seniors' lodges, to cut payments for folks who are some of the most vulnerable and instead continue to increase costs for low- and middle-income families, including the increase to student loan repayment programs.

Again, I know that the member says: well, we ran on a platform. You absolutely did, and I can tell you that the increase to student loan debt repayments was not in the platform, Mr. Speaker, through you. It certainly is troubling to me. There absolutely was an election, and the majority of the seats were won by a party other than ours, but we were also elected as private members to come here and fight for Albertans.

The Speaker: Hon. members, we are on the amendment. Are there any other members wishing to speak?

Seeing none, if there is a desire of the House to go to one-minute bells, then perhaps someone could move the request for unanimous consent.

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, I would like to move for unanimous consent to go to one-minute bells.

[The voice vote indicated that the motion on amendment REF1 lost]

[Several members rose calling for a division. The division bell was rung at 10:34 p.m.]

[One minute having elapsed, the Assembly divided]

[The Speaker in the chair]

For the motion:

Totals: For – 10 Against – 31

[Motion on amendment REF1 lost]

The Speaker: Hon. members, we are back on the bill. Is there anyone else wishing to join in the debate? I see the hon. Solicitor General has risen.

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, I'd move that we adjourn debate at this time.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

The Speaker: I see the hon. Solicitor General.

Mr. Schweitzer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We've made some good progress here tonight. I'd move that we adjourn the House until 1:30 p.m. tomorrow.

The Speaker: Tomorrow morning the Standing Committee on Families and Communities will consider the estimates for the Ministry of Community and Social Services in the Parkland Room, and the Standing Committee on Alberta's Economic Future will consider the main estimates for the Ministry of Labour and Immigration in the Rocky Mountain Room.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 10:39 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Wednesday, November 6, 2019

Prayers

The Speaker: Hon. members, the prayer. Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and to her government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideas but, laying aside all private interests and prejudices, keep in mind their responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all. Amen.

Please be seated.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Hon. members, we have a number of guests, so I think it would be advantageous if you let me get through them all, and then we will give our guests the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly at the end of such time. They are a group of grade 6 students from St. Charles school in Edmonton-Castle Downs. From Edmonton-City Centre please welcome students from NAIT, the radio and television program.

Hon. members, many of you may be aware that it is grade 9 go to work day. That's why I'm growing a goatee, so you know that I'm actually meant to be here and not with go to work day. There are a number of guests of this wonderful program. Guests of the Associate Minister of Natural Gas: a student from Richard S. Fowler school in St. Albert, Cole Sekulic, and his parents, Verdelle and Mike; the Minister of Education's communications team: Luc Bourdeau and his dad, Chris; Kate Cromb and her dad, Ryan. Both Kate and Luc are students of Elk Island public schools.

Also here today are special guests of the Member for Highwood: Eddie and Jessica Maurice.

Hon. members, as some of you may have seen in the Federal Building earlier today, it is Alberta Book Day, and I am pleased to welcome guests of the Minister of Culture, Multiculturalism and Status of Women, book publishers from all across the province, the Book Publishers Association of Alberta.

Also in the gallery this afternoon is a guest of the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood, a member of downtown Calgary's homeless outreach #BeTheChangeYYC team, Chaz Smith.

Also in the gallery today are guests of the Member for Lethbridge-East: a delegation of the association of southern Alberta Team Lethbridge. Welcome here.

Guests of the hon. Member for Calgary-Fish Creek: please welcome representatives of Canada and Alberta's cement and concrete industries.

Visiting as guests of the Member for Banff-Kananaskis are representatives of the Springbank action coalition.

If I mentioned your name or a group that you're associated with, if you could please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Members' Statements

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Grande Prairie.

Remembrance Day

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today I rise to honour the men and women who have stepped forward to serve our country and preserve our freedom. Each year in the days leading up to Remembrance Day, I think of the families that paid the ultimate price in the name of freedom and democracy. I think of the generations of Canadians that have benefited from these sacrifices, and I think of the generations of Canadians that were lost in those battlefields so long ago, the family lines that ended as soldiers laid down their lives in service to our country.

On October 29, 1917, Private George Carr Thompson of Oxford, Nova Scotia, was killed in battle on the fields of Flanders at Passchendaele. He was 22 years old. Private Thompson served in the 85th Canadian infantry battalion, known as the Nova Scotia Highlanders. He was my great-great-uncle, the brother of my great-grandmother, Hilda Thompson Wood.

Last week marked 102 years since he took his last breath, and I rise today to remember him and to recognize the loss in my family and in the generations that followed. I think of my grandfather – God rest his soul – who never knew his uncle but proudly recalled his service in one of the darkest times our world has known. In the face of oppression Private Thompson stood bravely and fought valiantly along with over 420,000 Canadians who served overseas during World War I. Private Thompson was one of close to 61,000 Canadians killed and 172,000 Canadians wounded in the war.

In the words of Lieutenant-General Sir Arthur W. Currie:

Inspired by the example of their fathers, our children will know that the rights enjoyed by Canadians have corresponding duties, the greatest of them all being personal service to the country in case of danger. Let us all serve our fellow men. Let us all hold high the love of our country so that the work begun on the fields of Flanders in France may be continued and that our heroic dead may rest in peace, sure that their sacrifice has not been in vain.

Lest we forget.

Telus World of Science Edmonton

Ms Hoffman: Ignite curiosity; inspire discovery; celebrate science; change lives. Today it's my pleasure to honour the Telus World of Science Edmonton. While it's housed in the constituency I have the honour of representing, it's a treasure that we can all take pride in. For as long as I can remember, Edmonton has been home to the Space and Science Centre. I recall my first 3-D IMAX show, where as a young child I dodged the flies that were coming off the screen straight at me.

Here we are a few years later at the Telus World of Science, and it's probably even more dynamic than its vision originally was: almost half a million ticketed visitors annually and 75,000 children as part of a school group alone. In fact, the Telus World of Science is the largest ticketed cultural attraction in Edmonton. Whether you're enjoying the science garage; creating your own renewable energy; watching a stunning IMAX film in the new 4K projector, like the Rocky Mountain Express or Secret Ocean; creating black holes with your bare hands on your way into the Zeidler Dome and the space gallery; or visiting the feature exhibits like the current Marvel universe of superheroes, on its only Canadian stop, I might add, or Sherlock, Rubik's, Body Worlds – the list goes on – this place is amazing.

None of this would be possible without a strong fund development and without public investment. Under the NDP $12 million was invested in the Telus World of Science Edmonton. I intentionally use the word "invested," Mr. Speaker, because this place has hundreds of Alberta volunteers and workers who rely on it. I'm proud to have Constance Scarlett, Steve Baker, and Daryl Zelinski here today on their behalf. When the minister of culture says that she values the Telus World of Science, I take her at her word. I wish her luck in advocating to her colleagues as we know Conservative austerity often targets cultural initiatives, and this current budget is certainly no exception. I hope she has better luck in the spring, because we all deserve a science centre that ignites curiosity, inspires discovery, celebrates science, and changes lives.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Leduc-Beaumont.

Alex Decoteau

Mr. Rutherford: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As the government of Alberta's liaison to the Canadian Armed Forces I have the tremendous honour and responsibility of advocating for the brave men and women who have served us and continue to serve us bravely every day. One person that served our country as a member of the Canadian Armed Forces as well as on the world stage at the Olympics was Alex Decoteau.

Alex Decoteau was an amazing athlete. He won the C.W. Cross Challenge Cup five times. In 1912 he won the annual 10-mile race just outside of Edmonton in Fort Saskatchewan for the third consecutive year. He was winning competition after competition across Canada, which ultimately led to the Olympic Games in Stockholm, where he competed in the 5,000-metre race. He also went on to represent the Edmonton city police amateur athletics association at the dominion track and field championships in Vancouver.

Alex Decoteau was not only a great athlete. He also went on to become Canada's first indigenous police officer and a soldier during the First World War. At first he enlisted as a private in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, where he served in the 202nd infantry battalion and later the 49th. He bravely fought for the freedoms that we enjoy today and was tragically killed by a sniper in 1917 during the Battle of Passchendaele. We honour his great sacrifice and contributions to our country this week as we commemorate Veterans' Week and National Aboriginal Veterans Day on Friday.

In his memory our government has committed to the creation of the Alex Decoteau scholarship. This scholarship will be awarded to members or to immediate family members of fallen or disabled members of the Canadian Armed Forces from Alberta. I'm proud to stand with a government that is committed to making life better for all Albertans, especially our military families, Mr. Speaker.

Budget 2019 and Lethbridge

Ms Phillips: Lethbridge remains one of the best places in the province to raise a family and a model of a diversified economy to which other communities in Alberta aspire. Today we are lucky to have representatives from Team Lethbridge, a range of public-sector, private-sector, nonprofit and civil society leaders and organizations at the Legislature. Like me, they are here to ensure that Lethbridge is heard.

We have already seen this government's disregard for our city in their budget. Here's just a short list of our challenges: a broken promise on a new bridge for highway 3; cuts to ambulance services; no new schools despite the fact that we're one of the fastest growing cities in the country; no funding for a much-needed cardiac catheterization lab in our hospital; cuts to the arts and those that work in the creative industries; cuts to early learning, child care, and parent link centres; layoffs of teachers, educational assistants, and others through millions in cuts to our two school boards; cuts to urban indigenous programs; cuts to our parks and those who work to monitor and protect our environment; cuts to programs and tax credits designed to diversify and grow our economy and attract new types of investment and entrepreneurs.

Finally, Lethbridge is known for two things, seniors and students. We have seen this government go out of its way to make cuts to both by raising tuition and deep cuts to our university and college, cutting seniors' lodge assistance programs, seniors' benefits, and kicking tens of thousands of older Albertans off the seniors' drug plan.

Lethbridge withstood the worst of the recession caused by the collapse in the price of oil, but this UCP recession will undoubtedly hurt our community. Bigger deficits, higher personal taxes, and thousands of layoffs, all to pay for a $4.7 billion no-jobs corporate handout. That will mean that my friends and neighbours and all Lethbridgeans will have to look to one another through the hard times.

Team Lethbridge will help our community remain strong through the coming years of a UCP recession.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

Lethbridge

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm always proud to stand in this House and talk about my home, Lethbridge. Though we tend to be rather quiet about our successes and the people who make these victories possible, we should be proud of their achievements in their categories.

Nikka Yuko Japanese garden is within the top 10 of North America. The U of L is in the top five in Canada. Lethbridge College serves our registered apprenticeship program, that often has more students than Calgary. That's not per capita; that's total. We have a world-class agricultural production and food processing hub, with plans for an exhibition grounds to build and expand that presence even more.

I'm lucky enough to have many of these visionary people in the gallery today and here at the Legislature this week. This week marks the sixth visit of Team Lethbridge to Edmonton and to this Legislature. Beginning in 2008, Team Lethbridge has brought a like-minded group of individuals and associations to the Legislature in pursuit of building an understanding of how important our great city is to this province. Team Lethbridge works to build relationships between government representatives and Lethbridge's community leaders, which builds capacity in supporting the long-term success of our province as a whole.

Before ever standing in this House as an elected member, I recall myself being here as a member of Team Lethbridge on behalf of the Lethbridge Construction Association. Through uniting academics, educators, entrepreneurs, associations and organizations, Team Lethbridge brings the best and brightest from our community to our Legislature. The vision of Team Lethbridge is to foster a community, a province, and a nation that is not only ready to seize the opportunities of today but also the possibilities of tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker, just as the sun rises in the bright blue sky of the east and sets in an orange ball of fire in the west, so our parties are represented in this Legislature. Recognizing our diversity, innovation, and wide range of thinking and pursuits, through their hard work these individuals know what it takes to become the pillars of our community. On behalf of them I would like to thank many of our government, opposition, and private members who have taken the time this week to get to know Lethbridge a little better.

The Speaker: It would seem teamwork does make the dream work.

Teachers

Member Irwin: Today I'd like to talk about teachers. I'm so proud to be a teacher, and I'm so proud to sit on this side of the House with a few teacher colleagues in the NDP caucus who show me every day that once a teacher, always a teacher.

We've been hearing from a lot of teachers lately. A lot. They're worried. They're disheartened. They're deflated. They're being sent multiple messages from this UCP government. They're told that they're good enough to look after your kids but that they're overpaid and underworked and that their salaries should be rolled back. They're told that they're skilled, yet there's no room for a single practising teacher on this government's curriculum advisory panel, but there's room for businesspeople and an American researcher fixated on privatization. They're told that their professionalism is valued as they juggle complex classrooms, but then they're told that youth mental health is in a crisis and that there's no money to fully fund each of their students or to hire more educational assistants. They're told that their autonomy is respected, but they can no longer have control over the pension funds that they pay into, a decision made without consultation.

But don't get me wrong. This isn't about pensions. It's about people, and it's about respect and the complete lack of it from this UCP government and a growing list of contemptible attacks on public education. Most of all, it's about our students. They're the ones who are hurt the most in all of this. This government speaks a big game about investing in our province, yet their actions show that they continue to prioritize corporations over kids.

We build a strong province by building a strong education system, one that truly supports young Albertans and the people who teach them, not by asking teachers to continue to do more with less and certainly not by asking students to bear the burden in the name of efficiency and debt. On this side of the House we refuse to accept that our kids deserve anything less than a well-funded education system, one that values them, their teachers, and every person who helps them along their educational journey.

Thank you.

November

Ms Issik: Mr. Speaker, I'm honoured to have the opportunity to speak at the beginning of this special month about a cause that is important to me and countless Albertans. This fine month of November, also known as Movember, has long been associated with the no-shave movement. Some of history's most glorious manes have been nurtured thanks to this tradition. I see that some of our colleagues are actively involved in this effort, and it's coming along quite nicely. However, this hairy convention has become so overwhelmingly popular that its true purpose is often overlooked.

The objective of Movember is to raise awareness of male cancers and male mental wellness by embracing facial hair. Movember raises important funds to support these issues, but most importantly it saves lives. It saved the life of my own son because he recognized that he needed to seek medical attention immediately. Early detection of cancer saves lives.

Mr. Speaker, 2,800 men in Alberta will be diagnosed with prostate cancer this year. An estimated 1,100 Canadian men will be diagnosed with testicular cancer, with a large proportion being Albertans. And more men will suffer silently through mental illness, and sadly some will die through suicide as a result. Just like cancer, mental illness is most successfully treated with early intervention.

One mandate of Movember is for participants to donate any money they would have spent on grooming to relevant causes like cancer research and suicide prevention. Likewise, people who can't grow facial hair themselves are encouraged to support a nonshaver. And to all Albertans, I encourage your support of this cause because you don't need to have a beautiful mane to proudly stand behind the causes that matter. To everybody participating in 2019's Movember, regardless of your follicle strength, thank you for supporting this important cause.

Ms Pancholi: It has become increasingly clear that this government is targeting the most vulnerable Albertans to pay for their $4.7 billion giveaway to corporations. As Official Opposition critic for Children's Services, that is clear as this government cuts off young people who grew up in foster care from critical support to transition them into adulthood. These young people have survived trauma, abuse, and neglect and have no family support. Now they have less than six months to plan for another abrupt and heartless change in their lives. Sadly, this is not the only proof that the government values corporate bottom lines more than vulnerable Albertans. From AISH to child care subsidies to seniors to indigenous housing: cuts, cuts, cuts.

But this budget doesn't just hurt vulnerable Albertans. It makes life less affordable for all Albertans. Last Friday a resident of Edmonton-Whitemud came in to my constituency office to talk about how this government's budget affects her family. As an artist she's scared that the cuts to arts funding put her livelihood in jeopardy. She's worried she'll join the ranks of the unemployed and underemployed because this UCP government does not value the contributions that artists make to our economy. She's scared for her husband, a hard-working public servant for decades, because she knows that the UCP does not value those who serve all Albertans. In fact, we've already seen public servants shown the door by this government. She's scared for her young child, a child that will see growing class sizes, fewer teachers, fewer EAs, and, once again, fewer supports for those that need it most because this government has not funded enrolment growth and school boards are in an unprecedented state of underfunding.

She is scared for her older child, studying at the U of A, who will see tuition rise by 21 per cent over their degree and will bear the burden of a crushing student debt for many, many years as interest rates rise. She is scared because every day brings more bad news for her family. Income taxes are rising, electricity prices are rising, school fees are rising, and life just keeps getting more expensive under this government.

Now, I'm sure the members opposite will once again accuse me of fearmongering, but I did not create this fear; they did. I will rise to ensure that every voice is heard and to ensure that the Premier and his cut-happy cabinet take responsibility for their actions.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The Leader of Her Majesty's Official Opposition.

Firefighting Service Funding

Ms Notley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Every year Albertans face larger wildfires. Last year was the largest burn ever. For the last 40 years incredibly brave and highly trained Albertans have rappelled out of helicopters, sometimes right on top of the fire, and fought the flames that otherwise we could not reach. But today we learned that these brave rap team members have been sacrificed to pay for this Premier's $4.7 billion handout. Premier, why are you putting rural Albertans at increased risk from wildfires by disbanding this elite team?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, in fact, what this government is doing is massively increasing our budgeted resources for fighting wildfires. The NDP never did that. In fact, we're taking the contingency budget allocation for firefighting for wildfires from $200 million to $750 million a year. We are more than tripling the commitment to that. Now, the Official Opposition leader is talking about a program that was used in less than 2 per cent of instances. The department believes that they can more efficiently allocate those resources to other parts of our wildfire teams.

Ms Notley: Well, I'm sure that that rap team would be happy to hear that their Premier thinks they only work 2 per cent of the day.

You know what? One member actually wrote: the dismantling of the wildfire rappel program in Alberta is a travesty caused by the careless and irresponsible Conservative government budget cuts; how are we supposed to protect human life, communities, watersheds, soils, infrastructure when the provincial government clearly doesn't support us? These Albertans get it, Mr. Speaker. Premier, this firefighter understands your budget. Why don't you understand firefighting?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, I understand that the NDP shortchanged our firefighters and our wildfire service, budgeting only $200 million in contingency as opposed to the $750 million assigned in this budget. Unlike the NDP, that tried to snow Albertans with massively unrealistic revenue projections and by shortchanging the wildfire fighters, we instead are budgeting for what we actually expect they may spend. The department has decided to prioritize the helitack and firetruck crews, and there will be more resources available for them in this budget.

Ms Notley: You know, the Premier knows full well that the numbers he is throwing out right now are not real. It's a question of whether you budget in advance or you pay after the disaster. We always paid. We always paid, and he knows it. But what he doesn't know is that he's cut 13 per cent of Alberta firefighters in this budget. He should learn his budget. Why did he do that, and why won't he reverse it?

Mr. Kenney: Again, the budget contingency for wildfires and other natural disasters has been more than tripled to set aside resources to respond as necessary. Mr. Speaker, I'd also like to underscore that the Minister of Labour and Immigration has announced the launch of our heroes fund, that will provide a contribution of $100,000 to our first responders who are either severely injured or who, tragically, lose their lives, by adding a provincial contribution to the federal heroes fund to underscore our support for our first responders.

The Speaker: The Leader of the Official Opposition for her second set of questions.

Wood's Homes in Calgary

Ms Notley: Back in 2007 the former government established the Protection of Sexually Exploited Children Act. It requires specific efforts to protect children from sexual predators. Today we learned that this Premier is ending a contract with Wood's Homes, a nonprofit in Calgary that does exactly this protective work. As an Albertan and as a parent I am appalled, Mr. Speaker. This Premier has chosen to turn his back on children who are victims of sexual predators in order to fund his $4.7 billion corporate handout. Does the Premier really stand by this decision?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Budget 2019 was a balanced plan to create jobs, grow the economy, and protect our vital services, which includes protecting our most vulnerable in this province. That is why my Ministry of Children's Services saw an increase of 8.5 per cent in this year and 15 per cent over the next four years. We will continue to procure the services we need in a transparent way and deliver on the needs of the most vulnerable in our province.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, apparently the Premier won't stand at all.

Children in Calgary fleeing from sexual predators, their only lifeline eliminated by this government. He's tried to claim in the past that he's concerned about sexual exploitation, but he's clearly not walking the walk. For heaven's sake, Premier, why won't you direct your minister to reverse this unconscionable decision?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, as the minister underscored, even after having inherited a fiscal crisis from the NDP, we have found the funds to increase support for Children's Services by over 8 per cent and, in addition to that, new funding, as per our platform, by doubling the funding for the integrated child exploitation unit, operated by Alberta police services, and doubling the funding for the integrated threat and risk assessment unit, that helps combat domestic violence, as well as our action plan to combat human trafficking and so much more to prioritize the protection of the victims of sexual exploitation.

Ms Notley: This program has been in place for over a decade to protect children from sexual exploitation. The Premier is literally increasing the risk of sexual assault and trauma amongst children. Compared to the $4.7 billion that he handed over to his profitable corporate friends, the cost of this outreach work is minuscule, but the human suffering it prevents is not. Premier, you must know you're wrong here. No corporate handout is worth this. Why not have the courage to admit it and protect these children in the process?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, it's time for the opposition leader to admit that she is making up a nonexistent corporate handout. The job-creation tax cut, which independent economists project will help to create 58,000 new full-time private-sector jobs, represents a revenue offset of $100 million. Instead, if we were to eliminate that, we would still have an $8 billion deficit that we inherited from the NDP in part because they overprojected revenues by $6 billion.

Mr. Speaker, we are increasing support for Children's Services by over 8 per cent and investing more in protecting vulnerable kids.

The Speaker: The hon. the Leader of the Official Opposition.

Ms Notley: You've cut a contract to protect sexually exploited kids in Calgary; 27,000 people have lost their jobs. Those are the facts.

AISH Indexation

Ms Notley: Earlier today I was joined by many Albertans who live with a severe disability that prevents them from working. Now, I was very proud that our government was able to raise their rates and index them for inflation after years of Conservative neglect. The current Premier and his party even voted for that, but since then they've changed their mind, and they are pushing these Albertans further into poverty. Premier, why are you forcing these Albertans to sacrifice their food, their rent, their heat for your billion-dollar corporate handout?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, we are doing no such thing. The truth is that even though we inherited a fiscal crisis from the NDP that threatened the future of our social programs, we are increasing funding for AISH, and we're doing so by 11 per cent, increasing the budget from $1.285 billion this year to $1.398 billion next year while incorporating the significant increase last year. Altogether, from 2018-19 to '20-22 this represents a quarter of a billion dollars of additional resources for AISH. Those are the facts.

Ms Notley: The facts are that each individual human being – think about the humans, Premier – is getting less. The Premier, right before he announced it, said: it's not onerous that they could get up to $120 less. But, Premier, it's a week's worth of groceries. It's the difference between making rent. It's the difference between facing homelessness. Now, some of these Albertans are even raising children on those payments. Premier, they are here. Show some courage. Look up in the gallery, look them in the eye, and tell them once again that what you're doing is not onerous.

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, if there's one thing worse than the NDP's fundamental dishonesty, it is their hypocrisy. For four years in office, even while running the largest deficits in our province's history, they did not index AISH payments. AISH has existed since 1979. It has never been subject to indexation, not once in 40 years, including during the four years of the NDP, but now they are seeking to frighten vulnerable people. That is shameful. Instead, we're helping to increase AISH support by a quarter of a billion dollars. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, our changes last fall indexed for every year that we were in government. Moreover, the members opposite voted for it, and then after the election they decided it was time to break out their cruelest, most heartless plans. That's what they're doing. When we raised the alarm, they told us we were fear-mongering. But you know what? The fear is real because the lack of dollars in each individual's bank account is real. Why won't the Premier stand up, be accountable, be honest, and reverse these ridiculous decisions?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, our budget incorporates the large increase in AISH payments made last year, which is why the budget for AISH – this is not an opinion; these are the hard numbers that are before the Legislature – is going from $1.13 billion in 2018 up to $1.4 billion, a quarter of a billion dollar increase. But in 2015, '16, '17, '18, and into '19 the NDP did not index AISH. It has never been indexed. We are continuing to support and, in fact, prioritize support for the most vulnerable.

Education Budget 2019-2020

Ms Hoffman: For months the Minister of Education claimed that there would be no cuts to schools, and that's not true. Now the minister's fallback position is that crowded classrooms, longer bus rides, and removal of supports for kids with complex needs are someone else's fault. The cuts are real, but don't blame the UCP for their $4.7 billion no-jobs corporate handout on page 144 of their budget; blame the Calgary board of education. What a pitiful performance, Premier. You must be so sick of this kind of a response, Mr. Speaker. What do you have to say to the school board of Wolf Creek public schools in Lacombe? They're facing a $1.8 million budget shortfall. Is it their fault?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. I can share with you the fact that we are maintaining Education funding. The $8.223 billion that we spent in Education last year we are spending this year. Every single student is being funded at the same base rate they were funded at last year. Every student.

Ms Hoffman: The minister's office published a hasty op-ed just hours after the CBE went public with what the shortfall, that they were stuck with by this minister, meant for them. In the piece she writes that she's surprised that the Calgary board will have to lay off teachers and educational assistants. Mr. Speaker, she should not be surprised because she caused this to happen. Does the Premier also claim to be surprised by the $7.8 million budget shortfall this minister has stuck the Parkland school division with?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am surprised because the CBE has an operating budget of $1.2 billion. The overall operating budget for the city of Calgary is approximately $3.5 billion. We have one school division receiving $1.2 billion, servicing 130,000 students. My expectation is that every school division will look within their budgets to find efficiencies, including CBE.

Ms Hoffman: The question was about the Parkland school division, Mr. Speaker.

The minister seems content to point the finger at Calgary for the next four years while students and families suffer. What about the Foothills school division? They've also been stuck with an $11 million shortfall from this minister to pay for her $4.7 billion no-jobs corporate handout. Premier, are you really going to try to blame Foothills and every single one of Alberta's other school districts for the budget crisis that you and your minister have created?

Member LaGrange: Well, Mr. Speaker, the truth of the matter is that enrolment growth over the last 15 years has grown by 25 per cent, inflation has grown by 33 per cent, but the growth in operational funding to our school boards has grown by 80 per cent. We are maintaining the $8.223 billion. School divisions are adequately funded. They are in the best position to look at their finances and find efficiencies if they need them.

Diabetes Treatment

Ms Issik: Mr. Speaker, diabetes is one of the most common illnesses in Alberta and can take a significant toll on an individual's day-to-day life. I often hear from my constituents who live with diabetes that they worry about the availability of appropriate supports for their individual circumstances. If not treated properly, diabetes can become a major health concern or result in other major health complications, and ultimately these serious complications result in a strain on the public health care system. To the Minister of Health: what supports are available to Albertans living with diabetes?

The Speaker: The Minister of Health.

Mr. Shandro: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member is correct. Diabetes is one of the most common conditions in the province. About 350,000 Albertans live with diabetes today, and that's expected to increase to more than 500,000 by 2029. Alberta Health spent about $411 million last year to provide diabetes supplies and drugs. These benefits include $90 million for insulin and related products and $21.5 million for supplies like test strips for blood glucose. Diabetes is a perfect example of the challenges in health care.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Calgary-Glenmore.

Ms Issik: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the Minister of Health has outlined various supports available to those who live with diabetes and given that there are now safer, more efficient technologies such as flash glucose monitors or continuous glucose monitoring along with insulin pumps and given that these technologies can greatly reduce the challenges of living with diabetes and that many Albertans have eagerly followed the progress on these technologies, can the minister speak to whether the government is considering covering any of these new technologies?

Mr. Shandro: Well, Mr. Speaker, we're committed to maintaining our current benefits, and we want to do more where it's justified in terms of cost and benefit to patients. We know that living with diabetes or caring for someone with it can be a financial burden. Government in recent years has added benefits for insulin pumps, for example, at a cost of more than $18 million last year. We're working with the University of Calgary to evaluate a number of diabetes technologies, including glucose monitoring devices. This health technology assessment will help inform future coverage decisions.

Ms Issik: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that I receive consistent inquiries from my constituents about diabetes and in particular glucose monitoring technologies and the progress and potential benefits these technologies could have for those living with diabetes and given that my constituents are anxiously awaiting the results of the technology review that the minister mentioned and that diabetes and prediabetes affects such a large number of Albertans, to the Minister of Health: when can my constituents in Calgary-Glenmore and Albertans across the province expect the results of this new review to be made public?

The Speaker: The minister.

Mr. Shandro: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The department has commissioned this through the University of Calgary. The review will examine the clinical outcomes and cost-effectiveness of a number of new technologies like continuous or flash glucose monitors. The assessment will be completed by the end of the fiscal year. It's a technical analysis rather than a public report. The data will help inform the department as they consider future coverage options for Albertans.

The Speaker: I recognize the Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Children's Services Budget 2019-2020

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. There are even more cuts being planned for the Children's Services ministry. We've obtained a letter confirming that the early childhood coalition grant will end this March. This funding was used to advocate for early childhood development, hold workshops for parents, and help children in low-income communities. Now the grant is gone. To the minister: please explain why early childhood development isn't a priority but a $4.7 billion no-jobs corporate handout is.

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As I've said before, we continue to prioritize supports to those in Alberta who need it the most. These were one-time grants that went to a number of early childhood coalitions across the province, and future funding was not provided under the former government's budget. These were one-time grants for community building and capacity building.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that this government has also cut child care subsidies for low-income stay-at-home parents and given that they've gone even further and also cut kin child care subsidies, which hits families who rely on support within their families to provide child care, particularly in rural Alberta, to the minister. You've told Albertans that you want to provide choice in child care. How exactly does gutting all of these supports do that?

The Speaker: The Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. This year's budget actually saw an increase of child care subsidy dollars. For the programs that the member opposite is speaking to, less than 1 per cent – I believe it's .08 per cent – of Alberta families used these two programs. They also had absolutely no checks and balances in terms of whether there was financial need, whether the parents were working, or any requirements for invoicing or proof of care. That's why we're going to continue to support those working parents in Alberta who need the supports the most.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that our leader has exposed other cuts to the Children's Services ministry today and given that these all come on top of cuts to supports for former foster kids that we exposed last week in estimates and given that this minister barely blinks when asked about all of these cuts, to the minister: by the time you're through, how many vulnerable Albertans will be harmed by your cuts?

Ms Schulz: Mr. Speaker, our government prioritizes supporting vulnerable children, youth, and families. But what we won't do is continue to do the same thing we've always done because it's the way we've always done it. Part of this is our community-based organizations, especially in the early intervention and prevention space. Many of our community organizations are already well beyond us in terms of working together and providing innovative supports for vulnerable families, and it's time for government to catch up.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

Public-private Partnerships for School Construction

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. P3 schools are a failed experiment. Taxpayers pay more while students and families get less. Not long ago Conservatives came to understand this as well when the Progressive Conservatives cancelled 19 P3 schools and abandoned this risky ideological experiment. In 2014 the then Infrastructure minister, Wayne Drysdale, admitted, quote, that this project, a P3, does not make sense. End quote. Why is today's Minister of Infrastructure so infatuated with an idea that has been shown to be a disaster and proven to fail?

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, I can give you a number of examples where P3 projects were really successful. The member mentioned about a particular P3 project that was a failure, but I can give you so many examples. Our government is determined to evaluate case by case, and if the business case determines there is value for money, then we will proceed with the projects on a P3 basis. That's our campaign commitment.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that he claims he has many examples – but he can't even name one today – and given that the price of that failure was paid for by children, parents, and educators at schools in my riding and given that we had exposed ditches, mud so deep that children were getting stuck in it, construction fencing that was falling on children, and runaway heating systems that could only be turned off in Toronto, does the Minister of Infrastructure have any idea of the real human misery that his failed ideological P3 experiments will cause, or is he only focused on paying for his $4.7 billion corporate handout?

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, this member just jumps up and down all the time, but he doesn't listen to me and what I'm trying to say. There were 40 schools built under P3 in the past, and those were all successful projects. Forty schools were built under P3. The P3 contractors cover the warranty, they bring private finance, and then they also build the schools faster and cheaper. Those are the advantages with P3. But we don't blindly apply ...

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that those successful projects he's talking about are the exact schools that I'm describing and given that children, parents, and educators at Bessie Nichols school and Johnny Bright school endured years of mud and heat issues and unsafe conditions because of the failed P3 school experiment and given that no other Alberta children and families should be forced to live through that to pay for this $4.7 billion corporate handout, will the Minister of Infrastructure agree to come to my riding and meet with these students, these parents, and the staff in my office and hear their stories? Yes or no?

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, these guys keep talking about $4.7 billion, which was a myth we called out, and the Leader of the Opposition was misleading Albertans with $4.7 billion. Specific to his request to visit his riding, I'll be happy to visit his riding.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lesser Slave Lake. [interjections] Order.

Flood Emergency Response Highway 88 Flood Damage

Mr. Rehn: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In my constituency residents of Marten Beach were positive that 2018 brought the 1-in-100-year flood. This year the flood was even worse. This year homes were flooded on the main floor. Water was so powerful that it washed out two culverts on highway 88 and shut down traffic. No wonder the flood was so bad: there were 185 millimetres of rain in four days. To the Minister of Transportation: what procedures does the government have in place to react to massive floods which shut down highways?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Transportation.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you for the question. Flood response and mitigation is crucial to us. We have seen the devastation time and again, and being prepared is important. During a flood we work closely with municipalities to ensure that lives are protected. That's first and foremost. The Provincial Operations Centre kicks into gear and helps co-ordinate response efforts between government response partners and community members and, after the flood comes, our disaster response recovery program to help Albertans restore damaged property and municipalities recover and get back to work and restore jobs and personal property. It's a co-ordinated approach, and we keep learning each time it happens. I think we're getting better at it.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lesser Slave Lake.

Mr. Rehn: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that highway 88 was quite damaged by the flood and given that two culverts were washed out, rendering the highway impassable, and given that a temporary bridge over the Lily Creek gap was put in place and allows some traffic to go through but remains an obstacle for a lot of the industrial traffic, to the Minister of Transportation: what progress has been made on finding a permanent repair for the two sections of highway 88?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Transportation has the call.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. If I understand the hon. member correctly, he's referring to the culverts at Lily Creek and Brady Creek. In this case I hope the member and his constituents will be happy to know that in this budget we've allocated funding for the two projects. They are not complete yet. They're currently in the design phase, but we are aware of it, and we have put money in place to make the necessary repairs.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Rehn: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the temporary crossings on highway 88 are still in place and given that the temporary crossings stymie a lot of industrial traffic and force far longer trips and given that the plan is to replace these temporary crossings covering the washouts with permanent bridges, to the Minister of Transportation: when can we expect the permanent bridges to be in place?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I understand the hon. member's lack of patience. He's only responding to the desires of his community. Highway 88, as he points out, is a major artery for industry as well as people. Our job is to make sure our road network doesn't hinder the movement of people and goods and services. However, as I said, the project is in the design phase, tentatively scheduled for 2019-20. Our hope is that construction will begin in the spring, and our sincere hope is that construction will be able to be completed next year during the fall season.

Budget 2019 and Lethbridge

Ms Phillips: Mr. Speaker, we have in the Chamber today Team Lethbridge, who are here to advocate for our city. The Minister of Infrastructure needs to make two commitments. One, why doesn't Lethbridge have any new schools when both our public and Catholic school divisions need new schools? Superintendents are here in the gallery. Two, there was a previous commitment to a 34-unit supportive housing complex, which is something the downtown business association and others here today have been advocating for. It's nowhere in the budget as well. Where are these investments? The Minister of Infrastructure should give a clear answer to Team Lethbridge about his capital plan. They are here in the gallery today.

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, my job is to build the schools that are on the capital project list, so I would encourage the member to take it up with the Minister of Education. But our government has prioritized based on the needs assessment, and we are building the schools where they are required. Also, given the fiscal situation we are in, the projects will be prioritized. We have another capital plan that will be presented in four months. Then probably we can address some of those concerns.

Ms Phillips: Given that Lethbridge has two urgent law enforcement needs in addition to reversing the cuts that mean that our police budget is less this year, given that we need a SCAN unit in the city to shut down drug houses, given that we need a drug court because Lethbridge has the highest per capita use of opioids, and given that the mayor and several councillors are here today listening carefully, can the Minister of Justice spare us his usual yelling and puffed up theatrics and just give our city an answer on a SCAN unit and a drug court? Are we getting them?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, we heard from the opposition earlier today: the fear is real. That is the state of the justice system across Alberta. In particular, when I met with the people in Lethbridge – our justice system is in disarray. We put in additional resources for things like Alberta law enforcement response teams to go after organized crime. I'm also proud of the fact that we have $20 million to enhance drug treatment courts across Alberta. I look forward to working with Lethbridge... [interjections] I look forward to working with Lethbridge – I don't know why they're heckling when I'm answering their question. We look forward to working with them in expanding drug treatment courts.

Ms Phillips: Given that during the election this government promised to replace the highway 3 bridge in Lethbridge and given that I don't see that project in the capital plan, can the Minister of Transportation tell our Team Lethbridge guests, every single one of whom drove over that 60-year-old bridge yesterday to travel to Edmonton to hear his answer, specifically when he will fulfill his Premier's commitment to the people of Lethbridge and replace the highway 3 bridge?

The Speaker: Hon. members, a point of order is noted at 2:22.

Mr. McIver: Mr. Speaker, I've received strong advocacy for the highway 3 bridge both from Lethbridge's mayor and from the Member for Lethbridge-East. I met with the mayor recently to discuss this, and while he made it clear that the city wants the bridge, he's also aware that the province did repairs on this bridge just a very few years ago. We don't want to throw those repairs away. This bridge, while it's needed, is not a safety need but rather a capacity need. We, respectfully, don't want to waste the money we spent on the bridge recently, but the day will come when that bridge will have to be replaced to add capacity.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West has a question.

Postsecondary Education Budget 2019-2020

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Here's a quote: "Students should not have to suffer just to receive an education." This was part of a statement from the University of Lethbridge Students' Union yesterday. This organization is understandably panicked by this government's cuts to postsecondary funding and the resulting costs being dumped onto students. The tuition freeze is off, the tuition tax credits are gone, and interest on student loans is going up. To the minister: why are you making cuts on the backs of postsecondary students?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaides: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. As the MacKinnon panel report pointed out, we have some long-standing challenges with our postsecondary system. The members opposite can scream and yell as much as they want, but the fact of the matter is that under their tenure postsecondary participation rates did not improve. Under their tenure enrolment in the province declined. It decreased. We haven't seen an expansion of access. We have to address the problem in a meaningful and substantial way, and we're going to do just that.

Mr. Eggen: Given that the University of Lethbridge Students' Union also states that postsecondary should be a place for students to "achieve their dreams" and aspirations and given that now many students I'm hearing from have continuous nightmares about how they're going to possibly afford a massive increase to tuition and given that this minister insists that he's on the side of students from Lethbridge, to the minister: will you commit here and now to undoing your half-baked plan to allow massive tuition hikes?

Mr. Nicolaides: Mr. Speaker, when it comes to supporting our students, it's a top priority, of course, for us, which is why we have not only maintained scholarships, but we have increased scholarships. We are providing over $8 million over four years to new scholarships. As well, Budget 2019 includes an expansion of $3 million for the Alexander Rutherford and an expansion of $51 million for additional supports in terms of student loans. Those are the things that we are working on. As I said, we have expanded scholarships in comparison to the previous government.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that this government is increasing scholarships by maybe $4 million and taking out $600 million from operating expenses – do the math – and given that, you know, students in Lethbridge say that "we will not be quiet, and neither should you" and that "we realize that many people [will need and] want to mobilize," to the minister: students are going to take action against your terrible budget, but don't you agree that they really shouldn't have to be doing this? They should be studying instead of protesting your terrible cuts.

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaides: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In my conversation with the university presidents and college presidents I made it very clear to them that as they are looking to finding more savings and efficiencies within the system, they look, first and foremost, to administrative expenses. We, naturally, don't want to see the quality of education be affected. When you look at the MacKinnon panel report, you'll see that in Alberta we spend $8,000 per student on administrative expenses while B.C. spends $4,000 and Ontario spends $5,000. If they can do it, so can we.

Natural Gas Industry Support

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, our natural gas industry has been hurting due to extreme low prices and limited market access. This has caused workers in the natural gas sector to be laid off and wondering how they will be able to provide for their families in the future. Albertans elected our government on an overwhelming mandate because we promised to revitalize our natural gas sector and get hard-working Albertans back to work. To the Associate Minister of Natural Gas: what is this government's plan to ensure our natural gas products can reach international markets and ultimately save Albertans' jobs?

Mr. Nally: Mr. Speaker, look, it is nothing short of tragic. Had the members across the aisle done anything – really, anything – to help the natural gas industry, they might actually have saved jobs for the natural gas producers. Now, the Member for Sherwood Park is absolutely correct. We were elected on an overwhelming mandate to stand up and fight for all Albertans. That includes the oil and gas workers. That's what we're going to do.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Sherwood Park.

Mr. Walker: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Minister. Given that the former NDP government was well aware of the issues facing our natural gas sector yet chose to do absolutely nothing and given that the natural gas sector has been asking for assistance in finding solutions to these issues for years and years and given that in July several CEOs called on our government to mandate production cuts to natural gas to stabilize natural gas prices, can the associate minister comment on whether such cuts are being considered?

Mr. Nally: Mr. Speaker, the members opposite were handed by the natural gas industry a Roadmap to Recovery, and do you know what they did with that road map? Do you know how they actioned it? They didn't. They sat on it. Now, perhaps if the members opposite had spent a little more time reading the Roadmap to Recovery and a little less time reading the Leap Manifesto, perhaps – perhaps – the natural gas industry would be in a different situation than it is today.

Mr. Walker: Given that our government cares strongly about environmental stewardship and given that natural gas is among the cleanest fossil fuels and has the potential to significantly lower global emissions and given that natural gas producers cite increased natural gas production in the United States as a reason for lower prices in our Canadian gas sector, can the minister please comment on what our government is doing to promote Canadian natural gas as the best option for energy consumption across Canada and around the world? [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

Mr. Nally: Mr. Speaker, our office is focused on promoting Alberta natural gas to key international stakeholders. We're meeting with international investors and delegations across Asia to get significant market access for our natural gas. Our LNG story is an impressive one, and I look forward to sharing it with the world.

2:30                      Firefighting Service Funding (continued)

Mr. Dach: Mr. Speaker, the brave men and women who have dedicated their lives to fighting wildfires in this province and keeping our communities safe certainly know more about their job than this minister does. Tom Weston spent 11 years in the wildland rap program, that is now being cut. He said that, quote, forest fires do not get stopped from the air, much as Hollywood might have you believe; they are stopped by boots on the ground spraying water, dirt, and directing air tankers and buckets of water to the places where they will be most effective. To the minister: explain to Albertans why after 40 years you are ending the rap program and eliminating this very proud and effective squadron of elite Alberta firefighters.

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Dreeshen: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. To the member opposite: I actually agree with him. Forest fires are put out by boots on the ground. That's why we're refocusing how we actually fight fires here in the province of Alberta. Those 63 great men and women are part of the thousand-plus people that we hire to fight fires here in the province of Alberta, and they will be dedicating a hundred per cent of their time to actually fighting forest fires on the ground. They do an amazing job. They did an amazing job this year. We know that they'll do an amazing job next year in fighting our forest fires.

Mr. Dach: Mr. Speaker, the rap helitack firefighters are worth their weight in gold.

Now, given that firefighter Tom Weston expected the government would argue that this program is too expensive but given that he said, quote, how do you measure the damage that didn't occur because of us, and how do you do a cost-benefit measure when you can't measure what hasn't been spent? – to the minister: answer Tom Weston. Explain to him why you're willing to put communities at risk to pay for your $4.7 billion corporate handout rather than maintaining this elite firefighting unit who spearheaded our firefighting attack.

Mr. Dreeshen: Mr. Speaker, the premise of that question is disheartening, it's not true, and I wish the NDP would stop. That's actually great fearmongering that's coming from the NDP. It is demand driven, the amount of resources required to fight fires here in the province of Alberta. We spent over $600 million fighting forest fires, and that was all demand driven. We had a terrible forest fire year this year. The department would make recommendations to me as minister, I would go through Treasury Board, and we spent over $600 million, way above . . .

Mr. Shepherd: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Dreeshen: . . . the $320 million average that we would have as a province to fight forest fires. Again, the premise of that question is just wrong.

The Speaker: I recognize a point of order called at 2:33.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung has the call.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that these 63 men and women who are part of this attack squadron go out on a daily basis and protect our firefighting capabilities to make sure that these fires don't go beyond a 24-hour period and are learning every day of the devastating and cruel cuts that this government is making to programs to keep Albertans safe and given that cancelling this program will leave many Albertans fearful of the next fire, to the minister: last chance; will you commit now to restoring the rap program, which is essential to getting forest fires out before they get big?

Mr. Dreeshen: Mr. Speaker, terms like "fearful of the next fire" in our northern and forested communities is just wrong and irresponsible. I wish the member opposite would stop using language like that because, again, the 63 members that he has just referenced could be hired next year. We are going to hire over a thousand wildfire personnel to fight fires, boots on the ground that actually make a difference in fighting forest fires. As minister I'm proud of the amazing work that they do and will continue to do here in the province of Alberta.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View is rising.

Calgary Fire Department and Police Funding

Ms Ganley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Much like the Minister of Education, the Minister of Municipal Affairs continues to play the blame game. Now his lack of leadership is putting public safety at risk for a $4.7 billion no-jobs giveaway. The Calgary fire department is facing a $9 million cut, and firefighters say they are already at the breaking point. To the minister: what will you do besides pointing fingers to ensure there are enough firefighters to keep Calgary safe?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs has risen.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I can assure this House that our firefighting departments are well equipped to deal with any disaster in this province. As you heard from our Premier, we have devoted $750 million, something that the members opposite did not do while they were in office. I am confident that all of our fire departments in this province will have all the resources they need to protect our communities.

Ms Ganley: Given, Mr. Speaker, that we're talking about municipal fire services and given that Mike Henson, president of the Calgary Firefighters Association, said that, quote, citizen safety and firefighter safety is absolutely at risk, and given that funding to municipalities is being cut by this government and given that the city council in Calgary is left with two options, to cut services or hike taxes, again to the minister: are you really willing to risk the lives of people in Calgary by cutting municipal funding to pay for a $4.7 billion giveaway?

Mr. Madu: Mr. Speaker, we have delivered the long-term, predictable funding that municipalities asked for. The answer that I have for members opposite is that the relevant numbers that they should be interested in is the more than $60 billion they left for us in debt. We are spending more than $2 billion on interest rates as a consequence of their disastrous policies in the last four years. What we would not do is jeopardize the future of our public service and those programs and services that they care about with their reckless policies.

Ms Ganley: Given that police are also facing a cut due to the UCP's terrible budget and given that all the minister can do is point fingers and all the Premier's staff can do is mock this awful situation on Twitter, to the minister: what exactly do I tell my constituents? That 911 services must take a back seat to pay for your terrible, no-jobs corporate giveaway?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, I would tell them to call city hall, to call their elected officials and tell them to get their fiscal house in order and start funding the priorities of Albertans. I am tired of city hall in Calgary coming here and saying: they're putting policing at the top of the chopping block. Policing is critical. I'm a member from Calgary. I'm a resident of Calgary. I'm tired of my taxes going up. I want our funding priorities to be public safety. We have fully funded our grants and increased funding to go after organized crime. We encourage city hall to do the same. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

Eddie Maurice and Rural Crime

Mr. Sigurdson: Mr. Speaker, on February 24, 2018, Eddie Maurice, a rancher from Highwood, found two trespassers breaking into his vehicle in the early morning hours. Fearing for his safety and that of his 11-month-old daughter and after having verbally warned the trespassers to stop, Eddie fired two warning shots at the ground. We have recently discovered that the same criminal is now suing Eddie for $100,000. Can the Minister of Justice please explain what he is doing to ensure that innocent people like Eddie won't have to pay those who victimize them?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, what happened to Eddie Maurice came up at every single town hall that I was at across Alberta. Albertans can relate to it because it could have been them in rural communities. It could have been their daughters. It could have been their sons. It could have been their wives. What happened to Eddie Maurice is wrong. It is not justice, and I'm proud today that law-abiding citizens do not have to fear somebody that's committing a criminal act on their properties suing them civilly. We're bringing forward legislation this fall. I'm proud of it. We're going to have the strongest property rights in all of the country. [interjection]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. Member for Highwood.

Mr. Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that lengthy response times from law enforcement have left many rural Albertans feeling that they have no choice but to defend themselves, their property, and their families and given that charges wrongfully laid against Eddie were dropped by the authorities, can the Minister of Justice please explain what our government is doing to protect the property rights of all Albertans?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, today we announced a comprehensive package to make sure that property rights are respected here in Alberta. Like I mentioned earlier on, never again do we want to have somebody committing a criminal offence on their property being able to sue the homeowner. We're also making sure that we bring forward new measures to stop trespassing and send a clear signal to eco environmental extremists that want to trespass for their own agenda: not in Alberta. We respect property rights. We're going to be bringing forward new laws here in this province, the strongest in the country.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Highwood.

Mr. Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister for that. Given that many of the perpetrators of rural crime are repeat offenders and given that in this very case the trespasser, Ryan Watson, was only given a 45-day sentence but didn't serve a single day of it due to previous jail time served, can the minister please explain how our government is working to prevent criminals from becoming repeat offenders, particularly in rural Alberta?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, our laws right now are written for downtown Toronto; they are not written for rural Alberta. Today I'm proud that we are bringing forward community impact statements that can be brought forward on sentencing. We need our judiciary to hear the impacts of rural crime and what is happening in communities. I've met with so many people that fear for their loved ones, fear for their children. We want to make sure those considerations are before our judiciary. We need better presence.

We are going to be working with our prosecutors to get that evidence before the court to make sure that the justice system works for rural Alberta.

The Speaker: Hon. members, in 30 seconds or less we will proceed to Members' Statements.

The Speaker: Hon. members, the hon. Member for Calgary-South East is rising to make a statement.

School and Playground Construction

Mr. Jones: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. During the election we made a promise to Albertans that our government would continue to build new schools. This campaign commitment was especially important to me and my constituents in Calgary-South East as we've experienced rapid growth and have been lacking much-needed school infrastructure for some time.

On Friday, November 1, just last week, I was delighted to join the Minister of Education and the Minister of Infrastructure and several of my colleagues to announce 25 Education capital projects that are part of Budget 2019. Fifteen new schools will be built across the province, including brand new high schools in Calgary, Edmonton, Leduc, Blackfalds, and Langdon. Six schools are slated for replacement, and four will receive modernization or additions. Two of these announced schools, the Auburn Bay middle school and the new Auburn Bay elementary school, are located in my constituency.

An additional important announcement was also made that day, and it will affect constituencies and communities all across our province. The Education minister announced that moving forward, new schools will have playground funding included in their project budgets, something that I've personally advocated for. This means that every new K to 6 school announced by our government will come with a playground, including the newly announced Auburn Bay elementary school.

This is a welcome announcement to my constituents in the community of Auburn Bay, that recently had to fund raise over $300,000 for a playground for the Prince of Peace school, and to my constituents in Cranston, that will be fund raising to build their own playground shortly.

Studies have found that play improves the physical, mental, intellectual, and social well-being of children. These playgrounds will also enrich the communities that surround them.

Once again, I would like to thank the Minister of Education and the Minister of Infrastructure on behalf of my constituents in Calgary-South East, and I applaud the decision to ensure that each new elementary school is built with a playground.

Presenting Reports by Standing and Special Committees

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As chair of the Standing Committee on Private Bills and Private Members' Public Bills I am pleased to table the committee's final report on Bill 204, Election Recall Act, sponsored by the hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon. This bill was referred to the committee on October 23, 2019.

Mr. Speaker, the committee's final report recommends that Bill 204, Election Recall Act, proceed. I request concurrence of the Assembly in the final report on Bill 204.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, the motion for concurrence in the report is debatable pursuant to Standing Order 18(1)(b). Are there any members who wish to speak to the request for concurrence?

Seeing none, the chair of the Standing Committee on Private Bills and Private Members' Public Bills has requested concurrence in the report for Bill 204, Election Recall Act.

[Motion carried]

Introduction of Bills

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-South East.

Human Tissue and Organ Donation (Presumed Consent) Amendment Act, 2019

Mr. Jones: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my pleasure to rise today to introduce Bill 205, the Human Tissue and Organ Donation (Presumed Consent) Amendment Act, 2019.

Just one organ and tissue donor can save up to eight lives and make life better for up to 75 other people. A 90 per cent majority of Canadians support organ and tissue donation, but less than 20 per cent have made plans to donate. If introduced, this bill will change our underperforming opt-in system into an opt-out, or presumed consent, system to match other leading jurisdictions around the world and, hopefully, help the 700 Albertans on the waiting list for an organ transplant.

With that, I request leave to introduce Bill 205, the Human Tissue and Organ Donation (Presumed Consent) Amendment Act, 2019.

[Motion carried; Bill 205 read a first time]

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: Hon. members, there was an hon. member who wanted to present a petition, and it was my error to not recognize her while she was standing. It would require unanimous consent of the House.

The question that I do have for the member is: is this a petition that has been approved by the library?

Ms Rosin: It was run through your office, Mr. Speaker. I believe so.

The Speaker: Hon. members, apologies.

I'll provide some clarification for you. What you're presenting is actually a tabling, because unless it's been approved by Parliamentary Counsel, it's not a petition. Although it might be worded as a petition, it's unlikely that it's an official petition of the Assembly. As such, I invite you to table it during the appropriate time, which is Tabling Returns and Reports – and there are a number of those today – which we are currently at.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview has the call.

Ms Sigurdson: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have the requisite copies of 46 individual letters from teachers in my constituency concerned about this government's proposal to control the assets of the Alberta teachers' retirement fund.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Banff-Kananaskis.

Ms Rosin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Quickly I'd like to recognize Dave Rupert and Dave Klepacki, who are in the gallery today on behalf of the Springbank action coalition.

Further, I would like to table today the requisite number of copies of a petition from the residents of Rocky View county and Calgary which expresses concern over the devastation that the proposed Springbank dam will have on the communities, residents, and business owners of Springbank, Bragg Creek, Redwood Meadows, and surrounding area. The petition also calls on our government to reassess the costs, socioeconomic impacts, and science of the alternative McLean Creek reservoir. I'm happy today to table five copies of approximately 1,200 handwritten and signed letters, of which I am also a proud signatory. We have approximately, I think, 6,000 pieces of paper here – some are here; some are in the back lounge – and these will be tabled today.

Thank you so much.

The Speaker: Edmonton-North West I have on my list.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have the requisite copies of 26 letters that were sent to my office from individuals who are very concerned about the government's choice to move the Alberta teachers' retirement fund monies to AIMCo.

The Speaker: Hon. members, I have a lengthy list, but let's just go from who is standing as there may or may not be some members able to present their tablings.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-South here.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. If you'll indulge me, I have a tabling on behalf of my colleague from Calgary-Mountain View. It's entitled Calgary Firefighters Association Frustrated by Lack of Resources for New Communities.

I also have an additional tabling of my own, Mr. Speaker. It's called Stuck in the Mud: Parents Sound Off on Dirty Grounds outside Johnny Bright School, which iterates how P3 schools have caused safety issues in my community.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood, followed by Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Member Irwin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to table the requisite number of copies of a number of e-mails that I've received in Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood from constituents who are all teachers and who are quite concerned about this government's proposal to take over the assets of the Alberta teachers' retirement fund.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie, followed by Edmonton-Glenora.

Member Loyola: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have the requisite number of copies of 11 e-mails that have been sent to my office stating that the government has crossed the line by taking over control of the assets of the Alberta teachers' retirement fund.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you. I have two tablings. The first is with regard to the question my hon. colleague from Edmonton-

Whitemud made earlier today, with the Family & Community Support Services Association of Alberta referred to in her question.

The second are additional letters about what many are referring to as the heavy-handed overreach of attacking teachers' pensions, the Alberta teachers' retirement fund. I had letters that I tabled yesterday, and here are additional ones that we continue to receive.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have the requisite number of copies of an article from National Geographic entitled Most Countries Aren't Hitting 2030 Climate Goals, and Everyone Will Pay the Price: "Untold human suffering" is in our future as nations miss their Paris Agreement targets by a long shot."

The Speaker: Are there others wishing to table a document? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore, followed by Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I also have the requisite number of copies of six e-mails my office has received from Alberta teachers about their great concern with the steps this government is taking around the ATRF and wishing to express their disappointment.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have the requisite number of copies of a letter sent by a former rappel forest firefighter with 10 years of experience who equates the capping of the rappel program to the firing of the lifeguards in a busy swimming pool.

I further have four more tablings, five copies each, of letters sent to various ministerial agencies commending the rappel firefighters for their work over the last 15 years.

Tablings to the Clerk

The Clerk: I wish to advise the Assembly that the following documents were deposited with the office of the Clerk. On behalf of hon. Mr. Shandro, Minister of Health, pursuant to the Health Professions Act the College of Alberta Dental Assistants annual report 2018-19.

On behalf of Mr. Schweitzer, Minister of Justice and Solicitor General, the Alberta Law Enforcement Review Board 2018 annual report.

The Speaker: Hon. members, we are at points of order.

At 2:22 the hon. Member for Calgary-West noted a point of order, which was subsequently withdrawn.

At 2:33 the hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre also noted a point of order. I recognize the hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Point of Order Language Creating Disorder

Ms Sweet: Thank you. I'll try to be quick because I recognize that people have to be in estimates soon. Under Standing Order 23:

- (h) makes allegations against another Member;
- (i) imputes false or unavowed motives to another Member;
- (j) uses abusive or insulting language of a nature likely to create disorder.

I appreciate, Mr. Speaker, that you may not have the benefit of the Blues. It may not have been caught in the Blues, but the hon. Member for Lacombe-Ponoka – and this is not the first occurrence – repeatedly has made comments in regard to our caucus that indicate: they're the ones who let Fort McMurray burn down. He has done that again today. Numerous times members of this caucus heard it.

We would just ask that all members of the House not make comments associated with that, recognizing that the tragedy of the Fort McMurray fire was something that this Official Opposition, then in government, did the best that they could do with what was happening and that those comments do nothing to help the debate of the House.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, this in fact is not a point of order. As mentioned, first of all, maybe you have the benefit of the Blues already. I don't even imagine that anything like that in any way has been recorded in regard to the context of what the deputy House leader is referring to.

But further to that, we're clearly talking about topics that are of debate, and if we are going to spend our time point-of-ordering what members are saying to each other in conversations that they're having inside this House, then maybe we will start point-of-ordering every heckle that the NDP does. I'm sorry that the NDP may not like to be reminded about their mismanagement of the fire file. That, in fact, Mr. Speaker, as you know, is a matter of debate inside this Assembly.

As for accusing other members and stuff, I've watched today sadly as the opposition has continually got up both in heckling and within their questions and have accused cabinet ministers and members of this government over and over of doing terrible things to children, in fact, of hurting people, or of doing significant damage to Albertans, all of which, I want to be clear, is not true. I think it's unfortunate that the opposition continues to do it, but I will also recognize that it is clearly a matter of debate.

The Speaker: I appreciate the submissions from both of you this afternoon. It would not be possible for your Speaker to make comments on statements made by members that the Speaker did not hear. Having said that, I would suggest that these are the types of accusations that don't create order and decorum inside the House. I am in agreement with the hon. Government House Leader that these sorts of accusations aren't helpful.

If the hon. member said that – obviously, you, we, any individual in this House weren't responsible for letting Fort McMurray burn, so I would encourage members to not make these sorts of statements. But I did not hear that, so I'm not going to ask him to apologize or otherwise because I do not know whether or not that, in fact, was said and it would be inappropriate of me to comment.

Having said those things, pursuant to Standing Order 59.01(5)(b) the House stands adjourned until this evening at 7:30.

The legislative policy committees will convene this afternoon for consideration of the main estimates. This afternoon the Standing Committee on Families and Communities will consider the estimates for the Ministry of Community and Social Services in the Rocky Mountain Room, and the Standing Committee on Alberta's Economic Future will consider the estimates for the Ministry of Economic Development, Trade and Tourism in the Parkland Room.

Hon. members, the House stands adjourned.

[The Assembly adjourned at 2:58 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

7:30 p.m.

Wednesday, November 6, 2019

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, please be seated.

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

The Deputy Chair: I would like to call the committee to order.

Bill 20 Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, 2019

The Deputy Chair: Are there any comments, questions, or amendments to be offered with respect to this bill? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview has risen.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. Before we get started on debate for Bill 20, I'd like to make a request, that in dealing with Bill 20, votes be separated so that we can vote on each of the sections separately. The sections are as follows: sections 1 to 5, 7 to 8, 11 to 12, 14 to 15, and 23; sections 6, 9, 10, 13, 16 to 21, 22 and schedule 2, section 25 and schedule 3; and sections 24 and 26.

The Deputy Chair: Okay. What I'm going to do is that I'm actually going to take the opportunity to just quickly review that. What I mean by that is that I think you might have missed a schedule. What I'm going to do is that I'm also going to list off all the sections, but I'm going to give them blocks as well.

What we're going to do – assuming that we go forward with your request, then it'll be: block A will be one block of sections, and that'll be your sections 1 through 5, 7, 8, 11, 12, 14, 15, and 23; block B will be section 6; block C will be section 9; block D will be section 10; block E will be section 13 and schedule 1, which is the one that I think you may have missed; block F, which is section 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21; block G, section 22 and schedule 2; block H, section 25 and schedule 3; block I, sections 24 and 26.

If you could just let me know if that's what you're looking to do.

Mr. Bilous: Yes, Mr. Chair. Thank you very much. My apologies; I did miss section 13 tied with schedule 1. Thank you for that correction, sir. These are what I'm proposing.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you very much to the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview for his request.

I understand that past practice of this committee has been to allow a member to request that a vote on a bill such as one that is as complex as this and deals with several distinct propositions be divided and that then those votes be conducted in groups. Accordingly, I will permit the vote on Bill 20 to be divided once the debate has ended. For the clarity of all members, we will continue to debate all clauses of Bill 20 together, but when there are no further members wishing to speak and we move forward with the vote, then we will vote according to each block as previously noted.

Are there any hon. members wishing to speak to the bill? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre has risen.

Mr. Shepherd: Well, thank you, Mr. Chair. It is a pleasure to have the opportunity to rise in the House tonight to speak to Bill 20. It feels like it's been some time since I've had the opportunity to be here for an evening session, so good evening to everyone. Pleasure to see you all here.

Bill 20, the Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, 2019: in many respects, Mr. Chair, I would say that this is a cornerstone bill for this government. While it covers a very broad spectrum of changes in a number of different areas, it sort of really does speak to what I see being the economic philosophy of this government. We've had the opportunity, I guess, to hear a lot from the ministers and members of this government about what they want to see for the economy of Alberta and how they think that we are going to get there.

Now, indeed, I think all of us in this House want to see Alberta's economy thrive. We all want to see a more diverse economy. We all want to see Alberta doing well, and, indeed, Alberta still, Mr. Chair, to be clear, is doing quite well within the larger context of Canada. We are a fortunate province. But we recognize that the last few years have been incredibly difficult for people. We've had some very challenging times as an economy, with the world-wide drop in the price of oil, the impacts that's had, the shifts in investment, the changes in resource markets, the continuing challenges in gaining pipeline access to get our product to a better price in other markets. Those have indeed had their toll.

But when I think about what I'm hearing from this government about how they view the economy here in Alberta and how they think that we are going to get it back on its feet, it reminds me a little bit of high school, in particular when we talk about how we're going to build investment in the province. Now, what I mean by that is that I think back to high school – you know, high school is an interesting place to be. There's a certain social hierarchy, and everyone is a little bit insecure, and everybody is trying to build their social capital. Some think that the best way to build your social capital, to build your opportunity, your chances for your advancement and your place – often, Mr. Chair, when we're in high school, we don't see that far into the future. We only see what's in front of us; we have a bit of a limited understanding of what the world is like.

But one of the approaches people take is to say: "Well, hey. Who are the cool and rich kids? They've got something. If I can connect myself with them, if I can be friends with them, then that's going to get me ahead pretty fast. I can build a lot of social capital pretty quickly, and that doesn't require a lot out of me. I just have to make sure that I offer enough stuff that they're going to like me. If they like me enough, then I get some of what they have, and they're going to share that with me, and that's going to help me get ahead." Now, Mr. Chair, what I would say is: yeah, that works sometimes, I guess; if you change enough stuff about yourself, if you make enough compromises, if you sacrifice enough things about your own identity, then perhaps you're accepted into that cool clique and you get to enjoy some of those benefits. But it can also disappear just as quickly as you got it.

But, you know, Mr. Chair, you can also choose another path. You can choose to actually invest in yourself. You can choose: "You know what? Hey, maybe I don't fit in a cool rich clique. Maybe I'm not there, but I can build my own talents and skills. I can get to know myself. I can know what's possible for me. I can study, I can invest my time, I can invest my energy, build my own skill set, build my own opportunities and make friends that are going to stick with me. I build skill sets and opportunities that are going to carry on for a long time and are not dependent on anyone else."

Now, Mr. Chair, when I look at this government's approach to business and investment and when I hear them talk about what they want to see for investment in Alberta, what I hear them saying is that their biggest interest is chasing after the rich cool kids. What I hear them saying is that they're only interested in the absolute biggest businesses, the businesses outside Alberta, that international capital. That is what they want to bring to Alberta. That's what matters. That is the only way Alberta is going to get ahead. Now, let's be clear. This is a global economy. It is a global market. Indeed, we need to work with a global perspective. There is incredible value in having international investment in the province of Alberta, which we continue to have.

But, Mr. Chair, the question is: how much do we think we need to sacrifice to continue to chase after that as the be-all and end-all and the ultimate good? Now, this government has answered that. They feel that we should be willing to sacrifice up to $4.7 billion, and they feel that cutting the corporate tax down to 8 per cent is all that we need to do, well, that and, you know, reducing red tape and some other ambiguous things around creating efficiencies and that sort of thing. But really the centrepiece is this reduction, to 8 per cent, of the corporate income tax.

And when I hear them talk, they are not talking about how that's going to necessarily help Alberta businesses. What I generally hear them talking about is how that's going to bring in all this international investment and people from outside the province. Now, Mr. Chair, again, that is valuable, and that is important, but we also need to be building our industries here in the province. We need to be investing in ourselves. What I hear this government saying is that if you're a band geek or if you're in the AV club or the computer club, they're not interested in you in this high school. If you're in the film industry, if you are in the tech industry, if you're working in innovation, if you're working in anything, to some extent, outside of oil and gas, they don't have an interest. They will offer the 8 per cent corporate tax rate. They will offer that $4.7 billion corporate tax giveaway, which does nothing for a lot of those industries because those are industries that are building something here in Alberta from the ground up.

I have quoted, time and again, from the A100, a group of investors here in the province of Alberta, Alberta-born and -raised investors who have invested here in the province of Alberta and built successful technology companies here in Alberta and want to invest back into successful technology companies here in Alberta, people who are experts and knowledgeable in this field, who say that a corporate tax cut does next to nothing for the tech and innovation industry. What is needed are incentives that actually help people invest back in their businesses here in Alberta to build skill sets, to build talent, to build innovation, to build products that stay here in Alberta.

Mr. Chair, today in the estimates for Economic Development, Trade and Tourism the minister had this strange notion that somehow building export capacity for Alberta businesses is sending business outside of Alberta. What a ridiculous concept. When Alberta businesses access other markets, when they expand into other places, they are building Alberta business.

Earth Water, a company from right here in Edmonton, started out with a couple of university students who had the idea that they would sell bottled water and put those proceeds back through the United Nations program to do social good. They're now in cafés and groceries stores across North America. They've expanded into tea and coffee. And now they've expanded into the country of Japan, and they did that through support through Alberta's economic trade office, who brought them out there and introduced them to stakeholders. They expanded their business, and now they are in grocery stores across Japan. That is money that flows back to Alberta and creates jobs here. This is an Alberta-born business that is not going to pick up and run because the price of oil drops.

Now, again, Mr. Chair, I recognize the value of global investment, bringing money in from outside, but what I heard from the Minister of Economic Development, Trade and Tourism today is that that is all this government is focused on. They are going to be turning the focus of every one of our international offices to bringing investment back to Alberta. They are turning away from trying to help Alberta businesses access global markets, at the same time that we are trying to do exactly that for one of our most important industries, recognizing the oil and gas industry.

Again, we are putting, apparently, all of our eggs in that basket. We are turning away from Alberta companies that are looking for the support of government to help them build, just like in the 1970s. Before we had an oil and gas industry in this province, government invested to create and support the research that got the ability to extract oil from sand to the point that commercial business was interested in investing in it. A corporate tax cut would have done nothing to start the Alberta oil and gas industry. It wasn't proven yet. That took the forethought and the investment and the vision of the government of Peter Lougheed. Premier Lougheed made the investments to kick-start an industry that is now the pride and joy of every one of these government members, and deservedly so. It's brought us a long way. It's going to carry us a good ways further.

The fact is, Mr. Chair, that we need to support other kinds of companies to do exactly that. We have other raw resources we could be building on in this province. They're right here at the University of Alberta: medical technology and medical research that's being commercialized and turned into products using investments through Alberta Innovates to get them to the point where they're then ready to go out and seek outside investment, which in part was empowered by things like the Alberta investor tax credit. Just like when we were starting out with oil and gas in Alberta, no commercial company thought it worth while out of the gate because it was yet unproven, so Premier Lougheed came up with a system by which the government derisked investment to convince other people to step up and try to put a bit of money in. The Alberta investor tax credit, just like investor tax credits in multiple jurisdictions across Canada, worked exactly the same way. It derisked that initial investment that allows these starting, fledgling, small companies to get up and going.

Again, Mr. Chair, what I am hearing from this government and what I'm seeing from this government is that they are not interested in those companies. If you haven't already proven yourself, well, forget it; we don't have time for you here in Alberta. You have an idea? That's lovely. Go figure it out, and when you've got something going on, come back and talk to us.

Mr. Chair, we have incredible opportunities here. We truly, truly do. I talked about medical research and innovation. Of course, we have AI, and I will commend this government for continuing to invest in AMII, in artificial intelligence research here in the province. Now, they are committing less than what our government had hoped to commit – fair enough – but they are maintaining that investment. I salute them for that. They at least have that much forethought. It's my hope that they will continue to make that investment because that is another raw resource we have here in the province of Alberta. We are ranked third in the world. That is why Google brought DeepMind, their artificial intelligence project, here to Edmonton. I haven't had a chance to visit their headquarters here in Edmonton, but from what I hear after my visit to talk with the folks at AMII, that's one incredible space. These are companies that are not afraid to invest when they're given the opportunity.

But what I heard from the minister of economic development and trade today in our estimates for her ministry is that they are not interested in trying to do what companies like Google would like to ask them to do. What this government has to say to Google is: you can have part of our $4.7 billion corporate giveaway, and that is all we have to offer. We are not going to invest in supporting postsecondary spaces for the kinds of employees that Google is looking for. I talk to tech companies in and around downtown Edmonton all the time: folks developing apps, products, all sorts of different things. They cannot find enough people who have the knowledge and the skill set that they need. Now, this government says: well, we don't want to pick winners and losers, and we don't want to just choose one thing over the other. But this government is very specifically looking to invest more in apprenticeships and the trades.

Again, apprenticeships and the trades are important. They are a part of the oil and gas industry; they are a part of the construction industry. They are part of many things which drive our province forward, but they are specific industries. This government is willing to pick particular winners, but on others it simply is choosing to look the other way. It's unfortunate, Mr. Chair. I don't think it has to be one or the other. We could be investing in both. Unfortunately, what I see in this bill is the government again sort of doubling down and saying: "No. We gotta chase the cool, rich kids. They're going to be the only ones that can save our province." No thought to those that are actually trying to build and invest in something new here in our province to help complement. This government has no plan B, and plan A has a few problems, too.

Ultimately, I don't understand why this government is choosing to simply do it this way. Now, the minister of economic development and trade said that, you know, the Alberta investor tax credit had some problems. It was too bureaucratic, too many layers, too many things. Well, by all means then, please make it better. This is a successful program in multiple jurisdictions across Canada. This is what made Alberta competitive for tech investment. As the A100 said, a broad-based corporate tax reduction does not do anything to make Alberta more competitive for tech.

Mr. Chair, you can't just simply try to plant full-grown trees. You've got to build the soil, and what builds the soil is when new and aspiring entrepreneurs here in the province of Alberta have the support and the opportunity to try new ideas and fail and try again, because every successful checked jurisdiction in North America, indeed probably in most of the world, was built on 100 companies that tried and maybe five that succeeded. That is only possible when we are able to create that sort of supportive environment, and government needs to be part of that mix.

At multiple events that I've attended with individuals from the tech industry here in the province of Alberta, they have made that a hundred per cent clear. There is not a successful tech jurisdiction in the world that did not have some level of government support, just like we would not have an oil and gas industry in this province if the government had not stepped up to help get that ball rolling.

Mr. Chair, this does not have to be either/or. I can wear a T-shirt that says "I love Alberta oil and gas" as well as a T-shirt that says "I love Alberta tech." In fact, it was the philosophy of our government that those two things go together.

The Deputy Chair: I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview has risen to join debate.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. I'm going to pick up on some great points that my colleague the Member for Edmonton-City Centre made. I agree. You know what? The government talks a good game about diversification, but when rubber hits the road, we're not seeing actions follow words.

You know, we just came from estimates in Economic Development, Trade and Tourism, and I can tell you that there are a number of points that I want to make that are directly tied to this bill. Again, I'll echo some of the sentiments of the companies. I think the first thing that, you know, maybe we need to ensure all members understand is that the tax credits that our government introduced came from the private sector. They're not New Democrat tax credits. They came from the private sector, who has said to us and to previous governments that Alberta needs these to level the playing field.

The characterization that these are boutique tax credits is actually a mischaracterization. The investor tax credit is sector-wide. It is open to every single sector. It is not picking winners and losers, although there is some irony and possibly some hypocrisy when the interactive digital media tax credit is "a boutique tax credit, too bureaucratic" – these are, of course, claims that the other side is making – "only serves a number of companies and is very complicated; we want these broad-based tools," but in the next breath the film industry gets a tax credit. I'm not sure how in members' minds that isn't contradictory, where one sector gets a tax credit, but another tax credit that's open to multiple sectors is considered boutique and, therefore, needs to go. You can't have it both ways. You can't argue two different things out of, you know, two different sides of your mouth and say: yeah, these are totally different.

Now, I'll be the first to admit, Mr. Chair, that I am in favour of the film tax credit program. You know, we introduced a number of tax credits in our term, and we did increase the funding for the film production grant program. Where I think the government missed the mark on the film tax credit – and I'm confident that if we'd had a second term, we would have introduced a film tax credit, not to replace the production grant. The production grant is really meant for the smaller cultural industries, the small cultural films that are being produced here in Alberta. The film tax credit was and is and could be a better tool to bring in some of the larger productions like The Revenant and other blockbuster films. I believe one of the Ghostbusters was shot here in Alberta. The film tax credit can help attract those larger productions, who said to us that the cultural film screen grant was not big enough and it wasn't the right tool. Fair enough. But I think the challenge is that this government is throwing that program out to move to the tax credit program, which is now, again, hurting the cultural industries, and the film tax credit has a cap and is not a big enough fund to be able to attract the big blockbusters.

Now, Mr. Chair, in my opinion – again, you don't have to take my opinion; listen to the film industry, who were at estimates tonight and who are irate and talking about folding up shop and moving to other provinces – both programs are poorly executed. So getting rid of the first one hurts the small cultural industries, and not using the precise tool, an adequately sized, uncapped film tax credit, will not help the big industry to the level that it could.

I can tell you that British Columbia last year had $4 billion in revenue from the film industry. Last year. Now, members, you know, may jump up tonight and talk about how the screen production grant was oversubscribed. You're right. It was. But do you know what that tells us, Mr. Chair? It's that it was a popular program that was working. You know what? This year the film industry has seen record numbers. Why? Because our government funded the screen production grant. They were on track to have another record year this year. Do you know what happened, Mr. Chair? When the UCP formed government, they iced the program.

It was a little unclear in estimates earlier, which we tried to clarify. You know, the minister had talked about how the program is continued. No, it isn't. It's been frozen since the election. So when we talk about quoting companies who have said, "We are leaving Alberta," it's the companies that are saying that. So throwing back rhetoric is not acknowledging that this freeze has in fact impacted industry.

Again, this is a very competitive industry, Mr. Chair, and we are competing with large centres that have significantly larger supports. Again, in British Columbia, in Vancouver especially, but also in Ontario there is no cap on their film tax credit. So when blockbuster movies look to come – we're talking large projects employing thousands of people and turning out, you know, hundreds of thousands if not millions of dollars of revenue for hotels and restaurants, and the impact is significant – they're doing that in other jurisdictions, and Alberta will not be able to compete with them. I can tell you that.

But I want to touch a little bit on the interactive digital media tax credit, again, you know, a tax credit that provided a 25 per cent tax credit on labour. This is for companies where their number one driver of cost is labour. Again, programmers are well skilled. They're obviously well educated. They're paid well. These are good, mortgage-paying jobs. An interactive digital media tax credit helped level the playing field. In fact, Alberta was middle of the pack, at best, with what we offered. Quebec has got a 37 and a half per cent tax credit, and they also have a booming industry. Again, digital media companies generate billions – billions – of dollars.

When the government talks about diversifying the economy, I mean, so far, quite frankly, Mr. Chair, all that I've seen is lip service, because tools that were actually working are tools that are being gutted. The investor tax credit is a 3 to 1 return on investment, and I think it's shameful when the minister says: well, that only helped a couple of hundred companies. Okay. So your message to them is: "You're not important. You're a tech company. You're an investor. You know what? Your money is not welcome here. Go somewhere else." That's how the industry is interpreting it.

The province of British Columbia has had an investor tax credit since 1985. It works, is working. It provides a number of different opportunities, Mr. Chair. It provides opportunities for British Columbians to invest in B.C. companies. When you look at your tax-free savings account or your RRSP or maybe you've saved a few thousand dollars and want to spend it on a company in your province, the investor tax credit lets you do that, and it also derisks your investment.

You see, the corporate tax cut does not benefit these start-ups. I've said this before, but it's worth saying again. These start-ups have no retained earnings. They're not withdrawing money from their company. It gets reinvested. This government could put the corporate tax rate at zero, and do you know how many start-ups that would help? None. It would help none because they're not withdrawing their funds. What they need is a tool to help them scale faster. By scaling faster, Mr. Chair, they're going to hire more people, they're going to grow, they're going to grow the economy, and they're going to grow their businesses here in the province. That's a good thing. The investor tax credit was open sector-wide to any company that had to apply.

Now, members opposite in estimates today talked about how cumbersome it was. I appreciate the fact that they were quoting sources when we first announced the investor tax credit. I'll be the first to admit that initially, when we rolled it out, yeah, the application process was a little cumbersome. So we took that feedback, and we simplified it. But I can tell you, Mr. Chair, that what we won't do is allow companies that are home in other provinces to set up a shell company in Alberta, not provide any jobs for Albertans, not benefit the Alberta company but have access to an investor tax credit. That's the only thing I can think of that the other side is proposing by saying: yeah, there's too much red tape. Well, no. There needs to be oversight on tax dollars.

But I appreciate that the program needs to be simple enough so that companies fill out a one-pager, qualify, and now they don't need to go back to government for anything else. They can go out and raise capital and offer a 30 per cent tax credit in addition to whatever equity agreement they have with their investors.

I also think it's disingenuous, coming from the other side, that these types of investments are unwelcome. The investor tax credit is scaled and layered with the Alberta Enterprise Corporation – we talked about that tonight, Mr. Chair – an incredible vehicle that leverages dollars through their entity, which is funded by the government, and matches them with industry dollars, venture capitalists, to create a fund which then invests in companies, and many of those companies are here in Alberta. A very successful program, it was started under the PCs. I'll give a shout-out to former Premier Ed Stelmach; it was started under his government. They started with $100 million. We recapitalized them over the last four years, another $75 million. Now, I've asked the minister if she'll consider recapitalizing them, because they are an incredible vehicle. At the moment there are zero dollars in this budget, but I'm hopeful that maybe the government will see the value of the Alberta Enterprise Corporation. But what helped to leverage the dollars was offering an investor tax credit that would help the companies scale even faster.

My frustration, Mr. Chair, is that the only thing I can see is that ending the investor tax credit, the digital media tax credit, SRED, and the capital investment tax credit is ideological. There are no two ways to slice it. The return on investment is there. The numbers are there. The government talks about how it's about finances. Well, open the books and look at how it was benefiting. The capital investment tax credit: $200 million of tax credits leveraged $2.2 billion worth of investment. Two point two billion: those numbers sound pretty good to me. This was a tool that helped.

The challenge, Mr. Chair, is that – you know what? – there isn't a silver bullet. I can tell you that what's not helping is that these cuts to the interactive digital media tax credit, to the investor tax credit are coming at the same time as cuts to postsecondaries. We invested in 3,000 new tech spaces around the province. Why, Mr. Chair? I don't know if you recall, but the city of Calgary was pursuing Amazon, Amazon's HQ2 bid, right? Amazon was saying: we want to go global for our second headquarters; any city is welcome to be in the running. I can tell you that we supported a bid by the city of Calgary, including a number of different offerings that we had. We were unsuccessful, but what we learned from that is that Alberta has some incredible talent, but we don't have enough graduates to land the big fish.

Here's the irony. Today in estimates the minister was clear that they're not interested in helping Alberta companies access new markets. That's what she said when I talked about the export expansion program: we don't care about Alberta companies going global; we want to bring the big investment back home. I think, quite frankly, again, it doesn't have to be either/or. That's quite short-sighted. We need to support Alberta companies accessing new markets so they grow back here at home and hire more people. It's a win-win.

We also need to attract investment back to Alberta, a hundred per cent. Companies like Google, Apple, Facebook, Amazon are not going to come in droves to Alberta. Now, I know that Google is here with DeepMind – I'll talk about that in a second; that's artificial intelligence – but those big tech companies have said that they go where the talent is. What this government has missed is that of their top three things that they look for, a low tax rate is not in their top three. It's not. Talent is what they're looking for. Quality of life is what they're looking for. You know what they love about Canada? Our public health care system. You know why? Because it saves them millions of dollars. They like our quality of life, they want talent, but they want to see that we don't just have the talent today, Mr. Chair, but that we are graduating talent that will continue to sustain their business.

You know where else there was an opportunity, where the window is closing and we're missing it, Mr. Chair? With the current President in the U.S. putting a huge limit on the H-1B visas, which are visas for people coming from countries around the world. Tech companies don't care about the colour of your skin or the religion that you practise. They want talent, and they will take talent from any country. You know where Canada has a leg up over the U.S.? It's that we, too, value people and don't care where you come from or what religion you practise. These companies are looking to make strategic investments in Canada, but we've missed the boat if we think that simply dropping the corporate tax rate is going to attract these types of companies. They want talent.

Those 3,000 tech spaces that we committed to: do you know how many saw the light of day? Four hundred and six. Four hundred and six, and those spaces are as good as gone when the funding is gone, so by the end of this year. Again, there is evidence that there is demand. Industry is asking for it. You know what? I encourage the government to talk to MobSquad, based out of Calgary, a great company that we helped bring here to Alberta. Every time I talk to their CEO, he tells me how much it hurts that to get talent, he's got to go outside of Canada. We have the ability to develop that talent here, but it takes investments. Massive cuts to our postsecondary system are not going to prepare our young people for these jobs.

You know, Mr. Chair, for me, what's frustrating is that investments in the tech sector – first of all, let me back up. Technology is not a sector. There is no such thing as a tech sector. Technology is applied to every other sector, from oil and gas and energy to agriculture to forestry to manufacturing to health care. It's an enabler. By making those investments, we are in fact supporting our oil and gas sector.

I mean, I'm sure the members all know that technology to do pipeline monitoring uses artificial intelligence. There is an incredible company out of Calgary called Hifi, that had some government support, which has a state-of-the-art pipeline monitoring system. I encourage members to ask them for a tour. It'll blow your mind what these guys are doing. It's based on, again, using technology, artificial intelligence, and ensuring that the people that are graduating from our postsecondaries have these skills, because the world is going digital.

Mr. Chair, Alberta has an incredible opportunity in front of us. I was disappointed that not only the $100 million that we committed to artificial intelligence got cut, but now it's an extra $34 million over four years. I said to the minister: I'm worried that Alberta will slip from third place in the world when it comes to artificial intelligence to who knows what position. And we will. We will lose the third spot without sustained investments to grow this area, which, again, has applications to every sector.

Mr. Chair, it's with disappointment that I rise to speak to Bill 20, to say that these tools, again, don't have to be politicized. They didn't come from the NDP. We didn't think of them. They came from the private sector, who said: we've been asking previous governments for these tools; please enact them. And we did.

You know, again, in putting all of Albertans' eggs in a corporate tax cut basket – well, I can tell you, Mr. Chair: how many jobs have we seen created from the corporate tax cut? I think zero. What we have seen are companies that have said: "Thank you. We will take that $50 million or $250 million and go spend it in another jurisdiction." If the corporate tax cut is such a silver bullet, then why is it that companies like Husky are saying, "Yeah, well, we're not going to invest in Alberta, but thank you very much for that gift"?

There are tools, like these tax credits, that had results. They were measurable. The minister and the government have access to them. Honestly, Mr. Chair, if they sounded like a great idea but weren't producing the results, I would not be standing here speaking so passionately about these. This is about supporting Alberta companies to grow and scale here at home. Yes, we want to land the big fish, but guess what?

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to Bill 20? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood has risen.

Member Irwin: Yeah. He kept us in suspense. Thank you, Mr. Chair. I can't wait to return to my colleague from Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview because he left us hanging there.

Mr. Bilous: Oh, I'll be back.

Member Irwin: You'll be back. I know you will.

What I'd like to do is to shift gears a little bit here and speak broadly about Bill 20. You know, this is a giant Bill 20. It may actually be the largest that I've had in my hand here in the House, but bigger is not necessarily better in this case. The use of omnibus bills is something we saw under the Harper regime, and it's something we've seen in other jurisdictions. I would argue that it's quite ill advised, because there are so many elements in Bill 20 that are not related, each of which merits a debate on their own. I'm quite concerned about this because I think it's a sneaky tactic by this government to try to bring in, I guess, death by a thousand cuts. There's a lot in here to digest and a lot in Bill 21 as well and in some of the other bills that I think are forthcoming, and they impact a lot of people in this province.

I appreciate very much the comments of my colleagues from Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview and Edmonton-City Centre. I really appreciate the work that they both have done to build and support the tech sector and the tech industry and, in fact, support start-ups in particular, and I know both of those colleagues are hearing a lot from folks in the industry about their concerns.

I've actually heard a little bit as well. It's not industry that I'm as intimately connected with as my colleagues are, but I actually spoke with one young woman. She works in tech, and she's involved with a start-up. She's worried, she said. She was explaining to me what she heard was coming down the pipe and what, in fact, did come with the rollback of some of the tax credits. She said: "You know, I'm just someone who's new, who's starting out. All I want to do is build and build this province." Every cent that she makes gets reinvested, and the work that our NDP government did to try to help companies like hers was life changing, as my colleague talked about. I mean, we were able to attract and retain a whole lot of really effective folks in the industry. She's one example of someone who is quite worried. Just as my colleague mentioned, you know, some of these folks will possibly leave to other jurisdictions where it's a friendlier climate. That's certainly a concern to me.

But I would like to shift gears a little bit and talk about some of the things that concern me, because, again, this is a giant omnibus bill. One of the things that caught my eye was ending the access to the future fund, the Alberta cancer prevention legacy fund, and the environmental prevention and enhancement fund. You know, to be honest, I didn't know a whole lot about each of these, so I did a little bit of digging. I was curious in particular about the Alberta cancer prevention legacy fund. This fund is disestablished under what's proposed here in Bill 20, and the fund's assets shall be held in the general revenue fund.

Now, I guarantee you that some of the members opposite will talk about how it's not actually all that harmful, but before I get into that and before I counter those arguments, let's talk a little bit about what the Alberta cancer prevention legacy fund does. I'm going to quote from their website here. It says:

We are a team of innovative leaders, scientists, and public health experts who specialize in cancer prevention. We take what we know and we find out what works right here in Alberta. ACPLF partners with communities, employers and health service providers who are interested in pioneering new approaches. Then we help bring solutions to the rest of the province, with a focus on groups who tend to have higher rates of cancer.

None of the things that cause cancer are easy to change on our own. So we're preventing cancer by helping to shape our communities, workplaces and health system to make it easier for all of us to take proven steps to prevent cancer every day. This can be by making healthy food options available and affordable for everyone; by building communities that provide shade and support being active; by encouraging our workplaces to support healthy choices; and by having our health care providers routinely talk to us about cancer screening tests we're due for.

It's very fascinating, actually. I didn't know a lot about it; I can be totally honest about that. They go on to talk more about some of the screening tools that they provide, some of the pretty neat, actually, interactive tools, whether it's about HPV vaccines or quitting smoking.

Now, my point in saying all this is that, you know – as I said, I think the members opposite will say: “Oh, you know, the funds aren't being lost. They're just being streamlined. We're trying to save some dollars here and there.” This is the loss of dedicated funds to address something as crucial as cancer prevention. I assure you that I am quite certain that there's not anyone in this House who's not been affected by someone with cancer. I worry about the movement of this fund to general revenue funds. In the future, I mean, doesn't that leave these funds vulnerable? I don't think I'm wrong in saying that we need – I mean, it's because of the foresight of previous governments to set up funds such as these – to recognize that those funds must be dedicated and they must be protected.

I worry greatly about this. I worry that this government is starting to set a precedent and is attacking pretty crucial funds that do really important behind-the-scenes work. Again, I bet the average Albertan can't tell you a lot about the Alberta cancer prevention legacy fund, but I would bet that their family has been impacted in some way by some of the programs and supports that they offer. You know, this leads to less accountability, and I worry about the stability of these funds. It's the pernicious nature of a bill like this, that sneaks a whole lot of little things in there, and as I said, when you unpack each on its own, you start to recognize that there could be a lot of long-term detrimental effects.

I want to talk about another aspect – and, again, I think each of us could speak for hours on any of the pages of this bill – the loss of the tuition tax credits. Actually, I met with two young people – gosh, it must have been last week now – who said that they're very worried about this. It was good that they acknowledged their privilege, too, and they acknowledged that, you know, not everybody benefits from tax credits, but they acknowledged that they certainly do. They're worried about this. They're actually two folks that work with student union executives, and they said that this is just another attack on postsecondary students.

I think I recapped this last week, but let's just go through the list of all the attacks on postsecondary students. In Bill 20 here we've got the loss of the tuition and education tax credits. What else do we have? We've got the tuition freeze being lifted. We've got the student loan increase. The minister is saying that it's minimal, you know, that it's just $15 a month, it's nothing, that sort of thing, just as our Premier would say that the deindexing of AISH is minimal as well, right? I mean, again, put yourself in that person's shoes. We know. We spoke with a number of AISH recipients today who noted that it certainly is onerous and that when you're struggling every day to make ends meet, a few dollars extra a month makes a huge difference. Okay. I've listed off a few of the things there.

Again, how is it that a student is going to be getting ahead? I appreciated what my colleagues, especially the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview, talked about, you know, how you're raising tuition at a time when you want to be attracting students to some of these sectors like, for instance, the tech sector, right? There's not a lot of motivation for university students to even necessarily pursue an education.

That reminds me. Somebody shared with me on Twitter just the other day. She said that she's just becoming so deflated. She's someone who's struggling to get ahead, and she wonders sometimes if she should even enter postsecondary education. Of course, a number of people jumped in and said, “Yes, it will be worth it,” but you can imagine that she's just one of many young people who is struggling with that decision right now. And it shouldn't be that way. It shouldn't be that way at a time when we should be very much investing in our young people, not attacking them.

Wow. Like I said, there's so much to unpack in Bill 20. One of the interesting things about Bill 20 is the film credit. Now, let me just refer you to the exact – yeah. It creates a film and television tax credit act under economic development and trade. Now, I'm proud that in my riding of Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood we actually have a vibrant arts scene. I'm really proud of that, and I've had an opportunity to talk to a lot of folks who work in various areas of the arts, including the film and screen industry. In fact, as I was pondering the large omnibus bills ahead of us earlier this evening, I received an e-mail from one person who actually works in the film and screen industry. His name is Robert, and I told him that I would read his letter tonight and share his concerns.

Ms Hoffman: Do it.

Member Irwin: Thank you to the Member for Edmonton-Glenora for that go-ahead.

I am going to share that because he's someone who is working directly in this industry, someone who lives a few blocks from me and understands the industry a whole heck of a lot more than I do. Again, I can admit when I don't know a whole lot about something. I don't know a lot about this industry, but I'm learning. Let me share with you his thoughts. I'll just read the whole letter even though he has a few personal things in there.

We've met and chatted many times in the neighbourhood [at] the Carrot, Bike Edmonton North Shop, Zocolo. I am one of several thousand skilled Albertans working in the screen industry. I thought we'd bump into each other to talk about the issue [that I want to address] but you're probably busy in that big building by the High Level Bridge.

He's correct; I am.

If I may I'll let a unified voice of all Alberta Film/Media workers speak:

There was tremendous opportunity for Alberta to diversify the economy and create thousands of jobs in the latest budget.

The need for content is at unprecedented global levels. With Alberta's reputation for diverse locations and talented Albertan crew who bring that can-do spirit to every production, we would be positioned for success with the pre-requisite of a competitive and predictable incentive. Alberta would be part of a global industry and location of choice.

The [UCP] promised us that they would:

- Convert the Alberta Screen-Based Production Grant into a tax credit with greater flexibility to allow Alberta to compete for major media projects with provinces like British Columbia and Ontario. We will consult with stakeholders in the film, television and digital media industries to create an optimal tax credit designed to attract large productions and series.
- Incentivize media production in rural areas, following the lead of Manitoba's film tax credit.

They say:

[You know what?] We [appreciate] the move to a tax credit; however, the money allocated to the overall fund is not sustainable enough to grow our industry and capture the jobs and investment seen in other jurisdictions. Comments have been made from this government that this government must "clean up the mis-management by the previous government due to oversubscription of the incentive". With all due respect, the incentive grant program has been oversubscribed for years (even with the previous conservative government). This is due to the overwhelming success of our industry, our local producers and foreign producers know the great opportunities available here.

Our industry provides not only great opportunities for Albertans who have trained in Alberta post-secondary institutions, Alberta businesses who service the industry but with a booming industry, Albertans who have been laid off from other sectors (oil and gas for example) can easily transition into our sector.

Foreign productions bring their investment dollars (we are talking millions) to set up shop in Alberta for our locations. Locations that include dozens of small communities – Drumheller, High River, Irricana, Canmore, Beiseker, and Fort Macleod to name a few. Without a competitive tax credit and a rural incentive, it will have a negative impact on those communities who have seen a migration of businesses and tax-paying Albertans to other jurisdictions.

We [ask] you now to support the Alberta Screen Industries. Invest in the tax credit at the same level of funding ($45 million per year) and watch our industry grow and provide returns on the investment.

Wow. That's the end of his letter. He says:

Kind regards,
Robert

I want thank Robert and the folks from ACTRA for sharing that letter.

I want to reiterate the importance of listening to those folks who work in that industry day in, day out. I appreciated how much he talked about the investment that's been created because of the work that he and others in the industry have done. The comment about rural communities, which the members opposite represent: they're quite certain that any growth, any progress that's been made in those communities will flee, will leave. That's quite shameful to think about, especially knowing just how important that diversification is.

Folks like Robert are hard-working folks who do so much to add to the cultural vibrancy of our communities, and I urge this government to respect them and to listen to them. As I said, you know, I'm willing to admit when I don't know enough about something. I don't know a lot about the film and screen industry – I'm starting to try to learn – but I trust the experts, the ones who have built this industry here in Alberta, the ones who've helped to make it thrive.

I really do urge the government to think about this and reconsider this. We gain so much from the contributions of the arts. I think we're all so proud when we see Alberta in movies and blockbusters. I know I certainly am even if it's in the Rocky Mountains. I mean, I don't live near the Rockies, but what a cool thing, to be able to say that Alberta is being showcased. So I take their warning seriously when they say that we are at risk of losing some of the strength of this industry. Again I want to urge the members opposite to really think about that and to listen to the experts, because I know they feel like they're not being heard right now, and it would be a shame to lose them.

I'm not going to speak about a whole lot more on Bill 20. Like I said, I really wanted to focus on the impact to some of these smaller things like the Alberta cancer prevention legacy fund, like some of these smaller funds being rolled into general revenue and issue a warning that this could have serious impacts in the future. When we're talking about something as important as cancer prevention, I think it's a fair warning, isn't it? I know my colleague the former Minister of Health certainly recognizes the critical importance of a fund such as that one as well as, I mean, the impacts of eliminating the education and tuition tax credits, something that I think, you know, some of the members opposite would say are seemingly minor. Again, when we're talking about, I guess you could say, a tax on postsecondary students right now, that's just another one to add to the list. It helps out a lot of families. I know a lot of families benefit from being able to claim those education and tuition tax credits.

Like I said, I'll end with my final point, just around, really, the importance of supporting our film and screen industry. As I said, I wanted to share the words of somebody in my neighbourhood, a constituent, Robert, who's quite concerned. He works in that industry. He's worked in the industry for many years. He's helped to contribute to that thriving industry here in Alberta, and he's quite worried about the loss of that industry.

Thank you, Mr. Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you.

Hon. members, are there any other – I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung has risen to join debate.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Chair. A pleasure this evening to rise and speak to Bill 20. As other speakers have mentioned, we're talking about an omnibus strategy embedded in this bill. That seems to be a favourite effort on the part of this government. I know that the session started a couple of weeks earlier than we have traditionally started, with great expectations that we'd be seeing lots of legislation come down. The government warned it to be a full slate of legislation, that we needed to start early to get on with things and make sure that we had enough time to complete fulsome debate on all these measures that the government wanted to bring forward. What happened is that, for the most part, we piddled away a couple of weeks in October, time which could have been used dealing with some of these measures that are in this omnibus bill and having a full debate about many of them individually as individual pieces of legislation rather than having them introduced in an omnibus bill, which really doesn't seem to have a dedicated rationale or theme throughout it. There seemed to be a lot of disparate measures that were tossed into the omnibus bill just kind of randomly. It's unfortunate that we're approaching legislation this way in this House.

Overall, what I really get the sense of is that this government seems to be somewhat rudderless. The vision is lacking in terms of where, in fact, we fundamentally want to end up. We're in a period of time, Mr. Chair, when this province, the people of this province need serious measures that look well beyond the four-year life cycle of this particular government, that recognize the unique situation that we're in. Fundamentally, we're in that situation not as the government likes to claim, that the four-year term that the previous NDP government had put us in a financial hole; it's because we had mismanagement that lasted for decades in advance of that four-year period, where we ended up not planning to transition away from fossil fuels, and we ended up being complacent.

For whatever miracle of capitalism that the previous governments previous to our government had up their sleeve, they found it wise to rely upon one market primarily for the export of our petroleum products and never built any more than one pipeline to tidewater, which we still rely upon for export to international markets. That is what stuck us in the situation that we're in, and that is what we should be focusing our strategy on right now, a much more diversified strategy than one which simply looks at balancing the books in an effort to see at the end of a four-year cycle a balanced budget but no real vision for the long term. That's a shirking of the responsibility of any government, in my estimation, Mr. Chair, a responsibility to really recognize that we're in a transformational time frame, a shift where we need to take steps and take measures to prepare ourselves for the new economy that we're entering into, that's being thrust upon on whether we like it or not.

That's what we tried to do over the four years that we had to ensure that our young people found jobs, found hope, found opportunity, and that we had new investors come to the province to take advantage of the opportunities that we tried to incubate here through things such as the interactive digital media tax credit, the capital investment tax credit, community and economic tax credit, Alberta investor tax credit, scientific research and experimental development tax credit. Those investments in incubating companies and the minds and efforts of the talented people who were behind those companies that took advantage of those tax credit opportunities, those were the people who are going to sustain opportunities for our young people in the future. When we see in the next couple of decades a transition away from fossil fuels, opportunity exists to finance from the economic rent that we extract from those fossil fuels over the next two or three decades while we have a global market and the opportunity to extract global or world price by exploiting those markets that still exist and transitioning by investing in new technologies, artificial intelligence, in the grey matter that we have in the young population that we have in this province.

I just have difficulty getting excited about the vision that this government doesn't seem to be sharing, doesn't seem to be having in its foundation. Fundamentally, the only thing they seem to be thinking about is simply a balance sheet, a balance sheet where they say: "Hey, we're going to go ahead and take a race to the bottom. We're going to go and balance our books, and we're going to do it by taking away social programs, where it's going to hurt people and it's going to make people suffer more so than they would have under a program that wasn't so austere." Yet it seems as though they're willing to accept that suffering as a cost which they think is acceptable.

The people of this province have a great challenge to meet together, yet this government seems to be wanting to pit people against each other and pull us apart. And, really, it's a tragedy that during this time of transition we can't have a government that sees that the real way forward is to identify the issues or the challenges that we have in populations of our economy and people who happen to be unemployed. Rather than embrace those populations and those people and say, "Look, we all have a responsibility to help those individuals," what we see instead, Mr. Chair, is a government that says, "Look, those people are hurting. We're going to make you hurt just as much so the pain is shared by everybody." Well, that's a rather scandalous proposition in my view, and one that's totally unnecessary.

We will end up, Mr. Chair, at a balanced budget and a debt position that was very similar under this government to what the previous NDP government would have ended up at. Maybe it would have been a year later that we would have reached a balanced budget, but the actual debt would have been fairly similar over a similar period of time. Yet in order to get where this government is taking us, they're really slamming a lot of people. They're looking at measures and proposing in Bill 20, perhaps, to attack those who may squawk the least or to put the powerful in their place. I speak of the repealing of the city charters for Edmonton and Calgary and putting a new local government fiscal framework act in its place. [A cellphone rang]

The Deputy Chair: To the hon. member, however, given that it is the season of Movember, I will direct the hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre to the Speaker's office at some point with a donation.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I promise to be more riveting and gain the attention of more members in the second half of my speech. Nonetheless, it's a challenge that I hope to rise to.

What I was speaking about was basically managing the transition, Mr. Chair. I believe that Bill 20 is an example of a government doing a woeful job of doing that. It's a real abrogation of responsibility of government to seriously understand that we face an intergenerational hand-off, an economic transformation that few jurisdictions go through, yet we could see it coming. It's unfortunate that this slow-motion failure to recognize and to prepare our economy for transition from fossil fuels to greener energy, a greener economy, and to diversify our economy, truly do so, is something that this government seems to reject as a responsibility.

This whole budget, including the measures proposed in Bill 20, rings hollow as far as a project to create any kind of excitement for young people in this province. It rings hollow for those individuals who should be able to expect assistance from their government, not to be left begging as a result of austerity measures that are employed to grab a few million dollars here, a few million dollars there, and too bad, so sad if it's going to hurt you; you're going to contribute that way to the effort of this government to reach a balanced budget, and you're not going to vote for us anyway, so we'll take these measures and run.

Also, it's a matter of looking at Edmonton and Calgary's political power. The political equation in this province is something that the previous Conservative governments have taken a look at. They made some significant attacks upon the budgets and downloaded or off-loaded the responsibility to provide public services down to the cities of Edmonton and Calgary, or they ended up really slashing the capital amounts that the cities of Edmonton and Calgary had expected.

In this particular case with Bill 20 we are amending the funding agreements for the LRT in Edmonton and Calgary so the provincial cash can come after 2023. As a result of that, we may end up seeing delays in projects, delays in employment, higher unemployment than otherwise would have taken place. We're going to see the negative effects of economic development that won't happen, infrastructure that should have been put in place, and it's infrastructure that is public expenditures that provide good-paying jobs and really increase the efficiency of both the cities of Edmonton and Calgary. By putting a pause, as the government likes to say, on the provincial cash by amending these funding agreements, they're only making things worse. It seems as though this government is intent on making things worse just to reach this goal of balancing a budget. It rings hollow with anybody who is suffering as a result.

It's a retreat. These measures proposed in Bill 20 are a retreat from hope, a retreat from optimism. They're a retrenchment back to a former day, when we saw previous Conservative governments looking as if a Holy Grail was reducing the deficit to zero when in fact the creation of that balanced budget ended up with another kind of deficit. We're seeing that all over again. A repudiation of history is what this measure proposes.

Hopefully, we'll see the government perhaps changing its mind on some of these measures proposed in Bill 20. I know that the mayors of Edmonton and Calgary and many other citizens are really shaking their heads at why it was necessary to attack the power centres of Edmonton and Calgary and rightfully questioning the motivation of the government as to whether it's simply a matter of extracting cash so that the government can balance its budget or whether the motivation was really a political motivation, whether this government is looking at squashing whatever political opposition there might be to their agenda of minimizing the role of government in the lives of Albertans.

I think that there's a global discussion on, and it's a healthy one to have. I certainly am on the side of believing that government has a role to play and a responsibility to lead when a population, when an economy, and when a political jurisdiction face significant challenges. To simply do as this government has done as their centrepiece, cough up $4.7 billion and hand it over to corporations and suggest that laissez-faire capitalism will save the day by having these corporations who receive these corporate gifts invest in companies that will create jobs, has been totally discredited.

So far, of course, during this government's reign, we've had a drop in employment in this province of at least 27,000 jobs and counting, and we have seen the flight of numerous companies who have benefited from this $4.7 billion tax giveaway. Husky, of course, is one, EnCana is another, and the list has grown even this week again. I know that our opposition predicted that this is what would happen. The government acted surprised when it happened, but it shouldn't have come to them as a surprise that the corporations who received this $4.7 billion tax handout simply used it buy back shares or to pay down debt. Then some of them actually left the province, left the country. It's something that we warned against, and I think it's shameful that the government didn't see clear to heeding those warnings because it was very predictable.

We look at the government saying that the cupboard is bare and look at the measures in Bill 20, seeing that they are, of course, measures designed to extract expenditures on the part of the government so that they can reach a balanced budget, all the while claiming that the province is broke, that the cupboard is bare, yet we've got $4.7 billion to give away. It's something that people are beginning to grasp in this province, like, what $4.7 billion will purchase, how many schools that would have built and how many more than the 250 schools and buildings and refurbishings that we started would have been undertaken to complete, $4.7 billion that could have gone to help the most needy in this province, $4.7 billion that would have avoided having to raise tuition at a time when we need to attract students into our postsecondary institutions so that they may retrain for the new opportunities that, hopefully, the government recognizes are there and must be there in different form other than the oil and gas industry, which is not going to be there in the same volume as we've had over the last 30 to 40 years.

I know that investments in value-added and in agricultural processing and forestry, in fact, in product innovation are something that we saw as a government as very, very valuable and necessary and actually a responsibility of government to do.

You know, to be fair, corporations like Alberta Innovates – previous to that I think it was the Alberta Opportunity Company, its precursor – were well-established bodies of research and incubation for companies that otherwise wouldn't have even existed or would probably have left the province. The seed money, the seed capital, the incentives that they were able to be given through those mechanisms ended up allowing them to thrive here. This was primarily started under Conservative governments, Progressive Conservative governments, I might add. But this particular brand of conservatism that we have now in government in Alberta sees no value in investing in the talents and the ideas of our Alberta entrepreneurs.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to join debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. It's my pleasure to rise again to speak to this bill. I likely will be speaking often to this bill. For the sake of time I will get to an amendment that I have because I'm eager to talk about how this is a reasonable amendment. My hope is that the government will consider adopting this amendment. I will pause for a moment for you to receive the copies.

The Deputy Chair: The floor is yours.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. I'll read the amendment in. I appreciate that our pages are working very, very ...

The Deputy Chair: Just for reference, we'll be referring to it as A1.

Mr. Bilous: A1. Great. Thank you, Mr. Chair.

I was just saying that I appreciate that our pages are working as quickly as they can to get this amendment to members, but I'll read it out for the sake of all members. I move that Bill 20, the Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, 2019, be amended in section 9(49) by striking out "Proclamation" and substituting "July 1, 2020." This is a very simple amendment. What this does is that it simply delays this bill's coming into force. Now, I'm sure, Mr. Chair, you're wondering why. I hope the President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance will consider adopting this. Really, what this is just putting in a six-month pause on the deindexation of the personal income tax. We know that that's part of this bill. Really, it's just putting in a sunshine or sunset clause on the deindexing.

Now, I can tell you part of where this is coming from, Mr. Chair. With all respect to the government, unless I missed something, in the election this government did not campaign on raising personal income taxes on every Albertan. This is something that the government needs to be reminded of because even tonight in estimates I heard from the minister over and over again about our government introducing a carbon tax. Now, we did campaign on a climate leadership plan, but I am positive that this current Premier and this current government did not campaign on raising personal income taxes. If they did, I will humbly withdraw all these comments, if they show me where in the campaign platform they said: we are going to increase personal income taxes on every Albertan.

It's a word game for anyone to stand up and say that deindexing is not an increase to personal income taxes because when a person's salary goes up and so do their incomes taxes, it's an increase. It's tax creep. The Premier is on record in Hansard in Ottawa many times talking about how tax creep is a raise on taxes. So unless there are two different standards, one for Ottawa and one for Alberta, you can't speak and argue it both ways.

A simple amendment. This doesn't torpedo the bill or kill this bill at all. It merely provides six months before this bill, should it pass in this Chamber, comes into effect. Essentially, the amendment is quite simple. I'm hoping the members, including the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board, will consider accepting this amendment. It is a simple one, and I'm happy to take my place and allow other members to discuss both the bill and this amendment.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

On amendment A1 I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie has risen to speak.

Member Loyola: Perfect. Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. It's always a pleasure to get up in the House and speak to bills before the House, especially in committee since we can talk for a little bit longer and express quite a number of views and even give perspectives.

Specifically, today I'd like to talk about Camille and Eric. They're constituents of mine. They actually run Mosaic Entertainment. I'll never forget when elected back in 2015, they were probably two of the first constituents that came knocking on my door to start asking me about tax credits and how potentially they could grow their business. At that time I do believe that Mosaic Entertainment was relatively new, just starting off, and they were able to secure funding for at least one major film, that was filmed here in the province of Alberta, if I'm not mistaken. I wanted to share with you the level of enthusiasm that Camille and Eric had. They had a dream. They had this incredible dream to build Mosaic Entertainment and to put Edmonton and Alberta on the map when it came to production.

I'll never forget visiting one of their sets. I do believe it was in the second year after being elected. The number of people that they had employed as a part of this production: it was overwhelming. It was overwhelming. They must have had a set and crew of I'd probably say well over 50 people. They were actually recording film in a house in Glenora. I'll never forget. They invited me to go and visit the house in Glenora where they were actually filming, and I've got to say that it was quite impressive being on the set of a major production like that, just seeing all the cameras and everything. You know, we were in one part of the house while the actors were in another part of the house. They were doing their thing, and it was fun. I want to say that it was also a great experience to see not only the actual filming and the actual production but the hope and the just overwhelming happiness that Eric and Camille had on their faces because they were doing what they always loved to do, and they were doing it right here in Edmonton, Alberta, by growing their business. So an Alberta screen-based production grant, that's something that was absolutely essential for Mosaic Entertainment and people like Eric and Camille.

Now, the other part about Eric and Camille that I want to share with you is that, of course, they're constituents, as I said. They have two children. They live in Summerside, and Eric was the kind of guy who not only was so incredibly dedicated to building the business that both him and his wife were running, but he also gave back to the community. He was actually also on the Summerside Community League. He saw himself as a member of the community giving back because, of course, what's important for him was the fact that it wasn't just him living in the community, it was his children, the place where they call home.

Behind these tax credits, what I'm trying to get at is that these tax credits are helping people, yes, grow a business, but these same people that are growing their business also call Edmonton and Alberta their home. They have pride in this place. They want to make sure that Edmonton continues to grow, that Alberta continues to grow economically, that it truly is an economy that we can diversify as we continue to move forward. I want to thank Eric and Camille for their incredible drive, I would say, their incredible drive to not only build Mosaic Entertainment here in the province of Alberta but also their dream of putting production and film on the map as far as Edmonton goes, because it takes entrepreneurs like that who see well beyond the history of Alberta to truly diversify our economy.

Yes. I won't disagree with you: Alberta is known for petroleum. It's known for the petroleum industry. That's great. It's wonderful. It provides a base. It provides a base from which we can grow, and grow we should. [A cellphone rang] I'll never forget the very first time I ran for office, knocking on people's doors and talking to them and asking them: well, can we agree that we're too reliant on the petroleum industry? "Undoubtedly," they would say. I'd say: well, can we agree that we need to diversify our economy? "Absolutely. I've been saying that for decades." And these are Edmontonians, Albertans, who understand the importance of the petroleum industry here in the province of Alberta, undoubtedly, but they want to see more opportunities because they've had enough of going on the roller coaster, the boom-and-bust roller coaster of when things are good in the petroleum industry, well, things are great, everything is wonderful, but when the bust comes, so many people begin to suffer. They suffer, and we saw it. We saw it.

We saw the great number of people that ended up losing their jobs, and there are still people losing their jobs. Even with the promise of the UCP's corporate tax giveaway to big corporations, we haven't seen one new job being created. Instead, we've actually seen 27,000 jobs being lost.

Now, the question that we need to ask ourselves is: what is going to contribute to this economy? The tax credits that are being repealed by Bill 20, this omnibus piece of legislation, are actually going to be hindering rather than helping. This bill is actually hindering rather than helping the Alberta economy, especially when it comes to people like Eric and Camille.

Many times the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview has gotten up in this House, and he's talked about people that he has met with who have actually benefited from the tax credits that the previous government, our government, the Alberta NDP government, created in order to help drive diversification here in the province of Alberta. Those tax credits were actually helping business, were actually making sure that we could provide a foothold for these businesses here in the province so that when the economy got tough when it came to the petroleum industry, people had other options.

Shouldn't that be what it's all about? When the petroleum industry is great: great, wonderful. All these people can have these jobs. But the more that we begin to diversify the economy, then people will have other opportunities, other opportunities when it comes to being able to provide for their families because, as I stated, Eric and Camille are Albertans striving not only to make their dreams come true in this economy and in this province and contribute to the social, cultural fabric of our wonderful society here, but they're also putting food on the table for their children. Now, shouldn't it be that people have the opportunity to actually work at what they love to do? And shouldn't we as a government try our best to diversify the economy so that people can actually do that and contribute to the economy in a way that's meaningful to them?

You look at the number of people who are underemployed here in the province of Alberta, people that go to university or other postsecondary institutions for two, four years of education, come out, and end up working in something that's not even related to what it is that they studied. These are all people who are underemployed. If we had a more well-diversified economy, these people would actually be working in what it is that they love to do. Let me tell you this. When people are working in what they love to do, the level of production that they contribute to the society is overwhelming because people love to get up to go to work every day when they love their job. When an individual is underemployed, guess what? They may not have the same love for that particular position that they're in. When they go to work, they don't feel that they're contributing in the way that they truly want to contribute to the company that they're working for and for the economy here in the province of Alberta.

When people love their jobs, they contribute overwhelmingly to the company. They're willing to give more. They're willing to produce more because they understand that they're doing it because their job is not just a job. They see themselves as part of the fabric of our society. This is the kind of economy and society that we as government should be striving to facilitate for the citizens of this great province. We should be trying our best to create this kind of scenario when it comes to every Albertan.

You know, we have people come from all over the world, come to this province in order to work. That's a beautiful thing. I've always said that the cultural diversity, the ethnic, religious diversity that we have here in the province of Alberta only contributes more to its strength. That diversity helps us see things from different perspectives. The more perspectives that we have when we're looking at the world, the more well rounded and open-minded we become about understanding not only the world itself but also how to solve the problems that we're encountering as a society.

This is wealth. This is what makes us stronger. By being able to work together, bringing people from a number of different perspectives together in order to look at a problem, you end up creating a better solution. Now, imagine if we had that, with people who love their jobs, working at companies, contributing to the Alberta economy, all driven by their love for their work and giving to the Alberta economy. The only way that we're going to get there is by creating a more diversified economy.

It's, like, you go to an investment specialist, any one of them, and they'll tell you: you can't put all your eggs in one basket. I know that each and every one of the people in this House knows that. You can't put all your eggs in one basket. You need to diversify your investment portfolio. So what I can't understand is why it's good for people, individuals to diversify their investment portfolio, yet here in the province of Alberta we're not doing everything we possibly can in order to diversify the economy. We continue to have all our eggs in one basket. I'm not saying that the petroleum industry and putting our efforts and our work and our drive into making sure that it becomes more efficient is not something that we should be doing. I'm not saying that.

We should. We should make it better. We should make it more productive. We should make it more efficient, more effective, give incentives for the industry to do their best to meet the environmental standards that we're trying to meet and at the same time increase production and not only increase production but make sure that we're increasing our market share and make sure that we're exporting our products to other places in the world. This is all true. We can all agree on that.

Like the Member for Edmonton-City Centre said: just because you're doing one thing doesn't mean you shouldn't do the other. It's like when people juxtapose the economy and the environment. You can do both. You can have a strong economy. You can have a strong, well-diversified economy and protect the environment at the same time. That's what the Alberta NDP government was trying to do in our four years. I can only hope that we get that chance once again, to be back in office and continue to move Alberta forward to a more modern place, where people can actually have more opportunities and actually work at the things that they love to work at.

With that being said, I want to strongly encourage members in the House here to support this amendment being brought forward by the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview as I believe that we need more time. We need more time to make sure that we get it right. I continue to have hope that all members in this House, although we may not see eye to eye – I know we don't see eye to eye, but that's not what we should be striving for. We should be proud of the diverse perspectives that we all have. Those diverse perspectives, like I was saying earlier, will help us come at the same problem from multiple viewpoints and help us create bigger, broader solutions that actually create more opportunity for the people of Alberta. That's what it should be about.

With that being said, Mr. Chair, I want to thank you for the opportunity to be able to rise in this House and share my thoughts with all the members here. Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Prior to calling on any other hon. members with regard to this amendment, I do recognize that part of my role in this House is to ensure that I am fair and unbiased. As such, I must – I am duty bound – ensure, given that it is the season of Movember, that the hon. Minister of Health also make a donation, given the infraction of electronic instrument sounds earlier.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to amendment A1?

[Motion on amendment A1 lost]

The Deputy Chair: Moving on to Bill 20 generally, are there any hon. members wishing to speak? I see that the hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika has risen.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I move that we adjourn debate on Bill 20.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Bill 19

Technology Innovation and Emissions Reduction Implementation Act, 2019

The Deputy Chair: Are there any comments, questions, or amendments to be offered with respect to the bill?

Member Ceci: It's a pleasure to get up, Mr. Speaker, and to share a few thoughts about Bill 19, the emissions management and climate resilience act, TIER legislation, in Committee of the Whole.

It's my view that this bill should not be supported. It has some serious flaws that will take steps backwards from the existing climate leadership plan that is in place and that has served this province well since 2015 or thereabouts.

You know, I remember earlier today that when I was getting up, I was listening to the news, Mr. Speaker. There were several scientists who were on the news from the Edmonton area. They were being interviewed. They were part of, I believe . . .

Mr. Dach: Eleven thousand.

Member Ceci: . . . 11,000 – I was going to say 1,100 – climate scientists around the world who had the same view and they signed on to the same declaration with each other. It had four or six parts, Mr. Speaker. The people who were interviewed locally were talking about the impact of climate change on their work. Their work included work in the north of Canada, looking at the tundra and how it has changed as a result of the impact of CO<sub>2</sub> on our environment. That was one person who said that they travel north regularly. They work in the regions up there, and they're seeing significant impacts that will absolutely change the way of life for the people, the inhabitants of the northern part of Canada. It will impact the rest of our globe as well because the tundra, the permafrost, is melting. It will never go back, it will never come back, and it will release carbon into the atmosphere because it was a sink. It was being stored in the permafrost before, and it's not going to be anymore. [A cellphone rang]

The Deputy Chair: Hon. members, I hesitate to interrupt the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo, but in the interest of how things have gone today so far, I believe that there may have been another infraction for electronic instrument sounds coming from the hon. Minister of Infrastructure, so I believe that he also will be making a donation in the spirit of Movember.

Hon. member, please continue.

Member Ceci: Sure. Everybody, turn your phones off. Turn them to silent. You can't afford it.

Ms Hoffman: Yours is good.

Member Ceci: Mine is good. Yeah.

The other scientist that I remember listening to as I was getting ready for work was one who regularly comes out to the glaciers in the Rocky Mountains. She said in her short – she was under 40 – time as a climate scientist, she can't even see a glacier that she regularly monitors from where she first saw it, Mr. Speaker, when she was standing. It's so far back and has retreated so much. I bring up that story and those people because they are of the view that if we don't, as a society in Canada and others across the world, deal with this issue, it will be the undoing of the life that we, our ancestors remember and change irrevocably for young people going forward in terms of the environment we live in. That's why I don't support what's before us, because it takes some serious steps backwards. Our plan, the climate leadership plan, actually invested money in innovation that this plan downgrades. This plan invests less money in innovation.

As the climate scientists were saying on the radio today, if we don't innovate, if we don't do things differently, we are bound to change our world irrevocably for the next generation. That's not a legacy that anybody wants to leave. That's not a legacy all of us want to have on our backs, I'm sure. It's disappointing to see that this plan, this UCP plan, reduces emissions less than our previous plan. We should be doing more. We should be striving for more, Madam Chair. What I see here, and what my colleagues have reviewed over the last several days – and it's in Hansard – is that they've critiqued and they can say unequivocally that TIER will not reduce the number of megatonnes in our province's production that our climate leadership plan was going to and did.

It's unfortunate, Madam Chair, that another aspect of this plan is that money goes into gen rev, and it looks like deficit reduction is an aspect of the expenditure for the monies collected under revenues. Deficit reduction, of course, is important, but as I was just saying, if we don't have an environment to live in that sustains life for us all in a way that doesn't degrade our environment, deficit reduction won't matter a whole lot for the people coming after us. We need to do more, and Alberta has done more since 2007 with the revenues being collected going to innovation and green initiatives. That's changing, as I said, with the plan before us. We invested more under the climate leadership, the carbon competitiveness incentive regulation. We invested more in all aspects of innovation. I was very disappointed today in estimates to see that in Alberta Innovates, which is a great partner in terms of trying to bring people together around solutions that will affect all sorts of things in our environment, there was a reduction in staff, reductions in money to Alberta Innovates. It means that that entity will be able to do a lot less. Who knows, it might have been holding part of the key for the work that needs to be done around climate change innovation.

We have to look at a number of things with regard to the plan that's before us, Bill 19, and I can tell you, Madam Chair, that on the reduction of megatonnes our plan had a higher number of megatonnes reduced for the work we were doing. In our plan it was 50 megatonnes over, I believe, 10 years. This plan only reduces 32 megatonnes of CO<sub>2</sub>. It will be reduced without any innovation happening as a result. When I think about some of the critiques of the plan before us, I know that there are some who have said that this proposed TIER system is a step in the wrong direction, and I would have to agree. It would disrupt the investment landscape as a result of being passed. It'll create policy uncertainty because it changes policy that was better in class than what is being presented.

It sends a significantly weaker signal, Madam Chair, to industry to reduce emissions because those emissions are reduced at a higher amount under the current plan, the NDP plan. It lowers the ambition of recently implemented and well-designed policy, and that's not the direction anybody needs or wants to go, especially when there is something before us as serious as climate change and the impact it's having on the Canadian North and other places, like our glaciers, which are the source of a great deal of Alberta's watershed.

We, of course, are losing that at too fast a rate, Madam Chair. That critique is from a person who knows of what he speaks. It's a person at Pembina. We need to listen to the climate scientists, like the 11,000 that signed the declaration for more to be done on this. Alberta can do more and has done more in the recent past. I think it would be good for all of us to get back to a higher standard of work in this area instead of lowering those standards.

You know, the government also talked about being able to reduce emissions by 57 megatonnes, but it would appear that that would factor in potential innovation. As I said, that doesn't seem to be happening. Under the same assumptions our plan is forecasted to reduce a higher amount of megatonnes, approximately 19 megatonnes more, at 76 megatonnes. We previously put all of our plan in legislation, Madam Chair, and that is being downgraded by what's before us. In fact, it's a rather insubstantial document compared to what was there for the plan that we put in place.

You know, there is a system of benchmarks, Madam Chair, in this plan, not right here, but they will be in this plan. That's tremendous. I think that anything that sets benchmarks and companies have to surpass those benchmarks is a good thing, but the benchmarks that are put in place will be reduced, as I said, so that's not a good thing.

According to the fiscal plan document of 2019, this plan will only cover 48 per cent of all emissions in the province. It removes substantially the broader economy in terms of consumers and their impact on climate and focuses on companies who are involved in the energy sector. Again, that's a decrease or a downgrading of what's in the best interests of climate change and the impacts on the world, not to mention the significant impacts on our own country.

There are other parts of the plan that have been reviewed and I'd like to talk about briefly. The government says that there was significant stakeholder involvement in the production of this plan over the past summer. That's good as far as it's taken, of course, but I can tell you that the climate leadership plan that we worked on had significant stakeholder involvement as well, across industry, across society, and across differing groups. In particular, the major industry emitters were at the table and came together with environmentalists to form the plan that we put in place.

We know that your Bill 19 framework has already signalled that the carbon price will be $30 per tonne. That was something that recently the Premier said would happen. I think the modelling for your plan took place on $20 per tonne, or at least that was the signal that was given to the wider society and Albertans but recently was changed by the Premier. We started at $20 per tonne and went to $30 on January 1, 2018, and kept it at $30 on January 1, 2019, because of the fact that the TMX pipeline was not resolved in terms of what was going to happen with it. But soon after that, the federal government purchased the TMX pipeline, and we would have changed our price at some – but we didn't. But the federal government did step up and buy the TMX pipeline and promised to work as hard as possible to get it across the finish line in terms of the expansion. I have no doubt that that will take place in the not-too-distant future. It's not a small thing that the financial plan, the fiscal plan, identifies three pipelines in it. One of them is TMX. I think it's in the '22 time frame – I'm not sure what quarter in '22 – but it may be in '23.

There have been criticisms about our plan from the other side, of course. I just want to set the record straight that Alberta was on track to cut more than 50 megatonnes of emissions over the next 10 years. That would have happened under our plan. It would have reduced methane, which is a really difficult, difficult emission because it's so heavy and significantly affects the ozone. Reducing emissions under our plan would have happened, and 45 per cent of it would have been reduced by 2025. That is better than this Bill 19 plan.

This government is not serious enough about this issue and needs to take a more serious approach if it is going to be amongst the stellar plans in the world, of which there are many. But Bill 19 won't be one of them.

We, of course, did much more than focus on innovation in our plan. We focused on assisting families, lower- and middle-income families, with the price on carbon. That's not in this plan, obviously, because that whole area of consumers assisting with the carbon price and using the price to affect behaviour is not in this plan. I remember that we contributed a significant amount of money, over $600 million a year, I think, back to families so that they could address that impact in their budgets. Our climate leadership plan had rebates for 60 per cent of Albertans in it. What we see in your plan is that a part of the revenue is going to pay off the $4.7 billion no-jobs corporate handout that is built into your economic plan.

The climate leadership plan that we had had four main policies. There was implementing a new price on greenhouse gas emissions, also known as carbon pricing, and, as I said, that impacted behaviours, that collected money to go into a number of expense lines that were helpful to a broader number of initiatives to work off of fossil fuels and work towards a cleaner and greener electricity grid, renewables, and improve people's personal lives through enhancing their energy reduction in their own homes and businesses. Our plan had a phase-out.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Are there any members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Madam Chair. It's my pleasure to rise and again speak to Bill 19, Technology Innovation and Emissions Reduction Implementation Act, 2019, or TIER legislation. This is my second opportunity to speak to this legislation, so I'm just going to review some of the points that I chatted about the last time. Again, I just want to underline that it is disappointing to see the UCP presenting a plan that reduces emissions less than our previous plan. I think, like the Member for Edmonton-Strathcona has always said, that this should never be about pitting the economy and the environment against each other. Sadly, that's what we see happening all the time in this place and seemingly in this legislation. Let's hope not.

Anyway, as I said before, this plan does not invest more in innovation through the TIER fund than it did under our plan, so I think that that is important to note. Government has stated that emissions reductions are anticipated to be approximately five megatonnes less in 2024 under TIER than under the preceding CCIR. In fact, under our government we were on track to reduce 50 megatonnes of harmful emissions over the next 10 years. Now that's down to an unambitious 32 megatonnes. That's an almost 50 per cent drop, which is not good. I think, given what's happening in the world around us, in particular, this is not a good thing.

Looking at some of the numbers related to this piece of legislation: according to fiscal plan 2019 this TIER plan will only cover 48 per cent of all emissions in Alberta. As I said previously, certainly, large emitters are responsible, obviously, for a large part of emissions, but I think it's really important to understand that all of us are contributing to carbon emissions in all kinds of ways, and there are so many ways that we can all reduce our carbon footprint that collectively make a huge difference. Again, as I said before, I'm discouraged by the reduction of investment into energy efficiency, and I've heard people across make jokes about LED light bulbs. I get it; it's a good meme. In reality it's those little steps that were encouraging more and more innovation and investment. I think that something as simple as having an energy audit done on your home or business and then making the necessary changes actually went a long way to teaching people how easy it could be to reduce emissions. So it was unfortunate to see that reduction.

Implementing TIER will lead to a $0.7 billion of revenue reduction until '22-23, and the fund is expected to take in – actually, I'm going to skip over that – so $20 million of TIER revenue is supposed to go to the Canadian Energy Centre, again, that we affectionately call the war room or snitch line, $80 million over four years. Once again, I understand that it's important that we promote our resources and get the best price possible, but, really, in a day and age when we're facing cuts in this budget that have the ability to impact lives and to create a great deal of harm, whether it's in education, health care, social services, that we're spending this kind of money to hire, essentially, a failed UCP candidate to have a war room against people that have a difference of opinion. You know, a lot of it's been sort of secretive, so we don't really know what this war room is doing. I question this kind of spending on an initiative like this when we're making cuts that are impacting people's lives today.

When you compare the plan we had in place previously and this legislation, on average both plans invest about $200 million in innovation. While I continue to hear the members opposite talk about, you know, how great this plan is because innovation is going to save us – I have no doubt that innovation is going to do amazing things, as it always does, as science does, but to say that it is the answer, I think, is not realistic. Note that we were actually investing the very same amount. Now, innovation can only take us so far. Just crossing our fingers and hoping that our investment in innovation gets us to the place that we need to be to reduce emissions where we need to reduce them is, I think, not realistic.

Government also cut some of the revenues that came out of the previous plan – government has not seen fit to replace them – and, in essence, significantly cut from innovation and other parts that were funded. Again, we've talked about this repeatedly. For whatever reason, it's not sticking, and it's not getting traction. It's unfortunate because we've heard stakeholders stand up, speak publicly, and talk about what will happen when we reduce the investment in diversification in these areas. We lost investment in AI funding, the digital media tax credit, and funding to science in various departments.

One of the things I have noticed as estimates have gone through over the last little bit is that, certainly, a lot of ministries have taken some really significant cuts, but there are a couple in particular that I find fairly worrisome. One is in agriculture. You know, I didn't grow up on a farm. I'm not an agriculture expert by any stretch. It's really only just what I read in the reports that I get where I try to understand what's happening in agriculture. It seems to me that there's a great deal of innovation that happens in that area. I know that all of us owe a huge debt of gratitude to that particular sector and to producers and growers in this province and in our country. One of the things – I think that people that are producers or in that sector are really on the front lines, and I think they themselves have been really innovative. But it's been really important to fund research, and that requires investment, and that requires scientists. It looks like the cut to agriculture in particular is doing away with a lot of those positions. I can't imagine that that's going to take us forward in any way.

Obviously, I have no doubt that we'll be losing scientists and researchers in environment, which is incredibly short sighted. I'm not surprised by that, but it is short sighted. I just wanted to remind people to go back. I get that it fits into the UCP's narrative or into a meme that is about the job-killing carbon tax. What it was was a Nobel prize winning strategy to reduce emissions, a market-based strategy to reduce emissions. I think it was kind of funny when I can't remember who it was now was talking about raising taxes like a sin tax on a carton of cigarettes: you know, it's going to reduce people's willingness to spend that kind of money to buy these things that are harmful. It's funny because that is the same principle that is used in the strategy that we introduced, but that didn't seem to stick.

Here are some of the key points or key facts under climate leadership, and I think it's really important to talk about these things because we lost a lot as a result. It's important to talk about what we lost. There were four main policies within the climate leadership plan. One of those things was, obviously, implementing a price on greenhouse gas emissions or pollution. That was known as carbon pricing. Again I will remind people at every opportunity that it is a Nobel prize winning strategy. Economists, scientists will agree that this is a strategy that consistently helps bring down emissions.

One of the other things that we did – and, again, I'm glad that we did it in concert with supporting workers and supporting communities – is that we phased out pollution from coal-generated electricity by 2030. Our goal was to generate 30 per cent of electricity from renewable sources by 2030. One of the other strategies was to cap the oil sands emissions at 100 megatonnes. I certainly recall those long evenings of debate. Reducing methane emissions from upstream oil and gas production by 45 per cent was also something that we had introduced in this plan. Alberta was on track to cut more than 50 megatonnes of emissions over the next 10 years, the same as taking 10.6 million cars off the road, or nearly half the passenger vehicles in all of Canada. This is very much like eliminating the emissions of the Vancouver metro area three times over.

In terms of jobs we were heavily investing in this pillar of the climate leadership plan as it supported more than 7,300 jobs in just the first two years and thousands of jobs still to come, with construction starting on a number of projects. These are jobs that are now in danger, thanks to this change and thanks to this government. We cut the small-business tax.

I want to talk a little bit about transit. There was a significant investment in a plan because, again, the climate leadership plan was taking a very broad approach. It wasn't just about putting a price on pollution, but it was about looking at other areas. In transit we invested $3 billion over 10 years for light rail transit in Calgary and Edmonton from the climate leadership plan, including $1.53 billion for Calgary's green line, which now we're worried about, and $1.47 billion to support the Edmonton transit, including the west valley line. It also included $967 million for GreenTRIP and other transit investments.

I may have mentioned this before – it's really sad – that in St. Albert we finally got some GreenTRIP funding. I believe it was, to start construction on a new park-and-ride on busy St. Albert Trail and Campbell Road, I think it is. What the plan was: ultimately, like any city, sort of you're looking to the future, and a lot of folks that live in St. Albert do travel into Edmonton for work, so it was a park-and-ride centre that would allow eventually the LRT to come to St. Albert to continue to reduce emissions and get more vehicles off the road. Now, with the uncertainty around Edmonton and Calgary, the major cities that are really looking to increase public transportation, I really worry about St. Albert. I worry that we'll have a really great park-and-ride and a really great place to park for buses, but I worry that LRT access is a very long way in the future.

One of the really important things to remember under the climate leadership plan was the fact that about 60 per cent of Albertan families received a rebate. They received a rebate to help offset some of those costs. Is it sort of income distribution, in a strange way? Sure. But what that did is that it allowed more buying capacity for people that were sort of at the lower ends. For example, I was chatting with people on AISH because in preparation for budget estimates we were talking about AISH. One of the things that someone said to me was that in one rebate cheque, I think it was, she would receive $150. For somebody who's living on $1,600 a month to get that kind of rebate really sort of gave her a little bit more of a cushion to do some of the things she needed to do. Of course, like when we raise the minimum wage, we give more buying power to lower income families. They do tend to spend their money in local communities. There's another loss.

Energy Efficiency Alberta: I mentioned this a little bit earlier. Since 2017 – and I believe that we were at the time the only province without an energy efficiency plan. I'm not a hundred per cent sure about that. It's a little bit late. Now we're the only ones without an energy efficiency plan. Where's the logic there? We're trying to promote our product, and we're working hard to promote our product, get pipeline capacity increased, get a better price for our product. We want to keep saying: "We're, like, an incredibly responsible producer. Buy our product. Come here. Invest here." Yet we're the only province in this country without an energy efficiency plan. Like, how does that make sense? That doesn't make a whole lot of sense to me.

