That's the kind of working-class person that sent me here to stand here. It's certainly the kind of folks that I come from in terms of my own background. My dad was a guy, not unlike that fellow, who worked as an electrician on oil rigs. One of the things that my dad always said was: "When you go to work, you have to be straight with your co-workers because if not, somebody will get electrocuted. It's a big old rig, and that's a lot of electricity." At that time it reminded me, as I was standing on this guy's doorstep, talking to him about his overtime, because he said to me: "You know, the leader of the Conservatives says that they're not going to do it. They're not going to do it on overtime." And I said: "I don't know, man. Look at what they actually said." And, sure enough, here we are. I remember where that guy lives. I might go drop off a little letter to him when I get home on the weekend, if I ever get home and leave this place, Madam Speaker.

Those are the kinds of folks that this bill will affect. A lot of those folks did vote Conservative, Madam Speaker. They're going to look at this, and they're going to go: "Oh, okay. Maybe I parked it with the NDP in 2015, and I parked it because of jobs and the economy for the same reason in 2019." There are going to be some real, material effects for those working-class folks, folks in particular in the oil and gas industry. Our numbers show that oil and gas workers are some of the most often to avail themselves of banked overtime arrangements. That's exactly the kind of people who are not going to get thousands of dollars a year to which they are entitled and they worked darn hard for. They worked darn hard for that money. That's one of the reasons why further input from the public is necessary, and that is why I will be supporting this amendment.

Another reason, Madam Speaker, is that another family that I talked to – they live over on the west side in one of the more established neighbourhoods in kind of a duplex. I had canvassed quite a bit in that area over the last seven years, so I knew most of the families, but for whatever reason I hadn't ever connected with these folks. They came to the door, and they knew me, and, you know, the woman who came to the door, she kind of came out and gave me a hug. That was fun. I noticed they had two sort of older teenagers, early millennials, if you will, kids in the house. They were kind of circulating behind her. Then her husband came to the door as well. He was not looking well. So I said: how's it been going? He very clearly had just come from the hospital or something. He still had, like, his band on. He said: well, first of all, we need a cardiac catheterization lab in Lethbridge. I said: yeah; nothing could be closer to the truth on that piece.

You know, drastically cutting the heart out of health care services because you're going to give 4 and a half billion dollars away in a corporate tax cut: that's not helpful, certainly not to these folks. These are not the kinds of people who are going to pay to get to the front of the line in health care, certainly not these people. He started telling me how he had to take some time out of the workforce due to some heart complications, some other health care challenges, and I believe his wife worked at some kind of health care service provision job. So she was also concerned about health care.

I said: "Oh, so the kids are still at home. I see one of them here. Okay. She lives here, and the other one? Okay. Yeah. She's still here, too." And they said: "Yeah. Our 17-year-old has gone and gotten a job now because things are pretty tight around here." And I said: "Oh, well, so those changes to minimum wage probably really helped your family, right?" And they said: "Yeah. You know, I think we would probably prefer that she didn't have to contribute to the family budget, but here we are due to health care complications and everything else."

You know, these are the kinds of people who sent me here. So now that young woman, who was working at a service industry job to help her own family budget, basically when she walks to work in the morning, she's going to have a trail of Conservatives pulling toonies out of her pocket for every hour she works, Madam Speaker. While that image may be somewhat amusing, the impact on the bottom line is not funny at all.

That is the other reason, Madam Speaker, why further input from the public is necessary, and maybe a little remedial door-knocking for some of the members over on the government benches might be in order here. You know, maybe going out and actually – I can make the leaflets, and we can all go out and talk to people in working-class neighbourhoods about pulling toonies out of their pocket for every hour they work and going in and scooping all those truck payments and everything else that will come from banked overtime for oil and gas workers. I don't mind doing that. We could even maybe have some kind of a buddy system for MLAs, and we can all go together in a great spirit of postpartisanship, go and talk to working people about the . . .

Ms Hoffman: Nonpartisan issue.

Ms Phillips: Yes. The nonpartisan issue of how much oil and gas workers should be compensated for their overtime hours.

That's a proposal that is certainly not reflected in this amendment, Madam Speaker, but it is in the spirit of what this amendment proposes, which is, of course, that further public input is necessary.

One of the things that I think is really, really key about this bill in terms of the $15 to $17 differential minimum wage – you know, like, there are further proposals that may propose a liquor servers' differential wage for people in the service industry at some point. There are a couple of things there that are highly problematic. One is that people who earn low wages spend them at small businesses. Again, if anyone would like to undertake a collegial exercise in doing a little tour of downtown businesses in Lethbridge, we can go talk to some of our friends at the Owl Acoustic Lounge or Kapow comics and cards or Plum Restaurant or a number of different clothing shops and so on owned by people who feel very strongly about paying an appropriate minimum wage. In fact, at the time when we were elected, in 2015, many of them spoke out locally in favour of such a policy.

11:00 a.m.

I remember my friend Wallie, who runs a comics and cards business right downtown, saying straight up: well, who do you think buys comics and cards? It's low-wage workers, and when they make more, I make more. That, I think, is an important insight in terms of the circulation of money among the lowest paid people, in fact the people who are working very hard to keep our downtowns vibrant, to keep our small-business scene vibrant.

It's one of the reasons why people like coming to Lethbridge, because we have so many cool little businesses. That's because we want to empower young people to participate fully in the economy. We want to empower young people to build their lives, their hobbies, to have that access to a good, solid middle-class life, that we've sort of seen evaporate in many ways as inequality has worsened over the last 40 years, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Comments or questions under Standing Order 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I wanted to first of all just say to all of the people who have been working all night how much we honour your contributions. I know there are folks from Hansard, there are folks who are sheriffs and sergeants and commissionaires, and the list goes on. I don't think anyone asked them, "Hey, would you be interested in staying an extra 12 hours today?" but we are tremendously grateful, and we want to say thank you for everything you do to keep us safe and keep this place accountable. I also want to say: I think you deserve time and a half. There's that.

To the hon. member, I want to know if . . .

Mr. Ellis: Point of order, Madam Speaker.

Ms Hoffman: Oh. Great.

The Deputy Speaker: A point of order has been called. The hon. whip.

Point of Order

Referring to Employees of the Legislature

Mr. Ellis: Madam Speaker, I'm just going to refer to 23(b), "speaks to matters other than . . . the question under discussion." We, of course, those who were here all night, also thank those who stayed and certainly one hundred per cent appreciate the time and effort put in.

However, I would like to refer to the ruling by the hon. Speaker, who asked the Assembly not to refer to those who work in this Assembly and to specifically their wages, what they may or may not be getting. That was the ruling earlier of the Speaker throughout the night. We certainly, of course, respect and appreciate all the hard work that these people are doing, but this is not the place to refer to these people and what they may or may not make.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. Now, I think a number of us have been in here for a while, and I think we're all aware that at times, particularly when we've been going on with an issue for a while, people do tend to diverge a little bit, and for that I will apologize. I think the idea here – and I think it's quite common; I mean, certainly, we saw it from the members across the way on a number of different bills when we were in government – is to try to really discuss the impact that this is having on the lives of people out there in the real world. This is, after all, a reasoned amendment that we're speaking to currently, and the reason in this case is to take the time to reflect on what exactly the impact of this is going to be. I think the stories of individuals who are out there working who are affected by this policy are highly relevant, incredibly relevant, at least as relevant, I would argue, as the individuals who the members across the way discussed, you know, on things like the Climate Leadership Act.

I think the point of this reasoned amendment is to slow it down and to reflect on exactly that sort of thing. I don't believe that this is a point of order. We are happy to steer the discussion back a little bit more towards the bill.

The Deputy Speaker: Additional comments? The hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley.

Mr. Loewen: Yes. I was here last night when the Speaker made the ruling, and he clearly said that it doesn't matter what time it is. He clearly said that we were supposed to leave the people in this building out of this discussion. It was very clearly said. So I think this is a point of order.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: It's not really an additional comment, Member.

I do not have the ruling of the Speaker from earlier this evening. However, I very much believe that members in this House are very much aware of what has been said earlier, and perhaps this is an opportunity to be reminded to be a little bit more careful as we move through this debate.

I'd just like to add an additional reminder that we be very careful to stay on topic for this amendment and what it's saying. This has been a very long night and a long morning. I'm not sure anybody is out of air yet, so let's stay focused and not incite others to stand up and call points of order.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Debate Continued

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I can definitely do my part in the debate, but I certainly can't control all individual members of this House. So thank you very much for your caution on that.

My point, Madam Speaker, is that we're not talking about theoretical people. We are talking about real people, real people who live and work around us, real people who live and work in our constituencies, our bosses. We're talking about them and the money that we're picking out of their pockets. So I appreciate that feedback.

I also appreciate the narrative that the member was painting. I think we actually have a Red Lobster caucus. I was wondering if the hon. member would talk about – when I was working a really long shift and the staff that had just got let off at the Xwrecks or at the Hilltop pub would come into where I worked, the Ottewell neighbourhood pub, I'd be, like: hey, solidarity. Man, if they had a good tip night, I was going to get a good tip night. They'd make it really obvious to all my regulars that they were overtipping me and put that pressure on everyone else to overtip me. It definitely created a lot more money in the local economy because I immediately the next day would go to the Hilltop pub or to Xwrecks and I'd pay the gift back.

I wondered if the hon. member could talk a little bit about what she did and the camaraderie she saw and how that extra money in the local economy is stimulated through people like the service workers that we're considering picking the pockets of today.

The Deputy Speaker: Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. You know, it's an interesting inquiry. I worked in the service industry for a very long time. I was probably, when you add it all up, a waitress for about 10 years. When people ask me, you know, "What are the skills you need to be in politics?" I say: well, if you've been a server, you probably have it covered. You can talk to almost anybody. You can solve problems. You do it with a smile on your face. You end up interacting with the full rainbow of humanity, and sometimes you see the good and the bad. To the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar's prior comments: it makes you a lot better customer, just a better human out there in the world.

You know, whenever I come across young people in the service industry now, I know how hard they're working. Things are even tougher now, I think, for young people to get ahead. That's why it's so distressing when we're doing things that will pick the pockets of young people, that will take money out of their pockets. Differential wages as well for service workers are also, you know, deeply problematic. It was really distressing to me when I heard the then leader of the UCP talking about millennials thinking that the government is an ATM, sort of, like, harshing on millennials. From my experience, they're working just as hard as anyone else, maybe harder because life is different now in terms of home ownership affordability and all of these other things that have changed a lot even since I was in that world in the early 1990s.

11:10 a.m.

I know that the Member for Calgary-Mountain View and I share many years of working at a Red Lobster, she in Calgary and me in Edmonton. The one that I worked at in the west end actually just unionized, I found out, which was interesting. But even at that point, it was a great place to work. I mean, we got benefits and a few other things, right? It was different from many of my other colleagues in pubs and restaurants throughout Edmonton, on the west side of Edmonton in particular because that's where I grew up. Yeah, we used to probably go and spend too many of our tips after our shift, necessitating picking up extra shifts. That was kind of my business motto for a long time.

Certainly, that money does circulate within the economy, but the other place it circulates is into your tuition fees, Madam Speaker.

Certainly, that is the case for many young people now, and through freezing tuition, we have, you know, saved people thousands of dollars.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any more speakers to the amendment? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker, and good morning to you. Thank you for acknowledging me and allowing me to participate in this discussion this morning, which has been diligently and continuously going on since early last night. We find ourselves this morning discussing an amendment to Bill 2, An Act to Make Alberta Open for Business. I really like that word "make" Alberta.

I know that in earlier discussions I had started to make some comments. Unfortunately – you were even in the chair – I'd run out of time and didn't get a chance to finish my story. I guess this might pose an opportunity for me to discuss this, why it is so important that we tap on the brake, take some sober second thought, and consult with some of the people that this may affect.

As I'd mentioned the last time, in my much younger youth I had the opportunity to play a very long career in basketball, starting as early as junior high, and I even had the chance to play at the college level as well. One of the things that I learned over those years from all the coaching that I received, you know, is that players are asked to stick to their plays. That's what helps them to score baskets. But sometimes as players we can get really, really focused on having to make that play, especially when part of that play maybe involves a really tricky pass that just looks really good, and your teammate gets to go in and dunk the ball. It's fantastic. The crowd goes nuts, and it really fires you up. You get excited about that moment, making what we lovingly call the pretty play.

When I look at this bill, I'm starting to possibly see some similarities. As we know, members from the government side have gone on at length about the election and winning that election. There's that excitement around winning. "We won the election. We have the majority. We have been given the mandate to move forward on what we said we would." I think that possibly, Madam Speaker, some people are getting a little caught up in the excitement of that, even just right in the title of the bill, An Act to Make Alberta Open for Business.

See, what we found, Madam Speaker, is that when you are, as it's known in the game, forcing the play, looking to make that pretty pass so your teammate can just drive the crowd nuts, more times than not you end up throwing the ball away to the opposition, which usually means they end up scoring against you. Now you're even further behind. So I'm wondering if we might be forcing the play here just a little bit because we're going to make Alberta open for business. I think there's a little assumption here that it was never open to begin with, which I would kind of tend to disagree with. I know that during the election I struggled a little bit trying to find a campaign office, and the same thing back in the 2015 election. The great news was that business was booming in Edmonton-Decore, and there just wasn't any room to find a campaign office.

The bad news, from my end of things, was that business was booming, and there was no room to find a campaign office. But you know what? I was really okay with that because business was booming. So when I hear this "make Alberta open for business," I'm a little confused because I thought it was open for business. That's what I saw all around in my constituency, thriving businesses that I love to go spend my money in. There are some amazing places in Edmonton-Decore known as the shopping district: three major malls, all kinds of restaurants. I welcome anybody to come. There's terrific food there, lots of variety.

We need to take a bit of a sober second thought, just tap on the brake and put a little bit of pause on here because not only do I find some concern in just the title, Madam Speaker, but there are other concerns that I have around the bill. As everybody knows, we've maybe not so lovingly adopted a little bit of a nickname by calling it the pick-your-pockets bill.

I have a couple of friends that, shall we say, don't necessarily share my political views. That's okay. It doesn't preclude us from being friends. We just simply don't talk about politics. I was taken aback, quite surprisingly so, when they called me after the introduction of this bill and said to me, "Is this bill for real?" I said: "Well, what do you mean?" "Well, I've heard that I'm going to lose, potentially, my overtime pay." "Well, unfortunately, yeah, that's probably the case." "I also have another question: my child is going to be paid less than somebody doing the exact same job?" "Well, yeah, that's what the bill is proposing." Unfortunately, I could not repeat what came after that. I fear you would most likely deem it to be unparliamentary language, but the gist of it was that they were not happy.

As I'd mentioned earlier about these friends, we just don't share the same political views. Right there, that also now starts to tell me that we need to tap on the brake. We need to slow this down just a bit and go talk to some of the people that this is affecting, like our oil and gas workers. I have friends that work in the industry – electricians, pipefitters – and they tend to work a lot of overtime. They enjoy it: hey, fill your boots, 20 or 30 hours of overtime, absolutely. If that's what helps you to attain the goals that you're after, I'm all for it. But they were not happy at potentially losing that money because that is, in a sense, their reward for taking their time away from their family, from their friends, or just simply their plain old free time. Time and a half is the reward, and whether you bank it or you're paid out, it's still overtime.

I think that with what we have in this bill, we might as well just change the name "overtime" and just get rid of it because there's really no use for it. We'll just call everything regular time. You're just going to get paid regular time. That in itself, Madam Speaker, I think brings some pause.

I look at the youth wage. Now, I'm very, very excited by the fact that with the new boundary redraws after this election, I went from 21 to 26 schools in Edmonton-Decore. I'm very, very excited. I've got all the high schools in north Edmonton, and I try to spend as much time as I can visiting those schools. Usually that's at least twice a year for all of them, for some a little bit more, and I get the opportunity to talk to students all the time. I'm going to maybe take a shot in the dark here with some of my colleagues over here on this side, and I'm going to bet there's a bit of a consensus around the fact that we should be listening to our young emerging leaders.

You know, I think things have changed a little bit since I was that age. Maybe back then I was a little bit more worried about things like when the next basketball game was or what time dinner was. I'm clearly finding that the youth in my schools are very, very engaged, and surprisingly so. I've quite honestly made quite the commitment to listen to my students because more often than not they have some very incredible ideas to share. I actually joked quite consistently with the Member for Lethbridge-West when she was environment minister. I have some students over at Queen E that put together a climate paper. At one point I literally had to pull the member over, and I said: "Okay, Are you feeding them information?" And I even posed it to them, too. I said: "Okay.

Who's your contact in the ministry? How is it that your paper almost perfectly mirrors the climate leadership plan?"

Engaging with our young emerging leaders – coincidentally, it's funny how these youth that we're looking at giving a $2-an-hour pay cut to weren't able to vote in the election. I'm wondering what would have happened had they had the opportunity. Of course, I'm very grateful because of the student vote. The students in Edmonton-Decore very graciously re-elected me out of their vote. That's why I feel it's almost a duty, quite honestly, that I hear them, that I consider their words, and I don't think that has happened here in Bill 2.

We've certainly heard from members opposite about: well, $13 an hour is better than zero dollars an hour. I guess that in its plain form, sure, it would be better, but did we consider the young emerging leaders that are already currently working? We've heard from many members over here that some of our youth 17 years of age, who have made personal decisions to strike out on their own for whatever various reasons there are, have bills to pay. Yet they still want to go to school. We are about to make their lives much more difficult by passing this legislation as it is right now. What we're telling our young emerging leaders: "You know what? It's all in the name of the economy, and I'm sorry that you've got to pay the price." It's those kinds of things where I see – the title that we seem to have adopted around picking your pockets: well, we are quite literally picking their pockets.

I also want to touch a little bit on the liquor server differential wage. I remember from back in my times – I suppose I should probably prepare the House, Madam Speaker, because I'm sure the teeth gnashing is going to start and that bodies are going to tense up – my experience in the union world. There's that word, "union." I very specifically remember going to support a demonstration around a restaurant very, very close by here. Employees there were mad. They were trying to form a union, and I'll get to that part of it in the beginning. But part of the reason why they were trying to form this was that the requests of the owners were quite demeaning to women. They were saying: "We're not necessarily making enough money. Tips: one day they're up; the next day they're down. It's uncertain. We need to try to make a little bit more money." The owner's solution to that was: "Well, we'll change the uniform. We'll make that skirt a little bit higher. We'll make that top drop a little bit lower. That will entice customers to give you a tip." I'll be honest with you: that disgusts me; that point of view really has no place.

What we're saying is that for the majority of our liquor servers, who are women, by bringing this back, we are opening up the door again, potentially, to that kind of behaviour by bad actors. I'm going to say right here, right now, because they're right in my very own riding, that I have some fantastic businesses. They value their employees very much. I'm very grateful for that. Those are the individuals that, you know, we don't have to worry about.

The Deputy Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It was great to hear the hon. member talk about his experience and why further public input is necessary into this bill and why he supports this amendment. Certainly, hearing stories of working people and his own experience and why the public should have more input into this bill was, I think, helpful to the overall debate and our consideration of this amendment.

It did put in my mind, Madam Speaker, that we have a lot of people on this side of the House who have done a lot of work with ordinary, working-class people. It actually reminded me of something that Jay-Z talks about. Yes, Jay-Z. In his last album with Beyoncé he said:

Over here we measure success by how many people [are] successful next to you Here we say you broke if everybody [else] is broke except for you.

That's exactly the kind of input and the kind of experience and the kind of ethic that defines this NDP caucus and certainly the working background of many of the people on this side. If the member could talk a little bit more about what kind of public input might be necessary and, you know, about our life experience in terms of measuring success by lifting everyone else up, just as Jay-Z and Beyoncé suggest that we might – you know, that song is called Boss. Certainly, on this side of the House that is a pretty boss kind of ethic in terms of representing working-class people, and I want to hear more about how the hon. member has done so.

The Deputy Speaker: Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I guess that here's where maybe – I don't know – my age might be showing a little bit. Of course, the Member for Lethbridge-West is probably much younger than I am. Jay-T. I thought: who is that?

An Hon. Member: Jay-Z, not Jay-T. Jay-Z.

Mr. Nielsen: Point taken. Apparently, I need to update my library a little bit, and perhaps, maybe, the Member for Lethbridge-West can help me with that endeavour at a later time.

Around her questions around the kinds of people that we need to be engaging with: I mentioned earlier that we need to be engaging with our youth, the ones that are 17 years of age or younger, because they're the ones currently working that will receive that pay cut, our liquor servers, and how they feel about going back to, potentially, quite honestly, a precarious wage, tips going up and down day to day. I've heard some stories, in a fun way, about getting a chance to go back to some of those establishments and pay it forward. Certainly, I'm not going to say that after one wobbly pop my tip is probably here, maybe after two or three my tip tends to climb, but mostly it's because I get fantastic service, it seems, everywhere I go in Edmonton-Decore. Again I invite members: come to Edmonton-Decore. We have some fantastic businesses there, and the level of service is absolutely amazing.

Back to the consultation, we need to be reaching out to, quite frankly, all workers in Alberta. I know that sounds like a daunting task, but anywhere where somebody has the potential to work overtime – and I'm saying "potential" because this rule around overtime will affect them. I don't know if there are any workers in the province that get any kind of holidays off; we might want to talk to them as well.

Maybe around some of the administrative burden: of course, as the critic for red tape I do find it a little bit ironic that we are creating some potential work for our amazing businesses around trying to keep track of how old somebody is, if they are in school or not. I certainly hope that any of our students that are in Edmonton-Decore watching today do not make that consideration: maybe I should leave school just so I can get a $2-an-hour raise. I think we shouldn't put them in that type of position and make sure that they are getting paid duly for what they do, with everybody else.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the amendment? The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

Member Ceci: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I'll speak to the notice of the amendment that the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview put in last night, moving that the motion for second reading of Bill 2, which, really, is a pick-your-pockets bill, be amended by deleting everything after "that" so that we can look at Bill 2 further. It's this part here of the amendment, that the bill will not draw investment to Alberta or stimulate the economy and that further input from the public is necessary.

Madam Speaker, before I begin on that, I'd like to, as the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar did, recognize that 75 years ago today our proud men and women of the Canadian Forces were part of an invasion of Europe to free Europe from Naziism. My own father was not part of that invasion as he was just 17 years old at that time, but he joined the Canadian Forces two years later and was shipped over and spent three years in Europe and was demobbed after the end of the war and came home. I bring that up because as all of us in this room here grew up, we were influenced by our parents and immediate family and loved ones.

The whole issue of fairness was something that we all learned. I can appreciate that there are different understandings or views of fairness. From my father's perspective, it was very much the kind of thing that gets set out here. You know, your word is your bond. I'm from eastern Canada, the Ontario area, and his view of fairness was that you make a deal and you stick to it. I never saw a contract – and maybe it was because I was too young – but he worked in back-breaking work all his life, in contracting the building of homes and working as a general contractor and a block- and brickwork and concrete specialist. I never saw a contract the entire time I can remember him going to work. He and his partners agreed on a job, they set a price, and they did the job.

I think that's what we want for this notice of amendment, to have an opportunity for the public to weigh in on the whole issue of the contract that was set around labour standards and wages with Albertans over two years ago. That contract was around, for instance, minimum wages. Those minimum wages are set at $15 an hour. As you know, this bill, that we hope to see amendments to, purports to make it better for youth to be paid $2 less an hour if you're a young person between 13 and 18.

I think Albertans, particularly that age group, would have a distinct concern with that. The contract has been out there since October. It is something that everybody is used to, and it will change going forward, and colleagues here spoke eloquently about why it's necessary to keep that contract, because of the important need for money that young people have growing up.

I want to say, too, that I don't believe that this bill and Bill 3, which is the largest corporate tax giveaway in Alberta's history, will stimulate the economy to the degree that the opposite benches believe they will. I don't believe they'll draw investment to this province. You know, during the election campaign that we've closed out, I can remember repeatedly jobs, the economy, and pipelines being talked about, and the premise was that the economy would grow at 3 per cent per year. I remember distinctly hearing the Premier say 3 per cent per year, that if we do that, the suite of changes that we're bringing in will stimulate the economy to that amount. The GDP will grow 3 per cent a year. Not one year, not two years in a row, not three years in a row, but it will continue at that rather moderately high running rate for an economy going forward, you know, seemingly in perpetuity.

That hasn't happened in Alberta. There have been, obviously, booms and busts in this province. In 2017, I think, there was a significant bounce back in the economy at 4.5 per cent, but that has levelled off, Madam Speaker. I remember the Premier making a pledge. Then he was not the Premier, of course. The pledge that was generally talked about by him and others is that we'll balance in 2022, we'll grow the economy at 3 per cent per year, we'll maintain the level of spending at the amount it is now, and no services will be reduced or cut. Those are the general pledges I remember. It may have a difference in emphasis somewhere, but that's what I remember being said repeatedly.

Growing the economy at 3 per cent per year, as I said, is a moderately high running rate for this province, and it's based, people on the other side said, on economists' reports. But I want to point out that there are other economists who don't agree with that, Madam Speaker. Many other economists don't agree with that. I would submit that the circumstances between the election and now are vastly different, and they're vastly different in terms of our economy because since the election the prolonged constraints on the takeaway of oil from this province are weighing heavily on this province. The cancellation of the crude-by-rail agreement is going to weigh even heavier on this province. There's significant chop in the world economy, caused by many things. One of those things is the U.S. tariffs that are being levied around the world and the response by countries to the U.S. tariffs in return.

Bill 2, the pick-your-pockets bill: I think that from the time it was written, the time of the election, to now our circumstances in this province are vastly different, and we need further input, we need further deliberation, and we need further sober second thought. The member previous to me was talking about tapping the brakes and taking a second look at all of this. There's nothing wrong with doing that, Madam Speaker. In fact, I think Albertans would appreciate the opportunity to not only weigh in but to know that we're taking the opportunity to look at the different circumstances.

The impression I get from people on the other side is that we must go fast, follow through with the commitments we made. You know, I don't know when the platform was written. I know there are several versions of the platform that they brought forward, and it seemed to be updated regularly. So I don't know when it was written or rewritten. I know the circumstances are different, and I know that Albertans would appreciate a second look at all of this.

You know, the view that we might hear is that Albertans aren't happy about changes to their banked overtime. The Leader of the Opposition was eloquent this morning around what that impact would be, for instance, on an oil field worker making a significant amount of money per hour, but they would not get that hourly rate if that overtime was banked and they were paid out in straight time. They wouldn't get their time and a half.

The holiday pay changes. You know, another member on the opposite bench has talked about working stiff, and I think he properly implied that it's a person who goes to work every day and just puts their nose down and their tail up and they're working hard. If more people knew about the changes to holiday pay that are proposed in Bill 2, the pick-your-pockets bill, they would not be pleased, Madam Speaker. They would not be: I signed up for that.

The certification vote changes. Again, Madam Speaker, that's a contract that was made as a result of labour code changes recently, a labour code that hadn't been looked at for 30 years. I don't think there would be a great deal of support in the ranks of the working stiff for those changes.

Rolling back wages for youth, Madam Speaker: that's, you know, in a way, going after those with the least ability to help themselves or have their voices heard. Not that everyone in this place does not believe that young people need to be encouraged and supported and valued and nurtured and mentored. We need to do those things regularly for young people, and I know that I'm not alone in everyone here believing that that's how you help the next generation, the younger generation, to come up and to take over as leaders.

In total, Madam Speaker, there are a number of things that we need to have a second look at. The amount of investment that is purported to come into this province as a result of a suite of bills that are before us is highly suspect, is highly questionable, especially when there are many people on the other side who question it. For instance, a 3 per cent GDP growth per year as a moderately high running rate going forward: I'm not sure why we can believe that at this point. We saw information – it could have been the Conference Board – come out last week that did not show Alberta being anywhere close to that. That's regrettable. There are reasons for it. The previous government was working on solutions to that, Madam Speaker – crude by rail is a solution to that – the efforts to make sure that the federal government approved pipelines. And they bought a pipeline at $4.5 billion. That is something that doesn't get talked about a lot here.

You know, they didn't just decide that it was good on their own to do that. They needed to be convinced. We had the Premier and the Minister of Energy and the Minister of Environment and Parks and the entire cabinet, the Executive Council, focused on that, and it happened. It was groundbreaking for that investment to take place and not only that investment but a commitment to expand the pipeline to tidewater, something that hasn't happened in this province.

That's part of the chop in the economy, that's part of the headwinds we're facing, and that's part of the reason that crude by rail and the curtailment and easing off as the supplies of oil dwindle down in this province are so important. But that doesn't get talked about here, Madam Speaker. What gets talked about is an act to pick your pockets. What gets talked about is the largest giveaway of corporate taxes probably of any province in this country.

The Deputy Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. The hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika.

Mr. Schow: Why, thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise under 29(2)(a) in response to the member opposite's speech for a number of reasons – a number of things he said I'd like to respond to – but primarily I rise mostly because I can. There were a lot of things said in that speech and also some things that were said earlier, and I kind of want to go over those.

You know, we on this side of the House don't believe that we are forcing the issue, forcing the play, like one of the members had said earlier. We believe that this bill is a response to a significant problem in Alberta, which is youth unemployment. That's a big problem. It's one of the things that we would like to see a resolution to, not exacerbate the problem by creating more layers of red tape and more burdens on employers in Alberta.

We'd like to attract more investment here, and to do that, we will make Alberta an enticing place to be, reduce taxes on corporations, and help people get into the workforce, climb the ladder of employment. You know, one of the problems we're trying to respond to is youth unemployment, which was at 11.6 per cent. There's this idea, for anyone who's applied for a job, of trying to grasp that first rung of the ladder, that you can't get a job without experience but that you can't get experience without a job. That's a real problem. We believe that this is a way that people entering the workforce can find those opportunities to get that work experience. We made this pledge during the campaign.

The Member for Lethbridge-West was making a point of quoting some hip hop lyrics, and I can appreciate that. Mind you, she quoted some more contemporary Jay-Z. I try to go back to the classics like Reasonable Doubt and 22 Two's. It's a classic and should have gone triple. You know, we walk it like we talk it on this side of the House. That is a commitment that we made, and we will do just that.

We will also try to ensure that we are attracting people back to Alberta to work. We want people to come here and start a business, do something great with their resources, do something great with their ideas, and tell the province, tell the country, and tell the world that Alberta is open for business, is a great place to be. I know, from knocking on doors across my constituency of Cardston-Siksika, that we have some of the hardest working people that I've ever had the pleasure of meeting. I referenced some in my maiden speech, and I'm honoured to represent them. But every day, every time I go and talk with them, they're asking us: please, help us; please help us find ways to be more successful.

11:50 a.m.

It's not our job here to create jobs for people. It's our job to help others come to Alberta, start a business, and create jobs for others to get into the workforce. I believe that Bill 2 does just that. So we have created this bill.

I speak against this motion, the reasoned amendment, because I don't believe that we need to go down that route. I believe that this is a good piece of legislation, and we should move forward with it.

With that, I will simply say this. On this side of the House and, in fact, in this province we may have 99 problems, but Bill 2 ain't one.

Member Ceci: I disagree with everything said. This bill will cause more people to be unemployed. It'll cause investment not to come here because 3 per cent GDP growth is not reasonable at this point in time. That's what this is predicated on. They need to fix that first, Madam Speaker, and they're not doing anything to do that. They're giving money away. We're going to have less money to be able to afford the many services and programs that Albertans rely on, and they're going to then take a look at cutting those programs. That's the contract they're making with Albertans, the one they're not talking about, the one they will issue as we get closer to having less and less money in the treasury as a result of their giveaway to corporations.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Edmonton-South.

Mr. Dang: What time is it?

The Deputy Speaker: You're done.

Fun fact, hon. members: it's almost lunchtime. But that's not relevant to any of us here because it is still yesterday.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Ms Sigurdson: Well, thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I'm pleased to also add my voice to the debate today on this amendment to the pick-your-pockets bill, and I certainly am standing in support of it. Certainly, what is indicated in this is that it is our view that this bill will not draw investment to Alberta or stimulate the economy and that further input from the public is necessary. It really is an attack on workers.

I think that we've heard a lot of stories of our own journeys into the workforce. I certainly would like to share mine. I have a long story because I've been around for a few years. As a citizen of this province I have my perspective, you know, and as a woman I have my perspective, that's perhaps different than some of the other members here, and as a woman with my particular experiences, it may be different from others, but I know that I'm not alone in this experience. So I stand very strongly against this pick-your-pockets bill because it is, again, an attack on workers. It's so important to hear the voices of citizens.

You know, I had my share of jobs that weren't great, as many people have. I grew up in a small town in northern Alberta, in the Peace River country, in Valleyview, and I didn't work in any kind of cool places like Red Lobster; I worked in the Esso truck stop. I actually started working as a waitress at the age of 12. Honestly, I was 12 years old, and I was waiting tables. But before that, I babysat for, like, half of what the minimum wage was, and the minimum wage at that time was $1.35. And do you think I got tips? No, no, no. I was lucky if I got a buck. That was extraordinary: wow, I got a buck in tips. This predates the birth of many people in this Chamber, for sure, but it is my journey, the significance of what's developed me as a person and what's made me a strong advocate for workers' rights in this province.

Of course, this amendment calls on the government to take another look at this bill because it is not supporting workers; it's hurting them. I mean, this is sort of the fundamental reason that I got involved in politics, the extreme inequality we have in our province. We have the highest income gap of any province in Canada. We have, you know, the very elite, who have the most, and then a significant portion of the rest of us have much less. Of course, this again just follows along that path, keeping Alberta a place for elites and then the rest of us. It's a deep concern of mine.

As I said, I waitressed throughout my whole junior high and high school in this very small town. You know, there was no doubt that I experienced lots of harassment, sexism in that role as a waitress in a truck stop. Eventually I got tired of it, so I thought: I want to do one of the boys' jobs. So I pumped gas, and I liked that way better, and it seemed to be that just because of the different role I was in, I got more respect. I still made a low wage, but I appreciated having more respect as I fulfilled my job.

In '79 I graduated, and I moved to Edmonton. I went to university because I knew that I didn't want to stay in that small town even though that's what most of the girls in my class did. They got married early on, and they stayed in that town. But I had sort of bigger dreams, so I came to Edmonton, and I got my BA in political science at that time. I needed to support myself in Edmonton because, you know, I had to pay for my rent and tuition and all of that. My family didn't support me in that way. I paid for my own schooling.

I got a job at the ALCB. Does anyone remember what the ALCB was? The Alberta Liquor Control Board. I was excited because this was a union job, so I got a bit of a higher wage. That made a big difference. I had more rights. I had more benefits. I had more support. Actually, if you worked so many hours, after that you could take a product knowledge test, which I thought was cool. I studied and studied, and then my salary went up. That was very good. I was excited to be able to improve myself, be a better employee because I had more knowledge. This was a union shop. Of course, you know, we had more support.

Just before Christmas there was this new manager that came in, and he was known as the Axe Man. Unbeknownst to us – we were a bunch of struggling university students working part-time, trying to get our studies done – he called about 20 of us into his office. Of course, we were all the ones who got paid more. We were all the ones who'd taken that product knowledge test. He fired us for some kind of trumped-up thing. We had worked there for a long time in good standing. There were no issues, and then it was, like: oh, well, you did this one day; you did this. It was, like, horrific. I was just stunned that someone could get away with this. As a worker I was vulnerable even though I was in a much better working arrangement than I had had as a waitress back in my small town. You know, here I was again, a vulnerable worker. I was going to school. How was I going to pay my rent? I was gone. I had to figure something out.

But I did eventually graduate with my BA in political science. I graduated in '82. Of course, '82 was sort of a bust time in Alberta, so there weren't any jobs. It was another really tough time for me. Again, I was super vulnerable, and now I had huge debt. I had a huge student loan hanging over my head. I worked in the nonprofit sector for a while, and although I liked the work, I got paid very poorly. You know, again, it paid very poorly, and it was shift work. This Bill 2 does talk about how some of the changes to the holiday pay, the general holiday pay, will impact shift workers even more so. I was a vulnerable worker, as workers working shift work are. We know that it's super stressful to do that kind of work. This is just another way to sort of pick the pockets of these vulnerable workers, and I certainly can relate to that, being one of those workers myself.

For about a decade I worked in the nonprofit sector, and I experienced poor wages, poor working conditions. You know, my work had meaning, and I liked it, but I just was frustrated because I was living in poverty. So when I was 30, I decided to go back to school because I felt like I just couldn't get a job that paid me decent and I needed to get a profession. Of course, I'd worked in the social services sector for this past decade, so I decided to become a social worker. I set my sights on doing that.

But by this time I was a young mom, and soon I was a single mom. I lived in poverty with my young son, and as I said before, when I did my response to the Speech from the Throne, I did live in subsidized housing. That was, you know, a godsend for me. That meant so much to me and my son because it made a difference and it helped me to be able to go back to university, get my bachelor and my master of social work. Really, education was my pathway out of poverty.

Again, when I graduated, it was the early '90s, and that's, of course, when the Premier cut public programs in half. So a lot of people, myself included – not only was I looking for a job, but when I was in university, I used to get a grant. I got support because I was seen as someone who needed support because I was a single mom and, you know, it was difficult for me. I did get a grant, but as soon as the government of the '90s came in, that grant was gone. Again, I had to take out bigger student loans, and I had tremendous, tremendous debt. Of course, I graduated in a bust cycle. As I said, the programs were cut. There weren't many jobs, but eventually I did get a job, and I got a job in child welfare in the government. I was a front-line caseworker, and I worked to support vulnerable families, and I was a vulnerable family myself.

One of the things that happened early on was that, you know, we were all in training sessions or whatever and getting to know our colleagues who were starting at the same time as us. They had done a big recruitment from Ontario at that time because they couldn't get enough Albertans. So I met all these people from Ontario, and I met this one fellow. I think, over drinks, we were talking, and he told me what his starting salary was, and I told him what my starting salary was. He had an MSW, just like me. He had just the same amount of experience as me, and he was making 10 K more than me, 10 grand more than me, when I was hired. And I was, like: "What? How can that be?" So I complained. Of course, HR looked into all of this. They saw it, and they said: "Yes, this is a mistake, but there's nothing to be done. Nothing can be done." I wonder why that was. Why would he get 10 K more than me? I wonder about that.

Again, these are just vulnerabilities for workers, and we don't have equality. That's why legislation is so important, so that workers are protected, because even when they are, still there are advantages that are given to some but not others. That also informed my view as a young woman, not understanding why this fellow was getting so much more than me.

I guess one of the things that I just wanted to mention. You know, the hon. Member from Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland spoke yesterday just about his journey in his career. He talked about being a farm boy and growing up in rural Alberta, and then through his connections on the farm he was able to get a job in the city, and it just seemed like he met person after person that promoted him along. It sounds like he's had a very successful time of it. But I wonder: what is the difference between him and me? I wonder. I think it must have something to do with gender, that I'm a woman. I'm a female, and I didn't have access to the old boys' network. He had access to the old boys' network. I'm not a privileged white male. I'm a woman, and I've had to make my own luck.

I put up with tremendous sexism along the journey, some I've just talked about specifically right now, and I know I'm not alone. I know my story is not unique. I know that this is a phenomenon that many women experience. So I just really want to expand the thinking of the members in the Assembly. Even though they may have had a clear trajectory to success in their lives, some people experience challenges. Of course, you know, gender is often a barrier to success; ethnicity may be. Certainly, we know that if people are of indigenous background, they have many, many barriers to their success in our society. Legislation that supports all workers, makes sure that they are supported, that's strong so that they can be treated with respect – you know what? Sometimes people aren't respectful. I certainly experienced that first-hand.

That's why I became a social worker, because I wanted to support people to overcome those barriers, to know their worth, to know how important they were. It doesn't matter where you come from, who you are; you have an important role on this planet. I am so grateful to my younger self, who saw that, and I've been able to live out my career supporting people. Now in this, you know, lofty position, being a Member of the Legislative Assembly, a representative for Edmonton-Riverview, I'm so honoured to again support the people of my community, to support Albertans, to support workers, which this bill absolutely does not, to have access to opportunities that oftentimes the doors are closed to.

The Deputy Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available.

Ms Glasgo: I'm very grateful, Madam Speaker, to be rising on 29(2)(a) to address some of the points brought up by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview. You know, I greatly appreciate her sharing her stories of her struggles as a woman in the workforce. Of course, as a young woman in this Chamber I do have to take some issue with some of what she shared, mostly because I do not believe my gender to be an inhibitor to my success. I also know that as a young woman in this arena, as a young woman in this Chamber, some of the best respect and some of the best opportunities I have been given are because of my male colleagues or my other colleagues of any gender. I'm actually suggesting that I had the ability and tenacity to do the work. I know that I have that because I earned the support of 65 per cent of people in Brooks-Medicine Hat in this last election.

So for the member opposite, Madam Speaker, of course, through you, to suggest that the Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland is benefiting because he is male: I take issue with that because we all had to work exceptionally hard to be in this Chamber. I know from my own personal experience when I was door-knocking that there were a couple of people who said to me: hey, little girl. I was called “little girl” quite a bit. I mean, I’m not exactly the tallest person in this Chamber, and, yeah, I’m visibly younger as well, so it’s just one of those things that happens to the best of us. But when I was at the door, I never let that stop me. It became a motivator for me, that somebody saw me and that maybe I couldn’t do it. It became a motivator for me to work harder and to get ahead. That’s exactly what I did. I kept knocking on doors.

I know that the Member for Banff-Kananaskis had some of the same issues. I’m not going to speak on her behalf because that’s her story to tell. But I know that as different members of this Chamber in different areas of the province we all had issues and all had things that we had to overcome. But the biggest thing here and I think the biggest point of contention between our United Conservative caucus and the women in our caucus and the members opposite is that we don’t see gender as an inhibitor to our success but as a different perspective that we share. I know that our Premier has worked exceptionally hard bringing people from a variety of backgrounds, including women, to this table and has actually made an overt effort.

I don’t have, obviously, the copies with me because I didn’t expect to be rising on this today, but in the National Post there was an article – and I’d be happy to table the copies later if that is necessary – where myself and a few other of my colleagues commented on the success of our movement in recruiting strong, talented, diverse women. I think you, Madam Speaker, sitting in your chair today, are a testament to that as well because it shows that our movement and this province really value and respect the opinions of strong, diverse women.

Once again, I do take particular issue with the member opposite going after or implying, rather – sorry; I’ll use better language – that the Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland had somehow benefited disproportionately or unfairly because he happens to be a male. He worked very hard. I worked very hard. The Member for Banff-Kananaskis worked very hard. I’m looking at other members in the Chamber. We all worked hard. But me being a woman has absolutely nothing to do with that. I wanted to earn the support of the people around me, I wanted to earn their respect, and that’s exactly what I did, Madam Speaker.

How can we make sure that we continue this going forward? Well, I think that by creating jobs in this economy – to the point of the bill, when I was at the doors, it didn’t matter if I was talking to a man or a woman. Actually, I talked to one girl – and I say “girl” because she was 17 – and she was turning 18 I think it was, like, April 14 or something. It was awesome. She was going to be 18 on election day. We talked for a while, and, you know, she had some issues, and she was actually quite engaged. We were talking, and she said, “When did you get involved?” and I said, “Early on in my life.” We were talking about what our party brings to the table, and we were talking about getting out of university and how important it is to have a job.

I know that, for me, having a job really fulfilled me. When I was 14, I actually worked at the local hockey rink in Medicine Hat called the Kinplex. At the Kinplex, you know, I was slinging poutine. It wasn’t the most glamorous job in the entire universe, but I did it because it put gas in my moped – yes, my moped – to drive to lacrosse practice or to drive to wherever I needed to go because my parents knew that that would give me meaning. Actually, they were discouraging me from having a job at one point because they wanted me to focus.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there members to speak to the amendment? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you. Thank you very much. I am a bit at a loss for words, just hearing the previous speaker talk about the fact that because she’s had success, therefore there is no such thing as structural barriers in the world. I think there are women all around North America . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. member, I hesitate to interrupt you. However, we’re on the amendment, not comments of the previous speaker.

Mr. Feehan: Yeah, of course. I just . . .

Mr. Dang: Point of order, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: A point of order has been called. Edmonton-South.

Point of Order

Explanation of Speaker’s Ruling

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise on Standing Order 13(2). I believe the hon. member was about to get into why her comments, that were towards the bill, and comments that opposition members had made towards the bill – you had allowed those comments, showing that they were relevant to the bill and the amendment. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford was about to move forward and discuss how those comments tied back to the amendment and so forth. I would ask you to explain why it was appropriate for the Member for Edmonton-Riverview and the member across in the government there to speak on these matters, but it is not such for the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. member, there’s been a lot of latitude that has been given throughout the course of this debate on all matters in this House. I will remind all members that there’s been an exceptional amount of latitude when it comes to comments and questions, which is very different than actually speaking on the amendment. So I’m just offering some caution again as we are all very tired and still operating on yesterday.

Will the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford please continue?

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I take your caution. I just needed to express my emotional reaction in the moment because it was quite a fascinating moment.

Debate Continued

Mr. Feehan: I do want to talk a little bit about where I was this morning before I came in today because it is quite relevant to the discussion of this amendment that has been brought forward. I had the pleasure and the opportunity to be at one of the high schools in my constituency of Edmonton-Rutherford and was able to join the students of Louis St. Laurent high school and Cartier McGee junior high. As many of you may know, they are together and often do events together in the same physical building. They had invited me to their year-end event and their liturgy and their assembly – a Catholic school, so the liturgy was there – which was quite enjoyable. They had a theme attached to the year-end event, which was typified by the final hymn from the liturgy, which was Go Make a Difference. That was the name of the hymn. The message from the presiding priest, Reverend Glenn, and, of course, the message of the whole liturgy and the year-end event for all of these young people, almost a hundred per cent of whom I think would be under the age of 18, was that it is incumbent upon all of us to be responsible for the world in which we live and that we need to go out there and truly make a difference even though there are struggles, things, barriers that will stop us and sometimes pain or suffering that we will have to endure as a result of making the decision that we need to make.

As I got up to speak, right at the end of the liturgy, I addressed the fact that we, in fact, had been here talking in this House all day yesterday, throughout the night, and right into the morning. I said that as we speak right now, there are people over at the Legislature that are talking about bills because they have that dedication. And I would say all of us. I didn't say that it was just the opposition side of the House, by the way, when I was speaking to the students. I tried to be a little nonpartisan. I said that members are here because they truly want to make a difference. I think that's probably why. Most people, I think, in this House would agree that that had at least something to do with their motivation to run for election. So here we are, trying to make a difference.

But then I said that I wanted to let them know a little bit about why we're staying in the House, that it's unusual for us to stay all night long and endure the sufferings, the pains of listening to each other endlessly for hours and hours at a time. So I said to them that one of the things that's very important and part of the reason for the filibuster that's going on right now is the fact that this present government is passing a bill, as we were talking to this group of perhaps 500 grade 7 to grade 12 students at one of the great Catholic schools here in the city of Edmonton, that right now there are people in the Legislature who are making the decision to take the minimum wage that you are presently allowed to earn of $15 an hour and to reduce that minimum wage down to $13 an hour.

I wish you were there – I wish you were there – to see the reaction of those 500 students who heard that phrase from me and the immediate response of boos and jeering that went on in that room, so much so that I literally had to interrupt it repeatedly to get them to calm down a bit and bring it back to the message of the day.

I didn't want to litigate this bill in that kind of a speech but, rather, to talk about the fact that things do matter, that the choices that are made by other people in this world will sometimes affect you negatively, that sometimes people engage in behaviours which are an assault on you or an assault on other people in the world, and that you have a responsibility to step up and, as the hymn says, to go out and make a difference. When these challenges come forward, it is very important that you take on that responsibility not only for yourself, I reminded them, but for all of those brothers and sisters around the world who will benefit from your having stood up when it was time to stand up.

So that brings me to this amendment. The whole point of this amendment is exactly that, that it is time, literally, for people on this side of the House to stand up, as you do when you speak. We stand up repeatedly, over and over again, to actually make a difference, to actually improve the lives of people who are more vulnerable than ourselves. This legislation isn't about anybody in this House. This legislation is about people who cannot be here to speak for themselves. It's about giving a voice to the voiceless, a challenge which I think is extremely important.

I know that just before we went into the liturgy, I had a few moments to speak with Father Glenn and talk a little bit about, you know, what we were doing here and so on. He asked me a little bit about why I decided to go into politics. I just reflected to him about a recent tragedy for the world, I would say, that a man by the name of Jean Vanier, a great Canadian who started the L'Arche communities, first in France and then subsequently here in North America, had recently died. I reflected on the fact that when I was 17, when I was just a young man at the University of Alberta, I went to listen to this incredible man speak about the need for all of us to care for others, to believe that the work that we do is most important when it is done for those who are vulnerable. He talked, I felt, to me personally about how important it was that we actually are proactive and have a preferential option for the poor, as was often said in the faith community. That's exactly what we're talking about today, a preferential option for the vulnerable and the poor.

I've got to tell you that I've stood in this House and talked about the fact that I sometimes find the internal workings of the conservative mind to be a bit chaotic and confused, and I point out when I see that chaos and confusion. Here I am looking at the bill that's being presented today and looking at the very first part of the bill, which is a reduction of the monies that are available to students who are trying to, first, establish themselves in the world, who are trying to do all the good that we all want to do to achieve for themselves a better life through self-improvement and moving forward.

As I look at this, I see a somewhat bizarre series of red tape measures included in this bill, that you will get paid $13 an hour for the first 28 hours when school is in session but then $15 thereafter. It's an interesting, Byzantine kind of concept there that somehow an event that is taking place outside of the work environment, has nothing to do with the job you're doing – that is, whether school is in or not – influences the amount you get paid for the work.

Now, I want to address again the notion, you know, about logical understanding of bills and why things are put into those bills. Why would you say that we're going to take something that has nothing to do with the labour that you put in, nothing to do with the circumstances of your contractual employment with the employer, and we're going to make that circumstance influence the actual remuneration that you get? How does that make any sense?

They used to do that in all kinds of other ways. If you happened to be a black individual in certain parts of the world in a certain era, you would get paid less than someone else. Again, an externality. It has nothing to do with the labour that you're performing, yet you would get paid less. If you happened to be a woman: we know that over the centuries frequently that externality, the fact that you are a woman, would lead to you getting paid less. But as a society we've come to the place where we have made the determination that those externalities are not logically attached to the work that is being done and therefore should not be used in the calculation of the remuneration for that work. That's just a basic issue of social justice, exactly what Jean Vanier was calling out to me to do, to pursue a social justice with a preferential option for the poor, and here we are going exactly in the opposite direction. We are actually introducing this Byzantine system of red tape where externalities are being used to calculate your value as a human being.

It was interesting. One of the things that Jean Vanier said when he first set up the L'Arche community – and I still remember this. I was 17 at the time. I'm a little older than that now, a few years, but I still remember. He said that people would call him up at the L'Arche community and say: "I understand you're setting up this group home for people with disabilities. I have a broken TV. Would you like it?" And he paused and said: "It's a fascinating thing that people would do that. They would call you and they would say: it is broken; it is not good enough for me, but because you are broken, it may be good enough for you. Giving broken things to broken people."

I think that's a profound statement. It's stuck with me all of these years. I can do the calculation. I'm 59 now, and that happened when I was about 17. Here we are again, taking people who are broken people, people who do not have a voice – they cannot vote in this situation – people who are vulnerable, and we're giving them broken things. That is something I just can't condone.

The set of rules around here is a little bit like a choose-your-own-adventure novel. You get paid one wage if you're in school for a period of time, then you get paid a different wage after a certain number of hours, but then, when school is out again, again an externality, you suddenly get less wages again. So you literally can have students who start a job in September, work for 28 hours at $13 an hour, get moved to $15 an hour, and then, when they graduate at the end of the year, get moved back down to $13 an hour. If that isn't a series of red tape, I don't know what is, which is fairly ironic because one of the other bills that's in this House right now – in fact, there's a whole ministry dedicated to the reduction of red tape. Then the very second bill they put into the House is essentially quintessential, absurd red tape that would make John Cleese happy to read about.

I guess I'm very concerned here that this government really has lost faith with the youth. The reaction at Louis St. Laurent school this morning to hearing that just because of an externality, their age, they would be paid less was significant. The youth know that there have been a series of attacks. I would love to have at some point the Minister of Education stand up in this House and defend that and to speak about the fact that she is voting for a bill in which she is saying to all the people for whom she has responsibility that we have looked at you and we have valued you at 13 per cent less than we value other human beings. I'd love to hear that speech. I'd love to be in that audience to hear her make that statement to the people that she is responsible for.

I want to go on and talk a little bit more about who is going to actually benefit from having these wages go down. Who is it for? We know it's not for the youth. We know that taking money away from people is not going to make their lives better, especially the vulnerable people. There are only a couple of people that may benefit from this kind of decrease in wages to young people. One of them is perhaps businesses where the profit margin is so thin and so tight that being able to reduce the wages of their workers may . . .

The Acting Speaker: Under 29(2)(a), I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's always a pleasure to hear from my colleague the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford, and I think he's mentioned very important points today that all members of this Assembly should take note of. It's important that we consider the stories that we continue to hear from members of the opposition on why this bill needs to not now be read a second time, and we need to consider having the opportunity to have more public consultation.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, I'm going to use a quote here. It's actually from Hansard. It's page 1060, and it was said on December 9, 2015. It's actually from the now hon. Minister of Transportation. He said:

For the government members, if they're tired of warming their hands, because that's what happens when you sit on them, to get up and talk and defend your bill.

Tell the . . . truth, not half the truth.

That's the whole quote. It's something that I think is very fitting here because we haven't heard from the government at all. In fact, I think one of the scariest things about us not having heard from the government on this bill is that this bill is a direct attack on workers' rights, whether that worker is young, whether that worker is old, whether that worker works in Edmonton or Medicine Hat or Calgary. Wherever it is in this province, over 400,000 workers are being attacked right now by this bill.

One of the biggest questions I will have and continue to have is: why does the government front bench and the backbench not support this bill? Why will they not get up and defend this bill? What do they think is wrong with it that they don't feel comfortable getting up and speaking to it? Perhaps the hon. Minister of Education could get up and tell us why as the Education minister she is okay with students having to drop out of school to make a living wage. I think that supporting a bill that encourages students to leave the school system is not what the Education minister should be supporting. Perhaps the Education minister is thinking that it'll save her a couple of dollars in the long run.

Mr. Speaker, I wouldn't mean to presume anything, but unless the minister is willing to get up and defend her position on this, I think that is going to be a significant problem as we move forward. It's a significant problem that there is an Education minister in this province who is not willing to have public consultation on whether students should have to drop out of school before they're able to have a living wage, whether students will have to actually leave their classes and no longer get high school credentials before they are allowed to make the minimum wage, especially for vulnerable young people, who may in fact have to end up going to a food bank or who may be in even more precarious situations than that and not feel comfortable going to a food bank.

It is very concerning to me that there is an Education minister in this House that is likely going to vote for this legislation and against this amendment, move forward with no consultation, and really talk about how young people are supposed to be the focus of her file, and then we see her supporting a bill like this and not supporting this amendment. That is something that is very, very concerning. It's an attack on youth, and when the Education minister in Alberta attacks youth, that is something that we need to really look at and say: is this the right minister at the right time? When we look at this, we've seen the Premier defend that, we've seen the front bench defend that, but we haven't seen them talk about why it's okay that this bill directly targets these young people, that this bill directly takes away those young people's rights, that it discriminates against young people.

It is absolutely the wrong thing to do. We've seen young people across the province speak out against it. We saw the minister of labour, who introduced the bill. He's made, I think, about 30 tweets in, apparently, his whole life, Mr. Speaker, but in two of them he's already been ratioed harder than I've seen a sitting MLA in the last four years. That's something that's very concerning. We have the Minister of Education then going forward and defending this and saying, "Oh, but young people don't need to be in school if they want to make a living wage," and she's supposed to run the education system. She's supposed to be the one encouraging students to graduate. Instead, she's going to support legislation that says: "Well, if you want to graduate, we think that you're worth a little bit less. If you want to go to school, we think you're worth about 13.3 per cent less."

Mr. Speaker, that's something that all Albertans need to be concerned about, not just young people. I think all members need to be concerned about it. It's something that is certainly a bad precedent to be setting here. Perhaps the minister wants to continue to sit on her hands and not defend herself, and perhaps the minister wants to just leave this be and not speak to the importance of this legislation and the importance of why she wants to take away these rights for young people. That's the minister's prerogative, but I think it's a shame that we have a minister that refuses to get up and defend legislation they're going to vote for. It means that either the minister does not understand the bill that they are trying to vote for or they are wilfully negligent of that bill, and both of those are not something we want to see from anyone on the front bench but certainly not from somebody who has an obligation to our young people here in the province.

Here in Alberta we want to make sure we have world-class education with world-class graduates, and if the minister refuses to defend this, then we must assume she ...

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, are there any other hon. members looking to speak on this amendment? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods standing.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I am delighted to be able to stand in this Chamber today with my colleagues and contribute to this really important debate. The amendment that we have before us, that states that "the Assembly is of the view that the bill will not draw investment to Alberta or stimulate the economy and that further input from the public is necessary," has my full support. It has my full support because I have been talking to working people from all corners of this province about the impacts that Bill 2 will have on them and their families.

Specifically, Mr. Speaker, I really want to maybe draw a little heat out of this debate and talk about some of the real facts, the truth of what's happening here. I think it's really important that we focus back down onto that. In the papers the Premier is quoted as saying that this debate is necessary because of the NDP's radical changes to Alberta labour law. If radical changes were what we were debating here, that would be a different story, but we are not. We have a Premier who is trying to characterize this as radical changes when he's talking about taking away overtime banking at time and a half, which Alberta just got because we were behind the rest of the country. No other jurisdiction in Canada had a minimum standard – a minimum standard – that is there to protect vulnerable workers and those who rely on the minimum standards, where overtime banking could be done at straight time. It was not a radical change to move from straight time to time and a half. In fact, that puts us now catching up to every other jurisdiction.

Who does that impact, Mr. Speaker? Well, we know that 400,000 Albertans use overtime, primarily in the oil and gas and the construction fields but in many different industries. We know that when somebody does overtime, they deserve that premium because that is additional time and effort that they are spending away from their friends and family. This bill would take that away and move it from time and a half, changing that minimum standard. Again, let's remember that employment standards are there as the minimum to protect the most vulnerable.

So when we're thinking about who this change impacts, it's certainly not our overtime, Mr. Speaker, because we are not getting overtime although we are still in Wednesday and having a very robust discussion about this. This is protecting that minimum that is there for workers who probably don't feel empowered to go and have that conversation with their employer to talk about how, you know, in Saskatchewan and British Columbia and Ontario and Quebec and in every other Canadian jurisdiction workers are allowed to bank their overtime at time and a half, recognizing the premium when somebody works more than eight hours in the day or 44 hours in the week. This was not a radical change to Alberta labour law, which is the Premier's quote. That was just bringing Alberta into the mainstream.

I know, from talking to many, many Albertans and consulting widely on our original changes to the Employment Standards Code and the Labour Relations Code, Mr. Speaker, that a lot of Albertans didn't realize they were out of step. That's what happens when legislation that is so fundamental to our working people, to our society doesn't get changed or updated on any regular basis, as was the case when we finally updated employment standards for the first time in 30 years.