Let's take a stroll down memory lane and go back to 2017. You know, we added the – Energy Efficiency Alberta actually added about $850 million in economic growth and reduced greenhouse gas emissions by 5.7 million tonnes. Now, I mean, it's not 50 megatonnes, but 5.7 million tonnes just because we finally introduced an energy efficiency plan: that's pretty good. That's actually a really good investment. For every dollar we invested in energy efficiency programs, we got $3.30 returned to Albertans' pockets. That's pretty significant.

One of the other things that we invested in because it was very important – and then just based on the recent estimates with Indigenous Relations and sort of some of the non answers, it's not clear to me where these projects are. But under the indigenous climate leadership, more than 65 indigenous communities in Alberta have benefited from 125 indigenous climate leadership initiative projects since 2017. I mean, that's incredible. I wish I could remember – and I know it's not an indigenous community – the name of the community that is completely sort of self-reliant for renewable energy. I might have to look up that article and table that tomorrow. But that's incredible, that just in such a short time small communities are making these kinds of investments.

You know, we see regularly in the news that different industries that are not oil and gas industries are worried, right? The solar industry, which had grown by nearly 500 per cent – installed solar capacity has increased – is worried. There's uncertainty because they're not sure what kind of investment is going to go towards that industry. About 3,100 solar installations have been completed. That's pretty significant. More than 300 certified companies have installed solar projects across the province. Albertans have conserved enough energy to power a city the size of Leduc. That's pretty significant.

You know, one of the things that I do want to focus on... [interjections] Sorry if I'm disrupting anyone's party over there. I just want to talk about why I keep sort of harping on the fact that we're not addressing the need to bring our emissions down faster, more significantly.

Or I can ramble a little bit more. I mean, there's a reason I wear this button every day. You know, it's like...

Member Irwin: I love that button.

Ms Renaud: This button. It says...

Member Irwin: What does the button say?

Ms Renaud: The button? My button says: science doesn't care what you believe.

Member Irwin: Absolutely.

Ms Renaud: That's kind of straightforward.

Like I said time and again, I am most definitely not a scientist at all. In fact, I struggle to get through some of the scientific papers that scientists send me. But one of the things that I have learned from scientists who've taken the time to explain these things to me is that we have a crisis, that we have a very real crisis. I think that given the fact that Alberta is landlocked, we are fairly far north, we are not seeing the severe impacts that other places in Canada, particularly the coastal regions but other places in the world – I think that we are such a wealthy country, so we are not feeling the impacts of climate change. But they are around the world; countries are around the world. Our own country is really experiencing a lot of challenges on the coast, and I think you'll see more and more cities stepping up to say: "We do have a climate emergency. We do need to take this seriously." It's incredibly sad to me that the province of Alberta hasn't taken a leadership role to say, you know: "Yes, we're going to introduce some legislation that goes even further to reduce emissions while supporting this very important sector. We're going to take this further. We're going to do something and address this problem." We're not.

I mean, the northern parts of Canada are warming at twice the rate as the rest of the world, and I don't see a lot of concern. In fact, I see scientists and researchers being fired or budgets being cut. Emission targets are lower. We don't talk about this. We had 10,000 people outside of the Legislature. I don't actually care what kind of signs they had. What I saw were little kids. I saw one little guy...

The Chair: Are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland.

Mr. Getson: I really appreciate that. I've been listening very intently to the previous bill that we talked about, and I've been listening to the TIER bill, which is actually fantastic, in my opinion. I know that the members opposite don't really like using technology to help save the environment. They prefer taxing little children and school moms and all of those to save the planet, so I know it's a bit of a reach for them sometimes to see that there's a better way of doing things than what they were doing before. I've heard some silly things in here a few times, and one of them that came up – honestly, I understand that there was a climate emergency recently declared by one of the city councillors in Edmonton. I've never experienced that type of climate change.

The really neat thing with the TIER program – the members opposite were talking about the larger polluters on the planet. Well, yeah, absolutely, it's not Canada. Canada is not a large polluter. Alberta is not a large polluter. If you look at China, for example, they put out about 25 per cent of the world's carbon. Now, that's kind of a big number to deal with. The population of China exceeds ours by – I don't know how many times – a billion times. You know, our population is about 35 million, and they have about 1 billion people. Obviously, they have a bigger impact as well. India is another place, you know, a hot spot in the world, that really doesn't have access to energy like we do. If you look at what India is doing, they're, I mean, even still burning animal dung just to heat, to have the basics.

At Enbridge Pipelines there was a gentleman by the name of Pat Daniel, and he was kind of a visionary. He was one of those CEOs that took it upon himself to make a difference. When you're operating one of those pipelines out there, the biggest cost that we had for operating those lines was electricity. What Pat Daniel had done at that time was put an initiative forward. He wanted to have wind power; he wanted to have solar. He wanted to do all of those things to offset it, and that's what we did as a company. We did that of our own volition to produce those things and to take care of that. We had the carbon offsets and all those good things put in place, and we developed the technologies that went with it. We supported those industries. We had a whole green division that was working on that. Heck, when we did the Montana tie-line, we were in a joint-venture partnership, and 350 windmills were sitting down in Lethbridge. Those were the things that industry was doing before this climate challenge initiative package or leadership or whatever it was called before, before we started taxing school moms, before we started taxing people for it.

Now we seem to be polarized all the time, polarized on the difference of what we want to do for our planet, polarized on taking a different way and using the big polluters, the ones that actually have the horsepower to do this. If you look at our program and our package on the TIER program, it's using that technology. It's allowing the larger polluters to make their systems more efficient, take care of the carbon, scrub up their technologies, do all those good things, and then, heaven forbid, we could actually package that and send it across the world.

I've heard some numbers, for example, coming back to India and China, who actually want our LNG. If we had access for our LNG to get to port – now, here's a really neat concept. Just imagine. Just imagine if we got along as provinces, just imagine if we weren't scaring ourselves into a corner here all the time, just imagine if we had a corridor where we could send our liquefied natural gas or send gas itself off to the coast and not just to the Tsawwassen terminal. Get us to a deep-sea port maybe, heck, even up in Alaska. I'd take that, for example.

If you got us to B.C., that would be the best thing that we could do as western provinces, standing together. Take our gas, send it over there, use B.C. Hydro, where we actually are utilizing that, put LNG in place, and pump it off. Just imagine that. That would be the greenest energy that we could give to the planet. Send it to places like India, that are crying for this. Send it to China, where they actually want our products. That's how Canada can make an impact. That's how Alberta can make an impact. That's where we can take our technologies. We can take all the great folks that are in the artificial intelligence area, we can take all the good folks that get spooned up by that.

Because what happens is that if we start changing, we don't want to diversify the economy for the sake of diversification. It's like that same person waiting for that next leap in technology. Let's use an example here. We're all at the horse-and-buggy stage, and we're all riding horses. The next best thing is the automobile, and for some reason, before we get there to get that first car, we go and shoot our own horse. Before we get there, we watch everyone else gallop past us. What does that do? Nothing. You don't do anything. You don't get to the end of the race. You do nothing.

You know, I was at a chamber of commerce business meeting, and it was really interesting. You have all these ingenuitive people. They have different businesses, small, medium, large. They are diverse. They're all over the place. They're doing a bunch of great things. Here we are. I'm standing in line talking to a gentleman who is about in his 30s. He says: "You know, I don't mean to be disrespectful, but aren't we just in a downturn because we're changing, and there's no real need for fossil fuels, there's no need for those energies?" I asked him: "Do you know any other jurisdictions in the world that have this much energy at their disposal and what their economic state is?" He said: "What do you mean? Aren't they all the same as Alberta?" He had no idea. This is a guy who is actually at a chamber of commerce. He had no idea that Texas and Oklahoma are flat out. We're the only jurisdiction right now with this much resources that has this recessed economy. The event horizon for us for people demanding and needing our energy exceeds out past 2040.

Again, coming back to that analogy of shooting our own horse that we're riding before we get there, we're all going to go there. Those companies are looking for those innovations. And we looked at ourselves as energy companies. It wasn't just oil and gas; it is energy companies. If you look at Shell, for example – and I've heard it from the members opposite, too. They are saying how good a job they are doing by putting solar panels in place. They are, but they're not doing it here. They're doing it in a different country, and they're doing it on their own. The research and development department over at Exxon Mobil has literally more scientists on their staff than anybody else in the world. They have GDPs that exceed most economies. These are the folks that are already putting the innovation of technologies together. They're working on it. They're working on the solution for the next thing.

We've got a lot of the climate change leadership that's running around. We talked about The Revenant movie a little while back. Of course, it takes place in that beautiful landscape out towards Banff. One thing that I remember from that movie: Leonardo DiCaprio, a fantastic actor, jumped and started tweeting that he was experiencing climate change first-hand, saw the impacts that were taking place. Well, lo and behold, it was this climate change thing called a chinook. A chinook. And do you know where that word came from? It wasn't from us; we didn't invent it. It was the native peoples who have been there for 10,000 years. So that 10,000th climatic event all came to one climactic point, being Leonardo DiCaprio who is saving the planet.

That's the problem. We have a bunch of half-truths out there. The problem is that we're doing that to ourselves again, and we're getting these 30-year-olds that don't know what the difference is. They actually think that what we do for a living is bad, that we're actually in the middle of a major, major disaster in our own backyard, but we won't use our own technology. Instead, the best way to save the planet is to buy that Starbucks coffee or buy something else, and it's the act of nonparticipation that's actually doing it. Holding a sign up and down and protesting that the sky is falling is not going to fix it. Using our technology, using our smarts, using what we can to help out others and to help ourselves in the appropriate way: that's the way we have the best impact.

Now, do I believe that we have an impact on climate change? Absolutely. I believe we can do things better. Now, let me give you an example of something that I did. When I put in my heating system for my house, I buried it really deep, about 15 feet. I ran a geothermal-type system in place. When we were building our house, I put as much insulation as I could. I spent extra money to put all the nice windows that we could in there. I put everything so that I had positive drainage. We changed the place and the location of the house so that it actually had cross-flow, so in the summertime you don't need an air conditioner. The passive solar that I did: we put that in place. The heating system that we have: well, I have a couple of wood stoves in there, a fireplace, and I have a boiler system. The boiler system only gets turned on half of the year. I did this 15 years before the carbon tax came in place, and I'm not the only one from the energy sector that did that. We were always looking for something efficient. We were doing the right things before someone was holding a gun to our heads yelling: the sky is falling. Heaven forbid that you disagree and you want to do something a little bit different than taxation.

Coming back to the Nobel peace prize winner with the economic model on taxing carbon: yeah; he won a Nobel peace prize. Fantastic. He did. In his model if you actually follow it, it includes that carbon pricing works, but you have to take away all the pre-existing levies and you have to have an order of magnitude. You can't have your own sole economy doing it, or the whole thing fails. The groups that followed that, including Justin Trudeau, that were saying that this was the best thing since sliced bread, ran the model inappropriately. They were taxing on both ends. They were not having the buy-in, the weight of actually those tied-in economies. You know what happened when that Nobel peace prize winner ran that type of scenario? It failed every time. What did we experience? A failure. You cannot tax yourself into changing the carbon footprint without having all of those other elements in place. Heck, we can't even decide in this room how we're going to run our economy. Can you imagine trying to get 10 or 12 other countries onboard with that?

Here's the reality. We've got lots of energy at our disposal. We have the technology that we've already been using for the last 15, 20 years. You look at the coal-fired plants. I heard somebody in here speaking – I can't remember if it was the Leader of the Opposition or not – declaring victory when they said that the climate had changed here because we've actually reduced all the carbon because we've already cut off those coal-fired plants. In actuality we just opened up the pipeline for it, and we still haven't converted the boilers. Again those half-truths. We're still operating on the same systems that we had, and those were very efficient, very efficient indeed.

Here's another story. There was a mechanical engineer. I'm on my way to an airport, and we're talking about school and he wanted to talk about universities and what we're doing with funding there. We've got this nice little gentleman. He's going to rent me a car. I'm talking to him on the way to the airport and asking him, "What do you do?" "I'm a mechanical engineer." "Where'd you graduate from?" "U of A." "Why are you renting cars? Are you between semesters?" "No. I can't find a job." "As a mechanical engineer you can't find a job?" "No." "Well, why do you think that is?" "I'm not sure. Like, the oil prices around the world dropped down." "Oh. Well, why isn't our product any good?" "Well, I don't know. It's just not as good. It costs too much to produce." "Well, no. That's not the case. It isn't because our product is costing more on the market. It's actually recessed." When we talked about pipeline capacity, he got it at that point.

By the time we made the transition from driving from the south side of Edmonton to the airport, he then understood, and he goes: "Who else knows about this? Who else knows that this carbon tax doesn't work? Who else knows that our economy is in this state?" I said: "All of us. All of us do. It just depends on which Twitter feed you're reading. It just depends on which page you look at." It was interesting.

I found as well that when we talk about all the scientists that are lining up on one side of the fence that are receiving all the funding – I happened to see a newscast that was taking place. It was an interview with the gentleman who started The Weather Network. He's diametrically opposed to what's being put out there about all the climate concerns and all the climate risk. Again, here's a man of science that doesn't have his side heard because the folks like DiCaprio get the media feed. There are tons and tons of other people out there that have different ideas and different ways of doing things. It isn't one size fits all. But if we're going to have the best order of magnitude, the best bang for the buck: Canada, 1.6 per cent of the carbon output versus China, who's got 25 per cent. If you look at India, again coming back to that point: I don't know; are they another 10 per cent? If you have 35 per cent, argumentatively, and we have 1.5 per cent, the biggest thing that we can do is shut down our economy? We can kill that horse before we're ready to get there. Or can we actually export our product, make a bang for the buck over there, and let those folks have the energy that they need?

Quite honestly, I would love to have an open debate, but the alarmist things have to stop. You know, I've heard silly things like when we had some visitors coming over here from the Solomon Islands, and one gentleman from the other side had said that we'd better give them snorkels before you go home because we're having such a climate risk. Well, as a pilot I know that we're sitting at 2,500 feet. Villeneuve Airport is 2,500 feet above sea level when I'm sitting on the tarmac. Do you realize how much of a climatic event we would have to have before we flooded and got sea water in our boots? These are the types of things we're hearing.

The member before was talking about his exposure when he was up north and he was dealing with all the flies, the black flies in Zama Lakes. Well, this is as close to the environment as you can get: black flies so thick, quote, unquote, you couldn't even see the man standing next to you. The logical part of me goes: I've been up in the bush; I've seen black flies; I've been there; it was never that bad. Maybe it was at night. I don't know. Maybe that was part of it. He didn't realize it was dark, didn't realize that the blackflies weren't the reason he couldn't see him; it was just at night.

The other gentleman, in his 30s, when I was talking about that line, again thought that our commodities were outpriced. He thought that our carbon output was way different than conventional oils. Well, in fact, because of the technologies of folks up north – they've been developing this over years – we're almost there. We're almost at the same amount as regular output would be.

The oil sands themselves, reading back through some of the old information from the settlers up there, the Clearwater River – I've actually worked up in those areas. The reason why it's called the Clearwater River is because back at a point in time that was the only place you could drink water from that was clear. We have the world's largest oil spill that took place. God did it, not us. We've been cleaning it up.

You look at the stunted vegetation and the stunted animals that are out there when you left that natural. The natives used the tar that was oozing from the banks to cover their canoes. Now, you look at the areas where they've actually used that product and restored it, and we've actually done something good with that. You've got buffalo herds roaming out there. You've got great restoration. I mean, that's what we're talking about.

I ran across recently Absolute Aviation, Absolute aircraft heaters. Here's a small incubator group that's taking place out at the Edmonton International Airport. They're reducing 60 per cent – 60 per cent – of the fuel it takes to heat up a jet engine. These are the types of innovations that are taking place on their own.

You've got Wayfinder. Wayfinder is another company that's producing frac sand out by Glenevis. The displacement of using all the frac sand that typically comes from Texas or Minnesota: these are things that are taking place.

The Lornel Group: well, they use technology. They use tons of software to map out all the information on where all of the utilities are at. They do that. They also came up with a little sister company called Aerium robotics. This Aerium robobird is what they're producing. They're doing all these really neat, innovative things. These are companies that are taking place because of the energy sector, because they worked for these companies, because those are the spinoffs, and they're always developing and advancing this technology. Again, we all want to save the environment.

Mobile Augers: there's a company that started something. It was around 60 years ago. They're the ones that actually do all the soils testing, testing the LELs. Those are innovations that are taking place around the world.

There's another company out in Acheson. They do more work overseas than they do here, and their whole job is to reclaim soils.

They're flashing off all the LELs. So those are the things that we can be doing.

Instead of spending like drunk farmers' wives on a trip to Vegas and running the economy down and running the credit card up and doing all those things – it just irks me. Honestly, we all want to do the best thing for our kids, but instead of polishing the brass knobs on the Titanic while we're heading towards an iceberg because we don't want to look out the pilot's window and we don't see that iceberg out there because we're not listening or we're not hearing about a different way – instead, we're just going to head headlong, drive this thing into the iceberg, sink our economy, and take everybody else that's left in Alberta with us. We've poisoned the well for so long that tons of investment have gone.

I heard about all the jobs we were going to talk about, and here's a really quick number. That dirty energy sector that we keep talking about: $92 billion, roughly, is what that thing is worth for our economy, just looking at some quick numbers. We have 360 some-odd million dollars for it. We're about 27 per cent. That's our economy. Some of the other members were talking about all of the great innovations we can do with AI and that we could do it with the technology and some of the film industries. I'm not refuting that; I think it's great. But when you're stuck comparing $45 million or a billion dollars to $92 billion, again, it's coming back to the idea of shooting that horse before you get there.

We can produce energy, the renewables. Wonderful. Flip up the windmill; turn on the solar thing. Do it on a winter's day when it's cloudy and there's no wind. The other side of it is that you've got tons of wind, but now you have no place to put your energy. So until you have a little nuke sitting there so that you can flip the switch on the nuclear power or you've got a coal-fired power plant or you've got hydroelectric that's sitting there or you've got a gas turbine – you need to have those items where you can flip the switch, and it's an integrated system.

Again, coming back to our TIER solutions, use the integrated systems. What we haven't figured out yet is how we store that energy, so whoever comes up with the best battery is going to win this race, how we can store the energy that we produce so it's available at that time. Again, in running these systems, they have to be integrated, and we want to get there.

The only way you get there is by the TIER program. That's the best footprint we have. If we called it the climate-leading challenge technology innovator and best superhero solution, well, maybe we wouldn't be arguing about it so much, but we called it TIER, just plain, old TIER. "Technology" is the first word in it, and it isn't as exciting as climate-challenging leader or ice-bucket challenge or whatever some of the other folks might come up with.

I think I've about run out my shot clock, and I think my conscience is clear. Obviously, I'm a big supporter of the TIER program. I would love to be able to see our provinces working together again; I would love to keep our country together. Heck, I'd even love it if we and all the members opposite could sit down and have a beverage one day and actually agree to something rather than getting too polarized.

Mr. Bilous: It's possible.

Mr. Getson: It's possible, and I appreciate that, sir.

Again, if we can utilize all the folks that are techies, put it together with our main driving economy, our industries, we're going to get there. Obviously, a lot of us have children, and we want to see the best for them. I don't want to see my kids exit our economy, go to a different province or a different country because we've spoiled the earth, because we've poisoned the ground, or because we've poisoned the well of our economy, from which everyone was drinking, because we were too short-sighted on ideology. By having a good, clear conscience and understanding how this process works, with a majority government on our side and a minority back there to be our conscience, I think this just might work.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I certainly appreciate rising in the House this evening to consider this bill that's before the House and respect the fact that this is a democratic institution where we all have a chance to have our voice heard and contribute in our ways to try to make this place better, not just this place where we are today but this society that we are the keepers of today and that we are borrowing from future generations.

With that in mind, I just want to talk about a few things that I find problematic with the switch to TIER. Number 1, for me, to be very frank, is that I think it actually heightens our reliance on a boom-bust economy rather than creating opportunities for us to support our top three industries today – of course, oil and gas, agriculture, and forestry – and actually continuing to diversify into other areas of renewables and other types of good, long-term, sustainable employment for our province. That's my number one. I feel like this pushes even more eggs into one basket, one that I think has caused a lot of anxiety for folks waiting for the next boom when we're in the midst of a bust. One of the things that I don't appreciate about TIER is that I think it will actually make us even more reliant on the one industry.

The second one is that I think it doesn't create any options for individual consumers; it's put all of the onus on industry. I think that giving individual consumers some power in determining what ways they want to engage in a carbon economy is something that I appreciate, individual choice. I appreciate individuals having the opportunity to be able to feel like they're making decisions, like the last speaker said that he made prior to incentives, that there are actually additional incentives for folks who are in a position to be able to exercise that choice. That's number 2.

Number 3, I'd say, is the fact that there is no time given in this bill to transportation. Transportation, we know, is the third-largest contributor to greenhouse gas emissions. By cancelling investment in transit, in GreenTRIP, and in other initiatives that could be funded with this rather than it being put into general revenue, I think we're again putting greater reliance on the one industry and taking away from other investment opportunities and other employment opportunities and also taking away other transit options from the society at large.

Number 4 is that I don't believe that this will create any jobs, and I'd be happy to be corrected if it will. In reading this, it doesn't seem like this is going to enhance economic diversification, certainly, and certainly I don't think it will create more opportunities in this sector of the economy. I'd be happy to be given evidence and information that shows otherwise, but it seems problematic to me.

Number 5 is that I have serious concerns about revenue from here being funnelled towards the energy war room. I think that's not a good focus for what is supposed to be using the price on pollution to address emissions and find ways to reduce them. I think that putting this money towards the war room would be counter to the value that having a price on pollution brings.

Number 6 is that I have concern that TIER, COSIA, and Alberta Innovates overlap and create redundancies. I know we spend a lot of time in this place talking about the importance of efficiency, talking about cutting red tape, so I am nervous that TIER, COSIA, and Alberta Innovates have overlapping roles and responsibilities and mandates.

Those are my six points. I'll just say them again quickly before I table an amendment, because I do have one that I think will help improve this and alleviate some of my concerns: one, lack of focus on diversification; two, not having any individual options for individual consumers; three, transportation; four, no new jobs; five, the energy war room; and six, creating more overlap and red tape and inefficiencies. Those are the main concerns I have there.

With that being said, I'd be happy to present the amendment that I have, with the requisite number of copies for the House, and I'll just keep one copy for myself.

The Chair: This will be known as amendment A1.
Please proceed.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I'm moving this on behalf of my colleague the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar. I move that the Technology Innovation and Emissions Reduction Implementation Act, 2019, be amended in section 4 by striking out clauses (b) and (c). If I could provide some rationale for that. Really, this amendment is about that TIER currently, as proposed, is all set to go into general revenues rather than a dedicated fund, and I think that this is problematic for a number of reasons.

Since there is a price on emissions that was introduced in Alberta, it has always been one hundred per cent reinvested in carbon reduction. This is the fund that was created previously. I think it was during Stelmach's time that there was a price on carbon, and all of that money was focused specifically on carbon reduction. By having it going into general revenues, I fear that it will go towards things like the energy war room and other things that don't actually achieve the mandate as has been mentioned in this House around reducing carbon emissions.

I think that this shouldn't be different. I think that with the fact that we have a price on carbon, it should be focused on the ways that we can support industry and support individuals and support our province in finding ways to reduce emissions and to indeed show that our fossil fuels and other energy forms in this province can indeed be the most environmentally sustainable long term and show that we are not taking our responsibility in this lightly.

I think the new system should not become a general slush fund. I think it's important that it be focused on the intent that was originally set in the original mandate. I think that when government says that they want to focus on innovation, I believe that, and one of the ways they could focus on innovation is by having this fund dedicated away from general revenue towards actual emissions reduction.

Also, the previous plan was for $1.4 billion over seven years, and the new plan is for $800 million over four, so both average about $200 million a year annually, certainly enough money that we could focus it towards this dedicated area.

The Chair: Hon. members, could you just keep the volume down a little bit so that the member can be heard. Thank you.
Please proceed.

Ms Hoffman: Also, the plan, I think, could have significant gains in innovation. Certainly, previous plans were to reduce 76 megatonnes. Of course, we appreciate that if there's any desire to reduce megatonnes, I think that that is a step in the right direction, but having this focused towards general revenue as opposed to a dedicated fund, where that is its sole mandate, I think is problematic and doesn't speak to the importance and significance which we are dealing with, the very real and pressing impacts of climate change.

With that, Madam Chair, I am happy to hear feedback from other colleagues about this proposed amendment. I think it's reasonable, and I think it's probably something that – other members, when in opposition, would have been happy to see dedicated funds focused towards dedicated clauses rather than to general revenues. That's simply what I'm asking for today.

Thank you very much, Madam Chair.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, I'm happy to respond on behalf of the government and as the sponsor of Bill 19 to some of the comments by the hon. member. There's lots to unpack there, and fortunately we've got lots of time to unpack, so we'll spend some time on that. First, Madam Chair, I'd like to just talk a little bit about what the hon. member referred to as far as emission targets and/or projections, the NDP's plan on GHG emission reductions compared to TIER. It always surprises me how the NDP's numbers change on certain issues throughout the day. Even watching it today in question period, they can't keep straight as they exaggerate the cost of the job-creation tax cut.

Ms Hoffman: It's $4.7 billion.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Four point seven is the one that the hon. member is heckling at the moment. I've heard her today say 4.6, 4.8. The reality is that they're off by $4 billion, but what's $4 billion amongst friends, particularly when you're the former Deputy Premier of a government that brought in the largest deficits and debts in the history of the province? They're wrong about that, as has been articulated many times. I'm happy to talk about that in more detail later. My point is that you can't trust the NDP numbers. You saw it there again just a few moments ago.

The reality is that when it came to the large-emitter program that the NDP had, they were projecting about a 32-megatonne reduction in the same period of time that our TIER program is projecting a 57-megatonne reduction. She said 76. Her own critic and the former minister who was in charge of the program has already said in the House, on this very bill, just a few days ago, totally opposite numbers. But mistakes happen, kind of like the NDP's carbon tax. But I digress on that for the moment. I'm sure I will get back to it shortly.

The hon. member wanted to talk about a slush fund. Her concern seems to be around the fact that this legislation will allow some of the money that comes from TIER to go into general revenue. She is, in fact, correct about that. That's the primary purpose of the bill. That comes down to the great difference between the NDP and the current government. The NDP, Madam Chair, you will be shocked to know – actually, you probably would not be shocked to know; you've been in this Chamber long enough that you already do know it – started out saying that their carbon tax would not ever go to general revenue. Then we found out in their budgets, as time went on, that it actually was going to general revenue despite the fact that their legislation said that it would not. Shockingly enough, even the stuff that they kept within the fund that we're talking about right now they were using for general revenue projects. They were using it throughout the entire government to try to meet financial objectives of their government. Sadly, we know that they didn't meet any reasonable financial objectives. They ended up carrying this government to the largest debt in the history of this province, overseeing devastating job loss and significant economic impact.

Albertans sent us here to fix the NDP mess, if you would, and certainly that was a slush fund. The difference for our approach, Madam Chair, is that we told Albertans that we were going to take a portion of the money associated with the large-emitter side and we are going to spend it on technology and GHG emission reductions and helping with pollution issues inside the province. Then we were going to take another portion of it, and we were going to put it in two issues: one, to help with deficit reduction, to be able to clean up the mess the NDP created – we told Albertans that – and second, to fund the war room. Both issues, which the hon. member referred to, we were transparent about.

We're taking the time to legislate to make sure it's clear to Albertans what we're doing because we want to be transparent with Albertans going forward. We have committed to a formula on how that will work. We committed inside our platform very clearly that the first $100 million for TIER would go to technology for emission reductions, and 50 cents of every dollar thereafter would also go to technology investment for emission reductions. The other 50 per cent would go to deficit reductions plus a $30 million investment – actually, I think it was $20 million; I can flip to the page in a minute – in the war room.

That's the choice that Albertans had in the last election, when they fired that hon. member's party from government and most of her colleagues, who had come to this place and supported the carbon tax approach while hiding from Albertans actually where the money was going. We came here, gave Albertans a choice. They could have the NDP's carbon tax on fuel: no rebates for most people in Alberta and investment inside NDP pet projects, very little investment inside the environment, sadly, most of it inside infrastructure, investing in light bulbs. I see one hon. member pointing out about investing in light bulbs.

You know what, Madam Chair? Shockingly enough, the hon. member supported – some of the new members here may not know this – and worked really hard to defend, as the Deputy Premier at the time, hiring Ontario companies to install light bulbs in people's homes and shower heads that often did not even work for the water pressure, particularly in rural Alberta, as I mentioned before. They forget about rural Alberta all the time, though. It's unfortunate.

But that's where they spent the money. In addition, they also spent it on different infrastructure projects, programs throughout government that had nothing to do with emission reductions, all throughout the government. Every minister of our current government has had to go through and unravel the mess that the previous government did using climate change money for things that had nothing to do with emission reductions.

The point, though, is this. Albertans had a choice. They knew, despite the fact that the NDP did not tell them about their carbon tax. As I said, Madam Chair, when we're outside the Chamber, we use different words for what that really means, but we certainly can't here. They did not tell them about it, though. They told Albertans that they would never put it in general revenue, and they did. They called Albertans Chicken Little for expressing concerns about it. We'll talk about sewer rats maybe at a later time. But the point is this. Albertans, by the time they got to the 2019 election, knew what the NDP's carbon tax was. They also knew what the UCP was proposing because we spelt it out clearly in black and white inside our platform, and Albertans chose in record numbers to fire the NDP and to go with our approach when it came to this important piece of legislation.

We know that the NDP is frustrated that Albertans fired them, and I sympathize with them. It's probably hard to be fired, particularly to have the legacy of being the only one-term government in the history of the province and devastating their party for probably at least a couple of lifetimes inside the rural portion of the province with the brutal policies that they imposed on the people that I represent. But they can't argue with the fact that democracy made a decision, and that's what we've brought here. This hon. member is now attempting to stop what was a clear platform promise that was made to Albertans, that they voted for, Madam Chair. It is shocking. I don't even know how they could have come to this conclusion.

Now, it does go into a dedicated fund. That also may be where the hon. member is confused, maybe not well briefed on the issue or hasn't taken time to read the bill. I know she's moving the motion on behalf of another member so maybe that member did not explain ...

Mr. Bilous: You'd be out of order.

Mr. Jason Nixon: What was that? Sorry?

Mr. Bilous: It'd be out of order.

The Chair: Hon. member, through the chair.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Thank you.

They moved the motion on behalf of another member, so she may not be aware, but it does go into a fund associated with technology and investing in the TIER program. In fact, the bill also renames the fund that it goes into. Maybe the hon. member should take some time this evening to do that.

Further to that, I think that really what the hon. member should do as the former Deputy Premier of the province, the former Health minister of the province is take some time actually to still reflect on how her party has ended up over there. They haven't done that, Madam Chair. It's important to this piece of legislation because it's at the core of why the NDP was fired by Albertans, why Albertans lined up in record numbers to fire them.

Madam Chair, you know – I know; I'll go with what I know. I was getting calls from constituents who were travelling from as far away as the United States just to get home to vote to fire the NDP because of their carbon tax and other policies they brought in. When you would tell them on the phone, "Hey, you can vote in advance polls; there's this thing you can do to vote when you're away, absentee ballot," they'd say, "No; I've just got to get home and make sure my ballot is counted on the night because I want to be part of firing them." That's because of the proposals like she's proposing with this amendment, to try to go back to the NDP's failed carbon tax, already rejected by the people of Alberta. It certainly will be rejected by us. We're proud to have gotten rid of the NDP's carbon tax. We're proud to be clear with the people of Alberta on how we'll spend the money.

To her last point, which is in regard to not wanting to spend money on the energy war room, or the Canadian Energy Centre, that also was a platform promise. Yes, this bill makes sure that money can be used to be able to fund the Canadian Energy Centre and protect our largest industry, Madam Chair. This hon. member trying to move amendments to stop that from happening continues the NDP's behaviour of supporting people that will attack our largest industry. That hon. member was Deputy Premier to a Premier who appointed people, like Tzaporah Berman, to oil sands panels who have dedicated and sworn to be able to destroy our largest industry, who have protested and blocked pipelines that we needed to get our products to work, and have done more to cause unemployment in this province than anybody else.

The members smile because that's their ally. Remember, they are part of a federal – I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood smiling away, smiling away, excited about the fact that she supports a federal party and a provincial party that are antipipeline, that have people that are dedicated to the Leap Manifesto, which is dedicated to making sure that our energy products cannot be produced.

An Hon. Member: She's nodding as well.

Mr. Jason Nixon: And she's nodding about it. She's dedicated. She's excited about it. That's fine. At least her position is there. Her position is known.

But then to move an amendment on the very – and the member's argument is this: it's to prevent the money from going to the energy war room. She wants to move this amendment to prevent money from going to the energy war room to be able to defend our energy industry.

As you can see, the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood continues to smile excitedly about the issue. That's their goal. At the end of the day, they've never been able to hide it. When their leader admitted in this last federal election that she still voted for her federal leader despite the fact that he's on the record as trying to shut the oil sands, trying to stop all pipelines, and trying to make sure that our people remain out of work across this entire province and cannot survive with the largest industry, they sit inside this Legislature and smile about that support.

Well, Madam Chair, we reject their amendment because we have no problem with defending this province. We have no problem with defending our largest industry. Yes, we are not going to pass an amendment that would stop us from being able to finance the energy war room, because we're proud of our commitment to do that, because we're proud of our largest industry and, most importantly, we're proud of the people that work in it each and every day.

Unfortunately, it's unfortunate, which I said twice because it's very unfortunate, three times, that this party across from me is still dedicating their existence to trying to shut down the largest industry, the lifeblood of this province. Do you know what that means at the end of the day? They're standing with people like Justin Trudeau. They're standing with people like their federal leader. They're not standing with the men and women that built the industry, that built this province, and that continue to depend on it for their livelihoods. Sadly, they're not standing with the rest of the country, who also depends on that industry for their livelihoods.

Again, out of all the things that the deputy leader of the NDP just said, the most shocking is the fact that they would come to this Chamber and try to stop the energy war room from being funded. Their approach continues to be to back up Justin Trudeau, support Justin Trudeau's anti oil and gas positions, support their federal leader, their federal NDP leader, the same party, by the way, Madam Chair. The same party, right? There's no secret that I voted for the Conservative Party of Canada and supported them in the last election – I was very proud of that – but we're not the same party as the Conservative Party of Canada, as you know. They're the same party, run by the same leader, a leader who is on the record even in the last few weeks, who has sworn to stop pipelines and energy production. Well, that's why we need a war room. That's why we need a Canadian Energy Centre, to stand up to their leader and others like them.

Madam Chair, have you ever read the Leap Manifesto? You would be shocked to read the NDP's Leap Manifesto. You would be shocked. What it has to do with this amendment is that they are trying to stop us from defending our energy industry from things like the Leap Manifesto. It is so disappointing.

I will close with this. My biggest point is to make it clear to our colleagues that there's no way we're going to support – and I certainly hope that they support me in that statement – the NDP's continued attack on our energy industry and the people that work in it. We'll be proud to vote this amendment down.

Again to the NDP: take some time. And to the Opposition House Leader: you, too, take some time, take some time to reflect.

Through the chair to you: take some time to reflect on why you got fired, because if you keep coming back here and doing the same thing, you are never ever going to leave that side of the aisle.

The Chair: Any other speakers to amendment A1?

[Motion on amendment A1 lost]

The Chair: Are there any other speakers to the bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Madam Chair. I appreciate the opportunity to take the time to speak to Bill 19, the Technology Innovation and Emissions Reduction Implementation Act, 2019, which would introduce the new TIER policy, the marquee climate change policy being brought forward by the UCP government. I've had the opportunity to sit down and take a bit of a look at the legislation and to consider it a bit.

I came across an excellent piece written by everyone's favourite energy economist to quote when he agrees with you and ignore when he doesn't, Dr. Andrew Leach. Now, he recently wrote an opinion article for the CBC in which he undertook an analysis of the new TIER legislation. I have a great deal of respect for Dr. Leach, as apparently do many members in this Chamber, again perhaps on a selective basis. But let's go with the general premise that we all recognize that he is a man who has devoted a good deal of time to energy and the economy and the issue of climate change and has advised both Conservative and NDP governments on the creation of such policy, which is something that's apparently admired by the government, as we saw with the head of their MacKinnon panel, who, they are very happy to tout, was an NDP Finance minister but also consulted for the UCP. So we can assume that if we don't always agree with Dr. Leach on all of his thoughts, we at least all recognize that he is a voice of experience.

In his article he actually has a fair amount of praise, with some caveats, for this government on the TIER policy. In fact, if I may quote him, he says, "This is serious policy, not the complete abdication of action on climate change many will expect from [the Premier's] government." I'm not sure that that would be called damning with faint praise. That's more than faint.

He makes some observations about the bill, and he sort of talks in general about the concept of output-based pricing, which is something that we talked about in this House and, indeed, we have heard members in this House disparage when it came to consumer pricing and the carbon levy. Indeed, I've heard members talk about: well, how can you charge and then give money back and then say that it's going to do anything? Well, that's the basis of output-based pricing, and that is part of what's present here in TIER. The way Dr. Leach chooses to look at it, he says: "Think of these policies as the government sending companies a bill for their carbon emissions and writing giant novelty cheques to subsidize output." Fair enough. That was the same policy that our government had implemented in dealing with industry.

He observes that, of course, there are two major sectors in Alberta that are affected by TIER, those being electricity and oil and gas, and when it comes to electricity, he actually speaks fairly highly of the approach from TIER. He notes, of course, that electricity is the second-largest source of emissions in Alberta, after oil and gas, and notes that Alberta's electricity emissions are, in fact, more than half of the total emissions for the entire electricity sector in Canada. So the types of policies that we bring in on this indeed matter a great deal.

But what he observes is that the TIER plan put forward by the Minister of Environment and Parks, in fact, "levels the playing field across all sources of power." Basically, any emissions from any source are going to be charged $30 per tonne, and all the generators, regardless of the source or the means by which they generate, are going to receive the output-based credits at the same rate. He notes that, in fact, that is the formula that was used by our government in our policy. That's excellent. I appreciate that the government, when they see a good thing, in some instances apparently is willing to continue with it.

Dr. Leach praises that choice. In fact, he even gives some praise, that I think the government would especially appreciate, in that if he had to choose between the Premier's and the government's TIER and Mr. Trudeau's carbon price on power, he prefers the Premier's and, I suppose, by extension, then, ours, on which this is modelled. The reason he gives for that: he says that the federal approach actually gives more credits back on coal than they do on gas, and they provide absolutely nothing to new or existing renewable power sources. So the criticism Dr. Leach has of the federal program is that it gives too high a subsidy back to the coal industry, giving less to gas and absolutely nothing to renewable sources. In essence, then, while you have higher emission plants paying more in a carbon price but are giving larger subsidies to coal, then that reduces the effectiveness of the policy. He observed, somewhat ironically: well, who would have thought that the Premier's plan would be worse for coal plants than Mr. Trudeau's, the Prime Minister's? But that is, in fact, the case. This government, the UCP, is being tough on coal plants in the province of Alberta.

Dr. Leach observes that under this plan, under TIER, "the cost advantage for low-emissions generators in the Alberta market remains exactly the same as if there were a carbon tax on electricity," so it balances out.

Now, while he has that praise for the government on how they've handled the electricity file, he says that he's somewhat less thrilled with how TIER approaches the question of the oil sands and other industrial emissions within the province of Alberta because it, in fact, abandons what works so well about the electricity section. Again, in the electricity section we have all output being treated equally, the same subsidies going back to everybody but, indeed, weighting it heavier for people that are emitting more. For example, coal is paying more because it's creating more emissions. Gas is paying less. Renewable energy, assuming it's completely carbon neutral, is paying none. But when it comes to the oil sands, for some reason the government has chosen to flip and invert that. Basically, for everything outside of the electricity sector, we have emitters receiving more emissions credits if they have higher historic emission intensities. Dr. Leach observed, "It rewards exactly what we want to avoid," which is puzzling, Madam Chair.

The government seems to understand this very well when it comes to the electrical sector, but they flip it on its head when it comes to the oil sands and other sources of emissions. A carbon price is supposed to reward improvement. That's what want to see. We want to see things get better. But we also want to see innovation. Certainly, that's something we've heard the government members and the minister toss around quite a bit and talk about, the investments in innovation. Indeed, it seems that through TIER they are trying to cover for some of the fact that they have cut and removed so many other incentives and opportunities for innovation within the province, but we'll set that aside for the time being.

Dr. Leach observes that for oil sands in particular, where we're expecting we are going to continue to see production growth, which, despite the claims of the Minister of Environment and Parks, I have never been on the record opposing – where that production growth is still expected, companies need to see value from deploying the best technology. Under the previous system, under the system that our government had brought in, Dr. Leach says, "The full . . . carbon price would have factored into the financial value of innovation in new facilities as well as for improvements in existing facilities."

But under TIER that emissions-reducing innovation becomes less advantageous because the better performing you are with your facility, if you build that new facility and you build it in an innovative way so you actually reduce the amount of emissions and have less emissions credits every year for as long as the policy remains in place – if you do better, you will get less from the government. We're paying more to people that create more emissions and less to people that create less. To quote Dr. Leach: "Thanks for lowering your emissions. Now you get smaller novelty cheques than your competitors as part of our climate change program. The signal is backwards." That seems troubling to me, Madam Chair.

I appreciate that this government has done their homework. They looked at what was in place, they looked at some of the steps that our government has taken, they have made some adjustments, and they've got it pretty much right, it sounds like, on the electricity sector. But I do not understand why they are choosing to ignore what they seem to understand there when it comes to the oil sands and other sources of industrial emissions within the province of Alberta. The concern that Dr. Leach brings forward, which I kind of share, is that this change from the policy which our government had in place in the way that credits were being provided is that we're going to see a transfer of hundreds of millions of dollars per year which benefits primarily the highest emitting facilities in the province and then a significant reduction in the value of producing innovative and emissions-reducing technology.

Now, from what I've heard from the minister and from other members of this government, the entire purpose of TIER is to incent, to encourage the growth of innovation and technology. Indeed, that has been the claim, that that is, in fact, what's going to drive, in their view, a larger emissions reduction than our government would have achieved. We've had some discussion around those numbers, and I'm not going to go back into them here. But if we take them at their word, it seems problematic that we are talking, in the words of Dr. Leach, about hundreds of millions of dollars per year going to higher emitting facilities, therefore discouraging investment in technology which is going to lower emissions.

I appreciated some of the words earlier from the Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland. He talked quite a bit about the work that industry has done to create innovation, and indeed I salute and respect that. But the whole intent of legislation like TIER is to reward the people who are already doing it and encourage those who aren't to get onboard to make this a broader spectrum initiative. I appreciate that the government has tried to find a way to do that with some of the smaller emitters in that they're able to group together to maybe then take advantage of some of these opportunities so that they can get some of those emissions credits and themselves then perhaps find ways to develop new innovation. That's fantastic. That's a great thought. Again, standing this on its head, where they're giving more money if you emit more and less if you emit less, seems to be an impractical way to encourage people to create more innovation and lower their emissions.

One of the other things that Dr. Leach brings up is an overall concern just in the message that is sent by employing a policy like this. Now, we've heard from members, and indeed I recognize that they ran very clearly on their plan to repeal the consumer carbon tax in the province of Alberta. It was very clear that they got a majority and had the mandate to do that, so they have done so. They convinced Albertans that a better way to approach this is to put the burden solely on the heaviest emitters and on industrial sources.

What Dr. Leach raises is the fact that if you take that provincial plan and you expand that to a national plan, then all of a sudden Alberta would be expected to bear the brunt of emissions across Canada because we have, as he notes, 314 industrial facilities in Canada that meet the Alberta definition of a large industrial emitter, 114 of which are in Alberta, and of the 253 megatonnes of emissions from those facilities, more than half, 142 megatonnes, are from Alberta facilities. So if we take the approach that we're implementing here or that this government is proposing to implement through this legislation and if that were to be the policy that was adopted by the federal government across Canada, Alberta would be expected to deal with about half of the emissions reductions for the entire nation.

Obviously, we don't support that. Obviously, we're not fans of that. Obviously, we appreciate the fact that, as Dr. Leach notes, people who burn gas in their car on the 401 in Toronto are paying for their share of emissions alongside the oil sands in Alberta in that we are sharing that burden more broadly across the country, much in the same way as we as Albertans indeed do share some of our wealth through the taxes that are collected by the federal government and redistributed by the equalization program.

Those are my main concerns with this bill: the way that it approaches the oil sands and indeed deincentivizes innovation, and the fact that I think this sends the wrong message as to how we need to approach this on the larger scale and as we continue to work with the federal government on how we will be folded into and work under the federal climate change plan and carbon levy. It's sending a bit of a wrong message on how we would like to see that play out.

With that, Madam Chair, I think those are all my thoughts at this time. Thank you.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to the bill?

Seeing none, shall I call the question?

Hon. Members: Question.

[The remaining clauses of Bill 19 agreed to]

[Title and preamble agreed to]

The Chair: Shall the bill be reported? Are you agreed?

Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chair: Any opposed? Carried.

The hon. Government House Leader.

11:20

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. I move that we rise and report Bill 19, first of all, and progress on Bill 20.

[Motion carried]

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Mr. Getson: Madam Speaker, the Committee of the Whole has had under consideration certain bills. The committee reports the following bill: Bill 19. The committee reports progress on the following bill: Bill 20. I wish to table copies of all amendments considered by the Committee of the Whole on this date for the official records of the Assembly.

The Deputy Speaker: Does the Assembly concur in the report? All those in favour, please say aye.

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Deputy Speaker: All those opposed, please say no. So carried.

The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you to all hon. members for another hard day of work. I'm just trying to catch the calendar here. I think tomorrow is the 7th, so I will adjourn the House until tomorrow, November 7, at 1:30 p.m.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, pursuant to Standing Order 3(1.1) the Assembly stands adjourned until tomorrow afternoon at 1:30. At 8 o'clock tomorrow morning the Standing Committee on Resource Stewardship will consider estimates for the Ministry of Municipal Affairs in the Parkland Room, and at 8:30 tomorrow morning the Standing Committee on Alberta's Economic Future will consider the estimates for the Ministry of Executive Council in the Rocky Mountain Room.

The House is now adjourned.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 11:23 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Thursday, November 7, 2019

Prayers

The Speaker: Hon. members, the prayer. Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and her government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideas but, laying aside all private interests and prejudice, keep in mind their responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all. Amen.

Please be seated.

Introduction of Visitors

The Speaker: Hon. members, I am honoured to have met with this morning and welcome to Alberta and to the Legislative Chamber this afternoon Mr. Chung, the consul general of the Republic of Korea. Mr. Chung is accompanied by the deputy consul general, Yongwook Na, consul general of Korea in Vancouver, and Ms Hester Kim, executive assistant to the consul general. Welcome to Alberta. Thank you so much for joining us.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Hon. members, we have three school groups joining us this afternoon. Please rise as I call your schools: from Calgary-Klein, grade 6 students from Colonel Irvine school; from West Yellowhead, grade 6 students from Niton Central school; from Edmonton-City Centre, welcome to the specialized professional services. Thank you, all students, for joining us.

Hon. members, it's my absolute pleasure today to introduce to the Legislative Assembly perhaps the very best thing coming out of Livingstone-Macleod, the hon. member's wife, Darleen Reid. If you'd please rise and receive – we all know it was true; I was just saying it.

Also, in observance today is a very distinguished group, and it's my absolute honour and pleasure to introduce them to the Chamber. There are a number of indigenous veterans and indigenous leaders who are here in observance of indigenous veterans' day, which actually takes place tomorrow, November 8, but they were here today for a ceremony. If you could all please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly. [Standing ovation]

Hon. members, guests this afternoon of the Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo are Cheryl Robb with Syncrude and Melanie and Lloyd Antoine, Fort McMurray residents and business owners.

Also, guests of the Member for Lesser Slave Lake are Herb Lehr, president of the Métis Settlements General Council, and Silas Yellowknee, Chief of Bigstone Cree Nation.

Lastly, guests of the hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung, welcome members of the wildland firefighter rappel program, also known as rap. Please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly. [Standing ovation]

Ministerial Statements

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Indigenous Relations.

National Aboriginal Veterans Day

Mr. Wilson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Tomorrow, November 8, is National Aboriginal Veterans Day, recognizing indigenous veterans from the First and Second World Wars, the Korean War, and the Canadian Armed Forces efforts. While exact numbers are difficult to determine, approximately 12,000 First Nations and Métis soldiers served Canada with at least 500 losing their lives during major conflicts in the 20th century.

Today I'd like to honour indigenous veterans for overcoming challenges, for contributing their skills, and for sacrificing their lives for our country. Many travelled far from home to enlist and left their families to afford us peace, freedom, and all the rights and privileges of a democracy. These veterans contributed valuable skills, often working as successful sniper and reconnaissance scouts, who secretly gathered information on the enemy. Others created and interpreted radio code messages in indigenous languages to evade the enemy. Many of these veterans are from Alberta and deserve our recognition.

In World War I Henry Louis Norwest from Fort Saskatchewan had a divisional sniping record of 115 fatal shots, earning him the military medal and bar. Also during World War I Alex Decoteau, who was Canada's and Edmonton's first indigenous police officer, used his skills as an Olympian to serve as a communications trench runner.

Sadly, after their courageous efforts, all that many veterans were left with were memories of fighting amidst a land of rubble, smoke, burnt trees, and bloody casualties. Many of these veterans died. Others suffered from trauma and injuries only to continue to face discrimination here at home. They fought with courage, skill, and a deep commitment to our country, and they deserve our gratitude for selflessly sacrificing their lives and well-being for our freedom. On behalf of our government, thank you for all you've done for Canada.

Lest we forget.

The Speaker: Lest we forget, indeed.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs will respond on behalf of the Official Opposition.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today we honour National Aboriginal Veterans Day on November 8 and Remembrance Day on November 11. As Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition to the Canadian Armed Forces I am honoured to stand here today and honour those who have dedicated their lives to the service of Canada. Indigenous people have always played an important role in the Canadian military. Often their determination started well before deployment, travelling from remote communities, learning new languages, and overcoming discrimination and other challenges in order to enlist.

In the First World War over 4,000 indigenous people served in uniform. In the Second World War over 3,000 indigenous people served in uniform. Indigenous soldiers served bravely, and many serve as proud examples to the generations that have come since. Over 50 decorations were awarded to indigenous soldiers for bravery during World War I, soldiers like Henry Louis Norwest, a Métis marksman born in Fort Saskatchewan. He held a divisional sniping record of 115 fatal shots and was awarded the military medal and bar for his courage under fire. Sadly, Henry was killed three months before the end of the war. His sacrifice is like so many soldiers who were prepared to give their life for our freedom.

During World War II many indigenous soldiers shared their own language to support the war effort as code talkers. Charles Checker Thompkins from Alberta translated sensitive radio messages into Cree so they could not be understood if they were intercepted by the enemy. Indigenous families also contributed to the war effort on the home front. They donated large amounts of money, clothing, and food to worthy causes and also granted the use of portions of their reserve lands to allow for the construction of new airports, rifle ranges, and defence installations.

In my previous role I was able to host a ceremony to honour Passchendaele, and I was able to meet the family of Private Alex Decoteau, Canada and Edmonton's first indigenous police officer. His great, great niece wrote a book about his life, and that is available from our very own Legislature Library. To hear personal stories of this incredible athlete is so important and a great example of how we need to continue to honour our veterans and pass their stories on to the next generation.

I've spent time working with the Aboriginal Veterans Society of Alberta and The Memory Project. Both of these organizations do important work to connect today's youth with the history and impact of our indigenous veterans. I want everyone here to know that they can reach out to these organizations. Please let schools in your constituencies know that these organizations can help co-ordinate visits from veterans to come and share their stories with our little ones. On behalf of my colleagues and Albertans, thank you to our veterans and their families for your sacrifice.

Lest we forget.

Members' Statements

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-South is rising.

Premier's Travel Expenses

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Premier has a perfectly usable vehicle parked outside this building along with a driver, all provided to him at taxpayers' expense. He's also been seen driving a suspiciously clean blue Dodge pickup although we don't know who paid for that, but neither of these vehicles is fancy enough for this Premier.

After flipping some pancakes at Stampede, the Premier and his buddies and his buddies' wives whistled up a private plane to take them all to Saskatoon. I'm sure this really made the Premier feel like the big man on campus, and then he stuck Alberta taxpayers with the big bill. That's right, Mr. Speaker. Every Albertan is paying more income tax, more in property tax, more in school fees, more for their insurance, more to register their mortgage or their car while this Premier is blowing up Alberta's budget with his $4.7 billion corporate handout, then he went in front of business leaders and said: we're broke; we have to make hard choices.

Mr. Speaker, it's this Premier's judgement that's broke. He's forcing hard choices on Alberta seniors, Albertans with disabilities, and Albertans with kids, but when he's partying with his pals and their wives, he chooses a private party plane over the car these Albertans are already paying for. We've seen this movie before, when an arrogant and ambitious Conservative Premier doesn't want to spend any time on the highway with taxpayers. Albertans have zero patience for this kind of free-spending entitlement.

Premier Redford's love of private plane rides brought down her government. The Premier may read a lot of history, but he sure hasn't learned anything from it. He even said that he would do it again. It's time for this Premier to get his head out of the clouds. He must apologize to Albertans and pay for his own private plane ride.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville has a statement.

Remembrance Day

Ms Armstrong-Homeniuk: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's an honour to rise in the House to acknowledge Remembrance Day, a day to honour the memory of millions of Canadians who have served as part of our military and for those who have made the ultimate sacrifice.

Our Canadian troops have bravely served in the First and Second World Wars, the Korean War, Afghanistan, and many other international military and peacekeeping operations and are well regarded for their bravery and defence of our freedom.

Our nation may not be the most populous in the world, but our forces have had a major impact on the international stage. Normandy, Vimy Ridge, Dieppe, and Juno Beach are amongst many of the momentous battles that our Canadian soldiers played a vital role in.

The Canada we live in today is because of their efforts, and for that we thank them. For many, war is something only observed second hand, far removed from our everyday lives. We must take time and remember those that paid the ultimate price for our freedom and also acknowledge all of those that have served and continue to serve our country.

I would like to acknowledge the service of my grandfather, Walter St. George Armstrong, my father Jack Armstrong, and my family good friend, Kris, and many others who through their sacrifice helped make Canada and the way we live today possible. Our dedicated military families also sacrifice alongside our soldiers throughout the deployment, the moves, and the family separation.

May we honour their memory and teach the next generation and the generations to follow the high price that was paid so that we can live free. May we continue to wear our poppies as a symbol of remembrance. May we also stand alongside our veterans not only on the battlefields but as they return home. Much has changed in our world over the past 100 years, but the values of freedom, democracy and justice live on. May I sincerely offer my solemn thanks and eternal gratitude.

Lest we forget.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Fish Creek.

National Senior Safety Week

Mr. Gotfried: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As MLA for Calgary-Fish Creek I'm proud of our active agers, the people that truly built this province, and it is therefore my privilege to address the issue of senior safety.

Every November from the 6th to the 12th we recognize National Senior Safety Week. Throughout this week awareness campaigns urge us to pay special attention to helping mature Canadians stay healthy, active, independent, and safe. In my own family I have been through and continue to be involved in building ramps, installing hand rails, modifying bathing facilities, and doing all possible to minimize the risk of injury. I've also had the privilege of cohosting numerous seniors resource fairs at the local Legion, connecting public and private service providers with our growing population of aging baby boomers, and, Mr. Speaker, I intend to continue to do so.

This year the Canada Safety Council is highlighting the most common cause of injury-related hospitalization among seniors. Falls and related injuries represent a disproportionate number of potentially life-changing and critical-injury incidents in our seniors population. Among seniors, falls made up a worrisome 81 per cent of all serious-injury hospitalization in 2017-2018. This year let's attack this worrisome statistic by encouraging seniors and those caring for them to not only address fall prevention tips to help them to live safer lives but to do risk assessments along every step of their daily lives. Some preventative measures include encouraging regular physical and mobility-focused activities, providing stability and strength and thereby reducing the chances of a fall, and investment in nonslip footwear and walking aids.

Mr. Speaker, our honoured seniors represent a growing proportion of Canadians, accounting for some 35 per cent of the current population. By 2035 over 1 million seniors will call Alberta home. I would therefore encourage all of my colleagues to make time during this week to visit seniors in their community, to learn about the safety challenges facing them, and to take time to learn and share some practical tips that clearly demonstrate the much-deserved care and respect . . .

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Since the UCP government released their plan for Budget 2019, my office has seen a significant increase in e-mails and phone calls from folks who are worried about how this bait-and-switch budget will impact them. We have heard from single parents worried about rising school fees, folks with disabilities on AISH, and high school students who are worried that postsecondary might just get too expensive. The UCP campaigned on getting Alberta back to work, yet our province has lost over 27,000 jobs since they took office. They insisted on giving $4.7 billion away to big corporations and that it would increase investment in Alberta, but last week EnCana took their $55 million gift, packed up, and left. They told us that we just need to tighten our belts and to put a few things on pause. Now they are slashing the many important programs that help our most vulnerable populations live with dignity.

There are a lot of people out there who are worried about a whole range of different issues in this budget, but, Mr. Speaker, I can tell you the one thing that they all have in common: they are confused about how this budget is supposed to help make their life more affordable. They're hearing things like "making life better" and "smarter public services," but now they're going to have to pay more in taxes for fewer services.

Given that this government has seen fit to spend $10 million to create an associate ministry of red tape while cutting public services, scrapping social programs, and making it more difficult for our kids to get an education, I think it's high time the UCP government starts cutting through their own red tape. They need to clearly explain the true costs that Albertans will pay for their reckless and irresponsible budget.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo.

Syncrude Partnerships with Indigenous Businesses

Mr. Yao: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The oil sands are a major driver for our local, provincial, and national economies. What people don't realize, though, is that the oil sands have also benefited our indigenous Canadians. Today in the gallery we have Cheryl Robb from Syncrude and Melanie and Lloyd Antoine, owners of Antoine's Pump and Equipment Maintenance. Very early on, Syncrude worked with indigenous-owned companies as over the last 25 years Syncrude has spent over $3.5 billion contracting with indigenous-owned companies. In 2018 alone Syncrude spent $518 million in indigenous content contracts, which represented 14 per cent of Syncrude's total annual procurement.

Because of that partnership, there is prosperity, prosperity for these local indigenous companies and their communities. Lloyd and Melanie Antoine support our community. Specifically, Lloyd and Melanie support Girls Incorporated of Northern Alberta, they support the Centre of Hope, and they support Keyano College, which enriches our community. They take their hard-earned dollars from oil and gas development and support their families and our communities, too.

Thank you, Melanie and Lloyd, for all that you have done. Thank you for partnering in the prosperity of our natural resources. And congratulations to Syncrude, who have just hit the 3 billion barrel milestone. They have always ensured that our entire community and indigenous peoples have been partners every step of the way.

The employment opportunities strengthen everybody. When our people are working, they can send their children to university, they can donate to our social nonprofits like the SPCA and the food bank, and local sports teams are sponsored. The wherewithal to address abused women with housing and safety, children with lunch money, our addiction-afflicted with counselling: they are all supported when our community is working.

I know that under our current government and with great industrial partners like Syncrude and with fantastic people like Melanie and Lloyd Antoine, our community and each of us as individuals will become stronger than we ever thought possible.

Thank you.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The Leader of Her Majesty's Official Opposition.

Premier's Travel Expenses

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, the last two weeks the Premier has said that people with disabilities, former kids in care, kids in the school system all have to get by with less to pay for his $4.7 billion corporate handout. What he didn't say is that if he wants a pancake party with his Conservative friends, he'll fly them around on private planes and make Albertans foot the bill, no problem. To the Premier. This isn't hospitality; it's hypocrisy. Will he pay Albertans back for his irresponsible $16,000 plane ride on Air Tory?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, another day, another effort by the NDP leader to mislead Albertans. There is no such thing as a $4.7 . . .

Mr. Bilous: Point of order.

Mr. Kenney: . . . billion handout. There is the job-creation tax cut, that will create 55,000 net new private-sector jobs according to several prominent economists and this year will represent a revenue shortfall of $100 million, not $5.7 billion. We ran on a commitment to stop Alberta's isolation under the NDP, to build alliances with like-minded provinces. That's why we hosted several Premiers, representing 60 per cent of the population, in Calgary. We provided them with logistical support to get to the Council of the Federation, part of our effort to stand up for Albertans.

The Speaker: A point of order is noted at 1:52.

Ms Notley: Those Tory Premiers supported Alberta long before this Premier's pancake plane party, Mr. Speaker.

A private plane chartered by this Premier for his Conservative friends cost Albertans 16 grand. In estimates today the Premier cited good old-fashioned Alberta generosity as the reason, yet when he defends his broken promises to kids in school, to people with disabilities, to former kids in care, the Premier shows nothing close to Alberta generosity. Why does the Premier think that children should pay for his $4.7 billion corporate handout and his friends take private planes?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, almost every line in that was inaccurate. We're getting used to that from the NDP leader. One of the reasons she is the first Premier in Alberta history to be fired by voters after only one election is because she isolated Alberta whereas this government has built alliances. We've managed to get nine of 10 provinces agreeing to fight Bill C-69, the no-more-pipelines law. We got nine of 10 provinces to sign on to energy and resource corridors, including oil and gas pipelines. We even got the government of Quebec to join us in suing the federal government to stop the imposition of the carbon tax. That will save us billions of dollars.

Ms Notley: A completely different topic.

Albertans already had one Premier with a taste for partisan planes. They truly don't want another. Now, Mr. Speaker, what is very true is that this Premier is telling Albertans to tighten their belts while he buckles up his for a private plane ride with his friends. He said that we can't afford to fly firefighters into the heart of danger, but we can fly a bunch of Tories into the heart of Saskatchewan. To the Premier. Give your head a shake. Why won't you apologize to Albertans, do the right thing, and pay Albertans back?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, we invited several Canadian Premiers from different parties to come to Alberta to demonstrate solidarity for the 180,000 Albertans who lost their jobs under NDP mismanagement, to show their support for oil and gas, to stand up for the construction . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Hon. members, you would think that you would want to hear the answer to this important question. [interjections] Order.

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, they're still angry with Albertans for firing them this April, but happily we have several . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. members of the Official Opposition, the Speaker will hear the answer.

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, while they're angry with Albertans, happily we had Premiers representing 60 per cent of the Canadian population showing solidarity with this province. In order for them to do that and to get to the Council of the Federation to fight for pipelines, we offered logistical help with one prop plane.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung has a question.

Wildland Firefighter Rappel Program

Mr. Dach: Mr. Speaker, today I was joined by 14 brave firefighters from the provincial rap program, and my colleague the Member for Calgary-Mountain View was joined by another 15 members at a press conference in Calgary. They are all part of the rap program, that has been cut by this Premier to pay for his $4.7 billion corporate giveaway. The Minister of Agriculture and Forestry stooped to even further lows yesterday when he insulted them and implied they were lazy. To the Premier. These brave souls are in our Legislature today. Simple question: will you or your minister apologize to those firefighters?

Mr. Dreeshen: Mr. Speaker, the laziness, I think, comes from that member opposite and the attacks that he said yesterday . . .

Mr. Bilous: Point of order.

Mr. Dreeshen: . . . because overall, Mr. Speaker, the thousand wildfire personnel that we have here in the province of Alberta do an amazing job. They keep our forests safe. They keep our communities in the forested areas safe. They do an amazing job, and it's something I'm proud of. We've spent $30 million for 1,000 seasonal wage positions, and that will continue. It is all demand driven, and we will continue to give the funds to these brave men and women, that do a great job keeping Albertans safe.

Mr. Dach: Mr. Speaker, I'll let the firefighters determine who's working hard on this file, me or the minister.

The rap program only brings on elite firefighters who are willing to literally jump into the middle of a blaze to put it out. Firefighter Logan Mahoney said this of the program's cancellation, quote: we would like to stress that this has a major effect on safety and that you can't measure damage that didn't happen. Unquote. To the Premier: are you willing to put the safety of Albertans and their homes at risk just to save money to pay for your corporate giveaway while you're insulting firefighters?

Mr. Dreeshen: Mr. Speaker, again, the premise of that question is ridiculous. We do actually have the human external cargo program, that is an alternative to the previous rap program, and it's something that Alberta Parks has been using for decades. It's a proven technology and its proven methods that actually go out – and in the backcountry it's been used to rescue people. It's something where there's been a two-year pilot program that's already been in place, and it's something that's going to continue next year. That's extra certification to our brave men and women in the Alberta wildfire program, and that will continue.

Mr. Dach: Mr. Speaker, Albertans are watching as this government refuses to bend, and the rap program, they say, is gone. They left our communities at risk as a result. They won't even apologize for offending the firefighters gathered today. To the Premier. These firefighters deserve respect and to be listened to. You haven't even agreed to listen to them. We have at least listened to them and met with them. Will you or your minister today commit to meeting with them and me immediately after question period?

Mr. Dreeshen: Mr. Speaker, $750 million is going to be committed to emergency wildfires, an emergency fund, for next year. I'd be happy to meet with Alberta wildfire members. I've done it all this year. They are brave men and women that keep Albertans safe. To try to politicize the public sector, I think, is just disrespectful, and it's something that we won't do on this side of the House. Again, happy to meet with the brave men and women, the thousand of them, that have been working extremely hard for Alberta Wildfire. I as minister am extremely proud of all the hard work that they've been doing. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo has the call.

Emergency Management Funding

Member Ceci: The Wood Buffalo wildfire was the largest wildfire evacuation in Alberta's history. More than 88,000 Albertans fled their homes. It required unprecedented co-ordination between all partners. In the aftermath of the fire, Mr. Speaker, the KPMG report recommended that the province invest in a new Provincial Operations Centre to better respond to future incidents and protect Albertans. We funded it; they cut it. Why does the Premier believe that protecting Albertans in an emergency is wasteful spending and that the $16,000 spent on a plane ride isn't?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Myself and the Premier and a lot of MLAs spent this summer at the Provincial Operations Centre in Edmonton to tackle the northwest wildfire. I can confirm to this House that we've got a state-of-the-art facility. All the equipment that they need is embedded in that wonderful complex. What we don't need is to spend money that we don't have. While the NDP would continue with their reckless spending, we will rein in our expenses and bring balance to our finances.

Member Ceci: This morning the Minister of Municipal Affairs insisted that the cut to the Provincial Operations Centre was perfectly reasonable because it's, quote, a functional building, but the KPMG report states that the operation centre is "past its useful life." The abandonment of building a new facility is made all the more concerning with the word that this government is also cutting the rap firefighters program. To the Premier: we need highly trained firefighters and the necessary facilities and resources to keep Albertans safe. Are you really telling Albertans that their safety and even their lives are worth less than your $4.7 billion handout to big corporations?

Mr. Dreeshen: Again, Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring some reality to the context of what's happening here. Next year we are going to commit $750 million to the contingency fund for emergency responses. Emergency responses are demand driven. When there is a need, the province of Alberta steps up. Recommendations come through the department to ministers. They go to Treasury Board, and the funding is always there. It has been, and it will continue. That's just the process. Again, the fearmongering that happens on the other side is sad to see.

Thank you.

Member Ceci: The firefighters that my constituents in Calgary rely on are at their breaking point, and yesterday all the Minister of Municipal Affairs would do is point fingers when asked about the $9 million shortfall that the Calgary fire department is going to experience. To the Premier, one last time: will you take responsibility and restore the rap program, properly fund firefighters in Calgary, and build a new Provincial Operations Centre? Or does every dollar have to go to your $4.7 billion corporate handout and a $16,000 plane ride, Mr. Speaker?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs has the call.

Mr. Madu: Thank you so much, Mr. Speaker. As I earlier remarked, we have a state-of-the-art Provincial Operations Centre that's got all of the equipment and machines that we need. What we would not do is embark on reckless spending. Obviously, we are working so hard to rebuild our province. If we find that there is a need for a new building for the Provincial Operations Centre, we will do that. But at this point in time we have a functional Provincial Operations Centre that works and meets our goals. What we will not do is embark again on reckless spending.

Rural Education Funding 2019-2020

Ms Hoffman: The chair of Sturgeon public schools wrote to the Minister of Education on November 1: "Several significant changes arising from the 2019 Provincial Budget far exceed that which our rural Division can bear." The letter itemizes $3.3 million of lost provincial funding this year and says that next year "will mean further draconian cuts and fee increases for our families." The Minister of Education says that her cuts don't exist, so to the Premier, then: is the Sturgeon public board chair lying?

The Speaker: I recognize the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. For the record, every student that walks through our doors in any school is going to be funded at the exact same level as last year. We are spending $8.223 billion in the 2018-2019 year. We're spending $8.223 billion in the 2019-2020 year. By reallocating restrictive grant funding and eliminating reporting requirements, we have reduced red tape and provided boards with additional flexibility to meet their local priorities.

Ms Hoffman: I quote:

To balance the 2019/2020 Budget the Division will deplete our limited reserves, increase fees, and reduce staff across all Schools and Departments. The cuts will be deep and have a lasting effect.

These deep cuts send a clear message that rural education does not matter.

That's from the board chair, Terry Jewell. To the Premier: why are you prioritizing a $4.7 billion no-jobs corporate handout and making kids in rural schools pay for it?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The truth of the matter is that all summer long, late summer, early fall, I met with school boards, and one thing that they told me over and over and over again was that they want sustainable, predictable funding. We have a new funding assurance model that we'll be rolling out in the new year, and part of that will be the sustainable, predictable funding. Again, every single student that walks through our doors will be funded, is going to be funded, was yesterday, will be tomorrow.

Thank you.

Ms Hoffman: I quote:

The communities served by Sturgeon Public Schools elected your Government with the belief that you and your Government would honour your commitments to our children, staff, communities and to Albertans . . .

The spirit of hope that accompanied your promises to the students within our collective care has been replaced by grave concern for the future of rural education and the communities that are the heart of a vibrant Alberta.

These are the Premier's supporters, Mr. Speaker. Is the Premier calling the Sturgeon public school board chair a liar? It sounds like his minister is.

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I totally – totally, totally – do not agree with that statement. What I heard over and over again from our rural boards is the absolute support that this government is showing to our rural communities. It's unprecedented. Actually, I was in communities where they haven't seen the Minister of Education in decades, if at all ever. Therefore, I would just like to reinforce again that school boards are in the best position to deal with their budgets, and we are funding every single student. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Interprovincial Relations

Mr. Orr: Mr. Speaker, Albertans are frustrated with our current position in Confederation. Albertans know that we need to get a fair deal in Confederation. Albertans also know that to do this we need allies, and unfortunately under the previous NDP government some of our closest allies like Saskatchewan were alienated and pushed away. To the Premier: what has our government been doing to repair and build alliances to support Alberta's interests? [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

You are a lively bunch this afternoon, but the hon. Premier has the call.

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, for the folks at home, the government is not heckling. It doesn't heckle. It's the opposition that's angry with Albertans for firing them last April. One of the reasons that happened is because the NDP isolated Alberta. They picked fights with our best friends right next door in Saskatchewan. They mocked the Premier of Ontario, who supports us on pipelines, on the carbon tax, on C-69, and on all of our vital economic interests. Instead of picking fights with other provinces, we've been working to build a coalition to help us get pipelines built, to scrap the carbon tax, to stand up for our vital economic interests.

Mr. Orr: Mr. Speaker, given that I think Albertans feel that one of the primary barriers to our success and fairness in the federation is Prime Minister Trudeau, the federal Liberals, and the NDP and Greens who are propping them up and given that alliances with like-minded provinces are critical to standing up to a hostile federal government, to the Premier: could you please tell us how the alliances we are building with other provincial governments will help push back against federal policies like C-69, C-48, and the carbon tax, that are prejudicial against Alberta?

Mr. Kenney: Thank you to the member for the question, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to report to the House that in part through Alberta's leadership under this government we managed to secure the support of nine of the 10 provinces and two of the three territories to call on the federal government to not proceed with the No More Pipelines law, Bill C-69, which the NDP could not bring itself to oppose for almost its entire tenure in government. I'm also pleased to report that we had several provinces speak out against Bill C-48, and I anticipate several provinces will support our constitutional challenge against the No More Pipelines law.

Mr. Orr: Given that the previous government thought that our best course of action was to forge an alliance with Justin Trudeau and given that the NDP-Trudeau alliance was a disaster for Albertans, to the Premier: can you explain how our government's approach to standing up to the federal government and advocating for the interests of Albertans will be more successful than the NDP alliance with Justin Trudeau's Ottawa Liberals? [interjections]

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, I hear the NDP leader quite inappropriately heckling because she doesn't like to hear the truth about how her deal with Justin Trudeau sold Alberta down the river. She was in his office mugging for the cameras the day that he announced that he'd killed Northern Gateway and that he was going to bring forward the tanker ban. Instead, I'm pleased to tell the House that we even have the government of Quebec joining us at the Supreme Court of Canada to argue against the federal imposition of the carbon tax, that will cost Albertans billions. One of the ways we built this coalition was through the Stampede Premiers' meeting that brought together Premiers representing 60 per cent of the population in the defence of our interests.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Rural Police and Sheriffs

Ms Renaud: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. The Justice minister talks a big game about how he's going to add 500 police officers to take real action to combat rural crime in ridings like St. Albert. Bluntly, he promised more boots on the ground. Yesterday we learned that there are, in fact, no new boots on the ground. Maybe some different shirts, maybe new badges, but no new officers. Why did the Minister of Justice abandon such a public promise to rural Albertans to pay for his $4.7 billion corporate handout?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Advanced Education is rising.

Mr. Nicolaidis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The government of Alberta at the moment, just for some clarity for the members opposite, provides two very important grants to our cities and to our municipalities. The first, of course, is the municipal policing assistance grant, the MPAG, and the other is the police officer grant, the POG. The province stated quite clearly that neither of these grants will be reduced to our cities.

Ms Renaud: Okay. Given that boots on the ground means fish and wildlife, commercial vehicle enforcement, and Alberta sheriffs and given that all three of these branches saw their funding reduced by this minister's budget – that's on page 150 of his estimates, by the way – why does this minister think rebranding a smaller number of officers is going to do anything at all to address rural crime?

Mr. Nicolaidis: Mr. Speaker, let me be very clear. Our government wants rural Albertans to know that we have listened to them, unlike the former government, unlike the members opposite, who did nothing to address rural crime in the province. We have listened to them, we have heard them, and we are standing with them. We are doing everything that we can to strengthen crime protection and fight crime in rural Alberta.

Ms Renaud: Okay. Try to follow along. Given that the minister says that none of these officers will be trained and ready until the fall of next year and given that this minister's policing budget will drop below 2018 levels – that is on page 108 of his fiscal plan – Minister, when will you come clean with the people of St. Albert, Rocky Mountain House – you name it – about your paper-thin plan that is actually taking police right out of communities?

Mr. Nicolaidis: Mr. Speaker, the only paper-thin plan was the one that the members opposite were operating from as they were trying to tackle rural crime. We have a robust five-point plan to help us address and fight rural crime within the province, including an announcement that we made the other day regarding the creation of the RAPID force. This force will put more first responders into more rural areas. The government will be creating the Alberta provincial integrated police force, also the RAPID force, as I mentioned, and grant additional roles and authorities to Alberta sheriffs to take some real action on rural crime.

Access to Sexual and Reproductive Health Services

Member Irwin: A United Conservative government will not address this issue, will not engage in this debate, will not initiate legislation. Mr. Speaker, these were the comments made by this Premier earlier this year. What was he talking about? Abortion. Fast-forward a few short months, and what do we have? An MLA from the Uterus Control Party introducing a bill that's all about abortion. To the Premier: will you stand by your words and declare in this House today that you will not support this bill? Simple question.

The Speaker: The hon. minister of status of women.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm not going to talk about a private member's bill, let alone one that hasn't even been introduced yet. There is, of course, time and a place to debate private member's business, as the member opposite well knows. I would suggest that the member opposite wait and read the bill in question.

Member Irwin: Given that trans and gender-diverse Albertans continue to face a number of potentially fatal barriers when accessing the health care system, including long wait times for gender-reaffirming surgery, and given that when conscience rights are invoked, we know this can mean that vital services for LGBTQ2S-plus folks can be denied – absolutely unacceptable in 2019 – to the Health minister: will you commit in this House right now to ensuring that queer and trans people will face no additional barriers to accessing health services under your watch?

Mr. Shandro: Yes. Mr. Speaker, the 29 health professions that are in this province who have colleges all have standards of practice that prohibit discrimination.

Member Irwin: Given that a few weeks ago my colleague from St. Albert introduced a motion calling for increased access to reproductive health services where there's a desperate need, particularly in rural Alberta, and given that the members opposite refused to support this motion, claiming it was divisive – but it wasn't just about abortion; it was about access to critical services like birth control, midwifery and fertility treatments – and given that this Premier has also claimed that he will allow his members to vote by their conscience, to the Premier: will you force the entire government caucus to support a bill that hurts access to reproductive health care?

The Speaker: Hon. members, I would caution that it wouldn't be appropriate for members to comment on a decision that's already been made by the Assembly.

If the minister of status of women would like to, of course, she would be welcome to.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's sad that the opposition lacks the sensitivity that is essential for a respectful conversation surrounding issues. Interestingly enough, during that motion half of that caucus didn't even show up to vote, so . . .

Mr. Bilous: Point of order.

Mrs. Aheer: . . . let's talk about that for a minute. Secondly, it's clear, absolutely clear that instead of trying to bring people together . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's clear. It is clear that the goal of this opposition purely is to drive a wedge between Albertans. As the minister of multiculturalism . . . [interjections] You know what? There is an opportunity for respectful discourse in this place. I am honoured to have the debate.

The Speaker: Of course, the hon. minister of the status of women would know that referring to the absence or the presence of a member would be wildly unacceptable, and I'm sure she'll be happy to apologize after question period.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Child Protective Services Caseload

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. When I managed youth shelters, we worked with kids on temporary and permanent guardianship orders. For context, these were kids whose guardian was the provincial government that were placed in a homeless shelter and often assigned to a caseworker with caseloads of 25-plus high-risk kids. That was four years ago. We knew back then the caseload pressures and the challenges that were created for front-line employees. For four years we also saw the previous government fail to adequately fund caseload growth. To the minister: how are we going to do better for kids?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Despite what we've seen in terms of a cynical campaign of calculated misinformation by the NDP designed to scare and shame vulnerable Albertans, I'm going to present the facts. Unlike the previous government, we have a thoughtful and well-funded plan to ensure that government resources are targeted to at-risk children, youth, and families. Our government increased Children's Services' budget by 8.5 per cent this year, 15 per cent over the next four, and our child intervention budget alone saw an increase of $68.5 million. That is after we fund the $5.7 million . . .

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the minister for the thoughtful response to this important issue.

Given that the lack of funding by the previous government for caseload growth has led to increased pressures for front-line caseworkers and given that increased pressures on front-line caseworkers has led to increased burnout and poor staff retention and given that it takes time to fill positions and train front-line employees to ensure that they are prepared for the challenging work ahead, what are we doing to help recruit, qualify, and train new employees to help manage the shortfall created by the previous government's failure to act?

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. We do have some challenges in Children's Services as it pertains to retaining and recruiting new front-line staff. We have maintained all front-line staff positions within this year's budget. We will continue to fill those positions. I'm also relying on the expertise of our front-line staff and management, who are working together, especially in some of the rural and remote areas of our province, on how we can best identify some of the challenges and begin to recruit and retain more staff in those very important roles.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and again thank you to the minister for the answer. Given that our front-line caseworkers often have very challenging work environments and given that their success or failure affects so many young lives and given that failure to communicate problems and issues within the department leads to children falling through the cracks, to the minister: what are we doing to help support our caseworkers at all levels of the ministry to reduce potential burnout and the resulting attrition in our front-line services?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. We are continuing to do this review, and we're undertaking this review with the AUPE and our front-line staff to determine some of the biggest impacts to front-line caseworkers. I want to say that we also work very closely with our community partners, and despite what the members opposite have been saying, we are continuing to fund multimillion-dollar partnerships with our community partners to continue to target supports for at-risk children, youth, and families who need it the most.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Public Service Wages

Ms Gray: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. "Neither [our leader] nor the UCP are proposing cutting pay for public sector workers." That was a message this Premier's official Facebook account sent to an Albertan concerned that the UCP would cut the wages of teachers, just before the election. The UCP said that concerns about wage cuts were just fear and smear, but we now know that they want a 2 to 5 per cent rollback for the many hard-working public servants. Will the Premier just admit that massive wage rollbacks were part of his plan from the beginning?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, we took several months this summer to take a look at Alberta's finances. We commissioned the MacKinnon panel for a report to do a deep dive into our finances and to provide a path to balance. What the MacKinnon panel found is that public-sector wages in this province are significantly higher, in many cases, than those in other provinces. We have a responsibility to deliver sound fiscal management on behalf of Albertans, and we will deliver that.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Ms Gray: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the Premier also claimed publicly that, quote, the UCP knows the value of our front-line public servants, end quote, right before directing his Finance minister to seek a cut in wages and given that hundreds of thousands could see their pay cut so that this Premier can pay for a $4.7 billion no-jobs corporate handout, to the Premier: how can you say that you value the people who care for our loved ones and clean our schools when you're planning to lay off so many and cut the wages of the rest who remain?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, this side of the House has a great deal of respect for those public-sector employees, that deliver top-quality services every day on behalf of Albertans. We believe that our position is very defensible considering the losses that so many other Albertans have taken in the last four years with decreases in pay and in some cases, in many cases losing jobs altogether. We believe that we're providing a very defensible, responsible position going into public-sector negotiations.

Ms Gray: Given that this Premier promised Albertans that he wasn't planning to cut the pay of our public-sector workers before the election and given that day after day in this House the Official Opposition points out the many places where the Premier misled or wasn't up front with Albertans about his true plans, to the Premier:

will you now finally admit that you said what was necessary to get elected and now we are seeing your true colours?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, again, this government took time to become well informed to make responsible, sustainable decisions on behalf of all Albertans, including the public sector. One thing we will not do is reperform the recklessness of the previous government, the members across the House, who drove this province into an unsustainable spending trajectory, spending 4 per cent per year every year, over and above the previous, while revenues remained flat, driving us to over $100 billion of provincial debt. We will not reperform that irresponsibility.

Edmonton LRT Valley Line Funding

Mr. Carson: Mr. Speaker, residents in my community are deeply concerned that this UCP budget will scuttle the long-awaited west leg of the valley line LRT. The Minister of Transportation has offered them no hope that this project will actually proceed. Instead, his government has snuck a clause into Bill 20 that allows them to pull funding to the project without cause. To the minister: why are you playing games with an LRT line that my constituents have been waiting for for so long?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Transportation.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member ought to know that what he just suggested is not, in fact, accurate. We promised to fulfill our promise of $3 billion for LRT, including $1.47 billion to Edmonton. A section in the legislation before this House right now actually confirms that very commitment of this government. The hon. member ought to know better. We are actually looking forward to the LRTs being built in Calgary and Edmonton, and we intend to work co-operatively with both cities.

Mr. Carson: Well, given that the bill before the House gives the government 90 days to cancel that project without cause and given that it's not me saying that the project is in jeopardy but, rather, Mayor Don Iveson and given that this government has hoped to sneak the clause to kill the valley line LRT past Albertans by cramming it into an omnibus bill that also raises taxes, cuts tax credits, and leaves Albertans paying more and getting much less, to the minister: are you willing to admit that you intend to kill the valley line LRT to help pay for your $4.7 billion no-jobs corporate handout?

Mr. McIver: Well, Mr. Speaker, it's been well established that the $4.7 billion is not accurate. Experts have said so. I've also made it clear in the legislation that the money will be available for Edmonton. I appreciate that the hon. member is trying to make a point, but he actually ought to stick to the facts because the facts are that our government has committed to the funding for the LRT line and that our government will deliver the funding for the LRT line. We look forward to working co-operatively with the city of Edmonton in the construction and planning of that same line.

Mr. Carson: Well, given that the $4.7 billion figure is on page 144 of this government's budget and given that we get nothing but rhetoric and finger pointing from this minister and given that the residents in Lewis Farms, Secord, Rosenthal, and all of west Edmonton are waiting on the valley line LRT and want certainty that it will be built as quickly as possible, to the minister: will you commit here and now to removing this heavy-handed clause from your terrible piece of legislation?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Transportation.

Mr. McIver: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would say to the hon. member that the city of Edmonton, to my knowledge, hasn't had any complaints about the cancellation clause in the federal funding on the very same project. I don't know why they would have a complaint about a similar clause in the provincial funding. On that basis, I look forward to working with the city of Edmonton. I hope the hon. member will actually change his mind and get on the bus and actually support the city of Edmonton in working with us in getting the LRT built. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order. The Official Opposition will come to order.

The hon. Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat.

Teachers' Retirement Fund Management

Ms Glasgo: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I know that every member in this Chamber can agree on the pivotal role that teachers play in setting our young people up for success. I know that our government values their contributions to this province. I have been made aware of a considerable amount of misinformation surrounding our government's announcement on the Alberta Investment Management Corporation becoming the exclusive manager of the Alberta teachers' retirement fund. Can the Minister of Finance please clarify why our government is proposing this change?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Having the ATRF use AIMCo as their investment manager reflects our commitment to make government more efficient, remove redundancies, and provide more value for taxpayers' dollars. Because AIMCo invests substantially more assets than ATRF, it can benefit from economies of scale and deliver with lower costs. The combination of similar or better returns for substantially lower costs creates a compelling rationale for AIMCo to manage these investments. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat has the call.

2:30

Ms Glasgo: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister. Given that many teachers have reached out to my office voicing concerns over a perceived loss of control over their pensions and given that this perceived loss of control has many teachers worried about AIMCo's management, to the Minister of Finance: can you assure this House and teachers in Brooks-Medicine Hat that the ATRF will have strategic control of the fund?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I want to assure you that teachers' pension compensation benefits will be unchanged. There are no changes to the plan itself. The only thing that is changing is the investment manager of the funds. The ATRF will continue to be the trustee for the plan, and it will continue to manage the administration of the pension. The ATRF board will remain in control of determining how the pension funds are invested at a strategic level as well as retaining ownership of the plan's assets. That is, AIMCo will invest according to the policies set by the ATRF board.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat.

Ms Glasgo: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the language that has been communicated to my office has verged on inflammatory and given that there is considerable fearmongering around hijacking of teachers' pensions and, further, given that in all likelihood the health of the fund will improve under lower administration costs, to the Minister of Finance: is there any concern about government influence over the fund, and can you elaborate on the potential health of the fund after making this proposed change? [interjections]

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford will come to order when the Speaker is on his feet. This is not the first time this week that we've had this conversation.

The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, the ATRF board will remain in control of determining how the pension fund will be invested at a strategic level, and the ATRF will retain ownership of the plan's assets. AIMCo's mandate is to provide the best returns for the owners of the assets that they manage. We have great respect for AIMCo's independence, and we are confident that they will deliver excellent returns at a low cost for teachers.

Drinking Water Quality in Daycares and Schools

Mr. Schmidt: An article in StarMetro this week revealed that more than 10 per cent of daycares in Alberta have drinking water that exceeds the maximum allowable concentration of lead. Lead is a neurotoxin that impedes children's brain development. It can cause behavioural problems and result in loss of IQ. It's unacceptable that our government will allow our children to be exposed to lead. To the minister: what action will you take today to stop kids from being poisoned by the lead in the drinking water at their daycares?

Mr. Shandro: It's a good question, Mr. Speaker. I've been advised by AHS, and both I and the Minister of Education have let those school boards know that AHS is there to be able to provide the support to be able to do the testing and to be able to provide any strategies that might be required to mitigate any safety concerns for our children.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, given that the same article identified that a quarter of all schools tested in the Calgary Catholic school board and the Elk Island public school board also had drinking water that exceeded the maximum allowable concentration of lead and given that testing of drinking water in schools isn't mandatory so we don't know how many schoolkids are being exposed to lead on a daily basis, what will the minister do today to prevent our children from being poisoned by the lead in their drinking water in schools?

Member LaGrange: Thank you for the question. Of course, we're very, very concerned about this issue and concerned about the water that our children are drinking. School boards and municipalities are the ones that are testing and monitoring and maintaining water supplies, and as my hon. colleague has already said, AHS and my department are willing and wanting to assist anyone who needs it so that we can deal with this particular issue.

Thank you.

Mr. Schmidt: Given that the lead issues are easily solved – you simply replace the lead plumbing – but given that this government has handicapped municipalities and school boards by drastically cutting their infrastructure grants, to the minister: are you really going to stand in this House and support a $4.7 billion corporate handout but deny any funding to fix the dangerous problem of lead poisoning in our schools and daycares?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Shandro: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I said previously, AHS is there to be able to provide the supports for our schools in this province, to be able to do any testing that's required, and to be able to help them with any mitigation, any strategies that might be required to be able to help make sure that our kids are safe.

Ms Notley: By treating the lead poisoning: is that what you're saying?

The Speaker: Order.

School Construction Needs in North Edmonton

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Education has done nothing to address the growth pressures of north Edmonton schools. For years now the parents and students in my constituency have been in dire need of a new public and a new Catholic high school. In her announcement there was not a single project to address the needs and concerns of the residents of north Edmonton. Can the Minister of Education please clarify why she's fighting for a $4.7 billion corporate handout but won't do a thing for the people in the area that I represent?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. During the election we made a promise to Albertans that our government would continue to build schools. We have actually carried through with that promise in Budget 2019. We are supporting 25 new capital projects for the education system, an increase from the total amount, increased from the previous government, of 2018. This includes 15 new schools which will be built across the province, including brand new schools in Calgary, Edmonton, Leduc, Blackfalds, and Langdon. Six schools were slated for replacement, and four will receive modernizations or additions.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, given that that list doesn't include north Edmonton and given that Queen Elizabeth high school in my area is in dire need of upgrades to the point that the school board would rather replace it and given that the minister and this government are putting no-jobs corporate giveaways ahead of the needs of my constituents, can the minister please tell me and my constituents and the people of north Edmonton specifically when they will get the new high schools they need?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Every year at budget time we receive from school divisions approximately 300 asks for schools and replacements or modernizations. We only have limited funds, and what we are doing is building 25 new capital projects in this budget year. Through these significant investments our children will continue to learn in up-to-date spaces and safe spaces, resulting in better successes in our classrooms. We will be addressing future capital issues in the next budget.

Mr. Nielsen: Given that there was $4.7 billion for corporations and given that enrolment continues to rise in Edmonton schools and they're already packed to the brim in some areas of the city and given that to address the capacity issues, work on building new high schools would need to begin immediately, can the Minister of Education please tell my constituents that she will reverse this oversight and immediately build the high schools needed in north Edmonton? If not, why not?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As the hon. member knows, there is a matrix in place. Every school division puts in a three-year capital plan, and on that capital plan they prioritize their asks for the upcoming year. Then it goes to our department, and we go through a very long process in terms of determining which schools need to be built and addressed. As I've said, 15 new schools across this province are being built, including schools in Edmonton. Four new schools were announced in Edmonton, whether they were schools or modernizations. We also will continue to build modulars to address . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-North has a question.

Mental Health and Addiction Services

Mr. Yaseen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Over the past weeks I have attended several events on the topic of mental health. Albertans from all walks of life face mental health challenges, and diagnosis rates are higher than ever. Education and awareness likely play into these growing diagnosis rates; however, services are often too costly to access, especially for our vulnerable youth. To the associate minister: what steps are our government taking to ensure that Albertans have access to affordable mental health services?

The Speaker: The hon. associate minister of mental health.

Mr. Luan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for asking this very important question. On this last Monday we announced a new direction this government is taking. We appointed a mental health and addictions advisory committee. They are going to focus on developing a full recovery-oriented continuum of care to help Albertans to create multiple pathways to get the help they need.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Yaseen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that our United Conservative government has committed to investing $100 million to implement a mental health and addictions strategy and given that during these tough economic times this investment should be made where it can have the biggest impact per dollar, where is this new money being spent, and how will it help people to move forward into a life of recovery and wellness?

2:40

The Speaker: The hon. Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions.

Mr. Luan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am very proud that our government, under a very difficult fiscal environment, committed $100 million to help people to increase their access to recovery-oriented continuum of care. In that continuum of care we're going to focus on prevention, intervention, treatment, and recovery. You have already heard us. We committed to 4,000 treatment and recovery spaces. Within that parameter treatment beds, detox beds, outpatient services, and community support will all be provided. In the coming months we're going to be informed by this advisory committee; more services will be guided through the advisory committee. We're going to engage Albertans at large to contribute what they can to work on this.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-North.

Mr. Yaseen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that Albertans face challenges in regard to addiction, depression, anxiety, and other issues and given that many of us have seen first-hand the potentially devastating impact that untreated mental health and addiction can have on communities, to the associate minister: how is our government going to help Albertans and communities who have been affected by someone else's mental health and addiction?

The Speaker: The hon. associate minister.

Mr. Luan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you for this great question. You are absolutely right. Mental health touches the lives of our family, our community, and our business. Unlike the previous government, that didn't seem to care about the community, the business, and they don't care about needle debris, our government will provide the support that Albertans need. We'll also keep the interests of our families and communities and safety at heart. We'll balance both.

Statement by the Speaker

Ceremony in Honour of Indigenous Veterans

The Speaker: Hon. members, prior to rising and departing for the weekend or sticking around for the very important Members' Statements and daily Routine that will follow, I'd just like to bring something to the attention of members of the Assembly if you'll indulge me for just a couple of seconds.

Earlier today, as many of you know, there was a ceremony that was held to honour indigenous veterans. This ceremony had a number of moving parts, but the Speaker invited them into the rotunda as late as early last week. There were some errors that occurred. Unfortunately, the Official Opposition didn't receive the appropriate invite to speak at that ceremony or to be acknowledged. That is an oversight on my part. I apologize for that, although the good news is that this was the first time that that ceremony took place in the rotunda. I look forward to that new tradition in an ongoing way in the Assembly with all members of the Assembly being able to participate.

Having said that, in 30 seconds or less we will proceed to Members' Statements. If you are out on the roads this afternoon, please drive safely, and I invite you all to participate in a Remembrance Day ceremony on Monday.

Members' Statements

Member Ceci: Mr. Speaker, the Calgary Alliance for the Common Good is a nonpartisan, religiously diverse association of congregations, unions, schools, and community groups representing more than 30,000 people in Calgary. On October 17 I attended their founding assembly, where they pledged to focus on four areas: mental health and addictions, building community, truth and reconciliation, and the environment. It is tremendously heartening to witness the formation of groups like the Calgary Alliance for the Common Good, but they can't address these issues alone. The sad truth is that they're being hung out to dry by the UCP government in all four areas.

In the latest budget AISH and income support were deindexed, restricting the opportunity for people with disabilities and on low incomes to engage with their community. The government says that it will not impact recipients of AISH and income supports, but the recipients know better. For years inflation has impacted their livelihood.

This government abandoned the NDP government's climate leadership plan, which reduced emissions by 50 megatonnes at the same time as creating more than 7,300 jobs. The latest budget also cuts 36 per cent from the services to indigenous peoples and completely eliminated the indigenous climate leadership program, a program that was accessed by all 48 First Nations and eight Métis settlements.

These moves have seriously jeopardized the previous government's progress on truth and reconciliation. We see it in this budget over and over. The government is making Albertans pay for their $4.7 billion no-jobs corporate handout.

Mr. Speaker, organizations such as the Calgary Alliance for the Common Good show the remarkable community spirit that exists in Calgary, but they shouldn't have to do this government's job for them. They need help. When is this government going to stop passing the buck, stop taking money out of the pockets of Albertans . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lesser Slave Lake.

Alberta Indigenous Opportunities Corporation

Mr. Rehn: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm honoured to rise and speak today about the establishment of the Alberta Indigenous Opportunities Corporation.

At a young age I told my father that I would like to be a pilot, and he proceeded to help me out right away. The next morning I found myself down at his sawmill piloting the lumber. I was very fortunate to be raised in rural Alberta and was honoured to work shoulder to shoulder in the sawmilling and forest industry for decades with many great indigenous families like the Duncans, Gerioux, Sinclairs, Desjarlais, Joachims, Whitehorses, Delormes, Morberlys, McDonalds, Wanayandies, and many others.

To see this bill pass through this Assembly, giving my lifelong friends, who are leaders in their indigenous communities, the opportunity to be true partners in the prosperity of our resource-rich province warmed my heart. It's a game changer. That is what my friends have told me, that will help indigenous communities in my constituency of Lesser Slave Lake and the rest of the province realize a higher quality of life. That is what this historic, unprecedented program is about, the quality of life of the indigenous peoples of our province.

Herb Lehr, the president of the Alberta Metis Settlements General Council, wanted to thank the indigenous minister for spearheading this, saying: he's inspirational, and he cares and wants to find a solution that is to the benefit of all Albertans as well as all indigenous people. Silas Yellowknee, the chief of the Bigstone Cree Nation, said that this is a great step forward to help First Nations work towards becoming fiscally independent.

The indigenous people in my constituency can see the hope and opportunity, opportunity to improve their quality of life and hope that their children and their children's children will be able to live a better life than they have. The message I have heard from my constituents is clear and simple. This is progress, progress that the establishment of the Indigenous Opportunities Corporation will help them in creating a better life for them, their families, and their communities.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lacombe-Ponoka has a statement to make.

Red Tape

Mr. Orr: Thank you, sir. Mr. Speaker, red tape is one of the big issues facing investors and business owners in my constituency and Alberta. A recent World Bank annual report, titled ease of doing business, measured business regulation in 190 countries. It looks at regulatory standards and red tape burdens on business. Scores serve as a basis for ranking economies and business environment. The report measures processes for incorporation, getting a building permit, obtaining an electricity connection, transferring property, access to credit, protecting minority investors, paying taxes, engaging in international trade, enforcing contracts, and resolving financial distress.

Canada ranks 23rd. This is the worst score Canada has received in the 15 years of record keeping. We have declined the last three years in a row and fallen steadily from fourth place in 2004. This is abysmal. It's concerning that we are not even in the top 20. Our biggest competitor, the U.S., ranks much better than we do at number 6.

Key takeaways from the report: with regulatory overreach, corruption increases, businesses go abroad, unemployment increases, investment leaves the country, and there was a causal relationship between economic freedom and GDP growth. Worse, this report didn't paint the real story for Alberta. The 2019 Red Tape Report Card from the Canadian Federation of Independent Business scored Alberta an F, the worst rating available.

Red tape has placed Alberta in the category of some of the worst business economies in the world. Businesses have left, unemployment increased, and investment has gone. These are the long-term results of regulatory overreach. We campaigned on getting Albertans back to work and restoring investor confidence. One of the steps we took to achieve this was the establishment of the associate ministry of red tape reduction. Under the federal Liberals and the provincial NDP, Canada and Alberta have fallen badly. This government has made the reduction of red tape a top priority. There is much more work to be done, and we will do it.

Corporate Taxes and Government Spending

Mr. Long: Mr. Speaker, in the past few weeks we have heard the opposition delivering a message about a $4.5 billion and now a $4.7 billion corporate handout. The reality is that collecting fewer taxes is not actually a handout. It simply means that government isn't digging into someone else's pocket quite as much as it was already. While this is obviously a strange concept to some of my colleagues in opposition, it is something the current government takes pride in.

Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, I have also been listening very intently as opposition members have discussed the electricity market. Having run a power plant for the last number of years, this conversation has proven particularly interesting. You see, as the opposition members have rightly pointed out, the coal phase-out was going to happen. However, when the NDP government decided to accelerate the coal phase-out, it cost the taxpayers $1.4 billion via a corporate handout.

When the NDP government put a cap on electricity charges of 6.8 cents per kilowatt hour and the actual price rose above that cap, it again cost the taxpayers $800 million by way of a corporate handout into the Balancing Pool. Then, when the NDP government decided to purchase rail car contracts, which, according to private industry stakeholders I have talked to, industry was prepared to do on their own, again it cost taxpayers to the tune of $3.7 billion, not to mention the $2.1 billion handout for petrochemical diversification and partial oil upgraders.

Mr. Speaker, the previous NDP government enacted bad policies, made industry suffer, and then bailed them out using $8 billion of taxpayer money. Our policies give industry much-needed relief, which allows them to continue investing in our province. That said, when the members opposite are talking about corporate handouts and boondoggles, we should all take heed because it appears to be their area of expertise.

Speaker's Ruling Interrupting Members' Statements

The Speaker: Hon. members, we have a very long-standing tradition of not providing any comments during Members' Statements. There are lots of times to debate the facts in this House. You might disagree with the statement that the member makes, but there is no reason to provide comment during the statement while he is making it.

Mr. McIver: Mr. Speaker, I would just like to provide oral notice that I think we might go past 3 o'clock today for the Routine.

The Speaker: Thank you.

Introduction of Bills

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Energy.

Bill 23 Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2019

Mrs. Savage: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today on behalf of the hon. Minister of Justice to introduce Bill 23, the Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2019.

This bill will amend three statutes: the Court of Appeal Act, the Court of Queen's Bench Act, and the Provincial Court Act. The amendments will honour our constitutional monarchy and the history of the legal system by re-enacting a provision that will automatically change the name of the Court of Queen's Bench to the Court of King's Bench when Canada's monarch is a king, reduce the age of eligibility from age 60 to age 55 for masters in chambers of the Court of Queen's Bench to be appointed as half-time masters and for provincial judges to be appointed as part-time judges, and allow justices of the Court of Queen's Bench and the Court of Appeal to access federal funds to attend meetings related to the administration of justice without being limited to an annual $500 per-judge amount.

Thank you.

[Motion carried; Bill 23 read a first time]

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Livingstone-Macleod.

Bill 206 Workers' Compensation (Enforcement of Decisions) Amendment Act, 2019

Mr. Reid: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm honoured to rise today to introduce Bill 206, the Workers' Compensation (Enforcement of Decisions) Amendment Act, 2019. This bill proposes that workers who receive a favourable judgment when they file a dispute with the Workers' Compensation Board will be awarded their compensation in a timely manner as well as have the potential to be compensated for any legal fees that may be incurred.

With that, I request leave to introduce Bill 206, the Workers' Compensation (Enforcement of Decisions) Amendment Act, 2019.

[Motion carried; Bill 206 read a first time]

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Peace River.

Bill 207
Conscience Rights (Health Care Providers) Protection Act

Mr. Williams: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I request leave today to introduce Bill 207, Conscience Rights (Health Care Providers) Protection Act.

Mr. Speaker, this bill seeks to commit to provincial law the fundamental freedom named in Charter section 2(a), “the freedom of conscience,” for health care providers so that these professionals never have to choose between their most deeply held convictions on one side and their jobs on the other. This bill is aligned with existing protections that many colleges and regulatory bodies governing these professions already have established and gives certainty to our valued Alberta health care providers while maintaining access to services.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I look forward to robust debate in this House on the bill.

[The voice vote indicated that the motion for first reading carried]

[Several members rose calling for a division. The division bell was rung at 2:57 p.m.]

[Fifteen minutes having elapsed, the Assembly divided]

[The Speaker in the chair]

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: Are there any tablings for today? The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have received so far 254 e-mails about the ATRF, the Alberta teachers’ retirement fund. I’d like to table copies of just six of them.

I also have a tabling of an article I referred to last evening, Alberta Town Becomes Solar-powered ‘Net Zero’ Community. “The math makes total sense.” That’s from the Canadian Press.

Finally, one more article from November 1, 2019. It’s entitled ‘We Knew’: Ex Oil Boss Says Climate Change ‘With Us Forevermore.’

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-McCall, followed by Lethbridge-West.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to table the requisite number of copies of an article entitled The UCP Budget is Leaving Albertans Dizzy, and That’s Deliberate, written by Keith Gerein.

The Speaker: The Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Two sets of tablings today. One is the requisite number of copies of the flight manifest for a private jet company from Calgary to Saskatoon. The flight flew back empty from Saskatoon to Calgary, costing some $16,764.

I also have 59 e-mails and the requisite number of copies on the topic of taking control of the assets of the Alberta teachers’ retirement fund from teachers in Edmonton.

The Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood, followed by Edmonton-City Centre.

Member Irwin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to table the requisite number of copies of a number of e-mails to my constituency of Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood from teachers who are quite concerned about this government’s proposal to take control of the assets of the Alberta teachers’ retirement fund. I’ve got 16 e-mails.

I’d also like to rise on behalf of the Member for Edmonton-Whitemud and table 22 copies of the same sort of e-mails from a whole number of teachers who are quite upset about this government’s plan to take control of the ATRF.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It’s my pleasure to rise and table five copies of multiple e-mails and letters that I have received from students in the faculty of medicine at the University of Alberta regarding their concerns over this government’s intent to legislate changes to how they allocate practitioner IDs in the opportunities in rural Alberta.

I thank several of those students for joining me today in the gallery.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have tablings on three different topics. The first is nine letters that I have received from folks who are deeply concerned about the government’s reaching into the ATRF, which has been in existence since 1939 as joint governance, and making a decision to move this over to AIMCo. They urge the government not to do so.

The second is letters from teachers about their concerns regarding their class sizes and the complexity of their classrooms and the even deeper concerns they have that things will get even more challenging with this new budget.

The third tabling I have is from the Sturgeon public schools, a letter that was sent to the minister as well as local MLAs, the Premier, and others that outlines the deep cuts that are coming to Sturgeon public, $3.3 million this year alone. They itemize those and they say that they’re in direct conflict with what the government campaigned on and that they feel betrayed by this budget.

Thank you.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I rise to table 17 copies of e-mails from teachers upset around the ATRF pension changes.

I have two other tablings, Mr. Speaker. The first is a report produced by the Alberta Federation of Labour in consultation with respected economist Hugh Mackenzie where they analyzed the report of the Blue Ribbon Panel on Alberta's Finances and determined that should the government follow through, it would be a path to economic recession.

Secondly, I have the requisite number of copies of a second report produced by the Alberta Federation of Labour in consultation with respected economist Hugh Mackenzie where they analyze the newly released UCP budget and confirm the predictions of the Kenney recession from their previous report and suggest that these cuts could result in a cumulative negative impact on GDP of 4.8 per cent and the loss of over a hundred thousand jobs.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Are there others wishing to table documents? The hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to table an article from the Calgary Herald calling the budget "a credible budget plan." It goes on to say, "It pledges to prune back operating spending over four years, yet aims to protect priority areas such as health care, children's services and education."

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to table a copy of a letter I received from Alexander Grove. He's a Centre High science teacher. He says that his classroom this year is up to 34 students when it should be 25.

The Speaker: Are there others?

Seeing none, I have a tabling today. Hon. members, in accordance with section 21(1) of the Child and Youth Advocate Act I have the six requisite copies of the 2018-2019 report of the Child and Youth Advocate for the period April 1, 2018, to March 31, 2019.

Hon. members, we are at points of order. The hon. Official Opposition House Leader.

Point of Order Parliamentary Language

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I rise under 23(h), (i), (j). At approximately 1:52 today during question period the Premier specifically was referring to the Leader of the Official Opposition and referred to her as attempting to mislead Albertans. Now, I believe that this is a fairly clear point. You've made several rulings consistently that when a member accuses another or alleges another member in this House has misled Albertans or the public, it is out of order. I know that the Premier knows better. I mean, I assume he knows better. On this first point of order I'm asking for him to apologize and withdraw his comments.

The Speaker: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

Mrs. Savage: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We will withdraw that comment. I wish to clarify that what the Premier meant to say was: another day, another effort by the NDP to mislead Albertans. We withdraw. It's clear we're not to refer to a person in the House. Thank you.

The Speaker: I thank you for your withdrawal and consider the matter dealt with.

The hon. Official Opposition House Leader for the second point of order.

Point of Order Insulting Language

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I rise under 23(h), (i), (j). I'm going to implore the members opposite, because this is a similar example, that there is an apology along with a withdrawal as opposed to a backhanded second attempt to again infer what members are not allowed to do directly or indirectly, which you have said many times on many occasions.

At approximately 1:57 the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry, in responding to a question from the Member for Edmonton-McClung, spoke directly to him as opposed to through you and said "the laziness . . . comes from that member" right there. I don't know if there's a more clear example of something, in my opinion, that's unparliamentary. That is a comment made to cause disorder. It was abusive, insulting language, quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, and again "imputes false or unavowed motives" against the Member for Edmonton-McClung. I implore you to call on the government to apologize for this comment as it was an insult and offensive and to withdraw the comment.

The Speaker: I appreciate your encouragement. I hope that you'll do the same to your own caucus, who had a big problem with this just yesterday in repeating the unparliamentary language in their apology, in fact.

The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. We will withdraw and apologize for the hon. member's statement. I think what he intended to say is that the NDP are lazy, which is something that I'm sure all of us here would agree with. Thank you.

The Speaker: We got so close there – so, so close – to apologizing and withdrawing. It's always the easiest path forward. I encourage you to do so in the future.

Hon. Opposition House Leader, it's very difficult for the Speaker when you give him the high eyebrow about how he responds when only yesterday he didn't create any form of disorder for members of his caucus who basically flat out refused to apologize or, in fact, repeated the unparliamentary language in the very loose apology. The high eyebrow is not really appreciated by the Speaker.

We'll take point of order 3.

Point of Order Referring to the Absence of Members

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise under Standing Order 23(h), (i), (j), but there are a number of precedents. At approximately 2:17 the Minister of Culture, Multiculturalism and Status of Women in response to a question said, referring to this side of the House, that "half of that caucus didn't even [bother to] show up to vote." Now, I'm going to draw your attention to a number of rulings. There are precedents on this, first, in House of Commons Procedures and Practice, page 217. You know, it says that "the Speaker has traditionally discouraged Members from signalling the absence of another Member from the House." Again, there are many places that members have to be in order to carry out all of the obligations that go with their office.

There are numerous examples, Mr. Speaker, of previous rulings. In fact, you ruled against me at one point. That was on June 24 of this year. I withdrew the remarks, but you said that "we can't do indirectly what we can't do directly, which [is] to refer to the absence or the presence of a member."

There were previous rulings under Speaker Zwozdesky back on November 27, 2012. It was actually my former colleague from Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood who referred to the absence. Again, Speaker Zwodzesky reinforced the decision and actually interrupted question period to force Mr. Mason to reframe his question during question period.

I'll also point you, Mr. Speaker, to Beauchesne's parliamentary practice, page 141, citation 481.

481. Besides the prohibitions contained in Standing Order 18, it has been sanctioned by usage that a Member . . . must not:

(c) refer to the presence or absence of specific Members.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I believe that this is a warranted point of order, where the minister did in fact break tradition.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member. In light of the time this afternoon I might just provide some comments, and then, hopefully, we'll be able to proceed in an orderly fashion. I would say that there may be some ambiguity here this afternoon as to the hon. minister of status of women. An argument could be made that she was referring to the voting record of individuals inside the Assembly, and of course a voting record could be commented on. In this case, because of the language that she used and because of my intervention during question period suggesting that she could apologize at the end of question period, I'll ask the hon. Deputy Government House Leader to apologize and withdraw. I think we've had a good example of how that can be done today. Let's see if we can all get there.

Mrs. Savage: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We apologize and withdraw. I just would like to point out that I think what she had said was that 11 MLAs out of the caucus of 24 voted. I don't think she intended to note that anybody was either absent or present. It was the voting record, a matter of public record. We do withdraw and apologize for that.

The Speaker: I appreciate the apology and withdrawal. I think it would have been helpful to just apologize and withdraw so we could all move on in the most expedient way possible, but thank you for the apology.

Hon. members, we are at Ordres du jour.

Orders of the Day

Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019

[Adjourned debate November 5: Mr. Schweitzer]

The Speaker: Anybody wishing to join in the debate today? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie has the call.

Member Loyola: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Always a pleasure to get up in the House. As we continue to debate Bill 21, Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019, I would very much like to introduce an amendment.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

I can hand this over now and wait, Madam Speaker, until you have received the notice of amendment before I continue.

The Deputy Speaker: Thank you very much, hon. member.

All right. This will be known as amendment RA1. Hon. member, please proceed.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. Just for the record, I'd like to read this. I move that the motion for second reading of Bill 21, Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019, be amended by deleting all the words after "that" and substituting the following: "Bill 21, Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019, be not now read a second time because the Assembly is of the view that the bill will negatively affect the most vulnerable Albertans, and should not proceed without further input from the public."

As has been highlighted a number of times by my colleagues on this side of the House, Madam Speaker, there are a number of effects that this omnibus bill will actually have on the Alberta public. It will significantly affect advanced education, the student financial aid assistance act, as well as affecting seniors' and health legislation. It will impact those who are receiving AISH, employment and income supports, the seniors' benefit, the seniors' lodge program. It will eliminate the regulated rate cap that was put in place by the previous government, our government.

In terms of Health, it will give the minister the ability to set conditions on issuing practitioner certificate ID numbers, and there have been at least two constitutional challenges, that were both lost, in British Columbia and Quebec, in relation to the proposed legislation that's being brought forward by this government. As well, for Municipal Affairs, it will enable the provincial government to retain a greater portion of fines collected on behalf of municipalities, and the enabling legislation gives the minister the ability to change the police costing model to charge currently exempted municipalities.

That's not all, Madam Speaker. In terms of Labour, it gives the minister greater authority to define "employee." It sets restrictions on unionized employees for what services they access from the government. It repeals the essential services replacement worker ban, of course, as has been highlighted a number of times by a number of my colleagues but specifically the Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods and critic for Labour here, who has brought this up a number of times. It reinstates the specific bargaining unit exemptions for budget officers, systems analysts, and auditors; prescribes limits on termination and severance pay for non bargaining unit employees; and the list goes on. It formalizes bargaining oversight by laying out that the minister can issue confidential directives to employers before, during, and after collective bargaining respecting the mandate, including terms of agreement, fiscal limits, and requests for information from employers, and it does not change exemptions at all.

Madam Speaker, these are but some of the issues that are being brought forward by the Alberta NDP caucus in opposition to the government in terms of bringing forward Bill 21, that we're highly concerned about. We're already hearing from a number of stakeholders in the communities on their opposition to a number of aspects of this piece of legislation. I think that the Member for St. Albert has gotten up and spoken eloquently about the effects that this will have on AISH recipients. As well, a number of other colleagues have gotten up in the House to talk about all of this.

With that being said, Madam Speaker, I will highly encourage all of the members of this House to support this amendment. With that, I will give you thanks for the opportunity to speak.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, 29(2)(a) is available on this amendment, RA1. Any members wishing to speak under 29(2)(a)?

Mr. Toews: Madam Speaker, I just want to respond to this motion. I certainly cannot support this motion. Bill 21 is very important legislation that will be required to implement our budget. The reality is that this government has inherited a very challenging fiscal scenario within the province of Alberta, and Albertans elected us to manage our finances responsibly. We've presented a budget that we believe will do just that. In fact, we've had a number of banks that have confirmed that we have presented a very credible budget and a very credible path to balance on behalf of the province. Bill 21 is a key part of implementing that budget, so I will speak against this motion.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members under Standing Order 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, any other speakers to RA1?

Mrs. Savage: Madam Speaker, with the agreement of the House, we would like to go to one-minute bells for the remainder of the afternoon.

[Unanimous consent granted]

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other members wishing to speak to the referral motion? The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to speak to Bill 21, the Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019. There are a number of ways in which one sustains fiscal sustainability. Indeed, looking at how much you spend versus how much you take in is an important consideration, and looking at areas where one can save money to ensure that you stay closer to within your budget is a good and reasonable thing. But you also have to carefully think about each decision you make in choosing to save money because not all choices are equal, and with the implications of them, particularly when you are dealing with systems as complex as those of a government and responsibilities as broad as those of a provincial government, that impact so many people's lives, I think it's important that we give very careful consideration to the steps we take.

That's why I find it concerning that, you know, with Bill 21 here, as with Bill 20, we see this government moving on so many fronts at the same time, with, it seems, not a lot of thought, perhaps, on some of these things. In particular, today I would like to speak about the piece in Bill 21 which allows the Minister of Health to set conditions on issuing practitioner certificate ID numbers. According to the government they are intending this as a tool to try to encourage more doctors to practise in rural and remote areas. This is a concern, I know, that has been present in the province of Alberta for some time. Now, I'm not quite sure precisely how they tie that to fiscal sustainability. It is an issue, and certainly the provision of rural health care is an important part of the government's work – fair enough – and they have included it here.

One of my concerns is that this is a fairly significant move on the part of government and one that has been tried in other jurisdictions and indeed been unsuccessful. We know, Madam Speaker, that indeed there have been two constitutional challenges against precisely this type of legislation and this type of move by government, and both times government lost. That was in B.C. and Quebec. Now, of course, we know that this government has no problem with throwing money at losing legal battles as they continue to move forward with their court case against the federal government on the carbon tax and as they intend to move forward in other areas, setting up their energy war room and other things. We know that this government likes to be litigious. Fair enough. That said, I don't think that it's the most practical way to move forward in trying to address what we recognize is a real issue, that being ensuring that we have enough doctors providing support and being willing and indeed encouraged to practise in rural Alberta.

Indeed, as I said, this has been tried in other jurisdictions. The province of New Brunswick is currently reversing their policy on this. The province of New Brunswick introduced this policy mandating where physician practitioner IDs were given out, depending on where they wanted doctors to practise, and what they discovered was that it was not successful in achieving their ends. Indeed, it created new problems for them that they had not anticipated. Indeed, the Minister of Health in New Brunswick, Mr. Hugh J.A. Flemming, said: "The physician billing number system no longer works for the province. It is flawed because it restricts the number of physicians practising, restricts the mobility of physicians and impedes recruitment." That's the Health minister.

The president of the New Brunswick Medical Society, Dr. Serge Melanson: after 30 years we've come to understand that this is a failed experiment; by removing it, we're essentially streamlining the process so that we can recruit physicians to the province faster and actually give more flexibility and options to physicians who are looking to set up practice in the province.

Madam Speaker, that sounds like they are working to cut red tape. That is one of the flagship policies of this government, but they seem to feel that in this particular instance introducing more red tape is going to improve the system. It's clear from the example of New Brunswick that they have come to see that that is, in fact, not the case.

Indeed, Dr. Melanson goes on to say, "The billing number system has not proven effective in recruiting physicians in any region of the province, rural or urban, and its restrictive nature has actually proven to deter some physicians from practising in the province."

This has been echoed, Madam Speaker, by Dr. Christine Molnar, the president of the Alberta Medical Association. Her observation is: "It's ironic that on one hand, we are witnessing reduction of proven, effective support for rural care through on-call." As we learned the other day, this government is pushing through a nearly 50 per cent reduction in payments for physicians who are currently willing to practise on-call, reducing incentives for doctors to practise in rural communities. As Dr. Molnar says, she finds it ironic that this government is moving on that front in that way while, on the other hand, they're "introducing restrictive policies that will undoubtedly inhibit rural access."

She notes that their rural members "are already stressed by a heavy burden of service." She refers to Bill 21 as "[restricting] access to billing numbers in the name of improving rural physician supply," but she notes again, as I have, that this is "a strategy that has failed in [multiple] other provinces."

Now, it's problematic, Madam Speaker, that this government is moving on what has proven to be a failed policy, that does not actually achieve the ends that they claim it would achieve, and at the same time is making an enemy of yet another health care profession in the province of Alberta. This government's track record on that in its brief six months in government so far is not a good one, looking back to Bill 9, one of the first examples we had of how this government intended to collaborate with the public sector and indeed many health care workers in this province by breaking their duly negotiated contracts.

When I raised this issue with the Minister of Health during estimates on Tuesday, his comment to me was that he believed, you know, that doctors would be willing to take the government at their word that they intend to negotiate in good faith. Madam Speaker, this government has not demonstrated good faith at any stage of their work with health care professions in this province so far. Bill 9: breaking contracts, making promises that they were not in fact going to seek wage rollbacks, and now, of course, they are. Promise made, promise broken.

Indeed, to go back to a popular trope of this particular government and that many members who are sitting in this House today love to repeat about the carbon tax, this government did not include this intention in their platform. They did not tell doctors that they intended to take away their freedom to practise, that they intended to enforce that.

Now, I bring this up today in particular, Madam Speaker, because I have today here in the gallery several students from the University of Alberta medical program. These are some of the first doctors that will have the opportunity to practise in the province of Alberta under the new rules which this government is pushing forward through their sustainability omnibus bill. To the best of their knowledge, these students are not aware that the Minister of Health has taken any opportunity to reach out to and speak with medical students, who will be the first affected, for their thoughts on this bill. It seems clear from the comments from the Alberta Medical Association that they are not feeling that they've been heard either. What we are seeing and what I'm hearing from these students is that this will not be an effective way to convince them to go and practise in rural areas.

Now, I had a chance to speak with these students, and they've done some research, Madam Speaker. They've looked at other alternatives. Indeed, they pointed to a program, I believe, within the province of British Columbia, where they have outreach specifically to recruit students from rural areas and have particular streams within schools of medicine. If you recruit a student from a rural area, they are more likely to want to go back and practise in that area, and we see that often with teachers and with other professions. That is perhaps a better option for us to explore.

For a government that is talking about how it wants to invest more in the skilled trades and provide more opportunities for students to gain that experience across the province, perhaps they should consider one of the other suggestions that these students brought forward, that being that we work to open up more opportunities for students to train and do their practice in rural areas. Indeed, some of those students spoke to me about how they themselves have done that or some of their colleagues have. Once they have the opportunity to live in and experience those communities and learn more about the particular nuances and challenges of rural health care – because it is different from the city. We recognize that.

Indeed, Madam Speaker, members of the government often speak about the unique challenges that are faced in rural Alberta. So for doctors to practise there, they have to find other ways to approach. They may be required to be on call for a larger area. They may have less equipment to be able to work with. They might not be able to refer to a specialist as quickly. They have to have an adapted mode of practice. So giving students the opportunity to go out and get that experience, rather than simply by force of law telling them where they are and are not allowed to practise, I think could be a far more effective model, one that would not be subject to constitutional challenge at the expense of the Alberta taxpayer. It would not continue the habit of this government, so far, of picking fights and wielding a fairly heavy hand in how it approaches the health care sector.

These students care about health care in rural Alberta, Madam Speaker. They made that very clear to me. Some of them are from rural Alberta. Some of them are from other rural areas. Some of them are from urban centres. But they recognize the need to provide quality health care to all Albertans. They want to be part of that process. They want to support that, and I believe, you know, that all of our colleagues with the Alberta Medical Association do as well.

The path forward, Madam Speaker, is through collaboration, through innovation, another favourite word which this government likes to toss around, but when it comes to things like this, they seem to prefer to fall back on old things that have been tried and have failed. They have the opportunity here to look for new ways, new paths forward, but instead they are going with policies that have been subject to successful constitutional challenge and that are indeed being abandoned by other provinces in Canada. You know, I appreciate what Dr. Molnar brings up when she says – and then at the same time this government is creating disruption in so many other areas, by cutting the on-call pay for doctors, again, by nearly 50 per cent, which some doctors have said is almost guaranteed to put a life at risk.

These students also spoke to me about their concerns about how this government is deindexing AISH, how they are removing supports for vulnerable young people, pulling funding for housing for individuals who are homeless. These students recognize that when they are doing their practice and when they are in our health care facilities, their workload is increasing because we do not provide enough of those preventative supports.

Again that brings me back to where I started with this bill. Fiscal sustainability is not just about making cuts to balance now, it is making prudent decisions informed by recognizing that long-term investments or even just investments made now have long-term impacts. This government may be successful in lowering the deficit, though on this budget they certainly aren't. Their deficit is up from where we would have been as a government. Indeed, they are on a path to $93 billion of debt, just barely behind where we planned to go while actually investing in these front-line services, working collaboratively with our health care professions to realize savings and realize improvements.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. Any members wishing to speak? The hon. member for – the hon. Opposition House Leader.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Always a safe way out.

I was quite interested to hear what the Member for Edmonton-City Centre – to give him an opportunity to conclude his thoughts. I know that, specifically, there are guests of his in the gallery who are very concerned about this piece of legislation. I know that the Member for Edmonton-City Centre supports the amendment because this refers it back to committee for further discussion, for an opportunity for the Minister of Health to meet with students like these and doctors, to come at negotiations in good faith, not through legislation. I'm curious to hear what else the member has to say.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Indeed, that is precisely why I support this amendment and believe that this bill should not be now read a second time.

To continue, these students have expressed to me their concerns that this government is creating this level of disruption throughout the health care system, making decisions like this alongside cutting wages, cutting back on RN hours, making cuts to EMS and ambulance services, which could in fact drive more health care workers, as we did see under the austerity years under Premier Klein, out of our province. Indeed, I remember that my own family doctor at that time, who had served my family for over a decade, picked up and left for the United States. It was no longer worth his while under that government to continue to practise here. This government speaks often about their concern about investment fleeing Alberta. They seem perfectly content to drive out health care workers.

Like these students, we had physician residents that were here earlier this week who met with my colleagues and I imagine met with some government members. They were here specifically speaking again about investment in preventative supports, in particular harm reduction and other programs, which this government has continued to target and besmirch since coming into power, and expressing their concerns that some of the pivots this government may be choosing to take in how they fund addictions and mental health supports could indeed begin to drive up costs in health care and make their jobs more difficult. I can tell you that those resident students are the ones working on the front lines in the Royal Alex hospital, where they told me that they need more capacity for supervised consumption services because the spillover is landing in the halls of their hospital.

All that to say, Madam Speaker, that amongst many other reasons – again, this is an omnibus bill, which does many other things, including pausing the indexing for AISH, which again these students also have raised concerns about and so many other things – today my reason, in particular, for supporting this amendment that this should not be now read a second time is because of the further disruption this creates.

I would encourage the Minister of Health, when these students return here later this month for their regular advocacy day, to meet with them, listen to them, and hear their concerns. It's my hope that he's listening and that he will make room in his schedule to do that because the way we will move forward in improving health care in this province is not by dictative legislation and a heavy hand and the sorts of threats we are seeing coming from this government but through open negotiation and collaboration in true good faith.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members in the last minute of 29(2)(a)?

Any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I do want to thank the Member for Edmonton-City Centre for his very thoughtful comments on some of the challenges that he has with the bill.

The challenge with a piece of legislation this size, Madam Speaker, is that these types of omnibus bills, again, popular in Ottawa – it's interesting how they're becoming more popular in Alberta now. Normally omnibus legislation is for housekeeping items. This piece of legislation could be broken, quite frankly, into a number of bills because of how many people it impacts. Now, I believe that the title of Bill 21, Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019, is a bit of a misnomer. I think part of this bill could be renamed the Act to Raise Costs on Everyone, or the Picking Winners and Losers Act.

There are a couple of challenges that I have with this, Madam Speaker. Let's start with Advanced Education. The tuition cap is coming off, something that – you know, I think I can now safely say that I've heard it all sitting in this House in a short seven years. At one point in discussion or in a back and forth a couple of weeks ago the Minister of Advanced Education made it sound like students were asking for the tuition cap to be removed. They were asking government: "Please raise our tuition. This affordable postsecondary is just ridiculous. We should be paying more." That's the first time that I've ever heard of a student or students asking to pay more for postsecondary. I too was a postsecondary student once, and I can tell you that I never thought: "Wow. I'm not paying enough. I should pay more." So that's interesting.

Now, I appreciate that the minister is talking about a new agreement that they're working on. The challenges when you talk to postsecondaries – and we've heard from a number of them that their costs are going up. In fact, in all of the different places in the budget, it sounds like postsecondary education is where there are the biggest increases, up to, I believe, 23 per cent. So that is going to make postsecondary unattainable for some students in this province. For every student? No. For some students? Yes. I appreciate that the minister has talked about increasing bursaries and grants, but unless those bursaries apply to every single student, you've made postsecondary more expensive and unattainable for some students.

Madam Speaker, I am a very, very big fan of our natural resources. I know that Alberta is blessed with an abundance of oil and gas, a very valuable resource. But in my opinion, our greatest resource in this province is the people, and investing in the people of this province will ensure that we continue to have a robust economy and that Alberta continues to lead the province, the country, and quite frankly the world in a lot of different areas.

In fact, I think it was just last night that I was talking about artificial intelligence and, you know, Alberta ranking third in the world. We're about to start dropping from that position, which is alarming. I think we're missing opportunities in that space.

But postsecondary is a great vehicle, Madam Speaker, to be able to ensure that Alberta is a solutions provider. We know that Albertans are entrepreneurial and innovative, but the tools and supports that help them to be successful for some students, not all, is through our PSE rates. Increasing the interest rates on student loans will make that more costly and more expensive. I'm sure it will make some students think twice.

Another area, Madam Speaker, that's of grave concern to me. I know that the Leader of the Official Opposition along with the Member for St. Albert had a number of guests who are adults that are on the AISH program. The fact that through this bill that indexing is being cut out means that – of course, every year through inflation costs go up, our purchasing power goes down, and it means less and less money.

Now, the payments that AISH recipients get are, you know – I know the government likes to talk about how they're the highest in the country. Well, when you look at some of our costs and you look at the cost of housing alone, to my understanding, most AISH recipients have just enough to scrape by, so removing indexing is going to hurt these people and hurt their ability to continue to make ends meet, Madam Speaker.

We also see that we're pausing indexing for seniors. You know, the very people who helped build this province, and you have a government through legislation saying: yeah, we're going to attack your benefits by deindexing them. Again, anyone who stands up in this House and says that that's not a cut, they're being very loose with the facts. Deindexing means less money moving forward, which is essentially a cut.

Very similarly, Madam Speaker, anyone who says that maintaining funding, whether it's education or health care, is not a cut – it is a cut. You know, a simple example in our education system this fall: 15,000 new students entering our school system. Over the next four years there will be 60,000 new students. Not adding a single additional teacher or teacher's aide or support staff means larger class sizes and is essentially a cut. There's no two ways to argue this.

In this legislation, in Bill 21, again, cutting indexing or eliminating indexing for the seniors' lodge program, for seniors' benefits is outrageous, quite frankly, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the fact that there is a desire for Alberta to get back to balance in the budget. I appreciate that. I had many conversations with Albertans who said that we want to do that responsibly and methodically. What I don't understand is that there are decisions that are being made. The answer isn't that there isn't enough money. It's that you haven't made the priority list. You're not important enough, because there are enough funds to be able to move to a path to balance responsibly, without picking fights with the public service, with teachers and nurses and doctors, saying, "You get paid too much. We're rolling your wages back," or deindexing AISH, and picking on seniors.

Madam Speaker, within 30 days of forming government, I think, from the election – I'll stand to be corrected – the government announced a $4.7 billion corporate tax cut. There's money right out of the gate for that, but there's no money for anyone else. Everyone else: you can't; we have no money. Oh, but they did find $16,000 for a flight. That doesn't count though. It's only $16,000. But $4.7 billion for a corporate tax cut: we are still waiting and, in fact, Albertans, quite frankly, are waiting for this to help incentivize jobs, but to date I'm not aware of a single job that that's helped to create.

We've heard of some amazing companies in Alberta that are, unfortunately, taking what they've gotten from a corporate tax cut and are investing it in Saskatchewan, investing it in Newfoundland, investing it in other provinces, or investing it in the U.S., but they're not investing it here. That flies in the face of the Premier and this government saying: "No, no, no. This corporate tax cut is going to help Alberta be more competitive. It's going to help businesses stay here." Okay. Well, you've yet to produce one example of that. "It's going to trickle down, and it's going to help create jobs." Well, again, haven't found a company yet. I'm looking, Madam Speaker, all the time to find companies that are going to use that to help create jobs.

Meanwhile other tools that were helping Alberta companies create jobs have been cut, have been axed. Once again, these are choices that are being made. You know, for me, it's frustrating that we're seeing the real priorities of this government.

Regarding energy, the electricity cap is coming off, so already we are hearing from groups of people around the province that are expecting their electricity prices to shoot up. Soon, Madam Speaker, you can look forward to your insurance rates going up substantially. It's ironic for a government to talk about: we're saving people money. No, you're not. You're playing a shell game, and you're actually costing people more. There's a list of fees in the budget. That means that everything is going to be more expensive, from user fees to insurance to – I'll look to my colleagues for other examples of the costs that are in the budget that are going to be going up. [interjection] Oh, of course. Thank you very much, Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Of course, you know, it's also rich, Madam Speaker, I just have to say. The other side criticizes our former government about the carbon tax, that we didn't campaign on it. Show me in your literature where you campaigned on raising personal income taxes on every single Albertan, because I'd love to see that piece of literature. You can't have it both ways. You can't attack us for saying – we actually did talk about a climate leadership plan throughout the whole campaign, and a price on carbon was part of the climate leadership plan. I understand. I'm not arguing to resurrect it. I appreciate that Albertans voted against it. But they didn't vote for you to bring in and raise provincial income taxes on them. Not a single Albertan knew that that was something that you were going to do, nor was it something that you campaigned on.

That's in the first couple of sections. Sorry; I'm jumping ahead really quickly. Of course, my esteemed colleague from Edmonton-City Centre spoke about the government's ability to unilaterally terminate the doctor compensation agreement with the AMA. If you rip up a contract and break your word, then your word means nothing. How can any Albertan trust you when you say: "No, no, no. Here's an agreement, but we're actually not going to honour that because it's not convenient." Once again, Madam Speaker, it's not that we don't have the money. No. We spent $4.7 billion, but just not on you. We spent it on others, that have still failed to produce the results that were promised.

Now, I get that the Premier is very excited about the MacKinnon report and because a couple of economists say that there will be jobs created. I've yet to hear a timeline, Madam Speaker. You know what? The other day I was talking to an unemployed Albertan, who said: "You know what? I need a job now, not in two years from now, when the corporate tax cut may or may not help." When I asked the Premier, I mean, his timeline was: maybe two years. So let's say to these Albertans: "You know what? I know that you have a mortgage payment coming up in two weeks. Can you wait two more years? Then maybe you'll have a job to make that payment." No.

But tools that were helping the economy grow – and, yes, our tax credits may have helped only a few hundred companies, but you know what? They were working. The numbers don't lie, Madam Speaker. We see the return on investment. We see how companies were growing. They were hiring people and helping our economy. Those tools have had the legs knocked out from under them. I'm growing tired of arguing with the minister of economic development and trade, who either doesn't get it or doesn't care, that the numbers for the tax credits were helping to create jobs. It's a tool that was working.

In this bill, Bill 21, again, attacking the very people who take care of us when we're sick, the very folks who are in high demand – I mean, you know, let's talk about rural Alberta and access to doctors and to health care. We have members of the government stand up daily and talk about either a care facility in their constituency or the need of a hospital or refurbishing or upgrading a hospital. I guess the plan is: let's fix some buildings, and then let's not worry about having anybody work in them. That was actually the MO a couple of governments ago, where they would build shiny buildings, and then they wouldn't staff them. The Member for Edmonton-North West remembers some of the schools that were built, yet there was no money for teachers or staff. That's great; so now there are empty buildings.

Other areas of this piece of legislation attacking workers: again, it opens up when it comes to labour, in addition to going after doctors . . . [Mr. Bilous's speaking time expired] Time flies when you're having fun, Madam Speaker. I have many more things to say.

The Deputy Speaker: There is an opportunity for Standing Order 29(2)(a) to be used. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview sharing his thoughts on this bill. I know that there were a couple of other things that he wanted to touch on, so I don't want to take up much time. I was hoping he might share those because I think those are important things that we need to know when we're making critical decisions about an omnibus bill that, quite honestly, I think should be renamed the Act to Make Life More Difficult. If he could share his thoughts.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker, and I'll thank the Member for Edmonton-Decore. I'll wrap up my comments here. It is my pleasure to speak to second reading and to speak in favour of this amendment that gives the government an opportunity to pause on this bill. I mean, I've tried to highlight some of the areas that I think are very, very challenging and very problematic for a number of Albertans. In fact, the personal income tax increase affects absolutely every single Albertan, but this one for seniors, for people on AISH, for supports for the most vulnerable, for our doctors, for labour, for our public-sector workers – really, I encourage the government to look at this amendment that merely sends it to committee so that, you know, some of the consequences, intended and unintended, can be reviewed. It allows for the government to have good-faith conversations with the very groups that it's trying to legislate.

You know, Madam Speaker, the labour unrest that Bill 21 will cause is significant. I don't know if you recall, but years ago a former PC government tried to bring in a number of different pieces of legislation attacking public-sector workers. They caused wildcat strikes all over the province. It caused massive disruptions, and it cost money.

Under our government, in four years, do you know how many labour disputes there were and unrest that caused an economic impact on the government or a real impact on service delivery for Albertans? You guessed it. None, because we met with these folks at the bargaining table in good faith. You know what we said? For many of these public-sector workers we asked them to accept zeros for a couple of years because Alberta was in a tough spot. We recognized the private sector was hurting. A lot of people had lost their jobs, but we said to the public sector: "Your salaries don't spike when prices go up. When the economy is hot, you're paid the same, but you have stability because when the economy hits a recession, you still have a good-paying job." We asked them through good-faith negotiations, and they accepted. They said: we understand that we need to do our part.

I can tell you, Madam Speaker, that legislating to roll back people's wages or open up agreements is an attack on working people. I think it will permanently question the faith and trust that the doctors and others have in this government to honour their word. If you don't have your word, then I don't know what you have.

With that, I will urge all members to support this amendment.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any members wishing to speak to amendment RA1?

Seeing none, I shall call the question on amendment RA1 as moved by the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview on behalf of the Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Bill Status Report for the 30th Legislature - 1st Session (2019)

Activity to Thursday, November 7, 2019

The Bill sponsor's name is in brackets following the Bill title. If it is a money Bill, ($) will appear between the title and the sponsor's name. Numbers following each Reading refer to Hansard pages where the text of debates is found; dates for each Reading are in brackets following the page numbers. Bills numbered 1 to 200 are Government Bills. Bills numbered 201 or higher are Private Members' Public Bills. Bills numbered with a "Pr" prefix are Private Bills.

* An asterisk beside a Bill number indicates an amendment was passed to that Bill; the Committee line shows the precise date of the amendment.

The date a Bill comes into force is indicated in square brackets after the date of Royal Assent. If a Bill comes into force "on proclamation," "with exceptions," or "on various dates," please contact Legislative Counsel, Alberta Justice, for details at 780.427.2217. The chapter number assigned to the Bill is entered immediately following the date the Bill comes into force. SA indicates Statutes of Alberta; this is followed by the year in which it is included in the statutes, and its chapter number. Please note, Private Bills are not assigned chapter number until the conclusion of the Fall Sittings.

1:30 p.m.

Monday, November 18, 2019

Prayers

The Speaker: Hon. members, the prayer. Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and to her government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideas but, laying aside all private interests and prejudice, keep in mind their responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all. Amen.

Hon. members, ladies and gentlemen, please remain standing as we will now be led in the singing of our national anthem by His Worship Mayor Ben Kellert. I would invite you to all participate in the language of your choice.

Hon. Members:

O Canada, our home and native land!
True patriot love in all of us command.
With glowing hearts we see thee rise,
The True North strong and free!
From far and wide, O Canada,
We stand on guard for thee.
God keep our land glorious and free!
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.

The Speaker: Thank you. Please be seated.

Introduction of Visitors

The Speaker: Hon. members, I'm very pleased to welcome our very first elected anthem singer, the mayor of Killam, Ben Kellert. His Worship has recorded three albums, sung at numerous football games and hockey games and even the occasional rodeo as well as many seniors' events, including at churches and lodges. Today he is joined by his wife, Tanny. I invite them to rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Hon. members, this afternoon we have a School at the Legislature group visiting us from the constituency of Edmonton-South. Please welcome the students from Roberta MacAdams.

Also joining us are dedicated members of the public service, employees from the Ministry of Service Alberta. Welcome, and thanks for everything you do.

Also, guests of the Minister of Advanced Education, representatives from students' unions and student union associations from the University of Alberta, MacEwan University, and Mount Royal University.

Last but certainly not least, in the Speaker's gallery this afternoon are family members of the MLA for Athabasca-Barrhead-Westlock: the hon. member's son Jaron van Dijken, his grandchildren Niko and Emma, and the beloved Mrs. van Dijken.

I invite you all to rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Freedom of Expression

Mr. Jones: Freedom of expression and peaceful protest are foundational to the academic experience, the pursuit of knowledge, scholarship, teaching, and all intellectual endeavours. The purpose of a university requires the fullest and most varied expression of intellectual life for students, faculty, and staff. Critical inquiry, discovery, exchange of diverse perspective and ideas, and open discussion and debate are fundamental to the intellectual and academic life of any institution.

Freedom of expression is a fundamental right. It reinforces all other human rights, allowing societies to develop and progress. The ability to express opinions and speak freely is essential to bringing about change in a society. Free speech is not only about your ability to speak but also the ability to listen to others and allow others' views to be heard.

Mr. Speaker, every student has a right and responsibility to speak, be heard, and engage in active citizenship and peaceful protest. We have some of our own postsecondary students with us today who are here to do just that, speak and be heard. That is why our government has asked all of our institutions to implement the University of Chicago statement on freedom of expression, so that our students and faculty have the highest protections. We firmly believe that freedom of speech and expression are essential to a healthy democracy.

During this time of fiscal crisis it is important that all of us work together and hear voices from all across this province as we work towards a stronger economy with more jobs. Our government is committed to ensuring Albertans from all walks of life live healthy and prosperous lives now and into the future. While we know Budget 2019 came with some very difficult decisions, I am confident that we can work together, moving forward to make Alberta the best place to live, learn, and do business once again.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Oil and Film Industries in Alberta

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I've had many reach out to my office regarding the film industry, and I wanted to share a story with you today from a stakeholder who compares his experiences in both the oil and film industries in Alberta.

The well was drilled by Shell; the film, Unforgiven, made by Warner Brothers. Shell hires a drilling supervisor; Warner Brothers hires an executive producer. Shell hires a drilling contractor; Warner Brothers hires a production manager. The drilling contractor hires a tool push, a driller, and a derrickman; Warner Brothers hires director Clint Eastwood, a first assistant director, and a cinematographer. The drilling contractor hires motormen, roughnecks, lease hands, et cetera; Warner Brothers hires gaffers, grips, makeup, hair, props, et cetera. Both companies hire accounting and payroll people.

In the case of the 4,500 metre triple rig 110 trucks moved it to site in the mountains near Hinton; Unforgiven rolled about 60 trucks, but unlike a rig that moves twice in a year, the film trucks moved every day until the final month of filming. On site at the drilling rig they had roughly 30 people in camp; on Unforgiven at various points they had 100 people in small-town hotels at Brooks, Drumheller, and High River.

Both crews spent money in small-town Alberta. Both projects worked 12-hour days. The pay scales on drilling rigs are similar in hourly rates to Warner Brothers' film crew. The Shell rig was blue collar; a film set is also heavy blue collar. Both crew rates are in the mid-five figures, all the way to six figures in annual Alberta taxable salaries.

Who works on the rigs and films? Your friends, neighbours, hockey coaches, et cetera, regular people trying to make a good life for their families, who love where they live. He always thinks fondly of his days on that big rig in the mountains and on the Oscar-winning Unforgiven set.

Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the stakeholders for sharing their stories with me. I will continue to highlight the toll that this budget has on Alberta families and blue-collar jobs.

Thank you.

550th Anniversary of Guru Nanak Dev Ji's Birth

Mr. Toor: Mr. Speaker, diversity is one of Canada's greatest strengths, and Canadians benefit from our country's multiculturalism and spirit of openness. On November 12 Sikhs in Canada and around the world celebrated the 550th birthday of Sri Guru Nanak Sahib Ji. He's the founder of the Sikh religion and one of the world's greatest symbols of peace, unity, and social justice. During his lifetime Guru Nanak travelled the world promoting equality, diversity, service, and compassion, which became the core principles of Sikhism.

He brought enlightenment to people who lived in darkness, where women were considered impure and less than human. Baba Nanak condemned those who committed abuse and discrimination against women. To him, this was one of the most shameful deeds that one could commit. Guru Nanak asks in his hymns how a woman can be called inferior, from whom kings and saints are born, and says that the reproductive strength of a woman is in itself a symbol of divine supremacy.

Many Sikh Canadians bring these values to life and enrich our country every day, reminding us that the principles of inclusion and respect for all are not only at the heart of the Sikh faith but are also central to all Canadians.

On this very special day I also want to thank the governments of India and Pakistan for their beautiful gift of opening the Sri Kartarpur Sahib corridor. I am hopeful this goodwill gesture will help to ease some of the tension between two nuclear nations.

Canada is proud to be home to one of the largest Sikh communities outside India. As a member representing the large Sikh community in Alberta I wish all those who celebrated the birth of Guru Nanak Dev Ji the best wishes of the Assembly.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods has a statement.

Premier's and Adviser's Travel Expenses

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Recently this Premier tried to justify sticking Alberta taxpayers with the bill for a $16,000 joyride in a private plane for him, his buddies, and his buddies' wives. The Premier claimed it was just a bit of Alberta hospitality. Well, to borrow a phrase, that dog won't hunt, because while the Premier and his friends were piling into the party plane, Mr. Doug Ford, the Premier of Ontario, made the same trip on a commercial flight. It's a dark day when Doug Ford has better judgment than the Premier of Alberta.

In just a few moments we'll hear him again try to defend the indefensible. This time he's sticking Alberta taxpayers with an $18,000 bill for his principal adviser to make four trips to London, where he dined out 43 times, Ubered around the city, and slept in the finest hotels. Maybe he'll say that it was a trade mission. Maybe he'll say that it was a war room mission. Maybe he'll say that it was kind of like the war room but not exactly.

Those are the three different stories his office has produced so far, Mr. Speaker. The excuses don't matter. There is no government business that requires a political staffer to stay in a five-star hotel, in a historic Georgian townhouse with an attached art nouveau champagne bar. This hotel describes itself as "a home to aristocrats." It was opened by the favourite chef of French Emperor Napoleon III.

So is Alberta in tough times or not? To borrow another phrase, this Premier needs to pick a lane. Here today in Alberta teachers are being laid off, disability benefits are being cut, and people are being thrown off their drug plans to pay for the Premier's $4.7 billion corporate handout.

I know there are members of the government caucus that deplore what is happening in the current Premier's office: the police investigations, the sneaky tax increases, the no-bid contracts for friends and family, and now this repeated abuse of taxpayer dollars. Albertans have seen this movie before, Mr. Speaker, and the sequel is always worse.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Airdrie-Cochrane.

Federal Methane Regulations

Mr. Guthrie: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. A potential catastrophic situation is about to be imposed on Alberta on January 1 with the federal backstop for both methane and carbon coming into effect. The cost to our energy sector will be enormous, and it could lead to more companies, especially the smaller gas producers, going bankrupt. In fact, the methane regulations, by the federal government's own regulatory impact analysis statement, indicate it will cost Alberta billions to comply, a cost the feds don't even try to hide.

The largest emitter of methane in the entire country lies at Toronto's waste disposal facility, but I don't hear cries to reduce those GHGs.

Our province has worked for months with the federal government to achieve equivalency, but a decision has not been made because it has rested at the political level with Justin Trudeau. That said, we shouldn't even be having these discussions as both backstops are a significant intrusion into provincial jurisdiction, and we should seriously consider a constitutional challenge. The basis of that challenge lies in section 92A of the Constitution, which states:

92A. (1) In each province, the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to . . .

(b) development, conservation and management of non-renewable natural resources and forestry resources in the province, including laws in relation to the rate of primary production therefrom.

Albertans just got rid of an ideologically driven NDP provincial government who supported special-interest groups, stacked on taxes and red tape, and imposed a carbon tax. Now the federal government wants to pick up where they left off and pile on carbon and methane regulations in their quest to decimate our province's resource sector. This is not right. Albertans said, "No more," and elected us to defend this province, and, Mr. Speaker, that's exactly what we intend to do.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Edmonton-North West.

Postsecondary Education Funding

Mr. Eggen: Thank you. Mr. Speaker, today I joined students from the University of Alberta and MacEwan University. They were protesting hikes to tuition, increased interest rates on student loans, and cuts to overall budgets.

This Premier blew a $4.7 billion hole in the budget with a no-jobs corporate giveaway. Students are upset that the government is now asking them to pay double to dig him out of this mess. Just a few weeks ago we were presented with a budget that has drastic negative impacts on postsecondary students and institutions. The government is proposing huge cuts to postsecondary funding, doubling tuition costs, and increasing interest on student loans. In addition, the government cut the education tax credit and cancelled the student summer employment program. These changes will have significant impacts on our students. Some students have told me that they will have to delay their education or they just won't be able to go at all. These short-sighted decisions will not only just affect many of our students individually but will also hurt the economic future of our province.

Mr. Speaker, there is a better way. Under our government, tuition went from the highest in the country to amongst the lowest in Canada. We also limited noninstructional fees to postsecondary students. Our changes saved students an average of more than $2,000 for a four-year degree.

The students were clear on the steps of the Legislature today. They should not have to pay for this government's irresponsible $4.7 billion giveaway to profitable corporations.

Tax Policy and Government Spending

Mrs. Pitt: Winston Churchill said, "For a nation to try to tax itself into prosperity is like a man standing in a bucket and trying to lift himself up by the handle." Not that that stopped the previous government. Hikes on personal income taxes resulted in lower revenue. Hikes on corporate income taxes led to lower revenue. After all that, they decided to take everything with a carbon tax. Well, Mr. Speaker, if you find yourself digging into a hole, stop digging. Some people still don't get it. The crowd that wants to spend like there's no tomorrow is now asking for a provincial sales tax. In the tough economic times that we find ourselves in, the spenders want us to dig deeper into the pockets of hard-working Albertans. This can't go on.

We have a government that is going to do better. We know that we spend more per person than B.C., Ontario, and our recipient Quebec. We know this because we took the time to study our finances through Dr. MacKinnon's review. More of the same is literally something Albertans cannot afford. We cannot continue to spend more and get less in return. We finally have a government committed to getting our fiscal house in order and getting our economy back on track. We're protecting our cherished services like health care and education while making choices so that we have better and smarter public services. We're taking a reasonable and steady approach despite what the over-the-top critics are saying. After years of being the highest spending province, we're going to do what our critics couldn't do, find 3 cents on the dollar.

Climate Change Strategy

Mr. Schmidt: Climate data released earlier this month revealed that this past October was the hottest October on record. September was the hottest September on record. So was June. So was July; 2019 will be one of the five hottest years in human history. The evidence of climate change is all around us, and with only eight years left to drastically reduce carbon dioxide emissions, we are quickly running out of time to prevent its worst effects from happening.

Rapidly reducing carbon dioxide emissions is pretty straightforward. We need to invest in renewable energy, energy efficiency, public transportation, and research and development. The money to pay for these measures has to come from somewhere, and Alberta has been collecting it from heavy emitters since 2007. But this government is committed to collecting less money from heavy emitters and using that money not to reduce emissions but to pay for a $4.7 billion corporate giveaway.

We tried to get this government on the right track by bringing forward an amendment to their heavy emitter carbon price legislation that would require all the money collected to be spent on reducing carbon emissions and mitigating the impact of climate change, and we didn't even prescribe where it should be spent.

We know the UCP loves to mock purchasing shower heads and light bulbs even though those are proven ways to improve energy efficiency, but what we don't know is what they think we should do to tackle climate change. We've heard a lot from the other side about saddling future generations with debt but nothing about saddling future generations with the catastrophic effects of climate change. Eight years from now, when it's too late to do anything about the problem, the members opposite will have to explain to their children why they spent so much effort reducing the debt from $95 billion to $93 billion while doing nothing about what really mattered, tackling climate change.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The Leader of Her Majesty's Official Opposition.

Premier's Travel and Bill 22

Ms Notley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I believe that today Bill 22 will be tabled in the House. Now, the contents of that bill are under embargo. I believe, however, that Albertans will want the Premier to account for it very much. To the Premier: why are you scurrying away to Texas instead of facing Albertans and being accountable for your actions?

The Speaker: The hon. the Premier.

Mr. Kenney: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our government was elected on a mandate to get Alberta back to work, in part by restoring investor confidence, by going around the world to tell them the story that Alberta is open for business. That's one of the reasons I'll be travelling to Texas for the next three days to meet with CEOs of some of the largest energy companies and petrochemical companies in the world, to discuss, potentially, billions and tens of billions of dollars of future investment that will create jobs here in Alberta. While the NDP used to fly people like Tzeponah Berman around attacking our energy industry, we're going to where the decisions are made to get jobs created in Alberta once again.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, I suspect those investors are also going to be very interested in the health and safety of this province's democracy. The Finance minister had an embargoed press conference with media on this from which the opposition was barred, but it's not the Finance minister who's attacking our democracy; it's this Premier. Once again I ask: why won't this Premier look Albertans in the eye and explain himself? He can't stay in Texas forever.

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, first of all, I understand the opposition had a briefing on that bill today. Secondly, I'm here answering questions. I always am available every week to answer questions from the media and in this Assembly. But where the NDP drove tens of billions of dollars of job-creating investment out of this province during their four years of catastrophic economic mismanagement, we are now proactively going out to try to restore investor confidence and bring some of that money back to Alberta. That's what Albertans hired us to do, and we'll do it without relent to restore investor confidence, to once again create good jobs in the Alberta economy.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, a little bit of a hypothetical question, still linked to the topic a bit: if Paul Martin had fired Justice Gomery during the sponsorship scandal, if Justin Trudeau had fired Commissioner Dion during the SNC-Lavalin case, if Stephen Harper had fired the commissioner of the RCMP during the Mike Duffy investigation, in the event that those absolutely unfathomable scenarios had ever occurred, doesn't the Premier think that those leaders would have an obligation to stick around and explain themselves to the people of this country?

The Speaker: The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition will know that House of Commons, page 509, would prevent the asking of a hypothetical, but if the hon. Premier would like to respond, he's more than welcome to do so.

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, the government isn't firing anybody, but the voters fired the NDP in the last election for their economic mismanagement, and then they hired a new government to focus on job creation. They understand that that means restoring investor confidence. You know, I have here the expense tabs of the NDP's friend and ally Tzaporah Berman. That leader of the NDP sent Tzaporah Berman around the country, costing thousands of tax dollars, to fight against Alberta's energy industry, to fight to kill jobs in Alberta. We're doing the exact opposite.

The Speaker: The hon. the Leader of the Official Opposition for her second set of questions.

Ms Notley: None of those things are correct, Mr. Speaker.

Premier's Adviser's Travel Expenses Public Inquiry Commissioner's Legal Contract Award

Ms Notley: What is correct, private planes, luxury hotels, sweetheart deals? Mr. Speaker, pro tip: this is not what tightening your belt looks like. The Premier and his friends are living large, giving out $4.7 billion to corporations while insurance goes up, school fees go up, vulnerable Albertans get less. The Calgary Sun says that Toryland is back in business. To the Premier: why are you cutting services, preaching fiscal responsibility at the same time that you fly around in chartered planes, let your staff bill Albertans for luxury hotels, and let your friends jump through loopholes to hire their family?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, none of those things is true. I don't know where to start. Is she talking about Dr. Legg, a man with a PhD from Yale, who has made a massive pay cut to help work for this government to get people back to work? You know, I've got here the NDP's friend Tzaporah Berman staying at the Fairmont Hotel, charging taxpayers for her mochas and cappuccinos at Starbucks while she was campaigning to kill energy jobs in this province. I'm proud to have Dr. Legg going to major financial institutions to fight back for this industry and this province.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, the Premier's top adviser – poor guy, only making $200,000 a year – had to spend at least $18,000 for luxury London trips as well. I say "at least" because we don't know how much more he expensed to the war room slush fund. First, London was a trade mission. Then it was a secret, undercover operation. Either way, this Premier's 007 needed a champagne bar and vitamin C showers. To the Premier. Albertans deserve to know what expensive tastes are being satisfied through that $120 million slush fund. When will they come clean to Albertans?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, the answer is none. There is no such thing as a slush fund. Dr. Legg works for the Premier's office and, through it, for Executive Council. His expenses are transparent. His travel expenses were arranged by the government travel office according to government travel rules, flying economy and staying in government-booked hotels. You know what he's doing? He's fighting back against the Extinction Rebellion nonsense that the NDP has aligned itself with while they're out there in front of the Legislature campaigning for the shutdown of our energy industry. We've had to dispatch somebody to argue against that case in amongst the major financial institutions of the world.

Ms Notley: Actually, we were out in front of the Legislature standing up with the young people who see this government destroying their future.

Now, we also learned that the head of the Premier's public inquiry into un-Albertan activities, coincidentally a major donor to the Justice minister, gave a $1 million contract to his own son's law firm: no bids, no business case, no oversight except by the same public official who oversaw Tobaccogate. To the Premier: did you intentionally set this up to encourage this kind of cronyism? And if not, why don't you apologize to Albertans and fix this mess?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, first of all, the NDP fear and smear has no limits. Mr. Allan has 40 years of experience as one of the country's leading forensic accountants, former president of the Alberta chartered accountants institute, former chair of the Calgary Stampede, chair of Calgary Economic Development, chair of the Canadian Tourism Commission, voted the most respected member of the Calgary community, Alberta Order of Excellence recipient, has worked in the nonprofit field for the homeless, for indigenous people, for the arts community. You know, we've asked Commissioner Allan to get to the bottom of the foreign-funded campaign against this province. He's a widely respected Albertan. How dare they smear his name.

The Speaker: The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

Ms Notley: How dare these guys exempt him from conflict-of-interest rules, just like any other Albertan.

Panel on Federal-provincial Relations

Ms Notley: The economy is slowing, jobs continue to be lost, and now our kids' future is in jeopardy. The Premier's $4.7 billion corporate handout hasn't created a single job, and now he's trying to distract from that failure by sending Preston Manning and friends on a road show to relaunch ideas that Ralph Klein shot down in 2004. To the Premier: will you admit that this is a cynical attempt to play on people's fears, or are you trying to distract from the fact that you are failing to create jobs and to grow the economy? Which is it?

Mr. Kenney: That question perfectly illustrates why that was the first Premier to lose an election after one term in the province's history, Mr. Speaker. That leader and her party are so radically out of touch with the frustration of Albertans and our role in the federation that they actually voted for the federal NDP, that got 11 per cent of the popular vote. They went out and campaigned with Extinction Rebellion to shut down our energy industry, and now they refuse to listen to the voices of Albertans who say that we need a fair deal in the federation. We instead are going to listen with respect to those Albertans and come back with a plan to get fairness for Alberta in the Canadian federation.

Ms Notley: Albertans are angry, and they want a Premier who will focus on getting them jobs, not try to distract them with shiny objects. Mr. Speaker, the head of the Calgary Chamber of commerce calls it politics over policy and says that it creates uncertainty. Doug Griffiths rejected the ideas of Ralph Klein, saying that they were all risky and that they would cost too much. So either this is all a show or the Premier is seriously considering these risky, billion-dollar, ideological experiments, not one of which he discussed with Albertans in the last election. To the Premier: which is it?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, the NDP still doesn't get it. It is about jobs. When they made their failed strategic alliance with Justin Trudeau, they gave him a licence to shut down Northern Gateway, kill Energy East, surrender on Keystone XL, bungle Trans Mountain, bring in the no-more-pipelines law, bring in the tanker ban, bring in the cap on oil sands emissions, bring in the carbon tax: a body blow, all of that, to our industry and our jobs. Albertans elected us to fight back. We're going to listen to them on how best to do so, and we are going to keep our word with Albertans. [interjection]

The Speaker: Order.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, fighting for jobs doesn't mean attacking people's retirement. You know, the Premier is a privileged recipient of a six-figure pension from Ottawa, so it's hardly surprising that he doesn't understand that for most Albertans CPP is the only retirement money they can count on. Now his panel is floating the idea of taking it over for politics. To the Premier: how does someone who only describes pensions as a tax on employers and someone who didn't lose a night's sleep over taking $30 a month out of the pockets of people with severe disabilities think Albertans should ever, ever, ever trust him with their retirement?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, we're going to listen to Albertans, unlike the NDP, who are rigidly ideological about these questions. Albertans want this province to assert itself within the federation. One idea is to do what Quebec has done successfully for six decades, to operate our own pension plan. We'll listen to Albertans on that. Ultimately, Albertans would have the final say in a referendum, but doing so, in principle, would allow us to reduce job-killing payroll taxes on Albertans. Because we have the youngest population in the country, we subsidize benefits for the others to the tune of $3 billion a year. How about the NDP actually stand up for Alberta for a change?

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Education Funding

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. The Education minister took $10 million away from Rocky View schools to pay for a $4.7 billion, no-jobs corporate handout, and last week both of Airdrie's government MLAs confirmed that Rocky View is facing provincial funding cuts. That means more fees, less support for kids with complex needs and larger class sizes. To the Premier: can he explain why his Minister of Education just removed the class-size reporting requirements? Just admit that this is an attempt to conceal the impact of her cuts.

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education has the call.

Member LaGrange: Thank you for the question, Mr. Speaker. The reporting was tied to a failed grant. That is why I am now assembling a working group of education partners to re-examine this issue. Instead of working with education partners to develop new solutions, the NDP chose to continue to recklessly shovel money into a program that the Auditor General had already called ineffective. We will not do this. We are going to move forward.

Ms Hoffman: Hiring teachers and educational assistants is not recklessly funnelling money anywhere, Mr. Speaker.

The Premier's cuts mean that Rocky View parents are going to pay $308 in busing fees. For the Premier's benefit let me explain that this is an onerous amount of money for ordinary folks. These parents are also paying for the Premier's provincial adviser to sleep in a luxury, five-star London hotel. How can the Premier justify charging parents $308 more while his best buddy sips champagne in London?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The truth of the matter is that every single student who walks through our doors is funded. The envelope still remains at $8.223 billion. We collect approximately $2.5 billion in education tax dollars, but we are spending $8.223 billion. This is unsustainable, and we are going to move forward.

Ms Hoffman: The next shoe is about to drop, Mr. Speaker. Parents and kids in Calgary schools will be learning in the days to come about an unprecedented mid-year fee hike. This fee hike used to be illegal. These new fees are the direct result of the Premier cutting the budget to Calgary schools. Why does the Premier think it's okay to charge parents more while he gives $4.7 billion away in a no-jobs corporate handout?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Over 98 per cent of the Education budget flows to school authorities who deliver services to students. Over the last 15 years enrolment has grown by 25 per cent, inflation by 33 per cent, but operationally we've grown by 80 per cent. Again, this is unsustainable. Boards have the autonomy to allocate funds, and I expect them to prioritize their funding by directing it to the classroom and continuing to put teachers in front of students. Teachers in front of students are the ones that have the greatest impact in the classroom.

Thank you.

Canada Pension Plan

Mr. Stephan: Mr. Speaker, over the past 10 years the design of federal formulas and programs have stripped more than $200 billion from Albertans to other areas of the country. One example is CPP. In 2017 CPP contributions by Alberta businesses and workers were about $3 billion more than benefits paid to Alberta retirees. A government panel is soliciting input from Albertans on an alternative Alberta pension plan. To the minister: what similarities would an Alberta pension plan have to the existing CPP?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and the President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Canada Pension Plan Act states that any province wishing to withdraw from the Canada pension plan, or CPP, must create a provincial pension plan with comparable benefits. If Alberta were to create its own provincial pension plan, Albertans would receive benefits similar to what they would have received under the CPP. While the benefits would be similar, there are reasons to believe that Albertans would benefit from lower payroll taxes under a provincial pension plan.

Mr. Stephan: Given that the Trudeau Liberals over the next four years are increasing CPP payroll taxes for Canadian businesses and workers by over 20 per cent and given that Alberta businesses and workers already subsidize the rest of the country with billions more each year than is paid to Alberta retirees, to the minister: will this increase to the CPP further disproportionately exacerbate the billions already taken from Alberta businesses and workers for other parts of the country?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and the President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Albertans work more hours and make higher wages than Canadians in other provinces. As a result of that, Alberta will pay the lion's share of the enhanced Canada pension plan premiums. The end result of this attempt to expand the Canada pension plan will be a greater net transfer from Alberta to the rest of Canada.

Mr. Stephan: Given that CPP taxes for Alberta businesses and workers could be lower if Alberta did not have to make multibillion-dollar subsidy payments every year and given that with lower payroll taxes Alberta businesses could be more competitive, incent more employment, with Alberta workers retaining more after-tax salaries, to the minister: if Alberta had its own pension plan, could there be an opportunity for lower payroll taxes while maintaining or increasing benefits for Alberta retirees?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. There have been independent reports that would indicate that if Alberta administered its own pension plan, it could result in lower contributions for employees and employers in this province, and that's why the Premier announced this as an idea to be added to the fair deal panel. One thing that I want to be clear and that the Premier has made clear, before any final decisions would be made, this concept will be researched thoroughly and it would ultimately be brought before Albertans in a referendum.

Automobile Insurance Premiums

Ms Phillips: Higher income tax, higher insurance, raiding our retirement savings, higher property taxes, higher deficit, same debt. The Premier's $4.7 billion corporate handout isn't creating any jobs. It's just costing Albertans more. The Premier gave a massive gift to the insurance industry by taking the cap off our car insurance rates. Constituents of mine have shown me bills that have gone up by $500 or more a year. To the Premier: why are Albertans paying higher car insurance as part of your high-deficit, high-taxes corporate giveaway agenda?

2:10

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, the previous government brought in a rate cap, which was just a Band-Aid on a problem that didn't fundamentally deal with the reasons why insurance premiums are going up in the automobile industry. Their rate cap was resulting in fewer Alberta insurers, which was resulting in less choice for automobile owners, and would ultimately result in much higher costs. We will not kick this problem down the road like the previous government did. We will work to deal with the underlying problems in the Alberta insurance industry. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Ms Phillips: Well, you know, Mr. Speaker, this minister and this Premier need to show leadership and find a better way to regulate insurance rates than slamming Albertans who can't afford it, or would Albertans only get a break if they were taking a private plane?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. That is exactly what we're doing. We're taking time to identify the fundamental issues that are creating higher premiums and costs in Alberta's automobile insurance industry. We're going to work with the industry and with Alberta consumers to ensure that we have a solution that will ensure Alberta automobile insurance consumers have sustainable, cost-effective premiums in the future. [interjection]

The Speaker: Order.

Ms Phillips: Well, given, Mr. Speaker, that the time for that conversation is before people get stiffed with hundreds of dollars in new bills every month and given that Kim Zook of Tofield told the media, quote, $30 isn't much for your average joe, but to me it's a tank of gas for four days – right? – so it's harder for me than a lot of people, why is this minister more interested in defending his fancy staff toot-tooting around London than he is in Kim Zook of Tofield's pocketbook?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, as I've mentioned, we're dealing with the fundamental underlying issues that are pushing insurance rates up in this province, and unlike the previous government who didn't have the courage to deal with the issues facing the insurance industry, this government will deal with those issues on behalf of Albertans.

Mr. Carson: Mr. Speaker, the list of Albertans feeling the pinch of this Premier pandering to insurance companies continues to grow. Calgary father Scott Johnsen told Global News that the insurance hike will likely force his family to give up one of their vehicles. Just one problem: both of them work. To the Premier: can you explain to Scott Johnsen how exactly he and his wife are supposed to keep getting to work and supporting their young child if they have to sell off one of their vehicles?

Mr. Toews: Again, Mr. Speaker, we are aware that insurance premiums are going up. We're also aware that there are underlying contributing factors that are driving those costs up. It's complex. We're already starting to work with the industry and with consumer groups to ensure that we can deal with those underlying issues and ensure that Albertans have sustainable, cost-effective insurance in the future. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Mr. Carson: Well, Mr. Speaker, given that Albertans from across the province have written to us with concerns of their insurance premiums rising even with clean records and given that the Premier and the minister don't seem to want to budge on their talking points as real Albertans struggle to keep their vehicles on the road, to the minister: will you commit to releasing a list of every organization you consulted before lifting the insurance rate cap?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, the previous government, the NDP government, brought in a rate cap, which, again, limited options, ultimately limited products that were available to Alberta's motorists, resulted in some Alberta motorists not being able to buy collision insurance or comprehensive insurance. They were unable to actually buy plans that would extend their payments and make it more affordable. There were unintended consequences of that rate cap. We have lifted the rate cap, but more importantly, we're dealing with the underlying issues of the insurance industry.

Mr. Carson: Given that the minister has said that insurance companies could no longer afford to operate in Alberta with the rate cap in place but given that I'm not aware of any major insurance companies leaving Alberta in recent years and that threats from the industry seem to have been hollow, will the Minister of Finance commit to releasing any and all studies into the viability of Alberta's insurance industry, and will he release all other documents that guided his decision to lift the rate cap and hammer the budget of Alberta families?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, all this is pretty rich coming from the previous government, who didn't have the courage to deal with the underlying issues of automobile insurance. We will not make that mistake. Albertans elected us to come up with solutions that will stand Albertans in good stead today and tomorrow. We will deliver for Albertans.

Member Irwin: Bill 207 is an attack on women, an attack on LGBTQ2S-plus Albertans, an attack on Albertans seeking medical assistance in dying. In committee this morning the Member for Peace River did nothing to persuade us that this bill is anything other than a foot in the door to reduce access to health care, particularly in rural and remote areas. I'm glad that the Minister of Justice has read the bill, and I'm glad that he's publicly planning to oppose it. Can the minister tell this House why he plans to vote against Bill 207?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, our party and our government campaigned on making it clear that we would enshrine into the standing orders the right of private members of this place to be able to bring forward legislation during their time and for each member of this place to be able to have free votes. Bill 207 is going through the private members' process. It will be debated through that process, and each and every member of this Chamber will have the opportunity to be able to make a decision that reflects what they think is in their conscience and in the best interests of their constituents when it comes to Bill 207.

Member Irwin: Given that the members have the opportunity for free votes but not the opportunity to freely speak when asked questions and given that the Minister of Health claimed that he hadn't even read the bill as recently as last Wednesday and given that the same minister, who's a lawyer, said that the bill was, quote, over his head, can the Minister of Health tell us: has he done his job now, has he read the bill, and what will his response be? Will he oppose it?

The Speaker: Hon. member, I might just remind you that the use of preambles after question 4 . . .

Member Irwin: I said given.

The Speaker: I'm pretty certain that it was a preamble. Otherwise, I wouldn't have reminded you.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, as I said, our party is committed, our government is committed to free votes when it comes to private members' business inside this place, including all members of the government, including all members of cabinet, who have committed to that process, voted for it to be enshrined in the standing orders of this place. I understand that the NDP do things differently when it comes to their members, that they whip them and make them speak and do certain things that fit within the party line. For this party, when it comes to private members' business, we believe in open and free debate, which we look forward to having inside this Chamber. [interjections] We certainly believe in not shouting down other members of this Chamber.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford will come to order. I had no problem hearing you; I did have some challenge hearing the Government House Leader during the question.

Member Irwin: Given that the Member for Peace River admitted today that he had no idea if he had consulted with a single member from the LGBTQ2S-plus community and given that this community is really hoping that the minister for the status of women will show up and speak up for them, can the minister or perhaps the House leader tell this House if she is satisfied with this lack of consultation, and will she oppose this attack on women's and LGBTQ2S-plus rights?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, we have a robust process when it comes to private members' business. The hon. member knows that and, in fact, I think, is a member of the private members' committee, the standing committee on private members' bills. I understand that there was some preliminary debate around Bill 207 today and that there will be more to come in the coming days. This is something that we strongly believe in as a party, the free vote process. We will honour that. We will honour our commitment to Albertans, and we look forward to hearing the debate when it comes to Bill 207 inside this Chamber.

Postsecondary Education Funding

Mr. Eggen: Mr. Speaker, if the Advanced Education minister had gone outside a bit earlier, he would have seen hundreds of students gathered on the steps of the Legislature to protest this government's policy of higher tuition, higher interest rates, slashed tax credits, and lower supports for our schools. This minister is making students pay more just to pay for his $4.7 billion corporate giveaway. Will the minister start listening to students and end his attack on postsecondary education?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaides: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm quite confused, to be quite honest with you. I'm not quite sure what the member opposite is talking about. You know, if you have a look at my calendar, most of my time, a lot of my time, is spent meeting with students and talking with students directly. As well, just on Thursday I was in Fort McMurray visiting Keyano College and had a town hall with over a hundred members of the university community: students, faculty, staff. Students are our absolute top priority, and they have the strongest possible seat at the table to help inform government decision-making moving forward.

Mr. Eggen: Well, given that if this minister was actually listening to students, he would hear that they are opposed to an increased tuition of more than 21 per cent, they're opposed to losing their tax credits, they're opposed to $600 million being taken out of operating expenses for postsecondary institutions, and they're opposed to leaving all of the money for capital projects away, when is this minister going to actually start addressing students' needs and start doing his job?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaides: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, I'm taking a lot of time engaging with our students and listening to them and implementing their concerns and their objections. [interjections] I know the NDP wants to continue to yell and scream and not hear the response, but postbudget I had an opportunity to meet with student leaders. As we talked about moving forward from the budget, they wanted to ensure that the postsecondary institutions and universities were consulting with them and speaking with them. On Friday I was happy to send a note to our board chairs of all of our institutions and ask and encourage them to engage and consult with students as they're developing those . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Sherwood Park. [interjections] Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you. I'm very happy to have the second supplemental. Given that if this minister was calling those board chairs, they would have told him exactly the same thing, that they don't want their capital budgets liquidated, that they don't want to have to impose 21 per cent increases to tuition, that will literally cut off tens of thousands of students from being able to go to postsecondary, and given that this is really the best way by which we can diversify our economy, why is this minister making cuts to postsecondary education at exactly the worst time he could possibly do so?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaides: Mr. Speaker, thank you for that question. The answer is quite clear. Those members, when they were in government, drove the province off the fiscal cliff. We are in a very clear situation that is not sustainable. We can't keep going in the same direction. Postsecondary enrolment in the province over the last 15 years increased by 21 per cent, yet funding increased over 107 per cent. In order to ensure the long-term sustainability and high-quality nature of our postsecondary system, we have to make some changes now. I know our students understand that, and we're working with them to make some challenging decisions.

The Speaker: Now the hon. Member for Sherwood Park.

Federal-provincial Relations

Mr. Walker: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Albertans have spoken loudly about their concern surrounding an out-of-touch federal government. They know that Alberta needs to stand up for itself in Confederation in order to get a fair deal. We know that many politicians have been dismissive of the very real concerns of Albertans in this regard. Could a minister tell us whether this government believes that we should listen to the concerns of Albertans and work toward solutions or whether we should dismiss concerns, as some politicians have said, as, quote, distractions?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. We will always listen to the concerns of hard-working Albertans who legitimately feel that they have not been treated fairly by Ottawa. Albertans have very real concerns and frustrations, and standing up for them is not a distraction. It's what we were elected to do. For the NDP to say that this is a distraction shows how completely out of touch with Albertans they are. That is part of the reason why they were the first one-term government in the history of this province.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, given that amongst the many voices that have been dismissive of the concerns of Albertans, we have heard from eastern opinion elites and the leader of the separatist Bloc Québécois and given that the federal leader of the NDP has said that western Premiers listening to the people of their provinces is, quote, distracting, to the same minister: is it the job of this government to listen to Albertans or to those who have little understanding or respect for the deep frustrations of the people of Alberta?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Rather than representing the interests of Albertans, the members opposite have chosen to join their federal NDP leader, Jagmeet Singh, who over the weekend dismissed the concerns of Albertans and told Alberta to, quote, do better. Well, the federal NDP received about 11 per cent of the vote in Alberta in the last federal election, and their leader is not in any position whatsoever to tell Albertans how we should feel. We will listen to Albertans, not the NDP or the Bloc.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, given that in response to our plan to listen to the concerns and frustrations of Albertans, the Leader of the Opposition said that, quote, what we are seeing is an effort to distract and given how this displays how out of touch the opposition is with the concerns of Albertans, to the minister: can you tell us whether MLAs and ministers should be listening to find solutions for the people of Alberta or dismissing Albertans' concerns as a, quote, effort to distract, echoing the language of the federal NDP leader and the leader of the Bloc Québécois?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mrs. Savage: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The kind of rhetoric that we heard over the weekend by the NDP here and in Ottawa is a continuation of the last four years, where the government in Ottawa set up roadblocks in policies, regulations, and legislation that harmed Alberta. For four years, while other jurisdictions around the world were supporting their oil and gas industries, the NDP here and Justin Trudeau in Ottawa were taxing and regulating everything they could find. They pursued a failed social licence, they built nothing, and they drove investment out of this province. They burned it to the ground and salted the earth. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview has a question.

Seniors' Benefits

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In this government's recently released fiscal plan, there is a bar graph that compares three provincial seniors' income support programs: B.C., Ontario, and Alberta. The narrative in the document indicates Alberta seniors receive funds that put them squarely on the poverty line and claims Alberta has a generous support system for seniors. To the Minister of Seniors and Housing: have you talked to seniors about your government's efforts to push them below the poverty line? Did seniors tell you they received too much money?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Seniors and Housing.

Ms Pon: Thank you for the question. Mr. Speaker, in my six months as Minister of Seniors and Housing I went to 30 different communities besides the two big cities, listened to our seniors, and listened to a lot of Albertans about how to better serve them and how to utilize our money and control the spending for something they really want. We are going to continue to do that. This government is going to spend the money on quality services and products for our seniors.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Ms Sigurdson: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, income support programs are fundamental to supporting seniors to live with dignity in our province, and given that each year the cost of living rises, negatively impacting those on fixed incomes, like our seniors, and given that seniors built this province and deserve our respect and given that this UCP government has cut seniors' benefits, to the minister: why are you paying for a $4.7 billion handout to corporations on the backs of Alberta seniors? How can you possibly justify cutting their benefits?

Ms Pon: Please review, Member, our budget. We increased by $9 million our budget for seniors' benefits. Also, our government must get spending under control. Seniors have made our province into what it is today, but they also understand we need to live within our means. The MacKinnon report indicates that if we continue down this road of spending out of control like the previous government, we will soon be more than a hundred billion dollars in debt. They spent $5 million a day on interest.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It amazes me that the minister cares more about interest rates than about seniors in our province. She's showing no compassion for them.

Given that the seniors population in Alberta is growing at the rate of 23 per cent annually, significantly higher than the general population, and given that the budget does not account for this growth in many areas, including the Seniors and Housing ministry, will the minister please explain to Alberta's growing seniors population why she's okay with seniors paying more and getting less as a result of this terrible UCP budget?

The Speaker: The hon. member will know that even though this is a very important and sensitive topic, the rule for preambles still applies.

The hon. Minister of Seniors and Housing.

Ms Pon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Let me repeat it again. Budget 2019 included an increase of $9 million for Seniors and Housing – an increase – and we always make sure Alberta's growing seniors population is well equipped. It's not like the previous government. The four years they managed were unsuccessful years. The NDP did not address the needs of the growing seniors population. By 2035 1 in 5 Albertans will be over the age of 65. Our government will ensure that our most cherished residents have the supports they need, including maintaining . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Hospital Emergency Liaison Officer Program

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Now, for many years ambulances have been getting stuck at our major urban hospitals for hours, leading to paramedic burnout and code reds, where there are no ambulances available to take a call. This problem has been especially difficult in Calgary. The hospital EMS liaison officer program, or HELO, was an initiative of the previous government to help ambulances turn around faster at major urban hospitals. That program was successful. To the Minister of Health: why did you cancel this program this past June?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Shandro: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps just to provide some clarity, I cancelled nothing. This is a decision of AHS. As the hon. member knows from the question that arose at estimates, HELO is one of, I think it's estimated, about a hundred different initiatives that AHS has done recently to try to deal with wait times in our emergency departments as EMS and paramedics are dropping off patients at our emergency departments. HELO: I'm advised by AHS that there was no information to provide that it actually made any difference. They are going to continue to try and innovate to be able to help our patients get admitted to the hospital.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Now, given that AHS's own analysis, which I will table, actually showed that all four of Calgary's major hospitals showed dramatic improvement in hitting their turnaround targets and given that both the chief paramedic and the associate executive director of Calgary EMS said that HELO was creating immediate improvements – and I will table those comments as well – why did the minister disregard this evidence and advice from paramedics and allow AHS to cancel this successful program?

Mr. Shandro: Mr. Speaker, again, I made no decision to cancel anything. This is a decision of AHS. It was actually advice of the chief paramedic himself. When I spoke to him about this, I'm sure it was him who told me that HELO made no difference and that they're going to continue . . .

Ms Hoffman: Read the report.

Mr. Shandro: . . . to innovate and try to find new programs to be able to make sure that our patients are admitted to our hospitals and that ambulances are going to get back on the street as quickly as possible.

Mr. Shepherd: Given that this minister clearly has not read the report – and I would encourage him to look at the documents that I will table today – and given that behind these statistics are paramedics trapped at work, away from their families for hours after their shift was supposed to end, and given that this minister is choosing to leave Calgarians in acute distress waiting longer for an ambulance, to this minister: how could you possibly justify AHS cancelling the HELO program and leaving Albertans in distress while you stand willingly behind a $4.7 billion corporate giveaway that has yet to create a single job?

Mr. Shandro: Well, Mr. Speaker, I agree that this is an issue that we have to deal with as a government.

Ms Hoffman: You should read the report.

Mr. Shandro: I'm very happy to answer the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora as well, Mr. Speaker, as she likes to heckle throughout my answers.

The answer is this. [interjections] We get asked and I get asked quite often why in six months we haven't fixed the mess that we were left by the Member for Edmonton-Glenora. No, I haven't in six months fixed her mess. It's going to take a lot of work by this government to be able to make sure our patients are cared for. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Mobile Home Owner Consumer Protection

Mr. Long: Mr. Speaker, residents of mobile-home communities, like all Albertans, are hard-working, persevering individuals. Many of these individuals live in mobile-home communities in West Yellowhead, and these families deserve fair treatment. I'm hearing from my constituents that in some cases targeted rent increases have forced these hard-working Albertans to leave their community, and my constituents don't feel that the Mobile Home Sites Tenancies Act has proven that it will protect tenants. Could the Minister of Service Alberta tell me how this government is going to ensure mobile-home owners are treated fairly?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Service Alberta.

Mr. Glubish: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the Member for West Yellowhead for raising these important concerns. You know, I heard a lot about these kinds of concerns when I was on my tour this summer, and I want to assure the member and his constituents that I take these concerns very seriously. I wouldn't have toured the province if I didn't take this seriously and if I didn't think it was important. What I can further assure the member and his constituents is that we're getting there, and residents of mobile-home communities can trust that I've heard them. I as well as my department continue to spend a significant amount of time on this very important issue.

Thank you.

Mr. Long: Mr. Speaker, given that constituents in my riding are concerned that their rights aren't always being respected and given that mobile-home site residents are concerned that their landlords are being unjust and given that information on the Mobile Home Sites Tenancies Act is not always readily available and easily accessible and given that Albertans want to stand up for themselves and their own communities, what is this government doing to ensure that mobile-home site residents know and understand their rights laid out within the Mobile Home Sites Tenancies Act?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Service Alberta.

Mr. Glubish: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's important that all Albertans, including mobile-home residents, know and understand their rights. That's why we have a tipsheet specifically related to renting mobile-home sites, which is available on the government website. This includes information for both landlords and tenants, including, as I've talked about with several members of this Assembly, the fact that landlords cannot increase rents more than once a year and that they must give six months', or 180 days', notice of any increase.

Mr. Long: Mr. Speaker, given that my constituents have turned to municipal and provincial government members, including the minister during his tour in August, and given that they are frustrated that they don't feel they're getting the answers or the attention they need regardless of whom they turn to and given that they're also frustrated because they don't feel that they get the attention or action required from site managers and community owners and they're nervous to speak up for fear of repercussion, again to the minister: how is this government going to make sure that tenants are able to get answers to their questions and their concerns?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Service Alberta.

Mr. Glubish: Well, Mr. Speaker, thank you for question, and thank you again to the member for his continued and tireless advocacy for his constituents in West Yellowhead. In fact, I just want to point out that when I was on my tour – I believe that it was in Hinton – the member had organized what was the most well-attended meeting to discuss this topic, so thank you to him for standing up for his constituents.

What I would tell him and his constituents, through you, Mr. Speaker, is that the best thing they can do is work with their local MLA and share their concerns and their challenges, and to the extent that they're having issues there, then they can work with my department. We are there to make sure that they know their rights and that their rights are protected.

Parent Link and Family Resource Centres

Mr. Sigurdson: Mr. Speaker, as a father of three children I understand the challenges that many families in our province may face. Many new families with young children across my constituency have accessed services such as parent link and family resource centres. They've expressed support and a sincere wish to continue these services. To the Minister of Children's Services: what does the future hold for parent link and these family resource centres?

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much to the member for the great question. Some early intervention and prevention contracts have been in place for more than 20 years. Instead of reviewing those services, new programs have been layered on top of existing programs, and we now have an inconsistent patchwork of programs and services across the province. We owe it to the vulnerable Albertans who rely on these services to transform the system. With the new family resource network and the support of community partners that's exactly what we'll do.

Mr. Sigurdson: Thank you to the minister for that answer.

Given that young people across the province face unique challenges and may not have strong support networks and given that it's crucially important that we have early intervention and prevention services in place to address these needs before they become critical, to the Minister of Children's Services: can the minister tell us what she is doing to ensure that Albertans receive equitable and necessary supports regardless of their income and where they live?

Ms Schulz: Mr. Speaker, we won't continue to do things the way they've always been done just because that's the way we've always done them. Over the next six months this transparent process will allow community partners to propose best approaches on how we can strengthen the prevention and early intervention system. It needs to be more consistent across the province, it needs to reflect unique community needs, it needs to address the gap in services that sometimes exist for children over the age of six, and we need to implement the precedent-setting well-being and resiliency framework introduced this spring. Many organizations are already there, and we as government need to catch up.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Highwood.

Mr. Sigurdson: Thank you to the minister, and thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that I've heard a lot of discussion in my riding about the perceived end of these services, which has been exacerbated by the fearmongering of the opposition, to help put these families at ease and provide some assurance to them, to the Minister of Children's Services: can she set the record straight on funding for these critical supports?

Ms Schulz: Mr. Speaker, these programs will continue to support at-risk kids and parents. This is about providing services where they have the greatest impact and building on partnerships that are already happening between community agencies across all areas of the province.

Mr. Feehan: This is misleading.

Mr. Loewen: Point of order.

Ms Schulz: That means simplifying the system and reviewing where we are spending tax dollars. One example: we know that these dollars are going to things like community newsletters and system navigators. Mr. Speaker, if Albertans need navigators to access important services, then we need to change the system to better support their needs.

The Speaker: Hon. members, we will return to Members' Statements, but prior to doing that, I think it's fair that we deal with the point of order at this point in time.

Point of Order Parliamentary Language

The Speaker: I very clearly heard the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford say, "This is misleading." Of course, that is wildly unparliamentary language, and I'm sure that he's happy to apologize and withdraw.

I don't understand why you might be standing. You don't look like the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford, but I'm happy to hear your call.

Mr. Bilous: No, Mr. Speaker, I'm not, but I would like to speak to the point of order that was called.

The Speaker: That's not possible because the Speaker is actually addressing the point of order. Even if the hon. member hadn't raised the point of order, the Speaker would have called the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford to order because it was very clear to the Speaker. Of course, the Speaker's discretion at any point in time is to call a member to order, which I've done for the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford because he very clearly said, "This is misleading," which is clearly unparliamentary and out of order. So he's happy to apologize and withdraw, or we can continue to have this discussion.

Sorry. Hon. Opposition House Leader, you are not the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford. The only path forward today is for him to apologize and withdraw. I'm happy to hear you one last time, but let's be clear that that is what is going to happen today.

Mr. Bilous: Mr. Speaker, I rise because in many accounts in this place, when it is government or an entity or a body, you have allowed the word "mislead," and it has not been a point of order. The member was not referring to the individual minister; he was referring to a topic, and therefore it is not a point of order, sir.

Ms Hoffman: Based on your past rulings.

The Speaker: I am very clear on what my past rulings are, hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora. I appreciate your assistance. In this House the Premier has apologized for utilizing the term "misleading" when he said that the Leader of the Official Opposition was misleading the House.

There was one individual who was speaking at the time that the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford heckled inappropriately that "this is misleading," referring to the individual who was speaking. As such, by saying that "this is misleading," he has said that the minister is misleading the House.

He can apologize, or he can find the door. What would he like to do?

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I withdraw the statement and apologize to the House for their interpretation of my comments.

The Speaker: This matter is dealt with and concluded. See how easy that is, hon. members.

In 35 seconds or less we'll move to Members' Statements.

Members' Statements (continued)

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Drumheller-Stettler has the call.

Don Cherry

Mr. Horner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Political correctness in Canada is completely out of control. This time it is Canadian icon and hockey legend Don Cherry, who was fired by Rogers Sportsnet on Remembrance Day.

Don Cherry is a man who has dedicated more than most to helping support our veterans and active service personnel. He travelled to Afghanistan to entertain our troops during the conflict, and that is just the start of his support. Now he's been fired for making inarticulate comments about how everyone, especially new Canadians, should be wearing poppies and understanding why. Most Canadians agree with this point. The poppy is an important symbol of the sacrifice which previous generations made on our behalf.

His point was not made well and certainly not with political correctness. His passion no doubt comes from experiencing World War II as a young boy. He has already said that he wishes he had said "everyone" rather than "you people." This phrase has significant connotations of racism attached to it, especially when directed at marginalized groups. It is, however, a stretch to accuse anyone of racial bigotry simply because they used a phrase you do not agree with. Our own Prime Minister has dressed in blackface on at least three separate occasions, but he didn't lose his job. I guess Canadians experienced that differently.

In the words of Cherry's lifetime friend Bobby Orr: it's a new world, I guess; freedom of speech doesn't matter. Orr describes Cherry as: the most generous and caring guy that I know. Cherry has been saying controversial things on Hockey Night in Canada for over 30 years. To act in composure is not what made him synonymous with hockey. Cherry is an Everyman. He is passionate about hockey and has found his niche by being confrontational.

The point is this. Whether you agree with Cherry or not, we can't keep cancelling individuals just because we disagree with what they say or how they say it. This is not what breeds a healthy society nor a healthy debate. It certainly isn't fair treatment for a man who's devoted much of his time to supporting our troops and veterans. He simply wanted to urge all Canadians to do the same.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Notices of Motions

The Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I wish to provide oral notice of three government motions and a few pieces of legislation if I could.

First would be Government Motion 35.

Be it resolved that when further consideration of Bill 22, Reform of Agencies, Boards and Commissions and Government Enterprises Act, 2019, is resumed, not more than one hour shall be allotted to any further consideration of the bill in second reading, at which time every question necessary for the disposal of the bill at this stage shall be put forthwith.

Government Motion 36.

Be it resolved that when further consideration of Bill 22, Reform of Agencies, Boards and Commissions and Government Enterprises Act, 2019, is resumed, not more than one hour shall be allotted to any further consideration of the bill in Committee of the Whole, at which time every question necessary for disposal of the bill at this stage shall be put forthwith.

Government Motion 37.

Be it resolved that when further consideration of Bill 22, Reform of Agencies, Boards and Commissions and Government Enterprises Act, 2019, is resumed, not more than one hour shall be allotted to any further consideration of the bill in third reading, at which time every question necessary for the disposal of the bill at this stage shall be put forthwith.

Further, Mr. Speaker, I wish to provide oral notice of three bills for the Order Paper, those being Bill 26, Farm Freedom and Safety Act, 2019, sponsored by the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry; Bill 27, Trespass Statutes (Protecting Law Abiding Property Owners) Amendment Act, 2019, sponsored by the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General; and finally Bill 28, Opioid Damages and Health Care Cost Recovery Act, sponsored by the Minister of Health.

Introduction of Bills

The Speaker: The hon. the President of Treasury Board and the Minister of Finance.

Reform of Agencies, Boards and Commissions and Government Enterprises Act, 2019

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I request leave to introduce Bill 22, Reform of Agencies, Boards and Commissions and Government Enterprises Act, 2019. This is the last of the three budget implementation bills being introduced, preceded by bills 20 and 21.

This legislation will eliminate needless government spending, improve the efficiency and oversight of public agencies, boards, and commissions, and increase the value of taxpayer and pension plan investments. This bill will strengthen the governance and oversight of ABCs while also reducing duplication and nonessential spending. In some cases this will involve simple changes such as reducing the number of board members at certain agencies, boards, and commissions. In other cases we will dissolve agencies, boards, and commissions, otherwise known as ABCs, entirely and move their functions into ministries. These reforms will allow our government to realize significant administrative savings while still delivering the high-quality services that Albertans depend on.

Another key objective of Bill 22 is to strengthen the Alberta Investment Management Corporation, better known as AIMCo. The bill aims to consolidate the investment of pensions, funds, and endowments under AIMCo's management. The proposed changes are expected to increase AIMCo's investment portfolio by $30 billion. This will enhance AIMCo's economies of scale and allow it to deliver higher expected returns for lower investment management costs. Strengthening AIMCo benefits all Albertans since it will increase the return on Alberta government funds and endowments, including the Alberta heritage trust fund.

Albertans know that our government is focused on finding savings through improving the efficiency and effectiveness of the public services that their dollars pay for. Mr. Speaker, Albertans have waited long enough for action to be taken to ensure publicly owned enterprises and agencies, boards, and commissions are delivering the best possible value for taxpayer dollars. This legislation takes a step in that direction.

This being a money bill, Her Honour the Honourable the Lieutenant Governor, having been informed of the contents of this bill, recommends the same to the Assembly.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I move first reading of Bill 22, Reform of Agencies, Boards and Commissions and Government Enterprises Act, 2019.

The Speaker: Thank you to the hon. Minister of Finance for that very thorough introduction of first reading.

[The voice vote indicated that the motion for first reading carried]

[Several members rose calling for a division. The division bell was rung at 2:53 p.m.]

[Fifteen minutes having elapsed, the Assembly divided]

Orders of the Day

Public Bills and Orders Other than Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 204 Election Recall Act

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise today on behalf of the MLA for Drayton Valley-Devon to move second reading of Bill 204, the Election Recall Act.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is a measure to make elected officials in this province more accountable. The political climate in our province and across the country is rapidly changing, and we're seeing that politicians, in addition to the media and other public entities, are far less trusted than they have been in the past. This measure is an opportunity for us to restore some of that trust, to ensure that politicians are accountable to their constituents, those who elected them. We want to make sure that trust is restored. That is the motive for this bill.

I'm pleased to rise on this bill. I'm pleased to speak on it because it is something I have advocated for a very long time and the predecessors of mine have also advocated. To cite Paul Hinman is a great example, a true champion of recall legislation, someone who has fought for greater transparency and accountability in this Chamber when he was elected and someone that I consult regularly because I believe it's important to go to those who have gone before and to seek wisdom and guidance.

But what this really does is give more power and more and more authority back to the constituents, back to the ones who elected us. I am happy that this is being brought forward by the MLA for Drayton Valley-Devon. Now, in addition to being an important piece of legislation, it was also a campaign commitment and something that I'm glad that the member decided to use his luck of the draw, the private members' bills draw, to bring forth. In the United Conservative Party campaign platform on page 89 it says:

A United Conservative government will:

- Introduce a Recall Act based on precedents in several jurisdictions, including the United Kingdom, the United States, and in British Columbia where the provision has existed since 1996.

Now, I believe this also speaks to a larger issue of changing the way we do things. One of the most detrimental phrases that could every be uttered in an organization is: this is how it's always been done. This is how it's always been done. It's terrible. It suggests that we're going to stay inside the box, that we're not going to look for new ways to be more efficient, to be leaner, to be better. For years we have not had recall legislation. It was introduced in the past by a private member, but it never saw third reading, so now we're sitting here talking about it today.

An example from my own life about changing the way that we do things: you know, back in late July we welcomed our third child in our family. It was a very joyful time, but with that came a lot more constraints on my own time. I needed to stay home with my wife and my kids and make sure that they were well taken care of. In doing that, I was a bit remiss in maybe taking care of my own diet and even going to the gym. Naturally, the body does as it does as it ages, and when the time came to prepare to come back to this historic Chamber, I realized that some of the suits that I usually wear may not have fit quite the way they used to fit. So I was faced with two choices. The first choice, Mr. Speaker, was that I could just go buy some new suits. Now, that would be a pretty significant dent in my pocketbook, and I choose not to do that. Or I could change the way I was doing things in my own life. I could take better care of myself, go back to the gym, change my diet. That is exactly what I did. I think that speaks to the main point of this bill, which is changing the way we're doing things.

Now, I also look at the process for this legislation, what it takes to initiate a recall. I'll go through some of those steps with you. The first is that a voter can only petition to recall a member for the electoral district in which the voter is registered to vote. What that means is that you, Mr. Speaker, could not introduce a recall legislation on me in my constituency given that you are a resident of Calgary and not God's country, Cardston-Siksika.

The second is that upon receiving the voter's application, Elections Alberta issues the petition and the voter has 60 days to collect the requisite signatures totalling 40 per cent or more of the number of voters that appear on the postelection list of electors. That is to say that of the list of electors on election day you must be able to garner 40 per cent of those signatures. That's very important to note.

The recall petition can only be signed by individuals who are eligible to vote in the member's electoral district at the time that the recall petition takes place. So if you may have been a resident, Mr. Speaker, in the constituency where the recall petition had been initiated but you were no longer living there but you were on the electoral list on the day of the election, that does preclude you from signing the petition.

Now, once that's done, the voter returns the petition to Elections Alberta at the end of the 60 days, and the Chief Electoral Officer has the following 42 days to verify the signatures. If the required number of eligible voters have signed the petition and the rules were all met, the member ceases to hold office, and a by-election must be called.

To wrap all that into a nice little package, it's important to know that there is a threshold here of 40 per cent. That's the big number. That's the bingo number here that people need to know. If you want to initiate a recall of a sitting Member of the Legislative Assembly, you have to be able to get 40 per cent of the signatures of the number of electors that were on the list on election day.

Now, I guess the question begs: when would this be applicable? I don't think the purpose of this is to try to recall a member of this Chamber just because you may not like something that they said in the media or something that they did while they were at a local event. This is a very serious process, something that we here must take very seriously, and the electors must do the same.

If I can take a little jaunt down memory lane, you know, sprinkle a little history on your ears, I'll do just that and give an instance where I think recall might have been applicable. I take a step back to during the leadership campaign for our now Premier. I was out knocking on some doors in the wonderful constituency of what was Calgary-North West. Now, for anyone who can remember, Calgary-North West was represented by none other than Sandra Jansen. Sandra Jansen was originally elected in 2012 as a member of the Progressive Conservative Party. We all know that the parties did merge and that the electoral districts have changed since then, but what hasn't changed and what remains still seared in the minds of the voters of what was Calgary-North West is the dramatic betrayal of trust that Sandra Jansen perpetrated on their votes. Ms Jansen crossed the floor on November 17, 2016, and was even subsequently named Minister of Infrastructure. How coincidental. How convenient.

Now, going back to that day, when I was out knocking on doors, I was often greeted with: "Thank goodness you're out here; thank goodness you're knocking on doors. Thank goodness you're moving towards the right direction of uniting the conservative parties in this province. We just wish you could do it faster so that we could get rid of this MLA of ours." I cannot tell you how many times I heard it. I'm paraphrasing, Mr. Speaker. I can tell you that the language was far more colourful in many instances.

Then I went over to one of the local businesses afterwards to treat some of the volunteers to some nice refreshments and some appetizers, as I usually believe you should. You know, I think that one of the first rules of campaigns is that you've got to feed the troops. That's really important. You show that appreciation. I think everybody in this Chamber would certainly agree with that. Even the owner of the business that we were at, the restaurant, started asking us what we were doing there, and before we even got to it, that owner saw one of the T-shirts we were wearing and said: "Thank you for what you are doing. You are moving in the right direction. We've got to get rid of this MLA we have. I wish we could do it faster."

Well, Mr. Speaker, if only recall legislation was available back then, because I am certain that in the – well, I guess that I don't want to presuppose too much, but from the constituents that I heard in the wonderful area of Calgary-North West, I believe that there would have been an important call for that recall. For that reason, I'm grateful to speak on this today.

The Speaker: Hon. members, I see the hon. Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction has risen.

Mr. Hunter: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to ask for unanimous consent to revert to Introduction of Bills.

[Unanimous consent granted]

Introduction of Bills (reversion)

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction.

Bill 25 Red Tape Reduction Implementation Act, 2019

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, thank you to the House for this. I'll keep this short. I rise today to introduce Bill 25, the Red Tape Reduction Implementation Act, 2019.

Bill 25 follows through on our government's commitment to cut red tape. This is one of many steps to make Alberta one of the freest and fastest moving economies in the world, and I look forward to many more red tape reduction bills to come in order to be able to fulfill our one-third reduction.

With that, I move first reading of Bill 25.

The Speaker: Thank you for keeping that short, hon. Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction.

[Motion carried; Bill 25 read a first time]

Public Bills and Orders Other than Government Bills and Orders Second Reading (continued)

Bill 204 Election Recall Act

The Speaker: I saw the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View has risen.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm happy to rise to speak to Bill 204, which is the Election Recall Act.

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

Mr. Speaker, the speaker before me was correct in at least one of his comments, which is highly unusual, when he indicated that this bill has a very high threshold. That is correct. This bill does have a very high threshold in order for this to occur, so for that part of the bill, we're fine with it.

I think the thing which concerns us more about this bill is that it's essentially a backdoor way to allow third parties to advertise during a different time period. Every time one of these things is started, we're going to see campaigns amping up and third-party advertisers mixing into the political mix. What this is is essentially an attempt by the UCP to Americanize our democracy, to put us in the position of constant campaigning, to put us in the position of pay-to-play politics, where if you don't have millions and millions of dollars, no one's really interested in your opinion, and I think that's incredibly sad. I think that our democracy is something that is under increasing threat here in this place.

Not only do we see this, but mere moments ago we saw closure invoked before a bill was even introduced – I would be surprised if someone could tell me that that had ever happened before in this place – a bill, incidentally, to fire an Election Commissioner who is investigating this government. That goes exactly to this bill, which is to say that it's just another backdoor way to slide in additional campaigning, additional money, pay-to-play politics, and I think that everyone should be concerned.

You know, this is premised on the justification of accountability of elected officials, and that justification in and of itself is an incredibly important thing – it is – but I'm not sure this achieves it. I think that what we lose here is so much larger than what we could ever possibly gain.

I also think that it's a distraction. It's yet another thing like this panel investigating the Wexit and everything else that's going on that's intended to distract from a terrible budget. This bill is being introduced to try and attract attention and pull attention away. In fact, I suspect there are a number of private members' bills that have recently been introduced in this place that exist for exactly that same reason, to try to detract attention from what Albertans should be paying attention to, which is a terrible budget, a budget that hands $4.7 billion to profitable corporations while taking from pretty much everyone across the entire province.

Mr. Speaker, I continue to be shocked by the behaviour in this place. You know, there are a lot of long traditions in this House. I apologize; I am trying to speak to the subject matter, but in light of what happened earlier today, it feels a bit shocking. Certainly, again, this bill does have a very high threshold. It's quite unlikely that recall could occur.

I'm not surprised to discover that the hon. members from across the way took this opportunity to once again attack a female MLA who stood up to the current Premier. I'm not surprised at all because they attacked her repeatedly in the past. You know, all of this goes on, Mr. Speaker, at the same moment that we're seeing this incredibly terrible budget, at the same moment that we have multiple members of the UCP under investigation. Well, I guess maybe not under investigation for much longer, since they've used the Legislature to remove the individual investigating them, but I think, again . . .

The Acting Speaker: Hon. member, I hesitate to interrupt you. I just want to ensure that we stay on task with the topic at hand.

Ms Ganley: Okay. Well, how about if I speak to the last member's comments?

The Acting Speaker: I think that what I'm getting at with this is that it sounds to me like we might be getting close to talking about a decision previously made by the House. I don't think that this would be the right avenue to do so. If the hon. member would please continue with comments on Bill 204.

Ms Ganley: Sure. I'm happy to comment on Bill 204, and I'm happy to comment on the comments of the speaker immediately before me, who used the opportunity of this legislation to slide in a series of digs at a female member of this House who was the subject of some genuinely egregious behaviour in the past.

Mr. Speaker, again, the bill does have quite a high threshold, so it's unlikely that this will ever occur. We're not, again, opposed in principle to the idea that a person should be accountable. Mostly, this will introduce an enormous amount of cost. It will introduce a backdoor method by which political action committees can operate outside of the normal electoral time. It will introduce a method by which, you know, campaigning can pretty much become continuous, as in American-style politics. It's unlikely to be effective, although on that basis I wouldn't reject it because the point of the thing is good. I would reject it on the basis that it's likely to be extremely expensive, and it's likely to drive us further, again, to that Americanization of politics, which unfortunately we're seeing here in Alberta. I'm hearing it from constituents. I hear it on the doorsteps all the time, that the things people feel that they are entitled to say, that bar has shifted significantly. I don't want to see that happen here.

I think that, you know, this has been a place of respectful debate and respectful discourse for years. For years and years Alberta has been a place where we can respectfully disagree with one another. We're starting to lose that, and I'm worried that this plays into our starting to lose that. Again, by allowing backdoor entry of political action committees to be campaigning virtually constantly, we won't just get this sort of hyperpartisan electoral rhetoric in the months immediately preceding an election, but we'll get it constantly.

You know, I think we've probably all had the experience, everyone in this place, of volunteers coming back to our campaign office who have had a really negative experience, sometimes not even at a door. I mean, certainly, my colleague that ran in Calgary-Varsity had a horrendous experience of being followed around by a truck, being followed around and having her volunteers threatened, having people take pictures of their licence plates and threaten to come to their homes. This is not something that we want entering – and I don't think that anyone in this room really wants that in politics. I don't think that anyone really wants that to be the case, that people are physically – physically – afraid to speak their opinions.

I don't think that that's the way we should be moving. I don't believe that anybody thinks that that's the way we should be moving. But as we let these American-style politics sort of seep into our Canadian democracy, as we let it seep into our democracy that the loudest voice and not the voice with the most coherent argument wins, I think we're going to see it more and more. I think that is sad, I think it is a loss that we should all mourn, and that is ultimately why I will stand in opposition to this particular bill, again, not because of the substance of what it does but because of this sort of backdoor attempt to bring big money into politics, you know, in between election cycles.

I think that between the provincial election and the federal election we're all a bit exhausted by the level of discourse that occurred. I think that it's good to have a break. It's good to go back and try to be able to have some time in between elections. I mean, it doesn't seem to be the way it's going, unfortunately, in this place. Certainly, today's events make it pretty clear that we're not going that way anyway, but I suppose my heart can wish that that could be a thing that exists in Alberta again, that that could be a thing that continues to exist in this province, because I think it's an important thing. I think that, yeah, this is an incredible concern.

With that, I will end my comments. I will say again that we are not against the substance of the bill. It's just this sort of additional allowing in of political advertising action committees as well as the additional cost that goes with this. I mean, Mr. Speaker, I'm sure you're probably aware that by-elections are quite an expensive thing, and I suspect that in addition to – again, we're very unlikely to see a by-election, but the process itself is likely to add a certain amount of expense, and I don't really think that that is necessary at this point.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud has risen to speak.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am pleased to rise today to speak to Bill 204, the Election Recall Act. I do sit as a member of the private members' bills committee, so I did have the opportunity to hear the presentation by the hon. member putting forth this legislation and to hear from the stakeholders who provided their input as well with respect to Bill 204. I actually want to echo a number of the comments from my colleague the Member for Calgary-Mountain View in that my largest concern with respect Bill 204 is that it does appear to be a distraction.

What I did find interesting about the fact that this bill was brought forward as a private member's bill – and I understand that the member bringing it forward had a bit of a history with respect to this issue. However, this idea of recall legislation was actually set out within the UCP platform. It was set out there as a highlighted thing that the government would be bringing in. We've heard repeatedly from the Premier and from members of cabinet and all members on the government side about how important their UCP platform is to them, how they appear to justify any action, particularly if it was outlined in their very, very detailed, lengthy platform, with the assumption that all Albertans who voted for the UCP voted for all of the commitments in that platform. We certainly do challenge that assumption.

However, it was set out as a commitment made by the UCP in their election platform, so I find it remarkable that this is being brought forward as a private member's bill and not as a government bill. It could have been part of the numerous pieces of legislation that we are seeing brought forward. It was a very intense legislative session that we had in the summer and that we are having now, but clearly this was not a priority for the government because it was not brought forward as a government bill. In fact, it was brought forward by the Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

To me, it also speaks to my questioning about whether or not there actually is a commitment within the government caucus. I understand that it is a private member's bill, and we've heard a lot of comments recently about free votes on private members' bills. Perhaps there is a division – and I believe there likely is a division – within the members on the government side with respect to their support for this legislation. We know that with this kind of recall legislation, it's not the first time that it's been brought forward in this Assembly. Several of the members on the other side actually have voted against legislation like that in the past. I'm curious as to whether or not there really, actually is, despite it being in the government platform as a commitment, a commitment to this legislation. I suspect we're going to see a bit of division on this one.

You know, for me, my concern, when I look at the bill, is twofold. First, it's that there seems to be a lack of detail within the bill, that I think suggests to me that some very big loopholes, either intentionally or unintentionally, have been created. This was an issue that came up a number of times when we were in the private members' bills committee, which was questions about: who is authorized to collect funds during a recall petition? In particular, there was concern, actually, that the way the current Bill 204 is phrased, there is some room there for third parties to essentially be fund raising during a recall petition. Although the member bringing the private member's bill forward maintained that he did not intend for that to be the case, I believe that the current wording – and we confirmed this when we spoke with both the Chief Electoral Officer as well as the representative from Alberta Justice who came and spoke and gave a technical briefing on the bill – does not limit who can actually collect funds during a recall petition.

It does leave an opening for a prescribed entity to, by regulation, be able to collect funds, to be a participant, and that, to me, raises some red flags. It raises the alarm that perhaps we are going to be in a situation where we will have third-party actors, political groups organizing behind the scenes, and maybe even political parties, because there's actually no prohibition within this current act that would prevent political parties and other third parties from actually being the ones to raise funds for recall petitions. I take the member who brought this bill forward at his word when he said that that was not his intent. However, that is the outcome of the current wording of the bill. My concern around that is that perhaps it's not an unintentional oversight. Perhaps it is an intentional oversight and maybe not an oversight at all.

Really, my concern is exactly what my colleague from Calgary-Mountain View's was, that this is about continuing campaigning in between election periods. This is about creating a machine, a way for fundraising by political parties to continue to raise funds outside of election periods, outside the current parameters of our elections legislation. You know, I actually was very struck by the comments from my colleague from Calgary-Mountain View, because when she talks about the Americanization of our political system, that is, actually, precisely what it feels like. As an outside observer who watches what's happening in the American system, it does feel like the campaigning and the fundraising is going on all the time.

Now, of course, political parties have rights to fund raise, but to use a recall petition to do that actually seems like it's deliberately designed to continue to fuel the division that we are seeing, that is being promoted actively by this government. We've seen that the entire tone of this government has been about creating and identifying enemies. We've had members in this House stand up and basically say that it is about us versus them and that you're either with us or you're against us. To me, this kind of system, where we're going to be allowing fundraising and recall petitions to be filed, is just going to continue to fuel that.

To some extent, we have to have some trust and faith in our democratic institutions and the democratic systems that have been in place for some time. Now, I have to tell you that I believe that my own personal faith in our democratic institutions is starting to be challenged because we're seeing that we have a government that's actively undermining democracy. We saw a perfect example of that a mere two hours ago, less than that, actually, when, before even introducing a bill into the Legislature, the Government House Leader stood up and invoked closure of debate on that bill, before even introducing it.

Certainly, at a time when our democratic institutions are under attack by the very government that's in place right now, I think we have to go back and say: "You know what? We need to start looking at ways to be moving forward and actually governing."

One of my concerns that I'm consistently seeing when we hear the rhetoric that's coming from this government caucus is that it's all about lawsuits and war rooms and inquiries and referendums and potentially looking at ways to separate Alberta out from Canada. This is being fuelled by this government if not by the Premier directly. At some point we actually need to get down to business and govern and actually make decisions in the best interests of this province and stop fighting fights and actually move forward in a progressive way.

We're seeing no indication of that because this government, with its budget and all the measures it's taking, is attacking all Albertans from all sides right now. This is just one more piece of that puzzle as far as I'm concerned. It's another way to keep continuing to have this environment and a climate where we are in combat with each other, where we are constantly divided, where we are constantly seeking to tear down our institutions. Rather, there has to be some acceptance of the democratic will of the people when an election is made.

I think, actually, one of my concerns with respect to the details of this bill is that we have seen recall legislation in other jurisdictions. In the United Kingdom, for example, they do have recall legislation, but there is a requirement there that there be just cause to recall an elected official. You know, I'm not very familiar with what the details of the requirements for just cause are or what qualifies as that. Certainly, you would think it would be an automatic disqualification, even in our system, if there was criminal conviction of certain kinds. Certainly, there should be some reason, perhaps, that would give some assurance that this is not simply a way to continue to have political division and individuals and constituents fighting against each other when an election has taken place and the system has worked properly. If there have been no concerns about whether or not the election was proper, at some point we have to respect the outcome.

That is why we have terms in our democratic system. If an elected official has not been doing their job, has not been performing well, and if the majority of their constituents are unhappy with their performance, that's what the next election is for. That's the time to be mobilizing. We know you don't just mobilize and vote the day of the election. You're really doing that for some time beforehand. Really, I think that that is the system we have in place, and I support that.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Member for Sherwood Park has risen to speak.

Mr. Walker: Thank you so much, Mr. Speaker. Very happy to take part in this very important debate, giving me the opportunity to speak on this very important bill. Bill 204 is a crucial step forward to achieving a more transparent and accountable government.

I got into politics not because I needed a job – I was happily employed – and not because I wanted to make a name for myself but because I wanted to help get a better life for the people of my own constituency of Sherwood Park and all Albertans. I believe that my colleagues, on both sides of the aisle, ran for office for the same reasons. Even though we might disagree on policy, I am sure we all want to see a better Alberta. But time after time, Mr. Speaker, Albertans have seen politicians who say that they have the best interests of Albertans at heart and then completely ignore the voices of their constituents and who, we must always remind ourselves, will often break promises and who abuse their power, with little or no consequences.

Mr. Speaker, we are lucky to live in a democratic state, where all citizens are able to participate in the democratic process, but the voices of Albertans should not only matter on election day. They should matter every day, because Albertans are our bosses, and we should be held accountable to them each and every day. That is why I am proud of the Member for Drayton Valley-Devon for introducing the Election Recall Act. It is time for us to adopt legally binding measures that will ensure Albertans have the tools to hold their elected officials accountable. This is something all of us as elected officials should strive for because, at the end of the day, we are working for the people of this province, and underperforming members should not have tenure that prevents them from being held responsible if they are not doing a proper job according to their constituents.

Alberta currently does not have any recall legislation, which means that displeased constituents have to wait up to four years to express their disapproval. The changes made in this bill will allow constituents of the riding to petition for a by-election if a total of 40 per cent of the number of electors that appear on the post polling day list of electors in the constituency sign within a 60-day period. This can only be done after the MLA has been in office for more than 18 months. This prevents officials from being ousted before being given a fair chance to represent their constituents. Completely reasonable, Mr. Speaker.

This idea is not new or particularly revolutionary. It is common-sense, pragmatic legislation. B.C. has had recall legislation since 1995, and many states, including California, Arizona, Washington – you have a mix of blue and red states, conservative and liberal there – have also implemented similar policies. This is not simply a North American phenomenon either, Mr. Speaker. We love the comparative international review here. Furthermore, dozens of countries world-wide have employed analogous rules regarding accountability for their elected officials.

Recall legislation not only improves accountability but also empowers private members to make the voices of their constituents heard and heard loudly. The bill also has measures to ensure that the recall process is fair and in accordance with the Election Act. The fact that canvassers cannot be paid in tandem with requiring a sizable chunk of the voting population to sign is a steep barrier preventing partisan or well-funded attempts at unrighteously attempting to remove an MLA from office in terms of frivolous attempts. In the extremely rare cases, Mr. Speaker, where officials are undeservedly removed by a well-co-ordinated minority, they will still be allowed to run in the next election. Thus, the will of the people will still be reflected. The people are always right.

Mr. Speaker, a fundamental component of any functional democracy is checks and balances. Recall legislation is another check that ensures MLAs are held accountable by their constituents. This means that MLAs can't get elected and then do as they want with disregard for the feelings and wants of the constituents who elected them and who they're supposed to represent. This is so important. There should be recourse for constituents who do not feel adequately represented by their MLA, and this is what recall allows for. If an elected official is not properly representing their constituency, they should be promptly held responsible and accountable for their poor performance. This bill strikes an ideal balance between holding members liable for their actions and ensuring our government runs smoothly, without constant changes to its members.

In the 2015 election my riding was taken by the NDP, who won that riding. They then implemented vastly unpopular policies, to the disapproval of my constituents, including the carbon tax, which sprung out of nowhere. It was a total surprise. It was not in the NDP platform, nor was it mentioned in any of the debates. This tax was implemented despite mass disapproval among Albertans. The numbers showed 64 per cent opposition. But despite the huge backlash from my constituents in an energy-heavy riding, where 30 per cent of our income is derived directly from the energy industry, my constituents were very upset when the previous MLA in my riding voted in favour of this tax, which they did not run on. Had we implemented this recall legislation, that MLA would have been held accountable to their constituents and would have chosen the action that would have benefited the people in their riding rather than force their political agenda on them.

Our party, as mentioned previously, campaigned on delivering recall legislation. This is clearly outlined in our platform, that over 1 million Albertans voted for, a historic election and a historic support level. Our government has demonstrated that we are committed to keeping our promises, many of which were designed to ensure a more transparent and accountable government. Some of our key promises to make Alberta's democracy more transparent, accountable, and fair include fixed election dates, restrictions on government advertising approaching an election, and free voting. Recall legislation goes hand in hand with these other platform promises, Mr. Speaker.

When recall legislation was passed in British Columbia in 1995, it received overwhelming support, 81 per cent, at the polls.

Accountability to the people is crucial for a healthy and fair democracy. When underperforming members have to worry about their job security, it will encourage hard work and, frankly, reliability. Recall legislation would have prevented massively unpopular policies like the carbon tax from being implemented and discouraged elected leaders from breaking their promises or pulling out surprises, to many people's dismay. This would have come in handy for Manitoba voters when Premier Greg Selinger broke his promise to not increase the provincial sales tax, in Ontario when Premier McGuinty broke his promise not to increase taxes in 2004, and for Albertans when the former Premier, again, introduced the carbon tax, something that she did not campaign on, Mr. Speaker. And it applies to our government members, too.

Introducing and implementing this bill is about keeping a promise we made to Albertans in the last campaign. A fair and accountable electoral democratic system is crucial for a healthy and functional democracy. There is simply no plausible reason to oppose this bill. It is a nonpartisan law that will only bring positive change for Albertans by holding our representatives to the same standards we would hold any other worker to in this province. As elected officials we are here to work for the people, not for our own personal gain. There is simply no excuse for having immunity to the political recourse and the consequences of not doing an adequate job representing the interests of our constituents, be it in the political profession or in the workplace outside of politics.

The requirements to successfully recall MLAs are high enough, Mr. Speaker, that it cannot be hijacked for partisan gain, and it will also be a rare enough occurrence that it will not destabilize the government. Operations will continue to run smoothly. This will be a large step forward for constituents who have a major and rightful grievance with their elected officials.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood has risen to speak.

Member Irwin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, it's an honour to rise on Bill 204. Like my colleague from Edmonton-Whitemud stated, I too sit on the private members' committee and had an opportunity to hear a little bit more about this bill and hear from the Member for Drayton Valley-Devon, who was certainly quite passionate about this bill. I wish he was just as passionate about other issues like health care or LGBTQ issues, perhaps.

Actually, before I get into some of the meat and bones, I do want to respond to the comments from the Member for Sherwood Park. I must say that while I am a new MLA, I was quite proud to see the work that the former Member for Sherwood Park put into her constituency, so to speak of her in the way that he did, to imply that she could have been subject to recall because of her support of the carbon tax, is absolutely shameful.

You know, I wonder. I have many, many friends who live in the Member for Sherwood Park's constituency who are teachers, who are public servants, who are nurses, who work in a variety of occupations, who are currently very frustrated with their member and are feeling like they're under attack. I would urge that member to think about his own approach to his constituency. I presume from his comments that perhaps he'll vote against – I don't know – Bill 20 and Bill 21 as well, then, if he's going to make those sorts of remarks about the previous Member for Sherwood Park. Again, I know because I've heard from a number of folks. One of my good friends teaches in Sherwood Park, and he tells me that he's written multiple times to his member and has not had an adequate response. So I just want to leave that there.

Now let's get back to Bill 204. It is a distraction and I believe it's a waste having this conversation right now, at a time when there are so many other topics that we could be discussing. You all have heard me speak about how proud I am to represent Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood, a diverse riding which has incredible folks in it but also has its share of challenges, that I as an MLA am trying to address as best I can. You know, admittedly, it gets hard from time to time given the stories I hear from my constituents, folks who are AISH recipients who are struggling to make ends meet.

These aren't just hypotheticals. These are stories that I could point any member in this House to. I could point them to multiple e-mails, the correspondence I get from folks every day who are struggling, the calls my office staff receive on health care, affordable housing – that's a big one, right? – postsecondary education, education, and the list goes on. The point is that there are so many issues that we should be focusing on. I worry that this is a distraction, that this takes away from the important issues at hand.

I know that there's also a lack of – I've got the bill in front of me. I mean, it's a little more robust than some of the other private members' bills, I must admit, because some of them are quite thin. This one has a little bit more detail, but it does lack details in some areas. For instance, there's nothing to deal with PACs, third parties, political parties, or the use of data collected. You know, we're not seeing a lot of specifics around what is to happen with third-party advertising and whatnot. Again, I know we asked some questions about this in the private members' committee and were less than satisfied with some of the answers that we received, so I do worry about that as well.

Also in those meetings we asked the Member for Drayton Valley-Devon to talk about, you know, who he spoke to, who he consulted with, to kind of walk us through the process, because he said that he'd heard from many of his constituents about the need for this. I'm not doubting his honesty, but I have to tell you that I've been knocking on doors for quite a long time. I did prior to the election. I've knocked on every single door in Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood, many doors multiple times. I like door-knocking. I like talking to folks in my riding, and I can honestly say that the issue of recall legislation did not come up. It didn't, ever. I'm happy to be wrong in case one of my volunteers got it at the door, but I certainly personally did not hear about that issue.

What did I hear about? I heard about the need for housing, I heard about folks feeling unsafe in the neighbourhood, and I heard about the need for investments in education and health care but, again, nothing about recall legislation. I think it's important that we listen to our constituents. Again, I'm not doubting. Perhaps that member did hear about it, but I would gather and I would guess, in looking at some of my colleagues here, that they probably had a similar experience where they didn't hear a lot about recall at the door. I'm seeing some nods there.

An Hon. Member: Never.

Member Irwin: Exactly.

The other thing I want to point out is that this is actually in the UCP platform. I pulled it up. It was kind of an important pillar in the platform, in fact, on page 89 under Democratic Reforms. I'll just read this to you: "introduce a Recall Act based on precedents in several jurisdictions, including the United Kingdom, the United States, and in British Columbia where the provision has existed since 1996." Then there are a few other specifics provided in the UCP platform.

It's always nice to have the UCP platform handy for when there are confusing items brought forth by this government. In this case what I would ask about this – sure. That's fine. It's their prerogative to include that in their platform, but if this were such an important measure for this government, then why not move it as a government bill? I'm quite curious about that, and I'd love to hear one of the members opposite talk about why it wasn't prioritized if it is, as some of the members have shared already today, such a critical issue.

The other thing I want to speak about is the populist element of this bill. Now, hear me out. What I'm going to do is refer to an article – and I will share this with Hansard later on – in the Calgary Herald from February 2019 from someone who's not known to be too critical of this government, Corbella. I want to just pull out a few things that she notes because I thought it was quite interesting. Again, it's quite relevant to this bill, Mr. Speaker. I can assure you of that. She notes that "whether it's called populist Pablum or democratic drivel, one thing is certain, a few of the democratic reform promises made by [this Premier] can best be defined as bad policy."

Now, what she notes is that she actually pulls in the comments from a previous Member of the Legislative Assembly, Richard Starke, who talked a lot and went on a bit of social media discussion about how recall legislation is not the best step forward. He notes that, "Populist parties sell people on keeping elected officials on a short leash with a choke chain." He says that when you peel back the onionlike layers of policies like recall legislation, you should expect metaphorical electoral tears.

Now, Dr. Starke gives a couple of examples, and I looked up some of these, too, because I found them, as a former social studies teacher – I know the Member for Drayton Valley-Devon is one as well. Quite interesting. Dr. Starke points to the case of Covina, California, a city of about 50,000 in the Los Angeles area, as a prime example of why recall legislation is a bad idea and says:

In July 1993, the entire . . . city council was recalled by angry voters after councillors raised municipal utility taxes by six per cent to make up for a $2.3-million budget deficit.

A new election was held and most of the newly elected city councillors were leaders of the recall movement. Once the new councillors got into office, however, they discovered that if they didn't increase taxes they would have to shutter the library, shut down the parks and recreation department and lay off 77 city workers. By the time a new election had been held a year had passed, the deficit had increased and the new councillors concluded that they had to raise taxes by 8.25 per cent to keep vital city services running.

This then – wait for it – sparked yet another recall petition – which . . . was not successful.

Now, his point though – and it's a relevant case study – is that to suggest that this is going to provide better accountability, as some of the members opposite have suggested, and sound political decisions is false.

Dr. Starke actually goes on to point to another example. I won't read that whole example, but essentially: "In Peru, over 5,000 democratically elected authorities in 747 municipalities (46% of all Peruvian municipalities) were recalled in the period between 1997 and 2013."

It's not just a matter of inefficiency and of the fact that evidence shows that it doesn't lead to increased accountability; there's also the issue of cost, right? We did talk about cost a little bit in the private members' bill committee and, you know, the numbers didn't necessarily sound too alarming. But when you're talking thousands of dollars, when you're talking about the fact that that money could be used in so many other ways, I think we do need to think about thousands of dollars as being substantial amounts of money. Again, we haven't experienced this in Alberta, so we don't know exactly what the costs will be. We do have examples in other jurisdictions where in some cases the costs haven't been extreme, but again we don't know how regularly this could be used in Alberta. There's the administrative burden, and then there's a whole lot of additional work needed to move things forward.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Klein has risen.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's been an interesting debate so far, and I'd like to be able to touch on a few of the points that I've heard. Before I do that, I wanted to talk a little bit about my experience at the doors in Calgary-Klein. Granted, I hear and recognize the experiences of all the members of this Assembly and their experience at the doors. I started door-knocking in Calgary-Klein back in 2010, so I've got about nine years of experience knocking on doors in Calgary-Klein.

I'm just thinking of one particular story, actually, from this last election. I can tell lots of stories like this – I'm sure that you can also tell stories, Mr. Speaker – of the people that, when I've knocked on their doors, were feeling disillusioned and feeling like their elected people don't listen to them, feeling disconnected from their elected people, like they can't actually have an impact and that their voice and their vote don't matter. Many times people had come to the door like I had been at their door and had told them something and had promised them something and then went and got elected and did something completely contrary to that.

I think that this bill is absolutely critical. What it does is that it gives individuals like that a voice between elections, at the end of the day, making sure that their elected people continue to be accountable to them and not just showing up every four years begging and asking for their vote. I think what it does is help engage people throughout the election process.

We've heard a few kind of references to continuing campaigning. If continuing campaigning means that you're out and engaging with your constituency regularly and hearing from your constituents and making sure that their voices are heard, then this won't be a problem for you because your constituents will like you, and it's very unlikely that they're going to come out and enact this process in regard to recall. That's where I think this is so important.

I've been campaigning on recall legislation for eight years. That's why it's so much my pleasure to be able to rise here today in support of Bill 204, Election Recall Act. Again, for eight years I ran on the election platform that promised to strengthen Alberta's democracy. That included recall legislation. Introducing the Election Recall Act is a direct promise that this government and I made to Albertans during the election, and by now everyone should know that when this government makes a promise, we are going to keep it.

The key goal of this legislation is to enhance democracy by making MLAs directly responsible to their constituents between elections. As it currently stands, MLAs can only be fired by their constituents during a general election. We can all think of examples, I think, especially over the last four years, where this might have been particularly relevant, without getting into specifics. This bill would give constituents a method to recall an MLA if they are no longer representing them. As the MLA for Calgary-Klein I know that my boss is the constituents of Calgary-Klein, and I'm here to serve them and be their voice in the Alberta Legislature. I take that very, very seriously. If myself or one of my colleagues is no longer acting in the interests of those whom they represent, then they shouldn't be in that position anymore, and their constituents should have the opportunity to recall for that.

Our democracy lacks direct accountability to the public. As elected representatives we should strive to find ways to make our system more accountable and democratic. Bill 204 does that. It will strengthen Albertans' trust and participation in the democratic system. It allows for everyday citizens to be more involved with the political process by increasing their power. Isn't that what democracy is all about, the people having the power to choose their government? Why should this power be available only every four years? Bill 204 puts the public back in the driver's seat and in control of democracy.

Mr. Speaker, this is not a partisan issue. On both sides of this aisle we should be striving to improve our democracy regardless of our political stripes. I think we can all agree that as an MLA our job is to represent our constituents, and if we are not doing this important job, we shouldn't be in this House. As the Premier said, government should be the servant, not the master, and you as the voter should be in charge.

Let us consider an example of when recall legislation would be used. An MLA, regardless of their party, wins a seat in the Legislature. During the election this person could have presented themselves as someone who would work hard, represent their constituents. However, once they become an MLA and have their seat, they do a complete turnaround. They don't show up to work either in their riding or in the Legislature. They do not meet with constituents, and they do not bear the minimum duties of an MLA. Now, this MLA could get kicked out of a caucus and continue as an independent. However, they are still the person that is supposed to represent their constituents. If they are not doing this, there is currently no mechanism for constituents to remove the MLA as their representative. The MLA could not be doing any work and would continue to be paid. This does not make any sense to me. Speaking for myself and I'm sure for many of my colleagues, we did not want to be an MLA for the job security. In every other job you can get fired for poor performance. Why should there be a double standard for elected officials? This is a common-sense bill, and I see no reason to oppose it.

Mr. Speaker, Bill 204 may be a new idea in Alberta, but similar legislation exists in British Columbia and other jurisdictions across the United States and in 12 other countries. Bill 204 proposes the same parameters as we've seen in B.C. In order for a recall to go through and a by-election to be called, 40 per cent of the total number of voters that appear on the post polling day list of electors for the constituency must sign a recall petition – that's a pretty high threshold – no sooner than 18 months after an election. This threshold of 40 per cent ensures that the Election Recall Act is not used unless constituents are genuinely concerned about an MLA.

In British Columbia recall has been attempted 26 times, and we've been told that the costs associated with that are actually very, very small. However, it has only been successfully used once, and the MLA did step down before being recalled. I would say that the costs associated with not doing recall in regard to accountability of MLAs to their constituents and the concern that constituents feel disengaged from the political process because their MLA is no longer representing them are greater than the costs associated with recall.

Voices of Albertans should be heard every day, not just on election day. Bill 204 was a key aspect of a platform that over 1 million Albertans voted for and, certainly, something that I heard about lots at the doors. Mr. Speaker, I ask all members of this House to strengthen our democracy by supporting the legislation.

Thank you very much.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West has risen to speak.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise to provide some initial comments on Bill 204, the recall act. As I understand, it was contained within the platform, so fair enough. Here we are, Mr. Speaker.

I just heard some comments from my hon. colleague prior indicating that it wouldn't be a problem if there was a constant campaign and so on. Okay. Let's take that at face value, then. Let's take that comment at face value but subject it to a little bit of rigour. We're here to debate, after all, not just to agree with ourselves but to be open to input from others. After all, that is the point of being here.

There are significant issues with this concept of the constant campaign, in particular, if it opens the door to a constant, lawless stream of money that, in turn, opens the door to a stream of invective from the deepest pockets of external actors' international funds funnelled to PACs and outside foreign interference in our free and fair elections. That is, Mr. Speaker, a problem.

What is the basis upon which I make those statements? Well, it is the Justice official who appeared before the private members' committee on November 4 in which she flagged five things. One, nothing in the bill addresses the role of political parties in funding, supporting, or organizing recall petitions. In other words, political parties are not subject to the normal rules. Neither, too, as I understand it then, is anyone else, and even money outside of Alberta is not governed by this.

There is no included offence for harassing someone who is canvassing for signatures or who is signing a petition. That, Mr. Speaker, must cause our colleagues to pause. Bill 204 does not contain rules relating to the role and conduct of the member or the member's supporters in raising or spending money. Once again, this would appear to open up some of the holes we've already blown in our election financing rules via the senatorial elections and calling them into further question by allowing, by my reading of this, international money, foreign money, money outside of Alberta to come in under the guise of a recall act.

It is not an offence to offer or accept an inducement to sign or refuse to sign a petition. In other words, people may be paid to sign a petition. That sounds an awful lot, Mr. Speaker, like some of the offences that are being currently investigated by the Election Commissioner. It is not okay in a democracy to offer an inducement to undertake any sort of activity within the electoral system.

There are no provisions regarding unauthorized use of the list of electors. Well, I imagine our constituents will be quite surprised to learn this, that our list of electors, then, can be used by dark money influence, by corporations, by foreign-funded actors to contact us using political messages in a never-ending stream of campaigning, in a never-ending stream of negativity to target individual members.

While I, too, quite enjoy the opportunity to go and talk to my constituents – I am well known for loving canvassing – and I, too, enjoy that constant check-in with my constituents, I do not enjoy, Mr. Speaker, the prospect of having this much dark money sloshing around our democracy.

Now, we do realize that this is very clearly a backdoor way to flout election finance laws, which has, in any case, been accomplished by the senatorial election. But there might be, if we could engage in a thought experiment – oftentimes in debate scenarios, if I recall my high school years correctly, one might engage in analogies or hypothetical situations to make a point in the debate, so let's perhaps try. I'm going to try to put myself in the place of the hon. members opposite to think of some instances where recall might be appropriate. Our colleagues have indeed shared some of their ideas with us around when recall might be appropriate, so let me try some, too.

Certainly, down south we've seen that some people believe the President of the United States ought to be in a form of recall, even before this latest round of hearings, for firing an FBI director who is doing an active investigation into how someone rigged an election. It's interesting to me that we could potentially have a member or series of members recalled for firing an Election Commissioner who has an ongoing investigation into how someone rigged an election. Perhaps it may be appropriate to indeed recall someone if a member was raided by the RCMP. Perhaps it may be appropriate to recall someone or initiate a recall – indeed, there is no requirement for an application to provide a reason, but we could imagine some of the reasons. That's what we will do right now.

Perhaps if a member was linked to a scheme to funnel money to an adjacent campaign for another candidate and people linked to that member then furnished donations to another person, which is an offence under the Election Act but then also potentially triggered the income tax act if indeed those funds that were provided to someone then turned around and provided those donations and received a receipt, an income tax receipt, for them, that would then be both an unlawful contribution underneath the Election Act but also a contravention of the income tax act potentially. That might be a reason. If a member knew of such a scheme involving tens of thousands of dollars and knew of those unlawful contributions, that might be a reason to recall someone.

Perhaps if someone were under active investigation and took steps to in law obstruct that ongoing investigation and used their power as a lawmaker to obstruct that investigation, that might be a good reason to recall someone. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, other reasons might be, for example, a member who stands accused of forgery, bribery, or fraud. That might be a reason to recall someone. Perhaps a member who was fined for firing someone for sexual harassment, perhaps someone who was caught hunting on private land, perhaps someone who ran a voting station for a particular leadership contestant and is now being interviewed by the RCMP, perhaps other people who have had multiple RCMP interviews: those could be reasons to recall someone.

Or perhaps simply a group of people campaigned on one thing and then did another. We've had some of these examples already. One of the ones I thought of was Saskatchewan Premier Brad Wall. He campaigned. He won a mandate. I believe it was in 2016. By 2017 he had turned tail and ran. Why? He had raised taxes on everyone through deindexing the income tax brackets. He had raised the PST on things like children's clothing and other essentials, raised the cost of construction by 6 per cent by adding the PST onto those things, ran a huge deficit, all kinds of things. He left before people could rise up, but that is a – we had some other examples of other provinces. So there is one for people.

Perhaps one might want to recall a member or series of members for contravening promises around indexing benefits for the severely handicapped, for example, taking one position and doing another.

Perhaps one might want to recall someone for raiding our only pension security for those of us who do not have a six-figure pension, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps it might be that if someone wanted to go in and take away those monthly contributions that we make under CPP that is in fact our money, perhaps if there was someone who wanted to make a play to the 80 per cent of us who don't have a public-sector pension, certainly don't have a six-figure one.

Perhaps one might want to recall a member who takes a particular position around LGBTQ2S rights, for example, such as the right to immediately and confidentially form a GSA, and says one thing during a campaign and then immediately at their first opportunity turns around and does another.

Perhaps one might want to recall a member who says, "No, no, no. We will not attack women's fundamental freedoms and our section 7 personal security rights. We will not legislate on these matters," and then at their second-most convenient opportunity does exactly that, Mr. Speaker.

So there are many reasons why one might want to recall an MLA. I certainly think that the existence of ongoing investigations and then the attempt to obstruct those investigations – as we're seeing south of the border, there's quite an appetite for consequences around that. We shall see if there are consequences anywhere else where hypothetically this may be occurring.

Now, of course, the recall legislation hasn't worked anywhere it's been tried. It increases red tape, which, of course, accomplishes the goal of misleading Albertans given that they didn't campaign on any of it.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland.

Mr. Getson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was jotting down a few notes here, but I guess the last member had made a great argument for voting in favour of it. I'm not sure if she'd finished or not, but it sure sounded like it would be one heck of a good idea based on all the potentials for that and giving folks the democratic right to yank someone or some person if they weren't fulfilling their needs or obligations or acting in an unduly manner or not in the job description.

You know, we've heard lots about the bogeyman. Quite frankly, there's an old adage that thee who lives by the sword should surely almost die. In our neck of the woods we favour that. Absolutely. The folks that we talked to, we campaigned on having one of these key elements and items. One of the reasons why it's so important that a private member would bring it forward is because even private members believe in what we campaigned on. It's not just a government promise; it's a promise of every UCP member that was out there. We had a platform. We didn't campaign on being a minister. We didn't campaign on being the government, ministers. We campaigned on being a candidate for those areas, and it went over with great success. Obviously, there's a strong majority government of UCP members here, and that's something that we strongly believe in: being representative, being accountable.

I can understand if the bogeyman was out there and I only won by the skin of my teeth – some of the members in the opposition may have – I think that yeah, they would be concerned. They would be concerned about that. But from what I've seen, NDP supporters are in favour of this. This is their Hail Mary. My wife brought to my attention that there were lots of folks applauding this, asking the loyal opposition leader, literally, on their Facebook feed: when is this coming through? Well, hallelujah. We're bringing it in. This is a great thing. It keeps everyone on all sides of the fence on their toes and responsible.

There was an interesting thing. When you held yourself accountable and responsible, when you are truthful in what you say and you can remember that – and also people's memories over 18 months: they're a lot more acute than every four years. Guaranteed on some of the things that happened with the carbon tax that Albertans had a really good memory after 18 months. They were chomping at the bit to wait for four years to make their decision. I can see why there would be some hesitance, but again, this is something, Mr. Speaker, that's so important to us as Albertans to bring this through.

There's an old adage in the patch sometimes they, you know, say when we're talking about dollars and cents and costs. The question goes – and it's a bit of a joke, tongue in cheek – why are divorces so expensive? Because they're worth it. Why would it be worth spending money in a by-election? Because it would be worth it. If that individual was not representative of their constituents, if they were not keeping their word, if they were not being truthful, if they were not following through with those promises, it definitely would be worth it. It would definitely be worth having that individual recalled, having the folks out in those constituencies having their voices truly heard in the democratic process. It would definitely be worth it.

The other thing that some of the members had mentioned, too: you're only as good as your last job. A lot of us that worked in industry understand that. Every year you go for a job interview. That's how I campaigned, Mr. Speaker, that this was a job interview to me. Once I got that job, that was the intent. It's a performance review. Most of us have those yearly performance reviews and some organizations quarterly because it's made to make sure the process is better. It's made to make sure that you are actually keeping your commitments during getting that job. That's what this is. It's a performance review, so you'd better have your little running shoes around your neck as in the little adage in Who Moved My Cheese? where there were, you know, a couple of mice there. There were a couple of Hem and Haw characters. The whole adage behind that was: be on your toes, be ready for change, and be accountable.

Accountability and responsibility: those are things that the UCP believes in. I think that every politician should. As we've seen in history – and if we want to start citing some of the examples that the Member for Lethbridge-West just spoke about, she pointed out perfect examples of why someone should be recalled if that were the case. The Alberta people will make those decisions, and if we're bringing that forward to keep us all accountable, well, that works.

Here's a theory. Some of the folks that protest against this might be the ones that are the most concerned because maybe their skeletons haven't come out yet or maybe there are issues that they haven't taken account of. Myself, personally, I didn't really enjoy the door-knocking part of it. What I enjoyed were the forums. What I enjoyed in my area, being rural, were the cafés. What I enjoyed was meeting different organizations at events, going where there was a bunch of people and hearing that mass support. That was really important to me. Of all of the platform items we had, this is one that I'm so proud to see one of our private members bring forward. It resonated with him as well and his constituents, and it represents all of us. We didn't have to wait for the government to bring it forward. Potentially, maybe that's why there are some fundamental differences between our parties.

I'm in full support of this. I think that most people should be, and given that the folks I've seen that are of the NDP persuasion in my area also support it, I am truly speaking for all the constituents in my area. I think we should be in favour of it.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Member for St. Albert has risen to speak.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Okay. That was something.

I've been listening to some of the comments, and I just wanted to say, you know, that you don't get to pick and choose which campaign promises or things you said before the election and then say: "See? Look. Look what we're doing." I remember a lot of conversation around a lot of issues before the election. Certainly, what I'm going to say might support this legislation according to what you just said or not. Let's take a trip back and remember. When asked specifically about AISH, about indexing AISH benefits so that people with severe disabilities in this province would get a yearly increase of, like, $30, we heard: "Oh, no. We're going to protect that. We would never do something like that." Okay. What about women's rights, accessing reproductive health care? "No. No. We're not going to do anything about that."

Yet still they allow private member legislation or they support private member legislation to show up in this place, and their response to everything is: well, we have a great big mandate. You made a lot of promises that you didn't keep, so if this turns around and bites you and you get recalled, I guess that would just be fair. You don't get to do these things and then just say: we have the right to do it because we won; we got all of these votes. What you continuously forget is that not everybody, not every single Albertan, voted for you.

What is immensely frustrating is that it feels like it has been a systematic attack on democracy in this place, in this place that is a symbol for democracy in our province. It started off slow – right?

– something really simple like: well, there's no need to pound the desks because we don't like it, so let's clap our hands. All right. Well, we don't like the fact that private member bills should be debated and voted on in this place without being censored by a committee where the government has a majority. Step two. Let's just chip away at democracy. Let's look at recall legislation that is so loosely written that it allows dark money to once again find a loophole to make its way into our democracy when we worked so hard in an all-party committee in the last sessions to look at ways to make this fair, to make it about that every single Albertan had a voice, had an ability, that their vote would mean as much as their neighbour's regardless of what their income was or what political action committee they belonged to. This is a systematic tearing down of those rights.

Like it or not, and I might not like all of the results of the last election – that's maybe an understatement – but I respect our voters. I respect what they said. I respect the people that showed up on election day and who voted early and who made those decisions, you know, by voting. This just takes us to another place, but it's almost like we're getting numb to it because it's happening so quickly. I can't remember which of my colleagues said it, but he said that it's like trying to take a drink from a firehose. Maybe that's the intent.

You know, some of my other colleagues have said this. I think this is just a blatant attempt to Americanize our democracy so that it's a constant campaign. We already expend enough during campaigns. We don't need to do this. We need to focus on our jobs while we are here, when we're in our constituencies. I think all of us would agree that we have an incredible amount of work to do when we're home in our constituencies and when we're in this place. We don't need to add another aspect of: let's just continuously campaign now because there's a backdoor way for money to get injected into our democracy. That's what I see this private member's bill doing.

You know, my colleague touched on this. There are some simple things that a caucus can do if your members have engaged in activities that are serious enough that the RCMP are investigating and that an independent Election Commissioner has fined – I think that it's over a couple of hundred thousand dollars now. You would think that a caucus would look at that and say: this is serious enough that this person should at the very least not be in our caucus until the investigation is concluded in one way or the other. But, no, let's support a private member's bill that looks at bringing more dark money into this process so that we can target individual people. It's not about individual members being intimidated by this; this is an overall intimidation.

Let's think back to the last election. I know that people on the other side like to say: well, you know, we don't have anything to do with people like Rebel media. I don't believe that, but whatever. Why was it that it was only in a couple of constituencies where this ridiculous electronic billboard showed up over and over and over again spewing garbage? This is dark money showing up in our democracy, and this private member's bill is opening yet another door. This is a systematic chipping away at democracy in this place, which is the biggest affront of all.

You know, the other member talked about what's going on in the United States. Certainly, our countries are very different, and I'm extremely thankful for that. But if we don't learn some of the lessons from our neighbours of some of the things that are happening there and do our best to protect our democracy – this isn't about our party memberships. This is about democracy for all Albertans. If we don't do everything to protect that, then shame on us.

This act, of course, is brief, short in comparison, not super surprising. There is nothing to deal with political action committees, third-party political parties, the use of data that's collected. I think that we can all agree that that's a problem. This bill, once again, gives enormous power to cabinet and a lack of transparency to design regulation that works for them.

When you hide in the shadows and you make rules in the shadows, that's an affront to democracy, especially when it is something like recalling – it's more than recalling an MLA. This is about saying to Alberta voters: we don't trust you; we are going to launch this campaign to change the results of that election. As I said earlier, did I like or agree with – I mean, I have no business agreeing with the election results because I'm not a voter in those constituencies. But like it or not, the people of Alberta spoke. They didn't speak as loud as you think they did, and I think that you will find that out very soon. This, in my opinion, is just a systematic chipping away at democracy. It is a way to put more money in, when we all worked so hard.

I know that there are members across the way that sat on that all-party committee, the Special Ethics and Accountability Committee, that looked very hard at election financing and looked at: what are the best ways to close the loopholes that are here so that we do our very best to ensure that it is Albertans that speak out, not dark money, not political actions committees, but Albertans? This does the opposite. When you make these decisions and regulations and you hide them in secrecy, you are doing the very opposite of what you were sent here to do. You represent tens of thousands of people. They sent you here. Your job is to protect democracy, not to chip away so that you make it easier for your political party to do well in an election.

The members opposite can talk all they want about that this was a platform promise, but you blow a big hole in it when you pick and choose your platform promises or the promises that you made before the election. You can say that, yes, this is a platform promise. Okay. You made a lot of other promises, and not one person from the other side has stood up and said publicly, "You know, I don't agree with this piece of legislation; this goes against what we said we would do," one of those things being reproductive health care rights or access to health care for all people or access to an appropriate, timely referral, which is part of that process in health care.

I seem to remember many, many people – I can remember it from forums before the election. I can remember it from posts. I remember from what people said: no, no; we're not going to do that. You're doing it. Once again, Mr. Speaker, I am very disappointed in the fact that – maybe that's the intent – people are getting numb to the fact that you are chipping away at this democracy instead of building it up, making it more transparent so that we know where every dollar that goes into this process comes from. You know, you're very intent on having your little secret war room . . .

The Acting Speaker: Thank you.

Hon. members, I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday has risen to speak.

Mr. Carson: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's an honour to rise today to speak to Bill 204, the Election Recall Act. I will echo many of the sentiments brought forward by my colleagues in the NDP caucus because I, too, am very concerned about what we're seeing in this legislation.

Most importantly, as I quickly look through this Bill 204, I see the mention of the Chief Electoral Officer quite often and the role that they will have in ensuring that this legislation is moved forward and that recall is taken forward when a constituent or a person in the community tries to bring it forward. That leads me to my first but possibly most important concern.

Earlier today we saw the introduction of Bill 22, effectively the firing of the officer, and now we see Bill 204 coming forward with increased responsibilities and obligations of that very same person. I'm very concerned – not to spend too much time, I suppose; of course, we will have a chance to debate it further – about Bill 22, what those implications and consequences are of removing this person from a position, first of all, as has been stated earlier in this debate, that is actively investigating a leadership contest where there are alleged wrongdoings to the fullest extent. We've seen fines laid to Albertans, so that's very concerning that now this government is going to fire and potentially rehire someone else that maybe has a vested interest in protecting their interests.

Once again, with Bill 204 we are extending their ability or their need to be involved. On one hand, we're getting rid of this person who has been working very hard to uphold our democracy. You know, we're talking about replacing them, and what that means to Bill 204 is very concerning to me.

Of course, there have been many points about the fact that this bill really does seem to be a distraction from the fact that the budget that has been delivered by this government that's currently under discussion is not popular by any stretch of the words. The fact that we're giving $4.7 billion away to large corporations while telling seniors that they should be able to live with less, while telling people with severe disabilities that they should be able to live with less is very concerning. I think that this government caucus is concerned with it as well, so they are looking for any opportunity to deflect from the fact that their budget is so unpopular.

Once again, as has been mentioned by my colleagues in the NDP caucus, this really does seem to be moving towards a more American-style political system in terms of the constant campaign and fundraising that will be expected not only from Bill 204, as the private member brought forward with the Election Recall Act, but also in the discussions that we had earlier around the quote, unquote, Senate elections legislation that came forward and the fact that there were massive loopholes in the ability for, specifically, parties to fund raise to get these Senators – well, not elected but elected in Alberta. Of course, it's up to the federal government and the Prime Minister to make that final decision, whether they actually listen to that or not.

We are seeing a constant move towards, once again, an American-style political system where it's just a free-for-all. You can campaign at any time of the year; it doesn't really matter if it's an election year or an election cycle or not. That's very concerning to me because, as the Member for St. Albert brought forward, in the previous election we saw organizations like Rebel media targeting people that are deciding to put their name forward to run for election. It's really not fair. It's very concerning that we see these organizations that very well may be funded from outside of our own jurisdiction, outside of our province, and possibly even outside of our country. I would say most definitely funding coming from outside of our country. Really, this bill is opening up more loopholes to do just that, and that's very concerning.

The fact is, as the Member for St. Albert mentioned, the UCP doesn't really like to make public their relationship with Rebel media, but on election night in the last election Rebel media was sitting at their main election night event to celebrate their win. On one hand, we have a government saying, "Well, we don't make friends with people like this organization," but they save them a couple of seats and let them televise their stream from their event. That's very concerning. Yes, it's a concern that we are opening up loopholes for organizations such as Rebel media.

Myself and people in my constituency are constantly inundated with text messages from organizations like Alberta Proud or Alberta Strong or whoever it might be that day, Sue or Shirley. I don't know. It depends on the day. That's concerning to me because we have these organizations where we really don't know where they're coming from or where they're funded from, and they are actively data mining people in our communities.

Of course we're concerned about funding coming in from other jurisdictions, but we're also very concerned about what is going to happen with the data from those text messages that are sent out and also the repercussions of data mining that might happen under Bill 204, which has been brought forward. Money is power, but so is knowledge, and having that data is just as good, if not maybe even better, than having the dollars. If you know how somebody is going to vote, which is all that these organizations are going after, whether you say yes or no, the fact is that they're getting what they're looking for. That should be of concern to all Albertans.

Now, for a government that wants to cut red tape, who says that that's in their mandate, this legislation really seems to be dead set on creating more bureaucracy and more red tape. The introduction of recall legislation, I believe, has been shown in a 2003 report by the B.C. Chief Electoral Officer to require increased bureaucracy to ensure that people are available to administer the legislation, just like the Bill 204 that we see before us. That's very concerning. Once again, at a time when this government is talking about getting rid of such an important position as the Election Commissioner, we're also introducing more bureaucracy to their position.

The Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood also raised the point that Corbella, in an article from February earlier this year, when this discussion was happening, essentially stated, I think quite rightfully, though I don't agree with this person very often, if ever, that this legislation should be recalled. I would agree with Corbella on that fact. It went on to detail the discussions that Member Richard Starke had brought forward, and I also agreed with the points that he was making.

The fact is that recall legislation, at the end of the day, leads to public servants fearing doing the right thing because sometimes doing the right thing isn't always the popular thing. Sometimes it is unpopular to do the right thing, especially as we talk about taking action on things like climate change. It's quite clear that the government today does not agree with the decisions that we made. There were, of course, as the election showed, many people who also didn't agree with the decisions that we made. The fact is that we saw the writing on the wall that action had to be taken to combat climate change. We made those decisions. Once again, they're not always the popular decisions, but we believe them to be the right decisions.

Sorry; I lost my train of thought here. Let me go back to the 2003 B.C. point. Now, when we looked at the recall legislation there, there was an estimated cost of administering nine recall petitions, which all failed, I think it's important to note, that cost over $550,000. They didn't even get to the point where a by-election was called because these petitions did not reach that threshold, yet it cost the system over $550,000. That's very concerning, once again, for a government who's talking about reducing red tape and ensuring efficient spending of public dollars. Well, that doesn't seem to really go with that same message.

Once again I think it's important to point out the fact that the prevalence of global forces trying to influence our democracy is at an all-time high right now, going back to the point I was trying to make, whether it's an organization fighting to elect people who are pro oil and gas or the exact opposite. I mean, it's a concern on both ends that radical environmentalists might try and unseat people. That's a concern just as much as it going the other way in terms of foreign influences on our democracy.

It's really not just a one-sided issue. The fact is that with the passing of this legislation and with actions that this government has undertaken under the, quote, unquote, Senate elections legislation, there will be a further prevalence of foreign influence in our democracy.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, I'll be brief. Bill 204 has been something that – when we were in opposition, I think we brought this forward a couple of times as a private member's bill. This is something that is not going to be a surprise to this Chamber, that this is something we feel very strongly about. The concept of recall is obviously in other jurisdictions. It is in B.C., that's for sure. The value of recall is to allow individual constituents to keep their MLAs honest.

The reason, I think, that we're hearing from the members opposite a rejection of this principle is because they recognize that had we had recall in the last four years, when they were in government, they would not have been in government for four years. Albertans rejected especially the carbon tax, which is interesting when the member who just spoke talked about how doing the right thing isn't always the easy thing, that it's the hard thing sometimes, but it's the right thing, and then he talked about the carbon tax. They still haven't recognized that that concept was rejected wholeheartedly by Albertans.

Now, this is the value to Bill 204, that if the hon. members in the NDP caucus really believe that they are representing Albertans, they should never be afraid of allowing recall legislation because they would know that the majority would be in their favour. The truth is that no matter the rhetoric, how much they spew in this House, they know deep down that they do not represent the majority of Albertans, which is certainly the case, as we've seen in the last election, on April 16, 2019, when the UCP received over a million votes, and 40 per cent less is what the NDP received.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is a way for Albertans to have the accountability that they're looking for. Now, whether this actually gets enacted or not, just the threat of an MLA not being able to vote his or her conscience, vote the way that he or she believes that their constituents would want them to vote is enough for this bill to have real efficacy and real importance in this House. I am very much in favour of this.

Paul Hinman, who used to be an MLA in this House, passionately spoke about the need for this and how this is a check and balance on power. Now, it is a private member's bill, but it is something that a private member on the government side has brought forward, recognizing that it is important to have checks and balances on power. I don't believe that the NDP subscribe to that kind of belief, that you should have checks and balances.

They've spent a majority of this time talking about how we should be careful of this because it's dark money. Well, I would remind these members that I just decided to take a look at the 2015 contributions that the NDP received, and I was surprised to see that they received a substantial, six-digit figure from the Ontario steelworkers' union. What's interesting about this is that they talk about never receiving any kind of contribution outside of this jurisdiction, yet they have received that themselves. Now, I don't know whether or not that member knew. There were actually two members that just spoke about how that was so bad, yet their own party has received a six-digit contribution from the Ontario steelworkers' union. Now, they talk about dark money. In reality, if that's not dark money, I don't know what is.

From the way they described dark money, they're saying that other jurisdictions are starting to gerrymander Alberta politics, yet they have no problems receiving a six-digit contribution from the Ontario steelworkers' union. You know what? When I took a look at those things, Mr. Speaker, there were actually other contributions as well, and the gerrymandering was happening in this province not just in 2015 but also in 2019 by the NDP and their allies. I think that this is a smokescreen, and it's sad to see how disingenuous these members are in their attack on this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to be able to stand in this Chamber and support this bill knowing that for over four years now I have been a big advocate to be able to have this kind of check and balance, checks and balances that we're willing to place upon ourselves, checks and balances that we're willing to say: "You know what? We want to be held to a higher standard in this House." This is what Albertans are looking for. If they believe that we are going to deviate from what we campaigned on, the 375 campaign promises, they have the full right to fire us.

We're going to give the power back to the people, which is what democracy is all about. I was surprised to hear the member say that we were trying to strip away democracy. Mr. Speaker, there's nothing stronger than a recall bill to empower the people and then empower democracy. There's nothing stronger than this kind of measure. This is a fantastic tool. I get that they're in opposition. I get that they are concerned that this could actually affect their numbers of 24 MLAs. In reality, why don't they just focus on representing their people, representing their constituents to the best of their ability? Then they don't have to worry.

This allows us, all members, to be able to vote our conscience, Mr. Speaker. This allows us to vote the way that our constituents want us to vote. This would allow us to be able to make sure that if there's a bill that comes forward in this House that is not in harmony with the way our constituents want us to be moving forward, then we could move forward the way that we think we should, the way that our constituents think we should. There's no problem with that. I don't understand the arguments against this.

I am in full support of this bill, and I applaud the Member for Drayton Valley-Devon for bringing it forward.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview has risen.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I want to raise some of the issues that I have with this piece of legislation as it currently stands and to clarify some of the things that the previous speaker just said, amongst others, in this House.

First of all, checks and balances exist in that every four years there is an election. That's when members of this House are held accountable for their actions and words, through our regular elections.

What previous members have said as far as: well, this doesn't really cost that much. Actually, I challenge the members to bring forward the additional costs of having recall legislation.

Now, it is interesting that there are members who are currently sitting in this House who voted against recall legislation. In fact, you know, with all respect, there are two members, the Member for Calgary-Fish Creek and the Member for Calgary-West, who voted against recall legislation in the previous Legislature and now are in favour of this. Now, I'm not sure if they've had a change of heart or a change of mind or if that's how they have to vote.

I mean, to the previous minister who was speaking: this does nothing around free votes and voting how you want and what he was saying.

Mr. Speaker, the issue that I have with this bill as it's currently written – and I don't have an issue with recall legislation. I do think that, again, Albertans every four years – you're not elected for life. You have to win an election every four years, so if you do a really poor job, chances are that voters are going to send you a strong message and send you out of office altogether.

The challenge I have with this piece of legislation – and it's been said by those that have had a chance to look at it – is that it does nothing to deal with PACs, with third-party advertising, with the use of data that is collected, that can be used or misused. If the members opposite are adamant that they want to bring forward a bill or their private member, then this bill should be amended to ensure that we close any loopholes that currently exist. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that in other jurisdictions that have recall legislation, they have closed those loopholes. These ones are gaping wide.

I also find it interesting that, you know, jurisdictions have tried to bring this in and changed their mind. In fact, Bible Bill, William Aberhart, brought in recall legislation and then was threatened to be recalled and quickly changed the legislation so that he couldn't be recalled.

You know, I appreciate that the UCP campaigned on this. This is a campaign promise. I do think that that argument is used when it's convenient because I don't recall you campaigning on raising personal income taxes or on legislating on women's issues or conscience rights or other things when, actually, their leader had said specifically that there wouldn't be those types of legislation being brought forward. Now, having said that, it was in the platform. That's fine.

But if you look at B.C. as an example, Mr. Speaker, they do have parameters on how third parties can act and advertise during a recall petition. Again, what we don't want are third parties who have a hate on for a member to, you know, do everything within their power, including raising huge sums of money, to oust a member because they disagree with a position that they took and to unduly influence voters as opposed to it being based on the behaviour of the actual members themselves.

I can tell you that we talk about how this government has set up a war room to go after foreign-funded campaigns, yet this bill, as it's currently written, allows for foreign-funded campaigns to influence and take over elections within the province of Alberta. I hope other people see that this is a huge problem and a little bit hypocritical, that in one way there are actions to try to stop foreign-funded influence, yet through this current piece of legislation it allows for that. Now, I appreciate that government members may say, "Well, this is a private member's bill, not a government bill," but I would hope that it does raise concerns for them and that it gets addressed, Mr. Speaker.

The reason that I'm opposed to this is that it's a waste of taxpayers' money, having multiple elections between terms. Again, four years, although some days feel like a long time, pass by very quickly, and Albertans have the right to exercise their electoral rights on whether or not a member returns to this Legislature or whether a member is elected in the first place. This legislation, even though it exists in other jurisdictions, I don't think does what these folks hope that it will do. I honestly think that the reason that this is being brought forward is really to change the channel on what's really happening.

The Acting Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview, but seeing the time, 5 o'clock, the time limit for consideration of this item has concluded.

5:00 Motions Other than Government Motions

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul.

Walleye Fish Stock

509. Mr. Hanson moved:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to enhance the biodiversity, health, and economic value of Alberta's lakes by utilizing the Cold Lake fish hatchery and other tools at the government's disposal in order to increase Alberta's walleye fish stock.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to stand today and introduce Motion 509. This is an issue that comes up quite often in my riding, and I'll refer to some of the coffee shops around the area that refer to the local senate. One of the questions that often comes up, because a lot of these folks are retired, is lack of fishing opportunities up in northern Alberta.

Now, we've got a wonderful facility, the Cold Lake fish hatchery, that's been around for upwards of 30 years and has a capacity – that is my understanding – to rear a hundred million walleye fry a year. Even if we take into consideration mortality rates, we could still be looking at easily 60 million-plus fry being raised there per year. Now, over the last 10 years how many walleye have we produced at the Cold Lake fish hatchery? Zero. We haven't raised a walleye there in 10 years. They've been raising trout for fish ponds in Calgary, Edmonton, and other surrounding areas for community fish ponds and not utilizing the fish hatchery for what it was designed for back in the '80s.

Now, we look at lakes up in my area that have been closed to fishing for upwards of 20 years. The lifespan of a walleye is about 15 years. So we're actually hatching them, and the fish go through their whole life process and actually die of old age in our lakes, yet our residents aren't allowed to take their kids out and have a fish fry around the lake. That's one of the big things.

On top of that is a wasted economic potential. We have a loss of tourism. We have a lot of our local provincial parks, some of the MD parks that are up in that area that go underutilized because folks are – guess what? – going to places like Saskatchewan, where they can actually catch and keep fish. So we're losing, you know, revenue to our parks, revenue to municipal parks, hotels, motels, local sport-fishing shops, gas stations. It kind of goes on and on. For instance, just in 2018 over 24,000 Albertans purchased fishing licences in Saskatchewan rather than Alberta. Over the period between 2015 and 2018: $1.5 million in lost revenue to the province of Alberta in fishing licences alone, nothing to do with the local impact to tourism or the life there.

You know, we've got municipalities that are willing to invest in tourism, that are willing to help out with raising the awareness on this, and we've had many, many town halls where we've had very robust conversations with local fishermen and guides that are asking for us to reopen these lakes. I'll give you one example. The town of Lac La Biche has been holding what they call Lac La Biche Pow Wow Days for upwards of 50 years. Over the last five years, when I was their MLA representing them, they've had an event called the Seniors' Fish Fry. Over the last five years at least and prior to that they've had to import walleye from Manitoba and Saskatchewan. Meanwhile you can go out onto Lac La Biche, right outside the facility where they're having the fish fry, and you can catch upwards of a hundred walleye in an afternoon, and the mortality rate, depending on how deep the water you're fishing in, can be anywhere from 5 to 20 per cent.

It's very popular for the pelicans because they like to follow the fishing boats around. They know that out of every hundred fish that get caught, anywhere from five to 15 are going to come popping to the surface, and they get a free meal. So we're actually causing more damage by restricting fishing than by just allowing people to go out there and catch and release. It's very, very frustrating for the folks up in Lac La Biche.

One of the things I would like to see: even though I'm not their MLA, I'd like to be able to go up next summer and enjoy the fish fry up in Lac La Biche with locally caught fish. It's one of the things I'm trying to work with our department to promote.

We also need to look at the environmental balance that comes from the overpopulation of the walleye. Now, you talk to local fishermen. They were quite adamant at the town halls we held, and they spoke to the ministry staff that were there and the biologists that were there about mortality rates. They talked to them about, you know, long skinny fish with big heads that had no bodies because there are so many of them that they've eaten out all of the smaller fish and are basically starving to death. I said that most of them die of old age, but maybe a lot of them are starving to death as well.

Also, I'd mention, you know, that we've had a couple of lakes up in our area that have winter kill. Rather than allowing people to go and catch these fish, it's quite acceptable to have thousands of them die over the winter or on a hot summer day, when the lack of oxygen, because of the overabundance of fish, is causing these big die-offs.

Going on, like I said before, we are missing the good opportunities, the fishing opportunities. The seniors that I talk to tell me that, you know, when they were kids, they'd go out and enjoy the fishing experience with their grandparents. A lot of people are just saying: we'd like to be able to go out to our lakes, catch a couple of fish, take our grandkids, have a fish fry on the beach, and just have that experience as a family thing. I don't think it's too much to ask, especially with the overabundance of fish that we're seeing in our lakes up there.

With that, like I said, we've got the Cold Lake fish hatchery. The capacity is there. We'd be looking at utilizing that fish hatchery to rear some fish and stock some lakes. You know, some of the lakes maybe should be fished out a little bit to allow for some of the other natural species like whitefish and perch and northern pike to develop. There are some of those lakes that used to be fantastic perch fisheries. Now you go out and you can't even catch a perch. But guess what? You can catch a walleye on a perch hook. Or you're out fishing for northern pike in the traditional way that you'd be fishing for northern pike and you're not catching northern pike. But guess what? You're catching walleye. Again, we're seeing a lot of these lakes that have an overabundance. We're looking at just getting some balance back by utilizing the fish hatcheries.

We also have another tool at our disposal. Bill 206, that was passed back in May 2002, that was put forward by Mr. Ray Danyluk, the MLA for the area at the time, deals with the control of predators like cormorants. Now, we have statistics and video footage of thousands of cormorants landing on a lake. My understanding is that they can eat up to three pounds or three kilograms of fish, depending on what size of bird they are, every day. So as well as utilizing the Cold Lake fish hatchery, we also need to control some of the predators that are feeding on not only the small walleye that are in the lakes and hatching in the lakes but the perch and jackfish, or northern pike, as well.

Like I said, there has to be a balance. We're trying to promote fishing up in our areas, to increase the tourism and access to our lakes, to increase access to our public parks, and at the same time to rear the fish in a facility that was designed for that and bring some economic development and tourism back up to our area.

With that, I will step down and allow some other folks to stand up and speak to, hopefully in support of, Motion 509. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview has risen to speak.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I want to begin by thanking the Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul for bringing forward this motion. I've had the opportunity to have a couple of conversations with the member about the importance of recreational fishing to the province of Alberta. It attracts tourists not just from other provinces; it attracts tourists from all over the world to come here. We know that regardless of the reason a tourist comes, when they come, they're spending money. They're supporting our economies, often our local economies. In this context, I have had the opportunity to talk to the municipality and the council in Cold Lake as well as in Lac La Biche, that rely heavily on tourism.

We know that protecting our ecosystem is absolutely critical, Mr. Speaker, but I can tell you that just this March – March 1, 2019 – there was a new regulation that came into effect. In the past one pike out of Lac La Biche could be kept if it met a certain slot size. As of March 1 no one can keep any pike out of that lake. I can tell you – I know the member probably has the stats – that the impact alone this summer on Lac La Biche has been significant.

[Mr. van Dijken in the chair]

We have a beautiful provincial park, Winston Churchill provincial park, right down the causeway in the middle of Lac La Biche. Beautiful. If you haven't gone, Mr. Speaker, I encourage you to do so. I've camped there many, many years. I've heard that the reservations were down significantly, that it was a ghost town. You know, for the town of Lac La Biche and the county, again, tourism is the lifeblood of many industries, of many small businesses. They've asked for government to come up with a solution. We know we need to protect our ecosystem, but we also know that tourism is significant.

I myself, Mr. Speaker, will be the first to disclose that I love to fish. I love to fish in Alberta lakes. So any opportunity that we have to say to the government, "Hey, this requires your attention; let's look at some creative solutions" – I like what the member has proposed. As far as using our fish hatcheries to help restock these lakes so that we can continue to not only hold fishing derbies, which, of course, bring in a significant number of people and revenue to our local communities not just on those weekends but overall – I know that fishing is a huge attraction, especially for our friends down to the south of us. Again, we are competing with other jurisdictions in western Canada: in B.C. and, of course, in Saskatchewan.

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

Mr. Speaker, some people believe that walleye are the best-tasting freshwater white fish. Now, I will contest that. I do love walleye. And before people start getting angry, I do love walleye, but I also love northern pike. For anyone who has never had the opportunity of catching a pike and within an hour it goes from the water to the frying pan, you're missing out, quite frankly, because it is absolutely delicious.

For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I'd like to put forward an amendment. I consider this a friendly amendment. I have the requisite number of copies. I will wait a moment for our friends to bring it up to you.

The Acting Speaker: Once you see that the pages have essentially managed to hand out all the amendments, then just feel free to read it into the record and then continue along.

Mr. Bilous: Our pages are working diligently to get this to all members. I will read it for those members that haven't received it yet. I move that Motion Other than Government Motion 509 be amended by striking out "walleye fish stock" and substituting "walleye and northern pike fish stocks." This is, of course, Mr. Speaker, to ensure that we do attract people who fish who are interested not only in walleye or pickerel but also who are interested in jackfish, or northern pike. I have been assured by the mover of this motion – and I appreciate that – that Alberta's hatcheries do have the ability to produce both walleye and pike. I think, obviously, this would be done in concert with the very bodies of water and folks under Environment and Parks.

Again, my hope, Mr. Speaker, is that by us debating this motion today in the Chamber, we will signal to government that action is needed. Again, I hope to hear from other members on their assessment of our current situation and this idea as far as how we can help to support our industries. I do want to acknowledge as well that this is another way to support our indigenous communities who do rely on fishing for sustenance. Really, I think this is a win-win-win all around to ensure that we are safeguarding our natural resources but still promoting and encouraging tourism and, of course, promoting our province.

I don't want to take up too, too much time other than to encourage all members to vote in favour of this friendly amendment to strengthen the motion that the hon. member has put forward. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Just for the record, going forward with regard to the debate on this amendment, we will be referring to this as amendment A1.

I see the hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul has risen to speak.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Yeah. Just to be clear, I am in favour of this amendment. I did check with the local fish hatchery in Cold Lake, and they assure me that they can raise multiple species at that facility. They just have to keep them separate. They said that the only hard part is, you know, keeping your fingers safe when you're getting the eggs from a northern pike.

The member mentioned, you know, having caught a fish and getting it into the pan within the hour. That's exactly the experience that the folks around my area are talking about, getting out there with their kids or with their grandkids. I would just ask to make sure that the member actually measured that fish before he cut it up and put it in the pan.

Mr. Bilous: Always.

Mr. Hanson: Okay. Make sure you fall into the slot size there. Thank you very much.

I will of course be supporting this amendment, and thank you very much for bringing it forward. I've got no problem with adding northern pike to the hatcheries as long as it helps to get some recreation and tourism back up into our northern areas.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you.

Are there any other hon. members looking to debate on amendment A1?

[Motion on amendment A1 carried]

The Acting Speaker: Are there any members wishing to speak to Motion 509? I see the hon. Member for Lacombe-Ponoka has risen.