An Hon. Member: How many?

Ms Gray: Thirty years, Mr. Speaker.

Just as a throwback to my friends who were here in the 29th Legislature, the last time the Employment Standards Code was updated, Who Framed Roger Rabbit was in theatres, Mr. Speaker. Beetlejuice was in theatres. The movie Rain Man was in theatres. There were some really good movies. Coming to America: who remembers that one? The movie Big, with Tom Hanks, was in theatres, and of course I could never forget the Christmas classic Die Hard. When we were debating the changes to employment standards originally, I used references to a lot of those movies to really characterize the fact that it had been so long since these rules had changed and to really highlight how out of step Alberta had become.

We made changes like moving overtime banking to time and a half so that that minimum standard for most vulnerable Albertans was in line with every jurisdiction across Canada, and that is being characterized as radical changes to Alberta labour law. It is not radical, Mr. Speaker. It is fairness. It is fairness for working people, and it is making sure that when somebody is putting in the extra time – perhaps they work in a seasonal environment – they get the compensation.

The change to take this away is going to cost working people. It will cost someone who is doing significant overtime during a busy period perhaps up to $2,500 across 12 weeks. When we average these overtime amounts, it looks like for some Albertans it's going to cost 150 bucks a week. Mr. Speaker, 150 bucks a week is not insignificant when you add it up. It was not because of a radical change to labour law that we had this; this was Canadian mainstream. This is what every other Canadian gets.

Now, another example of what every other Canadian gets: every other Canadian – but not Albertans, potentially, after this change – gets Christmas as a statutory holiday. Alberta had been the only place where a worker could get no benefit for a statutory holiday because of some very complicated and convoluted calculations around holiday pay that were unique to Alberta. I can tell you again, Mr. Speaker. What are employment standards? They are the minimum standard. That means that the workers who rely on those minimum standards are our most vulnerable workers. Those are workers starting out, or perhaps they are workers who do not have depth and years of experience. What ends up happening when you reintroduce some very complicated and convoluted holiday rules that include distinctions between regular and nonregular working days and add in periods of eligibility and convoluted rules?

If in at least 5 of the 9 weeks preceding the work week in which the general holiday occurs the employee worked on the same day of the week as the day on which the general holiday falls, the general holiday is to be considered a day that would normally have been a work day for the employee.

Now, why do I read section 27(2)? Because this is exactly the kind of red tape and overly complicated calculations that employers asked us to remove, and we did in moving our employment standards to the same minimum standard as the rest of Canada.

Now, Mr. Speaker, you may or may not be aware that there are a lot of companies that under the old rules had actually invested in HR management systems, in scheduling systems specifically designed to avoid paying their employees statutory holiday pay. In taking advantage of the rules that existed in Alberta before and that this government wants to bring in now, you could work at, let's say, a call centre – a call centre – and the scheduling software will set it up so that you did not in at least five of the nine weeks preceding the work week in which the general holiday occurs work on that day. The fact that we have had employers with scheduling software designed to take advantage of this loophole to give those workers less is shameful because every worker deserves a statutory holiday.

Let's bring this back down to the fundamentals. What is a stat holiday, why do we have them, and should Canadian workers get compensation for statutory holidays? Yes, they should. Stat holidays are common across the country. We all get them. Some provinces have as many as 10 stat holidays. Alberta has nine, which is right in the middle of the pack. But we will become the only place where someone may not get a benefit for that stat holiday.

In 2022 Christmas will fall on a weekend, and New Year's Day will fall on a weekend. I know that the members of the government like to talk about the impact when stat holidays fall on a Monday. But what happens when Christmas is on a weekend and New Year's Day is on a weekend? Workers get no Christmas benefit for that stat holiday, no money to buy Lego for their kids, no additional time off. I know, because it has happened to me, that employers who are providing the absolute minimum will give their workers no extra time off. In a year where Christmas and New Year's fell on weekends, I had the experience as a young worker of working that full week all the way until 4:30 on Friday – we got off a half-hour early because the employer was feeling generous – and then coming in again on the Monday.

Now, most employers in our province give generous Christmas time off. Our public servants get a week off, but let's remember what we're talking about. We're talking about the minimum standards for workers. That is what employment standards are.

The Acting Speaker: I hesitate to interject, but I believe that with regard to the amendment we are focused more with regard to drawing investment to Alberta and stimulating the economy, so I would just ask the hon. member to ensure that she stays within the realm of RA1.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Really, what I'm talking about: bringing this back to the fundamentals really comes back to needing more public consultation. We had significant public consultation when we brought Alberta standards into the Canadian mainstream, and there has not been significant consultation about sending Alberta backwards, about sending it back. Now, the members opposite will talk about the election and 375 points within a platform, all of which had been studiously read by all members of Alberta's citizenry and thought about before they voted. As we look at each piece of legislation, it is our job to consider if this is the right move and if it will have the intended benefit. If the response to the problem is making sure that Albertans don't get time and a half for overtime and don't get any benefit for Christmas, I think we need more input from the public into that.

The public is watching what we say and do in this Chamber, Mr. Speaker. Our citizens are tuning in right now, and I hope everyone watching understands that Alberta will become the only place where you get no benefit for your holiday pay, the only place where Christmas could come with nothing additional, no time off. That is the minimum standard we are going back to. I hope everyone watching understands that we will be the only jurisdiction that goes from time and a half overtime banking to straight time at a cost of $150 a week to those who use overtime banking; $2,700 in a 12-week period is not uncommon in the oil and gas and construction industries. I think it's really incumbent on us that we talk about – further input from the public is necessary. That is why the opposition is up here talking about this.

Now, I had mentioned wanting to make sure that we had kind of the facts out. In fact, there's a quote from the Member for Calgary-Hays that he used when we were debating bills in the 29th Legislature. He said to us – we were the government at the time – tell the truth, the whole truth, not the half-truth. Well, Mr. Speaker, I find that the government has been telling half-truths about the impacts of what is happening within Bill 2.

I'd like to speak for a moment about the need for more public input when it comes to the change in youth student minimum wage, and I would like to talk about the facts. In my first response to second reading I did mention that the government in their news release chose to use numbers from March 2019 when April 2019 numbers had been out for two weeks. They used old numbers, Mr. Speaker – old numbers – because they liked them better, they told a slightly better story. That was, I would say, something that caught my eye, that I talked about here in the Chamber but I didn't think a lot about. Well, just recently the minister has put out a video talking about how there are 30,000 young people looking for work. He's misusing Statistics Canada data, because the number he's using talks about people who are 15 to 24. The policy he's talking about only impacts the people who are 15, 16, and 17. What we actually know, in April . . .

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, under 29(2)(a) there is an opportunity for questions and comments, and I believe it was the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs who caught my eye.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to provide some commentary on some of the things that I have heard this morning, especially from the member opposite, the former minister of employment. With all due respect to my colleagues, perhaps there isn't anyone in this Chamber that has the first-hand experience of employment standards of myself. In my years of employment in this province one of the jobs that I had the greatest privilege of doing for the people of our province was actually as an employment standards officer. I went on to be one of those who set up the temporary foreign worker program for our province, and then I went on to be responsible for the review of minimum wage, employment standards regulations in our province as a public servant. So I have got tremendous insight into all of the issues that we are debating today. I have had years of experience interacting first-hand in the field, across this province: employees young and old, from Smoky Lake to Grande Prairie to Edmonton to Wabasca. I have had the privilege of doing all of that work.

Mr. Speaker, the point is that the changes that we are putting forward are actually meant to – and it is not true. It is not true that we are removing the requirement for overtime. In the context of an overtime agreement it is not true. We must make a distinction between philosophical argument and intellectual argument on the substance. The members opposite have been digging deep into their philosophical understanding of how a society ought to be structured versus the substantive argument on the benefit of some of these changes we are to make for the sake of employment for our young people and our economy overall. Two different things. Two different things. It's okay for them. They can seize the floor and go on and on and dig deep into their philosophical underpinnings as the NDP. I get that. But what we must never allow them to do is to package that as a substantive intellectual justification for attacking this amendment.

Again, Mr. Speaker, in the context only of an overtime agreement with respect to time and a half, what the bill we've put forward says is that if you work more than eight hours a day or 44 hours a week with that overtime agreement, nothing – nothing – impacts that. Section 3 of the Employment Standards Code makes it clear that employees and employers can enter into an agreement on whatever basis they want. So if they agree by employment contract that they are to earn more, that will be the case.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Are there any other members wishing to speak to the amendment?

[The voice vote indicated that the motion on amendment RA1 lost]

[Several members rose calling for a division. The division bell was rung at 12:55 p.m.]

[Motion on amendment RA1 lost]

The Speaker: We are back on the main bill. Anyone wishing to debate this afternoon? I see the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West rising to debate.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and a happy Wednesday to you. We are back in the time warp again and happy to be so, loving this opportunity to stand up for my constituents, for working-class people across this province, to shine a light on this attempt to pick the pockets of ordinary working people, in particular oil and gas workers that already saw, lived through, worked through the economic downturn and were just starting to get out of that recession that was caused by the downturn globally in the price of oil.

And lo and behold, another challenge to ordinary working people, but this time one that didn't happen across the Atlantic, over in the Middle East, or, you know, from a bunch of people that we have no control over setting the price of oil. No. This time it is this government that is going after the very people who very likely, potentially, voted for them, ordinary working people looking for jobs, looking for improvement in the economy. Not in their ordinary household economy, Mr. Speaker – nope – that's not going to happen with this group of folks as they reach in and grab thousands of dollars out of the family budget for work that they did, for banked overtime that they earned doing work to build this province.

They will have less for their truck payments, they will have less for their Christmas presents, and they will have fewer resources to put towards any of their family priorities, all for an entirely avoidable public policy choice that is actually quite confusing, especially given what was said during the election campaign. During the election campaign we were all assured that there would be no picking of the pockets of ordinary working people.

Ms Hoffman: Say it again.

Ms Phillips: We were assured that that would never happen and could not possibly.

When we brought it up during the campaign, they said: "Oh, no, no, no. No. That is quite wrong, hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona. You don't know what you're talking about. You're utterly out to lunch." It turns out: nope; fully at lunch. Here we are at Bill 2. Now, it wasn't the first priority of this government, Mr. Speaker. That was a different bill, that I had nothing to do with, but it was the second priority. The second priority was to go straight into people's bank accounts and take away their hard-earned overtime.

Now, the second aspect of this bill and the reason why we've been here since Wednesday – and technically it's still Wednesday – is this just mean-spirited, complicated, irrational decision to take toonies out of the pockets of 16-year-olds, Mr. Speaker. To follow a 17-year-old home from work at a grocery store or at a café and rummage around in their pockets looking for toonies: that's exactly what this bill does.

Here's the other thing that is so confusing about this rationale. The rationale for this bill was that, oh, we have a youth joblessness rate. When they made the announcement on this, they could have used April 2019 data to justify this exercise in basically breaking into people's piggy banks and taking out every toonie they could find. They could have used April 2019 data given that the announcement was made after the Labour Force Survey data from Statistics Canada came out. They could have done that. No. No, they didn't. They used March 2019 data, which was more unflattering and painted a more incorrect picture of what is actually happening with youth employment rates out there. One of the other reasons they probably did that is because Saskatchewan's rate was far worse than Alberta's in April as opposed to March. That was a convenient sleight of hand that we saw on the part of the labour minister in justifying this bill, Mr. Speaker.

The other sleight of hand that we saw was that we saw the labour minister justify this piggy bank raid based on him saying that 30,000 young people are looking for work, but that is actually incorrect. Let me provide the House the service of a fact check this afternoon, Mr. Speaker. In actual fact, we're talking about fewer than 10,000 people that this might affect, people between the ages of 15 and 17. The numbers were utterly incorrect. The exercise of a simple Google search: I am happy to provide that to the minister in order that he might justify this particular public policy arrangement on actual, factual grounds. Certainly, I wouldn't want the minister to continue to labour under incorrect notions. Let us, then, disabuse him of things that are demonstrably false so that we may all play from the same set of facts.

Now, one of the things that I think really is of concern to us around overtime is the amount of money that is going to be taken away from ordinary working people. We're talking about thousands of dollars, Mr. Speaker – thousands of dollars – not just in overtime but also in these changes to general holiday pay, which then put us offside other jurisdictions and do things like take away people's holiday pay for working on Christmas.

You know, one of the things I do often on Christmas Day is that I take little gift bags, packages to people working on Christmas Day in Lethbridge. I have met with, talked with, sat with many of the people who are working on Christmas Day. It's one of the things I do to recognize that people in my community are going above and beyond, both in the public and private sectors. At a time when many of us are otherwise with our families, there are lots of folks out there who are just simply not. The idea that those folks wouldn't be eligible for holiday pay on Christmas Day, Mr. Speaker – I mean, this is Bill 2. An Act to Restore the Role of the Grinch in the Alberta Economy: that is how it should be renamed.

Speaking of families, I do want to take a moment, Mr. Speaker, to recognize the fact that my mother is up in the gallery with her husband, Mike.

An Hon. Member: Oh, my goodness. Did you just introduce your mother?

Ms Phillips: I did. I did do that.

You know, my mom was a small-business owner. My mom is an advocate for equality and therefore takes an active interest in Bill 2, as should all Albertans and as all Albertans are beginning to do, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, this bill is now garnering a lot more attention because the opposition has done what we were elected to do, which is come to this House to provide thoughtful amendments to bills that we think are not quite fully considered, to query the public policy rationale for certain decisions such as to raid the piggy banks of children ages 15 to 17, for example, to scoop overtime from ordinary working people, taking away holiday pay from the folks who work as Santas in the malls, because that's absolutely what will happen, and all other seasonal workers, for that matter.

You know, I think what we have seen is a very motivated opposition to come here and represent our working class constituents, Mr. Speaker, and in a way that we are shining a light on legislation that may otherwise – or at least it was the hope, I think, of the government caucus that it would just slide through and that we would just let this one go. It's not the case. The people elected us to come here and do a job, and we will do it for as long as it takes.

You know, Mr. Speaker, a number of people were just out on the steps of this Legislature taking time off from their busy workdays, busy workdays that may be affected by this legislation, to protest other rollbacks of rights that are coming as a matter of priority, it seems, for this government. We've barely been in this Chamber a month, and we've already got protestors out on the steps of the Legislature. We've already got people talking about legislation and talking about the very severe impacts it's going to have on the economy, all because these seem to be the priorities of this government. Having hundreds of people committed to equality of all kinds standing on the steps of this Legislature was very, very inspirational to me this morning. I did see that the Raging Grannies were out there. My mother sang with them, and that is as terrifying as it sounds.

Other people were also there, certainly people from Lethbridge who have driven all the way here, disrupted their working lives to come here and join us, to watch the debate on Bill 2 but also to ask very legitimate questions about this government's attack on equality rights either through the conversion therapy issue or the upcoming prohibitions and discrimination against LGBTQ youth, that is forthcoming in a subsequent bill. One of the people who has joined us is Dillon Hargreaves, who is up there, from Lethbridge, who's been an advocate – sorry, Devon Hargreaves. Dillon is Devon's sibling, and sometimes I mix them up even though they look nothing alike. Again, Devon has joined us all the way from Lethbridge. He's been a tireless advocate on conversion therapy, for equality of all kinds in southern Alberta. This is oftentimes very difficult work, Mr. Speaker, and there are a number of great Albertans who have spent hours working on a more just and fair Alberta, whether it's with respect to our labour rights and some of the issues that we see brought up here in Bill 2 or on other issues.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to talk a little bit about this youth minimum wage issue and return to that. You know, we have here – I think it was just this morning or maybe last night. I don't know. It's all bleeding into one. The C.D. Howe Institute released a report on the topic of the youth minimum wage and the possible impacts to both the labour market and how business owners respond to this particular policy initiative. You know, I will be happy to table this document at the appropriate time, but let me just enlighten the House.

You know, with the C.D. Howe Institute, committed as they are to free-market economics and a very business-minded approach, I certainly have benefited from their analysis on other topics such as their analysis on Bill C-69, for example, or the federal approach on output-based allocations to the renewable energy sector. Those are two very recent analyses that the C.D. Howe Institute issued that were relevant to Alberta.

But here's another one, Mr. Speaker. You know, given that we are also discussing the so-called Red Tape Reduction Act, which is mostly just an act to create a committee and have some chit-chat time, here's what the C.D. Howe Institute says. It says, "The complexity of the compensation scheme can be a factor that discourages employers to substitute students for their current non-student workers." In other words, there's too much red tape in this suggestion for it to work and for employers to respond in the way that this government would in fact wish for them to respond. You can't make public policy based on wishful thinking.

Let's talk about some other wishful thinking around this youth wage. They allege, they assert that the idea here is that the youth minimum wage is going to be modelled on the Ontario system. In fact, there are a number of differences. There's quite a bit of daylight between the Ontario system and what is proposed in this bill. Leaving that aside for a moment, Mr. Speaker, the Ontario youth unemployment rate is higher than the national average. That's the thing that we're trying to emulate, I suppose? That doesn't make a whole lot of sense to me.

Mr. Speaker, let's talk about other Ontario policies that are also being proposed by this government; for example, massive cuts to the public sector in Ontario. The Bank of Canada in their latest forecast, that came out a couple of weeks ago: all of Canada's growth forecast is flat. Why? The Bank of Canada, those well-known radicals in the Bank of Canada, attributes Canada's softening growth rate to Ontario's fiscal policies of retrenchment and austerity, and the growth that the Bank of Canada identifies coming out of Quebec and British Columbia was not outweighed by the dampening effect on growth that Ontario's austerity policies had.

Again, you know, trying to emulate policies, whether it's picking the pockets of youth . . .

The Acting Speaker: I would like to, prior to 29(2)(a), just take a quick moment to remind all hon. members of this House that guest introductions should be done at the appropriate time during the daily Routine.

Under 29(2)(a), I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and I'd like to thank my hon. colleague for her comments, which I found very, very helpful in the course of this debate. She touched on a number of topics, but one that really struck home for me was when she was talking about red tape and the impact of Bill 2 to increase red tape on employers.

Now, she was talking about the challenge and complication introduced by having a separate youth minimum wage, the red tape that that adds for employers to now track birth dates for their employees, to track the school enrolment status for their employees, to be able to adjust on the 29th hour the amount of money that that employee is being paid, and all of the related complication. In fact, Mr. Speaker, we know from the news release issued in 1998 under Ralph Klein's leadership that reducing red tape was one of the reasons why the youth differential was originally removed, because employers were finding it burdensome to try and track this.

1:30 p.m.

We also know that in Ontario they find it administratively difficult and hard to enforce, and the Ontario employment standards teams have had many issues with employers paying too little when someone has already turned 18, when somebody is not a student. This is red tape being introduced.

Similarly, the new holiday rules, where you now have to track if somebody has worked five of the last nine of this particular day of the week in order to determine if they may or may not deserve holiday pay – I can make it easy for you, Mr. Speaker. Everyone deserves holidays. That's the way it should be.

And now this government is moving us to where Alberta will be the only place in Canada – the only place in Canada – where someone may get no benefit from a statutory holiday, putting us out of line with the Canadian mainstream, very similar to how we will be out of the Canadian mainstream when it comes to overtime banking, because nowhere else in Canada can someone use overtime banking at straight time versus time and a half without taking advantage of something like a flexible averaging agreement, which Alberta has. Alberta has the mechanisms to allow that flexibility that employees want without putting them in a position, which we know happened, which was why it was changed, where employers were forcing employees to use banking to avoid paying that premium for their overtime.

The red tape that my colleague was talking about I think is a really important aspect of this debate, and I think we can learn a lot from Ontario, we can learn a lot from important experts like those who are at the C.D. Howe Institute, and we can learn a lot from our own history. Take it from Premier Ralph Klein: having a separate youth minimum wage is a bad idea. It is overly complicated. Youth deserve a fair wage.

An Hon. Member: Who said that?

Ms Gray: Premier Ralph Klein in 1998, when they removed the youth differential, felt that the Leader of the Official Opposition had the right idea.

A single minimum wage was the way forward, and that was after extensive consultation. We had extensive consultation in 1998, specifically talking about that youth minimum wage. We also had extensive consultation just a couple of years ago as we brought employment standards into the mainstream. What we have not had is extensive consultation about taking people's overtime, picking their pockets, taking toonies away from 16-year-olds, and not giving all Albertans statutory holidays, in a way that is completely out of step with the mainstream.

I really want to say thank you to my hon. colleague and ask if she has any further thoughts when it comes to the fact that Bill 2 introduces red tape and that Bill 4, the act to reduce red tape, also introduces red tape. It seems a little odd, Mr. Speaker, and I'd love to know my colleague's thoughts.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to my hon. colleague for sharing with the House some of the expertise that came from public consultation, because she undertook that for a long time. Now, the general holiday pay and overtime pieces are actually quite complicated. Employees must work 30 days of the last 12 months before a general holiday. Only employees who regularly work on a general holiday will be entitled to the pay. If the holiday falls on a day that is not normally a workday for the employee and they work that holiday, they're entitled to 1.5. If they do not work the holiday, they're not, blah, blah, blah, blah, blah. If in at least five of the nine weeks preceding the work week in which the general holiday occurs . . .

The Acting Speaker: Are there any other members wishing to speak? I believe that the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie is standing.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Always a pleasure. I did get a chance to go home and get some shut-eye, but it feels like I never left. [interjections] Thank you. I appreciate that. One of the things that I hear often in this House from members across the way is: oh, you NDPers have no idea what it's like to run a business. But guess what? I actually ran my own business. So I'd like to tell you a little bit about the business that I used to run, and I'll put it in context.

When I graduated from the University of Alberta back in 1999 – you know, we talk a lot about our past when we're in the House, of course. Earlier, in the wee hours of the morning, I was talking about how I was actually born in 1974. For those of you who missed it – oh, I'm so sorry – it was such a riveting story, right?

Ms Hoffman: Is it in Hansard?

Member Loyola: It is in Hansard. You can read all about it. Read all about it.

I graduated from the University of Alberta in 1999. I did a bachelor of arts degree in anthropology, history, and Spanish. For those of you who don't know – sometimes, you know, I tell people, "Oh, yeah; I studied anthropology," and their reaction: it's, well, either Indiana Jones or that I dig up dinosaur bones. Indiana Jones is a little bit closer, but I definitely didn't do the dinosaur bones. That's more geology, or paleontology, I should say, but connected to geology. Anthropology is the study of human behaviour. Specifically, a lot of the classes that I took were on economic anthropology.

That being said, though, I remember a lot of friends during that time being, like: “Oh, what are you going to do with a bachelor of arts degree? You’re never going to be able to find a job.” You know what? It was difficult. When I ended up graduating from the University of Alberta, it was very difficult at that time. We were in a recession. I remember applying for hundreds and hundreds of jobs, and I just couldn’t seem to land even an interview.

Now, I don’t want to take us off topic too much, but one of the things that I did want to say is that when I was applying for jobs, I was using my full Spanish name, Rodrigo Loyola. Then one day a friend of mine was, like: “Well, you know what? You know what you should try? There are a lot of English speakers that simply just use Rod. Why don’t you just use Rod?” Lo and behold, I started submitting resumés with the name “Rod Loyola,” and – wow – I started landing interviews. Quite interesting. I don’t want to take us too much off topic, but I just wanted to share that with people in the House.

Regardless, it was a tough time, and I’ll never forget, because my wife at the time – we were recently married. We had just moved out of an apartment, and we moved into a house close to NAIT, and we didn’t have a lawn mower. I remember that I had to cut the grass, and I remember thinking to myself: well, I’ve got to cut the grass, so I’m going to go and get a lawn mower. I started going around to garage sales in the area, and I ended up finding a lawn mower for $50. I think it was probably close to the last $50 that I had in my bank account. I remember going home with the lawn mower, mowing my lawn, and then sitting on the stoop at the front of my house with my head in my hands, thinking, “What am I going to do; I can’t seem to find a job,” incredibly perplexed.

But at that moment I remembered that my father always taught me that there’s no shame in working with your hands. I went up and down the block asking people if I could mow their lawn for $20. With the money that I made that day, I designed my own flyer, went to Staples, photocopied it, cut them up, and then I started delivering flyers all over the neighbourhood, to as many places as I could. I delivered them myself. Lo and behold, I started getting phone calls, and the business was born. I started mowing lawns because there’s no shame in working with your hands.

I say that because I come from a working-class background. My father, my mother were working-class people, salt of the earth people, people dedicated to building a good society. They don’t want to have any more privileges than anybody else. They taught me that we should all be seeking to have the same opportunities, that we should live in a society where opportunities – no matter who you are or where you come from, no matter what your ethnicity, your orientation, everybody should have equal access to those opportunities.

Of course, the reality is not that way. I can’t tell you the number of times I’ve heard from people’s mouths that it’s not just what you know; it’s who you know. And I get it. We live in a society where people vouch for each other, and that’s the way you kind of get a job. But we should be hired based on merit, for what we know and what our experiences are and what we can contribute.

I remember that when I ended up getting enough houses that I could mow the lawn at, I couldn’t do it by myself. Remember that this was back in 1999, 2000, 2001. I hired three other people to work with me, and at that time – and I stress that I hired them to work with me, not for me, because I was out there mowing lawns with them just the same – I remember that they would come to my place, because I used to run the business out of my garage, of course, like many other businesspeople do. They’ll run it out of their own home. I used to run the business out of the garage. All the lawn mowers were stored in my garage. They’d show up at my place, and we’d all roll out together in my Chev Cheyenne. It was a one-ton. I used to put a trailer on there. We used to put all the lawn mowers on the trailer, and we used to head out, and we’d have a wonderful day. Most days were full of sunshine. I’ll never forget that I got quite the tan those summers. Yeah, beautiful.

We used to get out there, and I used to pay the people that worked with me back at that time $15 an hour. The same minimum wage that we’re seeking for people to get paid now, I was paying back then. So when business owners come to me and say, “Oh, my goodness, you know, I can’t afford to pay $15 an hour,” I say to them: “Okay. Well, show me the books. Show me.” At that time I was running my own business, paying people $15 an hour for their time. For their time. I want to stress this because we would get up in my truck, and we’d go from one contract to the other, and just because we were sitting in my truck didn’t mean that they weren’t getting paid for their time. They were sitting in my truck, and we were on our way to the next contract. They were still getting paid for that time. It wasn’t, like: “Oh, I’m going to stop the clock, guys, because you’re not actually mowing lawns at this time. No. You’re working. We’re on our way to the next contract. You’re working.”

The reason why I mention this is because, being from a working-class background, I was taught that workers’ rights matter. It’s about fairness. I want you to think a moment about all of the rights that workers had to fight so hard for, not only here in this province or in this country but internationally. I mean, I’m not suggesting that any members on the other side believe this, but know that there were times when it was like a no-holds-barred playing field. Workers didn’t have an eight-hour day or a 12-hour shift.

An Hon. Member: Child labour.

Member Loyola: Exactly. It was child labour.

Workers had to organize and systematically work towards making sure that their rights were respected. It was about fairness. I say this because I want to remind us all that an economy serves people – it’s not the other way around, people serving an economy – and it’s our duty and our responsibility in this House when we govern to keep that in mind.

After running my business for a long time – I did that for three years, and it didn’t stop at lawn maintenance. Then people started asking me to do little contracts. “Hey, can you build me a fence? Can you build me a deck?” I was very lucky because my father and my grandfather before him were carpenters, and they taught me how to do a lot of these projects, working with my hands. For me, it was no problem to build a fence. I remember working with people who, you know, had never built a fence before in their lives, but they were working with me, so we’d get the job done. I would always make sure to pay them fairly for their time regardless of their experience.

Eventually I ended up selling the business because I wanted to get back into working in a related field, and I ended up going to work at the University of Alberta for University of Alberta International. Eventually, with time, I ended up getting more involved with the union at the University of Alberta and eventually got involved with working on the bylaws committee of the union, the Non-Academic Staff Association. Members from the union were, like: “Rod, we think you’re a great guy. Why don’t you run for vice-president?” I said: “Okay. Sure. I’ll run for vice-president.” I did my two years as vice-president, and people were really happy. They were, like: “Rod, why don’t you run for president?”

An Hon. Member: Names.

Member Loyola: Thank you.

They were, like, "Friend, brother, why don't you run for president?" So I did. I was very proud to serve the members of the Non-Academic Staff Association as their president and to continue to work on making sure that their rights as workers were being respected by the University of Alberta through their collective agreement.

I want us to remember – I'll never forget being on the other side of the House and names being lobbed over to that side of the House. People used to call us – I remember hearing "union thug" one time if I'm not mistaken.

Ms Hoffman: Union hug.

Member Loyola: Union hug.

I distinctly remember hearing "union thug," "union boss," "crony" being lobbed at us. Let me tell you: in serving the members of the Non-Academic Staff Association as their president, I was there democratically elected by those members to represent them. Unions are an exceptional example of democracy.

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, a five-minute question-and-comment period. I believe I see the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Yeah. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, these questions of labour relations and orderly labour relations that are within the Labour Relations Code: actually, there are some changes to these contained within Bill 2. I think the hon. member was moving towards discussing how those changes actually have practical effect for ordinary people. I wonder if he might continue sharing that view and that experience with the House in terms of some of the changes that are contemplated in this bill and how that may be problematic for ordinary working people going forward.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much to the Member for Lethbridge-West. That's exactly where I was going to go. That's what I was getting to. You know, you guys know me by now. I've always got a point. I've always got a point.

Whereas some people do have unions that actually fight for their collective agreements to make sure that their rights are respected, not all workers in our province have that privilege. Of course, Bill 2: what it wants to do is to actually take us back in time. Our government, the New Democratic government – and this is kind of a crazy thing – was only trying to put us on par with other jurisdictions across this great land of ours called Canada. It was only trying to put us on par, not anything more than any other place in Canada. It was just trying to get us to that basic and, I would say, very balanced, measured, pragmatic approach of getting us to where we could be where other jurisdictions in Canada are.

Now, here we see this UCP government wanting to roll us back, to roll us back in time: let's go back in time. And don't forget: that's the power that our Premier would love to have. He'd like to be a time traveller. He's quoted as saying that. He wants to take us back to – I don't know – the 1950s, the 1970s, to take us back in time when it comes to workers' rights.

I want to remind you all that unions are a great example of how democracy can function in the workplace, where you actually elect the representatives. They're not union thugs. They're not union bosses. These are people who are duly elected by the workers that they represent in their workplace. I'm proud to have served as a union president, and I worked very hard for the people that I was representing at that time, more than 5,500 workers at the University of Alberta. I'd like to think that I did it with integrity, with dignity, treating everybody with dignity and respect, making sure to listen to each and every one of the members that had issues and concerns and making sure that if there were changes that I could make, I worked hard to get them done. It was about workers' rights.

So when this government decides that they want to take us back in time, they're actually taking rights away from working people here in the province of Alberta, and this is why I cannot support Bill 2. I want the members on the other side to actually think about this. I want you all to think about this. Is it really fair? Is it really fair that profits should trump workers' rights? Is that the kind of Alberta that we want to build and leave for future generations? Do you really want to take us back in time to where in the interests of profits . . .

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, are there others? I believe I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford standing.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am happy to have an opportunity to rise and speak to the main motion on Bill 2 and speak a little bit about my objections to Bill 2 and the concerns that I have in addition to some of the ones I've already previously addressed in speaking to the amendments. I'd like to be able to add, with my time I have available, about some of the underlying problems that I see with the bill. In fact, I would like to begin by tying that into a larger theme that I am increasingly becoming concerned about with this government.

In the short period of time that they've been government, they appear to have really lost faith with youth in our society and appear to continually be making decisions which are specifically and directly assaultive toward youth, those vulnerable people who we all as a society have a responsibility to protect and to nurture and to mentor. Instead, what I see from this government is a government that is hell-bent for leather, as they say, to take away protections and rights of young people. We see that when we see the new education bill, which is undermining the safety of children in GSAs and protections against bullying within the school system, putting them in a place where they have to fight and challenge authority figures within their system in order to be able to have the right to meet and to talk about their concerns.

We see that when we look at the reduction of the minimum wage, affecting people directly and not based on the work that they do but simply on the reality of their age. It is an assault that we would not accept in any way on people described with any other personal characteristic. If we made the same decision that people who are left-handed would be paid less, then you would look at them and say that that's absurd. If we made that decision about people of another skin colour, another religion, another social group, any other defining personal characteristic as a reason for reduced wages, we would say that this is not only ridiculous but a violation of the human rights which we have worked over the last number of centuries in democratic societies to build up and to protect for all people. Yet when it comes to children who are most vulnerable, we jump right in and do it without any kind of concern at all.

I was struck as well a little bit by the presentation, the speech made by the Member for Edmonton-Riverview, who talked about the challenges that she met as she grew up, working in a small northern community, Valleyview, in the Peace River country of Alberta and subsequently going to school, becoming a mother, finding herself to be unexpectedly a single mother, trying to go through school on minimum wage jobs, where she didn't receive a lot of protections, didn't have those things that make it safe for a woman on the work site and provide the kind of income that is necessary for her to be able to appropriately raise her child and subsequently other children she's had. She talked a little bit about the type of workplaces that she worked in and the type of work that she did, and it struck me that there's another piece to this legislation that I think is very concerning.

[The Speaker in the chair]

I've already spoken to the fact that I believe we have a responsibility as a government to have a preferential option for the poor, but I think that underlying that is a notion that people who have all of the advantages in society will do well. They don't need government to step in on their behalf. They'll find a way. They'll take advantage of the things that they have been given that other people have not been given, the extra bit of Monopoly money they got at the beginning of the game that makes it possible for them to win the game because they started in a different place than the other people who are playing the game. Because those people have those advantages, they don't need the same kind of protections. The people that do need the protections are the people who are vulnerable.

2:00 p.m.

I just was remarking on the comments from the Member for Edmonton-Riverview when she talked about the types of places that you find these minimum wage jobs. Let's just talk a little bit about some of the places that I worked as I was growing up and the types of places that do have minimum wage jobs. Some of the places that I worked, for example, were at Camp He Ho Ha, a camp for people with disabilities just west of Edmonton, where we were paid, well, in fact, much less than minimum wage because we essentially were on duty 24 hours a day and paying minimum wage would have been impossible. Subsequently that led to me working in places like McQueen Road group home, for people with disabilities here in the city of Edmonton, to put enough money together to put myself through university or when I worked just after that in Edmonton children's receiving and detention centre, again, another minimum wage job. I started to realize that the people who were being hurt by these kinds of actions that are being taken in Bill 2 are people who are working with people.

Now, I know that if you leave high school at the end of grade 12 and you head off to Fort McMurray and you get a job driving a truck, you can earn a very substantial wage, much greater than minimum wage, so it's not those people we need to worry about in this kind of situation. Not only are you receiving a much greater than minimum wage salary, but you're also immediately invested into a union, which is protecting your safety, which is protecting your right to benefits, which is protecting your right to reasonable treatment on the job site. Those people are doing fine.

Who is it that's not doing fine? All of those people who are working with other vulnerable people: people who work in daycares, people who work in group homes, people that work in settings that are often nonprofit kinds of settings, where unionization is almost completely absent. Not only are they receiving less money, but they're also receiving fewer protections and supports from unions. Why is it that they're receiving that? They themselves in some ways are vulnerable because of their youth but also because of the people they are working with. At a daycare you're working with children. In a group home you're often working with people with disabilities or people who have been in the child welfare system.

It seems to me that this bill is an attack not only on the workers but on the people who are served by those workers. It's an attack on people who are already vulnerable. We don't have to worry about the folks that head off to drive that truck in Fort McMurray; they're well taken care of. But somehow if you decide that you want to devote your life to working with people with disabilities, not only are you being attacked, but the very people who you are devoting your life to are being attacked because they're being told that their concerns are not worth while enough that the person who is working with them should be protected.

I'm very concerned about not only the reduction in minimum wage, which is often attacking people who are starting those kind of jobs – when I worked at Camp He Ho Ha, for example, many of us were young people who were entering into the workforce and getting those kinds of jobs – but also I noticed that the provisions in this bill regarding the formation of unions, very specifically, are going to have the effect of reducing the likelihood of somebody having a union. We know from the example from British Columbia that when they moved away from card certification, the number of actual unions that got formed was reduced significantly and then increased again by about approximately 19 per cent when they returned to having card certifications. We can see that the intent of this section of the bill is actually to decrease the likelihood of unions.

It's a suppression of unions. That's the underlying intent. It's not about democracy. Democracy is still there. People have the right to sign the card or not sign the card. This about a government trying to put in structural barriers to prevent people who work with vulnerable others such as people in nonprofits, in daycares, in summer camps, in group homes, and so on from actually achieving unionization. It's saying: you don't have power; therefore, we are going to put in a barrier to prevent you from achieving any power because we like to keep you in that powerless place.

I can tell you that that very much concerns me. It concerns me that a whole bill would be created to disenfranchise segments of society, largely segments of society that are already disenfranchised by other structural barriers in their lives. Structural barriers like family violence and family dysfunction that cause a high school student to say: my parents cannot support me in the way that I would like to be supported, perhaps not even to the point of being able to feed me properly, so I'm going to find a job in order to be able to take care of myself and perhaps even contribute to the family. That person is now the focus of a concerted attempt to create a structural barrier for them to overcome the problems that they already experience in their life and family circumstances.

We have a young person who is leaving a traumatic home life, heading out on their own because they simply can't live at home. Perhaps they are a victim of child sexual abuse, an area I worked in for many, many years, as the Speaker might know. Perhaps they are a child who came out as gay and was rejected by their family, and now they're heading out onto the street because their family is no longer willing to support them. For those people who've already experienced those kinds of structural barriers that prevent them from doing well in society, we want a society to come in and to move in and to help them to overcome those barriers, not to impose new barriers on them.

We should have a society that looks at those vulnerable people and says to them: "You already have suffered enough. We are going to find ways for you to be successful." Instead, what we do is we actually create a bill where we say to them: "Drop out of school. You'll get a couple extra bucks. You'll be able to feed yourself. You'll be able to leave that abusive family situation and take care of yourself." That seems like a crazy person to pick the pocket of. That seems like a terrible time to demand a loonie or a toonie.

We should be going to those people and we should be saying to them: we are going to provide ways for you to be successful, not encouraging you to drop out of school. The research is really clear. If you continue in school, over your lifetime you will have substantially more resources available to you, primarily wages. It goes up specifically with every piece of school achievement that you have. We know that if you graduate from grade 12, you are likely to have a significantly higher wage than somebody who does not graduate from grade 12. We know that if you go on to some postsecondary, if you go to a trade, if you go to a university, if you go to a college, then your income will go up.

What we've done now is that we've created a structural invitation for defeat. We've invited these people who already have the barriers of abusive homes that they're trying to leave to struggle against not only the negatives that they grew up with in the first 16 years of their life but to add onto that the invitation to not engage in those kinds of activities which will help them to overcome.

Society in part is judged by the ability of people to move from one socioeconomic bracket to another socioeconomic bracket. It's one of the measures of successful, modern democracies. When people can be born into humble circumstances and through their efforts move themselves up to another socioeconomic level, we can say that society has provided them an opportunity to make the best of who they are. That is something that I think is quite noble, yet we are now creating a bill which actually puts in structural barriers for them to do that, which prevents them from earning the wage they might earn, which prevents them from joining a union.

2:10 p.m.

The Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. I believe I saw the Member for Edmonton-Decore rising first.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, I've always enjoyed the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford. The thought that he brings to debate: it's not some kind of random musings, you know, the world according to somebody. He does his research. He comes with the facts and his lived experience and very eloquently gives us information that we, in my opinion, with this bill right now, must very seriously consider.

We're faced with, I think, two decisions with this information. We can listen to it and we can take it very, very seriously when we're talking about whether we should move this bill forward or not or, potentially, we can lie to ourselves and pretend he didn't just tell us this. I think that second option poses a lot of problems for us.

I was hoping, because I know that probably the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford was closing in on his finishing thoughts, that he would share those with us so that we're able to make an informed decision.

The Speaker: Thank you for your brief question or comment. It's noted.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you very much to the Member for Edmonton-Decore for the opportunity to address a little bit more of what it is that I'm trying to bring to the attention of this House.

In summary, the thing that I think is most concerning here is that this bill appears to be an attempt to take away whatever voice is left for people who already, in many ways, are voiceless. It takes power and privilege away from people who are under the age of 18 by taking away resources that are their due right for the work that they have contributed to, whatever their employment is. It takes away their right to join in a union, which has at its very core the purpose of giving a voice to workers and allowing workers in the workplace to be there not just as cogs in a larger machine but as people who have value in their own right, people whose lives matter on an individual basis.

The purpose of unions is to allow workers to be able to be represented in a work setting not simply as serfs or tools to be used by a corporation or a business but, rather, to be people who can express their own needs and satisfy their own needs because they themselves have value intrinsically. The union allows them to bring their voice to their employment situation. Without unions we would be back in a pre-industrial British time where some people were successful and other people were not and where those who were successful could use the less successful for their own benefits and not provide anything in return. That brings us back to a time of Charles Dickens, of Oliver Twist, when people's health and well-being were not cared for, where their desire to create for themselves a good life was not a concern.

It's only because of the creation of unions and the work of those unions to stop the kind of abuses that were occurring to front-line workers that we have been able to create a society in which there is nobility in work that before was seen as the work of a serf or of a chattel. At a time now when you have a trade – you're a carpenter, an electrician, a stonemason – that work in and of itself has value, and you can have pride in being in that profession. Other people will know that your work is important and will acknowledge it by allowing you to have a voice in your work setting.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, we are back on the main bill. I see the Member for Edmonton-Decore rising to debate.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Good afternoon to you. It's a pleasure to be here to continue what has been a very lengthy discussion today on Bill 2, An Act to Make Alberta Open for Business. I touched on this a little bit earlier, about making things happen, just forcing it on through, which, as I'm sure I explained a little earlier, isn't necessarily the best approach because sometimes in that blind quest to move ahead, you miss a lot of other things going on, and it generally tends to create a lot more problems than you first anticipated. I think we have some significant problems with this.

I had a chance to rise a little bit earlier today, speaking about an amendment to tap on the brakes a little bit here: "Let's think about this. We need to talk to some of the people that this affects. It could help us make better informed decisions." Certainly, I'm very grateful for the fact that Kieran Quirke is here in the gallery – he's a very staunch advocate for workers' rights – listening very intently because I'm sure that there's probably some information that we could have gleaned from him in terms of this bill and how we could have made it probably a little bit more fair for workers.

When we talk about fairness, I can't imagine how picking their pockets can be fair when we say to our young emerging leaders in this province, the ones that will be inheriting the things that we do today: "I'm sorry. We really do appreciate your work, but it's worth $2 an hour less simply because of your birthday." I find that very, very disappointing. Again, I think I spoke a little bit at length about how we should have been talking to these people. I know that in the last election they were 17 and they weren't voters, so it didn't kind of really seem like their opinion mattered. I very highly disagree. I know, Mr. Speaker, that with the number of schools I've gained, from 21 to 26 now, I interact with my students on a very, very regular basis because I found that the input that they give me actually is able to help me make some very good decisions moving forward as their MLA.

I touched a little bit around the liquor server differential wage and how that has the ability to very disproportionately affect what is predominantly women in that industry. I really, really take exception to that, because I had mentioned a scenario that I had witnessed in terms of how they were treated, what they were being told to solve the issue. As you can imagine, I very adamantly disagreed with that approach. It's amazing how fast time flies, and I didn't get a chance to talk a little bit back then during that amendment to tap on the brakes, to take that pause, to slow down here for just a second.

General holiday pay: oh, my goodness. I was thinking to myself: can you imagine if Christmas landed on a Saturday? I don't know if Santa Claus is going to have to stay home now or something because he's not going to get paid overtime to deliver those presents. You know, when I was looking around – it's always helpful to do a little bit of research; the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford was very, very clear on that – I noticed that it seems like there's no other jurisdiction that does this.

I'm really not sure what the point that's trying to be achieved is by setting those conditions up. For our workers, again, when they choose to work a holiday or choose to work overtime, this is a personal sacrifice away from their family, away from their friends, and, like I said, just their plain old free time. It's these extra premiums, this extra pay that in a sense compensates them fairly in order for them to come to work, put in the hard work, and make sure that the employer, their business, is successful moving forward.

You know, I also, I guess, question a little bit why we would want to take this money out of their pockets. There was some discussion earlier from members in caucus around Red Lobster and whatnot. Mr. Speaker, I'm feeling a little left out because, unfortunately, I was never working at Red Lobster. I did work at Dairy Queen. I'm hoping that maybe there are some other caucus members here that may have done that in their former lives, and maybe we can connect and talk about that a little bit.

You know, getting paid that money, be it general holiday pay or overtime, I'm going to be pretty bold here and say that those folks are probably not taking that money and squirrelling it away in a Cayman Islands account. I just don't see that happening. My gut feeling is that they take that money and not only do they spend it on the things that they need, which could be food, clothing, and shelter, but they also spend it on the things that they want. The last time I looked, it's things like the stuff we need but also the stuff that we want that moves our economy. It creates those businesses. Somebody is willing to take the time to step up to offer that good or that service. Those people are willing to freely take money out of their pocket and give it to them, but if they don't have that money, Mr. Speaker, they're going to have a hard time supporting that business.

I know I'm very grateful for all the different businesses that are in my riding of Edmonton-Decore, nicknamed the shopping district. We have three major malls, a lot of restaurants. I would highly encourage you, during your time when you're here in Edmonton, to come to Edmonton-Decore. We've got some great restaurants. The food is fantastic, and I guarantee you'll love the service, Mr. Speaker. It's because of those workers that are there that are the face of those businesses, and they're working so hard for those customers so that that business is successful.

You know, from time to time we do have maybe the odd bad actor. As I was mentioning a little bit earlier around the liquor differential, when you have conditions in a workplace that maybe aren't so favourable, those individuals will sometimes seek out – and here's where I always prepare everybody because I'm going to say that word again, “union” – a union because they know that collectively they are able to stand up and change those conditions for the betterment of all, not only the employees but the business, too. When you have a happy employee, when they're paid well, treated with dignity and respect, given a good paycheque, they will promote all by themselves for free the business that they work at, a great, great exchange.

You know, we've had some of our members touch on this a little bit, and I want to clear up a little bit of a misconception that I've heard over and over again when legislation was brought in around the card check. As soon as that was brought in, everybody lost their mind, Mr. Speaker: “You've taken away the secret ballot.” Let's see if I can be very clear about this: “No, that didn't happen.” What happened was that there was an extra component added, where if you have signed up 65 per cent of the workplace – I should be very, very clear here. I have participated in organizing drives. It's not an easy task to get to that level. So when you can't, that 40 per cent threshold is still the secret ballot. It's always been there. It's never gone anywhere. I just wanted to take a quick moment to clear that up, hopefully, and maybe people can put some of that rhetoric aside.

I think we have some very serious concerns here around this bill in terms of what everybody else is doing, things like taking away holiday pay. Nobody else is doing that, Mr. Speaker. Again I mention that, unfortunately, the odd time we do have bad actors in the employment sector, and they are going to take advantage of people. But you know what? Thank God there are unions around. Hopefully, they'll be able to stifle that kind of behaviour a little bit.

But asking our current youth to take a $2 pay cut when potentially they could be out on their own, supporting the things that they're doing – I remember entertaining discussions back when I was at my former employer. At the time, you know, the market wasn't the greatest. Business had dropped a little bit, and the company did come to us and say: “You know what? Something has to be done, and we're asking you to take a big wage rollback.” One thing I do remember about that was the promise: “When things get better, don't worry. We'll make it up.”

Mr. Carson: We've heard that before.

Mr. Nielsen: Yeah. I did hear that.

Very clearly, then, I continued to hear it for several years after that. I believe it was something like 12 to 15 years later before we finally sort of caught up through negotiations to where we had left off back when we took that rollback to save the company, which back then was the only profitable division of the entire company, which was a little bit odd. The point was that people were looking at that wage rollback with a lot of concern.

What is the difference between, you know, myself back then, a young man with a growing family and children, being asked to take – well, back then it was over a $2-an-hour wage cut. I don't see what the difference is between my concerns and the concerns of a 17-year-old. I think they are just as valid when it comes to that kind of drastic, drastic change in a wage scale.

I'm very, very disappointed with this bill. I remember very clearly in the last Legislature how we were constantly pointed at, our government, for apparently not consulting. Over and over again: “You guys didn't consult. You didn't talk to people.” Yet here I am seeing legislation from what I thought would be the government who was going to prove how to do it properly, Mr. Speaker. They, you know, rightfully or not, pointed out all the mistakes that were done, and I thought: “Well, okay. They're going to step in. They're going to show us how to do it right, how to treat everybody fairly, how to bring forward legislation that balances everything out.” Then we see Bill 2, An Act to Make Alberta Open for Business, again, unfortunately, just very, very disappointing.

When we look at the amount of money that hard-working women and men, be it in the oil and gas industry, in the construction industry – like I said, I had two friends give me a call as soon as this bill was released, and I find it odd because, as I had mentioned earlier, our political views don’t necessarily line up. Some of the conversation, like I said, Mr. Speaker, I’m not going to repeat because I’m almost absolutely certain that you would rule it unparliamentary language, but they were not happy. They were asking me if this really, truly was coming forward. I, unfortunately, had to tell them that, yes, this was being proposed, that your overtime – you know, this one friend, who’s an electrician, does a lot of overtime while he’s up in Fort McMurray. Not happy about losing that money.

2:30 p.m.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore. I would just note that I’d welcome an invite to Edmonton-Decore, and any time you want to take me for dinner, I’d be more than happy to visit some of your establishments.

Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. I see that the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction has risen.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Just in listening for many hours now, I would like to remind the members that one of the reasons why we were so specific in this last election with what we were looking for as a mandate from Albertans – we put together a 117-page platform commitment, where we were able to showcase 375 what we felt were good ideas for Alberta, good ideas to be able to bring back jobs, jump-start the economy, and to be able to right the ship in Alberta. We did this for a specific reason. We did this so that Albertans would know what they were going to be voting for, not voting for an NDP government, like in 2015, that said one thing and then went and offered the largest tax grab, through the carbon tax, that Albertans have ever experienced.

Now, this is interesting because we were very clear with Albertans what our plan was. We were very clear, again, by design, to make sure that Albertans knew . . .

Mr. Dang: That kids are worth 13 per cent less.

Mr. Hunter: The hon. Member for Edmonton-South, who continues to heckle, needs to remember that we have listened very patiently to that member’s pontification in this House, so I would hope that he would be willing to provide me with the same thing.

Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, what we’ve seen over the last many hours is the NDP rejection of democracy, the NDP rejection of the majority of Albertans making the decision about the direction that Alberta should take. So they can talk about their view of Alberta and the way that it should be all they want, but the truth is that Albertans made a decision on April 16 and told us the way that they would like us to go. All that we are hearing since yesterday, very early, is their iteration of the way that they would like to see Alberta go. It’s unfortunate that they reject so wholly a democratic process that is centuries old in this province and in this country, in fact in the world.

We are in a situation now where we continue to allow them to work through the process of being able to give us new evidence of why Bill 2 is not the right way to go, but in reality . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. members, I might just encourage you to allow the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction to have the floor briefly.

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, I believe that the opposition members have an opportunity to be able to show to Albertans that they respect the democratic process in this province, yet they are fully rejecting it. I do believe that Albertans, all eight of them that watched through the night, will take note and make sure that the NDP stay where they are and where they deserve to be, in opposition, perpetually because of the anger machine that they are. This is something that we have continued to see, and Albertans rejected this in the past.

I have had the opportunity of being able to listen intently, and I’ve heard the arguments over and over and over again, the same arguments, and the redundancy in their arguments shows the depth of their conviction. The arguments are completely redundant, continually, over and over again repeating the same thing only to be able to filibuster and to be able to stop the progress of this government.

Now, they know full well – they were on this side of the House not too long ago – that they had the opportunity to be able to bring forward their agenda, which they received from Albertans on May 5, 2015. Now, they were fully willing to accept that they received that agenda and that mandate yet are willing to reject the mandate that we received in this House. The hypocrisy of that, Mr. Speaker, is unbelievable.

The Speaker: We are back on the main bill. Are there others wishing to debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to talk about Bill 2. My dear friend Christine was watching our debate late into the evening, and now she and her two youngest children, Meleah and Austin, are watching again. I want to mention that her husband, Ian, is retired air force. Her two older children are currently members of the Canadian Armed Forces. As we stand here in this House and freely debate, I can’t help but reflect on the importance of citizen engagement and the ability that we have as opposition to freely express our opposition to the government.

As Her Majesty’s Loyal Opposition liaison to the Canadian Armed Forces I’d like to take a moment in this House and commemorate the 75th anniversary of D-Day and acknowledge those that fought for our ability to engage in the very democracy that we are speaking to today. That historical 24 hours involved 14,000 Canadian soldiers who landed on Juno Beach or parachuted into Normandy. Our soldiers broke through the beach’s defences in less than two hours, and by nightfall they had reached as far as 10 kilometres inland, the highest of any division that landed on June 6, 1944. Many soldiers lost their lives that day and many more in the battles that would follow in Normandy. The invasion is now recognized as the greatest military operation ever executed.

To honour those who fought and died in Normandy, Canadian veterans created a museum called Juno Beach Centre, located on Juno Beach, in 2003. The world can now learn of the incredible Canadian sacrifice made on Juno Beach in Normandy, where many Canadians landed 75 years ago.

The Victoria Cross is the highest military honour one can receive in Canada and the Commonwealth. Only one was awarded within Canada for the invasion of Normandy. Mr. David Vivian Currie of the South Alberta Regiment, now known as the South Alberta Light Horse Regiment, received this honour. It is because of the resiliency, determination, and, for so many, the sacrifice made by our soldiers that we are able to be here today and participate in this Legislature. To those that are no longer with us, to the veterans across this nation, to the current members who perpetuate the work of soldiers before them, and to the many, many families, thank you.

I would just like to thank my members for the standing ovation that was given to our soldiers who have come before us and who have provided the freedoms that we are so able to enjoy today in this House. To be able to debate freely is such an honour and an appreciation by our members. It's an incredible privilege.

Back to Bill 2, Mr. Speaker, An Act to Make Alberta Open for Business. More appropriately, we've been calling it, on this side of the House, the pick-your-pockets bill. We're standing up for Albertans over here, and that's why we are opposed to the legislation that's being proposed the way it is.

2:40 p.m.

When we were government, we made sure that Albertans had modern workplace laws that respected working people, that set modern standards and ensured that Albertans were treated fairly. After decades of inaction, hard-working Albertans finally had the same rights and benefits as every other Canadian. We followed through on our promise to phase in a $15 minimum wage so people didn't have to go from their jobs to the food bank. We made workplaces more family friendly. We introduced job-protecting leaves and improved maternity leave and compassionate care. We put a lot of time and effort into studying the impacts of the minimum wage.

Earlier this morning we heard concerns about the bill progressing, and we've introduced an amendment that was asking the government to stop. We felt that enough consultation hadn't occurred with Albertans. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, that was voted down, so we're back speaking to the main bill. We just want to continue to advocate because we know about the impacts of consultation. We took that information, and we were able to ensure that we were putting more dollars into the pockets of hard-working Albertans who live here, who work here, who spend their money here. We looked at studies finding positive effects of raising the minimum wage. I hope that our opposition has consulted and has looked at impacts on women, on consumer spending, on health, on poverty, and more.

You heard me, Mr. Speaker, talk about my story this morning. You heard me talk about the experiences that I've had as a social worker, seeing first-hand and living first-hand the impacts that poverty has on all aspects of people's lives. This bill, unfortunately, is taking money out of Albertans' pockets. Taking away their ability to have their overtime at time and a half is shameful. Unfortunately, we know that most of the people that are impacted, in poverty as well as working in minimum wage jobs, are young people, women, and children. We know that poverty has a huge impact and that there's a higher rate of illness, lower education, limited housing availability. That list just goes on.

On this side of the house we believe that Albertans, young or old, deserve equal pay for equal work and that rolling back the minimum wage for young people demonstrates an absolute lack of compassion and a lack of respect for young workers. The value of your work should depend on the effort and the skill that you put into it, not the year that you were born. The UCP is also proposing to implement a $2 – oh, sorry. I talked about that, the $2-an-hour wage cut to students between the ages of 13 and 17.

However, it would only apply if they were in school. If they work more than 28 hours in a week, they must be paid the general minimum wage for every hour beyond the first 28. During breaks and summer holidays the youth rate would apply to all hours worked. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, this would lead vulnerable youth to choose to drop out of school in order to make a higher wage, which is very concerning. Again, you heard me talk about some of those vulnerable youth and, specifically, young parents. Like I mentioned earlier, as a single young mother myself – having worked with young parents for several years, I spoke to the negative impacts that this legislation would have on these young people and their families. Looking at all families, our government knows that we need to be able to support families, and proposing legislation that has a direct impact on their pocketbook is harmful, and it's shameful.

The other piece I talked about this morning was, again, the impact on those that are in the service industry and the UCP proposal regarding a liquor server differential wage. We believe that the minimum wage needs to be guaranteed for all hard-working Albertans, regardless of where they work, and that the government shouldn't be creating different tiers for workers. I talked about knowing that tips can't be considered a stable income. Their tips may vary, night by night, shift by shift, with the location of where they are in the province. It simply just doesn't make sense, Mr. Speaker. You can't rely on an unstable source of income. When the UCP says that all servers make up the difference in tips, I'm curious how they can guarantee that.

We talked a little bit this morning about overtime. We know that the pick-your-pockets bill will take your overtime, steal your holiday pay, cut your holiday pay to pay for their big tax gift to corporations. The Premier's pick-your-pocket bill will impact roughly 400,000 Albertans working overtime to care for themselves and their families. Albertans in oil and gas, construction, and the skilled trades will be hit hard.

Mr. Speaker, I can speak to this first-hand. My oldest son is a fourth-generation journeyman insulator and has worked in the oil field for several years now. We know the impact that this is going to have on our family, on so many families across this province. There are Albertans that are working to a project deadline who often put in the extra hours to get the job done and then take the paid time off later. If you're an oil and gas worker making average pay, putting in 10 overtime hours every week on a 12-week project, that's 120 hours in paid time off. The difference between banking that pay at time and a half pay versus straight time is over $2,500. That's quite significant. It's a huge difference for working people. We're talking hundreds to thousands of dollars for people going above and beyond in the workplace day in and day out.

What happens when the workers accumulated overtime with the understanding that they were going to receive 1.5 for each overtime hour? It's not taught to students or non-unionized workers to negotiate their rights as an employee. Who is to sit with workers and explain that they have the right to request their overtime to be paid out, Mr. Speaker? How will employees respond to that negotiating process? Even if they allow that discussion to take place to begin with, there's a power dynamic at play in these discussions no matter how you frame this. Employers' bottom line profits are affected if they pay out overtime. Will they be open to doing so when they know that by paying out overtime, it will be at 1.5 hours for each hour worked versus time in lieu, which is 1 hour for 1 hour?