Mr. Orr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yeah. I would like to speak in support of Motion 509, to enhance the biodiversity, health, and economic value of Alberta's lakes by revitalizing the Cold Lake fish hatchery and whatever other tools actually can be added there, thereby to increase Alberta's fish stocks, walleye and others.

This is an important piece for Alberta for a number of reasons. I can see economic value here, I see recreational value, and quite honestly I see food value, if I can put it that way. The economic value of Alberta's fishing, hunting, and trapping: the only figures I could find were from 2014 to 2016, but the GDP value of that sector has declined by 75 per cent over those three years. This is an area that Alberta should be actually enhancing and developing. There's a tremendous resource that we have here, and in times of economic difficulty we should be growing this industry, not curtailing it.

By increasing the fish stocks of our Alberta lakes, I think this has great economic value. That's the first thing I'd like to say. There are many, particularly American tourists who love to come up here for hunting and fishing. Fishing is a great thing for them to come to, and they bring with them not just the fishing experience itself, but they stay in hotels, they buy meals, they have travel expenses, they engage in other forms of entertainment when they're here. So I think this is truly something that we really should be growing, and we can do that by enhancing the fishery work and by actually expanding fish hatcheries across the province, truthfully. I admit that there can be a lot of demand on the fishing, so we need to make sure that we take care of that resource and we restock it on a regular basis. Even in my area there's a lot of demand. There have been some declining results in terms of fishing, and it just simply needs to be restocked. My question is: we can do that, so why wouldn't we?

I also have to affirm the huge recreational value for Albertans, especially when, you know, people are under stress, when things are difficult. The ability to go out there and just have a peaceful, quiet morning or afternoon or whatever it is, to be there when the sun starts to set is a beautiful experience. For me, when my children come to visit with my grandchildren, we always take an afternoon, we go out on the lake, we set up there, we have a campfire, we have food. The kids play games, they make snow angels, they make ice forts. It's a great opportunity for adults to visit when you're standing around the holes. It's an incredibly exciting thing for kids when they catch a fish and they pull it out and you help them. They learn things.

There's a social value for the community as well because people meet each other on the ice. Friends meet each other. I know churches that have planned special events out there. I know that one time a group took out a group of 30 Filipino immigrants, first time ever, to fish on the ice. They could not believe that they were driving on water. Incredible experience for us to share with all Canadians. There's a community, social experience that happens out on the lake. People who may not have been there have no idea how amazing this is. It's like a town square in Mexico. Everybody meets there and visits and socializes: huge recreational value for Albertans and part of our culture, quite frankly. We need to support it, not let it die.

Lastly, I do want to say that I think there is a food value to it for Albertans and especially – I know some of the Albertans that are out of work and that are struggling. I know some of them that actually go out, and they catch their fish, and they take it home, and it's a good, solid meal for them. It comes out of clean water. It's local food. It's not shipped in from Asia or someplace. It's a sustainable resource for families.

So for those reasons – economic, recreational, and even food value – I really think we have to support this kind of motion and, more broadly, throughout the rest of the province along the same direction. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you.

I see the hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley has risen to speak on this matter.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to stand and speak to Motion 509, talking about enhancing "the biodiversity, health, and economic value of Alberta's lakes by utilizing the Cold Lake fish hatchery and other tools at the government's disposal in order to increase Alberta's walleye and northern pike fish stocks." It was interesting to see that amendment come forward to add northern pike. Of course, if I had my way, we would add perch and many other species of fish, too, that we could be enhancing in Alberta here.

I think it's a great idea to be able to use this Cold Lake fish hatchery to its full potential and use it for potential that Albertans would like to see it used for because, of course, Albertans love to fish. They love to eat those fish that they catch: the walleye and pike and perch and whitefish, all those types of fish, even the trout in the western slopes and, of course, the trout that are stocked in lakes across Alberta.

I think that one thing Albertans like to do is that they not only like to catch fish, but they also like to keep fish. Of course, we have a situation in Alberta where there seems to be more opportunity to catch than there is to keep, and maybe that's like anywhere. But when fishermen can go out all day and catch fish and not be able to keep one, I think that kind of adds to a level of frustration. It shows that in some lakes the populations are plenty high enough for the actual fish in the lake, but for some reason the laws and regulations keep them from actually keeping some of those fish. In other lakes you could fish all day and maybe catch one fish, and it might not be legal.

Of course, if there's a way to enhance that opportunity going forward, I think that that's what the fishermen and fisherwomen in Alberta would love to see because right now many of them are travelling out of Alberta to go fishing. Of course, that's a loss of opportunity right in our own communities. When we think of rural Alberta and we think of some of the challenges they face with agriculture – you know, in the last few years in agriculture there have been some crop problems there that have caused losses to farmers, and we know that the oil and gas industry has been not in great shape for the last couple of years either. When we think of rural Alberta and the opportunity to have some economic development within those communities, I think that fishing would be great.

You know, in certain parts of Alberta there are very few lakes, so there are a lot of fishermen concentrated on just a few lakes. That's why it's so important to have this opportunity to enhance those lakes so that the fishermen that go to those lakes will have an opportunity to catch a fish, to keep a fish, and eat a fish. We stock trout in many lakes in Alberta, and for some reason we've been a little bit hesitant to stock some of these other species, and I think we need to be able to take advantage of these opportunities. We have a fish hatchery, that I understand is a world-class fish hatchery, that can provide those opportunities to rear fish and stock some of these lakes. I think that if we take our world-class fish hatchery, we could create a world-class fishing industry or a fishing opportunity for the people here in Alberta.

Now, the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview mentioned that, you know, fishing attracts tourists from all over the world, all across Canada, and he's correct to a certain extent. But there are provinces around us that have better fishing or seem to be perceived to have better fishing and have a lot more opportunity and a lot more tourism going to those provinces. We need to be able to be in on that market and be able to take some of that opportunity and have it here in Alberta. Of course, like I say, this fish hatchery exists right now. It's sitting there. If we could just utilize it for developing our economy here, attracting the fishermen and fisherwomen who want to come from around the world right here to Alberta, we can do that. They want to come. There are tourists that already come to Alberta, some for fishing and some for other things.

Even if they're coming for something else, if they know they have an opportunity to go fishing also, that'll help to extend their trip. I know that when I travel to different places, if there's an opportunity to do some fishing or some hunting there, then I'm likely to stay a little longer because that opportunity is there. I think we need to have that opportunity for people that are travelling rather than having that opportunity lost to other provinces.

I think we can't forget, of course, that – it was also mentioned about First Nations but also residents of Alberta. We talk a lot about the economy and the benefit of jobs and tourism coming into Alberta for fishing, but obviously it's a recreational opportunity for Albertans, and it's an opportunity for the people of Alberta to put a fish on their plate that they've caught locally. There's obviously a lot of pride and a lot of satisfaction that goes into catching a fish, cleaning the fish, putting it on the table, and serving it to your family. A lot of people actually rely, to a certain extent, on that as a food source to help provide for their family.

Again, I think it's important for multiple reasons that we take advantage of this fish hatchery that we have and use it for more species than just the trout that it's been used for, recently anyways.

People don't fish just to fish. You know, I think if you sat there all day fishing and never caught a fish, that could be kind of boring, actually. It's nice to be out on the water, it's nice to enjoy the outdoors, but at some point you want to catch a fish, and at some point you want to eat a fish. I think that's something that we need to provide, not just an opportunity to throw a hook in the water and tour around the lake on a boat or sit on the shore and fish; we need to provide that opportunity to catch a fish and keep a fish. I think we've noticed recently that fishing licences declined, the sales declined. There aren't as many fishing licences being sold, so people could say: well, maybe fishing isn't as popular as it used to be; maybe it's something that's on a downward trend. Of course, if you go out fishing and don't catch a fish and you don't have an opportunity to catch a fish, the chances of you wanting to go back next year and go fishing decline.

I guess it's that adage that if you build it, they will come. I think that if we build a fishing industry here in Alberta and a fishing opportunity here in Alberta, the people will come. They'll come from outside the province – they'll come here for tourism, to fish – but also the residents will want to fish, too, because they'll have that opportunity to catch a fish. I think that a lot of times you see people out in the winter ice fishing and everything, and it's no fun if all you catch is ice. You need to be able to catch something and be able to take it home and have that opportunity to serve that to your family.

So I think this is a great motion, and I encourage everybody to support this motion. I think it's something that's been long in coming, and I think it's a great opportunity to put to use this fish hatchery that we have to produce the fish that Albertans would love to go out and catch and put on their table.

Thank you.

5:30

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Mr. Getson: I'm going to make it really quick. I support this. I think it's an Alberta rite of passage. There are so many fond memories growing up in rural Alberta on this, and it's just been wonderful. To hear that we're actually going to start using the environment to bring more people in and promote it – because as young kids learning how to fish and catch your own food and the whole thing of learning how to build a fire in the wintertime is also a survival skill. A lot of that's being lost with folks in urban areas and otherwise.

I'm glad to see the members of the opposition – this is something we can all agree on. It's something that is very valuable and vital, and I really thank the Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul for bringing it forward.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-South has risen to speak.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's always a pleasure to rise in this place and speak to any motion that's brought forward. To see a private member's motion which is actually something that we can all agree on in this House is, frankly, astounding to me. It's something that I myself have fond memories of, actually, when I was younger. I say younger. It was just a few years ago, but I have fond memories of having long drives with my father. We'd drive north, and then we'd drive north, and it felt like we were driving north forever, but then we'd get to this lake. We'd go out and cast some lines and we'd see what we got, because that's what we were going to eat for dinner that night. It was going to be something that we did together because our family wanted to have an outing that weekend.

Mr. Speaker, I think it's something that so many people in this Chamber, so many people in my riding and across this province are able to relate to. Alberta's lakes and using our lakes and using the outdoors and having access to these amazing facilities and natural resources are something that we should honour and we should protect and we should preserve. It's so great to be able to hear what so many of the other members of the House are saying, because having the opportunity to increase the fish stock in all these lakes means that we have more opportunities to share these experiences with others, more opportunities to share these experiences with Albertans, and, as we heard from members of the government caucus, it could be opportunities to share this with new Albertans as well, whether they're new by being born here or having immigrated here.

That's something that I think is very, very exciting. It's something that I think we should all be encouraging. I think it's something that we can bring back and say that every single member of this House, I believe, is going to be voting in favour of this motion, so we can go out and we can talk about how this is something that we agree is valuable for us. It's so important because we know that lakes are an important habitat that contribute to our environment. They contribute to our economy. They contribute to everything in this province, and it's something that is so vital to the lives of people like indigenous peoples and Métis communities and the recreation opportunities and things we've been hearing about in this Chamber, Mr. Speaker. Those recreation opportunities are fundamentally something that we know we need to encourage and we need to support.

Fundamentally, it's something that makes us human. It allows us to connect with ourselves, with our friends, with our family, and with nature, Mr. Speaker. That's something that's exciting, because having to learn how to gut a fish for the first time when you're nine or 10 years old is something that I think a lot of people, perhaps, in this room remember. They remember that first time when you're handed the knife, and they go: well, what do I do now? You learn pretty quickly that it's not so bad. You learn pretty quickly that it is a cool experience, that you are able to actually, from the lake to your dinner table, see the entire process of how food works. I think that's something that we should continue to try and strive to make available for future generations, for future Albertans, and for all Albertans that are currently enjoying that as well.

It's something that – who doesn't enjoy it when you're trying to get away from it all? Maybe members here in this Chamber remember over the last summer or, hopefully, over the next summer they will be as well able to get some time off and go to one of the great lakes here in Alberta and have that opportunity. Perhaps even, Mr. Speaker, my caucus members will chide me for this, but perhaps one of those lakes you go to fish at may even not have cell reception. That would be a real shame, that you wouldn't be able to get your cellphone going, but it would be something that certainly would be possible here.

I believe that that's why we need to support these healthy lakes. We need to support having these lakes that provide important environmental, economic, and recreational benefits for every single person across this province, because every single person deserves to have that chance.

I'll admit, Mr. Speaker, not every single Albertan will want to or will have the opportunity to go out and enjoy these lakes and enjoy using them for fishing while they live here in Alberta, but it's something that we should preserve and we should protect. We should give them that option because it's one of the great things that we can share. It's one of the great things that I believe this motion speaks to, how it can be prudently used to have these types of conversations and share how amazing our province is and how if we do this properly and if we protect these lakes properly, we'll be able to minimize impacts on things like natural habitats. It's something that I think is very interesting.

I think it's great to see that this motion also speaks to things like biodiversity, speaks to things like utilizing a local fishery, and all of those types of programs, Mr. Speaker. It's something that I think we on this side of the House agree with wholeheartedly. I think it's something that we would be happy to advocate for on behalf of Albertans because it's something that we know is something that Albertans enjoy. It's something that Albertans would like to continue to do.

We know that when we look at some lakes across this province, we do need that little bit of help for the biodiversity. We do need that little bit of work to make sure that they are sustainable. We do need that little bit of work to make sure that we have vibrant, thriving fishing opportunities, Mr. Speaker, because that recreation is something that we need to cherish. It's something that we need to foster. When we try to foster something, it means that we do have to go out and work with our local hatcheries like this and ensure that there are tools like that at our disposal and at the government's disposal to have that fish stocked, to have those opportunities, to have that recreation. It's something that I'm very proud that I'm going to be able to support. It's something I'm very proud I'm going to be able to vote in favour of.

It's something that I'm very excited about – again, Mr. Speaker, I know I spoke about this a little bit at the beginning – that we're able to find something that every single member of this House can agree on, that actually nobody is getting up here and having an argument over the merits of this. I think it was the member across who had spoken to how he wished we'd added more types of fish to this motion. That's something I think is exciting as well because it's simply more opportunity, right? Who couldn't advocate for more opportunity, more biodiversity, and more fun for Albertans?

We talk sometimes in this House about how one side or the other is trying to wage a war on fun, Mr. Speaker. We can see here today that that's not true, because every single person is going to vote in favour of trying to have that recreation available, trying to have recreation available for families, for communities, and have those conversations. We know that whether you're nine years old or whether you're 90 years old, you can get out there on a lake, and you can go fishing, and you can have a great time.

I'm really pleased that I'll be able to vote in favour of this. It seems like every single other member of this Assembly will vote in favour of this. I'm looking forward to hearing what other members of the government caucus and the opposition caucus here will have to say as well. I think it's something that's really so important that every single MLA has the opportunity to talk and every single MLA takes the opportunity to talk, because we deserve to speak on behalf of our constituents when it comes to issues like this.

With that, Mr. Speaker, it's my pleasure to support this, but I hope we can hear from many of my colleagues as well. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday has risen to speak.

Mr. Carson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I am quite excited, maybe not quite as excited as the last member to speak to this motion but excited nonetheless. I do thank the member for bringing it forward. I think it sounds like we all agree to the fact that we should be enhancing the biodiversity, health, and economic value of Alberta's lakes. I would never venture, as some members have this evening, to choose a favourite fish, with the prospect of recall legislation before us. I would not want to alienate, say, my walleye-loving constituents, but either way, once again, I do appreciate that the member brought this forward.

As has been said, Alberta's lakes are an important natural resource to our province and need to be protected and preserved. They are an important habitat, and they also play an important role in the lives of indigenous and Métis communities as well as recreational opportunities, as has been stated.

Now, I will just point out the fact that while I do support this motion and I will vote in favour of it, I do have concerns with the overall picture that this government is painting for us. While we're talking about enhancing biodiversity and working to increase the economic value of our lakes, we're also seeing cuts to environmental monitoring through the environment ministry. We're seeing cuts to Alberta Innovates, when we talk about collaborating between industries. That's a concern for the future of adding economic value to this important industry.

When we look at cuts to postsecondary education and what that might mean for training opportunities in the future for our students, where on one hand this motion is talking about increasing economic opportunities but on the other hand we have a Minister of Advanced Education who's talking about reducing opportunities for people to get trained in this important industry, whether it's, you know, environmental protection officers or conservation officers or the like, that's a concern to me. The overall goal of this government and the cuts that we're seeing don't necessarily go along with this motion.

Of course, on the other point, increased costs across the board, whether we're looking at the income tax changes that this government has made, bracket creep, it's going to leave less money in the pockets of Albertans. We talk about increased insurance costs and also the prospect of increased education costs now under this government because of the choices that they've made. Really, at the end of the day, all of those choices to increase the burden on Albertan families will mean fewer people are in a position where they can take the vehicle for a weekend and go fishing in these communities or at these lakes, so that's a concern.

With that being said, I do support Motion 509. I do thank the member for bringing it forward, and I believe it's something that we should be working towards all together.

Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you. Are there any other members wishing to speak on Motion 509?

Seeing none, the hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul to close debate.

Mr. Hanson: Well, thank you very much for the opportunity, Mr. Speaker. I thank everybody for their points, well taken, and for the friendly amendment that we've all accepted, and I would proceed to the vote.

Thank you.

[Motion Other than Government Motion 509 carried]

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 23 Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2019

The Acting Speaker: I see the hon. Minister of Energy and Deputy Government House Leader has risen.

Mrs. Savage: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am pleased to move on behalf of the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General second reading of Bill 23, the Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2019.

Mr. Speaker, if passed, the act will address a variety of issues facing our courts. The first of these issues involves the name of the Court of Queen's Bench. When Queen Elizabeth II ceases to rule, custom dictates that the name of the court is changed out of respect to the new monarch. This bill proposes re-enacting the section of the Court of Queen's Bench Act that would automatically change the court's name to Court of King's Bench. This section was repealed during the 2018 fall session of the Legislature. It's our belief that automatically renaming the court to Court of King's Bench best reflects our constitutional monarchy and honours the heritage of our legal system. This decision would be in keeping with similar naming provisions that have been enacted in Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

Bill 23 would accomplish two other matters. First, it reduces the age at which masters in chambers and Provincial Court judges may request to be appointed to part-time service. As the Court of Queen's Bench Act and the Provincial Court Act currently stand, these officials are eligible to be appointed to part-time service when they're 60 years old. Bill 23 would lower the threshold to 55 years of age. It would create greater work flexibility for judges and masters. It will also create a small amount of savings for the province. Approval of these two changes would not be automatic. The Chief Judge of the Provincial Court and the Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench would have power to deny a request if they felt it would create difficulties for the court.

Finally, Bill 23 would give justices of the Court of Queen's Bench and the Court of Appeal greater access to federal funds. Currently when these justices attend certain meetings, conferences, or seminars, the federal Judges Act places an annual $500 limit on the amount of money available to pay their expenses. This limit places undue pressure on the provincial budget allocation for these two judicial branches. Bill 23 would allow the $500 level to increase by authorizing their attendance at meetings, conferences, or seminars relating to the administration of justice with the approval of the Chief Justice. This change would allow these justices greater freedom to travel and carry out their duties. Taken together, these provisions, while small, will create a more efficient justice system.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any hon. members wishing to join debate on this matter? I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View has risen.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much. I am pleased to rise and speak to this bill. Obviously, there are sort of three main components that we're dealing with here. One of them is eligibility for part-time service. I don't think I have any concerns per se about that. It just lowers the age from 60 to 55 so that a judge may go part-time sooner. I think my only concern is that in light of the budget and in light of the forthcoming 20 per cent cuts to the court services, I'm a little concerned that this is just another method to reduce the number of judges available in the provincial court to hear matters. Of course, the reason that that concerns me, the reason that I'm concerned about a decrease in the number of hearing days available to the public, is that the justice system is fairly strained. I don't think that this is a surprise to anyone. It's been the case for – well, it's probably been getting worse for at least the last 20 years.

That was creating increased concern, and then in 2016 the Supreme Court of Canada came out with the Jordan decision, which is now a fairly famous decision, which basically said that matters could be stayed if they didn't reach court in a timely manner. It set limits, very firm limits, on what those matters were. We had challenges with Jordan here because when the decision came down, the court system had been slowing down, like I say, for a couple of decades. It was very difficult to turn that very large ship, but we worked diligently to do it, and we saw average lead times to trial in provincial court coming down significantly and average lead times for matters coming down significantly.

We saw less movement on that front, unfortunately, in the Court of Queen's Bench, and that's because those are federal appointments. Despite the fact that our current federal government – still current, I guess – had made some moves and allowed Alberta to have more judges, it was still the case that they weren't appointing sufficiently quickly. Unlike in provincial court, where the province had a lot more ability to move and to change things and where we saw lead times coming down a lot, we didn't see nearly as much happening in the Court of Queen's Bench. That's why it concerns me that we're going to have potentially fewer and that this could be used to have fewer provincial court positions, because it means that matters will take longer to get to trial again, and that means matters being stayed. That's bad for everyone.

It's incredibly challenging emotionally to be a victim of crime. I have talked to a lot of people over the years who have had devastating experiences, and their experience with the court system itself is incredibly challenging. To go through all of that and to not even get your matter adjudicated, to not even get your day in court, to have the person you have accused of doing what may be the worst thing that's ever happened in your life go free without a trial: that's pretty awful. I don't think that anyone in Alberta should have that experience. That is my concern there.

When we talk about matters before the court, the criminal ones are obviously important, but there are a number of other things. Civil matters are important before the courts. Family matters are important. Sometimes these people come in before the courts, and they're coming a couple days before Christmas and they're literally arguing over who gets to have the kids on Christmas. The stress of that, not just on the families but on the children who are experiencing that, is incredibly challenging. The longer that conflict is allowed to draw on, the more negative experiences those children have, particularly in high-conflict cases where you're arguing over custody and access. It's a huge concern to me that this may be used as a way to decrease the number of sitting days, decrease the number of appearances available to Albertans. That is my major concern with this bill.

I'm actually quite supportive of allowing judges and justices to travel to attend federal conferences. I think that that's incredibly important. We certainly know that there's been a lot of attention recently around ensuring that judges are appropriately prepared to deal particularly with sexual assault cases in light of some very unfortunate things that have happened in the court system. I have to give them credit. The Provincial Court of Alberta, you know, after that happened, after I had the experience of having to complain about a sitting judge, which was a difficult decision for me, and his comments to a sexual assault complainant, the Provincial Court did go out and immediately bring in experts to assist them with that training. I do know that they were concerned about it, and I'm glad that they were. I think that we all ought to be, so that piece is quite important in terms of judicial education.

I think that the last piece of this, obviously, changes the name back to the way it was. Obviously, by way of miscellaneous statutes, so with the consent of both sides, both the previous government and the now government, who was then in opposition, had agreed that we ought to give the Lieutenant Governor in Council, so basically cabinet, the jurisdiction to change the names of the court if that was seen fit. It's a bit peculiar to me that they were in favour of it then and are against it now, but I don't think that this is a huge concern. I mean, the changes that we made at the time were made after multiple conversations with stakeholders who felt very strongly that the names of the court needed to be more reflective of everyone in Alberta, sort of more reflective of what they felt the courts should look like. Obviously, minds have been changed in that case. I certainly haven't had people banging down my doors to suggest that this is a concern for them, so I think that mostly that isn't a major concern for us. I don't think that the change that we made was bad. I think that giving cabinet the ability to make that decision was fine. I don't think that's sufficient to oppose it.

I guess to sum up, overall I think that this is mostly fine. My main concern, again, arises around Jordan because we've made so much progress. We've made so much progress on that issue, on ensuring that cases of serious and violent matters are not being stayed, and I'm really concerned that this is one step in reversing that progress.

With that, I will end my comments, and thank you very much.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you.

Hon. members, I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud has risen to speak.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise today to speak to Bill 23, the Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2019. I share a lot of the comments from my colleague from Calgary-Mountain View, in particular, even as myself, a practising lawyer, who practised for some time before running for my current position, I actually had not given much thought prior to this about the fact that our courts are named the Court of Queen's Bench and what would happen when the Queen was no longer the Queen. I can honestly say that this is probably the first time I've actually turned my mind to that, to think about the fact that perhaps the current Queen has been the Queen for so long, my entire lifetime, so I had not really even thought about that.

While I was at first surprised by the change, of course, it does make sense. It does fit within our Constitutional monarchy system, and certainly we know that there are many symbols and traditions that we draw from the fact that we are a constitutional monarchy, so I can appreciate that that does need to change when the Queen unfortunately passes. I do have to say that I'm slightly concerned about the impact that that will have financially because, of course, there are so many ways that the Court of Queen's Bench – and even just terms of vernacular. Lawyers are quite, you know, familiar with calling it QB, which is Queen's Bench. Certainly, I can imagine that there's going to be quite a cost associated with making a name change, but that's just the reality, I suppose, of the system we have.

I had not heard the concerns raised by stakeholders that my colleague from Calgary-Mountain View expressed that perhaps the courts should be more reflective of the diversity of our province. I think that's a fair comment. However, I will say, you know, that I think we have the system that we have. That's been in place for some time. There are significant tradition and values that go along with that. I think that perhaps there's a bigger conversation that could be had around how we make sure our courts do reflect all of our diversity. I note, for example, we recently brought eagle feathers into the courtrooms, which I think is a fantastic tribute and recognition of reconciliation but also the value of our indigenous peoples. So, certainly, there are ways that our courts need to better reflect the diversity of our province.

I do also want to comment on the change in Bill 23 that will lower the age of eligibility for part-time service for judges to age 55. Like my colleague, you know, I share a concern. Well, I acknowledge and am respectful of the fact that judges have usually by the time they're appointed to the bench served for quite some time in the legal fields and are usually prestigious. I certainly am somebody who supports flexible work environments, particularly to accommodate individuals and families and whatever the case may be, but while I do understand that more and more judges might be seeking that sort of service and may be more willing to take the appointment were they to get that, I share a concern that it does cause a delay at a time when we are constantly talking about how to move our justice system to be more expeditious and to deal with concerns. My colleague rightfully pointed out the decision of the Supreme Court and Jordan, which actually created an imperative on our systems to move more quickly so that we are not staying charges in violent criminal cases in particular.

I do worry that with fewer judges working full-time, more judges working part-time, that does increase the demand that we need to make sure that we are actually appointing and working with our federal counterparts to ensure that more judges are appointed so that we do not see a slowdown in how our cases go through the court system because I think that's a significant concern to all Albertans. We talk a lot in this House about the administration of justice and making sure that it is proper and fair, and part of fairness, of course, means making sure that it is handled expeditiously both for the accused but also particularly for the victims.

I'd be curious to know whether or not an assessment has been done as to how this could impact the number of appointments and the ability to move cases through the system and whether there's a plan of action should there be fewer judges available to hear cases because they're now part-time. Has there been an assessment of how we're going to make up for that by either appointing more judges or working with our federal counterparts to do so?

With respect to the change in Bill 23 that would allow for more judges to access federal reimbursement for travel to take conferences and to do that professional development, I think that's critical. Even as legislators we know – I recently attended a conference where I got to meet legislators from other provinces, and it is such an invaluable experience, not only because you get to learn a little bit more about what's happening in other jurisdictions, but it hones your own skills as well. That does not stop when you're in the legal profession. I know that professional development is a key part of my obligations. As a member of the Law Society we are all as professionals required to maintain that professional development, and so too should our judges. So I think that that is a fair and reasonable expectation, especially since we're looking for reimbursement from the federal government for that kind of travel. Certainly, we do want our judges to have opportunities to hone their skills and to learn from the experiences of their colleagues in other provinces.

I'm mindful of the time, Mr. Speaker. Therefore, I will reserve any further judgments for any further reading of this bill. I do want to say that I think there are some relatively – they seem innocuous, but they're important changes and good changes. I am curious a little bit because I do think we need to answer these questions about the impact of the system as it goes through, particularly with reducing the number of judges potentially.

I'd be very interested to know about the cost implications about changing the name from Court of Queen's Bench to Court of King's Bench. There will be costs associated with that, and how will that be accounted for? Of course, we don't know precisely when Her Majesty will no longer be with us and the name change will be happening, but certainly I would hope that there is some planning that's being put forward into the system to make sure that we are prepared to make those changes clearly.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but seeing the time is now 6 o'clock, the House stands adjourned until 7:30 p.m.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

7:30 p.m.

Monday, November 18, 2019

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Please be seated.

Government Bills and Orders Third Reading

Bill 19

Technology Innovation and Emissions Reduction Implementation Act, 2019

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Environment and Parks.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to move third reading of Bill 19, the Technology Innovation and Emissions Reduction Implementation Act, 2019.

Mr. Speaker, our government fulfilled its campaign promise, as you know, to repeal the carbon tax as our first priority. We were proud to accomplish that with Bill 1, An Act to Repeal the Carbon Tax, this spring. This was a promise that we made to Albertans along the way that we were excited to be able to fulfill for them to be able to take away the job-killing carbon tax and to be able to begin to move this province forward, something, I would remind you, that Albertans voted for in overwhelming numbers in April and sent clear instructions that they did not want a carbon tax going forward, clear instructions when they fired the NDP, who are now the only one-term government in the history of this province. A large part of that was to do with their job-killing carbon tax.

However, Albertans also voted in overwhelming numbers this April for a different solution when it comes to emissions reductions inside this province. They voted for the technology innovation and emissions reduction system that we campaigned on, Mr. Speaker, and that's what this bill that is before the House paved the way for. It's a commitment to implement the TIER system, as we promised. That will be achieved through Bill 19 if it passes this Chamber. So we are clear, this bill includes a name change, the TIER regulation and new provincial emissions management and resilience strategy.

Alberta's entrepreneurial spirit runs deep in this province. I understand that the NDP and some of their allies are anti the oil and gas industry, the industry that built this very province, Mr. Speaker, but I and my colleagues on this side of the House are proud of the oil and gas industry. We're proud of the energy industry. We're proud of their contribution to this province. We're proud of the men and women who built the energy industry and helped to build this province. At no time, unlike the members opposite, would you find me standing on the steps of the Legislature protesting against the very men and women who built this province, who have created an industry that is the economic backbone of Alberta, but not only that, the economic backbone of the entire country.

I always enjoy the member from Edmonton laughing when we talk about the energy industry, Mr. Speaker. I don't find the energy industry funny. I find it extremely important and an industry we should be proud of.

Our industry leaders, though, Mr. Speaker, my point is, are innovators. They are able to create such amazing things like creating the energy from the oil sands in northern Alberta, which has gone on to contribute to the success of this province in significant ways for decades, not only the success of this province but the success of the entire country. That type of innovation runs deep inside our province. That entrepreneurial spirit runs deep inside our province. I'm proud of it. I know my colleagues are proud of it. The TIER program allows us to work to harness that same entrepreneurial spirit, to be able to focus on technology and innovation, to be able to move forward on the climate change file, to be able to move forward on reductions in emissions, Mr. Speaker, in contrast to the NDP's plan, which was to tax everyday Albertans, to reach into their pockets and to take tax money from them at the very time that Albertans needed their then government to actually stand up for them. Their then NDP government spent their time trying to tax Albertans instead of helping them and then took the money from that program, from their climate leadership program, and spent it on things like light bulbs and shower heads. Shame on them for that.

Not only that, Mr. Speaker, they then took that money and they spent it with Ontario companies. Get that. I don't know if some of my new colleagues to this Chamber, who were not here in the 29th Legislature, know that, but that's what the NDP government did. They taxed Albertans while they were down. They took money from hard-working Albertans. They then spent it in Ontario companies to buy light bulbs and shower heads, Mr. Speaker, and then sent people around with those Ontario products to install them inside the people's houses.

Mr. Speaker, I know your neck of the woods. Both of us, as the co-MLAs for the great county of Mountain View, where I'm proud to be from and I know that you are proud to be from, were shocked to find out, then, that when they installed those shower heads in rural Alberta, where I'm from, they didn't even work. Not only that, they took the money, they invested in Ontario companies, they sent people around to install shower heads that didn't even work because the water pressure wasn't high enough in rural Alberta. Such a shameful process.

And then, Mr. Speaker, their leader famously – this is shocking. I know that you will be shocked. Their leader, the former Premier of Alberta, told Albertans to take the bus when they protested against her carbon tax. Told them to take the bus. How many buses are in your constituency? I know it's very similar to my constituency. Of course, you're from the east side of the Cowboy Trail. I'm from the west side of the Cowboy Trail, so maybe things are a little different west of the fifth, so to speak, but the reality is that we don't have buses. We don't have buses. There's no bus that comes and picks me up to bring me to Sundre to go grocery shopping or to do other things. It was a ridiculous, ridiculous thing to say but not shocking from a former government that called Albertans sewer rats or called them Chicken Little or those types of things. They clearly did not care about the implications of their carbon tax on the people of Alberta or the consequences to the very people of Alberta that they should have been trying to protect.

We, the current government, because Albertans told us to – I want to stress that – have brought forward the TIER program, which will focus on working through the entrepreneurial and innovative spirit in this province to be able to harness that to actually have implications in a positive way on emission reductions. We're excited about that, Mr. Speaker. It's why we brought the TIER program, something that Albertans voted for that was clearly put in the platform and is a clear contrast to – I see the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar, who I know is the environment critic in their party. It's a clear contrast to their approach, which was to tax my constituents, your constituents, and everyone's constituents inside this House with no significant positive impact when it came to climate change.

Mr. Speaker, the NDP's approach also ignored the fact that the number one way that we can overcome this issue, which is a global issue, nothing that Canada does – and it's important. We should do stuff. It's why we have legislation in this House today. But nothing that Canada does can have a significant impact on global emissions here at home except for one thing. Do you know what that is? Getting our clean natural gas to Asia and to India. Even the Paris agreement talked about that, about the fact that the number one thing that Canada and Alberta can do is take our clean energy products and get them to the rest of the world. That will have a bigger impact on global emissions.

Sadly, the former government, while they focused on taxing Albertans repeatedly, taxing fixed-income seniors, taxing school boards, taxing municipalities, taxing unemployed Albertans who are using fuel to try and find work, taxing farmers and ranchers, while they were focused on that, did not focus on the number one thing that they could do when it comes to climate change and emission reductions, which was to get our clean energy products to the world. Instead, do you know what they did, Mr. Speaker? They sided with their close ally Justin Trudeau, who was doing everything he could to hurt our energy industry, and even worse, they sided with the leader of their party – the provincial and the federal NDP Party are the exact same party – and they voted for him despite the fact that he was on the record trying to stop pipelines, trying to shut down the energy industry.

I see the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood smiling with excitement for supporting her leader. That's okay. That's her leader. That was her prerogative, but Albertans should understand that that's what the NDP's focus was. Our focus is working with the industry, continuing to reduce emission intensity, create innovative technologies that not only help us here at home but can help us abroad. That's exciting, Mr. Speaker.

The other important difference between this program and the NDP's program is that we are straight up with Albertans on how we're going to spend the money. The NDP took their taxes that they put on Albertans. They put it into what I affectionately or not affectionately referred to as the orange slush fund for all my time in opposition and then spent it all over government on different pet projects. Then they had the nerve, Mr. Speaker, to sit on these benches right here and to stand up over and over and claim that they were giving major rebates to Albertans when that was not the fact. What they were doing was taking money, putting it into general revenue, something that they promised Albertans they would not do and then did anyway, and then spent it on their pet projects.

Transparency on our side of the House is significantly different than the NDP. We put in our platform exactly what we would do: the first $100 million plus 50 cents on every dollar to go towards technology and innovation and partnerships with our industry to reduce emissions and the remaining 50 per cent of every dollar to be able to go to deficit reduction to begin to clean up the mess that the NDP made when they were in power. Mr. Speaker, they didn't only make a mess of the emission reduction file, which, by the way, this province has been working on long before the NDP were in power, but they made a mess of everything when they were in government, so we had to do our part to be able to help to fix that.

Mr. Speaker, of course – and I know the NDP like to rail against this – an investment in what is affectionately referred to as the war room, the Canadian Energy Centre, that the Energy minister oversees to protect our largest industry. Well, of course the NDP rail against it. They voted for their federal leader, who wants the energy industry to be shut down. They supported Justin Trudeau, who said he doesn't want the oil sands to exist anymore inside this country. They stood with their federal Liberal allies and their federal NDP allies repeatedly, over and over stood against Albertans instead with their ideological friends in Ontario. We're not doing that here. Instead we're standing with industry and our province and the people of Alberta.

My last thing that I want to show the contrast between the NDP's approach and our approach is that we are working to protect our industry from Justin Trudeau. The NDP over and over, Mr. Speaker – and I know you have been in this Chamber as long as I have and have probably had your own reaction to watching it repeatedly, but the NDP repeatedly have sided with Justin Trudeau over Alberta. Think about this: they sided with a federal Prime Minister who went out of his way to make life worse for Albertans, and they side with him.

We don't. We side with our industry, who we're depending on to create economic growth, to help people go to work inside our province, so we've created a system that keeps our energy industry, not just our energy industry but all of our industries, all of our large emitters and our conventional oil and gas facilities, being regulated inside the province of Alberta and not by an anti oil and gas Prime Minister that the provincial NDP have allied with and not by a federal NDP Party who's leader says that he wants to shut down oil and gas pipelines. Instead, we brought them safely to be able to have an opportunity to be able to regulate it inside our province with the province of Alberta. You know why, Mr. Speaker? Because that's what they asked for. They do not want to be with the federal Liberal leadership inside Ontario despite the fact that the former government, now opposition, wants to continue to sell them out to them.

Mr. Speaker, in closing, I think all members of this House should support this important piece of legislation because it fulfills a promise to Albertans that Albertans voted for in record numbers. Record numbers. Clearly and transparently put inside the platform, talked about by the Premier every stop along the way in great detail, his plan. That's what Albertans chose. Albertans chose our plan and rejected the NDP's plan when they fired them just a few short months ago.

Second, it's a plan that allows us to be able to harness the great entrepreneurial and innovative spirit of this province that we should be proud of. It allows us to partner with the people that built this province to be able to help innovate our way out of what is a serious problem.

Lastly, Mr. Speaker, it's a plan that is actually transparent on how the money from this fund will be used, unlike the NDP's approach to this, which was to say one thing while they were running and then come in and bring in the largest tax increase in the history of the province.

One other thing before I yield the floor, Mr. Speaker, because this may be the last time that we talk about an emissions reduction bill inside this place. The former government still has not apologized, and rather than standing up inside this place and rejecting the plan that Albertans voted for in overwhelming numbers, they should take some time to think about why they got fired, because at the end of the day it comes down to the plan that they brought forward on climate change. It comes down to the plan that they brought forward that hurt seniors inside my constituency, that hurt schoolkids inside my constituency, that made it harder for businesses to create work and created some of the largest unemployment in the history of this province, that caused billions of dollars of investment to flee this province. That's what they should be thinking about right now, reflecting on why Albertans rejected their plan so drastically instead of still trying to defend it.

But you know what? They won't, because this is the party that was in power when their leader's office told seniors, when they raised concerns about the carbon tax in my riding, to go and hold a fundraiser to pay for the carbon tax. Well, through you to them, Mr. Speaker, shame on them. Shame on them. They should spend some time reflecting on that, coming up with emission plans that actually work for Albertans, and stop spending their time trying to tax Albertans, trying to take money out of Albertans' pockets and then spend it on Ontario companies or their ideological friends in eastern Canada. Instead, stand up for Alberta, stand up for our energy industry, stand up for our other industries, and stand with Alberta, not their federal allies Justin Trudeau and the NDP.

The Speaker: Hon. members, we are at third reading of Bill 19. Anyone else wishing to join in the debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise and speak against Bill 19 at third reading. You know, it's always interesting to hear the Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre talk about climate change. In the 15 minutes that he had to defend the legislation that he brought forward, he said that this bill is huge, that it's the best bill on climate change that we've ever seen – he said, “Trust me; it's going to be amazing” – and then he didn't provide any details or any plan on how Alberta is going to reduce carbon dioxide emissions. In fact – in fact – he admits that carbon dioxide emissions are going to increase under this plan. And then for the remaining 13 and a half minutes he railed against our climate leadership plan. You know, fine. We're no longer in the place of having to defend the climate leadership plan. That has been clearly thrown out, but a majority of Canadians and a majority of Albertans want the country – and that means Alberta has to do its share – to reduce carbon dioxide emissions immediately.

As I've said many times in this House, time is running out. We only have about eight years to get our carbon dioxide emissions under control before we start triggering catastrophic changes in the world's climate system, Mr. Speaker, and to think that Albertans won't pay the cost is flat out wrong. We are going to pay the cost in increased fires. We're going to pay the cost in increased floods. We're going to pay the cost in increased drought. We're going to pay the cost in increased number of days where the heat is intolerable. People are going to suffer severe health consequences and possibly die as a result of catastrophic global climate change if we don't get our act together.

That's why it's absolutely unacceptable that this government stands up and says that it's taking the issue of climate change seriously and then introduces a bill that actually increases emissions. You know, this is clearly not acceptable. We are still waiting for the federal government to make a decision as to whether or not this meets the federal backstop. I eagerly anticipate the government's decision, and I certainly hope that everybody, both the provincial government and the federal government, takes their responsibilities to reduce carbon dioxide emissions seriously and that we see a plan developed here that will result in real carbon dioxide emission reductions.

I don't hold out a lot of hope, though, because in the last few sentences of the Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre's speech he said that this is probably going to be the last time we discuss a carbon dioxide emission reductions bill in the House. I think that's a pretty terrifying fact. Here we have a plan that actually increases carbon dioxide emissions, and the Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre says that there is nothing else we are going to do in the remaining days of our government to tackle climate change. That's unacceptable to me, that's unacceptable to the people of Edmonton-Gold Bar, and I think that's unacceptable to Alberta and to Albertans' children.

It's ironic because we get lectured all the time about leaving intergenerational debt, fiscal debt, on the backs of Albertans, yet here we have a government that's leaving a huge climate change debt for our children to have to deal with. I don't think that's fair. They don't seem to recognize the fact that they are saddling future Albertans with significant climate change debt, that will have consequences that are much more extreme than any fiscal debt that we could create.

On the issue of, you know, reducing global climate emissions, the Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre is correct in saying that it is a global problem. However, the other statements that he's made wrapped around that are completely false. Again, we hear from the other side all the time that Canada has no responsibility, that there's nothing we can do on our own to reduce climate change emissions, and there's nothing that could be further from the truth. Canada, although it is a small emitter on the global scale, is still one of the top 10 countries that emits carbon dioxide emissions in the entire world. We're top 10. That means that nine other countries in the world have emissions that are greater than our own, and that means that we have a responsibility to reduce emissions simply because we've already had the benefit of carbon dioxide emission reductions, and we need to carry the load, as it were, when it comes to reducing carbon dioxide emissions.

The second argument that they come out with all the time is this idea that the best way to reduce global climate emissions is for us to ship natural gas to India and China. There are two things that are wrong with that argument, Mr. Speaker. The first is that none of the international agreements around reducing climate change emissions have any form of exchange of credits between countries, so Canada is not going to get any credit for climate emission reductions for reducing . . . [interjection] If the Member for Lacombe-Ponoka, you know, would have the decency to keep his mouth shut while I'm speaking and engage in the debate when he has the time . . .

The Speaker: Hon. member, while I appreciate the fact that you may not like the interjections from the Member for Lacombe-Ponoka, I don't think threatening someone to keep their mouth shut is appropriate in this House. I think you can apologize and withdraw, and we can move on. I appreciate your commitment to not having people interject, but I also know that you know the rules of the place.

Mr. Schmidt: I apologize and withdraw, Mr. Speaker.

Regardless, the idea that we can get credit for emission reductions in China and India is flat out wrong. There's nothing in any global climate change plan that says that even if China and India would use more natural gas in electricity production for their energy uses, it necessarily means that they will even reduce their carbon dioxide emissions. There's nothing about building natural gas infrastructure in Canada to ship it to China and India that will be a benefit to global climate emission reductions. You know, the members opposite need to be honest with Albertans when they're talking about what Canada has to do with respect to climate change emissions.

I had to laugh when I heard the Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre complain about how not transparent we were with the money that was invested through the climate leadership plan. It was so untransparent, Mr. Speaker, that every budget document introduced into this Legislature contained in detail where all of the money was collected from and where it was spent. Every organization that was involved with the collection and expense of carbon dioxide emission reduction plans had to provide annual reports to this Chamber. There was nothing but complete transparency around where every cent of that money was collected from and where it was spent.

On the flip side, the Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre is quite clear that $30 million a year is going to be funnelled into the Premier's war room, designed for the purposes of vilifying people who are engaged in their democratic right to discuss public policy issues in the country. There is no oversight over that. In fact, the company is exempt from FOIP. There is no way that citizens are going to be allowed to see how that $30 million a year is going to be spent.

In fact, we've seen already from the government a lack of transparency around what even constitutes war room business these days, with the Premier's principal secretary allegedly on business for trade missions, and then it might have been war room business, and then it was a mix of war room business and trade mission. Of course, we'll never find out the truth because we can't find out where the $30 million that is being collected and spent on this war room is going to be spent. For the Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre to accuse us of not being transparent is mind-boggling, but I know that in the UCP world whatever is good for the goose is not necessarily good for the gander, so here we are.

The other thing that struck me as odd was the member's reliance on continued emphasis on Alberta's entrepreneurial spirit, that the money collected from the TIER plan is going to boost entrepreneurialism by letting the large emitters off the hook from funding research and development that they should pay for and turning that responsibility over to the taxpayers of Alberta. I don't see how that's in any way entrepreneurial. If private enterprise wants to sponsor research and development into carbon dioxide emissions, they're more than welcome to, but it's quite clear that they are either unwilling or unable to make those investments on their own, so they've asked the government of Alberta to pick up the tab.

Now, I am completely in favour of government spending on research and development, but to frame it as private-sector entrepreneurialism is absolutely ludicrous, Mr. Speaker. I think it would be wise for everyone to admit that this is a problem that requires collective action and that collectively all Albertans are responsible for working together on the solutions. That's why I think it's a good idea that we spend money on research and development, but it's also why we need to be sure that we're spending enough money on research and development and making other money available for the carbon emission reduction technologies that we know exist.

In my comments at second reading I said that we already know what works to reduce carbon dioxide emissions, right? It's energy efficiency, it's renewable energy, and it's public transportation. Those are the things that we need to be investing in to achieve significant carbon dioxide emission reductions, and all of those things are things that the members opposite have stepped away from. Now they're just pinning their hopes on some magical technology that's going to be invented that will somehow reduce carbon dioxide emissions when they're unwilling to implement the kind of technologies that we know will work.

You know, as a side note, Mr. Speaker, of course, the member opposite likes to highlight the fact that we've encouraged people to use public transportation, and then they say: well, we can't use public transportation in places like Olds and Rocky Mountain House because there is none. Well, that seems to me like a problem that the provincial government should fix. If there isn't public transportation available to people in those centres, then we should provide some. We should make public transportation available to people who don't have access to it. It's not just folks in Edmonton and Calgary who need reliable, affordable transportation to get to work and get their children around town. Everybody has that need. To say that investing in public transportation doesn't help the citizens just reveals a lack of imagination on the part of the members opposite. In fact, we should be moving towards some kind of policy that creates public transportation that's more widely available to more of the citizens of Alberta instead of just laughing at people who suggest that public transportation is a potential solution to the issue of climate change.

Anyway, Mr. Speaker, there are a number of other issues that I have with respect to this bill. We do have some questions planned for the member opposite during estimates tomorrow around some of the details of the TIER plan. Unfortunately, you know, it would have been nice to have been able to get that information before we were asked to vote on this at third reading, but here we are. We're a government, I guess, that's intent on making sure that we get all of our legislation passed without allowing the people of Alberta to thoroughly examine and understand the consequences of the legislation that we're passing.

For all of the issues that I've highlighted with this bill – the fact that it actually increases emissions, the fact that it eliminates spending on technologies that we know will work to reduce carbon dioxide emissions, the fact that the money is being funnelled into a top secret Twitter troll farm, and the fact that, you know, it really leaves Albertans at significant risk of the effects of climate change – I urge all of my fellow members here in the House to vote against this bill.

The Speaker: Hon. members, is there anyone else wishing to speak to Bill 19 as 29(2)(a) isn't quite available yet but will be following the subsequent speakers? Anyone else wishing to join in the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise today and speak to Bill 19, the emissions management and climate resilience act, or TIER. Let me make it very clear. Climate change is the largest crisis facing my generation of people. It is one of the most important things that we will ever do in this Chamber, so when the Minister of Environment and Parks gets up and says that he thinks that this will be the last time we ever speak of this again in this House, I think that is something that is shameful. I think it's something that we should strive to do better. In fact, it's in the name of his ministry, environment. We should be trying to actually, perhaps, do his job.

Mr. Speaker, we're here to talk about the bill today, and I think it's very important that we do talk about the impacts this bill will have on future generations because when members like the Member for Lacombe-Ponoka get up and heckle and speak and talk about, "Well, you drove a car to work today, didn't you?" and "You have to heat your house, don't you?" – these whataboutisms are really great and all, but the reality is that the science doesn't care whether you believe in it or not. The reality is that we as young people will have to deal and live with the consequences of climate change.

Legislation like this and repealing the climate leadership plan and moving with a plan that actually proposes that we increase our emissions is something that will have detrimental effects for decades and hundreds of years to come, detrimental effects for people like myself, detrimental effects for people that are younger than me in the next generation, and detrimental effects that perhaps that member will not see. That's true. Many people in this House will not see what those effects will be. They will not be here when the flooding comes. They will not be here when the forest fires happen, Mr. Speaker, but my generation will. I will, my children will, and the people that I know and love will. We are the ones that are going to be living with the effects of climate change, the climate crisis. This is the reality of what is happening right now.

So when you use whataboutisms like “Did you drive to work today? Did you heat your house today?” that is a fundamentally flawed and, I will say, a fundamentally ridiculous idea because we can do things to help reduce global emissions, to help reduce emissions here in Alberta without resorting to trying to belittle individuals, without resorting to saying to individuals that they are the problem. It is a fundamental misunderstanding with what the climate crisis is. It is a fundamental misunderstanding of how we are supposed to deal with the climate crisis, because it is young people like us that are going to have to live with these effects. When the government members get up and say, “Oh, it’s not even a thing; it’s not real; it doesn’t matter,” or “They should just stop driving their cars and stop heating their homes,” that is completely ignoring the root of the issue. It’s completely ignoring what we are supposed to be fighting against. It’s completely ignoring how we actually should be addressing issues collaboratively in this House. Instead, these government members choose to belittle, they choose to ignore, and they choose to reject.

That is shameful. It’s because those are the things that we are going to have to live with. Those are the things that young people will remember. Young people will remember this. They will know that this generation, the one that came just before mine and before them as well, let us down. They let down the younger people because the younger people will no longer have clean air to breathe. Younger people will no longer have forests to go into and explore, our national parks here, for example. All these things are at risk. It’s not just the recreation, Mr. Speaker. It’s not just the playgrounds and the parks and the forests and the mountains and the oceans. It’s the very way of life. It’s the very ability to actually live. It’s the attack and the flooding. For something like I believe it’s — significant percentages of the world population live within flood zones, and as the water level rises in the oceans, their homes will be under water. That’s what we are talking about. We’re talking about a global climate catastrophe.

My colleague the opposition environment critic and Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar spoke about how we have eight years. That’s the problem with scientists, Mr. Speaker. They speak about how we have eight years to reverse the acts of climate change. The problem is that they’re probably too optimistic. They probably are actually saying: if we stopped emitting right now, all emissions, then in eight years we’d be fine. We know that’s not likely. We know it’s not feasible, but we also know that we can’t stop fighting. We can’t not try just because it’s going to make less of a difference.

It’s people like the Member for Lacombe-Ponoka who probably throw their coffee out the window when they finish it as they’re driving down the road. That’s because: “Well, one coffee cup is not a lot of garbage. Just like Alberta: Alberta doesn’t give a lot of emissions. If it’s only one coffee cup, what does it matter?” Well, Mr. Speaker, let me tell you that I believe that any reasonable person in this province would say: well, that’s a stupid argument. That’s what these government members are saying when they say things like “Alberta is a small emitter,” when they say, “Alberta doesn’t emit enough to make a difference.” They’re saying that they are willing to throw their coffee cups out the window as they drive down the highway. That’s a stupid argument. I’m willing to say it. I’m willing to say it in the House on the record right now because it fundamentally ignores what young people have been saying, what scientists have been saying. It fundamentally doesn’t understand what a climate catastrophe is. It doesn’t understand why this is so important.

These are our lives. It’s not their lives. That’s right: many of them will not be here to see those effects. They will not be here to have to live with the consequences of mass tropicalization, mass temperature increases.

To put it in perspective, Mr. Speaker, when the ice age happened, I believe there was a two-degree Celsius average global temperature difference. Average global temperature: there was a two-degree Celsius difference to what it was in about the 1980s. Since the 1980s the average global temperature has gone up almost one and a half degrees Celsius. One and a half degrees Celsius. We are on track to increase the temperature of this planet so much that the last time the temperature increased this much, half of the world’s global ice sheets disappeared. Half of the world’s global ice sheets. Almost all of North America, all of where we stand right now, where we are sitting right now was covered in ice last time the temperature changed this much.

That’s the type of disaster we’re talking about. We’re talking about a disaster that will be so significant that we will kill hundreds of thousands of people if not millions if not billions, Mr. Speaker. That is what is happening. That is what we’re talking about. We’re not being hyperbolic. When young people say, “This is a catastrophe,” we’re not being hyperbolic. We’re talking about the lives of millions if not billions of people on this planet.

Climate change is a real crisis that we can move to try and fight today, and this legislation does absolutely nothing. It increases the emissions that we will have in this province. It does absolutely nothing to actually make a difference. Mr. Speaker, it’s either because these members of the government don’t understand or they don’t care. I won’t hypothesize on which one that is, but it has to be one of the two because people and scientists and young people and people that aren’t young, either, have been talking about this for a very long time. They’ve been explaining that this TIER legislation, for example, is absolutely disastrous, that it is something that will absolutely harm our planet, Mother Earth, what gives us life. It will absolutely cause damage. That’s something that they don’t understand, that they don’t want to see, that they don’t want to reckon with.

I understand that it’s uncomfortable. I understand that it’s uncomfortable to deal with the reality that the way of life we have, myself included, Mr. Speaker, may be damaging our planet. That is an uncomfortable reality. It is something that nobody wants to admit. It is something that nobody wants to reckon with, but the reality is that it doesn’t matter whether we don’t like it or not. It will still happen to us. We will still have these effects on future generations. We will still have these effects on our families, our children, and our grandchildren because in as little as 10 or 20 years we will not be able to recognize what type of damage we have done. The planet will look fundamentally different. It will be fundamentally different. That is something that is very, very dangerous.

It is something that we should know better, and we do know better. We had a better plan, and we had a plan that didn’t try to pit the economy and the environment against each other. But that’s what this bill is doing; that’s what this TIER legislation is doing. It’s something that’s absolutely shameful. It’s something that’s absolutely a misunderstanding of how serious this issue will be. That may or may not be intentional, but I certainly think that we should strive to do better.

When we talk about striving to do better, the environment minister spoke about it himself when he was speaking to this bill, how they wanted to reduce greenhouse gas emissions and different emissions like carbon dioxide and methane. Well, this very legislation that we’re looking at right here proposes that we actually increase the emissions by a significant number of megatonnes, Mr.

Speaker. Again, on a global scale, perhaps, yes, it's not going to be as much as we would like. That's true.

Let me tell you that young people if you talk to them, scientists if you talk to them would say that we should be reducing emissions quite a bit more than even the climate leadership plan that we proposed had. That's the reality. I'll admit it. The climate leadership plan, people would say, was not aggressive enough. But to introduce a plan on the turnaround that actually proposes that we increase emissions is shameful. That is absolutely shameful because it shows that the government really does not understand and does not care about what this environmental impact will be. Does not care, Mr. Speaker. I think that is something that's very, very dangerous, it's something that is very, very shameful, and it's something that I'm very concerned about.

So I'm standing here in this House today – I'm standing here in this House today – fighting to make sure that we have this on the record, because we know that this government has a majority and that what they have is the ability to ram through damaging legislation. They have the ability to ram through legislation that's going to hurt generations for decades to come, for hundreds of years to come, perhaps millennia to come. We can't predict the future, Mr. Speaker, but what we can predict is that this will hurt our planet. That's what we can predict.

I hope that perhaps members will look into their hearts and, hopefully, into their textbooks as well, but I hope that they will look into something and understand how drastic these effects will be, understand how drastically the environment will be damaged, and understand what this means because this isn't just screaming into a void. These are actual impacts that will affect this planet. They're actual impacts that will affect these students, these young people, people of my generation, Mr. Speaker.

Again, I know some of them won't be here to see the impacts, but I will. When we fight again to try and save our planet or try to reduce the damage that's being done to the planet in decades to come here, when this comes up again and again, even if the environment minister does not want it to come up again – he said so himself in his opening remarks here – when we have these conversations, I'm going to be proud that I stood in this House and fought against this disastrous plan. I fought against this plan that does nothing to help the environment, absolutely nothing.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. I see the hon. the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would like to be able to just comment on a couple of points that were made by the last two speakers, actually. I'm quoting, actually, the World Resources Institute. What they've said is that from 2005 to 2014 Canada's global emissions decreased from 1.8 per cent to 1.6 per cent. Now, it's interesting also just to be able to – you know, a couple of members stood up there and talked about some things that I thought were interesting.

First of all, the last member just said that we don't have to worry because we're all going to be dead on this side of the House in eight years, basically. I have to say that I'm 52. I sure hope I don't die by 60, Mr. Speaker, because that's a very young death. I'm just not sure if it was the overheated rhetoric that we normally hear from this member, but I can assure him that I'm healthy and I have no plans of dying at 60.

Now, Mr. Speaker, one of the interesting things that I think needs to be stated is that when you take a look at Canada's emissions, we talk about – I think it was the member that was just before the last speaker that said that we're in the top 10 for global GHG emissions.

Here's the thing. We'll often hear members opposite throw out some statistics, and we hope that they've done their research and their homework and that they know what they're talking about, but I actually just decided to do a quick little research to see whether or not we were in the top 10. Again going back to the World Resources Institute, I'm just going to tell you what are the top 10. The top 10: China, United States, then E.U., then India, then Russia, Japan, Brazil, Indonesia, Mexico, Iran. Those are the top 10. Now, I didn't see our beloved country, Canada, in there.

Perhaps this World Resources Institute is wrong. Perhaps the members opposite are right. Perhaps they have some indisputable facts that have not been presented to us here tonight. It's sad when they continue to throw out statistics, inflammatory statistics. We hear on a regular basis from members opposite that in eight years we're all going to be dead because of not addressing this issue. This is the sort of thing that gets my children and my grandchildren concerned, and we have conversations about this. I can assure the members opposite that this is not just a young person's responsibility. This is actually all of our responsibility.

Mr. Speaker, being able to find this information – I found it on a cellphone. Now, 20 years ago, maybe 30 years ago, I couldn't hold that cellphone in my hand. I had to actually carry it in a briefcase. How did I get to be able to hold that cellphone in my hand? Because of innovation. It is human history that when we come up with a crisis, we have not actually solved the crisis by going back 30 years or 50 years and deciding to live like we did 50 years or 30 years ago. How we solved every crisis in human history is through innovation. We've innovated our way out of it.

This is the reason why I'm in favour of the TIER program. The TIER program, first of all, incentivizes innovation whereas the NDP's strategy was to actually provide Albertans with no incentive to innovate their way out of this problem. In fact, what it said was: we're going to tax you. Really, it wasn't about reducing GHG emissions for them. It was about actually increasing taxes. The truth is in the pudding, Mr. Speaker. The reality is that they couldn't actually bring in a PST, so what they did was the next best thing, a carbon tax, because a carbon tax basically taxes everything.

Conservative governments in the past made all the necessary arrangements, and this is... [Mr. Hunter's speaking time expired]

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Is there anyone else wishing to join in debate on Bill 19 at third reading?

[Motion carried; Bill 19 read a third time]

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 23 Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2019

The Speaker: Hon. members, is there anyone wishing to join in debate on Bill 23?

Is there anyone hoping to move second reading on behalf of the minister?

Mrs. Savage: Mr. Speaker, I did move second reading of Bill 23 this afternoon on behalf of the Minister of Justice.

The Speaker: Excellent.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I recall, just prior to adjournment for the dinner break, I was speaking to second reading of Bill 23, the Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2019. Just to continue from my comments, I wanted to express that I do generally support Bill 23. I have some questions, however, that I think are some fair questions to ask with respect to this bill.

Arguably, I think that most people would say that these are pretty minor amendments, but they are something that we should consider and take a look at. In particular, I expressed earlier and I continue to express my concern about lowering the age of eligibility for part-time service for judges to age 55 from age 60 simply because I think there is a question that we have and we've expressed repeatedly – and all members of this House, I think, share this concern – about the administration of justice and making sure that our justice system moves efficiently through cases that they receive. We know that that has historically been a problem not just in Alberta but throughout Canada and, actually, throughout most court systems. Getting a matter to trial and having a matter proceed through trial can sometimes be a very lengthy process, and part of that challenge has been created by not having enough judges.

Certainly, when we're talking about moving some full-time judges both in the Court of Queen's Bench and the Provincial Court, moving more judges to be able to do part-time work, we have to make sure that we are appointing and that our federal counterparts are appointing enough judges to make sure that we still have a timely and efficient administration of justice system.

While I appreciate that many of our esteemed members of the legal community who do go on to serve as justices have worked very long and hard to be where they are and certainly I support the idea of more flexible work environments, I do share a concern that if we have more appointed judges who are now part-time rather than full-time, we need to make sure that we are making up for that by appointing more judges.

Certainly, I know that my colleague the Member for Calgary-Mountain View, who is a former Minister of Justice, termed it, and I think it was a very appropriate terminology. She said that in trying to steer that large ship, there's a lot that has to take place before you can appoint new judges, and a lot of that is sometimes out of our control because it's based on how quickly the federal government also appoints new judges. However, it is important that we make some headway towards doing that. If we are increasing the number of judges who are now part-time as opposed to full-time, we do risk slowing down our system.

Again, as my colleague for Calgary-Mountain View pointed out, we have a very serious Supreme Court of Canada decision, the Jordan decision, in which the justices said, you know, that if criminal proceedings take too long, those criminal charges will actually be stayed against those accused members. That's something that we should all be concerned about. We know that a matter taking too long through the courts is actually a failure to administer justice fairly, and we don't want to risk more cases being stayed because of delay. That is only to say that while judges should be entitled to have the flexibility to work part-time, and they certainly have earned that, we do want to make sure that we are appointing enough judges to make up for those who are no longer working full-time hours.

I know these requests will continue to be approved by the Chief Judge of the Provincial Court and the Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench. I just encourage the government, in particular the Minister of Justice, to carefully monitor the impact of this change to make sure that all Albertans' access to justice is not impacted by this change.

I also want to comment on one other change, of course, which was the change to move basically our court system from being called the Court of Queen's Bench to the Court of King's Bench. In the very unfortunate but, unfortunately, also inevitable situation where we no longer have a Queen as our Monarch, we will need to move to renaming the system. I actually indicated to my colleagues earlier, you know, that I have been practising law for 13 years and never actually thought about the fact that our justice system is the Court of Queen's Bench. I took that name for granted. It's been like that for my entire legal career. It's not that long, but for my entire lifetime we've had a Queen, so I never really considered what would happen at the point when we in our system no longer have a Queen.

I hadn't really thought about this change, but while I acknowledge that it's within our constitutional system and our constitutional monarchy system to be moving to Court of King's Bench, I note that it's going to be actually, I would guess, quite a costly and lengthy process to do that because it is quite ingrained in so much of what we do in Alberta, not only in our justice system but certainly within our justice system, the Court of Queen's Bench, QB as we call it. Those are things that will take some time to change. It's an administrative change, but it could be quite costly when we think of how many things are branded with that term. I only mention that to say that it's a change that may be necessary, but it certainly might be costly, and we hope that there will be some vigilance and thoughtfulness done in how that is implemented.

The last small change that's taking place through this bill is to amend the legislation to allow judges to travel for professional development opportunities, conferences and such, and to seek access for federal reimbursement for that professional development. Again, I am completely in support of that. We know that as professionals, even as legislators here in this House we have an obligation to continue to develop professionally, to meet with our colleagues, to learn from their experiences, to share our experiences and our information, and also to do proper training.

I actually note that the Member for Calgary-Mountain View made a very good reference to some very important and necessary training for judges around sexual assault trials, especially because we've had unfortunate instances in this province and in this country of judges who demonstrate a lack of understanding around rape myths and, unfortunately, have been applying those myths while presiding over criminal trials. It's very necessary that all judges get access to adequate and appropriate training, specifically with sexual assault, but just general professional development is important for all professionals. Certainly, I know that it's something that would be very valued by our justices currently.

I'm generally, as I've indicated, in support of this bill. I do think that we need to make sure that we're monitoring specifically the reduction of the eligibility age for part-time work for judges and think about how that might change our FTEs and caseloads and how it will effect overall court timelines. Other than that I'm pleased to say that I generally do support these changes. They seem to be small but timely and seem to be updating this act to appropriate levels with respect to service and our name changes. Therefore, I'm proud to stand in support of this.

Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, I'd just like to thank the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud for her caution around speaking about the Queen as she knows that one of your Speaker's favourite Standing Orders is 23(k) "a member will be called to order . . . [if they speak] disrespectfully of Her Majesty or any other member of the Royal Family." Great job in being cautious around one of my favourites there.

Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available if anyone would like to ask a brief question or make a comment.

Seeing none, the hon. Member for Edmonton-North West has risen.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I just wanted to make a few comments in second reading in regard to Bill 23, the Justice Statutes Amendment Act. I think that, by and large, as the Member for Edmonton-Whitemud pointed out, the Official Opposition seems to see Bill 23 to be in order. I mean, there are a couple of issues that I think it brings up that bear some discussion in regard to ensuring that we have sufficient judicial capacity here in the province of Alberta to deal with cases coming to each of our courts. We know that one of the ongoing challenges that we have in our justice system, not just in Alberta but right across the country, is sufficient capacity to have cases brought forward and executed in a timely, just, and reasonable way. I know that this idea around allowing the age of eligibility for part-time service to be reduced to 55 – I'm not sure where it's at now. It's probably 65, right?

8:30

Ms Pancholi: It's 60.

Mr. Eggen: It's 60. Okay.

So, I mean, that certainly does provide some flexibility and perhaps even allows judges to continue to practise longer because they are given some more space to perhaps be more reflective, and it increases the longevity of people if they choose to work part-time over a longer period of time. But I'm just wondering if the Justice department has done the math to ensure that, you know, we're not going to leave ourselves short. There's nothing worse than having cases that with I believe it's the Jordan principle – is that what it's called?

Ms Pancholi: The Jordan case.

Mr. Eggen: Yeah. That's right.

The Jordan case has come down from the federal courts, that compels the timely execution of a case in all courts across the country. You know, that's caused us quite a lot of consternation and problems here in the province of Alberta because we quite simply don't have the space and the time. I saw a case in the news just maybe 48 hours ago or at the end of last week where someone was not given court time and a court case in a timely manner in our second official language, and that person ends up with a suspended sentence or, I guess, no trial. It's the end of it, right? So we want to make sure that we have judicial capacity here in the province of Alberta in both official languages and that we are not compromising that with this Bill 23.

The other part that I wanted to make very brief comments on is just to ensure that the savings that we might incur from the changes in Bill 23 – I mean, they are outlined in the technical briefing that we did get. You know, I just want to make sure that we're not compromising, once again, the integrity of the execution of justice here in the province just for the sake of saving the dollars, as put forward here by the Justice department, right? I see that the potential saving in provincial courts is about $1.5 million from the '18-19 actuals, which is good. But I don't want to see – $1.3 million I see. I see the Queen's Bench at $0.8 million and so forth.

I mean, all of these numbers do add up, but when you consider the time and resources that are put into both our justice system and our police system and our corrections system, then we don't want to, you know, save a dime when we've already spent a dollar kind of thing. I just want to ensure that there's a provision for realizing savings maybe by Bill 23 but also a review process by which we look to see that we're not, like I say, trying to save a dime when, in fact, we've already spent a dollar in the pursuit of justice and the conviction of criminals here in the province of Alberta.

Those are really the only two things that I wanted to bring forward in regard to Bill 23. I'm just going to skirt right around the whole Queen's Bench to King's Bench issue because I feel sensitivity around that. You know, you always want to be on the right side of the Crown. So with those comments, Mr. Speaker, I will take my leave and hope that we might have some of those questions answered by the Minister of Justice.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available if anyone has a brief question or comment for the hon. member.

Seeing none, is there anyone else wishing to join in the debate at second reading?

Seeing none, I'm prepared to call on the hon. Minister of Energy on behalf of the hon. Minister of Justice and Solicitor General to close debate if she wishes.

Mrs. Savage: Thank you. I just would stand up to close debate. I think we've heard lots of lively debate and comments on this. In respect of time and matter and having heard people voice their opinions on this, I would just simply like to close debate on behalf of the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General.

[Motion carried; Bill 23 read a second time]

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mrs. Pitt in the chair]

The Chair: I'd like to call the Committee of the Whole to order.

Bill 21 Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019

The Chair: Are there any speakers to the bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: I was trying to let the other side stand if they wished, but I suppose.

It is an honour to rise and speak this evening although I have some concerns, as I will outline here, with Bill 21, the Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019, an interesting name for an omnibus bill that really should be divided into multiple separate bills. I've spoken to this bill in previous conversations and in previous debate in this House, and truly I would argue that nearly each piece of this bill should be argued on its own. I can use the deindexing of AISH as one example, where the indexing of AISH under the previous NDP government, of course, of which I was not a part but was very proud to see the indexing of AISH, was its own separate bill. I am quite troubled by this use of omnibus bills that sort of merges together so many of what should really be separate pieces of legislation. I would argue that it's a sneaky attack. With Bill 21 it's really death by a thousand cuts. As I will outline here tonight, the impacts of Bill 21 are quite far-reaching, just as we saw with Bill 20, a very similar bill in that the impacts on people across this province are tremendous.

I just want to, for the benefit of those watching at home, of which there probably is at least one – some of the measures proposed in Bill 21: temporarily suspending the indexing of benefits for AISH, income support, and the seniors' lodge program; excluding budget officers, systems analysts, auditors, and employees who perform similar functions from bargaining units; reversing the replacement worker ban; ending the tuition freeze; increasing student loan interest; ending the regulated rate option cap for electricity; allowing changes to the master agreement with the Alberta Medical Association; changes on how municipalities pay for policing; changing how the province uses fine money – I haven't even gone through them all – letting the government have greater oversight over collective bargaining. The list goes on. In fact, I didn't even name them all there.

My point in listing all of those is that these are almost a disparate set of measures that, again, should individually be debated, and I think that's only fair, especially when you are talking about things that truly impact the lives of Albertans. And in the cases of some of the pieces that I want to focus on tonight, they impact the lives of many in my constituency.

If I go back to that first element, temporarily suspending the indexation of benefits for AISH, income support, and the seniors' lodge program – well, I've spoken multiple times about my concerns around the deindexing of AISH. I've heard from many people in my riding who are concerned. I've shared in this House before that in my riding we do have pretty high rates of poverty and have a number of folks who do rely on supports like AISH.

In fact, I'm glancing at my phone because as I was sitting here earlier, I had someone who I met who receives AISH who messaged me and said that she's really worried, and I haven't responded to her yet. She's concerned about the changes under this government. I would think – I won't say her name because I haven't gotten her permission to share that – that there are many folks just like her out there who are quite concerned. For this Premier to say that it's not onerous and that it's not significant, deindexing AISH: well, again, I've heard from countless folks who would say that absolutely it is. I would love to ask the Premier and his ministers to come and talk to some of those folks who I've heard from who are really worried about how they're going to make ends meet every month. They're relying on that increase for inflation. We know that it's a significant challenge for a lot of them.

Included in that same change in the deindexing is the deindexing to the seniors' lodge program, which, of course, has implications for seniors' affordable housing in our province. I take pride in the fact that I tried – I knocked on every door in my riding or at least tried to, because of course you get a lot of folks who aren't home. We have a number of affordable housing complexes and seniors' lodges as well. I looked at the list because I thought that a lot of these are in my riding, and sure enough, a number of the seniors' lodges are in the beautiful riding of Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood. A lot of folks in those buildings are very much struggling to make ends meet from day to day. Again, losing out on the deindexation: there is quite a concern, and I'm not sure – you know, it reminds me that I need to go back and visit some of the folks, some of the friends that I met while campaigning because I bet a lot of them are struggling and are concerned.

I really think – and I think I will speak to this more later tonight – that this government should consider: you're giving $4.7 billion away to large corporations. You've already demonstrated your lack of compassion for our most vulnerable. I would urge the members opposite to really think about: if the moral imperative isn't there, the economic one should make you reconsider because it's a small, small, small fraction of a budget that we're talking about here that has a huge impact on our most vulnerable. I always like to point out, especially when we're talking about AISH, for instance, the costs that we're going to be paying down the line by not providing proper supports now. I worry, and I think that if you're not able to make that small financial sacrifice of something like indexing to inflation, I get quite alarmed. I would urge the members opposite to reconsider, particularly when it comes to the deindexing of those benefits.

What I would like to do is speak to the next point that I feel is quite resonant, and it's quite relevant today, and that's ending the tuition freeze for three years. Now, I recall in this House not too long ago the Minister of Advanced Education saying something to the effect of: students were asking us to lift the tuition freeze. I thought: oh, my goodness. That is some interesting malarkey, because I can't imagine postsecondary students asking to pay more tuition.

In the early 2000s, when I was an undergraduate student, I remember there being a few protests at the university. I don't remember protests at the Legislature but at the university, for sure. We had a pretty active students' union at the time. I looked back in a little bit of a moment of reflection today as I heard the protests were quite robust today as well. We're possibly going back to the era of PC cuts, but in fact the cuts to postsecondary education under this UCP government are even more extreme. I wasn't able to be at the rallies. I would have loved to have been at the rallies because, gosh, my life has been a lot of rallying lately, and I hate to miss them. Unfortunately, I was in the private members' committee meeting while it was going on.

I did read a couple of news stories, and one quote actually quite resonated with me. Students at both MacEwan and the University of Alberta, both of which are reporting huge shortfalls, $44 million and $17 million respectively – rallies were held at each campus. One student, Eunah Cha, a second-year international student in the Faculty of Nursing, voiced her concern about more expensive tuition. She said: I'm frustrated, I'm angry, and I'm very worried because of the tuition increasing and not being able to keep up with it; I don't know if education is going to be something that I can access next year. How disheartening is it that we have university students who aren't sure if they're going to be able to return next year because of the increases? For this minister to say that he's hearing that kids, that university students wanted this or that postsecondary students want this tuition increase is absolutely farcical. I think that students like Eunah are speaking out, and I hope they continue to speak out. What impact will it have if multiple students are facing the same experiences as Eunah, that they do in fact have to drop out?

I had a university student actually chat with me the other day. That student is at MacEwan University, in fact, and they've already made the decision that they're not going back to school next year. I tried to reason with them and say: you know, is there any way you can try to reconsider that? They had made the decision that it just wouldn't be affordable, that they'd have to work instead.

Part of that person's rationale was also around student loans, that they're already shouldering student loans, which brings me to the next point, the next measure in Bill 21 that's quite troubling, and that's increasing student loan interest by 1 per cent. Again, what message are we sending to young people, to future generations, to some students that are already struggling like Eunah? "Oh, by the way, you know, your tuition is going up, and if you need a student loan, if you have to have a student loan, well, you know what? Your interest is going to be going up."

I think that if we recap all the attacks on postsecondary students – I'm sure that my colleague from Edmonton-North West has been hearing from hundreds of folks impacted by the attack on postsecondary education. Let's just list these: the tuition freeze being lifted; Bill 20 speaks to the loss of the education and tuition tax credits; the student loan increase, which I just talked about. I think, again, the minister might have noted in the House here that it's only going to be about $15 a month, that, you know, it's a nothing sort of thing when you break it down. Again, it's that same sort of rhetoric, just like with AISH recipients: ah, it's only, like, 30 bucks a month, right?

Again, if you're living in a situation where you are having to make ends meet day to day, where you don't know where your next meal necessarily is coming from, every dollar does add up. I know that's not the experience of every student, but it is the experience of some. These are the students that we need to be thinking about. I just wonder, you know: how the heck are students today surviving when they're facing these financial barriers, and what's the motivation – gosh, what's the motivation? – for young people to engage in postsecondary?

I mean, I've talked about my experience as a high school teacher and being in rural Alberta, and part of my role was that I was an academic counsellor for a little while. I would try make sure that they had enough credits, and I would try to encourage students to go on to postsecondary. A lot of them just wanted to get out and work – there's no problem with that – but in other cases I met some kids who just didn't think it was financially viable: it's better if I go work for a bit so that I can make some money to go to postsecondary. But we know, the statistics show that if they go to work for a little while with the hopes of going to postsecondary, often students won't actually go back if they're gainfully employed. If they're not, that's a different story.

Nonetheless, you know, I had a lot of conversations trying to convince kids, students to engage in postsecondary, whether it was pursuing a trade at NAIT or going into university but really thinking about broadening their horizons, if for no other reason, as someone who grew up in rural Alberta myself, than to leave the small towns, the village, in fact, that I was at that time teaching in, to go see a little bit more of the world, even if that world is just 120 kilometres down the road in Edmonton.

I think about those students, and I think about how many other high school teachers right now are having those conversations and trying to convince young people to access postsecondary. Students are saying: "Well, why would I, right? You know, why would I when tuition is so high, when student loan interest has increased?" Yeah. The list goes on. The list goes on. Again, I would ask this government, in this piece of the bill as well, to think about this. I think it's a bit of an alarm bell going off already, with university students starting to protest and with many folks starting to speak out with their concerns as well because, to reiterate, it's an investment in the future, for sure.

You know, one of the other pieces that I find quite troubling in Bill 21 is the following: allowing the government to have greater oversight over collective bargaining. We've seen already a few attacks on workers from this government. In my short tenure as an MLA I've witnessed that. We had Bill 9, where there was an attack on the constitutional right to collectively bargain. We've seen already that this government hasn't been friendly to those public-sector employees, and I'm very much worried about further attacks. I'm worried. You know, I've heard from countless folks in the public sector. I've heard from a whole heck of a lot of teachers and nurses, teachers in particular.

Of course, it's something that's close to my heart, close to my colleague the Member for Edmonton-North West. We were both teachers, so I think we probably disproportionately hear from a lot of teachers as well who are feeling quite disheartened. As I said in the House not too long ago – I gave a member's statement talking about how teachers are reaching out and telling me that they're disheartened and they're feeling deflated. You know, I try to rally them, and I try to encourage them to keep speaking out and to ask their MLAs questions, but then the attacks keep coming, right? The attacks on their pensions, for instance. As I stated in the House prior, this isn't about pensions. This is just one piece of it. It's about disrespect. It's about feeling continually disrespected by this government. In Bill 21 we see further reach into collective bargaining and into the constitutional rights of some of Alberta's workers.

In fact, I wanted to share a little bit of a letter I received from a constituent. She was fine with me sharing a little part of this. Actually, I've got a few letters, so maybe I'll share this first one. This is a message from Brynn,* who said: you know, I'm worried that Bill 20 and Bill 21 are going to have serious consequences for my family. She notes that she is a public service worker. Her ministry did get a bit of increase in the budget, but she's heard that there will be an attack on her pay. She points out: actually, I'm a recent graduate, and I've got student loan payments that I'm making. She's saying, you know, that student loan payments are actually going to go up now.

What else do we see? We see an increase in tuition. She also, being a graduate herself – she's an older woman who went back to university. She actually has a daughter who's also in university, in her second year at the University of Alberta. She's got another child who's in high school. Now, you know, she's heard from other folks who kind of attack public-sector workers and say: well, hey, we in the private sector had to deal with that as well. She says: yeah, I get that, but I've only worked with the public sector for a year, and at least in the private sector I had a bit of an increase, a 1 per cent increase. She says that she's worried. She says that she's worried for her financial livelihood. She said: losing $300 a month in my family's budget will not be sustainable for my family.

I think that that's an important story to share. She's quite concerned. She's someone who went back, jeopardized a lot to go back to school as a mature student, thinking, you know, that it would help her, that it would further her in her career. Now she's facing multiple burdens, right? She's facing the burden of having to pay for her postsecondary education through her student loans, on which the interest rates are of course going up. She's got children, one who's in university and one who's planning to go to university, and she has just established herself in the public service. She's fresh there, and she's worried about attacks on her pay. She doesn't mention it here, but I'm sure she's also worried about job loss. We know that across a number of ministries there are job losses and that there will be more job losses because we've asked about some of those in estimates.

I don't believe that her story is unique. I think that a lot of folks – as I said, we've heard from teachers, heard from a number of nurses as well who are concerned, right? This idea – and this is what a lot of nurses and teachers tell me: you know, we get attacked, with people saying that we have high pay and that we have a pay cut coming to us.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. I appreciate your somehow being able to pick me out of all the people that jumped out. I really appreciate your being able to do that. This evening we're speaking about Bill 21, Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019, which, quite honestly, I think I'd want to rename to An Act to Make Life More Difficult for Albertans. There are a host of changes in Bill 21 that are very, very problematic, but before I even get to those changes, I just want to talk about how Bill 21 has even been put together.

*This spelling could not be verified at the time of publication.

You see, Madam Chair, there are members on the government side who were members during the 29th Legislature. I remember that when the former NDP government brought in some legislation around labour, those individuals were very, very upset because they felt that that piece of legislation was an omnibus bill. You know, they wanted to argue, to separate things out, and whatnot, yet when I look at Bill 21 – and, by the way, this is just one piece of legislation that we've seen introduced. There are four omnibus bills before us. I think I've said this before in the Chamber. When you're prepared to stand up to criticize the way somebody is proceeding with something and then when it's your chance to come around and do that and you don't do something different – you do the exact same thing or even worse – that tends to be a little bit, shall we say, disappointing. I certainly saw a lot of those comments, so when I see four pieces of omnibus legislation before this House, it seems a little bit hypocritical on behalf of the government to be rolling these out the way they are.

But the reality is that here we are on Bill 21, a very robust piece of omnibus legislation, changing everything from indexation for AISH recipients to changes to exclude various different people from collective bargaining. We're seeing things like the lifting of tuition freezes, an increase in student loans, allowing the Health minister to place conditions on new practitioner identification numbers, changing how the province uses fine money it collects on behalf of municipalities. We're seeing proposals here around greater oversight of collective bargaining with public-sector employees, including even the length of the agreements: you know, no bad-faith bargaining possibilities there. We're seeing changes with the master agreement to the Alberta Medical Association, changes to regulations about how municipalities pay for policing. We have changes here that are encompassing a very broad spectrum of topics, which, as I mentioned before, is a very problematic position that I think this government has taken given how it's viewed omnibus legislation in the past.

As a riding in Edmonton that happens to have the three, all the high schools north of the Yellowhead freeway, I get the opportunity to chat with students all the time. They tell me about their aspirations for postsecondary education and all the great things that – you know, when they get through school, they want to be able to come out and essentially change the world, Madam Chair. It's very, very exciting to listen to. It's very, very invigorating right up until they see things like tuition that could be rising at dramatic rates and student loan interest going up. Certainly, through all of those times that I've been able to talk with those students and even the students that are currently attending postsecondary education with those same kinds of dreams and aspirations, I have yet to find one student that has said to me: please, raise my tuition; please, make me pay more on my loans. I stay awake at night thinking about the day when that will come, but, funnily enough, I just have not had a single one of those conversations before. So when I hear suggestions that these are some of the things that Albertans are looking for, I really question whether those conversations really took place because I have yet to find one. Like I said, I have three high schools in my riding. That's a lot of students that are eyeing postsecondary education.

The next piece that I have some significant problems with is the deindexation of benefits for AISH recipients. We've heard comments, of course, including by our Premier, that this will not be onerous on these recipients, and I highly beg to differ. This will be onerous. You know, to somebody who potentially has a very solid six-figure income from one source, also making a very good six-figure income here in the province, sure, maybe to that kind of an individual $30 or $40 isn't onerous whatsoever. They probably could head out and maybe spend that kind of money on lunch. But for an individual that's on AISH, that is a significant amount of money. So when I see things like our Premier, who has argued very, very vigorously in the past, during his time as an MP representing a Calgary riding, against deindexing – I can't remember some of the words that the Premier used at the time, but I can assure you, Madam Chair, that they were not very complimentary around how bad the idea of deindexing is.

Now we have here in Bill 21 deindexing. One minute we're saying something over here; another minute we're saying something over there, kind of like the whole concept of this omnibus legislation. When we look at potentially what this is going to do, we're talking over the coming years into the '22-23 fiscal year. You know, I wonder what AISH recipients in this province could do with an extra $300 million in their pockets. I suspect that they could probably live lives in greater dignity and respect, something that they deserve because they don't have the very high six-figure secondary income or a high six-figure income here in the province.

I think that the saying is that sometimes a society can be judged on how it treats its most vulnerable, and AISH recipients here in our province are certainly one of our most vulnerable in our society. For us to look at this and say, "Well, this is not onerous; this'll be fine": I think that we really, really need to start checking our moral compasses here, and we really, really need to rethink this decision about deindexing.

Now, when I start looking at some of the labour changes, you know, I've said multiple times in this House that my background is in labour. I very proudly come from labour. I spent the last 26 years fighting for workers to get a fair deal, to be treated with dignity and respect, to be able to work in a safe work environment, to be paid a good wage, to receive decent benefits. Those individuals will then come and build lives here in the province of Alberta. They'll spend it in our local economies, and everybody prospers because of it.

But the reality is that when you look at the labour world, one of the most fundamental things that takes place between and employer and a bargaining unit is fair bargaining. When I see things like the replacement worker ban, when I see things like oversight of the collective bargaining agreement, including even the length of that, that is bargaining in bad, bad faith, Madam Chair.

I think that we are going to see that public-sector workers, as these things potentially are rolled out, will become very, very annoyed with this government. Again, I'm trying to use somewhat good parliamentary language here, but these workers are going to get very, very upset. You know, I think that some of the protests that we've seen out on the front steps of this Legislature in just a short six months – I've always admitted that we certainly had our protests when we were government and on the other side there, but the number and the size that I've seen in just the last six months is potentially something to be very, very concerned about.

I don't know how else to urge the government to rethink this direction. They talk about wanting to create an atmosphere that businesses want to come to, that businesses want to invest in this province, but I think that they're going to have a very, very hard time if all they're seeing is labour unrest. They're going to see a workforce that is very, very unhappy, and I think that might end up giving them pause to come and invest here.

You know, during the election we saw that province where we're going to grow jobs, we're going to grow the economy, but we're not going to do it by treating our most vulnerable with disrespect, by cutting services that Albertans rely on and creating a toxic work environment that will discourage that investment and that job creation from coming here to Alberta.

We need to really rethink our position on this and how we're moving forward. Again, we're trying to say one thing over here, but our actions are doing something totally counterproductive. I've probably mentioned this during some other debates in this House, where we seem to be stuck, where we've got this narrative, you know, of a direction that we're going to go to, which I suppose in theory sounds plausible, but we're making decisions, we're heading in directions that are counterproductive to that.

A simple, quick example of that in Bill 20 is around the tax credit. Again, we want to create jobs, but we're driving companies out. We're stopping them from expanding. So there's this narrative that's beginning to form very, very clearly, and I think it's going to hurt Alberta in the long run if we want to try to create jobs to grow the economy. Labour peace is one of the components that businesses will look at when they're thinking about investing in this province. They want to know the workforce is looked after, yet we're doing things like deindexing our AISH recipients. It just sends the wrong signals, Madam Chair.

When I'm also looking at things around how municipalities will pay for policing, I've heard some very, very significant concerns from municipal leaders around this topic and how that could affect the safeties that we enjoy within our communities. Absolutely, there is always room to do better, to provide better service, to make sure that our citizens are safe at all times. It's not something where you make one simple move, you wash your hands, and you say: look what I did; everything is fixed. It's constantly evolving. But if we don't give our municipalities the ability to fund those decisions, that will have a negative impact on our local communities, which then will also have an impact on businesses that are looking to invest here in the province, which will affect our ability to grow the economy and create jobs. Again, yet another example of how we've said we want to do one thing, but the decisions we're making are completely counterproductive to that.

Changes to fines and how they're collected: I don't remember over the last four years hearing from city councillors that that was something that needs to be addressed and changed. So I kind of wonder where we ended up, I guess, getting that impression that that was the type of change we need to make.

Then ending the rate cap on electricity: we've certainly seen other jurisdictions. What was that line? I think, you know, everything is bigger in Texas. Yeah, including their electricity bills and the number of swings that they get. Here we have the government that's talking about, "Well, we have the backs of Albertans; we're going to create stability for them," yet we're duplicating a jurisdiction that does not have that. So we're again in that position of conflicting ways of doing things. We very, very clearly have seen down in those areas where they have brownouts. They have potential blackouts. I bet if we started asking Albertans if that was something that they want to have, we probably would not find a willingness to have that kind of thing.

In regard to Bill 21, I just simply cannot support this legislation, this piece of omnibus legislation that was highly, highly criticized by serving members that sit in here today from the 29th Legislature. It is, as I said, An Act to Make Life More Difficult for Albertans. If we are seriously going to say that we're trying to make life better for them, that we have their backs, that we're going to create jobs, and that we're going to grow the economy, this bill certainly is making decisions that are completely counterproductive to that. I would urge all the members in this House to vote against this legislation. Let's get to work on actually trying to create jobs instead of losing over 27,000 at this point. Let's actually work towards growing the economy instead of stalling it out. Let's get away from that narrative that we can be a better society if we treat our most vulnerable a lot better, because this bill certainly won't do that.

Thanks, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thanks, Madam Chair. I appreciate the opportunity to say a few words here in committee in regard to Bill 21. Listening to quite a number of members speaking about how difficult it is to, perhaps, look at this bill in its totality – it is a classic definition of an omnibus bill – and the scope by which it moves around the province, both figuratively and literally, making fundamental changes to so many important services and responsibilities that we have here in this Chamber and here as a provincial Legislature, it becomes painfully obvious, I think, that what needs to be done is to look for separation between some of these ideas that are really quite disparate as well. Just listening to the Member for Edmonton-Decore talk about the range of what Bill 21 tries to accomplish: it has a regulated rate option, ending the regulated rate option for electricity, and then it talks about suspending indexation for AISH. It talks about the agreements with the Alberta Medical Association and then suddenly jumps around to municipalities and municipal taxes. For legislators to try to get your head around these is not easy, and for Albertans and the public I think it's definitely confusing. The use of this sort of omnibus bill, I think, is a poor choice. I think that if it's not deliberately trying to confuse the issue, then certainly it does make it a whole lot more complicated.

Madam Chair, as I had to pass forward to you some time ago, I just want to make a request that when we deal with Bill 21, the votes be separated so that we could vote on them separately as follows. Each of these is a separate section, then: section 1 as a separate unit, sections 2 and 17 as a separate unit, sections 3 and 5 as a separate unit, section 4 as a separate unit, sections 6 and 10 as a separate unit, sections 7 and 8 as a separate unit, section 9 as a separate unit, section 11 as a separate unit, sections 12 and 18 as a separate unit, section 13 as a separate unit, section 14 as a separate unit, and sections 15 and 16 as a separate unit. So I am seeing 12 delineations here, taking Bill 21 into its component parts for the purposes of voting. I have submitted that to the table and to you, Madam Chair, and I appreciate the opportunity to do so.

Thank you.

9:20

The Chair: Hon. member, thank you for requesting to separate the votes on Bill 21 in the sections as mentioned. For clarity's sake I am pleased to grant the request. I will also add that there is a schedule remaining for the sections that you didn't mention, that we'll vote on after the sections, and the individual sections blocked together will be numerical, starting from A to K.

Mr. Eggen: Yeah. That works for me. Can I make further comments on it?

The Chair: Yeah. Please proceed. You still have 15 minutes remaining.

Mr. Eggen: Okay. Sure. Again, I think that this is going to provide some clarity both for this Chamber and for members of the public. We know that there are literally, let's say, thousands of students that are dealing with the aspects of Bill 21 in regard to tuition and student loans. We saw hundreds of young students – well, actually, students of all ages – on the steps of the Legislature here today at lunch talking about the elements of Bill 21 that will definitely affect their lives both financially and in terms of the quality of their education. This lifting of the tuition cap will result, from the government's own budget, that we debated in estimates last week or the week before, in a 21 per cent increase to tuition.

I know that already tuition is not cheap, and people know that, too, so they make plans for themselves and their families. Sometimes you do it for many years. I know that in my own family we saved for many years with an expectation that postsecondary was going to be expensive but not out of range if we could plan ahead. Now suddenly, if you change the rules midway and within the next three years have a 21 per cent increase to that premium to go to a trades college or go to NAIT or SAIT or, you know, Olds College – right? – Lethbridge, you are inevitably creating a barrier, a ceiling so that some students will simply not be able to go, even if they and their family had been planning already and saving to make that switch. You know, in adult education it even becomes more, I think, sensitive because, of course, for older people going back to postsecondary training – let's say that they're going to go to a trades college and learn pipefitting or electricity or get an arts degree or go to law school – the expense of postsecondary education is a very, very important decision to work through.

If you start increasing prices – certainly, it's reasonable that tuition can change and go up over time. If you tie it or you pair it to the consumer price index for expenses in the province of Alberta, then, you know, I don't think that's unreasonable to have tuition changing to meet the inflationary pressures that might be had here in the province of Alberta. But having 7 per cent a year for three years, 21 per cent: I mean, that far exceeds any projection around how inflation is growing and other factors like that. I believe that, you know, while we do need to fund and make sure we're always looking for efficiency in all aspects of what the government funds and with postsecondary especially, I can't help but notice and I think the hundreds of people on the steps today and the tens of thousands of students notice that this government seemed to single out postsecondary education particularly for cuts and fee increases that far exceed either inflationary pressures or any other measurements that you could possibly bring forward to our postsecondary institutions.

You know, having the tuition go up that, like I said before, one, we will exclude many people from making a choice to go to postsecondary education. Two, we will be putting the burden of debt onto students in an inordinate and unfair sort of manner as well.

So there you are. You show up, and you pay that extra 21 per cent or so forth, Madam Chair, and then you're hit at the end with an increase to the interest rates of that student loan, that you incurred to get that degree or to get that trade training or what have you, at the end. I mean, we already know that student debt is a looming problem that excludes many people from making choices around taking postsecondary education but also is a burden of debt that people carry around with them for many, many years.

Perhaps I'm learning quickly as the Official Opposition critic for postsecondary education that, you know, student debt is real, it's tangible, and it is making life more difficult for young people. An increase by 1 per cent, let's say, on a $30,000 student loan over time is a couple of thousand dollars more, and often people are actually incurring more than a $30,000 student loan debt. I'm learning very quickly here now. I was with some students a couple of days ago that told me that they had more like either $70,000 and $125,000, respectively, for their student debt and had just finished their bachelors' degrees, right? They're looking at $3,000, $4,000, $5,000 more in interest payments because of this choice that this government made in this Bill 21.

Again, you know, it's a way by which for us to at least shine a light on each of these individual elements, each of these individual elements in Bill 21 that have a profound effect on Alberta families. I'm glad that you did grant us the opportunity to have separate voting avenues here with this omnibus bill.

You know, another one that I just was thinking about, and I think the hon. member on this side will probably shine a greater light on it, is in regard to this electricity rate, right? We know that the ending of the regulated option rate cap for electricity really puts us back to the bad old days in regard to having a reliable source of power and a reliable price for that power as well. Here in the province of Alberta it wasn't very long ago where we had that market rate that caused chaos, both chaos through speculators just playing the futures game on electricity and jacking up the price of electricity but also not encouraging capacity to be built into the market as well.

Here we are in this one other aspect of Bill 21, ending the regulated rate option for electricity, you know, and exposing both families and commercial electricity users to the vagaries of a market system that is proven to – and with very expensive electricity. As the hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore said, in Texas they've suffered through this experiment and came back to look to a regulated rate because people were exposed to speculation, unfair speculation, on the rates for electricity.

Those are just two examples, Madam Chair, of things that we need to examine more closely, more specifically. I'm glad that you gave us leave to divide this into 12 different voting sections as well as the overall piece that needs to be voted.

I will cede the floor to others that, hopefully, will shine more light and more specific light on how we might be able to make each of these subject areas start working for Albertans rather than the punitive measures that Bill 21 represents at this time.

Thank you.

9:30

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Madam Chair. It's a pleasure to rise today and speak to Bill 21, which really is the Making Life Less Affordable Act. It's my pleasure today to be able speak about something that I think is going to be so important for this House, and I'm hoping that every single member of this House will give support because we know that with the Americanization of the energy market and the elimination of the regulated rate cap, families are going to pay more for electricity. It's going to cost more, it's going to be less stable, and it's going to be a really bad system that doesn't allow us to protect the best interests of Albertans. Instead, we'll be giving money away, as the government has already done with their $4.7 billion no-jobs corporate handout to the wealthiest corporations.

I'm hoping we can make a change together that's going to make this bill better, so with your indulgence, Madam Chair, I have an amendment to present. I'll wait for it to be distributed to the table.

The Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Hon. members, this will be known as amendment A1.

Hon. Member for Edmonton-South, please proceed.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Madam Chair. My amendment is that I move that the Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019, be amended in subsection (2) by striking out "November 30, 2019" and substituting "December 31, 2019" and in subsection (4) by striking out "November 30, 2019" and substituting "December 31, 2019."

You know, Madam Chair, I think this is a very simple amendment. What it does is that it delays the removal of the rate cap on the regulated rate option here in Alberta for the electricity system. I think it's very important that we think very carefully about this because this amendment ensures that the rate cap will continue until the end of the year.

The reason I'm trying to bring this forward is because what this bill does is that it will potentially allow electricity companies and energy companies to go back and, at the end of December, raise and back charge for electricity to ratepayers. So electricity payers at the end of the year, during Christmas, during the holidays, when they're trying to spend time with their families, will actually end up paying more for power. In fact, the way the bill is currently worded, if we don't do this, they could actually end up paying more for a bill they've already paid, right? The way the existing bill is, without this amendment, is that a retroactive charge would have to be adjusted on their next bill. So for power they've already paid, they could end up paying twice because this bill eliminates the rate cap before Christmas.

What I'm saying, Madam Chair, is that I don't think that's fair. I think we should give the stability at least through the holidays so people can spend time with their families without worrying that this Americanization, this dangerous, risky ideological experiment in electricity won't hurt their family at least to the end of this year, at least through Christmas.

We know that without the rate cap families can pay significantly more for electricity. We've seen that. I know that my colleague from Edmonton-Decore spoke about how in many of these American systems like in Texas, where this exists, it's a failed experiment. Electricity costs more, and it's simply something that does not work and something that is not in the interests of making the electricity market work for consumers.

We want consumers to at least get through this year. I think it's important if the government is insistent on bringing in this risky American ideological system, making profitable corporations more profitable, giving $4.7 billion away for no new jobs and sending jobs to the United States, in fact, Madam Chair. If that's what the government is interested in, at least let's protect families through Christmas. At least let's protect families and not back charge them, retroactively charge them more money for electricity they've already paid for. At least let's just wait until the new year because then families can start to assess their situation again next year and families will have that predictability to be able to assess their situation next year.

I think it's a very fair amendment, Madam Chair. I think it's very fair that we're going to be able to look at the market again and families will be able to assess how their financial situation will be in the new year. I think that's something that's very important. I think it's important that we can give that stability to families because we know that by eliminating the rate cap, power bills will go up. We've seen this before.

We saw this risky Americanization of the power system when it was first introduced over a decade ago. We saw the rolling blackouts. We saw the price spikes. We continue to see how that can affect families and cost them more. I'm asking for the government to show some heart. I'm asking for them to show enough heart to let families get through Christmas and the holiday season, to let them get into the new year and then make those assessments on how this is going to affect their families. It's not a significant change, Madam Chair. It's really administrative. It changes two dates in the entire bill. I'm not asking for the world. I hope that the minister will be able to support this, and I hope that the government caucus will be able to support this because I'm asking that we allow families just those four extra weeks, allow them to have that stability, allow them to say: we won't get hit with more right as we're trying to buy the presents to put under the tree this year, right as we're trying to make sure that we have enough to squirrel away and make sure that our kids can have the best Christmas they can.

Life is getting more expensive under this government. They're raising personal income taxes. They're giving money away to corporations, $4.7 billion to corporations, in fact. They're making electricity more expensive. They're making tuition more expensive. They're making school fees more expensive. They're making busing more expensive. All of these things are getting more expensive for families, Madam Chair. I'm asking today that we mitigate some of that. If we can make their electricity rates stay stable at least past Christmas into the new year, past the holidays into the new year, that would be something that I think would show compassion, would show heart, would show that we really do care and that we are here to try and do good things. It's not something that's going to significantly alter this bill. Again, it's two lines, not even two full lines. It's two dates. It's one month.

It's enough that we'd be able to look at it and say: hey, maybe you can go get that new toy. Last year I know it was Hatchimals, and I know that there were some people paying hundreds of dollars for these Hatchimals. Perhaps this won't make the difference for that, but what will make the difference is that families will be able to go out and make those decisions themselves. They will be able to know what their bills will be. They will be able to have that stability. They will be able to go out and say: "We know that we have these things to assess in the new year. We will be able to get through at least one more Christmas. We will get through at least one more holiday season." The family can get together and have those discussions, and they will be able to have that stability. That's something that is compassionate. I think it's something that's fair, and it's something that I'm hoping all members will be able to support. It would be unreasonable to say that we're going to give $4.7 billion away to the wealthiest corporations and then take money away from families over the Christmas holidays. That's what I think is unreasonable, Madam Chair.

We're telling families that their rates are going to go up, that we're not going to protect them from rate hikes right in the holiday season, right when people are supposed to be happy spending time with their families and enjoying their holidays. What we're going to do with the removal of the rate cap is go in and make life more expensive. We've already raised tuition. We've already raised school fees. We've already made class sizes larger. We've raised personal income taxes. We've done all these things that make life more expensive.

But today we can make a change right now that at least sees families through to the new year, at least sees that they can buy that Hatchimal – I know it's not going to be Hatchimals again, Madam Chair, but they can buy whatever they need to buy this holiday – and that Santa really will come. This amendment in some cases, I believe, will actually save Christmas, basically. We will be able to have Santa show up again for some of these families. That's the difference we're talking about. In some cases for some families it could be as little as $10, $20, $30, or it could be as much as a couple of hundred dollars. I think the government might be scoffing a bit, but for some families that $30 is the difference for their holiday. That will be the difference between whether they can buy the presents or not. That will be the difference between whether they can get that ham for dinner or not.

Madam Chair, I think that is what we are here to do. We are here to try and make life better. We are here to try and be compassionate and have a soul. I'm hoping we're able to go and save Christmas by making sure that families can have a stable electricity rate into the new year. Again, I'm not asking for the world. I'm not asking for us to eliminate this change. The government has made it very clear that they will be moving forward with these changes, and I've accepted that.

What I'm asking is: instead, can we please let families evaluate this in the new year? Can we please give them that extra 31 days? Because if they can evaluate in the new year, then that's a decision that they'll be able to make throughout the rest of the year and squirrel that 30 bucks away for Christmas next year. But this year we can still save Christmas. We can still make sure Santa Claus shows up for every single family. We can still make sure that kids aren't getting coal instead of whatever the greatest toy will be, Madam Chair.

Again, I think that for some families, whether it's $10, $20, $30, $100, or $200, Madam Chair, it's going to make a big difference. It's something that will make a significant difference for these families. We know that this is important because we've had families telling us that the regulated rate option, if the cap is removed, is a scary thing. We've seen it in other jurisdictions. We've seen it in Texas. We've seen it everywhere, basically, that the energy-only market doesn't work.

We've seen right here in Alberta that it doesn't work. Those rolling blackouts – again, I've spoken about that on this bill before. I remember as a child that we'd have to light candles because we wouldn't have the power. The rolling blackouts would come because the energy rate spikes weren't sustainable, because the system was designed to fail. It was designed to make profitable corporations more profitable. It was designed just like the $4.7 billion corporate no-jobs handout, to make profitable corporations wealthier instead of trying to work for families, instead of trying to provide stability for families, instead of trying to provide quality services for families.

Madam Chair, I'm worried that that's what eliminating the rate cap will do, actually. I really do believe that eliminating the rate cap will make life more expensive, that it will make life less sustainable, and that it will make life more unstable for families. We can at least stave that off till after the holidays. We can at least stave that off till after Christmas. We can at least stave that off until the new year. I think that's a very reasonable ask. I think it's something that's very reasonable because, again, it's only two dates in this entire bill, right? It's only two small dates. It's not even a significant change.

Sometimes we come in here, Madam Chair – I know that government members, when they were in the opposition, did this to us, and I know that we've done this as opposition. Sometimes you make changes like five years or 10 years or months and months and months. That's not what we're asking for. We're asking to save Christmas. We're asking for one month to make this change. I think that's a very reasonable ask. I think that families will appreciate it. I think that all of our constituents will appreciate it and will know that they can have stability at least into the new year. Families will be able to understand what their bills will look like at least for another month and that we aren't going to be going back and retroactively pulling money out of their pockets right after their Christmas bills come due. I think that no family would appreciate that, whether they bought the most expensive toy or not this year. No family will appreciate, as their bills are coming due at the end of next month, that they'll have to pay more, that they have no stability, that they don't know what their rates are going to be. They don't know whether the power bill is going to be $100 or $500, Madam Chair. I think that's very unreasonable.

I think what we need to do is have compassion. We need to understand that for so many families in every single one of our ridings this could make the difference between whether they're going to have a stressful Christmas, frankly, a Christmas that – I mean, sometimes, you know, we'll joke that meeting with the family is stressful no matter what it is, but really in this case this is the difference for some families of whether they're going to be able to have that meeting, whether they're going to be able to have that Christmas dinner, whether those parents are going to be giving gifts to their children on behalf of Santa Claus, of course. For all the kids listening at home, Santa Claus definitely needs us to save your Christmas, Madam Chair.

Certainly, I think we want to make sure that we can have a real impact on families when we bring bills like this forward. We want to be able to have a real impact on our communities when moving this forward, and it's something that's very clear. We have that ability today. We have the ability today to bring stability to families at least until 2020. I'm not saying that this needs to be a five-year amendment or a 10-year amendment or 20-year amendment, as we've seen when they're stunts, right? When this type of amendment, Madam Chair, is a stunt, then it's a 75-year amendment with the date changes.

That's not what happened today. What happened is that we want one month. We want to be able to say to families that we fought, we changed, and we decided that you deserve to have stability. You deserve to know what your bill will be at the end of the month. You deserve to understand what your bill will look like. We know that energy usage is going to go up over the Christmas holidays, as is normal, Madam Chair. We know that that type of change happens with the seasons. It's wintertime here in Alberta, and as we know, it gets cold in wintertime, so energy usage goes up.

But what we want to be with that energy usage is that at least the families will know what they're expecting to pay, that at least families can then create a budget. If we bring this change in and we can pass this change, then those families, knowing now that they have stability until the end of the year, will be able to build their entire holiday budget, right? They'll be able to build and understand. If they've got one child or two children or five children, whatever it is, Madam Chair, they'll be able to know exactly how much they can budget for those families, and they'll be able to understand, for those families, exactly what that means for their household. That's the reasonable thing, right? That's the thing that makes the most sense.

We know that this Christmas season is going to be a tough one because this government is giving $4.7 billion away to wealthy corporations while raising every single fee, whether it's your car registration or registering an RV or whether it's tuition or personal income taxes. If you're a family on AISH, then you don't get the indexing any more. Whatever it is, we know that this government is basically making life more expensive for every single family. But can we at least try to make sure that when they're heating their homes and using electricity this year, they're going to know what they're paying so that we can have a holiday season where they don't have to worry about that, Madam Chair, where they don't have to worry about what that bill is going to look like at the end of December, where they don't have to worry about how they're going to budget and afford those toys?

That's the type of decision, those are the type of people that we affect when we make change in this House, right? When we make laws and bills and debate these things in this House, we should all remember that we're talking about real people. We're talking about families. We're talking about families with children. We're talking about people who really do have to make these types of decisions. I know, Madam Chair, families like mine. When I was younger, my family was the one that had to make decisions like this, right? We didn't have all the flashiest toys when I was younger, but it's families like mine that'll benefit the most from this because when we talk about that stability, when we talk about making that $30 difference, if that's what this works out to – 6.8 cents is the cap right now, or $68. When we're talking about if it's 30 bucks or if it's 50 bucks, whatever it is, that's a Christmas toy for two kids right there. That's the type of difference we're talking about. It's families that live in every single one of our ridings that will see this difference.

Let's get them through the holidays. Let's make sure they can have a fun holiday that their kids will remember for the rest of their lives. Let's make sure we can have an environment that is friendly. Let's make sure we can have an environment that encourages this and allows those families to understand what the impacts will be because you can't bring it back, right? If you ruin one Christmas, that kid is going to remember it forever. If you give $4.7 billion away to wealthy corporations, raise their school fees, make busing more expensive, make tuition more expensive, make their personal income taxes more expensive, make their electricity more expensive, all of these things more expensive and then decide that we're going to go back in and take money away from you at the end of the holiday season, at the end of the Christmas season, that's what's a little bit heartless, Madam Chair. That's what's kind of heartless.

We can do this. We can make this change. We can make it better. We can stop some of this bleeding. We don't have to go to every single family and take money out of their pockets. That's not what we have to do today. We have the opportunity to make it better right here, right now. This amendment, Madam Chair, is a minor amendment. It changes the date by one month. It allows these families to know for the next month what their power bill can be expected to be. It allows them to know a maximum limit on the power bill. That's something that families will be able to work with. That's something that's very reasonable.

I think it's something that – there are a number of my colleagues, for example, who are social workers, and they'll have experienced families that this will make a huge difference for. This would make a massive difference in their lives because perhaps they do have two or three kids, and knowing how much they can spend and afford to spend over this holiday season, whether it's on, "Should they should get the extra-large fancy maple-glazed ham?" or whether it's on, "Should they get the newest toy?" – whatever it is, these are the families that need to know these things because they need to make those types of decisions. Those are the decisions that families need to make before the bills come due, right? If you go in after and make life more expensive after the invoices have already been issued, then it doesn't work because now they're in trouble. That's where we run into trouble.

Once again, I think we have an opportunity here to save Christmas. I think we have an opportunity here to make the holidays okay for families. I think we have an opportunity here not to go in and steal from every single family, to show some compassion, to have a heart, to go in and make life more affordable, to go in and actually tell these families that we care about them. I think that's what we can all stand up here to do, and I hope we can all agree on this. I hope the government understands that this is very detrimental to families. I hope they understand that by delaying it by only one month, we can make Christmas okay again. These families will be able to budget properly, they'll be able to have the stability that they need, and they'll be able to understand all those types of issues.

I'm looking forward to hearing from government members. I hope they'll be able to enlighten me, and I hope they'll be able to support me, because a minor change like this: we have the opportunity right now to make sure these holidays are good memories for generations to last.

Thank you.

The Chair: Hon. member, Hatchimals were a thing, like, two years ago, not last year.

Are there any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. I'll just respond to that proposed amendment with some information. For electricity customers who choose to stay on the regulated rate option, the elimination of the 6.8-cent rate cap is expected to increase the average residential electricity bill by about $7 in the month of December – about $7 – for each residential bill. That's all. The cap itself was put into place to hide the volatility created by the previous government's proposed move to a capacity market from the energy-only market. That's why we've removed the rate cap, because we're sticking with the energy-only market.

One last short comment. For those customers who are concerned with the $7 increase in the month of December by the elimination of the rate cap, there are options to the RRO, and you can choose from more than 30 competitive retailers that offer a fixed-rate contract of less than 6.8 cents.

Again, the cost per electricity bill for the month of December is approximately $7. For that reason, Madam Chair, we will not be supporting the proposed amendment.

Thank you.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Madam Chair. I appreciate the Energy minister getting up and revealing her true intentions for the electricity system with her response to this amendment and also revealing, of course, the continued lack of compassion that we see from this government: "Oh, it's only $7 this month. Oh, AISH clients are only going to get their benefits reduced by $30 this month. That's not onerous. Oh, seniors are having their underage dependants kicked off their drug plans. I'm sure they'll be able to afford to pick up the tab." You know, this government is nickel and diming Albertans at every turn. They're told that these costs are small and that any reasonable person should be able to afford them, and they can't.

Yet when we point out, of course, the excessive expenses that the Premier's office is making, flying their friends around for pancake parties, sending the principal secretary to sip champagne with Conservative supporters in London, England, not London, Ontario, just so that we're clear as to which London we're talking about, well, that's perfectly reasonable – in fact, we should have sympathy for this person because he's reduced his salary so greatly, to the lowly amount of $200,000 a year – and, oh, how wonderful it is that the people of Alberta have this master of the universe who's practically donating his time to work on behalf of the people of Alberta.

You know, it's interesting, with the Energy minister's remarks about the $7 hit that regular Albertans are going to be faced with continuing this trend of a lack of compassion for the average person trying to make ends meet given this economic climate.

Furthermore, in my remarks and in my colleagues' remarks around moving from the capacity market back to the generation-only market, we had highlighted this tendency, the intent to push people onto these long-term contracts which, study after study has shown, have cost electricity payers more in the long run than staying on the regulated rate option. The Energy minister is revealing the government's true intent, to continue to soak utility ratepayers by trying to sell them long-term contracts that aren't to their financial benefit. So here we go again. This government is working on behalf of its wealthy donors, the elite owners of the utility companies who stand to make huge profits from these long-term contracts, and doing nothing to protect the average Albertan from seeing a spike in their electricity increases this month and electricity increases going forward.

For those reasons, Madam Chair, I intend to support this amendment, and I intend to let every Albertan know that the Minister of Energy and all of her caucus colleagues display a shocking lack of compassion for the average Albertan and are, you know, working in the interests of the billionaires who run the electricity system in this province and are not interested in protecting average Albertans from getting soaked.

Thank you.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Madam Chair. It's my pleasure to rise today to speak to this amendment that was proposed by my colleague. I think it's reasonable to ask for a one-month extension, 31 days, to allow people an opportunity to perhaps reassess some of their bills, to look at some of the things that they might need to cut in the future.

I think that the timing of this is quite fitting, Madam Chair. November is Financial Literacy Month, and I know that out of my office we've been hearing from not only constituents but from people from all over the province who are afraid. They're expressing fear. They're expressing concern when they've seen the release of the budget and how it's going to impact their family, and seeing that one of the many pieces of this omnibus bill is to eliminate the regulated rate cap, people are scared. They know that this is a bill that they have to pay, and when there's some unpredictability in it, it causes fear. Being that it's Financial Literacy Month, we're encouraging people to look out at the resources that are available to them to help them plan for their budget when everything is going up: their cost of insurance is going up, the cost of registering a vehicle is going up, tuition for students is going up.

Unfortunately, some of the things that aren't going up are the funding that several people with fixed income rely on: those on AISH, those receiving employment income supports benefits.

As my colleague had mentioned, there are social workers on this side of the House and on the other side of the House who have worked closely with families who have a very, very limited income, Madam Chair, and when we're talking about proposing a one-month extension, that seems totally reasonable. We know that the government is going to push this through – we've seen it time and time again – regardless of the impact on the people of this province. I think that asking for a minimal extension, to December 31, 2019, is something that is absolutely reasonable and should be supported by every member in this House. We know it's going to go through, so proposing this extension, I think, is quite fair. We talked about Christmas and that happening in the month of December and just the general holidays. Many families that don't celebrate Christmas celebrate the holiday season: they're spending time with family, they're going to social events. Having an increase in energy and having a decrease in their income might mean that they're not able to do some of those activities.

I heard people talking about Christmas gifts. I know many families that I've worked with over the years, Madam Chair, that can't afford Christmas gifts. The government doesn't seem to be understanding that there are families out there that are struggling. They access services that are available in this province, to which so many Albertans that can give do, charities like Santas Anonymous, where families will put forward their children's age and their gender and ask for a gift because they can't afford it. It's humiliating to have to say, "I need this help," and we're forcing families, more and more of them, into this situation, families that can't afford a Christmas dinner, that are relying on the food bank. I'm not sure if members opposite have worked with families or have had to go to a food bank themselves, but it's not something that people are super excited to talk about.

When families are coming to my office and they're in tears about the impacts of this budget, it's something that I take very, very seriously, and it's something that I believe as legislators we all need to take seriously. I can't imagine looking at a family and saying: "You know, we're sorry, but everything is just going up. The cost of living in general is going up. We're not going to provide you any sort of indexing for your AISH or for your employment and income support benefits. If you're a teenager who is a mom who is raising a family and you're still in school, at your job you're no longer being paid minimum wage." These are just some of the things that this government has done and inflicted on families all across the province, and they're afraid, Madam Chair.

I think that offering a simple one-month extension is not too much to ask. We've offered many opportunities for the government to listen to Albertans and to hear their struggles and to hear their fears and to hear the actual, real-life impacts that these decisions are having. Knowing that there are families that have two incomes that are struggling to be able to pay for daycare – they can't afford daycare. They might not be able to afford two vehicles anymore. They might have to give up one vehicle because they can't afford the increase to the insurance and they can't afford the increase to register their vehicle again.

This is a province that has so much to offer. I mean, when we were in government, we reduced child poverty. Things like this in this omnibus bill I don't feel are working anywhere near reducing child poverty. It's looking at increasing poverty across this province. And raising rates for energy, I think, is one more step that hits every single Albertan in the province. It's a way that their rates are going to increase. Asking for a one-month extension, I think, is totally reasonable. We're saying: please just allow one more month to give them some time.

Like I mentioned, I'm encouraging constituents, when they're struggling with financial means and just trying to understand how they can budget – they might have had a job loss; they might be looking at an increase of their benefits. Financial literacy is something that a lot of people haven't learned. It wasn't something that was taught in school, and some families weren't able to pass that on, and they just continue to struggle month to month, paycheque to paycheque, literally deciding between paying a power bill or getting groceries. And when you have a child who is telling you that they are hungry, I can tell you what that parent is going to choose. They're going to choose to feed their child. It might not even be something as exciting as a Christmas gift that they're giving up.

These are real-life impacts that are happening right now across the province, and people are really worried about what tomorrow brings for them. Even the fear of hearing about all of these cuts in jobs: it's terrifying. People don't know if they're going to have a job tomorrow. People are afraid of the possibility of not having work.

Then when you look at options about them returning to the workforce, they might have to go back to school, postsecondary, to diversify, to look at something else because their job is no longer an option. And when we're looking at increasing student loan rates by 1 per cent and getting rid of the cap on tuitions, these are decisions that are going to prevent people from going on to better their education to better provide for their families. It's not just young people that are accessing postsecondary; it's adults that are forced into a workforce that they're no longer eligible for.

When we talk about this small change, Madam Chair, I think it's one hundred per cent reasonable to ask for the extension to December 31 as opposed to November 30, 2019. Let's give families one more month to maybe look at their budget and to adjust some of their spending and prepare for the incoming energy increases that they're going to see on their monthly bills. It's something that's scary. When we think about why we're in this position right now, it's because the government gave a $4.7 billion giveaway at the cost of increasing so much to Albertans, and it's just not fair. I think we owe Albertans some stability, at least through Christmas. I know this budget is very unsettling and causing serious strain in families and conversations around kitchen tables, water coolers, and if we can give one month to allow for an extension, I think that's something that's absolutely reasonable. I would hope that every member in this House can go back and say: yeah, I supported this.

We know it's going to go through, Madam Chair. We've seen it time and time again despite the government hearing heartbreaking stories from Albertans, that our side of the House has shared so openly. We have people flooding our offices with phone calls, with e-mails, reaching out on social media, coming into our offices, coming here to the Legislature to be heard, to plead with the government to not make these drastic cuts that they're making. It's falling on deaf ears, and I think a simple proposal that isn't going to stop it – we know that that's not going to happen – but extend it to December 31, like the hon. member is proposing, is something that we should all be able to at least vote on. We're asking people to pay more in a time when everything is going up, when costs are going up, and that's something that's not being taken into account.

You know, the minister had mentioned that it's only $7. Well, that, to me, says that they're just out of tune with what some families are actually dealing with. It's not just $7. It's impacts to child care, to their transportation. All of these things, Madam Chair, are impacting families. It's a huge impact. Knowing that we have an opportunity today to vote on a simple extension, one month – that's all we're asking, one month – to allow families to perhaps sit down and look at their budget, that's already so strained from so many expenses going up: I think that is something that's reasonable. Asking for a little bit of stability through the holidays is completely reasonable. Giving them a little bit more time to look at this, especially during Financial Literacy Month, putting it on families to help them come up with a better budget that can absorb some of these damaging decisions that the government is making I don't think is unreasonable.

When we look at the overall impact of this, it might not seem that significant to have just one month, but to many, many families across this province it's going to make a huge difference, especially when we're looking at the retroactive charge and the increased costs over December that many families deal with. They're rebudgeting for January for tuitions. They're looking at many things that are increasing, personal income tax. All of these things families are already talking about, and giving them 31 extra days, I think, could be a great benefit.

I just know that there are so many families that I've worked with over the years that truly struggle, and knowing the impacts on them, knowing the single mom who is struggling, who's working now for less than minimum wage, going to high school, raising her child on her own, knowing the impact of this is heartbreaking. I was in that situation myself, Madam Chair, as a young mom going to school, working, trying to raise a child, and trying to budget and balance. It's hard. And then seeing that the cost of child care is going up: it's just really heartbreaking.

I know that this is a simple amendment that should be able to be supported by all members of the House. It's only 31 days. I think it's something that's reasonable, and it would show good measure on the side of government to support this.

With that, I'd like to conclude my comments. Thank you.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you, Madam Chair. Well, it's my pleasure to rise and also speak in support of this amendment to Bill 21. Continuing to have a regulated rate cap on until the end of this year, I think, makes a lot of sense. It is distressing because, of course, taking this off means that the consumers are vulnerable to price spikes. You know, people who are on fixed income: it makes it very difficult for them. Certainly, this bill also talks a lot about not indexing AISH or the Alberta seniors' benefit, for example, so these are other things that are sort of like a double whammy when you're not supporting people to have their cost-of-living increase.

It certainly strikes me as odd, Madam Chair, that the members of the government currently, while they were in opposition, spoke very highly of indexing. You know, I did some research and looked back in Hansard about how important – when we brought forward, in the fall of 2018, Bill 26, it was the indexing of AISH and the seniors' benefit, and many, many, many of my colleagues on the other side of the aisle spoke very positively on that.

Actually, here's a quote from the Member for Taber-Warner. He says:

People with disabilities are those people who we need to help. The AISH program is specifically designed in order to be able to help them . . . I actually am very grateful for a lot of the work that the current NDP government has done for that part of our society, something that I think is very important to Albertans and to the people who need it.

So he spoke very positively in that regard.

This is from the Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul.

This indexing to CPI will greatly benefit all support recipients who have been waiting for years for an adjusted amount that reflects today's cost-of-living increases. We've heard, devastatingly, from AISH advocates that some cannot even afford basic necessities. This is absolutely unacceptable. The supports are in place in order to ensure that this is never the case for anyone. The fact that this is still happening is unacceptable and must be addressed. Every Albertan, as a base, should be confident in their ability to afford personal hygiene products and other necessities.

Here are two members from the current government that, while they were in opposition, spoke very passionately, very positively, congratulated our government at that time. We had indexed AISH and, of course, the Alberta seniors' benefit. But it seems like something has shifted. All of a sudden there's a new view, and I'm concerned that regular Albertans, vulnerable Albertans aren't being supported.

So I just really would ask the members to look at, you know, the quite significant difference from what they professed not very long ago and what they're saying now. I would identify that there's a clear incongruence, and I wonder why that is. I'd be happy to listen to any member sort of try to explain that because it does seem to lack integrity, what was shared then and what's being shared now. Certainly, that's a very important quality in a provincial politician.

With that, Madam Chair, I will sit down.

The Chair: Are there any other members wishing to speak?

Seeing none, shall I call the question?

Mrs. Savage: Madam Chair, I move that on the amendment, yes, we call the question.

[Motion on amendment A1 lost]

The Chair: We are now back on the main bill in Committee of the Whole. Are there any other members wishing to speak?

Mrs. Savage: Madam Chair, I now move that we rise and report progress on Bill 21.

[Motion carried]

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. The Committee of the Whole has had under consideration a certain bill. The committee reports progress on the following bill: Bill 21. I wish to table copies of all amendments considered by Committee of the Whole on this date for the official records of the Assembly.

The Deputy Speaker: Does the Assembly concur in the report? All those in favour, please say aye.

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Deputy Speaker: Any opposed, please say no. So carried.

The hon. Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I move that we adjourn until tomorrow, November 19, at 1:30 p.m.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 10:17 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Tuesday, November 19, 2019

Prayers

The Speaker: Hon. members, the prayer. Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and to her government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideas but, laying aside all private interests and prejudices, keep in mind their responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all.

Please be seated.

Introduction of Visitors

The Speaker: Hon. members, it was my absolute pleasure this morning to welcome the consul general of France in Vancouver. Bienvenue. Welcome. Thank you for coming. Consul General Mr. Philippe Sutter, please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Also in the Speaker's gallery this afternoon is a very familiar face, a friendly and lovely face at that, the former Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake, Ms Genia Leskiw. Welcome back.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Hon. members, we have two school groups in the galleries today. First, from Drayton Valley-Devon welcome grade 6 students from Calmar elementary, and, second, from the constituency of Edmonton-Manning welcome some more grade 6 students from Edmonton Christian northeast school. Thank you for joining us.

Hon. members, in the gallery this afternoon a guest of the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood from Skipping Stone in Calgary, Anna Murphy.

Also in the galleries are guests of the Minister of Service Alberta. Welcome those from the AREA's government relations committee, Chair Jennifer Gilbert, Brad Mitchell, Bill MacDougall, and over 40 realtors from across Alberta today.

Last but certainly not least, the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora has five Edmonton-Glenora constituents that are joining us here in the gallery.

All please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Members' Statements

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Holodomor Memorial Day

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today we mark 86 years since the Ukrainian genocide known as Holodomor, a word made up of two brutal realities: "holod," meaning hunger, and "moryty," meaning a slow, cruel death. In just two years millions of Ukrainians died of starvation.

Two years ago I travelled to Kiev to pay my respects at the Holodomor memorial in the country of our ancestors. We carried a bowl of wheat as we walked by the angels of sorrow, statues that guard the souls of the starved. We passed 24 millstones that reminded us of the 24,000 human lives ground to death every day during the famine. We laid our eyes on a statue of a girl with tears on her face, captured in time, along with her frail, malnourished frame.

Mr. Speaker, Stalin's plan was deliberate, and beginning in 1932 brigades of men came to steal any and all food. Many came specially equipped with long metal rods topped by hooks, used to prod any surface in search of grain to feed Stalin's armies.

Natalia Talanchuk remembers her mother forbidding her to look outside the windows in the mornings because out in the streets were bodies of the people who had died of starvation overnight.

Outside of Ukraine little was known, and inside to even speak of this event was a crime subject to imprisonment, exile, or execution.

Remembering the Holodomor isn't just for those of us with Ukrainian blood; it is for all of us. As Albertans we do more than remember. We act to ensure that their tragedy is never repeated. We are here as proof that hope somehow surfaced from the depths of despair of the Holodomor, and the spirit of the Ukrainian people was not broken. Generations later this spirit is alive and thriving in over 365,000 people of Ukrainian descent in Alberta and millions across the world.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker. [Remarks in Ukrainian]

Holodomor Memorial Day

Ms Armstrong-Homeniuk: Mr. Speaker, I'm proud to rise today as one of more than 350,000 Albertans of Ukrainian ancestry. It was of utmost importance to me to attend today's commemoration ceremony marking the 11th anniversary of the Ukrainian Famine and Genocide (Holodomor) Memorial Day Act. The fourth Saturday of every November is now a day where Canadians make a point of remembering the Ukrainian famine and genocide of 1932 and 1933.

The Soviet regime, under the leadership of Joseph Stalin, imposed impossibly high quotas for the amount of grain Ukrainian villages were required to contribute to the Soviet state. When they were not able to meet these quotas, the Ukrainian people would have their homes searched and any food confiscated. Soldiers would be posted in watchtowers to prevent them from taking any of the harvest. People were forbidden from leaving the country in search of food, apprehended, and sent back to their deaths.

Holodomor, translated as "killing by hunger," was a horrific government-imposed famine which saw millions of children, women, and men starve to death. Thankfully, my gido had come to Canada at the age of 17 for a better life. Sadly, many of his family members ended up starving back in Ukraine. I remember as a little girl, my baba would be carrying around potatoes in her apron. I would ask her why, and she told me that they were there just in case.

This period was one of the darkest periods in human history, Mr. Speaker, and the Soviet Union took significant steps to keep it a secret. For decades these horrible acts went largely unrecognized outside Ukraine.

While nothing will erase the past, I am grateful that we can at least recognize that these heinous crimes took place. As Albertans we must always cherish democracy, defend human rights, and value diversity and the multicultural nature of our society.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Athabasca-Barrhead-Westlock.

Chops and Crops Agricultural Event

Mr. van Dijken: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Alberta farmers have faced many challenges this growing season, but I'm proud to say that Alberta farmers have once again done a magnificent job, doing their part to help feed the world. In the midst of enduring weather uncertainty and devastating harvest conditions, they also continue to face trade uncertainty.

Mr. Speaker, all MLAs are invited to attend the annual Chops and Crops event happening in the Wales Room on the 10th floor of the Federal Building next Monday, November 25. This event is a wonderful opportunity to observe and appreciate the outstanding products our agricultural community produces. The event is hosted by the Alberta Beekeepers, Alberta Canola, Alberta Wheat, Alberta Barley, the Alberta Pulse Growers, Alberta Sugar Beet Growers, Potato Growers, Oat Growers, and Alberta Pork.

In addition to learning about these vital industries, a variety of fantastic food will be provided to really showcase the quality of products these groups produce. Last year the event theme was Industry of Champions, focusing on the fact that Edmonton was soon to host the Grey Cup. As such the event featured football-related decorations as well as trading cards for each of the commodities present. This year the theme is Food for Thought. I am sure they will leave us with a lot to think about.

We as legislators need to recognize the role we play in maintaining a globally competitive agricultural sector. Any extra cost that public policy adds will need to be paid for by the products that they produce. We have a huge responsibility to get it right.

I hope all MLAs take the time to attend Chops and Crops to demonstrate our commitment to agriculture in this province and its contribution to both the economy and the health and wellness of Albertans. MLAs have all been preregistered, so I would encourage members: check your calendars and attend if possible for an outstanding evening honouring Alberta agriculture.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora has a statement to make.

Midwife Barbara Scriver

Ms Hoffman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my honour to rise in this House today to recognize Barbara Scriver, a midwifery pioneer in the province of Alberta whose career spanned 39 years. Barb caught her last baby in August, and I was thrilled to attend her retirement party. In hearing families share their experiences in Barb's care, it was evident that she carried out her work with passion, dedication, confidence, and joy.

One spoke of living in Fort McMurray and not having access to care there at the time of their pregnancies, so they drove for both to Edmonton to have Barb's support. The parents talked about the difficult labour that resulted in an emergency C-section and how Barb was calm, loving, and strong when they needed it the most. They said: she helped us make the right choices when we were scared and lost. They were grateful that she was also there for their second pregnancy that ended in a successful vaginal birth after Caesarean.

Another family talked about how much Barb involved the father in both of their pregnancies, which was especially helpful when the second came so fast that dad had to catch the buttery baby. When they heard Barb's cheery arrival and the baby cried out to her, they knew all was well.

While we are celebrating Barb's legacy, it goes deeper than the babies and the families that she personally supported. Her legacy includes advocacy for the profession and public access for all. While we aren't quite there yet, I am proud of the progress we were able to make under the NDP government in partnership with the Alberta Association of Midwives. I want all midwives, women, and allies to know that our party will keep pushing for more midwifery care. While Barb may have caught her last baby, there are women and families throughout our province who need us to fight for them, and we will.

Thank you.

Interprovincial Trade Barriers

Ms Issik: Mr. Speaker, in April Albertans chose to chart a new path. They supported our vision of intense focus on jobs, the economy, and pipelines. We promised to pursue government policies that unleash the power of Albertans to create jobs and drive our economy forward. This is a significant shift from policies which took away the rightful earnings of Albertans through high taxes and burdened efforts of Albertans with bureaucratic red tape.

We have a lot of work left to do on all fronts, but we have made some great progress. One area where we have made fantastic progress is establishing Alberta's leadership on the elimination of interprovincial trade barriers. For too long it has been easier to do business across the southern border than across provincial borders. As many undoubtedly know, these barriers are extremely costly for our economy, other provinces, and our country as a whole. These interprovincial trade barriers are estimated to cost our economy between $50 billion and $130 billion every single year. That's almost $9,300 per Canadian household.

That gap represents a massive opportunity for economic development and a potential increase in the base level of prosperity for many Albertans and Canadians, even if we can only capture a small portion of the total potential gains. These gains will lead to a real increase in the quality of life for Albertans and in the ability of our government to provide health care, education, and other services for Albertans.

Our government has shown real leadership by removing an incredible 21 exceptions under the Canadian free trade agreement. Alberta has become the national leader in eliminating internal barriers to trade. I am proud of the leadership shown by our government in eliminating these trade barriers, and I look forward to other provinces following our lead to create a more prosperous Canada.

Support for Agriculture

Mr. Dach: Mr. Speaker, Alberta farmers are facing yet another dismal harvest season caused by poor harvest conditions, ongoing international trade disputes, and business risk management programs that are not equipped to handle the issues. Team Alberta, representing producer organizations comprised of the Alberta wheat and barley commissions, Alberta Pulse Growers, and Alberta Canola, have publicly called on the Alberta and federal governments to act immediately to provide financial assistance to Alberta farmers who face huge economic losses and very burdensome personal stress and mental health challenges as a result of conditions beyond their control. So far Alberta's agriculture minister has paid lip service to this but has failed to bring forward any real, concrete action plan to help farmers right now.

Three out of four past growing seasons, Mr. Speaker, have seen bad harvests. The latest crop report shows that 11 per cent of crops province-wide are still in the field. For specific crops the numbers are even more catastrophic: 17.3 per cent of the canola crop, nearly 15 per cent of the potato crop, and 45 per cent of the sugar beet crop are as yet unharvested. That's about $778 million worth of unharvested crop in Alberta. According to John Guelly, the Alberta Canola chair, quote: farmers are experiencing a very disappointing crop year once again, and many won't be able to get their crops off the field until the spring. This means delays in insurance and access to funds necessary for next year and to feed their families.

Mr. Speaker, it is the family farm that is most vulnerable to these challenges. When added to the heavy burden of having to compete with corporate agriculture producers who operate increasingly larger landholdings, we see an alarming rise in the incidence of mental health issues, including serious depression, anxiety, and suicidal tendencies, erupting in Alberta amongst family farms. Family farmers who leave agriculture depopulate rural Alberta, and they need our support right now.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

Crime in Mid-size Cities

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We know that rural crime is a concern to many in our province. We have heard the stories of survivors of these crimes in this House. Our government has taken concrete steps to combat rural crime across our province, and I am thankful for that.

But there are concerns in urban areas outside of Edmonton and Calgary as well. Our mid-size cities across this province are facing increased instances of thefts, break-ins, vandalism, assaults, and other crimes. I've heard from my constituents about these incidents first-hand. Each incident is one too many, and further than that, each crime perpetuates negative assumptions about our mid-sized cities. There should be no hesitations about visiting downtown Lethbridge and supporting the local businesses that keep our city vibrant. We need an answer for our urban crime in Lethbridge to reassure those that have experienced it and to properly penalize those who offend.

I recently went on a ride-along with emergency medical services in Lethbridge. As incredible as it was to understand the life-saving work they do, I could not ignore how they're struggling under the increased workload due to these crimes. These front-line workers deserve our full support.

Beyond that, cities outside of Edmonton and Calgary deserve the same commitment and attention to safety that larger centres receive. No one's safety should be based on where they live. This applies to the folks who make rural Alberta their home, but this also must apply to everyone who makes Lethbridge their home.

Mr. Speaker, while we consider the impact of rural crime, we also have to consider how urban crime is harming our communities. These crimes feed assumptions about downtown cores, painting them as unsafe and inaccessible, which is discouraging investment and turning families away from these centres. We can no longer afford to let these acts go without justice. Steps have been made to serve this justice such as expanding the drug treatment court program throughout Alberta, but we need solutions to dispel the notion that our downtown cores are a lost cause.

Our communities deserve an answer and a solution to these crimes and a plan for downtown revitalization, one that will support these downtown centres while making sure those that commit these crimes get the help they need to prevent them from offending again.

Federal Equalization Payments

Mr. Schow: Fat Surplus Means More Money for Quebec Families: that was the headline of Philip Authier's article in the Montreal Gazette on Thursday, November 7. The recent budget tabled by the Quebec Finance minister, Eric Girard, shows that the province enjoyed an $8.2 billion surplus in 2018-19 and a $4 billion surplus in 2019-2020. Girard said that the province is swimming in cash and will use the money to pay down the debt and address the issue of astronomical parking fees. In Alberta we know that if you've eaten today, you thank a farmer, but I guess if you're in Quebec and you parked today, thank an Albertan.

These kinds of headlines stoke the ire of Albertans who already feel that Quebec is getting the lion's share of our money, and they're not wrong. Since equalization was introduced, in 1961, Alberta has given over $600 billion, $240 billion in the last 11 years. In that same time span Quebec has gotten $107 billion. This begs the question: what gives?

My grandparents used to keep a poster of the milch cow in their house, you know, the one where Alberta feeds it and it gets milked in Ontario. As a kid I didn't understand what it meant. I even recall laughing at it, but there's nothing funny about tens of thousands of unemployed Albertans or the way we're treated by a country that depends so heavily on our generous financial aid. So it's high time Alberta gets a fair deal in Canada. It's time to get a pipeline built to the coast. It's about time Alberta gets a little respect from the east; otherwise, we'll just take it.

Our Premier said to the Bloc Québécois leader, Mr. Blanchet, that you can't have your cake and eat it, too. His smug response was telling. He said: you know what; I like my cake, and I will do what I think about it. As far as I'm concerned, I think he can have his own oil and do with it whatever he likes. Well, Mr. Blanchet can have all the cake he likes. Just don't expect us to pay for the ingredients, make it, bake it, and serve it to him on a silver platter. Those days are over.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The Leader of Her Majesty's Official Opposition.

Bill 22

Ms Notley: As the longest serving member of this House, Mr. Speaker, I've always respected its profound importance to democracy. You will all remember that I grew up watching my father debate here. I watched him and Premier Lougheed engage in a robust but fair exchange of ideas and ideals. That is why I am heartbroken by the attack on this House, its members, and its institutions through this Premier's Bill 22. To the Premier: before you establish yourself as the most undemocratic Premier in Alberta's history, will you please do the right thing and withdraw this bill?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, the fake outrage from the NDP is ridiculous. This bill does a simple thing. It consolidates the election authority system within our province to be in line with every other province inside the country and the federal government. Let me be very, very clear. All investigations remain under the purview of an independent officer of this Legislature in the Chief Electoral Officer, who has served this Chamber for a very, very long time in a nonpartisan way. In fact, the last time they were appointed was when that member was the Premier of the province. The Election Commissioner position will remain and, in fact, will now be further away from political interference because they'll be reporting directly to the Chief Electoral Officer.

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, winning the election does not give the Premier unfettered power to do whatever he wants. Our democracy demands oversight through this House, its institutions and officers, and the judiciary, and all must be independent, yet this Premier's decision to fire the Election Commissioner, someone who's actively investigating the UCP fraud, is an attack on democracy, a cover-up of the truth, and could even constitute an obstruction of justice. To anyone on the front bench: how can you let this level of corruption into this people's Legislature?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, also a ridiculous statement. Let me quote somebody. "It is important to ensure that the varied activities of an [election management body] are directed by the organization and not controlled by some other level of government or the Assembly bureaucracy." Who said that? The current Election Commissioner of Alberta, Mr. Lorne Gibson, in a white paper on independence and accountability of election administrations that he wrote for the Northwest Territories in December 2016. This simply does exactly what Lorne Gibson suggested, brings the entire election system under one body. It remains with an Election Commissioner position and the Chief Electoral Officer being independent officers of this Legislature.

Ms Notley: Absolutely missing the point.

Let's all remember that in his bid to lead the UCP, the Premier's campaign set up a stalking horse, the kamikaze candidate Jeff Callaway. Then his staff ran this man's fake campaign from the shadows, a campaign funded by illegal donations, just to attack Brian Jean – Brian Jean – who served this province with integrity. The Premier has always shown disrespect for democracy in his own party, but now he's showing disrespect for the law. Why is this government covering up for him by firing the Election Commissioner in the middle of an investigation?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, the Premier has already been clear. Those allegations are ridiculous by the Official Opposition leader. In addition to that, no one is firing anybody. We are consolidating the system, bringing the Election Commissioner position back to a system that is closer to where it was in 2018, before the NDP government changed it. The Election Commissioner position will remain. It will be underneath an independent officer of this Legislature in the form of the Chief Electoral Officer, a position that has served this Chamber for over a century very, very well. The current occupant of it I trust completely to operate in a nonpartisan way.

The Speaker: The hon. the Leader of the Official Opposition.

Ms Notley: The issue is not who that member trusts or doesn't trust, Mr. Speaker.

Now, Canada's Criminal Code prevents wilful actions to obstruct justice. The demotion or firing of an independent officer of this Legislature in the middle of an investigation into UCP operatives, into fraud and illegal donations tied to the Premier's own leadership race sounds pretty obstructive to me. This Premier is using the power of his office to politically prevent investigation into fraud and corruption surrounding his friends and his party. Why is this Justice minister protecting this Premier and his corrupt friends? What are they hiding?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, again another ridiculous assertion by the Leader of the Opposition. First of all, the Premier's office is not making any decisions associated with Bill 22. This Chamber will make that decision by voting with the 87 members of this Chamber. Again to this, the Chief Electoral Officer will remain as an independent officer of this Legislature, and the Election Commissioner position will remain. All investigations will fall underneath their purview, completely arm's length from any political decisions, as they should be. This legislation ensures that that will continue and goes back to simply operating like every other province in the country.

Ms Notley: Absolute rubbish.

This Justice minister said nothing when it was revealed that the Premier's leadership campaign staff colluded with the candidate found to be funded by illegal donors. Now he's standing by as the Premier fires the Election Commissioner who was investigating those donors. This bill, which is obstructing justice, goes against the very spirit of the Attorney General's own profession and his sworn duty, as the Alberta Attorney General, to prevent the Executive Council from breaking the law. I ask the Attorney General: why is he giving away his integrity and for what?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, this fake outrage and this fear and smear that we've seen from the opposition for very much too long, seen when they were in government: that's why they were the only one-term government in the history of this province. That's why they were fired by Albertans. This approach will not work. Albertans will not buy it. We will continue to ensure that the Chief Electoral Officer remains an independent officer of this Legislature, that the Election Commissioner is able to continue to operate within that capacity to continue with any investigations, completely arm's length from any political interference. That's what this legislation does. It brings us in line with every other province and the federal government.

Ms Notley: The House leader is misleading the House.* The Premier is saying that Albertans are subject to one set of rules, but when it comes to himself, it's a whole new world, and he can rewrite them as any cover-up demands. He's firing the Election Commissioner, asking his cabinet to play along in this abuse of power, and then displaying a cowardly refusal to answer for his own actions. Why won't the Premier explain to Albertans what exactly it is he is trying so hard to hide?

Speaker's Ruling Parliamentary Language

The Speaker: The Leader of the Opposition knows full well that she can't make a statement like: the Government House Leader is misleading the House. She can apologize and withdraw.

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, there are many, many conventions in this House which I believe are in jeopardy at this time. You just identified one of them. Unfortunately, the greatest jeopardy in this House is posed by Bill 22. At this point, we must have a full and honest conversation that doesn't involve misleading statements by any member over there, so I will not apologize until we have fully canvassed the destructive nature of this bill, in a historic way, to the people of this province and to the members of this House past, current, and future.

The Speaker: The hon. the Leader of the Official Opposition is the longest serving member of the Assembly. She knows the rules. The rules are that you may not make an accusation against another member that would indicate that they are misleading or lying to the House. This is a very serious matter, as is Bill 22. The hon. member will know that the Speaker takes no position on Bill 22. Whether it is a good bill or a bad bill, there will be plenty of time for debate. What the Speaker's requirement is is that the rules of debate are followed. If she chooses not to follow them, she won't be allowed to be in the House. Those are the rules that the House has set out, which she is a member of. The Leader of the Official Opposition can apologize for making the statement and withdraw, or she knows what the step after that is.

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, you are right. I am the longest serving member of this House. Before that I was a political staffer, and before that I was a political activist, and before that I watched my father in this House. I know how important the traditions of this House are. I know how important the officers of this House are. I know how important the conduct of this House is and the fact that we all got here fairly by rules which we all agree to follow. Bill 22 goes directly at the heart of that, and it is a far bigger threat to this House than whether or not I said that people over there misled or the House leader misled, specifically something that is in writing in front of this House already, in the Legislature, which is what he did.

But more to the point, Mr. Speaker, we see a corrupt act to interfere with an investigation in this House. We must be able to call it what it is because I have never seen a threat to this House like Bill 22, not in the province's history. I cannot apologize until we have fully canvassed every effort to stop the . . .

The Speaker: I appreciate your comments. [interjection] The Speaker has risen. Let me reiterate. The Speaker takes no position on the steps the government may or may not take. I have no feeling about the bill at all and the importance that it has to the Assembly. The only position that the Speaker takes is that the rules of the Assembly are followed.

I want to be very clear. The Leader of the Opposition is refusing a ruling of the Speaker, that the Speaker has made, that she is out of order. She acknowledges that a refusal to apologize will result in the removal of her presence from the House for the rest of the day. Is that the case, hon. Leader of the Opposition?

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, as I have said before, there are many, many elements of this House that the Speaker has to defend. The integrity and the independence of officers and executive members of this Legislative Assembly, including the Election Commissioner, who is in the middle of an active investigation, is another thing the Speaker must defend. Regardless, I cannot apologize for having an open conversation about . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member. I never asked you to apologize for having an open conversation because, obviously, that would be outside the purview of the Speaker's role.

What I have asked you to do is to follow the rules of the Assembly, which you've chosen not to. So then according to Standing Order 24(2) the Speaker may name a member and require them to be removed from the Assembly, at which time, Rachel Notley, you are no longer permitted to be in the Assembly for the rest of the day.

[Ms Notley was escorted out of the Chamber by the Acting Sergeant-at-Arms]

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, there are even more serious consequences to Bill 22. This bill creates a real danger for any person who might stand up and call for this UCP Premier and his friends to be accountable to the law. It is appalling that this is happening against an independent officer of our Assembly when that officer has already uncovered widespread illegal activity. Will anyone in the UCP stand up for our democracy?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, it doesn't matter how much the NDP want to continue with their fear-and-smear tactics, which are not working. The reality of this process is a simple consolidation, a process that brings us in line with every province in this country and with the federal government. The Election Commissioner position remains. It goes further away from any potential for political interference by going under the Chief Electoral Officer, an office that has been in this province for over a century and has successfully served Albertans in that role. All investigations remain arm's length from any political body and from this Chamber and remain under the purview of the Chief Electoral Officer.

Ms Hoffman: The Premier has claimed that he has a mandate from the people of Alberta to do whatever he wants, but that mandate has limits. Nobody gets a mandate to break the law, fire law enforcement agencies, or undermine the very democracy that creates his mandate. This is Alberta. Does the Premier understand that there are limits to his democratic mandate?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, this is a prime example of the Official Opposition overplaying their hand yet again. Nobody has fired a law enforcement agency. That is completely and utterly ridiculous. The Election Commissioner office and position remains. It is now consolidated within the recommendation of the current Election Commissioner in the province of Alberta, similar to other provinces. It consolidates the process, it saves taxpayers upwards of a million dollars, it protects all current investigations and future investigations, and it continues to make sure that this is run by an independent officer of the Legislature.

Ms Hoffman: I read the bill, and the bill says terminate. The Government House Leader can say what he wants, but the bill is in black and white, and it says terminate.

Yesterday the Premier didn't answer when asked about what would happen if the Prime Minister fired the Ethics Commissioner during the SNC-Lavalin case. If Paul Martin had sacked Justice Gomery, that would have been corrupt, too. The Premier knows this, and I'm sure his entire caucus does, too. At their emergency caucus meeting tomorrow who among them will speak up for our democracy?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, to be clear yet again, all of our election system remains under the Chief Electoral Officer, who is an independent officer of this Legislature. The position of Election Commissioner has not been removed. If this House decides to support Bill 22, the Election Commissioner will move into a consolidated role with the Chief Electoral Officer, exactly the same as it is all across this country and with the federal government. This consolidates the process, brings it closer to where it was before 2018, when the NDP changed the system. We have utmost confidence in the Chief Electoral Officer.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

2017 UCP Leadership Contest Investigation

Ms Ganley: Thank you. On the night of October 26, 2017, two candidates of the final UCP leadership contest filed complaints of voting irregularities. Since then we've heard credible claims and seen documents that support these allegations. The Election Commissioner launched a probe to get to the bottom of it, but now he's been shut down by this government. One of those UCP candidates is now the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General. He's charged with upholding the rule of law. Why is he allowing the government to undermine it?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, nobody has shut down any investigation. Let me be very, very clear. This was completely confirmed by the Chief Electoral Officer's office yesterday. Any investigations will continue going forward under the purview of the Chief Electoral Officer and the Election Commissioner, which have now been consolidated into one office. Any investigation that may or may not be taking place will continue under their control. We trust the independent officer of this Legislature to make the determination of what is best going forward. He has been appointed by all members of this Chamber.

Ms Ganley: I see why the member might shut down the Minister of Justice on this issue. The Minister of Justice himself was one of the first witnesses to the illegal activity. He asked for an investigation, and now he sits in the government who's shutting down an investigation into bribery, forgery, and fraud. To the Minister of Justice: what is the public supposed to think when the chief law enforcement officer in the province sits silently while the government removes an officer in the middle of an active investigation?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, that is completely false. The allegations and words she's trying to put into my mouth did not happen. That is not what I asked to be investigated. I raised questions about a voting process. My concerns were addressed by the party. I accepted the result of that election where our Premier received a resounding mandate. I accepted that result clearly. The allegations that they have – we are going over old treaded ground. The good work of the Election Commissioner's office under Bill 22 will simply continue under the Chief Electoral Officer. That is what it's going to do.

Ms Ganley: It's in black and white, Mr. Speaker, in the bill. Employment contracts are terminated.

Last spring we pushed the Minister of Justice into appointing a special prosecutor to look into UCP voter fraud. Since then he has refused repeatedly to name a special prosecutor. To the minister: did you refuse to name a special prosecutor because it was always the intention of this government to shut down any investigation into themselves?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, this is absolutely ridiculous. The appointment of a special prosecutor is done independently of my office. The people are informed of the matter, they review it, and the ADM, independent of my office – I have no input into this whatsoever – made the decision to seek a counsel from Ontario to act in the role of special prosecutor. Those are the facts. Right now we've got people here torqued up to 11. Those are the facts.

2:10 CN Rail Strike and Commodity Transportation

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, Albertans know that one of the most critical issues facing our province is market access for our energy resources. For years we have faced obstruction to building pipelines to move our products, and industry has had to ship more and more oil by rail. Now we are facing yet another obstacle. The CN Railway union has initiated a strike action, which will disrupt our rail network and our ability to get our oil to market. Today alone the benchmark price for western Canadian oil has dropped by more than $4. To the Minister of Energy: can you tell the House what impact this will have on our energy producers and Alberta taxpayers?

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you to the member for this question, Mr. Speaker. Today's labour action by the railway union has a significant impact on Alberta's economy, and this morning Minister Dreeshen and I called upon Prime Minister Justin Trudeau to immediately take action to recall Parliament early and introduce emergency back-to-work legislation. The federal government has already failed Alberta oil and gas workers: blocking pipelines, restricting market access, introducing bills C-48 and 69. We need immediate action from the federal government before . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Energy would know that naming any member inside the House or using their last name would be wildly inappropriate.

Mr. Horner: Thank you, Minister. Mr. Speaker, given that in addition to the impact on our energy industry, this will also have a significant impact on our farmers, who rely on rail companies to ship our agricultural products to global consumers and given that many farmers in my constituency will be worried about how this union strike action will impact their families, to the minister of agriculture: how will this impact our farmers, and how are we going to support them?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry has the call.

Mr. Dreeshen: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member for that very important question. Rail strikes do have very damning effects on farmers. It's something that we've unfortunately seen here in Alberta and Canada many, many times. I was very proud to stand with our Minister of Energy to ask the federal government to get back to work so they can legislate the CN Rail line back to work. Ultimately, rail disruptions like this, the cascading effects that they have on our supply chain when it comes to our grain – 145 different countries get exports from the province of Alberta, and they need to go by train.

Mr. Horner: Thank you, Minister. Mr. Speaker, given that any long or protracted union strike would cause severe harm to our energy workers, our farmers, and our province and given that the federal government has the power to end this disruption of our economy through legislation, to the minister of agriculture: can you tell us what the government of Alberta is asking the federal government to do in order to immediately end this union strike and stop any further harm to our economy?

The Speaker: The Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Dreeshen: Thank you again, Mr. Speaker and to the member for that very important question. Over $12 billion in exports from our agriculture sector, over $4 billion in exports from our forestry sector: these are very big numbers. It is a very impactful issue when it comes to our sector and our province. With the difficult harvest that farmers were again faced with this year, this is an added stress. It's an added frustration that our farmers shouldn't have to face. That's why we're calling on the federal government to take this seriously, to come back early and get to work and actually have back-to-work legislation.

Public Inquiry Commissioner Appointment

Ms Sweet: Mr. Speaker, questions surrounding the appointment of Steve Allan to run this government's public inquiry continue to build. Today it surfaced that Mr. Allan held a fundraiser at the Calgary Golf and Country Club in 2018 for the now Justice minister. He also endorsed the minister in a written e-mail during the spring election campaign. To the minister: is he now convinced there's a perceived conflict of interest with Mr. Allan's appointment, or does he just not care?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, the smear job against Commissioner Allan needs to stop. This is an individual who received the Alberta Order of Excellence. He was named Calgary's citizen of the year. He was chair of Calgary Economic Development, chair of the Calgary Stampede board. He was named by Treaty 7 the honorary title of Chief Rides Many Horses.

The role of the commissioner, Mr. Speaker, is akin to a judge. They're treated with independence. All decisions made by Commissioner Allan regarding whom to retain, how to conduct his inquiry are his decisions alone, and that's reflected in how he's been engaged.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Sweet: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the minister has refused to identify what steps were taken to ensure that Mr. Allan's appointment was above board – he has refused in the media; he has refused during three hours of estimates questioning that I did this morning – and given that this minister seems to believe that being accountable to the public isn't something that is included in his job title, how can the minister ask Albertans to trust him when he won't even come clean on what is clearly a patronage appointment? Why won't he produce a paper trail?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Justice.

Mr. Schweitzer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. With respect to the appointment of Commissioner Allan that was a decision of cabinet. At no point in time has my office been involved with the inquiry after his appointment. When it comes to who has been retained, how he's being supported, that is not being run through my office. Commissioner Allan is somebody who has given back immensely to his community on homelessness, dealing with the Rotary Club. This is an individual who does not deserve this. We have the NDP on the opposite side aligning themselves in the same attacks Ecojustice is going after Mr. Allan with.

Ms Sweet: Given that Steve Allan has now contracted with the Dentons law firm to carry out some of the inquiry work, a contract that's worth almost $900,000, and given that Mr. Allan's son is a partner of Dentons and given that the Justice minister himself worked at Dentons right up until the election, to the minister: are you really trying to tell Albertans that this appointment of Steve Allan doesn't reek of Toryland entitlement?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, this was reviewed by Deputy Minister Grant Sprague with respect to Steve Allan's retaining. He sent a letter to that hon. member. I am satisfied that Mr. Allan is not in violation of the code of conduct and ethics and there is no conflict between his private interests and his role as commissioner.

Previous to coming here, I worked for the three largest law firms in the province of Alberta. They employed about 500 lawyers at any given time. All of them have done work for the government. I resigned all of my positions before taking office.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. With respect to Steve Allan's patronage appointment we first asked the Ethics Commissioner to investigate. She informed us that the way in which this appointment occurred prevented her from doing so. She pointed us to the Deputy Minister of Energy. We then asked him to investigate, and he has since refused. To the Minister of Energy: who exactly will investigate this very concerning appointment, or have you set it up so that no one can?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, again, the hon. members on the other side sent a request to the Deputy Minister of Energy, Grant Sprague, to review how this was done. Again, he sent a very detailed note back regarding all of the points that they asked, saying that Commissioner Allan is in no conflict. With respect to who he's retained, remember: this is the sole decision of somebody who's akin to a judge, their decision alone. We have to treat them with independence so that when they come forward with a report, we know it's done with integrity. Mr. Allan is somebody of the highest regard. This has been reviewed by department officials, and they found no conflict.

Mr. Sabir: Given that it would appear that Steve Allan's appointment came in exchange for political favours and given that he now stands to profit from this inquiry, as does the law firm where his son is a partner, and given that this is all very shady and Albertans are raising questions, that are going unanswered by this government, to the Minister of Energy: can we really trust the results of this inquiry if you won't first address the perceived conflict of interest with setting it up?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Energy has risen.

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The public inquiry is independent of the government. As such, the commissioner is responsible on his own for selecting contractors. The government doesn't interfere with that. As per the engagement agreement between the government of Alberta and Commissioner Allan the commissioner is entitled to select the resources at his sole discretion.

Thank you.

Mr. Sabir: Given that golf course fundraisers, patronage appointments, and shady backroom deals are now plaguing this government and given that some are comparing this to scandals that plagued former Premier Redford – some are saying that the scandals are even worse, and I agree – to the Minister of Energy: will you actually show some leadership and launch an investigation into this appointment and make the details on the results public?

Mrs. Savage: Mr. Speaker, large law firms like Dentons, who Commissioner Allan hired, are regularly required to construct ethical walls between clients in order to ensure no conflicts of interest. Commissioner Allan operates independently of government. He's free to choose contractors of his own choosing, and we trust that is in order.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Grande Prairie has a question.

Teachers' Retirement Fund Management

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last week was constituency week, and I spent the entire week at home in Grande Prairie meeting with various groups, stakeholders, and constituents. One group that I heard from was teachers, who continue to express their concerns about their pension fund in light of this government's decision to group public pensions under the Alberta Investment Management Corporation, or AIMCo for short. There seems to be some confusion around this decision, why it was made, and how it will impact the teachers' benefit. To the Minister of Finance: will you set the record straight about the decision to move the ATRF under the AIMCo umbrella?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the opportunity to make some clarifying comments on moving the Alberta teachers' retirement fund asset management function over to AIMCo. The broader use of AIMCo is a reflection of our commitment to drive efficiencies, see that we deliver services...

Mr. Eggen: Stealing money.

Mr. Hunter: Point of order.

Mr. Toews: ... in a more cost-effective manner, and will result in cost savings, which will improve performance for the pension fund, Mr. Speaker. ATRF will continue to own the pension, they'll continue to administer the pension, and they'll continue to provide strategic direction.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie.

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and through you thank you to the minister for the answer. Given that there seems to be a persistence of conflicting information, including the historical performance or track record of the ATRF versus that of AIMCo, and given that Alberta is a relatively small jurisdiction to attract personnel with the skills and experience to manage this level of investing, to the same minister: can you explain the benefits of having these pensions managed together, including the benefit to the Alberta heritage savings trust fund?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. AIMCo has a long history of achieving excellent returns for their clients. The real gain for pension plans here is the sustainability of larger investment pools, which, ultimately, provide economies of scale and drive down costs in managing those investments. Alberta taxpayers, this government, and teachers all have the same priority and goals, and that is ensuring maximum returns and ensuring the most risk-mitigated environment for Alberta teachers' pensions.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mrs. Allard: Thank you again, Mr. Speaker, and thanks to the minister. Given the answers already provided by this minister with respect to the benefits of this change and given the conflicting information that people have been hearing about their pension, to the same minister: can you provide some insight into the rationale for this move and whether there is a resource online through your ministry that concerned Albertans can access to get clear information about this change and how it will benefit them? Are you able to clarify the historical performance of AIMCo relative to other funds and how the ATRF will work jointly with AIMCo going forward?

The Speaker: The minister.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I mentioned before, the ATRF board will remain in place. They will continue to manage the pension and provide strategic investment decision-making over AIMCo in terms of how the assets are managed. It's estimated that the ATRF's administrative fees will decrease by .25 per cent as AIMCo can apply economies of scale, which will drive costs down in the management of these investment assets. That will result in substantial savings for the pension plan, which will result in improved performance for Alberta teachers' pensions and Alberta taxpayers.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods has a question.

Public Service Pension Board Appointments

Ms Gray: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Along with the concerns that teachers have around this government's move to change pensions that we just heard about, inside of Bill 22 there is also an attack on workers' rights to have input into the decisions affecting their own pensions. The Minister of Finance has taken a board seat away from the Alberta Union of Provincial Employees and handed it to management. This clearly weakens the voice of AUPE workers with respect to oversight of their own pension funds. Who, if anyone, did the Minister of Finance consult with before he made this decision?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, this change just simply reflects the representation to ensure that there is adequate and impartial representation on the pension board. Nonbargaining staff represent a full 25 per cent of the participants in the pension plan. This move is simply to ensure that there's adequate representation for all employees on the pension board.

Ms Gray: Mr. Speaker, given that there is absolutely no mechanism for representation or accountability for this seat and given that this bill also gives the government power to veto the appointment of an individual selected by labour to sit in their seat on the board and given that this is yet another naked attempt by this government to intimidate and control working people, why is the Minister of Finance overriding the right of workers to name their own representative to their pension board?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, the construct of unions nominating representatives to the board will continue. The changes will ensure that appointments are based on competency, and in the event there is a name that comes forward for which adequate competency doesn't exist, the unions will simply put forward an additional name. This is not going to dilute representation in terms of pension boards.

Ms Gray: Given that this minister just described vetoing choices made by workers around their pensions and given that this is simply the most recent attack on working people in Alberta and given that this government has already bargained in bad faith, illegally torn up contracts, openly plans to veto settlements and impose wage rollbacks, isn't it true that this hijacking of pension governance is purely to give the minister leverage in the labour disputes he plans to provoke?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, our changes to public pension plans in Bill 22 will strengthen the public pension plans in this province. They will ensure that pension boards have adequate competency to make the very significant decisions they make on behalf of the Alberta public-sector employees. This government is concerned about having adequate competency around the table, unlike the previous government, who simply wasn't concerned about competency at all.

University of Calgary Layoffs

Mr. Eggen: Mr. Speaker, this Advanced Education minister stood in this House yesterday and claimed that the brutal cuts he is inflicting on our postsecondary institutions to pay for a $4.7 billion corporate giveaway were in the name of sustainability and quality. Hours later we learned that the University of Calgary is cutting 250 positions on their campus. Can the Advanced Education minister please tell us how losing 250 positions at the University of Calgary will improve the quality and sustainability of postsecondary education?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaides: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, the MacKinnon panel was very clear in a lot of its conclusions and findings. [interjections] In comparison to other provinces the province of Alberta spends $36,500 per student whereas B.C. is able to educate their population at $31,000 and Ontario at $21,000. At the rate that we're going, that is clearly not sustainable, so we have to make some changes. We have to make some fundamental transformation to improve the situation for the future. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Mr. Eggen: Well, given that it's public knowledge that this minister has given his personal assurance to stakeholders in meetings that drastic cuts imposed on postsecondaries would not translate to job losses and a decrease in instructional quality yet here we are with 250 jobs lost at just one institution alone, now is your chance to come clean. Please, why did you tell these workers that their jobs were safe, and then they were fired?

Mr. Nicolaides: Mr. Speaker, I've been working with our post-secondary institutions and have asked that they submit a budget impact assessment plan to my department by December 2 so that we can get a better understanding of how they plan to work through the next few years and how they plan to work through the budget. [interjections] I was quite clear that if one of our institutions has a clear plan that is not addressing administrative overhead and other administrative costs, I would have some serious concerns with that. Again, the MacKinnon panel showed that we spend double on administration per student than other jurisdictions. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order. Order. It's becoming more and more difficult to hear the answers.

Mr. Eggen: Given, Mr. Speaker, that students are furious, rallies and protests are being planned across this province to force this government to listen to students, and given that this minister didn't see fit to talk to students at the rally right here at the Legislature yesterday, to the minister: whose fault is it for the job losses at the University of Calgary? Is it the institution? Is it the students on campus? It feels an awful lot like it's your fault.

Mr. Nicolaides: Actually, Mr. Speaker, it's their fault for creating the situation that we now have to clean up. They created a situation that is completely unsustainable. Not just that, they drove us to the ... [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order. Order.

Unfortunately, hon. members, I'm having a very difficult time hearing the answer at this point in time.

The hon. Minister of Advanced Education has 20 seconds remaining.

Mr. Nicolaides: They drove us to the edge of the fiscal cliff and then on top of that bashed our main industry, did not support it, resulting in hundreds of thousands of job losses in our primary industry and putting us in a situation where we've had to make some very difficult decisions in order to get our province back to balance.

When it comes to students, I don't know what the member opposite is talking about. That morning I had the opportunity to meet with students and listen to their concerns. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. I heard the question. I'm going to have to hear the answer.

Municipal Funding and Performance Measures

Mr. Amery: Mr. Speaker, municipalities across the province were promised millions of dollars in order to contribute to and meet the needs of their cities. All municipalities need support from this government to provide the services that their residents rely on and need. These needs affect the smallest of towns to the biggest of our cities. Can the Minister of Municipal Affairs please speak to whether these municipalities will receive the appropriate amount of funding, funding which was promised to them in order to meet the local needs of their communities?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. I am proud that we are delivering all dollars promised to our municipalities for the 2019-2020 budget year. We have also delivered a new funding framework that will see a modest 9 per cent reduction in subsequent years, which will increase with provincial revenues and which still provides the highest level of per capita funding in the entire country. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Cross still has the call.

Mr. Amery: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the previous government promised billions of dollars to large municipalities such as Calgary and Edmonton for the expansion of their LRT systems and given that some of these large-scale projects are currently under way or in planning and given that many municipalities are projecting costs to be much greater than anticipated, can the minister please explain how this government plans to support these municipalities with these projects while ensuring that the higher costs will not result in provincial funding being frivolously spent?

The Speaker: The Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We must always remember that there is only one taxpayer. I've been clear that I expect municipalities to reduce wasteful spending, cut red tape, and streamline operations and keep taxes low. I am proud to know that most Alberta municipalities are doing great work to align themselves with the goals of our provincial government and to make life better for all Albertans. I look forward to continuing to work with our municipal leaders.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Amery: Thank you once again, Mr. Speaker. Given the difficulty of measuring local government performance on such a small scale and given that many constituents look to attain proper resources to allow them to understand this further and compare their municipality with other municipalities throughout the province, can the minister explain how this government will improve Alberta's knowledge and understanding on how local governments are performing in regard to property taxes, municipal revenues, spending, and debt as compared to governments throughout this province. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

Mr. Madu: Mr. Speaker, I can understand why the members opposite will continue to heckle all day. After all, they taxed all movable and nonmovable objects in this province. What happened? Our revenue took a dive. But soon we will be introducing a municipal measurement index, which will track things like tax rates and spending for all local governments. This will improve transparency and accountability for all municipalities and taxpayers with a one-stop, easy-to-use platform. I look forward to all that in this House.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie has a question.

Traffic Safety and Transportation Funding

Member Loyola: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This UCP Transportation minister compromised highway safety to pay for the UCP $4.7 billion no-jobs corporate handout. He cut $137 million from highway maintenance. He cut $27 million from a fund to upgrade dangerous intersections. The minister's own business plan predicts these cuts will lead to 61 additional fatal or serious injury collisions. That's his own data. What is wrong with this minister that he signs a plan knowing it will make Alberta's roads more dangerous?

Mrs. Sawhney: Mr. Speaker, I just want to make it very clear that safety is a number one priority for the Ministry of Transportation, for the Department of Transportation, and for this government. Certainly, our budget does not make any kind of changes or reductions that are going to compromise this safety.

Member Loyola: Mr. Speaker, talking points aren't going to save any lives.

Given that the rate of fatal or serious injury dropped every single year of the NDP government and given that every year our Transportation minister challenged the department to make the roads safer still with a lower target, is this minister really going to say with a straight face that this rise in projected collisions, the first in five years, has nothing to do with his brutal cuts to highway maintenance?

Mrs. Sawhney: Mr. Speaker, again, I'm going to reiterate that this government and the Ministry of Transportation are committed to safety first. That is our priority. Certainly, the information that has been presented by the member opposite is not accurate.

Member Loyola: Given that the Humboldt Broncos bus tragedy occurred at an intersection the Saskatchewan government knew to be dangerous and given this minister cut 85 per cent of the fund to fix dangerous intersections in Alberta, will the minister commit today to releasing a list of the dangerous intersections that won't be fixed because he preferred a $4.7 billion no-jobs corporate handout?

Mrs. Sawhney: Mr. Speaker, our government is committed to the safety of Albertans. It's unfortunate that we're using the tragic Humboldt incident as a partisan attack to perpetuate... [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Hon. members, I cannot hear the answer. Part of this question period opportunity is the opposition has the opportunity to ask a question, and the government has the opportunity to answer it. We might not like the answer, but they do have the opportunity.

The hon. Minister of Community and Social Services.

Mrs. Sawhney: I would just like to say that it's unfortunate that we are using a tragic incident and episode to perpetuate a narrative that is inaccurate and untrue. Our government is committed to safety for Albertans.

Alberta Innovates Corporation Layoffs

Mr. Bilous: Today we have to deal with the fiscal reality of a significantly reduced budget and resulting significant changes in staffing levels and programs: that, Mr. Speaker, was the CEO of Alberta Innovates in a letter to her staff announcing that layoff notices would be beginning Monday and continuing into December. Up to 125 people are expected to lose their jobs leading up to Christmas. To the Minister of Economic Development, Trade and Tourism: can she please explain why she's sacrificing 125 jobs as part of her plan to pay for a $4.7 billion no-job corporate handout?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, firstly, I want to acknowledge that job losses are difficult, especially for those families affected. I certainly want to acknowledge that. Alberta Innovates is in the effort, as is every government department, of restructuring, finding efficiencies, making changes to deliver more efficiently and more effectively on behalf of Albertans. We believe in the good work that Alberta Innovates does on behalf of Albertans, and we encourage them to continue to drive efficiencies in the way they deliver those services.

2:40

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Put your money where your mouth is, sir.

Given that in the Alberta Innovates 2019 annual report Alberta Innovates supported the creation of 2,000 new jobs and that every dollar of funding generated over $29 in follow-up investment – follow that – and that while job-creating organizations like Alberta Innovates get cut, this UCP government is handing over a $4.7 billion giveaway, taking $16,000 flights, and staying in luxury hotels, will the minister please explain why 125 hard-working Alberta Innovates staff need to lose their jobs?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, firstly, I want to correct the false assertions that the member opposite made, and that is that our job-creation tax cut results in as large a number as he suggested. Our job-creation tax cut will result in the net reduction of $100 million of revenue this year.

Alberta Innovates continues to be a priority for this government. We are encouraged that Alberta Innovates is moving forward to find efficiencies to improve the effectiveness of the way they deliver programs on behalf of Albertans.

Mr. Bilous: Mr. Speaker, given that it's been reported that the government asked Alberta Innovates to deliver the layoff notices on December 23, two days before Christmas, and given that this decision has been rightly described as inhumane, will the minister of economic development apologize to the staff at Alberta Innovates for her government's cruel and heartless plan to fire people literally on the eve of Christmas? Are you really that much of a Grinch?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, again, I want to acknowledge that job losses are difficult, particularly for the families involved, but this is all part of an effort to restructure in the way we deliver on behalf of Albertans, to deliver more efficiently and effectively, something the previous government knew nothing about. We inherited a fiscal mess from the previous government. We will deliver sound fiscal management on behalf of Albertans. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. Member for Banff-Kananaskis.

Animal Rights Activist Farm and Ranch Protests

Ms Rosin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Over the weekend 15 activists were arrested in Canmore after targeting and illegally occupying and filming two Canmore sled dog facilities, both of which not only comply with but exceed the regulatory requirements. This is the second demonstration this year where activists have trespassed and put animals and business owners at risk. To the minister of agriculture: what is being done to deter these illegal acts and protect Alberta farmers, ranchers, and business owners?

The Speaker: The Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Dreeshen: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for that question. We are committed to amending the Animal Health Act, which will actually see fines increase to $15,000 for a first offence and $30,000 and actually one year of imprisonment for a second offence. At the end of the day, whether it's tourists going to our beautiful mountains to go on dogsleds or just turkey farmers, there is a culture of enforcement that Albertans expect, and it's something that this government is doing everything that we can. The great work of our Justice minister with his amendments to the trespassing act and increasing jail time and fines for criminal . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Banff-Kananaskis.

Ms Rosin: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Minister, for addressing this incident. Given that illegal invasion of private property is dangerous to business owners and animals that live and work on these properties and it's harassing to property owners and given that we cannot allow facilities like Howling Dog Tours and Mad Dogs & Englishmen tours to become unfair targets of radical activists, to the same minister: when can we expect to see this new legislation passed?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Dreeshen: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Soon. I was pleased, actually, to see that the RCMP did charge these illegal activists that were involved in this situation.

Mr. Speaker, through you to these illegal activists when they go out and break the law: the RCMP will charge you, you will face jail time, and we will fine you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Banff-Kananaskis.

Ms Rosin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister. Given that it seems that protesters are feeling emboldened lately when it comes to demonstrating on and illegally occupying private property all the while slandering and spreading false narratives about innocent business owners and given that we cannot allow this trend among activists to continue into the new year and beyond, especially when these protesters target property owners that care for their animals and exceed excellence in industry standards, to the same minister: what is being done to put a final end to this brazen behaviour?

The Speaker: The hon. member and certainly the minister of agriculture will know that if there have been charges laid, there are certainly some rules around sub judice that you will want to be cautious with should you choose to respond.

The hon. Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Dreeshen: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. When it comes to the changes to the trespassing act, we will increase fines up to $10,000 for a first offence and up to $25,000 for subsequent offences and actually up to $200,000 for organizations and imprisonment of up to six months. When we're dealing with amendments to the Provincial Offences Procedure Act, we will increase the maximum amount of compensation that can be awarded by the courts from $25,000 to $100,000.

The Speaker: Hon. members, in 30 seconds or less we will proceed to the last members' statement. I know there's lots going on this afternoon. I'd encourage you to leave the Chamber expeditiously if you're needing to do so to get to other appointments.

Members' Statements

Medicine Hat

Mr. Barnes: Mr. Speaker, according to Colby Cosh, a journalist with the National Post, federal Conservatives need "an election strategy that will work in Skeena and Algoma, and perhaps gives . . . a little ground in Medicine Hat." I disagree.

The people of Medicine Hat are kind, charitable, and understand the importance of community. It is because of this generosity that Medicine Hat is the first city in Canada to eliminate homelessness. On top of this amazing accomplishment we are also leaders in energy, with a wind farm, 100 years of oil and gas exploration, while also serving as a training ground for hundreds of skilled energy workers. We also take pride in our fiscal responsibility and our respect for tax dollars. In fact, the Medicine Hat hospital is one of the very few hospitals in the province that manages to stay within budget year after year.

But if that wasn't enough, Medicine Hat could also be considered one of the friendliest cities in the world. It could have something to do with Medicine Hat being the sunniest city in Canada or perhaps be because of the beautiful scenery and landmarks like the world's tallest teepee. You could also look at the incredible talent, Mr. Speaker, that comes out of our city like Nobel prize winner Richard Edward Taylor or like Trevor Linden and Lanny McDonald, who played with the Medicine Hat Tigers. We also have incredibly talented performers like Terri Clark and MacKenzie Porter.

Again I would like to ask Mr. Cosh: what is it about Medicine Hat that wouldn't work somewhere else in Canada? We understand the importance of innovation and environmental leadership, we understand the importance of taking care of some of the more vulnerable in our communities, and we understand what it means to allow people to make decisions for themselves through low taxes.

Mr. Speaker, Medicine Hat is the best city in Canada, I would even say the world. Mr. Cosh, the Conservatives need to focus more on the leadership of such an amazing community, that truly represents the values of our great country.

Notices of Motions

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. At the appropriate time I'll table the requisite number of copies for Standing Order 42, urging the pressing matter of public interest in respect of the management and stewardship of records and correspondence regarding the Election Commissioner.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, just rising on Standing Order 7(8) to notify the Chamber that, if required, we will extend the Routine.

The Speaker: I appreciate the extension. Unfortunately, given the schedule, we're unable, but we may extend just a couple of moments to deal with some of the issues.

The hon. Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake and Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Dreeshen: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to provide notice that at an appropriate time I will be moving the following motion in accordance with Standing Order 42.

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government of Canada to take all steps necessary to convene the Parliament of Canada as soon as possible to introduce emergency legislation to compel Canadian National Railway employees to return to work in order to prevent the potentially devastating impact of a strike on Alberta's energy and agricultural sectors.

The Speaker: Thank you to the hon. minister of agriculture for that.

Also, Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview, it is appropriate for you to distribute those now, but we will deal with them at the appropriate time.

I'd also like to offer an apology to the hon. Government House Leader. In fact, Routine can be extended past 3 o'clock. I was confused by the unique situation of estimates.

Introduction of Bills

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General has the call.

Trespass Statutes (Protecting Law-abiding Property Owners) Amendment Act, 2019

Mr. Schweitzer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and given our time I'll make sure I'm very brief here today. I'm here to seek leave to introduce Bill 27, Trespass Statutes (Protecting Law-abiding Property Owners) Amendment Act, 2019.

This bill would amend the Limitations Act, Occupiers Liability Act, the Petty Trespass Act, the Trespass to Premises Act, and the Provincial Offences Procedure Act. If passed, the amendments will make sure that we protect property owners, Mr. Speaker, that property rights are respected in the province of Alberta. We heard this loud and clear on our rural crime tour, that we need to make sure that Albertans have the strongest possible property rights here in the province of Alberta. It's integral to make sure that property rights are respected, that landowners can feel safe in their homes knowing that law-abiding citizens are protected.

The Speaker: I thought you were going to be quick.

[Motion carried; Bill 27 read a first time]

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have the requisite number of copies of an open letter that was placed in the Edmonton Journal by 175 professional doctors in this province, titled Bill Removes Checks on Doctors Who Put Conscience Over Patients' Well-being. Maybe the committee should have extended the invite to a few more people.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have seven copies of letters from teachers within my constituency and in the area expressing their concerns about this government's intentions for the Alberta teachers' retirement fund and stating that they are not in support of the changes under Bill 22.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have the requisite number of copies of two tablings. The first are 24 letters from teachers who are deeply concerned about the situation in their classrooms. One cites: "Overcrowding is a serious concern. There is no more room in my class for [more] desks." There are 35 students in that junior high class today.

The other tablings are with regard to the heavy-handed, ham-fisted attempt to claw back the Alberta teachers' retirement pension after it being established as joint governance in 1939.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I have two tablings today. First, I would like to table a letter from the Election Commissioner in which he expresses his surprise and disappointment for the ending of his office, which he found out through the media yesterday at 3 p.m.

My second set of tablings, Mr. Speaker, is that I have the requisite number of copies of 34 separate letters from constituents of the fabulous constituency of Calgary-Mountain View who are concerned about the government taking over the ATRF and moving it into AIMCo.

The Speaker: Are there any other tablings? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today I table the requisite copies of a letter from Craig Lukinuk, reeve of Smoky Lake county, in support of the interprovincial nomination of the North Saskatchewan River for the Canadian heritage rivers system. As he says, "We [must] safeguard the future of our North Saskatchewan River environment for the use, benefit, and enjoyment of future generations."

The Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have 53 letters from all over Alberta, actually – from Edson, Coronation, Medicine Hat, Calgary, Lethbridge, Red Deer, Edmonton, and St. Albert – regarding the cutting of AISH. The government likes to call it deindexing.

My second tabling. I spent some time in estimates this morning. It seems the minister isn't aware of what's on his government's website about climate change, so I thought I would table five copies of that as well.

The Speaker: Are there other tablings? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore. Oh, sorry. I've already done that three times. That's how much I love Decore. The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to table the requisite number of copies of seven letters sent to my office and other MLA offices on the opposition side from current and alumni members of the rapattack firefighting crews, who express devastation and their large concern that their positions have been cut, to the detriment of our ability to properly fight forest fires in this province. They're very, very concerned that we're going to have significant problems and losses as a result.

The Speaker: Are there others?

Seeing none, I have two tablings today. The first is the six requisite copies of the annual report for the office of the Information and Privacy Commissioner for the period April 1, 2018, to March 31, 2019.

Secondly, I have six copies of the annual report for the office of the Ethics Commissioner for the period April 1, 2018, to March 31, 2019.

Hon. members, we are at points of order. The hon. Member for Calgary-West made two points of order, that have subsequently been withdrawn. But at 2:22 the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction raised a point of order. It appears that it's going to be debated by the hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika.

Point of Order Parliamentary Language

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. At the time of 2:22 the Member for Edmonton-North West said to the Minister of Finance while he was speaking: you're stealing money. I believe this is a point of order under 23(h), (i), (j), specifically (i). This would be "imputes false or unavowed motives to another Member." I ask him to apologize and withdraw.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, I do withdraw the fact that I did say: "Stealing money." What I meant to say was: taking the pensions without the teachers' permission.

The Speaker: I consider that issue dealt with and concluded.

Motions under Standing Order 42

The Speaker: The issue has been raised by both the hon. the Official Opposition House Leader – and I'll go to him in mere moments – and then followed by the hon. minister of agriculture.

First, with respect to the Official Opposition House Leader's motion under Standing Order 42, I'd just provide a few comments. In the form that it's proposed, the motion resembles more of a request for emergency debate under Standing Order 30 as opposed to a substantive motion. I'd encourage all members, if they wish to move a motion, to please feel free to reach out to Parliamentary Counsel in advance. They are more than happy to ensure that it is in its proper form. But that doesn't prevent us from proceeding this afternoon. Despite this deficiency in the form, I'm happy to have the hon. Official Opposition House Leader move his arguments.

Just before that, though, I'd like to provide an outline with respect to the procedure. If unanimous consent is granted, because we are currently in estimates and the estimates vote is this evening, Standing Order 59.01(5)(b) requires that the Assembly stand adjourned this afternoon upon the completion of the daily Routine to allow for consideration of estimates in committee, and Standing Order 59.03(1) requires the vote for the Committee of Supply on main estimates later this evening. Should unanimous consent be granted to proceed with the motions by the Official Opposition House Leader or the hon. Minister of Agriculture and Forestry, that debate will be postponed until this evening following the scheduled vote in Committee of Supply and the introduction of the appropriation bill. I trust this clarifies our procedure moving forward over the next few minutes.

I will caution both members. This is not an opportunity to debate substantively your request but merely to provide the notice and to let us know why consent should be granted.

The hon. the Official Opposition House Leader.

Election Commissioner's Office Records Management

Mr. Bilous:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly consider pursuant to Standing Order 42 the urgent and pressing matter of the preservation of the public interest with respect to the management and stewardship of records or correspondence pertaining to ongoing investigations currently being undertaken by the Election Commissioner.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I can tell you that the government served notice of a large volume of comprehensive changes yesterday. I'm sure you can understand that it's taking our caucus some time to digest these sweeping implications.

Today I'd like to provide a brief rationale for the need for this House to focus on the immediate practical implications of government legislation and how it affects the ongoing operations and investigations of the office of the Election Commissioner. I know and understand that there will be a more appropriate time to raise the particulars of Bill 22. I'm not here to speak to the legislation itself but, rather, an urgent problem that the active introducing of the provisions of the bill into the public record creates for an office of this Legislature. Commissioner Gibson is a dedicated and distinguished public servant. I have every expectation that he'll conduct himself with integrity even in these challenging circumstances.

That said, the tabling of Bill 22 creates an immediate and pressing concern with respect to the management and stewardship of records in the keeping of the office of the commissioner. This House must defend the public interest, Mr. Speaker. We have a duty to ensure that those records are secured and not subject to inappropriate access or destruction while their fate is before this House. That work must occur immediately, and it is the responsibility of this Assembly to ensure that the records of the Election Commissioner are secured while the House debates this bill.

Thank you.

[Unanimous consent denied]

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Agriculture and Forestry has the call.

CN Rail Strike

Mr. Dreesen:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government of Canada to take all steps necessary to convene the Parliament of Canada as soon as possible to introduce emergency legislation to compel Canadian National Railway employees to return to work in order to prevent the potentially devastating impact of a strike on Alberta's energy and agriculture sectors.

Mr. Dreesen: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I rise to ask this Chamber to give unanimous consent for another very important issue that came up in question period again today, something that affects our agriculture and forestry sectors, our energy sector, and pretty much anything that goes on rail. We do so much exporting here in the province of Alberta, in the billions of dollars – $12 billion in exports in agriculture, $4 billion in forestry – and it's frustrating to see that a potential rail strike by CN would have devastating impacts to our major economic drivers in the province of Alberta.

So I'm urging for the unanimous consent of my colleagues here in the Chamber to be able to send a strong message to the federal government that we do need to stand together to make sure that our economic drivers in the province of Alberta are allowed to function. Thank you.

[Unanimous consent denied]

The Speaker: Hon. members, the daily Routine has now concluded. Pursuant to Standing Order 59.01(5)(b) the House stands adjourned until 7:30 p.m.

The legislative policy committees will convene this afternoon for consideration of the main estimates. This afternoon the Standing Committee on Resource Stewardship will consider the estimates for the Ministry of Energy in the Rocky Mountain Room, and the Standing Committee on Families and Communities will consider the estimates for the Ministry of Service Alberta in the Parkland Room.

Hon. members, the House stands adjourned.

[The Assembly adjourned at 3:03 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

7:30 p.m.

Tuesday, November 19, 2019

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

The Deputy Speaker: Good evening, everyone. Please be seated.

Committee of Supply

[Mrs. Pitt in the chair]

The Chair: Hon. members, I would like to call the committee to order.

Prior to beginning, the chair will outline the process for this evening. The Committee of Supply will first call on the chairs of the legislative policy committees to report on their meetings with the various ministries under their mandate. No vote is required when these reports are presented according to Standing Order 59.01(10).

The committee will then proceed to the vote on the estimates of the offices of the Legislative Assembly. The vote on the main estimates will then take place.

Finally, the chair would like to remind all hon. members of Standing Order 32(3), which provides that “after the first division is called... [in] Committee of Supply, the interval between division bells... shall be reduced to one minute” for any subsequent divisions.

Committee Reports

The Chair: I would now invite the chair of the Standing Committee on Alberta’s Economic Future to present the committee’s report.

Mr. van Dijken: Thank you, Madam Chair. As chair of the Standing Committee on Alberta’s Economic Future and pursuant to Standing Order 59.01(10) I am pleased to report that the committee has reviewed the 2019-20 proposed estimates and business plans for the following ministries: Ministry of Advanced Education; Ministry of Culture, Multiculturalism and Status of Women; Ministry of Economic Development, Trade and Tourism; Ministry of Executive Council, Ministry of Infrastructure; and Ministry of Labour and Immigration.

Thank you.

The Chair: Thank you.

I would now call on the deputy chair of the Standing Committee on Families and Communities to present the committee’s report.

Ms Sigurdson: Madam Chair, as deputy chair of the Standing Committee on Families and Communities and pursuant to Standing Order 59.01(10) I am pleased to report that the committee has reviewed the 2019-20 proposed estimates and business plans for the following ministries: Ministry of Children’s Services, Ministry of Community and Social Services, Ministry of Education, Ministry of Health, Ministry of Justice and Solicitor General, Ministry of Seniors and Housing, Ministry of Service Alberta.

Thank you.

The Chair: Thank you.

And now the chair of the Standing Committee on Resource Stewardship.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. As chair of the Standing Committee on Resource Stewardship and pursuant to Standing Order 59.01(10) I am pleased to report that the committee has reviewed the 2019-20 proposed estimates and business plans for the following ministries: Ministry of Agriculture and Forestry, Ministry of Energy, Ministry of Environment and Parks, Ministry of Indigenous Relations, Ministry of Municipal Affairs, Ministry of Transportation, and Ministry of Treasury Board and Finance.

Thank you very much.

The Chair: Thank you.

Vote on Main Estimates 2019-20

The Chair: We shall now proceed to the vote on the 2019-20 offices of the Legislative Assembly estimates, general revenue fund. Pursuant to Standing Order 59.03(5), which requires that these estimates be decided without debate or amendment prior to the vote on the main estimates, I must now put the following question on all matters relating to the 2019-20 offices of the Legislative Assembly estimates, general revenue fund, for the fiscal year ending March 31, 2020.

Agreed to:

Offices of the Legislative Assembly	$159,915,000
-------------------------------------	---------------

The Chair: Shall the vote be reported? Are you agreed?

Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chair: Any opposed? Carried.

We shall now proceed to the final vote on the main estimates on all matters relating to the 2019-20 government estimates for the general revenue fund for the fiscal year ending March 31, 2020. All those in favour, please say aye.

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Chair: Any opposed? Carried.

Shall the vote be reported? Are you agreed?

Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chair: Any opposed? Carried.

I would now invite the hon. Government House Leader to move that the committee rise and report the 2019-20 offices of the Legislative Assembly estimates and the 2019-20 government estimates for the general revenue fund.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. I move that the committee rise and report the 2019-20 offices of the Legislative Assembly estimates and the 2019-20 government estimates for the general revenue fund.

[Motion carried]

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, the Committee of Supply has had under consideration certain resolutions relating to the 2019-2020 offices of the Legislative Assembly estimates and the 2019-2020 government estimates for the general revenue fund, reports as follows, and requests leave to sit again.

The Deputy Speaker: I would now like to alert hon. members that pursuant to Standing Order 59.03(7) following the Committee of Supply's report on the main estimates, the Assembly immediately reverts to Introduction of Bills for the introduction of the appropriation bill.

Introduction of Bills

Appropriation Act, 2019

Mr. Toews: Madam Speaker, I request leave to introduce Bill 24, Appropriation Act, 2019. This being a money bill, Her Honour the Honourable the Lieutenant Governor, having been informed of the contents of the bill, recommends the same to the Assembly.

[Motion carried; Bill 24 read a first time]

Government Bills and Orders

Second Reading

Bill 22

Reform of Agencies, Boards and Commissions and Government Enterprises Act, 2019

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I'd like to speak to the last of the three pieces of budget implementation legislation, Bill 22, Reform of Agencies, Boards and Commissions and Government Enterprises Act, 2019. This bill deals primarily with Alberta's agencies, boards, and commissions. As I did with the other budget implementation bills, I begin with changes in my own ministry, Treasury Board and Finance. Bill 22 proposes a number of changes that will enable the Alberta Investment Management Corporation, better known as AIMCo, to deliver even better results on behalf of all Albertans. AIMCo currently manages an investment portfolio of approximately $110 billion. This is public money. It includes Alberta government funds and endowments as well as most of Alberta's public-sector pension plans.

First, the legislation would require the Alberta teachers' retirement fund, or ATRF, to use AIMCo as its investment manager. The ATRF currently holds approximately $17 billion in assets that are managed and administered directly by the ATRF board. I want to emphasize that investing these assets with AIMCo will not impact teachers' pension benefits, and it will not affect the ATRF board's control of the plan. The ATRF board of trustees would still set investment policy and guidelines while AIMCo would be responsible for day-to-day investment decisions within the parameters set by the board.

Second, Bill 22 will require the Workers' Compensation Board, or WCB, and Alberta Health Services, AHS, to use AIMCo to manage their long-term investments. AIMCo would manage approximately $10.7 billion on behalf of the WCB. These funds would continue to be used exclusively for injured workers, and there will be no changes to workers' compensation benefits because of this bill. For AHS, AIMCo would manage approximately $2.3 billion of investments. Again, this change is only about the management of investments in the fund. AHS will still have full discretion of how they use their invested funds, and health outcomes would not be impacted because of this proposed change.

Finally, Bill 22 would also remove the option in the Joint Governance of Public Sector Pension Plans Act for various pension plans to use fund managers other than AIMCo. This applies to Alberta pension services; the local authorities pension plan, also known as LAPP; the public service pension plan, known as PSPP; and the special forces pension plan, known as SFPP. These funds are already managed by AIMCo, and altogether these changes would add around $30 billion to AIMCo's investment portfolio.

A larger pool of investments would allow AIMCo to realize greater economies of scale, increasing the returns and lowering administrative costs on a range of public investments. Ultimately, consolidating pensions, funds, and endowments under AIMCo's management reflects our commitment to make government more efficient.

Bill 22 also proposes changes to the LAPP, PSPP, and SFPP to ensure that these pension plans follow industry best practices. These changes include requiring board appointments based on competency as well as representation and reinstates the Auditor General as the auditor for these pension plans.

Next, the bill will amend the ATB Financial Act to include a statement of ATB's financial mandate. As a provincially owned institution ATB needs to deliver the best possible value on behalf of taxpayers. Through Bill 22 ATB Financial would be mandated to manage its business in a commercial and cost-effective manner, turning risk adjusted rates of return that are similar or better than returns of comparable financial institutions in both the short term and long term and to avoid undue risk of loss by prudently managing its business, which includes establishing and implementing relevant plans, policies, standards, and procedures. These changes would improve ATB Financial's strategic alignment with the government's fiscal priorities.

Lastly, for Treasury Board and Finance we would dissolve the Alberta Capital Finance Authority. This group was responsible for granting and administering loans to local authorities. With its dissolution these responsibilities would be transferred directly to the Ministry of Treasury Board and Finance, which will continue to provide low-cost loans to local authorities. The function of the Alberta Capital Finance Authority will continue uninterrupted, but we would achieve savings and reduce financial risks by bringing this program directly into government.

Next, I will discuss changes in the Ministry of Justice and Solicitor General that return powers to the Chief Electoral Officer as they existed prior to the previous government's 2018 changes. This does not eliminate the Election Commissioner role but simply consolidates functions under the overall authority of the nonpartisan Chief Electoral Officer. The reunion of these two roles in a single independent office will bring Alberta back in line with the model used in Alberta until 2018 and used in every other province. This reconsolidation of the office of the Election Commissioner into the office of the Chief Electoral Officer is an administrative measure intended to eliminate redundancy and streamline the function and the operation and implementation of Alberta's election legislation.

Moving on to Culture, Multiculturalism and Status of Women, Bill 22 would dissolve two boards and one fund. First, the Alberta Sport Connection and its board would be dissolved. Programs offered by the Alberta Sport Connection would be incorporated into services offered by the ministry. Moving the Alberta Sport Connection programs into the ministry would better leverage existing government resources, thereby cutting costs and reducing red tape. Government's previous funding commitments to the 2020 Alberta Winter Games in Airdrie, the 2020 Alberta Summer Games in Lethbridge, and the 2022 Arctic Winter Games in the regional municipality of Wood Buffalo would remain unchanged.

Next, we would dissolve the Alberta Historical Resources Foundation along with the historic resources fund. No programs will be affected as we would move the services and funding into the ministry. Owners of designated historic resources would still be able to apply for heritage grants through the same channels. This change would save an estimated $200,000 annually.

One change we would make in Health is streamlining how the mental health review panel operates. Bill 22 proposes changing the panel size from four to three. It would also allow reviews to be conducted by video conference. Alberta is one of the only Canadian jurisdictions that requires four members for a panel hearing. The three-person panel will still have a registered psychiatrist to ensure the best possible medical advice. These changes would improve services for patients by streamlining the process and reducing unnecessary administration.

Moving on to Economic Development, Trade and Tourism, Bill 22 would dissolve the Alberta Competitiveness Council and repeal the Alberta Competitiveness Act. The council has been inactive since 2011 and does not have a CEO or any employees. The proposed change is in line with government's review of public agencies to reduce waste, duplication, and nonessential spending.

Next, we are proposing two ways for Economic Development, Trade and Tourism boards to run more efficiently. Bill 22 would remove the requirement for a minimum of eight members on the Northern Alberta Development Council and reduce the maximum number of members from 10 to seven. Second, we would bring the same change to Travel Alberta's board: eliminate the minimum requirement of seven board members and reduce the overall maximum membership. A smaller board is more cost-effective and can be run more efficiently.

8:10

As part of this bill we will also be dissolving the Social Care Facilities Review Committee, which has been inactive for more than three years and has no current membership. Through strict licensing and service standards our government already ensures that facilities serving vulnerable Albertans offer high-quality care. By dissolving this inactive committee, we are reducing duplication so that we can continue to focus resources on the front-line services Albertans rely on.

Lastly, we would dissolve the Campus Alberta Strategic Directions Committee. This committee was established by the Post-secondary Learning Act to provide advice to the minister respecting issues related to Campus Alberta. However, it's been inactive for nearly four years and does not have any appointed members. The Minister of Advanced Education continues to convene regular meetings with postsecondary board chairs.

Madam Speaker, those are the changes being proposed in the Reform of Agencies, Boards and Commissions and Government Enterprises Act, 2019. I appreciate the House's time and attention to all of these complex pieces of legislation. Our fiscal situation is challenging, but we've identified immediate changes that can help get us back on track. We're doing this all transparently and with respect for Alberta's taxpayers.

With that, Madam Speaker, I move second reading of Bill 22.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I'm very pleased to rise to speak against Bill 22. Certainly, we have seen this NDP opposition take a very principled stand against this bill that proposes an unlawful action, an act of self-dealing, and ultimately, the obstruction of justice through firing the Election Commissioner.

Now, we have already heard from the Leader of the Official Opposition, and we have heard from many of our caucus members that we oppose Bill 22. We do so because our leader has set the example. She has the distinction of being the longest serving member of this House. She is the longest serving member of this House because she has never given up, because she will always lead her caucus to stand up to the powerful, because she expects her caucus to rise to the same level of integrity that she has set for us, because she believes that Alberta can be better than this, which is an affront to the rule of law. She believes that we are better than this. She has led her caucus to oppose this bill because Grant Notley raised her to, and I only hope to raise my own children with the bravery and honesty that Grant Notley raised his own kids.

The NDP opposition opposes this bill because the foundation of a democracy is the rule of law and that the law applies to everyone and that laws get made out of the consent of the governed via the outcome of free and fair elections.

Now, the Member for Edmonton-Strathcona's first act when she was elected as head of Executive Council was to begin the restoration of democracy after 44 years ended in rot and entitlement. Her first bill was to begin to clean that up. Why did we do that? Because of the 2015 election campaign. The prelude to it was shady nomination races. The prelude to it was the firing of an Election Commissioner, the elections officer, the very one that this government is now going back to those PC days to fire. We had partisan returning officers in our past. That's what you got when you lost a nomination race; you got to run the election.

It was always clear that we had to do more to clean up elections, particularly after this very same elections officer, an officer of the Legislature, was fired by the PC government. Why? He issued a report on illegal campaign contributions. Alberta Justice didn't prosecute a single one. He found nine cases. He made 100 recommendations, including – get this – regulating leadership contests. For this he was fired by the Conservatives, and he had to go to court to get his severance. The same guy, as it turns out.

So we knew that there were Conservatives who wanted to flout the laws. There was a long history of this in Alberta, and that is why – that is why – the officer running an election was split from the person receiving complaints and following up on those complaints so that we could uphold the rule of law and ensure free and fair elections in this province. Since that time the Election Commissioner has entertained over 800 complaints. This has been a busy man. He is not twiddling his thumbs over there as an officer of the Legislature: 800 complaints.

Why do we care? Well, we care because he has before him an active investigation. Let's talk about what that active investigation entails. On July 19, 2017, a fellow named Jeff Callaway met with the Premier of this province and his campaign manager to discuss the leadership race. Weissenberger admitted the meeting happened. Then Mr. Callaway collects $60,000 in unexplained donations that were wired into an RBC bank account and then furnished to other people to make unlawful contributions. It is an offence to furnish money to someone else to make donations, yet this happened, and it happened with the knowledge of at least the Premier's director of issues management. We know this because the courts have told us this through documents.

When does the Election Commissioner first come onto our radar? Well, it's on January 27, 2019. He confirms that the office is looking into the UCP leadership race, and here's his first utterance to the media. He is concerned about obstructions to the investigation where someone has attempted to, quote, dissuade co-operation with investigators and hinder the proper disposition of matters. I wonder who that could be.

Then Cam Davies is issued a $15,000 fine. Karen Brown is issued a $3,500 fine. Darcy McAllister is fined $8,000. Lenore Eaton has been told that she may serve up to two years in jail. Happy Mann is fined $9,000. Then, after all these fines, what happens? Jeff Callaway files a lawsuit against the Election Commissioner, trying to obstruct his work – we have a long history of this – seeking an injunction to halt the investigation into his campaign. Now, who would do that? Who indeed? The current principal adviser to the Health minister, Ivan Bernardo, tells the media that he is in fact the person who is acting for the clients to stop the Election Commissioner's work from moving on. Bernardo suggests that the Election Commissioner should pause the investigation. Well, we're doing more than a pause now, so I guess Bernardo got his way.

Then Jeff Park is fined $7,000. Amy Davies is fined $3,000. Lenore Eaton is fined $7,600. Christopher Maitland is fined $4,500. Christopher Scaee is fined $1,750. Randy Kerr is fined $10,000. Darren Thompson is fined $5,250. Jennifer Thompson is fined $3,900. Jeff Callaway is fined another $70,000. Well, it's a good thing Bernardo got a job with the Health minister because he sure wasn't a very good lawyer. On July 30 the Court of Queen's Bench rules that the Election Commissioner was the successful party on the application and is entitled to an award of costs. So it's good that he got a nice, juicy appointment with Executive Council after his work because he sure didn't shine as a lawyer on this file. Now they've applied to the Court of Queen's Bench for a judicial review. Of course, they've lost Bernardo, but they'd better call Saul because now they've got Jonathan Denis on the file. That is fantastic.

Well, why do we care? We know that the Premier orchestrated this unlawful campaign. We know that there have been consequences levied by this Election Commissioner. We know that people close to the Premier have already attempted to obstruct this investigation.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Point of order.

The Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader has called a point of order.

Point of Order Allegations against a Member

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 23(h), (i), and (j). The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West just accused the Premier of conducting an illegal campaign, accused the Premier of Alberta of doing illegal actions. The facts are that in no way is that true. The hon. member cannot accuse a sitting member of this Legislature of conducting illegal acts. It's not factual, and it certainly is going to cause disorder in the House. It is accusing an hon. member of this place of something that is just not true.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I think that in context of what was being said, I understand this to have been a reference to allegations which have been made, fines which have been levied in multiple instances. Certainly, those allegations were made about a leadership race in which the Premier was a contestant. I understand the hon. member to have been speaking directly about those things. In many cases those fines have been levied, so I would say that those allegations have been in some instances proven. Certainly, in some instances there's evidence. I would say, overall, that this is a matter of debate, but I would respect it if you were to caution us to indicate that that was an alleged action as opposed to . . .

The Speaker: I'm prepared to rule. I can't imagine that you would provide any context that would be of assistance to me, but it is, of course, your right to provide additional comments.

I agree with the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View that caution is necessary, particularly around what is going to be a very sensitive evening, just my speculation, when making allegations about what members of the House have or have not done. Certainly, the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West referred to a number of reports that are factual. I also would agree with the Government House Leader that there have been no fines levied, so as such making an allegation about what the Premier has or hasn't done will require some delicacy. I encourage the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West to be cautious with the words that she uses around making allegations about any member of this Assembly.

Debate Continued

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yes, I ought to have said "alleged." Much to Hansard's dismay, I speak too fast, and I spoke too fast over my notes. So thank you.

Back to the point, we know that people close to the Premier have already attempted to stop this investigation. We know that they're appealing the fines, and there are tens of thousands of dollars at stake. We know, in fact, that there is $211,000 at stake. There are a number of people who haven't paid their fines yet. So what happens when these investigations are dropped? Their friends don't have to pay their fines anymore.

We also know that there are a number of members of this government that are implicated in these investigations. We know that the MLA for Calgary-East has been interviewed, the MLA for Calgary-Elbow and Minister of Justice has been interviewed, and the MLA for Calgary-Edgemont and Minister of Infrastructure has been interviewed. The MLA for Chestermere-Strathmore and Minister of Culture, Multiculturalism and Status of Women, the MLA for Calgary-Beddington and Minister of Seniors and Housing, the MLA for Calgary-Foothills and Associate Minister of Mental Health Addictions, the MLA for Cardston-Siksika, and the MLA for Sherwood Park have all been interviewed in this investigation that they are now seeking to undermine by firing the Election Commissioner.

Mostly, what we know about this is that it is clear that this government is willing to take the hit on firing the Election Commissioner – the public opinion hit, the bad headlines; the reviews are in, and people are not happy – because clearly the alternative is much worse. We don't know yet what that is, but it has to be.

Now, I hope that the members across the way take a moment of pause. Not all of the members are caught up in this web, yet they will have to go home and answer questions as to whether they, too, are brazen. They are associated with a strongman; they are turfing the watchdog; they are politically interfering in the work of the Election Commissioner: those are just the last 24 hours of headlines, Mr. Speaker. They will have to answer questions from their own constituents.

They will get wrapped up in this even if they had nothing to do with it. Was it worth it? Is it worth it? Perhaps just speak up at the next emergency caucus meeting on Bill 22. Perhaps just speak out and say: no; let's press pause on firing the Election Commissioner because it is an affront to the rule of law. Caucus members would be heroes with the people if they did it. We'll see if anyone has the courage to do so.

Mr. Speaker, the public, certainly, and our own constituents will learn how much the NDP caucus cares about democracy in the coming days. They'll learn about how much we care about the rule of law and the integrity of elections. We will use every tool available to us to stop this. This is an odious attempt to undermine lawful election processes. This is an affront to who we are as Canadians. This posits that if you want to skirt the rules on leadership campaigns, you can absolutely do so because we'll just fire the guy that is investigating you after the fact.

Now, here's one of the reasons why we care so much about this. Here's the difference between folks who will just do politics because they have some sort of venal streak in them of a win at all cost sort of mentality. Here's the difference. Here's why we care so much about the integrity of elections and the rule of law in elections. Every vote matters. We all know that when we're out campaigning. Why does every vote matter? Because every person matters. Every person matters. On this side of the House it doesn't matter who you are; you will follow the law. On this side of the House it doesn't matter who you are; your X means the same thing in that secret ballot box. It doesn't matter who you are; you should not be able to buy yourself an election or favours or freedom from consequences, which is what we see with this bill. We will defend that principle of equality, the rule of law, and an election that reflects the will of the people, where no one is above due process. That is the approach of this NDP caucus to Bill 22, Mr. Speaker.

Now, it's very clear to me that some of the commentators who have indicated that the UCP believes it is immune to political fallout are hitting a nerve there. They do in fact believe they are immune to it. They do in fact believe they get a free pass because they won an election. Well, that's not how it works. No one is above the law. No one gets to skirt election rules. No one gets to break those rules, make illegal contributions, or derive a benefit, a tax benefit even, from making donations of funds that were given to them.

Now, Bill 22 is about much more than this. You know, the Finance minister earlier tried to make it sound really boring because there were a whole bunch of other things in it, just sort of skimming over the fact that it is a direct attack on the rule of law and an ongoing investigation and an open door to destruction of evidence, to stopping all of these thousands of dollars' worth of fines, to simply stonewalling anyone from getting to the truth. I think that Albertans are not having it. Albertans are very keen watchers of governments that treat them with arrogance and entitlement, and they can change their minds quite quickly, in my experience, when they see the footprints of arrogance and entitlement and hubris.

You know, the Government House Leader and Minister of Environment and Parks is laughing because he's arrogant, I guess. I don't know. I don't know why he's laughing, if he thinks it's fun.

Mr. Schow: Point of order.

The Speaker: Hon. members, a point of order has been called by the hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika.

Point of Order Imputing Motives

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, I rise under 23(h), (i), and (j), imputing false motives. You know, throwing shots at the Government House Leader, Sundre's favourite son, is just inappropriate in this Chamber. It's causing disorder. I recognize that this is a bit of a heated discussion tonight. That's maybe a bit of an understatement. I would encourage the Member for Lethbridge-West to maybe retract her remarks and apologize.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View, keeping in mind that the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West did say that the hon. Government House Leader is arrogant.

Ms Ganley: I think what she said was: "He's arrogant, [perhaps] . . . I don't know why he's laughing." I mean, it has a certain amount of subtext to it. I think that perhaps we can all move on from this one, knowing that the hon. member will not do it again.

The Speaker: I think that the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West will recognize that the Speaker is providing a significant swath here this evening given that when we say that a member is arrogant, even if we provide a qualifier, it's quite likely unparliamentary. But we'll provide an additional caution to her, keeping in mind that this is now the second in less than 20 minutes. I hope that she will revise her definition of what caution is.

The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Sure. Well, I was talking about, Mr. Speaker, Albertans' limited patience with arrogance, entitlement, and hubris. I'd like to read into the record some observations around this matter from a piece posted earlier this evening in Maclean's magazine.

It harkens back to the dismissive shrug with which United Conservatives greeted the scandalous revelations that came out about them during the provincial campaign . . . "Voters don't care about that stuff," Conservatives told me repeatedly last spring.

In a budget omnibus bill, United Conservatives will fold the election commissioner's office into Elections Alberta, effectively terminating [him] when the bill passes. This . . . does create uncertainty around the future of Callaway's court challenge . . . [The Premier's] allies say the investigations can all proceed . . .

. . . It's also true that if Donald Trump had the chutzpah to fire special prosecutor Robert Mueller, his probe would have . . . continued under somebody else's guidance.

But would it have had the same weight?

Yes, jobs are still scarce, Trans Mountain pipeline construction is in its still-uncertain infancy . . . But if Albertans give [the Premier] a pass on this strongman maneuver, they've signalled that he can get away with pretty much anything.

A strongman manoeuvre. I wouldn't want in a democracy to be part of a party that was led by what was referred to as a strongman manoeuvre. That's really not what anybody got elected for, and I know many of the members in this House deplore a strongman in other parts of the world. We were at the Holodomor memorial today. We have deplored some of the actions that we have seen in Hong Kong. We have deplored, certainly, the invasion by a strongman. We have deplored the invasion of Turkey into northern Syria and what has happened to the Kurds: strongman manoeuvres. I don't think that anyone wants to be associated with that kind of language, yet those are the reviews for Bill 22. Strongman: there's a real connotation to that word that I don't believe we want to be part of.

Now, the Election Commissioner himself was rather surprised at this development. He learned of his dismissal, his firing, by way of the media yesterday. You know, it wasn't a tweet, like people get fired south of the border, but it was close. He was "concerned about the potential negative impacts on the independence of election administration and the real and perceived integrity of the election process." Well, that is not a ringing endorsement. That is not, Mr. Speaker, any kind of corroboration for the claim – the claim – for which the government has provided no evidence, that this is something that will simply reduce redundancy. This, in fact, doesn't show any of that good faith, when he learned of it in the media. He also details how many complaints he got and how needed his role is.

At the end of the day, Mr. Speaker, we deplore this bill. We deplore its attacks on pensions and other initiatives as well, but I think that what Albertans are about to see is the fact that the NDP caucus will stand up for their democracy, for principles, for integrity in the face of anyone or any action like this that seeks to undermine it and undermine the rule of law.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: I appreciate the hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre; however, I have a list rolling, so we'll go back to the government side, and then we'll return to the opposition side.

Standing Order 29(2)(a) is not yet available, so as such, the hon. the Government House Leader, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, for an opportunity to rise in regard to Bill 22. Several parts of Bill 22 are worth discussing this evening. I'm sure several of my colleagues will rise in short order to discuss several important components of Bill 22 and why it's an important piece of legislation and why it deserves the support of all members of this Chamber as it works through the Chamber. I only rise today to respond primarily to some of the misrepresentation of facts that continue to be presented by the opposition, from the NDP, in regard to this important piece of legislation.

The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West just went through a rather lengthy tirade of not very factual statements, Mr. Speaker. She stated – and I want to unpack some of this for the members of the Chamber – that investigations would stop, stated that investigations somehow would not go forward, and the hon. member knows full well that that is not the case. The hon. member knows full well that investigations will remain and take place through the Chief Electoral Officer and the Election Commissioner office, which will work with the Chief Electoral Officer and continue with any investigations that take place, in fact, moving the investigative process even further away from a political body because currently the Election Commissioner reports to this Chamber through the Standing Committee on Legislative Offices.

The Election Commissioner will now report to the CEO of Elections Alberta and will continue any investigations – that's a fact – as they have for over 100 years in this province, until the NDP moved forward with their changes to change our system, different than any other system in the entire country under their mandate, Mr. Speaker, at which time, certainly, the legacy members of the current government caucus who were in opposition fought against because they thought that it was the wrong process for our province. In fact, the Government House Leader of the day, Brian Mason, our former colleague – and I hope he's enjoying his time in his vineyard in Kelowna in the Okanagan there tonight – had to move time allocation and closure to be able to get that through because the opposition of the day certainly was very, very clear that they disagreed with breaking the election system into two in our province.

The person who provided some of that advice, interestingly enough, some of the information that we determined that it made no sense to break apart the management of our election system and the policing of our election system, was actually the current Election Commissioner, who, in a white paper that he provided to the Northwest Territories government, I believe in 2016, Mr. Speaker – I referred to it in question period today – made it clear within that white paper that separating the election system into two separate organizations and not having it run as one was probably ineffective, certainly not cost-effective, and took the organization in two different directions where it wasn't working together. This bill simply does this.

The second thing that the hon. member said seemed to be implying that fines that were already issued by the Election Commissioner would somehow not have to be paid or would go away. That, Mr. Speaker, I want to again reiterate, is not factual. Again, the NDP has trouble with facts occasionally – I do know that – but in this case they're definitely not being factual. Fines have been issued. The Election Commissioner's office remains in place, will continue to do its work, just now in partnership and back with the Chief Electoral Officer and Elections Alberta, which, again, has been there for a hundred years.

The fake outrage from the NDP is certainly ridiculous. I did enjoy a little bit of time to have the opportunity to be able to call back home to a few people over the supper break and spend a little bit of time explaining to them what was taking place in the Legislature today, and I can tell you that the majority of people that you talk to in Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre are just tired of the NDP's fake outrage. They were tired of it in the last election, which is why in my constituency they got something like 7 or 8 per cent of the vote and the United Conservative Party was about 82 per cent. I recognize that west-central Alberta is not the traditional heartland for the NDP, to be fair. I don't know if the NDP has ever broken 10 per cent in Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre. It's not a place they spend a lot of time campaigning.

But I can tell you that on coffee row in Sundre, Rocky Mountain House, and Rimbey they're just shaking their heads about the NDP continuing their tactics of fear and smear, continuing to come into the Chamber and say that the Election Commissioner office won't exist when it will, continuing to say that investigations won't take place when they will, continuing to say that there'll be political interference in investigations, Mr. Speaker, when we know that the system will still remain under the care of an independent officer of the Legislature who reports to this Chamber, an independent officer, by the way, who was last appointed when the NDP was in power in this place. In my experience as a member of this Chamber, Mr. Resler, the Chief Electoral Officer of Alberta, has always acted in a nonpartisan way and has done an excellent job in his capacity as the Chief Electoral Officer. I am not aware of any concerns from the Standing Committee on Legislative Offices or from this Chamber in regard to his performance and any reason why we should in any way question his credibility or his ability to be able to make sure that investigations go forward.

The last comments that I would like to talk about are in regard to some of the unfortunate comments that Member for Lethbridge-

West made in regard to the hon. the Premier of Alberta, indicating that he is under investigation by Elections Alberta. At no time have I seen anything that indicates that the Premier of Alberta is under investigation from Elections Alberta. I do certainly acknowledge that Mr. Callaway's campaign appears to have been under a lengthy investigation by Elections Alberta. Again, if any member of this Chamber, including the Premier, is under investigation by Elections Alberta, those investigations will be protected within the legislation that the hon. the Finance minister has brought forward to this place.

But to stand up inside this place and indicate that an individual of this House is under investigation when they don't know that is appalling, Mr. Speaker, and not becoming of any member of this Chamber. The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West then went on to name individual cabinet ministers, including the Minister of Justice and others – I didn't write them all down as she was saying them – and then indicated that because they had responded to interviews, being requested to – in those interviews they were told that they were not under investigation, clearly told that they were not under investigation and were happy to be able to provide any information that they may have been able to provide. I was not in those interviews, obviously, but I do know that those members were told that they were not under investigation. But then they have to come to this Chamber, where they represent their constituents, and hear from the Member for Lethbridge-West accusing them of being under investigation even after they had been told that they were not under investigation: again, very unbecoming of a member of this Chamber and very disappointing.

But it goes to the credibility of the NDP when they continue to misrepresent facts to Albertans each and every day, stating things like, "Investigations will not be protected" or "The Election Commissioner office will not exist" or "This will now be run by political offices, not by independent officers." Mr. Speaker, Albertans lose faith each and every day in their Official Opposition, and one great example of that is this: as you look at the coverage – the Member for Lethbridge-West referred to coverage this evening – you see over and over the Official Opposition referring and stating, outright stating, that closure and time allocation has been moved on this legislation already and that there will only be three hours of debate on this legislation, which is not factual.

In fact, I happen to know that unless the NDP intends to allow us to have the vote on this sometime before midnight tonight, I can tell you as the Government House Leader that I intend to keep us debating on Bill 22 well into the wee hours of the night to give the Official Opposition as much time as they can on the second reading of this legislation. In fact, Mr. Speaker, I suspect that by the end of this evening, we will have already well surpassed the amount of time of debate that the NDP are trying to tell Albertans that they get on this legislation, again misrepresenting facts to Albertans. That's why the NDP has no credibility left, because they just immediately go to fear and smear, won't stick with facts, spend their time focused on ridiculous allegations, and it's disappointing.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West spent a lot of time accusing people on this side of the aisle of horrific things that, in fact, are not true and then went on to sit on a very high horse and say that the Official Opposition and the NDP in this Chamber are perfect and they don't do anything wrong and that this is just the most appalling thing ever. I've already established why it's not, but that is very rich coming from a member who sits in a caucus whose own leader has confirmed that there were two investigations into sexual misconduct of her caucus in which something was found, and that leader has refused to even declare whether those current members actually sit in those benches today. That's confirmed by their leader.

Now, I won't do the same thing that the Member for Lethbridge-West did, stand up and start naming people based on rumours that I've seen on the Internet on those people because that would be inappropriate for a member of this place, so I won't do that. But for them to stand up here and have the nerve to say something like that when the Member for Lethbridge-West knows that she is sitting in the benches, possibly – she may even know who they are; I don't know – with two people that her leader has confirmed – confirmed – were involved in serious sexual misconduct, confirmed by an internal investigation by the NDP. That hon. member should maybe have a talk with her leader and her caucus about whether that's appropriate.

As the debate goes on tonight, I do hope that we talk about other aspects of Bill 22. It's an important piece of legislation, and ample opportunity will be given to debate it, but we should stick to the facts. We should not be misrepresenting facts and confusing Albertans. Let me be very, very clear that the Election Commissioner office remains, reports are protected, investigations will continue. The Chief Electoral Officer will remain an independent legislative officer of this place, answering through the same processes, through the Standing Committee on Legislative Offices and upwards to this Chamber, not to the Premier, not to cabinet.

Mr. Speaker, you and I both know that's not how it works despite the NDP wanting to accuse the Premier of that. Those are the facts. No matter how loud the NDP lies . . .

Mr. Shepherd: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Sorry, Mr. Speaker. I withdraw and apologize.

No matter how loud the NDP misrepresents facts to Albertans when it comes to this legislation, they can't make what they're saying, in fact, actually be factual, Mr. Speaker, because it's not, just like when they continue to go to this Chamber and say that there are only three hours of debate on a bill when there's going to be significantly more than three hours of debate on a bill. It's just not something that the majority of Albertans are buying anymore.

It's got nothing to do with arrogance, what happened in the last election. You know the communities that we come from. They wouldn't accept people acting in arrogant ways. In fact, that's why they rejected what they thought the NDP government was being, significantly arrogant. It's got to do with facts. The Election Commissioner is protected; investigations are protected: those are the facts. There is no political interference with this.

I predict, of course, that the NDP are not going to be able to get focused on any other portion of this important piece of legislation. Ultimately, the decision will be made by the 87 members of this Legislature, and then we'll move on to the next piece of legislation. The NDP will continue their tactics of fear and smear. Look, I've made no secret: I think that's why they're on their way not only to not be the Official Opposition and not government but, next, to be the third party and, I predict, at some point not to even have a seat in this Chamber, because of the fear and smear tactics that they've chosen to do. That's why Albertans rejected it.

I know that the members that were re-elected for the NDP inside this Chamber – I congratulate them for that – haven't taken the time to reflect on why all their colleagues lost their jobs. It's because of this fear and smear tactics, the ridiculousness of this NDP opposition. I do encourage them to stop misrepresenting facts to Albertans.

The Speaker: Hon. members, before we call the hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available if anyone has a brief question or comment for the member.

Seeing none, the hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre has the call.

Mr. Shepherd: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate rising following the hon. House leader in his own rather lengthy tirade, that was certainly rife with a broad range of misrepresentations of facts and certainly had a large lack of factual statements, as he himself attributed to the Member for Lethbridge-West. Amongst them, I would note his laughable claim that the firing of the Election Commissioner in the process of moving that position under the Chief Electoral Officer, in fact, is a good thing because it removes him further from political influence. The hon. House leader indeed made the claim that the Election Commissioner currently reports to the Standing Committee on Legislative Offices.

Having served as the chair of that committee, indeed I know and yourself, Mr. Speaker, being well informed, as obviously the Government House Leader is not, about the actual operations of officers of the Legislature, that they do not report to the Standing Committee on Legislative Offices, none of them, including the Election Commissioner. They are appointed by this House. They respond and are responsible to this House and can only be removed or appointed by this House. If that is what the Government House Leader considers to be political interference, then every single officer of the Legislature, from the Auditor General to the Ethics Commissioner, all the way down the chain, suffers from a similar amount of political interference. So let's be clear. What this government is choosing to do with this bill is not improving the independence of any officer of this Legislature. They're removing a significant level of independence from the position of the Election Commissioner.

Now, the hon. House leader also made the claim that the Member for Lethbridge-West said that current members – and she named several here, indeed, some who are serving as ministers – were under investigation. That is, in fact, not the case. I invite him to take a look perhaps at the Blues or Hansard when that is released, and he can see that she clearly indicated that they merely had been interviewed as part of ongoing investigations both by the Election Commissioner and the RCMP into members of the governing party, investigations which have been duly noted in multiple media reports. As yet, I have not seen the lawsuits of defamation, so I am assuming that those reported facts indeed stand as facts as reflected by the Member for Lethbridge-West, which are far from what the Government House Leader suggested as being rumours on the Internet. It's what is known, Mr. Speaker, as journalism, though I appreciate that perhaps, given some sources of media which seem to be popular amongst some members of government at times, they may not quite understand.

That said, I appreciate the opportunity tonight to speak to Bill 22. You know, Mr. Speaker, every day during question period and at times during debate I have the perhaps somewhat dubious honour of listening to some members of government offer their opinions of myself and my colleagues and our questions that we bring to this House on behalf of Albertans. I have the fortune, I suppose, of sitting quite close to several of them. Indeed, the Member for Lacombe-Ponoka tends to be particularly colourful. But indeed it's not an unfamiliar thing here during the day for me to be told by these members that we are terrible people, that we are, in fact, socialists. Just for the record I have never actually even read a book by Karl Marx. I'm not a man of political philosophy or having studied political science. It seems that, indeed, at times members of the government seem to think that we've done some incredibly terrible things, suggestions that we would allow a community such as Fort McMurray to burn. Apparently, they have the belief that we would somehow intentionally attempt to destroy an entire industry or economy.

And I'll tell you, Mr. Speaker, that their opinion of our Election Commissioner, Mr. Lorne Gibson – well, as this came up for discussion today and as it was raised during question period, indeed these members to my right were pretty clear about their opinion of Mr. Gibson as they laughed at the concerns that we raised here in this House. Indeed, we've had discussions of arrogance and entitlement. The word "smug" comes to mind. That is what I've been seeing from members of this government in discussing what is a profound change.

What I can tell you, Mr. Speaker: I have not seen a single member of the media, individuals who have been observing politics in this province for, in some cases, decades, who have a deep knowledge of the history and the actions of governments in this place – not a single one of them dismissed this as something laughable. Indeed, aside from those who are directly affiliated with the government party, with the UCP, their direct partisan friends and allies, every single political commentator I've seen is calling out the arrogance, the entitlement, the utter disregard for democratic convention that this government is demonstrating in this action to fire the very Election Commissioner who is currently investigating multiple participants in their leadership race, spiralling ever closer towards the Premier himself.

I'll tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I have yet to run into a single Albertan that finds this a laughing matter, that considers this a small thing. I'll tell you that I've been beginning to receive a number of e-mails already. The nights that I've been out, last night when I was out in the community, indeed, people that I've run into today: this is being raised, this is being discussed across the country. This is on national news. This is what this government wants to represent for us here in our province.

Indeed, what I heard today from these members here to my right is that, in their view, Mr. Gibson is a partisan appointee, Mr. Gibson, who has never held a political membership, to the best of my knowledge, in his life, a man who has been absolutely scrupulous in all of his work, to the point that the Government House Leader feels that he will try to defend this policy by quoting a white paper from Mr. Gibson as an expert on electoral politics and indeed, particularly, electoral financing. Yet it is the allegations of members of this House that Mr. Gibson is compromised, that in his work investigating illegal campaign donations within the very sphere of influence of the Premier himself, involving a kamikaze campaign, which the Premier has denied on multiple occasions but, again, which we have seen reputable journalists and media in this province repeatedly bringing forth evidence of – there, Mr. Speaker, are your misrepresentations of facts, the denials that we continue to hear from these government members.

I suppose that this level of partisanship, of mockery, of telling themselves what terrible, misguided, awful people myself and my colleagues must be: perhaps that's what it takes to be able to screw up the courage to assuage your conscience to vote for something as reprehensible as this section of this bill.

Indeed, members of this government today tried to tell me that this bill did not in fact fire the Election Commissioner. Let's be clear, Mr. Speaker. Right here in Bill 22, section 13(11)(5):

Any employment contract between the Legislative Assembly of Alberta and the person who, immediately before the coming into force of this section, held the office of Election Commissioner under this Act is terminated on the coming into force of this section.

That means he's fired. He is fired upon this bill coming into force.

Now, the fact that he may, if the Chief Electoral Officer should choose, be rehired does not negate the fact that the government is passing a bill to fire the individual who is currently investigating a kamikaze campaign, thousands of dollars of illegal campaign donations, whose information, that he found in the course of his investigations, has gone on to spark RCMP investigations into potential electoral fraud, Mr. Speaker, involving complex voting schemes, potentially fraudulent e-mails, again reaching into the very circles in and around the Premier himself.

Mr. Speaker, it is not my job to afford this government and these members any benefit of the doubt. That is not why I'm here, and that is not what I am asked to do on behalf of my constituents. Indeed, they are making it quite clear that that is not what they are wanting me to do on this bill. And I dare say that if these members actually sat down and had the conversation with the constituents in their own constituencies according to the actual facts, their constituents would not be big fans either. Yet these members are choosing to laugh and to mock in their attempt to screw up the courage to vote for a bill that, frankly, insults and tramples on the trust that their constituents have placed on them to act with integrity and uphold rather than undermine the very democratic institutions that gave them their seat in this House. There is no denying that there is a preponderance of evidence that indicates there was, at the very least, some incredibly shady trickery involved in the very race by which the Premier became the leader of his party and went on to gain the premiership. But, apparently, his members are okay with that. That's how politics gets played.

Mr. Speaker, I ran because I wanted to see politics done better in this province, because I was tired of the arrogance and entitlement I had seen from previous governments. Indeed, there are members of this current government that were part of those governments and saw this the first time around yet somehow are willing to sit here and do it all again. As the Leader of the Official Opposition said today on national television, this goes to the very heart of Canada's Constitution, the separation of the judiciary, the executive, and the legislative lines, which these members seem repeatedly content to blur.

The Member for Lethbridge-West gave a lengthy explanation of the many questionable actions in which members of this governing party have been involved, which come close to and touch on so many people intimately involved with this party, indeed, at this time with this government and with members that are sitting here in this House, that have led to a total of more than $211,000 worth of fines that have been levied.

Mr. Speaker, as I said, it is not my job to give this government any benefit of the doubt, and I can assure you that every one of these members would not do that if the shoe were on the other foot. They would not for a moment hesitate to call this kind of an action out. Indeed, we see how far they are willing to go with their conspiracy theories around environmental organizations attacking the province and taking on other things in their misrepresentation, as we continue to see as we discuss this bill.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. I see the hon. Minister of Culture, Multiculturalism and Status of Women.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I have a couple of questions for the Member for Edmonton-City Centre, but just before I get started, the implication that Mr. Resler, the Chief Electoral Officer, is not capable of doing his job or having a significant role in being able to carry out any investigations is quite despicable. In recalling this discussion previously, when I had the privilege of being in opposition, the arguments around this were quite heated at that time as well, and I can remember consistently having the discussion.

Actually, the Member for Edmonton-City Centre was the chair at that time and did a really good job of actually mitigating a lot of the very, very great debate that went on around the necessity for having a commissioner at that time. It was very interesting to see the disrespect that was intended and implied towards the Chief Electoral Officer, Mr. Resler, that he was incapable of doing the job that was set out for him, which, by definition, within the definition of what the commissioner does, he already does. The whole discussion around this was around a redundant job, a redundant position already held by an extremely competent human being who, within his capacity over the years of doing this, had already shown his ability to do so and who in the future, with the legislation that could pass possibly here in the next little while, will continue to do the work that has already been set out, including the investigations that are already under way.

So I go through this. You know, there were so many things, and I'll get a chance, I'm sure, to talk about this a little bit more. When the contract was negotiated, Mr. Speaker, the opposition was talking about time allocation, and this has been a big part of their discussion. Did you know that the time allocation that was put on this discussion of the motion was one hour? One hour. That was the discussion that we were allowed to have around a duplication of a role, that was obviously a duplication, and also questioning the competency of the Chief Electoral Officer, who already had this position and was extremely, extremely good at his job.

My question for the Member for Edmonton-City Centre is: maybe you could tell me what the job of the Chief Electoral Officer is and why you feel that Mr. Resler is not capable of doing the job that he was sent out to do.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre has risen.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm happy to answer that question. I would answer it by pointing out that upon the creation of the office of the Election Commissioner, he immediately began receiving a large number of submissions. Indeed, he has spoken many times about the capacity that he has had to have. Now, he has managed very well within the resources he had, but he received a large number of submissions, concerns, complaints, requests for investigation, all of which he has acquitted quite well.

At no point have I suggested that Mr. Resler was not doing his job. I think Mr. Resler was working within the capacity and the resources that he had. With the changes that our government brought in, many of which had been recommended by Mr. Gibson and for which he was fired by a previous Conservative government for daring to even suggest – strengthening oversight of, in particular, I would note, leadership campaigns – there was a great increase in what the expectation was of what would need to be done. So our government decided and determined that having a dedicated officer of the Legislature to uphold and enforce those rules could be of benefit to the people of Alberta, and indeed, Mr. Speaker, it has been.

Now, this government may not like the fact that the majority of wrongdoing and issues that he has found are attached to themselves and their friends and their party – they may choose to view that as partisanship – but I would say, Mr. Speaker, that it is simply Mr. Gibson doing his job, much as Mr. Resler continues to do his, which is running and operating elections in the province of Alberta.

The Speaker: Hon. members, we are back on the bill. I see the hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika would like to join in the debate.

Mr. Schow: I sure would, Mr. Speaker, and I am grateful that you recognized me to speak on this bill. It's an honour to stand up in this Chamber tonight to talk on Bill 22, a really important piece of legislation that I think is really going to achieve one of the ultimate goals of this government, which is to make things leaner, to be more efficient, to be more effective, which is what over a million Albertans asked us to do.

We do have bosses back in our own constituencies, and those bosses have made things very clear to us as we went through the campaigns. It's interesting, as we listen to some of the debate tonight, that I feel like I was almost hearing – I wouldn't say almost. I was hearing a campaign-style speech from the Member for Lethbridge-West, almost invoking an inner Churchill, if you will. Such passion. But what I think she fails to understand is that campaigns aren't won in this Chamber. Campaigns are won out on the doors. Having worked countless campaigns, I'd be happy to consult with the Member for Lethbridge-West on how to run one, because, you know, as someone who has been involved with one at a number of levels, I can certainly share some advice on how to do that.

Like I said, the first one is really, actually consulting your base, consulting those who would actually want to be involved in your campaign, and maybe getting a bit of a team together – a campaign manager and some volunteers – even feeding them some food, which would be a nice option there. But one of the things you don't want to do is go and insult your campaign volunteers or insult those who may actually want to come join your campaign, like the member has done this evening in criticizing our government and the direction we're going and those who voted for us and supported our side. If that member is looking to win a leadership race and draw some supporters from this side onto her side, she might want to actually show a little more respect to those citizens.

Now, I also found it interesting that in talking about this bill, a measure to make Alberta more lean, more effective, that member decided to invoke references to Syria, Hong Kong, and the Holodomor – we commemorated today the 11th anniversary of the act – which was, of course, Stalin's genocide of over 10 million Ukrainians. That kind of reference is completely unacceptable. And if the shoe was on the other foot, I believe that that member would be standing up in outrage over that kind of a comment. To suggest that Bill 22 is even comparable to the atrocity of the Holodomor: Mr. Speaker, I would venture that that's several steps too far.

I also find that when the members opposite are talking about Bill 22, they're only talking about one small portion of a very significant piece of legislation. I mean, if you look at this thing, this is pretty dense stuff. There are about 13 pages that talk about the Election Commissioner whereas the rest actually deals with the overall mandate given to us by Albertans with overwhelming numbers. That's like being the family member at Thanksgiving or Christmas dinner who goes in the fruit salad and just picks out the strawberries. I mean, really, nobody likes that person because, you know, you're just taking one part of the salad. Take the whole thing. Let's have a robust conversation about this bill, not just about the one piece.

I recall when I was living overseas in Russia. When I left, I packed everything, including the kitchen sink. You can imagine that in going away for two years, you think you're going to need all these shirts and pants and belts and shoes and socks and everything else that you think is so essential at the time, and then you get over there – and for anybody who's gone backpacking over in Europe, you'll know that you can't take everything. I learned that lesson really quickly because I lived in several different cities. I lived in St. Petersburg, right in the centre of the city, I lived in Veliky Novgorod, I lived in Pushkin, and I lived in Peterhof, in some beautiful places in Russia, where I was doing service work, serving the Russian people and cleaning up hospitals and teaching English classes. But through moving from place to place to place, every time I left an apartment, I would leave a number of things behind because I realized it just wasn't necessary. It wasn't going to fit in my suitcase, and I didn't need it to accomplish the goal that I was there to do, which was to serve the people.

Similar to this bill, we have to be lean and look at the things that were outlined by the hon. Minister of Finance and President of the Treasury Board. I think these are good things that we're doing. You know, we look at AIMCo. It currently manages about $110 billion, and we've taken a measure to move the ATRF into AIMCo, $17 billion into AIMCo. Now, there have been a lot of misconceptions about this move, but the reality is that this has no impact on teachers' pensions. This has no impact on the ATRF board control of the funds as the board will still set the investment strategy. It's simple.

So I don't know where this backlash is except for what the NDP might be telling the media, and that is flat out just spin, just misinformation, and I guess that's their job. You know, the Member for Edmonton-City Centre has said that he'd be doing no favours nor pulling any punches, and I can respect that. That is Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition's role in this Chamber, to hold the government to account, and I truly respect that. I've said that lots of times before. I do respect that role but understand that it's important, Mr. Speaker, to have the facts straight.

Same thing with WCB and AHS, moving long-term investments into AIMCo. From WCB it's $10.7 billion and also $2.3 billion from AHS, and both will maintain discretion over the funds. That will not change. You know, these changes alone add about $30 billion to AIMCo. Now, what does that mean? That means savings because of economies of scale. That means savings because of reduced inefficiencies. So I don't see how that is really a bad thing.

For anybody looking within their own pocketbook or their own chequebook in their home, if things are a bit tight, you start tightening the belt, you start making some difficult decisions. If I've got a $100-a-month grocery bill – and I wish it cost $100 a month to feed me – and somebody came to me and said, "You know what? You can only spend $97 this month," I'd put back the chocolate bar. You know, I'd put back both chocolate bars, maybe all three of them. But the reality is that we have to make these kinds of decisions and recognize what is essential versus what is not essential.

Furthermore, there are a number of provisions in this bill – a number of provisions in this bill – that will help accomplish this goal. We've moved the Alberta Sport Connection program into the ministry. We've dissolved the Alberta Historical Resources Foundation, also the historical resources fund. The mental health review panel has gone from four members to three members. Why there's four members I'm not quite sure. As I understand it, as earlier stated, these boards typically have three members in other jurisdictions, so why do we have four? I'm not sure, but this is a good move towards being efficient. We've dissolved the Alberta Competitiveness Council, repealed the Alberta Competitiveness Act.

To reduce waste and duplication and nonessential spending is the goal of this bill, and I don't understand why all we're hearing tonight is one part of a much larger piece of important legislation to accomplish a goal that over a million Albertans voted for, over a million Albertans asked us to do. This is us responding to our employers, Mr. Speaker.

Now to address the issue – I wouldn't call it the elephant in the room because we've already talked about it a lot, but I'll address it myself – of the changes of the Ministry of Justice and Solicitor General to return powers of the Chief Electoral Officer as they existed prior to the government's changes in 2018. Now, I was a staffer here in 2017. I don't remember all the dealings that happened in 2018, but my understanding is that this does not eliminate the Election Commissioner's role but simply consolidates the functions under one single authority, the nonpartisan Chief Electoral Officer. To suggest that that gentleman, Mr. Glen Resler, is incapable of doing this job would be nothing short of offensive, so I don't imagine that the members opposite are suggesting quite that. You know, moving these two roles into a single independent office will bring it back in line with the way Alberta was in 2018. The consolidation of the office of the Election Commissioner into the office of the Chief Electoral Officer will eliminate redundancies and streamline processes and operations. Mr. Speaker, it should come as no surprise that this is a move that our government is making.

If you look at this bill again, even more pieces that are part of this bill: you have the Northern Alberta Development Council – the minimum members are now seven instead of 10 – dissolve the Social Care Facilities Review Committee; dissolve the Campus Alberta Strategic Directions Committee.

Mr. Speaker, this is one part of a much larger bill, yet we're focusing on that. I suspect that deep into this night we're going to continue to talk, at least members on the opposite side are going to talk specifically about 13 pages in a much larger bill. I just would love to hear some thoughts about some other parts of this bill instead of cherry-picking the strawberries out of this fruit salad. Rather, let's hear about the rest of it, hear their thoughts.

Instead – I'm going to continue – probably, through the rest of this evening, as we debate this longer: more campaign-style speeches like the Member for Lethbridge-West gave us. Now, I do appreciate her moxie. I know that I knocked on doors during the campaign in her constituency to help out the person from our party who ran against her. There were members of her constituency who spoke quite highly of her and her work ethic, and that's great. You know, I understand that. But if that member is going to run for a much larger role, to try to run the party, which would ultimately be an attempt to run the province as potential Premier, she might want to recognize that there is a world outside of Lethbridge-West. And to appeal to those average, everyday, extremely normal Albertans, she might want to recognize that they think about more than just one part; they think about the whole piece. What's the future of this province going to look like if we end up with no ability to fund anything because of the fiscal disaster of the province, that we were put in by her government?

Mr. Speaker, I don't want to take up a whole lot more time, but I do really want to emphasize the importance of Bill 22 and what it does for Alberta. We are an efficient people. We are a hard-working people. I am, as I've said so many times before, the proud grandson and great-grandson of ancestors who came here, certainly not for the weather but for the opportunity of a better life, something that they could leave for me, that I could leave for my kids. Now is the time where we still have the opportunity to change the way we do things, change the way that we operate, change the way we look at problems, because we are still in a position to make those changes.

As we were travelling at a rapid pace towards a fiscal cliff, someone had to hit the brakes, and that's what Alberta did on April 16. Albertans finally said: we've had enough; we recognize that we voted for change in 2015. Albertans did not want the PC government, and they did not want a Wildrose government. They chose the NDP, and that was the will of the people. I will never disrespect the will of the people. But in April of this year those same voters made a conscientious decision to hit the brakes and decide what was best for this province, and it was not the direction that the NDP was going.

So I will be supporting this bill. I will be voting for this bill, and I will continue to consult my constituents on this bill. What I've heard so far is gratitude that this government is actually doing what it said it would do. It's not going ahead and making any kind of crazy changes or implementing significant new tax hikes on them that were not campaigned on during the election. Our campaign was clear that we would reduce the size of government, that we would be mindful of spending, and that we would be supportive of Albertans and the things that they need, and we're doing just that. [interjections] The way we were doing things before, Mr. Speaker, was not working. Albertans clearly said that.

While I appreciate Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition and the heckling that they decide to engage in now and during question period, at some point in time they have to recognize that Albertans are going to be tired of them crying wolf. They're going to be tired of it, and they're going to become tone deaf to it, if they haven't already, because – I'll tell you what – in my constituency of Cardston-Siksika all of this that they're talking about, all the hyperbolic phrases are falling on deaf ears.

With that, I'll conclude my remarks.

The Speaker: Hon. members, 29(2)(a) is available. I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View has a brief question or comment to make.

Ms Ganley: A brief question or comment: well, I definitely do have several comments, Mr. Speaker. I think the first thing that I'd like to pick out from the speaker before me was that he asked repeatedly: why are we hearing about just this one part of the bill? Well, we're hearing about just this one part of the bill because that's the part of the bill that impacts the rule of law in our province, so I think that that's a pretty significant concern. You know, the member certainly referenced his ancestors coming here to this country for several opportunities. Well, a lot of people come here to this country for opportunities, and those opportunities are preserved. One of those opportunities that people come here for is the rule of law in this country, the idea that, fundamentally, everyone will be subject to the same laws, that there will be no arbitrary laws, that laws will not be made to support the random whim or will or flight of fancy of whoever happens to be in government. That's a fundamental reason that people come here. So the reason we're talking about this portion of the bill is because the rule of law is important.

In Mr. Gibson's letter that he wrote to the media earlier, he wrote: I'm concerned about the potential negative impacts on the independence of election administration and the real or perceived integrity of the election process. Mr. Speaker, the reason that we're focusing on this section of the bill is because this is the section of the bill that undermines the public's confidence in democracy, that undermines the public's confidence in our electoral system. We are standing in the Legislature of this province. We are standing in the Legislative Assembly, and I think that in no place in the country, perhaps excluding the Parliament of Canada, would it be more important to preserve the impact of democracy. I think there should be no group of people who are more concerned about the public's perception of our laws and of our democracy and of its health. I think my comments about that are that the reason we're so concerned about this one portion of the bill is because it's the part that strikes to the very essence of who we are as a people and how we choose to govern ourselves.

Mr. Speaker, there are, in fact, other areas of this bill that I could go on about at length, and were they in a different bill, I would do that. I think that using the length of this bill, using that it has crammed together unrelated things, removing an officer who is actively investigating the political party of which the government members are members with removing people's rights to govern their own pensions – I mean, those are some wildly disparate things. This is some, like, serious omnibus legislating. Implying, because you've rolled these unrelated things into one bill in an attempt to move them through the House quickly, in an attempt to avoid any public scrutiny on them, that by picking one thing out of such omnibus legislation, we are somehow doing wrong to the public: I mean, it's almost mind-boggling. It's shocking to suggest that, oh, well, all the government has to do is take a really ugly piece, something they really badly want to hide, and bury it deep inside other unrelated legislation, and then the opposition ought not to talk about it. I mean, it was a good attempt, but it didn't work.

I don't think it's very reasonable to stand in this place and suggest that because they have rolled unrelated things together in an attempt to pass them quickly through this House, that ought to cause us not to be concerned about the rule of law and about how we fundamentally govern ourselves as a people. This concept of the rule of law has been around for a long time, the idea that it's the rule of law versus the rule of force, so people cannot by greater strength or greater numbers overcome the law. [The time limit for questions and comments expired] It seems I've run out of time.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to speak against this Bill 22. I think that's the only logical thing that comes to my mind, that in good conscience I can only oppose this bill. As my colleague from Calgary-Mountain View was talking about, in reference to the Member for Cardston-Siksika, why we are talking about just one part of the bill, let me talk a little bit about that.

This bill amends 31 pieces of legislation. Thirty-one pieces of legislation. You will remember, as part of the 29th Legislature, many occasions. One that comes to mind is that Labour Relations Code changes and workers' compensation changes were put together by our government, and the then opposition, the UCP, was lighting their hair on fire that this was omnibus legislation. They brought all kinds of motions, they used all kinds of rules to split that legislation so that they could debate those things thoroughly. I think that if they truly believed in that kind of debate, they wouldn't bring forward a piece of legislation that amends 31 pieces of legislation.

It's not reasonably possible to address all 31 in the time that I have, so I will have to prioritize what I choose to speak on. Certainly, changes to the Election Act are of utmost importance to me and to my constituents because we were all elected in a democratic process, and having strong democratic institutions is important and vital for a strong democracy. Both the Chief Electoral Officer and Election Commissioner were playing very important roles, one for election management and the other one in enforcing the laws and conducting the investigative role, investigations. Both of these roles are important, and nowhere in my comments would I ever suggest that one role is less important than the other. I have utmost respect for both of these offices.

There was considerable talk about facts, so I will state some facts. Then I will have a little bit more discussion about it. One thing: it's a fact that the Election Commissioner's office and the Election Commissioner will no longer exist if we pass this piece of legislation, Bill 22. That's very clear in section 13 of this legislation. We can all agree that based on this piece of legislation, if passed, which will be passed, I think, the Election Commissioner's office or the Election Commissioner, Lorne Gibson, will no longer exist there.

The second thing. I think that it's a fact that prior to this piece of legislation passing, the Election Commissioner is an independent officer of the Legislature. He is not reporting to the Chief Electoral Officer. Instead, he is an independent officer of the Legislature. His annual report says that in the first nine months he had 450 complaints, and to date there are 800 complaints that were made to the Election Commissioner, so certainly people have concerns about how these election laws are enforced. Albertans have raised concerns, and they deserve to be heard. Those alleged violations need to be investigated.

Another thing that is a fact is that the UCP leadership campaign from 2017, in which our Premier was victorious, is under investigation by this same office. I think that is also a fact. It's also a fact that certain members of the UCP caucus, including from the front bench, have been reached out to, have been talked to – and I'm not saying that they are involved in it – by the RCMP, by law enforcement, in relation to this investigation. Those members include the Minister of Justice, the Minister of Infrastructure, the minister of culture and status of women, the associate minister of mental health, and the Member for Calgary-East. These are the facts that we know so far. Again, I'm not alleging that they are involved in it, but these are facts, that they have been reached out to by law enforcement in relation to the UCP leadership campaign from 2017.

Also, it's a fact that $211,723 have been levied as fines on 16 people or corporations. That's a fact that is publicly available. We know even the names of the people who have been fined.

I think I will note another thing, that somewhere I was reading that consolidating these two offices will save the government $1 million over five years. But to the Minister of Treasury Board and Finance, just a suggestion: had we not changed the Election Commissioner, he would have given you $1 million in five years at this rate anyways because in one year he fined $211,000, times five. Over $1 million you would have collected, so you didn't save much there.

Then it is also a fact that this Bill 22 says that the Election Commissioner's office may continue, but it doesn't say that there will be an Election Commissioner. The fact is that this bill doesn't indicate whether the current commissioner will be rehired or whether any commissioner will be hired. It doesn't say whether any of those active investigations will continue when this commissioner's office is dissolved. These are the facts.

I think we value here our institutions, we value here the rule of law, and when we know that there is an active investigation that may potentially involve some members of the UCP caucus – may involve. In the midst of that investigation what this bill is doing is removing the very person who is investigating that file. It's taking away the independence from that very person who was investigating this scandal. It, in fact, completely gets rid of that person's office. On this side of the House and Albertans: they're rightfully concerned that it's an attack on our institutions, on our democracy.

The UCP talks about their mandate. I think Albertans gave them a mandate of jobs, economy, and pipelines. That was their key slogan. Nowhere in that most detailed platform of the UCP did they tell Albertans that they will remove the office of the Election Commissioner, the very office that is investigating the kamikaze campaign, which may involve some UCP members, that they will remove that. Albertans didn't give them a mandate to walk roughshod on laws and attack the rule of law and democracy in our province.

It's an important piece that is included in this Bill 22, and that's why we are focusing more on this change, because this will change many things. This will dilute respect for the rule of law. This will diminish the respect for our institutions. This will send a message that with power you can stop an investigation that may potentially include you. Albertans certainly deserve better than this. Those who elected me in Calgary-McCall certainly deserve better than this. Personally and many of those who are first-generation immigrants: we have seen, we have witnessed with our own eyes, in our own experience, when the rule of law is violated, what happens to society. We have seen those things when institutions are weaker, what happens to the society.

This change certainly weakens our institutions. It certainly puts the rule of law in question and, I think, the basic and fundamental values that we believe in as Albertans, as Canadians, that every individual is equal before and under the law. Here we have a caucus who is thinking they are not equal before and under the law, so they are changing the laws in the middle of an investigation that may potentially impact them. It's clearly wrong, and we will be opposing it here in the Legislature, in this House, and everywhere across this province because it's fundamental to our democracy, fundamental to our province.

There are many other things that I can touch on, and one of them is public-sector pensions. Arguments were given that it will remain the same.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. Is anyone wishing to add an additional question or comment? I see the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West has risen.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The member was just starting a thought, and I'm wondering if he could conclude it for the benefit of the House.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Member, for the question. I was getting to public-sector pensions. Responsibility is given to AIMCo, and Albertans are asked to trust this government that there will be no changes and that they will get the same benefits and everything and to have trust and confidence in AIMCo's ability to manage the funds; they're very experienced people.

The fundamental question here is, Minister, that it's not your money. This money belongs to those who contributed to this fund. That's the fundamental thing, and they have every right to manage their money where they see fit. It's not about AIMCo's ability or inability to manage their fund. It's not about whether their benefits will stay the same or not. It's about people's basic right of self-determination. They have financed and funded these pension plans, they have a vested interest in these plans, and they have every right in a democratic society to choose how to manage these funds. Without consulting them, without affording them an opportunity to have a say about their funds – I would have preferred it if you had done a referendum on it for these fund holders and asked them whether they want you to move it to AIMCo or not. It's not about AIMCo's ability or inability to manage these funds; it's fundamentally about those people's basic right to self-determination, those people's basic right to manage their own funds the way they see fit. It's an attack on people's basic rights, and certainly that's unacceptable. Again, we will oppose that attack here in this Legislature and across this province.

Also, after seeing how this government has dealt with the Election Commissioner's office – I think, at the end of the day, that the minister retains the authority to direct AIMCo – I think people sure feel that their funds may not be safe in the hands of this government. If they can remove the Election Commissioner that is investigating them, how can they trust this government with their pensions? At the end of the day, for many that's their only source of income, and they cannot trust this government handling their pensions like this without any consultation whatsoever with them. They deserve an opportunity to understand these changes better. They deserve an opportunity to be heard.

There are almost 400,000 people that are part of these pension plans, pension funds, and I think that among those 400,000 people there are very capable people who can manage these funds. At the end of the day, it's their money, it's teachers' money, and they should have a say and a right in how their monies are invested. They need to be consulted before this takeover by this government of their funds.

Also, other things this government... [The time limit for questions and comments expired] Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, we are on the main bill.

Unfortunately, I believe that you're the mover of the bill, unless you're planning on adjourning debate.

Mr. Toews: I thought it was 29(2)(a).

The Speaker: Sorry; 29(2)(a) has expired. The time has elapsed.

We are moving back and forth from government to opposition, so we'll have the hon. Member for Livingstone-Macleod, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

Mr. Reid: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm happy to say that about two and a half hours ago my youngest daughter returned safely from a three-month trip to Europe. One of the joys of this modern age is that even though she was halfway around the world, we got to stay in constant touch with her through online chats and text messaging. Three months ago she left for Europe with a bank account that was full, and she sent us pictures of her upgraded seat on the airline. She sent us some lovely pictures of her wonderful meals in Paris, and she did send us a text that said: I can't afford me. Today she returned with less money in the bank. She flew economy. She still got home safe, but she realized that her circumstances were different than they were three months ago.

Albertans realized in April that our circumstances are different than they were four or five years ago. Our government was elected on a promise to live within our means, to find efficiencies, and to bring our province back to balance. This bill is an important part of actually getting that done. By eliminating redundant ABCs, this bill also reduces red tape for everything from social services seeking licences to easing access to receiving mental health and addictions treatment, making life better for Albertans.

Mr. Speaker, every member on this side of the House spent hundreds of hours at the doors in our spring election campaign. It led to this government receiving the largest mandate of any government in Alberta's history, with our party receiving over a million votes. This was key to our understanding of why we were sent here. At every door we heard the same stories of job insecurity and anxiety about the economy, of how our families have had to make significant changes to their lifestyle as a result of pay cuts at work, a partner being laid off, or the carbon tax hurting a family that was already living paycheque to paycheque. It is from this that we established our priorities: to bring back jobs, to get pipelines built, and to reignite our economy.

This demanded leadership from the very top rung of this government. To exemplify this approach, our caucus agreed to take a 5 per cent pay cut while the Premier himself reduced his pay by 10 per cent.

Our budget continued this approach by laying out a clear and credible path to balance. Hard decisions had to be made, and our budget as well as the report from the MacKinnon panel prove it. Where we can, we must always look to find efficiencies that can prevent us from having to make even more painful decisions. While much of this work is being done by the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction, it was also reflected in both our budget and a number of bills that have come out. Tonight this Bill 22 builds on that work by finding efficiencies in a number of additional areas, whether it be eliminating boards that already haven't functioned or existed for a number of years such as the Alberta Competitiveness Council, which has been inactive since 2013, or finding more efficient ways for boards to operate such as the suggested changes to the Northern Alberta Development Council and the Alberta Sport Connection. Our government is taking concrete action to live within our means and to return our province to balance.

That said, these necessary and pragmatic steps aren't what the media will focus on. This opposition's over-the-top theatrics regarding the steps we are taking to bring our province in line with other jurisdictions will of course steal the headlines. So if I can, Mr. Speaker, I would like to address some of the fear and smear that the NDP is trying to change the conversation with, both in the changes to the Alberta teachers' retirement fund and the changes to the chief electoral office.

I have seen a number of questions asked in this House already about the role of AIMCo and ATRF. I know I've personally gotten to learn a lot more about AIMCo and how they already manage a number of the public-sector pension plans. It's been encouraging to hear of AIMCo's success in managing these funds, Mr. Speaker. While, like almost everything we debate in the House, we're not likely to go home at the end of this debate in perfect agreement on what the best course forward is, the rhetoric from the other side of the House far overexaggerates the issues at play. AIMCo outperformed the ATRF from August 2017 to August 2018, with a return of 9.8 per cent compared to ATRF's 9.6 per cent. AIMCo has also outperformed the ATRF over the last four years.

That, however, while being a benefit, is not the best reason why I feel this move should be supported. The larger investment pool held by AIMCo will allow the ATRF to significantly reduce administration fees. These fees can be directed back into the fund, protecting both teachers and taxpayers.

In addition, I believe that it's important to note that the ATRF will be able to maintain the same strategic decisions that they have always had, with the board of the teachers' retirement fund retaining control of determining how the fund should be invested as well as retaining ownership of the plan's assets. The board will continue to develop policy for the fund while being able to leverage the substantial assets of AIMCo to do so.

The other area that the NDP has created fear over is the changes to the Chief Electoral Officer and the Election Commissioner. Mr. Speaker, Alberta didn't even have an Election Commissioner until 2018. The appointment of a separate officer as the Election Commissioner simply doesn't make sense. It was simply an extension of the NDP's reckless disregard for taxpayers' dollars. The Chief Electoral Officer has always been capable of ensuring that elections proceed fairly and according to the law, and they have done that for over a century. The accusations that have been levelled that this was done in order to end the investigations currently being pursued by the Election Commissioner: this is simply not the case. As officials from Elections Alberta as well as members of our government have confirmed, there will be no immediate impact on ongoing investigations, and the Chief Electoral Officer is free to continue to pursue them now that they are rightfully back in his file.

Mr. Speaker, I don't think it's unfair to say that the rhetoric in this House has hit some ridiculous levels this year, but for a bill that aims to implement a number of cost-saving measures, the rhetoric around this bill has hit a new fevered pitch. I look forward to voting for this bill and the pragmatic cost-saving solutions that it will bring to Alberta taxpayers.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to hear from this member. We don't often get an opportunity to hear from him in the House, so I appreciate that he took the opportunity to share what I hope were his thoughts on this bill.

Just to address a couple of things there. He spoke of rhetoric reaching a fevered pitch. Mr. Speaker, I would agree that many times we do hear a lot of rhetoric coming out in this House. Indeed, we often hear that from members of government as they put forward what are so joyfully known as puffball questions during question period. We certainly hear that from ministers of the Crown, ministers of the government, when they are purportedly answering questions in this House. We have a lot of give-and-take in this House, I think, in terms of what constitutes rhetoric. I would suggest to this member that when we are talking about, in this case, not just the simple act of moving the Election Commissioner's office, though certainly that is a profound decision, but taking away the independent office of an independent officer of the Legislature and making them subservient to another officer, that is, in and of itself, a fairly profound move. It's not the simple sort of housekeeping that this member seems to think.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, to be clear, none of us have stood in this House and suggested that that is the issue with this bill. The issue that we have brought forward is around the very appearance if not outright existence of a rather serious conflict of interest in choosing to make that decision, much as we have discussed the appointment of their commissioner, Mr. Allan, for the war room.

This government and, I guess, this member as part of it does not seem to understand the principle that when holding a position with this kind of power and indeed when enacting legislation in this province, which is an incredible privilege, one should be utterly scrupulous in avoiding not only actual conflict of interest but even the appearance of the same, which is why, Mr. Speaker, it is not a matter of us stealing headlines. Trust me; every journalist was breaking down the door to write this story long before we ever reached out to talk to them. Social media was full of their amazement at the audacity of this government to make this move.

I suppose my question, then, to the member is: does he appreciate that what he considers to be a simple piece of housekeeping has, indeed to a large number of Albertans and, I would dare say, even an increasing number of people who voted for him and his government, at least the appearance if not the outright suggestion of craven self-dealing and clear conflict of interest, an attempt for government to pass legislation solely in its own favour?

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Livingstone-Macleod should he choose to respond.

Mr. Reid: I'd like to thank the hon. member from the other side. Tough decisions need to be made – we all agree – decisions that are better for the people of Alberta and the efficiency of this government, because it's not my money, and it's not your money. It is the money of Albertans. [interjection] Absolutely.

I ran on the premise that government is too large and that we need to run leaner because we simply cannot sustain our province at the levels that we were operating at over the past number of years. What we presented in our budget, what we present through this legislation, Mr. Speaker, are those opportunities to make decisions that will cause Alberta to be sustainable in the long run, to move through these difficult times, and to once again experience the province that enjoyed the prosperity that my great-grandparents moved to this country to take opportunity from, that I enjoy today as their descendant. As a businessman every day I needed to make decisions to cause my business to sustain the tough times to get to the success so that we and my staff could prosper. We need to do the same as government.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise today and speak to Bill 22. I would retract that. I don't think it's a pleasure to speak to Bill 22 because it's such a terrible bill. But we rise today and we speak on what is perhaps one of the most influential pieces of legislation that we will see in our time in this House, and it's influential in all of the wrong ways. It's influential because it is an attack on the core fundamentals of our democracy, it is an attack on the core fundamentals of independence and justice, and it's an attack on and an affront to this very House. It speaks to the high level of corruption that this government is complicit in. It speaks to the high level of corruption that they are willing to go to in firing the independent investigator that is currently investigating corruption, fraud, bribery.

Speaker's Ruling Unparliamentary Language

The Speaker: Hon. member, a very exciting 30-second start. To imply that the government is complicit in corruption would be unparliamentary. You have about 14 minutes left. We've seen how the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West was able to express points passionately but do so in a parliamentary manner. I would just provide some caution that you might heed some of her discretion as you debate. I'm very keen to have a full and robust debate on Bill 22. I have no position, as I mentioned earlier, on Bill 22, but I want members to be very cautious with the language that they use with respect to ensuring that we are respectful of the traditions of the Assembly.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I take that under advisement.

Mr. Dang: Mr. Speaker, we have never seen an investigation like this in this province, an investigation into alleged corruption, bribery, fraud, forgery by members of this government caucus, investigations that were being performed by an independent office, by an independent officer. Then we see in black and white in this bill that that contract has been terminated. Those are the words that were used by this government. They are the ones that are terminating the investigation of the person doing the actual work to determine whether corruption had occurred, to determine whether fraud had occurred, to determine whether criminal acts had occurred.

Those were the types of things that were being investigated, and now through the media – they did not even have the courtesy to give a call to the commissioner himself. They did not even have that professional courtesy, Mr. Speaker. They fired him through the media. That is absolutely shameful. That is something that no democratic institution in the Westminster system should ever see, and these government members should know better. They should know better than to be so shamefully brazen, as has been reported, as to try and do this type of action, to go after the person doing independent investigations without even consulting with that investigator. That is something that is absolutely shocking to me. It's something that's absolutely shocking because these members should know better. They should know better.

When the Justice minister, Mr. Speaker, was running in this very campaign that is now being investigated by the Election Commissioner – well, it was being investigated by the Election Commissioner – the Justice minister himself raised concerns that there were irregularities, raised concerns that there was voter fraud, raised concerns that they needed an investigation into this. And now that that investigation is moving forward, the Justice minister is supporting a bill, this Bill 22, that will absolutely terminate that investigation. If that's not hypocritical, I don't know what is. This hypocrisy is deafening.

We just saw a member across the way, a government backbencher, get up and speak passionately about how we need to reduce the size of government. Well, Mr. Speaker, in fact, what they've done by this termination is that they've actually cost the government more money, because the over $200,000 in fines that the government caucus members and their party have had to pay has actually exceeded the amount that it cost the government to run that office this year. Those fines, the types of allegations and corruption that we're seeing being fined, the types of bribery and fraud that we're seeing being fined would have sufficiently covered, actually, the costs, so I don't know what he's advocating for here. I think he's actually advocating to reduce the size of government where it harms his party. That is something that's absolutely shameful.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

It's something that's absolutely shocking, and Albertans will not stand for it. Albertans know they deserve better from their democracy. Albertans know they deserve better from their government, Madam Speaker. It's something that we can see right here plain as day, that this government either does not understand or they do not care about what this means for democracy. I think Albertans will be able to make that decision themselves.

I have a bit of a message to pass on. I know that there's quite a lot we're going to get through tonight, but I know that my former colleague and a former colleague of yourself as well, Madam Speaker, and of many members of this House, the former Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood, Brian Mason, was referred to earlier in debate today. I believe it was by the member who's the current environment minister. He actually wants the environment minister to know something. He wants the environment minister to know that he's not in British Columbia. Indeed, he's actually, just like many Albertans, at home, and he's watching our debate tonight. He's watching our debate, and he wanted me to actually express that it's with great difficulty because he's having to spend so much time listening to government members and, in particular, the Government House Leader. I think that's something that's very concerning for him and concerning for many Albertans.

We look at the effects of this bill. I think that in the last Legislature that member had been one of the longest serving members of this entire Chamber. Indeed, he was the longest serving member of this entire Chamber in the 29th Legislature, and today the Leader of the Opposition is the longest serving member of the 30th Legislature. They will tell you and they have said in this House – at least, the leader has said it in this House – that this is a fundamental affront that has never been seen. This is an attack on the core of what we stand for, of why we are elected and why we are sent here. This is an attack on every single thing this institution stands for. This is an attack on how we do government, on how we do governance, and on what good governance looks like, Madam Speaker. It's an attack on the very foundation of what this building symbolizes, and that is what is so shocking and so scary.

It's scary, Madam Speaker, and I use that word because Albertans are worried. They're worried that there was interference in the independent judicial process here, the independent investigation, the independent investigation into forgery, fraud, bribery, corruption. Those are the things that people that are in the government caucus and people who are affiliated with the government party are being accused of. Those are the shocking things. When we see that these attacks are going on on the independent office, when we see that the independent officers are not even given the courtesy of a phone call, then it's something that's very, very, very concerning for Albertans.

Really, Madam Speaker, always you don't want to get caught in the cover-up. That's something that the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood has said to me as some advice he wants to pass on, and I think that's very prudent advice. It's very prudent advice because we're going to be seeing a lot coming out in the days and weeks and months to come. The things we are going to be seeing or that I hope we will be seeing – the investigator has now been fired, summarily terminated by this government, by the Finance minister's bill. We know that that is something that is very concerning.

We know that this government has a record, Madam Speaker. The facts of the matter are that this government has a record and a pattern of misusing taxpayer money. They've gone in and chartered private planes. They've gone in and given $4.7 billion away to the wealthiest corporations. They've gone in and decided that it was appropriate to fly other Premiers and their wives around. Then, on the other hand, when investigations into impropriety are going on, they are now firing the very person that would be responsible for those investigations. That's the shocking thing, right? We can see this pattern moving forward. We can see this continuation of what Albertans are seeing over and over again.

That's concerning because when somebody says, "Well, I made a mistake, and we'll fix it," that's okay, right? This government had every single opportunity to say that time and time again, but instead we saw that the Justice minister refused over and over again to apologize. We saw the Premier refuse to apologize for misusing taxpayer money. We saw these government members refuse to apologize for being hypocritical regarding the investigation. We see this time and time again. What they're telling Albertans and what they're telling this House is that they have no respect for the fundamental foundation of our democracy, that they have no respect for the fundamental foundations of what we stand for, of why we were elected here. The very institutions that we represent are being attacked by this bill.

I know one of the members across the way – I think it was the Member for Cardston-Siksika – said, “Well, I wish you’d talk about more things and wouldn’t pick individual pieces out of the fruit salad,” Madam Speaker, but you know what? This entire bill tries to do so much. Those members, this government, is trying to distract from the very fundamentals of the danger. They are trying to distract from what they are attacking. They are trying to distract from that they don’t respect this institution. They don’t respect the process of governance. That’s what’s really concerning to Albertans.

That’s why, Madam Speaker, you’ve seen all over the media, I’m sure – and Albertans are seeing it, too – in every single major outlet, even the conservative ones, that people are concerned. They’re saying that this government has no respect for the public, they’re saying that this government has no respect for the institutions, and they’re saying that this government is so brazen, the words that are being used, that they don’t think that public fallout even matters to them. That’s extremely concerning because it’s not about public fallout. We know that. It’s not about public fallout. It’s about respecting democracy. It’s about understanding that we have a parliamentary system here in Alberta. Instead, what we are seeing is the government firing the person responsible for investigating corruption, firing the person responsible for investigating members of their own party, Madam Speaker. That’s shocking because in what universe are you supposed to be your own judge, jury, and executioner? In no universe. That is foundational to our democracy here. It’s foundational to western liberal democracies to be able to have these separations of power, to be able to have this independence of our judiciary, to be able to have these ideals that nobody is above the law.

Instead, this government has reached in – reached in – and broken all of the traditions, broken all of the rules, broken all of the things that we are supposed to accept as traditional Westminster parliamentary systems and western liberal democracies, broken all of the conventions and decided that they can go in and fire their own prosecutor. That’s absolutely shocking. Albertans will not stand for this. Albertans know they deserve better from their government. They deserve a government that will not allow the prosecutor that is currently investigating their party to be fired like this, Madam Speaker.

We’ve heard, time and time again, how this bill is about reducing the size of government and all these other things that are great and how we should look at the administrative processes and all those things. Members of the government backbench got up and spoke about how we should look at the administrative processes that changed here because those nitty-gritty details are so important.

Well, Madam Speaker, what is most important in this bill is that all of those nitty-gritty details are actually just being thrown in an omnibus bill. They’re trying to make it so that it’s too hard to debate this bill. They’re trying to make it so that it’s too difficult to figure out what is important in this bill. There is lots that’s important in this bill; that’s true. But this government does not even have the respect for this institution – they don’t even have the respect for this institution – to introduce individual bills for each of those processes, right? They could have pulled out ATRF into an individual bill. They could have pulled out LAPP into an individual bill. In fact, most governments would, Madam Speaker.

But what we are seeing instead is an Americanization of our democracy, an intentional Americanization of how we do legislation in this House, an intentional attack on our fundamental democratic institution. They’re giving $4.7 billion away on one hand, they’re chartering private planes, they’re doing all these things, and then they bring in an omnibus-style bill just like in the States. That’s something that’s very shocking.

I think that they are trying to do some very dangerous things. They’re trying to do some very dangerous things in this House. They’re trying to do things that underpin and attack the foundations of why we are here. They attack the foundations of why we were elected. They attack the foundations of our entire process, Madam Speaker, and that’s very dangerous. It’s very dangerous that we can see this type of thing happening in front of us.

We can see history being written. We can see history being written when we have a bill that actually proposes to fire the prosecutor who is investigating corruption, bribery, fraud, and forgery, including from people who sit in this very House right now. People who have seats in this Chamber are currently being investigated, and many of them who are not being investigated have been interviewed. I believe it’s actually dozens of people on the government benches. When we hear that they are now firing that investigator, that is an attack on our justice. That is an attack on democracy. That is an attack on our Legislature, and that is something that is absolutely shameful. That is something that is absolutely disgraceful, and these government members should be ashamed. I hear them laughing and chuckling away, but they should be ashamed.

I know that some of them, if the shoe was on the other foot, if, let’s say, they were MPs in Ottawa – in fact, some of these members were MPs in Ottawa – if they had seen a federal government pull this off, would be lighting their hair perhaps even literally on fire, Madam Speaker. I wouldn’t dare to speak on what they may or may not do. That is something that we would see time and time again.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available.

Ms Phillips: The member had begun some thoughts on the implications of firing the Election Commissioner and certainly has pointed to some evidence as to why this might be problematic with respect to due process, the rule of law, and the integrity of free and fair elections in a democracy. I’m wondering if he can continue to share those thoughts with us.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you to the member for their comments there. I think it’s very important that when we look at this legislation and we look at what this legislation proposes to do and when we look at – in any western liberal democracy, what we see is that this legislation is an affront to those systems. I’ve said it before, but I think that this is really shocking. This is tinpot dictator stuff, right? This is actually crazy stuff, to go in and try to fire the person investigating yourself. No other system in the world would accept this as a reasonable way to do justice in your system. The integrity of the judiciary, the integrity of having independent investigations are fundamental.

You would expect this type of bill to be brought in in countries, Madam Speaker, that we would consider too dangerous to travel to. That’s where you would expect this type of bill to be brought in. Instead, we are seeing this bill brought in in Alberta, which is supposed to be a free and strong area, a free and strong province. Instead, we are seeing this bill brought in in what is supposed to be a western liberal democracy, what is supposed to be somewhere with free and fair democratic elections. That is one of the greatest jeopardies posed to our Legislature and likely will be for generations to come.

We are seeing history being written right now, and government backbenchers should realize that. They should realize that they are being a part of one of the most fundamental changes to what we do in this province and how we recognize the independence of investigations and the integrity of our democratic institutions. They are right now voting on a bill that will affect this province for generations to come. They are voting on whether we think it's okay to fire the person investigating corruption, fraud, bribery, and forgery, Madam Speaker. That is what is being voted on right now in this bill. That is what's being debated in this bill.

And the government will accuse us of being dramatic. The government will accuse us of using hyperbole, Madam Speaker, but it's right here in black and white: the Election Commissioner is being terminated. That is insane. That is actually insane. It is a type of thing you would never expect to see in a justice system like this, the type of thing you would never expect to see in a democratic institution like this. Every single thing that this building stands for, that this Chamber stands for is being attacked by this bill, and that is not hyperbole.