The workers' time is not valued as it was in our legislation. Workers are at the mercy of employers' discretion to honour their important work that generates those profits for the employer. How can the members sit across there, vote this through, look Albertans in the eyes, and say: your work is not valued? Many of my constituents work in the trades. Their overtime is what has helped them and their families in Edmonton-Castle Downs get through the economic downturns. When I was at the doors, I heard loud and clear from all constituents that overtime was the most important issue that crossed all demographics. I heard many times that the previous election reflected Alberta's wishes for the future of Alberta. Well, Edmonton-Castle Downs voted overwhelmingly against losing their overtime hours, losing their value.

I now have constituents coming to my office with fears now that this has been introduced. "What will this mean for me? What will this mean for my family?" One constituent came in so upset that there is an exception on workers to know how to negotiate to have their overtime paid out at time and a half instead of lieu time at hour for hour. He's never had to do this before, Mr. Speaker. His concerns are that if he opposes the employer, he is at risk of losing his job. Therein lies the rub: the power dynamic at play, that we worked to eliminate for workers' rights. He is speaking with co-workers about how to have these discussions.

A working Albertan does not pit workers against employers; that is what this bill does, with both having a large stake in the outcome. Workers need their hours to be honoured for what they have earned versus businesses' bottom line. Workers take on overtime to help pay for a roof over their head. Workers take on overtime to help pay for braces. Workers take on overtime to help pay for their children's tuition costs. Workers miss out on major life moments by taking on overtime for the benefit of finishing the job and for earning additional pay for their family to be able to succeed here in our province.

Businesses' bottom lines do not hug your child at night and tuck them in. Businesses' bottom lines do not pay for formula and diapers. Businesses' bottom lines cannot pay for missing a first step or a first word or a first "I love you." How will this play out for the economy if Albertans don't have that additional $2,500 in their pockets? Mr. Speaker, this is concerning.

2:50 p.m.

To hear the UCP repeat over and over that the thousands of dollars of the carbon tax deserves to be in the hands of Albertans, what is the difference when they are taking over $2,500 from Albertans? This is a prime example that they weren't concerned with the amount of money in the hands of Albertans but where the money from Albertans was going. Instead of having that money back in circulation in Alberta, they would rather it be back in the hands of employers like large corporations, whose profits aren't reflected in the Alberta economy. For a party that shouts from the rooftops that they are about jobs and the economy of Alberta, this does not sound like they are concerned at all about Alberta's economy. The voters in Alberta voted for more jobs and an improved economy. They did not vote for losing money out of the Alberta economy, and this bill does just that. I'm just overwhelmed with the lack of insight.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member, and thank you for your lovely statement on the commemoration of the 75th anniversary of D-Day.

We have Standing Order 29(2)(a), and I saw the Minister of Labour and Immigration on his feet. I'm not sure if he'd like to provide some brief comments or questions to the member.

Mr. Copping: I would. Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I would like to respond to the comments made by the hon. member and a number of the members opposite and set the record straight. You know, I'd like to talk about three primary issues: the job creation, youth minimum wage, and general holidays as well as banked overtime.

First, talking about the youth minimum wage and the changes to the general holiday pay, Mr. Speaker, this is about creating job opportunities, particularly for youth. Members opposite fail to recognize that their policy changes, including increasing the minimum wage to $15 an hour and changes to the general holiday rules, created a youth job crisis in our province. At the time many economists indicated that a 50 per cent increase in the minimum wage in the face of one of Alberta's worst economic downturns would result in job loss. Nonetheless, the previous government went forward and made changes not only to the minimum wage but to a number of work rules and increased taxes.

Canadian empirical research has generally found that a 10 per cent increase in the minimum wage rate reduces employment among teens by 3 to 6 per cent. For example, the Bank of Canada did a study that suggested that a 10 per cent increase in the minimum wage is estimated to decrease participation rates by nearly 3 per cent for 15- to 19-year-olds. What did the previous government do? They didn't increase it by 10 per cent. They increased it by nearly 50 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, these studies are actually borne out in fact. The Calgary Chamber of commerce reported that 55 per cent of businesses in Calgary that hired minimum wage staff reported layoffs due to the minimum wage increase. A similar CFIB survey reported that 55 per cent of businesses had reduced or eliminated plans to hire new workers. Furthermore, Restaurants Canada reported that their industry lost 10,000 jobs between 2015 and 2018, and this industry largely employs youth.

Mr. Speaker, we have a youth job crisis, and when we put forward policies to address these issues, the members opposite suggest that that's unfair. What isn't fair is that thousands of Albertans and, quite frankly, thousands of youths do not have jobs. These changes will get Albertans working, particularly young Albertans, get them on the job ladder, and give them the experience and skills they need to progress in their career and start earning more than the minimum wage.

I'd like to talk briefly as well concerning banked overtime, Mr. Speaker. This change is about providing greater flexibility for Alberta workers. Now, the hon. members on the other side have suggested that this will impact overtime pay. Let me be clear. Changes to the banked overtime rules do not impact paid overtime. What this does, however, is increase flexibility for workers and employers and provide greater opportunity for those workers to actually bank overtime.

One of the unintended consequences of the changes that the NDP made is that they imposed greater costs on employers for banking overtime, moving it from one to one and a half times. What this resulted in was an employer saying no to agreeing to banked overtime – right? – and that reduces opportunities for employees to bank their time and average out the time worked for a particular employer, particularly in those professions where you work for a period of time and then you have long periods of time off such as the construction industry. Now, by making this change back to 1 to 1, it will provide greater opportunities for employees to bank their overtime. And if they do not take banked overtime, they will be paid out at a minimum of 1.5 times their rate. It has been suggested by the members opposite that this provision will force employees to bank overtime whether they want to or not. The legislation is clear, Mr. Speaker. The only item in the current act that Bill 2 changes is the rate at which overtime is banked.

Let me point out items in the rest of this provision that we are not changing in the Employment Standards Code and that actually were endorsed by the previous government. I'll paraphrase here in the interests of time. First, section 23(1)(b) – again, we're not changing this, Mr. Speaker – there must be a written agreement. Section 23(2)(b): if banked overtime is not taken as time, then it will be paid out at at least 1.5 times. Section 23(2)(d): no amendment or termination is to be effective without at least one month's written notice given by one party or another. That goes both ways. Finally, section 23(3): an employer must provide a copy of the agreement to the employees affected. These items we are not changing.

Clearly, it is a written agreement between the employer and employees. There is choice involved in this written agreement. They can pull out of this written agreement. In fact, these provisions are currently in the act, and these are the provisions that were passed by the previous government.

So, Mr. Speaker, the provisions in the act are about creating more job opportunities for Albertans and for youth, and they are also about restoring worker rights. This was clearly laid out in our platform.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday is rising in debate.

Mr. Carson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure, an honour, and a privilege to join you this afternoon to speak to Bill 2. Of course, I had the opportunity to provide some comments on the amendment that was before us, but now we're back on the main bill.

I first want to have a conversation about the comments that the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction brought forward, saying that we simply should not oppose this legislation because they have the mandate of, he made it sound, every Albertan, but that's just simply not the case. The fact is that there is a large portion of this Assembly, elected members of this Assembly, that are not members of the government caucus, and we have a responsibility to our constituents and to people across the province who did vote for us, whether their constituency elected an NDP member or not.

They have a responsibility to listen to us about the concerns that we have and about the concerns that our constituents have. So to stand in this House and say, "Oh, you know, it took up a quarter of a page in our platform or a line in our platform; therefore, we have a full mandate to implement it" is simply ridiculous. I would go further to say that this legislation goes against his mandate as the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction. If you think about what is being put forward here, to say that if a student is in school, they get paid less, and if they work over 28 hours, then everything after that is $15 an hour: this is an administrative nightmare. So for him to sit here and say, "All is good here; red tape reduced" – no, it simply is not. You are causing HR nightmares for employers across this province.

Now, I also have concerns with what the minister of labour said because the fact is that this legislation is weakening the ability of employees to bank their overtime at time and a half. Our government saw that there were concerns from employees with their ability to get paid for the work that they are doing. So we modernized the legislation, put us in line with almost every other jurisdiction if not every other jurisdiction across Canada, saying that if you work overtime, you will get paid, recognizing that you are helping an employer and you should be rightfully compensated for that. So for him to stand up and say, "Oh, we are not weakening it; we're increasing flexibility" – these were the exact words that he said. Well, in the conversation that I had about the amendment that was before us earlier, I shared an example of how employers in some circumstances use the legislation or lack of legislation to take advantage of workers. Like I said, it might be a unique circumstance, but the point of us legislating these changes and being elected to this House is to protect workers. So the fact that you want to take us back to a time when there wasn't legislation protecting us is simply irresponsible. I will not support that, and I have every right to stand in this Assembly and speak against that.

3:00 p.m.

Now, I want to point out a comment that our Premier made when the open for business act was tabled in the Legislature. He said, and I quote: look, $13 an hour is a heck of a lot more than zero bucks an hour.

An Hon. Member: True.

Mr. Carson: It is true, but it's simply a false equivalency to say that you either get paid less or you've got no job. It's simply ridiculous, and I have concerns that that is his best comment to make to this legislation. I think that he should have a conversation with his press secretaries and his chief of staff, because for them to think that that was the best conversation to bring forward in the introduction of this legislation is, well, concerning, for sure.

Now, the biggest issue that I have and the biggest underlying disagreement that I have with the legislation that is before us, of course, has been brought up several times: it is a direct attack on young workers in our province. Now, this legislation is not simply one attack and, you know, nothing else changes. This is going to be done in conjunction with, I imagine, cuts to $25-a-day child care. It will be done at the same time as cutting school nutrition programs, which we've already heard coming up in the news, where school boards are talking about cutting the nutrition programs because they aren't getting clarity on the funding moving forward. We haven't heard a commitment, as far as I have seen, to continuing the Alberta child benefit program. I think that the government probably sees the benefit of this program, and I really hope that they don't move forward on cutting that.

Even the price on carbon and the carbon levy rebate were helping young families. Believe it or not, I went to a few doors, and they said: who's the party that brought in the carbon levy rebate? That might surprise you, but there were people out there that said that, and many of them were young families that were seeing the benefit of getting that rebate because they were actually receiving more money back than it was costing them.

When we look at the bills that have been brought forward to this Legislature so far, we're seeing – excuse me; it's been a very long couple of days here – an attack on workers but an attack on young Albertans specifically. With the act to destroy GSAs, we're seeing an attack on young Albertans.

Mr. Nielsen: Who can't even vote.

Mr. Carson: Who can't even vote. Exactly.

With this legislation we're seeing it, and it's concerning because, as has been stated several times in the Assembly, these are people who did not have a voice in the last election. They did not give you a mandate. You talk about having such a big mandate. They did not give you this mandate to cut their wages. You should take the time to consult with young Albertans. For the members across the way to stand – and they have stood in this Legislature – and say, "I've talked to young Albertans who think this is great legislation," well, maybe you could introduce them in the House or, I mean, just share exactly why they think it's going to help them, because it doesn't seem reasonable to me.

I shared with the Legislature the story of my upbringing and the fact that my mother was 14 years old when she had me and that that was a decision she had to make. Now you're telling somebody like my mother, who's 14 years old and has a child, that she doesn't deserve to be able to help her child. You're saying: unless you drop out of school, we're going to pay you $13 an hour. I think it's unreasonable.

Mr. Nielsen: It's disturbing.

Mr. Carson: It is disturbing.

I think it's unreasonable to tell any person, no matter how old they are, that they should get paid less and that they should have to go to a food bank afterwards because they're 17 years old. She had responsibilities that many 20-year-olds don't have in having a child that young, and she made the decision to continue going to school. This legislation will penalize somebody like my mother for doing that. Once again, it's been brought up several times that with this legislation, at a time when there are major concerns about high school completion rates, you are incentivizing people to drop out of school before they complete their diplomas, which is gravely concerning.

Now, something that hasn't been addressed by the government, at least not reasonably, is the effects that lowering the minimum wage is going to have on people with disabilities. Now we are going to get into a system where an employer has to make a decision between hiring somebody that's under 18, that they can pay less, and somebody with a disability. Now, I hope they make the right decision in ensuring that they are an inclusive employer, that they're supporting all people in our society, in our communities, but you are making it harder for that employer to choose the person with a disability, which is incredibly unfortunate.

Our government, through legislation in the 29th Legislature, brought up the wage for people with disabilities. We made it an even playing field because we recognize that we shouldn't make it harder for employers to choose to support people with disabilities.

Now, once again, we are also pitting students that are in school against students who are out of school. In the circumstance where for whatever reason a student is not attending school and they're under 18 years old, they are going to be less likely to get hired compared to somebody that's in school. Now you're hurting somebody that is not attending school for whatever reason, because it's actually harder for them to compete against somebody that can be paid less.

Another concern is what lowering the minimum wage for youth is going to do to seniors that are trying to get a job. You know, we're talking about a 17-year-old who may have work experience and that you can pay $13 an hour compared to a senior, who you're going to have to pay more. You're actually hurting seniors through this legislation.

It's been brought up several times, the concerns around what lowering the minimum wage for youth does for people turning 18 years old. I'm concerned about the turnover, seeing somebody turning 18. An employer may no longer want to keep them on because they have to pay them more.

Now, of course, it's been shared in this Legislature several times that the NDP caucus has major concerns about what this means for banked overtime. I shared a story earlier, on the amendment, about an instance that happened to me where an employer took advantage of me in terms of crunch time, making sure that we were able to get the product out, which is reasonable and happens in a lot of industries. But then the employer came back to me and said: you can either choose to take a couple of days off, take a day off at regular time, or you can find yourself another job. Whether the minister thinks that happens or not, it happens. It happens, and you're really encouraging it to happen more. We need to protect these people.

Now, I am very proud that when we were elected in 2015, we raised the minimum wage to $15. We recognized that if you're working 40 hours a week, you should not have to go to the food bank afterwards. Once again, it goes back to my values in being raised by a young mother. Now, we've heard several times from the government caucus that, you know, all of them have signed the front of so many cheques and that we don't have any experience with that. Well, I have experience being a worker, and I don't think that you should hold it against me that I haven't run a business.

You know, running a business is not for everyone. Not everyone is going to have the opportunity to do that, just like not everyone is going to have the opportunity to go to postsecondary education, especially as we talk about increasing postsecondary tuition costs and lowering the minimum wage for students, who are no longer going to be able to afford postsecondary education. It's very frustrating for me to start pitting people against each other. You say you have so much more knowledge because you've signed the front of a cheque. Well, I have received many cheques, and I have helped those employers be able to sign the front of cheques, so I think that we should maybe move off that conversation. Imagine if one of us stood up and said: well, you don't have the same education as me, so you probably just shouldn't talk. The fact is that we were elected here by the members of our community for a reason, whether you agree with those reasons or not.

3:10 p.m.

Now, once again, I do want to just raise the fact that this government thinks it's okay to discriminate against people under the age of 18. As far as we can tell, it's legal. As shameful as it is, it's legal. The Alberta Human Rights Act does not protect people under the age of 18 from age discrimination. It protects them under reasons of discrimination but not for age. I'm sure that this is a conversation that the front bench of the government had with each other, and I imagine they might be – well, hopefully not – quite proud that they were able to get away with paying young Albertans less than everyone else.

Now, I started working from a very young age. I was also 14 though I didn't have the responsibility of raising a child, like my mother did. But I had important things to pay for. I had to start saving for postsecondary education. Of course, my mother, being as young as she was when she had me, had a lot of responsibilities to pay for other things, and I thought it was important to pay for my own education. Now, thankfully, I went to NAIT for radio and television broadcasting, not a full degree program, just a two-year diploma, and it was exceptionally less expensive than a four-year program. So I'm very thankful for that.

I just think about the Albertans who are looking at taking on, you know, $20,000 to in some instances $100,000 of debt to go get a postsecondary education, and this government is telling them that they don't deserve to be able to get paid enough to actually pay their way through that. Not everyone has the privilege of having a family unit that can help them pay their way through that. I think that it's reasonable to be concerned about how this legislation is going to affect them.

The Speaker: Well, thank you, hon. member.

Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available, and I believe that I saw the hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore rising first.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate your recognizing me. I was listening very intently to the Member for Edmonton-West Henday. During his remarks some thoughts came to me around what he was speaking about around the youth rate, about some of his lived experiences, with remarks about his mother as she was faced with certain challenges. I know it kind of coincides a little bit with some of the remarks that I was speaking to earlier around making sure to consult our young emerging leaders. These are individuals that did not get to vote in this recent election, yet here we are potentially making decisions that will adversely affect them. I find it a little bit ironic that here we are saying, “Democracy: we need to protect it,” yet these young emerging leaders aren’t a part of it.

I think that as we were talking earlier about tapping on the brake there a little bit, maybe having a chance to discuss with them, get their points of view, I was hoping that possibly the Member for Edmonton-West Henday could comment on his slightly younger days, when he was going to school, on just some of the conditions around that time. I’m wondering: were there any kinds of decisions maybe being made by the government of the day, how they might have affected him, be it working relationships or how he was earning income or just simply decisions that impeded his ability to create a better lifestyle for himself? I’m hoping that maybe the member might comment on that a little bit and share that for the House so that we have the ability to make informed decisions here.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday has approximately two and a half minutes remaining this time.

Mr. Carson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the Member for Edmonton-Decore for the question. I guess that to that question I would say that the decisions that governments were making at the time, if anything, discouraged me from going to postsecondary institutions or going to get a four-year degree. At the time we had a Conservative government that was not willing to recognize that the cost of postsecondary education was hurting students’ abilities to go. When you come from a family of lower middle income, postsecondary education is simply, for the most part, out of the question. I mean, you can take on student loans, of course. I wasn’t necessarily willing to make that call, but that is exactly why I was so proud, when we were elected into government in 2015, to freeze tuition for four years, moving on five years now. It sounds like this government is committed – well, because they haven’t presented their own budget, the freeze will go into the next year, which I am very happy to see.

My concern is: what happens after that? We saw from the previous government, going into the election, that they were proposing market modifiers which were going to see the cost of tuition explode by thousands and thousands of dollars. If that’s what their plan is, well, you are going to see postsecondary completion rates or entry rates drop. I can only imagine. Once again, that is why I was proud to stand with our government in 2015 to raise the minimum wage, giving students the opportunity to go to school and get better educated. Of course, that’s important in our society.

Now, I will say that this all started, the idea of income equality started – I’m not going to have enough time to tell the story, I don’t think. No. I’ll just stop there. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I’ll save it for another time.

The Speaker: Hon. members, there are approximately 30 seconds left under 29(2)(a).

Mr. Carson: That was enough time to tell the story.

The Speaker: Well, I’m never really aware. Brevity may not be your number one quality. It’s sometimes tough to know how long the story would or wouldn’t take.

Seeing no other questions or comments under 29(2)(a), I see that the hon. the Member for Edmonton-South would like to debate.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It’s really my pleasure today to rise and speak to you because I’m going to be moving an amendment that I think may be one of your personal favourite amendments. I would move that the motion for second reading of Bill 2, An Act to Make Alberta Open for Business, be amended by deleting all of the words after “that” and substituting the following:

Bill 2, An Act to Make Alberta Open for Business, be not now read a second time but that it be read a second time this day six months hence.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member. I would just ask that you would pass the amendment to the pages, and I will give you the “proceed” in due course. Thank you, hon. member.

This will be referred to as amendment HA, if you are following along at home or if you’d like to add it to the top left of your amendment that you are receiving. It will be referred to as amendment HA.

The hon. the Member for Edmonton-South has the call.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It really is my pleasure to speak to amendment HA, as you have so eloquently named it. This is an amendment that I’ve looked forward to moving because I think it allows us to take a hard look at this bill and say that we do need that extra six months to review what we’re getting ourselves into. We do need that extra six months to review what the pick-your-pockets bill is going to do to Albertans, how it’s going to adversely affect families, how it’s going to adversely affect workers, and how it’s going to affect so many different people across this province.

I mean, I guess there are certain things that I am very concerned about because we’ve heard so little from the government benches. Of course, a few of the members have gotten up under 29(2)(a) to speak about this, but really there has been no co-ordinated effort for them to defend the bill at all. In fact, of course, there are many ministers here who I think should be very concerned about this bill. I know that the Minister of Children’s Services must be, then, okay with the children under her care, Mr. Speaker, if they want to get an education while also working, that they would actually be making $2 less, 13.3 per cent less, than any other person working.

3:20 p.m.

Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of Children’s Services is okay with this happening to children under her care, then I am deeply concerned what the direction of this government will be for other forms of legislation. The minister ought to know that the children under her care are working hard not only to go to school and try to accomplish what they need in their education but will often also need to work to support themselves and try to save for many things in the future or perhaps just to deal with their day-to-day expenses.

The minister, of course, has not spoken. The minister has actually remained silent on these issues. If the minister would wish to stand up and clarify and perhaps talk to why she believes that it is okay to take money out of the hands of the children under her care, then I would welcome that opportunity. Of course, it looks like the minister either doesn’t care or doesn’t know what this bill is going to do to the people that she is obligated to protect. I think that’s a real shame. That’s something that the government should be very concerned about – I think all private members and all members of the opposition here are certainly concerned – that the minister does not know what effect this bill will have on her portfolio. The minister does not know what effect this bill will have on the people that she is charged to ensure have a safe home.

These children, who only want to make sure they have a strong education while also trying to work to support themselves, Mr. Speaker: this is going to be going into their pockets and picking those toonies right out. It’s going to be picking their pockets and taking that money away from them every single day they go to work. If the minister is okay with that, I want to hear why. I want to know why the minister thinks that those . . .

Mr. Ellis: Point of order.

The Acting Speaker: Okay. The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Point of Order Imputing Motives

Mr. Ellis: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Standing Order 23(h), (i), and (j): “imputes false or unavowed motives to another Member.” Obviously, the Minister of Children’s Services works hard every day to ensure that children in this province are taken care of. For the member to insinuate in any way that she doesn’t care about children, to insinuate in any way that there is harm to be done to children I think is absolutely outrageous and something that that member needs to apologize for, withdraw his comments. This is not a matter of debate. This is a situation where he is directly imputing false motives to this member within this House.

I would also, through you, Mr. Speaker, encourage this member to follow the rules within this book to ensure that when he is directing his comments, it is to you at the chair. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-North West standing.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I certainly am happy to rise on this particular point of order. You know, what we are discussing here is a question of a two-tiered minimum wage that leaves young people, children, on the short end of that second tier. For the hon. member or any of us as individuals, I think we’ve made it abundantly clear that this puts young people, underage, minors – otherwise, children – at a distinct disadvantage. The implication of that, as we’ve described, I think, with a number of arguments, is that these young people are working side by side for equal work expectations in a given job situation yet under this proposal are being given a 13 per cent cut to their pay. A lot of mischaracterization that we’ve seen from the opposite side of kids working to buy an iPad . . .

The Acting Speaker: Hon. member, I’m just looking for: with regard to this point of order is there new information that you would be providing on this?

Mr. Eggen: Yeah. You bet. The new information is – it’s not new information. I think it’s fairly well established that this has . . .

The Acting Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but you just admitted that you weren’t providing new information on this issue.

Mr. Eggen: Sure. Absolutely. You betcha. Having this money taken away from the people – and young people are working to perhaps go to school, as I described. You have this whole contingent of grade 12s that, if they happen to have been born in one half of the calendar, end up getting a 13 per cent cut. This hon. member is pointing this out. It’s a matter of opinion that he is describing, thus under standing orders, with which I’m very familiar, and precedents and experience in this matter, there is nothing here to withdraw.

The Acting Speaker: I will make the confession that at the time that the comments in question were made, I did not hear clearly what the hon. Member for Edmonton-South said. That said, there is the opportunity to review what is stated at a later time. What I will do is that I will simply give the opportunity to the hon. Member for Edmonton-South, as he knows what he said – I will find out later. Knowing what you said, do you feel at this time – in order to move this process ahead very quickly, are you willing to, then, just apologize for the comments and move on to the rest of your discussion? The hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

Mr. Dang: This is clearly a matter of debate. I encourage you to make a ruling toward that direction.

The Acting Speaker: I will make a ruling in due course.
The hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Now, as I was already saying, it is very clear what this bill does. This bill goes into the pockets of vulnerable children, particularly children that are under the care of this minister. They will go in and they will not be able to receive the pay that they deserve under equal work, equal pay. They will not have that money. They will have their pockets picked, they will have their toonies taken away, and what will result is that this minister will be complacent in accepting that the children under her care should be paid less if they wish to go to school.

That is simply a matter of the facts, Mr. Speaker. If the minister wishes to defend that or dispute that, then the minister absolutely has the opportunity to stand up in this House and do so. But we’ve seen that the front bench and indeed the backbench of the government have been hesitant to speak to this bill at all. Perhaps it’s because they know what the facts of this bill are. They know that this bill is designed to hurt people, to hurt families and ordinary working Albertans.

I really am concerned that this is the direction the minister wants to take with moving forward with the file, Mr. Speaker, taking advantage and picking the pockets of the children that she is charged to care. We really need to put the brakes on this bill. We really need to stop and say in six months: is this still the right move to make? I think it’s very clear that when we talk about these issues in this House, every single member, especially members of the front bench, who are charged to protect Albertans, who have that obligation and indeed that duty, should get up and defend themselves. When we move forward legislation that affects over 400,000 Albertans, when it affects so many people in such a broad, sweeping way, in such a negative manner, the members of the front bench should and indeed need to get up and defend why they think it’s okay to pick the pockets of ordinary Albertans.

Of course, the minister absolutely is supposed to be protecting these people, but what this bill does is that it goes in and damages her ability to do that. So why would the minister be okay with that? And if she is not, would she stand up and explain that to the House, Mr. Speaker? I certainly think that if I were the minister, I would be concerned that the children under the care of the ministry need to be able to both have an education and work to support themselves. That is something that is foundational to being a free citizen here in Alberta, that equal work should result in equal pay, that somebody who is working hard to pull themselves up by their bootstraps, as our friends across the aisle would like to say, absolutely should have the opportunity to both go and study in school so they can get their high school credentials and also work hard so they can support their family, so that they don’t have to stop at a food bank after getting off the bus on the way home.

I think that is something that is very clear and should be very clear to all members of the Assembly but that particularly the minister should be concerned about. The Minister of Children's Services should be getting up and talking about why she is either okay with this or why she does not support this bill. Mr. Speaker, I think that is something that all members would be excited to hear because we know that the minister definitely has the obligation to protect these children. We want to know how she will be doing that with the limitations brought forward by Bill 2, the pick-your-pockets bill, because this bill will absolutely hurt those children. This bill will absolutely hurt the people in care. Those are the facts of the matter. When we look at the simple facts, this minister needs to explain and clarify to the House why she is okay or not okay with this happening.

Mr. Speaker, I think I've gone on at quite some length about the children in care that will need the support of the minister and how I hope we will hear some advantages being brought forward from her, but I think there are other ministers who also should have some very grave concerns about this bill. In particular, I'm very concerned with what the Minister of Education would have to say about this bill because the Minister of Education has yet to speak to this bill. I mean, there have been two amendments, a referral and a reasoned amendment, and of course we've spoken at quite some length to the main bill as well, and the minister has refused to get up and say anything.

The question, of course, then becomes: why is the minister supporting a bill that encourages students to drop out of school? Mr. Speaker, the Education minister's real duty here should be to ensure that as many students as possible graduate from high school and receive their credentials. But the minister has refused to speak to this. The minister has refused to get up and defend the bill or oppose the bill. I would hope that the minister would oppose this portion of the bill, at least, because this portion of the bill directly affects the people that she is charged to educate. If the minister thinks that that is okay – it attacks the people she is charged to educate; it encourages them to drop out of school – then I want to know why the minister would think that. If she doesn't think that, then I want to see and I want to hear why she would vote against this portion of the bill.

I think it's something that is very clearly an issue that the members of this Assembly and certainly the opposition would want to know, and we want to know immediately because it is something that will affect Albertans for generations to come. There are 400,000 workers here that will be affected, Mr. Speaker, and we know that you can't have a prosperous Alberta if the Education minister is actually trying to get kids to drop out of school. We know that you can't have an Alberta that works for all if you have an Education minister that doesn't want kids to graduate. I, of course, hope that the Education minister is trying to get as many students through the credentialing process as possible, and I would be very pleased to hear her get up here in this House and say that. Unfortunately, we have yet to hear that, and I'm concerned that she may not.

If she doesn't, I'm concerned with whether she understands the ramifications of the bill that's being presented today. I'm concerned with whether she understands the ramifications of the pick-your-pockets bill and how that's going to affect students because those students will have to make a decision. They will have to choose whether they want to take a 13.3 per cent cut, a massive pay cut, or whether they want to drop out of school. That is something that is deeply concerning because the minister's obligation should be to ensure that these students have the best possible learning environment and don't have to choose between food banks or studying. They shouldn't have to choose between whether to pay for a bus pass or stop at the food bank. The pick-your-pockets bill: taking the toonies away one at a time, it absolutely forces students to make that choice. It absolutely puts students and the most vulnerable students, Mr. Speaker, into very tough situations that are going to have adverse consequences.

That's why I think we need to just put the brakes on this bill a little bit here. We need to stop, we need to take a deep breath and think: in six months, is this still a good idea? After we've had some time to consult with Albertans, after we've had some time to look at the ramifications of this bill, after we've had some time to consult with the people who are actually getting the cuts, Mr. Speaker, the 400,000 workers who are having their pockets picked by every single member of this government, then we will know whether this bill is something that we want to move forward with.

I mean, I'm concerned that the Minister of Education – I mean, we've seen quite a bit in this Assembly over the last few weeks – hasn't been able to answer the questions that have been posed to her with a very satisfactory answer. That's concerning because I think the minister should have a single-minded goal. It should be a safe, inclusive learning environment for all students. But when you create a system where there are two tiers of young people, when you create a system where suddenly one person is worth more than another by a very significant margin, Mr. Speaker, 13.3 per cent, when you create these adverse situations for children, it creates a scenario where you cannot expect young people to have an easy decision. You cannot expect young people to be forced to make the decision between dropping out of school or going to work to support their family.

That is the reality of what the minister is going to be asking students to do if she refuses to get up and admonish this part of the bill. Again, I really encourage the minister to get up and speak to this. I think it's something that all members would be excited to hear about, and we want to know: does the minister support this bill, and if so, why does the minister support picking the pockets of the students she is entrusted to care for? If she doesn't support this bill, then will the minister be voting against it, and what amendments will the minister be bringing forward? I think those are important questions that Albertans deserve to know. They're important questions.

We need to make sure that we have the utmost respect and the best interests of students right here in this Assembly. When we don't have the minister getting up, when we have the minister remaining silent on the issue, it leads us to question: what is the intention here, and what will happen? The front bench, again, Mr. Speaker, either has not read the bill or does not understand what is going to happen. They either do not understand what the adverse consequences for so many people across this province are going to be or they simply don't care. I think either of those situations is really unacceptable for Albertans because it creates a situation where Albertans have this two-tiered system, and suddenly you're telling people that they are worth less because of the day they were born.

Mr. Speaker, we've gone down this path in the past, and it's been very clear that it doesn't work for working families. It doesn't work for families that rely on that extra income from maybe that one child. If you're asking that student, if you're asking that child whether they want to stay in school and study for that diploma exam or they want to stop at the food bank every day, then I think it becomes very clear that we are putting students in an impossible scenario. We are putting them in a situation that will hurt families and will hurt these vulnerable Albertans. The minister needs to stand up and explain why the minister is okay with that. The Education minister needs to stand up and explain why she will be okay with students having to choose between food banks or dropping out of high school. That's something I think all members in this Assembly should be extremely concerned about.

I think members in the government caucus in particular should be extremely concerned about it because their front bench brought this bill forward, and they've brought this bill forward without much forethought, it seems, because as the opposition has brought up many times, time and time again today, Mr. Speaker, there are very core flaws with this bill. There are core flaws that directly influence very important figures in this province, very important ministers in this province, and ministries that have very large roles to play in shaping our future. When we talk about these concerns, it is very clear that the ministers either do not understand this bill and how bad it is for families or they simply do not care.

If it's either of those, I'm very concerned with the direction that we're going to be seeing in the next four years here. I'm very concerned that the Minister of Education will not understand how bad this is for her students. I'm very concerned that the Minister of Education thinks it's okay to encourage students to drop out of school.

The Acting Speaker: Under 29(2)(a) I believe that I see the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition rising to speak.

Ms Notley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Yes. I want to thank the Member for Edmonton-South for his very thoughtful comments on Bill 2 and, in particular, on this amendment. I do want to begin by saying that I appreciate the instinct he shows and the fact that he is challenging some of the other members of the front bench to actually do the work of the ministry that they are responsible for leading and to actually lean into what ought to be their mandate and asking them to answer for how they plan to navigate around the negative consequences of Bill 2 as it relates to their own mandate. I want to thank the member for that because that was an important thing.

I mean, we've been talking a lot about the UCP as a whole, we've been talking about the minister of labour, we've been talking about the Premier, but really the member is absolutely correct that there are front-bench members here who are tasked with the best interests of either school-age children, in the context of being in school, or children in care, in the context of being very vulnerable. In both cases, this bill undermines the best interests of those very people that these ministers have been asked by the Crown, quite frankly, through the authority of the Lieutenant Governor, to care for. They actually have an obligation, Mr. Speaker, to stand up and defend how it is they can actually fulfill their mandate while at the same time allowing this particular bill to go through and why they would not suggest amendments in order to protect their sphere of responsibility from being undermined by this bill.

You know, while I respect very much the Member for Edmonton-South for really focusing in on the rights of those workers who are under the age of 18, I'd like to talk for just a moment about the rights of workers who are part of that group which is characterized as being underemployed and suffering from high unemployment rates, which is, in fact, not just those 14 to 18 but 18 to 24.

In fact, I'm sure many members on the other side know – if you don't, you should – that the Member for Edmonton-South was first elected when he was squarely within that demographic group. He was elected at the age of 20. Now, the members opposite suggest that the reason we need to undercut the salary and the wage of people who are under 18 is because that's the only way they'll get training to do their job. Well, you know what, Mr. Speaker? Here's a different way of looking at it. I would suggest that over the course of the last 24 hours the Member for Edmonton-South ought instead to be earning a premium because he's been training the members on the other side about how they should do their job. In fact, it had nothing to do with his age. It had simply to do with his energy and his focus and his commitment.

That's how you earn your wage, by showing up to work and being passionate and trying hard and speaking faster than anybody else in this room, and by doing that, you succeed at being very good at your job and earning your wage. The key is that what we should not be doing is undermining the contribution of the Member for Edmonton-South because of the fact that when he was first elected, he was the youngest person to ever be elected to this Legislature, and we should assume that when young people step up to take a job, they too will approach that job in just the way the Member for Edmonton-South has.

So I'm just wondering if the Member for Edmonton-South would like to offer advice to some of the members of this House who are maybe 15, 20, 30, 40, 45 years older than the Member for Edmonton-South about how best to approach the job of representing the people of this province in the House.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-South, with 23 seconds left.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'll keep it brief. Certainly, I think that one of the most important things that I, of course, learned from the Leader of the Official Opposition is that members and, especially, ministers should get up and defend the things they believe in. Again, I can see many ministers here today who have not taken the opportunity to do that, and I would wish that they will talk about why these issues are important to them.

The Acting Speaker: Are there any other members looking to speak? I see the hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, thank you very much. I will endeavour to be brief as many of us have been awake a long time, and it's been certainly a long, long session. We're certainly proud to stand in this House – and I think I can probably speak for both sides – for the hard work that we're doing on behalf of all the people whom we represent. You know, this is, of course, in regard to this amendment that has been brought forward by the hon. Member for Edmonton-South. As I read this, of course, he moves “that the motion for second reading of Bill 2 . . . be amended by deleting all of the words after ‘that’ and substituting the following” – and I paraphrase, of course – that it now be read six months hence. I'm going to have to respectfully disagree with the paper before us right now.

You know, I think that our party, our government has been very clear in our platform, which, of course, was put forward and supported by the majority of the people of Alberta on April 16. We were very clear in regard to An Act to Make Alberta Open for Business. Many people, sadly, through the previous government's policies and, of course, various reasons – there's been unemployment. There have been people, certainly, within my constituency that have been hit hard by the economic downturn as well as policies. Of course, that is something that we have been very clear on, that we are trying to make Alberta open for business, to bring back what was formerly known as the Alberta advantage to this province, a province that many of us, you know, came to after generations of family members that chose to live here because it is a place that has the highest quality of life, the highest standard of living, and a place which, I would argue, every single person in this Chamber loves although we may have disagreements as to certain policies.

Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. As I indicated, we cannot support this amendment put forward by the hon. member, and I certainly encourage all members of this Chamber to not support this amendment.

Thank you very much.

The Acting Speaker: Under 29(2)(a), any questions or comments? The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, my whip counterpart can certainly put together a compelling argument and sentences that agree between subject and verb, but I respectfully disagree. I wonder, just having some questions for him: why, first of all, would a new government choose to have a bill like this? Taking money from people's banked overtime, taking away holidays, compromising Christmas as a holiday for people next year, maternity benefits, compassionate leave, minimum wage for young people: why would you put something like this up at the front end of your first session as a new government?

You want to set the tone for what Albertans are expecting from this government because it's a long haul, four years. It's just starting; we're only nine days in, I think. I just really wonder if the hon. member can help me with some of the logic as to why they would choose to have a bill like this, an open season on workers, you know, a pick-your-pocket kind of tone to send out to the people of Alberta, right? Here we are, a brand new government. Here we go. Watch out; we're coming after your banked overtime: that just is not a coherent presentation of what I think Albertans would expect.

I know that the hon. members like to say: oh, well, it was all in our platform, and people voted for that, so sit down and shut up because that's the way it is. Well, I mean, this is the way it is, hon. Speaker, where we do debate these things. In a democracy it's a pluralistic thing. People vote and represent all kinds of different opinions and so forth, and we have a strong opposition here that obviously was backed by hundreds of thousands of Albertans that voted that way, too. So you have to make sure that you give the fullness of time and consideration to debate around these important issues. Again, I think, in my humble opinion, that this amendment brought forth by the Edmonton-South representative is reasonable and very modest in its scope. It doesn't necessarily even mean that this bill disappears; rather, it is given the consideration of time, right? Time is the healer of all wounds, and time is a way by which we learn to become wiser as we get older. This bill: I really don't think that it's going to age well with time. I really don't see that happening. You know, you could certainly make a case for that in the interim.

I believe that Albertans are expecting and hoping for the best, and I believe that the character of Albertans is that they hope and expect the best for themselves and their families but for others, too. That's kind of the way we roll in my family and, I think, in the vast majority of families, too. We look past our noses to others in other places, in other socioeconomic circumstances, and in other life circumstances, too.

I've learned a lot about banked overtime that I didn't know about before. I'm really impressed by how people pushed back on this particular issue because it actually means a hole, sometimes of several thousand dollars, in an individual's or a family's budget, and I don't think that that's fair. I think people are starting to wake up to that injustice as well. You know, there are the actual words that are printed on the page of a bill, and then there are the tone and the intent and the emotive response that people will bring from laws and regulations that we provide here in the Alberta Legislature. You've got to think of both of those things, Mr. Speaker, when you're building legislation here because people will judge you on the logic of your decisions, but they'll also judge you on the tone that you set for governance. As I said before, I'd just be curious for the hon. government whip to . . .

The Acting Speaker: Are there other members looking to speak to amendment HA? I see the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

Ms Notley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to be able to rise to speak to this amendment. This will be the third time I've been able to speak on this matter in second reading, and each time I do, I have a fair amount of time to speak but not necessarily so much time to prepare. This time I will attempt to be a little bit more organized in my thoughts as we speak to why we think this particular motion should be passed so that this bill does not proceed through second reading at this point.

I think what we need to begin with is that, you know, there's been quite a bit of conversation around this issue of electoral mandate. There have been a lot of folks saying: well, you know, we won the election, so you should just let us do what we want; and how disrespectful you are for actually taking a bit of time to talk about this issue, to challenge the concerns that people might have; and how dare you, actually, you know, speak in the House for as long as you have about this issue. Various people have argued that that was the mandate, that Albertans gave this government the mandate to pass Bill 2.

First of all, obviously, just at the outset, they also gave us the mandate to be the Official Opposition, so I will not now or ever apologize for that. In fact, it is my duty and my obligation to work as many hours as necessary to ensure that we exhaust all of the resources that we can to be a strong opposition for the people of this province. That is the mandate, ultimately, that we were given, and people understood very clearly, without any equivocation, without any kind of slippery language or anything like that that we believe strongly in the rights of working people to be treated fairly. So it should come as no surprise that we would do everything we can to ensure that working people will be treated fairly.

Now, that being said, though, I think there is also another matter that we need to consider around this issue of mandate. The members opposite argue that their mandate is included in their however-many-pages platform. They love to talk about their platform.

Member Ceci: A hundred and one.

Ms Notley: Is it 101 pages?

Member Ceci: Pretty much.

Ms Notley: Something like that.

Now, of course, one of the interesting things about that platform, which I must ensure history remembers, is that it was a living document, and it changed with the wind. When it did change, there was no press release that went out to say: "Oh, we just rewrote this section," or, "Oops, we added a new section." It just kind of happened in a very sort of fluid kind of way. It was precedent setting, actually. I will congratulate the members opposite for completely changing the sort of democratic process that typically surrounds the practice of a political party introducing a platform, presenting it to voters, saying, "Here's what we believe; vote for us or don't vote for us on the basis of it; hold us to account; move on." In fact, instead, what we had was an ever-changing, ever-evolving, ever-amending document.

Really, you have to sort of get immediately into this process of saying: well, I just screenshot UCP platform 4.9 and compared it to my screenshot of UCP platform 9.8, and I think that if we average the two together, what they mean to say is this. Like, you really, literally, Mr. Speaker, would have had to have a team of researchers on it to really understand exactly how to nail it down. It actually sort of makes real the figurative description of nailing Jell-O to a wall. That's kind of what tracking the UCP platform was like over the course of the election. But, congratulations, you know. I mean the media did report very briefly on the nailing Jell-O to the wall nature of the UCP platform, and people still went ahead and voted for the UCP. Fair enough. But to be clear, what they voted for was Jell-O that was nailed to a wall. So when you try to back up your position on the basis of said Jell-O, know that that rationale is going to be about as solid as the Jell-O.

That being said, when the UCP platform 1.9, or whichever one it was, was released, we grabbed a couple or three or four different versions of it and went through it. Over the course of more than one version the position of the UCP around changes to worker protections actually remained consistent between at least a couple of versions. As a result, when we went through it to see what was there and what it meant, we found the provisions that talked about these changes to banked overtime. We quickly raised the alarm. We said: "Oh, sheesh. This isn't very good. This looks like they are going to go after workers' rights to overtime pay through the banked overtime scheme." But when we said that, the members of the government and, in particular, the now Premier hastened to assure us: no, no, no; that's not what it meant. What he said was, and I quote from an April 2, 2019, Edmonton Journal article: "This does not affect overtime pay. I repeat – it does not affect or diminish overtime pay." That is what the Premier – not at the time; then the Leader of the Official Opposition, the leader of the UCP and now Premier – said to voters in response to the concern that we raised about what appeared in the UCP version of the platform that was released on the day preceding that quote. Fair enough.

Now, I don't know exactly – I can't remember – if they actually at that time included the specific wording that they were proposing to move forward with but, nonetheless, they did say in general that this is what they were going to do. The Premier hastened to assure Albertans: "No, we're not going to touch overtime. It will not affect overtime. It will not diminish it in any way."

Interestingly, experts in the field immediately responded by saying: "Ah, well, we're not entirely sure that the Premier knows what he's talking about here because, in fact, it will diminish overtime. It will affect overtime. It will hurt overtime." They explained as much as they could. My question, then, to members opposite who make the argument: "Listen, this was in our mandate. This is something we told Albertans before the election, and they voted for us, and we got more votes than you did, nyah-nyah, nyah-nyah, nyah-nyah. Therefore, why are you still here talking?" – when they say that, when they say, "That was our mandate," do they refer to the mandate as what was in Jell-O doc 4.0? Do they refer to the mandate as the Premier's statement that it will not affect or diminish overtime, or do they refer to the mandate as the experts' assessment that said: "Oh, no, no. This will affect and diminish overtime"?

So we had people saying: "Oh, no, no. The Premier is incorrect. Basically, what we can see here is that this is going to affect and diminish overtime." Then we had the Premier saying: "No, no. It will not affect or diminish overtime." So I'm just curious as to whether the mandate was that which came out of the mouth of the Premier or that which came out of the mouth of the experts who looked at what the Premier was proposing and actually analyzed the consequences of what the Premier meant. I'm just curious. Which part of that conversation actually constitutes the mandate that they claim they have to bring in this pick-your-pockets legislation? So that's a question, and maybe at some point we'll get the answer to that.

Now, on the matter of a mandate, though, the degree to which one can argue mandate really comes down to the similarity between what one promised and what one delivers. I would argue, based on widely publicized statements of the Premier that their plan with respect to workers' rights would not diminish or affect overtime, that the mandate, therefore, was for them to bring in changes to the legislation that would not diminish or affect overtime. As a result, their mandate is that they should amend the legislation and stop any changes that they are currently proposing to overtime because that is actually the mandate that the Premier himself said to the people of Alberta during the election.

If now they've decided that they've reconsidered or they've talked to their donors or whatever the process is and that they do now want to do what is in this bill, which is to affect and diminish overtime, then they should come clean on the fact that they are now already, two and a half weeks into whatever we are, diverging from the mandate that they secured from the people of this province. I would argue that that's exactly what they've done because I have the quote from the Premier. Yet I have the black and white words in front of me in the bill, and I can tell you with absolute certainty that what they are proposing to do is affect and diminish overtime, Mr. Speaker.

Now, the other thing the Premier said during this sort of mandate acquisition period, otherwise known as an election, in response to the concerns that were raised about this bill: "There were no complaints about abusive practices by employers. There weren't in the past; I'm sure there won't be in the future." Now, I don't know where exactly it was that the Premier secured that particular piece of information from. He stated it like it was a fact. But I can tell you that the public record shows that that is not correct. The public record is easily accessed because when the Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods led the consultation around the changes to the labour code and the Employment Standards Code, we had significant public engagement, and we had submissions from a number of different Albertans, and in fact it was very clear that there were complaints and concerns about abuse by employers of the banked overtime scheme that existed prior to our change to the legislation.

So, again, this mandate that the members opposite speak about so passionately was premised on information that was categorically untrue, Mr. Speaker, because in fact there were complaints. Now, I'm sure that there are some people that the members opposite spoke to like the restaurant association, like Merit Contractors – you may recall Merit Contractors. They had big billboards up and down the highway for about a year and a half before the election that said: vote UCP. You know, that objective, neutral, nonengaged organization: that group, I am sure, told the Premier that they had no complaints with the previous overtime regime, prior to us changing it. I will not hesitate, though, to suggest that there were other people who did actually have complaints about the previous overtime regime. Therefore, the Premier's statement that was reported in the news on April 2, 2019, that there were no complaints, was, in fact, also factually incorrect. I would suggest that when you have a mandate that is premised on information which is not correct, the quality of your mandate begins to fritter away at the sides. Now, you know, we shall see how far we go and how long it takes, but I'm going to say that the mandate is somewhat tattered as it relates to this particular issue.

I do believe that mandates are important. I do. But I fundamentally disagree that the members opposite received a mandate on this issue because, at the heart of it, their leader did not correctly discuss what their platform was in relation to the actual facts. He, in essence, to put it another way, said one thing before the election and is delivering a very different thing after the election, and that, my friends, does not a mandate make.

Now, let's just talk a little bit about this issue. I would like to just dive into it a little bit. The labour minister took the time to talk a little bit about this legislation, and I appreciate that. The only unfortunate part of it was that in so doing, with the greatest of respect, it revealed the fragility of the evidence and the analysis which underlies the decisions to amend the overtime provisions in the way that they have, and it is unfortunate for the working people of Alberta who are going to pay the price for the labour minister's misunderstanding of the issue.

First of all, he was quick to talk to us about research as it relates to the impact of certain things. I guess that was actually more about the youth wage, so I'll hold off on that. Let's just talk a little bit about the overtime. You know, it's excellent that the minister took the time to walk us through the sections of the act. Rest assured, we have also reviewed those sections of the act. We reviewed those sections of the act when we made the first set of changes, and we reviewed the sections of the act that are being amended now as a result of Bill 2.

What the minister needs to understand is that with the practice that is happening and did happen prior to our amendment of the overtime premium under the banked overtime scheme to provide 1.5 pay as opposed to 1.0 pay, there was an incentive for the employer to get people into the banked overtime scheme prior to our changes because overtime then was paid at straight time. What we saw happening was that employers would construct an agreement with the majority of their employees. Many employers who benefit from this kind of regime hire people on a seasonal or project basis. They would construct the agreement with a very small group of employees, put the agreement in place, and then new employees would come in and they would be bound by that agreement. That's exactly what the legislation that the minister of labour quoted specifically enables. That is exactly the way it worked before.

Individual employees, as outlined in the legislation, when they came on, were bound by that agreement, and individual employees do not have the authority to individually pull themselves from that agreement. Therefore, employers who need these kinds of work arrangements in place established these banked overtime agreements prior to hiring the majority of their employees. Then there is no opportunity for it to be changed, especially in non-union workplaces. It was abused, and we knew this. We knew this because, when we did our consultations, that is what we heard from workers who had been the victims of these kinds of problems.

Now, it is true that the incident of abuse of this kind of regime disappeared in the last two years, so the labour minister would not see much evidence of that over the last two years. But you know why? There was no longer an incentive for it to happen because banked overtime agreements ensured that overtime was provided, whether by way of time off or otherwise, at one and a half times. The incentive to do it had disappeared. Therefore, the abuse of the system had disappeared, too.

However, we're actually in a position now that's worse with this act than it was when we changed it in the first place because at least in the past, before we changed it from 1.0 time to 1.5 time, the employer had to give that time off within a three-month period.

When we changed it from 1.0 to 1.5, we said, "Hey, let's enhance flexibility; let's give people more time to take the time off rather than have it paid out," because, as I was saying earlier today, some people really just do want time. You know, they want it at the overtime rate, but they prefer time than extra money on their cheque. We said: "Sure. Let's expand it from three months to six months. Because it's at the 1.5 rate, we do increase flexibility, but at the same time there's no incentive for the employer to push workers into an unfair situation."

Now we're in a situation where we have the worst scenario because we have the incentive, if this bill passes, for abuse of these overtime arrangements to reappear just as it was happening before we got rid of the incentive in 2017. Now it can be abused even more because instead of having three months within which to do it, they can do it within six months. We actually end up further behind than we were when we fixed this provision which, to be clear, was the worst provision of its kind in the country. This is what we are talking about.

I know I sound a little bit legalistic right now, but it frustrates me to hear people say things that are not accurate and do not reflect an understanding of the legislation and the way it has been applied and enforced and utilized over many, many years. I think that the people of this province deserve to know what this government is doing to their overtime, and that is why I'm taking the time to explain it, Mr. Speaker. That is why what we are dealing with, then, in fact, is a substantial plan by this government to affect and to diminish the overtime received by working Albertans in this province, in contrast to what they promised during the election.

Now, there are other things that are happening just in the overall collection of changes that this government is doing, and I want to talk a little bit about those as well. We have talked a bit about youth and the youth wage. Now, the argument that is put before us is that what we need to do is cut the wages of youth so that they can get a job. Now, as I've said before, somewhat facetiously but not entirely, is that the logical conclusion of this argument is: hey, let's just cut all their wages. Why pay them anything? Why not get them to pay for their own job? Just think of the jobs we could create if young people paid for the right to have a job. Oh, my goodness, it'd be crazy. I don't know why these guys haven't thought about it yet. I'm a little worried about the next session of the Legislature. We might even see it. Anyway, I think we all know that that is kind of nonsensical, and so, too, is the argument that by cutting wages, we increase jobs.

Let's not just get into a rhetorical fight between us about this. Let's look at the evidence. The minister of labour briefly said: "You know what? We have lots of research that the minimum wage is resulting in a loss of jobs for young people." Then he pointed to discussion papers provided to him by lobby groups for employers. Oh, my, my, Mr. Speaker. You know, it's really important, when you make significant policy changes that do things like drop the wage rate of young Albertans by 13 per cent, that you do your homework a little bit more than simply taking, lock, stock, and barrel, the lobby documents from your lobby groups and trying to call that research. I am sorry, but the restaurant association – God bless them – are there to lobby for owners of restaurants, and that is lovely. But the fact that some of their members anecdotally describe that they're feeling like they might not hire as many people, while interesting and worthy of consideration and definitely a submission that needs to be considered, is not independent, third-party, validated research.

I think it's helpful to look at things like Stats Canada and third-party, independent groups that are perceived to be separated somewhat from the lobby groups that are putting forward a certain position. I would suggest, then, that we do something simple like look at StatsCan. The theory goes that in Alberta we introduced the minimum wage and youth unemployment rose. Well, as the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford did a lovely job of demonstrating at some point earlier today, which is Wednesday still, there is a difference between an associative relationship and a causative relationship.

Of course, what the members opposite are arguing is that youth unemployment is up and that therefore it must be because of the minimum wage. They are not in any way, shape, or form considering that if youth unemployment is up, maybe it's because the price of oil dropped 70 per cent, sending the province into a recession and that, in fact, unemployment is up everywhere and that, historically speaking, youth are always the most hard hit on these things. In any setting, in any jurisdiction it is sort of a last-in, first-out kind of scenario for them, and that's exactly what happened. One could also make that argument. But, no, these folks have decided that the existence of a recession is irrelevant and that the high youth unemployment is entirely related to the minimum wage.

Well, what we could do, then, is look at another jurisdiction that is going through similar economic circumstances as the province of Alberta that did not change its minimum wage and look to see what happened there, as measured by StatsCan, which is an independent sort of evidence-based agency. What we know from that, then, is that next door, where our good friends in Saskatchewan are, they are not suffering to the same degree that we are from – I mean, they're actually suffering more. Their economy has slowed much more than ours has, and I would argue that that's because of their austerity as opposed to the approach to economic support that our government took, but that's a completely different conversation. Nonetheless, they too did suffer a slowdown because of the drop in the price of oil. It wasn't as big a part of their economy as it was in Alberta, but it was certainly significant, and they did suffer.

In April 2019 their youth unemployment rate was 10.8 per cent, and our youth unemployment rate was 9.7 per cent. Rather than getting lost in the fact that ours is actually lower than theirs – certainly, these folks, I'm sure, if the shoe was on the other foot, would absolutely argue that it's because of the minimum wage, but let's not get lost in that – what we know is that in both provinces there is a gap between the unemployment rate average and the unemployment rate for young people, and the unemployment rate for young people is higher in both provinces. It is more than double in Saskatchewan. It is higher in Alberta but not double.

But here's the thing, Mr. Speaker. There's clearly a problem with youth unemployment in Saskatchewan. It's actually, arguably, a bigger problem than it is here in Alberta. They did not bring in a $15-an-hour minimum wage. So one would argue, if one were engaging in a more sort of balanced analysis, that the minimum wage is actually not the cause of the unemployment rate in Alberta amongst young people, and I think that there would be some evidence to support that based on Stats Canada labour analysis.

I think it's really important that, once again, we are straightforward and honest with Albertans about why we are doing this, because this is not about creating jobs amongst Alberta's young people. This is about giving a 13 per cent pay cut to a group of very vulnerable employees, I assume in order to give at least the semblance of giving yet another break to another group of Albertans. I'm not sure exactly why it's being done, quite honestly. That being said, it is very important that we are clear here that this does not reduce youth unemployment. What it does do, though, is that it creates the incentive for higher levels of youth unemployment for kids who are 18 and above.

I can speak quite honestly about the situation. I'll just talk about my family for a moment. I have one child, my son, who started working when he was 16, and that's great. He's been quite lucky. He got the benefit of minimum wage increases. He's now 20. He's been working for four years. He's got a solid resumé. I mean, it's not like he's, you know, doing nuclear physics or anything – he may someday, which is a whole different issue – but he's certainly got a good, strong resumé of being that person that shows up to work and shows up regularly. His supervisors like him, and he does the job he's asked, and he's got that stuff on his resumé, and that's really going to help him as he goes forward looking for more work. I'm so glad that he's had the opportunity to do that regardless of the nature of the work he's been doing. It's the kind of thing that helps kids get started as they make their way in the world and start looking for work.

Now, on the flip side, my other child, my daughter, has been involved in extracurricular activities, above and beyond her school, to the tune of about 20 hours a week throughout high school. What that's meant is that apart from very, very little, sporadic contract jobs here and there, she really hasn't had too much work experience because she's been so focused on her extracurricular activities. Well, that's great, but here's the deal now. Here's the rub. She's just about to graduate. She's 18. She's about to go out and start looking for full-time employment, probably in the service industry, probably the restaurant services industry, just like her brother. But she's 18, so now she is likely going to find a much, much more difficult time to get that job because folks can hire a whole different group of people for 13 per cent less than they'd pay her. So look at what we've just done here. We've actually made it harder for her to find a job now and for every other 18-year-old who has worked like the dickens to get the kinds of marks they need to be accepted into the programs they need to get into, to do that work.

I mean, folks over there love engineers. They're big, big fans of engineers. I'm a big fan of engineers, too. They're incredibly important parts of our economy. You know very well that it is very, very hard to get into an engineering program at a place like the U of A. A lot of kids in grade 10, when they decide that that's what they want to do and they, unlike my children, listen to the pleas of their parents and say, "Yes; okay; I will go into engineering; stop whining; I'll do it," when they do that, they then have to work. They don't just go to high school. Many of these kids go to high school, and then they go to high school all over again for the remaining eight hours of the day, working to keep their marks up because it is that hard to get into engineering now at university. It didn't used to be, but now the marks that kids are expected to earn in order to get into engineering are through the roof. These kids are working really hard, and some of them, as a result, will not necessarily be getting part-time jobs when they're 15, 16, or 17.

Then when they graduate from high school, maybe if they're lucky enough, they get accepted into engineering. But then they come across the tuition, and they go: "Oh, for the love of God, I'm going to have to get some work. I can't afford this tuition and all these costs without also having a part-time job." And there they are. They're off trying to get that part-time job to help them stay in university, that they worked so hard to get into, a very difficult program, and they're competing with people that get paid 13 per cent less than them now thanks to this bill. So this does not – this does not – reduce unemployment amongst young Albertans, those people between 15 and 24. It shifts the burden, and it actually makes it harder for kids who are 18 or 19 who haven't for a variety of very good reasons broken into the workforce. It makes it harder for them now to get in.

What about those kids that do get into the workforce before they turn 18? Well, you know, I want to talk just a little bit about that, because the Member for Edmonton-South, I think, did raise a very, very good point. I don't know if the Minister of Children's Services has had an opportunity to be briefed on this yet, but once she is, she will learn that children in care, many of them, by the time they reach the age of 16 will not necessarily be living in a stable family situation. There are more than a few occasions where those children are supported by social workers to live independently or quasi-independently. While they're doing that, of course, they are struggling to cobble together enough money to live on. Now what we've done is that we've said to those kids who are in care but often are not living in secure family situations – they're living in group homes. They're going from foster home to foster home in some cases. They are literally being set up to live independently on their own. Those kids are working to help make their way and stay off the street and finish school and live their lives, and that's the group of kids, under this government's care, that we are now going to force to take a 13 per cent pay cut. It is a travesty.