It is not too much to say that this will fundamentally damage the trust Albertans have in our democratic institutions, and that's not my opinion, Madam Speaker; that's the opinion of the Election Commissioner. That's what he wrote in his letter when he found out he was fired summarily through the media. That's what's shocking, that this government has so little respect for that office, the office that has fined their party over $200,000, that they fired him through the media and now are ignoring that this will undermine our democratic independence, our democratic institutions, and independent offices of this Legislature. That is a type of corruption, that's a type of fraud that is going on when we vote for this bill. That is what is so scary.

I want to say it again because I think it's important that all members of the House are able know this, but I think it's something that is – you don't want to get caught in a cover-up, right? You don't want to be caught in the cover-up because there will be consequences. This attack on our justice system, this attack on our democracy, this attack on our Legislature will not be allowed to stand. It cannot be allowed to stand because we live in a western liberal democracy, Madam Speaker. We live in a democracy that is supposed to have freedoms, that's supposed to have independence and integrity, and when we move forward and fire our own prosecutors that are investigating our own parties, that will ruin it.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I am pleased to join some comments to what's already been said here today on Bill 22, the Reform of Agencies, Boards and Commissions and Government Enterprises Act, 2019. This is a thick bill. As we've seen, this government has also had two previous ones, 20 and 21, which are also omnibus bills. This one changes or amends 31 statutes, so it's a substantial piece of legislation.

It does, as many of my colleagues have already shared, sort of hit at some of the foundations of a democratic state, and I guess I just – you know, there are different sorts of categories, categorization systems, but I came across just some principles of democracy that I think are worth talking about at this point because I think that this bill jeopardizes some of those principles. Certainly, I know that my colleagues care very much about having a robust, fair democracy, and we actually – for myself, I mean, that's really one of the reasons I got involved in politics, because I really wanted to make sure that people were engaged and that anyone could be a representative if they did the work and had a set of values that they wanted to champion.

You know, I grew up in Alberta, and I grew up in the Peace Country. My views were often in the minority, but I had deep roots in what my values were. I often was the dissenting voice in the classroom, but I know what I believed, and my roots have only grown deeper through the years. I'm an Albertan, just like the folks in the room, but I haven't been, a lot of times, the majority. I have had the dissenting voice. But that's what's so cool about a democracy, that we honour that dissenting voice and that we are a tolerant society and that we know that people can have different values but still coexist in harmony or, hopefully, close to harmony.

Some of these principles that I just want to identify. Just fundamentally, you know, we accept the results of the elections. We know what's happening in this House. We know that we are 24 members here in the opposition. Of course, that's not enough to be a majority, so the government has the majority, and that makes them in charge and make decisions.

But in a healthy democracy, of course, there are opposition voices that can be heard, and sometimes opposition voices can actually influence the government enough that they may change decisions because they will see some aspect of what's being shared and think: ah, we should have integrated that into that plan. A democracy is not just: that government won, and then nothing more can be said about it. There's lots that can be said about it. I'm sure that the governing party right now would say that when they were in opposition, they too influenced the government, which was the party that I represent. It is kind of a give-and-take. It's not just an absolute dictatorship or anything.

Certainly, we know that democracy has to have accountability. We talk about citizen participation. That's sort of fundamental to a democracy, encouraging that, enhancing it. Controlling abuses of power: we want to make sure that people aren't, you know, using their positions and taking advantage of that. You have economic freedom. People have choices. They can choose to work in a certain field. They can join unions. People can do all sorts of things. We believe in equality, that people have the right to opportunities and that people sometimes need a hand up to have them access those opportunities. We believe in human rights. Anyway, there's a long list of sort of aspects of democracy, and I just wanted sort of to remind my colleagues in the House that those underpin the decisions, the things we do each day, how we conduct ourselves in this Legislature.

Bill 22, to get more specific here, is challenging some of those tenets, principles of democracy. Of course, I along with my colleagues in the NDP caucus here do have some trouble with it. As the government clearly sees, we've been focusing on a key aspect of Bill 22, which is the most egregious piece of it, which is the firing of the Election Commissioner. We all know – it's been said clearly in here – that there's an ongoing investigation into the leadership contest of the UCP; $200,000 has been levied in fines. A lot of those people who were fined are now in the court system fighting those fines, so it's not settled. Even though the fines have been levied, there are, you know, defences on either side going ahead. There's much work to do.

It is a deep concern that the current government would want to fire the commissioner unless, you know, there's something that we don't know about what's gone on. Are they trying to hide something? I mean, transparency: I didn't get far enough down my list, but transparency is also another sort of tenet, principle of democracy. We need to understand how things are happening, so we need to have transparent processes. This change has really created a lot of fog, I guess, very little transparency, so that concerns me greatly. We know that in order for, I don't know, justice to be done – like, who is going to carry on with the work of the commissioner? How will the evidence be secured? What will be done to make sure that fair processes are continued? I don't hear the government really explaining that.

I mean, there's been a firestorm of response to this bill in the media, you know, social media but also in the mainstream media. I just wanted to refer to an Edmonton Journal columnist. Keith Gerein wrote a piece today about it, and I just want to share that with the House. What he says is:

When a government charges ahead with a move as seemingly brazen as this, it can indicate only one thing. Alberta is now being governed by those who have lost any fear of political fallout, a machine that has come to interpret its election mandate as a blank cheque to do whatever it wants, no matter the optics, the cost to accountability, or the threat to democracy itself.

I just want to pause there before I go on and just make a comment. That is something that we do hear from the government over and over again, that because they have a majority government, no other voices can be heard. Somehow I don't have legitimacy, or I'm being told that I don't have legitimacy in standing in this House. I find that extremely offensive. I mean, when they were in opposition, they had every right to stand up and champion their values. I have that right right at this moment, and I take offence when I'm told that just because we don't have a majority government, I have no voice. I do, and I know my constituents voted for me so that I would share that voice. I think that Keith Gerein's comments here are very articulate in that, you know, that is sort of the narrative that we are hearing from the government.

I'll continue with his words.

For those still gamely trying to keep up with the government's agenda, the election commissioner at the centre of this – Lorne Gibson – is the same one who in just 16 months of work, has imposed 30 letters of reprimand, punished nearly 90 instances of political over-contributions, and issued more $200,000 in fines to people connected with Jeff Callaway's UCP leadership campaign.

The same commissioner who is responsible, in part, for what little the Alberta public knows about that scandal, and who may well be investigating further alleged malfeasance connected to the UCP race, including what role [the Premier] may have played.

In short, if there was ever an independent officer of the legislature who proved his or her worth in such a short time, it is this commissioner.

High praise for Commissioner Lorne Gibson.

Still, the UCP government says it has two legitimate reasons for firing Gibson mid investigation and placing the responsibilities of his office under the control of the Chief Electoral Officer.

First, the move will save close to $1 million over five years, and second, it will put Alberta back in line with other provinces that do not have a separate, independent commissioner's office.

In effect, the UCP would like the public to see this as a purely administrative move with no larger impact whatsoever, rather than an attempt to obscure alleged party corruption [and] government corruption.

The UCP's rationale rings hollow in two respects, according to Gerein.

To begin, the idea that Alberta should have the same election law enforcement model as other provinces comes across as hypocritical, considering the UCP has been eager in other instances to break from the pack, whether it be to create a separate minimum wage for youth or try to impose geographic restrictions on doctors.

As well, saving $200,000 a year – approximately what it costs to deliver health care for five minutes in Alberta – is the government equivalent of scrounging the couch cushions for loose change. It's hard to imagine the UCP would see those paltry savings as worth the political blowback, unless there was an advantage at stake.

Yeah. What's that advantage?

The fact that the government plans to invoke closure on the bill . . .

It's true. The government gave us notice that they were going to invoke closure before they introduced the bill, so any talk that they didn't do that is mythical.

. . . and limit debate to three hours, also tells you how much confidence the UCP has in the legislation standing on its merits. (Not to mention the fact that [the Premier] is spending the next few days in Texas, 3,500 km away from annoying questions about the move).

Ultimately, the overriding concern here has to be for the progress of any open investigations, particularly the UCP leadership probe, which includes some unfinished court challenges.

The government says it expects all such investigations to continue. However, they also admit the decision of how to assign staff resources, and whether to rehire Gibson – or any commissioner for that matter – will now be up to the Chief Electoral Officer.

And even if the current electoral officer, Glen Resler, decides to let the probes stand, his contract is up in April, giving the government an opportunity to find a new officer less interested in investigating.

Then he goes on to say this:

To no one's surprise . . . Albertans are already comparing the move to that of U.S. President Donald Trump, who has shown an inclination for trying to obstruct any institution or individual investigating him.

These are the words of a journalist, published today, who obviously covers Alberta's provincial government and what it does.

I mean, there are so many aspects of that that really undermine, certainly, Albertans' faith in the work that we're doing here. It makes no sense, what is going on, and Bill 22's firing the Election Commissioner makes people shake their heads. Regular Albertans are wondering what's going on. They're surprised by this. I mean, I know that this is something that is pretty important to the Premier and the UCP. They had a very large platform, and they said that they would fulfill their platform, and it's in their platform. That's their plan going forward. Unfortunately, these are things that weren't in their platform. It is, I guess, what's politically expedient. Sometimes, you know, they're saying one thing but doing another. Therefore, people are confused, to be frank, and kind of outraged, as I think Keith Gerein does very well articulate.

10:40

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. member, I suspect you will table that document that you read from although it may not be necessary as you pretty much read the entire document.

Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. Are you wanting to speak under 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise to speak to 29(2)(a) and ask a number of questions of the hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview, who spoke so eloquently about Bill 22 and some of the affronts to her sense of democracy that it represents. I couldn't help wondering, as I listened to her profound remarks about the impact Bill 22 will have in the lives of her constituents and some of the remarks that she's already received from her constituents, what indeed she thinks the reaction will be, as we all do, when she goes to meet with young students in some of the classrooms that we as MLAs visit and read to on a regular basis each year. Quite often the beginnings of those meetings with those students are prefaced with small vignettes of what it's like to be an MLA and participate in government or opposition sides of the House and fulfill our duties as MLAs and perform the roles that we're elected to perform as members of this Legislature.

In light of this Bill 22 I'm wondering if that changes her sense of pride in trying to describe exactly what this democracy we're a part of is really founded on. I'm just wanting to hear perhaps what her initial, unvarnished remarks might be when she considers talking next time to groups of students in Edmonton-Riverview in light of the changes that this bill will bring to democracy in Alberta and the views of Albertans themselves about it and perhaps how we're seen in other jurisdictions as well.

Ms Sigurdson: Well, thank you very much to the Member for Edmonton-McClung for those comments and questions about, yeah, speaking to young Albertans who we often, you know, as MLAs – I mean, I think that's one of the most enjoyable parts of the job, going to, especially, grade 6 classes, because it's part of that curriculum where they learn about provincial government, and hearing their questions and trying to understand that. To be honest, I feel that part of the work of any MLA is being a witness – right? – to what is actually happening and understanding it. I guess we're sort of all very, I think, deeply, compared to an average Albertan, understanding the machinations of government and how it works and how it doesn't and what supports it and what doesn't support it.

Certainly, what encouraged me – and I usually talk to young students about this – is: why did you become a politician? I didn't become a politician willingly. I really had to be convinced and wooed a bit before that. I had been a social worker for 25 years, but I was frustrated with dealing with cuts after cuts. I mean, I worked front-line social work when Premier Klein was here, and he cut public programs by 50 per cent, and I just saw the devastation. I certainly had deep concerns about the choices the government was making, and I continue to have those concerns with this Conservative government.

But, you know, besides talking to Albertans about the importance of decisions that are made in this House and how it impacts their lives, earlier today I was with a group of professionals. These are adults who vote and work in our province. There were a lot of people pretty disgusted with the choices of this government. There were a lot of people who were shocked that AISH and Alberta seniors' benefit were being deindexed, that bracket creep was happening, because all Albertans are going to be paying higher taxes. This government didn't run on that in their platform. Unfortunately, they didn't honestly tell Albertans what their plan was. Certainly, these professionals I saw were very disheartened by Bill 22 and by people not having the resources to carry on with the investigation, possibly, and the lack of willingness to really support our democracy, because we want people to feel better . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I entered politics to represent people, regular, average, everyday people, because I am one. My background is construction: early mornings, black coffee, and hard work, a training ground where contracts are still done on a handshake, a look in the eye, and based on one's character and integrity. In fact, I ran my business under the name of Integrity Builders for more than 13 years and built a reputation over that time for characteristics that allowed me to win a nomination and an election this spring. This new job as a Member of the Legislative Assembly is very different from my former career. Plain language isn't plain. A single word can change the meaning and connotation of an entire phrase, and nothing is as straightforward as snapping a line and cutting a sheet of plywood, where you measure twice and you cut once. I understand that world, and I am still learning this one.

But I know people, and the Minister of Finance looks me straight in the eye and has a solid handshake, and I trust him. I also know that that may not be a good enough reason for many people, so I began reading Bill 22 to learn for myself the truth that is written there, the whole truth and nothing but the truth, so help me God. On page 21 of the bill, under 153.093(5) it says:

Any employment contract between the Legislative Assembly of Alberta and the person who, immediately before the coming into force of this section, held the office of Election Commissioner under this Act is terminated on the coming into force of this section.

Pretty straightforward that that person is terminated.

It carries on in subsection (6). That says:

The person who, immediately before the coming into force of this section, held the office of Election Commissioner under this Act may be appointed by the Chief Electoral Officer as the Election Commissioner pursuant to the Public Service Act.

So that individual could have their job back if they're deemed to be worthy of it.

As stated by the Minister of Finance and completely true, the Election Commissioner is removed by this act but can absolutely be put back in place at the discretion of the Chief Electoral Officer should he or she be deemed the best choice of that office, not by an elected official, not by this government in power but at arm's length and in line with the practice of nearly every other provincial Legislature in Canada. I think that's pretty straightforward and clear.

In the same way, under 153.093(2)(f) it says:

An investigation commenced by the Election Commissioner under section 153.09 of this Act or section 44.95 of the Election Finances and Contributions Disclosure Act before the coming into force of this section may be continued by the person who holds the position of Election Commissioner.

The only challenge I see here with some legalese or that kind of thing is the word "may," meaning it may continue or it may not continue based on, presumably, the experience, understanding, and character of the Election Commissioner as well as the evidence or lack thereof, and I leave that to the office of the Chief Electoral Officer and whomever they may appoint to the office of Election Commissioner.

This bill, in fact, in the vast majority of its changes, in plain construction language, cleans up duplications and redundancies of agencies, boards, and commissions, predominantly to save Albertans money. By eliminating waste and bureaucratic growth, this bill makes good, thoughtful decisions in light of our current fiscal situation, which is not sustainable and on a trajectory to reach $100 billion of debt. That is a legacy I will not leave for my children, and I will support this bill.

I started this evening speaking about trust. It is clearly evident that trust is truly lacking in our society today, but I will continue to try to build trust where I can and whenever I can, just like building a construction business, by doing it one person at a time. Like we used to say in construction: just keep nailing, and it'll all come together.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

10:50

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. Are there any members wishing to speak?

Seeing none, any other members wishing to speak to the main bill, Bill 22? The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Ms Ganley: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise to move an amendment, which reads as follows . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Before you read the amendment, could you just wait till it's distributed to me?

Hon. member, this will be known as amendment RA1. Please proceed.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much. I move that second reading of Bill 22, Reform of Agencies, Boards and Commissions and Government Enterprises Act, 2019, be amended by deleting all the words after "that" and substituting the following:

Bill 22, Reform of Agencies, Boards and Commissions and Government Enterprises Act, 2019, be not now read a second time because the Assembly is of the view that dissolving the independent office of the Election Commissioner could have negative impacts on the independence of election administration and the real and perceived integrity of the election process in Alberta.

Boy, that's putting it mildly.

Madam Speaker, I think that of all the bills I have ever seen come before the House, this is the one that I probably find the most objectionable. The reason I say that is because it strikes at that which is most fundamental to how we govern ourselves, that which is most fundamental to how our institutions are set up. It strikes at the rule of law, but in this case, you know, we're talking about something that does impact the rule of law, the rule of law and specifically the decision of the Election Commissioner, so not just the rule of law but the perceived and actual fairness of our electoral process. I think that that should be a huge concern to everyone in here, and I hope that members in this House will support this.

I think one thing that's worth clarifying is that the members opposite keep rising and saying: well, this is a debate about, you know, whether there is one person or two people making this decision and how exactly the legislation is written and who's in charge of whom. But that just misses the point so fundamentally on so many levels. The point isn't who should have jurisdiction or who should investigate what or whether there should be one or two or what the efficiencies are; the point, Madam Speaker, is that the man was terminated in the middle of an active investigation into the very people who are terminating him. I mean, those points about who should investigate what and who's in charge of whom and what the legislation says are all incredibly important points but not as important as the fact that he is investigating members of a political party, a political party that forms the government in this province currently, and members of that same government, of that same political party who are being investigated are coming forward to remove him from his office.

He has issued 211,000 and some dollars in fines to date against multiple different individuals. Every time, it seems, that this issue comes up again, more individuals are found to be complicit. I mean, we're literally talking about envelopes of money. Those are some of the allegations. I think that should be a huge concern. I think the fact that the Election Commissioner has levelled so many fines, the fact that the RCMP is investigating related matters should be a huge concern.

What message does this send, Madam Speaker, to those members of the RCMP? What message does it send to those people who are also investigating allegations of fraud around this same matter? I think the message that it sends is: don't look too deeply; we may decide to get rid of you, too. I think that's a message that's pretty concerning. The idea that those who are in power can remove oversight of themselves is a huge concern.

You know, we hear people talk about the rule of law a lot. I feel like it's maybe a concept that doesn't penetrate that deeply. Fundamentally, what it means is that you, that I, that every person in this room, that every person in this country are subject to the same laws, that we are all equal before those same laws. Decisions about how those laws impact us, decisions about whether we have violated those laws are not based on who we are or who we know or how much money we have or who our friends are. Those decisions are fundamentally based on our own actions. Different circumstances, different application, but fundamentally everyone gets the same rules.

I can't imagine a principle more fundamental. I mean, go to a class of kindergarten children and ask them whether it's fair to play a game where everyone has to abide by the same rules except the person who's chosen to be in charge because they get to remove from the game anyone who calls them out on violating the rules. I think it's pretty straightforward that no one would consider that acceptable.

That isn't all the bill does. Part of the concern is the number of unrelated ideas that are rolled together here. This bill also attacks pensions governance. For instance, teachers in this province have had the ability to have an equal say over the use of their pension funds for a number of years. I think that's pretty appropriate, you know, if it's their money. These are educated professionals. They have a direct interest in this matter. It's been this way for a number of years. They care about their own retirement future, and I think it's reasonable that they care about the future of their retirement savings, so they want to have a say. What could be more democratic than saying that they are permitted to elect representatives to have that say on their behalf? This bill changes that.

It also has an impact on the retirement savings of many other folks. We worked long and hard when we were in government to ensure that many different types of employees had a say through their union about the use of their pension funds. LAPP, for instance, was certainly referenced earlier today. I think that's important. I think it's important that people deserve to have a say in their retirement funds.

You know, the member before me spoke at length about regular people and how he's here to represent regular people. Well, at the same time, he's defending a bill which takes the rights away from regular people to have a say in how their retirement funds are managed. It imposes on them requirements about – essentially, the implication by the Finance minister earlier today was: we have to have the ability to remove the chosen representative of the workers because that person might not meet the standards of competence. We're not worried about management, and we're not worried about us meeting a standard of competence, but we're really worried that the workers might choose someone that doesn't meet that standard. I think that that is a pretty unfair thing to say.

11:00

I think this bill does a lot of things, and I think one of the big concerns here is that we're talking about not only an enormous number of things that are done in this bill and an enormous impact on the financial concerns of the people that were in the pension programs impacted; we're also talking about something that impacts the rule of law and how we govern ourselves as a democracy.

To bring forward a huge bill like this, all rammed together, and to move that closure can be used at all three levels before the bill is even introduced is a big concern. You know, the members opposite are going to argue: well, we didn't invoke it right away; you had more than three hours of debate. I mean, that's a pretty low bar, but I think the concern is that it's not the hours of debate. It's not the number of hours that we're here in the middle of the night talking about this bill. The concern is the overall time for the public to notice. I'm not here to stand on my own convictions alone. The purpose of my having the ability to debate this bill is not because I'm a special person somehow. It's because I'm someone who was elected to represent a whole lot of other people, so the concern isn't about whether or not I have time to speak to the bill or whether or not I have time to look at the bill. The concern is about whether or not my constituents have time to understand the bill.

Given that we're looking at potentially seeing this pass before the end of the week, in four days, when we're sitting overnight, when I have no opportunity to even go back to Calgary and speak to my constituents about this bill – incidentally, my office had received already this morning more than 50 e-mails about this bill – you know, I think that's a huge concern. I think that when we attack our fundamental democratic institutions and we try to do so in such a way that we can move it through in less than a week in order to avoid public scrutiny, that should be a big concern. That's what this entire thing is about, avoiding public scrutiny. The removal of the Election Commissioner is about avoiding future public scrutiny. The moving of the bill to remove the Election Commissioner so quickly is about avoiding public scrutiny. I think that that's a really big concern.

The idea that the members opposite are talking about, "Well, that person could have their job back if they're deemed to be worthy of it," that's kind of exactly the concern, right? Who's doing the deeming of the worthiness? The idea that investigation should be independent, that those investigating breaches of the law should be independent is fundamental.

You know, the government loves to accuse us of fear and smear, but a lot of this isn't even coming from us. A lot of this is coming from the media, is coming from the people out there. I don't think there are actually words that I can use in this place that are sufficient to describe my feelings about this bill, which is fundamentally attacking the rule of law, attacking our democracy. I think that that is a pretty big concern.

I was reading sort of historically different things about the rule of law, and many moons ago Samuel Rutherford used this to argue against the divine right of kings. That's the thing that I'm concerned about here, right? The idea that the king had divine right was something that was being argued against. This was the idea that the rules applied to everyone else but because the king was divine, they didn't apply to him. I don't want to see that happen here in Alberta. I don't want it to be the case that we live in a place and we can say: well, the rules apply to everyone unless of course you're investigating those who are in power, in which case you will be removed from your office because the rules ought not to apply to them.

I believe that every person in this province should be concerned about this. This isn't a conversation about how the rules should be enforced or who should enforce them or whether it's better to have one agency or two. It is a conversation about whether those rules ought to be enforced at all. I think that that is a huge concern.

[The Speaker in the chair]

If we're saying that the rules should be enforced so long as they aren't enforced against members of the governing party, I think people would be appalled to hear that, to hear that this is a conversation that we are having here, and I think it is a sneaking in of American politics into our system because I think we've seen some very similar things in the U.S. with the current President around the idea, you know, I mean, even the consideration of removing people that are investigating you. That's not appropriate.

Mr. Speaker, we don't even know how or if the evidence is being secured from this investigation. I mean, that's a pretty big concern. Are they transferring that evidence to the RCMP? Where does it go?

I think, you know, the Election Commissioner himself, his comments are very telling. "I am concerned about the potential negative impacts on the independence of election administration and the real and perceived integrity of the election process." I think that this whole incident calls into . . . [Ms Ganley's speaking time expired]

And with that, I will sit down.

The Speaker: Hon. members, we are on RA1. Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. The hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley caught my eye.

Mr. Loewen: Okay. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I guess I just want to confirm that we are talking about the amendment before us here now. It seems like the member that put the amendment forward didn't talk a lot about the amendment, talked about everything but it, including teachers' pension, which I don't see in the amendment at all. She talked a lot about, you know, complained about the lack of time for debate, but of course she took a lot of time talking about everything but the amendment which she brought forward. So, I guess, when we're complaining about the hours of debate that they may or may not have, it seems bizarre that they would take time and talk about anything else other than what's at hand, which was, of course, the amendment.

Now, I just want to go through this amendment a little bit. It suggests "that dissolving the independent Office of the Election Commissioner could have negative impacts on the independence of election administration." Now, it's always good to go right back to the bill itself, I think, because, obviously, there's all sorts of spin going on from the NDP and their friends, and a lot of times that spin doesn't always represent the truth or what's actually written in the bill.

When I look at the bill here, it says on page 20, section (11), and this is under the heading "The Office of the Election Commissioner is dissolved."

(2) On the coming into force of subsection (1), the following applies.

- (a) the property, assets, rights, obligations, liabilities, powers, duties and functions of the Office of the Election Commissioner become the property, assets, rights, obligations, liabilities, powers, duties and functions of the Office of the Chief Electoral Officer.

Now, obviously, this amendment suggests "that dissolving the independent Office of the Election Commissioner could have negative impacts on the independence of election administration." So I guess what this amendment is suggesting is that there's no independence of the office of the Chief Electoral Officer. Now, that's a pretty serious allegation, I think. I think that we have some confidence in the Chief Electoral Officer being able to do their job in that office and the Chief Electoral Officer himself doing his job, but obviously, the members opposite are suggesting that there is "the real and perceived integrity of the election process." So they're suggesting that there could be a problem with the integrity of the election process if the Election Commissioner's "property, assets, rights, obligations, liabilities, powers, duties and functions" are turned over to the Chief Electoral Officer. Now, that's pretty serious.

Now, I'm going to go on and read the next section. First, I'll read:

(2) On the coming into force of subsection (1), the following applies:

- (b) the records in the custody or under the control of the Office of the Election Commissioner are transferred to the custody and control of the Office of the Chief Electoral Officer.

Again, when we apply this amendment's suggestion that dissolving the Election Commissioner office "could have negative impacts on the independence of election administration and the real and perceived integrity," it's another serious allegation, that the office of the Chief Electoral Officer is somehow going to have a perceived lack of integrity and lack of independence.

11:10

I'm just going to go on and read the next paragraph.

(2) On the coming into force of subsection (1), the following applies:

- (c) an existing cause of action, claim or liability to prosecution of, by or against the Office of the Election Commissioner is unaffected by the coming into force of this section and may be continued by or against the Office of the Chief Electoral Officer.

So any suggestion by the members opposite and their allies, that are out running around spreading information, that any action or claim or prosecution that's going on with the office of the Election Commissioner would somehow be stopped by this bill is absolutely false. It states clearly in the bill that that will be continued "by or against the Office of the Chief Electoral Officer." Again, this amendment is suggesting somehow that the Chief Electoral Officer could have a lack of independence or real and perceived integrity. When we look at things like that, we understand that this amendment, obviously, has no bearing at all and should be voted down.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, we are back on RA1. I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung has risen to provide some debate.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm glad to rise this evening to speak to the amendment to Bill 22, which, I would say without hesitation, is an understatement of the session given the impacts that the bill would have should it be passed. I fully support the intent of the amendment to Bill 22 to not have the bill read a second time because, as the amendment states, "the Assembly is of the view that dissolving the independent Office of the Election Commissioner could have negative impacts on the independence of election administration and the real and perceived integrity of the election process in Alberta."

As I said, Mr. Speaker, the statements contained in the proposal to amend Bill 22 are certainly an understatement and something that is underscored by the current Election Commissioner himself, who in a media release today eloquently expressed how, in fact, any democracy should be very careful to protect the ways in which it conducts elections. His intent, of course, in making his disappointment known about the fact that indeed he was going to be losing his position and that the position would be terminated stemmed not from a personal sense of loss but about "the potential negative impacts on the independence of election administration and the real and perceived integrity of the election process," and that's a quote from his statement released today.

He goes on to say, Mr. Speaker, that his "disappointment stems from [his] firm belief that the citizens of Alberta must have confidence and trust in the integrity of all aspects of the provincial electoral process." That is critical and fundamental to what we're speaking about this evening, confidence and trust. I'm just wondering how in the world we as Albertans in many facets, in many different situations can seem to express and have the same sense of confidence and trust in our electoral process should this Bill 22 pass unamended or pass at all. We're speaking to the amendment now to not have the bill move forward. That confidence and trust is something that many of us in this Legislature and Albertans in general have proudly exuded when we would go and speak about our province and our electoral process and our democracy in many different forums.

But now with this Bill 22, which proposes to fire the Election Commissioner, a bill which invokes closure at every stage of debate to basically get it over with quick so that it's out of the news and Albertans can move onto something else, the government's hope is that this will be something that is a quick Alberta snowstorm. Boom, it's over and melted and the grass will appear and everything is normal again, but this flurry is going to be a deep pit, a deep, heavy snowfall in the government's agenda, Mr. Speaker. It's something that they can avoid by adopting the amendment which we proposed as the opposition.

It's amazing that less than a year into its mandate we're at this place, Mr. Speaker, where a government that proudly came in talking about how it had won the right to govern, a majority in Alberta, is now with its tail between its legs, looking to fire the Election Commissioner because it seems to be afraid of what this commissioner might turn up in upcoming investigations and indeed in ongoing investigations that are alleging some very, very serious breaches of the Election Act.

In committee a number of months ago, previous to the last election, I believe it was Alberta's Economic Future Committee – I could stand corrected – there was a member, actually the proud, final standing member of the former Progressive Conservative Party to name himself and brand himself as such in this Legislature. The Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster, the former classmate of mine at Queen Elizabeth high school, stated, somewhat shockingly to me, when we were talking about setting rules around the nomination process for leadership races within political parties in Alberta – he stunned me by saying very forthrightly and resolutely and in a committed way that was really disappointing to me that government has no business in a nomination process for leadership. This really set the tone for what I began there to understand was the actual heartfelt belief of even Progressive Conservatives and now in the subsequent government and Conservative parties that there should be a closet within which nominations for leadership and leadership races within political parties are shrouded.

The crux of the matter is that the UCP government members believe that the process by which political leaders are chosen by their parties should be held in secret, as that member indicated to me so strongly, that the public has no right to review the political parties' leadership races and nomination procedures. It should be done without public scrutiny, away from the public eye, in secret, without rules or at least without any public knowledge of what the rules are that the public could scrutinize, out of sight, out of mind, none of your business. Mr. Speaker, I was very shocked and very disappointed in that member, whom I as well as many other members of this Legislature had great respect for, but that is one view that I certainly had nothing but derision for.

To see that Conservative members of this Legislature thought that a political party is some kind of private club to which public scrutiny has no right was shocking, yet that's exactly the type of attitude that is embedded in Bill 22, and we see it, unfortunately, with pride being displayed by the members opposite in the government. I'm just wondering why they come to these seemingly entitled views of what indeed political parties are and what indeed a democracy is. It astounds me that anybody who's in this Chamber, who's gotten elected, gone through the process of a nomination meeting and so forth could end up having the opinion that somehow the public doesn't deserve to know how those decisions are made within a political party, yet that's the attitude of this government. Bill 22 is a prominent display of that total disdain for the respect for our democracy that we would hope all members of this Chamber and all citizens of this province and indeed the country have.

As I mentioned to the hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview in my remarks to her under 29(2)(a), how indeed are we going to face schoolchildren that we talk to and proudly talk about our democracy, that we represent, in the light of this Bill 22, which proposes to remove an Election Commissioner who actually is involved in active investigations into alleged abuses of power and corruption on the part of the current government? Even the grade 6 classes – and I shouldn't say “even” because they have really impressed me whenever I go there with their level of understanding and their knowledge of the political process, and that's evident when you walk by the hallways when they come to do their mock parliaments. Their understanding of our democracy and what it should be is actually pretty deep, and I really am saddened to know that our grade 6 classes in these coming weeks are going to be talking about this piece of legislation and scratching their heads and, hopefully, having lots and lots of questions about what it is that this government is actually up to.

Out of sight, out of mind: why would the government want to do such a thing? It should be an interesting discussion for grade 6 classes, probably even right through to high school and university level classes, as to what this government is up to. I know that my constituents are talking about it. They're astounded. In fact, professionals in this province are talking about it, and they're not happy with it. They're ashamed, they're embarrassed, and they're angry about it. Now, even today, looking to speak with members of the Alberta Real Estate Association who were at the Matrix Hotel earlier this evening, members opposite from government may not have heard the shrillness of the arguments that I heard, but certainly I had a number of the members there talking to me about how shocked they were that this government would actually try to pull a stunt like this, to try to actually pull the rug out from underneath the Election Commissioner, who has been hitting UCP leadership campaign operatives with massive fines, in the words of Mr. Don Braid, a journalist who's of some repute in this province, not one who is necessarily the friendliest to the progressive part of the world in this province. But I'll tell you what. Mr. Braid is not overly impressed with what's going on with Bill 22 and this government. He goes on to say in his comments:

Bill 22 rolls the commission duties into Elections Alberta, the outfit that governs the wider realm of running and regulating elections.

Chief electoral officer Glen Resler [then] can decide if he wants to rehire Gibson, whose job was to enforce the election and financing laws.

Now, he goes on to say:

The government says current investigations will continue, whether Gibson is retained or not. All fines and penalties are still valid . . .

although that remains to be seen. A lot of questions are up in the air.

People I was speaking to at the reception for the Alberta Real Estate Association were dumbfounded that this current government would have the audacity to fire the Election Commissioner in the middle of an investigation which wasn't, frankly, going their way.

Even in the light of, you know, major fines that had been levied and perhaps other unforeseen judgments coming down and maybe even more fines, this government chooses to pass or attempt to pass legislation, Bill 22, to shove under the carpet the current Election Commissioner, have the role usurped by the Chief Electoral Officer, and expects that Albertans are going to be hoodwinked by this and that it will go away very quickly without much public debate.

Well, I'll tell you what, Mr. Speaker. They are about to be very, very surprised if that's what they thought, because the large number of complaints that were received by the Election Commissioner early on after he was returned to office after being fired by a previous Conservative administration speaks to the fact that Albertans wholeheartedly disagreed with that member's desire to operate political parties as a private club. I speak about the former Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster, who said in committee to us that he thought that political parties were basically tantamount to private clubs and that public scrutiny was not something that the electorate deserved to have and had no right to oversee, these private political clubs that they were so entitled to belong to.

I wonder aloud about other conversations we have as MLAs when we do our constituency work. What are we to say to newcomers to this country, Mr. Speaker, who want and are hungry and thirsty to learn about our democracy and who come from places where there is no democracy, where the rules are broken constantly if there are any rules, who struggle to put in place rules that emulate what we thought were the gold standard here in Canada and in Alberta, where the election laws are something to be proud of, where you can run to be a leader of a political party in full knowledge that the rules that are in place will be followed? Yet these newcomers will question exactly what's going on in this province if this bill passes, and rightly so.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. I see the Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods has risen on 29(2)(a).

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, and I want to thank my colleague for his comments. He spoke at several points about the feedback that he has received from Albertans, whether it was at an evening mixer that he attended or talking to school groups. I just wondered if he might be able to tell us if he as an MLA has been contacted by his constituents around the contents of Bill 22 and how that has informed his position on this piece of legislation and through that to the reasoned amendment that is before us, that we are currently debating.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung if you'd like to respond.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to respond to the hon. member's comments. I've always appreciated her deep and insightful analysis of any issue we're debating in this House, and that certainly goes for this debate tonight on Bill 22 and the amendment thereto that we are discussing right now.

Other members in this House have spoken earlier this evening about this debate being one of the rule of law versus the rule of force. That is something that I was alluding to when I spoke about us as members of the Legislature or even members of the public who happen to be at gatherings where we find ourselves talking to newcomers about our electoral process. What are we to say to newcomers to this country who want to learn about what this gold standard of democracy that we supposedly have in this province means to us and how it enshrines the rights of everyone to, without fear of reproach and without any expectations of interference, fairly achieve public office, a leadership role within a political party in this country, in this province, knowing that the rules are going to be followed and that there are consequences for not following those rules? Those consequences are what keep in check those who might want to thwart the rules and just, in fact, go ahead and take over a leadership position in a way that many of these newcomers have seen in countries that they left or escaped in order to come to Canada. Many countries come to mind, Mr. Speaker, where those individuals who come to this country will tell stories of there being no democracy, no opportunity to have a representative government, no opportunity to even run for office. It simply would be a dictatorship position where a leader would expect to rule for life, perhaps, and have no inclination to ever give up power or to ever give any credence to or believe that anybody had any ability or right to openly oppose them.

That seems to be what's happening, Mr. Speaker, in this province. A government, that was elected last April, a United Conservative Party government, seems to be implying with Bill 22 that they have a divine right to govern without opposition, without necessarily bending to the rule of law. That's something that's shocking as far as the history that we have in this country, a proud history of representative democracy, that we have fought world wars to defend. My family members have certainly been overseas to defend it. I know that those who we recently remembered on November 11 as having served and fought for our country to defend our values, our democratic process and our electoral process, would be turning over in their graves to look at what this government is trying to do to our electoral process here in Alberta. Never mind my late grandfather and my father, who both served in the Canadian Army to protect our democratic rights, but even my grandmother, who served at home, keeping the family farm operating during wartime, who later was elected numerous times to serve on village council in Thorhild, never ever in her wildest dreams would have thought that this would come to pass.

The Speaker: Hon. members, we are on RA1. I see the hon. Member for Barrhead-Westlock — for Athabasca-Barrhead-Westlock.

Mr. van Dijken: Yes. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. With all the changes that went on in the previous four years, I can understand why you're confused with regard to my constituency having changed from Barrhead-Morinville-Westlock to Athabasca-Barrhead-Westlock now. That was just part of a lot of the changes that occurred during the previous term of government. I was here as a member of the Official Opposition at that time, and I feel I can spread some light on how we came to this point and on some of the concerns we had when the previous government was introducing the changes to the Election Act and to how we would be overseeing the process within Alberta.

You know, the amendment is to essentially not utilize this act and that we not read it a second time. I believe that Bill 22, Reform of Agencies, Boards and Commissions and Government Enterprises Act, 2019, is long overdue. I'm thankful that the President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance is taking it seriously, finding ways to do governance better, to do process better, to be able to find efficiencies within how we're able to move forward in a manner that respects the taxpayer's dollar and respects the fact that government needs to be accountable to the taxpayer on how their money is being spent. I believe that the plans that are being proposed in Bill 22 will lead to better governance, will lead to more efficient government, and I'm happy to support it at this time. I believe that we should continue on with our process through second reading.

You know, there were many times during the previous government that I had concerns over how the previous government would just continue to not look for ways to manage more efficiently, manage better, but on the contrary the previous government continued to spend, spend, spend without any consideration for Alberta taxpayers.

We even take a look with regard to the changes in the Election Act and the process with regard to the elections. Some of the advice that our Leg. Offices Committee was receiving was not adhered to. When we take a look at even things such as door-to-door enumeration, the advice was that it has been seen as being ineffective, yet the government of the day decided that $11 million spent on an enumeration was good value for taxpayers' money. I had other concerns with that.

With regard to Bill 22, you know, we get a lot of letters and a lot of people that contact us as MLAs with what they've heard, whether it's in the media, whether they've heard it from their acquaintances, whether they've heard it from their association, and they want clarity. They want clarification on what is happening: how is this going to affect them, and is this going to be a good move to move forward?

At times I've been able to speak with individuals. I had a call from an individual just yesterday morning in the office here. I rarely get a call on the phone, but the individual was very happy to be able to talk directly to me. He was very concerned with Bill 22 and the implications it had with regard to the office of the Election Commissioner. But when I was able to direct him to the bill, able to help him read through the bill, it alleviated a lot of the concern that he had with regard to the process moving forward and how the government has decided to essentially amalgamate into the office of the Chief Electoral Officer the functions of oversight over elections.

Everybody is of the opinion or there are a lot of people that are hearing that the Election Commissioner has been fired. The Election Commissioner office will be terminated. The individual that's currently holding the office will be terminated. It may be appointed by the Chief Electoral Officer if he so chooses, and the investigations that are continuing on will continue on. All the due process that has been going on in the Election Commissioner's office will be transferred over to the Chief Electoral Officer, and we can expect that those processes will continue on. To make it as if all things have come to a halt with regard to the investigations: I think that's misleading the public. The media, I believe, needs to properly inform the public of what truly is going on.

You know, I reflect on the office of the Election Commissioner, and I was very involved in committee with regard to that. We also were dealing with I believe it was Bill 32 during the previous mandate, and we as the Official Opposition had serious concerns with the direction that the previous government was moving in. We had identified early on in the process that there were concerns about the establishment of another office of the Legislature. We understood that there were going to be increased costs, that those were probably costs that could be controlled within the office of the Chief Electoral Officer much better than by establishing a whole new office with new locations, new people, and that the Chief Electoral Officer was in a good spot to be able to proceed with this duty.

You know, back in December 2017 there was much debate over whether or not we needed to move forward with that. I quote from Hansard — let's try to find out who was speaking here; it looks like the member from the constituency of Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills – with regard to the establishment of an independent officer of the Legislature with the election commissioner.

While it is important that we ensure that we have the appropriate checks and balances within our electoral system, adding an independent office of the Legislature I do not believe is the right path forward with respect to the independent elections commission. If, in fact, the government would like to have an independent elections commissioner, there is no reason why this commissioner cannot function within the confines of the chief electoral office.

Okay. We go further here about an independent elections commissioner within the province of Manitoba, a province where good portions of the NDP world view have come from, and as such, they like to point to it as a real pinnacle of NDP thought, so they like to do some of the things that they've done there. One significant difference between Manitoba and what they're proposing here is that the independent elections commissioner in Manitoba actually reports to the Chief Electoral Officer and works inside the confines of that office, not as an independent office of the Legislature.

We heard earlier today that the other provinces have this structure and that it is working fine for them.

The setting up of a completely separate office: I believe it was a budget of around $2.2 million that was introduced earlier tonight in Committee of Supply. Was that good spending of taxpayer dollars? We can look further into the debate with regard to the elections commissioner and those types of things and find that there were many, many individuals from the Official Opposition at that time that were very concerned with the redundancy of the separate office and also with regard to whether or not it was going to provide good value for taxpayers.

I think I will move forward with some of the concerns that were being brought up from the work that we did as a search committee when we went to look for an elections commissioner and some of the concerns that were brought up at the time when the motion came forward to the Legislature highlighting the concerns of the private members of the Official Opposition that participated on that search committee. I quote myself from Hansard, May 1, 2018, on many of the things that we were concerned with while we were on the search committee. Going forward, we as members on that committee from the opposition were not in favour of appointing an individual as Election Commissioner who did not have all-party support.

During the last term I served on a number of the search committees that we've put in place over the last couple of years, with a very good working relationship during search committee meetings, and we were able to come to unanimous support in all committees. But from the outset of this committee...

Again I'm quoting from when the motion came forward.

... in December it became very apparent that the members from the governing party were prepared to move forward in a way that I would consider to be somewhat haphazard, a little bit reckless.

We have long been disappointed in how members of the government caucus chose to conduct themselves throughout the entire search process. It became evident at our first meeting, at the end of December, that government MLAs were determined to proceed in a reckless fashion by forcing the Legislative Assembly Office to compose a job posting and a position profile for a brand new position in less than 48 hours.

This was a brand new position, yet the government was ready to just move at breakneck speed, without proper due diligence. We saw where the previous government decided that it was prudent to advertise for this position during Christmas. These were all concerns that led to where the members from the opposition on that search committee could not find it within themselves to actually support the motion that came forward to the House. We had made many of these concerns known to other members on the committee. For all Albertans to have confidence in the individual – we felt that it was important that that individual would be able to have the full confidence of all Albertans. Just given the history of the individual that was hired as the Election Commissioner, there would be concerns with the fact that that individual had already gone into a position of suing the Alberta government, with concerns of that.

Like I say, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance...

The Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. The hon. Minister of Culture, Multiculturalism and Status of Women has the call.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you so much, and thank you to the member. One thing I just wanted to reiterate – and the member was mentioning this – is the 48 hours in which this office was created.

The interesting thing was, too, that – there were a couple of things that I would like to provide some clarity on. One of them was a mistruth that was brought forward, hopefully accidentally, by the Member for Edmonton-City Centre, that Mr. Gibson was fired. He was not. His contract was not renegotiated, and that needs to be extremely clear. Let me provide some clarity. His contract was not renegotiated. He had moved here from Manitoba and had not had his contract renegotiated and therefore was frustrated and therefore chose to sue the government at that time. He was not fired. His contract was not renegotiated. There's a huge difference there. Let's provide some clarity there.

The second thing is that the implication that Mr. Resler is not capable of doing his job has been completely implied. The intention is, of course, there because if the government is making a decision to choose at that point in time that they know best and that they're going to go forward with the decision on a new commissioner without any consultation nor a proper, appropriate time to create a tenure to bring a person forward for that particular position, over Christmastime, too, spending an extra $20,000 bringing people in in order to be able to create said position, a redundancy that we all understand to be true at that point in time – that's the second piece.

The third thing is that Mr. Resler himself had stated at that time that he was completely capable and confident and had the people that he needed to do the job at that time. These are some of the facts.

The question I have – and potentially the member could answer this for me. As I understand it, the Chief Electoral Officer is independent. Would you please speak to that, about the independence of the Chief Electoral Officer, their job, and the competency of Mr. Resler?

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Athabasca-Barrhead-Westlock should he choose to respond.

Mr. van Dijken: Good. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have full confidence in the Chief Electoral Officer and his abilities to be able to oversee this function within his office.

I do have one comment that I was not able to get to. When the motion was brought forward before the Legislature, in our meeting as the Committee of Leg. Offices we felt that it was prudent for allowing Albertans to know what contract was being entered into with the Election Commissioner. We now are able to see what that contract was. We now are able to see the direction that the previous government decided to go in. Under the sunshine list disclosures we have a compensation of $159,523 for nine months' worth of work, which translates into just shy of $213,000.

My amendment to the government motion of the day was essentially to allow this disclosure to happen so that Albertans could see what was happening within the process of fulfilling the duty to hire an Election Commissioner. The salary was advertised, the position was advertised with a range of $152,818 to a top of $212,801 for a maximum term of five years. The previous government felt it was prudent to hire an individual that, although fully capable of being utilized as an elections consultant, never really gave me any indication that he had done any significant investigative work. So to start that individual at the top of the range, at the top salary, for a five-year term concerned me. I felt that there was opportunity to negotiate with the individual to ensure that we were in a position to move forward, to essentially go with fewer years in the term. So we proposed that amendment. The previous government decided that that was not necessary. The amendment was voted down.

I believe that that was, in my opinion, a failure to recognize the need for accountability and transparency. They could have provided more confidence to Albertans that they were doing something that we could all be confident in.

The Speaker: Hon. members, we are on amendment RA1. I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods would like to provide some comments.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise to speak to the amendment that my hon. colleague has introduced. It may be because I was at the NDP Provincial Council this past weekend debating resolutions, but I have to say that this amendment does not go far enough. I will be supporting it. [interjections] Your conventions aren't like that? Okay. Just an inside joke over here. This amendment does not go far enough. I will be supporting it, but I want to speak to, first, the amendment as it is and then what I think the amendment is missing, which I think is appropriate context for why we believe that this bill should not be read right now and instead should be amended by deleting all of the words.

First, let me start by talking about what the amendment does talk about. The amendment talks about the real issue, the negative impacts that dissolving the independent office of the Election Commissioner could have. Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the members of the government caucus throughout the debate this evening, and I really don't understand the mental hoops that they must be jumping through to make this seem logical to themselves. To be here and to pretend to not understand why this has reached national media and why it seems as though everyone who comments on politics or reports on politics or watches politics or is an expert on politics is looking at this situation and going, "You know, it doesn't pass the smell test" – in fact, many people are using far stronger language, and we're seeing this coverage across Alberta but also across the country.

For the members of the government to pretend to not know why this might be perceived as a problem, to terminate the person who is investigating issues related to their 2018 leadership contest and 2019 election, is disingenuous. I don't believe them. I have heard the call-in talk shows on the radio with countless people calling in to say: I voted UCP, and I cannot believe what this government is doing. I have seen the e-mails that I am copied on that your offices are receiving. Albertans believe in a strong democracy. Albertans believe in trust in their elections. Canadians are proud of that democracy. The actions of this government to fire the person investigating them and then to jump through some mental hoops to try to justify that is a little bit beyond belief.

Also, how can the member who spoke before me, from Athabasca-Barrhead-Westlock, stand without laughing to talk about how crazy it was that they had to write a job description in 48 hours when I am being expected to pass an 80-page omnibus bill that touches 31 pieces of legislation, that impacts every Albertan on the election side, 400,000 Albertans on the pension side, countless others, with all the minor changes inside, in what looks like will be about 72 hours? Seventy-two hours for this large omnibus piece of legislation, and the member opposite is talking about the two days it took to write a job description as if that – again, the mental hoops, the connections that are not being made to connect the arguments they are making on one hand and what is actually happening in this Chamber and in our province shock me because if you're going to fire the person who's investigating you, at least acknowledge that there is a perception that there could be a problem with that.

Also, acknowledge the words in your bill because they say very, very clearly that all of the ongoing actions, claims, liabilities, prosecutions, anything that this office is doing – it does not say: it will continue. It says: it may continue. The words "will" and "may" and "shall" are incredibly important when drafting legislation, something that I and many of the colleagues who sat in this House before understand very well. This government has chosen to include the word "may." They can stand in this House and say, "Of course, everything will continue," but the legislation doesn't say that, and they know it.

They say that the Election Commissioner is not being fired, but the legislation says that he is. He is being terminated, and he is receiving severance which I believe is less than what was in the contract that he signed. His severance is being lowered. He's being fired. The position is being demoted, yet – I mean, honestly, this could potentially be called the Lorne Gibson clause because they are getting rid of Lorne Gibson. They are getting rid of a particular individual who is the individual investigating them, and they are jumping through hoops to try and explain it away. This from the party and from the political side of the spectrum that talks about the rule of law constantly. In this case, they are jeopardizing our democracy. They are jeopardizing the trust that Albertans have in what happens in our province.

I genuinely believe that this reasoned amendment is very important because all matters relating to the 2018 leadership race and the 2019 election should be closed before any changes to this officer take place, if only for the perception. Let's not talk about the real, what actually – the government believes that there is no real impact to the investigations, but you have to admit that the perception is out there clearly among Canadians that there is a real issue with what's happening here. The perception is really important here. We need to make sure that people feel trust in their democracy and trust in their government – and I can tell you that from the conversations I'm having with my constituents, they do not feel that there is trust here – so that is what this amendment does say.

12:00

I began my remarks, Mr. Speaker, by saying that this amendment does not go far enough, because I believe that all of the words of this bill should be deleted also because of the terrible impact to pensions. I have 200 e-mails from teachers extremely concerned about the move of their pension funds to AIMCo, done in a unilateral way with no consultation. To date – and I did just check the ATRF website – this government has not provided a business case or analysis. The analysis done by the ATRF shows quite clearly that in all scenarios that they have run, the ATRF size has been an advantage and their returns have been better than AIMCo's and would have been better than AIMCo's, even taking into account the analyses of bigger is better and that if AIMCo had more money, they could find efficiencies.

I think that the 400,000 people who are part of ATRF, LAPP, PSPP, SFPP deserve the time to know what is happening with their pensions and to understand it. Now we're back to the 72 hours, Mr. Speaker, because Albertans are not being given the time to consider the contents of this omnibus legislation and the impacts to them and their lives. When we're talking about pensions, we are talking about the money these workers saved and put in place for the future. We are talking about something very key to these Albertans.

Now, timing is everything, and the timing of the debate of Bill 22 is interesting to me because, of course, our Premier is away in Texas. Almost the entirety of the debate on this legislation may happen while he is away, and that is deliberately done. [interjections] Oh, I apologize. Mr. Speaker, allow me to withdraw. It is getting late, and I should not have recognized that.

I would also note from a timing perspective that tomorrow the new federal cabinet will come out, and that's going to dominate a lot of the headlines, maybe cover up a few of the things that are happening. I think that we need to focus on the fact that Albertans deserve to know what is happening in this legislation. I think that's an incredibly important point, and the number of letters and submissions that I've received from Albertans leads me to believe that that is the case.

Now, speaking of pensions, I do want to suggest that we have some serious questions not only about AIMCo's ability to generate returns that are higher and better than ATRF's but in the case of PSPP, LAPP, SFPP and the statements that this minister has made around AIMCo's independence from government. In AIMCo's statute it says that the corporation must act in the best interests of its clients, but AIMCo is still a Crown agency that must follow directives from the Treasury Board. A directive is broadly defined to include policy under the Alberta Public Agencies Governance Act, APAGA, and that prevails over AIMCo's act. So as we debate this reasoned amendment, the government needs to explain how AIMCo will maintain distance from government when it's clear that Treasury Board directives are a key part of how government can influence what AIMCo is and is not doing.

On other things that this bill touches on, again talking about the referral and how it does not go far enough, I would include in the referral the negative impacts of moving teachers' pensions without consulting them and the damage that does to trust, the concerns and the stress that that has caused. I would include the damage it does to remove AUPE's seat at the governance table. Losing that seat, losing that influence over their own members' money is a real issue, Mr. Speaker.

I would say that this bill should not be continued because of the new competency matrix, that the government is trying to process, giving them a veto over the nominations that the sponsoring organizations make, because it's suggesting that the members, the workers, who put their money into these pensions will somehow nominate incompetent people. Which of the members of the boards now are incompetent? Please identify them. If you suggest that we are implying that the Chief Electoral Officer is incompetent in some way, which we have not and would not, certainly in your legislation and in your answers in question period you have directly stated that there are issues of competence with the people currently on the board. I would love to delve into that more because I would argue that there is not an issue of competence.

The Finance minister also completely skipped over a good chunk of this bill in his introductory comments. I would note that he didn't mention that this bill allows political parties to merge. Why would this bill be doing that, Mr. Speaker? Perhaps the government should be telling us all about the changes that directly impact their party and the parties that they were formed from and the financial arrangements between those parties because they've legislated it across several pages of this bill yet not spoken of it in this House.

Here we are with potentially less than 72 hours to process a bill that is 87 pages, across 31 pieces of legislation, that talks about so many different things: the ATB Financial mandate, changing the mandate to allow them to be more commercial and cost-effective and to avoid undue risk of loss. When I was a part of Premier Notley's government . . .

An Hon. Member: Point of order.

Ms Gray: My apologies again. I withdraw that.

. . . of the previous government, we specifically gave ATB Financial more money to give out more loans to support businesses. By giving them the direction to avoid undue risk of loss, does that mean fewer loans for small businesses? Is this fewer loans for farmers? Is that the decision that ATB Financial is going to have to make?

These are some of the concerns that I have, Mr. Speaker, so this reasoned amendment does not go far enough. There are some serious concerns with this bill and serious concerns with how this government is moving forward with this legislation. The 400,000 people who are part of these pension plans and all Albertans concerned about democracy deserve more time to fully understand what is happening in this omnibus piece of legislation.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I move to adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mrs. Pitt in the chair]

The Chair: Hon. members, I would like to call the Committee of the Whole to order.

Bill 23 Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2019

The Chair: Are there any members wishing to speak to the bill?

Hon. Members: Question.

[The clauses of Bill 23 agreed to]

[Title and preamble agreed to]

The Chair: Shall the bill be reported? Are you agreed?

Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chair: Any opposed? Carried.

12:10 Bill 20 Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, 2019

The Chair: Are there any speakers with respect to the bill? The hon. Minister of Culture, Multiculturalism and Status of Women.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you so much, Madam Chair. I rise to table some amendments. Shall I pass those up to you? How do I get those to you?

The Chair: The pages will come and grab the amendment from you. Just wait till I receive it before you proceed.

Mrs. Aheer: Okay.

The Chair: Hon. members, this will be known as amendment A2. Please proceed.

Mrs. Aheer: Madam Chair, would you like me to read this out?

The Chair: Yes, please.

Mrs. Aheer: Okay. On Bill 20, the Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, 2019, the bill is amended as follows:

- A Schedule 1 is amended
  - (a) in section 1(d) adding “to the Minister” after “delivery”;
  - (b) in section 20
    - (i) in subsection (1)
      - (A) in clause (a) by striking out “April 1, 2020” and substituting “the coming into force of this Act”;
      - (B) in clause (b) by striking out “March 31, 2020” and substituting “the day before the coming into force of this Act”;
    - (ii) in subsection (2) by striking out “March 31, 2020” and substituting “the day before the coming into force of this Act”;
  - (c) in the schedule
    - (i) in section 1
      - (A) by striking out “22%” and substituting “C”;
      - (B) by striking out the following:

B is the estimated designated assistance amount.

and substituting the following:

B is the estimated designated assistance amount;

C is the prescribed percentage applicable in the prescribed circumstances.
    - (ii) in section 2
      - (A) by striking out “22%” and substituting “C”;
      - (B) by striking out the following:

B is the designated assistance amount.

and substituting the following:

B is the designated assistance amount;

C is the prescribed percentage applicable in the prescribed circumstances.

I will take a moment to describe what all that means.

Madam Chair, I rise today to table amendments to the Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, 2019, on behalf of my colleague the Minister of Economic Development, Trade and Tourism.

I’ve heard just absolutely fantastic stories from filmmakers and producers since taking on my role, and I’m super proud to say that our government will be maintaining funding for the film industry with our budget and moving forward, and this is despite some very interesting words from many in the opposition. The industry will be receiving the same amount of funding as they have in previous years. There will be a transition period as we shift from the previous grant under Culture to the new tax credit under Economic Development, Trade and Tourism. The previous government was not listening to the industry and severely mishandled the previous grant program, leaving our government with quite a mess to clean up. I’m really proud to say that the creation of the film and television tax credit is just actually the first step.

As of April 2019 there were $92.5 million worth of grant commitments scheduled for payment between 2019 and 2022. We will be meeting all of those commitments while still introducing our new film and television tax credit. We are committed and we did commit in our platform to developing a film tax credit, and the hope is that it’s designed to attract large productions and series to Alberta. We are transitioning from an existing grant program because it not only puts us in line with other provinces, but it is what the film industry has asked us to do.

Since film production began in Alberta, in 1917, our government is the very first government to have the vision and leadership to recognize the need for a tax credit program. These amendments have come after consultation and a lot of consultation with industry. My colleague the Minister of Economic Development, Trade and Tourism has worked tirelessly to meet with many film producers, unions, and studios since the budget was tabled, and I’m really happy to say that we’re addressing some of their concerns. We’ve had a lot of chances to listen to the industry. In order to provide confidence to the production companies and industry, we’ll be launching a new intake process. We really want to have this happen as soon as possible. These amendments create a new application process, the intake to start no later than January 2020.

If principal photography began after March 1, 2019 – this gets a little complicated – the production company then will be eligible to apply, in the first year of the program, from the date of proclamation up until March 31, 2021, in order to accommodate the companies that had applied to the original screen-based production grant, which was originally under Culture, in May and August of 2019. The transition takes a little bit of time, but we’re trying to accommodate all of those things in between. This will allow the companies that applied for the screen-based production grant in May and August of this year, 2019, to then be able to apply for that tax credit, which is what they’ve been asking for. That will actually happen starting April 1, 2021 – sorry. That’s that tax credit.

Starting April 1, 2021, at that point in time, there will be no retroactivity allowed. We’ll make those accommodations initially up until then, but starting on April 1 of the 2021 year, there will be no retroactive ability. The companies that applied between March 1, 2019, and the day of proclamation as well as those who apply between the day of proclamation, somewhere in January-ish, and March 31, 2021, will be eligible. This gives us a little bit of flexibility. We really listened to the industry to help this move a little bit faster.

We’re also amending the tax credit formula. This formula will be set out in regulation rather than legislation. This gives us a little bit of flexibility, especially because there are a lot of different scenarios, as we know, around the industry. We want to make sure to be as flexible as possible for them. Not all productions are the same, and there are many needs that are different between the applications, so we want to acknowledge that and make sure that we take that into consideration. Production companies will receive an authorization letter that will include – what we’re wanting to do is to have an estimated amount of tax credit that they can receive based on their estimated eligible production costs.

What will be included is that there will be a subtracting of any designated assistance that they may have already received – that’s grants and applications from other ministries – towards the same production. These changes mean that the actual amount of the tax credit that the production companies will receive will be based on their actual eligible production costs minus the other forms of designated assistance. Again, the designated assistance is other grants that they may have received for the same production in other ministries. This ensures that the film and television tax credit only supports eligible production costs incurred in Alberta. This has been something that we’ve all been working on diligently to make sure that we can make that happen.

We’re also making a change that more clearly defines what it means for production to be completed. This is absolutely an imperative piece of accountability for the film industry and for government. It ensures that the film and television tax credit supports projects that are complete and available for distribution and broadcast. Regulations will further clarify completion of production. We're very much looking forward to working with the industry to figure out what that definition will look like.

Thank you very much, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Are there any other speakers wishing to speak to amendment A2? The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'm moving that we rise and report Bill 23 and report progress on Bill 20, but I don't know if you need me to adjourn debate first. You don't. So I am moving for the committee to rise and report Bill 23 and report progress on Bill 20.

[Motion carried]

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Athabasca-Barrhead-Westlock.

12:20

Mr. van Dijken: Thank you, Madam Speaker. The Committee of the Whole has had under consideration certain bills. The committee reports the following bill: Bill 23. The committee reports progress on the following bill: Bill 20. I wish to table copies of all amendments considered by Committee of the Whole on this date for the official records of the Assembly.

The Deputy Speaker: Does the Assembly concur in the report? Those in favour, please say aye.

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Deputy Speaker: Any opposed, please say no. So carried.
The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you to all members of the House for their hard work today. I move that we adjourn the Assembly until tomorrow, November 20, at 9 o'clock a.m.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 12:22 a.m. on Wednesday]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

9 a.m.

Wednesday, November 20, 2019

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

Prayers

The Acting Speaker: Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and her government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideals but, laying aside all private interests and prejudices, keep in mind their responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all. So may Your kingdom come and Your name be hallowed. Amen.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

The Deputy Chair: I would like to call the committee to order.

Bill 21

Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019

The Deputy Chair: Are there any comments, questions, or amendments to be offered with respect to this bill? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford has risen to speak.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I appreciate the opportunity to speak on Bill 21 in Committee of the Whole. It gives us a chance to spend some time on different sections of the bill. Since this government has made a decision to hide most of their legislative agenda by burying very complex and important issues, which they have actually identified as both complex and important, in bills that tie together unrelated acts of the Legislature, it's really good to be in Committee of the Whole, where we can pierce that intent to hide and speak to issues. So I will, if the opportunity allows, be speaking to this bill on a number of occasions this morning and throughout the days ahead.

Previously I've had a chance to talk about the incredible attack on democratic rights that this bill represents with regard to unions and some of their functions in society and the fact that workers in this province have been the focus of repeated and, well, serial assaults by the government in legislative terms.

I would like to turn my attention this morning at first to the attacks on students and again begin with my overall concern and then move into a conversation about some of the particulars that are offensive in this bill. Hopefully, at some point members of the government side of the House will make whatever feeble attempts they have to legitimize this bill before voting for it.

I want to speak about the issue of students here because I think that this is again an issue of democracy. The benefits of a democracy are widely known throughout the world, and many people aspire to participate and contribute to democracies. But a fundamental aspect of democracy is the ability for average citizens to fully understand their role in participating in democracy and to make effective choices when voting. I think that any scholar of the history of democracy will tell you that part of the reason why the Westminster-style parliamentary democracy has done so well is because there has been an adjunct of an increase in public education, available freely to all citizens, that supported that ever-important democracy.

What we have in this bill is an attempt to decrease access to postsecondary education, where in fact people often spend a significant portion of their time understanding and learning either aspects related to the democracy directly, through political science or other studies of that nature, or various areas of learning in various faculties at the universities and colleges and technical institutions, where they learn about the details of content area that is relevant to our conversations here in the House. Yet we have a government that is dead set on creating barriers and reducing accessibility for many people in this Bill 21.

Now, it's really important that we take the time to recognize how significant education is to the well-being of our society, and it's significant in a number of ways. As I mentioned, it allows people to receive the greatest amount of information necessary to become participants in our democracy, but it also helps to spread democracy outside of the voting booth. It spreads democracy outside of the voting booth by ensuring that no matter what family you're raised in, no matter what unfortunate circumstances you may unfortunately have been born into, you have an opportunity to make better for yourself in society. That means that just because your parents didn't have an opportunity for postsecondary education, it doesn't mean that you will be limited in going to postsecondary education. That means that we have an opportunity for people to move up in terms of socioeconomic position within society, which is a very democratizing aspect of the structures of our world right now.

This is what's been attacked by this government, the ability of people who are from more vulnerable or unfortunate circumstances to make changes in their world and to move on. Now, we know statistically that if your parents did not go to postsecondary education, the chances of you going to postsecondary education are significantly reduced compared to people whose parents did go to postsecondary education. Many of us know that in the colloquial sense.

I happen to be very fortunately blessed in terms of my birth. I was born an individual that has all the privileges a society has to offer, including both parents who are university educated and grandparents who were very highly focused on university education. You know, there's a story within my family about my grandmother on my mother's side refusing to move to Regina when a job offer was given to my grandfather, because they didn't have a university there at the time, but finding themselves eventually fortunate enough to move to Saskatoon, where there was a university, the University of Saskatchewan.

My grandfather, who fought in the First World War at Vimy and Passchendaele, thought education was very important, so much so that although he had three daughters – and daughters were not always educated in families in the '40s, '50s, and '60s – he ensured that all three of his daughters were university educated in the 1950s, so high value on education at the time. That was only possible because education was affordable to him. He wasn't a rich man. He worked for Marshall-Wells, and as was very common in those days, his wife, my grandmother Evelyn, was at home raising the children, part of the community, part of the church, part of society in many very productive ways. One of the things that she had insisted on was that her daughters also get university education, and the consequence was that at a time when not all women had that kind of access, they did have that access because education was affordable at the time.

Now, I think it's really important for us to realize how much that's changed over the last number of years. For example, when I went to university, in my first year, 1977, I was able to work at Camp He Ho Ha for the summer and earn very little money, because essentially it was an organization that while they provided us some dollars for having put in eight weeks of work – essentially, they paid me $50 a week to work at Camp He Ho Ha, but it was an excellent experience. It helped to give me lots of understanding of the universe and the concerns that the disabled community has about some of the barriers that they experience.

But that $400 turned out to be exactly how much I paid for tuition for 10 full courses that year at the University of Alberta. I was able to be a contributor to society, working in the disabled community during the summer, and then go on to the university and pay my full tuition. Fortunately, of course, I also had parents that were more than happy to have me live at home and subsidize me in that way. Not everybody has that.

Now, with my own children going through university, we're at a place where university tuition is completely impossible to raise on your own. My son who went through law school eventually in the early 2000s was paying over $15,000 a year. There was no way he could earn that kind of money over the summer. At the time, I was a social worker earning probably about $50,000 a year and didn't have the wherewithal to completely support him, although he lived at home, so he had to take out student loans but has been able to pay those off. That's fortunate for him.

The issue here is that we have set up a system now where people like myself, who just by happenstance of birth end up in the right family with the resources necessary, can ensure that their children go on to advanced education, but people who come from families that either don't see the value in advanced education or where they may see the value but don't have the ability, because life has not dealt with them fairly and has not given them the financial wherewithal to be able to provide education, are being told now that the barriers that are going to prevent them from making that move from a lower socioeconomic status to a higher economic status are being raised by this government.

The government has made a number of assaults on university tuition here in this bill, and the consequences of them are dramatic and specific, but they're differentially specific; that is, some groups are being hurt more than others. The first group, that I've already mentioned, is people who don't have the dollars to go to university. Tuition will be rising by somewhere in the neighbourhood of about 21 per cent over the next number of years, and that by itself is a barrier for many people. What we will see is that people who clearly have the intellectual ability and the wherewithal personally to attend university will find themselves unable to do so because they simply can't afford that level of tuition in their life.

But on top of that, the government has also made a decision to increase interest rates on university loans and to reduce the tax deductions for university attendance. Now, this is an issue that is passed over by a lot of people but is very critical for a particular group of people. There are a significant number of women that are attending universities at the postgraduate level such that they have finished their bachelor's degree, often with the support or help of family members when that was possible, but then they go on to pursue a master's degree. We have a particular circumstance there that the majority of people going on to get master's degrees or PhDs in the province of Alberta are women. Many of them have multiple responsibilities in their lives. Not only are they going to university, but they're often at a life stage where they're raising children or are part of a family, often taking care of elderly seniors, and really living complex, stressful lives.

One of the things that helps them to do all of this work is that they receive payment from the universities in the form of grants for postgraduate students to be TAs or RAs, research assistants or teaching assistants, or other functions within the university. Now, that means that their own income is high enough that they need to use the tax deductions to reduce their income to reduce the taxes that they have to pay. They can't pass it on as perhaps a 17-year-old or 18-year-old student might pass it on to their parents because their income isn't high enough to pay for it. But at the graduate level, because of the research assistantships and the teaching assistantships, their income is high enough that they must use that tax deduction themselves.

Now what's happened is that we have an assault not just on people who are most vulnerable from a financial point of view, but we also have an assault on women, who are most often in the position of seeking these sorts of degrees, being told that the tax deductions, which they themselves are using, are not going to be available to them any longer. As well as being in postsecondary education so they can become, you know, our speech pathologists or our OTs, occupational therapists, or our social workers or our nurses, all of those kind of degrees that people are participating in or, of course, the sciences – sorry; I come from the humanities, so I tend to mention those – and become our scientists, our engineers, our lawyers, our doctors, all of those people are being told that as well as dealing with the stressors of being in postsecondary education and being of the age at which they're likely also to have other responsibilities such as caring for children, being part of a family, or caring for elders, the costs of going to university are going to rise dramatically.

I can tell you that the deductions that were available until this government came along were significant in terms of the amount of return to a family. It could often mean the difference of $3,000 or $4,000 a year in terms of the money that would be returned to them against their research assistantship or teaching assistantship positions.

I think we have a real problem here. We have an act that is selectively harming people of a particular category and therefore is problematic. It's selectively harming people who are in postsecondary, selectively harming women, and selectively harming people who are trying to change their life circumstances and move forward from one socioeconomic group to another socioeconomic group. I think these consequences are worth paying attention to because if we allow these kind of things to happen, we will end up in a society where we have those that are privileged and those who are not.

Naturally, that's going to happen in any society. It doesn't matter where you are in the world. That's going to happen. But one of the best things about a democracy is that we have ways to reduce the likelihood of that, to give those that have been oppressed or have been neglected or have been forgotten a chance to move into the section of society that benefits from the fortunes of society, people who weren't necessarily born into it but who are willing to do the work to try to achieve it, and this is what this government is attacking.

It is at its core an attack on the nature of democracy. It is at its core an attempt to create a society in which we have the privileged and the nonprivileged, in which we have those that will benefit from the structures of society and the goods of society versus the people who will not. It puts a larger, higher, taller barrier between those two groups so that individuals who are dissatisfied in one aspect of their life can't move over to the other aspect of their life. When you begin to undermine democracy in order to privilege a small few so that you can become part of a richer, more powerful class, then you are acting in antidemocratic ways, which seems to be the underlying theme behind most of the legislation brought forward by this government. They actually seem to dislike democracy, and this is something that we need to stand up and challenge.

Some bills, like Bill 22, that we talked about do it directly and are a complete and obvious assault on democracy. Bill 21 does it more subtly. Bill 21 does it by creating the circumstance under which democracy will become more fragile. Democracy will have less of the supports necessary to sustain the vagaries of world dynamics. I think that that is very problematic.

I would like to see this government take a very serious look at this and look at the creation of a two-tiered reality, that they are trying to create here in this province, saying to the people on AISH who are living on $1,600 a month: "You don't get to have $30 extra a month in order to help pay your grocery bills. You don't get to have that." On the other hand, people who are international multimillionaires will be able to get $4.7 billion in tax reductions. Now they're talking about reducing royalties, too, which isn't even a tax. It's our money as a government. They're saying that we're going to give away our own value for free to somebody else so that they can become wealthy and so they can export that wealth to another land, another country. What we have is people unable to pay for their groceries here in Alberta being told: there's no money for you, but if you want to build a swimming pool in Texas, here's some dollars so that you can do that.

That's what this bill is doing, and that's why I am objecting to this bill amongst the other things that I've previously objected to such as the assault on unions and the assault on worker rights. Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members looking to join the debate on this matter? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie has risen to speak.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. It's always a pleasure to get up in this House and continue speaking to the bills that we have before us. Like my colleague from Edmonton-Rutherford, I'd like to focus specifically on how this government continues to undermine the democratic process and democratic institutions within our society.

As the member was getting to, one of the most important democratic institutions that we actually have in our society is unions. Now, I know that members on the other side of the House don't feel that way. They actually appall unions. They know the reasons why. But this actually gives workers the opportunity to organize within themselves and ask for the specific benefits and pay that they think are required under the current economic system. It gives them the opportunity as well to debate these things amongst themselves. I know this first-hand because, of course, I used to be within a union at the University of Alberta, the Non-Academic Staff Association. I remember going through the process by which we democratically decided what things we were going to focus on as we went into the collective bargaining process.

Of course, this government wants to undermine that entire process by centralizing power and making sure that the minister of Treasury Board and Finance, in essence, can eliminate the entire bargaining process if he chose to. This is what is really problematic about this bill.

Of course, so many of the people that are actually represented by these unions, public-sector workers, are people who honestly aren't making that much money compared to a lot of people in this society. Many of them are constituents of mine. My constituency happens to be a constituency that's full of many new Canadians, many, many new Canadians. I've spoken to a number of them. I remember attending an event by the Nepalese community. So many of the Nepalese community are people who are professionals, like many others from other communities as well who have come from Pakistan, from India, from Latin America, people who are new Canadians and are within these unions and are represented because they're public-sector workers.

Now, these new Canadians come to this country, like all immigrants came to this country – of course, we recognize that we are on treaty land and that we share this land with indigenous people – looking for better opportunities for them and their families. This bill undermines that opportunity. In the same vein, the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford was talking about how this bill undermines the democratic process by not providing people access to postsecondary education. Well, undermining their ability to bargain for themselves, being public-sector workers, being part of a union, is also incredibly problematic. Incredibly problematic.

I believe that new immigrants have come here – my family was part of this community not too long ago. My parents came to this country because they thought it would be better. We came fleeing political violence back in our country. My parents came here believing that this would be a better opportunity for them and for us, their children. I have three brothers; we're four in total. I'm happy to say that all four of us ended up getting access to postsecondary education but with student loans. We had the same loans that the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford was talking about. Having to take out student loans in order to pay for our postsecondary education – it took a substantial amount of time in order to pay off those student loans after graduation.

I think that this is something that all members of this House should consider because now we're creating a situation where people actually have to pay more for postsecondary education in the province of Alberta, considering that our government actually put a tuition freeze in for over four years, making sure that people could continue to access postsecondary education. On average an arts or a science student's tuition at the University of Alberta is going to go up by $371 a year. This first year it'll go up by $371. Over the next four years students could see an increase of up to an additional $371 per year, so over a four-year period that would mean an additional $4,000. Those $4,000 are $4,000 that that student will have to take out in additional student loans and then, when graduating, will have to pay for.

As people know, when people are in debt, it puts them in a situation where they can't as actively participate in the economy. Yes, it's helping banks because they have to pay back the student loan and they have to pay the interest on those student loans, but it inhibits people from being able to buy a car, purchase a home for themselves and their families. Many students, once they graduate from university, end up getting married and starting a family. These are people that want to create a home for their future families – right? – for the kids that they're going to have. Being substantially in debt is going to inhibit many of these people who are graduating, many of them new Canadians or the children of new Canadians, that have purposely come here seeking a better future.

We have to ask ourselves: is this really the kind of Alberta that we want? Do we want to continue to undermine the democratic process, creating a situation where people won't have as much opportunity to actually participate in the economy? It inhibits people.

Getting back to the unions and their democratic institutions, I wanted to cover that in that process, people are elected to represent within the union, and this is something that members on the other side seem to forget or just simply overlook. All director positions within unions: they're elected positions. The members of that union actually vote for the person that they think is best going to represent them within that union. It's a process. It's a democratic process.

Many times the members from all kinds of unions have the opportunity to actually be consulted by the directors of the union. The president, the vice-president, all the people that make up the core of the directors of the union, then begin a process by which they consult with the members on the bargaining process. So many times, while at the bargaining table, the bargaining team is not necessarily the directors. When I was president of the Non-Academic Staff Association, I wasn't part of the bargaining team. I was the president of the union but still not part of the bargaining team.

There was the opportunity where we created a situation where we went out to the members. We wanted to make sure that members not only were consulted but actually had the opportunity to participate in the bargaining process themselves. Within the bargaining team there were actually members at large of the union, that actually sat on that bargaining team so they could reach out to other members within the union, consult with them, talk with their fellow members within the union, and then bring those issues and concerns not to the president, not to the vice-president, not to the directors, the elected positions, but to themselves, participating within the bargaining process. It was they that decided, "Okay; well, if we can't get a pay increase, then at least we should be able to get some other kinds of benefits when bargaining with the employer," in this case the University of Alberta.

It looks like this government is doubling down on bad-faith bargaining. They want to be able to erode this process, and this is what's substantially wrong with this bill. It's actually taking away the ability of workers within their unions to represent themselves at the bargaining table. It may be pay, or it may be some other benefit like how much coverage they get when they go to the dentist or they take their child to the dentist – I mean, I'm sure that many people here know that it can be quite costly – or what kind of drugs they have covered by their benefit program when their children need any kind of medication because of an illness or anything like that. These are things that are so simple but at the same time so important to these families. By eroding this, it affects people's lives in very, very dramatic ways. People may think it's a small thing, but these are things that end up costing and then coming out of that person's pocket for things that they would normally have the benefit of if they were able to participate in the bargaining process.

All of this is being done, of course, to pay for this $4.7 billion no-jobs corporate handout. We have yet to see one job created because of this amount of money that's been given to these corporations. In fact, not only have we not seen jobs created; we actually see these corporations taking the money and going to other jurisdictions and investing that money in other places, not only in other places across Canada but also other places in North America, in the United States. So you have to ask yourselves. Here we are taking money from the people who need it most, whether that be through the collective bargaining process and workers, all these Albertans who work so incredibly hard for the public sector or for postsecondary institutions or whatever the case may be, and we're giving that money to corporations that are not even investing it here in the province of Alberta.

The cost is being borne by Albertans themselves, who really now have to reach into their own pocket in order to pay for things such as medication. The Member for Edmonton-Rutherford talked about the deindexing of AISH and how AISH recipients are now going to receive $30 less. Now, I don't know if any member over on that side has tried to live on the amount of money that an AISH recipient gets from the government, but $30 to them is a lot of money. The amount of money that people are going to have to reach into their own pocket for in order to pay for the things that normally they would have gotten under a benefit program – all those things are going to impact the amount of money that these people have in order to pay for their families, for the needs that their families have.

This is what's so difficult to understand about this bill and why this government is actually reaching into the pockets of Albertans and then not only reaching into the pockets of those Albertans for that money to go to general revenue and even perhaps provide services for more Albertans, not even that. It's actually being taken out to give this $4.7 billion no-jobs corporate handout, and the money is not even being invested in the province. Where's the rationale in that? This is what we on this side of the House just can't seem to understand. We're supposed to be investing in Alberta and the future of Albertans, making life better for them. Instead, not one job created. In fact, jobs are being lost, continue to be lost here in the province of Alberta, and the money – that is Albertans' money because it's tax collected from Albertans – is actually going to these corporations and is being invested in other jurisdictions.

I have to ask the members on the other side of the House: does this make sense? Does this make, actually, any sense, that this is the way forward to actually improving the lives of Albertans? Getting back to the fact that this is just incredibly undemocratic, why is more and more and more power being centralized with the bills that are coming forward from this government? That is another question that we need to ask. Like the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford actually stated, Bill 22 does that in a very specific way, and Bill 21 does it in perhaps a more elusive way.

When you take away money from Albertans and their spending power in the economy, you're actually taking away the process of economic democracy, of them being able to participate in the society, in the economy, being able to help prop up and move the economy forward. Less money in the pockets of Albertans means that our economy is going to suffer, that less money will flow, and people will start to say, "Okay; well, perhaps this year I won't make the investment in a car" or "This year I can't make an investment in buying a new house." This is what's going to end up happening. So instead of actually making the economy grow, we're actually going to stagnate. We're going to get into deeper trouble.

Again I state that the money that's being taken from Albertans through tax is actually going to this $4.7 billion no-jobs corporate handout. We need to ask ourselves: is this really the kind of society that we want to build, that we expect for Alberta to move forward? So many new Canadians in my riding have come to me and asked me: "Why is this government moving in this way? Why is it doing all these things? It's actually making life more difficult for Albertans." So it's really important for me to stand up in this House and actually draw attention to these matters.

I think that having been part of a union in the past, it's also my responsibility to be the voice for those people, who I actually used to work with, making sure that their democratic rights within unions are being respected. Of course, that's what we see here . . .

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Mr. Hanson: Mr. Chair, I was sitting quietly, enjoying my coffee here this morning, and I couldn't help but notice the irony in the member's speech. It's interesting hearing an NDP member talking about the problems with incurring debt and having to service it when you're finished school. It's pretty rich coming from a government that put our province $60 billion in debt, and we're now servicing that debt at $2 billion a year, the fifth-largest line item in our budget. It's almost laughable to hear him talk like that.

I think that as a government what we should be doing is providing opportunities for our young people so that when they are in university and do get that opportunity during the four months that they get off, maybe they could actually go out and get a job and work their way through. I know a number of young people that actually took advantage of the Alberta advantage when things were prosperous here in the province, and they would go out and work in the oil patch or in a good construction job over the summer and build up enough cash that it carried them through the whole year so that they didn't have to have a second job or incur debt that they had to pay off after they graduated.

It's quite laughable to hear that member talk about debt in that way and the problems of incurring debt and then having to pay it back at higher interest rates when they totally forgot that concept in the four years that they were in government. Shameful, absolutely shameful, that now we have to carry that debt and that our children and our grandchildren will have to carry and pay off the debt.

Ms Pancholi: Talk through the chair. I'm not the chair.

Mr. Hanson: I'm talking through the chair. I'm just looking at you.

Ms Pancholi: Yeah. Don't look at me.

Mr. Hanson: It seems to me I've . . .

Chair's Ruling Addressing the Chair

The Deputy Chair: Hon. members, I just want to remind hon. members that the concept of talking through the chair doesn't necessarily mean that any individual on any side of the House has to be staring at the chair in order to be talking through the chair. The idea is that third person is predominantly how we like to engage in debate, and the purpose of that is to ensure that this depersonalizes the debate. I think that it's fair to say that members from all sides sometimes veer close to the line on that aspect.

So what I would do is that I would just ask the hon. member to try to focus his comments with regard to ensuring that he's moving through the chair. If he would please continue.

Mr. Hanson: Absolutely. And through you, Mr. Chair, I obviously struck a nerve on the opposite side there by, you know, pointing out the fact that they did get us into all this debt and into this mess and had us on a trajectory to $100 billion. And in future years we could be facing $4 billion a year in debt, which would put the debt servicing as the third- or fourth-largest line item on our budget.

You know, we talk about having to make these changes to get us back to a track of prosperity in this province. And the complaining that we hear from the other side: they're the ones that put us in this position. We're asking for a small, 2.8 per cent decrease in spending in this province, that they drove through the roof in the four years they were in government. The fact that they would stand up here today and talk about how terrible it is for students to have debt and a debt load when they did the same thing to our province is shameful. I think that they should be ashamed of it and stop talking about it.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to stand to join debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud has risen to speak.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Chair. It's a pleasure to rise today to express my significant opposition to Bill 21, the Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019, especially because this bill and all parts of the government's budget actually do nothing to ensure fiscal sustainability. I note that the Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul stood up and was very excited to speak about debt. He must be deeply, deeply disappointed by the budget that has been tabled by his government, considering that it actually does not reduce the deficit. It increases the deficit and does nothing to address ensuring fiscal sustainability. In fact, what it does do is throw away – that is what it's done so far – $4.7 billion in a corporate giveaway to large corporations that have not actually created any jobs. In fact, we've seen a significant amount of job losses. So when you put a $4.7 billion hole into our budget, I guess you've got to make up for it somehow. We look at Bill 21, Bill 20, Bill 22, the estimates we've been considering. Clearly, this government has decided that average Albertans, vulnerable Albertans, all Albertans will be paying the price for that gamble.

I want to go back, actually, and speak specifically to the issue of deindexing AISH, which is a key component of Bill 21, although I should note that it's buried amongst all the numerous other cuts to Albertans in ways that will increase the costs of living for Albertans. It's just one of several, but it does deserve a little bit of highlighted attention because of the fact that it so cruelly targets the most vulnerable in our province.

I'll tell you a little story, if we can talk about beginning my political career. It wasn't necessarily a clear trajectory for me. I actually began when I was an undergraduate student at the University of Alberta. I worked in my local MLA's constituency office. I was working there as a constituency assistant. Prior to working there, I didn't really know much about what MLAs dealt with every day. I knew that I was interested in politics and political science, but I went into that office a little bit green on what the day-to-day activities of a constituency office were. The constituency that I worked in was at that time called Edmonton-Centre. It's now Edmonton-City Centre. It is a very downtown, urban riding, with a high turnover of residency. A lot of new Canadians live in that area, a lot of lower income individuals.

One of the issues that I learned a whole lot about very quickly, working as a constituency manager, was AISH. I actually can say, with a great deal of privilege, which is what I know I had at that time and still do know, that I never even realized that there were so many people in our province who were living on so little every month because of very significant medical disabilities. It didn't even really occur to me that people could live off such a small amount of money. These are people who are there because they can't work or they have difficulties working in a permanent way, so they are some of the most vulnerable Albertans we have.

I got a very quick introduction to the life that they led because those individuals are so dependent on what at that time and still is quite a very small amount of money, really, to get by. Their stories were absolutely heartbreaking, and at that time AISH was not indexed. I mean, this was 1999, and AISH was quite a bit lower, of course, than it even is now, but it was not indexed. Over the course of the years that I worked in that constituency office, I got to meet many individuals on AISH who were struggling to get by on practically nothing. It completely astounded me every day to see how much they were expected to do with so little.

The other thing that became quickly apparent is that they often communicated a lot with me at the constituency office because they had a hard time managing the system and navigating the intricacies of trying to – it's a difficult process to get approved by AISH. It's a difficult process to survive on AISH. As these are already some of the most vulnerable Albertans, the amount of self-advocacy they had to do was also astounding, to simply get the pittance, really, that they were getting from the government. As much as I could, I felt it was my job to advocate and support them when I could.

Now here we are, 20 years later. I have my own constituency office now – and I’m very proud of that – and I know that I am still being contacted, my office is still being contacted by recipients of AISH who are struggling. Now we see that this government has cruelly and callously chosen to take money out of their pockets. Now, while that’s cruel enough as it is, the part that I am struck by is the fact that so many of the members opposite just a year ago made statements in this House about how important indexing AISH was, simply being a humane, decent thing to do.

I actually was not part of the previous government, as you may know. This is my first term, so I spent a little bit of time going back and looking at Hansard and looking at the discussions and the debates that took place in this House around the issue of indexing AISH, as the former government, under the Leader of the Official Opposition as Premier at that time, brought forward.

I want to highlight something first off the bat, because when this has been brought up in question period so far this session, the Premier has stood up and somehow made some kind of statement that implies something, that the government under the current Leader of the Official Opposition didn’t bring in the indexing of AISH into legislation until year three of their term, which is absolutely, first of all, not an argument for deindexing AISH. It’s an appalling argument to say: well, you didn’t do it. But we did do it, and members on the other side did support it. But as the Leader of the Official Opposition has repeatedly stated, AISH amounts were actually increased the first three years of that government’s term, and it was in that third year where we also passed legislation to index it to the cost of living because that is just common sense. It is just common sense that we know that the cost of living increases for all of us in every single way. Inflationary pressures exist. The cost of living goes up.

For those people who do not have or have very limited capacity to actually increase their income by working: to say that they are frozen in time at one small allowance which is, frankly, barely enough for anybody to get by is ridiculous. We all know that. We all live in this world where we see our cost of living go up all the time. In fact, I sat in on the estimates for five different ministries over the last few weeks, and consistently I heard ministers talking about increases in small budget items and saying: oh, well, we had to increase that because of inflationary pressures, because we know that cost goes up. The government seems to accept that there are situations where it is very critical that we increase how much we spend on something because – guess what? – the cost of living goes up.

The government has acknowledged it numerous times in its estimates, but yet when it comes to the people who have the least, the people who have the least capacity to actually increase their income, we’re saying, “No; your costs have to remain frozen,” when we know that the things that they purchase, the things that they spend their money on go up all the time.

I want to go back to the fact that I did find it a very interesting exercise to review Hansard from last year, when the former government brought in the indexation of AISH, and I was really struck by some of the comments from some of the members on the government side in support of indexing AISH. Now, there were a number of statements. Some of those members are no longer members of this Legislature, so I’m just going to focus on the comments from members who are currently still members of the Legislature.

In particular, on page 2086 of Hansard, which was November 22, 2018, in debate on Bill 26, which was the indexation of AISH, the Member for Calgary-Fish Creek stated:

Indexing, I think, is something that is a natural thing to do because we don’t want those people on those fixed incomes to be falling behind day by day and year after year to the point where they can’t put food on their tables, it’s hard for them to make rent, it’s hard for them to live a respectable and respectful life and to ensure that they have that opportunity.

This is still a quote from the Member for Calgary-Fish Creek.

So, Madam Speaker, we’ll be supporting this bill. I’ll be supporting this bill. There are a lot more questions we would like to address I think in Committee of the Whole as well, but I do thank the minister for bringing this forward, for addressing this. It’s taken a little while, but here we are, an opportunity for us to do the right thing, and I’ll look forward to supporting it.

I wonder how the Member for Calgary-Fish Creek has changed his mind in the past year, how he no longer believes that it’s the right thing to do. Perhaps we’ll see. Maybe he will vote against his government’s decision to deindex AISH. Perhaps he will, and I look forward to that because I’d like to know what happened in the last year, where he no longer thinks that indexing AISH is the right thing to do, that in fact it’s okay to let these people fall behind year by year by year and day by day by day. I’m interested to hear that.

Also from the previous session of this Legislature, on page 2207 of Hansard, November 28, 2018, the Member for Taber-Warner, who is now the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction, stated this, and it was a very compelling argument. It was a very personal argument. His quote was:

I believe that it needed to be indexed for some time, and I was never in a position where I could advocate for that. I’m now in a position where I can advocate for it, and I want to be able to do that, because I’ve seen the face of an individual in our society, a close person to me, my brother, who has been affected.

Now here we are, a year later, and I’m wondering if the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction – he’s actually now in a better position to advocate than even where he was a year ago, when he was a member of the opposition. He’s now an associate minister within this government’s caucus. I’m wondering what steps he’s taken to advocate within his government against the deindexation of AISH. I’m compelled by the fact that the member has a very personal affiliation with this. He’s got a family member who’s affected. Now, I don’t think that the Premier has declared that this is going to be one of those situations where there is a free vote – I doubt that there will be; this is a money bill – but I’m curious as to how the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction can reconcile his position from a year ago with the position that his government has taken now.

To me, it is perhaps the most careless and casual way to treat vulnerable Albertans. I believe that, by the government’s calculation, this is going to save about $7 million a year, to deindex AISH; over the course of the term of this government, $100 million. You know what? That’s less than half of the money that Husky has received this year as a corporate handout from this government as a result of the $4.7 billion no-jobs corporate handout. Husky walked away with $233 million, and guess what they did with that? Well, maybe they paid down their own personal debt, maybe they gave it out as dividends, but what they didn’t do with it is invest it in Alberta. What they didn’t do with it is create more jobs. In fact, they cut jobs. They put more Albertans out of work. For less than half of what we just handed away to Husky oil in this province, we could have at least maintained the cost-of-living indexation on AISH for the people who are the most vulnerable in this province. That was an opportunity that this government had, and they made a choice.

One of the things that we need to realize is that every single time, every single item in this bill, in Bill 20, Bill 22, and the government's estimates, represents a choice, a choice by this government as to who they're going to support and who they're not. What we're seeing is that they're choosing not to support vulnerable Albertans, but not only that; they're choosing not to support average Albertans.

Let me tell you what also struck me when I did my little deep dive into Hansard from last year, again, not having been a member of the Assembly. You know, of course as a member of the public I remember some of the debate in the public sphere about the carbon tax, but I hadn't read all of the comments made by members on both sides of the House with respect to the carbon tax. Within the topic of indexing of AISH, as I was reading Hansard, what struck me was how many members of the then opposition, now government, railed against the carbon tax on the basis that it took money out of the pockets of Albertans. That's what they kept saying: oh, the carbon tax made life more expensive for Albertans.

Never mind the fact that most of those individuals received a rebate, and the money that was collected by the carbon tax was legislated in terms of how it could be spent. A huge majority of that went back to rebates, so a lot of those low-income Albertans who had to pay carbon tax actually got that money back. The other way that money went was to support the small-business tax decrease. I know it's almost a waste of time to talk about to this government caucus because they don't care about climate change at all, which is evident even by the bill that they presented that's suppose to be their position on climate change, but it also went to things like energy efficiency, innovation, technology, and developing our growing but no longer, now stagnating renewable resource energy sector.

But to go back to the carbon tax, because I don't feel badly talking about the carbon tax, they railed against it because it was making life more expensive, never mind that people got rebates, yet we have seen nothing from this government caucus to stand up for the average Albertans now who are seeing, as a result of this budget, as a result of bills 20, 21, 22, all of the ways life has become more expensive under this government. I mean, honestly, I could probably spend an entire 20 minutes of time going through all the ways it's become more expensive, so let me just highlight.

Even within this bill we see the absolute bottom-line increase to tuition costs. We know that's going to happen. In fact, that's an intention of this bill. Postsecondary students are going to be paying more themselves if they're paying for their own postsecondary, or their families, if they're doing that, are going to get less back in education tax credits, so guess what? They're also paying more. Removal of the cap on electricity rates, deindexing of AISH, deindexation of seniors' benefits, more families being cut off the Alberta child and family benefit: the number of ways that this budget that has been presented by this government is going to increase the cost of living to average Albertans far exceeds anything that the carbon tax was putting on people. Absolutely.

You pile that all up for the average Albertan. Let me tell you, they're paying a lot more, and they're not getting rebates. That's what they're not getting. They're not getting rebates, yet I don't hear any protest. Why do they now not have a problem picking the pockets of Albertans? Some of them are getting paid less than the minimum wage. We know they're not collecting overtime at the same rate. That's all okay for the members on the government side. What's most appalling is that it's perfectly okay for them to be taking them out of the pockets of people who can't actually collect more money by working more because they are severely disabled.

I am looking forward to going back even to Hansard of this session to see how many times individuals like the Member for Calgary-Fish Creek, how many times the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction will stand up and argue against the deindexation of AISH. Just a year ago they had strong, strong views against it and deeply held personal views. It seemed to be almost a moral argument from some of them. Now, however, they seem to have no problem with taking money from the most vulnerable Albertans. I find that to be either hypocrisy, or perhaps their self-interest in maintaining their position within their government caucus is more important, but I don't know what that is.

I don't know how people flip-flop on their morals because I certainly know that I don't and the members on this side of the House don't. We've been very clear over and over again. The Leader of the Official Opposition has said it a number of times, and it's absolutely right: "When times are tough, those who can pay more should. It should not come off the backs of those who cannot pay more." Yet this government is giving away money to profitable corporations, part of whom are not even really based in Alberta. Half of them are now investing not only outside of the province but outside of the country. Who is benefiting from that? They are, but we are not. Albertans are not.

Let's go back to the fact that all of that was built on a gamble to create jobs, yet just yesterday we heard about 250 employees being laid off in the University of Calgary. We hear about a hundred employees being laid off from Alberta Innovates. This budget is actually costing Albertans jobs, and that is not what this party, the government party, campaigned on. They campaigned on creating jobs. Not only have they failed to do that so far, but they're actually costing Albertans jobs.

Now, one can assume that that is because the jobs that have been lost are jobs that they don't really care about. Let's be clear. There are Albertans in this province that this government does not seem to care about that much. They don't care about their jobs. I can tell you that in my riding a number of people who were hurt during the oil and gas price drop, which has to be said over and over again because the government likes to blame the NDP – hey, I wish. I wish that our Alberta provincial government had the power to control the oil and gas industry. We can see that the government party can't because they haven't created jobs. All their supposed love for the oil and gas industry has not actually done anything to create jobs here because – guess what? – a lot of that is outside of your control. What you can control are a number of Alberta jobs that a lot of Albertans rely on.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Chair's Ruling Imputing Motives

The Deputy Chair: I do also just want to take this opportunity to again – I think we may have come close to the side of either not talking through the chair or imputing false motives with regard to other members in the House with regard to whether or not people care about climate change. I'd just caution members in order to ensure that we have effective debate in this House.

Debate Continued

The Deputy Chair: Are there any other members looking to speak to the bill? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar has risen.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I'm pleased to speak against Bill 21, the so-called Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019. Of course, my caucus colleagues have done a marvellous job of outlining some of their concerns with the bill and why we shouldn't vote in favour of this piece of legislation, and I want to highlight some of the things that I think are wrong with the piece of legislation.

There are two parts to this legislation that I find particularly offensive, and that is the increase, the allowed increase, to tuition for the next three years – up to 23 per cent, I think, is what the Advanced Education ministry has put out in its press releases – and the increase in student loan interest rates. Mr. Chair, this follows a number of other throat punches that this government has given to students in the past few months. Of course, we've seen them reduce minimum wage for students under the age of 18 from $15 to $13. We've seen them take away the STEP program, which provides students with valuable opportunities to work. None of those things have achieved any objective other than making life harder for students, which I think is really the true intent of the government.

You know, it was interesting to hear the Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul complain about students who are whining about debt and just telling them to go find a job. In fact, this government was elected on a platform of making sure that young people had jobs, but nothing that they've done has actually led to job creation for young people. Unemployment for young people is still stubbornly high. It's in fact higher than it was when we left office. Of course, they've taken away significant job opportunities for students by removing the STEP program. I'm not exactly sure where a young person is supposed to find a job when this government is actively preventing students from accessing opportunities to get work.

Of course, this is not only shifting – it's interesting, Mr. Chair. One of the things that we often hear from government is how we can't saddle Albertans with debt, but they're happy to saddle students with debt, as if students aren't Albertans. In fact, in his comments on this bill the Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul certainly suggested that it was more fair for students to bear the debt than all Albertans generally speaking to bear this debt, which is really interesting.

You know, when we talk about raising taxes to cover the debt, when we talk about raising personal income taxes on wealthy people, when we talk about raising corporate income taxes, when we talk about eliminating subsidies for corporations, you know, the members from the UCP scream bloody murder: oh, we cannot pick the pockets of rich people because they're the ones who already pay the taxes; they pay more than their fair share of taxes, so we can't dip into their pockets any more. When we talk about who should pay for the debt, the members opposite are always there to defend the interests of the wealthy and their corporate donors to make sure that they don't have to pay any more, but when we talk about the provincial debt, well, that's everybody's responsibility, and we sure can't ask, you know, the corporate CEOs in Calgary, who are making out like bandits in this $4.7 billion corporate giveaway that this government implemented on day 3 of the Legislature, to pay more. We can ask students to pay more, students who have nothing. We're going to make sure that their first days in employment are spent trying to get out from under a mountain of crushing debt, and that's not fair. We have people in this province who can afford to carry the debt and the deficit, but this government is not willing to make them pay their fair share and is instead putting the burden on students. That is wrong.

Mr. Chair, we've all, or many of us, anyway, have been in the position of having to pay off student loans. I was in the unfortunate circumstance of having to go through university during the so-called Klein revolution, when tuition skyrocketed. It was twice as expensive in my last year of university as it was the year I started, and that was four years. At that time I wasn't even eligible to get Alberta student loans because of the circumstances that I was in. I had to scrape together money from all kinds of sources. Fortunately the STEP program existed at that time, and I was able to cover a substantial part of my expenses while being a student through that employment, but now even that's gone. When I graduated from university, there were significant debt reduction programs that were available from the federal government, and I managed to take advantage of some of those. Those have been eliminated. Students who start university this year will graduate four years from now with more student loans that cost them more money to pay off.

What are the economic prospects that they're facing? This government has done nothing to create jobs. This government has done nothing to raise wages, so a student now graduating in the year 2023, hopefully, if they can complete a degree in four years, which is highly unlikely because if they're lucky enough to find a job, they're going to have to work 20 or 30 or 40 hours a week on top of their classes just to be able to afford to go to school, so they might have to spend another year or two or three just to be able to complete their degree – when they graduate, what kind of economy are they going to graduate into?

This government is certainly not creating jobs, and every economic forecast that we see come out about the future economy of Alberta shows unacceptably slow growth. If a student is entering university now in any kind of health care profession or education profession, there certainly won't be a job for them because this government is making sure that public-sector employees are kicked to the street. We've seen 250 people laid off at the University of Calgary this week. We've seen 300 people laid off at the Calgary board of education yesterday. That's just the beginning. Not everybody even knows what their allocated budgets are going to be from this government, so we're going to see thousands and thousands more layoffs. The ones who are lucky enough to keep their jobs, Mr. Chair, are going to have to deal with wage rollbacks that are going to be imposed by this government.

I know a lot of public-sector workers who lead a reasonably comfortable life but are only one or two paycheques away from having to declare bankruptcy. Now this government is going to fire some of them and roll back the wages of the rest. Then they have the unmitigated gall to tell the students who want to go into those kinds of careers that they're going to have to work harder to pay off more debt, if they're lucky enough to find a job, and if they find a job, they're not going to have the financial means to pay off the debt because they're working overtime to make sure that they squeeze the wages of the remaining public-sector workers. It's absolutely wrong. I hope that this weekend, you know, the members opposite take the opportunity to go into their ridings and explain to them, to the young people of this province, why they're stealing their futures.

It's particularly upsetting to me, Mr. Chair, because, as we get reminded of every day in this House, we have no rural members in our caucus. The members opposite like to present themselves as being the defenders of rural interests. Everything that they're doing is going to make it even harder for potential rural students to make it through the doors of a university or college because the barriers that rural students face are even greater than the barriers that urban students face. Not only do they have to face the costs of tuition and books and food; they also have to face the cost of transportation because, Lord knows, there's no public transportation available anymore in this province from small towns into university or college towns.

They're going to have to face the costs of accommodation, and that's going to go up, too, Mr. Chair, because this government is cutting the budgets of every university and college. And where are the universities and colleges going to make up those cuts? It's going to come from residence fees. It's going to come from student meal plans. So now out-of-town students are going to have to pay more not only in tuition and books and food and transportation; they're going to have to pay more just for rent. There are thousands and thousands of potential rural students who won't even make the trip, who are going to look at the overwhelming costs of going to university, and they're going to say: "You know what? I'm not going to bother. Why bother? There isn't a job for me. Even if I was lucky enough to find a job, if it's in the public sector, which is the largest employer in most small towns, they're going to roll back my wages, and they're always going to be threatening to fire me."

10:20

What rational person going through high school in a small town in Alberta is going to think that there's a future for them going to university or college under the administration of this government? They're not going to, Mr. Chair. I can tell you that the data already supports that. We know that if you live within 100 kilometres of a university or college in this province, you're way more likely to go to a university or college than if you live further than 100 kilometres away. That was under the policies of our government that froze tuition and kept student loans affordable and made sure that we had grants available and maintained the education and tuition tax credits. All of those things are being scrapped, and in service of what?

You know, the title of this bill makes me laugh, Mr. Chair, Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019. Anybody who looks at the budget knows that there is nothing resembling fiscal sustainability for the public finances of the province of Alberta. We've got a deficit this year that's $2 billion higher than the one that we projected in 2019. We've got a debt that's within the margin of error of the same one that we projected by the end of 2023. We're entering into a recession that's caused by the massive wage cuts and layoffs that this government is intent on seeing through.

So whose fiscal sustainability is this bill ensuring? It's certainly not the province of Alberta. It's certainly not students. I think we know here on this side whose fiscal sustainability is being ensured, and that's big corporations in Alberta, with the $4.7 billion handout on top of a whole bunch of tax giveaways from municipalities, royalty holidays, a whole other bunch of subsidies and tax deferrals. Big corporations in Alberta are more profitable than ever before. I wish the members opposite would at least be honest when they're talking about ensuring fiscal sustainability as to whose fiscal sustainability they're ensuring. It's not ours. It's not the fiscal sustainability of 99 per cent of Albertans. It's the fiscal sustainability of the Hong Kong billionaire who owns Husky Oil. It's the fiscal sustainability of Murray Edwards, the CEO of one of the biggest oil companies in the country, who doesn't even live in Alberta, can't bring himself to spend his time with the lowly people who have given him so much and asked for so little from him. He spends his time in London, can afford to send his children to any university or college in the world that he pleases.

In the meantime this government is making sure that the same opportunities that are offered to the children of the Hong Kong billionaires and the Murray Edwards of the world, who control capital in this province – our children don't have those same opportunities, and they can't explain why. But it's our fault, I guess. You know, we didn't have the moral rectitude to become billionaires and be able to afford to send our children to any school that we could want, so we have to suffer.

Mr. Chair, it's incredibly upsetting, and the people of Alberta are not going to stand for this any longer. I was encouraged to see students protesting on the steps of the Legislature earlier this week, defending their own interests, making sure that they have the opportunity to get an education that will make their lives better and, furthermore, making sure that those students who are currently in high school and junior high school, who are looking forward to an education in a university or college, also have those same opportunities.

If there are any students out there who are listening to the speeches – I'm sure many are – I encourage them to do more to make sure that the members opposite hear their opposition to what this government is doing to take away their futures, to what this government is doing to make sure that they have to work harder and longer and get less all in the service of a $4.7 billion giveaway to the wealthiest here in this province. It's not fair and it's not right, and students are upset. They have the right to be upset, and they should express how upset they are in any way they can to the members of this government so that this government maybe reconsiders its position and stops throat punching the students of this province in service of the masters of capital. [interjection]

I hear the Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat taking issue with the language that I've used.

Ms Glasgow: Yes.

Mr. Schmidt: I sure hope that she can go back to her constituency and explain to . . .

Chair's Ruling Parliamentary Language Addressing the Chair

The Deputy Chair: Hon. members, I'm just going to take this opportunity to, with great effort, ensure that all members ensure that they try to ensure that their language that they are using isn't of a type that might be trying to incite some sort of negative decorum within the House and that all individuals on both sides ensure that they make an effort to speak through the chair. There will be ample time, of course, in Committee of the Whole to debate on this matter.

If the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar would like to continue, there are 10 seconds left on this one. Otherwise, the option is his. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Debate Continued

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Chair. Yes. I guess we have to be polite even though this government is intent on making sure that students' lives are harder, and that's outrageous.

The Deputy Chair: Are there any other members looking to speak to this? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-North West has risen.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I'm very happy to make some contribution to the debate here on Bill 21 in Committee of the Whole. I had the opportunity to meet with more university student representatives yesterday, and they were very concerned about elements of Bill 21. Let's not forget that it's an omnibus bill that ranges from postsecondary education to health to energy to labour to municipal affairs and so forth. You know, again, I remember yesterday members opposite from the UCP talking about the shortage of alternatives for bus transportation in the rural areas. Well, they have at least created an omnibus that travels through this Legislature metaphorically and is both cumbersome and, I would suggest, poor drafting of legislation, borrowing from, I think, some very nefarious habits that were developed in the federal Parliament, imported back here, and quite frankly, causing a great deal of confusion and havoc amongst the population that would be affected by this bill.

As I said, yesterday I had an opportunity to meet with university student representatives, and what they wanted me to point out to this government – and I'm happy to do it here this morning – is the fact that the tuition cap being suspended or being lifted will result in thousands of students not being able to afford to go to school. You know, this government likes to point out that it's 3 pennies on the dollar or whatever that they are imposing on Albertans with this budget. Well, a 21 per cent increase over three years for tuition is far more than pennies, Mr. Chair. It represents thousands more dollars that students will have to pay for the privilege to go to school. This is not just universities, but this is trade schools. This is NAIT and SAIT, apprenticeship programs, and so forth.

I know that this government likes to perhaps cloak their attack on postsecondary education, saying that they are refocusing on the trades. But talk is cheap, Mr. Chair. I noticed and certainly all of the people actually engaged in postsecondary and the trades noticed that there's no money for that. There are some words. You know, you can't take words to the bank. You can't use words to pay for your tuition or your apprenticeship program.

This whole notion that this is a shift to ennoble somehow the trades: well, that's great, and I encourage any efforts to do that that are substantive. But this budget or this bill hasn't anything to do with actually putting money into the trades. You know, it has some small scholarships that have been augmented and changed; for example, putting an additional $3 million into trade scholarships – or maybe it's up to $4 million – with two different scholarships.

Let's not forget that this same budget takes out $600 million from postsecondary education. You know, the percentages: the scale of $3 million or $4 million to taking away $600 million is exponential. Let's not pretend that somehow this is anything but quite a targeted cut on all forms of postsecondary education, including the trades.

Another element that student leaders brought to my attention yesterday was the instability of operating, programming funding that this budget is imposing on schools across the province. We just saw a small but very significant indication of that with the announcement from the University of Calgary, just hours after the Advanced Education minister professed to be, you know, protecting jobs and making investments in postsecondary education: 250 jobs gone from the University of Calgary, just for starters, quite frankly. I mean, there's much more to come.

Another aspect that we had in discussions with student leaders yesterday was how the mental health initiative that was started by the previous government, our government, in postsecondary institutions is in serious jeopardy with this budget. We know that the mental health crisis amongst young people, especially, is even more pronounced in our postsecondary institutions. I know that the pilot, for example, that was offered at the University of Alberta for mental health strategies and initiatives and supports was oversubscribed within the first two weeks of September, when school opened here a couple of months ago. It was a small indication but a significant one of just how much of a need there was for mental health supports at our postsecondary institutions.

Now people are saying, like: "What's the future of this? Can we sustain and continue to hire the people that had been brought in to develop more comprehensive mental health support programs in our colleges and universities across the province, or do we just have to let that go?" It's a big question mark, and I would venture to say that it exacerbates the instability or the nervousness and tension that students are feeling to know that their mental health supports that they rely on to reduce stress – this, in fact, is creating another source of stress in our colleges and universities.

Another issue that was brought to my attention by postsecondary leaders yesterday is the suspension of the capital and maintenance funding for institutions right across the province. I know that by trying to realize economies in the maintenance of structures in any place, in any time – it could be your own house, or it could be a school or a hospital, university buildings, trades buildings – by trying to save a dollar on maintenance, you end up with an exponentially larger problem down the road, where the structure is compromised. You end up having to pay much more, or you even lose the use of a structure that's not been properly maintained over time as per what the schedule of a building should be – right? – anything from painting to fixing the roof to ensuring the heating systems are being updated. This is an investment to ensure the longevity of a building, and to compromise on that, I think, is short sighted. It's for the sake of showing on paper that you have reduced one ledger for one year or for one time, but in fact you've just deferred that expense down the road.

I saw this very often in the capital assets that our education system had. The maintenance budgets were shortchanged for many years, even decades, by the former Conservative government, and those costs came back to roost by, you know, having to perhaps even put some buildings in mothballs or not being able to use them, right? There's a certain point where if you scrimp and you cheap out on maintenance, eventually all of the money and more that you've saved, perhaps, on one hand comes back to bite you when the building is not usable and/or is compromised in some not fixable sort of way. Again, very short sighted.

I think that Albertans have learned this lesson from before, from previous Conservative governments – right? – by not building the capacity, let's say, in education. Again, I saw it first-hand as minister. Then you have to play catch-up, you know, which is good, I mean, to actually face the reality of what the needs of your population are and build the buildings that you need, build those schools, build postsecondary capacity. But to put your head in the sand and to pretend that that's not a looming issue in 2019 for the students that are currently in junior high school here in this province or elementary school right now is irresponsible, right?

I can tell you first-hand that we have had an enrolment increase in our schools over these last four years at least. I can tell you of, you know, between 2 and 5 or even 6 per cent or even up to 13 per cent in some districts, Mr. Chair. Those students largely, I can tell you, are in elementary or junior high school right now. What happens to those tens of thousands of students in the next five or six or seven years? We hope and presume and we plan and we expect that a large percentage of them should be attending postsecondary education. Do we have the capacity for that looming demographic of young people that are moving through our elementary and junior high schools and high schools right now? No, we don't, not even close. As I learn more about the postsecondary file, it's become clear to me and to the presidents and to the managements of all of our colleges, universities, trade schools, and so forth that we have a looming shortage of spaces in our postsecondary institutions to accommodate the people and especially the young people of Alberta.

I prefer to look optimistically. You know, we can perhaps correct this measure while we have an opportunity to do so, because just like the seven-year-olds that are learning how to read in our schools right now, the junior high and high school students that will be ready for postsecondary in a few years' time – time doesn't wait for that. There is a window of opportunity to get people engaged in postsecondary education, to learn a trade, to pick up a degree, but that window opens and closes, and it's time sensitive. If we are tens of thousands of spaces short for postsecondary and trades positions in this province for that population, then they lose out. They don't go, or it becomes so expensive that only the people that have considerable resources get to go, and the rest are left out.

We have the lowest participation rate in postsecondary education in Canada here in Alberta. Interestingly, we also have the highest percentage of population with postsecondary degrees here in Alberta as to the rest of the country. That tells me, I think, and anyone who's listening, Mr. Chair, that people bring the degrees in with them from other jurisdictions, and we are not meeting our responsibilities for our own population to ensure that Alberta's young people, especially, are participating and getting meaningful postsecondary education here in Alberta. Obviously, I think that that's a fundamental responsibility of the postsecondary education minister and of this government, to rectify this.

I know that our government was starting to address this issue by making tuition more affordable, to bring it closer to the national average for tuition so that that barrier for people to go to school was made somewhat easier. Now, in 2019, suddenly is dropped from the sky a budget that is a direct attack on any progress that we might have made or planned to make in the postsecondary file: tens of thousands of new spaces needed, and instead there are cuts, a total freeze on capital building, again, just at the point where we need to start to build our capacity in postsecondary education.

There's a movement away from permanent instruction positions in our colleges, trades, and universities and to sessional instructors – right? – at much reduced rates, much more unstable circumstances, and a real, measurable increase in class sizes, especially in undergraduate and trades programs, that interferes with the capacity for people to learn in those classrooms. Sessional instructors do, you know, I'm sure, yeoman's work to ensure that their students are getting the education as best they can, but that inherent instability of having a sessional position, leaving a sessional position, hiring different sessional positions, larger class sizes, for sure: it all adds up to a decrease in the quality of education that a student will receive in a college trades program or university.

There you have it, Mr. Chair, a toxic combination of a dramatic increase in the costs of a postsecondary education and the reduction in the quality of that same postsecondary education. I don't think that, you know, it's fair, quite frankly, to the hundreds of thousands of students that we have in our postsecondary system now and those tens of thousands more that are just coming up the pipe, that are in grade school now across the province.

We have one of the youngest populations in Canada as well. You know, it's a sign of optimism and hope that people are having families, and with that is the expectation that we can provide a good-quality education that will allow them to thrive and do well economically here in the province. It's obvious that the number one indicator of success and rates of pay for anyone in a society is their education and the quality of education that they have, a direct correlation to the pay that someone brings home and the success of an economy as well.

I would suggest that part of the reason that we have been very successful in, you know, gross domestic product here in this province and per-family income and so forth is the fact that we have a well-educated population. As I said before, we have a well-educated population, people that are bringing their qualification and their education from elsewhere, which is fine. I think that's fair play, and we need our population to continue to grow. We have that immigration from other provinces and other countries, too, which is, again, a wonderful thing, but we also have a responsibility to move the dial on the participation rates of people, young people especially, in our postsecondary institutions. This budget, Bill 21 specifically, throws a spanner into the works with that ambition big time.

Postsecondary students that I met with yesterday asked me to bring up this issue around student loans and the tax change that's associated with student loans as well. Again, you know, you can play with numbers and talk a good talk by saying that you're increasing this by a small percentage and that people can afford it. But with a student loan, let's say, of $30,000, you're talking about thousands of dollars more that a student will have to pay over time. I am just getting an education on just how much student debt people are actually carrying, and $30,000 isn't a lot. I had an individual from another university in my office last week that has not even finished an undergraduate degree yet and has more than $70,000 in accumulated debt, right? So it's like carrying a mortgage for a property. Another gentleman who was with him expects at the end of his master's degree to have $125,000 of debt.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other hon. members? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud has risen to speak.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I'm pleased to rise again today to speak on the matter of Bill 21, the Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019. You know, there are so many different parts of this bill that are problematic and that should be of concern and are of concern to many Albertans. I spoke at length just earlier today about my concerns around the deindexation of AISH and how that attacks the most vulnerable Albertans. However, I also would like to speak to another piece of the act. This is actually something that I think the government caucus would be in agreement with.

Perhaps I'll begin by indicating that I would like to table an amendment to Bill 21. I've got the copies here. We're just distributing the amendment right now. Would you like me to wait, Mr. Chair, until it's all circulated?

The Deputy Chair: Yes, if we could just wait until the pages get a chance to run it to the members.

Just for the record, this will be referred to as amendment A2.

Ms Pancholi: Amendment A2. Thank you, Mr. Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Hon. member, if you would please read it into the record and then go ahead and continue with your debate.

10:50

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I move that Bill 21, Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019, be amended in section 13(2) by striking out “or government initiatives.”

Because Bill 21 is a very large bill, I will give a little context to what this amendment is about. This section refers to an amendment to the Provincial Offences Procedure Act. It is amended by section 13(2) of Bill 21. Specifically, it amends section 14(3) of the Provincial Offences Procedure Act, which currently states:

Where, under an enactment,

- (a) the Crown in right of Alberta collects an amount of money in respect of a penalty, fine or sum of money payable under the enactment or the proceeds of a forfeiture, and
- (b) the amount collected by the Crown does not belong to the Crown in right of Alberta, the Crown in right of Alberta may, notwithstanding any Act and subject to the regulations, retain a portion of that amount to offset the expenses incurred by the Crown with respect to the collecting of penalties, fines, sums of money or forfeitures arising under any enactment, and that portion that is retained by the Crown belongs to the Crown in right of Alberta and shall be deposited in the General Revenue Fund.

That's the original section 14(3) of the Provincial Offences Procedure Act.

Bill 21 amends that by adding basically that the fines and penalties that are collected under the Provincial Offences Procedure Act are to be used to fund programs that support or improve the administration of justice or government initiatives.

What I'm suggesting by this amendment, Mr. Chair, is that the words "or government initiatives" be struck out. What that would mean is that any fines, penalties, or sums of monies that are collected under the Provincial Offences Procedure Act can only be used to improve the administration of justice and cannot be used for other government initiatives. That's the intent behind the amendment.

I think, actually, that given some of the comments and what I actually think the intent of this section of Bill 21 speaks to, this should actually be consistent with what the government has stated a number of times. They have referred with a lot of disdain to funds that go into the general revenue fund as a slush fund. Specifically, they applied that term to the collection of funds under the climate leadership plan despite the fact that the legislation was very clear under the climate leadership plan as to how funds collected through the carbon tax would be used. Even as recently as, I believe, yesterday or maybe it was the day before, on Monday, the Government House Leader spoke very derisively of the use of the general revenue fund as a slush fund. This is ironic, too, by the way, because we know that there are other measures put forward by this government. Just as an example, the lottery fund has now been dissolved, and all of that money has been put into the general revenue fund. We are supposed to trust the Minister of Finance when he says that that won't actually result in a reduction of monies going out to nonprofit organizations that rely upon lottery funds to conduct their work. In that case, apparently, the general revenue fund is not a slush fund; I guess it depends on, in the government's view, who is in government.

Given the freewheeling spending that we've seen from this government of late with respect to expenses and cronyism and pancake plane parties, I'm not really sure who should be wearing the moniker of slush fund, but I certainly don't think it's the members in the opposition or when they were formerly the government. Those accusations were never levied against us.

In any respect, I appreciate that the Government House Leader, in particular, but many government members have been clear that they don't believe that money should go into the general revenue fund to be a slush fund. Therefore, I suggest that monies that are collected under the Provincial Offences Procedure Act, which are specifically collected through fines and penalties under that act, should not go to government initiatives generally. I think that that actually means that they would be using those funds to basically compensate or make up for the $4.7 billion corporate no-jobs handout that has already been done by this government. Really, those fines and those penalties should only be used for the administration of justice, to improve the administration of justice. In fact, that is consistent with what the wording of Bill 21 includes. Section 13(2) does seem to be that the government is also of the view that there should be some parameters around how monies collected under these fines and penalties should be used.

It is actually the government's suggestion in 13(2) of Bill 21 that it only be used to "improve the administration of justice or government initiatives." I would say that if they're trying to fulfill a certain intent, which is making sure that the money gathered under these fines is used for the purpose for which it's intended, they actually should not want the money to be used for other government initiatives. In that respect, it just really could be anything. Government initiatives is a pretty general term. We know that any activity by the government could certainly fall within that description. Really, it's saying that the money could be used as part of the general revenue fund for any purpose. You know, I'm going back to some of my legislative drafting training, but the intent, certainly, behind 13(2) of Bill 21 seems to be to prescribe some limits on how that money can be spent. Therefore, I would say that it's undermining the intention of that provision to also allow this money to be used for other government initiatives.

My hope is actually that the government will take this as a friendly amendment. Really, I think I understand what their intent is behind this section of Bill 21, and we're helping them out a little bit to be very clear that the money collected under these fines should really only be used to improve the administration of justice and not for any other purpose because that's what the money is paid into. It's paid under the Provincial Offences Procedure Act, and it should be used for improving the administration of justice.

Just yesterday I had the distinct pleasure of sitting in on the estimates for the Ministry of Justice. I heard the minister speak at length about his commitment and objectives around improving the administration of justice but also speak at length about, you know, the tight financial times we're in. Really, if he's looking to make some significant measures and progress with respect to streamlining and improving the administration of justice, here's an opportunity to make sure that the funds that are collected under these fines and penalties only go for that purpose.

Again, I view this as a friendly amendment, and I assume and I am hopeful that the government caucus will view it that way as well. I look forward to having some further debate on this.

Thank you, Mr. Chair.

Chair's Ruling Decorum

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Prior to hearing from any other members, I just want to remind the House that although we're in Committee of the Whole and, you know, there's the opportunity for a few more discussions, et cetera, perhaps even between the aisles, members should not break the line between the speaker and the chair as they are wandering about the House. I think it happened twice with the last speaker. Just a reminder on that point.

Debate Continued

The Deputy Chair: Are there any other members looking to speak to this amendment A2? I see the hon. Member for Calgary-West has risen to speak.

Mr. Ellis: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Chair. I thank, certainly, the member for bringing forward this amendment. However, you know, this is something that I think our government certainly would be more than happy to engage in these types of conversations with members of the opposition. I appreciate it being a reasonable amendment, but not having heard from the Justice department with respect to this particular amendment, the way I am reading this – when I look at page 47 of Bill 21, Mr. Chair, 13(2) states:

Section 14(3) is amended by adding "or to fund programs that support or improve the administration of justice or government initiatives" after "arising under any enactment."

I think government initiatives are important in ways that are enhancing the community. These are initiatives that are to provide value to the community. I think that by removing “government initiatives,” that would certainly cause, you know, concern in regard to possible good deeds that these government initiatives may be doing.

That being said, I certainly appreciate the friendly amendment that was provided by the member opposite. However, at this time we cannot support this amendment. Thank you.

11:00

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to amendment A2? The individual who caught my eye is the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. One of the things I appreciate about committee so much is that we have the opportunity to bat things back and forth and to rise to speak to these matters as many times as necessary. I think that with this one, certainly I would propose, then, that perhaps the Government House Leader consider taking this amendment to Justice. He said that he hasn’t had the opportunity to discuss this with the actual officials in the Ministry of Justice. I think it would be, then, beneficial for the Government House Leader or the Acting Government House Leader or the designate or the Justice minister, for example, as well as for all members of this Assembly for the member to do so, to actually take this back, consult with the officials, make the proper determination once having garnered that additional information before addressing this amendment here today.

I think that if there was a motion from the government side to potentially adjourn debate on this matter to have the opportunity to engage in those discussions before rushing to make a decision on this amendment, that would be beneficial. Thank you very much.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members . . .

Ms Hoffman: Oh, sorry. I can move that.

The Deputy Chair: Okay. I didn’t hear that it was actually moved.

Ms Hoffman: I didn’t actually move it myself. I was gesturing that maybe somebody else would, but I’d be happy to move that we adjourn debate.

The Deputy Chair: On this amendment? Just for clarity, you’re asking to adjourn debate on this amendment?

Ms Hoffman: Let’s do it first on the amendment, yeah.

The Deputy Chair: Okay. All right.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Mr. Ellis: I ask that we rise and report, Mr. Chair.

[Motion carried]

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

The Acting Speaker: I see the hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul has risen.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. The committee reports progress on the following bill: Bill 21. I wish to table copies of all amendments considered by the Committee of the Whole on this date for the official records of the Assembly.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Does the Assembly concur in the report? All those in favour, please say aye.

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Acting Speaker: Any opposed, please say no. So ordered.

Government Bills and Orders

Third Reading

Bill 23

Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2019

The Acting Speaker: I see the hon. Member for Grande Prairie has risen to speak on this matter.

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I’m pleased to move this morning on behalf of the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General third reading of Bill 23, the Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2019.

Mr. Speaker, if passed, this act will address a number of issues concerning our courts. The first involves the name of the Court of Queen’s Bench. When Queen Elizabeth II ceases to rule, convention dictates that the name of our superior trial court is changed out of respect for the new monarch. Renaming the court will require a significant number of changes to signage, seals, and forms as well as other official documents and websites bearing its name.

This bill proposes re-enacting the section of the Court of Queen’s Bench Act that would automatically change the court’s name to the Court of King’s Bench. This section was repealed during the fall 2018 session of the Legislature. It’s our belief that automatically renaming the court to the Court of King’s Bench recognizes our constitutional monarchy and honours the heritage of our legal system. This decision would also be in keeping with similar naming conventions in Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

The provisions of Bill 23 cover two additional matters. First, it would reduce the age at which masters in chambers and Provincial Court judges may request to be appointed for part-time service. As the Court of Queen’s Bench Act and the Provincial Court Act currently stand, these officials are eligible to serve for part-time service at 60 years old. Bill 23 would lower this threshold to 55. This change would create greater work flexibility for judges and masters. It may also create a small amount of savings for the province.

Approval of these requests would not be automatic. The Chief Judge of the Provincial Court or the Chief Justice of the Court of Queen’s Bench have the authority to deny a request if they feel it could create difficulties for the court. In this way, Bill 23 would balance the needs of judges and masters against the demands on court resources.

Finally, Bill 23 would give justices of the Court of Queen’s Bench and the Court of Appeal greater access to federal funds. Currently, when these justices attend certain meetings, conferences, or seminars, the federal Judges Act places an annual $500 limit on the amount of money available to pay their expenses. This places undue pressure on the provincial budget and the allocation of the same for these two judicial branches. Bill 23 would allow justices to access federal funds beyond the current $500 limit by authorizing their attendance at meetings, conferences, or seminars related to the administration of justice, with the approval of their Chief Justice. This change would allow these justices greater freedom to travel and carry out their duties.

Taken together, the provisions of Bill 23, while small, will help make the justice system more efficient for us and for the province of Alberta. It’s my hope that members of this House will continue to support this legislation.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other hon. members looking to speak to this matter?
Seeing none, the hon. Member for Grande Prairie to close debate.

Mrs. Allard: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my honour to rise again on behalf of the Minister of Justice and close debate on Bill 23.

[Motion carried; Bill 23 read a third time]

11:10 Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 24 Appropriation Act, 2019

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance has the floor.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my pleasure to move second reading of Bill 24, the Appropriation Act, 2019.

This is a budget that will enhance Alberta's competitiveness by enshrining the job-creation tax cut, adopting the accelerated capital cost allowance provisions, and cutting red tape. When these measures are fully implemented, we will have the most competitive overall corporate tax regime in Canada and lower corporate taxes than 44 of 50 U.S. states. Once again Alberta will be the destination of choice for investors, and we feel very optimistic about Alberta's prospects. However, we're not assuming a fast recovery by Alberta standards. We need to be cautious and focus on the things we can control, and this includes getting our fiscal house in order by bringing spending in line with comparative provinces and eliminating our deficit while creating the conditions for businesses to thrive in Alberta.

Budget 2019 lays out a plan for government to live within its means while protecting the front-line services that Albertans depend on. It includes a moderate operational spending reduction of 2.8 per cent over four years to get our budget back in balance. This is essential to bring our province's debt under control and prevent our children and grandchildren from bearing the burden of paying for services that we use today.

Taxpayer-supported debt now stands at $62.7 billion, and Alberta taxpayers paid $1.9 billion to service these debts last year. That works out to $5 million a day, money that goes to bankers and bondholders instead of projects that Albertans care about like roads, schools, and hospitals.

The MacKinnon panel found that Alberta spends more per person on many key government services than comparable provinces do. Worse still, the panel demonstrated that our service delivery is no better than in comparator provinces, and while these findings were troubling, they present an opportunity for us as government. If other provinces can deliver high-quality services for less money, so can Alberta. Budget 2019 will bring our spending closer in line with other provinces, and it will thoughtfully reprioritize our spending to ensure that we keep our platform promise of maintaining or increasing funding to vital public services.

We are investing $20.6 billion per year to provide health services. This includes increases of $100 million for a mental health and addiction strategy, $40 million for the opioid response, and $20 million for palliative care.

We are also providing $8.2 billion for education services. The budget keeps our promise to maintain current education funding and fund enrolment growth of 2.2 per cent.

Budget 2019 does not make cuts to the social programs vulnerable Albertans depend on. In fact, we're increasing funding to Community and Social Services to address human trafficking and sexual exploitation, rising caseload pressure, and to undertake a comprehensive review of programming.

We're also increasing funding to Seniors and Housing to maintain overall benefits for seniors.

Children's Services will see a 15 per cent increase over four years so we can continue to provide the tools necessary to support healthy families and communities.

Budget 2019 makes good on our commitment to stand up for Alberta's interests. Albertans told us loud and clear that they want a provincial government that is willing to defend our energy sector and stand up against unfair federal policies. Standing up for Alberta is more important than ever given the results of the federal election, and we're committed to defending our world-class energy industry. Budget 2019 commits $30 million for the Canadian Energy Centre, which will promote Alberta's responsible energy practices and combat misinformation. This is on top of the $2.5 million we announced in July for a public inquiry into foreign funding of anti-energy campaigns. We're also pushing back against prejudicial federal policies that force Albertan taxpayers to pay more than their fair share to Ottawa while receiving fewer federal services than other Canadians. Our government is committed to working with the federal government and all provinces and territories in a review of the major federal transfers to ensure these transfers do not discriminate against any one jurisdiction. Mr. Speaker, federal fiscal transfers must be fair. We are in the process of reviewing all federal fiscal programs and are pushing to both cap the size of the equalization program and exclude nonrenewable resource revenues from the program's calculations.

During the election it was clear that Albertans wanted change, they wanted jobs, and they wanted a government with a real plan to bring investment and prosperity back to Alberta. What they didn't want was to carry on the legacy of debt that had become too commonplace in Alberta or to pass that debt on to their children and grandchildren. I believe that Budget 2019 is a thoughtful and measured budget. It will end the overspending that has plagued Alberta for almost 20 years and puts us on a credible path towards balance.

I along with my colleagues look forward to implementing Budget 2019, a plan for jobs and the economy, and I urge you all to support this bill today. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. Member.

Are there any members looking to speak to this? I see the hon. Member for Calgary-West has risen.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you very much. Thank you to the minister for bringing up those important comments, but at this time, Mr. Speaker, I ask that we adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

The Acting Speaker: I see the hon. Minister of Transportation has risen to speak.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We've had some good, lively debate here this morning. We've made some progress, and as such I move that we adjourn the House until 1:30 this afternoon.

[The Assembly adjourned at 11:17 a.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Wednesday, November 20, 2019

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Please be seated.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Hon. members, we have a number of guests and visitors with us today, including two school groups. It's my absolute pleasure to welcome, from what is, in my nonpartisan opinion, the most outstanding constituency of Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills, the students from Prairie Christian academy as well as, from the excellent constituency of Edmonton-Meadows, grade 6 students from Julia Kiniski elementary. Please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

Hon. members, as some of you are aware, you had the opportunity to attend in the lower rotunda and meet representatives from the Stollery children's hospital visiting today. I'm pleased to welcome some very, very special guests. I believe that they have arrived in the gallery: Emma and Cameron Nagel, Jacob Martens, and a special shout-out to the folks from Airdrie-East, Payton and Easton Langenau. Welcome and thank you for joining us.

Hon. members, this afternoon in the galleries are guests of the Member for Livingstone-Macleod from the organization for scleroderma.

Also in the galleries are guests of the Minister of Health: representatives from Alberta Health Services and Covenant Health here in observation of World Wide Pressure Injury Prevention Day.

Visiting as guests of the Member for Highwood: Mr. Brent Nelson, Chad Hughes, and Sean David.

Also, guests of the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry: members of Alberta's Hutterite community as well as MNP Alberta.

Last but certainly not least are guests of the Member for Peace River: the Wiebe family and their eight children.

All of those who are able and would like to, please rise to receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

Members' Statements

Stollery Children's Hospital

Ms Armstrong-Homeniuk: Mr. Speaker, the health of our province starts with the health of its children. The Stollery Children's Hospital Foundation has a great vision to transform children's health care so that every child, no matter where they live, can get the best possible care. That's why we're proud that the Stollery is being hosted today at the Legislature. This is an opportunity for our Legislative Assembly members to celebrate this amazing, world-renowned expertise that exists right here in our own backyard and in backyards across Alberta, to help kids like Payton and Easton Langenau from Airdrie, Jacob Martens from Grande Prairie, Emma and Cameron Nagel from Leduc, and Emily Gordon from Sherwood Park. I'm proud to say that almost all of these Stollery kids and their families are here with us today in the members' gallery.

As the second-largest children's hospital in Canada the Stollery sees more than 293,000 patient visits every year, and nearly one-half of those kids come from outside of the Edmonton region. The Stollery children's hospital is one of the busiest and most specialized children's hospitals in Canada, performing more than 11,000 surgeries per year and providing care to some of the most complex health care cases anywhere in the world. The foundation is committed to investing in the best people, programs, equipment, and research to make sure that the Stollery has what it needs to care for kids for generations to come. It's the primary funder of pediatric research, $40 million over 10 years through the Women and Children's Health Research Institute at the University of Alberta. With donor support the foundation is helping to give the sickest kids the best chance anywhere in the world for a long and healthy life.

Stollery day is a chance for all of us to reflect on the tremendous impact this hospital has had on the quality of health care in our province. On behalf of Emily, Emma, Cameron, Payton, Easton, Jacob, and their families, thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: If you might indulge me as a father of two who have both spent time in children's hospitals, I too would like to voice my thank you to the Stollery and to those who do great work for our children.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Holger Petersen

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today I rise to pay tribute to a great Albertan, a long-time resident of Edmonton who has made enormous contributions to the music scene in our province and, indeed, across Canada and around the world, Mr. Holger Petersen. Holger started his career as a drummer, playing with bands like Hot Cottage in bars across Edmonton. He earned a diploma in radio and television arts from NAIT and in 1969 became the host of Natch'l Blues on CKUA Radio, a program which now stands as Canada's longest running program dedicated to blues music.

Not content to simply play records, in 1976 Holger founded Stony Plain Records to support and promote some of the amazing artists he'd had the fortune to meet, interview, and eventually produce records for. In the 45 years since, Stony Plain has gone on to release over 400 albums by a wide range of artists, which have won over 30 maple blues awards, 11 Junos, and been nominated for six Grammys. Holger himself has earned multiple awards for producer of the year, a Canadian country music award for record company person of the year, lifetime achievement awards from no fewer than five prominent blues associations, a Queen's golden jubilee medal, the Order of Canada, and honorary doctorates from both Athabasca University and the University of Alberta.

As if that wasn't enough to cement him as a force to be reckoned with in the provincial, national, and global music industries, Holger also helped found both the Edmonton Folk Music Festival and the Alberta recording industries association, now known as Alberta Music.