Quite frankly, if I were the Minister of Children's Services, I would lose my mind on my cabinet colleagues if this is what happens to the kids that I am statutorily responsible for the care of, that the second bill in this House goes after the income of the kids that are under your care to the tune of 13 per cent. Shameful. Shameful.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Then, of course, the Member for Edmonton-South also did a very good job of asking the Education minister to come clean, because, of course, the particularly unique proposed structure of this idiotic plan to roll back the wages of working people under the age of 18 suggests that they will be paid the reduced rate if they're in school. If they can prove that they're 16 or 17 and not in school, well, then they get to keep the minimum wage. What exactly does this do to the objective – I am going to for the moment give the benefit of the doubt to the government, and I'm going to assume that this is still actually their objective – that they want more Albertans to graduate from grade 12 and not fewer? What does it do to that objective?

You have written a bill that statutorily incents kids who are struggling in high school to drop out. You could call this the drop-out-premium bill, in fact. What kind of Minister of Education would sit by while the minister of labour wrote a bill that could otherwise be named the dropout premium . . . [interjection] Sorry. I appreciate that it's a regulation.

Why would you stand by and let that happen? It's a tremendous abandonment of your responsibility. Of course, we don't have a mandate letter. We just have to nail the Jell-O to the wall platform document of the UCP. But I think it was silent on the issue of trying to have more people graduate, so again I'm going to give them the benefit of the doubt and assume that the mandate does not include a plan to reduce the number of people graduating from high school.

However, your second legislative action, combined with the regulations coming out of what's probably your third or fourth cabinet meeting, does exactly that. They create a statutory incentive for kids to drop out of school. Just shameful. Just shameful.

4:30 p.m.

Now, we also have the minister in charge of Community and Social Services. Again, that minister is responsible for providing services to, among others, Albertans with disabilities. I assume that by now that minister will have had the opportunity to meet with the stakeholders for that ministry, including self-advocates, people with disabilities as well as people who work on behalf of those people with disabilities. They will tell them that it is not always easy to have people with disabilities find employment. That, of course, not only helps them earn money and improve their living conditions, but it also is fundamentally important to their sense of self and their ability to engage in the community and to live their very best life.

Once again, what we have done with those adults is that we have made it more difficult for them to find that work because we've created an incentive for people to hire people under the age of 18 rather than considering enhancing the inclusivity of their workplace and getting the benefit of an employee who might have particular special needs but at the same time a capacity to do particular jobs as well or better than many others and in a way that would give meaning and direction and substance and joy to their life. But now, unfortunately, that job that they could do with tremendous dedication and loyalty is being given to somebody who can be paid 13 per cent less. Again, the minister in charge of Community and Social Services, who is responsible for these people, I would hope at some point will speak out against this statutory plan to disincentivize the employment possibilities of folks with special needs and disabilities.

Now, this whole issue of the youth wage is, of course, not new to Alberta, and other people have mentioned this, but it bears repeating again. It used to be the case that we had a discriminatory and lower youth wage in the province of Alberta, and then in the '90s the matter was reviewed by the government of Ralph Klein, who many of the members opposite are great fans of. At that time, after the review, the government concluded that the youth wage was unfair, that it hurt employment opportunities of people over a certain age, and that it was a bureaucratic nightmare. Essentially, it created red tape. That's what they concluded. So they wisely, with common sense, decided to jettison that plan.

Now these folks, allegedly the fighters against red tape, not only have created a whole new ministry with staff and people who walk around – and I'm sure we're going to have red tape month sometime soon. We'll all have little, extra-special red tape pins that the government gets printed, and all the extra staff will run around and do red tape photo ops. Oh, it's just a plethora, a red tape jobs extravaganza, a whole new ministry. Meanwhile what we're doing is that we are creating additional red tape for people over there in the ministry of labour.

What we've got is this ridiculous situation. Here's what employers now have to do. Well, of course, they really have to dig in on the age of their workers. That's the first thing. They have to then investigate whether that worker is or is not in school. Well, that's not a big pain in the butt. Good luck trying to figure out that information and ascertain it one way or the other. Then what they have to do is that they have to adjust their payroll system so that that person either doesn't work more than 28 hours, or if they do, their payroll system automatically has some kind of program in it to click and pay them more after 28 hours, which is also complicated. Then, of course, they have to further adjust their payroll system so that when that person turns 18, their pay changes. So it's not just a simple process, Madam Speaker. I would argue that that process, actually, itself kind of sounds a bit like red tape, sounds like a bit of an administrative burden that we are putting on folks.

Now, granted, there is a payoff for it. There's a 13 per cent reduction in payroll costs. But then, at the end of the day, probably you've got to pull back, and maybe it's only now a 9 per cent reduction in payroll costs because the other 4 per cent just went to the administrative burden of that. So I guess we've created red tape jobs for those people who are now administering when and where the employer can actually pay the reduced, discriminatory, pick-your-pockets wage. That is a thing that has been done, and it really makes no sense.

Another thing, of course, that is included in this bill is the plan to scoop out of people's pockets statutory pay holidays. There are a whole bunch of new rules around when people can claim their statutory pay. In essence, when you look at those rules – again, you know, I've got to say that I'm pretty sure these guys have an unstated antagonism for people who are young. I don't know exactly why that is. This will disproportionately affect, I suspect, young people and definitely disproportionately affect lower income people.

What it does: it particularly means that when people are hired for seasonal work, they are disqualified from getting stat pay. That's in essence what it does. Of course, there are particular times of the year when people hire up, staff up. For instance, if you're in retail, you staff up in November and December in order to deal with the incoming Christmas holidays. But heaven forbid that you are one of those new employees who's been hired as part of that staffing-up exercise. You are not going to get an extra cent when you're forced to work on Christmas Day. What is the profile of the person that takes the job when retailers are staffing up in anticipation of Christmas? Well, I'll tell you. They're young. They're mostly women. They're often students. So, you know, young female students: that's whose pockets will be picked by this particular element of Bill 2.

Member Ceci: Same with garden centres.

Ms Notley: Garden centres are another group. That's another seasonal place. Those folks will have their pockets picked.

Again, what are we looking at? Lower income people and new Canadians who get pulled into these short, seasonal jobs. And thanks to the plans of this government in Bill 2, they will get less, and they will have their pockets picked by this piece of legislation. Again, it's one of these things where we are choosing to create jobs by taking money away from the people who need it the most, Madam Speaker, with absolutely no indication that the jobs will actually be created. That's what they do there.

One other thing that I want to talk about, of course, is the whole issue around the effort of the folks here to take their marching orders probably from Merit Contractors, who, I said, did a lovely job of running billboards all over the province on behalf of the Premier and the UCP for many, many months before the election, I think probably over a year. You know, I'll give them credit. It took them a while because originally their billboards . . .

Member Ceci: You couldn't read them.

Ms Notley: You couldn't read them. You didn't know what they were talking about. I think that at a certain point Merit Contractors might have gone off and found themselves a better agency. I don't know.

But at a certain point there was no question – big signs all over the place: vote UCP; vote UCP – that Merit Contractors had a clear position, a very clear position on the issue of card check and automatic certification. So they got their gift. They got their quid pro quo. You know, they put up a whole bunch of signs saying, "Vote UCP," and in return they got card check rolled back because they don't like unions. Merit Contractors on its surface is an anti-union organization that exists primarily in the construction sector to undermine the wages of people who work in construction. So they got their gift.

You know, it's interesting. Previously I was talking just on the basic math that we used to come up with the calculation and how the average Albertan who works overtime would lose up to $2,500 every 12 weeks. I had to allow for the fact that it's not an exact calculation, of course, because we're using a global number of people who work overtime and a global number of overtime hours, and then we're using the average rate of pay that those folks earn. We may be overshooting the amount a little bit because we can't factor out those people who are on union contracts. It's likely the case that those people on union contracts do make a higher wage, so they push up that average of the wage that we're using to make these calculations, and at the same time they are protected from this pick-your-pockets bill being brought in by this government because of their union contract. The majority, I suspect, of union contracts have particular stipulations with respect to how overtime is paid. That's a benefit of being a member of a union.

But it's interesting. On the off chance that we overestimated the cost to Albertans of the pick-your-pockets bill, by making sure that we reduce the number of unions and we reduce union density by making it harder for unions to organize and we give more opportunity for employers to use their inherent control over the workplace as a means of dissuading their employees from voting for a union, then, of course, that estimate of how much Bill 2 and the overtime pick-your-pockets piece will cost actually goes up. So just in case we overestimated the cost to average working people of the pick-your-pockets bill as it relates to the overtime efforts, people can be assured that the consequence of removing the card check provision will ensure that unions will become less frequent, and therefore the benefits to employers and the loss to workers with the overtime changes will grow. Just in case anyone wants to accuse me of overestimating, we'll get there thanks to this other little gift that the minister of labour is putting into the legislation.

We know that, frankly, if you can get 65 per cent of a workplace to sign a card, that is a strong bit of evidence that you have more than a majority, easily a strong majority of people in the workplace who want to join a union. I won't get into it with as much colour as I did the last time I talked about it with respect to the fiction around the notion that the big, evil union thug is somehow intimidating the poor worker into signing the card given that, in fact, they have very little access to workers and it's the employer that has control of the workplace.

Nonetheless, what I will say is that 65 per cent was a very pragmatic choice on the part of our then minister, the Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods, and ought to have allowed for people to just move on and, in fact, made good labour relations sense on many fronts because it discouraged the polarization and the fighting that tends to occur in workplaces when you have the two-stage process where you compel – even where you have 70 per cent of people signing cards, you still are in a situation where the employer gets another kick at the can to dissuade people from their original indication of wanting a union, and that in and of itself creates discord within the workplaces and enhances labour relations discord throughout the province.

You know what? Folks over there will probably not buy this, but most experts in the field of labour relations will actually say that under NDP governments, labour relations discord, whether in the public or the private sector, tends to go down and productivity goes up. Time lost, strikes, and things that undermine productivity go down because we respect, at the heart, the ability of working people to come together to negotiate their best deal, and we deal with them in a thoughtful, collaborative, evidence-based way, obviously still doing everything you can to get the best deal you can either for the employer in the private sector or the employer in the public sector.

That is why, for instance, we had almost no days lost to strikes even though under the term of our government, strikes in the public sector became legal in Alberta, which they hadn't been for decades. As a result of decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada, they became legal. We didn't have strikes. We did zero per cent increases. We had responsible, adult conversations with them, and I actually think that we did a pretty good job of bargaining. We actually modernized the government of Alberta's bargaining tools and the department and the people that did bargaining. We brought in experts. We did it on a sophisticated basis, and we actually secured some pretty reasonable deals, and we did it without massive work stoppages and the services to Albertans being undermined. This is actually what, you know, experts in the field will look at, governments over the last four years. Many will argue that, in fact, in most cases it's NDP governments that are most successful at maintaining pragmatic and functional and productive workplace arrangements that recognize the rights of people while at the same time getting the work done.

Anyway, that is a bit of a digression, but I will say that it is unfortunate that the members opposite have a very outdated, unsophisticated, hostile view of the role of labour unions and the degree to which they not only represent their members, that they not only ensure that they have more rights, that they not only protect them, but they also provide a thoughtful avenue for managing workplaces in a way that gets more done and more achieved.

Anyway, the final thing that I wanted to sort of say is that Bill 2, not section by section but generally, certainly reflects in large part exactly the kinds of initiatives that were taken by the BFF there of the Premier, Ontario Premier Ford. They, too, introduced, you know, an open for business or selling off our workers act, whatever the heck they called it – I'm not sure which – something like that. I believe it was about a year ago. I guess that now I'll be a bit hypocritical because I'm going to take a page from the government's strategy of just making associative leaps around causation since that's what we've heard from those folks since we've been in this House, in fact before the last election. So why not? What's good for the goose, as they say.

So they brought in – what do they call it, again? – the open for business, selling off workers bill in Ontario, and what has been the outcome? Well, the GDP is down, economic growth has been revised downwards, consumer spending is down, and jobs are not up. The so-called magic formula of Reaganomics was introduced about a year ago in Ontario: a lot of unrest, a lot of discord, a lot of polarization, a tremendous drop in popularity as well for Mr. We Finish Each Other's Sentences. Nonetheless, not exactly a success story for the economy of Ontario.

Now, folks over there might argue: "Oh, that's just ridiculous. You know, the reason Ontario is struggling is because of all these other reasons." But they happened at the same time, so one thing must have caused the other, because I've just spent the last nine days learning at the feet of the experts when it comes to causative and associative conclusions. Having learned that, what I think I can say is that we certainly have seen no evidence of jobs increasing, of people doing better, of higher levels of consumer spending, of higher reports of better quality of life, any of those kinds of things. There's no flourishing new sector in Ontario where they're all saying: "Oh, my goodness, we have all this cheap labour now. It's great. We're so glad to have relocated here from Alabama, and we are going to completely remake the province of Ontario's economic plan." We are not hearing any of that there.

I would suggest, then, that we don't have the evidence to suggest that what this will do is actually grow businesses or increase jobs. What it does do, instead, is that it answers the demands of a small set of folks who happen to also donate a great deal of money to a variety of PACs that supported this government's bid to become government. In so doing, we are unfortunately going after the people who can least afford it, from vulnerable waged workers; from hard-working construction and oil and gas workers, who have been struggling with the consequences and the drop in the international price of oil for some time now; from young people over the age of 18, who are going to actually find it harder to find work because they have to compete with people that earn less than them; and from those people who earn less than them, who frankly are now going to be encouraged to drop out of school or who are going to find it even more difficult to make their lives better while struggling in the position of being under the care of this government and, through this government, the people of Alberta.

All in all, this is an incredibly misplaced bill, and it hurts people. It picks people's pockets. For the reasons that I've outlined, this government does not have a mandate to do this, and they should therefore not do it. There are many things that they can do and are doing to try and create jobs, but doing this and hurting people when they really did not have a thorough and upfront conversation with Albertans about this before or during the election is unwise, and the people of Alberta deserve better leadership. I believe the members opposite have the opportunity to demonstrate that by withdrawing this bill and going back to the drawing board.

Certainly, what we also know is true is that there were no consultations. There were no extensive conversations with the young people who are being so negatively affected. There certainly were not conversations with labour groups or construction workers or oil and gas workers about how they were looking forward to losing their overtime. You know, the members opposite used to go on endlessly, maybe not quite as long as we have over the last 24, 26, 27 hours – I'll grant you that this is a bit longer than often. But they did go on endlessly about the need for our government to consult more on changes that were being made. Yet this is being brought in with virtually no consultation. It was buried in their Jell-O platform, and then the consequences of it were denied by the leader. There have been no government-led conversations or consultations with people since that time.

I could actually, probably, burn out, I don't know, 60 hours of the clock in one way or another using whatever tool – and there are many – just reading back all the Hansard requests for the government to consult with affected people that the folks on the opposite side of the aisle made over the course of the last four years. I mean, that would be fun. Maybe now they should go back to that thing that they thought was so important. I won't do that this time. Maybe later. Certainly, for now we will not do that.

But I think that those members of the House here on the government side who were here before the last election will recall that this was a common theme in the debate that you led, which was about respecting the people of this province and consulting with them in a more significant way about these kinds of changes that would have such a significant impact on them. I would suggest that a 13 per cent drop in pay to young people is a big one. I would suggest that a barrier for 18- to 24-year-olds to now get employment, because they have to compete with people who are paid $2 an hour less than them, is a big one. I would suggest that $2,500 over 12 weeks is a big issue. I would suggest that the loss of pay from denying statutory holiday pay to primarily seasonal workers is a big impact. I would suggest that those people have not been thoroughly consulted in any way, shape, or form by this government.

I will argue, then, that that is part of why we are making such an effort to ensure Albertans are aware of exactly how their rights are being breached through this government's proposed Bill 2. That is why I would urge all members to vote for this amendment. This bill should be withdrawn, there should be consultation, and the member opposite should do more research on what the actual practical impact is of the changes around overtime if he genuinely doesn't understand it yet. Again, we should be reconsidering the issues around union certification and also the issues around why we would attack holiday pay of vulnerable workers.

With that, Madam Speaker, I am pleased to take my seat and answer any questions or hear any comments anyone may have. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Comments or questions under Standing Order 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, any speakers? The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. While it was a riveting or an interesting idea that the hon. Leader of the Opposition proposed – and I'm sure we would have been very interested in listening to her read all of our comments in Hansard over the last four years – I'm going to propose a different direction now and move for unanimous consent that despite what I believe would be Standing Order 7(1), we go back to Ministerial Statements. If the table tells me that I've got the standing order wrong, that would be okay, but that's my motion.

5:00 Ministerial Statements

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Premier.

75th Anniversary of D-Day

Mr. Kenney: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today to mark the 75th anniversary of D-Day, the Allied landing on the beaches of Normandy that led to the defeat of the Nazi empire, to the end of that terrible tyranny, and to the beginning of the liberation of Europe in the Second World War.

[The Speaker in the chair]

Words can scarcely capture the enormous scale of Operation Overlord, the largest seaborde invasion in world history, as 150,000 troops, including 14,000 Canadians, stormed the heavily fortified German defences along a 100-kilometre stretch of France's northern coastline, supported by 110 warships of the Royal Canadian Navy, five squadrons of Royal Canadian Air Force fighter planes and bombers, and a battalion of Canadian paratroopers in addition to 14,000 soldiers of the 3rd Canadian Infantry Division and the 2nd Armoured Brigade, together landing at Juno Beach and seizing it from the enemy in a single day, at a cost of more than a thousand Canadian casualties, including 359 killed.

Among the many Albertans who participated in that battle 75 years ago today was Gunner George Lynch-Staunton of Pincher Creek. He narrowly survived and returned home to become a Provincial Court judge and later honorary aide to the Lieutenant Governor of Alberta. Lynch-Staunton was in the first wave to hit the beach and was almost immediately wounded by a shell explosion that blinded him in one eye. His harrowing account of his captain dying in his arms that day is a moving portrait of the courage and the sacrifice of the Canadian citizen soldiers, the brave men who have fought and died to protect our freedom throughout our history, on that day, and in so many other places.

Ronald Sole of Barrhead was a tank driver with the Fort Garry Horse. In an interview decades later he described in vivid detail the chaos and carnage of the assault, which only he and two other members of his squad survived. After the war Sole initially worked in Edmonton and Camrose as a mechanic, then served as a fish and wildlife officer in various parts of Alberta, and eventually wound up farming until his retirement near Barrhead.

Many Albertans fell at Normandy on this day and many more in the hard fighting that followed before Europe was finally liberated from the Nazi nightmare, but many more survived, came home, and built the modern Alberta that we know and that we celebrate today.

Mr. Speaker, few of the heroes of Juno Beach are still with us, but I invite all members to join with me in paying homage to them and to all veterans of all of our wars – the Afghan War, the Korean War, the First World War – and other conflicts where Albertans and Canadians have worn the uniform of Her Majesty's Canadian Forces. The decision to serve one's country, to take on the risk and sacrifice that that entails, reveals a lot about the women and men who choose to do so. It demonstrates courage, patriotism, love of community and country, and devotion to the principles of freedom and democracy. Thus, it is no accident that so many of those who make that decision go on after military service to make outsized contributions to our society in civilian life, as did citizen soldiers like George Lynch-Staunton and Ronald Sole.

Mr. Speaker, on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of the June 6, 1944, D-Day invasion of Nazi Fortress Europe I urge all members of this House and indeed all Albertans to honour these heroes amongst us then and now. The single most precious thing that we have, our freedom, we owe entirely to them.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker. [Standing ovation]

The Speaker: I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs is rising to respond.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to thank the Premier for his remarks and for the honour to respond and join him and all members and to add to my earlier remarks. As Her Majesty's Official Opposition liaison to the Canadian Armed Forces it's an honour to rise and pay respect on behalf of all of my colleagues to a very important anniversary that should be acknowledged and honoured in this House and is indeed being honoured today by all Canadians: June 6, 1944, known in the hearts and minds of Albertans as D-Day.

It's important to remember an invasion which marked the beginning of the end of the world war in Europe fought by thousands of brave men and women, more than 4,400 of whom made the ultimate sacrifice and laid down their lives so that the Allies could claim victory, including 359 Canadians. It's important to remember that so many of these women and men left the relative peace and security of their homes in Canada, many barely old enough to vote, to answer the call to defend Canada – our ideals, our democracy, and our freedom – from tyranny, from oppression, and from injustice.

Mr. Speaker, this morning I read about one of these men. Frank Krepps was in France at the height of the war. He had packed his bags and left from Saskatchewan. He was just 17. He had never seen Paris. Today he lives in Red Deer, and he's one of the 36 veterans in the Canadian delegation to return to France today for the formal ceremony. He said, and I quote: in my heart, all of our boys that didn't come home, that's D-Day for me; I'm going over there to say my goodbye.

Mr. Speaker, if we were to walk outside this Chamber, we would only have to go down the steps and into the rotunda of this very building to see the memorials, the flags and their colours, the plaques and the tributes and, above all, the names of those brave Albertans who didn't come home, the names forever memorialized of those who selflessly gave everything that they had, including their lives, so that our generation and all future generations could live in peace, harmony, and freedom. We will remember them.

Thank you. [Standing ovation]

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. members. I'd like to thank the Premier as well as the Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs for both of your tributes and moving words and all members for allowing the Assembly to step out of where we were to do this important remembrance.

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 2 An Act to Make Alberta Open for Business (continued)

[Debate adjourned June 5]

The Speaker: Prior to reverting to Ministerial Statements, the Leader of the Official Opposition had just concluded her remarks on amendment HA. As such, I believe that Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available for brief questions or comments. Are there any members wishing to do so?

Seeing none, we are on amendment HA. Are there any wishing to speak in debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Sweet: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again I would just like to thank the hon. Premier and the hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs for their words this afternoon.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to speak to the reasoned amendment on Bill 2. I'd like to use my time today to put Bill 2 into context and to reflect on the recent changes that happened in Ontario with Bill 47, on which this bill was modelled. Since, as we know, both the Alberta Premier and the Ontario Premier finish each other's sentences, I thought it would be interesting to do a comparison between the two bills.

As many members of the Chamber will know well, Ontario finally updated their labour laws in 2017 and brought in the Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, known as Bill 148. This act was a significant achievement for working people in Ontario. It was decades in the making. Working people in Ontario celebrated the changes as they were finally being given a fair shake in the economy. But in 2018 Premier Ford and the Ontario Conservatives were elected. The reasons for their electoral success were multiple, but Premier Ford promised the people of Ontario more jobs. The details were scarce, but the people voted for jobs, jobs, jobs.

5:10 p.m.

Shortly after getting elected, Premier Ford's new government took some pretty drastic actions. In 2018 the Ontario Legislature decided to reverse the gains won by hard-working Ontarians with Bill 148. Now, Premier Doug Ford made some pretty bold claims. He told Ontarians, and I will quote: we're getting rid of Bill 148; we're going to make sure that we're competitive around the world. Sounds familiar. He promised more jobs; sounds familiar. Higher standards of living; sounds familiar. A better quality of life; also sounds familiar. He was making Ontario open for business, and working people were going to benefit. It was a great exercise in political communications, to be sure, but the reality of his actions are now being felt by the working people in Ontario.

As I said last night, one of the major things that we've been hearing consistently around Bill 2 here in the Chamber is how important the changes in Bill 2 will be for the hospitality and service industry, but as we know, in Ontario currently the GDP in the area of service and hospitality is actually negative 3 per cent, and the Ford promise is not being delivered as advertised.

Mr. Speaker, what was Premier Ford's promise, and what was in his bill? As I said, he promised jobs, jobs, and jobs. He introduced Bill 47, Making Ontario Open for Business Act. Sounds familiar? I think Alberta's Premier may have borrowed the idea. Some may say that it was vice versa, but I'll leave that matter up for debate. In fact, the bill we are debating today, for the last 24 hours or so, is based on the work done by the Ford government. So what did Ford's Bill 47 do? Well, according to labour activists in Ontario it turns out to be – and I will quote – a sweet deal for big employers, and families got screwed.

Let's look at the details of this Ontario bill and some of the similarities here in Alberta with Bill 2. First of all, the minimum wage was rolled back. In Ontario the legislated minimum wage was rolled back from $15 an hour to $14 an hour. Right now in Alberta this UCP government is rolling back from $15 an hour to $13 an hour for youth. In Ontario provisions for workers regarding paid sick days were rolled back, as were the rights to use bereavement days for kids' emergencies. In Alberta provisions for workers regarding paid stat holidays were also rolled back. In Ontario the Ford government rolled back the rights of workers to determine whether they should join a union. In Alberta with Bill 2 we are seeing the same initiative to roll back workers' rights when it comes to their choice to decide whether they want to operate in a unionized environment.

Now, Mr. Speaker, Ontario's Bill 47, Making Ontario Open for Business Act, is not identical to Bill 2, An Act to Make Alberta Open for Business. There are some differences, but these differences are on the margins. The general policy thrust of both bills is the same, and more interestingly the political communications have been the same. The message is the same, and the message to voters is simple: more jobs, jobs, jobs, and jobs. But let's peel back the onion; the reality is a little more complex. It goes something like this: let's hurt working people, let's roll back wages, and let's take away your banked overtime; then and only then will working people be better off.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we all know the Ford government, after winning a large majority, isn't quite so popular anymore, and I think that for the UCP that's worth considering. Beyond the sensational headlines and the day-to-day scandals, I think the reason for their decline in popularity is actually pretty straightforward. The Doug Ford promise didn't work. The evidence is out there.

What is the evidence? Well, let's look. If we're going to follow the path of Premier Ford, then let's look at whether or not he's been successful. In Ontario, following the changes introduced by Bill 47, the open for business act, economic growth slowed. Projections have been revised downwards. Ontario is now projected to grow at the slowest rate since 2013 according to Stats Canada. Again according to Stats Canada the unemployment rate in Ontario actually went up as the open for business act gained traction. Is this surprising, Mr. Speaker? I don't think so. It's not a surprise that the economy might suffer when wages for real working people get cut and therefore families struggle to make ends meet.

Now, Mr. Speaker, recall the political promise of the Ford government: jobs, jobs, and jobs. How was this to be achieved? Well, according to the rhetoric it was to be by empowering business. Sound familiar? Quietly, by empowering business, what the Ford government meant was that they were going to punish workers. Sounds familiar. They hoped that the trickle-up strategy to business would eventually trickle back down to workers.

Again, let's look at the evidence in Ontario. Are reductions in wages for working people in Ontario actually trickling up to businesses and then trickling back down? Let's look at the most recent TD Bank provincial forecast for Ontario. What's changed? Well, Mr. Speaker, they are experiencing a real, pronounced, and significant slowdown in consumer spending. What logical conclusion can we draw? Workers now have less money by virtue of legislation, and therefore those workers, who by definition are consumers, are spending less money, and that's hurting their economy but also the broader business environment.

What else has happened in Ontario? Well, according to the TD Bank business investment has slowed significantly. It isn't a pretty story. And it's not just the TD Bank. Scotiabank has also reported a similar trend. Following the adoption of Bill 47, Ontario's economic growth slowed. Let me repeat that again: according to Scotiabank Ontario's economic growth slowed. Again, not a pretty story.

To my hon. colleagues in this Chamber, I urge you to take a step back and hit the pause button. No, we're not in Ontario – you're right; we're here in Alberta – but you're adopting the same legislation. Let's seriously consider what happened in Ontario when they adopted their piece of legislation. It isn't pretty. It's not going to be pretty.

We can't grow the economy here in Alberta by hurting working people. Hurting young people by picking their pockets isn't the solution. The idea that cutting wages for young people, letting the dollars trickle up and then maybe trickle back down will somehow create a better life for young people and other workers is actually a fantasy. Even Premier Ralph Klein, yes, the king, knew it was wrong and changed the practice. I honestly can't believe I'm saying this, but I think all of you need to listen to Premier Ralph Klein.

Ms Hoffman: So Harper this morning and Klein this afternoon.

Ms Sweet: I know. Harper this morning and Klein this afternoon. I am NDP, I promise.

Mr. Speaker, the idea that we can rob workers of their overtime pay and that somehow this will make these workers better off is also a fantasy. We've seen the evidence. The strategy has been tried before, and the report card is out. The strategy got an F, a failing grade.

Let's not repeat the mistakes of Ontario. Let's not pass Bill 2. Let us continue to stand up for working people, and let's drop the political rhetoric around Bill 2. It's not a saviour piece of legislation that's going to create jobs, jobs, and jobs. It's a piece of legislation that will hurt working people.

I thought we'd moved past this point in Alberta, where we were trying to punish workers just based on an economic strategy, but perhaps we haven't. I guess it remains to be seen. We still have time. We can change our direction. So I urge all the members in this House to use your conscience and protect all workers in this province and vote against Bill 2.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there any wishing to make questions or comments under Standing Order 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, are there any others wishing to debate? The hon. the Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is an honour to have the opportunity to be back in the Legislature today to continue on in this important discussion about Bill 2, the somewhat Orwellianly named An Act to Make Alberta Open for Business.

We've had the opportunity to talk about a lot of different aspects of this bill. I think my colleagues have highlighted a number of different areas, but the one that comes to mind for me, again, is the impact this could potentially have on youth. You know, just earlier today, Mr. Speaker, I had the honour of attending the mayor's lunch for Reach Edmonton, Reach Edmonton being a fantastic organization here in the city that works on a number of fronts to create safe and sustainable communities. That involves a lot of different work. They act as sort of an umbrella organization with a number of local nonprofits here in Edmonton. They do specific community work. They've done some fantastic outreach with the Central McDougall Community League here within Edmonton-City Centre, and they've always been a fantastic partner, have always attended when I've had community barbecues.

I really appreciate, in particular, the work they do with youth. Mr. Speaker, Reach Edmonton, as I mentioned, generally work as a partner organization with others. For example, they work with the Africa Centre and the Boys & Girls Clubs Big Brothers Big Sisters of Edmonton & Area to provide a youth mentoring program, the name of which, unfortunately, is escaping me – perhaps it's my lack of sleep, but at this point I can't recall the exact name of the program – but I know that it is one that has a significant impact.

Particularly, I know, from my work in talking with folks at the Africa Centre, the difference this made in the lives of many young people from the African communities who have been struggling with various issues, whether that's academic, whether that's been family life, whether that's been involvement with gangs and other unsavoury groups, or whether it's been, you know, delving into substance use. Through this program those young people have been able to get ahead, get a good foot up and a leg up. A lot of that, Mr. Speaker, then, will often involve those young people getting the opportunity to begin to get a job and get good work.

In many cases, Mr. Speaker, as many of my colleagues have talked about and as we've discussed here, these youth are coming from new Canadian families, so oftentimes their parents have limited English, limited understanding of the culture. These young people, from a very young age, have been required to be support for their family. They have been translators for their parents. They have sat and provided that bridge for the parent-teacher conferences. In some ways that's where the challenge comes in for some of these youth sometimes in that their parents are struggling, often working multiple jobs at minimum wage or for fairly low remuneration, so these young people are left to take up a lot of slack.

Oftentimes, then, they themselves, you know, once they have worked through some of these issues with the support of an organization like Reach Edmonton, are looking for work and looking for that opportunity to make a living. Mr. Speaker, after all that work they do, after all that time they put in to pull their lives back together, after everything that's invested in them so they can go back and support their family and try to get themselves ahead, a bill like this steps forward and says: and let's pay them $2 less an hour.

Now, through the Africa Centre, Mr. Speaker, they also have an excellent program, that receives some funding through, I believe, a Canada jobs grant, which works with young people from those communities to help prepare them for better work. They offer them training in writing a resumé, they offer them training in interviewing skills, and they offer them training in computer skills and other things to prepare them for many different opportunities within the workforce.

They also offer mental health first aid training, emotional support resiliency, to prepare these young people to be able to go out and get a job and move ahead. These youth face discrimination sometimes in finding work because they may look a little bit different, because they speak a bit different, because they may present themselves in a slightly different way because of the culture that they grew up in. Indeed, from the day-to-day pressures of what we recognize, of what we know exists in terms of systemic racism, which can target folks who are new to Canada, it can often be a challenge for them in terms of building up their self-esteem and believing that they are worth having that opportunity and that they deserve to have that chance.

This program, again, Mr. Speaker, invests in them, prepares them, helps them to build these skills so that they can go out and get a good job, and it provides a subsidy to employers to hire those youth and give them the opportunity, and we want to, with this bill, turn to them and say: but your work is worth $2 less an hour. Somehow the work that these youth would do, what they would bring to the table, is considered more frivolous than if they were a year or two older.

Mr. Speaker, we have heard from my colleagues. My hon. colleague from Edmonton-Manning just laid out very clearly that initiatives like this are not seeing success. They are not improving the economies in places like Ontario. We heard from the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition today that the issue with youth unemployment in Alberta is clearly not derived from the minimum wage. As we recognize, in neighbouring Saskatchewan they have had a higher youth unemployment rate, and they have a lower minimum wage than we do here in Alberta. While some members, in defending this bill, have shown a penchant for confusing causation and correlation, we recognize that there has not been any evidence so far brought to this House that what they are purporting this bill is going to do is in fact going to occur.

That is one of the main concerns that I have with this bill, Mr. Speaker, and why I have been happy to be part of this opportunity for us to have a very thorough discussion. Indeed, I'm very pleased to see that the broader public has been paying close attention to this debate. Indeed, the Premier himself took the opportunity to recognize that this debate was going on. He suggested that my colleagues and I were here because we were angry.

Now, Mr. Speaker, certainly, I would say that there has been a good deal of passion expended on this bill and, I think, reasonably so. As we've outlined, some of the tenets in this bill I think could be potentially very damaging. But I think we've been relatively measured in our discussions. Certainly, I don't feel that I've personally expressed any anger on this bill. I recognize that I can be a bit emphatic at times, I've been told. My childhood dream of being a preacher one day, of being a youth pastor, is something that may come through a little bit sometimes in my public speaking. I can't say that I could aspire to, say, the level of the great Dr. Martin Luther King or some of the other great black gospel preachers, but it provides perhaps a useful template at times. But even then, you know, those individuals at times were characterized as being angry. It was generally characterized as being angry when people wanted to shut out and turn off and not have to listen to what they had to say.

Now, that's, I think, a common rhetorical practice that we've seen from this particular Premier and this particular government, and fair enough. I recognize that this particular Premier is a gifted rhetorician, and I have the greatest of respect for that. He has the greatest skill in putting forward a narrative, whether one views that narrative as being particularly factual or not, and putting it forward quite emphatically and repeatedly, without wavering, and I can certainly recognize the skill and the ability that's involved in that. But on this particular bill I have to emphatically disagree with this Premier's narrative.

Youth in this province are not facing difficulty in finding employment because of the minimum wage. I emphatically disagree with this Premier's and this government's belief that youth in this province are facing difficulty in finding work solely because of our government or even with the more moderate version of that that he likes to put forward, that we aren't responsible for everything but that we made a bad situation much, much worse. I fundamentally disagree with that take on things, Mr. Speaker.

As I outlined yesterday in, you know, the discussions on Bill 3, talking about the 4 and a half billion dollar hole that this government wants to punch into our budget to give money away to profitable corporations, we are dealing with a complex number of factors that are interplaying. Certainly, we are dealing with some decisions of previous governments in how they have gone about, I guess, incentivizing, whether by direct action or by indirect action, the types of opportunities available in our economy, the types of opportunities that they provided for young people, recognizing that our energy and resource industry is certainly a fantastic opportunity and avenue for employment, the trades and everything that's associated with that, but recognizing that at the same time it is volatile. In many respects I think we did not properly prepare many, in particular, young men in this province for the realities of that shift, so they were hit quite hard by the world-wide drop in the price of oil.

We see that the youth unemployment rate, which, of course, we recognize, Mr. Speaker, spans up to the age of 24. That includes a number of younger people who wouldn't necessarily be in this category for the question of the minimum wage.

Also on this bill, Mr. Speaker, talking about troubling characterizations or particular narratives, as I mentioned in previous debate, the kind of conversation we've heard from government members when they sat in opposition and indeed at times now about unions and labour in this province, suggesting that in a situation where you have folks who are discussing unionization, generally the situation is that we always have one hundred per cent saintly employers and absolutely evil union thugs – we recognize that neither of those extremes is true.

As I was quite clear yesterday, I certainly respect employers in this province. I respect the people that start businesses and provide jobs for their workers, and I believe that the majority of those individuals are doing so with the right motives and wish to treat their workers well. But I also recognize, Mr. Speaker, that we have all of history to demonstrate that there are and always will be bad actors, and we need to have reasonable protections and balances within the system to ensure that workers have the opportunity to, when necessary, come together and organize, to be able to advocate for their rights, and to look out for their own self-interest.

Indeed, as this Premier knows because he is an incredibly successful organizer – that is another thing I greatly respect about him. He is well known for his ability to organize multiple communities, whether that be folks from various faith communities, whether that be folks from various immigrant communities, and he's very good at working with them to help them come together, generally to advocate for issues that he wishes to move forward, but also very good at bringing them onboard and believing that those are their issues, too. Really, ultimately, that is what it is about with the organizing of a union.

Now, I recognize that we have a difference of opinion between our side of the House and theirs as to, I guess, the validity of card check as a part of that. This government wishes to roll that back and go back to simply having the voting method that existed previously. You know, in the conversations that I've had with both workers in unions and others that have been involved in various situations, I've personally found or what I've heard is that a card check system with a threshold like 65 per cent is one that is reasonable and effective and gives a little bit more opportunity for workers to be able to organize without fear of intimidation. I've seen and I've had folks reach out to me, Mr. Speaker, who have shown me examples of when they've had employers that have tried to intervene in the process. Again, I don't see this as being a majority, but I recognize that there are some. For that reason, I do not support rolling that back as part of this bill.

My initial thoughts, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Why, thank you to the hon. member.

Statement by the Speaker

Longest Sitzings of the Legislative Assembly

The Speaker: In just one brief moment I'll be happy to call Standing Order 29(2)(a). However, if I can indulge the attention of members just ever so briefly, I would just like to perhaps note, as many of you are adamant observers of legislative history, that just a few minutes ago we passed a certain threshold together.

You may be interested to know about the top five longest sittings we've had here in the history of the Legislative Assembly. I stand to be corrected by the library over the weekend, but here's what I believe to be the longest sessions that we've had. The fifth longest occurred May 9, 2007, when the Assembly convened at 8 a.m. on May 9 and sat till 10:45 a.m. on the 10th. The fourth longest occurred November 9, 1993, when an evening sitting began at 8 p.m. on November 9, and the House rose at 4:11 on the afternoon of November 10. The third-longest sitting occurred on May 28, 2001, when the evening sitting began at 8 p.m., and the House then rose at 5:20 on May 29. The second longest, December 4, 2007: the session started on the 4th at 8 o'clock, and it rose on the 5th at 5:53.

At approximately 5:24 the hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre brought us all through a threshold that now makes this the longest Wednesday that the Legislative Assembly of Alberta has ever seen. While I offer no comment about whether that is good, bad, or indifferent, I merely observe and am but a humble servant of the Assembly, so only you will decide how much that record is exceeded by.

With that said, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available, and I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-North West rising on a brief question or comment.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to ask the hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre a couple of questions. I must say briefly, as a comment before, that I am a veteran of the two longest sittings. I was there in 2007 as well and, of course, here today, so maybe we can make a commemorative T-shirt or something like that. If you can give me your sizes, I will see to that.

You know, it's interesting that when you go through this process, it's cathartic in a way, but it also helps, I think, to sharpen one's senses, ironically, though you might feel tired. What it does do as well, I think, is that it hones the skills of people to be able to think of all angles around a specific issue.

Specifically, on Bill 2 I just wanted to ask the hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre to elaborate a bit in regard to the effects of taking the overtime and how he saw that kind of unfold during the course of the election. I found it to be a very interesting experience, to see how people built their budgets for their families or individuals working on projects up north and so forth. I guarantee that you probably ran across the same sort of thing, where people, you know, are counting on banked overtime to do other things and to get time with their families because, of course, you work in an isolated area and so forth. It's a question of time as well, and it's sometimes a question of being able to work another job even – right? – if you are trying to make ends meet. So all of those things came together. I mean, we have banked overtime for a reason. It just didn't appear out of the air, right? Rather, it was a deliberate and considered way by which to fairly compensate employees. I'm just hoping that the hon. member might give us some further insight in that regard.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It looks like I have a couple of minutes, so I'll just begin by observing, just tagging onto your observations earlier, that it seems to me that in your role, both in observation and in your neutrality, you are somewhat akin in the Legislature to the Watchers of the Marvel Comics universe. Just a thought that occurred to me, probably due to lack of sleep.

That said, on the overtime pay, you know, I appreciate that my hon. colleague brought that up. That's certainly something that I considered and thought about. I was speaking earlier about Reach Edmonton. One of the programs they have is called all-in for youth, in which they provide youth mentors who work in local high schools as part of a program where they provide social service supports not only to the students but also to their parents and families, a very successful pilot program that I'm hoping will see continued investment.

I had a young man who worked in that program who reached out to me to talk about the challenge he faced around the question of overtime because he used banked overtime in order to be able to serve youth. He was set on an eight-hour day, but then often youth that are in need don't follow the clock. So he'd have them come to him at the final hour of the day, and he would need to spend a couple of hours sometimes with those youth. He would do overtime. Therefore, he would bank that overtime, and then he would take that as time off. He came to see me because he was facing a challenge with some of the changes, and he wanted to find a better way forward. What we did was that we sat down with him and we talked about the opportunities for averaging agreements. I helped connect him with officials in Labour, and he was able to get support to have that discussion and look to find a way forward.

But what we did not need to do, Mr. Speaker, is remove a protection that's there, as my hon. colleague said, to protect workers who need that overtime, who count on that pay. We did not have to put people in a position where they could potentially be exploited by an employer, as was laid out quite thoroughly by the Leader of the Official Opposition today. There were options, and there were ways to work around that to adjust those circumstances for what we recognize was a unique situation. That strikes me as being the more reasonable way to proceed on this than simply to tell all Albertans that for some reason an hour of overtime when they've worked it is worth an hour and a half in pay but . . .

The Speaker: Thank you for your comments, Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

The Member for Edmonton-McClung is rising to debate.

Mr. Dach: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It gives me great pleasure to rise on this historic day in this House and, first of all, to acknowledge and thank you for bringing to our attention the sitting record, which we've just set, as the longest sitting in this Legislature. I know I had a chance meeting outside in the hallway earlier this afternoon with the hon. Minister of Agriculture and Forestry, and he was asking me, just in passing, how long I thought we might be sitting today. He was on a later evening shift, apparently. I responded in my role as critic for Agriculture and Forestry as best as I could, saying that it depended upon when the cows came home. We'll find out, I imagine. However, it could be that this sitting goes down in the annals of legislative history as a question in a new version of Alberta Trivial Pursuit or perhaps even a Jeopardy! question that Alex Trebek might one day pose to a contestant.

However, Mr. Speaker, in the spirit of the historic nature of today's debate, not only the length of time we're debating here but on the auspicious day that we hold this debate, je voudrais faire une dédication de mes remarques à deux soldats canadiens que j'aimais beaucoup, avec tout mon cœur. Both these Canadian soldiers, who I love with all my heart, suffered greatly in their earlier lives, before serving overseas, in horrendous working conditions.

I'll start first by speaking of my grandfather, who I mentioned earlier, Joseph Edouard Napoléon LaBelle, who went overseas to Dieppe in 1945 and landed not too long after D-Day. Before his service overseas, as I mentioned, he endured horrendous working conditions in Canada, as did countless other Canadians of his generation. He was born in Verdun, Quebec, in 1904 and came with his family to Alberta in 1911, speaking French only until he was about 12 years old. Later on, in 1929 he faced difficulties on his homestead north of Edmonton, in Thorhild, and found that he had to leave for work. He went to the Quebec forest and the bush in Quebec, to lumber camps in the dead of winter in 1929. He got there, Mr. Speaker, not on the Trans-Canada highway, because it didn't exist, of course. The only way to cross the country efficiently then was by rail and steam locomotive. Of course, going to seek your fortune in Quebec to find a job so you could survive and perhaps keep your homestead alive here in those days was something that you did by riding the rails, as they said, meaning you jumped on a moving train and hoped to heck you didn't get kicked off of it till you got to your destination.

He did arrive in Quebec and he worked in the bush in Quebec with poor clothing, bad food, horrendous bosses, and near starvation conditions. I've heard numerous stories from him about that. He survived it, but ended up getting news by way of a letter from my future grandmother and his future wife who clandestinely wrote to him to let him know that during November of 1929 there had been a horrific ground fire in Thorhild that got whipped up by big winds, and the whole town actually went up in flames, the grain elevators, every house, surrounding farms, including the homesteads of both sides of my family. The whole village was gone. Train cars full of paint and other things blew up, and the whole town went down in flames.

My grandfather came back, after enduring those horrific working conditions in Quebec, to nothing. He even had a cache of lumber that he had hoped to build a small house with on his homestead. That burnt up as well. In fact, the only thing my grandparents were able to save from their homestead were the two buffalo robes they buried in the ground as they escaped the flames.

Ms Hoffman: What about the one-eyed pony?

Mr. Dach: The one-eyed pony came much later in history.

I do want to get back and circle back. The reason I bring up my grandfather's hardship is because he endured all that, and generations later we're doing the same thing here in Alberta where we're struggling to improve working conditions for people, and we're facing a government who is wanting to dial back working conditions for workers here in this province. I find it very disappointing that after all of his struggles and those of my father, the other Canadian soldier I wish to speak about, just two generations later we're suffering the same fate, where this pick-your-pockets bill is making it more difficult for young workers with a wage differential and where people have to bank their overtime at a lower rate, where the minimum wage is being reduced arbitrarily.

On this 75th anniversary of D-Day I think it is a very sad comment that we find ourselves in this Legislature debating a bill that takes us backwards to a time when labour legislation really was much less than it is right now, but going backwards is not the direction that we should be going in. I don't think it's the direction my grandfather or my father had hoped we'd be travelling in 2019.

Now, my grandfather ended up coming to Canada, and he started that homestead. In 1933 he married my grandmother, Winnifred, and in 1935 my mother was born. But a few years later, when she was five years old, they came back from a one-time trip in the mountains in a borrowed car, and the next morning they woke up to an absolute killing frost. Like, their crop was dead. It was nothing. It wasn't salvageable. They didn't know how in the world they were going to survive, and my grandfather blurted out that if he had five bucks, he'd join the army. My grandmother, thinking they'd never take a man who was about 37 years old with about a half-section of land and two farms that he was helping to farm and a wife and child, never thought they'd take him, had saved five dollars for the rolley man who they expected in their absence and who never came. She handed him the five dollar bill and said: "Hey, go ahead. Knock yourself out."

He ended up applying, he was accepted by the military, and he was gone for 62 months. That was in service here, training, first of all, then in England, and then finally landing in Dieppe shortly after D-Day in 1945. That man suffered some horrendous working conditions throughout his life, worked extremely hard, joined in service of his country, and eventually became a successful farmer and, in his later career, the postmaster for the village of Thorhild, which was the final job that he had, a proud member of the postal workers' union.

To the next generation: my father, who did actually join and served in what was then overseas, as described, because Newfoundland was not yet a part of Canada in 1947. He got as far as Newfoundland, and that was deemed to be overseas service during wartime, which qualified him as a veteran. He also served at a time when conditions were difficult and worked before that service in some pretty horrendous working conditions as well. Both of those gentlemen have now passed away, but I remember both of them on this day with fondness and love as I reflect on the bill that we're debating today and the fact that we're going backwards in labour legislation in this province, something that they would be very, very sad to know about. I hope that my contribution to the debate today might make people pause in this province and raise their awareness and give them the voice and allow me to be a vehicle for them to counter the movement of this government towards diminishing the rights and conditions of working people in this province.

Hopefully, the people that are watching this – and I know that the longer this debate has gone on, there's a greater level of public attention that's been garnered. People are starting to pay attention in this province, especially over the last few days. It's really raised and galvanized a lot of people. When they know that it's their kids and it's their grandkids who are being targeted by this legislation, whether it's minimum wage or whether it's the wage differential, they're looking across the street at their neighbour's kids or their own children or grandchildren and saying: hey, this government wants to take $4,000 out of the pocket of the young man across the street or my grandkid.

It's the pick-your-pockets bill for sure, and it's a bill that's definitely targeting workers. It's a bill that is basically what I call an open season on the working people and on labour legislation in this province. I'm very sad to say that we've come to this day. On a day when we reflect on the service to Canada that thousands and thousands of women and men dedicated themselves to in a horrific Second World War effort against Nazi Germany, I'm sad to say that we're looking with less than full pride at a piece of legislation that would take us in a regressive way towards a labour law, an environment that they, my grandfather and my father, strove to counter in their generation and hoped that their efforts would have contributed to a more progressive and enduring march towards worker's rights and benefits than we're witnessing here in Alberta today.

Our Ontario cousins are being heralded by our current Premier as being forward looking. In fact, when you do add up all of the measures that are being undertaken by this bill and those that we find in Ontario, the net effect is negative and it does hurt working people. It hurts young people and it diminishes their ability to save for university, to assist their families. It's something that is being used to pay for large tax cuts that the government tries to tell us are going to incent investment in this country when, in fact, the opposite has been shown to be true. It's with very mixed emotions, Mr. Speaker, that I stand before you today and talk about this bill before us, knowing that the generations of Canadians who fought so hard to protect this country and establish the rights that we have see themselves rolling backwards in time.

I for one intend to do everything I can to follow the direction of my constituents in Edmonton-McClung who have told me to stand firm and make sure that their rights, the rights of their children and grandchildren in terms of labour law, are protected in this province and that we end up looking forward to always improving the rights of workers, the rights to associate, the rights to form a union, the rights to engage in union activities, and the rights to make sure that their working conditions and wages are improved, something that we never forget is a foundational value in this country.

I think that anybody who doesn't recognize the ability to associate and to form a labour union without impediments is somebody who doesn't recognize how important and foundational the union movement is to democracy. It's a pillar of our democracy. It's the foundational right of association that many, I think, across the aisle in the UCP government fail to value, and I think that's something that we as the NDP opposition will continue to counter. Hopefully, we'll be reaching those that are most affected by this legislation and garnering an unstoppable force so that in the next four years the sides have changed, Mr. Speaker, and we'll once again be sitting to your right and, in terms of labour legislation, turning the clock forward.

Thank you very much.

The Acting Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available for questions and comments. Seeing the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for his comments. I feel like I'm getting to know his family much better through some of the narratives that he's sharing about hardship and perseverance and determination and, certainly, about connections to homesteading in Alberta. I was wondering if the member might wish to comment more about the importance of having fair compensation for fair work with regard to his rural connections.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have been fortunate enough to capture many of the stories and many of the historical moments of my grandparents in particular on a tape, which I quoted a couple of times. I think it probably might be within the rules of the House to expect me to table five copies of those tapes once I can get them transferred onto an electronic device that I think the library could potentially house, and if indeed that's Mr. Speaker's expectation, I would see fit to undertake to get that done. I do have a copy of the tape that, I think, would be copiable, and I have already spoken with the library of the Edmonton public school board and McKay Avenue school to seek assistance in making copies of that tape so that it could be housed in the library there as well as here if required as a tabling.

The working conditions over generations, of course, have improved in this province, but that's a direction that we should continue to go, and going backwards is not something that Albertans elected this or any other government to do in terms of labour legislation. When we come to think about a wage cut – and we have different arguments on both sides of the House in terms of what the relative benefit or harm might be – I believe that our arguments carry the day when it comes to knowing that particularly the young people, who suffer a $2-an-hour wage cut as a minimum wage earner, almost $4000 a year, are probably sitting in disbelief and wondering why in the world their government would see fit to do this to them.

I think those young people who are under 18 years of age right now who are feeling victimized by this government's move to reduce their minimum wage, those single moms struggling to keep their families afloat who were suffering the same indignity, those individuals who are trying to go to university by saving up enough money in a minimum wage job who see the legs cut out from underneath them by this draconian cut to their minimum wage earnings: all of these people are really, really feeling disappointed, Mr. Speaker, in today's legislation that we are so strongly opposed to.

I think the population of this province will recognize that we are absolutely committed to having their back and ensuring that somebody stands up for working people in this province. It certainly isn't the government because this legislation is an attack on working people. It's a threat to labour peace in this province as well. I know that everybody is watching what Alberta is going to be doing. We know on this side of the House that we're doing everything we possibly can to raise awareness of the damage that it's going to do to the pocketbooks of people who are affected but, not only that, also to the rights that we enjoy under our Canadian Bill of Rights and labour legislation. They're being chipped away at, chipped away at by this government, who doesn't see fit to recognize the value of individual working people. They see fit, certainly, in ensuring that corporations get 4 and a half billion dollars in tax cuts, but they're going to pay for it by having our kids and grandkids take a wage cut, by having our kids and grandkids suffer a wage differential even though they're doing the same work at the same place of employment, by having our working people have overtime . . .

The Acting Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak on the amendment? I believe I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadows.

Mr. Deol: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise in this House to support the amendment to Bill 2. I think this is a very reasonable amendment proposed by my colleague. I don't find there's any reason not to support the amendment on this particular bill that takes very important changes in hand.

Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to remind that we all celebrate Labour Day in Canada to commemorate and to pay tribute to all the sacrifices, struggles behind all the achievements the labour movement has had. Eight-hour working days, regulating that all workers can get paid overtime, and how they're entitled to get stat holidays: these achievements were not made in one single day or one month. There is a history behind them. People advocated, people struggled for centuries and centuries for this, and it took the precious lives of great, I would say, leaders, workers to achieve these achievements so that the ordinary people, the ordinary workers of any province, any country, any state can have a respectful working environment and can find a decent job to live a respectful life.

The changes proposed by this bill I would see as not really backed by evidence, and that's why it's lacking even a guarantee that it will bring the kind of proposal this bill is showing, a guarantee that it will contribute, attract investment, or that it will stimulate any kind of employment or create jobs.

Looking at all the proposals in the bill and the kinds of changes in hand, I think that this amendment is a very, very reasonable amendment to the bill. By not accepting this amendment, it will give just a very, very wrong impression that we are not really serious, that we are just kind of trying to push something that is driven by their ideological or their philosophical belief. My colleague the Member for Edmonton-Manning already highlighted, you know, that the Ford government, in the direction they have taken in Ontario, is very similar. We have seen the changes, not exactly but in the same directions, and that did not really contribute anything that was proposed, that they will create more jobs. Instead, they are contributing more loss of jobs, and that's why even the Ford government, which just came into power not very long ago, are losing their popularity very, very fast.

This bill proposed, you know, wage cuts to youth workers, union rights on collective bargaining. As I already mentioned, that is a hard-fought right that workers have. That's the only right that guarantees to them they can stand up for their rights and that they have a right to negotiate their salaries and their benefits. Not giving enough time and just trying to, it seems like, push this bill through the sitting, it's probably not driven by very – I don't know – reasonable or good faith. We are not trying to achieve anything by passing this bill in a rush. We should give enough time to see. We have already passed a bill. We are already discussing so much that Bill 2 already proposed. Bill 3 proposed the largest, you know, tax giveaway to corporations and that it will create jobs. We have a number of changes going through this House, and we have a reason to see those things, how they move forward, and we have plenty of time to work on these things. Not giving emphasis to this amendment will somehow show that this is kind of a systematic attack on workers' rights, workers' achievements that they have fought very hard for for years and years, for, I will say, centuries.

I will say that it was my privilege, my pleasure, and my honour to rise in the House and speak in support of this amendment. I will encourage and request all my colleagues, on both sides of the House, to please support this amendment.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Under 29(2)(a), I see the hon. Minister of Labour and Immigration standing to speak.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would like to take a few moments to set the record straight concerning comments made by the members opposite. I would like to discuss two items: first, the youth job-creation wage and, second, to touch on comments that have been made concerning red tape.

Now, the hon. member suggests that the minimum wage has no impact on employment. I'd like to make a couple of comments about that. First, the hon. members are avoiding the findings of independent third-party research. I noted in my earlier remarks, Mr. Speaker, that Canadian empirical research has generally found that a 10 per cent increase in the minimum wage reduces employment among teens by 3 per cent to 6 per cent. This is not research conducted by advocacy groups. Rather, this includes studies by the Bank of Canada and academic studies such as one published in the Journal of Labor Economics.

Now, I recognize, Mr. Speaker, that there is some debate among economists on this issue. Certain studies have suggested that a modest – and I repeat: modest – increase in the minimum wage may have limited negative impacts on the number of jobs. However, let's be clear. What was done by the previous government was not a moderate increase; rather, this was a significant increase by nearly 50 per cent in a few short years in the face of a tremendous economic downturn. This theory was borne out by studies conducted by the Calgary Chamber. Calgary businesses did in fact lay off or reduce job opportunities for Albertans as a result of the minimum wage, and youth in particular were hit hard. The fact is that this increase in the minimum wage and other changes, such as changes to the general holiday pay, negatively impacted jobs in Alberta. Youth were those the most impacted.

Now, the hon. Leader of the Opposition has suggested that we reduce the minimum wage to zero dollars an hour to create more jobs. Mr. Speaker, let's be reasonable. We are suggesting $13 an hour, and this remains one of the highest minimum wages in the country. But let's apply that thinking in reverse. Let's say that the NDP increased the minimum wage to $20 an hour, $30 an hour or, let's say, even to $50 an hour or that the minimum wage was a hundred thousand dollars for every employee in Alberta. Would jobs stay? Would employers actually pay these wages and still remain open for business? That's certainly not the case, and Albertans have more common sense than that. The minimum wage has an impact on jobs. The theory supports this, our experience in Alberta supports this, and sadly the opposition cannot see this. Again, our focus is about creating opportunities for the thousands of Albertans, particularly youth, who do not have a job, giving them the experience and the skills they need to prepare for the future.

One other topic I would like to just touch on and briefly talk about is red tape. It has been suggested by the hon. members opposite that these changes we are suggesting in Bill 2 will create a tremendous amount of red tape. Quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, this is not the case. Regarding the youth job-creation wage, we spoke to a number of employers in Ontario. Their HR systems manage this seamlessly. Payroll systems are available and designed to handle these types of policies and can be modified to do this and, once modified, handle them automatically.

Regarding general holiday changes we're suggesting, we are simply reverting to the rules that were in place for years, and actually these rules were in place only a couple of years ago. Payroll systems were in place to manage these systems then. They can be put back in place now. The same applies for systems to manage changes to banked overtime. Once again, this was in place a couple of years ago and was in place for quite some time prior to that. The argument that these changes will create a significant amount of red tape, again, is not the case.

Our focus, Mr. Speaker, is about creating jobs for Albertans and, in particular, our youth. It is also about creating greater flexibility for workers and employers and supporting workers' rights. This was a commitment made in our platform. The hon. member suggests through this amendment that we should wait six months. I submit to you that our youth can't afford to wait. We need to get Albertans working and get our youth working again.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Other members wishing to continue in the last 30 seconds under 29(2)(a)?

Other members looking to speak to HA? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar has the floor.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm looking forward to going back to my constituency this weekend and telling my constituents that I just heard 60 people applaud cutting wages for 17-year-olds by 15 per cent. That certainly will not go over very well with the people of Edmonton-Gold Bar, and I think that it won't go over very well with most of the people in Alberta once they find out what the members opposite have done.

Before I make my comments, I want to just respond to some of the things that the Member for Calgary-Varsity raised in his response to the comments made by my colleague from Edmonton-Meadows. You know, he talks about the minimum wage and the fact that all reasonable people agree that raising the minimum wage has a negative impact on jobs.

I want to say a couple of things. First of all, you know, as I've mentioned in my comments before, Ontario has actually looked at this issue of whether or not the student minimum wage has had a positive impact on youth employment. There was a report generated by the Ontario government. I believe the Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods has shared that with members of our caucus. In fact, they can find no discernible effect on youth employment by providing a student minimum wage. The people who have reviewed the impacts of the student minimum wage have actually recommended that it be removed and that students be paid the same minimum wage as every other worker who is paid the minimum wage. I think it would be interesting for the Member for Calgary-Varsity to obtain a copy of that report and perhaps read it over the weekend and rethink this issue of the minimum wage, because if he thinks that reducing the wages for 17-year-olds by $2 an hour is going to have a positive impact on youth employment, he's dead wrong, and there are solid facts to support that.

You know, on the other issue around red tape and changing systems, that these were systems that were in place a couple of years ago so it's not a very big deal to go back to them, obviously he's never had to change the payroll system of any organization in his career. In fact, Mr. Speaker, I got an earful from my mother when we made the changes to the general holiday pay. My mother is a payroll clerk for the St. Albert public school board, and she had to spend a significant amount of time updating the payroll systems for the St. Albert public school board to change the banked overtime and the general holiday pay rules, and now she's going to have to spend a significant amount of time reverting to the rules that were in place.

When I say "significant," this is not a couple of hours or a couple of days. This is many weeks of work that she had to expend making these changes, which is especially frustrating because we know that the Minister of Education is going to be taking an axe to the budgets of the school boards in this province. So now people, like my mother, who are in charge of payroll in school boards will have to go back and do the work that needs to be done, spending precious resources that could be better directed to supporting students in classrooms. I don't think that's what anybody in this House wants, so that's why I think it's important to support this amendment, Mr.

Speaker, because those are some of the unintended consequences of this bill that I think need to be examined before members pass it.

You know, the main focus of the comments that I wanted to make with respect to this amendment and why I think that it wouldn't be prudent to read this bill for a second time now but to wait six months and examine the impacts of this bill are the rules around overtime. I had the opportunity to listen to some discussions undertaken by a man named Nick Hanauer. Some people in this Chamber may know him. He's a venture capitalist from Seattle and also an advocate for better wages and working conditions for people in the United States of America. He said that one of the things that occupies his time as a manager of a successful multibillion-dollar business is managing overtime, that in fact when companies have to pay their employees a premium, they manage their overtime very carefully because it affects the bottom line quite significantly.

But when the rules are changed and overtime costs the same as regular time, well, then that creates an incentive for employers to just run their employees ragged and not carefully manage their overtime. And, perversely, it doesn't actually make it easier for them to hire people and create more jobs, Mr. Speaker, because if you've got two people who you can work for 60 hours a week, that's a lot easier, for a number of reasons, to manage than three people who are working 40 hours a week.

So that's the system that this bill is going to set up. We had a temporary reprieve from it for a couple of years, where people, you know, could bank their overtime hours at a 1.5 to 1 ratio and people were getting compensated fairly for their work. But there is no evidence to suggest that reverting to a 1 to 1 overtime banking ratio will create more jobs. In fact, it will actually just increase the incentives for employers to run their employees ragged and take advantage of them.

It actually creates financial incentives to hire fewer people and make them work longer hours, which is exactly the opposite of what the members on the Treasury benches say they want to do. They want to create jobs, but here they are passing overtime banking legislation that will create a financial incentive for employers to not create jobs.

You know, I understand that people elected the members opposite to create jobs – that was their big promise – but here we have in this bill a financial incentive for employers to do the exact opposite of what the members on the Treasury benches say they want to do. I think people will be very upset to find out that they're trading in lower wages and not seeing their friends and neighbours going back to work as a payoff for that, that a lot of people will be made worse off and that nobody will be made better off as a result of this.

That's why I think it's important to not read this bill a second time but to take six months, actually engage in consultation with employers, see how they manage their overtime, talk to them and get a sense of whether or not limiting overtime banking to a 1 to 1 ratio will have a positive impact, do an analysis of the employment impacts where this has been in place, and do a crossjurisdictional analysis to see whether or not different overtime banking regimes have a positive effect.

It's interesting to me that, you know, the Member for Calgary-Lougheed's bromantic partner, Doug Ford, created an open for business act that didn't actually affect the overtime pay for people in Ontario. People in Ontario can still bank their overtime at a 1 to 1.5 ratio, and in fact unemployment in Ontario is much lower right now than it is here in Alberta. What is it that's magical about overtime banking in Alberta that's preventing employers from hiring more people and that's not preventing those same employers from hiring more people in Ontario? I would like, you know, to engage in some consultations and understand completely what it is that may make the Alberta labour market unique to justify this move to banking overtime rates at a 1 to 1.5 ratio.

I also want to revert to some comments about the minimum wage in relation to Ontario. The Member for Calgary-Varsity says that they modelled the minimum wage on the Ontario program. As I mentioned earlier in my comments, when I looked at the minimum wage structure in Ontario, I see that Ontario froze their minimum wage to $14 an hour for the calendar year of 2019, but they're committed to raising all minimum wage earners' wages by inflation from 2020 on. It's legislatively tied to inflation.

The Member for Calgary-Varsity should know and everybody here knows that our minimum wage is not linked to inflation. So what is the plan of the members opposite for making sure that people who – and I really do hope that these measures create jobs. Like I said, I'm very skeptical, but if they do, what's, then, the plan of the members opposite for making sure that those minimum wage earners don't fall further behind? You know, the cost of living is going to continue to increase, as it always has, here in Alberta, and especially if the economy picks up again, the cost of living will go up quickly.

What is the Member for Calgary-Varsity's plan to make sure that minimum wage earners don't fall further behind? If he actually structured the minimum wage program to closely model the Ontario plan, he would have linked it to inflation so that at least people who were getting into the minimum-wage work at $13 an hour, instead of the $15 an hour that they were originally promised, would have some light at the end of the tunnel. They would know that they're taking a temporary pay cut, that over time their wages would increase with inflation, and that at least they wouldn't be falling further behind than the 15 per cent cut that they're putting them at. But they're not doing that, Madam Speaker.

I really question whether or not they're sincere in their attempt to use the minimum wage cut as a way to increase employment. I wonder if it's actually caving in to the corporate lobbyists that have advocated vociferously on their behalf, like Restaurants Canada, who have long advocated for minimum wage decreases and certainly are major opponents to minimum wage increases. That would be interesting to know, Madam Speaker.

I have to say, you know, that the restaurant industry is not unified on this issue, on the issues around minimum wage and overtime pay. The Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods and the Member for Edmonton-Strathcona had a very well-attended press conference earlier today with a lot of restaurant owners, in fact, here in Alberta who support a $15-an-hour minimum wage for all. I'm glad that we have restaurant owners who understand that paying their employees a fair wage is better for their own business and better for the communities that they serve.

I'm privileged in the constituency of Edmonton-Gold Bar to have a restaurant called Cartago. The owner of that restaurant ran an op-ed in the Postmedia outlets during the election campaign speaking out against Restaurants Canada's move to reduce the minimum wage, and she wrote at length about the benefits that her restaurant has seen by paying their employees a fair wage. They have a lot less turnover. You know, it takes a significant amount of time to hire and train somebody to do the work well in a restaurant, and once you've put that effort in, Madam Speaker, it's beneficial to her as a restaurant owner to be able to keep those people on staff.

By paying them a $15-an-hour minimum wage, she's seen a lot of retention in her employees, so she doesn't have to waste a lot of time and energy continually retraining new people to do the same tasks. She also knows that her people are happier when they're coming to work and able to support themselves and their families on the wages that they're earning at her restaurant. They have less stress in other areas of their lives, so they're better employees. They work better with their colleagues, and they provide better service to their customers because they're much happier people. That improves the restaurant.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. member, please remember to table the documents that you referenced in your speech.

Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. Are there any comments or questions? The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you to the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar for your analysis. You know, some edification around real-life examples: I think that helps to have any given bill sort of jump off the page and become real either through stories or concrete examples of how people might be benefiting from the protections that the current labour reforms do allow and/or how individuals might be exposed in the absence of those protections. I was interested to hear about your example of a restaurant that you have in your constituency. I just fail to remember the name of it. I just was intrigued to know about the quality of life that paying a fair living wage does afford restaurant workers and how that will benefit or translate into a successful, more stable business environment, especially for the restaurant industry.

I think many of us at some point in our lives have experienced working in restaurants, and you know that, for example, if you're not being paid very much, you rely on gratuities. The gratuities and tips come and go, and it can be a feast or a famine, quite frankly. When we look for ways by which to make life better for Albertans, I mean, these sorts of regulations and standards for protections are significant. If you just perhaps could edify us a little bit more on that area of discussion that you were just engaged in, I would be grateful.

The Deputy Speaker: Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker, and I want to thank the Member for Edmonton-North West for his thoughtful questions. You know, certainly, one of the things that we heard when we embarked on this project to raise the minimum wage to $15 an hour was that tips were going to dry up, that because restaurant workers were going to be so highly paid, nobody would be able to afford to leave tips for restaurant workers anymore. The Member for Edmonton-North West touched on tips and how unreliable a source of income that can be for people who work in the restaurant industry.

Certainly, it was interesting to me that, you know, this restaurant that I mentioned opened up in my constituency a couple of years ago. They knew full well that the minimum wage was at $12 an hour, I think, at that time and going to $15. That didn't impact their business plan, and in fact it's probably one of the most successful restaurants in my constituency. I drive past it regularly, Madam Speaker, and morning, noon, and night that place is hopping.

I'm glad to see that businesses can be successful while paying their workers a fair wage. That's something that we've always talked about – we've talked about this in Bill 2; we've talked about it in Bill 3, the tax giveaway bill that's proposed – that businesses can be successful while their employees are successful, too. Everyone benefits when that's the case, and that's why we wanted to raise the minimum wage and create an economy that works for everybody and doesn't just select the wealthiest top percentages of the population, that actually lifts people up out of poverty and creates those opportunities that would be denied them in other circumstances because they didn't have the finances to take advantage of them.

You know, certainly, the facts bear out what we've seen with this particular restaurant in my constituency, Madam Speaker. Even though Alberta has gone through a very difficult recession, restaurant receipts are up to record levels. They've been doing very well in tough economic times and at a time when wages for their workers have been going up. I think that that's a tremendous success story that needs to be more widely shared and not taken down.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any more speakers to the hoist amendment? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker and to colleagues who've participated in this debate thus far on Bill 2 and, specifically, the hoist amendment, which reads: "Bill 2, An Act to Make Alberta Open for Business" – a.k.a. the pick-your-pockets bill; it doesn't actually say that in the amendment, but that's the vernacular – "be not now read a second time but that it be read a second time this day six months hence."

I want to say that it's been quite an exciting week. Oh, first I want to say that I just noticed that it must be a date night for the Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods because I see her husband is looking adoringly from the gallery. I imagine other people's spouses might be watching on their phones or other ways. Anyway, it must be date night. That's what I wanted to say.

Now I want to get back to what an enlightening week I think it has been. I want to start by saying that on Monday the Speaker introduced the family of William Daniel Dickie, the former Member for Calgary-Glenmore, and we had an opportunity to hear about some of his legacy. Of course, one of the pieces of his legacy was bringing forward a motion to create and publish Hansard. I can't actually read the debate from the debate about creating Hansard because, of course, it wasn't created yet, but I imagine that some of the discourse was probably around: "You know, it'd be a nice idea. It'd be really interesting. It's probably going to cost way, way, way too much money because, of course, we'd have to pay people to create Hansard." But I think that there is value in doing things that cost money. I think there is value in paying people for their work.

I want to say that one of the other things I found enlightening just a few minutes or hours ago – it's hard to tell the difference some days. The Speaker referenced that this has been the longest consecutive sitting of the Legislature in Alberta history. He referred to the sitting in December 2007 in which the Member for Edmonton-North West, then the Member for Edmonton-Calder, was an active participant. Because we have Hansard, because of Mr. Dickie, I was able to go back and look at some of the history of that night's debate.

For the recollection of all members here, I think it's important that we consider the historical context we are in today, which is a great sense of concern being raised by the opposition, as there was in 2007. In 2007 the bill that was being considered was the Alberta Utilities Commission Act. It was introduced, actually, on June 14. Here we are in June as well. Because there was so much concern initially on June 14, the government chose to wait until November to bring it back for second reading. It was in second reading for two days in November, a third day in December, and then, depending on how you read the days, December 3, 4, and so on. When I had a chance to do a little scanning of the Hansard, bills that had this much concern or at least the last one that had the House go almost as many hours as this House is going – I looked a little bit at some of the back and forth and what happened during that debate that night and then the days that led up to it.

One of the things that I found very interesting is that – again, I haven't read quite all of the Hansard yet, but I imagine there will be more time in this place to read more of the Hansard – as I read, it appears that there were at least 24 government amendments brought forward to that bill, the bill that initially had concerns raised, concerns brought forward. The government tabled it, took some time to think about what to do, and then came back with a number of amendments because the government had some concerns. Eventually it did pass – it absolutely did – after that very, very late night sitting, which the Member for Edmonton-North West, I'm sure, recalls with great precision, all of the details of that night's debate. Eventually it did pass. But there were, it appears, at least 24 government amendments brought forward to that bill because there was so much concern about it.

What I want to say is that just because a bill has been presented and because it's already made its way through cabinet for recommendation to this House, it doesn't mean that we need to pass it in its current form. I know that there are many members here who probably feel pressure to do so, but I want to say: feel free to look at the Hansard. Feel free to see all of the additions that government members brought forward to try to take a bill that had a great deal of concern to the people of this province – some were probably in the government members' own ridings at the time. Think about ways that you might be able to help make people at home feel excited about this bill. I'm sure that the members who were part of the debate back in 2007 were initially excited or at least thought they should be excited, but when they had a chance to see just how much concern and outrage there was in their communities and across Alberta and how many issues had been raised, they certainly paused, took some due consideration, and they themselves created a number of amendments to bring it back, to try to make it better.

I am saying that I recommend this hoist for the reasons that my colleagues have already mentioned. Also, I think it would behoove us – it gives us an opportunity, rather than having to work through the messy amendment process, which, of course, we will do if that's what happens, for government to take the opportunity, through this hoist, to actually develop a bill that they can be excited about and that I think they can sell with confidence rather than saying, as the Member for Lethbridge-West mentioned earlier – I know we've talked about pick your pockets or take your toonies. All those young people who are living in our ridings who weren't old enough to vote in this last election but will certainly be old enough to vote in the next election: they will absolutely be old enough to vote in the next election, and they will have opinions about the way that they have been treated by their government. I think that it would be of benefit for us to take the opportunity to reflect on the lessons learned, number one, because of Mr. William Daniel Dickie's motion to create Hansard and, number two, because of our ability to actually learn from history and not repeat the errors of the past.

A few of the areas that I think require a significant re-examination and reflection. I would hope that individuals, either through government amendments or through passing this hoist amendment, then take the opportunity to bring back something. Specifically creating a class for discrimination based on age: I think that's a big old red flag. I think you've heard that from many of us, and I imagine you're probably hearing it from some people in your own constituencies as well. That would be one area that I would imagine would be some room for consideration.

When I'm thinking about the progress that we've made on human rights – and I know other people have talked about this. I can't help but think about how – it depends on how long you imagine history being, but not that long in world history has it been since we said: it's wrong for kids to work in unsafe work conditions; it's wrong for kids to work in coal mines. And I imagine that if there was Hansard for the day, there would have been extensive debate saying: you know, of course, we don't want to treat kids this way, but it's just not the right time. So to say to kids, "Of course, we don't want to make you a lesser class of citizen, but it's just not a right time to treat you equally in terms of your pay for your work," I think, is problematic. I think we have an opportunity to pass this hoist and then take the opportunity to rewrite this in a way that doesn't create that case for discrimination based on age.

I think our leader, the Member for Edmonton-Strathcona, did a really lovely job of describing the two different scenarios – two children, very similar and very different in many ways, one who started working at a young age, one who was going to start working this summer at not quite as young an age – that difference between being under 18 and being over 18, and how not only will discrimination based on age for income, by lowering the minimum wage for youth workers, create a disadvantage for those youth because they're taking less money home, but it also has the potential to create a disadvantage for people over 18 because they could be seen as: you know, is it really worth that extra $2 to pay somebody because they're a little bit older? So it can work for grounds for discrimination on the other side of that toonie as well, both sides of the toonie working against regular workers here in this piece. That's one of the major areas.

Of course, the other one is around overtime pay. I know that I have already touched on some of my concerns around the seasonal worker piece, but I do need to reiterate that that requirement for 30 days of employment before a statutory holiday, qualifying for statutory holiday pay, I think, is mean, and I don't think it, again, respects young people. I think a lot of young people and, actually, probably a lot of older people as well like to work seasonal work. I know of a number of retired folks who don't mind spending a few months in the garden centres, right? They're kind of keen to spend some time in the garden centres, pick up some extra cash, pick up these fun, seasonal opportunities for employment, and it certainly could create an uneven playing field both for them as well as for the youth worker.

Then, of course, the general overtime pay provisions: moving from time and a half to straight time, I think, is again a direct attack and something that creates a very uneven financial situation for the people of Alberta compared to virtually every other Canadian jurisdiction. I think that we shouldn't be striving for the lowest standard; I think we should be striving for – I think the Minister of Transportation said, "Just achieve average," when he was debating last night. That was one of the things his constituent said: just be average. Well, I will tell you that this proposal is far below average. Going from time and a half, which is essentially the Canadian standard, to straight time is undercutting the value of the workers that all of us represent in our ridings and across the province.

Then the last piece, of course, is some of the attacks on the rights of workers to organize. I have a colleague and friend who is a labour lawyer, and when I said, "Why did you go into labour law? Were your parents union members, or did you grow up with parents who were working as labour lawyers?", that friend said: "No, actually, not at all. I was really interested in human rights law, and I saw that it's the union that actually drives a lot of human rights cases." Ordinary folks can't afford to get a human rights lawyer on their own individual salaries, but if we pool our resources together, we have the ability to fight for one another and to create a stronger world. Inspired by some of the French I heard earlier: nous sommes plus forts ensemble. We are stronger when we are together.

I think that it is an affront to the rights of people to organize to say that we're going to move back and take away your rights to be able to organize in a timely fashion. I think the 90-days piece is a concern. I think getting rid of the card check is of concern to me and I know to many people who want to have the right, if they're being discriminated against, to exercise their human rights to organize and to fight for fairness. That's, to me, what a lot of the union workers I've met over the years have done.

Some of my first exposure to union workers. Of course, my parents were both teachers, and both of them were members of the union. There were times when they had to turn to their association, to their union and get some support, and rightfully it was there for them and it had their backs. The same when I was with the Edmonton public school board. I spent a considerable amount of time with the ATA but also with the three different CUPE locals that were represented there. CUPE 3550: these are the educational assistants and the admin staff in schools. They're not exactly people that would typically, walking down the street, make you think: oh, there's a union thug. This is the lady who greets you and your family when you drop your kids off at school. This is the person who helps a child with a disability be toileted during recess. This is the person who makes sure that somebody with a disability has an opportunity to learn how to read. These are a lot of – often women, but not always – the kinds of unionized folks that I spent time with.

When I asked about their history with becoming organized as a group, they said: well, members of the board didn't respect us, they didn't respect our wages, they were rolling them back, and it was important to us that we stand together. Somebody actually, one of the board members, maybe even the chair at the time, said: well, this is just to give I think it was pin money to moms who don't want to have to ask for extra allowance from their spouses. Well, I'll tell you, that mobilized those women and the men who also worked with them. They were deeply offended by that, and they knew it was important that they have a united voice and the ability to fight for fairness for them because, honestly, the working conditions of our educational assistants in our schools are the learning conditions of those kids they are tasked to work with. Attacking the right to organize, I think, is an affront to fairness in our society.

All of this being said, the last time in Alberta history when we went on this long for debate, it resulted in the government having some reflection and coming back with 24 amendments to their own legislation. We can either pass this hoist tonight – you can go home, and you can think about this and talk about it with each other about ways that you can amend this bill to come up something that you're more proud of – or you can vote to pass it through all stages as quickly as you physically can. But at the end of the day, I know that I talked to my loved ones, and I know how important it is for me to be able to say that I did what I thought was right.

There will be times where you will be left with the decision to say, "I did what I was told" or "I did what I thought was right." I think it is very important that all of us be able to go home to our communities and to our loved ones and be able to say: I did what I thought was right. This is an opportunity to do this, hon. members. I think you've seen the commitment that we in this House and I know many others across this province have to make sure that we have fairness and that we have, I would say, as the Minister for Transportation said, an average playing field. That was what his constituent aspired for him to achieve. I think what we have is very fair and reasonable and many would say average, and I think what this bill proposes is to bring us back and to reduce that threshold.

I think that's what I wanted to say.

The Deputy Speaker: Perfect timing. Standing Order 29(2)(a), comments and questions. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I appreciate that. I want to thank the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora for her remarks. I'm hoping to tap into her experience being a school board trustee and, of course, the chair of the public school board. With 26 schools in my riding I'm very proud, very excited about the students that go to these schools. One of the things that we talked about during this entire debate is, of course, about creating the jobs, but I still fail to see any discussion around the students 17 years of age that already have jobs and why they should maybe be consulted around this legislation. With your experience in the school board you obviously have had multiple, multiple chances to be around students, to talk with students, to find out how they view things. I was wondering if you might be able to share some of those experiences about how important it is to tap into our young emerging leaders and how we can form legislation.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. Maybe I'll tell one quick story about during the campaign period, not that long ago. We know spring break fell in the middle of that campaign period, but the first Monday after spring break, in Edmonton anyway, I happened to be at Westmount mall. Busy place, especially during the lunch hour, when the students from Ross Shep high school across the street have their lunch break. That food court is packed, and it is a hopping place. A few of the students recognized me because I've been around the community for years. I was over chatting with them, and I said a couple of things that I thought that they should be thinking about as they head into the election. One, I said, "There's a proposal to roll back your wages." They said, "That's not fair." I said that, two, there were considerations around GSAs that were, in my opinion, going to be threatening, and now we've seen through the introduction of Bill 8 that certainly they are very threatening. I heard somebody actually already refer to it as Bill Hate, so that's interesting. Then the third one I mentioned was provincial achievement tests and how diploma exams are going to go back to 50 per cent.

I have to say that the response and reaction from those youth were amazing. We had a really interesting debate. One said: "Well, but why would they want to do that? What would be the benefit?" I'm sure we'll have an opportunity to talk about diploma exams another day. I said, "Well, they say that if you get paid less, there will be more jobs." They said: "Are you kidding me? Like, we have four people that work our shift at the restaurant. How are there going to be more jobs? We don't need five people. If we have five people, I'm going to have less work. You staff the people that you need at your business to support the supply and demand situation that you have there." So I thought it was pretty interesting.

Anyway, it evolved to a number of them saying: "Where's your office? I want to come and volunteer." That was a lovely surprise and a pleasant treat, and I really enjoyed working with them. I'm grateful that they helped me get back here. Those are the kinds of people that I'm fighting for every day, and that's why we've been here for the longest Wednesday in Alberta history. It's going to be an interesting one, folks.

Thank you very much, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: About a minute and a half under 29(2)(a).

Seeing none, any speakers to the hoist amendment? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today to speak to the amendment, this hoist amendment, and to the broader bill. I'll try to keep my comments fairly concise, but I just want to start, actually, with the title of this bill, An Act to Make Alberta Open for Business. Now, I've read through this a couple of times and, quite frankly, still fail to see how this is making Alberta more open for business. There's nothing in here about, you know, what work the government could be doing to attract new investment here in the province, how it's supporting new businesses, whether start-ups or companies that are looking to scale up, or how it is making it easier or better for businesses to do business in Alberta.

Now, Madam Speaker, I'm very proud to live in the best province in the country to start a business, to live, work, and play and recognize that although we are the best, there's always room for improvement and ways to make things better. Now, for me one of the challenges of this bill – and I'll just jump right to it – is the full-frontal attack on working people. During the election campaign I do not recall the Premier nor this UCP party, now government, then party, telling Albertans that they were going to roll back or give employers the option to pay out banked overtime at straight time.

I can tell you, Madam Speaker, that every Albertan that I've spoken to relies on their overtime pay to pay their bills. That's part of the reason they take certain jobs that they do. This applies heavily to our energy sector, which, of course, is our largest sector in Alberta and really the driver of our economy and the driver of the Canadian economy, as well as our construction sector. Conversations that I've had with workers in this government's attempt to pick their pockets, hence why we dubbed this bill, really, the pick-your-pockets bill – I think that would be a more accurate title for it, quite frankly. Workers that work overtime do that knowing that they're going to get it, whether it's time and a half or double time. To put this under the guise of: it's an agreement between a worker and an employer. I can tell you that, you know, obviously, there are some incredible employers throughout this province, incredible companies with incredible reputations, who treat their workers very, very well. Unfortunately, like in all sectors, there are some bad apples. There are some companies that will take advantage of this provision and either tell a future potential employee, "Sign this contract with straight time, or we'll find someone else who will," or negotiate – and I'll use that in loose brackets; really, it's more people being volun-told – how they're paid or how their banked overtime is going to be paid back to them.

This is a significant issue. I know that some of my colleagues have pointed out numbers around $2,500 a month, and the Leader of the Official Opposition went in depth, did a breakdown of where we came up with the number on average of $2,500. It's not precise but more of a ballpark. The point is that this legislation will allow employers to not have to pay out banked overtime at time and a half. I view that as an attack on working people.

I can tell you, Madam Speaker, from the doors that I've knocked on and the constituents that I've talked to and Albertans around the province that this is something that this government is trying to bring in, is something that, they said, they sure as heck didn't advertise that during the campaign. For a government that says in one breath, "Oh, yes, we're doing everything we said that we were going to and we told Albertans" yet tried to accuse us during elections of not being forthright or forthcoming with Albertans, well here's a prime example of a piece of legislation in week two of this brand new 30th Legislature. This government is going right after the very people who built this province and who keep this province moving and the economy running. So I have serious issues with their proposals when it comes to overtime.

The other thing that's interesting. I know the minister recently got up to speak about trying to clarify the holiday pay. I mean, this is another attack on working people. I know that some of my colleagues have given many examples of folks working at Christmas or other holidays that now have to go back to a qualification period. What's interesting about this is that Alberta is the only province in the country that once again will not have this holiday pay. You know, it's interesting for the minister to say: well, this was the way it was a couple of years ago, so why can't we go back to it? Well, I guess that once upon a time minimum wage was, you know, $2. Why can't we go back to that? The fact is that, again, recognizing – and I do recognize that this is an additional cost to, especially, small businesses. I recognize that a hundred per cent, but again, workers that are working on holidays deserve to get that pay and shouldn't have to qualify to get it.

For me, really, one of the things we tried to do when we were in government is that we would always do crossjurisdictional scans, looking at: what is the common practice in other provinces across this country? I mean, we have a very diverse country. We have great examples across the country. If I recall, especially around the cabinet table we would look at at least three or four other provinces. We'd look at Ontario usually all the time, one of the largest provinces. We'd also compare to B.C. and Saskatchewan, being our close neighbours, and then either Manitoba, Quebec, or the Maritimes to look at what the rest of the country is doing as a benchmark. Are we ahead of the pack, are we trailblazers, or are we laggards?

Quite frankly, you know, Mr. Speaker, there are some areas where we are leading the pack and trailblazers and very proud of it and then other areas where we are laggards. I can tell you that one of the reasons that our government raised the minimum wage is because Alberta was a laggard in minimum wage even though we had some of the higher costs of living and higher rates of inflation than other provinces. Because of us being so reliant on commodities and being an energy province, we are more susceptible to the booms and busts, more so than many other provinces. That also gets into why we focused on working with job creators to help diversify the economy, providing them with the right tools to be able to grow and expand.

You know, Mr. Speaker, I think, for us, looking across the country: that once again Alberta will be the only province that doesn't compensate for holiday pay or provides the caveats around qualifying for it – it's not automatic for workers – is not something that we should be proud of. We were proud when we fixed this and amended it in our term, and quite frankly it's shameful that the government is proud to bring the province back into the dark ages when it comes to this.

A couple of other issues, briefly, Mr. Speaker. When it comes to card check and union certification, I know that this government has a disdain for labour, organized labour, and I can say this because in many debates in this House there were members who are current members today who were members of the former party, Wildrose, who spoke at length demonizing unions and attacking their very purpose – right? – which is to bargain and be one voice, collectively supporting workers. Anyway, we don't need to go into what they are. Maybe we do, actually.

But the issue of card check: I mean, essentially, in Alberta it was a two-step process if a work site wanted to unionize. We know of examples where there have been, when work sites wanted to unionize, employers trying to break that, where there have been intimidation and threats. I can tell you that I've been on the front line with workers at different job sites trying to unionize.

Again, this isn't all companies. There are some that are incredible, that have incredible relationships with their workers, employer and employees. We applaud those companies. I think of, actually, the casinos that have a brilliant relationship with their employees. The one casino, the brand new one in West Edmonton Mall: I'm trying to think of the name of the company. Regardless, I applaud them. They have an incredible relationship with their workers, value them, pay them a very good wage, and they are very, very loyal and very hard working.

Anyway, the card check. I mean, it's not like it was a 50 per cent plus 1 and suddenly everyone would be unionized. The bar, the threshold, was set fairly high, at 65 per cent. So what this did is just ensured that employers couldn't interfere in this process if that was the will of the majority of workers.

Ms Hoffman: Significant majority.

Mr. Bilous: Yeah. Sixty-five per cent is a significant majority, I mean, especially when you think of – even in this place, when members receive 65 per cent of the popular vote, that is a significant portion. We set the bar fairly high because we wanted this to be able to hold up to scrutiny.

But, again, you know, it's an unfortunate provision in this pick-your-pockets bill, which we've been discussing now for, I think, well over 22 hours. Yeah. Time flies when you're having fun, Mr. Speaker.

It's not part of this bill, but we know it's coming, and I just want to touch on it briefly: my frustration with having a two-tiered minimum wage. I strongly believe that equal work deserves equal pay. I don't care how old you are, the colour of your skin, who you pray to, who you love. You should get equal pay for equal work, and to say that we're going to try to help youth by paying them less is demeaning to young people. It's saying: you're not as valuable as others. You know, this isn't an internship, although I know the minister loves to compare them: it's going to give them some experience. Well, you know what? If that young person is doing the same thing that a 40-year-old or a 60-year-old or an 80-year-old is doing, it is ageism. It is discriminating against a person for their age, justifying it by paying them less, and quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, it's shameful. We will be talking about that.

I love to talk about, again, the fact that for a while in this province we had a two-tiered wage for people in the liquor industry. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that in my 20s I worked in restaurants and bars. That helped put me through university. You know what? For people to say, "Oh, they get so much in tips; they don't need it": frankly, when I hear comments like that, they're usually from people that are quite ignorant, who have never worked in the industry, in the sense that if they had, in every restaurant or establishment I've worked in, the employee has to, at the end of their shift, pay out a percentage to the house, to the cooks, to the managers, to a number of people. If a person gets stiffed – that lingo means, you know, that they have customers that come in, they pay for their meal, but they don't tip or they tip a very, very low amount. What can happen – and it's happened to me, and it's happened to colleagues of mine: they end up having to pay out of their pocket to work that shift because they owe the restaurant money. This practice happens.

I know that people may jump up and say: yeah; well, you could take them to the labour board or whatever. You know what? First of all, good luck in that, and if you try, you will be out of job. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I worked in a couple of different bars where the employers refused to pay a wage after 2 a.m. Now, do you think that the staff went home at 2:01? We went home around 5:01 in the morning after cleaning for hours and hours, yet the employer refused to pay. Is that illegal? Yes, it is. The second that a person would take them in front of the labour board or file a complaint, they were out of job. Again, that is not all practices. I've worked for some incredible owners that have done an amazing job taking care of their workers, treating them very, very well.

Again, this is to talk about: what we need to try to do is provide and ensure that there are provisions to protect workers so that – it may be few – bad apples don't have the ability to take advantage of working people. That's why I encourage all members to vote in favour of this hoist.

The Speaker: Hon. members, on 29(2)(a) are there any wishing to ask a brief question or comment of the member?

Seeing none, on the hoist amendment, are there any wishing to debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It is my pleasure to rise to speak to the hoist amendment to Bill 2, the bill that we have given the name the picking-your-pockets bill. Our hoist amendment reads: that the bill "be not now read a second time but that it be read a second time this day six months hence." The reason that I support this hoist amendment is because I think that we very seriously need to spend more time discussing the contents of this bill and consulting with Albertans about this piece, making sure that Albertans have a chance to fully understand what the government is proposing and to register their thoughts and opinions.

Let me start by saying thank you to all of the members who've contributed to this debate, either in full on comments on the bill or on amendments or in questions and comments under 29(2)(a). We've had a lot of really good discussion throughout the day, the night, and then the day again, and I really appreciate it. We're now at this point where it is Wednesday within this Chamber but Leg. Friday outside of the Chamber, as Thursday is often referred to. I'm very pleased that we were able to have such good discussion throughout, and I know that when this piece of legislation moves into Committee of the Whole, we will have the opportunity to continue the dialogue and at length discuss the pros and cons of this piece of legislation.

As I discuss this hoist, my intention, Mr. Speaker, is to talk once more about the concerns and the reasons why I think we need to go back and consult with Albertans about this piece as well as to address some of the issues that have been raised by my hon. colleagues in this Chamber throughout the debate and to touch on that.

To begin with, Mr. Speaker, I really just want to get back to the key impacts of this legislation on both employers and employees, because the workers of this province drive our economy and are critically important. Without the workers, nothing gets done. Without employers, no one has jobs. It's a really important relationship, that needs to be protected. I do want to make sure that everyone is really thinking about both sides of that coin because the employers will often have very active and powerful lobbying groups, and sometimes the workers do not have that same level of visibility. Making sure we are thinking about the people who rely on minimum standards, which are in our employment standards legislation, which is what we are talking about here, is critically important; also, making sure that we're listening to the stakeholders when they are giving us feedback.

First off, when we're talking about some of the changes in Bill 2 and related to Bill 2, one of the things I've heard the members opposite say is that this bill does not introduce any new red tape. I would like to dispute that fact because we know through consultations at a number of points that employers have said that holiday pay calculations in Alberta historically have been overly burdensome and complicated. That was one of the reasons why we simplified them.

We have also heard that having wage differentials has been overly complicating. We heard that in 1998, under the leadership of Premier Ralph Klein. When they removed the student minimum wage in their changes in 1998, when they were debating increasing the minimum wage at that time, if I recall correctly, the minimum wage had not been increased in roughly five years. Interestingly, at that point the business lobby argued against raising the minimum wage – the minimum wage at that time was roughly $5 – because of the negative impacts that it would have.

When employers are telling us that there is red tape, that having two different wages and the associated administrative overhead to track that can be difficult, when we know from looking at our neighbours in Ontario that this is, in fact, the case with their system – and the report that my hon. colleague from Edmonton-Gold Bar referenced and, I know, others have talked about: when Ontario did a very thorough review of employment standards, the recommendation out of that changing workplaces review was the elimination of multiple minimum wages. That report recognized that devaluing youth not only introduced unintended consequences and behaviours similar to what we've seen in Australia, the learn and churn effect – it's interesting because this government is looking to target and improve a very specific number, the youth unemployment percentage, and that number is measured.

The most specifically we can get to it is through some of the Stats Canada data, but it's grouped either, depending on which type of report you're looking at, as 15- through 24-year-olds or 15- to 19-year-olds. In both of those cases, the number you're trying to target – everyone may be impacted by this policy, but not everyone will be impacted positively by this policy because we know, from Australia and Ontario, that those 15-, 16-, and 17-year-olds: perhaps if they find themselves finding more employment under this policy, the 18-, 19-, 20-, 21-, 22-, 23-year-olds, and 24-year-olds may not, because that is what we've seen in other jurisdictions that have a wage differential. Employers may preferentially hire students where they can pay that lower wage.

Again I would like to highlight that the Alberta differential will be 15 per cent, which is more than twice the differential in Ontario, which is only 85 cents. Here it will be $2. That is not insignificant when we think about unintended consequences and how it might impact behaviour. We now have a policy where, if it positively impacts those that this policy targets, it very likely negatively impacts those just slightly older. I think that's a really important factor that we need to consider.

Within this bill, from listening to employers, we also know that employers said that the holiday pay calculations previously were overly complicated. The hon. minister just a little while ago said that payroll systems can be put back in. I think we need to acknowledge that the holiday pay calculation system was overly complicated and that not every employer has a full payroll system. There are a lot of smaller businesses that may not be able to afford the full-package HR system that calculates it, the HR system that – I will remind you that I talked about it earlier – can be set up to make sure that workers get the least possible amount of holiday pay. I know people who worked at call centres where their payroll systems were set up to make sure that their workers were never scheduled on five of the last nine weeks preceding the work week in which the general holiday occurs.

I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the employers who do not have the very in-depth HR systems that automatically calculate these things find themselves having to do a lot of paperwork to figure out if Jane worked five of the last nine weeks preceding the work week when you have scheduled employees. If somebody is Monday to Friday, it's a little bit easier. That's not always the case in our workplaces. The idea that this is not red tape is ignoring what employers told us in '98, told us through the review that our government did just two years ago, and what we see in Ontario. I think that's very important to remember.

I do want to speak, very briefly, again, as a reminder that these employment standards protect our most vulnerable workers. The minimum standard is the one that workers who do not have collective bargaining, workers who are potentially starting out in their careers – a lot of professional jobs and a lot of employers provide far beyond the minimum standard. I would say that above the minimum standard is the norm in Alberta. We are a prosperous province with wonderful businesses throughout, but when the minimum standard is what an employee is forced to rely upon, that's where employment standards come in.

Now workers may not get compensation for statutory holidays. We know that happens because it used to happen under the previous system, and this brings me to what my colleague from Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview has already touched on, the idea that because we had it before, it must have been a good thing and no big deal to bring it back. I think that's a fallacy. Because Alberta was the lowest in the country for our standards doesn't mean we should go back. We now have mainstream employment standards that put us on par – not above, not better but on par – and getting there, on par, was a big change in Alberta. I can tell you that. To start reverting to some of those standards is a disservice to the workers of this province, the workers who spend the money that they earn here in our province.

We know that when you pay the lowest paid workers a little bit more, that money does not go to Tahiti. It does not go into stocks. That gets spent in the local economy. That gets spent on buying Christmas presents and holidays. That gets spent on buying food for school lunches. Oftentimes when we're talking about employment standards and those who rely on those minimum standards, we are talking about some of our lowest paid workers, and money going to those lowest paid workers in the form of stat holiday pay gets spent in our local economies. We can see that through Stats Canada, and I'm very sad that I don't have that chart with me. But the return on investment of giving more money to the lowest paid workers is so much better than giving money to the highest paid workers. That is something we know, and I don't think anyone disputes that.

Now, the hon. minister also spoke about the impact of the minimum wage on our economy. He accuses us of suggesting that the minimum wage has no impact. We have never said that. What I would suggest to everyone: if you are interested in seeing some of the impacts on our economy, there are ways you can look at what has actually happened in Alberta. We can look at the Labour Force Survey, we can look at the stats, and then we can compare to the next-closest jurisdiction and see what the differences may be. That can help pinpoint: when we changed the minimum wage and Saskatchewan did not, how did that potentially impact it?

Now, economies are complicated. Economists do not always agree with each other. Ask two economists for their opinions, and you will get three opinions: that has been said before. That being said, we can look at Alberta and we can start trying to interpret the numbers. The minimum wage here has gone up, and our youth unemployment has been going down since its peak in roughly July 2016. We're seeing those improvements. We're also seeing that our youth unemployment trends very closely matched what was happening with Saskatchewan around the same time, leading me to posit that it was more to do with the global collapse in the price of oil and the overall recession than any specific impacts from a minimum wage increase given the fact that Saskatchewan even now has higher youth unemployment than Alberta does but did not make changes to their minimum wage.

This policy of having a youth job-creating wage: I have not heard the members opposite provide any proof of how this will create new jobs or any studies showing that it has created new jobs in other jurisdictions. In fact, Ontario, where we are modelling this after, although not completely, as the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar pointed out, has youth unemployment higher than the national average. This solution has not solved the problem in Ontario, yet we are bringing it to Alberta, where it will introduce other problems, other problems like I've talked about. Let's touch on a few more: the fact that many youth are working to support themselves and their families. We know that the Premier has told the story many times of the youth he met at a gas station in Hardisty who was working to support his family. That youth would get $2 less an hour under this government's policies, and I fail to see how that will help that youth and his family.

With all this being said, Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak to Bill 2 and share my thoughts with the Assembly. Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available for a brief question or comment. I see the hon. Minister of Labour and Immigration rising.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Also, I'd like to thank the Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods for her comments. I would like to just make a couple of comments in regard to talking about, first of all, the youth minimum wage and the red tape associated with it. I agree with the Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods that if you asked an economist for a point of view, you can get three, all from the same economist. There is some debate in terms of the impact.

However, as we look at the general trend and most of the economists who are looking at this type of issue in terms of the impact of the minimum wage, it often has to do with the scope and size of the change and what the conditions are around it. I agree that these items are complex. As has been indicated before, the change in the minimum wage made by the previous government was significant, nearly 50 per cent, and in the context of one of the worst recessions we've had in the Alberta economy.

Quite frankly, there is an impact. We've seen from studies and we're told that there was an actual impact on the minimum wage associated with that. The member opposite also indicated the $2 differential. I also heard some concerns raised earlier by other members saying that this change in the minimum wage will actually result in a $2 decrease for people currently working. I just want to reiterate, Mr. Speaker, that the minimum is just that, a minimum. Employers can choose to pay workers more. In fact, many do. In fact, a number of employers have indicated that they will continue to pay $15 an hour, and this makes sense. When you actually hire an employee and you train them and they become more productive, you want to hold on to them. It costs money to hire. It costs money to train.

That's why we are focused on getting our youth to work – right? – by reducing the minimum wage so that we can get them on this job ladder. The job ladder: once they get into the workforce, they can actually gain some experience in the marketplace. Then they perhaps either stay with that employer, or they have the option to move elsewhere, and they can actually, with that experience, continue to increase their earnings. This is not about a cut to those individuals who are helping their families. This is not about a cut for those currently working. This is about creating more opportunities for youth who don't have opportunities, and we have a very large number, thousands and thousands of Albertan youth who need to get their jobs back.

The last comment I would like to make, Mr. Speaker, is in regard to red tape. The hon. member, you know, indicated that she held consultations with employers and that with holiday pay some of the calculations were burdensome. I understand that. Some changes were made to address that from the eligibility standpoint. Also, my understanding is that some changes were made in terms of how the payment was actually done. We're not suggesting any changes to the pay, but what we are suggesting is going back to the previous general holiday.

Again, a minimum is just that, a minimum. If an employer finds it too complicated with their systems to do that, then they don't have to do that. But, in fact, what we heard from a number of employers, particularly in the restaurant industry, is that the general holiday pay on a nonstandard workday where the restaurant was closed resulted in thousands of dollars in additional costs. What did they do about this? They told us what they did. They laid off staff, or they reduced hours, and the people who were most negatively affected were our youth. That's why we're making this change to the general holiday. But, again, a minimum is just that, a minimum. Employers aren't required to do that.

The last comment I'd like to make in terms of talking about red tape: the hon. member mentioned that in 1998 under Ralph Klein they actually eliminated the youth employment wage and that part of the reason was the complication. Well, I would suggest to the hon. member that HR systems have become far more sophisticated since that point in time and far easier. Again, quite frankly, I would reiterate, Mr. Speaker, that when we actually talked to employers in Ontario, they have systems in place. Their HR systems can manage this and manage this fairly seamlessly without significant cost. We have the ability to do the same.

We're talking about red tape, and we're talking about these changes, and what this is really about is getting Albertans back to work and getting our youth back to work. This is why we're focused on making these changes, because we firmly believe – and this is why Bill 2, our open for business act, and these particular areas we're focused on are getting Albertans back to work. Even if it creates just a little bit of red tape, we think our Alberta youth are worth it.

Thank you very much.

The Speaker: Well, hon. members, I would never ever, ever want to presuppose a decision of the Assembly, but my Speaker senses are at peak Speaker senses, and I have the sense that we might be getting closer to the end of what I think we can all agree has been the longest day of our lives given that, technically speaking, it's still yesterday. I hope that hon. members would just join me in thanking the table officers as well as our pages and, in particular, the LASS security staff and the hardest working man in politics at the Hansard controls today, Roger. Thank you so much to everyone for all your help.

I see the hon. Government House Leader is rising to move a motion.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm actually going to rise on two unanimous consent motions. Like you, I sense something though I don't know what Speaker senses are. Maybe you have to be elected Speaker before you get those. But I do sense that the opposition is near to wanting to test the House to see if their 24 hours now of hard work has changed anybody's mind. For one, my mind has not been changed. In fact, my resolve to support Bill 2 is even stronger now after 24 hours. But I don't want to prejudice the rest of the Chamber nor delay the opposition in that opportunity to be able to see the results of their hard work here shortly.

First, I will move for unanimous consent to move to one-minute bells for the amendment that is before the House and for second reading of Bill 2.

The Speaker: Having heard the motion, it is a request for unanimous consent for one-minute bells for the hoist motion, and then, immediately following, the question on second reading will be put to the Assembly, depending on the results of the first motion.

7:30 p.m.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. One other motion. As members of this House are no doubt aware, most members of Executive Council have a meeting on Monday, June 10, with First Nation chiefs, which presents a conflict with Oral Question Period at 1:50 p.m. on that day. Therefore, to give the opportunity for private members of this Assembly to decide whether they want better access to the Premier and cabinet for question period or not, I would like to ask for unanimous consent to waive Standing Orders 3(1), 7(1), 7(1.1) to allow the Assembly to meet on Monday, June 10, from 11 a.m. to noon in addition to normal sitting hours and, furthermore, to commence the ordinary daily Routine business at 11 a.m. on that Monday morning with Oral Question Period to commence at 11 a.m. and to suspend Standing Order 7(1.1) in order to begin Monday's sitting at 11 a.m. with a 50-minute Oral Question Period.

The Speaker: Hon. members, for clarity's sake, this is not a motion; this is a request for unanimous consent.

[Unanimous consent denied]

The Speaker: We are on the hoist motion. That is HA. Are there any members wishing to speak to the motion? Seeing none.

[The voice vote indicated that the motion on amendment HA lost]

[Several members rose calling for a division. The division bell was rung at 7:32 p.m.]

[One minute having elapsed, the Assembly divided]

[The Speaker in the chair]

[Motion carried; Bill 2 read a second time]

The Speaker: I see the hon. Government House Leader rising.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Twenty-four hours after that conversation started, we got progress. I'm always happy to see progress. It doesn't matter how we get it as long as we get it.

First of all, I'd just like to thank all the House for their hard work over the last 24 hours and, as you said, Mr. Speaker, through you to all of the LAO staff who have been along with us for the last 24 hours. I wish all members a great weekend.

As such, I will move to adjourn the House until Monday at 1:30 p.m.

The Speaker: Prior to the motion, as I speculate we will have a positive result, please, Members, I implore you to travel home safely. I would recommend that you stay the night. Your family wants you to arrive, so please govern yourselves accordingly.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 7:43 p.m. on Thursday]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Monday, June 10, 2019

Prayers

The Speaker: Hon. members, the prayer. Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and her government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideas but, laying aside all private interests and prejudice, keep in mind the responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all. Amen.

Hon. members, ladies and gentlemen, we will now be led in the singing of our national anthem by R.J. Chambers. I invite you to participate in the language of your choice.

Hon. Members:

O Canada, our home and native land!
True patriot love in all of us command.
Car ton bras sait porter l'épée,
Il sait porter la croix!
Ton histoire est une épopée
Des plus brillants exploits.
God keep our land glorious and free!
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.

The Speaker: Please be seated.

Hon. members, I might just congratulate you on the stirring rendition of O Canada. I'm not sure if it was for the Canadian women's soccer game versus Cameroon, started just half an hour ago, or perhaps game 5 of the Raptors' series tonight. Either way, I'm sure all of the teams would have been impressed with your singing efforts.

Introduction of Visitors

The Speaker: In the Speaker's gallery this afternoon I'm very pleased to welcome a familiar face back to the Legislative Assembly, the former MLA for Dunvegan-Central Peace-Notley and former Minister of Energy Ms Marg McCuaig-Boyd. I'd invite you to rise. [some applause]

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Hon. members, I ask that you keep your applause till the end. Visiting us today all the way from the constituency of Spruce Grove-Stony Plain, please join me in welcoming a School at the Legislature group, Stony Plain Central school. Also joining us are Taleesha Thorogood – I'm not sure if these guests have made it yet or not – and Andrew House. Also in the galleries this afternoon as guests of the hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul: Brenda Rosychuk, Jennifer Muirhead, Johanna Green, and Julie Kelndorfer.

Thank you very much for joining us.

Members' Statements

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley.

National Public Service Week

Mr. Loewen: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. In 1992 National Public Service Week was created following the passage of the serving Canadians better act. Its objective was to recognize the value of the services performed by public service employees and to recognize their contribution. Today marks the start of National Public Service Week, an opportunity to recognize all public servants across Canada for their contributions to the well-being of all Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, we are fortunate to have a high-quality public service that is professional, nonpartisan, and trustworthy. Every day our public servants take great pride in delivering a variety of services that support the work of our government and meet the needs of Albertans in their day-to-day lives. Their objective is to do this efficiently and effectively while committing to core public service of Canada values, which are integrity, dedication, and excellence.

Here in Alberta the public service is committed to continuous improvement to better serve our province and fellow citizens. They make a difference in the lives of Albertans every day. From keeping us safe to improving health care and inventing new life-changing products and technologies, our public servants truly serve the public.

National Public Service Week was designed to promote pride in and recognition of the public service of Canada by providing internal recognition and by raising Canadians' awareness of the excellence of the public service. Our new government shares their commitment and their passion for helping the people of this province, for doing everything we can to provide Albertans with optimal economic opportunities and public services.

In 2019 National Public Service Week will take place from June 9 to 15. During this time I encourage all Albertans to join me in extending our appreciation and thanks to all public servants for their important contributions to our country. I look forward to what we will accomplish as we work together to get Alberta back to work, to stand up for our province's right to control our economic destiny, and to make life better for all Albertans.

Thank you.

Legislative and Social Change

Mr. Dang: Mr. Speaker, last week the Minister of Infrastructure said that P3 projects had been adopted all over the world before I was even born. Not only was this deeply offensive to me, but this was deeply offensive to young Albertans across this province.

But let's talk about things that happened before I was born, on April 7, 1995. Mr. Speaker, before I was born, people with disabilities weren't even allowed to vote. Before I was even born, women weren't allowed to vote. Before I was even born, there was no free trade deal between Canada and the United States. Before I was even born, Alberta used to sterilize people the government deemed disabled. Before I was even born, gays weren't allowed to marry in Canada. Before I was even born, Chinese people wishing to immigrate to Canada had to pay a head tax. Before I was even born, owning another person as property was legal in British North America. Before I was even born, it was normal to round up First Nations people and place them in residential schools. Before I was even born, teachers had to quit their jobs if they got pregnant.

Clearly, Mr. Speaker, a lot has changed since I was born. A lot has changed for the better because of dedicated people in buildings like this fighting to make their communities better. The minister should be ashamed of what he said in this House last week. Young people like myself will continue to fight for a better future for ourselves. A lot has changed since I was born; a lot has changed for the better. While the government chooses to sling insults and throw mud, our NDP opposition will continue to stand up for all Albertans. I will always fight against this government turning back the clock on progress.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul.

Mr. Hanson: I'll try my best to follow that one, Mr. Speaker.

MS Society Lakeland Regional Office

Mr. Hanson: Canada has one of the highest rates of multiple sclerosis in the world. Here in Alberta we have among the highest rates in the country. On average, 11 Canadians are diagnosed with MS every day. MS is a chronic disease of the central nervous system affecting vision, memory, balance, and mobility, and women are three times more likely to be diagnosed than men. Sixty per cent of adults diagnosed are between the ages of 20 and 49 years.

Alberta is recognized as an international leader in MS research. Since 1948 the MS Society has funded over $175 million in MS research as they work toward new treatments, a better quality of life, and, ultimately, a cure. The MS Society offers programs and services for affected people and their families and advocates to improve life for Albertans affected.

I'd like to highlight the work of the society's Lakeland regional office. Based out of St. Paul, supported by their local staffperson Brenda Rosychuk and committed volunteers and led by the council chair, Jennifer Muirhead, both of whom are here today in the gallery, they support a vast area comprised of 65 towns and promote the importance of a healthy lifestyle and help to connect people to community wellness programs.

The St. Paul MS Walk, the community's signature event, began in 2008 with under 300 participants; 10 years later it had nearly 600. Since 2008 the event has raised over $1.75 million, with a significant portion coming from a team out of Bonnyville called MS Ain't Purdy. Originally captained by James Purdy, a young man with MS, the torch has since been taken up by his young son Griffin and daughter Stella. In four years as captain 11-year-old Griffin raised over $60,000, adding to their total of half a million dollars. MS Ain't Purdy was the number one MS Walk team in Canada in 2014. The sheer magnitude of the St. Paul walk is incredible. On a per capita basis the St. Paul event far exceeds its much larger urban counterparts.

The MS Society's Lakeland regional office has been exemplary, and it's my honour and pleasure to salute their efforts today.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Stony Plain.

Pride Month

Mr. Turton: Yes. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This month we acknowledge those brave Albertans who fought hard for their LGBTQ2S-plus rights. All Albertans deserve the freedom to be true to themselves regardless of race, religion, or sexual orientation. While we have so much to celebrate, we also have a great distance to go before everyone in this country is treated equally.

Pride month is an opportunity to celebrate our shared belief in unity and diversity. It's also a good occasion to show gratitude for the many successes and contributions of Albertans who identify from our LGBTQ2S-plus community. All human beings are equal in value and dignity and deserve respect. Individuals of different perspectives must respect each other and value one another as fellow human beings. No one should deny the dignity or freedom of those Canadians that seek to make our country a better place to live.

I personally look forward to attending both the crosswalk painting planned for June 22 in Stony Plain and the Pride at the Centre celebration, to be held in the Multicultural Heritage Centre on June 15. Both of these events are opportunities for the communities of both Spruce Grove and Stony Plain to celebrate our diversity and rally together as a community.

With kindness and understanding, I wish all people in this province a pride month full of support, love, and respect.

Thank you.

Mobile-home Owner Consumer Protection

Mr. Carson: Mr. Speaker, there is a crisis threatening the over 30,000 Albertans who live in mobile-home communities across our province. For years homeowners have come to me with stories of sky-high lot rents and unaccountable management bodies. People are being priced out of their own homes because they can't afford to pay lot fees, which climb to upwards of $1,000 a month. In many cases these lot rents have become higher than the mortgage payments for the homes themselves.

With rising fees, homeowners are looking to hold management companies accountable to manage the basic infrastructure of their community, which is only fair. Unfortunately, this is not happening. I've heard from seniors trapped in their homes because snow and ice aren't being cleared, and those who try to make that trip: many of them are injured from falls. Simply put, mobile-home owners are looking for the same protections that are provided to others under the Residential Tenancies Act, and they want this government to take action.

Unfortunately, for years the needs of mobile-home owners have been ignored, and for decades Conservatives have let everyday people fall behind while big corporations and the wealthy got ahead at their expense. Now they want to double down on that legacy, with big cuts to the services we depend on. Albertans deserve better from their government.

Our caucus will continue to push for changes to the Mobile Home Sites Tenancies Act that would provide additional powers to residents and new remedial measures for tenants. We call on this government to do the right thing and take action for the many people who are falling through the cracks in these communities.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Lac La Biche.

Pride Shabbat Dinner in Edmonton

Ms Goodridge: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm honoured to rise today to share with the members of this Assembly an event that I and a few of my colleagues attended on Friday, the annual Edmonton Pride Shabbat. This special event, hosted by the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee, and the Jewish Federation of Edmonton, served as a kickoff to pride month and provided an opportunity to come together with both the Jewish and LGBTQ2S-plus communities. Pride Shabbat lets us celebrate both our diversity and our individuality. The organizers of this event believe it is important to demonstrate respect and inclusion for members of the LGBTQ2S-plus community, and I am proud to stand with them. I would also mention that this was my first Shabbat dinner, and it did not disappoint.

I believe that everyone in this Assembly will agree that discrimination is wrong in whatever form it may take. Previous members of this Assembly believed that as well and passed the Alberta Human Rights Act as a way to combat discrimination. We as legislators need to build on that legacy and ensure that we make Alberta a more fair and inclusive province. Discrimination based on sex, sexual orientation, race, marital status, gender identity or expression, creed, age, colour, disability, political or religious beliefs is never acceptable. Unfortunately, there are still far too many situations where these human rights are being infringed upon. Our province and our society are still hurt by instances of anti-Semitism, homophobia, and transphobia. We must do better.

Events like the Edmonton Pride Shabbat that I attended offer an opportunity to celebrate the progress that's been made and demonstrate our commitment to the work that's needed to eliminate discrimination. Our United Conservative government stands together condemning discrimination. We welcome all Albertans regardless of whom they love or how they pray. It was an honour to be invited to attend this Shabbat dinner, and I encourage all members to join me in attending pride events throughout the month of June.

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning has a tabling.

Ms Sweet: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to table the requisite number of copies of the expenditures and tax multipliers from Prime Minister Stephen Harper's 2009 budget. The formal analysis presented by the economist and former Prime Minister clearly demonstrates that corporate income tax cuts are the least effective means to drive economic growth.

I also have a tabling, with the requisite number of copies, of Public Health and Public Order Outcomes Associated with Supervised Drug Consumption [Sites]: A Systematic Review.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for St. Albert is rising to table a document.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I've the requisite number of copies of an article by St. Albert Today, powered by the St. Albert Gazette: Minimum Wage Rollback Worries Youth Committee.

Thank you.

Tablings to the Clerk

The Clerk: I wish to advise the Assembly that the following documents were deposited with the office of the Clerk: on behalf of the hon. Mr. Toews, President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance, pursuant to the Insurance Act the Automobile Insurance Rate Board 2018 annual report; pursuant to the Alberta Capital Finance Authority Act the Alberta Capital Finance Authority annual report 2018.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Education Funding

Ms Hoffman: Thank you. Mr. Speaker, 1,800 additional students, 220 fewer teachers: that's the math confronting the Calgary board of education because this government won't fund classrooms properly. I met with the head of the ATA local 38 this weekend, and he warned that class sizes will increase and that students will certainly suffer. To the Minister of Education: is it that you're ineffective at your job, or is it that you just don't care?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance is rising to answer.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our government's commitment to education funding has been clear, and I'm pleased to confirm today that proposed enrolment growth will be fully funded for this upcoming year. Alberta's families and students depend on this government to ensure that a high quality of education is delivered, and that's what we're going to do.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the first answer to the question that I've asked about 10 times. It's nice to hear that the growth for the more than 1,800 new students for the Calgary board of education will actually be funded. I think I heard that for the first time in this House. Thank you very much to the government for actually saying that for the first time.