Holger's ongoing success is rooted in his endless curiosity, unerring ear, and genuine warmth. He's a deeply knowledgeable blues evangelist, a tireless champion of good music, a community builder, and the consummate fan. This Saturday I look forward to joining Holger's friends, family, and peers as they gather at CKUA Radio to celebrate his remarkable 50-year achievement in broadcasting in addition to his many contributions to the Canadian music landscape.

Congratulations, Holger, on 50 years. We look forward to many more.

Holodomor Memorial Day and Political Discourse

Mr. Schow: This Saturday is Holodomor remembrance day, the solemn day when we recognize Communist dictator Joseph Stalin's genocide of Ukrainians through a deliberate, co-ordinated famine. Soviet propagandists claimed that the famine was of natural causes, that some bad weather resulted in poor crops, but it was anything but that. In order to achieve his political ends, Stalin and his thugs confiscated food and let Ukrainians starve to death. The Ukrainians were resisting Soviet socialist collectivization, so Stalin devised a famine. Through his terror famine Stalin murdered upwards of 10 million human beings. Think about that for a moment. The Holodomor is undoubtedly one of the greatest atrocities in human history, an atrocity we should never forget. Holodomor is especially solemn in Alberta, where hundreds of thousands of Albertans trace their Ukrainian roots.

Now, I recognize that those of us in this Chamber have diverse political views, and sometimes we strongly disagree on matters of public policy. That's healthy. These disagreements and the debates ensure that we have a strong democracy. But we should not minimize crimes such as the Holodomor for the sake of convenient political argument. I was frankly shocked and stunned when the Member for Lethbridge-West invoked the Holodomor last night when debating Bill 22 before this House. This spring 55 per cent of Albertans voted for the United Conservative Party; over 1 million votes cast for us, the highest voter turnout since '82. There is absolutely no valid comparison. While I'm not optimistic, I sincerely hope that the Member for Lethbridge-West will apologize. There is no excuse for invoking Joseph Stalin when speaking about the democratically elected government of Alberta.

We must ensure that future generations remember the evils of Soviet Communism, including the Holodomor. That includes not minimizing those crimes by comparing them to contemporary debates in modern politics.

1:40                      Lead in Drinking Water

Mr. Schmidt: I've now risen a number of times in this House to raise the issue of lead in our drinking water. Earlier this month it was reported that our drinking water contains unacceptable concentrations of lead. I and many Albertans were extremely concerned that more than 10 per cent of Alberta's daycares and a quarter of all schools tested in the Calgary Catholic school board and Elk Island public school board had drinking water exceeding the maximum allowable concentration of lead. This is extremely concerning as lead is a neurotoxin that impedes children's brain development. It can cause behavioural problems and results in loss of IQ.

However, there is hope. There are solutions we can commit to right now. They are straightforward. We have already taken lead out of gasoline and paint, and we can take it out of our drinking water as well. We can replace all lead plumbing. Like Ontario, we can make testing for lead mandatory in all schools and daycares. I think this is a straightforward solution that we should commit to as soon as possible. To prevent this issue from ever occurring again, we should implement an outright ban on all plumbing fixtures that contain lead. These fixtures should not be sold or installed in Alberta. The government can commit to this right now and start taking action this afternoon. We've heard from this government that they're willing to implement federal standards and support schools in testing their drinking water, but that's not enough. We need to be decisive.

We need the government to take action on the solutions outlined. The government cut municipalities and cut school boards in their budgets, which leaves them at the mercy of the government to be able to finance taking action against lead. That's why I'm calling on this government once again to replace and ban lead plumbing and make testing mandatory. The government found money to finance a $4.7 billion corporate giveaway. Now it needs to find the money to protect our drinking water and our children.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

National Child Day

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am honoured today to rise to acknowledge November 20 as National Child Day. It's especially exciting to see so many children here sharing it with us today. I know that you and all members of this Assembly will agree that there is nothing more important than our children. We may often be at odds on questions of policy or priorities in this House, but one thing we have in common is that we want the best for our children. We recognize that our commitment to them now and supporting their well-being and development will have a lasting impact on generations to come. National Child Day serves as a reminder that everything we do, every choice that we make impacts young people in this province now and into the future. It is a reminder that children in Alberta and around the globe have a right to high-quality education, health care, protection from abuse and neglect, and a voice in this society.

Last month the South Sudanese community in Calgary shared with me the struggles of their children. These struggles, including addiction, mental health, violence, and isolation, are shared by every community across this province. These challenges must be faced head-on by our families, community organizations, and government. Together we can equip our children and give them the help that they need to reach their full potential. It is why we work to leave things better than we found them, because one day Alberta will be in their hands. When all in this Chamber are long gone, those whose lives were touched by our actions will stand in our place. Our government is committed to a path that will give Alberta's children the opportunity and the means to build a bright and happy future. We all have a role to play. Mentor a young person, coach on a local team, donate time or money to a community organization, and take an interest in young people.

I want to thank all members for sharing their commitment to Alberta's children and for the excellent work that you all do on their behalf. To mark this occasion and on behalf of my colleagues in this House, it is my great pleasure to stand here today and recognize this day.

Budget 2019 and Teachers

Ms Goehring: Mr. Speaker, members of our caucus have continued to be inundated with e-mails and letters from our constituents as a result of the budget currently being debated by the House. Whether it's classroom sizes, school fees, insurance rates, pensions, collective bargaining, public servant job losses, the termination of the Election Commissioner, loss of tax credits, increases to tuition rates, corruption, honestly, the list is exhaustive.

Recently a constituent reached out to my office regarding the government's ill-conceived grab of the teachers' pensions. She was concerned, to say the least, stating: pensions belong to teachers, not the government; with that, we respectfully ask that MLAs take their hands off our pensions. Unfortunately, since that e-mail I have received an update, and I would like to share Ulana Soletsky's story with the House today.

Since my last e-mail I have been informed that I might lose my position with the school board because of the last budget. I have been a classroom teacher since 1983, and now I have held the position of math consultant in my school district for the last 11 years. I have also been offering professional development in math education for 11 years. To hear that my position might be eliminated has been absolutely frightening and frustrating.

In the last few days I have also heard that the UCP government might be tabling a voucher approach to education. Our education system is one of the best in the world, let alone Canada. I have worked with teachers in the private school systems and can tell you honestly that what we have in the public-separate districts in Alberta is a much superior learning environment. What sense does this make, and how can we stop this? I am so frustrated and frightened that I am having great anxiety about the future of education in Alberta.

Mr. Speaker, this anxiety that Albertans are living under is a direct result of the government's ongoing sacrifice of the well-being of families and individuals to support a $4.7 billion giveaway, and it's shameful.

Weed Notice Appeals

Mr. Rowswell: Mr. Speaker, on October 31 I attended the northeast regional agricultural service board conference. There were many issues important to rural Albertans discussed. One that caught my attention was an issue that related to red tape reduction. Our government has found inefficiencies in the way in which growers can appeal a weed notice. Growers in Alberta are subject to the Weed Control Act, and when an inspector finds that someone is noncompliant with the act, they will provide an inspector's notice in writing.

Inspectors make mistakes from time to time, so of course the act allows for an appeal process. You see, Mr. Speaker, the appeal process has been known to take at least 110 days, and in some cases it has taken over one year. I'm sure that even my colleagues from the urban areas could understand that in 110 days these noxious weeds have matured, dropped their seeds to spread across the countryside, making the problem worse.

What could possibly cause such an important decision to take this long, and what can be done about it? Previously the government lawyers would review documents, prepare briefings, go back and forth with the ministry and the producer for an unknown length of time. This would delay the decision into the winter and the decision would be revisited in the spring and the process would start again. The ministry has changed this process. Using existing legislation in section 9 of the Government Organization Act, our government will be appointing one or more people to oversee the review process and conduct in-person hearings, with all evidence present. With this new process a written decision will be issued within 30 to 45 days of the hearing. This gives plenty of time to take corrective action and control the weeds before the problem gets worse.

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the producers and growers in our province, including many in my own riding, I wanted to take this opportunity to thank and congratulate the Ministry of Agriculture and Forestry for all their efforts in reducing red tape and efficiently managing problems. Thank you.

Government Policies and Women

Member Irwin: Women make up over half our province, yet Alberta women continue to see the lowest participation in the workforce in Canada, experience higher unemployment compared to men while working in the province with the nation's largest gender wage gap. Under four years of an NDP government our gender-balanced cabinet worked tirelessly to apply a gender lens to policy decisions, including when introducing budgets, with a goal of ending gender-based violence and finally closing Alberta's deep economic gender gap.

Yet instead of continuing the push for gender equality, the UCP is hurting women. I'll say it even if it hurts this government to hear it. Before you say I'm exaggerating, let me explain with some facts, and, wow, do I have a lot to cover in two minutes, so here we go.

In only six months the UCP have: gutted the status of women ministry with a 42 per cent cut and many millions gone as well; slashed supports for child care while creating uncertainty for those in $25-per-day early learning and child care centres; deindexed the Alberta seniors' benefit, affecting thousands of senior women across our province; kicked off 46,000 dependants from the seniors' drug plan, disproportionately affecting women; cut and froze the minimum wage, of which two-thirds are women workers; hiked tuition for postsecondary students, again affecting a lot of women; attacked collective bargaining rights and public pensions and announced a rollback of wages for our hard-working public-sector workers who are, again, mostly women; abandoned the 52 dedicated health care workers in Vegreville who were, you guessed it, mostly women; and introduced the dangerous Bill 207, which attacks the fundamental rights of women and LGBTQ2S-plus Albertans to access the health care and services they need. I've shared a list, and something tells me that this isn't exhaustive.

Now I throw it back to you, Mr. Premier, and your government: what will you do to start improving the lives of women now? Asking for 2 million or so friends.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Election Commissioner

Ms Hoffman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday the House leader for the government said: nothing is changing; the Election Commissioner can keep doing his investigations the same as before. The bill, however, says in black and white that the commissioner is "terminated." Let's be clear. The government is bringing forward a law to fire the person who has issued more than $200,000 in fines against UCP campaigns because they keep breaking the law. To the Justice minister: do you really want to go down in Alberta's history books as the guy who fired law enforcement to conceal the truth about his party and his boss?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, nobody has fired law enforcement. What I said yesterday was that the Election Commissioner's office continues going forward under the structure if Bill 22 is adopted by this House. In fact, the structure that is proposed brings us in line exactly with how it is in Manitoba and with the federal government. And for every other province inside this country, they actually do not have an Election Commissioner. The point is this. Every other system in this province, the entire system is run under one office. In fact, the current Election Commissioner has even advised other governments that that is the best way to structure these types of systems.

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, the bill terminates the Election Commissioner, who is charged with investigating fraud into the minister's party. The commissioner says that he has 800 investigations – 800 – many of these still ongoing. The commissioner reminds all members of this House that, quote, his office prevents the emergence of a culture of corruption within the political and electoral process. To the keeper of the Great Seal: isn't that what you want to be known for instead of the keeper of great secrets, who brings corruption back to Alberta?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, again, the Election Commissioner's office remains in place if Bill 22 is adopted by this Legislature. It will fall under the Chief Electoral Officer. Any and all investigations that are being undertaken will remain in place and be able to be completed. Elections Alberta have governed our election system in this province for over a century very, very successfully. This simply takes our system back to where it was before 2018. It protects the integrity of the independent officers of this Legislature but brings us in line with the system that's all across this entire country.

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, no one believes the tired spin.

Former Conservative MP Monte Solberg says, quote, the optics are pretty bad. Mount Royal Professor Duane Bratt says, quote, it's a cover-up, plain and simple. And Rick Bell says that he's seen the ghost of Alison Redford wandering the hallways of the Legislature. Does the Premier really think he has a mandate to bring corruption back? That's what he's doing in Bill 22.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, I'm excited that corruption will continue to be investigated in all ways by the Chief Electoral Officer and the Election Commissioner's office under Bill 22. [interjections] The investigative process will remain in place, the office of the Election Commissioner will remain in place, and the Chief Electoral Officer will remain in place, protecting the integrity of our election system. That's important to this government. We are taking the system and bringing it in line with the exact recommendations that the current Election Commissioner has provided other governments. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Calgary Board of Education Layoffs

Ms Hoffman: The Premier printed the word "jobs" on poster board during the election, but today 300 teachers are being laid off in Alberta's largest school district, Calgary public. Three hundred teachers, Mr. Speaker, in one district in Calgary. This government said that there would be none. The Minister of Education said, "Our government and I are very committed to keeping teachers in front of students." What does the minister have to say to the 300 teachers who were just fired and the thousands of students who relied on them to help them with their learning?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I do sympathize with those teachers, their families, the students, the parents, all who are affected by this rash decision. You know, I just don't understand it. I'm struggling to understand how this happened. I have been very clear from the beginning that teachers in front of students has the greatest impact on student learning, and the reckless mismanagement of tax dollars by this board is not going to go unaccounted for. I will be ordering an independent financial audit and governance review of the Calgary board of education.

Ms Hoffman: The minister won't take responsibility. She only knows how to distract. I have warned this minister for months that giving $4.7 billion away in a no-jobs corporate handout would mean teacher layoffs. Parents warned her. The ATA warned her. The CBE warned her. Everyone knew this was coming. So how can the minister claim to be surprised and divert responsibility when this is exactly what everyone knew was going to happen with her budget?

Member LaGrange: I am surprised. I have a board with a budget of $1.2 billion that services 130,000 students whose first option was to go cutting teachers. That is unacceptable. Unacceptable.

Therefore, that is why I am calling forward an independent financial audit and a governance review to determine what is going on in that board.

Ms Hoffman: Well, the CBE says that they could fire all of their HR, their legal, their senior management, and it still wouldn't add up to the amount that this minister has cut from their budget.

The minister's mismanagement means that thousands of schoolchildren in Calgary classrooms are losing their teachers mid-year. They will be in bigger classrooms with fewer supports. Districts right across Alberta are facing the same deep cuts, and kids are paying the price for this minister's mismanagement. All this government has left are excuses. How many more Alberta students are going to have to get ripped off before this minister decides to audit herself and her own bad budget, Mr. Speaker?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To be quite honest, I offered the CBE the expertise of my department to assist them with their finances, and they chose not to take us up on that offer. On Monday I met with every single board chair from the four metros, their CFOs, and their superintendents, and at no time did they mention any massive layoffs. There is a history here with this particular board, with this particular division, of mismanagement. I will get down to the bottom of it. There will be an independent financial audit, and there will be a governance review to see . . .

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Edmonton-City Centre has the call.

Government Policies and Nurses

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Now, if the Minister of Health had just gone outside today, he would have met hundreds upon hundreds of registered nurses rallying on the front steps of this Legislature. Nurses are the front line of health care. They're at the bedside in emergency rooms, in surgeries, in long-term care facilities. They support new mothers and seniors and Albertans struggling with opioid use. How does this government thank them? By taking away control of their pensions. To the Premier. Albertans trust nurses with their lives. Why can't you trust them with governance of their own pensions?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, the member opposite is being disingenuous with Albertans. The fact is that in Bill 22 we respect and will continue with joint governance with our public-sector workers relative to their pensions. We are making changes to ensure that we see competent individuals on the boards of these pensions, pension boards that manage billions of dollars on behalf of their members. Bill 22 strengthens public-sector pensions.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, given that this wasn't in their platform, there were about a thousand nurses here today that don't believe this minister. The Premier's attacks on nursing don't stop at pensions and wage rollbacks. His broken-promises budget practically brags about cutting $100 million worth of funded RN hours from Alberta's health care system. Why is this Premier so eager to take front-line nurses away from the bedside and from people in the community in order to pay for his $4.7 billion no-jobs corporate handout?

2:00

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health has risen.

Mr. Shandro: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This is an issue we've been asked about before in question period. This is an attack on our expansion of the scope of practice for LPNs in this province. I'd just like to point out that attacking the expansion of the scope of practice for LPNs is really trying to attack, actually, patient safety. The goal of our government is to make sure that there are fewer transitions in the care of our patients. Whether it's an acute-care hospital or continuing care, we want to make sure that our LPNs are practising to the full scope of their clinical knowledge and skills.

Mr. Shepherd: Bill 9; attacking pensions; wage rollbacks: why should these nurses trust anything this minister has to say? This minister could have heard some of those nurses today, some real human stories from the front line, if he had just taken the time to go outside and meet with them. If he understood that health care was about human beings and not corporate handouts, he might make some better choices.

What exactly was this minister doing this morning that was more important than actually speaking with the people who deliver front-line health care for the people of Alberta?

Mr. Shandro: Mr. Speaker, I'm very happy to be able to continue to engage with all of our health care professionals throughout the province, to be able to listen to all of our different health professionals, nursing health professionals in the province, to be able to listen to our RNs and to listen to our LPNs, as I did earlier this year when I listened to the LPNs and did what the previous government refused to do, which was to expand the scope of their practice to allow better patient care in this province.

Election Commissioner

Mr. Feehan: Mr. Speaker, we've learned today that the Election Commissioner has been investigating more than 800 complaints, including many we know of that involve voter fraud in the UCP leadership race. We also know that the commissioner was going to go before the legislative committee next week to detail the contents of many of these investigations and to request additional funds for those left outstanding. Now this government is rushing to fire him. To the chair of the Public Accounts Committee: will the committee schedule a meeting to hear from the Election Commissioner?

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you to my hon. colleague for the question. I share his concerns about the role of the office of the Election Commissioner. It is a matter of urgent public interest to scrutinize the public accounts and activities of the Election Commissioner for 2018-2019. As such, as the chair of the Public Accounts Committee I have written to all members of Public Accounts this morning to request an emergency meeting.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm concerned that part of this government's rush to pass Bill 22 is a direct result of them wanting to silence the Election Commissioner before he presents his annual report next week. I have to wonder if the UCP government cabinet is using the House now to suppress the findings of his investigations because they fear the damage that it would do to the UCP and the current Premier. To the chair of Public Accounts: what would be on the agenda of such a meeting?

The Speaker: All members of the House will know that House of Commons Procedure and Practice at 512, 513 addresses this very issue. The only issue that is able to be discussed is around the scheduling of a meeting or the agenda. As such, this question would be in order.

The hon. the chair of PAC.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to respond to my hon. colleague. Certainly, the Election Commissioner himself expressed concerns yesterday, and I believe that our Public Accounts Committee has a role to play in ensuring that democracy is upheld. The committee does have legislative oversight over the commissioner and how he has used the resources provided to him during the 2018-19 fiscal year and what contingencies and protocols are in place to ensure those funds do not go to waste if he is indeed fired. In the interest of accountability and upholding the rule of law, I am seeking support from all Public Accounts members for an emergency meeting.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you to the chair.

Mr. Speaker, I worry that the UCP cabinet will actively work to stop this emergency meeting of the Public Accounts Committee. We have seen that this government does not believe that the rules apply to them on repeated occasions. To the Government House Leader: will you now rise and commit that you will not block the efforts of the Public Accounts Committee chair to hold an emergency meeting with the Election Commissioner before Bill 22 passes?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, as a member of Executive Council I am certainly not a member of a standing committee of the Legislature, nor do I have a say or any control in the schedule. However, as the hon. member is well aware, the committee as a whole decides its scheduling matters, and I suggest that they continue with their process and have a conversation amongst committee members to be able to schedule the next meeting and agenda items as per our system.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Camrose is rising with a question.

Rural Crime Prevention

Ms Lovely: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last week in my constituency a woman and her dog were shot and killed. My constituents are afraid. Criminal activity has skyrocketed in our province and has become increasingly violent, with individuals being targeted numerous times. Law enforcement is frustrated. They go to great lengths of time and often endanger themselves to arrest these criminals. To the Minister of Justice: what is our plan to address rural crime?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General.

Mr. Schweitzer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you for the question. It was a privilege of mine to go to Camrose and hear directly from people in the community about their frustrations with rural crime. I'm proud of the fact that we made a significant announcement earlier this month to make sure that we have enhanced boots on the ground with our RAPID force announcement. We also need to make sure that we start changing precedents in the judicial system. That's why we brought in community impact statements. I'm hoping that the stories that I've heard in my town halls across Alberta can now be conveyed in a thoughtful way to our judiciary so that we can start having stronger penalties. It's time for the justice system not just to work for downtown Toronto but to work for rural Alberta.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Camrose.

Ms Lovely: Thank you, Minister, and thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the government has made this announcement but rural Alberta in particular has not yet heard a timeline and given that rural Albertans deserve to feel safe in their homes and in their communities and given that this is currently not the case, what is the government's plan to give rural constituents, especially in my riding of Camrose, some assurances of safety not only for themselves but for their property?

The Speaker: The Minister of Justice.

Mr. Schweitzer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, the community impact statements that I mentioned will be starting to be available in January. We also just introduced Bill 27. It is going to respect property rights in our province. Albertans deserve the strongest property rights possible. That's what this bill does. It makes sure that law-abiding Albertans can't be sued by criminals committing a criminal act on their property. That's common sense. That's what we heard from Albertans on the road. We're taking concrete steps now to help make sure that rural Albertans can feel safe.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Ms Lovely: Thank you, Minister, and thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that law enforcement and citizens have let me know that we are suffering from a catch-and-release program and given that my constituents believe that the same criminals keep repeating the same crime on the same people and given that we need help to combat the rural crime crisis in our communities, what is being done to help the constituents of Camrose and all rural Albertans?

The Speaker: The minister.

Mr. Schweitzer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you for the question. We're hiring 50 more prosecutors to make sure they have the time and resources to make sure they can have the caseload to go after repeat offenders. We're also making sure we provide additional training to our RAPID force, our sheriffs, our fish and wildlife officers to make sure that they can help contribute with our police on the ground to catch these repeat offenders and keep people safe. These are concrete steps. We're taking them now because rural crime is at a crisis and we have to act.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-McCall.

Canadian Energy Centre and Premier's Adviser's Expense Audits

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. One week ago the members for Edmonton-Manning and Lethbridge-West and I wrote to the Auditor General. We requested that he audit the travel costs of the Premier's principal adviser, David Knight Legg, and I'm pleased to report to the House that the Auditor General will be proceeding with this audit. Can the Minister of Energy state clearly, after so much confusion, whether the Premier's friend and personal adviser, David Knight Legg, was on official war room business when he stayed at five-star hotels at taxpayers' expense in London?

The Speaker: The hon. the Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, the NDP are playing with misrepresenting facts to Albertans. What the Auditor General did in fact say is that that is routine. Every three years they move through ministers' offices and the Executive Council for audits, and it happens to be that we are in the cycle portion where Executive Council is up for an audit. That's what the Auditor General said. Of course, we want the Auditor General to continue with all routine audits. But what we also want and what Albertans want is for the NDP to stop misrepresenting facts inside this House. It's not doing anything to help Albertans.

Mr. Sabir: I'll table the response later today.

Given that we also asked the Auditor General to audit the entire budget of the war room and given that I can report that he is proceeding with that audit as well, does the Minister of Energy regret trying to conceal the war room budget from Albertans, especially given the repeated abuse of taxpayer dollars that have come to light in the Premier's office and in the Attorney General's office?

2:10

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Energy has risen.

Mrs. Savage: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We have said from day one that the Canadian Energy Centre, also known as the war room, will always be subject to audit by the Auditor General. It was set up that way, to be transparent and accountable, and that's the way it will operate.

Mr. Sabir: Given that the Election Commissioner uncovered dozens of illegal acts by the Premier's associates and was still actively investigating a member of the UCP caucus when this government decided to fire him and given that the government has chosen to hide the reason or any form of accountability when it comes to David Knight Legg's shady London trips and given that the government is also hiding all the details of how its so-called war room is spending its $30 million budget, does the Premier also plan to fire the Auditor General before he can complete these two investigations?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, it's so outrageous to see the NDP continue to misrepresent facts. Of course, as we said, this is a routine audit that goes through every three years. We welcome the Auditor General to continue his important work. What this really comes down to is the NDP's ongoing war against the war room. This is the party that, when they were in power, put Tzepporah Berman in charge of our oil sands, a person who is dedicated to shutting down the energy industry. [interjections] I promise you that this government will continue to defend the energy industry inside this province despite the NDP trying to take them down.

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Lowe's Hardware Store Layoffs

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today Lowe's Canada announced it was closing six big box hardware stores in Alberta. This means significant job losses in Calgary, Edmonton, Airdrie, St. Albert, and Sherwood Park. It's yet another consequence of this government's failed economic policies. The total number of people laid off likely or should have been reported to the minister of labour. I know that he has this information, so can he rise in this House and tell us how many Albertans lost their jobs at Lowe's today, or is he too embarrassed to say?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, any time there are job losses we recognize the hardship that creates with families and individuals, and we certainly acknowledge that today. But in October there were over 20,000 new private-sector jobs created in this province. We are confident that the policies that we're implementing will turn the tide from the investment loss the previous government created in this province. We will see investment come back to the province and, with it, jobs and opportunities for Albertans.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that it's not all bad news, at least if you're a shareholder of Lowe's and not a worker, and given that Lowe's earnings per share and cash dividends are both up, which is good news for the traders in Toronto, for sure, but another loss for Alberta workers, can the Minister of Finance say how much of the $4.7 billion corporate handout was given to Lowe's in exchange for them laying off Albertans?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, when we hear the members opposite talk about a fiscal and financial policy, it leaves me with no doubt why investment fled this province by the billions when they were in government. They continue to be antibusiness, which equates to antijob, anti economic prosperity, and anti-Albertan.

Mr. Bilous: Given that Amazon, Google, RocketSpace, Cavendish all made investments in Alberta under our government and given that Husky, EnCana, Lowe's, and many others have all happily taken this Premier's $4.7 billion no-jobs corporate handout and then laid off Alberta workers or relocated outside of Alberta or invested in other provinces with Albertans' tax dollars, how does the Minister of Economic Development, Trade and Tourism explain her failure to even keep the jobs that she started with?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, all we have to do is listen to the University of Calgary School of Public Policy, where research has demonstrated that every time corporate taxes are lowered, it results in a point – one dollar of lowered corporate taxes results in 95 cents gained for employee wages. [interjections] Our policy of reducing corporate taxes will result in investment, increased job opportunities, and higher wages for Albertans. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. I heard you heckling all through the question. Perhaps you could not heckle while the Speaker is on his feet.

Dialysis Service in High Prairie

Mr. Rehn: Mr. Speaker, my constituents were led to believe that there would be significant upgrades to health care services in the town of High Prairie. While my residents understand that there are many health care needs all around Alberta, they are frustrated because they have a pressing need to access dialysis services in High Prairie that has not been met by previous governments. To the Minister of Health: will this government support the High Prairie health care centre so that my constituents can access the high-quality care they deserve?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Shandro: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's not just High Prairie. The NDP spent four years making empty promises on health care to all Albertans while they watched access get worse and waiting lists get longer, yet according to the latest CIHI data they increased health care spending faster than the government before them. They promised a dialysis unit for the new hospital in High Prairie, and they committed capital funding to build it but no money to operate it. So it's been on hold because our government, unlike that previous government, does not make empty promises. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Lesser Slave Lake is the only one that has the call.

Mr. Rehn: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that there is a significant need for a new dialysis clinic in High Prairie and given that High Prairie residents in need of dialysis must travel to either Slave Lake or Peace River, both over 100 kilometres away, or Edmonton, nearly 400 kilometres away, to the same minister: will this government fully fund the dialysis unit in High Prairie so that my constituents do not have to travel hundreds of kilometres to access the dialysis services that they need?

Mr. Shandro: Well, the member is correct. The capital dollars have been flowed to AHS but no operating funding. I've consulted with my department and AHS, and we've determined that with the savings anticipated from the AHS review, we can ask AHS to fund the operation. So, to the hon. member through you, Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes. I am proud to announce that today we can advise that we have told AHS to move forward with the construction of that new dialysis unit and to open it as soon as possible. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. Member for Lesser Slave Lake.

Mr. Rehn: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you, Minister.

Given that a staged rollout of obstetrics in High Prairie began in January 2019 and given that the High Prairie health care centre has experienced staff shortages and given that the government repeatedly promised in the election to push resources in health to the front lines, to the same minister: what will the government do to address these staff shortages in High Prairie so my constituents can access the health care they need in their own community?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health has the call.

Mr. Shandro: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Recruitment and retention continue to be challenging for dialysis and all services in northern communities. The new dialysis unit will help by adding capacity in the area so there are more jobs and more centres to share the demand. A big part of the recruitment challenge is the cycle of underresourcing in the north and other remote areas in the province. It's hard to attract people to work in places that are already short-staffed. We're going to break that cycle, and we are going to do so by adding capacity across the system, especially in primary care. We're going to strengthen the system in the north for all Albertans.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-South now has a question.

Calgary Cancer Centre

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. For decades Conservative governments have played games with the Calgary cancer centre – they announced it, they cancelled it, they moved it, they reannounced it, they recancelled it – in a vicious cycle that hurt the people of Calgary. Our government ended those games and started construction to ensure that Calgarians would finally get the centre they deserve. But in their first budget, the UCP has returned to that tried-and-true Conservative strategy and delayed funding for the Calgary cancer centre. Can the Minister of Infrastructure guarantee right here and now that despite the delayed funding in his budget, the Calgary cancer centre will still open on time and be fully staffed? Yes or no?

Mr. Shandro: Mr. Speaker, none of this is true. The member has, respectfully, completely misunderstood what a construction schedule is. Once we had a construction schedule, we aligned our funding to align with that construction schedule. We are still going to be funding another billion dollars to be able to fund that centre. It's going to be a total of $1.4 billion. That funding is just aligned with the construction schedule. I regret that the hon. member does not understand that.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the minister cannot answer whether it's going to be on time and fully staffed and given that the UCP delayed funding by $184 million this year and given that they plan to delay funding by a further $114 million next year and given that this government plans to cut funding for nurses by $100 million over the next four years and given that the government is standing proudly beside a $4.7 billion no-jobs corporate handout, will the Infrastructure minister please explain why he's removing almost $300 million from the cancer centre over the next two years? Have you leveraged this project to pay for your failed corporate handout?

Mr. Shandro: Mr. Speaker, as we've said many times in this House and just recently with the hon. Minister of Infrastructure and the minister of labour, who attended with me at the cancer centre: on time, on budget. Again, another day, another opportunity for the caucus opposite to continue to perpetuate made-up numbers about the job-creation tax cut, because it's a continued attack on job creators in this province, and it's shameful.

Mr. Dang: Well, Mr. Speaker, given that it becomes apparent that the Health minister hasn't read his own budget and given that this government's budget cuts both funding for this cancer centre and nurses to pay for a $4.7 billion corporate handout and given the Conservative track record of delaying and cancelling this project in the past and given that the UCP's commitment to this project was represented when their Infrastructure spokesperson dismissed this project as a "fancy box," to the Minister of Infrastructure: will the cancer centre open fully staffed, or will the needs of Calgarians come second to a $4.7 billion corporate handout?

Mr. Panda: Through you, Mr. Speaker, I ask that the member, instead of jumping up and down, listen to me one more time carefully. There is no $4.7 billion corporate handout, number one. Number two: the Calgary cancer hospital will be built on time, on budget. I hope we'll put an end to that question one more time.

Support for Transgender Albertans

Member Irwin: Today is the Transgender Day of Remembrance. This day honours those whose lives were lost because of acts of violence against trans, nonbinary, and gender-diverse people, and it's also an important opportunity to raise visibility for trans and nonbinary people and address the issues the communities face. I was so proud of our NDP government for taking leadership on trans rights. To the minister of status of women: what specific actions do you plan to take to support the trans community?

The Speaker: The hon. the minister of status of women.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you very much, and thank you so much for the question. We are honoured to stand with the transgender community today, especially to honour the murders, the bigotry, and other inhumane acts that have been perpetuated against this community. We proudly fly the flag both here and at McDougall in Calgary.

Member Irwin: Given that a number of organizations that serve queer and trans populations are facing funding shortfalls and given that these organizations have historically relied on grants from Status of Women and as well through the human rights education and multiculturalism fund, both of which have been eliminated by this UCP government, to the minister. I'm not exaggerating that without funds to support vulnerable trans-supporting organizations, lives are at risk. What can I tell these organizations that are worried about how they will provide critical supports and services without funds?

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you so much for the question. Well, I'm actually proud to say that through the ministry there's actually been an increase of dollars towards Multiculturalism and Status of Women. There are multiple dollars that are going out to vulnerable people through Community and Social Services and other priorities that are in this province. We developed the multiculturalism portfolio and mandate in order to have that intersectionality. To just be clear, the GBA plus within the Status of Women is for that lens to make sure that we adequately fund and make sure that we're helping out as much as possible with these things.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Member Irwin: Thank you. Given that one of the major barriers trans folks face is access to timely health care and given that Bill 207 further threatens trans health care access, allowing health professionals to deny essential health care, and given that we know that delayed or denied health care can mean the loss of trans lives, to the Health minister. You've not yet shared your position on Bill 207. I hope you've had some time to learn about it and reflect on it. Will you be supporting this terrible bill, and if so, why?

Mr. Shandro: Well, as I said previously to the member opposite when she asked, one of my greatest concerns is to make sure that all Albertans have access to health care, especially the trans community. I'm very proud that our 29 health professions in this province have in their standards of practice prohibitions against discrimination, including discrimination on the basis of gender identity and sexual orientation. I'm very proud to say that I will, as Minister of Health, continue to make sure that access for the trans community will continue to be there, Mr. Speaker. I'm very proud to make sure that we continue to do so.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Livingstone-Macleod has the call.

Red Tape Reduction for Small Business

Mr. Reid: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday we heard that our government launched the red tape reduction small-business industry panel. The stated goal of this panel is to identify and cut the red tape that is holding back members of the small-business community and would-be Alberta entrepreneurs. We made it a priority to listen to and work with Albertans to find the right solutions that will help get Albertans back to work and to make their lives a little easier. My question is to the associate minister through you: what is the impact of red tape on small business, and how will seeking their direct input help us achieve our red tape reduction targets?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to thank the member. I know that the Member for Livingstone-Macleod, before he actually entered into the tumultuous realm of politics, was a small-business owner himself, so he recognizes that small businesses are disproportionately affected by red tape. What we've done is that we've struck this panel in order to be able to receive good submissions from people who are in the trenches that are having to deal with these hoops that they've got to jump through, that oftentimes take away their ability to actually free up their hands and do what we ask them to do, which is to create jobs. We're going to make sure that these guys can do what they do best, create the jobs.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, given that the associate minister has been meeting with the small-business panellists and given that he emphasizes the importance of supporting small business in Alberta and given that as a former small-business owner myself I saw the impact of excessive red tape on everything from lost productivity to increased costs and given that these burdens hurt not only employers but also employees, my question to the same associate minister: what sorts of problems are small businesses telling us they're encountering most, and how can this government help them?

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, the member is correct; 2 out of every 3 new job hires actually come from small businesses in any robust, strong economy. So if we're to help those small businesses, we need to do one thing: we need to get out of their way. We need to make sure that we actually free up their hands and unclip their wings so that they can do what we need to them to do, which is soar in this economy.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Reid: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the associate minister. Given that small businesses are often where young Albertans receive their first work experience and given that youth unemployment in Alberta is unacceptably high after four years of NDP economic neglect and given that excessive and restrictive red tape hinders employment in key areas of my riding of Livingstone-Macleod such as hospitality, agriculture, and health care, once again to the associate minister: how can we reduce red tape and make sure that small businesses are able to again hire young Albertans and also that young Albertans wishing to start their own business can do so?

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, the member is absolutely correct. You know, the youth are our future, and what's concerning is that when we actually provide them with the opportunities that they need to be able to start a business and become an entrepreneur, they will get into it, and they will actually see a great life because of it. I've been an entrepreneur since I was knee-high to a grasshopper, and I can tell you that it was a great life. The problem is that under the NDP they continued to heap all sorts of red tape onto those job creators and those innovators, and in the end they drove business out of this province.

Lois Hole Provincial Park Management Plan Environment and Parks Ministry Budget

Ms Renaud: The Lois Hole provincial park is located on the western edge of St. Albert, Edmonton, and is bordered by Parkland county to the southwest and Sturgeon county to the northwest. This urban provincial park is almost 2,000 hectares of lake and wetland ecosystem. Appropriate oversight of the Lois Hole park, lake, and wetland is vital to flood management, conservation, management of recreation pressures, and urbanization. To the minister of environment: will you continue to fund the Lois Hole provincial park management plan as is, and will there be any reductions?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, we continue to invest in parks all across the province. I don't know specifically the parameters around the park the hon. member is referring to, but I'm not aware of any reductions in spending when it comes to that park. I will be happy to check and get back to the hon. member on the specifics.

2:30

Ms Renaud: Given this minister is responsible for cuts to water management, wildlife management, fisheries management, parks conservation, air quality monitoring, environmental emergency response, and so on, to the minister: if you're not a climate change denier, why don't you believe the warning of more than 11,000 of the world's climate scientists, who warned us that we clearly and unequivocally face a climate emergency that will cause untold human suffering? Plus, can he give us a parks' breakdown of the funding in writing?

Thanks.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, the NDP managed to be nice for a whole 30 seconds. I think you should note that on your calendar. Here's the reality. Our government takes climate change seriously, has just passed the TIER legislation in this place this week. We'll continue to move forward on that. What the difference between us and that party is, when it comes to this important file, is that we will continue to work on innovation and technology to move Alberta forward in a positive way while not destroying our economy in this province like that hon. member did when she was part of a government that caused $50 billion to flee this province with her ridiculous carbon tax.

Ms Renaud: Given that I'm not very nice, I'd like to ask one more question. Do you believe it was a responsible decision to cut programs and activities in the ministry of environment in order to give a $4.7 billion handout to corporations and fund a $120 million war room/snitch line instead of investing in emission reduction and climate change mitigation? Try to stick to answering the question for once.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, the reality is that we are investing significantly inside the emission management file inside this province, and we're proud of that. Again you see the hon. member continuing to attack the Canadian Energy Centre. We have the opposite approach. We are proud of the men and women who work inside the energy industry in this province and their contribution to both this province and to this country. Unlike the former government, who aligned themselves with both the federal NDP, who are antipipeline, and their good friend Justin Trudeau, who's anti the oil sands and the energy industry in general, this side of the House will stand with Albertans, will stand with our largest industry each and every day. That side will sell them out.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

2019 Harvest

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's been a very difficult year for Alberta farmers: poor harvest conditions, trade disputes, and business risk management programs that are not equipped to handle these issues. Team Alberta, representing the Alberta wheat and barley commissions, Alberta Pulse Growers, and Alberta canola, has called on this agriculture minister for financial assistance, but he has failed as of yet to act to support our farmers and ranchers.

Can the minister of agriculture tell me and the House what it will take for him to provide concrete actions, real action to help farmers instead of the lip service he's been giving them lately and why his government happily hands over $4.7 billion in tax dollars to profitable corporations but closes its ears . . .

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Dreeshen: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Numerous times in this House we would highlight the devastation, the very difficult harvest that happened this year. Again, I would reiterate to farmers – I was actually at the Alberta Milk AGM this morning and told farmers in the audience that the province of Alberta will be there to support them, whether it's through the suite of BRM programming. I've had meetings with AFSC in Lacombe, where we actually talked to the leaders there to show that we need to act as fast as we can. A lot of the unharvested acre benefit program – they can get a cash advance to crops that are out in the field right now covered in snow. We're on top of this, and we take this situation very seriously.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This crop year is very serious. Given that the latest crop reports give an example of the difficulties that our farmers and ranchers have had and given that 17.3 per cent of the canola crop, nearly 15 per cent of the potato crop, and a whopping 45 per cent of the sugar beet crop have not yet been harvested and given that this is around $778 million in unharvested crops, what more evidence does the minister of agriculture need to stop passing the buck and provide assistance to our farmers? We heard he's started to talk about things that might be available. Four point seven billion dollars in tax dollars were handed out on a platter to corporations, but the cupboard is bare for our farmers.

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Dreeshen: Thank you again, Mr. Speaker. At the end of the day, farmers need to get their products to market. We actually had a unanimous consent. We actually asked the opposition to have unanimous consent here in the province of Alberta to the federal government to recall Parliament early and to actually have back-to-work legislation for the pending CN strike, that's ongoing. Unfortunately, the opposition had an opportunity to actually support farmers. Instead, they chose to sit on their hands and vote against it.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In this country we support farmers as well as those who work in the railway transportation industry and their right to collective bargaining, and we'll leave them to do so with the counterpart in the federal government.

Given that the difficulties faced by farmers in this disappointing crop year mean that farmers will face delayed insurance and access to funds needed for next year and to provide for their families and given that rather than platitudes and talking points farmers are looking for leadership and action and that farming should be a nonpartisan issue, as nonpartisan as it comes, will the minister of agriculture tell this House how much longer he wants farmers to wait and why . . .

The Speaker: Perhaps if the hon. member didn't use such a long preamble, he would have been able to get his entire question in.

Mr. Dreeshen: Well, Mr. Speaker, through you to the opposition: you had your chance. Yesterday you could have given us unanimous consent to send a strong message to Ottawa that we needed Parliament to reconvene earlier and to actually have back-to-work legislation in this pending CN strike, which has a disastrous effect to our farmers. The backlog of rail contracts will pile up, all that cost being borne by our farmers.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-North is rising with a question.

Daylight Saving Time

Mr. Yaseen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday the Minister of Service Alberta announced that the government is reopening the discussion on whether or not Albertans should keep changing their clocks twice a year or should stay on daylight savings year-round. He's encouraging Albertans to register their opinions in an online survey. Since Albertans just talked about this only two and a half years ago, to the minister: why are you doing this survey now?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Service Alberta.

Mr. Glubish: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member. The reason we're having this conversation now is because more and more regions across North America are having this conversation right now. B.C., in fact, just tabled legislation to consider stopping the practice of changing their clocks twice a year. A private member in Yukon just introduced legislation for the same thing. Legislation has been passed on this recently in Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Nevada, Oregon, Tennessee, and Washington. North America is starting to move in this direction, and we think it's time now for us to have this conversation with Albertans and to hear from them.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-North.

Mr. Yaseen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that Alberta has been observing standard time for the past two and a half weeks and given that regular standard time is the time Albertans followed before daylight saving time was ever introduced or adopted, can the minister tell me why there is no option on this survey to stay on standard time year-round?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Service Alberta.

Mr. Glubish: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. That's an important question. As I said before, more and more governments are starting to have this conversation and tabling legislation on this. Most of these jurisdictions are choosing to stay on daylight saving time, which we would call summer hours, all year round as opposed to standard time. What we need to be mindful of is that it's important to consider what our partners from other jurisdictions are doing and that we are not proposing to act in a different direction. That said, I'm very interested to hear from Albertans on this. That's why we're bringing this survey forward, and I encourage everyone to participate.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Yaseen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Minister. Given that the survey ends on December 10 and also given that there is no information on what the government will do with the information it collects or receives or what their next steps are and given that Albertans, including me, want to see action on this and not just more conversation, can the minister tell us what is in his next steps after the survey?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Glubish: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member. What I would say is that this survey is just a first step in the process. We've had a lot of interest in this in the first couple of days, almost 100,000 views on our survey website so far. This clearly is something Albertans are interested in talking about. I encourage everyone to participate in the survey. I don't want to presuppose what Albertans are going to say on this, so at this time it's just important to hear from Albertans. Once the survey has concluded, we will determine our next steps.

Calgary Commercial Vacancy Rate and Nonresidential Property Taxes

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, in 2014 and 2015 Calgary's downtown vacancy rate exploded; 6.7 million square feet of downtown office space became unoccupied as businesses downsized and abandoned leases they could no longer afford. This trend never turned around as the NDP predicted. The loss of this tax revenue caused city hall to ramp up property tax, which only further burdened the businesses who are and, unfortunately, in many cases were trying to weather the storm. To the Minister of Municipal Affairs: what is our government plan for nonresidential property tax in the coming years?

2:40

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for that question. Although the numbers are beginning to improve, the commercial vacancy rate in downtown Calgary, which at its highest was around 30 per cent, is one of the most disturbing legacies of the previous NDP government. As we have all seen, city officials chose to deal with this issue by relying on massive property tax increases, a decision that has threatened the viability of hundreds of Calgary businesses. I've been clear that this is not an acceptable solution going forward.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie.

Mr. Milliken: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that we are talking about prime office space in the heart of Calgary's downtown core going unoccupied and given that vacancy rates are still hovering around 25 per cent by most estimates and given that NDP policies only further pushed businesses further into distress, can the minister please explain what our government is doing to attract businesses back to Alberta?

Some Hon. Members: Nothing.

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I can understand why the members over there would like to continue to heckle, but our government is doing so much to show investors that our province is once again open for business. In my own department we took emergency action to support the shallow gas industry, which is now on the rebound. Whereas the NDP imposed the largest tax increase ever on Calgary, we imposed the largest tax reduction. We scrapped their failed carbon tax.

Mr. Milliken: Given that the city of Calgary has increased their property tax levy on businesses by 37.8 per cent since 2014 and given that over that same period the NDP provincial property tax levy on businesses rose by 20.8 per cent and given that municipalities have an important role to play in making Alberta open for business again, can the minister explain what our government is doing to ensure that municipal taxes do not become unsustainable?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. Madu: Thank you so much, Mr. Speaker. Municipal taxes have already become unsustainable for too many people like Kelly Doody, a small-business owner who saw her property tax bill go up by a whopping 427 per cent. I have had the pleasure of touring many Calgary businesses, some that have been in the same family business for three generations. My friend over there who has done nothing for these businesses but raise taxes would let this continue. I am saying that enough is enough, and I'm glad the city has taken steps towards reducing taxes. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Hon. members, in 30 seconds or less we will return to Members' Statements.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-East.

Fentanyl Use Prevention

Mr. Singh: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Drug use, addiction, and overdoses are a real and dangerous problem in our province. Our province has been plagued with abundant drug use, trafficking, and manufacturing. Last year alone the annual deaths linked or directly caused by opioids exceeded 700. That is the biggest number of overdoses since the crisis began, a nearly 6 per cent jump from the preceding year.

The biggest culprit is the synthetic painkiller fentanyl. Fentanyl is a derivative of morphine, but it is around 100 times stronger. Three milligrams of fentanyl looks like a couple of grains of sand in your hand. That is why accidental overdoses can happen in the blink of an eye. While alternative drugs come with a litany of other problems such as addiction, dependence, and loss of bodily control and function, fentanyl is the number one lethal and accounts for an astounding 81 per cent of all deaths from drug use. The death toll is around two a day in our province. Calgary has been hit particularly hard. It has the most accidental deaths related to fentanyl in all of Alberta.

Our government must put an end to this crisis. Our law enforcement should focus on targeting producers and distributors to choke off the supply that is holding Albertans hostage. Addicts should be treated at health facilities and not thrown in jail for their addiction. In order to suppress the opioid crisis, we must properly filter the real culprits that are perpetrating and benefiting from the crisis, not the Albertans that are caught in a hard place and are now being strung along in this scheme.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

Presenting Reports by Standing and Special Committees

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. As chair of the Standing Committee on Private Bills and Private Members' Public Bills I am pleased to table the committee's final report on Bill 206, Workers' Compensation (Enforcement of Decisions) Amendment Act, 2019, sponsored by the hon. Member for Livingstone-

Macleod. The bill was referred to the committee on November 7, 2019. The committee's final report recommends that Bill 206 proceed. I request concurrence of the Assembly in the final report on Bill 206.

Thank you.

[Motion for concurrence carried]

Introduction of Bills

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Bill 26

Farm Freedom and Safety Act, 2019

Mr. Dreeshen: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I request leave to introduce a bill that finally repeals and replaces Bill 6. I'm proud to introduce the Farm Freedom and Safety Act, 2019.

After extensive consultation, Madam Speaker, at over 25 different stops across the province – I've personally put over 8,000 kilometres on my own truck – we finally came to a place with practical, common-sense changes to Alberta's labour relations, occupational health and safety, worker insurance, and employment standards. I'm very proud to introduce this bill.

Thank you very much.

[Motion carried; Bill 26 read a first time]

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you. My constituency office has been flooded with letters regarding the Alberta teachers' retirement fund and the concern about . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Wrong spot.

Ms Sigurdson: Wrong spot? Okay. I'm sorry, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, we are at points of order. Tablings? My apologies. There is a ton of confusion right now.

We are going to do tablings right now. Are there any members? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you. As I was saying, my constituency office has been flooded with letters from teachers, retired teachers about the Alberta teachers' retirement fund and just concerns about the government moving all the assets to AIMCo. I have the requisite number of copies, and I'll table them today.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I have the requisite number of copies of news reports featuring quotes from pundits and columnists, that I referred to in my leader's questions earlier today, about the Premier's decision to fire the Election Commissioner in the middle of the investigation of fraud in the party. I have five copies of the column by Rick Bell where he compares the Premier to former Premier Alison Redford, five of the tweet referencing Mount Royal professor Bratt calling it a cover-up, and five copies of the CBC story where former Conservative MP Solberg says that he can't defend it and that it's bad optics.

Thank you very much.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland.

Mr. Getson: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I, too, have received lots of e-mails and concerns about Bill C-71. I have the requisite five copies of Ten Myths about Gun Control.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

2:50

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. My office has received to date about 200 e-mails from concerned teachers around the ATRF and the impacts of Bill 21. Today I'm tabling 31 of those letters received at my office.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I know what big fans these guys are of Greta Thunberg, so I have a really interesting article. It's entitled Here's How Climate Pollution in Provinces Greta Marched in Compares to Sweden's. Kind of interesting. Five copies.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today and would like to record the requisite number of copies of a large pile of e-mails that I've received in regard to Bill 207 from many constituents in my riding and all across Alberta who are quite alarmed by Bill 207 and would like it to effectively be killed.

Thank you.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 24 Appropriation Act, 2019

[Adjourned debate November 20: Mr. Ellis]

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm happy to rise today and speak to Bill 24, Appropriation Act, 2019. I'm going to focus most of my comments, actually, on one particular ministry and hope that my colleagues will perhaps join me and speak to the other ministries.

As you may know, I'm the critic for two areas, Community and Social Services and francophone issues, but I'm going to focus on Community and Social Services today. Just last week, I think it was, we spent about six hours in committee asking questions, getting some answers but asking a lot of questions about the budget specifically for Community and Social Services. I would like to highlight some of the issues or some of the concerns that we identified during those six hours of questioning.

It's really quite a large ministry, as I'm sure everybody in this Chamber knows, and it includes a number of different areas, programming areas, that are absolutely vital to the survival, well-being, and thriving of Albertans. Those include things like FSCD, which is funding for families that have children with disabilities; PDD – the acronym stands for persons with developmental disabilities – which is funding that allows people with developmental disabilities to live and work and recreate in their communities; and then, of course, AISH, which is assured income for the severely handicapped.

Income support for people with barriers is not a step below AISH, but it is in terms of eligibility, so people not quite able to qualify medically or for other reasons for AISH benefits will often go on income support with barriers. There are income supports for people who are expected to return to work. There is also funding for homelessness initiatives, homeless shelters, also shelters for women fleeing violence. So you can imagine that this is an enormous ministry, I believe, tasked with incredibly vital supports for Albertans.

Moving right along, we spent about six hours asking questions, and we learned some really disturbing things, which is why, again, I will not be supporting this budget because I believe this budget, contrary to what we hear every single day – there are no cuts; it's just fear and smear; everything is just great; the $4.7 billion we're going to give to profitable corporations will trickle down, and life will be wonderful: that's not exactly how it goes.

In the Ministry of Community and Social Services, certainly, I first want to talk about AISH, assured income for the severely handicapped, an old name for it. I hope one day we get to the place where we rename it. But all of that aside, assured income for the severely handicapped allows people with severe handicaps to receive a monthly income of about $1,680; I think it's a little bit more than that. That also includes medical benefits, and these medical benefits are vital for people living in this kind of poverty. Now, I understand that over $1,600 a month is better than income supports, better than abject poverty with nothing, living on the street, but it still requires that people that get this live in poverty. That's the reality. That's just how it is. Medical supports are important. That covers dental care, vision care, things like that. It also helps pay for the maintenance cost of service dogs, let's say.

Now, while this government did not cut AISH benefits – you know, if I'm going to give them kudos for something, they didn't roll this back like they rolled back the minimum wage; they didn't roll this back, so I am grateful for that. Just before the election – well, actually, it was about a year ago – we actually indexed AISH. That means that, every year, AISH benefits would be indexed to inflation; they would go up. We also caught AISH up for the time that we didn't index while we were in government, so that was about – I don't know – a $90 increase. So we did that. The government didn't cut it: good job. That is one good thing. I will give you that.

What you did do was that you removed something that the community has been asking for for decades. For absolute decades they have been asking for this. The way it goes in Alberta for people with disabilities: you know, they're busy trying to live, trying to live in poverty, too, so for them to mobilize and advocate for a raise, for an increase is really, really tough. It has been our experience that over the four decades of a Conservative government, really the only time they got an increase was when oil and gas prices were high. There looked to be a lot of revenue, there was a lot of room to move, and then sort of as an afterthought AISH was increased. So what we did, although it isn't very much every year – it's about $30 – is that we assured severely disabled Albertans that they don't have to do that anymore. Although this isn't going to lift them out of poverty, because – let's be honest – this is like poverty wages, it will help. It will help defer some of the costs that go up every single year.

Now, thanks to this government – you know, you have removed caps, so insurance rates are going up. I have no doubt whatsoever that the cost of the carbon tax, that is no longer transparent thanks to your legislation that you're bringing in, will be passed on to consumers. Believe it or not, people on AISH are consumers, and they will pay that increase. This government has deindexed that, saving about – what? – $10 million. Now, let's put that in perspective. This government has a war room, a secret war room, where we really don't know what they're doing other than acting on reports of un-Albertan activities. This war room is, like, $30 million, $120 million over four years. Indexing AISH was, like, $10 million. I am hugely, hugely disappointed that this government wouldn't make that commitment. Hugely, hugely disappointed.

The reason that I'm spending so much time on the indexing is because it's not just AISH. Let's say that you're an Albertan that has a disability of some kind – you have a chronic mental health issue, whatever it is – but you don't yet qualify. For whatever reasons you don't medically qualify for AISH benefits. You're on income support for people with barriers, significant barriers to employment. That means you are living on just over $800 a month. Eight hundred dollars a month. Can you imagine? I believe that is $845 a month. Now, sure, if you have a child, you might get a little bit extra for child care or transportation or something like that, but it's under $900 a month.

You chose to deindex that. That is a choice you made. You chose to give $4.7 billion to profitable corporations, and you chose to stop indexing these benefits for people with severe disabilities, people with significant barriers to employment. I don't know about you, but if you've ever known people trying to live on AISH or income support, talk to them. Go meet them. Ask them what it's like. Ask them what a $30 increase per year means to them, and then show up here and vote on this. I guarantee you that you might change your mind. That sounds a bit funny: to guarantee that you might change your mind. I would hope that you would change your mind.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. member, just a reminder to speak through the chair.

Ms Renaud: Yeah. I'm sorry, Madam Speaker. I will absolutely speak through you.

The other things that I noticed in – I'm going to move a little bit and talk about PDD, which is another huge programming area in this ministry. Persons with developmental disabilities provides supports for people who are over 18 who have significant challenges, disabilities, to living, working, recreating in their communities. PDD supports allow people with disabilities to pay for staff. Madam, what that would mean is – let's say that you live with your folks, and your folks go to work. You have a job, and you need to be supported in that job. You might need a bit of assistance with personal care, whatever that might be. PDD would fund those hours, and you would hire someone to do that work. All good.

Some people use community service organizations or service providers. The service providers will hire staff for you. Sometimes you live with a roommate; they'll help co-ordinate that. They'll do the training, the oversight, all of those things. The vast majority of these organizations are nonprofit although there are some for-profit organizations. I believe there are around 150 of them providing service in Alberta. I'm not a hundred per cent sure about that number.

This year – fabulous – that program didn't get cut. One more point for this government. Actually, I applaud that because an immediate cut like that would have done damage that I can't begin to describe. So I am grateful for that.

What I'm very worried about are the out-years. If you've looked at your own budget, in the out-years AISH and PDD now do not keep pace with intake growth, the number of people that, let's say, turn 18 and are eligible for supports or perhaps move to Alberta for work or have sustained a significant injury of some kind. The numbers go up. That's just the way it is. Just like education, that's just the way it is for disability supports. The numbers go up. Certainly, we do lose some people, whether they move out of the province, they pass away, or they no longer require supports. That's often the case for employment support, which is fantastic. But the numbers go up every single year.

In your budget, in the out-years it does not keep pace with the growth. That, to me, is very concerning. That is the same case with FSCD support, and that is support for children with disabilities. Madam Speaker, you can imagine that I was very concerned when I saw these out-years, although this current year: all good, no problem. Out-years: there's a problem.

What is also a problem is that we spent quite a bit of time reviewing PDD. I think the disability community is very used to having things reviewed for them or having things reviewed internally. What was new about the way that we did it is that we actually opened it up for everybody to participate. That was the second time that we did that. What we saw were recommendations from all over the place about all kinds of things. I think that's the unique part of this process, that nothing is not considered or talked about or looked at or deliberated.

Now, we heard while we were in estimates that the Minister of CSS, or Community and Social Services, was very clear about the way that the review would be done and that it would be done internally. I asked numerous times: are you saying that this will be done internally? Yes. Will there be any self-advocates involved in this? That would be a person with a disability that advocates for themselves. No; this would be done internally. That's worrisome when on their radar for review are things like: let's look at changing the IQ for eligibility for this program. Do I think that's a good idea? Absolutely. I think that IQ number is as ridiculous as any standardized assessment that tries to measure a human being. That being said, you have to do this properly; otherwise, you will harm people. If you try to dilute a service so much that you harm other people, you're not doing any good.

The internal review coupled with the cuts in the out-years coupled with the lack of information about where they were going is very, very worrisome. When I look at these numbers, I can breathe a little sigh of relief for right now, but I'm scared to death about the next few years. I don't see a plan. I see an internal review looking at squishing a bunch of people into a little box, and the box needs to be fixed. Those are some of my concerns there. I have grave concerns.

Also in this ministry are supports for homeless shelters and homelessness prevention, which are absolutely vital in this province. We have a problem. I actually think that if we have one homeless person, we have a problem. Although we do have our challenges, we are an incredibly wealthy, fortunate province in an incredibly wealthy and fortunate country. Every single day I'm proud to be Canadian, and I'm proud to be Albertan. I know that if we decided that this was something that we could end, we could end homelessness, but that requires investment, and this budget doesn't do that. One of the most general questions I asked the minister during estimates was: is this government committed to ending homelessness? A simple question, really, because that determines your intent. Is this UCP government committed to ending homelessness? The answer: hmm, no.

Okay. Moving on, we looked at one specific example of that in Fort McMurray. Sadly, I've only been to Fort McMurray a couple of times, so I don't know what the shelters are like in Fort McMurray. I don't know what the homelessness struggles are. I can imagine that in a northern community there are difficulties just given the location, given the temperature, all of those things. As I understand it, there are two shelters in Fort McMurray. The Salvation Army is one. The other one, I believe, is called Marshall House. In estimates I verified this information and asked for some clarity, and I understand that the decision by this government was to close one homeless shelter, that being Marshall House.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, 29(2)(a) is available. Are there any members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I guess I had a number of questions for the hon. Member for St. Albert. She clearly has a breadth of knowledge around income supports for Albertans, and I was just hoping that she might be able to let myself know and Albertans as well, through you, of course, about where the best value investment is for Albertans with severe disabilities or AISH recipients and what structure we can put in place.

I find her last comments intriguing, that we do have the capacity to eliminate child poverty here in this province, but what mechanisms do we need to put in place to ensure that that's achievable? We saw a significant reduction in people living in poverty in Calgary while there was an economic downturn, which I found to be very reassuring news, that we learned about recently. Then earlier this spring we learned that, in fact, during, again, a significant economic downturn over the last four years we managed to cut child poverty in half. The burning question, I think, in the hearts of all Albertans who care about other human beings is: how do we finish the job?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you to my colleague. As I know that he knows, ending child poverty, I think, is something that is possible. I think that, just like ending homelessness, it's absolutely possible if you focus on it.

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

I think that just the work that we did: in a short period of time we were able to bring down the number of children and families in poverty significantly. But it's not just one thing. There is no one magic answer; it was all kinds of things. It was increasing the minimum wage. It was investing in affordable child care. It was all of those things. What we've seen in this budget, particularly in this appropriation bill, is a systematic tearing down of all of the investments we made that contributed to bringing people out of poverty. Now, keep in mind that this took decades to get us here. It will take a lot of time and investment to get us out.

3:10

But let me give you an example of why community and social service supports are so important. When you review, it's vitally important that you have people that use these supports to guide you, because we don't have all the answers in this place, believe it or not. One woman called my office. She's a single parent of a child with severe autism in, I think, the first grade. Of course, she qualified for FSCD supports so she could have respite for her child and so she could have after school care with qualified providers. The deal was that she had to pay for her staff and then submit receipts and then be reimbursed. Every time she paid out her staff, it was about $800, okay? She worked full-time to support her child; she actually had two children. She couldn't afford to pay the $800 and then wait a couple of weeks to be reimbursed. That's what poverty looks like: you can't even access supports that are available to you because you can't afford them.

Trying to change that a little bit so that billing was a little bit different or maybe she could get an advance of some kind: none of those things will happen without a review that is done and guided by people that use the supports. During estimates I repeatedly heard this minister say that the review is going to be done internally. I can pretty much guarantee you that that's going to be a fail as far as the people with disabilities, the people that use those supports are concerned unless you involve them in the review.

Going back to the comment about child poverty, I think sometimes people have a stereotype in our heads about what a family in poverty looks like. I'll tell you that the vast majority of people that live in poverty – actually, let me flip that. The vast majority of people on AISH and people that receive PDD supports live in poverty. I'm not just talking about how occasionally you have to go to the food bank at the end of the month, Mr. Speaker. I'm talking about poverty. I'm talking about poverty that doesn't give you choices. I'm talking about poverty that is also sometimes a barrier to employment because you can't do the things that you need to do.

On that, I'm going to end my comments for today. Thanks.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you.

Hon. members, I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo has risen to speak on this.

Member Ceci: Thank you very much. I won't speak a great deal of time, but I did want to get up. I listened earlier to the Finance minister move second reading of Bill 24. I took some comments down with regard to what he was saying, and I'll start with what I agree with. The capital cost allowance was something that, when I was the Finance minister, the federal government was endeavoring to get provinces to sign on to. We certainly heard that, and I remember us working towards that in the planning that we were doing as a government. Other provinces have done similar capital cost allowance policies within their fiscal plans and the way they allow relief to corporations around their capital investments. Good plan.

What I don't agree with in what I heard the Finance minister talk about is the job-creation bill. He's taking an approach to bringing that down from 12 per cent to 8 per cent over four years. We know that where Alberta was, at 12 per cent, was in the middle of the pack of all provinces and territories across this country. It wasn't the highest, and it wasn't the lowest. It was the middle of the pack. I don't agree with that. I think it's significant. We have repeatedly said – on page 144 of the fiscal plan, it's right there, Mr. Speaker – that it means that $4.7 billion won't be coming into this province to address the many necessary programs and services that Albertans rely on.

We're starting to see the reverberation of that bad decision throughout the province in the education sector. We heard just today the critic for Education speak to the minister and say that that was a negative impact on not only the CBE in Calgary, but there was Sturgeon; there were other places. There were a significant number of layoffs happening as a result of the lack of appropriate resources coming in because of policies like the job-creation tax bill, which will avoid $4.7 billion from coming into the treasury, and being left without the necessary funds to address the health and education and postsecondary school education needs this province has. That's not something I support, and I think it's a bad idea and one that will continue to have negative impacts around this province not only this year but in subsequent years, and we will be left with a social and economic infrastructure deficit akin to what happened in the mid-90s here. Why would we want to repeat something that everyone believes is in the wrong direction?

Mr. Speaker, I heard the Minister of Finance, certainly on this fiscal plan, over and over again talk about the MacKinnon panel. We had, when we were government, our own fiscal policy expert come in and address the needs of this province as we were going into the deepest recession and longest recession, over two years, that this province has gone into in generations. That fiscal expert was David Dodge, former Bank of Canada governor. Mr. Dodge came in and talked about the right size of our capital infrastructure plan, and he recommended an increase of 15 per cent over the previous government's budget with regard to the capital infrastructure. That put it from about 6 to about 7.5, 7.8.

We followed that recommendation, and we were able to ensure that in the depth of the recession Albertans who were working for Alberta companies and who were struggling got the necessary public investment to keep working. Schools were built, Mr. Speaker. We were assisting municipalities across this province to address the infrastructure needs they had, and they spent those monies wisely on improvements in their municipalities that would make roads safer, make facilities more environmentally efficient and on and on and on. It kept Albertans working. That was the point of it, to make sure that the companies in Alberta and Albertans continued to work. That was the capital infrastructure recommendation that David Dodge gave us, much different than the work of the MacKinnon panel, I can tell you, because at this point in time I think the economy in Alberta is about half a per cent in terms of nominal growth. That is flat, essentially.

The job-creation bill, the direction of the MacKinnon panel, is not having any measurable improvement effect in this province. That is what this fiscal plan is doing. It's not having any impact at all in this province. When we were government, the first two years were very challenging, as everybody knows. In '15 and '16 there was a retrenchment of the economy, but in '17 and '18, as the former economic development minister will tell you, the province of Alberta grew faster and stronger than any other province in this nation. It led the nation in terms of GDP growth. What we hear from the Minister of Finance is that, you know, the recovery has not been fast. Well, no kidding, Mr. Speaker. It is not happening. It's not been fast. It's not happening. Though he didn't say this – I'm kind of putting words in his mouth – he urges us just to wait and be patient. Wait and be patient, and it will happen: well, I don't buy that.

The other area that he talked a lot about is with regard to, as he called it, the unsustainable debt servicing. I think it was $1.971 billion in the '18-19 year. That's nowhere close to accurate. It's not unsustainable in terms of being able to be serviced by the province of Alberta. Just to put it in context, when we look at the total number of assets and total number of liabilities, this province's net assets at the end of the year of 2018-19 were over $23 billion, Mr. Speaker. When we look at the net debt to GDP in this province, we continue to enjoy the lowest net debt to GDP of any province, including the federal government. It is somewhere around 8 per cent if you look at the net debt to GDP, and with our path to balance that the previous government, that I was part of, sketched out, we would only top out at 11 to 12 per cent net debt to GDP.

Now, yeah, it's a growth in the net debt to GDP from 8 per cent to 12 per cent, but when you compare Alberta to other provinces and the federal government, we had the lowest net debt to GDP, and we'll continue to have the lowest net debt to GDP of any province. The next closest net debt to GDP higher than us would be currently in the 13, 14, 15 per cent, and they go all the way up to 33, to 40 per cent. Now – I agree – that's too high. But Alberta will never get that high. We're at 8 per cent now, going up to 12 per cent with the path to balance. Mr. Speaker, it's hyperbole for the Finance minister to say that we had unsustainable debt in this province and we couldn't carry it. We could carry it. We're the lowest in the nation in terms of net debt to GDP, and we have the best balance sheet of any province still to this day.

Mr. Speaker, those are the things that I wanted to communicate to correct the record, because it was part of that government's narrative, I guess, that Alberta needs to get its fiscal house in order. We have the best balance sheet. We have the lowest net debt, and we will still have that when the balance occurs.

I do note that the government of the day is increasing the deficit by $2 billion from where it was left by our government. That, obviously, is in the wrong direction, and they need to answer for increasing that deficit. It's got to go in the other direction, and we were taking it in the other direction. Now, they'll say that it's a result of the bad policies on this side. Mr. Speaker, I don't buy their financials in terms of what they think about our policies. We were given a highest grade by the C.D. Howe Institute in terms of our processes two years running, and that is a fact.

We do need to get this province going in terms of its growth, and I'm fearful that the policies put in place by the current government are going to take us in the opposite direction. Certainly, access for our oil products in this province is critical, and we were endeavouring to do that on a short-term basis with crude by rail, and that has been struck out. That's unfortunate. Mr. Speaker, the pipeline situation was markedly improved by the previous government. Of course, the federal government has purchased the pipeline and has put money towards the expansion of the pipeline. All of those things will in time – in time – benefit this province, in the 2023-2024 time frame.

Mr. Speaker, I look at the fiscal plan, and I see some numbers that say balance in the 2022-2023 year. That's dependent, of course, on a significant uptick in bitumen royalties. I really wonder if pipelines are going to be happening by 2022-2023 when we see the significant challenges that are out there. Rest assured that the people on this side will continue to push for pipelines so that our balance sheet can get healthier on the revenue side.

You know, I just think, as my colleague who spoke just before me was saying, that it's really problematic that the most vulnerable in this province are paying, essentially, for policies put in by the government on the other side. Mr. Speaker, that is a moral problem that I think needs to be addressed by the other side.

I listened to the other side. They say, "No, we're not reducing the benefits to those most vulnerable," but when you take away indexing, then going forward, you are reducing it, Mr. Speaker. They're not changing the original amount, but they're saying: it's only going to stay there. As we know, with CPI and inflation the purchasing power of that original grant amount will get smaller and smaller going forward. Now, that's the difficulty that the Leader of the Opposition raised when we listened to this on the other side. It's not accurate, but they hide behind the fact that they're not changing the grant amount. But they are taking away indexing, which means that it'll get smaller going forward. They never say that, so it's wrong to stand up here on the other side and to say, you know: we're addressing the needs. They're not.

Those are my comments about the appropriation bill, Mr. Speaker. There is a lot of good work, of course, done by the bureaucracy to put this all together. I noticed there are missing areas that were in our budget, the last budget; namely, the net debt to GDP graph is gone because they don't . . .

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Minister of Transportation has risen to speak.

Mr. McIver: Under 29(2)(a)?

The Acting Speaker: Under 29(2)(a), yes, because it is available.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I listened with some amusement to the remarks that were just offered to the House. I'm quite interested. It's actually refreshing to see the former Finance minister now take concern about the amount of debt that Alberta is in. Oh, how Albertans wish that the former Finance minister showed any bit of care and concern about that issue when he had the power to do something about it, when he actually not only didn't pay attention to it but actually floored it, if you will, and put the debt clock to the mat. Now he's complaining because it's not slowing down.

Well, Mr. Speaker, when you're going as fast as you can running Alberta into debt, including borrowing money for this week's groceries, even if you slam on the brakes, it takes a little bit of time to stop that forward momentum. We are trying to hit the brakes in such a way that we can still look after Albertans and do it in a gentle way, 2.8 per cent over four years, and get the incredibly irresponsible and reckless spending momentum of the previous government under control while looking after Albertans' best interests.

It was also interesting to hear just now the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo talk about how AISH was being cut. I would ask him to refer to the remarks from his colleague from St. Albert, who about 20 minutes before said that those benefits were not being cut.

Member Ceci: Deindexed.

Mr. McIver: I see him now trying to correct himself, so I'll help him out.

The Acting Speaker: I would just remind hon. members to speak through the chair. There will be ample opportunity for debate, and if the individual who perhaps really wants to speak has already spoken at this stage of debate, there will still be 29(2)(a) available as well in the future.

The hon. Minister of Transportation.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I thought I listened patiently while the previous member spoke. Though I didn't necessarily agree with everything, I did listen, I thought, quite quietly to all of the comments regardless of how irresponsible I thought many of them were.

Mr. Speaker, I'll continue. As I say, the hon. Member for St. Albert – and it was actually quite refreshing to hear her say that because I'm pretty sure that that hon. member said something quite different in previous days. I thank her for this, by the way. She did say: I thank the government for not reducing the actual benefits that AISH recipients are getting now. And she did go on to say that she would prefer it if the indexation would be there in the future. But my point, Mr. Speaker, is that's a departure from what the last speaker said. I would refer the last speaker to his . . .

3:30

Mr. Eggen: You can't make stuff up.

Mr. McIver: He still can't stop, Mr. Speaker.

But the point is . . .

The Acting Speaker: Order.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will try to hear my own thoughts while I carry on. I'm trying.

Here's the thing. The hon. member is talking about how we ought to reduce the level and the rate at which we're going into debt. I agree with that. I will reiterate the fact that the former Finance minister should have shown a little bit more care and responsibility about that during the four years that that hon. member had the maximum amount of control over that issue, yet was completely reckless and irresponsible with it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we are working hard to undo the damage that was done in those four years. That's why this budget is before us right now, including this Appropriation Act, 2019. We need to deliver the services. We need to do it responsibly and carefully and with a great deal of forethought, restructure the way government happens so that we can continue to deliver the services that Albertans most need and want in a responsible way while turning around the economic fortunes.

Again, it's interesting to see members on the other side today talking at different times about how debt was a bad thing for students. Well, debt is a bad thing for Albertans, Mr. Speaker, when it's irresponsibly put in place. Debt is a tool that can be used to build infrastructure if it's done in a responsible way, but when it's left to run out of control, with no demonstrable efforts in place to pay the debt back, it's completely irresponsible. That's what the previous government did, and we will not.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview has risen to speak on this matter.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my honour to rise. Actually, the timing couldn't be more perfect to talk about or speak or respond to comments that the Minister of Transportation just made, which – I don't know, I mean, I'm sure it's not unbeknownst to him. He's been talking about debt and how it's bad and how much, you know, our government was running up. I will notify the minister, who I'm sure is completely aware, of the fact that the very budget that we are debating, this bill, is putting Alberta $2 billion further into debt than the proposed budget by our government. The deficit in this budget is over $8 billion. Under our government it was $6 billion. That's black and white. Members can get up and, you know, try to change history, but the numbers are right in front of us in this appropriation bill.

Interestingly, as well, this government likes to talk about the campaign promises they keep. They don't like to talk about the campaign promises that they break. There's a list of them, Mr. Speaker, but one of them is the fact that during the election they campaigned on a path to balance a year earlier than what was proposed. Now they are on the same path: '23-24 is when they will balance. The other thing that's interesting is, you know, they try to sound like they are these slayers of deficits and everything else, when under our government, at the rate that we had proposed, yes, Alberta's debt would have been about $95 billion. Under the UCP, $93 billion. It's definitely misinformation, but it's not factual that they're going to pay it down much faster than we would.

The difference, Mr. Speaker, lies in the fact that they're giving away $4.7 billion. That's $4.7 billion that could've been used to fund classrooms, to fund teachers. Just today we learned that Calgary, the CBE, is firing 350 teachers because of their budgets. What floors me is that instead of this government owning up to their bad-news budget, they turn around and deflect and blame others. I mean, I don't know if that's now their thing. It's kind of been that way for the last – I don't know – hundred years, at least the last few weeks. I can tell you that that's been the approach that they've taken, to blame the school board for mismanaging their funds as opposed to – you know, you get the Justice minister, the Minister of Municipal Affairs blaming cities for not using their money appropriately when this government is downloading services to the municipalities and then forcing them to have to look at the only tool they have, which is property taxes, which is a terrible tool, which needs to be retooled.

In fact, we did that. At least, starting with Edmonton and Calgary, we had city charters in place, Mr. Speaker, that would give them the ability to participate in revenue sharing. The great thing about that – and I give a shout-out to the mayors of both cities, who said: "We want a share of the revenues, but we also understand that you can't have it both ways. So we will also be with the province in years where our revenues are down, when their funds will go down, so that, you know, they're in the same situation that the province is. That's fair, and they were willing to do that.

I mean, again, municipalities deliver, I believe, somewhere around 90 per cent of the services that individuals rely on. [interjection] Well, I know that municipalities get less than 10 cents per tax dollar to deliver a bulk of the services.

Some of the issues that I have with this budget, Mr. Speaker – you know, there are a number of things. This government didn't campaign on increasing personal income taxes. Again, for a government that supposedly is so antitaxes, I don't know how these folks look themselves in the mirror to say: I'm opposed to taxes. Okay. What about the personal income tax increase? "Well, that doesn't count." Oh, okay. I see. That's how you justify a raise of personal income taxes. I don't recall that during the election, the UCP campaigning on raising personal income taxes.

You know what? You can wordsmith and massage the language and words as much as you want, but removing a tax bracket is tax creep, and it's an increase in taxes. Their very leader – their very leader – used these exact same arguments in the federal House of Commons. Apparently, there are two different sets of rules: one you play by when you're in Alberta, and one you play by when you're in Ottawa. I think it's ridiculous. If you want to increase personal income taxes, well, then you should have run on it. You can't have it both ways.

This budget has a number of issues, Mr. Speaker. I mean, we see cuts to education. We see nurse layoffs. Again, there was just a protest today of nurses. You know, folks over there like to distract and try to talk about: oh, we're opposed to something else. No. We're in favour of funding front-line health services. This government promised that the front line wouldn't be affected. We knew that that wasn't the case, and now we're seeing the results of this very budget coming forward.

We see that AISH has been deindexed. Okay. Again, we can play the wordsmith game. It's a cut, Mr. Speaker. Find me a year since we've had currency where inflation was zero. Find me a year in the history of the world, of any country that has had currency where inflation has been zero. I see that one of the members may be looking to take on that challenge. Inflation is real.

I mean, the other thing that's interesting about inflation is that, you know, your cost of food and energy are not part of the actual inflation formula, which seems kind of counterintuitive considering those are the two things that drive costs, for sure.

But the point, Mr. Speaker, is that by deindexing AISH from inflation, it is a cut. Maybe it's not a cut this year, in 2019, but it'll be a cut next year. It'll be a cut the year after and a cut the year after. I mean, it's the same as freezing funding to schools. Fifteen thousand new students entered the school system this year. There'll be 15,000 next year, the year after, and the year after. Not increasing funding to be indexed with inflationary costs or, in this case, the growth of schools, is a cut. There are no two ways about it.

I think that there are other issues that I have with this budget. We're seeing an attack on teachers. Again, you know, later on we'll be debating Bill 22, which places the government's hands all over teacher pensions. I haven't met a single teacher that asked for it.

We see cuts in this budget to Alberta Innovates. In fact, we just learned yesterday that they're firing 125 of their staff. Mr. Speaker, this is my plea to all of the rural MLAs in this room. Alberta Innovates has people on the ground throughout this province who help support small businesses to prototype, get their products to market. You know, the government likes to talk about cutting red tape. Well, you know what you did? You just layered on red tape by cutting all of these positions that would actually help businesses get their ideas off the ground. Alberta Innovates has an incredible ROI. For every dollar that they invest, there's a $28 follow-on investment. For those that are unfamiliar with that term, it means that for every dollar that Alberta Innovates invests in a company, the private sector is investing an additional $28. That's huge.

This is how we grow our own companies here in Alberta. The next Google, the next Facebook, the next Amazon can be here, but when you stifle these supports and you choke them out and you have this naive mindset that a single corporate tax cut is the silver bullet, you either have to get out of your offices and talk to small businesses or something because the corporate tax cut does not help these very businesses. It doesn't because they don't pay taxes. They don't have retained earnings. I mean, will it help other companies? Yes. Companies have said that. Now, unfortunately, it's helped companies like Husky say: thank you very much; we're going to take our couple hundred million that you just saved us, and we're going to go spend it in Saskatchewan. You know, if that's not a slap in the face, I don't know what is, Mr. Speaker.

But, you know, in addition to cuts to Alberta Innovates, there are also cuts to artificial intelligence. I mean, the government says that they're in support of it. Where? Show me. Show me the line items of where you're supporting it, because I believe that AMII is actually getting a cut, which is ranked third in the world, Mr. Speaker. They help companies to develop technologies that use artificial intelligence to support oil and gas. So even if you folks think that there is no other sector in Alberta other than oil and gas – and, yes, oil and gas is important, but as Albertans, our economy, there are many more sectors – artificial intelligence and technology support oil and gas. By making cuts to AMII and Alberta Innovates, you are effectively cutting and hurting the oil and gas sector. Think what you want. That is the reality. These companies develop technologies that ensure Alberta is on the cutting edge. Where did SAGD technology come from? Alberta. Fracking? Alberta. These are technologies that were developed here because of investments.

Mr. Speaker, I'm sure you're well aware of this, but the oil and gas sector in Alberta never would have gotten off the ground back in the '60s and '50s if it wasn't for help from the provincial government, so this idea of, "No, any government support is just wrong," well, either you don't know history, you're naive, or you have your facts mixed up, because governments have supported the oil and gas sector in order to kickstart that industry. Companies were going broke trying to drill, unsuccessfully. They weren't finding anything in the ground, but they were going broke because of it, so the government stepped in. There is a role for government.

This government talks about the four or five different tax credits that our government introduced as boutique and unnecessary, yet in the next breath introduces a film tax credit. You just refuted your own argument when you said that they're not necessary, because the film tax credit is a boutique. Mr. Speaker, I'll be the first to say that I'm in favour of the film tax credit, just as I'm in favour of the investor tax credit, the digital media tax credit, the capital investment tax credit, SRED. These are all critical to helping small companies grow, and the reason it should be government is because government can derisk so that the private sector will then invest in these companies. That's the role and the power of the provincial government.

You know, folks over there talk about how bad debt is. Now, we know that you can't be in debt forever, but I will ask any member in this House to tell me if they know anyone who paid for their house without taking a mortgage, who just went to the bank with $500,000 from their savings and said: buying a house. Not all debt is bad debt, Mr. Speaker, and the rates that the government can borrow at are better than anyone else's. There is a place and a role for government. I'm not arguing that government should take on debt in perpetuity, not at all.

Again, what's interesting is that the folks over there don't like to look at their own leader and the deficit budgets he put in place when he served in Ottawa. Mr. Speaker, one year his deficit budget under Stephen Harper was over $100 billion dollars. One year. To talk about how you're the champion – and I hear somebody say: well, that's one year. Debt is debt. You can't argue: oh, it's bad if the NDP does it in Alberta, but it's okay if the former minister of immigration does it in Canada. I'd also remind the members that your own budget is an $8 billion deficit budget right now, that you're tabling. Ours was $6 billion; yours is $2 billion higher. Like, you keep arguing in circles.

Other areas that I have concerns with in this budget: cuts to programs, again, that were working. The community and regional economic support program was helping local communities diversify their economies. They came up with the ideas, not the bureaucrats, not the people in this room. It was designed and developed by local communities, business organizations who said, "Hey, province, we need a little bit of financial help," so we said, "We'll go in fifty-fifty." The dollars have supported incredible projects in every single riding of every member in this room, and it's shameful, Mr. Speaker, that that program is cut. It was pennies on the dollar.

It was a very small sum of money that had a huge impact, similar to entities like Alberta Innovates. Some of their most successful programs are $10,000 vouchers, but the $10,000: you talk to the small businesses – and I encourage members in this room, of this House to go speak to those businesses – and they will tell you that that was the difference between them going bankrupt or going under and them being successful. A small sum of money but a critical support system and critical support that the government could play. "Unfortunate" is not the right word, Mr. Speaker.

Another program that's been cut is the Alberta export expansion program. That program helps companies access new markets.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available.

Member Ceci: Could the member – I was listening to the member talk about: basically, you're not going to support the budget. What would make this a budget you could support? I think everybody would be interested in that.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview has risen to respond.

Mr. Bilous: Yes. Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for that question that was warm and fuzzy. You know, to answer the member or to respond to the member, I mean, it's tough. Obviously, we recognize that there is a way to get the deficit to zero without having to make massive cuts to our education and health care systems. Now, I know that the members opposite will say: we're not. But you are, though. It's black and white. It's in front of you. Calgary board of education would not be laying off 300 teachers if they didn't have a cut. They're not just going to do that for giggles. There is a way to do it.

I think that the corporate tax cut going from 12 per cent to 8 per cent: if you look at other jurisdictions that have tried it – and there are many U.S. states that have – it actually backfired, and it didn't work. What it did was that it gutted government revenue so that they had to cut back or cut out the services they were providing.

Yet the corporate tax cut is not creating the jobs that it was supposed to. What was, Mr. Speaker, are some of the programs that were introduced. The tax credits were creating jobs. We were attracting and retaining companies here in Alberta. We've heard from a number of digital media companies who have said: we were going to relocate to Alberta; you've now told us that you're not open for business and we're not welcome here, so we're going to stay in other provinces. Here's the funny thing. The Alberta interactive digital media tax credit was in the middle of the pack. In fact, in Quebec theirs is 37.5 per cent. Ours was 25 per cent, and I can tell you that the province of British Columbia has one as well.

When companies are looking for a level playing field – we had that here, Mr. Speaker, so for me what's so disappointing is that the other side, the government, has politicized these tax credits. It appears that the Premier and his government are throwing the baby out with the bathwater. Because the credits came in under our government, they are somehow bad. You know what? Talk to the private sector. They don't care who brings them in. They've been advocating that a government bring them in; we happened to. They're good ideas. The return on investment is there. The investor tax credit has a 3 to 1 return on investment. Don't take my word for it. Talk to the companies that are saying: you've now disadvantaged Alberta. Again, I get that the talking points are: the corporate tax cut. It doesn't help these companies. For me to support the budget, I would have looked for, again, better tools to help get the economy on track.

I've yet to see how this government has furthered the Trans Mountain pipeline. It was under the former government that we forced the federal government to purchase the Trans Mountain pipeline so that it wouldn't fail and regulators wouldn't have to start from scratch. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that under, you know, the leader of the government when he was in Ottawa federally, because of failures to adequately consult, projects like Gateway were torpedoed and were shot down. I mean, the Premier, when he was in Ottawa, did not get any pipelines to tidewater, so we are in a position where now we are behind the eight ball and it is a challenge to get our products to tidewater. It's frustrating that previous governments didn't work hard enough to get them done.

I mean, we've seen construction resume on the Trans Mountain; that's great. We see line 3 has resumed; that's fantastic. This government had nothing to do with it. Did we? No, we didn't. I'll call a spade a spade. But it's good news that that project has started.

I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that in 2016 4 in 10 Canadians supported the Trans Mountain pipeline, and because of the work that our government did, we got that number to 7 in 10 Canadians. We raised the level of understanding and consciousness on the need for pipelines. What I don't see moving the needle is jumping up and down and screaming, picking fights with every province and telling them that they're all wrong.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-North West has risen to speak on this point.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise with some interest to speak to the Appropriation Act, 2019, here, the budget for this new, UCP government. I certainly appreciate the scope by which any budget is constructed. I know from building five, at least, that it's a formidable task, and you can certainly see a lot of hard work by our public service here to deliver this 2019 budget for the province of Alberta.

The areas that I want to focus on here this afternoon are the ones which I am responsible for as the critic for the Official Opposition here in the Legislature, which is Advanced Education, and then I would also like to make some comments on the K to 12 education budget as well because, of course, I have a vested interest in that as an Albertan and as a former Minister of Education as well.

First off, then, Mr. Speaker, in regard to the Advanced Education budget I know that people were bracing for a reduction in grants and in capital and changes to tuition and so forth, but both the scale and the scope of the cuts directed at postsecondary education here in the province of Alberta, I think, came as a bit of a shock to those hundreds of thousands of people that are involved in advanced education and to the general public as well. I think we've seen a history of Conservative governments in this province making cuts to Advanced Education when they're delivering budgets like these.

But the scope and the scale of this particular attack on Advanced Education, I think, was both an incorrect decision and, I believe, was quite mean-spirited and misdirected as well because when we start to look at the larger things we need to do here in Alberta to help diversify our economy, to help to train a 21st-century workforce, to look for new technologies that we can own or be uniquely showing some leadership on in regard to the economy, all of these ambitions and goals reside in advanced education institutions. That's where you have research and development that gives us things such as nanotechnology and artificial intelligence and, you know, advances in biomedical technology – right? – with the work that's done here at the University of Alberta around kidneys and so forth and diabetes.

I mean, there's an infinite list of value-added products if you want to look at them that way. They're things that help humankind to advance and to create a better world for everyone, but you can make money off them, too. You can make lots of money off these things, and the research and development element of advanced education, you know, just suffered a significant body blow with the reductions in the grants to the universities, especially the large universities in both Edmonton and in Calgary. I mean, that's a mistake, Mr. Speaker, quite frankly.

We know that postsecondary institutions are economic generators unto themselves anyway, right? They help to mitigate the negative effects of economic downturns in other areas. We don't have to look any further than places like Lakeland College and its positive effect on the town of Vermilion, Alberta, allowing stable jobs and sort of a place to, you know, grow that town. You have colleges like Keyano in Fort McMurray, Grande Prairie. Each one of these – Lethbridge is a very good example of how postsecondary institutions literally help to stabilize the economy and rough off the edges of economic booms and busts, because these are stable jobs that are providing an essential service that makes investments into communities. So making cuts: it really just doubles down on the negative effects of an economic downturn to direct cuts to our postsecondary institutions.

Let's not forget that, of course, postsecondary institutions include the trades, right? I know that this government has put forward an interest in investing in the trades, which I think is an honourable and very positive idea. I certainly would support that in all ways. We know that we will have a generational turnover of trades professionals here in this province over the next number of years, and we need to make sure that we are directing both money and support to people that are interested in acquiring a trade, both young people coming from our K to 12 education system but also adults, young adults or even older people, to make choices in changes to careers. All of those are honourable and reasonable goals.

We know that we have a strong industrial base that requires quite a large population of trained professionals to get the job done, but you don't do that, Mr. Speaker, by cutting those very training programs and reducing the spaces and the opportunities for people to acquire those trades. Where do you get that? You get that through apprenticeship programs. You get that through dual-credit programs. You get those through our polytechnic schools and our trades colleges like NAIT and SAIT. You don't cut those same places and expect to get any result besides a negative result coming from those places.

As well, we know very well – the facts are irrefutable – that we have a very large contingent of young people moving through the K to 12 education system now that are perhaps in elementary or junior high school, but what's going to happen to those young people when they finish grade 12? They will need postsecondary positions to continue on with their training, be it a trade or university degree, any kind of professional training.

So, Mr. Speaker, we need to build capacity in our postsecondary institutions to meet those future needs, not reduce those same places and make them more expensive. I mean, that's just the worst combination possible. We know that there are tens of thousands more spaces that we need to start building immediately, both the capital infrastructure that's associated with that and the professionals and the professors and the support staff that would support tens of thousands of new positions. I've been told by university presidents around the province that we need to start building the equivalent in capacity of another University of Lethbridge here in this province immediately, to meet the needs of the growing demographic of young people that are coming down the pipe and will require postsecondary education.

You know, when I look at a budget like this, where it's providing cuts to advanced education and not making those investments, I see a very short-sighted exercise that has been chosen to reduce the balance sheet but to reduce the balance sheet at the expense of the essential services in advanced education that we require now and in the immediate future as well.

The Advanced Education budget here as presented also has basically eliminated capital maintenance and infrastructure for advanced education. Again, to my previous argument that we actually need more capacity and space, that's a wrong-headed view. In regard to maintenance and deferred maintenance, it's even just as bad or even worse, right? We know very well that if you fail to make the investment in maintenance in aging facilities, then you exacerbate the problem, where you literally lose those structures. There are places at the universities of Alberta, Calgary, Lethbridge, and so forth where you literally will not be able to function without following a proper maintenance schedule.

Again, this is a way to move some dollars off a ledger for the optics of trying to reduce spending, but then you end up with a deficit, a material deficit, that someone is going to have to build and do in the future. I was faced with that very thing in K to 12 education, where we literally had to build almost 200 new schools over the last number of years because previous governments chose to not build the schools that we knew we needed for young people and families here in the province of Alberta. You know, maybe people can come up with those big plastic cheques and show paid in full and all that kind of stuff. Absolute nonsense, right? If you have, let's say, an infrastructure deficit, someone is going to have to build those things sometime, and good for a responsible government to make the choice to do so.

Again, I have my concerns around the advanced education element of this appropriation budget. We know that decisions that are made to reduce the tax credit for students paying tuition and so forth are making postsecondary education more expensive. I know that this is being sold as not a consequential increase in expense, but it is if you're a student, right? I mean, every dollar counts, and one of the obstructions to even getting people to consider going to university or to trades college or so forth is the expense. I know that the hon. minister opposite likes to argue that that's not the case, but it's blatantly and obviously and commonsensically true that if something is too expensive, people are not going to do it. If they don't see a material advantage or perception of advantage, then you are not going to have people choosing to engage, quite frankly.

It's a responsibility of a modern state to have affordable postsecondary education available to all people, not just to people that have the money to do it, not the people that come from, let's say, a lineage of families that already went to university and their parents before and their grandparents before that, but for everybody to have an opportunity and to equalize that opportunity at every juncture possible. I certainly don't profess to be a conservative by any means, but it's on the very conservative line of thought to look at your population at least as a potential economic unit that you want to maximize.

For budgets like this, heading in the wrong direction with advanced education, making it more expensive, more inaccessible for individuals, you're literally cutting off your economic potential for people based on their ability to pay for training, right? You get the smart kid, you know, that just can't quite afford to go, can't get that trades ticket, and you're underperforming that person as an economic entity, potentially for the rest of their lives. These are all things that I think we know in here as conventional wisdom, but this appropriation budget sort of flies in the face of conventional wisdom, common sense, I would say, particularly in advanced education specifically and in regard to the responsibilities of a good government generally.

Another area that I find considerably of concern is around K to 12 education, where this government swears up and down that they're not making a cut, that every student is funded, and so forth, and so on, right? Well, I happen to know the budget that they were using up until today, and what they did was simply move money around. The key element to a successful K to 12 education budget in the province of Alberta is to make sure you're funding for enrolment. More kids are showing up at the schools every year, and you want to make sure that they're getting a high-quality education, meet their educational needs at every step along the way, have a rigorous curriculum and highly trained teachers and good facilities in which to do those things, right? This K to 12 budget: lo and behold, the secret missing ingredient here is that they simply took money from one place and put it into another, right? They liquidated the class size improvement fund, and they took the classroom improvement fund as well. You move the money around. It's like the hokey-pokey: you take two steps forward and one step back.

An Hon. Member: Is that how you do the hokey-pokey?

Mr. Eggen: That's how you do the hokey-pokey. You know, that's why I learned how to play in a band, because I could never dance, right? In the hokey-pokey you would take one step forward and two steps back, and that's what this K to 12 education budget is. We know it because we have school boards that are now having to lay off teachers. I was shocked to see that the Calgary board of education is looking at 300 positions right now being gone, probably more as they start to add up the true effects of the budget. I just find that very disturbing.

The Acting Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available should anybody be looking to make questions or comments.

Seeing none, are there any other hon. members looking to speak to the bill? I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo has risen.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's Calgary-McCall . . .

The Acting Speaker: McCall.

Mr. Sabir: . . . a very vibrant and diverse constituency. It's home to people from many different cultures and backgrounds and also home to many newcomers. In general, I think, the income of the people in my constituency is relatively lower as compared to the rest of Calgary. I think this budget will impact them in significant ways, and I have had the opportunity to talk to many of my constituents about this budget, and they have shared many concerns in this regard.

I think I will begin by saying that this budget is cutting everything to the bone. At the same time, they came up with a policy of handing out the $4.7 billion gift to corporations, and they want all Albertans to believe that somehow that policy will fix every issue this province has ever faced or will face in the future. Certainly, we disagree with that. Certainly, economists disagree with that. Trickle-down economics doesn't work. Even this year a Nobel laureate for economics said that these kind of tax breaks do not create jobs; they do not spur investments. So it's a completely failed policy.

If we look at the different areas of the budget, like, it's cutting from every single ministry, every single service that people in my constituency rely on, people in Alberta rely on. It's cutting grants to postsecondary students, postsecondary institutions, as my colleague mentioned earlier. It's raising interest rates on student loans. It is hiking tuition fees for students, and there are many, many young Albertans in my riding who do go to the University of Calgary, who do go to these postsecondary institutions. And because of this budget, they will be paying more.

It's also cutting supports for children in care, cutting from the child care pilots that we started, essentially making it difficult for those children to get ahead, making it difficult for women to participate in the workforce.

It's deindexing AISH and income support. Earlier the Minister of Transportation said that they're not cutting AISH. In fact, AISH was due to increase on January 1, 2020, and yes, you are cutting it. You are cutting it by $30 per month. It's almost $380 per year, so you are cutting $380 from AISH every year until you start indexing it again, for which you haven't given any date. Yes, you are taking away from Albertans with disabilities. You are deindexing income support programs. You are taking money away from those who are most vulnerable.

You are deindexing seniors' programs. You are taking money away from the seniors. You are taking them off the drug program.

CFEP, CIP grants, that are from culture, tourism: you are cutting 35 per cent from CFEP grants; you are reducing CIP grants that availed my constituents, many newcomer organizations quite frequently. So they will have less support because of this budget.

Also, it's ending all the tax credits that were helping us attract investment, that were helping us diversify our economy. As a result, people will have less opportunities to invest. People will have less opportunities to get jobs.

They are cutting from municipal grants. The Calgary police chief has been saying for a while now that they are cutting $13 million from Calgary police grants. We in the northeast have seen a spike in crimes, and we were at this point looking for more supports, not cuts to the police, cuts to law enforcement. They won't be able to do their job effectively if they don't have the resources they need. This budget is cutting grants from the Calgary police and police and law enforcement in general from all across the province.

It's also cutting from education. Today we heard that there are 300 teachers who are let go, laid off from the Calgary board of education alone. I think that will have a real impact on our youths' education. That will have a real impact on the families in my constituency and across this province.

Then they are raising insurance rates for everyone. We have kept it at 5 per cent. Now that cap has been removed, and Albertans, everyone, will be paying more in their insurance costs.

Similarly, if I come to the Energy ministry, which I'm the critic of, all they are telling us is that the war room and their inquiry will fix everything this industry is facing. We asked in question period, we asked in estimates how the war room will work. There is no business plan so far. There is no strategic direction whatsoever. Same thing with the inquiry: all we know so far about the inquiry is that a $900,000 sole-source contract was given to a firm where the inquiry commissioner's son is a partner, and the Justice minister formerly used to work at that firm.

They are removing the cap of 6.8 cents that we brought in on the electricity bills, and yesterday in estimates the minister stated that that program will cost somewhere around $380 million in four years. That means that Albertans were saving $380 million, were better off by having that cap. Now that cap has been removed, so Albertans will end up paying $380 million more in their electricity bills. That's a lot of dollars every month on their electricity bills. I'm sure those people who pay these bills do live in your constituencies as well. It will impact them as well.

In short, this is a budget that will adversely impact families in my riding and across this province. I think that when times are tough, we do not turn our back on our youth, our children in our education system, or those who are coming out of foster care. We do not ignore those who are sick and needing support. We do not ignore newcomers who are needing supports and services. This budget is doing exactly that. In good conscience I cannot support this budget. This budget will hurt Albertans all across this province.

This government should not impose this kind of budget to further their ideological agenda of austerity and trickle-down economics, which has failed all across the globe every time that it was experimented. I think that at this point this government needs to take these concerns seriously. Albertans are crying out loud against these cuts. There are protests and rallies on the Legislature steps every single day. They need to take their earplugs out and listen to these Albertans' concerns and reverse these cuts because they will hurt Albertans all across this province.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I won't be supporting this at all.

The Acting Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available to anyone should they choose to make any questions or comments.

Seeing none, are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung has risen to speak.

Mr. Dach: Thank you. It's a pleasure to rise today to give brief remarks and add to the debate surrounding Bill 24, the appropriations measure, the act that the government relies upon to bring forward its budget. I'll tell you what, Mr. Speaker, the hounds are unleashed on this one. It doesn't matter what ministry we spoke to in estimates; the axes were out. The government claims that the budget measures they've taken to reduce public services and make cuts were way, way less than what you might have seen in the Klein years, but I'll tell you what, the pain they've been causing certainly reminds me of the Klein years.

The amount of correspondence that I've gotten in my constituency regarding things like the deindexing of AISH is heart-rending to listen to. When you look at what's actually happening to individuals who are on AISH, they will be receiving about $30 less per month as a result of the loss of deindexing plus the other measures that the Member for Calgary-McCall just referred to. It's going to end up being even more than that. Those are our most vulnerable people, who are living close to the edge of not making it. Indeed, none of us, I think, in this House would have any desire to live on that type of an income. It's difficult to imagine how in cabinet the decision to come to this deindexing measure was made. I don't know what they were thinking. It is not a very appetizing thought for anybody who is on AISH right now, having just had their income indexed by our government previously, to face the fact that they're going to be going backwards again. They're wondering what the heck they ever did to deserve this.

Once again, with the Education ministry we've constantly been told by members opposite in the government, particularly the Education minister, that the cuts wouldn't result in layoffs. Well, the Minister of Education today rose in the House to say how surprised she was, how upset she was that indeed 300 Calgary teachers were getting the axe. Her response, her reaction was to blame the Calgary board of education, suggesting that it's somehow a governance issue and it's the board's fault. We begged the government to reconsider. We prognosed exactly what was going to happen, and we hoped that we would not have to come forward and say, "We told you so," but indeed that's what's happening. It was very predictable. This Calgary board of education round of cuts is only the first big one we're going to hear about. There are going to be lots more coming. The blame lies squarely at the foot of this Minister of Education and this government, and it goes on through to every ministry that one can think of.

But I'll focus, Mr. Speaker, on Bill 24 and the ministries which touch on my critic role in particular, the Ministry of Agriculture and Forestry. You may recall that over the past few weeks I've spoken quite passionately about the Alberta Beekeepers Commission and their efforts to lobby the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry for help right now, and what they got was sweet nothing for beekeepers who were at risk of going under. The claim, of course, is that the cupboard is bare, yet we had a $4.7 billion gift going to major corporations that was on the wing real quick, and I don't even know if they were demanding it.

Believe me, the ideology that is just across the way is determined to fail again by proving that corporate tax cuts don't get reinvested into the economy. They go to pay down debt. They go to buy back shares. Time and again we've seen, even with this $4.7 billion gift to corporations, that corporate tax cuts are out the window and forever lost for Albertans to use and invest in their livelihood and welfare and their social services and perhaps advancing their economic interest in things that we really need over time, especially right now, in this province.

For example, we had another really very bad crop year, and it's still ongoing. This agriculture minister – it's the third year in four that we've had a bad crop year – is basically suggesting to the agricultural community, to farmers, to producers to rely upon existing insurance mechanisms, yet they've been telling him time and time again that those instruments aren't sufficient. They're not satisfactory. They don't meet their needs. Yet he's unwilling to come forward with urgent assistance, once again saying: "The cupboard is bare. We can't afford it. Sorry. There's nothing there for you." There was $4.7 billion for large corporations, and $4.7 billion is, like, 10 per cent of our budget out the window, out the door, forever gone, invested into something that will have no return whatsoever, and hardly a thank you from the corporations who received it.

Another instance of the cupboard being bare, Mr. Speaker, in Agriculture and Forestry is the rapattack firefighters, 63 absolutely dedicated, highly trained men and women who rappel down from helicopters into forest fires that are relatively fresh and new in an attempt to stop them before they get larger than a hectare if at all possible. They cost about $1.4 million on an annual basis, these 63 firefighters. That investment has a return on it that is exponentially returned because of what they do in terms of minimizing forest fire damage, keeping many, many fires – I'm talking hundreds of fires – each year from growing bigger than a hectare and keeping them from growing beyond 24 hours in duration. They contain fires to less than a hectare. They also get down and they cut helicopter pads for other helicopters to land so that larger crews and more equipment can come in, and they spot equipment along larger fires as well so that they can have multiple attack centres on these fires.

The alternative that the minister is suggesting as a new technology, a basket with a long line to bring in crews, is something that these helitack crews will tell you is absolutely more dangerous and not an adequate response. They will end up having fires get larger as a result, and the cost that they will cause in actually being a less effective method is way, way more than $1.4 million, than these 63 well-trained, highly fit, very energetic, and essential spearhead of our forest firefighting attack team will ever have cost. It's a very, very bad move that the minister, so far, seems to be making.

I've managed to arrange a short meeting with the minister on this issue, and I believe, my understanding is that they were going to meet again. I hope – it's my sincere hope – that the minister will be convinced by his discussions, if indeed they take place, directly with these rapattack firefighters to change his mind, to realize that his $1.4 million budget item is something that should be maintained and probably even added to as a means of making sure that in a time when our forest fire risk is getting higher and higher, we do everything possible to minimize the size of fires as they are ignited.

Those three items within the Ministry of Agriculture and Forestry reflect a pattern of telling Albertans that in many ministries the cupboard is bare. In fact, there's money to give away to corporations, to the tune of $4.7 billion.

I also asked in estimates, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Service Alberta about the real estate industry real estate assurance fund and why that fee was increased to $1.50 per $5,000 of a mortgage that was registered on land titles from a dollar. We're talking millions of dollars that will be added to the real estate assurance fund as a result. He indicated that there was no problem with the assurance fund. It wasn't underfunded. It didn't need the amount of money that it was getting as a result of this increase, yet it's being increased.

So my query was: what in the world is this money going to be used for? Is it going into general revenue, or will it actually be dedicated to the assurance fund? I didn't really get an answer about that yet, but I'm going to be very much alert to what type of uses this money gets put to because his indication was that it goes into general revenue. But it's a dedicated fund, and it could be a slush fund that ends up getting used for things other than the real estate assurance fund as a means of sort of a hidden tax, a generation of tax that the government claims they weren't going to make, just like the $600 million they're generating in added tax that Albertans would pay as a result of bracket creep.

Mr. Speaker, I'm wondering what it will take for this government to get the message from Albertans – it doesn't seem that they're willing to talk about democracy or involve themselves in any way – to deter them from their absolute blind goal to go ahead and marry themselves to the idea of corporate tax cuts as a way of inciting the economy rather than helping people who need the help, who will actually spend the money in our economy, to end up getting our jobs created.

I could go on for a whole lot longer, but I think many of our other speakers have covered lots of the other subjects, and what I'll do right now is move to adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Government Motions

The Acting Speaker: I see the hon. Minister of Transportation has risen to speak.

Alberta's Oil and Gas Industry

28. Mr. McIver on behalf of Mr. Jason Nixon moved:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly express its support for Alberta's oil and gas industry, for the continued responsible development of best-in-class energy resources in accordance with the highest ethical and environmental standards, and for individuals who show their support by wearing their pro-Canadian oil and gas apparel, including when visiting the Alberta Legislature, and urge the government to continue its efforts to advocate for the reversal of federal and provincial policies that have negatively impacted workers in Alberta's oil and gas industry.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On behalf of my good friend the hon. Minister of Environment and Parks and the Government House Leader I'd like to move Government Motion 28. May I speak to it?

The Acting Speaker: Please.

Mr. McIver: Thank you. Folks, this is a motion that we're putting on the table. I think it's self-explanatory, but because some folks at home that are watching may not be as familiar – this is really important. The energy industry certainly isn't our only important industry, but it is by far the largest one, the one that employs the most people. Actually, it's not only Alberta's most important export industry; it is far and away Canada's largest and most important export industry.

4:30

Folks, it's been under attack. It's been under attack from a whole number of fronts. It's been under attack by, amongst other things, federal policies like Bill C-48, the tanker ban. While our country every day, just about, takes in hundreds of thousands of barrels of foreign oil, some off the east coast, somehow our oil, Canadian produced, highly responsibly produced, ethically produced, with high environmental and human rights standards, is not allowed to be shipped. Yet oil comes into this country with much lower environmental, human rights standards every day, and somehow that's okay. We are under attack: people that even just wear T-shirts in support of our industry getting told they can't visit the Parliament Buildings.

Our industry is under attack from other provincial governments that are opposed to our pipelines getting our product to the coast, which is really interesting because, through the great efforts of the women and men that work in the energy industry, Alberta contributes to Canada through equalization, most years, above $20 billion per year, which other provinces get to enjoy the benefit of. Albertans have been generous and would be okay to remain generous like that if we were allowed to just ship our products and get them to market, to get the best price.

In fact, what's happening right now is not just costing Alberta money. It's costing Canada money, it's costing the other provinces in this country money because when we are selling at a discount of sometimes $23 and more per barrel, that amounts to millions and millions of dollars every week, every month, and every year.

Mr. Bilous: It's $18 right now.

Mr. McIver: Yes. Thank you. The Opposition House Leader says "$18," and I don't doubt him. I'm just saying that that's not atypical: sometimes lower than that, sometimes a lot higher than that.

Folks, this is something that – I would feel better if we had unanimous support of this motion. I think it's support for anybody in this House that claims they do care about Alberta jobs. Last time I counted, we all claim to care about Alberta jobs. This would be a good way to actually say that we care about Alberta jobs, by saying that we are in support of our industry, we're in support of those who show support of our industry, we are in support of the men and women that work in the industry, and, by golly, we are in support of all of the schools, hospitals, roads, and social programs that the profits and the royalties from the energy industry bring to Alberta, bring to Canada, and bring to each of our communities and, in many cases, to our families.

It's my sincere hope, Mr. Speaker, that this motion will receive favourable support from the House, and I would respectfully ask for that support at this time. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I think I should have probably been more clear at the very start, when you asked if you could speak to it. I should have noted that it is, under I believe it's Standing Order 18(1)(a), a debatable motion, allowing for debate in the House.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview has risen.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and speak to this motion. I do want to thank the minister for his comments and his words on this motion, especially because I appreciate that although he could have chosen to attack the previous government or criticize the previous government, he did not do so, and that was noted. I will keep my comments to the positive as well, looking at, again, the importance of the oil and gas sector to the whole Canadian economy.

You know, for me, what's frustrating in provinces like Quebec, especially, is that there is a failure to acknowledge that there are hundreds and hundreds of Quebec and Ontario companies who benefit from Alberta's oil and gas sector. It benefits Canadians across the country not only through things like equalization, because, as we all know, that's based on personal income, and because Alberta is the economic engine of the country, we pay more than our share. I also agree that the equalization formula is broken. Alberta pays a disproportionate amount as a have province. Four provinces in the country contribute to the equalization formula, I do believe, and I understand and appreciate the role of that, that we want to ensure that Canadians have a similar standard of living no matter where they live in the country. I agree. We are one country.

But, again, Mr. Speaker, what is frustrating is when you have other jurisdictions or parts of this country that are choosing to bring in their energy from countries that are run by dictators, that have no environmental standards, that have poor working conditions, and that are shipping their crude across the ocean. I don't know what could be more damaging to the environment than that, should those tankers spill.

We know that pipelines are the safest mode of transportation, Mr. Speaker. We know that we need market access, and we need pipelines. That's why we unequivocally support not only the Trans Mountain pipeline. I've stood in this House on many occasions and talked about the importance of pipelines in every single direction. I'm proud that our government did commit 50,000 barrels per day to the Keystone XL pipeline in order to help that pipeline move forward.

You know, I'll mention briefly the discount. I was just watching on BNN this morning that it's up to $18 per barrel, which is significant. This is $18 a barrel that Canadians are losing because of lack of market access. Back last fall we had actually a clock, so to speak. It's like the debt clock except it was a clock showing the lost revenue to Canadians because of the delay of the Trans Mountain pipeline. The clock had started, I think, on August 31, 2018, and within a couple of months it was already at $15 billion, Mr. Speaker. I don't know where it's at today, but I'd imagine that it's north of $30 billion if not even higher than that. So it's critical.

We know that we have an incredible industry. It's good jobs for the men and women of this country. We're very proud of it, and we're proud to support this amendment. Now, having said that, Mr. Speaker, in addition to allowing members of the gallery to wear their oil and gas T-shirts, I think we should be showing unequivocal support for the other sectors that are drivers of the Alberta and Canadian economy, including agriculture, forestry, technology, you name it. For those reasons, I have an amendment that I would like to share with the Assembly.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

We'll just give the opportunity for the pages to pass it around, and then I will make another decision.

I was just actually checking to see how long it was. Looking at the length of it, I would ask if you could please read it into the record and then continue with your comments.

Mr. Bilous: Absolutely – thank you, Mr. Speaker – with pleasure. I move that Government Motion 28 be amended (a) by adding “agricultural industry, forestry industry, renewable energy industry and technology sector” after “express its support for Alberta's oil and gas industry” and (b) by adding “and other clothing supporting Alberta's industries” after “pro-Canadian oil and gas apparel.”

Now, Mr. Speaker, again, the purpose of this amendment A1 is not to detract from the oil and gas sector; in fact, it's to highlight the fact that there are other sectors that are absolutely critical that are also especially hurting right now. We know that the agricultural sector has been hit hard because of weather over the last couple of years. In fact, I believe that many crops in Alberta – farmers have struggled to get their crops off the field. We have challenges with market access and getting them to market. We know we've had challenges with trade, not only tariffs but trade barriers, you know, whether it's canola and getting it to China or other products.

I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the forestry sector employs, I believe, over 18,000 men and women in this province. It is absolutely critical to the Alberta economy. They have had challenges, especially in the last couple years and even currently, while we still have an ongoing softwood lumber dispute with the U.S., who, of course, is our largest market. You know, despite efforts in trying to increase market access in other countries, they too need our support.

Quite frankly, this is about allowing Canadians or visitors, really, to wear apparel that supports our oil and gas sector but also the other sectors critical to Alberta's economy. While we do support this motion to show and allow visitors who visit this Chamber the ability to wear a T-shirt to support our industry, I firmly believe that we should support all of the industries that drive the Alberta economy. I mean, I'd imagine that members opposite, as we have, have been contacted by members of other industries saying: yes, we support oil and gas, and people should be allowed to wear those shirts, but what about our sectors? What about the people that are raising the best beef in the world here in our province? Should they not be able to wear a shirt that says, “I love Alberta beef” or the other sectors?

Really, this is meant to broaden it to show unanimous support for all of Alberta's sectors that are absolutely critical to driving the Canadian economy. For those reasons, I strongly urge all members to support this amendment. I hope all members will support this amendment. My fear, quite frankly, folks, is that if we don't support this amendment, it sends the message to the agricultural sector, the forestry sector, and other sectors that they are not as important or as critical to this province. I know that members would say: no; we support all of these sectors. I urge members to show that support by accepting this amendment.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any hon. members wishing to join debate on amendment A1? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung has risen.

Mr. Dach: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I want to lend my support to this debate and move other members, hopefully, to vote in favour of the amendment. I concur with the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview in bringing forward this amendment to very much make clear the importance of other sectors in our economy, particularly the agricultural and forestry industries, which are often seen as the second cousins to the leading light, our oil and gas industry, in Alberta.

That can no longer be because as we see the transition, a generational shift from fossil fuels over time, over the next couple of decades, our agricultural and forestry industries are going to have to take up a lot of the economic space in this province that right now is occupied by oil and gas. We should do everything possible to make sure that the prominence of agriculture and forestry is brought to the forefront as we promote the industries that they are in terms of extraction of renewable materials, in terms of trees and growth in agriculture, but also in value-added processing and artificial intelligence and developing new genomic structures, whether it be in crops or in cattle or hogs or other forms of animal husbandry. There's unlimited potential in our agricultural and forestry industries, which I think should be heralded at every opportunity.

This is one small way, in adopting this amendment, Mr. Speaker, that we could demonstrate that we see agriculture and forestry as industries that are on an equal footing and share equal prominence in the minds of, certainly, the opposition but hopefully also government members and that we should always take the opportunity to elevate agriculture and forestry and other industries on top of our oil and gas industry. I think that including them specifically in this amendment is an important step in that direction, and I fully encourage all members to actually go ahead and adopt the amendment because we don't want to be leaving out industries as an afterthought that really are going to become more and more important over the next two or three decades.

They are important now – I certainly agree with that – but they are going to be increasingly important over time, and we should take every effort to make note of that and herald their prominence because more and more Albertans are going to be relying upon jobs in the value-added component of agriculture as well as in forestry, Mr. Speaker. Both are definitely at the forefront or on the verge of lots of innovation and technological advancements that will spring forward new products and innovations, that will hopefully result in new markets being opened for Alberta products.

I think that if indeed we play our cards right and don't continue doing some things that this government is doing, such as axing 51 full-time equivalent positions from the Agriculture and Forestry ministry, we can actually maybe develop some of these products in collaboration with the private sector but also maintain our scientific capacity within the ministry. There are some things that this government is doing that are basically dumbing down ministries by cutting budgets to scientists within the ministries, that I don't agree with because it diminishes the capacity of, particularly, our agriculture and forestry industries to collaborate with the private sector, and that's a wrong direction to go in.

I think that with this amendment, we correct another small wrong-directional step that this government is making so that we can draw attention to the prominence of our agricultural industry, our forestry industry. They should be in lockstep with the oil and gas industry in this province so that we don't lose sight that all of these industries are a team, that they're in tandem. Ministries and this government should be collaborating so that one benefits the other at all times.

With that, I'll encourage all members in the House to support the amendment. I hope that we see shirts of many colours, of many industries, hopefully made with Alberta hemp, worn in this House whenever the occasion is permitted by the Speaker's office but certainly, though, not displayed in the windows of the Legislature, which are sacrosanct and nonpartisan, flat spaces to be left alone.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available.

Seeing none, are there any other members wishing to speak to the amendment? I see the hon. Minister of Transportation has risen.

Mr. McIver: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm going to speak on the amendment. Let me say that the amendment seems reasonable. I would imagine that all members of this House support our agricultural industry, our forestry industry, our renewable industry, our technology sector, and are happy with clothing that expresses those sentiments, and though it's not mentioned here, I'm sure that we also support the growth of the hemp industry.

Mr. Speaker, we're going to support this. We're going to support this because basically we agree with the words in it. If there's any hesitation that we have, it's because to some degree – I think you might even agree, and maybe even the mover might agree to some extent – it could be seen as watering down the message of the government motion. But in the spirit of hoping to have a unanimous vote of support for our energy industry and now our other major industries, we think that's an important message.

It's an important message to send on behalf of Albertans, and it's an important message to send on the day that a new cabinet is sworn in in Ottawa, a message from the Legislature in Alberta to that new cabinet, with a new mandate. Even the old ministers are new because they have a new mandate, so in that case all that's old is new. The government is of the opinion that a message of this nature, of solidarity, to our federal government and all Canadians is a positive message and one that we sincerely hope will get – one should never presume the vote of a Legislative Assembly of Alberta, Mr. Speaker, as you know. I think that we actually have rules against that. Nonetheless, let me just say that I currently live in hope that we will get a unanimous vote on this because it is a message that very much needs to be sent to Ottawa and all across Canada on this day.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available should anybody be looking to take that opportunity.

Seeing none, are there any other members that wish to speak to amendment A1?

[Motion on amendment A1 carried]

The Acting Speaker: Moving back to Government Motion 28 proper, are there any members wishing to speak on this motion? I see the hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon has caught my eye.

Mr. Smith: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I wanted to just take a few minutes here to talk about the benefits of this motion. You know, coming from Drayton Valley-Devon, I have the privilege of being at the heart of the oil industry in Alberta. It's where Leduc No. 1 first came in, and it's the area of Alberta that first exhibited the boom that we have in our modern oil industry today. So I wanted to speak to this just for a few minutes.

"Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly express its support for . . . [the oil industry]." Mr. Speaker, I don't think it takes much to be able to see that the oil industry has been the foundation of modern Alberta. It's created prosperous communities, prosperous business communities like Acheson in my constituency. It's the oil and gas industry that has created the need for drillers and welders and operators and electricians. It's the oil and gas industry that has provided the incentive for entrepreneurs to create the companies that have helped to harvest this wealth that we have in this province.

Mr. Speaker, we should with great pride be able to stand up and speak to this motion, everyone in the House. We understand that when we wear a T-shirt, when we wear a hoodie that proclaims the oil and gas industry, this is something that should be encouraged. When we look at the policies of the federal government and the nation, as we look at this oil and gas industry, we need to double and redouble our efforts in this Legislature and as Albertans to support the oil industry and all of the industries that are in Alberta.

Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to stand today to say that I support this motion and that I will be voting in favour of it.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak on this motion? I'm seeing no one. Oh, I see the hon. Member for Grande Prairie.

Mrs. Allard: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It seems there's a little bit of confusion, but I'm happy to rise and speak in support of this motion. Also, it's lovely to see the Assembly agree today. That's a nice, refreshing change. I can envision us all in a Team Alberta T-shirt or something.

Anyway, I do want to speak specifically to the oil and gas industry although I certainly appreciate the comments from the member opposite with respect to the other industries that are hurting, in particular agriculture. I know that in my area of the province there are some real challenges with respect to crops wilting in the fields under the heavy, wet snow. I certainly appreciate those comments and would stand in agreement that the agricultural industry at this time in our history is struggling, but I will focus my comments on the oil and gas industry this afternoon and the importance of oil and gas to Alberta and for my constituency of Grande Prairie, certainly a foundation to our economic stability and the wealth generation of my region.

We are blessed in the city of Grande Prairie and the surrounding area, the Peace region, to enjoy a diversified economy, with oil and gas, forestry, and agriculture as the primary pillars. Through development and investment in these industries Grande Prairie has become a northern hub for our province, creating further expansion and affording our residents an average wage-earning that is significantly higher than the provincial average. The city of Grande Prairie, located in the heart of the Montney and Duvernay oil and gas formations, has become the central hub for housing, health care, recreation, shopping, and services that are needed to support and retain the labour force of this expanding economy. Indeed, there have been multiple times since 1997, when my family settled in Grande Prairie as entrepreneurs and job creators, that our economy grew so quickly that access to the labour force required for expansion was critically short. I can tell you that in light of the times that we're experiencing now, that would be a lovely problem to have again.

Mr. Speaker, my generation has enjoyed the best quality of life that any generation in Canada has been afforded. I believe Canada is truly the greatest country in the world, bar none. As a proud Canadian I believe it is my duty to stand up for Canadian oil and gas, and as a proud Albertan I certainly stand up today for Alberta's oil and gas sector.

Energy scarcity creates significant lack, Mr. Speaker. Without access to sufficient energy you don't have clean water, reliable food, shelter, schools, hospitals, critical infrastructure. I just wanted to highlight – I pulled up some facts on oil and gas for Canada – that in 2018 the oil and gas industry employed more than 269,000 Canadians and indirectly supported over 550,000 jobs in the Canadian economy. That's 550,000 families with employment. Canada's energy sector accounts for over 11 per cent of our gross domestic product. Government revenues from energy were $14.1 billion in 2017. That's an astounding number. I could go on, but I don't think we need to hear the statistics or just the messages.

Alberta and Canada have an abundant endowment of resources, and our nation has built its standard of living on creating value by delivering resources to the world through our fish, forestry, grain, potash, electricity, fertilizer, food, and so much more. Resource-export economies rely on efficient transportation to reach markets, between provinces, to the U.S. and overseas. Canada's energy industry has been built on supplying Canadians and Americans with reliable, affordable energy. We need to continue to build new transportation facilities, pipelines, and other production facilities to serve those markets in an open and competitive way. I rise today to stand up for our energy industry and to speak out one more time against the destructive policies of the Trudeau Liberals such as bills C-48 and C-69.

Beyond North America, the strongest growth market in the world is Asia, where Canada and Alberta can play an important role in providing responsibly developed natural gas and oil. Alberta and Canada need to create the conditions to efficiently and safely build the pipelines, LNG plants, and ports to ship to overseas markets. By supplying responsible energy to Asia, Canada can grow our economy, create prosperity in the communities where energy is produced, along the transportation routes, and at the export communities as well. This development will also greatly help indigenous communities build the capacity of their youth as valuable contributors to society and as potential owners of Canada's energy production.

I could go on and on and on, but I just wanted to say, Mr. Speaker, that even in this economic downturn I've had the pleasure of attending many different fundraisers in my community. Over and over and over again the oil and gas sector has come to the aid of our community, has donated significantly: last year, at the hospital foundation gala, $750,000 from CNRL – that's remarkable – in support of the hospital foundation, which is a legacy gift. When you give to the hospital foundation, AHS then continues that service or that equipment in perpetuity. I think that's incredible. Without prosperity in our communities, whether it's from oil and gas or agriculture or forestry or other industries, we don't have additional, abundant funds to give to other initiatives to support our communities. I wanted to give some examples.

Another company that operates in Grande Prairie and Calgary, Seven Generations, in 2018 alone gave over 5,000 volunteer hours in the communities where they operate. They contributed over $1,228,000 to different initiatives. I could read the list. It is a staggering list: initiatives like women's shelters, the SPCA, the hospital foundation, so many interesting ones, indigenous veterans day, Hythe Minor Hockey, the Humane Society, on and on and on it goes. That's the kind of thing that happens when our economy is working properly.

So I stand today in support of oil and gas. I stand today primarily in support of Alberta. I stand firmly on Team Alberta, and I hope our federal Liberals and their new cabinet are listening to the needs of Alberta.

Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Member for Calgary-McCall has risen to speak.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to speak in favour of this motion as amended urging our support for the oil and gas industry. I think that there is no question that it's one of the most important industries that we have in our province. It has generated wealth and prosperity for all Albertans, for all Canadians for decades, and it continues to play an important role in our economy, in our prosperity, and in the services that we enjoy and, I guess, the standard of living we have in our province.

I think that there are two things that I want to say. The government side always wants to say and portray us as if we don't support our oil and gas industry and that they are the champions of this industry. What I want to say is that as an Albertan, like, personally I'm a part owner of this resource, and those whom I represent are part owners of this wealth and this resource, and collectively we all represent Albertans, who own this resource. We can disagree on how best we can develop these resources. We can disagree about policies, but one thing is for sure, that as owners we have a vested interest in making sure that our resource sector or resources, this wealth, is managed in a way that is sustainable and generates prosperity for Albertans today and for generations to come.

One thing that I wanted to get out of the way is that we as Albertans, we as owners, we as representatives of the owners support this industry, and we have a vested interest in developing these resources in a sustainable manner so that we can all benefit from this resource and this wealth. That's why we are supporting this motion.

We also brought forward an amendment that reflects that we also support other clothing supporting Alberta's industries, all other industries. We do know that oil and gas is an important industry, but we do have potential. We have other industries that with the right support can thrive as well, and they are thriving. Agriculture supports our daily living, food, and generates a lot of employment as well. We have an emerging tech sector. We have other industries as well that we need to focus on and that are also important for many reasons, including that we need to diversify our economy as well so that we are not reliant on one industry at all times.

Third, I want to also mention that I think these symbolic gestures are important, but in order to support our industry, we need to take concrete steps in addressing the issues facing our industry. What I have heard so far from industry, from my colleagues, from my previous experience in government is that the number one issue that our industry is facing is market access and takeaway capacity. Even right now our industry has enough production capacity that without additional investment we still produce more than what our takeaway capacity is. When we were in government, we supported this industry. We focused on issues; we focused on concerns that industry brought to us. That was the reason we supported the Trans Mountain pipeline. We supported line 3. We supported Keystone XL. In fact, when we started, there were 4 in 10 Canadians who supported the Trans Mountain project. The then Premier and now Leader of the Official Opposition went coast to coast to build a case for the Trans Mountain pipeline. As a result of that advocacy, now there are 7 in 10 Canadians who support that project. It was because of our stance on this project that the federal government ended up purchasing this project, and now we are seeing construction on this project. Same thing with line 3. So nothing can be further from the truth, that we don't support the oil and gas industry. We have a vested interest in supporting this industry as representatives of the owners of this resource and as part owners of this resource.

I'm glad to support this motion, but at the same time I would urge the government to move beyond these symbolic gestures and focus on issues that are facing our industry. Work with industry to find new markets. Work with industry to build takeaway capacity. When we were faced with takeaway capacity issues, we worked with industry, and we brought forward oil-by-rail contracts that would have increased our takeaway capacity by 120,000 barrels per day, that would have generated $2 billion in revenues. What this government did because somewhere in the campaign they said that they would reverse everything that we were doing: without thinking, without consulting anybody, they cancelled those contracts as early as May. Because of that ideological decision, now Albertans are on the hook for $1.5 billion in penalties. We haven't seen any takeaway capacity that has been created under this government, so they need to focus on those issues. All we are seeing is the Energy Centre, which we have asked about. How will it help us with the issues that our energy sector is facing? We have not heard anything. That centre does not have a business plan. That centre doesn't have any employees, no strategic plan whatsoever.

I'm supporting this motion and urging this government to focus on issues that our energy sector is facing. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. I see that the hon. Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland has risen to speak.

Mr. Getson: Yeah. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I just got back from doing some other business across the way and was a little out of breath but had a chance to catch my breath and hear something that was fantastic. It looks like we're agreeing to a motion, both parties, to support the oil and gas sector. In addition, the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview has put an amendment that we've accepted here, and it includes other industries. To me, this is fantastic. Honestly, this is fantastic despite some of the language that might have pulled us into the ditch and got us scrapping again and fighting back and forth about who did what and when and ideological statements. I think the public record is clear on that one. I think the Alberta population voted well in favour of a group that actually does what they say, not just wearing T-shirts once in a while but backing it up. But I don't want to digress and go into that, either.

I was really happy with the agriculture industry because I was a farm kid. That's what I grew up with. That's the first thing that we started on, obviously, raising cattle and doing that. The supplement that we had for diversification: a little family sawmill. In the winter time we'd get a small forestry permit, we would log off those areas, and by doing that as a small business, we employed a bunch of the local folks as well, and then we'd saw up that lumber. So that ties in exactly with what I grew up doing.

Renewable energy? While I was at Enbridge, we actually put up 350 windmills, so we had renewable energy as well tying into the power sector. Again, that was driven there. Technology? Well, I happened to work for another local company that put in the first lease road to Leduc No. 1. That was their history. Ledcor started out from that, and that company ended up growing and branching into pipeline divisions, industrial divisions, electrical divisions, road maintenance. They also had this one thing that we were putting in, fibre optics, so again understanding technology and dealing with that.

I'm actually really, really happy to be able to stand up and support the amendment that was put forward and to be able to actually show our support for that sector. There were over 180,000 people that lost their jobs, and unfortunately the radio and media play that we got at that time was down in Ontario with 2,500 people working in an auto plant taking priority. Obviously, sending this clear message as a group from this Legislative Assembly, that we are standing together, that we are standing up for those folks – we're proud to say that we produce the best, ethical energy in the world, not just wearing T-shirts once in a while but actually saying it and meaning it out there, so walking the walk as well.

I appreciate it, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you. Two minutes and 50 seconds left under 29(2)(a).

Seeing none, are there any other hon. members wishing to speak to Government Motion 28.

Seeing none, I'm prepared to ask the question. I will give the opportunity to the Minister of Transportation to close debate on behalf of the Government House Leader if he should so choose.

Mr. McIver: Thank you. On behalf of the Government House Leader and Minister of Environment and Parks I just wanted to say thank you to all members of the House for what I can't be sure but am hoping will be a positive vote all the way around. I will just reiterate that this is an important day to do that. There's a new cabinet in Ottawa. This is a good message for us as a Legislative Assembly to send to Ottawa and across the country.

I will stop talking now and hope we achieve what I just talked about.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

[Government Motion 28 as amended carried]

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

The Deputy Chair: I would like to call the committee to order.

Bill 20
Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, 2019

The Deputy Chair: Currently, we have before us amendment A2 as brought forward by the hon. Minister of Culture, Multiculturalism and Status of Women. Are there any questions, comments, with regard to this amendment? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs has risen to speak on this amendment.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Chair. It's my absolute honour to rise this afternoon in the House to speak to the amendment to Bill 20, the Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, 2019. This amendment, I think, is something that we absolutely can be in favour of. I think it's wonderful that government has listened to industry, has listened to myself as the critic for culture as well as many members on this side of the House. It's been something that we've been asking for for quite some time, and I believe that this is a good first step when it comes to supporting the incredible film industry that we have here in the province.

I do, Mr. Chair, worry that it might not go far enough. We have heard from industry that they weren't consulted prior to the introduction of the tax credit, either about the transition from the grant or about the grant itself, despite many claims from government that they had had robust consultation. During estimates we were here and going through the culture budget, and we had over 50 members from the film industry that came to watch the estimates. I have to say that it was absolutely an honour to be able to be the representative and the voice in that meeting. I was able to meet with many in industry, from all over the province, well before the budget was tabled, hearing their concerns, hearing what they felt were absolutely necessities to be included in the budget.

Then to see the budget and to see that what was being proposed would have completely destroyed industry – like I said, I'm happy to support this. I think it's a good first step, but it's something that I think still needs to actually have ongoing consultation with industry. We've heard a lot of fear from industry. Part of my job I see as being able to be the voice of industry. I had so many come to me expressing concern about being penalized by government and just being completely fearful of putting their name to any of their remarks or any of their comments out of fear of some sort of consequence or being punished, because the system that's available right now is a juried system, so that directly could impact their production. If they submitted an application, there was a real fear, I would say, of being denied that process. We were accused of spreading unnecessary fear, but now we know that those fears the industry had, that there would have been no money, were founded.

This amendment allows for changing of the dates for immediate applications through a new intake process, the Assembly was told last night by the Minister of Culture, Multiculturalism and Status of Women. Previously, under the way it was written, there would have been no new applications until at least April 1, 2020. We heard very clearly from industry that this would completely destroy the progress that has been made in this province. We heard over and over of producers, productions that were leaving the province. They were going to provinces like B.C., where they have a wonderful system in place that supports industry. As this was happening in estimates, people were on social media, people were in the next room talking about this, that people were physically leaving, making decisions to leave the province while the estimates were occurring. I was accused of causing fear. It wasn't based on my comments; it was based on the responses from the minister.

It's an unsettling feeling, knowing that you've been reaching out and you've been desperately pleading for an industry that has such an incredible impact here in our province, not just with the sharing of stories about the beautiful people of Alberta, our history, the use of our incredible landscapes throughout the province but the jobs, Mr. Chair. I think that's something that is essential when we're talking about what the film and screen industry means. There are so many employment opportunities. I spoke yesterday in the House in my member's statement, comparing one person's experience of working in the oil field on a rig to working in a production. It really can be a wonderful opportunity for those that are seeking to diversify their employment to come work with the film industry.

Some of the jobs that the screen industry creates: if you would grant me the opportunity, I would just like to list a few that are impacted. Jobs are employed in this industry. We have electricians, accountants, drivers, chefs, mechanics, environmental scientists, photographers, lawyers, hair and makeup stylists, clothing designers, carpenters, editors, sound designers, heavy equipment operators, project managers, logistical co-ordinators, paramedics, gardeners, animal trainers, of course actors, CGI artists, interior designers, security guards, students, visual effects artists. Mr. Chair, those are just simply a few of the jobs that are available and created by the screen industry, and I know that something that Albertans are looking for is jobs. We want to be able to create an economy that is working, and we want to have a diversified economy, and they're already doing it.

To see that there's been an amendment proposed that is going to support the film industry, I think, is incredible, and it's definitely a good step forward. It's a show of good faith, if you will. It's a little bit discouraging to know that yesterday in the House the minister had indicated that she was so pleased that her colleague the Minister of Economic Development, Trade and Tourism was meeting with industry after the budget had been tabled. This all could have simply been avoided had they been actually meeting with the industry prior to the budget. I know myself as the culture critic, as soon as I was appointed to this role, it was something that I did immediately. I had people reaching out to me from all over the province, from many different industries, not just in film, wanting to be able to share their story and share their concerns.

Mr. Chair, they have an incredible story to tell. There are so many different projects that are happening in the province right now, like Ghostbusters, a project that is impacting rural Alberta. It's hotels. It's food. It's the sets, the building of the sets, the crews that are world-renowned. We have them here in Alberta, and if those people leave the province, they're not going to come back.

To be able to maintain our screen industry here in the province is absolutely essential, and I think that this amendment is a wonderful first step to do that. I think it gives a message to industry that they're heard, that our fighting on this side of the House as the Official Opposition has an impact when community, like this industry, comes together and has their collective voice heard and we're able to share it in estimates in this House. Whenever we're talking to people, it has an impact.

For everybody that came to me and shared their story, whether they were wanting to do it anonymously or whether they wanted to be proud of their story and put their name to it, I am so, so grateful. I want to thank them because without their words and their story, we wouldn't be here today. I'm only effective as opposition when I have people reaching out to me, telling me their stories, and despite the fear, so many were able to come forward and share that.

I sincerely hope that this is a first step of working with industry and that there is a commitment from this government to move forward in consultation with them. When we're looking at the policies and the regulations that they're referring to, I believe that we need to go to the experts, and those experts are industry, and they're more than willing to help provide information and solutions. You can do a cross-jurisdictional scan to look at what some of the other provinces in the country are doing, and it speaks volumes with the success of those screen industries.

I think that when we looked at what the concern was with this plan, there was not a lot of communication that was happening from government to industry, so seeing this as a signal, I think, is a really great thing. I know that part of my commitment and the commitment on this side of the House is to continue to monitor to make sure that there's progress in this and to make sure that government is meeting with many from industry, not just a select few. There are so many that I've heard from that have said that they want their voice shared, and they have a lot of value to add to this conversation. There's a lot of experience here in the province, with incredible people that love Alberta, and they're pleading. They want to be able to stay in the province, and I hope that this government is taking that seriously.