What about feeding the hungry kids, what about the classroom improvement fund – will CIF and will the school nutrition program be funded, or are kids going to go to school hungry? – and will classrooms continue to be overcrowded, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, again, our government is fully committed and will ensure that students' needs are taken care of. We're committed to a high quality of education in this province. We have committed to maintain school funding and, in fact, to fully fund increased enrolment. We will ensure that Alberta students have a world-class education.

Ms Hoffman: Fully funding increased enrolment: kudos for saying that for the first time. We asked that over and over and over again in the election; there was silence. We asked it at least 10 times in the House; there was silence. We are glad to see that you've listened to us and to the advocacy that parents and teachers have been doing over the last several months. Kudos on that.

What about the hungry kids that are showing up to school, Mr. Speaker? The I think it was over 4,400 kids that are being fed a nutritious school lunch because this government, the NDP government, invested in them: is the government opposite going to let kids go to school hungry, or will you continue with that program and grow it so that hungry kids across our province have the opportunity to be nourished and focused on their educational needs, or will that be cut?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, again, we are fully committed to ensuring that this government delivers a world-class education system to Albertan families and to Albertan students. We're committed to ensuring that Alberta students' needs are met.

I just want to point out that we're, maybe more importantly, implementing economic policies in this province that will ensure that we have a sustainable education system in the future, something that the members opposite could not and did not do during their term in office.

LGBTQ2S-plus Rights

Member Irwin: Yesterday students in Calgary organized a rally to protest this government's plans to take away LGBTQ rights. Last week people gathered in Edmonton to protest this government's unwillingness to take the harmful practice of conversion therapy seriously. Protesters even attended the government's raising of the pride flag on Friday. For the record, simply raising a flag does not make you an ally. To the Premier: can you explain why you or any of your ministers are claiming to be allies when we know the changes that you are bringing in will traumatize the LGBTQ2S-plus population?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, many of our members attended the raising of the pride flag here on our Legislature Grounds. It was an honour for them to do that. One of our particular ministers talked about his daughter and her wife and talked about their child and how important it is for us here in Alberta to make sure that we have an inclusive Alberta here for all Albertans. I personally am looking forward to going to pride events across Alberta, like I have historically.

Member Irwin: Protestors at the flag raising Friday carried signs that said: LGBTQ rights are human rights, and you cannot attack our rights and raise a flag. The culture minister told media that the flag represents a commitment from government to support all Albertans. She added: love is love. I agree. I'm going to give any minister here today a chance to break ranks with this Premier, who is rapidly rolling back the rights of youth to establish gay-straight alliances. To those ministers: will you stand in support of keeping the current GSA laws in place?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, our government is committed to making sure that Alberta has the strongest gay-straight alliance provisions in all of Canada. We've been clear on that from day one. We've been clear on that in the campaign. We're not here to divide Albertans; we're here to make sure that all Albertans are free to live their lives as they choose. That is a commitment from us, to make sure that all Albertans can live with freedom.

Member Irwin: Then why change the legislation? Two months ago on the campaign trail the Premier told reporters, quote: we just don't get distracted by issues that voters aren't talking about. He said this when asked specifically about gay-straight alliances. Yet now, in its first legislative session, this government has introduced a bill, Bill 8, that does nothing to modernize schools but does everything to destroy gay-straight alliances. To the Premier: if you don't get distracted by GSAs, then why is it such a high priority for you to destroy them?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, as I already noted, we support making sure that we have the strongest protections for gay-straight alliances in all of Canada. All of Canada. We should be celebrating the fact that both parties represented in this Chamber support the fact that we should have the strongest protections for gay-straight alliances in all of Canada. It's a day to be celebrated, not dividing Albertans.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Budget 2019 Revenue Forecasts

Ms Phillips: Last week the Premier attempted to sell his favourite stenographer at the Calgary Sun a tall tale about the budget. Now, I'm not surprised that there's a hole in the budget. The Premier himself put it there. A tax giveaway to his wealthy friends? That'll cost us $4.5 billion. Cancelling oil-by-rail contracts? Kiss another $2 billion in revenue goodbye. To the Premier: won't you admit that instead of a path to balance, you're on a path to baloney?

The Speaker: I'm not entirely sure about the use of the word "baloney," but perhaps I'll get back to the member and determine whether that was parliamentary or not.

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, it's been clear as we have looked into the province's books and as we're starting to move forward with our budget plan, that we'll be introducing this fall, that in fact we are inheriting a fiscal mess from the members opposite when they were in government. In fact, the revenues that were overstated during their time have meant that we're having to grapple with increased challenges here in this province. One thing I will say is that we are absolutely committed to delivering high-quality . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Provincial budgets are audited, and they're developed by public service officials based on private-sector revenue forecasts. When the Premier peddles poppycock to his favourite propagandists, he insults the officials who work tirelessly on the budget, yet he continues to keep those officials among his key advisers. Ray Gilmour, the Premier's Deputy Minister of Executive Council, would have had a hand in the budget, for example. Is this government accusing Mr. Gilmour and hundreds of other Treasury and Finance officials of not telling the truth? Sure sounds like it.

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, the senior staff in our departments are of the highest quality and highest calibre. I will remind the members opposite again that we have inherited a fiscal mess brought on by irresponsible decisions by the previous government. We're committed to deliver high-quality services to Albertans and to be fiscally responsible, which is what Albertans expect from this government. They expect that we won't spend their children's inheritance.

Ms Phillips: Mr. Speaker, this is a cynical ploy to buy cover to stop feeding kids and bring in credit card medicine. Six and a half billion dollars and counting cut from the revenues: no wonder the forecasts don't add up. And who pays the price? Kids, the elderly, the sick, and even the truth. To the Premier: will you admit that while we aren't cooking any meals for low-income children, you sure are cooking the books?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, the members opposite, when they were in government, had this province on a trajectory for a hundred billion dollars of accumulated debt. On that trajectory we could not provide a world-class education system or a world-class health care system. We are committed to creating a business environment that will attract investment, create jobs and opportunities, and sustain government revenue used for the people of this province. [interjections]

The Speaker: I might just hope that we could hear some answers. Whether or not you like the answer is neither here nor there, but I think it's reasonable that the Speaker should be able to hear it.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Job Creation

Mr. Bilous: Mr. Speaker, this UCP government ran on a promise to create jobs, but new figures released by StatsCan on Friday show that we lost more than 21,000 full-time jobs in May, the first month of this government's mandate. Now we see the Premier attempting to misdirect Albertans about the provincial budget. He's looking for scapegoats because he hasn't done a thing to support job growth. To the Minister of Finance: when will we actually see jobs gained, or is your so-called spring of renewal actually a spring of rhetoric?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, as all Albertans know, the election took place on April 16. Job numbers in May really, quite frankly, are an inheritance from the previous government's economic realities, the mess that they left us from their term in government. Again, we're committed to implementing policies that will attract investment, create opportunities for all Albertans, create great job opportunities for every Albertan.

Mr. Bilous: Blame us if they're bad; take credit yourself if they're good. I get it.

Not only is this government not creating jobs, but they're literally picking the pockets of workers. We know that their so-called open-for-business bill stands to take thousands out of people's pockets, and it will hit our oil and gas and construction sectors particularly hard. Those very same sectors were among the ones that saw job losses in May. Can the same minister explain to Albertans how either losing their jobs or taking a pay cut is part of their plan to open Alberta for business?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Labour and Immigration is rising to answer.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. Our focus, as mentioned by the Minister of Finance, is the creation of jobs. Bill 2 is actually to get Albertans back to work, and we have a series of measures to do that, including changes to banked overtime, general holidays, and youth minimum wage, to get Albertans back to work. That's what we were elected to do, and that's what we will do. You will see a change over time as our policies take effect.

Thank you very much.

Mr. Bilous: Yes. You'll see less pay for the same work. Good strategy, minister.

This UCP government has put all of their support behind a risky corporate tax cut, that has literally bankrupted other jurisdictions. We know that corporate tax cuts won't generate a dime of economic activity for at least two years. That's not me talking, Mr. Speaker. That's, rather, the UCP's own election platform. To the minister: how many more jobs will we stand to lose while we wait years for your apparent plan to get in gear?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, we were very proud to implement the job creation corporate tax cut, which will bring our corporate tax rates from 12 to 8 per cent within three years. It will make Alberta one of the most competitive jurisdictions in North America and, by far, the most competitive jurisdiction in Canada. It will attract investment. In fact, senior economists, reputable economists have suggested that it will create over $12 billion of economic activity and 55,000 additional jobs for Albertans.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Drumheller-Stettler.

Mr. Horner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This question is for the hon. Minister of Labour and Immigration. Canada's Labour Force Survey of May 2019, released Friday, shows that the unemployment rate in Alberta remains stable at 6.7 per cent while the national rate has dropped to 5.4 per cent. This shows that while Alberta's economy has become stagnant, elsewhere in Canada the economy is humming. It is evident to me that other jurisdictions in Canada have adapted their regulations more effectively than our former government was able to do. What does the minister plan to do to help Albertans get back into the workforce?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the Member for Drumheller-Stettler for the question. The unemployment rate is far too high, and business investment continues to be down. We're working to change that by reducing red tape and tax burdens on job creators. We have introduced Bill 3, the job creation tax cut act, to reduce the corporate tax rate by a third over the next four years to attract investment and create thousands of new jobs. We've also introduced Bill 2, the open for business act, to reduce burdens on job creators by returning to the previous general holiday pay and banked overtime rules.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The Member for Drumheller-Stettler.

Mr. Horner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. minister. To the same minister. Given that Alberta has always been known as the land of opportunity, with the phrase "Alberta advantage" coming from a reputation of a strong industry which provided diverse career options with high-wage growth for all Albertans and attracted job seekers from across Canada, and given that job prospects have become significantly more scarce in recent years, what is the minister doing to ensure that Alberta remains the land of opportunity?

The Speaker: The Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Copping: Again, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you for the question. We are introducing a host of acts. We talked about some of them, Bill 2 and Bill 3. In particular, we're also taking action to help youth get jobs here in Alberta. We're addressing the youth unemployment crisis with a new job-creation wage of $13 an hour. The $15 per hour minimum wage resulted in young Albertans not being able to find work. This $15 minimum wage was introduced by the previous government. The new youth minimum wage will encourage job creators to hire Albertans and get them back to work.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Horner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. minister. Given that properly preparing our young people for the job market is a fundamental piece of a strong future economy and given that the youth unemployment rate is nearly twice that of the adult unemployment rate, leaving thousands of young people without essential, on-the-job training at the most important time for them to be shaping their careers, how does the minister plan to address this issue?

The Speaker: The minister.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, as I've already spoken to, we are introducing a youth job creation wage. In addition to the open for business act and the youth minimum wage, our government has passed legislation that scrapped the carbon tax and introduced legislation that reduces corporate tax and red tape. These changes will restore investor confidence, encourage entrepreneurs, and bring back the Alberta advantage. We also plan to introduce legislation to ensure fair access to regulated professions and trades for newcomers, and this legislation will ensure that registration certification processes are transparent, objective, and fair.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Election Commissioner Investigation of UCP 2017 Financial Contributions

Ms Ganley: Mr. Speaker, $77,250: that's the total of the fines now levied in the United Conservative Party kamikaze scandal. The Election Commissioner has been hard at work investigating the irregular financial contributions that emerged from the kamikaze campaign orchestrated by the Premier's staff. To the government: can anyone stand up and tell me that the Election Commissioner can count on you to provide the necessary resources and support to his office to complete his investigation?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, I just want to make sure that we reference in this House that I'd gladly talk about government business here. Time and time again we're getting politics brought into this Chamber, and to quote the second-tallest member of this Chamber, we get fear and smear brought into this Chamber all the time. There's a reason why they're on that side of the Chamber getting comfortable. We're going to be focusing on jobs, the economy, and pipelines.

Ms Ganley: Given, Mr. Speaker, that repeating someone's own words is not fear and smear and given that this UCP government has refused for over a month to appoint a special prosecutor and given that they have now admitted that a conflict of interest does in fact exist and a special prosecutor has been announced, can the Minister of Justice affirm to Albertans that no one in his government will interfere with the work of the Election Commissioner or change the election finance and contribution laws while he continues to investigate the kamikaze scandal?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, I reject the premise of the question. There is an independent process in Alberta for doing special prosecutors, an independent process with an independent RCMP investigation. We've been over this time and time again in this Chamber. We're going to be making sure on this side of the House that we're focused on jobs, the economy, and pipelines and on doing the job that 55 per cent of Albertans elected us to do.

Thank you.

Ms Ganley: Given, Mr. Speaker, that I think that the public expects us to be ethical, whether we're focused on jobs or not, and given that the Premier himself has tried to write off this scandal as idle Twitter gossip and given that for all we know, these fines are the tip of the iceberg, will the government commit to respecting the independence of the Election Commissioner and allowing him to do his work and to accepting the ruling of this independent office?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, first and foremost, I take issue with the hon. member referencing ethics. I'm not sure if they're questioning my ethics. I wasn't sure that the frame of reference around that was appropriate.

We're going to make sure that we continue to focus on funding the priorities of Albertans. They want us focusing on getting Albertans back to work. They don't want us relitigating stuff from the past. We're going to be making sure that we focus on getting Albertans back to work. [interjections]

Speaker's Ruling Parliamentary Language

The Speaker: Hon. members, I think it would not be appropriate to imply or to say, as I may or may not have heard: that's because you don't have ethics. It would be wildly unparliamentary, so I can't imagine that it actually happened from that side of the House.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning is rising with a question.

2:10 Supervised Drug Consumption Sites

Ms Sweet: Mr. Speaker, last week I was joined by families and survivors of addiction at the constituency office of the Minister of Health. These brave individuals went public with their concerns about this UCP government's plan to freeze funding for new supervised consumption sites. These sites have saved at least 2,400 lives. Kym Porter, a Medicine Hat mother who lost her son to an overdose in 2016, said that this Premier's decision is, and I will quote, akin to wilful murder. Can this government explain why you're refusing to listen to Kym and countless other survivors?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, as promised in our election platform, we'll be reviewing the proposals for any new sites before funding them. We also have made a commitment to spending a hundred million dollars for mental health and addictions here in the province of Alberta. We recognize that this should be something that should be dealt with by Health. It's a serious issue. We're going to make sure that we deal with it in a thoughtful way.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning is rising.

Ms Sweet: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that this Premier is for 2.0 and the sites have been cancelled in Ontario, we would like to see our government put more funding into ensuring the safety of people living in Alberta and around these supervised consumption sites, and given that the Minister of Health agreed to meet with some of these survivors that protested at his office on Friday but given that even after that meeting the survivors felt no more optimism and a family physician, Bonnie Larson, said the minister needs to get out of the way, to the Minister of Health: can you explain to Bonnie why you're still standing in her way?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to rise here today on behalf of the Minister of Health to speak to this matter. As that minister has mentioned many times, his door is always open. He's always open to listening to the concerns of Albertans and making sure that they bring it forward in a thoughtful manner. We're here, again, making sure that we deal with the root cause. We want to deal with addictions in a compassionate and thoughtful way. We've maintained our commitment to making sure that there's adequate funding and looking at the future potential sites in a way that we can look at it holistically.

Thank you.

Ms Sweet: Well, Mr. Speaker, given that part of the spectrum of addictions is actually safe consumption sites and we know that they save lives and given that the review was launched by the Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions with no details and given that we have no idea who's going to be involved in the review and what the scope is and how long it will take and given that all this makes these survivors wonder if this is purely a partisan smokescreen to again justify shutting down these supervised consumption sites, like in Ontario, to the minister: can you tell this House exactly who is conducting the review, and will you commit, again, that both Kym Porter and Bonnie Larson will be allowed on this panel?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, I can speak from my own personal experience in this. I was on the board of the Calgary Drug Treatment Court for over five years dealing with addictions, making sure that we provided services in a way that deals with it head-on. I would invite the minister – I'm not allowed to comment, apparently, about who is or is not in this Chamber, and I respect the practices of this House – and if there's a thoughtful way to deal with this, I know that he'd welcome that meeting.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Glenmore is rising with a question.

Energy Company Municipal Tax Payment

Ms Issik: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Due to the downturn in the energy sector and a series of NDP policies that piled onto Alberta's oil and gas industry, municipalities are finding it increasingly difficult to collect taxes from oil and gas properties in rural Alberta. After four years of NDP government many of these companies are in difficult financial situations and just aren't able to pay what they owe. To the Municipal Affairs minister: what is your advice to the rural municipalities who are needing to collect these taxes?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. Government understands that this is a pressing issue for our rural municipalities and our oil and gas companies. Upon taking office, I immediately prioritized getting all of the stakeholders to the table, including the Rural Municipalities of Alberta and representatives from all oil and gas industries. Right now we are working on finding solutions that strike the right balance between the financial needs of our municipalities and the viability of the oil and gas sector.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Glenmore.

Ms Issik: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that rural municipalities are counting on these taxes to support their local budgets and given that I've heard from some of my hon. colleagues that many municipalities are asking residential taxpayers to cover the shortfall and given that many municipal leaders are wondering how this situation got to where it is, can the minister illuminate on why some oil and gas companies who operate in rural Alberta are finding it difficult to meet their tax obligations?

The Speaker: The Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member again for the question. It is no secret that many of these companies are facing insolvency or receivership. If these companies go under like Trident Exploration did, municipalities would get no taxes, landowners would get no lease payments, and the orphan well fund would be that much more strained. We aren't going to let that happen, which is why we have made this issue a priority and have committed to finding balanced solutions that benefit all parties involved.

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-Glenmore has her last question.

Ms Issik: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs for the answers. Given that municipalities provide vital services to Albertans like street cleaning, snow removal, and waste-water and waste management and given the urgency and severity of the situation, what steps is the government taking to ease the short-term burden on affected municipalities while they wait for the long-term solutions to materialize?

The Speaker: The Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. We understand the urgency of this issue, which is why we immediately made it a priority. We are working with groups like the Rural Municipalities of Alberta and the Urban Municipalities Association to find the right solutions for all the parties involved. We are making life better for the energy industry and for the municipalities by eliminating red tape, cutting taxes, and creating jobs in every community, all things that the NDP failed to do in the last four years. We want to see our oil and gas sector succeed, and we want to see our rural municipalities succeed as well.

Oil Sands Emissions Provincial Control of Natural Resources

Mr. Schmidt: Well, Mr. Speaker, we managed to convince the government to fund for enrolment; hopefully, we can get some action on climate change, too. Our government's climate change plan legislated a 100-megatonne cap on oil sands emissions, but now the Premier and party officials aren't sending clear signals about whether or not that emissions cap will remain in place. Can anyone on the front bench tell us whether or not they intend to keep the emissions cap in place?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance is rising.

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, thank you, through you, to the member opposite for that question. We're committed to ensure that this government takes concrete steps to reduce carbon emissions in this province. We do have and we will be implementing a program that will target our heavy emitters, basically targeting 60 per cent of the emissions in this province. We're working at rolling that plan out, and we're confident that Albertans will support it.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, Mr. Speaker, it sounds like uncertainty is still the watchword when it comes to the 100-megatonne cap on emissions.

Given that our government consulted extensively with industry, can anybody on the front bench tell us whether or not they're going to consult with industry about the existence of this emissions cap, and if so, who will they be consulting with?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, we don't need a lecture from this NDP opposition on consultation. In the last election campaign, back in 2015, the carbon tax was not in their platform, yet they brought in the largest tax in Alberta history. I'm proud to know that Bill 1 has received royal assent and that gas prices at pumps across Alberta have dropped. We're receiving resounding feedback on our plan here. We're going to be focusing on jobs. We have a really credible environmental plan, as the Minister of Finance mentioned. We're going to keep working hard on Alberta's priorities.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, Mr. Speaker, I'm happy to give the member a lecture on climate change being real, human caused, and needing urgent action any time he likes.

Given that the oil and gas industry is mostly in situ and given that if Alberta removes the 100-megatonne cap on our oil sands industry, the federal government through Bill C-69 will then take control of our natural resources, can anybody on the front bench tell us how they intend to protect the constitutional right for Alberta to govern its own natural resources?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, we have been clear that if Bill C-48 and Bill C-69 go forward in their current form, we will be launching constitutional challenges to defend this province. We're going to defend Alberta. We're going to defend our constitutional rights to develop our natural resources. That's one of the reasons why Albertans elected us with 55 per cent of the vote, over a million votes. This is a historic mandate that we have, the most detailed platform in Alberta history. That's what we were elected on. That's what we're going to keep our focus on.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Minimum Wage for Youth

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Unfair: that's how many young workers are describing this Premier's plan to gut their wages. But if this government won't listen to them, perhaps it will take some advice from the late Premier Ralph Klein. In 1998 Klein's government eliminated the student youth wage because it was unfair to young people and, quote: a fair day's work deserves a fair day's wage. To the minister: can you tell us which Premier was right? Yours or Ralph Klein?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Labour and Immigration is rising to answer.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The student job-creation wage is just that; it's about creating jobs for Alberta's youth. When other provinces have abolished or decreased the differential of their youth minimum wages, it has been shown that this may have lowered employment rates 5 to 10 per cent for 15- to 16-year-olds. The previous government created a crisis, a youth job crisis, and our youth minimum wage is focused on fixing that. It is fair to get Alberta's youth back to work.

Ms Gray: Given that this Premier campaigned frequently alongside well-funded lobbyists and given that it was Restaurants Canada Vice-president Mark von Schellwitz himself that argued in 1998 to Klein that the youth student wage should be even lower than it was at the time – credit to Premier Klein, who ignored those calls and actually increased wages for youth – again to the minister: will you wisely ignore the lobbyists, like the late Premier Klein did, and reverse your plan to gut wages for youth?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, again, this plan and Bill 2 are about getting all Albertans, including our youth, back to work. When the previous government increased the minimum wage and made changes to the general holidays, they significantly impacted job opportunities in a number of industries, including the restaurant industry. I heard from restaurateurs, even as early as today, who indicated that with the changes that are coming, not only will it reduce their costs, but they will be able to hire more youth.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods on her second supplemental.

Ms Gray: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the dire predictions made by Restaurants Canada VP Mark von Schellwitz in 1998 proved to be incorrect and given that we've already seen this government move against workers to appease restaurant lobbyists, to the minister: why won't you show the same leadership Premier Klein showed instead of bowing to your lobbyist friends?

The Speaker: The minister of labour.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As we have discussed in this House over the last week, the increase in the minimum wage actually drove thousands of Albertan youth out of the job market. This was not only demonstrated in theory but actually in practice. When businesses in Alberta were surveyed, they indicated they actually laid off youth, they actually laid off workers, and they reduced job opportunities. We are focused, through Bill 2 and the youth minimum wage, to create jobs for Albertans and get our youth back working.

Thank you.

Farm and Ranch Worker Legislation

Mr. Rowswell: Mr. Speaker, in 2015 the previous government passed Bill 6. This poorly crafted piece of legislation has forced farmers into a Workers' Compensation Board regime and a series of workplace safety rules that do little to protect farm workers and add pointless red tape that further complicates an already difficult job. In our election platform our government swore to launch consultations with farmers and ranchers to replace Bill 6 with better legislation. Can the minister of labour tell us if he has started these consultations?

The Speaker: The Minister of Labour and Immigration is rising.

Mr. Copping: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster-Wainwright for the question. As indicated, we made a commitment in our platform that we would replace Bill 6 with the farm freedom and safety act. In our platform we also promised to consult with farmers and ranchers before we did that. Their input will help us develop new rules that work for farms and ranches alike. The new laws will balance the unique needs of farmers and ranchers with the need for a common-sense, flexible farm regime. We will commence that this summer.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster-Wainwright.

Mr. Rowswell: Thank you, Minister, and thank you, Mr. Speaker. For the Minister of Labour and Immigration. Given that under the current law farmers are forced to pay for Workers' Compensation Board coverage even if they already provided private insurance that offered better coverage and given that this is one of the largest complaints that I've heard about Bill 6, can the minister confirm or deny if our replacement to Bill 6 will allow farmers to choose to provide private insurance instead of that forced upon them by the previous government?

The Speaker: The Minister for Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. WCB coverage is only mandatory on farms and ranches that have waged, nonfamily workers. Family members are exempt. A producer may voluntarily have WCB coverage for family members, but it's not mandatory. As we promised in our platform, we will replace Bill 6 with the farm freedom and safety act. One part of that is giving farmers the choice of WCB insurance or getting workplace insurance from the private sector. I can tell the hon. member that my ministry is in discussion with both the WCB and private insurance companies about options for farmers and ranchers.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster-Wainwright.

Mr. Rowsell: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My question is for the minister of labour. Given that in 2015 the previous government did not consult with farmers before tabling Bill 6 and only began consultations after objections from both Albertans and the previous opposition and given that the secondary phase of Bill 6 did undergo consultations with Albertans before it was enacted, can the minister tell the House whether the government will hold new consultations for sections of the bill that the previous government actually held the necessary consultations with Albertans over?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Copping: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As previously indicated, in our platform we made a commitment that we would actually undertake consultation. We are undertaking that consultation this summer, and our expectation is that we will be in a position this fall to introduce the farm freedom and safety act.

Thank you very much.

Automobile Insurance Rates

Mr. Carson: Mr. Speaker, our NDP government took action to protect Albertans from car insurance rate increases of 10, 15 per cent, or even more. We put a 5 per cent cap in place in late 2017, and then extended it until this August. Any increase beyond 5 per cent would be devastating to Albertans who rely on their vehicles to go to work or pick up their kids. To the Minister of Finance: will you commit today to continuing to protect Albertans by leaving the 5 per cent cap in place?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, we are aware and have heard concerns about the cost of insurance. We've certainly heard concerns about the sustainability of our auto insurance sector right now. Our department is looking into options going forward. But one thing we're committed to is ensuring that we have a sustainable automobile insurance system going forward to ensure that Albertans can find cost-effective insurance for their vehicles.

The Speaker: The Member for Edmonton-West Henday.

Mr. Carson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the Insurance Bureau of Canada has said that it is, quote, "extremely well positioned with this new government," and given that the IBC has been calling for a lift on the cap, again, will this minister reject the calls of these companies, stand up for everyday Albertans, and maintain the 5 per cent cap?

Mr. Toews: Again, Mr. Speaker, this government is aware of the challenges facing the automobile insurance industry. We've been in discussion with officials. We are working with the industry on a claims-and-costs study to fully understand the issues at play and possible solutions going forward. We're listening to Albertans, and we're committed to finding the best solution going forward.

The Speaker: The Member for Edmonton-West Henday.

Mr. Carson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Unfortunately, in due course is just not good enough.

As I stated, the 5 per cent cap is due at the end of August and given that the Alberta economy is still recovering and many are still struggling to make ends meet, will the minister commit today to protect those Albertans and keep the 5 per cent cap in place?

Mr. Toews: Again, Mr. Speaker, we are aware of the challenges in the automobile insurance sector, and no decisions have been made at this point in time. But one thing we will commit to is consulting with Albertans, unlike the members opposite when they rammed through a carbon tax that they never consulted on during the election campaign, unlike the members opposite who rammed through Bill 6 without consulting farmers and ranchers. We're committed to responsible decisions, decisions that are best for Albertans.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

2:30 Public-private Partnerships and Seniors' Housing

Ms Sigurdson: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. The Premier has promised that his government will aggressively pursue public-private partnerships, or P3s, for infrastructure projects, including seniors' homes and lodges. But the previous Conservative government's P3 model was considered a mess by an independent review because of cost overruns, lengthy delays, and insufficient oversight and project management. To the Minister of Infrastructure. Seniors in Alberta need reliable housing. Why are you planning to create another harmful mess for them?

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, thank you to the member for asking that question. There are always pros and cons of every policy, but in this case it shouldn't be any surprise because we campaigned on that platform. It's our campaign commitment that we will pursue these P3s, but Albertans need not worry about P3s because we are going to review each project and whether that model suits that project or not and then make those decisions.

Ms Sigurdson: Well, certainly there are more cons, Mr. Speaker.

Given that in that same independent report companies said that the increasingly price competitive nature of the P3 model has resulted in diminishing returns that simply do not provide enough incentives for proponents to bid and given that those companies said that there would be more interest if the province shelved the P3 model and switched back to the government's traditional model, which our NDP government did, again to the minister: can you explain how this government will ensure seniors have the affordable housing they need?

The Speaker: The Minister of Infrastructure.

Mr. Panda: Thanks again, Mr. Speaker and to the member for that question. What the NDP government did is not a benchmark for me. Having said that . . .

Ms Philips: Is building housing for seniors? Building schools?

Mr. Panda: Absolutely. Building schools, building seniors' care facilities are a priority for this government.

We actually said that we will honour the capital project list, the list they proposed for the next four years. We said that we'll support those projects which are sustainable, which are going to get Albertans back to work, and we're going to honour that. That's what we'll do.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that P3s often result in higher than expected costs and given that companies often look to user fees to recover those costs and given that seniors often live on modest, fixed incomes, to the Minister of Seniors and Housing: will you commit to not increasing fees for seniors regarding the cost overruns, and if not, why not?

Mr. Glubish: Well, Mr. Speaker, you know, we take this matter very seriously. We understand that the affordability of housing is critical and is an issue for many Albertans. We thank the member opposite for the opportunity to talk about some of our platform commitments that we made during the campaign to ensure that there's access to affordable housing. One of the reasons why affordable housing is an issue is because there have been increasing cost burdens on home builders due to unnecessary red tape, and that is why our red tape reduction strategy is so critical and will help us to deliver . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Cross.

Mr. Amery: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last week this government passed a bill which effectively reduced minimum wage for students between the ages of 13 to 17 from a previous $15 to $13 per hour. Many students in this province have entered into contractual agreements with employers for which they expect to be paid $15 an hour, but now students will earn significantly less. This is an issue for students in my constituency and, undoubtedly, everywhere else in the province, where these students work very hard to save money for school and put food on their tables. To the Minister of Labour and Immigration: what do you say to these young Albertans? [interjections]

The Speaker: You are an excitable group.

The hon. Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the Member for Calgary-Cross for the question. If employees have existing contracts or are part of a union's collective agreement, those wage rates are fixed and the youth job-creation wage would not have any impact in those cases. But I want to reinforce that the youth job-creation wage is a minimum. It's a minimum wage, and some employers may choose to pay more than that. What the youth job creation does is give employers more of an incentive to hire more youth so we can get our youth back to work.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Cross.

Mr. Amery: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister for that thorough response. Given that these new policy changes will now take effect and given that this was previously brought up in Chamber by other members on both sides of this House, to the same minister: what will you say to the 500 youth workers who have entered into contracts with the Calgary Stampede, who are budgeting for the upcoming year on a $15 minimum wage, and now are at risk of earning less than anticipated?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and again thank you to the hon. member for the question. We actually had a chance to talk to Warren Connell of the Calgary Stampede about this, and this actually proves the point. He confirmed that any contracts entered into at $15 an hour were being maintained at that rate, and many employers are stating that they will continue to pay their youth $15 an hour. [interjections] As I mentioned previously, this is a minimum wage, and employers can choose to pay their employees more. What this is about is creating opportunities for thousands of youth who have no opportunities and cannot earn anything.

Thank you.

The Speaker: You would think the opposition, being so excited to hear the question, would also be excited to hear the answer.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Cross.

Mr. Amery: Thank you again, Mr. Speaker. Given that these policies will now reduce the minimum wage for students and given that this impact will be felt by students throughout this province and especially in lower income areas where students rely on these jobs to pay their bills, to the same minister: how can you say that the youth job-creation wage will help if youth are now going to earn much less than before and struggle to cover their basic necessities? How can they be expected to live on $13 an hour, sir?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. According to Statistics Canada the majority of youth are working part-time and attending school. If the youth are not in school and working full-time, they will receive the general minimum wage. We are committed to get Albertans of all ages back to work. The youth job-creation wage will encourage job creators to hire students for their first job and give youth the opportunity to gain experience and skills, get their foot in the door, and start working up the job ladder. Again, this is about creating opportunities for youth.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Lesser Slave Lake.

Northern Alberta Wildfire Evacuations

Mr. Rehn: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the Minister of Municipal Affairs. As you know, there are many people out of their homes throughout my riding and northern Alberta. While many wildfire evacuees have returned home, many others remain under mandatory evacuation order and continue to face challenges brought on from being evacuated from their homes and communities. These unlucky Albertans continue to be plagued by fear and uncertainty as wildfires continue to pose a threat to their communities. Can the minister update the House as to the status of the evacuations?

The Speaker: The Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the Member for Lesser Slave Lake. Our government is working hard to ensure that every Albertan under mandatory evacuation order is taken care of. We are happy to know that more than 6,000 residents evacuated during the wildfire have returned home. We owe a tremendous debt of gratitude to the first responders and emergency management staff who have protected human life throughout this ordeal. Wet, cooler weather has created favourable conditions for firefighters, and we are hopeful that more evacuees will begin to return home soon.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lesser Slave Lake.

Mr. Rehn: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and through you to the minister, thank you for that useful update. It's great news to know that more than 6,000 evacuees have returned home. Given that unfortunately there are still thousands of Albertans that remain away from their communities and livelihoods due to these evacuations and given that the number one question I hear from constituents is "When can I go home?," to the minister: can you please provide us with an update as to when these Albertans, like those from Wabasca and Bigstone Cree Nation, in my riding can expect to return home?

The Speaker: The Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We continue to do our part in Slave Lake to make this situation right for the evacuees, but given the hardship these mandatory evacuations can cause an individual and family – the wildfire situation in this province remains serious. Those under mandatory evacuation order must remain in safe conditions and in safe locations. We urge all Albertans to stay up to date on wildfire and emergency evacuation . . .

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Rehn: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, through you to the minister, thank you for that important update. I would like to take a quick moment to also thank all of the first responders and emergency management staff who have served to protect the lives and safety of my constituents.

Given that these evacuations are put in place to protect the safety of residents and given that being away from your home and livelihood can be a large burden both financially and on one's mental health, to the minister: what is the government doing to assist the wildfire evacuees through these difficult times?

The Speaker: The Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. The government understands the toll this has taken on the evacuees. We are doing everything in our power to make the situation much better. We are supporting evacuees who have met the right criteria with financial support, which will assist them with their day-to-day needs until they can go home. We are also helping with temporary food and shelter. We said that we would be there to support the evacuees through this difficult time, and that's exactly what our government is going to do.

The Speaker: Hon. members, in 30 seconds or less we will move to Orders of the Day. I encourage members that have other commitments to exit the Chamber in an expeditious manner.

Orders of the Day

Motions Other than Government Motions

The Speaker: I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview is rising to move Motion 503 on behalf of the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Crude-by-rail Contracts

503. Mr. Schmidt moved:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to honour the crude-by-rail contracts in order to move Alberta's oil to world markets, protect jobs, and support companies in the province's energy sector.

Mr. Bilous: Yes, Mr. Speaker. It's my honour to rise and speak in favour of this motion. I rise to move Motion 503.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Now, if it so pleases the Speaker, I will continue in my debate on this motion and encourage members to not only support this motion but also to engage in a dialogue. Madam Speaker, the reason that the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar is proposing this, quite frankly, is that we know that the Premier and Executive Council have had time to look at the numbers. In fact, earlier today my colleague referenced Ray Gilmour, the new deputy minister of Executive Council, who was a senior official under our government and very familiar with the contract. In fact, he had a hand in it.

Really, this contract does a couple of different things. We know that it's been very frustrating with the delays to the Trans Mountain pipeline. We know that we continue to experience other delays. In fact, line 3 was on track. I think it was a couple of weeks ago that we learned that that project going through the state of Minnesota is now delayed. These projects are absolutely critical to Alberta getting a fair price for our oil, Madam Speaker. When I say "Alberta," it's really Canada because Alberta is Canada's economic engine, and when we get such a discount for having a lack of market access, it hurts all Canadians, quite frankly. That's why we're proposing this motion.

The crude-by-rail contracts: I appreciate the fact that the members opposite during the election had said, "This sounds like a bad deal. We don't think we should continue on it," but now that Executive Council has had a chance to look at the details of the contracts, I hope that they see a couple of different things. One, what this does is that it's a release valve that will come into play very quickly here. I mean, back then it was a medium-term solution. Now it's an immediate-term solution, Madam Speaker, because the railcars would be coming onboard in July. We're talking about moving up to 130,000 barrels per day. That will reduce the differential, which will therefore help every energy producer in Alberta, in fact in western Canada, get a better price per barrel.

Is that the long-term solution? No, Madam Speaker. We said that from the get go. The long-term solution is pipelines. Pipelines are the safest mode of transport hands down, but what this government is doing and what this Premier is doing is telling the world that they will do nothing until a pipeline is built. Even if the federal government tomorrow came forward and said, "We approve the Trans Mountain pipeline," would oil flow tomorrow or the day after? No. It'll be years, so this was a solution that would ensure that our producers get a better price.

At the same time, Madam Speaker, the line of reasoning that the Premier uses, that this would happen on its own: well, the Premier is being a little naive, or he's not being forthright. If it would have already happened, then it would have happened a year ago, six months ago, two years ago. The fact of the matter is that there is capacity, and I know this because I was one of the people that sat down with the rail companies. There is capacity to put on more crude by rail, but they did not want to pay for it. They didn't want to take on the burden. For the government to take on these railcars – we did the numbers – actually, it would mean an increase to general revenue by $2.2 billion. I mean, I'm sure the opposite side would love to construe this as, "Of course, this is the NDP government being socialist," which is far from the truth. What this is ensuring that our producers get a fair price immediately. It reduces the differential. It moves up to 120,000 barrels per day, but it also means an increase in revenue. This is a profit-generating tool.

My frustration and the reason why I support this motion from the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar is that here is a solution that is under the nose of the current government. They just need to honour these contracts. It is not going to be a loss for the government or the people of Alberta; it's actually going to be a revenue generator. More importantly, it gets our product to market now. It doesn't mean waiting for the TMX to get built. As we've seen, there are always delays and unforeseen delays. Again, look at line 3 going through Minnesota.

This was a mid-term solution that this government has available at its disposal. I think it's a shame if they cancel these contracts.

Again, you know, saying that the private sector should just do it on their own: well, they're not. It's the same argument that is flawed as far as the programs to upgrade and refine more of our petrochemicals here in Alberta.

My question to the government is: if a flat tax is all that it took, then why are we building the first-ever propane-to-polypropylene facility in Canada? It doesn't exist. Nowhere do we upgrade propane. Why? That's a great question, Madam Speaker. The companies had said to us: you need to level the playing field, and investment will come to Alberta. There is a role for government. This is something that I can't seem to get through to the members on the opposite side.

In this case, those future royalty credits meant over $9 billion of investment today, thousands of jobs for men and women today. The crude by rail will mean jobs for Albertans today. It means a better price for our producers. We're standing up for the energy sector. We're standing with Albertan and Canadian energy companies, and I urge the members opposite to do the same.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other members wishing to speak to the motion? The hon. Member for Highwood.

Mr. Sigurdson: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise on behalf of this government to speak against this motion. I've been a business owner for about 12 years, and you're going to have to, you know, bear with me a bit. There are a lot of reasons I'm speaking out against this motion. There are a lot of red flags. Just bear with me.

Number one, being a business owner for so long, I think it's important to be clear that our government, pretty much any government, should never be in the business of competing with our private sector. This government through the election, you know, even previous to the election, and postelection has been very clear that we are not going to continue with this crude-by-rail contract, and there are several reasons why.

You know, over the past 12 years I personally have negotiated millions of dollars in private contracts, and when I look at this contract specifically, $3.7 billion, this was a contract that was negotiated very hastily just over a couple of months. I think it was negotiated because there was so much inaction that hadn't been done for four years. They left it to the very end. This is a contract that when it's compressed that short, I think it put them in a position where they're overpaying for these railcars, and it just doesn't seem like a very good deal for the Alberta taxpayers.

I mean, we heard from the Member for Lethbridge-West. She stated that this is roughly $2 billion in revenue for the province of Alberta. Even if we consider that it is $2 billion worth of revenue, I'm looking at a signed contract for $3.7 billion, the largest expenditure in Alberta history, and I'm still looking at it. You know, the business sense in me goes: that's still a $1.5 million or more loss. That's just based on the estimates that we have right now, which leads me to the other part of myself in the business of risk.

Being in business – you know, the reason government shouldn't be in business is that the private sector really has the ability to adjust and deal with market values a lot quicker, faster. This is why government shouldn't be in that business. We can't react that well. There are a lot of highs and lows. We know that in the oil sector. This is a historical fact. We've gone through it many times in Alberta. The private sector is almost specifically structured to be able to take these risks, manage them better than government, and mitigate any losses that may come from that. Like I said, we're accountable to the taxpayers as government. That's our primary business, being accountable to every taxpayer that lives here. If we're looking at $2 billion in revenue and $3.7 billion in costs, to me that's just a net loss. It doesn't make sense.

You know, when we're talking about the fact that the private sector isn't capable of taking care of this, I don't believe that either. I mean, that would be under the assumption that the private sector is at a hundred per cent capacity, that they have no ability to go beyond what they're shipping right now, but looking at a National Energy Board report – we're looking at 2018 numbers – they were going from around 145,000 barrels per day in January, and then they fluctuated. They increased to 330,000 barrels per day in October. This leads me to believe that the private sector can increase. If the market is there, this shows that the private sector is more than happy to increase and continue to increase crude by rail.

Now, I think those things are very important to bring up. These are, you know, really the main reasons that we shouldn't be getting into messing with the private sector. We're looking at risk. We're looking at risk. We're look at, as a government, increasing our risk. We're looking at getting involved in the private sector. I just think both of these are going to have a negative effect, and it's not going to benefit the taxpayers in the manner that the opposition is saying that it's going to.

You know, they're saying right now this year alone – we're seeing industry experts at Genscape right now estimating that we could go anywhere from 300,000 barrels per day this summer up to 400,000 and 500,000 by the end of the year, this all done by the private sector. So a $3.7 billion contract, which is being proposed as being the complete answer to fixing our differential in our price, the export for Alberta: to me, every part of the business sense in me tells me that it's not. This is $3.7 billion of taxpayers' money being spent. When they've even stated, like I said, by the Member for Lethbridge-West, $2 billion in revenue – I don't know – to me this doesn't make sense.

We have numbers here that prove that the private sector has the ability to do this, and we're looking at a contract that was negotiated in the late parts of their four-year term. Inaction. They had inaction. They had no action, no credible action, for four years, forcing them into this terrible contract and even having to negotiate this contract in a very short period of time. This government was quite clear February 1 that we were not going to honour sweetheart deals or bailout deals. To me this appeared to be just their way of trying to convince the voters in this province leading up to the election that they had the answer for the oil problems. In reality they just hadn't done anything for four years. This was just a grasp at trying to bail themselves out after not getting anything in measurable effect for the oil and gas sector in four years, and the fact being that in the short period of time they negotiated this, I don't know how they could've negotiated a strong deal for this province or the taxpayers here.

I know that personally in business when I was negotiating contracts, if I was in a position where I had to do something, the only thing that I had on my side was time. If I had time to be able to negotiate, I still had something to work with. Now, you take time away, like was taken away from the opposition leading into the election – everybody knew they were forced. They had to have this done in a certain period of time. Everything here shows they're overpaying for these railcars, for the contracts related to it, and I just don't feel that in any way I can support this.

It seems like we can negotiate with the private sector. We can talk to them about, you know, what's going to work best to be able to continue to export our oil by rail, crude by rail as we work through dealing with the differential pricing.

We're moving into a time right now where it seems like the differential on the market looks good for them to be able to increase crude by rail. It makes more sense for them to be doing crude by rail. We have a market assessment here that says that due to where it's at right now, we're going to see that moving through this year. So I just don't see . . .

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to address the House on this particular subject and, of course, point out the error in the ways of thinking across the floor that we just heard and overall in terms of this bill. As I mentioned before, sometimes the chaotic thinking on the Conservative side of the floor is something that I'd find amusing if it weren't so dangerous to the population of the province of Alberta.

I just want to spend a few moments talking about some of the things we were just hearing from the member opposite about this bill just to demonstrate that the arguments that they're making, in fact, are often about things that were never said or are not properly descriptive of what has happened in the past and therefore – I mean, internally it must seem like the arguments make sense, but because they're not based on reality in the first place, they don't hold much water. I think it's interesting that the previous speech started with a comment that somehow the fact that this contract for oil by rail was done in the latter part of the term of our four-year government was in and of itself problematic. There are a couple of points I want to make on that.

One is that I do realize that there is an expectation on the other side of the House that we should have in four years done more than previous Conservative governments did in 44 years. I agree with him that we are indeed 11 times better than them at things that we do, but we simply didn't have time to do everything at once. Of course, you can't put all of your activities in the first six months of your time in government. You keep working. You have a job. You do a piece of work and you bring up the next piece of work and the next piece of work, and we did that. We worked right until the very end of our term, and of course that means that something – something – that we were doing had to happen at the end. So it's a silly argument to say that doing it at the end was in and of itself problematic because of the timing.

The second thing that was said about that is that it was done too fast and therefore that was problematic. That was said about a minute and a half before the comment was made that things should be left to private industry because they're more flexible and more agile and government can't move quickly to do things. I just wanted to point out the fact that that there was probably less than three minutes of time between the complaint that we did things quickly and their belief that government can't do things quickly were said. Again, you know, confusion in the Conservative mind that I think we need to, you know, point out because the decision to eliminate the crude-by-rail contracts is another piece of confusion.

We know from the assessments being done by the good members of the public service in the government of Alberta that the investment being made in crude by rail will net an approximately $2.2 billion profit for the province of Alberta. Now we have the Conservative Party telling us that they are against profit. I think that's, again, another example of the confusion that they have. They don't like it because they only want profits to accrue to a small, select group of individuals in society, people who are their friends and who will contribute to their coffers in the next election. When those profits instead are accrued and then shared by all people in society so that services can be created such as health care and education and the public services that we provide here in this province, they suddenly don't like profits.

Again, you know, the arguments they're making are at best confusing and at worst a little bit nasty toward the people of the province of Alberta who would be benefiting from this extra $2.2 billion. We know, of course, that the CEOs of the rail companies have indicated that if these contracts are cancelled, there are going to be penalties to be paid. So not only is it a loss of $2.2 billion in benefits to the people of the province of Alberta, but it's also going to be more than that when the penalties have to be paid out.

Let me just go on a little bit further and talk about some of the other faults in the previous statement that was just made, and that is concern that somehow this was supposed to be the solution, the only solution, and the complete response to the problems in the oil economy that the province of Alberta has been experiencing. Again, you set up a straw dog, you set it on fire, and then you pretend that somehow you have, you know, made a good point, but it's not true. If we just simply look at what the government of Alberta did under the NDP, we can see a very complex, sophisticated plan to deal with a problem that did not originate here in the province of Alberta but, actually, occurred across the board in oil economies in North America and, therefore, was largely out of our hands.

I just want to point out that the same kinds of problems that we've experienced here in the province of Alberta, such as the loss of jobs and so on, also occurred in Conservative Saskatchewan. It happened over there, too. They had the same kinds of issues in terms of loss of government revenue and loss of jobs as we did. They don't bother to point that out, though, because they like to pretend that because something happened while we were in government, therefore we are responsible for it happening. Again, as I've mentioned previously in this House, they really cannot understand the basic difference between correlation and causality – so everything that has a correlation that happens at the same time therefore must be causal and it must be because the government did it – when, in fact, we know that the evidence indicates that that's not true. It happened to the Conservative government in Saskatchewan as well as it happened to the NDP government in the province of Alberta.

I'd just like to remind the House a little bit about some of the complexity of the plan that we had put forward in terms of dealing with this issue, the fact that we did a number of things in order to ensure that over the long term we would have some benefits. In the short term, of course, we did put some reductions on the amount of production of crude so that the differential would be reduced, and indeed when we did that, the differential was reduced. At one point the differential was actually more than the actual profits from the barrel. By the time that we had implemented that phase of our plan, the differential was reduced to less than $10 per barrel. In fact, it was a very effective immediate step, but we understood that that was not a long-term plan for this province, that we needed to do something different, but we were handling the crisis in the moment.

The medium term was crude by rail because if we sell our product, which apparently the Conservatives don't want to do – they don't want to sell our product – then we can take the benefits of that. We can provide services to the members of the province of Alberta, and we can make sure that the province is growing and the number of jobs is growing. So it's an interim step.

Now, we all know that shipping crude by rail is not the first and best thing to happen. We get that. Nobody chose it above all other alternatives. What we said was that given the reality, given what's actually happening out there, not the made-up, straw-dog falsities that are often, you know, argued about in this House on the other side, the reality is that we do not have an oil pipeline in this province that can satisfactorily transport the crude oil that we would like to be able to transport in order to make the profits that we need to make as a province.

Now, that largely falls on the backs of the Harper Conservative government in Ottawa, of which the Premier was a senior cabinet minister, who failed to do anything to resolve this problem in over 10 years while they had a Conservative government in Alberta and a Conservative government in Ottawa. They failed. They failed continuously to address the problem and to deal with it.

As a result, when we got elected, we got stuck with a complete disaster that had been handed to us by a federal government that did nothing to resolve the problem in the first place and a provincial government who had saved no money, who had taken oil profits at a time when oil was at a hundred dollars a barrel or more and still had done nothing to resolve the problem at all. So we began the process of resolving the problem and pushing things forward. We know that ultimately we were moving toward a pipeline.

But it wasn't stopped by us. The pipeline wasn't stopped by the provincial government of Alberta. It wasn't stopped by the federal government.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie.

Mrs. Allard: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise this afternoon to speak against this motion. Let me be clear. This government is not in the business of competing with the private sector, and the government, in my opinion, should not be in the business of competing with the private sector. We have repeatedly stated before, during, and now since the election that we will not be continuing with a government-owned crude-by-rail program, and there are several reasons why.

First, shipping crude by rail is something that the private sector is fully capable of doing, and before the former government's program was announced, the private sector was fully prepared to do so. Let me share a few examples with the House. According to the National Energy Board, Canadian crude-by-rail volumes increased throughout 2018 from 145,000 barrels per day in January to over 330,000 barrels per day in October. Volumes peaked in December at over 350,000 barrels per day. With narrower differentials on the oil price between Alberta and U.S. markets in early 2019, the level dropped to around 130,000 barrels per day. However, as opportunities are developing from U.S. demand with wider than expected differentials, industry is stepping up again.

Madam Speaker, at the beginning of 2019 analysts at TPH Energy Research estimated that March volumes would be in the range of 160,000 to 175,000 barrels per day. Subsequent data released by the National Energy Board shows that they were right on the nose. Crude-by-rail exports rose 29 per cent, to about 168,000 barrels of oil per day, from February. This includes Imperial Oil shipping 15,000 barrels per day during that time, ending the month at around 28,000 barrels per day.

Looking ahead, Cenovus has talked about ramping up to 100,000 barrels per day or more by year's end. Both CN and CP expect to continue shipping more crude this year. Industry experts like Genscape are forecasting highs of 300,000 barrels per day this summer, while IHS Markit is going even higher when they estimate that railway movements will hit record highs of between 400,000 and 500,000 barrels per day by the end of this year or early next year.

Madam Speaker, all of this movement has been occurring before the NDP's irresponsible and ill-conceived crude-by-rail program even comes into effect. Speaking of irresponsible, let's talk about the fact that this program was rushed. It was last minute, and it was concocted by a desperate government on the eve of an election that they knew they were about to lose. We are talking about one of the largest single expenditures in Alberta's history, a $3.7 billion contract coming together in a matter of months, just months. It is challenging to try and do all of the appropriate due diligence and negotiate the best possible terms when you do not have time on your side. It's no wonder the former government pulled such a hasty deal together in such a short time frame and on the public stage, no less.

Madam Speaker, it was simply reckless of the previous government to borrow such an enormous sum of money to create crude-by-rail capacity without the proper oversight to go with it. These were contracts completed under less than ideal negotiating conditions in a clear attempt to secure an election. Again, the private sector was already expanding oil-by-rail capacity significantly over the course of 2018, without government intervention or its requirement. Curtailment was put in place and rail was expected to adapt as the differential started to bounce back, as it has been doing. The former government only had to step back and let the private market work itself out.

That brings me to my third reason. This deal is just too risky for a government to undertake. We all know what the oil industry is like. There are highs and lows, booms and busts. This is a historical fact. While these ebbs and flows are challenging for the private sector, it's something they are in a much better position to manage because they expect it. The private sector is specifically structured to be able to take risks, with investors who make the decisions to take higher risks for higher potential returns.

But as a government, Madam Speaker, we are accountable to the taxpayer. We are stewards of the province's energy resources, and we should not be taking unnecessary risk with the public's money or their economic future. The public needs certainty from their government, and they need us to be able to provide the public services they require to go about their daily lives. These contracts are not in the best interests of Albertans. Now, thanks to the members opposite, we are locked in, with few options to salvage the taxpayers' money.

Madam Speaker, we know the private sector will ship crude by rail if the economics are favourable. I'll say that again: if the economics are favourable. They can and they will take on all risks associated with this transaction. This, without question, should not fall on the province of Alberta, at least not on our watch.

Madam Speaker, before I conclude, I want to assure all hon. members that the crude-by-rail industry will continue, as it always has, to provide well-paying jobs to all Albertans even without a government-run crude-by-rail program. Based on industry forecasts, I predict it will be a very busy year for crude-by-rail activity, and we welcome that. Crude by rail is something that the private sector is in the best position to be running on its own.

This government will do what is best for Albertans, and we will do what's necessary to protect Alberta taxpayers. I will therefore not be supporting this motion.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm pleased to rise this afternoon to speak to Motion 503, brought forward by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar. I'd first like to start by disputing a couple of the points that have been brought up by members opposite who have spoken already to this motion.

Firstly, the Member for Highwood spoke in this Chamber a few moments ago about his expertise in the business community and how he thought that negotiations that were done over a certain pace of time were of less quality than negotiations that were done over a protracted time. I might remind that hon. member, notwithstanding his tremendous experience in negotiating contracts, that there are others in this Chamber who have also had a similar amount of experience.

I, for one, can say that I've been involved in over 800 contract negotiations in the real estate industry during my career, and believe me, Madam Speaker, the pace of those negotiations was different for each one of them. The circumstances of the clients involved, the nature of the transaction involved dictated the pace of that negotiation, and it didn't mean that the contract which resulted was any worse or better because of the pace at which that contract was negotiated.

The contract that results is what was negotiated within the framework of the needs of the time frame that was required. For example, in the negotiation that we undertook in the crude-by-rail investment project, that negotiation was certainly done in a period of crisis that necessitated quick action on the part of government to protect Alberta jobs, Alberta workers, and the bottom line for the government.

Now, the Highwood member suggested that in his calculations – and he mentioned that the cost of increasing rail capacity was about $3.7 billion; that was in the government announcement of the day – there would be a $2.2 billion profit that would be generated. Then he went on to say that in his calculation that would leave a $1.5 billion shortfall. I'm not quite getting where that all adds up. He's forgotten about the fact that the province anticipated generating $5.9 billion over the three-year period following that announcement in increased revenues and royalties. If you subtract the $3.7 billion cost from that, that's where you are left with the $2.2 billion profit that would emanate to the province. So there's a bit of faulty arithmetic going on there, and I would ask the Member for Highwood to correct that at his next opportunity.

So on a couple of fronts I do take exception to the Member for Highwood's characterization of the numbers as well as the type of condemnation he's made towards the province of Alberta's government negotiations during our NDP government's period, when he suggests that we were in a rushed, hurried negotiation that was flawed as a result of that. Nothing could be farther from the truth, Madam Speaker. The negotiation took place in a time frame which necessitated quick action, nimble action by a government which was able to respond in a way that ended up with a transaction that would result in a $2.2 billion profit for the taxpayers, to be reinvested in services and in the very industry that this government today looks to harm by $2.2 billion by eliminating the crude-by-rail contract. So I'm not quite understanding why some of the members opposite are opposed to the continuation of the crude-by-rail investments.

The fact is that over the course of the mandate of the previous government we suffered the fate of having to look at: why indeed are we in the place that we are in right now? In fact, if you actually look at the long-term situation, the crisis that we ended up in, the problem is that we don't have enough capacity to export our product to tidewater. That isn't something we created in the four-year term of our government, Madam Speaker. That's something that was a conscious decision made by the economic geniuses over on the other side over 44 years of Conservative government. They thought it wise and they accepted a policy world where we only had one pipeline to tidewater and did nothing to rectify that situation. Of course, it came to a head where we ended up with the situation where we couldn't get our product to tidewater.

We were producing a product that had no place to go, and as a result the price was dropping through the floor. We were practically giving away our resources. You're darn right that we negotiated an oil-by-rail contract to get some of that excess capacity out to the international markets and receive a reasonable price for it, the best we could possibly do under the circumstances, as an intermediate measure to keep the industry afloat, keep Albertans working, and keep the economic revenue flowing until such time that we can get an approval for a pipeline and get the pipeline capacity flowing to the coast, hopefully more than one coast, and continue on the road to developing our natural resources in a way that should have been done over the past 44 years by successive Conservative governments, who failed to increase our pipeline capacity and allow our products to get to world markets in a volume that would enable us to receive the proper return for our Alberta products.

Now, I know that the Member for Grande Prairie recently spoke to this Motion 503, and the quote that that member made is something I will deliciously remember for a long, long time, and I hope to hear it repeated many times over in this House. The solution that that member suggests that we should adopt is that we should simply "step back and let the . . . market work itself out." I think that's a pretty close quote. Well, in fact, that's what's been happening in this province for about 40 years of Conservative government, previous to our government, basically stepping back and letting the market work itself out. In the meantime they're letting Alberta workers and businesses become the collateral damage of 44 years of stepping back and letting the market work itself out.

I, for one, believe that there is a role for government to play when indeed faced with crises that are costing Albertans jobs and revenue and that need direct and immediate action. We took that action as a government, Madam Speaker, and we think that this current government should continue the oil-by-rail contracts because they were the right thing to do and they still are the right thing to do. They end up profiting this province to the tune of $2.2 billion over the life of those contracts. The argument that the private sector certainly should have been left, that we should have stepped back and let the market work itself out: we didn't have that type of time. The marketplace wasn't stepping in. Typically they will step aside when they think their risk is too high, so governments have a role to play to soften that risk, indeed, when that faces them, and that's what we did as a government.

We got into this crude-by-rail contract, and it's a profitable contract that will end up doing what it set out to do, and that is to, in an intermediate way, get our product to tidewater at a world price – or it won't get it to tidewater necessarily but get it into the marketplace at a higher price in a way that will allow our production to be maintained while we, hopefully in the not-too-distant future, get approvals for pipelines to tidewater and get our product to global markets and at a world price.