When we look at all of the impacts that the screen industry has in the province when it comes to our economy, when it comes to creating jobs, good, mortgage-paying jobs, I think it's absolutely essential that we continue the conversation. I know that this side of the House is going to be holding the government to account and paying attention with this credit as it moves forward. I know that so many are going to continue to reach out and let us know if they're not being heard because this is something that is an expectation of Albertans. When you're making decisions about their industry and how it's going to impact them, they absolutely should be consulted in that process. Seeing this, I think, is a good step.

I'm very, very proud of the advocacy that industry has done when they've come together and held town halls and information-sharing sessions. They're working on educating about what the industry means to Alberta. There's an organization called Keep Alberta Rolling, and they share amazing stories about the impacts that film has in this province, and it's something that is shared world-wide, Mr. Chair. Alberta is known for some of the most striking scenes in the country. People from all over the world want to come here and film here, not just because of the scenery, which is spectacular, but because of the crews that we have here. They know that when they have a production in Alberta, we have world-renowned crews that are there. They're of the utmost professional standing, and they're committed to this industry. They love their province just like we do, and they want to stay here.

I think that knowing that government is taking this seriously and moving this amendment – I would hope that all members of the House would support this, and I would encourage government to continue to advocate for the film industry and all of the many benefits that it has across many different industries in the province. It's not just the film. Like I mentioned, all of those other working professions that work within this industry have a huge impact.

We know that it's important that as we're moving forward with however this rolls out, because there is reference that ongoing consultation is going to need to occur, and they need some form of flexibility because they understand that industry has many different needs – to me, that means working with industry itself and continuing to listen to the people that work in this field and offer solutions. They come to us with solutions about what's best for their industry, and I think that as elected officials the least we can do is to listen to that and to do our best to make sure that that's something that's happening, which would keep us competitive and keep film coming to our province. It's essential.

I'm very, very honoured to be able to stand and say that we had a part in this, that our side of the House kept asking those hard questions that industry wasn't getting answers to and kept telling those stories of the so many that have been impacted by this budget and just the freezing of the money that was flowing. I'm very proud of the work that we've done, and, Mr. Chair, I'm very proud to say that I'm going to continue, as I know many colleagues on this side of the House are going to continue to do, to keep Alberta rolling.

With that, for now I think I'll wrap up my comments. I would just like to encourage industry to continue to share their voice and to continue to reach out to government and ask to be consulted with, demand to be consulted with. We're paying attention, we're watching, and we're here to fight alongside them. Overall, I would really encourage that everyone in this House support the film industry and support the amendment to this bill.

Thank you.

5:30

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other hon. members wishing to speak to this amendment? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview has risen.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. It's my honour to rise and speak to this amendment. I'll make some general comments, and then I want to respond to some comments the minister of culture made yesterday evening in regard to this amendment. Now, the amendment fixes some of the problems that are in the bill as it currently exists. The minister knows that this came from two places; number one, comments that we've made as far as the challenges. We heard directly from industry as far as the limitations of the film tax credit.

Now, I do just want to share – you know, I've said this before in this Chamber – that I am supportive of a film tax credit. I can tell you that our government had debated and discussed the film tax credit and were close to being able to get it over the finish line. The reality is that we didn't, and I wish that we would have, but I will give credit where credit is due. I'm pleased that this current government has introduced a tax credit.

We signalled very early on and in estimates especially the challenge with no intake. The intake has been paused since the election, Mr. Chair, and the problem is that until this amendment came forward, new applicants wouldn't be considered until after April 1 of 2020, so there was a gap. The problem is that industry has said that with this gap it's not just a small pause or delay. It basically is the difference between films coming to Alberta or going to another jurisdiction. That interruption has huge consequences. Industry has been incredible, incredible advocates. I want to thank my colleague the Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs, who's been a very vocal champion for the film industry.

I'll give a little bit of history on this, Mr. Chair. The program that was in place for many, many years had some challenges with it. It was a grant. It was meant for small cultural film industries and projects. It had a few challenges. Our government tried to – we increased the amount of funds that were available because there was a backlog of projects. Now, a backlog of projects is actually a good problem to have. What it means is that there's a significant demand for projects to come to the province of Alberta. We know that these are good jobs. We know the impact the film industry has, especially on small communities, rural communities: hotels being booked up and full, restaurants being busy. I mean, the amount of money that comes to the province through the filming of a series or a show or a feature film is significant, and Alberta has trailed behind other jurisdictions for many years. Again, we talk about levelling the playing field. Why? You look at the film industry in British Columbia, and it is massive, a massive contributor. It is one of the pillars of their diversified economy. I believe that Alberta can compete but with the same or similar and the right tools.

The film industry had asked us to keep the cultural grant that's used for smaller productions but also to introduce a film tax credit. Now, the way that this was first introduced by this current government was: get rid of the cultural one; bring in the film tax credit but at the same level as a small cultural grant. Well, Mr. Chair, that didn't solve either problem. That actually created a new problem because the larger shows, whether it's The Revenant that was filmed here in Alberta or other shows that are, you know, Time Warner, Hollywood movies, require a much larger tax credit or break to level the playing field, to make Alberta competitive compared to, again, other jurisdictions and what they offer.

You know, in hindsight I wish our government could have got it over the finish line, but we didn't. Happy to see this move forward. Again, for me the challenge with this amendment – and I'm glad that the government is amending this piece of legislation before it goes through. I can tell you stories, Mr. Chair. Before most members were in this Chamber, there were examples of the previous government from 2012 to 2015 that would make amendments to a piece of legislation, the House would vote it through, and six months later they would bring back a different bill amending the same piece of legislation. Once, it happened three different times, which tells me that there wasn't an adequate level of consultation to solve the challenges or fix the existing legislation all in one shot. I appreciate that we haven't voted this through and now in spring go: oh boy, here are some challenges.

Now, I do want to talk a little bit about some of the comments the minister of culture had made last night that, quite frankly, are incorrect. I have the Blues. I don't have Hansard at the moment, Mr. Chair, but talking about how the minister made a comment that "The previous government was not listening to the industry and severely mishandled the previous grant program, leaving our government . . . a mess to clean up." Well, that's not true. We did listen to industry and consulted with industry significantly. I can tell you that this amendment is coming now, after the film industry blasted the current government based on estimates when the Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs and I talked to the Minister of Economic Development, Trade and Tourism over and over again about this film tax credit and the flaws or the challenges that existed with it in its current state.

I do appreciate that the minister did say that since the budget was tabled, the minister of economic development and trade has been meeting with industry. Great. My request is: please meet with industry before you bring in pieces of legislation that impact that industry. Since it was introduced, they started meeting with the film industry. Well, ideally, I think, Mr. Chair, the industry said: "No. Meet with us before you plan to make sweeping changes, not after." Thankfully, their voice was loud enough and they were persistent enough to be able to get the minister's attention and say: here are some challenges with the bill.

Now, I can tell you, Mr. Chair, that I was very proud on one of my trade missions. In fact, in November 2016 I was proud to lead the largest trade delegation the province of Alberta has ever led in its history. There were over 86 different businesses and business organizations that accompanied me to Asia. A number of companies came from the film industry. Again, one of the roles, in my opinion, of government is to act as a convener or a way to bring people together. A number of film crews, along with AMPA, sat down with the minister of film and trade and television in the Guangdong province. Now, that individual has now been elevated in the Chinese government. He's actually now the minister for the country in charge of all film, radio, and television. It was incredible to work with him, a gentleman full of life who loves Alberta. He loves Banff, and he loves Canada. Alberta is his favourite province.

We worked together to develop a sister partnership between Alberta and Guangdong. In fact, that's Alberta's second sister partnership in the country of China. For context for members, the province of Guangdong is responsible for one-fifth of China's GDP, similar to Alberta and its relation to Canada. Guangdong is one of their economic engines. It's a powerhouse in the country and actually an absolutely beautiful province. I recommend to all to visit there, but I digress a little bit. The meeting happened between the minister and the film industry, and they were very interested. They signed MOUs that came from that meeting looking at ways to collaborate. I believe the highest number of tourists in the world come out of China. There are a significant number that come to Canada. We want to encourage that and grow that even more.

Mr. Chair, I mean, my point is that we've been working with the film industry to look at what they present as far as opportunities: an opportunity to help diversify the Alberta economy, an opportunity to strengthen the Alberta economy. They employ many men and women throughout the province. This change, this amendment to the bill, is positive in that it fills that gap.

You know, my hope is, as the Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs had also said, that this consultation now, this dialogue that is happening between the government and the film industry will continue and will continue so that the minister and this government will continue to monitor what is going on in the film industry and make changes.

Now, I appreciate some of what the minister of culture said. There's going to be much in the regulations. I know that legislation sets out a framework, and I appreciate that having some of the details and regulations just means that if tweaks need to happen, it's more expedient. I get that. I mean, I have challenges when, you know, legislation is paper thin and everything is in a regulation, but in this case, to be able to be a little nimble: that I do appreciate.

With this, I can tell you, again, Mr. Chair, the different changes that this makes, the two – and I appreciate that. We're not going to have this gap in funds for the film industry between the election here, in 2019 to 2020, which was one of the issues the film industry had, the message that that sends. That will be amended in this amendment, which I appreciate and so does the film industry. The second area that this amendment helps is removing the cap. There was a maximum cap of 22 per cent that will now be what's prescribed in the available circumstances for the film. That's what I believe was used in the original grant program, but that's what industry also was asking for. Now, what I'd like to see is the tax credits to be ongoing but also to increase their amount because, again, in order to compete to bring the really large blockbuster films to Alberta, we need to be able to compete with the other jurisdictions and their film tax credits.

Again, for me, I would have loved to have seen a continuation of the grant program, but you narrow the amount and the scope so that it's available for those smaller cultural films, which are really, really important, but also allowing Alberta the opportunity those big film sectors. So, Mr. Chair, with that, again, I encourage the government to continue to engage with industry.

Now, what's interesting and my final point here, Mr. Speaker, is that once again there is a little bit of doublespeak going on in the sense that the film tax credit is okay, but the investor tax credit and the interactive digital media tax credit, well, those ones aren't okay.

They're boutique. I mean, unfortunately the message that this government has sent to those industries is that: "You're not important. We're not interested in the tech sector. We're not interested in attracting Albertans to invest or derisk Albertans investing in companies in their own backyard." You can't say that boutique tax credits are not good because they're boutique and then at the same time support one of the boutique tax credits. You either support tax credits that are working and provide a return on investment like those others ones – the investor, the capital investment, and the interactive digital media – in addition to the film tax credit, but picking the film over the others is exactly what the government says it doesn't do, which is picking winners and losers.

The investor tax credit was sector-wide. It was open to every single sector of the economy, not one specific sector or another. If anything, the film tax credit is more boutique than the investor tax credit. So my hope, Mr. Chair, is that the government will look at the film tax credit, see the value that it's going to provide, how it's going to help level the playing field, attract investment to Alberta, and then look at the investor tax credit and the interactive digital media, and my hope – and I will continue to press this government – is to bring them back in some form to tell the tech community and start-ups that we support homegrown Alberta companies. We also want to attract investment into Alberta companies, and the best tool to do that is an investor tax credit.

So I urge the government to look at the success of this program, at other tax credits that will help diversify the economy, attract investment, grow our Alberta companies, which will in turn create jobs, support the GDP, and get Alberta back on track. Thank you very much, Mr. Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members looking to speak to amendment A2?

[Motion on amendment A2 carried]

The Deputy Chair: Are there any members wishing to speak to Bill 20? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: It's the Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview show this afternoon. As the hon. Minister of Transportation knows, brevity is not my strength although, you know, this is the time to talk about the benefits and challenges of different legislation.

My comments on Bill 20. Again, I appreciate that we did just unanimously pass the amendment that amends the film tax credit. I want to outline some of the concerns I have with the removal of other tax credits that were working, Mr. Chair. We know, for example, the investor tax credit: a 3 to 1 return on investment in the province over the past couple of years. This is a new thing, to stand up the investor tax credit. Other jurisdictions like British Columbia have had one since 1985. It's helped diversify the economy.

Mr. Chair, here's how it helps. Start-ups and small companies are riskier investments than, say, you know, looking at a blue-chip company that's been around for a significantly long period of time. They have a larger market capitalization. They'll have everything from retained earnings to significant cash in the bank. Hopefully, the companies don't have too much debt. But for start-ups, when they're first getting off the ground – I mean, most entrepreneurs will start with their own funds and then go to friends and family.

The challenge, Mr. Chair, is that once a company has exhausted those funds, they now need to look at raising money through, well, the market or going to a broader circle. At that point a lot of angel investors won't necessarily look at a company because they're in between being – well, they're often too small at that point, and they'll struggle to get an angel investor. The other thing is that the companies at that point don't need massive amounts of new investment. I know angel investors that won't look at companies that can't use a million dollars or more. They're not at that place where they need that sum of money.

Mr. Chair, what happens is that there's a gap between, you know, using your friends and family, equity that you've raised, and going out to do your series A. What the investor tax credit did was fill that gap so that a company could very easily, despite what some members opposite have said – the information is not accurate when they say that it was cumbersome and burdensome to fill out an application for the investor tax credit. We got it down to I believe it was two pages, a simpler process.

Now, part of the reason why there is an application process: there has to be oversight. In fact, I don't think anybody on the other side would say: "Yeah. You know what? For any company that claims they're an Alberta company, that is incorporated, that doesn't have to prove that they have any Alberta employees, sure, we should just give them money." I think we would see ourselves in a position where we'd be taken for a ride by individuals that would claim that they are an Alberta company and wouldn't be. So there needs to be some oversight. But I can tell you, Mr. Chair, that when we first introduced the investor tax credit, one of the challenges of the program – and this was brand new – was that the application process was a little bit slow, and we heard that from industry. I'm very proud that we in very short order amended the investor tax credit. We simplified the application process because we listened to companies who said, "You need to make this more simple," so we did.

That investor tax credit, Mr. Chair, enables companies to go out and try to raise equity but offer an individual like you or I or any member in this Chamber or any Albertan a 30 per cent tax credit on the money that they invest in the company in addition to whatever equity stake they get. Knowing that you're getting 30 per cent of the money you invest back automatically, regardless of the outcome or the future of that company, makes it more enticing to invest in that company.

Now, we know that Albertans work really hard for their money. Whether you're saving in a tax-free savings account or your RRSPs, you want to be prudent with your money. You don't want to make risky investments. The challenge with a lot of start-ups is that they are riskier because they aren't established and they're new, but these are where all of the best ideas come from. Being able to support Alberta companies through an injection of investment because we had an investor tax credit: that's significant.

We know that that has helped hundreds of companies to grow at a much quicker rate. Isn't that what we want? Aren't we trying to help support the economy and support entrepreneurs and businesses? Well, that tax credit did just that, and I know that the government has access to the information to see that it was a 3 to 1 investment. Around $95 million from the Alberta investor tax credit attracted close to $300 million of investment. Sorry. We conditionally approved about $30 million of investor tax credits that leveraged close to $100 million of follow-on investment. A 3 to 1 return on investment is significant.

You know, Mr. Chair, I have an issue when the minister of economic development and trade makes the comment: well, that only helped a couple of hundred companies. I'm sorry, but if we can help a single company to grow and expand, that's good news. To say that the investor tax credit is not as valuable as some other tool I think is insulting to these very companies. It sends the message that if you want to start a company and grow here in Alberta, we're not going to help you; we're going to make it more difficult.

You know, for a government that claims that they want to reduce red tape and grow the economy, here was a tool that was in place that was working and, again, a little bit newer. Part of what takes time, Mr. Chair, is getting the word out to Albertans, "Here is a new tool available at your disposal to invest in Alberta companies" and to spread the word to the Alberta companies that you can now go out and raise capital or raise equity easier, which is, I think, a good thing. For me, the challenge here, one of the challenges with Bill 20, is that it's removed the very tax credits that were working and that were helping grow and support the economy.

I know that the clock will automatically kick us over into the evening, but, for me, I have other points. I mean, that was just the investor tax credit. Part of the investor tax credit was the community economic development corporations, or CEDCs. Now, Mr. Chair, those are corporations that can get set up that provide a social benefit, so for-profit social benefit, which I think is incredible. Within the investor tax credit we consulted heavily with that sector, companies like Momentum and others that would help use that tool to, again, raise equity for companies and clusters of companies under the one corporation that could then raise money to go out and bring a social good in addition to turning a profit for investors.

Mr. Chair, that exists in the province of Nova Scotia. Those tax credits exist in other jurisdictions that we modelled ours on, that were, again, just starting to take off. Unfortunately, I mean, you want to talk about clipping wings? Well, this government just clipped the wings of these tax credits, that were just starting to take flight.

Mr. Chair, the capital investment tax credit: this is a tax credit that helps companies pull the trigger on making investments today and helping the economy recover. What we've seen in the last couple of years is, unfortunately, a number of examples where companies are sitting on their cash reserves and are hesitant to make the decision to invest in either a new facility or an expansion or new equipment. So this capital investment tax credit did that. It was a 10 per cent nonrefundable tax credit that a company could use any time in a 10-year window, up to $5 million.

We conditionally approved $200 million for the capital investment tax credit, that leveraged $2.2 billion of new investment. I know that the government can look at those – they can't refute those numbers because those are the numbers, and they have access to that information. Mr. Chair, $200 million leveraged $2.2 billion, thousands of jobs in communities around the province. That tax credit was working. Again, you know, one of our intentions, had we continued to govern the province of Alberta, would have been to extend those two tax credit programs because they were successful.

For me, what's frustrating is when you have a tool that is helping Alberta businesses and job creators and it gets thrown out or eliminated. For what, Mr. Chair? The province has the funds. I mean, they've chosen a $4.7 billion corporate tax cut over programs that have a track record of supporting companies. Again, the corporate tax cut does not support your small businesses that aren't withdrawing earnings, that are keeping every dollar and putting it back into the business. I know that they know that. Then why? Why eliminate tax credits that are working? It is only by and because of ideology: because they were brought in under the NDP government, therefore they are bad. Well, I think that's naive. I think it's short-sighted.

Again, I appreciate if the government wanted to put its own spin on them, but here's the part that I can't understand, Mr. Chair. They've agreed that the petrochemicals diversification program, that our government introduced, is good and is working. Again, it has attracted investments: you know, Inter Pipeline, investing $3.5 billion northeast of Edmonton; the Canada-Kuwait joint venture, that's attracting $4 billion of investment. For those programs, the government has admitted: "Yes, it's a great program. It's effective. It's doing what the NDP said it was going to do." Again, happy to have those numbers scrutinized. But they attracted investment. Why? Because they levelled the playing field, which is what we said when we introduced them, and half that side voted against them when we were government. Now that they've had a chance to crack the books open and take a look at it, they've decided that these are good.

What I don't understand is how some programs that we introduced you're continuing, yet the tax credits, that were successful, that were just starting to get a significant uptake, you're deciding to eliminate here. You know, Mr. Chair, I'm quite disappointed for those reasons, and this is why I really struggle, even with the film tax credit, to support this bill.

The Deputy Chair: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member. It seemed like perhaps he had notice of finishing a sentence there.

Pursuant to Standing Order 4(4) – obviously, it's 6 p.m. – the chair will leave and return at 7:30 today. From this point until 7:30 today we are recessed.

[The committee adjourned at 6 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

7:30 p.m.

Wednesday, November 20, 2019

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mrs. Pitt in the chair]

The Chair: Hon. members, please be seated.
The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Thank you, Madam Chair. Great to see you tonight. I move that we rise and report progress on Bill 20.

[Motion carried]

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much and good evening, Mr. Speaker. The Committee of the Whole has had under consideration certain bills. The committee reports progress on the following bill: Bill 20. I wish to table copies of all amendments considered by Committee of the Whole on this date for the official records of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Does the Assembly concur in the report? All in favour, please say aye.

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Speaker: Any opposed, please say no. In my opinion, the ayes have it. That motion is so ordered.

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 22 Reform of Agencies, Boards and Commissions and Government Enterprises Act, 2019

Ms Ganley moved that the motion for second reading of Bill 22, Reform of Agencies, Boards and Commissions and Government Enterprises Act, 2019, be amended by deleting all of the words after “that” and substituting the following:

Bill 22, Reform of Agencies, Boards and Commissions and Government Enterprises Act, 2019, be not now read a second time because the Assembly is of the view that dissolving the independent office of the Election Commissioner could have negative impacts on the independence of election administration and the real and perceived integrity of the election process in Alberta.

[Adjourned debate on the amendment November 19: Ms Gray]

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods has approximately zero minutes left. As such, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available if anyone has a brief question or comment perhaps for the hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods to provide her a moment to conclude her thoughts.

Mr. Dach: I just wanted to offer the opportunity to the hon. member to finalize her comments if indeed she had not completed what she wanted to say on the topic.

The Speaker: That is a brief question or comment. I appreciate that from the hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods has the call.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to my colleague. I was, when we were last speaking to Bill 22, referring to the notice of amendment that was moved by my colleague from Calgary.

Given that I have just a few minutes left in the debate on this amendment, I think perhaps I'll just summarize what I had said during the larger portion of time I was given, which is that this amendment does not go far enough. The amendment suggests that all words after “that” be deleted and substituted with the following:

Bill 22 . . . be not now read a second time because the Assembly is of the view that dissolving the independent office of the Election Commissioner could have negative impacts on the independence of election administration and the real and perceived integrity of the election process in Alberta.

I do support this amendment. The reason I feel that this does not go far enough is because there are so many other reasons to not read Bill 22 a second time right now.

Now, as the amendment speaks to, there are some very real risks with the dissolving or terminating of the Election Commissioner. In his statement about this, the existing Election Commissioner stressed that he's concerned about the potential negative impacts on the independence of election administration and the real and perceived integrity of the election process.

And he remarks that Albertans should have trust and confidence that the election laws established by the legislative assembly are being followed and that there are consequences for those who choose not to follow them.

I completely agree with the Election Commissioner in that assessment.

Now, along with the termination of the Election Commissioner, a man who is currently investigating the governing party for election activity around the 2018 leadership race and the 2019 election, Bill 22 also includes dramatic changes to pensions that impact nearly 400,000 Albertans who are part of LAPP, PSPP, SFPP, or the ARTF. AIMCo will become $30 billion greater once all of the funds related to Bill 22 are moved from the ARTF.

I will repeat one of my earlier comments, that I have received over 200 concerned e-mails from teachers who are quite upset at this unilateral decision taken without consultation. I have it on good authority that over 16,000 e-mails from concerned teachers across this province have been sent to MLAs of various constituencies. That is of great concern to me.

As well, the removing of seats from the sponsor boards, removing AUPE's seat, moving that to be management, non-union, is a removal of the voice of workers. As well, by putting on a competency matrix, this government is saying that they do not believe that workers can choose competent people to govern their pensions, so I'm very concerned about that.

Mr. Speaker, I am also concerned about the changes to ATB Financial in changing their mandate because I am concerned that it could mean fewer business loans, fewer supports in rural Alberta, and a change to how ATB manages its business.

I support this amendment, and I hope all members of this Assembly will support this amendment, that will allow Bill 22 to be rethought, that will allow this government to not take action that many are viewing in an incredibly negative light not only here in Alberta but nationally as it has received national attention, and that will allow the existing Election Commissioner to be able to complete all matters relating to the 2018 leadership contest and the 2019 election before any changes are made to this office. I would expect that the governing party, who is such a believer in rule of law, would understand that Albertans are proud to be part of a very strong democracy and that anything that calls into question those democratic systems should not be proceeded with.

Those are my concerns, Mr. Speaker, and I appreciate my colleague for asking me to finalize my thoughts.

The Speaker: Hon. members, 29(2)(a) has expired.

Is there anyone else wishing to speak to the amendment today? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday.

Mr. Carson: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's an honour to rise to be able to share my thoughts on Bill 22, which is before us right now, and, more importantly, my concerns with this legislation, the first concern being the fact that we are debating this Bill 22 at such an incredibly fast rate. I mean, this legislation has not been before us for very long, not enough time, most definitely, for me to share my concerns and hear the concerns or comments from my constituents, which was a comment that was brought up by the Member for Calgary-Mountain View yesterday evening. I share that concern, and I imagine that all of my colleagues do.

I imagine that some of the government members do have concerns with how quickly we are moving with this legislation as well because as the Member for Calgary-Mountain View stated, the fact is that it's one thing for us as members of this Legislature to be able to digest the information that is before us, especially in something as big as this bill is, Bill 22, the omnibus bill that it is, but the other fact is that we need to be able to have an opportunity to be able to speak to our constituents about the widespread changes that this is making to many areas, both ABCs as well as pensions, which are incredibly important to the people who are going to be impacted by that, as well as the transparency of our democracy. That is what I will spend most of my time discussing, I imagine, in my time right now.

The fact is that I got into politics – what's it been? – four years, eight months ago because, well, I believed in democracy. When we go to places like classrooms and we talk about our role as legislators in this building and the role that we play as representatives for our constituents, we talk about the importance of democracy, and we talk about the importance of the party system as well and what role that plays in the democracy here in our province.

I'm very concerned with what we see before us, really, the disappearance of transparency when it comes to things like the leadership race. When we were first elected, in 2015, we took swift action, as you may remember, Mr. Speaker, to remove things like corporate and union donations. We lowered donation caps or the ability for money and power to influence our elections. We brought the leadership races under the purview of the Chief Electoral Officer, if I remember correctly, and we made PACs more transparent and limited the ability for influences other than political parties and individual members to influence our elections. I believe wholeheartedly in those changes that we made over the last four years.

Now, in contrast, what we have before us is a government bringing forward Bill 22, where they are effectively firing the person that is investigating a leadership race where there were allegations that have been proven to be true, to the tune at this point of over $200,000. Now we have legislation put before us by this government that would actually eliminate that position, eliminate the person that is, on an ongoing basis, right now, this moment, investigating the internal happenings of their leadership race within their party. That is very concerning to me, Mr. Speaker, because, once again, I believe that our role in this Legislature and as representatives of our communities is to strengthen democracy. Unfortunately, it seems that on the other side of the House, through this legislation and other pieces that have come before us, they do not have those same beliefs. That is very, very concerning to me.

Now, another concern that I have with this legislation and the fact that they're eliminating the important role of the Election Commissioner is the fact that this UCP government is essentially signalling that it doesn't really matter what happens behind the closed doors of leadership races and party politics within your own party as long as you get elected to be government. And if you're elected to be government, well, then you can do things like fire the investigators that are looking into wrongdoings within your own party. That is very concerning to me, and I think that sends a lot of red flags to not only the members on this side of the House but all Albertans.

If you've been following the debate and the discussion around this on social media, Mr. Speaker, as I'm sure you have – and I'm sure all of the members of this Legislature have been – they would see and you would see that there is not a lot of sympathy for this piece of legislation before us when we look at the firing of the Election Commissioner and, effectively, the reduction of action that is going to be taken, I suppose, against this party and the wrongdoings that they have in fact been implicated in. That is very concerning to me. I don't want to have to go back to my constituents and go back to the kids in the classrooms that we visit on a daily basis or a monthly basis and tell them: sorry, kids, but today, you know, party politics was more important than the democracy that we have in our province. That is something that I'm going to have to discuss with my constituents.

Now, once again back to the fact that through my discussions with constituents and seeing the discussions online, there is – as far as I can tell, anecdotally, I suppose, the only people that are supporting this legislation are, of course, the members of the government caucus up to this point and their press secretaries. Now, there are a lot of them on social media, and they get paid good money to tweet about these things, but the fact is that those are the only people that I see supporting Bill 22. That also should send red flags to people across this province.

Now, once again, this Premier has tabled legislation to fire the Election Commissioner, who is currently investigating both the party and members of the UCP caucus that are in this House today, and that is very concerning to me. The fact is that whether members of the government should be able to actually speak to this in the first place is a concern for me. The ethics around that, whether people that are involved with a party that is under investigation should be allowed to pass legislation that is going to affect that, is a concern for me, Mr. Speaker, and I imagine it is a concern for all Albertans.

Now, I think about how this legislation looks from the outside. Of course, we talk a lot about the dome effect, being in this House and maybe only hearing one side of things or the opinions of the members only. I think about what this looks like from the outside looking in. If I'm a constituent or an Albertan out there and I'm looking at this legislation before us and I see that once again a governing party is trying to stop or slow down an investigation that has implications for their own members, that's very concerning for me. I think that's something that the government caucus should be taking seriously. I only think that, you know, one day they might look back on this and say: maybe that day I should have supported democracy instead of attacking it. I imagine that will come up at some point. I hope.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that this is an abuse of power. This is attacking the very foundation of democracy and the very foundation of the rule of law, which the Member for Calgary-Mountain View went on at length about yesterday, the fact that we should all be governed by the same laws no matter how much money we make or who we are in society. The fact is that this government is using their power to pass legislation about something they did not campaign on. I didn't see in their platform to fire the person that was investigating their party, but here we are. That is a concern for me because, first of all, the government does not have a mandate to pass this legislation, and second of all, they did not consult on this legislation.

This caught everyone off guard, including the Election Commissioner, who found out that he was going to lose his position and lose the ability to continue his investigations through the news, which is also very concerning to me. If we were to take it at face value that this government was in fact removing the person that's investigating their party for efficiency reasons, well, maybe they should have had that conversation with the Election Commissioner before they decided to put in black and white in their legislation that his position would be terminated, Mr. Speaker. We talk about cutting red tape. We talk about holding consultations almost daily, yet here we are. We have an important role in our electoral system, the Election Commissioner, finding out over the news that he is losing his job, being terminated, which is very concerning.

I'm sure that the media release that the Election Commissioner put out has been talked about, but I would just like to point out a few of the things that he said in that media release. Now, he said that this disappointment, the disappointment that he has from not being able to continue his investigation, stems from the firm belief that the citizens of Alberta must have confidence and trust in the integrity of all aspects of the provincial electoral system, not just the casting and counting of ballots on election day. I agree with that, Mr. Speaker. I agree with the words that the Election Commissioner said in his media release.

I think, once again, that the party system that we have in our province is an important part of our democracy. It should be held to the same standards that we hold our elections to. Once again, it is a concern. The integrity of the system can be attacked if a government says: "Well, it's all fine because we're government now. You know, the past is the past. The leadership race: many fines were divvied out, but those people are working in our offices now." The people that were part of the investigation as well as part of creating what is being investigated: those people are working in the offices of this government, and that is also a concern for me, Mr. Speaker.

Now, once again, I appreciate that the Election Commissioner is concerned with what this means for our democracy. He goes on to say that it's not the fact that he's losing his job, by any means, though he appreciated the opportunity to serve Albertans as the first Election Commissioner. The fact is that in firing the Election Commissioner, the signal that it sends to Albertans, once again, is that you can do whatever you want behind closed doors of your party as long as you're elected to government after the fact. That is very concerning.

Now, the fact is, Mr. Speaker, like I said earlier, that those Election Commissioner investigations that are ongoing include members of this very House. Allegations of fraud, forgery, improper inducement, and bribery: those are all very serious concerns. Once again, I would echo the fact that I'm concerned that members of the government are even speaking to this legislation. I think that there is an ethics issue there, but I suppose that will rest on their conscience and not mine.

Now, it is without any precedent for the government to fire an investigator in the middle of investigating the government. It truly reeks of entitlement. I'll go back to the fact that I got involved with politics because I wanted to strengthen democracy. I believe in the foundation that we have here in the province, which is being eroded through Bill 22. I got involved because I was very concerned with the many years of PC government about the entitlement that we saw, the mass floor crossings, sky palaces, and simply about the fact that the government became so comfortable and so complacent, because they had been elected for so many years, that they stopped listening to the people of Alberta.

Now, this UCP government has moved swiftly to take the place of those Progressive Conservatives that I worked so hard to get unelected, yet here we are, Mr. Speaker, and unfortunately today they have a majority. We will see if the people believe that they should keep that after things like we are seeing in this legislation, which are very concerning.

Now, we've also seen this Premier allow top officials in his government to do things like take – oh, actually, this was the Premier himself taking $16,000 chartered flights for him and his friends to pancake breakfasts. That's concerning to me, Mr. Speaker. Once again we're seeing the entitlement of this UCP government quickly coming to the surface.

Once again, we heard about senior staff under the Premier going to London and expensing thousands of dollars to taxpayers for hotels, lavish five-star hotels with vitamin C showers. Mr. Speaker, have you ever taken a vitamin C shower? I haven't. I'm interested to know what that feels like, but I imagine I wouldn't expense it to the taxpayer if I decided to go down that road. That is concerning to me, Mr. Speaker.

Now, once again, by firing the Election Commissioner, it's become quite clear that this Premier has forgotten that he was elected to serve all Albertans, not just the ones who voted for him, not just the ones who donated to his leadership race, and not the ones who donated to his election either. Truly, he has no mandate to do what is before us in Bill 22.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I imagine that you can appreciate the gravity of the changes to transparency within our elections from this legislation before us, the implications that are before us, but I also want to focus on the fact that there are changes to public-sector pensions.

The Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood would like to add a brief question or comment.

Member Irwin: Yeah. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would like to add a question and comment to my colleague for Edmonton-West Henday. I really appreciate his remarks, particularly his early remarks when he was speaking about teachers and about how he's hearing from a lot of teachers. I would just like to recognize that I see a number of teachers in the crowd in the gallery tonight. They can give us a wave. These are hard-working teaching professionals who ...

The Speaker: Hon. members, just as a way of a heads-up, recognizing that you're new to the Assembly, I just wanted to provide some caution. It is not customary for members of the House to engage members of the gallery under any circumstance. While I also have a love and appreciation for teachers and am glad that they're here, I certainly wouldn't want to start a habit of engaging members in the gallery.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will play the new card, as I have many times already, and note that I respect very much the teachers who are here and all the teachers across the province. Myself, I was a teacher as well.

I have to echo the member's comments that I've had countless e-mails. I just checked my e-mail, and we're getting hundreds of e-mails about Bill 22 and about the concerns related to teachers' pensions. Teachers are feeling frustrated, they're feeling disrespected, and I would like the member to just comment a little bit more about what he's heard from teachers and the disrespect they're feeling from this UCP government with Bill 22.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday.

Mr. Carson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to continue for a short while, so thank you for that question. I also appreciate that we have – now I'm going to do it. I won't recognize them, but I appreciate who we have here today with us.

So getting to the point: my concern with the changes to public-sector pensions that we see within this legislation. First of all, there was zero consultation done on this, Mr. Speaker. Once again, this was not in their platform, and that should be concerning to every Albertan. It most definitely is concerning to the people who are within the public sector that have pension changes within this legislation. This government, the members that are here today, should be ashamed of themselves. That is the truth, Mr. Speaker, and I imagine they are. I imagine that, just like my office, they are getting inundated with hundreds of e-mails from concerned public servants in our province, and they should listen to them. I can't imagine what the members of the government are telling those people when they write back and say: oh, you know, I understand your concern, but the Premier told me to vote a certain way, so that's probably what's going to happen. I understand that the government says that they'll have a free vote. We'll see how that free vote plays out as this debate continues.

I have a great appreciation for the teachers and all public servants across our province: nurses, health care providers, and all public servants. I would never support something as atrocious as what we're seeing in Bill 22 and the attack on public-sector pensions. I have had teachers come to me at community events and raise concerns. I imagine, once again, that the government members have as well, but the difference is that I'm going to support those public-sector workers by voting down this terrible piece of legislation. We will see how they vote at the end of the day.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, there's approximately a minute and 37 seconds left under 29(2)(a). I see the hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika has risen.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I actually have to throw it back to the Member for Edmonton . . . I do apologize, I don't know the name of the constituency. What is a vitamin C shower?

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday, if he chooses to respond.

Mr. Carson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's not anything – well, I guess I talked about it. With that top public servant under your government, I imagine that you can ask that member, considering how much they paid for that opportunity. Like I said, I've never been involved in a vitamin C shower, but maybe he can ask that public servant, who gets paid something like $300,000 a year.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, there's approximately one minute left under 29(2)(a) if anyone would like to ask a brief question or comment. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I really appreciate the Member for Edmonton-West Henday's comments around Bill 22, some of its failings, shall we say. One of the things that I wanted to just go back to very quickly if I could, Mr. Speaker, is around the termination of the Election Commissioner and how that transition will occur, bringing that position back into the Chief Electoral Officer's purview. You know, we've heard very, very clearly from the Minister of Finance that this decision was made on the basis of what I like to call bottom-line decision-making. If we're here to simply save a million dollars, maybe I should suggest . . .

The Speaker: Hon. members, we are on the amendment. If I can just provide a little bit of clarity to the hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday, it would be fine for you to thank people for attending. The challenge is when we cross the line from thanking them for being here to engaging them to do something that they're not allowed to do. As such, we would hate to put them in any sort of position where security would be concerned.

I saw the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford rising.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate having an opportunity to speak yet again to this duplicitous Bill 22. You know, of all the things I've seen go through this House over the last five years, this is absolutely the most treacherous bill I've seen come into the House with an apparent intent to reform agencies, boards, and commissions and government enterprises but with an underlying intent to take control away from the people of Alberta and put that control in the hands of government members so that government members can use the resources that should be available to the members of society in the province of Alberta but use those resources instead to pursue the aims of government in their very narrow, rigid, backward-thinking manner. I think this is completely unacceptable.

I've had an opportunity previously to speak about my concerns about the attacks on unions and the undemocratic nature of trying to undermine unions and the rights of people to act in collective ways, to control their lives and their places of employment. I've also had an opportunity to talk a little bit about some of the underlying very antidemocratic moves here that assail the underlying need in society for the population to have an opportunity to be well educated in the democratic process so that they can appropriately engage in that process and hire the best people during the election process.

So having talked about those things, I want to talk about the fact that this is really a duplicitous bill, because what it says it is doing on the surface is not clearly showing what it is in fact doing underneath. Whenever we question this bill and whenever we say that we have a lot of concerns about what is happening here, members of the government – the Minister of Finance and other people – stand up and say: "Nothing is happening here. We're just simply shifting dollars from point A to point B, and the same things will happen all along." But I want to remind people that something much more pernicious is happening here, and that is that the monies are being taken from places where citizens in the province of Alberta have control and have a voice over what happens to that money, and they're being brought into a place where only the ministers have control over those things. I think that's the truth that we have to pay attention to.

When this Finance minister says, "Oh, we're simply taking the money from the Alberta Sport Connection, and we're moving it into general revenues, but we'll simply use the money in the same way that we have used it in the past," that sounds nice. It sounds like:

“Okay. Fine. Instead of having this body distribute the money to some 80-plus sports organizations in the province, we’ll simply move it into government, where there will be less bureaucracy. We’ll reduce the number of bureaucracies, and we will continue to do the same thing.”

But what they don’t tell you is that under the previous arrangement there was a set of parameters given to the people who distributed that money such that we knew how that money was going to be distributed. We knew the process they would go through to ensure that that money was democratically distributed. Now that money is going to be moved into the general coffers of the government of Alberta, and decisions are no longer subject to the parameters that they were previously subject to when the money was under another act such as the Alberta Sport Connection Act or the historical resources fund.

Let me be clear about what’s happening here. This is money for the Special Olympics. It was decided by a group of Alberta citizens that this is how this money should be spent. Now that money is being taken away from them, and there is simply a hope that that money will continue to be there.

Now, you have to ask yourself: “Why is the government doing that? Why are they taking the money away from a very useful and productive process and bringing it in-house, where instead of having citizens of the province of Alberta do that as representatives of all of us, only a very small group of people get to make that decision?” Once they get it away from the other acts, they no longer have to be responsible to the intent of those acts. They can simply decide on any day to not do what they say today they are going to do. The Minister of Finance says, “Don’t worry about it; we’ll keep doing the same thing,” but once it’s out of the act, there’s nothing to hold them to that.

Now, I’m very concerned about the groups that are being denied these funds and have no guarantee that they will have those funds available to them again next year – like the Special Olympics or the museums such as the Glenbow Museum and so on – those organizations that are being folded up under this act.

But, more importantly, I am concerned about what’s happening with the teachers’ pension fund, because exactly the same thing that I just talked about with these two different organizations, that are being wrapped up under this act, is happening to the teachers’ pension fund. Right now the teachers have a good relationship with people who are investing their dollars and have people on the board who can speak to how those monies are invested and have ultimately been very successful in terms of their investments and have had a good return.

What happens, though, when that is shut down and that is moved into government, into AIMCo, is that suddenly the teachers do not have the same level of control that they always had. Suddenly decisions are being made not by people whose funds they are but by people who have a variety of motivations for controlling those funds. This is why I say that this act is duplicitous. It is an act that is really treacherous to the people who have, with all integrity, put their pension funds into the hands of managers who they’ve developed a relationship with and who they have been able to work with to get a good, positive return.

Once it has been moved into AIMCo, what actually happens is that the government gets to decide whether or not they want to do what the teachers want to have happen or not. Now, the Minister of Finance will tell you: oh, no; we’re going to do the same thing once it’s in government. But what’s really clear is that they can say that they’re going to do the same thing, but there is no actual control to force them to do the same thing. They may do the same thing, especially in the first year, when they’re trying to get things settled down and they’re trying to make sure that people aren’t upset, but then afterwards they can slowly – or perhaps quickly, because they seem to do these assaults on the citizens of the province pretty quickly. In seven months they’ve engaged in quite a wide range of dishonest and corrupt activities that we are challenging here on a daily basis.

A year from now, two years from now the government may suddenly decide that all of that money that’s now in AIMCo would be beneficial for government purposes in some other thing than to provide the best returns for the teachers. It says that explicitly in the act, that AIMCo must do the things that the government directs it to do. It’s written into the act.

That’s what’s most dangerous about this act. This act is saying on the surface: “Don’t worry. Everything will be the same as it always was. We’re just moving where money is being held and being invested.” But what’s really happening is that it’s being moved from a place where people have control and the ability to respond to a place where they do not have control and do not have the ability to respond but where the government has a great deal more ability to control, which I think is a very autocratic way to treat other people’s money. I think it’s something that we should be very, very concerned about.

I think that the underlying intent of this act is one that people should pay a lot of attention to. On the surface, we keep being told: “Don’t look over here. There’s nothing to see. Don’t worry about it. It’s all going to be fine. Nothing is really going to be different.” Whenever you’re told that, you always have to ask: “If nothing is really going to be different, then why are they so dead set on making sure that this happens? Why would they bring in a bill and then have the Premier disappear for the week that it’s being discussed?” Why would they make sure that – I saw your look. I got the point. Sorry.

The Speaker: We obviously wouldn’t want to refer to the absence or presence of a member of the Assembly as that would be considered to be a point of order. I’d just offer some caution, then, to the member.

Mr. Feehan: I didn’t say that he disappeared from the House. Sorry.

The point here is that what we’re seeing is a government ramming through a piece of legislation as quickly as possible because they know what it really means, and they know that it takes a while for the citizens of Alberta to receive the information that they need in order to be able to respond. The quicker they do it, the sooner they get to a place where even if you do learn what is actually happening, there is very little that you can do about it because the act has already been enacted.

I think that that’s the intention of this act; that is, to take control away from the citizens of Alberta and do it at such a speed that they are unable to respond because they simply haven’t had time to not only get the content of the act but to understand the implications of that act. That’s the thing that we’re very concerned about here.

If I look at this whole act, the underlying theme remains the same, whether it happens to be taking the teachers’ pension plan away from them so that it can go into government control, whether it’s taking the money away from the Special Olympics, whether it’s taking the money away from the Glenbow Museum, or whether it’s taking money away from citizens who are receiving AISH. In all of these cases it’s about the government bringing unto itself the power and control over other people’s money and making decisions such that those other people will be subject to the whims of the government of the day. When they’re under their own act, the advantage is that it’s moved arm’s length away from the government so that there are people who are not sitting members of the House who are making decisions. Now suddenly it's all coming into the House and into government hands so that they can make decisions. I think that's something that we have to be very, very concerned about.

We know that this act also has a very strong intent to get the government itself out of trouble. An officer of this Chamber, the Election Commissioner, has been investigating apparent fraudulent behaviour in the UCP leadership election, has indeed assigned over $200,000 in fines against the UCP members, and has been indicating that there are many more people yet to talk to and more resources necessary to complete that application. What we have now, again, is this nefarious underlying intent to pull that commissioner out of his work site, to stop him from making a report he was supposed to make as early as next week, and to prevent him from doing any further investigation. Now, again, the Minister of Finance is going to say: "Don't worry. The same function can happen. It's going to come into government, but we promise that once it's in government, we'll do the same thing." But that's not what's going to happen, and there's no guarantee that it is.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. I believe it was the hon. Minister of Finance who caught my eye.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I just have to respond to the member opposite's comments, certainly to a few of those. Firstly, relative to moving the teachers' pension plan into AIMCo, I just need to again clarify the facts. There is so much misinformation that's circulating right now, creating undue fear, quite frankly, amongst teachers and, particularly, retired teachers, that it just behooves me to rise and to clarify a number of the comments.

Firstly, Mr. Speaker, the ATRF Board remains completely intact, with the same composition as it has been in the past. The ATRF Board will continue to administer the pension plan as it has done in the past. The ATRF Board will continue to provide policy direction and oversight on the investment goals and strategies related to the pension funds. What is changing is that those funds will be housed at AIMCo, again, under the high-level oversight of the ATRF Board.

The concept that this is a takeover by the government of teachers' pensions is ludicrous. It simply is not founded in any fact. The ATRF Board will continue to have that high-level oversight.

Mr. Speaker, there are a number of wins in this move, but the real win is a win for teachers. The real win is a win for teachers because at the end of the day teachers' pensions will be better protected in a larger investment management firm.

Mr. Schow: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Toews: At the end of the day . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika.

Point of Order Behaviour of Guests in the Gallery

Mr. Schow: I believe that the hon. Speaker has already mentioned engaging with the audience or members in the gallery. Just recently I heard a number of them making comments behind me as I turned around, and they were trying to engage further. I ask that maybe the members of the gallery remain respectful of the work we're doing here and allow us to continue this healthy debate that we're engaging in tonight.

Mr. Bilous: First of all, this is not a point of order. Points of order pertain to members of the Assembly. Mr. Speaker, with all respect, it is your prerogative to deal with members in the gallery. It is not up to another member in this House to tell members of the gallery how to behave.

The Speaker: Hon. members, I would concur with the position of the Official Opposition House Leader. It is ultimately the purview of security to ensure that the galleries are also maintaining order. If there was ever a reason to do so, of course, the Speaker could take steps, but I don't think we're anywhere close to that at this point in time.

The hon. Minister of Finance had the call.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Moving teachers' pension funds to AIMCo will ultimately result in cost savings for those pension funds as the larger investment management fund as a whole can result in economies of scale, which will result in reduced costs in the management of those funds. Our estimates are that the cost savings alone will result in approximately $40 million of savings overall per year, which will accrue to both the teachers and ultimately to Alberta taxpayers as both parties will benefit down the road with lower contributions while defined benefit pensions are maintained at the same levels. Fundamentally, foundationally, Alberta taxpayers and teachers ultimately have the same goal when it comes to public-sector pensions. Both parties benefit as returns are increased and as costs are driven down and as risks are mitigated.

Mr. Speaker, there are congruent goals in going forward with moving the actual assets to AIMCo and, again, recognizing that ATRF will continue to administer the pension plan. ATRF will continue to provide direction and strategic oversight over the investments. The board makeup of ATRF will remain the same as it's been.

The Speaker: Hon. members, there's approximately one minute remaining in 29(2)(a). I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford has risen to provide a comment.

Mr. Feehan: Mr. Speaker, if the words of the Minister of Finance had any veracity, his behaviour would have been different. If he truly believed what he just said, then he would have gone to the ATA and said, "I have a great plan; it's going to give you a better return; let's sit down and figure out how this can happen so that we would benefit all people in the province of Alberta," as he just said. He did not do that. In fact, the ATA president, Jason Schilling said, "Show us the numbers and convince us it is in our interests, instead of unilaterally seizing our pension assets." If he really did think that this was going to be a benefit for the teachers, he would have talked to them and convinced them, but he didn't believe it, so he didn't do it.

The Speaker: Hon. members, I see the hon. Government House Leader has risen.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I move that we adjourn debate.

[The voice vote indicated that the motion to adjourn debate carried]

[Several members rose calling for a division. The division bell was rung at 8:20 p.m.]

[Fifteen minutes having elapsed, the Assembly divided]

Government Motions

The Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader.

Time Allocation on Bill 22

35. Mr. Jason Nixon moved:

Be it resolved that when further consideration of Bill 22, Reform of Agencies, Boards and Commissions and Government Enterprises Act, 2019, is resumed, not more than one hour shall be allotted to any further consideration of the bill in second reading, at which time every question necessary for the disposal of the bill at this stage shall be put forthwith.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise on Government Motion 35 today. It is my duty to move to Government Motion 35. I do not believe that time allocation should be used lightly or often inside this Chamber, Mr. Speaker. In fact, I believe that this is only my second time to use this in my capacity as Government House Leader. I do note that the Official Opposition House Leader will be on the opposite side of this motion, I assume – he may be voting for it – but just a few short months ago he was on this side of the House and would often move time allocation with his Government House Leader at the time. I have a list of comments that he made and several members across the way had made in support of time allocation and times in which they have voted for it, but I don't feel the need to go into great detail on that today.

The reality is this. We have a responsibility as a Chamber to be able to control the pace of debate, to be able to make sure that ultimately we're able to get legislation through this House. Time allocation should rarely be needed, but the reality is that at times on very few bills this is the only way to be able to proceed to be able to make sure that the Chamber can do its important work that it's responsible to do for the people of Alberta.

I would quote, Mr. Speaker, from December 4, 2013, a paragraph that the former Premier David Hancock said when he was a Government House Leader in regard to closure:

On a few bills, very few bills actually, at more than just the committee stage ...

At the time they were arguing whether or not time allocation should just be used at the committee stage.

... at other stages of the bill, there are times when the House manages its time well, and motions of time allocation are not needed or are left on the Order Paper. As we can see on the Order Paper [in his case], there are some left from [the] spring. It is one of the ways [though] in which government business can be managed, brought before the House for appropriate discussion, timely discussion, and timely implementation.

Today I move time allocation in that same line of thought, that we have to continue to make sure that legislation moves through this Chamber in the coming days to be able to accomplish all of the objectives of the 30th Legislature when it comes to the sitting before Christmas.

The reality is, Mr. Speaker, that often we work together to be able to limit debate sometimes for our own members. It's what government House leaders do. That's what opposition House leaders do. We choose critics when we're in opposition to respond to certain things, on the government side we choose certain ministers that will move certain bills or speak to certain bills, and sometimes we have government caucus members not rise to be able to give the Official Opposition more time. We negotiate those things. We negotiate question period rotation. We negotiate opportunities when the Official Opposition has amendments that they need to move and time grows late, where the government goes out of their way to be able to give them that opportunity. That's the reality of what we do in this Chamber. Sometimes, when things begin to grind to a halt, we have two options within our standing orders. Interestingly enough, closure has been removed from our system since 2003-ish, but we do have time allocations in the standing orders, the mechanism that I'm using today. We also have a standing order called the previous question, which helps to control time within this Chamber.

I want to be clear. Adequate time will still be provided to debate Bill 22. It's an important piece of legislation, Mr. Speaker, and the Official Opposition has a responsibility on behalf of their constituents to debate it fully. I will provide them that opportunity. At this stage we've already provided them five hours so far. There are three stages of this legislation that we have to go through, and we will provide the Official Opposition adequate time to be able to do their important work as the Official Opposition, to bring amendments as they see fit, and to have an opportunity to be able to debate this important legislation.

But we will not plug up the Legislature. We'll make sure that the legislation that is needed for Albertans will pass, that Alberta's budget will pass, and that we'll be able to implement that budget and continue to move forward. If we do not work together to be able to control the pace of this House, we would be in a spot where we would only pass one or two pieces of legislation. That's not a spot that I'm willing to let this Chamber get into, and it's not a spot that Albertans want. They want their legislative business to be done, Mr. Speaker. I suggest, through you to the opposition, that they make the best of the time that they have so we can make sure that we make the best piece of legislation that we can.

The Speaker: The Opposition House Leader.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'll start off by saying that this move that the Government House Leader and the government is doing is, one, unprecedented and historic. No time in Alberta's history has a bill been introduced in the very same week that all three readings have invoked closure to limit debate. The fact that the government is invoking closure at 8:40 p.m., after a mere five hours of debate, which is not a significant amount of time – as the hon. member knows, we have debated many pieces of legislation for many hours. The fact that the Government House Leader the other day rose to give notice for closure for three sections of the bill before the bill was introduced screams of how afraid this government is of the very legislation they brought forward to attack the very people that are sitting up there.

This piece of legislation to meddle with the teachers' pension is undemocratic. They did not ask for it. I would love for the Finance minister to respond to this House. Whom did he consult with who asked to move the teachers' pension to AIMCo? If the pension is going to save $30 million yet the teachers' board is going to have all the oversight and continue to have the due diligence over the fund, what is the purpose of moving it to AIMCo? In fact, the minister should know this – and I have a great deal of respect for AIMCo. Had the minister and this government actually talked to teachers to say, "This is what we're proposing to do with your money" – not your money; their money – then we wouldn't be here, Mr. Speaker. But the fact of the matter is that the government know they are in the wrong, which is why they've just invoked closure after five hours of debate. It's absolutely shameful. They are afraid to face the very people whose money they are trying to meddle with.

We have yet to have an answer as to how this saves $30 million. How is this better? In fact, the Finance minister should know that last year the teachers' pension outperformed AIMCo. There goes your argument that the fund can do better if it's managed under AIMCo. But the point for me is not whether it's AIMCo or the teachers' fund. Consult with the very people whose money you're touching. It's not your money. Hands off. Then to exacerbate things, Mr. Speaker, they invoke closure after four hours. Shame. Shame on every one of you for invoking closure, shutting down debate in this very House. Closure is one of the most antidemocratic methods that the government has.

I can and will say: yes, there were rare occasions that our government introduced closure. Never three motions of closure for a whole bill, introduced on a Monday and passed on the Thursday. That is unprecedented. Never in Alberta's history has a bill moved – and, Mr. Speaker, I'm sure you're wondering why. I've been trying to figure out why they would want to move at breakneck speeds. I can tell you that there are only two possible reasons: they're trying to hide something, so either the Election Commissioner has something really good that's about to come out, and they want him nowhere near what's going on, or they don't want him in front of Public Accounts, which is supposed to happen at the end of next week.

Otherwise, if this was merely about moving money, first of all, you should have consulted with the teachers. I'm offended by that. I am a teacher. You do not have the right to move their money, their pension money, without talking to them first. I don't care what financial arguments you make, that's their decision to make, not yours.

The fact that this government is moving this quickly, invoking closure at 8:40 on second reading after a mere five hours of debate, is unprecedented. I don't know what the Government House Leader is talking about as far as debate grinding to a halt. I don't know if that's some kind of weird joke, but five hours of debate is hardly grinding this place to a halt, Mr. Speaker. The minister claims that there will still be adequate time. According to whom? So you have the ultimate authority on what is adequate and what is not? You know what? I would venture a guess that the 50 people up there would disagree with you that the one hour for second reading that remains on this bill is adequate time to talk about their future, their retirement. They earned that money, not you. I find it rich.

Bill 22 Reform of Agencies, Boards and Commissions and Government Enterprises Act, 2019 (continued)

[Adjourned debate on the amendment November 20: Mr. Jason Nixon]

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung on RA1.

Mr. Dach: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I rise to speak to RA1. I'm left to refer at the commencement of my remarks to what the Minister of Finance recently said when talking about Bill 22 and its surrounding debate that we're having here tonight about it. He mentioned that we, in his mind, were creating undue fear. I tell you what, Mr. Speaker. If he wanted to undo fear, he'd withdraw the bill. The fear that he's creating is actually real, and it's a fear in the minds of many people who have expressed themselves throughout the last few days to all of our constituency offices. In fact, the running count, the tally, the clock count that we should have in front of the Legislature, similar to what the Premier had when he was with the Canadian Taxpayers Federation – we should have a count of all the e-mails that we're receiving on this issue. I don't know if you'd imagine how many e-mails we're at, but it's an astounding amount, Mr. Speaker: 29,000 e-mails and counting. Twenty-nine thousand constituents have written to us. My inbox is flooded. And I'll tell you: they're not boilerplate e-mails; they're not templated. They are individual letters of concern, and believe me, they are awfully angry.

I'll tell you what. Members of this House will recognize that at this late hour it's very unusual to have people in the gallery, but there are people in the gallery in force, Mr. Speaker, people whose pensions are being moved without their permission, and they are fearful for their retirement incomes. Those individuals in the gallery represent a small portion of the 29,000 and counting members of the teaching profession who have respectfully written all of their MLAs to demand that this move be halted. It is not undue fear. We ask the Minister of Finance to actually undo fear and withdraw the bill.

Now, I won't necessarily thank the government for one of the consequences of the proposals under Bill 22 because it's probably a piece of their strategy to invoke this fear and cause the chaos that they are doing, hoping that this chaos under the Bill 22 proposal might hide some of the other nefarious things that are going on with other pieces of legislation. I mean, we have a number of pieces of legislation this week, six bills, I think, at least being introduced this week. Others to come. It's an inundation of legislation that the government hopes will cause, by volume, a smokescreen under which many things will pass and not much will be actually seen.

Though as we focus our attention on one thing after another in this House, each one seems to be a larger and larger controversy and some of them full-blown scandals. I speak of the firing of our Election Commissioner, which is, of course, part of this legislation as well. It is something that is unprecedented in most democracies, certainly in ours, where a government will actually fire the Election Commissioner who has ongoing investigations into the propriety of their own leadership election process. This act of very cynical ploys by the government is something that they hope the electorate will forget about, the same way that I'm sure they didn't expect the reaction of 29,000 and counting teachers to at least take the time to send an e-mail. Also, as I'm reading these e-mails, almost every one of them that have been sent to my office says, "Yes, indeed," when my constituency assistant has asked if they can be quoted and if we can use their names. They're not saying, "Oh, no, don't use my name." They're saying, "You're darn right." That's what they're saying. Almost without exception, when they're asked if they wish to be identified, they are not hesitant about it.

Unlike other events in Alberta history, where in past years you may have had somebody disagreeing with the government and a small opposition of three of four NDP members and maybe some other members of other parties would rail against it and people in their neighbourhoods and their constituencies would tread relatively softly, not wanting to stick their heads up too high and be counted for fear of being ostracized – that was the way things happened in Alberta when there was a relatively . . .

The Speaker: Hon. member, I hesitate to interrupt. My apologies both to you as well as to the Assembly. Unfortunately, the hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung actually spoke to the amendment immediately following the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View, so as such, he is unable to speak to the amendment twice. However, if we happen to get back to the main bill, as he has not yet spoken to it, he could do that if that was possible.

We will move to another speaker.

9:10

Mr. Jason Nixon: We move that we move to one-minute bells for the duration of the evening, including in Committee of the Whole.

The Speaker: Hon. members, a question has been put to the Assembly, a request, which would require unanimous consent, to move to one-minute bells.

[Unanimous consent granted]

The Speaker: I invite another hon. member for the Official Opposition to rise. The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to speak to this. Actually, it's not my pleasure to speak to it because this is just wrong. To have an omnibus piece of legislation like this, in my opinion, it looks like legislation that a corrupt government would pass. It is a piece of legislation that is going to do an incredible amount of damage in terms of trust with our essential public-sector workers. It is going to do damage to the democracy of this place, the integrity of this place, and not one government member actually seems to care. That's incredible to me.

I'm going to speak to the pensions, and I would like to thank all of the people that are watching, all of the people that have taken time out of their evenings to come here and watch us because it's that important to them. Unfortunately, it doesn't look like any member on the government side thinks it's really important. They have not even sort of put out a little shred of, "Maybe I understand some of the concerns." They have not talked about, "Well, you know, maybe we could go back and speak to people." No. It's once again: "We know best. Opposition is fear and smear." It turns out we're not fear and smear. It turns out we know exactly what we're talking about, as do they.

So firing an independent officer, the Election Commissioner: that is something that corrupt governments do. They find ways to cover things up. They have all the power. They do things to cover things up. Let's look at Alberta here for a second. Let's look at some of the things that this commissioner has done, just some of the things he has found because he's really, really good at his job. Apparently, he's so good at his job that you want to shut him down.

So let's look at some of the administrative penalties. Some of them are quite recent. They're in November. Robyn Lore, contributor: penalty of $4,000. Again Robyn Lore: another $4,000. Oh, look, another one: $9,000. Agropyron Enterprises Ltd.: $8,000. That's just November 1st. Energize Alberta: fines of $6,300, $2,000, $2,500, $3,000, $500, $3,900. It just goes on and on.

Jeff Callaway, UCP – oh, that's the kamikaze guy. Sorry if I said his name and I wasn't supposed to. He colluded with a third party to circumvent contribution limits. Gee, I wonder why the government wants to shut him down. Jeff Callaway, another fine: $2,000 for taking money that he shouldn't have. Another one for Jeff Callaway, solicited or accepted a contribution: $3,000, again inappropriate. It just goes on and on and on.

If you type in Alberta Election Commissioner, it'll come up. You can have a look for yourself. See how long that list is. In just the short time that he's been doing this work, he's fined the UCP and their operatives – was it $211,000? But we're supposed to buy that you're just doing this to save money because, you know, it'll be like a million dollars in five years and you're so fiscally responsible. Oh, wait. You have a war room snitch line that is – what? – $120 million over four years. Mr. Speaker, do you think that anybody is buying this? They're not.

You can continue to talk about your great big mandate, and you're going to do all this stuff because Albertans sent you here to do it, but you are going to find out very quickly that you are responsible to the people of Alberta, and they're not happy. You will see that very soon. You might not see it right now, but you will see it very soon. You were sent to this place to enhance democracy, to protect it, to value it, to do everything that you can to ensure its integrity. You know what you don't do to ensure integrity of democracy? You don't fire someone who's investigating you. That looks an awful lot like corruption.

This bill is shameful. I could go on about all of the things that are wrong with this bill. It's so big. What you've done is that you've just shoved everything in there that you possibly can because, you know, you want us to pretend like we're trying to drink out of a firehose. There's just so much that it's difficult for us to actually inform Albertans of what you're trying to do. Isn't that the point? That is the point. That is exactly what you're doing.

I am so frustrated for all of our public-sector workers, for our teachers, for our nurses, for everybody that has worked so hard to actually have a degree of control over their future and over their pension. I for one am eternally grateful for all of their work. I will always be. You know what you do when you're grateful? You respect them. You include them. You speak to them. You consult them. You don't run over them. I think it's just shameful, what you've done.

I could talk a little bit about – you know, there are all kinds of things. You have dissolved groups that oversee really important programs, that I think are important, like Special Olympics, like the Steadward Centre at the university, that provides supports and physical activity for people with disabilities. There are so many things. It encourages and mentors indigenous coaching, women in sport.

There are so many things that you have shoved into this bill and then invoked closure. What is today, Wednesday? The Government House Leader stood up, Mr. Speaker, and tried to tell us: well, you've already had five hours of debate. Really? Something that is this important for all of these public-sector workers? This is their pension. This is their future. This is what they've worked for, and you are choosing to ignore them, to stuff earplugs in and not listen to them. You never even asked them. You know what? You don't know what's best for people. You do not. Like my colleague said, I have great respect for AIMCo, I actually do. But I have more respect for the people of Alberta. I have more respect for the teachers and the nurses. You do not show respect by ignoring them.

This piece of legislation is really something. You know, it literally – and I'm sure my colleagues have said this – changes or amends 31 statutes. It's an unprecedented affront to democracy, and the fact that the government chose to roll this out and then invoke closure is just – I don't know. I don't even have the words for it, actually. It's shocking to me. It's shocking.

You know, I used to have some American friends and American family, and I teased them a lot because sometimes they'll be talking about American politics and what's going on there and just the degree of corruption that has led to impeachment hearings, because there is a leader of a country that is alleged to have done some very, very serious things, so serious, in fact, that the entire country is talking about impeachment. I used to tease my friends and family quite a bit about just the corruption: "How did you get there? I mean, were there signals along the way? How is it that this is okay?" You know what? I look at what's happening right in front of us, and I'm stunned by it. It's like a really bad Netflix show. It's just an affront to democracy.

Yesterday, when our leader stood up – I'm sorry, Mr. Speaker. I understand that what you told us was that you were just following the rules of the House. But what she did, to me, was speak truth to power. What she did was say: "You know what? This can't be allowed to happen in this place." Too many people have fought for too long and too hard for democracy to be able to flourish in a place like this. That means not firing people that are investigating you. That means not hijacking people's pensions. That means not hiding changes in a bill that is so ridiculously huge that you just don't want people to see it. On top of that, you just stop debate because – why? – you don't feel like being here late, you're tired of listening to us, you're tired of the e-mails. Well, you know what? That's part of democracy.

Member Irwin: Teachers are tired. Nurses are tired.

Ms Renaud: I do believe the teachers and the nurses are very tired.

It's unfortunate that the government members just can't even be bothered to listen to any of this, so they stop debate. They've only given us a little bit of time, couldn't care less what we have to say. That sends a message. It sends a huge message. We should be working every single day in this place to earn the trust of Albertans, and earning the trust means being honest with them and including them.

You know, I talked a little bit earlier today about some of the things I was worried about in the area that I'm critic for, and that is Community and Social Services. One of the things that I was very concerned about, Mr. Speaker – and I'm using this as an example – is that one of the things I learned is that there was going to be a review of a very large ministry that had a lot of programs in it, from AISH to PDD to supports for children with disabilities, homelessness support, women's shelters. One of the things that I was very surprised to hear was that that review will be done internally. Well, when you do a review internally, you don't get the information that you need because the information that you need comes from Albertans, and it comes from the people that are involved in the decisions that you're making or who will be impacted by the decisions that you're making.

So is it a pattern? Kind of seems that way. We've had all kinds of changes, and nobody has been consulted. The people that matter have not been consulted. This has been driven by ideology, misinformation, in my opinion, and I believe that the goal of this is not to make Albertans stronger or to make Alberta stronger and united. This is about self-serving partisan politics. That's what I believe it is. You don't do something like this, you don't introduce a bill that is this enormous and then say that five hours of debate is enough. It's not enough. It will never be enough.

I know that my office is just flooded with e-mails – e-mails from nurses, e-mails from teachers, e-mails actually even from students, e-mails from family members, e-mails from community members who are concerned – and their message is very simple: they were not consulted, and they're angry. They have every right to be angry. I'm angry for them. I know that this caucus will continue to talk about it. You know, you all might forget about it in a little bit. We will remind you. This is a shameful piece of legislation, and if this is the example that you are setting for the next three years, it's going to be a long three years.

I just wanted to say a couple of other things. One of the things that has worried me, I guess, over the last few months is the comments that people make about public-sector workers. It has come from the front bench, Mr. Speaker, it has come from the backbench, it has come from social media. It's this disdain for public-sector workers that I just don't understand. I don't get it. They are the fabric of our communities. They're the foundation of our province. They're there when we need them most. They're there when we don't need them, they're there when we don't notice: they're always there. They educate our children. They help us raise our children. The disdain that comes from this government is really stunning to me. It is absolutely stunning. Of course, their choice not to consult on this really, really important move is just another example of the absolute disdain for our public-sector workers, that I don't understand, that I think is dangerous. It's so disrespectful. It's incredibly disrespectful. It's sad. It is really unfortunate.

I hope that our Premier – like it or not, the voters decided, so he's our Premier – chooses to stand up and explain himself, I really do. I hope that our Premier has the courage to look our public-sector workers in the eye and explain this, I really do.

Thanks.

The Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. I believe that the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford caught my eye first.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was just listening to the Member for St. Albert speak about some very important aspects of this bill and her real, deep anger, I think, quite legitimate and thoughtful anger, about the nature of this bill and why it is being brought in. The thing that really struck me, amongst the many things, of course, was her comments about the respect toward public service workers, whether they happen to be working for a department in government or whether they happen to be teachers or whether they happen to be nurses, the lack of respect that is shown by this government and particularly in this bill. I think it really is telling that they keep saying: don't worry; nothing bad is happening here.

If they truly believe that, why would they not have heeded the word of the chair of the ATRF, who asked for an audit to demonstrate whether or not moving these monies from the ATRF to AIMCo would indeed be positive for the teachers? I think their actions speak much louder than their words. If they do respect teachers, why don't they go to the teachers and demonstrate that this is a positive thing to be doing and work together to make it happen? They know that they can't do that because they have no evidence that this will be positive in any way whatsoever, but once the money is under their control, they don't need to talk to the teachers at all. Now, I know that the Minister of Finance has said: oh, the board of the ATRF will be kept intact. If it's being kept intact, why are you taking the money away from them? It doesn't make any sense. It has no face validity.

I would like to hear the Member for St. Albert speak a bit more about this deep lack of respect that she was addressing. Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. You know, one of the things I wanted to mention earlier – I am angry about this, and I think a lot of Albertans are angry about this. Part of the anger, obviously, is the complete lack of respect – the complete lack of respect – for our teachers. But part of the anger comes from – I can't believe that you actually think that we're going to buy your excuses. That's the part that I just don't get. You stand up and say things like, "Oh, no; we're doing this to save you money" and then you look at us like we're supposed to believe you. It's a little bit shocking to me.

Let me give you an example of how ridiculous this is some days, right? One of the things that you told us, Mr. Speaker, that the government told us was that getting rid of, firing the Chief Electoral Officer will save the government a million dollars over five years, and that's, like, super important because you guys are all fiscally responsible. But just the other day, when speaking to another piece of legislation, another member who sits over there stood up to speak about the cost of accountability. I think he was talking about recall legislation. He said:

Why would it be worth spending money in a by-election?
Because it would be worth it. If that individual was not representative of their constituents, if they were not keeping their word, if they were not being truthful, if they were not following through with those promises, it definitely would be worth it.

Accountability and responsibility: those things are worth it, right? Okay; that's all kinds of strange.

Number one: do I think a million dollars is a lot of money? Yes I do. Do I think that a million dollars to invest in an independent officer to ensure free and fair elections so that each Albertan's vote is worth the same as the other, do I think that's a good investment? Oh, yes, I do. Absolutely I do. What do I think about recall legislation? Well, that's for another day.

9:30

I just wanted to give that example because it's just one example of the things that the government, Mr. Speaker, stands up and tries to sell us and tries to sell Albertans, and they actually think that we're buying it or that anybody is buying it. You're doing it to save money? Again, firing somebody who's investigating you, that's what corrupt governments do. Let's not be that. It's not too late. We can stop this. You can stop this right now. You can admit a mistake. You can stand up and say: you know, well, we're going to reconsider because not only does it look bad, it is bad.

The Speaker: Hon. members, anyone else wishing to join in the debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. One of the things that I will often ask conservatives is: what are you trying to conserve? What exactly is it that you are attempting to conserve within our society? What we see before us in this bill is this government attempting to conserve entitlement, and what just behooves me is that there are members on that side of the House that are just completely oblivious to what this government is doing.

Am I angry? Yes, I am, Mr. Speaker. You know me to be a passionate man. When I get up in this House, I call a spade a spade, and I say it like it is because like our hon. Leader of the Official Opposition, I too like to speak truth to power.

Now, one of the things that conservatives love to say is that it's about freedom. It's about freedom and that they're protecting freedom, when honestly what they are talking about is freedom of capital, freedom of wealth, and the people who own that wealth and continuously use it in order to take advantage of others in our society. In fact, Conservative governments, no matter where they are within the world, actually preach less government because somehow they think that less government – and remember that government is supposed to be here to serve the people. Government is supposed to be here to serve the people of this province. Less government. As a result of that less government, it obviously means centralization of power, and that's exactly what this bill does in so many different ways, and so many of my hon. colleagues have already spoken to that, but I'm going to get into it.

Well, first, let me just take a step back because one of the hon. members on that side of the House just earlier got up and made reference to the Holodomor, for which we have an amazing amount of respect, and criticized the Holodomor and Stalin for the centralization of power.

An Hon. Member: Careful.

Member Loyola: No. I'm amazingly respectful, hon. member. You don't have to worry about me. What I'm talking about is the centralization of power.

It behooves me that members on the other side of the House are staying so incredibly quiet when this bill that we have before us right now, Mr. Speaker, is attempting to do exactly that with the teachers' pensions.

As was pointed out by so many of my hon. colleagues, teachers weren't even consulted. They weren't even consulted, and their pension plan actually outperformed AIMCo. So I have to ask the other members on the other side of the House: what is going on here? Why this move without any consultation with the people that this bill actually affects? Now, I understand, I get it. You think less government will be better. That's your political, partisan opinion. But when the rubber meets the road, Mr. Speaker, when the rubber meets the road, "Is that what is actually best for the teachers of this province?" is what we have to ask ourselves. Is bringing these monies, these monies that these individuals have worked so incredibly hard for throughout their entire lives, taking those monies and bringing them under the control of AIMCo, where they will have less of an opinion on how it will actually function.

Now, the President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance has gotten up in this House and very eloquently danced around the fact that, "Oh, everything's going to stay the same," just like the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford pointed out so many times. "Everything's going to stay the same." But it's not. It's not.

Now, in our society, Mr. Speaker, we should be striving to make our institutions more democratic, where citizens of this province actually have more of a say on the governance, not only of pension funds but, also, over all matters of government. We want more people involved in the democratic process than less people involved in the democratic process, and I'm sure, Mr. Speaker, that you would agree with that. We strive so that our institutions can be more democratic, so, then, why do have before us yet another bill that makes them less democratic?

Mr. Speaker, the other thing that I really wanted to point out – and it was something that was brought up by the Member for St. Albert, bless her – is the fact that Conservative – and it's not just this Conservative government – governments in the past always tried to pit public-sector workers against taxpayers, as if we're not all citizens of this great province. Now, you've got to ask yourself: why pit the public sector against the taxpayers? Why create that division? Why put that in there? It's because they're trying to convince taxpayers that less government is better, and, as a result, our institutions being less democratic is actually better, bringing more of the control inside the purview of government is better.

These public sector workers, like the hon. Member for St. Albert said, are the ones that come into work every day. They're the people that are sitting up in this gallery right now that dedicate themselves to educating our children, to making sure that they have the best education that they can possibly have here in the province of Alberta, to make sure that our children are properly prepared for the future that's in front of them. They dedicate themselves day in, day out, and I'm sure that a lot of members in this House on both sides of the aisle remember that one teacher, that one teacher that influenced them so much, that inspired them so much to keep learning and wanting to seek more education and more knowledge.

Those are the kind of people that are sitting up in that gallery right now, Mr. Speaker, because not only are they passionate about standing up for the future and teaching our children and making sure that Alberta is prepared for the future so that we can move towards a more modern way of being and, dare I say it, a more democratic society but they're also here because they care about the pension and they want to have their say in how those monies are managed, just like anybody else would do, just like every individual that goes to their bank and deposits money in their RRSP. They can decide how that money – where it's going to be placed, whether it's going to be a mutual fund or whether it's a guaranteed investment certificate or whatever the case may be. These teachers want to be able to have the same kind of say, provide direction, and that is what's being taken away from them right now.

So let's not fall into the trap, hon. members. This isn't about pitting the public sector against the taxpayers. We shouldn't continue to bring before this House proposed legislation that would actually make our institutions less democratic. I'm asking the members on the other side of the House: please consider the words that are coming out of my mouth; don't just blindly vote for this piece of legislation because cabinet has asked you to.

We're all here to represent Albertans, whether they be teachers or other public-sector employees. We're not just here to represent those who want freedom for their wealth. Yes, they are a part of our society, and, yes, they provide an instrumental role in making sure that our economy functions, but they are not the only Albertans that deserve a voice inside of this House. We're here to represent all Albertans, and that's what I'm asking all the members of this House to do, Mr. Speaker, to please consider all Albertans and not just those that share their personal, partisan, ideological frame of mind. Let's be true to the democratic institution that we were elected to participate in.

I tell my constituents regularly that I may be a member of the Alberta NDP, and I was elected as an NDP member, but I represent all of my constituents. No matter what their political beliefs are, what their ideology is, they all have an opportunity to walk inside of my constituency office and sit down with me and express their opinions. That's what we should be doing while we're inside this House, not representing only one group of people, one self-interested group, but all Albertans.

So I'll end with the words that I started with: what exactly are you trying to conserve?

The Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. Would anyone like to add a brief question or comment?

Seeing none, is there anyone else wishing to comment on the amendment? The hon. Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction.

Mr. Hunter: Easier said than – anyways, Mr. Speaker, it's a pleasure to be here tonight and to just talk a little bit about Bill 22. I have had the opportunity to be able to listen to members opposite debate this issue.

The first thing I wanted to say, Mr. Speaker, is that – I don't know if the members know – my father is a retired teacher. He taught all of his life. The reality is that I actually am a teacher as well. I taught for two years. Never made so little in all my life. This was a long time ago, and teachers get paid better now, which is great. We want to be able to pay our teachers well. But I remember when I finished my degree, Mr. Speaker, and I came back and I taught in Alberta for two years. I took home $1,960 a month, and there was no way for me to be able to provide for my family on that kind of a wage. So I looked at my father, what he was making. He had tenure, and he was making a little over $2,400. I realized that my father, for as long as I can remember, would teach during the year, and then in the summer he would have to make up for what he didn't make during the teaching year by going and doing construction, and I would help him on those construction jobs. The members opposite talk about how they have, you know, the only real-life experience when it comes to the public sector. I disagree. We have lots of experience on this side as well about what the public sector is dealing with.

But I want to unpack some of the information that the members opposite have used in this argument. Now, my father, when the media and the NDP blew this issue up – and they did blow it up. The Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie said that we should stop pitting the taxpayer against the public sector. I want to call that member out, Mr. Speaker, through you, and I want that member to know who has stoked the fire on this issue. It has been the NDP all the way. Along with their liberal media counterparts, they have stoked the fire. They have sent the information out through the ATA as well to the teachers, and this information has been false.

When my father and I talked about this, he was concerned. He said: "What's going on? I'm retired. I need to make sure that my pension is still going to be there." I said to him: "Dad, your pension is intact. In fact, what we are doing is that we are trying to make sure that your pension is sustainable for the long run." So what happened when the NDP and their close friends and allies the ATA sent out the information? They cherry-picked data points. This is specifically what the NDP do. They will present something in a certain way so that they can incite people against each other.

Now, when the Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie says that we are the ones who are pitting the taxpayer against the public sector, I call him out on that when they are cherry-picking the data points. We've shown specifically that over a 10-year period AIMCo outperforms the ATRF. So, Mr. Speaker, if that is the case, why would we not move that amount, that $18 billion, over into AIMCo, which is already working with $115 billion. Now, it only makes sense that a fund that is investing $115 billion has more buying power in terms of its investment capabilities than a fund that is only investing $18 billion.

But, Mr. Speaker, what's interesting about this is that when we took a look at this and being able to move this together, the NDP forgot to tell a bunch of information, which is that the ATRF was the outlier. It was the outlier for all the other public-sector pensions, which were under AIMCo. I get that the NDP are struggling with the decision that was made on April 16 – we still hear this from the NDP today – but the truth is that they lost the election. They lost the election. Albertans chose a different path because they recognized that Alberta was on the wrong path for four years under the NDP.

Look, I was in opposition, Mr. Speaker. You and I were in opposition together prior to us being able to win the election, so I get how tough it is to be on that side. I get how tough it is to be able to watch the government go forward with what they had said to the public. But you know what? They have to get over the fact that they lost the election, and when they talk about their strategy – oftentimes when I was on the opposition side, I'd hear them say constantly that we had done everything wrong for the past 44 years under Conservative governments. What is amazing about this is that if that's the case, why did the members even move here? Most of them moved here. So why did they move here? Because there were jobs and there were opportunities here.

This is the plan that this government has tried to be able to establish. This is about jobs and the economy, Mr. Speaker. This is about being able to consolidate the ATRF under a world-class investment fund. This is about being able to take the agencies, boards, and commissions and make sure that they're efficient. I appreciate this bill because this is certainly a red tape reduction measure, something that is very dear to my heart.

This is something that we campaigned on. We told Albertans that we would be getting rid of at least one-third – at least one-third – of the regulatory burden. Now, Mr. Speaker, if they are going to lose their minds over what we're doing in this session over one bill, I can't imagine how they're going to handle the fact that we're about to give this government a giant enema. We're going to make sure that this government gets rid of at least one-third of their regulatory burden. So if they're going to lose their head over this one bill, they need to pace themselves because we're just getting started.

Mr. Speaker, I was sad to hear the same rhetoric coming from the members opposite about our fight-back strategy. The reason why we have to do a fight-back strategy is because the members opposite drove $50 billion of investment out of this province with their antibusiness rhetoric, with their antibusiness policies, and their antibusiness legislation. What's interesting about it is that this ex-government – the only government that actually had only four years in the existence of Alberta – had the opportunity to be able to talk to business and say, "You know what; we really want you guys to be able to jump-start the economy and get Albertans back to work," because they saw that jobs were leaving. Then they piled regulation on regulation on regulation on top of them, and then they piled all sorts of taxes on top of them, and then they continued to disparage them at every opportunity that they had. Then they would ask them:

"Well, why aren't you guys creating more jobs? Why aren't you expanding your businesses?"

If they are supposedly the champions of the public sector, do they not understand that there is a symbiotic relationship between the public sector and a strong, robust economy? Don't they understand that you cannot continue to live on a credit card and expect that to be sustainable? Don't they understand that the only way that we can have good-quality health care and education in this province is if we have a strong, robust economy? How are you going to get that strong, robust economy? You can't buy your way into a strong, robust economy. You need to make sure that the businesses, especially small businesses – Mr. Speaker, 2 out of every 3 new jobs come from small businesses. Red tape disproportionately affects small businesses. If we don't start addressing these issues, I don't know how the members opposite expect us to be able to get Albertans back to work.

Mr. Speaker, on this side of the House we are champions of Albertans. We are the champions of all Albertans, whether it's the private sector or the public sector. The public sector cannot have a sustainable system unless we have a robust, strong private sector as well. So it is our job to make sure that we get out of the way of those job creators and those innovators. If we don't get out of their way, then we will not have the tax base to be able to pay for the important work that our public sector is doing. We hold both as important. But the past government did not seem to understand that symbiotic relationship. Because of that, they were fired after four years, the only government in the province's history to be fired after four years. They did not get it. They didn't understand it. They still don't understand it today, and they're still upset about it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, they say that we're not representing Albertans. They say that they have heard from all of their friends and close friends and allies. You know, certainly, when they stoke the fire of misinformation to the teachers, I can see how they would be upset. My father was upset until I talked to him about the fact that we are going to actually save the ATRF $41 million a year. Now, if we save the teachers $41 million a year, that money can be then put towards the pensions. Why would we not look for those kinds of efficiencies? The members opposite have got to understand that. They have got to understand that. But you know what? I get that they're in opposition, I get that they have to be able to try to inflame and to do their job as opposition, but what they're doing at the expense of teachers is deplorable. It's deplorable.

I've actually sat with many teachers in my riding – just so that members opposite know – and I've listened to their concerns that are basically just talking points of the NDP, and what I said to them was: "Listen, let me just at least give you the other side, and if you still feel that we are doing something that is not right, then I can take that back to the government. I can take that back to my colleagues." After explaining to them, Mr. Speaker, the other side of the equation, they said, "Well, why weren't we told that?" A good question. You know, we're supposed to have the NDP sending out correct information. We're supposed to have the ATA sending out correct information. We're supposed to have the media sending out an unbiased report. Unfortunately, we have not been able to see that. So what do we do? We have to go out and we have to talk to individuals one at a time and try to be able to go through the information that the NDP have been providing and let them know: "Look, this is the other side of the story. Please take a look at it. You're educators."

Mr. Speaker, I really do believe that there are going to be some teachers that are upset. Even if we tell them what we're trying to do, even if they see an extra $500 per teacher in their pockets each year into their pension funds, I think they would still be upset. They'd still be upset. [interjections] And here we're getting heckled by the members opposite, that supposedly know all the numbers. According to what we heard from these members opposite before the budget came out about how many hospitals we were going to blow up, how many teachers we were going to fire – all this stuff has not come to fruition. [interjections]

Mr. Speaker, they're continually heckling. The members opposite know that there's 29(2)(a) for them to be able to speak about the issues, but they can't wait. They just have to heckle. It's fear and smear, and it's the anger machine that we constantly see from the NDP. Albertans rejected that in the last election because they recognized that you can only cry wolf so many times until people stop believing you. I saw that in the election. There was so much fear and smear coming from the NDP in the last election that people got sick and tired of it. They finally said: "No. It cannot be true. The last 800 times you've said that the sky is falling, it hasn't happened, and therefore we don't believe you." And that's why they lost. They lost because Albertans don't believe them anymore.

Now, I don't know why they continue to go down this path that they're going down. It has not worked for them. But you know what? Look, if that's what they want to do, fantastic. Keep going at it. They can lose the next election as well. But you know what we're going to do, Mr. Speaker? We're going to keep to our campaign promises. We made 375 campaign promises to Albertans, and we're going to fulfill every one of them. Why? Because we actually care about Albertans. We want to get them back to work. We want to make sure that Albertans get back to work. This is a full-time job for us. They messed it up so badly on the other side for the last four years that it's very difficult to be able to accomplish this. We will make sure that Albertans get back to work.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available, and I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday has the longest look on his face.

Mr. Carson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Well, there was a lot to break down in the words that were just spoken by that member, many things that I'm concerned about. Of course, we have quite a difference in ideology from this side of the House to that side of the House, as we're seeing here, as we see every day.

One of my main concerns is the fact that the member continues to go on at length about, "We can't afford to pay teachers, we can't afford to increase AISH payments for people who are living in poverty, we can't afford to index seniors' benefits or cover dependants of seniors who are low-income Albertans unless the economy is firing on all cylinders," as has been said in this House by government members. That's something that we've heard from this government day in and day out, and that's very concerning to me, Mr. Speaker, because I don't believe, personally, that we should be saying, "You have to wait until we bring in X amount of dollars until we can actually help lift you out of poverty," but that is what this government says each and every day, and that is what they're saying in this legislation as well.

The member also said that there were 375 campaign platform commitments that they're planning to get through. Well, I looked through their platform. I didn't see this in there, so that's very concerning to me. Once again, they do not have a mandate to pass this legislation.

The member also went on about the fact that even if they did come clean about how this legislation actually works, the teachers and the nurses, well, they still might not support it. Well, maybe you should have had that conversation before you brought Bill 22 forward. That might have been a good place to start.

Now, another point that the minister made was that we are pulling the cloth over the eyes of Albertans, that teachers and nurses and other public-sector workers that are affected by this – essentially, what the member is saying is that these members of our public sector, people who are incredibly intelligent, who are some of the highest educated people in our province, can't take the time to learn about what this legislation does. I imagine the 50 or so teachers and nurses and other public-sector workers who are in this gallery right now know exactly what is happening in this legislation, and it's not because of press releases that we've made or conversations that we've had through social media or, as the member states, that the "liberal media" has brought forward. I imagine that in the limited amount of time that they've had, unfortunately, because of the speed at which this government is trying to move through this legislation, they have looked at what is in this legislation, and they're very concerned. That's what they're trying to take to this member. Unfortunately, they are not listening, and that's very concerning to me.

How are the members that are sitting in the gallery today, the members of the public sector who are going to be affected by Bill 22 and the attacks on their pensions, how are they supposed to trust this government when just this week the minister of agriculture said that the federal government needs to impose antiworker back-to-work legislation against the Teamsters, the railway workers that are trying to fight for safer conditions in their workplace? To have a minister of this House try and call on the federal government to impose something that is protected by Supreme Court rulings is absolutely shameful, Mr. Speaker.

How are the members of the public sector supposed to trust that this government has their best interests when on other files we've seen – once again, with Bill 9 the government was in negotiations with public-sector workers: "Well, we'll just push those back a couple of months, and we'll see how things go. Oh, well, now the MacKinnon report has come back, and we think you should actually take a 5 per cent rollback." That is not respectful to our public-sector workers, and that is exactly why those same workers do not trust that this government has their best interests at heart. And, really, who could blame them? Who could blame them?

The fact is that the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction and the Finance minister and every other person on the government side who has stood up today have not addressed our concerns, concerns about: "Why are we doing this in the first place without consultation? And if there is a real reason for this to move forward, why haven't you shared it with the public? Why haven't you shared it with this House? Why haven't you tabled the documents showing that AIMCo can actually get a better return?" If that conversation happened before you brought forward this legislation, then maybe this wouldn't be happening.

The Speaker: Hon. member, I hesitate to interrupt, but according to Government Motion 35 after one hour of debate all questions that remain for second reading need to be put. As such, we are on amendment RA1.

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mrs. Pitt in the chair]

The Chair: Hon. members, I'd like to call Committee of the Whole to order.

Bill 22 Reform of Agencies, Boards and Commissions and Government Enterprises Act, 2019

The Chair: Are there any members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. It's great to see progress as we proceed through the evening.

With that, I do have an amendment that I would like to move. I have the appropriate number of copies for the pages and will await your instructions.

The Chair: Hon. Government House Leader, this will be known as amendment A1. Please proceed.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'm moving the following amendment to Bill 22, Reform of Agencies, Boards and Commissions and Government Enterprises Act, 2019. The bill is amended as follows: (a), section 13(11) is amended by striking out the proposed section 153.093(2)(f) and substituting the following:

- (f) The responsibility for an investigation commenced by the Election Commissioner under section 153.09 of this Act or section 44.95 of the Election Finances and Contributions Disclosure Act before the coming into force of this section is transferred to the person who holds the position of Election Commissioner, who may continue the investigation.

And (b), section 24 is amended by striking out "Sections 14 to 17" and substituting "Sections 20 to 23."

There are two sections to this amendment. I will speak to the second first, Madam Chair, if that works for you, that being (b) in regard to the language around section 24. That is a simple amendment that was caught by drafters in government legal counsel as they proceeded through with this legislation. It is a minor modification. I don't anticipate any concerns with that. Drafters, as you know, do excellent work when they're putting together legislation, but it is very complicated and dry, and sometimes they catch one of these on the way.

In regard to section (a) it doesn't change anything within the current bill that is coming to Committee of the Whole in regard to investigations, as has been stated by the government along the way through the discussion in regard to Bill 22, Madam Chair. Investigations will continue. The Election Commissioner's office, if Bill 22 passes this Chamber, will move under the Chief Electoral Officer. That position will remain, and any investigations that are taking place can continue through that process. Processes have existed in this province for over a century, as you know. But the one change that we'd like to make and why I'm moving this amendment is to make sure that it's clear so that everyone understands that, particularly given the ongoing fearmongering from the Official Opposition, making the change to make it crystal clear what the legislation always did say; that is, that investigations will pass on to the Election Commissioner and the Chief Electoral Officer, going forward, with this legislation.

I think that's important to clarify in a clear way for Albertans along the way, Madam Chair, and also to reinforce the fact that we will be moving, if Bill 22 passes this Chamber, to the same system that exists in the province of Manitoba and the federal government, which are the only two jurisdictions in our country that have an Election Commissioner. Every other province does not have an Election Commissioner. They just have a Chief Electoral Officer, the point being that we will run this under one organization going forward, as it had been in our province prior to 2018 and had been for over a century in this province.

Interestingly enough, Madam Chair, is actually the way the current Election Commissioner has recommended to other governments in the past, including the Northwest Territories, with their white paper in I believe 2006 – I may be off on the date but within that range – making it clear that it makes the most sense, when you're managing election systems, both from the investigative perspective but as well as managing elections, that you do that from one agency. I think that's important. That's what this legislation does. I do hope that all members of the Chamber will support this minor amendment to make it clear that investigations will be continuing and protected under this legislation.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, and thank you to the member for this amendment. I have just a question for him. I agree that section 13(1)(f) – the language here is slightly different, but it still says “may continue the investigation.” In your remarks you said very clearly “will” and that this was for certainty that the investigations that may have been started will continue, yet the word “may” is still there. If you could please explain that.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Madam Chair, a few of my colleagues may have some other comments, particularly those that are lawyers in the Chamber. I do see the hon. the Municipal Affairs minister is itching, it looks like, to get up in Committee of the Whole this evening, and I'm looking forward to hearing his comments from a legal perspective. As you know, I'm proud not to be a lawyer. I do advertise that quite often in Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre.

But there are two different issues that I think the hon. member is confusing. The transfer of investigations: it's clear within this amendment. It was clear within the legislation prior to this anyway, but this does make the language more clear for people when they're reading the legislation that it will transfer. The hon. member seems to be indicating that the Legislature would then indicate to an independent officer of the Legislature what investigations they will continue with or how they will proceed with investigations. That would be wrong, in our opinion. It is not the place of this House or any member of this Assembly to indicate to an independent officer of the Legislature what investigations they go forward with. We don't have that information, and in addition to that, it is important that they remain independent from political interference and continue to do their work. To do what the hon. member seems to be suggesting would actually, Madam Chair, I submit to her through you, be getting into a level of political interference, something that the government is not prepared to do.

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Madam Chair. As the Government House Leader noted, I am one of the few lawyers in this House – I am one of the few lawyers in the House, hon. members – so I just want to provide a very narrow comment on the question that is asked by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods on the use of “may,” “shall,” “will,” or “must” . . .

An Hon. Member: And “can.”

Mr. Madu: . . . and “can.” You know, let's bear in mind that the purpose of this amendment, as the House leader rightly said, is to make sure that there isn't any political interference. One of the difficulties between us, members on this side and members opposite, is always this game of philosophical differences and fight when it comes to a matter that is common sense or that is of substance in nature. There are numerous occasions in which the courts have had to interpret the word “may” to “shall.” But what they want us to do with respect to this particular bill is to tie the hands of the Election Commissioner to act in a certain way, which I think would be highly inappropriate. The whole essence is to make sure that that particular officer is independent, uses his own judgment and powers and discretion as has been given to him under the law without the NDP telling that particular member how to do their work.

Legally speaking, again, this is a typical example of how members opposite have inflamed the debate and discussion around this particular issue. My hope is that at some point, you know, they would put aside their extreme ideological partisanship and focus on the issues before them. Courts have interpreted – there are several instances in which the courts have held how to interpret the words “may,” “shall,” and if it becomes an issue for that particular officer, I am confident that that officer will deal with it because under the proposed legislation he would have the authority to deal with that particular issue.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Mr. Ellis: Well, thank you very much, Madam Chair. I, too, am very proud not to be a lawyer in this Legislature, but I also want to thank the Minister of Municipal Affairs for his comments because he's correct. You know, I was just talking to my friend from Leduc-

Beaumont, who was also a police officer, and one of the things as a former investigator, both him and myself, is that we have the officer discretion. When a complaint comes in, it's not something that we shall do; this is something that we may do, and we use that officer discretion to either continue on with the investigation or not continue on with the investigation. I do agree with my learned friend the hon. Member for Edmonton-South West that you do not want to tie the hands of an investigator, and you must allow them to have that discretion.

With that, I will conclude my remarks. I thank the House leader for this amendment. I think it is an amendment that provides a lot of clarity for this bill. Thank you very much.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. It's my privilege to rise and speak to this amendment. Now, I may not be a lawyer, but I think there's a difference between "may" and "shall." You know, we could just use an example, say, of the Bible. There are the 10 commandments. I don't think they said: thou may not kill. Like, you may, you may not, maybe. It's pretty clear in the context of the Bible: "thou shalt not." Now, there is a difference between "may" and "shall." This does not ensure that the investigation will continue.

But you know what, Madam Chair? This amendment is irrelevant to the extent that what this bill does is fire the very person who is in the middle of an investigation. That doesn't erase the fact that nowhere in Canada have we ever seen this type of legislation. The Leader of the Official Opposition framed it really well when she said: this is equivalent to if the Prime Minister fired the lead investigator into the SNC-Lavalin case in the middle of the investigation. It's an unprecedented move to eliminate the very position of the person who has open investigations. I mean, this is a very, very serious matter. In fact, that's exactly why the Leader of the Official Opposition refused to apologize and is not in the House at the current moment. This is an unprecedented attack on democracy.

Now, what's astounding – I mean, so far tonight we've talked mostly about the changes to the teachers' pension. If the argument is simply that it's going to save money, then I really don't understand why the government couldn't bother to talk to the teachers. I find it also offensive and reflects a naive understanding of how the ATA works and that somehow either teachers are all New Democrats or – I'm not sure what.

Mr. Jason Nixon: No, they're not.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much. They're not.

Anyone who says "teachers are all" and put them into a political party box is incorrect. But I can tell you that teachers are upset, most teachers. I don't care what political party they belong to, which way they voted. They're upset because this government is without notice, without consultation, without conversation – the very people who claim that big government is bad. Guess what you're being? Big Brother. You're taking their pension and saying: "We know better. We know where your pension should be. We're going to give it to AIMCo to manage." Now, again, as I've said before, I have the utmost respect for AIMCo. I know that they have delivered good results, but if the teachers – well, first of all, the teachers should have been asked and should be given a choice, not forced through legislation. It speaks volumes, quite frankly, to how the government views consultation and actually having conversations with people.

I mean, that's one of the issues that I have with this current omnibus bill.

I mean, the other thing is that this government has three massive omnibus bills that are before this House right now. Now, Madam Chair, you'll remember in the last four years the number of times members of the former caucus of the Wildrose would stand up and say: how can we debate a piece of legislation this thick when it's only been tabled a day or two ago? I heard it over and over again in the last four years. I know that there are members who remember saying it and who have heard it. I know the Government House Leader may have made comments like that once or twice or maybe more than that.

The point is, Madam Chair, that this legislation was introduced less than 48 hours ago. We've moved into Committee of the Whole. We've gone through second reading. We didn't spend as much time as we would've liked, and now we're in committee. We know that the government intends to, should the House all vote in favour of passage, move this bill through before the end of the week. Now, if that does happen, that's unprecedented. In Alberta a piece of legislation like this has not been introduced and passed through all readings in the same week, let alone a piece of legislation that fires the person who has open, active investigations, and that person now will be terminated. Now, I mean, nobody believes the government when they say: well, he could be hired back. Okay. I guess in theory, sure. I doubt that's going to happen.

The other thing is why do we need this piece of legislation to be passed at breakneck speed, Madam Chair? What is the government afraid of? What does the commissioner know that they don't want to come to the surface? We know that he was scheduled to come in front of Public Accounts next week. Again, you know what? Maybe it's not either of those two reasons. I would love for the government to rise and say, "The reason we need to move this at breakneck speed is because of X," and then we can have a robust discussion about that.

Madam Chair, this piece of legislation makes changes to teachers' pensions without the very people being consulted. Again, you know, coming from a government that claims they like small government: well, clearly, you don't. Your actions are the opposite.

Again, with actions for removing the office of the person who's had over 800 complaints when it comes to the election and election irregularities – now, I would hope that everyone in this House stands for democracy and transparency and wants to ensure that Albertans have a voice and a mechanism, if there are concerns about the election, of how they can be resolved. Quite frankly, the reason that this position was created is because those complaints weren't adequately being resolved or explored, and we heard that from Albertans. To say that it's now rolled into one position, that it's the same thing: it's not the same thing, Madam Chair.

Albertans are concerned. I mean, we've had letters pouring in, not just from teachers. I believe on the teacher file that over 29,000 letters have come in. I know for a fact that every single member in this House has letters coming into the constituency office, and if you stand up and say that you don't, I know that is incorrect. I know that there are letters coming in. They aren't chain letters, Madam Chair; they're from teachers that are writing letters individually and sending them in, expressing their shock that this government would, without their permission, without their input, without any of their questions, make massive changes to their pensions, changing the joint governance, lowering the number of representatives that sit on the pension board. Again, the Finance minister can talk about: we're not changing joint governance. Well, you're changing the number of people in joint governance. So okay. There will be a representative but not the same number that existed before this bill came in.

There's a reason, Madam Chair, that until recently we had about 50 people in the gallery watching the discussion – that's just here – let alone the thousands of people that are watching this debate throughout the province. Teachers, quite frankly, are shocked. This government did not campaign on making sweeping changes to their pensions without talking to them about it first. Like, who do you think you are? To stand up and say: we won with a – well, you didn't win an autocracy. You didn't win every single vote in this province. You didn't win every single vote in your own riding. Nobody did. So to say that you somehow have carte blanche to do whatever you want – I don't know when Alberta turned from a democratic province to whatever this government thinks it is now, where they answer to no one.

Madam Chair, for the purposes of this amendment I appreciate what the Government House Leader is saying it will do. You know what? Even if I give him the benefit of the doubt – I know he can be a good guy – it doesn't change the fact and the reason that I cannot support this bill. It cannot be improved through an amendment. In fact, we could put up 5,000 amendments, and it still would not fix this bill. This bill needs to be torn up, and the government needs to go and talk to the teachers, find out what they want to do with their money. If the teachers say, "Yes, you know what? We're happy to move from the ATRF to AIMCo," then okay. I wouldn't stand up here and have a problem. If the teachers voted on what they wanted to do with their pension and they voted, "We want to move it," that's their democratic right. I would support that. But to stand and say it's going to save money, yet the board – and I'd appreciate if the Finance minister will clarify this because from his previous comments he had said that the ATRF board will still have oversight or still be involved as far as how the funds are being invested. Then where's that cost savings? The board is doing their exact same work, only now they actually don't have the authority to direct how the money is being invested.

The other thing is – and maybe the government would have a little bit of a rationale or a leg to stand on if the ATRF was really poorly performing and AIMCo's return on investment was much higher. Even then I would say that you still need to ask the teachers. It's their money. But the ATRF is performing better than AIMCo. The teachers didn't ask for this. The teachers haven't been consulted. Now, whether the government wants to go through the ATA or talk to teachers directly, that's fine. But I will remind all members that the ATA is a professional organization, so it is extremely disrespectful for any member to talk poorly about the ATA. I can tell you that they will not be very happy when they hear the comments that were made by the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction. But they weren't consulted. No teacher was. Or if they were – you know what? If I'm wrong, then I'm happy for the Finance minister to stand up and say: here's a list of all of the teachers we've reached out to, maybe not individually by name, but these are the schools that we talked to to get input on whether or not we should move their pension funds.

In addition to my concerns about the pension changes, in summary, Madam Chair, this amendment is irrelevant to the extent that it doesn't change the fact that the very position that is undergoing active investigations is being fired. For that reason I will not be supporting this amendment.

The Chair: The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. Thank you for the opportunity to rise and talk about some of the things that the Official Opposition House Leader had to say and correct some of the record. First of all, I would not accuse the Official Opposition House Leader in any way of deliberately misrepresenting facts or misleading this Chamber because I don't think that was his intention. With that said, though, he spent a significant amount of time . . .

Mr. Bilous: Point of order: 23(h), (i), and (j). The Speaker has ruled over and over again that you cannot do or say – you cannot back door a comment. What you would say – you can't impose it. I'm not thinking of the right words. You can't impute a motive of what you would say . . .

An Hon. Member: Indirectly.

Mr. Bilous: . . . indirectly what you can say directly. Thank you for that help. This was a team effort on this point of order. I appreciate that.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Rising on the point of order, I in no way was back dooring a comment. In fact, I was very, very clear that I don't think that at any point the Official Opposition House Leader would attempt to mislead the House. Unless he thinks me saying that he would not mislead the House is in some way saying that he would mislead the House, I don't even follow the logic. But you know what? Madam Chair, I'm feeling very charitable this evening, so I'll be happy to withdraw the comments that the Official Opposition House Leader would not mislead the House. I don't know what he's trying to say, but I'll let the people at home figure that out.

Back to the comments in regard to Public Accounts. This is the problem, Madam Chair, with this legislation and the NDP's approach to most of their files but particularly in the last few days in this legislation. The NDP continue to misrepresent facts whether deliberately or by accident, I think probably a combination of both. In this case I'll give the Official Opposition House Leader the benefit of the doubt. He's new to the Official Opposition side although this is his second time on that side of the House. I don't know if he has forgot the difference between standing committees, but he continues to say that the Election Commissioner was coming next week to the Public Accounts Committee. That is not factual. The Election Commissioner was not scheduled to attend the Public Accounts committee next week. That's not factual. That's the problem with the NDP's approach to this. They continue to say things that are not factual. How do they expect Albertans to believe them when they continue to do that?

An example yesterday: they continued to tell the media and everybody that they could that there was time allocation already moved on Bill 22 – not factual – and that they were only going to get three hours to debate Bill 22. Not factual. In fact, I was on my way in to question period today when I was speaking with the media. It was interesting to be able to have that conversation about the fact that the day before, the NDP told the media that they were only going to have three hours to be able to debate the bill, and the night before, we had already debated this bill for over four hours and were well on our way to much past four hours and will continue for a period of time significantly longer than that. So again not factual. Well, how can Albertans believe a party that at the very least gets it wrong so much?

Now, the Election Commissioner was scheduled, like all independent officers of the Legislature, to come to the Standing Committee on Legislative Offices. I don't know if the hon. member has the privilege of being a member of the Standing Committee on Legislative Offices or if he ever has. I do know that I have had the privilege of being a member of the Standing Committee on Legislative Offices for several years, Madam Chair, and I can inform you that the Election Commissioner and the Chief Electoral Officer and the Ethics Commissioner and the Auditor General and the Ombudsman and the Privacy Commissioner and the Child and Youth Advocate and on and on: those independent officers of the Legislature do report to the Standing Committee on Legislative Offices to talk about their budget. That is what was scheduled for next week, Madam Chair, when it came to the Election Commissioner, to discuss his budget, not to discuss investigations of any kind. In fact, that would not happen. In no way would the Standing Committee on Legislative Offices try to politically interfere in any sort of investigations, and I don't think any member on that committee from any party would try to politically interfere in an investigation. So why all of a sudden do the NDP want to give the impression that the Election Commissioner would go to the Standing Committee on Legislative Offices to talk about some sort of investigation?

Madam Chair, you know. I think, in fact, if I recall, you were a member of the Standing Committee on Legislative Offices for a while, maybe you still are. I don't know. You know what the process is. It just becomes kind of ridiculous when the NDP misrepresent facts so much to Albertans. How do I now as a member of this place who is trying to listen to their ideas when it comes to this legislation at this point, in Committee of the Whole – hopefully, the hon. members bring forward some amendments that may or may not benefit this legislation from the government's perspective. I hope they do bring forward some that will benefit it. If it happens, I'm sure the hon. the Minister of Finance will be happy to pass those amendments to be able to make his legislation better. But how could he even trust the Official Opposition now, when they misrepresent so many facts just on one piece of legislation over the last couple of days? How can any Albertan who is paying any level of attention trust the NDP? Now, I guess, Madam Chair, that's why the NDP are the only one-term government in the history of the province and they were fired in April. But I digress.

Some of the other concerns that the hon. Opposition House Leader has raised I found quite offensive, frankly, Madam Chair, in regard to the CEO of Elections Alberta, an organization that has overseen elections in this province for over a century. For over a century it has overseen the elections in this province. I have met the current CEO of Elections Alberta several times, particularly in my capacity as a member of the Standing Committee on Legislative Offices, and know that my experience with him – in fact, I sat on the Select Special Ethics and Accountability Committee, that was put together by the hon. Opposition House Leader's current leader when she was the Premier of Alberta. The current CEO of Elections Alberta sat on that committee with us for several months, doing important work as we went through the process of revising election laws inside the province of Alberta. My experience with him is that he has always acted in a nonpartisan way. He has been very, very competent in his capacity as the CEO of Elections Alberta and certainly has shown no reason for anybody not to trust him or for any member of this House to indicate that they don't trust the CEO of Elections Alberta or Elections Alberta to do the important work that they've done in this province for a century.

I will point out to you that the current CEO of Elections Alberta was reappointed by an NDP government when the NDP government had control of the Standing Committee on Legislative Offices and could have appointed anybody that they liked. So, clearly, it appears that they trusted Glen Resler to do that job. But then I just watched the Official Opposition House Leader rise and say that there were not adequate investigations going on, that issues were not being resolved when it came to our election system, Madam Chair. That's a direct attack, from my perspective, on an independent officer of this Legislature, to even imply that the CEO of Elections Alberta and Elections Alberta were in some way not doing their job when they had that capacity.

I'd say that at the very least maybe it's indicating that the NDP, who are now the Official Opposition, when they were in government seemed to have some sort of a problem with the Chief Electoral Officer. I don't know why they reappointed him, then, if that was the case, but to stand in this House and say that about an independent officer of this Legislature, Madam Chair, I would submit to you is offensive and, quite frankly, shameful, and the hon. member should apologize to the Chief Electoral Officer.

I do note that the Official Opposition House Leader again glosses over a couple of very important facts. The first is that not one province – I don't know if every hon. member knows this – in this country has an independent Chief Electoral Officer and an independent Election Commissioner, not one province except for Alberta, who just got that recently, in 2018, after the then NDP government forced it through under time allocation. Then Government House Leader Brian Mason forced it through under time allocation and brought in a separate office, making us different from any other jurisdiction in the country. At the time the legacy parties that make up the current government – actually, no. We were already merged, Madam Chair. The current party that makes up the government in the province of Alberta had lots of protests about that idea because the structure was wrong.

You know, Madam Chair, who made it so clear that the structure was wrong? The current Election Commissioner. The current Election Commissioner that the hon. members are referring to has written advice to other provincial and territorial governments, including the Northwest Territories, advising them how to structure offices around elections. I used the quote in question period the other day, as the hon. members may remember. It makes it clear that it makes no sense to separate the management and the investigation of our elections, and it makes sense to keep them in one capacity. Now, there are two jurisdictions in this country, and soon to be three if Bill 22 is passed into law in the coming days, that have an Election Commissioner and a CEO of Elections Alberta or Elections Canada, but they are in the same office. The Election Commissioner works for the Chief Electoral Officer of Elections Manitoba, Elections Canada, and, if Bill 22 passes, Elections Alberta.

Now, the other thing that the Official Opposition House Leader said – and I think this just proves the point that the NDP will just say anything. You'd think that after all these years I would have already figured that out, but sometimes it just quite shocks me. When you see the Official Opposition House Leader get up and say with a straight face that this bill will get rid of the office – he said it, Madam Chair – of the Election Commissioner, that hon. member must know if he read the bill that that is not factual. Or he didn't read the bill, and I don't know why he would comment on it and say some sort of office had been replaced inside that legislation if that is not the fact. The Election Commissioner's office remains in place. The staff that are within the Election Commissioner's office remain in place.

The idea that all of a sudden when the Election Commissioner's office and the process of investigations is brought back into the same system that used it for a hundred years that somehow information or serious investigations that may or may not be happening would automatically just puff and disappear is ridiculous, first of all, but, second of all, just a complete and utter attack on the Chief Electoral Officer and Elections Alberta. Madam Chair, that is what the Official Opposition is saying when they say that.

The people that will come and take over those files and those investigations and any of the information that may be in the Election Commissioner's office are not me. It's not the Premier of Alberta. It's not any member of this cabinet. It's not any member of this Legislature on either side of the aisles. It's not the Standing Committee on Legislative Offices. Do you know who it is, Madam Chair? It is the Chief Electoral Officer of Alberta, an independent officer of this Legislature who has served this province for a very long time, served it with integrity, and has never, as far as I know, been accused of any wrongdoing that I am aware of – certainly, if he was, I don't know why the NDP would have reappointed him – and has brought forward several elections without any complaint, including the last election and an election before that, where the then Jim Prentice PC government called a snap election a year before an election was supposed to be called. I know that I ran in that election, and I don't recall any significant problems. There are always problems in an election because it's pretty complicated to run an election across a province the size of this province, but no major problems. He was able to bring in the 29th and 30th Legislature, in my experience, with no problem.

Now he – wherever he is, if he's watching this – has to get up and watch the Official Opposition House Leader, the Leader of the Opposition's right hand inside this Chamber, and watch him say with a straight face that somehow, Madam Chair, the Chief Electoral Officer is going to make investigations disappear. It's appalling. To repeatedly say that inside this place is just offensive.

If there is some reason that that member knows of that the Chief Electoral Officer would do that, it's certainly his responsibility as a member of the Legislature to go to the Standing Committee on Legislative Offices. But it seems to me that he has indicated that he's not a member of, but as you know, Madam Chair, any member of this Legislature can attend a standing committee meeting at any time. He should inform the chair that there's a reason that the Chief Electoral Officer cannot be trusted with investigations, because I'm certain the Chamber needs to know that.

But you know what, Madam Chair? I suspect he won't go out of this Chamber and say that about the Chief Electoral Officer. He won't go out and say that about Elections Alberta anywhere but in this Chamber where he enjoys parliamentary immunity. If he truly believes that the Chief Electoral Officer and Elections Alberta are so corrupt – and they're not – that they would somehow make investigations disappear, he should march out and he should tell that to the TV cameras. If he really thinks that about Glen Resler, the independent officer of this Legislature in charge of our elections, he should leave this room where he has parliamentary immunity and go and tell those TV cameras what he just did there. You know what? He won't do it. He won't do it because it's not true.

The CEO of Elections Alberta has operated with integrity in the entire time that I have had the privilege of serving inside this Chamber. He deserves better than that from the Official Opposition, Madam Chair. Again, watching the NDP approach legislation like this just shows you again why Albertans fired them. It just shows you again why they probably will never return to government in our lifetime, and, as I predict, if this is how they're going to approach Official Opposition, they'll be the third party and then eventually not even a party inside this Chamber.

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Madam Chair. You know, I just wanted to add my voice as the Member of the Legislature for Edmonton-South West to the ongoing debate on Bill 22.

You know, Madam Chair, I have listened to the contributions coming from the members opposite on key issues contained in Bill

22. Number one, the office of the Election Commissioner and the teachers' pension – let me say this about the Election Commissioner. I listened to the Member for St. Albert in her remarks say that the Election Commissioner has fined the UCP and their operatives. Again, this goes to show the level of misinformation designed to cause fear and anxiety out there. Let's be clear. The Election Commissioner has not fined the United Conservative Party, and as I've always said . . .

Ms Renaud: Just your operatives.

Mr. Madu: I'm sure that Hansard would confirm that you said "the UCP and their operatives."

That was the language expressly used by the Member for St. Albert, and that goes to show some of the difficulties that I, quite frankly, have had with members opposite. In my very few remarks before this House I have appealed to them to focus on facts and the substance before this particular House and not political theatre, looking into these cameras in this Chamber. Again, to be clear, the Election Commissioner has not fined the UCP as a political party.

But coming to the substance of the bill before this particular House, you know, what we have had – Madam Chair, speaking through you to everybody out there, and there are citizens listening across this particular province – from the NDP is to say that we have, by this particular bill, fired the office of the Election Commissioner and that it is designed to gut the investigations against the UCP and their members.

11:00

Madam Chair, I just wanted to read into the record that section 153.093(2) of the bill reads:

On the coming into force of subsection (1), the following applies . . .

- (c) an existing cause of action, claim or liability to prosecution of, by or against the Office of the Election Commissioner is unaffected by the coming into force of this section and may be continued by or against the Office of the Chief Electoral Officer.

I've already addressed the legal meaning of may, shall, can, and will and how the courts of this land, including the highest court of this country, have looked at the interpretation and the application of those words. But no. The NDP would – [interjection] I can see why the Member for Edmonton-Decore would heckle because any time you speak the facts, it rattles them so bad because that is not what they're interested in. To anyone listening out there, that really is contained in this particular bill.

I will also go further to read into the record subsection (f), which says:

an investigation commenced by the Election Commissioner under section 153.09 of this Act or section 44.95 of the Election Finances and Contributions Disclosure Act before the coming into force of this section may be continued by the person who holds the position of Election Commissioner.

What we have been hearing in the media and online coming from the NDP and their allies is that this is designed to end the ongoing investigation by the Election Commissioner. To the contrary, and let me be clear to all those watching and listening tonight: all of those functions are preserved by the bill that is being debated before this particular House. Their fundamental problem, which is, again, a philosophical difference between those of us over here and the members opposite, is what they have always done. Prior to the introduction of the Election Commissioner, that office was never in existence for the more than 100 years that this province has had to manage elections. [interjection]

Again, Member for St. Albert, there is another point, remember, between those of us over here and the members opposite. Whilst we will stay quiet and allow them to speak – we will give them all the time they require to speak – they would never allow those of us over here to say what we want to say. Under the Westminster parliamentary system, when we allow you to speak and hear all that you have to say, it is common decency and courtesy that you would give the same to us. As a newly elected member of this House I am still hopefully looking forward to the day when that will be the case.

Again, there isn't anything that we have done other than to say to the NDP that we've had a system that has served us so well for more than 100 years and that we have never had any problem with. It has worked so well. We have a Chief Electoral Officer whose record is impeccable, an independent officer of this House who has had the honour of performing the particular jobs and responsibilities for a while, until the NDP said: "Hell, no. We must infuse our political ideology and division into our politics." That's exactly what this is all about, and they would want our citizens across this province to believe that this is anything other than their pursuit of their ideological purity. No, Madam Chair, I don't think that was what the people of this province voted for us to do.

You will recall that in the period leading up to the election, there was fear and smear and divisive and identity politics to the point where even their allies, the NDP and their allies, called my very self a white supremacist. You can go online and fact-check this. I still have the e-mail asking me to apologize for being a white supremacist. Many of them took to Twitter and Facebook echoing the sentiment. Again, why would they not sit down and pay attention to the facts? No. They are prepared to ignore the facts in pursuit of their ideological intention, which has always been to create fear amongst our citizens.

Madam Chair, I do not think that is what the people of this province voted for. I do not want to dwell too much on the Election Commissioner issue but simply to conclude on that particular point that if they think that returning this province to the system that virtually every single province, including the federal government, operates under – if they think that is bad, then in the next election they will have the opportunity to take that before the people of our province. With that, it is astonishing the level of fear that I have had to sit in this Chamber and see emanate from the members opposite.

I will now turn my attention to, again, one of their fear and smear – and I'm glad that some of our teachers are in the gallery tonight. Let me say to them that I have enormous respect for all of you, for all of our teachers. I have always said in public that I do not think that I would be standing before this people's Chamber if it were not for the men and women like our teachers. Many of you here know where I come from and my history. Education is something that I do not toy with. If it were not for education, I do not think that I would be here speaking to this particular bill. I want our teachers to know that there is nothing that we have proposed, in giving AIMCo the responsibility to manage the investment portion of your pension, that is an attempt to gut or destroy or, in the language of the members opposite, to take over your pension.

You know, Madam Chair, AIMCo, as a fund management company, manages all kinds of funds from endowment funds to pension plans to government funds to special proposed funds. Some of the funds currently under the management of AIMCo are the local authorities pension plan, the public service pension plan, the special forces pension plan, and the management employees pension plan. The entire public service's pension plans, all of those plans, are under the management of AIMCo.

For the NDP to sit in this particular Chamber and say that this is a takeover by this side of the House, you know, to somehow weaken the particular pension that is for the interest and benefit of teachers is ridiculous. I mean, nothing could be further from the truth. Again, it is always a case of fearmongering. But I think that at the root of this particular issue is the world view of the NDP. For those of you who have had the opportunity to take a look at the NDP constitution, there is something that is called socialism, and oftentimes we accuse them of being socialists. Many of them have also had to stand up in this particular House and want to run away from that, but in their own constitution, appendix C of the NDP constitution, under the Principles and Aims of the Alberta New Democratic Party, they say this:

Socialism is essentially the application of democracy to the economy.

Member Irwin: Point of order.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Point of Order Relevance

Member Irwin: Thank you. Yes. Under consideration right now we have an amendment that is relevant to something other than what the member is talking about, so under 23(b). He's speaking about our party constitution, which is not relevant, and I would urge you to call this out of order.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I know that in Committee of the Whole there is certainly a broad latitude. I believe that the member was certainly bringing his story into a direction that of course is part of what we are discussing right now in Committee of the Whole. I would argue that this is purely a matter of debate, and I hope that the member will be able to continue with his story.

Thank you.

The Chair: Hon. members, discussions frequently in this Chamber are not all on point at all times yet sometimes relevant to the discussion at hand. There has been a large breadth given to all members in this Assembly when it comes to that matter, but I would urge all members that, you know, temperatures are high. This is an emotional topic for many, and it's a good reminder for all members to focus on the task at hand.

The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs has the floor.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Madam Chair. There is no doubt that I am discussing Bill 22, which is what the amendment before us is all about. I also listened to the opposition leader talk about some of the things that pertain to Bill 22 but were not entirely focused on the amendment before this House.

Madam Chair, you know, I was referring the House to appendix C of the NDP constitution. This is their document, what they say they represent. Again, they wrote:

Socialism is essentially the application of democracy to the economy. Economic democracy, i.e. democratic socialism, assures production to supply the needs of all people. Decisions about what shall be produced, when and where, and decisions about where we shall make our living and under what conditions, are now left largely in the hands of private interests. The market economy produces transnational corporations, who give private profit priority over public interest, social justice and workplace democracy. Through the efforts of many, we have achieved a degree of social and political democracy. Economic democracy demands a co-operative rather than a competitive system . . .

The New Democratic Party believes that only a revolution in thinking can lead to the establishment of democratic socialism.

Madam Chair, half of how we determine how we build a society that we can be proud of and that our children can be proud of is the lens with which we view the world.

Here you have the NDP, you know, when they were in office, when they were in government twice using closure to appoint the current Election Commissioner, and they also used closure on Bill 6. They have used it twice while they were in office, minimum twice, something that they have today stood in this particular House to attack us on. It's the height of hypocrisy. You will hear them argue: oh, circumstances are different. No, circumstances are not different. The fact remains that you've used something that you've called undemocratic. That is exactly the language that many of their members have used tonight to describe what happened in this House tonight, undemocratic. It's something that they've used at least twice. To every member in this particular House and to all members, everyone listening: that is what we are dealing with from the NDP.

Again, the corollary to that as well is our desire on our part to make sure that we run efficient government, to make sure that we depart from what we saw in the last four years, a previous government that believed that, you know, you can tax anything that runs or is standing. They would want us to pour money on any problem that they see out there without an opportunity to think through that system, to make sure that the system is actually serving the taxpayers of this province well. No wonder that here you have a political party that knows how to spend money without end, that doesn't understand that there's only one pot of money, that we don't pluck money from trees, that there's no pot there kept somewhere where we go and dip our hands to get money, and that there's only one taxpayer, who is either our citizens or our corporations.

What did they do? They like to complain about consultation, but they brought the largest multibillion dollars in taxes, that they did not consult with the people of Alberta on. They did not have a democratic mandate to impose that multibillion dollars in tax.

The Chair: The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Madam Chair. It's my pleasure to stand up and speak to the amendment to Bill 22, Reform of Agencies, Boards and Commissions and Government Enterprises Act, 2019. Just so we're clear, we're talking about this amendment. Yes, I listened to the minister talk a lot about, you know, what we're saying: it is incorrect, there's no harm here, there's nothing to worry about, trust us. The reality is that this is your amendment. That means something.

The other part is that – I understand that you're a lawyer; I am most definitely not a lawyer – I do have issue with some words. As I listened to you talk about the words – and I'm not going to make any lawyer jokes or anything. Here's the thing. I'm going to play off what my colleague said earlier. There's a difference between "You may pay your fines for collusion" and "You will pay your fines for collusion." Do you see how that works, how that word works in a sentence? There's a big difference, and your amendment misses it. In my opinion, this amendment is really just trying to appease someone because I believe, Madam Chair, that the government understands that there is a massive amount of protest, blowback, and concern with this piece of legislation.

Although I do appreciate the government's attempt to make this really, really large, overreaching, unconsulted, undemocratic in my opinion, piece of legislation a little bit better, Madam Chair, you missed, because what you needed to put in here is, absolutely, "will." Don't leave any wiggle room, because I think that we all know in this place that it's really important to have language that doesn't allow for the wiggle room, that makes it very clear. "Shall," "will": that's clear. "May": not so clear.

Let's move on a little bit from the particular wording in here. The minister spoke up and just talked a little bit about: the opposition is really sort of making hay with this bill, and really, instead of raising legitimate concerns, what they're doing is creating division. Madam Chair, I take issue with that. I would say that causing division is perhaps having something like a little secret war room to report un-Albertan activities. Something like that would be divisive. Something like aligning yourself with a group like, say, Rebel media, that spreads hate and lies: that's dividing. What we are doing is our job, and we're opposing a piece of legislation that is, in my opinion, an overreach that is hard to describe.

Yeah. Talk about consultation: if you are going to take away whatever control exists for teachers and for other pension holders, the very least you could do is speak to them, and you didn't do that because, once again, you know better, but we're supposed to trust you, just like – you know, I think back, Madam Chair. Trust is a big thing, and I think that even if it was the correct thing to do – let's just say that moving these pensions was the correct thing to do and that it made sense for everybody, for government, for Albertans – you have to ask, you have to consult them, you have to speak to them. Why do you think they're speaking out by the tens of thousands? They're not okay with this. This attempt to try to make it better and then tell us that the language is, "Well, you know, you should know that this will work, no problem" – that's not right. That's not fair. I mean, you might get a gold medal for linguistic gymnastics, but that's about it.

I'd like to go and talk a little bit about – I read this article. I wish I would have written down the title of it. It's from, I think, the International Monetary Fund. It was an article about corruption in government, and one of the quotes that stuck with me said: corruption distorts government priorities. I would, Madam Chair, expand that a little bit to say that even the perception of that distorts government priorities because the government priorities should be – certainly, we have a different lens. We look at things through a different lens. But when you start to spend so much energy and time trying to silence people and to silence opposition, to limit debate, to not consult, to miss all of those really important steps that are part of our democracy, you are distorting the government priorities, and that's what this is about.

Now, I listened to the House leader kind of go on about: well, we have this position; we don't need the Election Commissioner. I would say simply, looking at the track record of the Election Commissioner in the last little while, that I'm pretty happy he was there. I don't know about you all, Madam Chair. I don't know about the people that have been fined. There are, like, $211,000 worth of fines, and if I'm not mistaken – perhaps I am, and if I'm to be corrected, then I will be – the independent Election Commissioner referred something to the RCMP. That seems pretty serious.

For anybody watching at home, if you are unclear on the role of an independent officer, the independent Election Commissioner, that, yes, is a new position, that was a new position, it was put in place for a reason, because if there is anything that we do in this place, it's that we protect and defend the democracy, the electoral process – and that includes the money that goes into the electoral process – so that every single Albertan's vote matters just as much as their neighbours'. Dark money should not influence our elections. It should be about each individual Albertan casting a vote. It's pretty simple.

This additional layer of oversight was welcome. I welcomed it because I think that if you want to say that you promote transparency and you are a protector of democracy, you do stuff like this. This is what you do. I think that if we look back at the history of this tiny, little office – and it's not a big office – they've been pretty productive. They've been quite busy. They identified where people chose to not respect the law: $211,000 worth of fines. That's something. That is something.

For those watching along at home, if you have your computer or smart phone, I would say: check it out. It's at the office of the Alberta Election Commissioner. It talks about the role of this position, and it talks about the legislation that guides it. It's really straightforward, it's really easy to understand, and you can see why a position like this for independent oversight is so important.

The job of the Election Commissioner is to ensure compliance with and enforcement of the Election Act, the Election Finances and Contributions Disclosure Act and certain aspects of the Local Authorities Election Act. Non-compliance and enforcement matters relating to federal elections do not fall within [this], just so we're clear.

Now, I think the House leader, Madam Chair, if I'm not mistaken, earlier was trying to say something about us standing up and saying that the termination of this position was somehow being disrespectful to another position. Well, that's not true. These are two very independent positions. They do different things, and I would think that they would welcome each other's help. That's a fair amount of work. To properly oversee a provincial election is kind of a big deal. I continue to ask myself, like: why on earth would this particular government be so focused on getting rid of this person? Well, if you go to the website and you have a scroll in, you can read, you can learn quite a bit about this position. You might get a sense of why this government is really focused on getting rid of this position.

But let's focus on the actual commissioner.

[Mr.] Gibson was Alberta's 5th Chief Electoral Officer . . .

That's great: lots of experience.

. . . from June 2006 to March 2009 and previously held the position of Deputy Chief Electoral Officer for Manitoba. [He] has been working in the election field as an election administrator and an election management consultant for more than 20 years. He is a recognized expert in the area of election law enforcement. Lorne Gibson was a public representative on the Discipline Committee of the Manitoba Law Society . . . and a member of the Appeals Committee for the College of Registered Nurses . . .

I don't think any of us will dispute that this is an incredibly appropriate person for this role. I think that if you look at even the last few months, what this person in a very small office – I think that it's just the commissioner and actually four full-time employees that are doing all of this work.

So, you know, going back to what the government told us, Madam Chair, that really they were just getting rid of this position to save money, that it's all about saving money – that's it; it's just about saving money – yeah, Albertans don't buy that. Albertans do not buy that. A million dollars over five years and you are going to chip away at the oversight of provincial elections? That's not right. I don't buy it.

Back to the amendment. This is very clearly the government saying: "I think we made a mistake. Let's try to fix it. Let's try to fix this piece a little bit." Only you missed it again, because you didn't include the language that you needed to. What you needed to include was not "may" but "shall" and "will," and you missed it. This amendment misses it. You missed it.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Madam Chair. Actually, I am very thrilled to see this amendment come out. I think it makes it crystal clear that any investigation or anything going on before the act comes into power will carry on. In the first revision the word is correct. The opposition has pointed out that it does say that before the coming into force of this section, it "may" be continued by the person.

But the amendment clearly changes that, and the article isn't "shall" or "will". It's actually "is." That's the article that changes it and makes all the difference, in my mind, even though I'm not a lawyer.

The responsibility for an investigation commenced by the Election Commissioner by section 153.09 of this Act or section 44.95 of the Election Finances and Contributions Disclosure Act before the coming into force of this section is transferred . . .

"Is transferred." "Is" is a definitive article, if I remember what my mother, who was a teacher, taught me. I really appreciate that definitive article being in there. It makes all the difference to me.

That's why I am thrilled to support this amendment to make it very clear not only for us but for everybody who's partaking in this bill that any investigation is transferred. What that independent officer, at arm's-length from any elected official, chooses to do with that investigation is up to them. That's where the word "may" comes into force, their actions at that point in time. It would be entirely inappropriate for any elected official in this House to direct an independent officer in what they should and should not do. To me, it's very clear – and I'm just a layperson; I'm not a lawyer – so I'm thrilled about that.

I'm also thrilled that in the act they may appoint the commissioner again. I would assume that with an office of this repute in Alberta, if they terminate an office and create a new office with the same name under an arm's-length, independent Chief Electoral Officer, they would pick somebody who was competent, educated, experienced, thorough, prudent. I would assume that someone with those characteristics may be the current Election Commissioner. Maybe he'll put his resumé in, and maybe he'll be chosen by that independent, arm's-length person if he fits the bill.

I am sure that the current Election Commissioner in his investigations must have taken some notes, maybe has some files, some contacts, come to some conclusions. I'm sure that it's not just stored in his brain. I'm sure that being a competent, educated, experienced, thorough, prudent investigator, he would have written that down and that those files would be transferred to whoever holds that position, whether it is the existing individual or whoever else is chosen because they are competent, educated, experienced, thorough, and prudent.

For me, this amendment needs to be highlighted, and the primary fact of why it is being brought here is to make it crystal clear that any investigation is transferred to that office. That's why I am very happy to support it and thankful that the government brought that forward for all of us who aren't lawyers to be able to understand it.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: The custom is that a member of the opposition will speak next, so I will recognize the Member for Edmonton-Decore and then a member from the government.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. I appreciate that because I have been itching for the last little while to speak to this amendment. I've heard some very, very interesting comments here as this has proceeded along.

[Mr. Hanson in the chair]

You know, like the Member for St. Albert, I too am not a lawyer. However, I do come from labour, Mr. Chair. I've served as a shop steward, I've served as a union representative with the local's membership as a whole, and I've sat on the bargaining committee – guess what? – working on language. So I was listening intently to the Minister of Municipal Affairs talking about how these words are interchangeable. I highly disagree, because we've seen, as an entire labour movement, fight after fight after arbitration after arbitration after grievance around the word “may.”

But you know what? I'm going to run with your idea here that they are interchangeable. Based on those comments from the Minister of Municipal Affairs and MLA for Edmonton-South West, that would mean that any future arbitrations, any future grievances, any future legal challenges arguing around the word “may” will now mean it's an automatic win for those people challenging that word that was used inappropriately.

If that's not the case and they're not able to succeed in those challenges, I would then assume that the government will step in, that the labour minister will say: “Oh, no. These are interchangeable words. They mean the same thing, so you have to award it to those grievors, to those ones submitting the arbitrations to the labour board.” I have a feeling that the people from labour are going to be very, very excited about that potential now, that they will no longer have to continue to fight that word “may.”

When I look at the implications that this amendment has, Mr. Chair, on the language that we currently have, when we talk about how the Election Commissioner will be terminated upon effect of this coming into force – and that refers to subsection (5) – in subsection (6) it says:

The person who, immediately before the coming into force of this section . . .

which, of course, would be our currently serving Election Commissioner, Mr. Gibson,

. . . held the office of Election Commissioner under this Act may be appointed.

So as soon as the act comes into force, he will now have his job again as the Election Commissioner, rolled into the elections office. That's how I understand it. That's your language. You're the expert telling me that he's getting terminated, and then he's immediately getting rehired right away to serve as Election Commissioner, which makes me feel a whole lot better because, of course, the Election Commissioner currently has somewhere in the neighbourhood of 800 different files that he is looking at. To take away the individual that has been working on that and depending on how long it would take to rehire somebody, it poses a significant problem, so I'm really glad that that transition now will be seamless.

The unfortunate part, Mr. Chair, is that, because of my experience, I know that that word is not the case, and I think we're going to have some problems moving forward. I know that the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview basically said that even with these changes, the bill itself still contains very, very significant problems. I have a feeling that we had probably a very incredible viewership tonight on Assembly TV, just based on the number of people that we had in the galleries watching the debate on Bill 22.

I don't think that this amendment is going to serve the way you think it will. I guess, at the end of the day, we'll see how that happens, and I look forward to watching how this rolls out, Mr. Chair.

11:40

The Acting Chair: The Minister of Treasury Board and Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Chair. I would like to speak to this amendment. This is an amendment that provides clarity, and on the theme of clarity I would like to provide additional clarity on Bill 22 in a number of areas. To provide clarity, ultimately we have to go back to the rationale for the bill as a whole and the fact that Bill 22 is a budget implementation bill. Albertans elected this government to bring fiscal responsibility to the province.

Mr. Chair, fiscal responsibility is something that had not occurred in this province over the last four years, and Albertans were loud and clear last April. They elected a government who would commit to bringing this province to balance. They elected a government who would build a sure and strong foundation by responsible fiscal management that would ensure economic growth and prosperity not only for this generation but for the next generation.

That is the budget that this government presented on October 24, and it's that budget for which this bill is so important, because Bill 22 is part of the effort to implement that budget that we presented to Albertans. Bill 22 is about streamlining government processes. Bill 22 is about simplifying and improving program delivery. Bill 22, Mr. Chair, is about ensuring that Albertans receive value for their hard-earned tax dollars. Bill 22 is about operating efficiently and providing better value.

I want to speak a little bit about the ATRF pensions because, Mr. Chair, there is so much misinformation and fearmongering going around these days in the province around ATRF pensions. Firstly – and I've risen and made this comment time and time again, but I need to make it again right now – by moving ATRF investment management functions to AIMCo, ATRF will continue to own and be the managers of teachers' pensions in this province. Pension benefits will remain unchanged. The ATRF will continue to provide strategic policy direction on how those funds are managed. I believe there's confusion around who pays for a defined benefit pension plan in this province. Teachers pay for part of that defined benefit plan, but taxpayers pay the other half of a defined benefit pension plan in the province.

Mr. Chair, Albertans elected this government to manage the province's finances responsibly, thinking of this generation, thinking of today's public servants and tomorrow's public servants and the next generation. When we took office and I was sworn in as a minister last spring, I, like, I expect, all of the other ministers, asked of our departments to identify efficiencies, identify opportunities for this government to provide better value to Albertans, and the department came back with a long list of opportunities to find efficiencies, to deliver more cost-effectively, to save hard-earned taxpayers' dollars.