You know, the whole idea behind the oil-by-rail contract was to secure market access for our resources, create good jobs, and continue to diversify Alberta's energy economy. We laid out short-term, medium-term, long-term plans to get top dollar for our resources. Ultimately, of course, as I mentioned before, the crude-by-rail investment was a medium-term solution which we put in place to tide us over while we fought to get more pipeline capacity in the long run. It was projected to be a win-win for the energy sector and taxpayers. We would have signed commitments with suppliers that would have seen an estimated 4,400 railcars move up to 120,000 barrels of oil per day. We'd purchase crude oil from producers, load it onto railcars at loading facilities across the province, and ship it to market. That was intended to help industry, including smaller producers who may have not had the ability to take action on their own.

Albertans could have looked forward to seeing railcars roll as early as July of this year, and, Madam Speaker, they still could if this government saw fit to continue with the wisdom of the contract that was produced in a crisis period of time and also in a way that effectively . . .

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland.

Mr. Getson: Thank you, Madam Speaker. First of all, thanks for having the chance to talk to Motion 503 here. It's been interesting hearing some of the dialogue back and forth from the folks and different perspectives, and I'd like to offer mine, if I can, from a gentleman who worked in that industry, who was actually part of the rail group at Enbridge that built transshipment facilities and oil by rail, so understanding some of that as well as the models for pipelines, et cetera.

What I do find very interesting, in my recent position here as a politician, is hearing politicians that I only saw on television or in news ads that protested against line 3, against Gateway, against Energy East, against, let's say, Trans Mountain, and against Keystone XL. Such proponents now have become for pipeline capacity and understanding it. It seems that they don't understand that when we build upstream facilities, it's based on the auspices of having those pipelines in place and the approvals, which should almost be a slam dunk based on the fact that our industry is so well poised and positioned for it as well as that we're so cognizant of the environment protection, et cetera, et cetera, the great lengths that we go to. I'm very happy to understand now that they realize that that part of the industry is so vital and that we are key people within that industry.

Little words of wisdom here: putting on a Superman cape does not give you the ability to fly or have superpowers. Buying a bunch of train cars does not make you an oilman. That's something that folks have to understand as well as the way the industry works. When you purchase product at a given spot value, you then take care, custody, and control of that product at a given spot value. When you do not control where or when that shipment will reach the other end, you are speculating. They are speculating with taxpayers' dollars.

The folks that actually are the oilmen and -women that are in that industry understand and know that there are different commodity types, and those commodity types are traded in situ and in transit and while they're moving at a given timeline and sometimes will hit terminal tankage, those types of things. Paper trades are played, and that's a whole industry. I have not heard once of how the former government was going to become a trading stock exchange to manage the shortfalls in those industries. It's a little-known fact – or obviously they would know because they crunched the numbers, as they've said, Madam Speaker – that typically moving oil by rail is three times the cost of moving it by pipe.

I also find it very interesting, given that they're, you know, on the record against pipeline projects with their partners in Ottawa, that they were the ones that ran around and caused the delays and the protest and all the churn that took place in these projects. Ergo, they are the ones that ran out and cut us, being the Alberta people and the folks in that industry, and now they're running around selling the Band-Aids to us to fix the wound that they caused, to help stop the bleeding. That's what I do agree with them on: this is an interim measure.

They failed repeatedly on their budgets. They failed repeatedly on everything that they've touched, including this sector, and we're supposed to now inherit the mess that they made. We campaigned on fixing the messes. We understand that this is more of a diverse issue. Industry are the ones that are able to take the risk.

Here's a little – I don't know – tidbit. When industry is worried about the risk, you might pay attention to it. The member over there had just mentioned that industry was too scared of the chance to take the risk in this, so we boldly jump in where, you know, angels fear to tread. Again, coming back to the Superman comment, Madam Speaker, putting on the little Superman suit does not give him superpowers, does not let him fly. Buying these train cars is not making them oilmen. I'm sorry. I get a little heated on this one. The boys out in the patch have heard me talk about this a number of times.

So they came in, with much of their power of having this industry that was hating the oil industry. They engaged in protest projects. They opposed and managed just about everything that we were dealing with on pipeline projects. Forming the government, they engaged in a royalty review that did nothing but scare away investors. They promptly rolled over on the Trudeau Liberals. It happened with the Northern Gateway project, and it happened with also the purchasing of that thing, that was supposed to buy us the Trans Mountain facility, all of this social licence. We're supposed to trust that this short-term, Band-Aid measure that they're suggesting is still salient and sound in the industry.

Colleagues have also mentioned about the market capacity and the fact that we can move this oil, that the industry is willing to take that risk. Again, understanding the industry that they are part of, they're the ones that play in that. For us to take the risk and pretend we're oilmen on the Alberta taxpayers' dollar: absolutely – absolutely – the wrong thing to do.

So I don't think it should come as any surprise to anyone at this point that I'm absolutely against this motion that the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar has put forward.

Unlike the NDP, which has shown their underlying opposition to development of the incredible natural resources that we have, the Conservative government here, the United Conservative government, are going to stand up for those 151,000 energy workers. We've got a clear plan on getting our product to market. We've got a clear plan on standing up against the friends in Ottawa that – well, their friends; they weren't ours. We're hoping Andrew Scheer helps things along when we get in there. The NDP failed repeatedly and came up with this plan to buy railcars. We're not going to repeat these mistakes.

We got voted in on a different mandate, to do things responsibly, to take into consideration all those other items we mentioned, and, again, by having people from those industries, not the accidental tourists that are strapping on Superman capes.

I don't know where the shot clock is at, ma'am. I could go on for hours on this. It just irks me. Again, we had such a strong mandate that we ran on. The Alberta people have spoken. They want us to make the right decisions. This was a half-hatched, haphazard-type idea. If the member has understood, having the 800 or 900 or a billion contracts that he's had, given the timeline that they're all different and all changing in those negotiations taking place, the one that should have jumped out at him came out of his own mouth: nobody else wanted this; it was too risky, so we decided to jump in. Wow. I would love to sit across the negotiating table from that gentleman on any other contract. Again, if anyone can remember that show Dallas, J.R. didn't lose too often, and that's exactly who this gentleman was thinking that he was negotiating on behalf of, to put it in that type of colourful argument.

Here's the track record. We tied in with Trudeau. We gave in to Obama. We actually pulled our negotiators off the Keystone XL project, helped to scrap Northern Gateway. We walked away from that. We gave Quebec and New Brunswick a veto. These are the same folks now that are trying to sell the Alberta people that this is such a great thing and that they're really concerned about the industry and that they know it better than the folks that are in it and the folks that were elected.

That's about all I've got to say about that. I'm against it, and I strongly suggest that everyone else vote against it, too. We're meddling with things we shouldn't be involved in.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

Member Ceci: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. You know, I just want to try and focus on the issue of crude by rail as opposed to trying to belittle the previous government and the actions they took. The actions that were taken were because the differential was blowing out. With the differential blowing out, there were small and medium-sized businesses, workers across this province working for nonintegrated companies, meaning that they were producing but weren't able to refine because they didn't own refineries – the people who were making lots and lots of money with the blown-out differential were the integrated producers, those who had production facilities. They could transport it to the refineries. They were making money on every barrel.

And who was suffering, Madam Speaker? Well, the treasury was suffering, of course, because the WCS was so low or so small. The action was taken because at small and medium-sized producers, those companies in Alberta with their staff across this province, in rural areas and urban areas, all of those workers were at risk of being let go.

The other side talks about: well, the private market would sort this out. The private market would have sorted it out, Madam Speaker, with the failure of small and medium-sized companies and thousands and thousands of workers being put out of work across this province. Those were the boys, maybe, in the oil patch that this individual from Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland talks about. Those boys would have been out of work because if they worked for an unintegrated company, they would have gone under. They would have gone under because the WCS was so small and the differential was so large.

For months and months and months the previous government looked at, "Okay; what are the solutions?" and they were identified very well by my colleague in the back row over there. They were talked about very well. We looked at short-term solutions, we looked at medium-term solutions, and of course pipelines are the ultimate solution. We took that action. I think my friend in the back row, of course, Edmonton-McClung, was very correct when he said that the speaker from across the way – I think it was the Member for Highwood – was wrong when he was talking about what the government of Alberta would have realized as a result of that crude-by-rail solution that we had proposed, that we had worked on.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. member, I hesitate to interrupt, but under Standing Order 8(3), which provides up to five minutes for the mover of a motion other than a government motion to close debate, I'd like to invite the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar to close debate on Motion 503.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and close debate. It's been interesting to hear the comments that have been made by all of my colleagues, and I want to thank all of my friends here in the NDP caucus for their thoughtful interventions.

It's certainly an interesting contrast with the points made by the Member for Highwood, who doesn't understand the difference between $2 billion in revenue and $2 billion in profit; the Member for Grande Prairie, who read notes that were clearly written by a staffer and that she'd seen for the first time entering this Chamber; and, of course, the Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland, who doesn't understand that we have the Alberta Petroleum Marketing Commission, that is the agent of the government, that buys and sells oil on behalf of the government of Alberta and has done so for 45 years and has done a reasonably good job. But, of course, Madam Speaker, I mean, we can't trust somebody who thinks that we've signed over immigration responsibility to the United Nations to bring anything resembling a fact to bear on debates here in this Chamber.

Madam Speaker, it's important to emphasize the need for moving this crude oil by rail because, as the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview noted in his opening comments, the uncertainty around the increases in pipeline takeaway capacity are greater now than ever before. Last week, just last Monday, the Minnesota Court of Appeals announced that they revoked the permit for Enbridge's line 3, so we don't know when Enbridge's line 3 will be constructed. Just the other day Keystone XL had a court injunction lifted, but of course as soon as that injunction was lifted, other organizations filed suit against the Keystone XL project, putting that project in further delays. And the Trans Mountain pipeline, of course, is now at risk. Our government worked hard to put in place a climate change action plan that managed to convince the federal government to grudgingly approve and purchase that pipeline, but now that the members opposite are intent on scrapping the climate change plan and won't even commit today to keeping the 100-megatonne emissions cap on our oil sands production, we are further away from getting the federal government to say yes to Trans Mountain than ever before.

All three of these major pipelines are what our oil sands producers are relying on to get our resources to market, and all three have a considerable amount of uncertainty. The earliest that any of those things would come online is three years from now. It's more critical now than ever to use oil sands by rail to get our oil to market.

The members opposite seem to think that the private sector was able to do this on its own. In fact, they pointed to the fact that oil sands by rail increased significantly throughout the year 2018. They neglected the fact that the differential dropped to significant lows, that we were practically giving our oil away. As the Member for Calgary-Buffalo noted, we had to enact a two-step plan to shore up the price of oil. The first was to curtail oil production by approximately 300,000 barrels a day. The second step of that plan, Madam Speaker, was to increase oil-by-rail capacity so that the oil curtailment limits didn't have to stay in place forever. We haven't heard the members opposite say what they plan to do with the oil curtailment limits. We know that the private sector can't move quickly enough to move all of this oil by rail. We need government intervention to do this.

You know, the Member for Grande Prairie pointed to companies like Imperial and Cenovus, who are moving their crude oil by rail, and that's true, Madam Speaker. Those companies have the negotiating capacity to deal with CN and CP, to negotiate contracts that make it affordable for them to move their product by rail, but the junior oil sands companies do not. What the members opposite neglect when they talk about the free market is that we don't have a free market when it comes to rail capacity. We have two companies that we deal with, CN and CP, and they have a significant amount of market power. They won't deal with the junior oil sands companies on their own because they don't have the volume and they can't commit to a three-year contract, that CN and CP are looking for. In order to act in the best interests of the junior oil sands companies, our government took action and secured these oil-by-rail contracts to keep junior oil sands companies at work and keep those people employed.

[The voice vote indicated that Motion Other than Government Motion 503 lost]

Consideration of Her Honour the Lieutenant Governor's Speech

Ms Glasgow moved, seconded by Ms Rosin, that an humble address be presented to Her Honour the Honourable the Lieutenant Governor as follows.

To Her Honour the Honourable Lois Mitchell, CM, AOE, LLD, the Lieutenant Governor of the province of Alberta:

We, Her Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Legislative Assembly, now assembled, beg leave to thank Your Honour for the gracious speech Your Honour has been pleased to address to us at the opening of the present session.

[Adjourned debate June 4: Mr. Glubish]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I'd like to take this opportunity to respond to the Speech from the Throne and talk about my journey to this Legislature.

First, I'd like to thank the constituents of Central Peace-Notley who chose me to be their representative. I also want to thank the many volunteers who gave freely of their time, energy, and money to support me and the United Conservative Party. The support is humbling, and I promise to represent them to the best of my abilities.

Also, I'd like to thank my parents. From their humble beginnings as homesteaders in the Valleyview area they taught their boys the value of hard work. Paul, my dad, worked hard as a heavy-duty mechanic with oil field contracting. I've seen him work 24 hours straight as a mechanic and then come home and put in a full day on the farm. My mom worked as a secretary for oil field companies and government, putting in a full day's work and then coming home to cook and help on the farm. Not only did they teach me by example how to work, but they also taught honesty and compassion when dealing with others.

They also taught their three boys to follow their dreams. My oldest brother, George, has made his living as a professional musician and music teacher, a very talented musician on many instruments. My next-oldest brother, Kelly, is an engineer in the racing industry. He's worked for over 30 years across North America in the racing industry as a mechanic, engineer, and team leader for the likes of Alex Tagliani and Kyle Busch and companies like Players and Toyota. I understand he's still winning with his new team right now. Myself, I've made my living most of my life as an outfitter in the tourism industry, guiding hunters from all over the world, and now, of course, being elected to this great Assembly for a second time to represent the good people in the Peace Country. I say this partly because I'm proud of my family but mostly to show the diversity of three brothers coming from the same humble household. Yes, you can follow your dreams.

My wife, Teena, and I grew up in the Valleyview area, and we couldn't think of a better place to raise our five children: Travis, Ty, Taylor, Tianna, and Tenea. Now, you might notice a tacky trend there. Also, our three grandsons – Silas, Ezra, and Leo – are all being raised there. We love the Peace Country and the life and opportunity it provides.

I was first elected in 2015 to the constituency of Grande Prairie-Smoky. That was the basic area that included Fox Creek, Valleyview, DeBolt, Bezanson, Teepee Creek, Sexsmith, and the north half of the city of Grande Prairie. In the most recent election, on April 16, 2019, I received the honour of being elected to the new constituency of Central Peace-Notley. Now, one of the most striking things about this constituency is its size, not just the amount of square miles but the number of communities and municipalities. Basically it includes the towns and areas around the towns of Fox Creek, Valleyview, DeBolt, McLennan, Falher, Spirit River to Bonanza, Berwyn to Fairview, and then west to Hines Creek, Worsley, Cleardale, and all the way to the B.C. border, where we find Cherry Point, Bay Tree, and the community of Gundy. Gundy can only be accessed by travelling 100 kilometres through another constituency or by going through British Columbia.

Here are some interesting numbers. The constituency of Central Peace-Notley contains eight MDs and counties, 11 towns and villages that have elected councils, 12 Hutterite colonies, and at least 80 other rural communities. It takes about five hours to drive between the communities of Fox Creek and Cherry Point. It also contains the Treaty 8 reserves of Sturgeon Lake Cree First Nation and Duncan's First Nation and lands of Horse Lake First Nation in the Clear Hills area. It also contains lands of Treaty 6 reserve of Alexander First Nation. I've had the opportunity to attend round dances and powwows at Sturgeon Lake Cree First Nation, and I've thoroughly enjoyed my time there.

I do want to give a bit of a rundown on a few of the communities. Though there's not enough time to cover all, here are a few. Fox Creek is known for oil and gas as it has access to both the Duvernay and Montney formations. Valleyview is considered a portal to the Peace where highways 43 and 49 split; of course, highway 43 goes on to Grande Prairie and then on to mile zero of the Alaska highway and Dawson Creek. Highway 49 goes up to Peace River, and it's the main access to Mackenzie highway, that goes all the way to Yellowknife.

Falher is the honey capital of Canada. It's also known for its agriculture, beautiful, flat farmland there, and it's also a francophone community. When it comes to the francophone community, I have family there, and one of my favourite parts, enjoying the customs there, is to have a good feeding of tourtière. Tourtière is a meat pie, and I like to eat it the way my wife's pépère would eat it, and that's with maple syrup.

We go on to the community of Wanham. Now, Wanham this year is having it's 49th annual Plowing Match. I've had a chance to be there a couple of times for the plowing match, and they've got me on the walking plow. I have to say I think I got third prize once, maybe fourth prize another time though I'm not sure how many competitors there were in the beginner category. But I did enjoy walking behind a horse and operating the hand plow.

Spirit River: a trading post is how it originated. It has a history of ranching that goes back to the 1840s and a history in agriculture that goes back to the 1880s.

Now, Dunvegan is one of the most beautiful areas in Alberta. It's located on the Peace River, a beautiful valley there. It's very historic. It was started in, I think, 1821 with the Hudson's Bay Company, but actually, of course, the indigenous communities used that area for thousands of years, in particular the Beaver people.

Fairview is known for Fairview College, which is an extension of the Grande Prairie Regional College. They have a trades college there and train people from all over Canada. It's actually the only authorized training centre in Canada for Harley-Davidson, so anybody in Canada that wants to take on the Harley-Davidson training has to come to Fairview. Also, just a bit of a note here, they actually have competitions for motorcycle mechanics. A fellow by the name of Brett Hart, who studied at Fairview College – not the Bret Hart that you may be thinking of, the wrestler – actually won the world championship in Japan for motorcycle mechanics. He was a product of Fairview College.

I'd like to take some time to talk about all the communities in the constituency, but of course there's just not enough time to do that. What I do want to talk about is doughnuts. Now, in this huge constituency – it's hard to imagine – there's only one Tim Hortons, and that's in Valleyview. Of course, we all know about Tim Hortons doughnuts and Timbits. I guess I've got a bit of a sweet tooth. Maybe that's why I want to cover doughnuts.

Just about 60 kilometres west of Valleyview is Crooked Creek. Crooked Creek doughnuts I think are known probably Canada-wide and sometimes world-wide because they have such a great homemade doughnut there. I think the store sells, like, over a hundred dozen a day. This is a little store along the highway there. As I was representing this constituency and campaigning, I actually found out about the Bear Country Inn in Wanham, and they make homemade doughnuts there, too. We had an event in Eaglesham nearby, and we actually ordered 10 dozen of these doughnuts for that event. Of course, I had an opportunity to taste-test them also, and they are excellent, too. As far as doughnuts go, we can't forget about the Tractor Pit Convenience Store in Girouxville, who makes doughnuts, too. They are fantastic also. Of course, other doughnuts: we have Freson, IGAs, and Co-op stores, too, that sell doughnuts. I actually think I might have to have an event some time called doughnut wars, where we can blindfold taste-test doughnuts. I think that would be a great opportunity to really test these doughnuts out in my constituency.

Now, I do want to mention one other thing here about Crooked Creek. In Crooked Creek – we'll call it downtown Crooked Creek. Basically there's the Crooked Creek store, and then there's Scotty's Burger Shack. Now, Scotty and his wife, Robyn, have the Burger Shack, and $1 from every burger that's sold goes to Ronald McDonald House and Kids with Cancer. Scotty started what they call a fight for hope. Scotty has raised – I don't even want to put a figure on it, but I know, like, with the fight for hope, one of the fights that he had was the biggest single fundraiser I think in Canada for the Ronald McDonald House. I know that he's got a little counter, and every time somebody buys a burger, it goes up a dollar. I know he's over $30,000 on that counter. That's Scotty's Burger Shack in Crooked Creek. I know he just opened another little store in Shaw's Point Resort. That's just northeast of High Prairie. I just wanted to mention that. Scotty and Robyn: I don't want to tell their story here because I wouldn't do it justice, but they have a child that's been battling cancer, so that's their inspiration for doing this.

I do want to recognize some of the previous MLAs. One thing I found out in doing a little research – most of the MLAs I was going to cover were more recent MLAs, but I thought it was interesting that in 1905 James Cornwall was the one that was declared elected, you know, in the Peace River district. But the election results were actually overturned because there were some irregularities, so that left the seat vacant. They had another election on February 15, 1906, and at that time Thomas Brick decided he was going to run, too. Thomas Brick and James Cornwall were the only two people running in that election in 1906, and they actually ran for the same party. Of course, only one was declared a winner, so Thomas Brick became the elected MLA at that time.

Now, maybe a little more recently, from 1971 through 1989 Marv Moore was the MLA. I guess I'll just back up for a second here. Because there are a couple of different constituencies involved here, I've got kind of two lists of MLAs. We'll start with Marv Moore, and this was the area that was considered Grande Prairie-Smoky. He was elected first in 1971 and represented the area till 1989. He was Minister of Agriculture, Minister of Municipal Affairs, Minister of Transportation, and Minister of Health. I guess he's politically a bit of a legend in the area. He's been very helpful along the way and has given a lot of good advice. But maybe even more special than Marv is his wife, Fran. Now, Fran is a fantastic woman. She's a history buff. She volunteers extensively in the community, and she really does keep a lot of the history of that area, the DeBolt-Crooked Creek area. I do want to mention Fran and what a wonderful woman she is.

Next elected was Walter Paszkowski, 1989 to 2001. He was Minister of Agriculture, Minister of Transportation, Minister of Municipal Affairs. Following his term was Mel Knight, 2001 to 2012, who was the Energy minister. Then following him was Everett McDonald, 2012 to 2015, who was previously reeve for the county of Grande Prairie.

Now, at the other end of the constituency – like I said, these two have kind of joined a bit. From 1971 to 1984, the namesake of the constituency of Central Peace-Notley, Grant Notley, who to this day is still held in high regard in the area. As I was campaigning in the area, I often heard his name mentioned.

Following him was Jim Gurnett. Then following him: Glen Clegg from 1986 to 2001; Hector Goudreau from 2001 to 2015, Minister of Tourism; and then, of course, Marg McCuaig-Boyd, 2015 to 2019, Energy minister.

I want to get back to the Speech from the Throne. I know that when we ran the campaign in 2019, it was a pretty ambitious campaign platform, probably the most detailed campaign platform ever in Alberta's history. One of the main things that we campaigned on was, of course, getting rid of the carbon tax. It was the number one issue at the door. We mentioned that in the Speech from the Throne. Number two was the open for business act to relieve the challenges that employers face when it comes to employing people and getting the job done. We talked a lot about the job creation tax cut, trying to get investment back into Alberta that we've lost over the last four years, and then the Red Tape Reduction Act. I think that everywhere we look in our world, we run into things that hinder our progress in trying to get things done.

Now, it seems that some people are maybe a little surprised that we're keeping our promises. It shouldn't be that way. I think that as politicians when we campaign on something, we should follow through on it, and we should be able to tell people what we're doing before we do it. There's kind of a theme that's been coming out, I think, since this last election as we've hit the Legislature and everything, and that theme is: promise made, promise kept.

Once more, I'd just like to thank the good people from Central Peace-Notley, and I commit to representing them to the best of my ability. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 29(2)(a) are there any comments or questions?

Seeing none, are there any more speakers? The hon. Member for Calgary-North.

Mr. Yaseen: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It is an honour to be with you in the traditional territory of Treaty 6. I also acknowledge the Métis people, who share a deep and historic connection to these lands. I want to thank the constituents of Calgary-North and all the volunteers during the previous election for giving me the honour and privilege to be their MLA. I would also like to congratulate all my colleagues in this Legislature on their election results. No matter which side we're on in this Legislature, we can all agree that there are no bad seats here in this Chamber, although I must say, Madam Speaker, that your seat seems most comfortable. Again, congratulations on your election as Deputy Speaker of the House.

Madam Speaker, my family moved from a small farm town in Pakistan to Canada. Like many others, we moved in pursuit of better economic opportunities. I am the second-youngest amongst seven siblings. I was 17 when I came to Canada. As a newcomer to Canada I had to face many basic challenges such as cultural norms, social cues, and language.

[Mr. Hanson in the chair]

My first day in English class at Crescent Heights high school I was told to finish reading the Shakespearean play Hamlet so we could discuss it in the class on Monday next week. At this point I could barely understand Canadian English, let alone Shakespearean English. Let's just say that my Old English to Canadian English dictionary and my Canadian English to Urdu dictionary were working on overdrive that weekend. It wasn't until years later that I realized that no one really understood Shakespearean English anyways.

I graduated from grade 12 and received my diploma and later received my diploma in petroleum technology from the Southern Alberta Institute of Technology. Mr. Speaker, the year was 1979. Peter Lougheed was the Premier of Alberta then, a leader who fought a hard political fight for the people of this province.

After graduating, I started my career as a field technologist at the Gilby field office near my favourite Alberta town, Rimbey. There I worked for two years, became familiar with the rich culture of rural Alberta, developed life-long friendships, and also learned the game of curling. Being young and eager to try games that I had not seen before, I also tried cross-country skiing. As most of my time trying cross-country skiing was spent on my back, I decided that it was better for me to focus on my career.

Because of this, Madam Speaker, I was able to save money and put that together towards furthering my education. I was lucky to be granted an educational leave of absence by my employer. I joined the University of Wyoming and completed my bachelor of science degree in petroleum engineering in 1983. I then returned to work with the same employer. Those were the good times when Alberta used to have lots of economic opportunities not only for Albertans but for people across Canada. This phenomenon later became known as the Alberta advantage.

Now living in the city of Calgary, where I had earlier experienced social, language, and cultural issues as a newcomer, I decided to get involved in the community so I could help those facing the same challenges I did. This, Madam Speaker, became such a fulfilling and rewarding and enjoyable experience for me. This is when I realized the importance of giving back, the importance of helping others when they need it.

The 10th Premier of Alberta, the Hon. Peter Lougheed, is quoted as saying: I am a community person; I think in terms of community before individuals, and that is the essence of Albertans, and, to a large extent, that is the essence of Canadians as well. Unquote. This quote has inspired me to do as best as I could for the community around me in Calgary and now here at the Legislative Assembly of Alberta.

I served as the president of the Pakistan Canada Association for many years while also volunteering intermittently with organizations such the United Way, Junior Achievement, the Canadian Red Cross, the Food Bank, Mosaic Volunteers, and others. During this time, while I was raising my two sons with my wife, Parveen, I began to take evening classes, completing my master of engineering and MBA.

Madam Speaker, I strongly feel that whatever I have been able to accomplish has been linked with my employment and, in particular, Alberta's oil and gas sectors. This is why it is so sad to see that the same oil and gas sector, which used to be an economic engine of Canada, is suffering from the adverse economic impacts over the last few years. This is the feeling that is shared with many of the constituents in the riding that I am honoured to represent, Calgary-North.

Madam Speaker, my riding is amazing. I have lived in this riding or in the northern part of Calgary for 35 years, and in this riding, specifically this riding, since 2003. I have made Panorama Hills my home for the past 16 years because I truly believe Alberta is the place to live, work, and raise a family. For that reason my family and I are eternally grateful for all that Alberta has given us. The riding is beautiful with its schools and small businesses, beautiful paths and walkways, parks, a golf course, and spectacular views of the city. There are a number of languages spoken in the riding, including English, Tagalog, Punjabi, Cantonese, Mandarin, German, Spanish, Urdu, and a few more. Forty-three per cent of the population in Calgary-North identify themselves as immigrants. I do plan to work closely with this population and other Albertans as applicable in my portfolio as parliamentary secretary of immigration.

This spring I met so many amazing constituents who gave freely of their time and effort as we worked together to bring back the Alberta advantage. The comments, discussions, and advice at the door have been of immeasurable value to myself and our government. I want to thank everyone who gave me their trust to be their voice in the Alberta Legislature. I am so proud to serve the communities of Evanston, Creekside, Hidden Creek, Panorama Hills, and Carrington, with Panorama Hills being the largest community in Calgary, with a population of 26,000 people.

One doesn't have to go that far in these communities to find a network of extensive green spaces and parks, bike paths, and winding creeks for families to enjoy. Just outside my riding is a first-class recreational athletic centre called Vivo. Even though it is outside my riding, it is still vital to Calgary-North. This rec centre is widely used by residents of Calgary-North, including my own family. Vivo is committed to promoting a healthier lifestyle by offering several programs and services for all ages. This facility partners with academics to offer a living lab whose research is to explore how to live healthier. Since its inception the facility has been the recipient of provincial grants, allowing the centre to expand its facility and programs, particularly to the many students who live in the riding.

I think we can all agree that one of the most important investments we can make is educating our children. Alberta is committed to providing students with a safe learning environment. This is why our UCP government has pledged to maintain or increase educational funding. My constituency has four elementary and one junior high school. It is, however, in dire need of a public high school and a middle school. I pledge to be a strong advocate for the schooling needs in Calgary-North.

The most devastating thing I would hear at the door was that of layoffs and high unemployment rates in the province. Engineers, accountants, and IT professionals were a small example of professionals who were struggling. We need to get our resources to market. We need to get Alberta's oil to market. People are struggling. People are leaving our great province. Madam Speaker, time is of the essence. That's why I am so proud to be part of a team that is 110 per cent committed to supporting the economy. We will stand up for Alberta pipelines. We will stand up for Alberta oil. We will stand up for Alberta, period.

As promised during our election campaign, we will lower taxes so we can create more jobs. We will reduce regulatory burdens so we can create more jobs. We will foster a positive economic environment in the private sector so we can create more jobs. By creating more jobs, Madam Speaker, we will balance the budget so our children don't have to. I am, therefore, very pleased that this government is focused on getting Albertans back to work and restoring the Alberta advantage. The people of Calgary-North sent me here for a reason. We in this House have a special obligation not only to our own people in our own riding but to Albertans across Alberta. We are here to make a difference. Together we can and we will.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. Are there any comments or questions? The hon. Member for Calgary-Glenmore.

Ms Issik: Madam Speaker, the hon. member mentioned that he's the former president of the Pakistan Canada Association. He's been a treasured member of the cultural community from Pakistan in Calgary. Perhaps he can elaborate on the contributions of cultural communities in Calgary.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-North.

Mr. Yaseen: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member. Calgary is full of cultural associations and communities. They offer wonderful programs. They have cultural facilities, and for that matter, the Alberta Pakistan Canada Association has its own cultural centre in the northeast, which I was very much involved in creating way back in the late '90s, early 2000s. I think it was officially inaugurated by the hon. Gene Zwozdesky, who was the Speaker later on but at that time was the minister of community and social development. He came to Calgary to inaugurate that centre. I think that was in October 2002.

The contribution of the cultural associations and programs that we have: they offer programs where the mainstream has an opportunity to come and see what's happening in various cultural associations, whether it's Polish or Pakistani or Indian or whatever. They have lots of opportunities to learn and share the values from different parts of the world.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any more comments or questions under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It is the rare privilege of a lifetime to rise as the Member for Edmonton-South West and respond to the Lieutenant Governor's Speech from the Throne. I think that it is in order for me to offer my congratulations to you on your election as the Deputy Speaker of this House.

I want to start my maiden speech by extending my sincere congratulations to the esteemed members of the House on both sides of the aisle on their successful election campaigns. In the words of one of my heroes, John Paul II, "The future starts today, not tomorrow." Albertans sent us here for a reason. Now we must get to work to deliver the future they deserve. I want to thank all of my constituents who voted for me, and I want all of those who did not to know that I am here to represent them equally. I want to thank my fantastic volunteers, who gave me so much of their precious time and energy. Volunteers are the unsung heroes of our democratic process, and without them none of us would be here. I want to thank my family. I owe everything and more to my beautiful wife, Emem, and our three beloved children: Adanaya, 13 years old; Chisom, 11; and Ugonna, four. My family has sacrificed so much to support my political journey, and for this I am forever grateful.

Madam Speaker, my constituency is beautiful, and it is diverse. It is home to seniors, young families, new Canadians, public servants, professionals, business owners, and entrepreneurs. The new Edmonton-South West riding was first created in 2000 to accommodate the significant business and residential growth that occurred in southwest Edmonton. In my community you will find children playing outside and neighbours who feel a sense of community toward one another. We are home to some of Edmonton's most beautiful communities, including Wedgewood, Hodgson, Lessard, Jamieson Place, the Hamptons, Glastonbury, Grandview Heights, Edgemont, Woodbend Estates, Cameron Heights, Keswick, Glenriding, Ambleside, Windermere, Langdale, and more.

We were first represented in this Chamber by Matt Jeneroux, who is now serving successfully as the Member of Parliament for Edmonton Riverbend. Part of Edmonton-South West was once Edmonton-McClung. Another part was Edmonton-Whitemud, which has been represented by two former Premiers, the Hon. Don Getty and the hon. Dave Hancock. The people of my riding have high expectations for their leadership, and I look forward to serving them well.

Edmonton-South West is home to hundreds of acres of natural beauty along the North Saskatchewan River valley, which our government has sworn to protect through the creation of the Big Island provincial park.

Over the past year I've had the privilege of speaking to tens of thousands of Edmonton-South West residents. I heard their greatest hopes and their dreams for the future. Where I met this relentless optimism, Madam Speaker, I also heard the very suffering of people who had fallen victim to the actions of the previous NDP government over the past four years. I heard from young professionals who hadn't worked in months and sometimes even years, I heard from small-business owners who had to forego salaries in order to make payroll, I heard from young families who were struggling with an ever-increasing tax burden, and I heard from parents who were worried that their children would not be afforded the same opportunities they had.

Madam Speaker, my constituents were extremely worried about the direction of the former government, and they voted in large numbers for change. They were worried about the ideological NDP carbon tax. They couldn't understand why they were being punished for heating their homes, buying nutritious groceries, taking their kids to hockey practice, and living their normal lives. They were worried about the skyrocketing debt. They knew the NDP had us on course for more than $100 billion of debt and that their children and their children's children would be the ones left holding the bag. They were worried about the six credit downgrades that caused investment flight and shook investor confidence in our province, and they were worried about the NDP's habit of resorting to divisive identity politics whenever questions about their economic record came up.

The NDP's ideological policies weren't just fodder for debate in this Chamber; they had real consequences for real people's lives. Under their watch the unemployment rate skyrocketed, and nearly 200,000 of our fellow Albertans found themselves out of work. Others moved out of the province or quit looking altogether, having completely lost faith in our economy, and countless businesses shuttered their doors for good. The NDP presided over the decline of Canada's wealthiest and most prosperous province, the heartbeat of Canada's free-enterprise economy and the place that has created unprecedented opportunity and prosperity for people from all over the world.

Albertans don't want a handout; they want a hand up. Throughout our history, whenever we have been challenged, we have ever answered that call. Let's create the conditions Albertans need to succeed, and then get out of the way.

In the words of another of my heroes, President Ronald Reagan: "There are no great limits to growth because there are no limits of human intelligence, imagination, and wonder." Albertans are down but not out. Along with my colleagues I vow to restore the Alberta advantage for my constituents and for all Albertans, but I will need the help of this Assembly to get that job done. We as legislators are embarking on one of the greatest projects in our province's history: fixing the economy of this province, an economy that once made dreams come true but an economy right now in crisis.

Madam Speaker, I myself have been blessed to have lived the Alberta dream, a dream I would not have thought possible at the beginning of my life. My journey to this historic building did not begin last month or even last year but many years ago on a remote family farm in southeast Nigeria, called the Igbo of Nigeria. I was born just a few years after the devastating Nigerian civil war, otherwise known as the Biafran War. More than 2 million people died in that war, most of them were Igbos, and the precursor to this war was the persecution and slaughter of countless Igbo people. The Igbos are known across Africa as the wandering Jews of the continent due to the remarkable similarities in culture, early religion, enterprise, and world view. The oral history that has been passed down for thousands of years traces the origin of the Igbos to modern day Israel.

While I was born into this rich history, I was also born into extreme poverty. Madam Speaker, I cannot overemphasize that phrase "extreme poverty." I am the seventh of 11 children. Two of my siblings, Thaddeus and Chinedu, have passed away. May their souls continue to rest in perfect peace. Growing up, my brothers and sisters and I lacked access to proper nutrition, medicine, and education. The life expectancy in Nigeria at that time was around 40 years, the lowest of all West African countries.

My parents were rural farmers. It was not mechanized farming, Madam Speaker, so my brothers and sisters and I worked the farm with mostly our bare hands. We grew yams, cassava, palm oil, maize, plantain, and groundnuts, among others. We cultivated, planted, weeded, and harvested the fields with less than ideal equipment such as hoes, knives, and shovels. Our farm saw our blood, sweat, and tears, but despite our hard work, we could not afford two square meals a day. For most of my teenage years my mother wore the same wrapper day after day, week after week.

Neither my mother nor my father had ever been to school, but they knew education was the key to unlocking a better future for their children. They worked so hard to ensure we attended primary and secondary school even though they knew this would likely take us away from the farm. While in primary school I made myself a promise based on a conversation I had with my dad's oldest sister when I was nine years old. My aunt told me that she had seen that I was going to become a lawyer in our native Igbo language. I had no idea what that meant at the time, but she described it to me, Madam Speaker. That conversation stuck with me.

After secondary school poverty threatened my dream of going to the university. I decided to take a risk and moved to Lagos. It was in Lagos where I started what I call petty trading, buying clothes and shoes and selling them to white-collar workers on the commercial streets in Lagos. I used the money I earned from this to become the first in my family to attend the university in Nigeria, the University of Lagos. I continued petty trading throughout university and law school, using the money to pay for my education and eventually that of my younger siblings.

Madam Speaker, it was on the first day of university that I met the love of my life, Emem. Little did I know then that this chance encounter, given to me by the grace of God, would change the trajectory of the rest of my life. Emem and I came from two separate backgrounds, however. Emem's parents were very educated, unlike mine. Her dad was an engineer and her mom was a lawyer in the registrar at a different university. Despite our differences, Emem saw in me someone I had yet to see in myself. She believed God had great things planned for me and for us. Despite my poor beginnings she drove me to never rest on my laurels but to continue dreaming bigger.

After practising law for a couple of years in Nigeria and after just a week-old marriage, Emem travelled to Canada to pursue her master's degree in law at the University of Alberta. I soon joined Emem in Edmonton. Prior to Emem's admission we had decided we wanted to live, work, and raise our family in the best place on Earth, a place we heard was teeming with hope and opportunity. I took a position with the patient food services at the University of Alberta hospital, making meals and washing dishes for our most vulnerable citizens. This work forever changed my life, awakening in me a desire to help others. While many looked at this as a step backward, I was very grateful for this opportunity as it allowed me to support my young family while my wife furthered her studies.

Following this I went on to work for Legal Aid Alberta and the public service. After writing my exams for my Canadian law degree equivalency, I was called to the bar, becoming a lawyer in Canada. I continued to give back in any way I could, volunteering for the Edmonton Community Legal Centre, the lawyer referral service, my local church, and community organizations.

As the MLA for Edmonton-South West I now find myself in the best position to help others that I have ever been in, and that's exactly what I intend to do. The next four years, Madam Speaker, will not be about settling scores or imposing any sort of political ideology. The next four years will be about bringing investment back to Alberta, growing the economy, implementing common-sense policies, and getting Albertans back to work.

In Nigeria there's a proverb that says that a single tree cannot make a forest. I always remind myself of this proverb because it reminds me that no matter what I accomplish in life, I accomplish it with the help of others. Standing before you, Madam Speaker, I think about this proverb and everything everybody did for me: my parents; my brothers and sisters; my teachers; my wife; my three amazing children; my MLA colleagues; my friends and volunteers, who worked tirelessly for me during the election; and, of course, the residents of Edmonton-South West. I am here not for myself but for them, and for them I will work tirelessly to create the future Alberta deserves. This is what the Alberta dream is all about, using one's success to facilitate the success of others and always conducting oneself with a sense of kindness, passion, and community. These are lessons I am now trying to teach my three children. While they may be growing up in a different world than I did, these ideas are universal for the prescription of a good life.

I am so thankful I followed my parents' wisdom all those years ago, and I thank God every day that they are still alive to see what their wisdom has become and how it is still helping others. I believe that public service is an honourable calling, and I'm eager to get to work alongside my new colleagues and our new Premier, who is one of the greatest leaders our country has ever known. In just a few weeks he has shown Albertans how committed he is to improving their lives. As soon as he was sworn in as the Premier, he travelled to Ottawa to fight against Justin Trudeau's Bill C-48, the west coast tanker ban, and Bill C-69, the no-more-pipelines bill. Under the Premier's leadership we have already tabled several pieces of flagship legislation, including the carbon tax repeal act, which is now law; the Job Creation Tax Cut (Alberta Corporate Tax Amendment) Act; the open for business act; and the Municipal Government (Property Tax Incentives) Amendment Act, 2019.

I fully endorse our government's Alberta advantage immigration strategy, geared towards attracting new entrepreneurs to our province. Our Premier is truly one of the hardest working people I have ever known, and I look forward to working with him as well as my other talented government colleagues to pass these bills and get Albertans working again.

I want to end on a quote from another one of my heroes.

The Deputy Speaker: Comments under 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Lac La Biche.

Ms Goodridge: Thank you, Madam Speaker. You know, I thoroughly enjoyed listening to your maiden speech, and I was just wondering if you could perhaps give us your favourite quote. I'd really appreciate hearing that.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I wanted to end this speech with one of my other heroes, Abraham Lincoln. "We can succeed only by concert. It is not 'can any of us imagine better?' but 'can we all do better?'"

This is reflective of how I view the world, and I look forward, you know, to reaching across the aisle and finding common ground, where possible, with the opposition. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any additional comments under Standing Order 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, the hon. Minister of Justice and Solicitor General and keeper of the great seal.

Mr. Schweitzer: It is an honour to rise, Madam Speaker, to speak in response to the Speech from the Throne and provide my maiden speech. I also want to thank my constituents of Calgary-Elbow and the team of people that helped, you know, get me here. So many times over the last year – this campaign that we launched was over a year ago – we were out door-knocking in minus 30-degree temperatures with large teams of people, and every time our team wondered whether or not our volunteers would continue to come out, people kept coming because this campaign that we ran mattered to them and it mattered to the people of our community.

It is absolutely humbling to be the representative for Calgary-Elbow. I'll get into it and tell you a little bit of detail about my constituency here, but it truly is a unique constituency in the city of Calgary. It's known by the name Elbow. People sometimes think of it just as one part of the constituency, but it truly is a diverse, inner-city constituency in Calgary. We have some of the highest density areas for rental properties. We also have Mount Royal University. We have Chinook mall. We have areas as well that were impacted by flooding in 2013. So it's a very diverse constituency with lots of different needs and also, you know, requests of their elected officials. It's a true honour to represent the community and be here to be able to give this speech today.

The constituency also has a deep and storied history of elected representatives. Some of them are very colourful. One of them is the former Premier Ralph Klein, known by many affectionately as King Ralph. When you door-knock and talk to constituents that remember King Ralph, they remind you on a regular basis that he held up a sign saying Paid in Full. It is often a reminder of how important this job is and how important it is to get Albertans back to work.

Also, not a day went by in that campaign where we didn't talk to somebody that was struggling, somebody that was wondering whether or not they were going to be able to make their mortgage payment or whether or not their kids were going to have a future in this province. So for them: I've received your messages loud and clear. I will hopefully represent you throughout this term with dignity and respect and make sure that I continue to listen to you.

I look forward as well to getting back to the doors here in the fall. Our team: I know that we're probably up there for some of the most door-knocking in Alberta, but we made it through our entire constituency five times – and that truly was a grounding experience as well – to make sure that we heard people, that we understood what their concerns were. Again, a huge thank you to my team and everybody there on the ground.

Also, it's an honour to serve as the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General, also, as you mentioned, keeper of the great seal, which is one of my favourite titles. It's just such a foundation of our democracy, to preserve our justice and make sure that Albertans know that they can live in a strong and free society. I don't take that lightly.

I also want to thank my family. I'll get into some remarks about my beautiful wife, Jen, but I also want to say just a few things to my two amazing daughters, Heidi and Stella. The one thing that really got them excited over the last year was when I got the call to be asked to be in cabinet. Their response was: yes, waterslides. To them, the West Edmonton Mall water park was the highlight of dad's political career. It puts things in context sometimes as to what it was. I must say that I was disappointed that the loop-the-loop waterslide, kind of that pinky-purple one, was not in operation that day, so my children are determined to take dad back to the West Edmonton Mall waterslide so we can take on that challenge as well.

Also, my parents, Ed and Karen, had the opportunity to come and see me be sworn in as an MLA. My mom was a schoolteacher. My dad was an entrepreneur. My dad was also an Edmonton police officer. When he was a young boy, at that point in time there was no high school in his community here in Alberta, and he actually came to Edmonton to go to Concordia. He went to Concordia, and after that he went on, in his late teens, to the Edmonton police force, where he served for a number of years. His claim to fame, he told me, was that one time when he was in a high-pursuit chase, he rolled his police car and got himself onto the front page of the Edmonton Journal. Luckily, it was not his photo but that of his car upside down. That was his claim to fame here in Edmonton when he was a young man.

Also, I just want to talk a little bit about my family history as well in this province. My grandparents on my dad's side experienced a war-torn Europe in World War I. My grandma remembers what it was like having Russian troops live in their home. They didn't know each other yet, but as young teenagers they both set out for a country of hope, where they knew that they could have prosperity and the ability to farm and, hopefully, live in peace. Both of them chose to come here to Alberta and set up near Goodfare, which is in the Peace Country, close to Grande Prairie. They raised eight children; my dad was one of them. I'm just immensely proud to see how many of my family members have gone on to stay here in this province and make this home.

On my mom's side of the family as well there is a long history in Alberta. My great-grandfather Richard Longhurst was a member of the 89th Battalion, which was recruited across Alberta and mobilized in Calgary. He went on and was wounded at Vimy Ridge. When he came home, he never actually spoke about the war or his experiences that he had when he was there, but one of the things that I've seen and my mom preserves is the notes that he actually would send back to my grandfather Master Eric. He would actually send them. Also, the photo that he had with the Winnie the Pooh – the Winnie the Pooh – is one of the most precious items that he sent to my grandfather. My grandfather also went on to serve in World War II, where he served and volunteered. He actually wasn't there for the birth of my mother. He didn't get to see her until she was about a year old, I believe, when she was a young girl.

I just want to say that it's humbling just to kind of see the history of your own family. I'm actually very, very moved by my colleague Minister Madu and his story about his family and how far his own life story has come. We all stand on our families' histories, and for me it's just grounding. I'm thankful for everything that everyone has ever done to get me to this point in my life, and it's just with deep honour that I say thank you to them and everyone in my family at this point.

I want to turn now to why I decided to get into politics. As many people in this room know, I'm a restructuring lawyer by trade. Many people don't know what a restructuring lawyer is, but we help companies and people in financial difficulty. Over the last number of years here in the province of Alberta too many Albertans have been facing financial challenges that other jurisdictions facing similar issues policywise were not facing. Time after time I would meet people. I'd meet a husband and wife who had built a small business here in this province, and they were having a tough time. They couldn't make payroll. There were, you know, economic challenges. They could accept that there were economic challenges, but they couldn't accept the policy framework here in Alberta that they felt was working against them.

Time after time we'd go out to the market. We'd try and see if we could come up with a solution so they could keep their employees, so they could keep the people that they cared about working here in this great province of Alberta, and time and time again we simply could not find them the resources that they needed to keep the lights on, to keep it going. Too many times I'd see these people go away, tears in their eyes, knowing that they'd actually have to go to their employees and face them, people that are family to them, and tell them that they'd have to turn the lights out. All the equipment would go to the auction yard. Ritchie Bros. auction yard was full here at unprecedented levels, Madam Speaker. It's unacceptable that Albertans have had to live through that in a way for the last four years. Seeing so many people go through this, I felt compelled to get up and run.

It hits me at a personal level because my own family in the early 1980s went through a very similar circumstance. My mother had taken time away from being a teacher to raise us as kids, and my parents had started a small business. At that point in the early 1980s we faced national energy programs, we had 20 per cent interest rates, and we had failed policies that economically devastated the west. My parents had their small business. They lost their small business. We lost our home. I remember an extended period of time in my youth with a great uncertainty as to what the future would hold. I remember what it was like to have an empty fridge. I remember overhearing my parents talking about whether or not they're going to be able to pay their rent. I do remember the great charity of our church and community, time and time again people in our community stepping up to help our family go through some great difficulties.

My parents are my ultimate heroes in life. I was asked one time in the media: who do you truly respect? It's my parents. The reason why I respect my parents so, so much is that they never quit. They never gave up. They always wanted to be an example for me and my siblings. So to them I say thank you for everything that they did for us to get us to where we are. My parents did recover, but it took them an immense amount of time. We really didn't have stability financially in our lives until I was about 11 or 12 years old as a kid. My siblings were older than me. I was the youngest one. They remember it more vividly than I do. But my parents did recover. They're now comfortably retired. My dad decided to retire at the age of 82. He kept working throughout his life, had that work ethic. My brother went on to become an accountant. My sister went on to become a well-published professor at York University.

I decided to pursue the really, you know, conservative profession, when I was younger – or at least I tried to make it a profession – of becoming a baseball player. I decided that I wanted to pursue that, so I had the great fortune of going on and playing college athletics in the United States. The one thing about being a pitcher, though – and I got opportunity after opportunity because in baseball I was strong. I could throw hard. I could stand at home plate and throw a ball out of the baseball stadium, but for some reason when you're a pitcher, to be able to take that to that next level, you have to be able to throw strikes, and that was one thing that was lost on me. I would walk a guy, hit a guy, strike a guy out, and after years of catchers groaning about having to catch for me, I decided that maybe some other path was in the future for me.

I came back to Canada at that point in time, looked at my somewhat jumbled transcript, I would have to say, after attending many different undergraduate institutions pursuing my dream of baseball, and realized that it would take me just as long to finish my undergrad as it would for me to go to law school and just finish that, so I decided at that point in time to write the LSAT. It didn't occur to me at that point in time in my life that people actually prepared for the LSAT.

Again, I decided to write the LSAT. It wasn't available where I was, so I drove up to Kamloops at that point in time, wrote the LSAT that morning. One of the things that I learned from writing that LSAT exam, as I compared that to my law school exam experience, was that I needed to wake up a little bit earlier than just showing up at the exam right when the bell went off, but I did well enough to get into the University of Manitoba. I had never been to Winnipeg before, but I heard it was a nice city, and I decided to go to law school at the University of Manitoba.

I am very fortunate that that happened in my life because that's where I met my wife, Jen. My wife, Jen, was a first-year law student like myself. She met me and quickly turned around and decided to run away. She thought I was an American because I still had a little bit of an American accent, apparently, at that time in my life. But luckily her last name and mine were both towards the end of the alphabet, so we were in many classes together, and shortly around Christmastime of that year we started dating, and by the time we graduated, we decided to get married.

Now, my wife is one of the most determined, smart, savvy individuals that I've ever met in my life, and she is truly the greatest partner. For me, personally, she saw definitely – I don't even think I was a diamond in the rough. I was probably a lump of coal at that time in my life from a refinement standpoint, and she stood with me throughout that. To speak to her patience: when we were set to graduate law school, I was involved in a few different things at that point in time, and her patience is to the point where we graduated law school on a Friday – I was involved in a political campaign; it might shock people to hear that I was involved in a political campaign – I won a leadership campaign on the Saturday, and then we got married on Monday. So in one weekend, we graduated, I won a campaign, and we got married. I helped with the flowers a little bit on the Monday, but other than that – Madam Speaker, my wife is truly an amazing woman.

I also want to turn to the first year of our marriage, getting back again to the patience of my wife. She got an articling job right away. She got an articling job in Manitoba. She was born and raised a Manitoba girl. She got a job in Manitoba, her dream job, doing criminal defence work. She got a job there. I, on the other hand, did not get a job in Manitoba. I went through the interview process, and they looked at me and said: "I don't know how exactly you're going to build a business here in Manitoba. You're not from here." And they took a pass at that point in time in my illustrious law student days. But at that point in time I had a chat with my then fiancée and said: "Okay. Well, what are we going to do? Obviously, I need to work. Let's take a look at: where in Canada do I want to be? Where in Canada do we want to be going forward?"

So we took a look at an amazing city called Calgary. I remember to this day the difference in experience that it was like actually going to that interview. At that point in time I was interviewing with a law firm called Bennett Jones. The experience that I had with those folks: they told me literally in the meeting: "We don't care who your parents are. We don't care where you come from. We want to know you have a good head on your shoulders because here in Alberta you can make it."

I was sold at that point in time. I told my wife: "This is where we need to be. This is what the future holds for us and our family.

We've got to make this work." We spent the first year of our marriage apart in different cities, and now we're here.

The Deputy Speaker: Comments or questions under Standing Order 29(2)(a)? The hon. government whip.

Mr. Ellis: Yeah. Thank you very much. You know, having known this member for quite some time, I'm sure I'd like to hear a little bit more as to what he had to say and to probably finish the remaining part of his speech.

Thank you.

Mr. Schweitzer: Building on that, Alberta was where we wanted to be. We had to be here. Just seeing how confident this city that we were in, Calgary, and the rest of the province was, it was setting the national agenda at that point in time. It was the magnet for talent, the magnet for young, talented people to come to to build their lives. For me, when I saw that, that's where I needed to be, and I want my daughters and I want all Albertans to experience that once again.

One of the most painful things that I experienced in the last few years in politics and campaigning was having young university students come up to me and say, "Your generation had it easier than mine." I'm 40 years old. They said: "Your generation had it easier than mine. We want the same opportunities. We're tired of our friends having to leave this province to go find opportunities. This is our home. We want to be here. We want a government that's going to reflect that and fight for jobs and our future here in this province."

For me, Madam Speaker, I was driven to run to do that. I'm actually amazed at the professionalism, the collegiality of the government members, and as I've gotten to know so many of you over the last few weeks and months here, I'm looking forward to working on our agenda here, focused on jobs, the economy, and pipelines. I'm looking forward as well to working with members of the opposition, where it sees fit. My door is open. If there are areas that they have issues with, we're here to work with everyone, to be here for all Albertans.

With that, I say thank you. I look forward to working with everyone here, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you, sir. Thank you very much.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. government whip.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you. I believe I have spoken to this.

Madam Speaker, I'd like to take this opportunity to adjourn debate. Thank you.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Municipal Government (Property Tax Incentives) Amendment Act, 2019

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I am pleased to rise and move second reading of Bill 7, Municipal Government (Property Tax Incentives) Amendment Act, 2019.

This legislation would empower municipalities to attract investment, create jobs, and realize their full economic potential. Municipalities desire the freedom and opportunity to make choices that fit them best. As it stands, municipalities have the ability to cancel, defer, or refund property taxes for a specific year. That helps provide relief to property owners in times of hardship, but it does little to support economic investment since businesses are looking for longer term certainty.

The legislation that we are proposing is concise. We are proposing to expand the powers of municipal councils to create property tax incentive programs. Municipalities know what is best for their residents. We are simply getting out of their way and letting them do it. If passed, Bill 7 would allow municipalities to provide property tax incentives for up to 15 years, down from the year-to-year incentive program that we allowed previously. This would give Alberta a competitive advantage over jurisdictions across Canada and the United States. Other jurisdictions have programs like this in place: Saskatchewan, British Columbia as well as Texas and Louisiana. If passed, we will be helping municipalities provide one of the longest tax incentive timelines in North America.

Another proposed amendment would require any tax incentives a municipality chooses to put in place to be included on the municipality's tax assessment and tax roll. This would allow public access to information about the properties that have received tax incentives. This transparency is already in place for other types of property tax exemptions. Our proposed legislation would mirror this requirement.

Another proposed change to the act would require that decisions come in written form. This explanation would outline the extent of any property tax incentives a municipality would put in place. This would ensure continued transparency for any business that applied for property tax relief. Our proposed legislation would allow an appeal process for any decisions that are made on the property tax incentives. This proposed legislation would allow municipalities the choice to permit municipal staff to make decisions on incentive applications. It would also allow these decisions to be appealed to municipal council. These decisions can be reviewed by the courts, who have taken the steps in this proposed legislation to reduce the review time to 60 days, down from the default timeline of six months. This would allow swift resolution of any dispute that may come up.

If passed, this legislation would allow the incentives to continue even when part of one municipality is annexed by another. This would allow more certainty for businesses, all guaranteeing the property tax incentives for the duration of their term as long as they continue to meet the conditions set by the specific municipality. In fact, this proposed amendment would give municipalities the ability to include conditions or criteria in their incentive programs, giving them the tools to hold businesses accountable and, in the worst-case scenario, cancel the incentive if the business does not live up to its commitment.

Some individuals and groups may disagree with the proposed legislation, thinking that it may lead to increased competition between municipalities. Increased competition is exactly what we are looking for. We want to help grow our economy, not just manage it. If passed, I believe that this legislation will bolster investment and economic development across our great province.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister. Just to confirm, as I was switching over into the chair, this was moving second reading of Bill 7?

Mr. Madu: Yes. That was exactly what I said, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you very much.

Are there any other members wishing to speak at second reading? I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo standing.

Member Ceci: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I want to thank the hon. member for bringing this forward and for saying some of the things he said about municipalities, especially things like: they know what's best. They do know what's best, and that's why the lack of consultation with municipalities around this legislation is astounding. It's stunning why this minister didn't reach out and talk to mayors and reeves around this province, talk to the organizations that they all belong to, with regard to: "Do you need this? Would this help you? Would this attract more business and development and investment and create jobs?"

I think, Mr. Speaker, that had the hon. minister done that research, he would have found out that, you know, this is not the top – this is not the top – of the list for municipalities of things they want to see. In fact, what they want to see is that they want this province, they want this government to get back to the table, sooner than later, with regard to a funding framework, a fiscal framework for municipalities that they need to have in place by 2021, when the MSI agreement runs out.

It's stunning that the government would bring this forward and say that this will fix things for municipalities. What this will actually do is potentially create some disagreements between municipalities. A cynical person could say that much will go on between municipalities but not in a positive way as a result of the bill, the legislation, brought forward here today.

Some problems that I have with this bill I can tell you are what was mentioned by the hon. minister just a second ago. He said that if a decision gets put in place by one municipality with regard to tax exemptions for a business potentially up to 15 years and then potentially to get renewed after that and if it's adjacent to another municipality, a municipality that wants to look at annexing in a planned way so that urban services can go out in a planned way, if there are all of these tax-exempt companies and properties on their border, then that municipality that wants to annex in a planned way will be stymied because they won't get any of those property taxes from those nonresidential or businesses far into the future, Mr. Speaker. They have to assume the exemptions or the deferrals that were given to that company by another municipality, and that's not a good thing.

You know, this is not an improvement on what we have. We already, in the MGA under specific sections, have the ability to, as the minister says, grant deferrals or exemptions to property, and many, many municipalities have done that for their businesses in their areas over time. In fact, when we were government, Mr. Speaker, I can tell you that the city of Lethbridge approached the government of Alberta around one of the biggest private investments they wanted to land in that city, Cavendish Farms. Cavendish Farms approached Lethbridge, approached the province of Alberta, and got their support that they needed to make that final investment decision with regard to the location of their plant in Lethbridge, and all of that took place under the existing legislation.

Numerous media reports have been in the paper, with different people speaking out positively and negatively about this, Mr. Speaker. Some of the positives that we can see are that some mayors talk about the increased flexibility they will have to use this tool, but I would contend that there are already tools in place that they can use and have used successfully to attract investment and jobs and businesses.

Some of the negative things they've said, Mr. Speaker, are far more numerous than the positives. They have talked about the potential of this being a race to the bottom or a competition. As the hon. minister says, we want there to be competition amongst municipalities for the betterment, I guess, of all of Alberta, but I can tell you that many are concerned that the competition will lead to a race to the bottom amongst municipalities, and therefore they will not have the ability to collect proper taxes that are needed to support operational budgets and maintain programs and services and things like roads and sewers and all those other things. So the race to the bottom, the competition, will actually be a bad thing for municipalities.

The Edmonton metro board talks about a number of municipalities in and around the city of Edmonton that like to work together, Mr. Speaker, that believe that if they work together, they can go much farther as a group than they would as any individual municipality. They talked about that as hunting like a pack. They believe that they sell the best of their region to those who want to invest. What this might do, this very legislation brought up by this hon. minister, is that this might strain and crack the ability of the Edmonton metro board to hunt like a pack. I hope it doesn't happen, but it could happen where one municipality breaks away from the rest and figures that they've got more to achieve on their own than their pack would have as a group. That's not a really great thing either.

They've tried to put together reasonable intermunicipal co-operation agreements with each other, and frankly, Mr. Speaker, isn't that what we want municipalities to do, to co-operate together so that they can build a stronger, more united region or Alberta together? That's, I think, what's missed by this legislation. What this minister likes to tout as, you know, a new advantage, where there will be competition amongst municipalities, could potentially lead to those same municipalities eating each other's lunch and having more conflict arise.

Mr. Speaker, the other thing that's missing, notably, from this legislation is no hint at all of the province of Alberta participating in this scheme besides putting the legislation together. If they're so confident, if the government is so confident that this will work for municipalities, why is no government money on the table; namely, the education portion of the nonresidential property tax? That's not mentioned at all here in my read of this legislation, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps the hon. minister can confirm or deny that the government of Alberta will still be collecting its educational property tax if a municipality decides that they want to not collect or defer the municipal portion of that property tax. The government of Alberta will still be able to collect theirs because there's no mention that that would not come to the province of Alberta, as it does now. The government's confidence in this seems to be lacking because they're not putting any money at all behind this initiative.

Municipal leaders have been popping up around the province saying: you know, this legislation popped up on our radar; we didn't know about it. I'm sure the hon. minister and his colleagues in this debate will say: well, you need to look at our policy platform for the election because it was in there. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that in the 101 pages of policy platform in the municipal governance section this was one line – one line – in 101 pages. It's been brought forward in terms of legislation here today.

You know, it's talked about as being what municipalities need. What they really need is certainty of income. They need businesses to locate, and they need the ability to plan for their futures. I think this is going to strain all of that. It's going to put a lot of tension intermunicipally, in between municipalities, and it's going to be a problem. The issue, in addition to some of those that have been talked about by myself, is that we don't know how one municipality will use this as a tool and other municipalities may not use it as a tool. Really, will those other municipalities be left behind? Probably, Mr. Speaker.

Will this attract any more business to this province, or will it cause municipality A to race to the bottom to try and get under municipality B? The argument that it's going to attract business from other places, nationally and internationally, I don't think really holds water. What we'll see is that business will go shopping amongst municipalities and have those quiet conversations with mayors. They'll say: "Mr. Mayor, I was just down the road at this municipality, and they've said that they'll do this for five years. What are you willing to do, Mr. Mayor? Will you kind of undercut them and go for seven or go for 15 years?" You know, I just don't think that's the kind of conversation we need to be having at the municipal level and that mayors need to be having at the municipal level, because, Mr. Speaker, it's a race to the bottom. It's not intermunicipally building relationships; it's more a dog-eat-dog kind of approach.

I'm really disappointed that the government would bring this forward, it being only one line in their platform and not a line that, you know, municipal mayors and reeves and councillors believed was first on the agenda. First on their agenda is always, always, always: do we have a long-term funding arrangement with the province, and what is that arrangement like? Now, we did that. We put that in place for Edmonton and Calgary, and we were working with the other two associations to put the same thing in place with them. Mr. Speaker, had we been sitting on that side right now, we'd be working on that and making that happen instead of further delaying them, as has been the case with this current government.

Mr. Speaker, I'm of the view that the kinds of things that are in this legislation are just going to lead to challenges amongst all of the municipalities and that we have current rules in place in the MGA where these same sorts of things can take place and have taken place across Alberta and, no doubt, will continue to take place across Alberta.

What we, of course, I think, need is that we need this government to step back, actually go and talk to the local partners, whom they value so highly but didn't talk to in advance of bringing this forward, and talk to them about the different provisions in here. I think one of the things they'll hear is: "If you believe so strongly in this, why isn't there any provincial money on the table? Like, you're expecting us to give deferrals and exemptions. Why isn't there any provincial money on the table?" If the minister can answer that question, that would be really helpful for me to understand. The minister could also maybe take an opportunity to answer the question: why this? Was it being clamoured for by municipalities across the province? I certainly wasn't aware of any large, significant clamour by individuals saying that they needed to exempt more property from nonresidential property taxes.

Mr. Speaker, it used to be good enough that we had an excellent education system in this province, one that was talked about by the government side just a little while ago. We have excellent services and programs, rule of law, safety in our communities, like I said, an excellent workforce, a young workforce. Those were seen as attractors to Alberta, and from all my time in city council, 15 years, I can tell you that those are significant benefits to any corporation that wants to locate in Alberta.

Now, those are the kinds of things that I can remember mayors of the day that I served with would say when they would go down to Montreal and, say, meet with CP Rail. CP Rail, as you remember, in the mid-90s moved to Calgary and created a head office in Calgary after having one in Montreal for 100 years or so. It wasn't because they were being offered a deferral of taxes. It was because of those other five things that I talked about: a good workforce, a good culture, excellent academics in our province, postsecondary education, great health care. All those things were the attractor, not the fact that they wouldn't have to pay property tax for a period of years. They came because of those other things.

I submit that, you know, if we really want to help municipalities out, we would start working on long-term funding agreements with those municipalities, not give them more opportunities to not collect nonresidential property tax and not put any provincial money up at the same time. Mr. Speaker, these are tweaks we don't need. It's not at the top of the municipal agenda, and we should just go back to talking to them before we bring anything forward. If I were that minister, I would take the opportunity to step back, talk to municipalities – “Let's do this together” – as opposed to springing something in this Legislature that they haven't asked for nor need.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you.

As the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo was the second speaker on this, there is no 29(2)(a) available.

However, is there another member who would like to speak? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Ganley: Calgary-Mountain View.

The Acting Speaker: Calgary-Mountain View. Yes, of course.

An Hon. Member: Close.

Ms Ganley: Close-ish. Fair enough.

Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Interestingly, I think that with respect to this bill I probably have more questions than comments. As many members of this House will be aware, in the last four years we underwent a significant rewrite of the Municipal Government Act. This is something with which I am intimately familiar. I'm sure many members of the government bench are aware of the Legislative Review Committee and the joy that it can be to chair that committee. I personally actually really, really liked it although as it turns out, many of my colleagues were not as enthused as I was.

Of course, that committee had to review extensive changes to the Municipal Government Act, which is why I remember doing extensive changes to the Municipal Government Act. Those were quite extensively consulted on. They came in in a series of different phases, which is an interesting logic conundrum, I guess, when you're dealing with amending portions of an amending act which itself isn't yet proclaimed. Those changes tended to be brought in, and then they would be consulted on in between legislative sessions and then passed in future legislative sessions.

After we went through the process with the legislation, the next process was with respect to the regulations. There are sort of special provisions under the Municipal Government Act with respect to those regulations that require them to be posted for 60 days so that municipal politicians and the public generally have the opportunity to see them and to form opinions on them or consider them and then to get back to government before those regulations are actually brought in by order in council. In that rather extensive process I don't actually recall anyone saying that the powers that they have currently with respect to this issue were inadequate.

For the sake of the record I will read in that section 347(1) of the Municipal Government Act presently states:

If a council considers it equitable to do so, it may, generally or with respect to a particular taxable property or business or a class of taxable property or business, do one or more of the following [things], with or without conditions:

- (a) cancel or reduce tax arrears;
- (b) cancel or refund all or part of a tax;
- (c) defer the collection of [taxes].

- (2) A council may phase in a tax increase or decrease resulting from the preparation of any new assessment.

To me, in substance, that appears to do already what it is that we're attempting to amend the act to do.

I'm, I guess, a little confused, in a rather packed legislative session that is already scheduled to run into the summer, why it is that this was such an urgent priority. It wasn't featured prominently in the election. It wasn't featured prominently in the platform. I don't recall, again, in the rather extensive consultation done on previous amendments to this same act, anyone cropping up and asking for this, and it appears that it doesn't do anything that the act didn't already permit or enable. So, yes, I guess I'm curious as to why it is that we're here having this conversation.

In fact, municipalities have created tax incentive programs under the current provisions. Lethbridge, for instance, has done some. In 2015 they established a targeted redevelopment incentive policy to promote new construction and major renovations. Chestermere also created a policy in 2019 to enable tax cancellation for nonresidential commercial developments, industrial developments, seniors' housing, multifamily housing in the form of three- or four-storey apartment buildings. In May 2019 Calgary council provided a one-time cancellation of $94,000 in property taxes for the Royal Canadian Legion in Kensington. Those are a couple of the places that it appears already to have been used.

I'd be interested to see the reasons for this. I wouldn't necessarily state that I'm against it. I'm just sort of concerned as to what the reason for this is. It seems to be less an issue of needing power and less an issue of needing legislation and more an issue of needing talking points. We all know, certainly, in Calgary that businesses are having a real struggle. It's because of a series of circumstances that I'm sure most members of this House are familiar with and that I don't need to go into in extensive detail. There's less tax base to draw from in the core, and that's potentially pushing costs out onto other businesses in Calgary. It's become rather a hot issue in recent days. It is a concern. I think it has been a concern in the past. I'm a little concerned that this is less granting municipalities more power – I think that they already have those powers – and more the government being able to say: well, municipalities, we did for you, and if you didn't cut taxes and cut your budget and do all sorts of things, then that's on you.

I'm a little concerned it's going to turn into this rhetoric, this rhetoric that we hear all the time that I think is destructive to the importance of our public services, about how everything is a waste and everyone who works for government is a bureaucrat and they deserve to have their salaries cut and their jobs cut and various other things. I don't believe that most of that is true in many cases.

Certainly, as additional technologies come on stream, as new ways of doing things exist, it's totally possible to find efficiencies. We found a huge number of efficiencies in court systems over the last four years. There were a number of different policies and processes that were changed because of the addition of technology, because of sort of new systems that came online. There's a lot of that that, admittedly, can be found. One of my favourites is still the bill that makes it the case that if you don't pay your C-Train ticket, a warrant is no longer issued for your arrest. I think that that was a huge efficiency in terms of typing those warrants and checking those warrants and having to enter them in the police system and the court system and everything else.

I'm not saying that efficiencies don't exist; I'm just a little concerned that this bill is an exercise in communications to try to sort of point the finger at municipalities and say, "Well, we gave you all the tools you need; if you can't find the money, then too bad, so sad," but really they haven't given them any additional tools. So the problem that existed continues to exist, and it continues to exist in pretty much exactly the same form that it existed previously. Yeah. I think that's a concern to me.

Now, perhaps I'm incorrect. I obviously don't have the benefit of the in-depth briefing that members across the way have with respect to this, but I would be interested to hear what ways this creates additional or new or different powers and who it was that was asking for those additional new or different powers because, yeah, I mean, it seems to do something that could already be done.

With that, I will close my comments. Thank you for much.

The Acting Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available should anyone have any questions or comments.

Seeing none, are there any members looking to speak to the matter? I see the hon. Member for Calgary-McCall standing.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to speak to the bill, the Municipal Government (Property Tax Incentives) Amendment Act, 2019, which, on the face of it, creates incentives and programs that somehow will – again, the same talking points for every bill – attract investment, create jobs in Calgary. I think this election and this party's platform was about jobs, the economy, the pipeline, and that's exactly what Albertans needed. They needed more jobs, and they wanted to see their economy improved, but so far what we have seen from this government is – the way, I guess, they were describing it is that hope is on the horizon and all those things. So far in whatever they have put forward, I think, we didn't see that hope. I guess, today there were new numbers for job numbers. Alberta lost 21,000 full-time jobs just in May. So there is still something missing that businesses failed to see. Albertans failed to see that hope. That is one, that kind of bill, which doesn't give any hope, doesn't attract any investment, doesn't create any jobs. It can be a good political stunt, but insofar as jobs, economy, pipelines, all those things are concerned, that doesn't do anything. That doesn't create those jobs, doesn't give a boost to the economy.

In an effort to support and attract businesses, small businesses, for instance, when we were in government, we worked with businesses, and we were able to offer incentives such as that we were able to cut taxes by one-third. That was something businesses were looking for. We were able to work with ATB, who were able to work with Business Development Bank of Canada, and come up with almost $2.5 billion to increase the borrowing limit, to make it easier for businesses to access loans and expand their businesses and create jobs. We were able to create tax incentives that were providing the funds to hundreds of small businesses, new businesses, and attracted investment in green technology. Similarly, we worked with Alberta Innovates and came up with programs where businesses were provided supports to help them market their products and increase their investment, create more opportunities. Similarly, small-business incubators were added so that businesses can grow faster. We created a partnership with Business Link here to provide resources and support to the newcomers to Canada to get ahead and get into businesses.

All those things were practical steps that were adding opportunities for new businesses, were attracting investments in new areas, diversifying the economy, and creating jobs. But this piece of legislation, as my colleague from Calgary-Mountain View just mentioned, is expanding on something or clarifying something that already exists in our existing Municipal Government Act, section 347, that gives powers to municipalities to do the kinds of things that they are clarifying in this legislation. In fact, there is a huge concern in Calgary, because Calgary was really hit hard during the downturn, at how nonresidential businesses are burdened by the business taxes. There was a protest this morning at 7:30 at city hall. After that, during the council meeting they approved a bailout package where they will provide almost $130 million to reduce the burden from nonresidential property tax by 10 per cent. This was happening as this bill is before this Legislature, and they were able to do that to provide relief to the businesses. That happened this morning.

One other thing. When we were working on the Municipal Government Act – there are 300-plus municipalities around the province – our minister then travelled all across Alberta to gather input. Here we are with this bill. If I just quote a couple of municipalities, just Calgary and Edmonton, the Calgary mayor, I think, said that it's great to have flexibility but clearly warned about unintended consequences. If there was some fulsome discussion, some fulsome consultation with Calgary, for instance, they wouldn't be saying those things. Similarly, the mayor in Edmonton also raised concerns about those unintended consequences and even elaborated on that, how it may create issues like equity issues, that if it's just a race to the bottom, surrounding municipalities may offer all kinds of incentives. It will pit municipalities against each other.

If they were consulted, I think those concerns could have been addressed, or they wouldn't have raised these concerns. I think government needs to get to the table, needs to talk to municipalities, who they claim this bill is about. They're not sure what it's about, and that's what their comments clearly reflect. They need to talk to them about what they really need in terms of attracting investment, in terms of creating jobs. As was mentioned by the MLA for Calgary-Buffalo, what we have been hearing for a while and even during the election campaign was that they were concerned about what will happen when MSI comes to an end in 2021.

What they would want to hear would be some predictability of whether they will be getting funds and what formula will be used, how much funds they will be getting so they can factor that into their long-term planning. But so far I think they have never heard anything about that. I think that's coming in due course like every other investment, like education funding, health care funding, and all those things.

Those are the things that municipalities are looking for, and I think this bill, when looked at in conjunction with other bills, for instance – there is another bill before the House that will give $4.5 billion to businesses. They are worried about how they will sustain their finances. For instance, the carbon levy will be repealed. If we talk about Calgary, there was a lot of investment that was going to the Calgary green line, many other projects across Alberta and in business communities. The province and municipalities, local leadership are worried about the impact of those bills. Now, I think, here is another bill that doesn't give anything concrete to municipalities about how they can continue attracting investment or creating jobs, not hearing what they actually need to hear; that is, about their MSI funding and those things.

With respect to section 347 of the Municipal Government Act, I think Calgary was facing that issue, and this morning there's the evidence that there is that flexibility. There is that power built into that act that they can offer those incentives. They can offer those breaks. They can reduce tax barriers. They can cancel them. They can refund it. Those things are already there. But if there is anything else, since municipalities were not consulted, if there is some other consultation going on with some business group who wanted to see these changes, I think, again, it would be nice if the minister would share those details. If there is somebody other than municipalities, if some businesses are looking for these clarifications, we would, I guess, love to hear those details as well if there were any consultations.

These powers, these kinds of programs, have existed under the Municipal Government Act and been used in Calgary. They were being used in Lethbridge. They were used in Chestermere, and the program that was used in Chestermere was to create a policy where a municipality could cancel the nonresidential commercial development, could put a brake on those kinds of developments. That program is still in place, and it will expire at the end of 2020, meaning that even right now, as it stands now, municipalities can come up with multiyear plans as well. It's not that that flexibility is not there. That flexibility is still there for municipalities to come up with plans that are longer than one year. It's not just that one-time kind of thing that they want to resolve. I think municipalities have the ability to come up with those kinds of incentives that are longer than one-year terms.

Again, these new clarifications, these new powers: we cannot see how they are helping municipalities to attract investment. Certainly, one thing that was indicated that maybe was an unintended consequence was that it may start a competition between municipalities on how they can offer more incentives and try to attract the same businesses, try to move the same businesses out of a municipality's boundaries with more incentives and all those kinds of things. It's not the kind of competition that will help us create jobs, except in moving those businesses. That will not help us attract any kind of investment.

As I said with respect to consultation, there has been literally no evidence of consultation, that this government went out and consulted with all the municipalities. It's the kind of change that is affecting municipalities across the board. What we heard from Calgary and Edmonton clearly shows that they were taken by surprise to see this. Sure, they welcomed the flexibility, but both the city of Edmonton and the city of Calgary have clearly warned about the unintended consequences. They are still trying to figure out how it can be used.

In the meantime, I think, as I said, it's good that we had that section in the Municipal Government Act that Calgary council was able to use this morning and provide relief to businesses in Calgary. I would say that if we see that bill, in the grand scheme of things it's not what this government promised to Albertans, to create jobs, to create opportunities for investment. So far, the total legislative package that's before the House, I think, is not helping us to move in that direction.

We do know that jobs in Calgary were lost in the downturn, primarily due to the issues that our energy sector is facing. With the issues that our energy sector is facing, I think that what the government has done so far is not helping that sector. For instance, they are cancelling . . .

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, 29(2)(a) is available. I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

Member Ceci: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I was listening, and I understand that the Member for Calgary-McCall was just about to talk about the energy sector and what things would better help that sector in the future. I would really appreciate knowing what that was.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you very much. What I was getting at was that in order to create jobs, I think we need to come up with policies that will help us with the energy sector. I think at this point we do know that line 3 was delayed. We are still awaiting the decision on Kinder Morgan and TMX. Seeing all those things when we were in government, we entered into an agreement to ship our oil by rail. It was an investment in our energy sector which would have created 125,000 barrels a day of capacity for our market. That would have certainly helped us attract investment, knowing that there was some way of transporting and shipping that oil out of Alberta while we wait for the pipelines.

Now they are threatening to cancel those projects. Without those projects, I think we will be losing more jobs, and we are also shutting down investment because nobody will invest in our energy sector if they don't know if they will be able to transport and ship that product to the markets. We are still waiting to get TMX. We don't have new markets, but with the existing market we do know that there is still a shortfall. We have production, but we don't have the takeaway capacity to match that production, so the steps they are taking are not attracting investment.

Those are the kinds of things, I guess, that Calgarians would want to see and that Albertans would want to see that would attract investment, that would create more jobs, that would help us with the economy. While they are cancelling those contracts and they're making us believe that somehow these clarifications will attract investment and create jobs, I don't think that we are buying it or that Albertans are buying it. I think it's still time for the government to get serious and focus on the energy sector and take the steps that are needed to create more takeaway capacity, take steps that are necessary to help that sector so that we can see jobs, we can see our economy once again booming. These, I guess, political stances and these talking points that these kinds of changes will be creating jobs and attracting investment won't cut it.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: With another about 90 seconds under 29(2)(a), are there any other members wishing to take advantage of questions and comments?

I'm seeing the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford standing to speak.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to speak to this. I'm surprised that I've been given 15 minutes to speak to it. It's obviously longer than the government took to actually write the bill given that there is only one point to the bill, and that point is to allow municipalities to do something that's already allowed under section 347 of the Municipal Government Act. I know that's deep into the bill, so perhaps in the short time that they've been in government, they haven't had a chance to read quite that far into the Municipal Government Act to discover that that which they are seeking is already present.

As the Member for Calgary-McCall has indicated, even this morning the municipality of the city of Calgary has used this section of the act in order to allow some changes in taxes to occur. So we arrive at the point where both the evidence from the bill and the evidence from the behaviour of the municipalities on this very day indicate that the bill itself is pointless. I mean, I guess one has to wonder, then, what it is that the government is doing when they bring forward a bill that is as pointless as this. You know, they told us during the election that they were all ready to govern and they had already started to prepare bills, and it appears that they've arrived here not ready to govern at all and looking for filler to put in to give the impression of doing something when they're not.

I guess I'm pretty concerned about this. As the Member for Calgary-Mountain View has indicated, if they had been serious about this as a way to create more jobs, they would have also included in this bill a mechanism for the provincial government to do a similar thing or to support the municipal governments in doing this. They didn't do that, so they're clearly just trying to download onto municipalities some responsibility that they don't want to take responsibility for themselves.

I think we have to then look at what the underlying intention is here since we know that the bill is pointless and that the government themselves haven't invested their own time and energy into this bill. So what's it all about? The only answer can be that it's essentially a dog whistle to their financial masters. The people who will be giving them donations in the next election are being told: we're going to try to find more ways to take money away from the people of the province of Alberta and shovel it to a small few of you who have the financial wherewithal to buy tickets to our fundraisers and donate to private PACs that will argue on your behalf in the next election.

That's the only reasonable purpose, because it doesn't provide any new jobs in the cities in which it's going to be employed. At best we may see some jobs shuffle around the province as municipalities fight with each other to try to create the circumstances that are most desirable for people who will take advantage of this kind of an act in order to create money and then take that money and go somewhere else. Nothing about this says that when a company comes into that municipality, they will somehow benefit or create anything in that municipality. They will just simply receive a smaller tax bill. There's no indication that they will actually spend those tax dollars in that municipality.

I'm very concerned. I think this is an assault on rural municipalities particularly, because they need industry to come in to provide a tax base. If they don't have that tax base, they cannot provide services. Now, big cities have lots of different industries that they can attract, and they can also attract people into the cities because they provide a variety of other services. If we start having companies leaving the big cities to go to the smaller municipalities because they don't have to pay taxes, then we're essentially just putting ourselves into a place where municipalities get all of the burden of providing the services to those industries without any of the tax base in order to then provide services to the rest of their population.

I'm very concerned that this is an assault on small rural communities, shuffling money from people who will take the money from those small rural communities and spend it not only in other cities, typically larger cities, in the province of Alberta but probably around the world. So, again, here we are, shoveling money out of Alberta into the pockets of people who will spend that money to take advantage of, you know, opportunities and pleasures in other parts of the world.

If this really was about job creation, then I have to ask: why would this government at the same time take away a carbon levy that was providing thousands of jobs in the province of Alberta? Specifically, for example, the Alberta municipal solar program was about creating jobs in the very cities that this bill was supposed to do something for, allowing the cities an opportunity to create a brand new industry, an industry that clearly is about the future, by visionaries like Tesla, who are telling us that solar is going to be more important in some number of years than oil in terms of running our services.

Now this government is saying: we don't want to be a part of the future; we don't want to be a part of what can be; we instead are going to grasp a narrative, a belief system from an earlier era because it makes us feel good. Something happened in the '50s that this government can simply not let go of. They are so attached to it that they will deny the reality that the world is moving on, that businesses naturally do that, that economies naturally do that, that people naturally do that: seek new output, seek new adventures, and create new opportunities by having visions of the future, not by maintaining a rigid past.

The Acting Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member. Two quick things. One, just for clarity, the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford was speaking to second reading of Bill 7. Standing Order 29(2)(a) had visually been passed over; however, now we have it on Hansard that that is the case.

Secondly, seeing that it is 6, the Assembly is adjourned until 7:30 p.m.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

7:30 p.m.

Monday, June 10, 2019

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

The Deputy Speaker: Good evening, members. Please be seated.

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mrs. Pitt in the chair]

The Chair: Members, I'd like to call this committee to order.

Bill 4 Red Tape Reduction Act

The Chair: Are there any comments, questions, or amendments to be offered with respect to this bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. I appreciate you recognizing me this evening to talk about Bill 4, the Red Tape Reduction Act, which on the surface looks a little bit light on some details. I suppose that maybe some of the details that could have possibly made it into this bill were reduced through some red tape. I'm not really sure.

I guess that to start with, I'd like to talk a little bit about what we see here in Bill 4 or maybe, more appropriately, what we don't see. We don't see things around, say, for instance, a definition of what kind of red tape the government is going to be looking at. Are they looking to reduce, you know, things that might put people at risk? Are they looking to possibly reduce regulations that might protect our environment? We don't have any details around that. I guess, as I was quoted a while back, it kind of seems like this is a bill that will create a big ball of red tape. The bill allows the minister to create regulations, it allows the minister to amend regulations, but we're a little light on the details past that.

I know that, you know, there have been some interesting statements going forward. When this bill was first introduced, the Premier made some comments about how over the first 21 days of this government they'd already reduced 17 regulations. The problem is that we don't know what those were, where they were posted. The ability for people to look at what it is that may have been reduced and how it might have affected them: again, we're still waiting a little bit on details around this.

When we talk about reducing red tape, you know, some of my friends across the way use this a lot around the unintended consequences of what might be removed. The government is creating a new process here in Alberta, which, in essence, kind of creates some red tape of its own through the ministry. I'm a little worried that this bill has no teeth, which means that if we are doing some things, we don't have any kind of accountability around there. I believe there is a bit of a threat to some of the fundamental protections: consumer, environmental, health and safety.

One of the things that kind of concerned me a little bit is around one of the validators of this bill. The Canadian Federation of Independent Business, which is one of the Premier's key validators, has said, "In Alberta's case, new rules on health and safety have only made the burden on business owners worse." I'm a little concerned about that phrase. When we're talking about people's health and safety, I think that as they go to work, they have every reason to believe that they can work safely and come home to their families safely. To say that health and safety is a bit of a burden, I kind of tend to disagree. From my experience sitting on my own workplace health and safety committee as a co-chair, as part of the joint management-workers committee, and having sat on my union's provincial health and safety committee, one of the things, you know, that I can't help but brag a little bit about is my former employer.

When I first left to become an MLA in this House, we had quite the record, I guess, to brag about. When I left, Lucerne ice cream had over 1,650 days accident free, and that was because our workplace decided to take health and safety very, very seriously. Yes, I suppose that maybe in the very beginning there were a few people that thought things were a little bit burdensome, but in the long run what it was was that nobody was sitting at home hurt. They were being very productive at work because they were healthy, and it actually lessened the cost on the employer. Their WCB premiums that they were paying shot down dramatically over that course. Again, when I hear things that health and safety might be getting in the way a little bit, maybe as another way to look at it, that sends a bit of a signal to me that I'm a little bit concerned about.

I also noticed, you know, that through the consultations with Albertans from 2019, the Red Tape Reduction Act will be amended by the end of the year to include legislated timelines for regulatory approval for various departments, agencies, including the Alberta Energy Regulator, the goal of which will be to achieve the fastest approval process in North America. Well, the problem is that when I look through the bill in terms of this, to say that we're going to amend the timelines, unfortunately, is a little bit of a stretch, Madam Chair, because there are no timelines in the bill right now for anything.

Well, maybe I'm not completely fair there. There is one timeline saying that "beginning in 2020" – it doesn't say whether it's January 2020 or anywhere between then and December 2020 – the minister will report one time through a report that will be brought here to the House. But, of course, that's always after the fact. I think there's maybe some ability that the government could look at for reporting a little bit more in real time in terms of what they're looking at, how they're looking at it, and what they're considering to potentially reduce.

When we were talking about this a little bit earlier, I did mention the fact that I was a little bit concerned. We don't want to get onto this tunnel-vision quest in order to get rid of regulations. I mean, my gosh, I heard the labour minister in the last debate talking about: well, you know, maybe it's okay if we create a little bit of red tape. Okay. Well, that's all right. But then are you going to be racing to get rid of some other ones because they just committed to creating a little bit more red tape? I don't want this blind effort moving forward: well, we've already brought in a few of these; we've got to quickly get rid of something. There was a commitment on a one-to-one basis, that for every regulatory burden that comes in, they want to get rid of another regulatory burden. Every new regulatory burden proposed must be matched with a cut of an equivalent burden somewhere else.

Now, I can't help but wonder, Madam Chair: how are we balancing that? What are the criteria around saying, "We've taken this regulation and put it in; this is something that's of equal value"? Well, just because it's of equal value doesn't necessarily make it a good idea to get rid of it. I wonder how that mechanism is going to work going forward. How do we measure what's equivalent? How do we balance that out? It'd be nice to maybe see a process around that.

When we look around in terms of what kind of efforts have been done around red tape reduction, there are several instances that we can look at. Of course, Mr. Harper in 2011 announced the launch of the Red Tape Reduction Commission, which called on the government to take action to reduce burden on business, making it easier to do business with regulators and improving service and predictability. They had made a goal to establish a 20 per cent red tape cut and a one-to-one rule. Again, as I was just talking about earlier, how do we balance that out? Hopefully, maybe there are some things that we might be able to learn from.

A couple of failures that I would like to highlight are around clean water protections. In the regulatory framework that protected lakes, rivers, and groundwater there was a loophole in the metal mining effluent regulation of the Fisheries Act. This allowed mining companies to dump toxic waste into lakes and reclassified healthy lakes as tailing impoundment areas. Now, I don't know about a lot of people out here, but I know I certainly like to go out camping, and I don't know if I'd be very excited if I was, say, water skiing in one lake that I like to go to, just to find out that it's being used as a tailings pond.

Sandy Pond in Newfoundland had been destroyed under this loophole, and Environment Canada released the names of 29 natural bodies that mining companies had applied to use as toxic waste dumps. Maybe a little bit of a failure there that we might want to be considering as we move forward looking at this bill.

Talking about food inspections, there were cuts of $56 million to the Canadian Food Inspection Agency, resulting in 100 fewer inspectors. Now, as somebody who worked in the food industry – albeit it was only ice cream – there were still some very, very strict regulations about how we conducted the work that we did in there, being careful in terms of sanitation, cross-contamination. I mean, my gosh, we even got to the point where we weren't allowed to stage certain products within a certain distance from others because of cross-contamination issues.

These 100 fewer inspectors resulted from reverse staffing measures put in place in response to the deadly listeriosis outbreak in 2008, in which 22 Canadians died. That concerns me. Again, I don't want to see us getting this tunnel vision: well, you know, we brought in some slightly necessary red tape burdens on business, but then we've got to quickly get rid of some other ones.

If we look at British Columbia, they promised to reduce regulation by one-third in three years, which is about, roughly, what is being suggested here in Alberta. They eliminated 157,000 regulations for citizens and small businesses and reduced regulation by 47 per cent. That is a fantastic number. They also introduced a net zero increase commitment in 2004: for every regulation that's introduced, one was required to be removed, again sort of what's being suggested here. Again, Madam Chair, we probably want to look at the failures that occurred so that, hopefully, when we are looking at those things and we're reducing regulations here, we don't fall into those same traps.

One of the big things I noted there was around money laundering. Reports indicated that $7 billion in dirty money has flowed through the British Columbia economy, $5 billion of which is in real estate, which inflated prices and hurt consumers. I think there was a bit of a failure to take action and properly regulate the industry to protect its citizens.

We had some struggles there around child labour, where government lowered the working age to 12 and removed the permit system, effectively deregulating child labour in the province. Madam Chair, I don't think any of us in this House want to be responsible for something like that because this puts the health and safety of children at risk. There was a dramatic increase in the annual payments for accepted disability claims related to children ages 12 to 14 injured on the job. Since 2004 nine were designated long-term disability. I can't imagine being at the age of 12 to 14 and you're permanently almost disabled from working for the rest of your life. I think those people have to have something a little bit better to look forward to.

In total, WorkSafeBC has paid out over $1.1 million in disability claims for 179 children injured on the job between 2003 and 2013. When I look at those numbers, it sounds to me like there was a bit of tunnel vision, where we were saying, "One in, so one has got to come out; we've got to hit that number because that's what we promised," a famous slogan there that we've already heard in this House over and over and over again: promise made, promise kept. Well, let's be careful about some of the promises that we are keeping because it can hurt people.

Environmental deregulation. The government oversight had relinquished the province's responsibility for environmental monitoring. This impacted projects like dam construction, forestry management, and hazardous waste disposal, which was likely the key factor in the failure of a 40-metre high tailings dam at the Mount Polley copper mine in B.C.'s interior, which caused widespread environmental damage, illuminated other problems with professional reliance, and in 2016 in the report on regulation of the province's mining sector following the disaster, the B.C. Auditor General found that "almost every one of our expectations for a robust compliance and enforcement program within [the ministries] were not met." Again, another example of us kind of plowing forward because we had committed to reducing this red tape – we brought one in; we're going to take one out – and you don't necessarily look at the consequences that some of those decisions might have.

I know some of those examples were a little bit further in the past, so maybe we can look quickly at something a little bit more recent. In December of 2018 Restoring Ontario's Competitiveness Act, which sets a target of 25 per cent reduction in regulations over four years, requires the provincial approvals for job-creating projects to occur within a year. On paper I think that sounds fantastic. It gets people working, sounds great. Again, what are the unintended consequences of our decisions in possibly going at this blindly to reduce something because we committed to it? Again, we want to keep saying that tag line over and over again: well, promise made; promise kept.

Some of the failures that we've already seen: loosening ratios for children in daycare. These restrictions were put in place after a number of tragic deaths of children, which, of course, means we're putting them at risk.

Economists, advocates, and researchers have argued that deregulation under the guise of reducing red tape hurts workers and doesn't lead to job creation and improved wages, which I think is something that this government has very clearly said they are moving forward to try to improve. I think, again, we're looking at the unintended consequences in this blind move forward. Well, we're going to reduce red tape, but let's make sure that we're consulting thoroughly on this.

As we move forward on this, I think there are possibly some changes that can be made along the way. I certainly want to hear the rest of the debate surrounding this. Maybe the associate minister might be willing to get up and talk a little bit about some of the things that they're thinking about. I know that the Premier had mentioned, you know, in the opening day of introduction that they'd be open to amendments around maybe a definition of what kind of red tape it is we're looking for but, more specifically, maybe a little bit around what kind of definitions aren't red tape. I think that'll allow Albertans to be able to take a look at this, assuming that maybe we could look at some way to inform them in real time about some of the things that they're looking at getting rid of, which will allow Albertans and businesses and organizations to come back with their feedback and talk about what may or may not be the problems around some of the regulations that could be proposed for cutting.

Of course, we always want to see some responsibility in terms of timelines. I think we can create a few timelines here, be a little bit more diligent in terms of how we move forward rather than, quite honestly, just a little bit of a sort of emptiness here when we're looking at Bill 4.

At this point I think I can take my seat. I do look forward to debate going forward here in Committee of the Whole, and I certainly hope that some of the members on the government side have some interesting things to add to the discussion.

Thank you.

The Chair: Are there any comments, questions, or amendments with respect to the bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Madam Chair. I appreciate the opportunity this evening to rise and speak to Bill 4, the Red Tape Reduction Act, and pass along some of my comments and add to those that I've already made in this House on the bill. I join others on this side of the House who really question what this and some of the other pieces of legislation that the government has brought forward this session are really all about, what the purpose and what the point actually is. Some of the pieces of legislation we've discussed, including this one, seem like one large communications exercise that really does nothing that isn't already enabled in other legislation. It's all designed to make it sound like they're doing something while they tread water and hope for the economy to improve all by itself or, as one member for the government said earlier today, the Member for Grande Prairie, "let the . . . market work itself out." The collateral damage while that happens is Albertans who suffer from this government's lack of action and meaningful legislation.

Many members have discussed or asked about the definition of red tape, which is the substance of this bill. It's the only substance that there is. It's the title. The title itself has not been defined or the term itself has not been defined in the legislation, and that's something that is a serious flaw. Most pieces of legislation will have a substantive list of definitions which provide a whole raft of meaning to the bill or piece of legislation that they're part of. In this particular case something as simple as a definition for red tape in the Red Tape Reduction Act is completely missing. To actually deal with the issue, if indeed there is an issue that needs to be dealt with, one is left to drift by this bill because the main focus of the bill, the title of it, the red tape of it, is left undefined.

In fact, it's a piece of enabling legislation, in my humble opinion, Madam Chair, enabling legislation to do things that the government wants to do through the back door that otherwise they wouldn't be able to accomplish through the front door, that the public might object to. For example, I believe it's actually enabling legislation to declare an underlying motivation such as we found in other bills. There's underlying motivation in Bill 2, which you can see is an open season on workers; an underlying motivation on Bill 8, an open season on municipalities; Bill 4, likewise, one might call an open season on consumers or an open season on an environmental protection act. I think we should look a little bit more closely at that and why I say it can clearly be called an open season on consumers and an open season on environmental protection.

We look at the supports that we have put in place for consumers while we were in government over the four years. Some of the consumer protection laws that we put in place strengthen protection in areas consumers said were the highest priorities, including banning the use of ticket-buying bots and approving consumer access to refunds from resellers. We know that there's a lot of these consumer protections which are probably going to be at risk under the guise of reducing red tape, Madam Chair. That's the back door that I believe this government is going to use this piece of legislation for. Under the guise of – quote, unquote – removing or reducing red tape, they're going to go ahead and try to eliminate a number of the consumer protections which we brought in during our term in government, calling them bureaucratic red tape unnecessary.

Other examples. Introducing industry-wide standards for vehicle sales and repairs to improve accountability in the sector and better protect consumers from unexpected or unauthorized charges, something we brought in as a matter of consumer protection: once again, something at risk, I think, Madam Chair, as a result of this so-called Red Tape Reduction Act, which will be used by stealth to accomplish many, many things which, in fact, have nothing to do with red tape but everything to do with quietly trying to strip away consumer protections which we brought in during our last term; for example, introducing a licensing framework for high-cost lenders to ensure responsible operations and help consumers better understand the nature of high-cost credit products. A whole raft of consumer protections that we brought in I think are at risk by this government using this new Red Tape Reduction Act as a tool to carve out many of the pieces of consumer protection legislation that we put in place.

Payday lending is another example. It put an end to 600 per cent interest rates on payday loans to help prevent people from becoming trapped in a cycle of debt. Today payday loan borrowers pay lower fees, have more time to pay off their loans, and are paying them off in smaller installments. Once again, consumer protections are under attack with respect to this enabling legislation, which will allow the government to do things by the backdoor quietly, out of sight, by claiming it's red tape or a bureaucratic reduction.

Door-to-door sales is another example. We put an end to misleading and aggressive sales tactics by banning door-to-door sales of energy products and services. The ban includes furnaces, hot water tanks, air conditioners, windows, energy audits, and electricity and natural gas contracts. Now, I've got personal experience with many of my former real estate clients and also my own mother, who has suffered under these door-to-door sales tactics that were very, very difficult to put off at the door and ended up having people I know sign more than one natural gas contract which cost them hundreds of dollars to get out of. This government is looking to reduce consumer protections such as this that we put in place by using, once again, this piece of legislation, the so-called Red Tape Reduction Act, as a stealthy method to go ahead and carve out consumer protections, and they hope that the public is not going to notice.

Condominium living. We introduced condominium regulations, another good example, to improve buying and living in a condo. It was something that had been a long, long time coming, and the condo market real estate agents throughout this province were very, very pleased to enjoy those new protections under the regulations that were put in place. Once again, we wonder whether these regulations are going to be at risk as a result of the legislation, the Red Tape Reduction Act, brought in by the associate minister to place limitations or completely eliminate these regulations that were brought in to protect consumers.

Another example as well, Madam Chair, is the Utilities Consumer Advocate. We expanded the advocate's free mediation services to water bills and improved the advocate's ability to report on the performance of gas and electricity companies to help consumers make well-informed choices. Once again, there's risk involved to the consumer because these things are possibly going to be disappearing as a result of the government taking advantage of the enabling mechanism of the Red Tape Reduction Act and going after consumer protections which allow consumers to feel that they have some measure of control in their life while the government looks to remove those safety measures and open season on consumers.

Another side of the coin, another element of protection that this government is putting at risk potentially by the use of this enabling legislation, the Red Tape Reduction Act, is in the field of environmental protection, Madam Chair; for example, dam safety. In 2013 the Obed mountain mine site dam spill occurred, spilling about 670 million litres of waste into the Athabasca River. It was the second-biggest coal spill in Canada and seriously contaminated the Athabasca River and forced a number of major communities to stop drawing water from it. Our government developed new dam safety standards to ensure oversight and monitoring of tailings dams and public reporting of this information, which makes Alberta a world leader in dam safety. We need to ensure that standards like these, Madam Chair, are protected to keep Albertans safe. However, these standards, these protections are potentially at risk because this government may end up using the backdoor of the Red Tape Reduction Act to claim that what they're doing is a reduction of bureaucratic largesse and red tape and eliminating regulations which protect the health and safety of Albertans, not to mention the workers' safety on these mines, and the environment as well.

Air quality is part of the environment that we are all reliant upon, the air that we breathe. Alberta's first Canadian ambient air quality standards assessment report was released in September 2015, a few short months after we took office last term. It indicated that the Red Deer region exceeded national standards for fine particulate matter. The lower Athabasca, upper Athabasca, North Saskatchewan and South Saskatchewan areas were found to be approaching the limits for particulate matter, which includes nitrogen dioxide and sulphur dioxide, so-called NOx and SOx. Now, in collaboration with CASA our government updated the Alberta ambient air quality objectives, put in place stricter standards for industrial emitters, and saw reductions of pollutants, improving air quality and the health of Albertans, Madam Chair.

The Premier wants to turn back the clock on this and a whole raft of other things by removing these protections and putting Albertans at risk and, indeed, very well may be using the enabling legislation that we're debating here today, Madam Chair, the Red Tape Reduction Act, as a backdoor mechanism to achieve those ends. Once again, another attack, this time an attack on environmental protection under the guise of reducing red tape and bureaucratic largesse.

Labour legislation: same thing. This is a wide-sweeping tool which I think the government will be using to mask much of the damage that would be caused by getting rid of many of the protections that we put in place last term. Some of those are found in health and safety protections. For example, our government introduced new protections to ensure that workers are informed of hazards and that health and safety information is provided by employers. We created requirements for joint work-site health and safety committees for employers at work sites with 20 or more workers. We created the independent Fair Practices Office, compensation and meaningful rehabilitation for injured workers, and strengthened appeal commission review and appeal processes.

The Premier has not been straightforward with Albertans about which of these protections is on the chopping block. Madam Chair, may I suggest that the chopping block is going to be named the Red Tape Reduction Act, the mechanism by which the government intends, in my belief, to circumvent the widely more public method of directly attacking these protections and going through the back door, claiming that they're red tape, bureaucratic largesse, and getting rid of them more quietly by using this enabling legislation that we're debating here tonight. So I'm really, really concerned about this legislation.

I think that the government is quietly bringing it forward and saying: "Hey, this Red Tape Reduction Act is what we said under our mandate. We're going to reduce red tape." They don't even really define it. They don't even make the effort to go ahead and say what it is because they know, in fact, that the whole purpose of this legislation has nothing to do with reducing so-called red tape or reducing bureaucratic replication. It has everything to do with using it as a weapon to attack consumer protections, to attack environmental regulations. Anything that they think of in our past platform that they want to quietly get rid of: they're going to use this Red Tape Reduction Act to do it under the guise of bureaucratic largesse reduction.

Madam Chair, I'm forewarned. I hope the rest of the members of this House are. I know that we on this side of the House have definitely got our antennae up about what the real purpose of this legislation is. I'm not fooled by it, and I don't think Albertans will be fooled by it either once they start seeing how, if passed, this piece of legislation actually gets used. It's something, I think, that I as one MLA on this side of the House will take a particular interest in, watching and seeing the methodology behind the implementation of this act.

The associate minister may hope that we're not going to be following up and reviewing exactly how this legislation is used, but I really doubt that we're going to see it used in a way that it's purported that it will be used, because the enabling capacity already exists within any government department. The Premier simply could have given a mandate letter or simply a memo to each of the ministers of the Crown telling them that their duty was to make sure that they reviewed all their existing legislation under their departments and got rid of anything that was redundant or repetitive or unnecessary. He wouldn't have needed to create another new ministry to do that. It would have been done as a matter of course. In fact, Madam Chair, it's something that, realistically, every minister of the Crown has as a sort of standing argument from their Premier, to make sure it gets done.

It's not something that necessarily every minister has during their mandate, the time to turn full attention to, but I argue, Madam Chair, that that's not going to happen under the mandate of this government either. Red tape reduction is not the focus of this piece of legislation. This legislation is designed to enable ministers to do things other than what they would be able to do under the full glare of the public, and that is to rid themselves of consumer protection which they see as antithetical to their dogmatic, ideological viewpoint.

You know, it's one thing that we certainly can see clearly here in this session of the 30th Legislature, Madam Chair. I hope Albertans become aware and join the debate and realize that there's more than one way to approach an argument or a decision in Alberta. We're looking clearly at two different approaches in this Legislature. Increasingly over the next four years we're going to see Albertans, with the assistance of this opposition, digging more deeply and questioning this place, this province, and this government's activities and making decisions for themselves after debating and talking about what exactly this government is up to and learning to challenge everything that's being said. Some things are not as they seem, and that's what's going on with this piece of legislation. This Red Tape Reduction Act is a weapon to enable the government to attack issues that they want to do with stealth. It's not something that will be forgotten about by Albertans once they start using it for the true intent that they have in the first place in putting together this piece of legislation.

We'll see if it passes. If it does, we'll certainly be watching the performance of the government in its implementation, and we'll be calling them out on every measure that they bring forward that matches what I say it's going to do, and that is to be used as a weapon against the protections, many of which we brought in, to protect consumers, protect the environment, protect workers, protect everyday people in this province.

I think that in many of the pieces of legislation that this session will see, including some that have already been brought forward, including this one that we're debating right now, you'll find that the government is bringing things forward basically as a bit of a smokescreen, one large communication exercise that really does nothing that isn't already in place. It's all designed to do what other pieces of legislation already enable them to do. It doesn't define exactly what red tape is. It doesn't bother to do that because it doesn't really care about reducing red tape; it only cares about the other mechanism that I've described as the underlying true mechanism in this Legislature, and that is to accomplish by stealth what they couldn't do so openly and directly.

Madam Chair, I think I've made myself clear. I encourage members to vote against this bill. I see it as a clandestine attempt to remove consumer, environmental, and labour protections that Albertans deserve to have in place and that finally did get put in place during our government's term of office. Once they see what this government's effort in dismantling our legislation is really going to mean in terms of consequences for the environment, in terms of consequences for workers' protection, in terms of consequences for working people in this province, we will be able to coalesce a very significant opposition to this type of legislation, the condescending and manipulative type of legislation that this government has been patterning over the beginning of this session. I expect to see a continuation of it.

Madam Chair, with that, I'll finish my comments and open the floor to other members who wish to join the discussion. I once again want to make it very clear that members on this side of the House will be monitoring extremely closely what this government does with this legislation, how it uses it to actually accomplish things by stealth that it couldn't otherwise do. We'll see if I'm wrong or right on the issue.

Thank you.

The Chair: Any other comments, questions, or amendments to the bill? The hon. Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you. A weapon, stealth, sneaky – this is the best one – a clandestine approach. A two-page bill. Now, what's interesting is that we have listened for three hours in second reading to everything from, "This is just a smokescreen; there's no value to it at all," to "This is a weapon, stealth, sneaky, a clandestine approach." You cannot have both. Either it's not going to do anything, or it's going to do all of those things. I'm trying to understand, through you, Madam Chair, what the members on the opposite side really want me to answer. Do they want me to answer their question about whether it has any teeth to it, or do they actually want me to answer: it has so many teeth; the poor Albertans?

In second reading of this bill, Madam Chair, the Member for Edmonton-Decore stood up and said: we are very interested in knowing. Then he named a couple of things: we're looking forward to being able to get into Committee of the Whole. And then for three hours after that they continued to say the same – well, actually not the same thing. Two separate points. One is that this is terrible legislation and it's going to destroy Alberta. The other one is that this has no teeth, there's nothing to it, and why would the UCP bring this forward? There is some confusion on the other side, so is it grandstanding, or are there actually questions that they would like me to answer so that we can be able to move forward and bring this bill to fruition?

One of the things that I was thinking about as I've been listening intently to the, I would say, arguments from the other side: the other day, when I heard I think it was the ex-economic development and trade minister, he was talking about how there was no need for this, so he was on the no-need side. He needed to talk to his other colleagues. There was no need for this, and the reason that he gave is that he said that there is a Legislative Review Committee, that brings forward any bills that could expire, and then they review them at that point.

What's interesting about the way that the NDP speak is that they forget to finish the sentence. What's unfortunate is what he forgot to say, that every bill that would come forward – there were no amendments made. So how is it possible that this government, after looking through all of those legislative bills that came forward to be reviewed, couldn't find one redundancy, one obsolete regulation, or one conflicting regulation? In all that time, supposedly this was the approach to being able to deal with the red tape. This was their strategy, yet in the four years that they were privileged to be able to be in government, they found not one. So the question that I have is: was their approach really working?

In the last election I had the opportunity to be able to door-knock on a lot of doors, and I heard this a lot from people saying: "You know what? The regulations are killing us. The regulations, adding layer upon layer upon layer, are really hurting our businesses and our ability to actually do what we do best: create jobs, innovate, make Alberta a better place, provide for our families." This government has been very clear. We were clear in the 117-page promises that we made to Albertans, our campaign promises, that we were going to really make effective changes in this government, effective changes in Alberta. One of the major components to that was actually doing something about red tape, actually effectively working out the problems that our Alberta job creators are facing.

What we did is that we looked at – over the last three and a half years I've had the opportunity to be able to look at many jurisdictions throughout the world. Lo and behold, just to our west in B.C. they had one of the best approaches to red tape reduction. What's interesting is that they've been doing this actually now for 16 years. In fact, under the current NDP government they actually have not gotten rid of their red tape reduction strategy. I think that the opposition needs to take a look at their brethren over to the west of us and ask why it is that the NDP have not gotten rid of their strategy to be able to reduce red tape or to at least stop it from increasing. I think the reason that they would hear from their NDP buddies in B.C. is that they have found in 16 years – yes, they've made mistakes – a good strategy to being able to help free up their job creators, free up their innovators so that those innovators and job creators can help grow the economy.

If the NDP in government over the past four years were truly interested in addressing this issue, they had an opportunity. I brought forward a private member's bill. Madam Chair, I know you were there in the House at the time, so I know you remember that bill. Bill 207 was a private member's bill. This wasn't actually to reduce red tape. It was actually just to stop it from growing anymore, so it was a one-in, one-out rule. I thought: "You know what? There's no way they're going to actually want to reduce it, but at least we could go for something like a one-in, one-out rule, at least put a stay to what's happening with the red tape." I went and talked to the then minister of economic development and trade and said: "Would your government be willing to support this? I think it's a good measure. It would show to at least the CFIB, Canadian Federation of Independent Business, that the F that we keep on getting in Alberta is not the right thing for Alberta." What I was told was: absolutely, we will not be supporting that bill. You know, there wasn't even a discussion about it. It was almost like: I don't see any problem.

Well, fast-forward a few weeks and they introduced a bill that added 100 pages to the Occupational Health and Safety Act, 100 pages of legislation. It was a book. Madam Chair, you remember the time fondly, I'm sure, as you read through that riveting read. What we found is that this government was so focused on micromanaging Albertans' lives that they lost sight of what we do here. We innovate. We look for opportunities of being able to find things that other people couldn't do, and we make it happen right here in Alberta. When you add layer upon layer of the federal and the provincial and the municipal governments in Alberta onto our job creators, what we find is that these guys just say: "You know what? We're not doing it anymore. We're going to go somewhere else where that regulatory burden is not so onerous."

We have seen over the last four years – just so you know, my riding is on the border. I have the only 24/7 border crossing, in Coutts. It's a shame when I watched those companies leave, the rigs go down to the States, where they can actually go with a lower regulatory burden, lower taxation, and the ability to make some money. Businesses actually won't stay in business if they can't make money, and if you're looking for a business that will do that, that's called a charity. We need charities, but businesses actually need to be able to make a profit to be able to stay in business. This is something that, hopefully, this legislation will address.

I want to talk to you about the disproportionate effect that red tape has on our small businesses. Small businesses are disproportionately affected because they don't have the economies of scale like the large businesses do to be able to hire an extra compliance officer. These small businesses, these ma-and-pa organizations, have to wear those hats themselves.

I talked to an interesting fellow in my riding who was in the oil patch. He got out because he said that when he first got in 20 years ago, he'd spend one day a month actually just filling out all the regulatory forms and regulation requirements and jumping through the hoops that governments asked him to do. At the point when he actually got out, he was spending half of his time – half of his time – doing that. He said: "It just wasn't worth while for me to be able to stay in. I couldn't actually go and do what I needed to do, which was actually create wealth and hire more people and grow my business. Instead, I was doing what the government asked me to do and filling out forms."

Now, I will be very clear. This bill is not about reducing regulations ad hoc. This is about being able to do it smarter, being able to take a look at the regulations that we have and looking for those redundancies, looking for those issues that are obsolete, those regulations that are obsolete, looking for conflicting regulations that make it difficult for businesses to be able to move forward because the only way they can move forward if one regulation is conflicting with another is to actually contact the ministry, and then they have another pinch point that they have to deal with. Then that minister has to be able to go through the bureaucratic levels in government to be able to get an answer. Now we slowed down the process of them actually being able to do what these businesses are supposed to be doing, which is creating jobs.

It's not a shock to me that this NDP government during their last four years saw some of the worst unemployment in this province that we've seen in a generation. It's not a shock to me because when you continue to pile this regulatory burden onto our job creators, they stop creating jobs. Actually, the NDP didn't see that, and for that reason they lost the election, Madam Chair. For that reason they were sent to time out. It's going to be a long time out if they never learn that rule, which is that you cannot continue to stop our job creators from creating jobs and think that they're going to do it just out of the goodness of their hearts. They're going to do it if the regulatory burden is lower, if the marginal tax rate compared to other jurisdictions where they can make money is lower, and where they have a sustainable government. That's what we used to call the Alberta advantage in this province. We have to get back to that winning Alberta advantage.

You know, during that time, Madam Chair, there was a 10-year period. It's interesting that the NDP have been quoting Ralph Klein, so I'll quote him. Not quote him, but I'll talk about his time. For a 10-year period we had almost 100,000 people moving into this province each year, the size of Red Deer or Lethbridge. During that time we had 150 corporate head offices move here. These weren't just oil and gas corporate head offices. These were other corporate head offices. They saw that the Alberta advantage would actually help them. During that time we saw more foreign investment come into Alberta than Quebec and Ontario combined. That was the Alberta advantage. That was what the lower marginal tax rate, the lower regulatory burden than other jurisdictions, and the sustainable government did.

We've been listening for a little over a couple of weeks now to the NDP talk about how we're getting it wrong, and yet I'm pretty sure – I know that quite a few of the members opposite moved here for the very reason that we are championing to this day, the Alberta advantage. They moved here because there were jobs here, because we did something different than other jurisdictions. We actually created jobs. It wasn't the government that did it. The government just created the playing field so that Albertans, job creators, and innovators could do the job.

We've heard again today and in the last few weeks how this opposition has said that they believe, for some strange reason, that when the government invests a million dollars, it will create more jobs than when the actual private sector invests a million dollars. I'll try to be good about this, but every time the government invests a dollar, they took it from someone else first. That's called tax. So their argument that a million dollars from the government is actually better for the economy is completely backwards, Madam Chair. It doesn't make sense. Before they could invest that dollar, they had to take it from a taxpayer first. When they start taking too much from the taxpayer and from those job creators, those job creators say: "Enough is enough. I'm not pulling the cart anymore. I'm gone." This is what we saw. I watched that down in my riding many, many years, for the last four years.

I've talked about some of the issues, 30,000 feet up issues. I am very interested in discussing this bill, but I need to hear from the members opposite concrete questions. I can answer those questions if they have those issues, and I'm very interested in hearing from them.

The Chair: Are there any comments, questions, or amendments with respect to the bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Madam Chair. They changed the name of my constituency, and sometimes I'm confused as well when I hear Edmonton-North West. I look to the left and to the right, and then I realize it's me. Here I am.

I'm here to ask some specific questions of the hon. Member for Taber-Warner, I guess. They've changed your name, too, and given you a title, the associate minister for the reduction of red tape. When I first came back to the Legislature, the new 30th Legislature, I saw that very name taped to the door, not using red tape but another colour, but taped on there nonetheless. You know, I thought to myself: well, what is this, the red tape reduction office? So I have a number of questions.

I guess being a former minister, I'm just curious to know how you would approach, then, let's say, a particular ministry and make suggestions about which regulations to cut. For example, I know that I did a lot of work in the Ministry of Education to try to streamline because I'm a very keen hunter of redundancy, right? I look for things always to streamline, you know, from my own personal life to family and to my professional life, looking for ways to make things work better. The way that I always find is that you defer to expertise and to, certainly, have a, let's say, theme of streamlining regulation in each ministry. But does it necessitate the creation of a separate office, and what authority does that office have? I'd like to ask through the chair: what authority does this associate minister have, the power to supersede both the minister and the Premier's office, to say: "No. This regulation must go," right? "If you want to put one in, you've got to take two out," kind of thing.

That would seem like sweeping power, Madam Chair, for such a fine office as the reduction of red tape. I'm just curious to know how the associate minister might sort of envision the enforcement of that thing.

Another question I have specifically is: how much does the ministry or department – I'm not sure what it is – cost? Like, what is the budget that is afforded to this new creation, and how does the associate minister expect to spend it? Where would the priorities be physically? As I say, reaching in to the Ministry of Health or the Ministry of Education and/or Transportation and deputizing perhaps some of those department workers and, you know, giving them a new direction, which is in the pursuit of reducing red tape and regulation, or does that happen through that office that has just been created?

My third question is – you should write these down – what regulations or what specific red tape targets have you had so far? Like, what are the, let's say, top 20, 15 – you can send those back to me in writing – that you're targeting now to reduce, right? Is it regulation around education or health care or environment or just what? I mean, I would like to know some examples. I think Albertans would like to see some examples of what exactly we're aiming for here because, you know, in order for me to cast my vote, I need to know what it is, right? I don't see any. As you said before, very astutely, this is a very thin piece of legislation. It's only a couple of pages.

You know, like, what are the targets? What are the priorities? What are the parameters of this whole reducing red tape sort of plan, right? We can't just sort of move in helter-skelter and say: okay, every regulation we make here – we seem to be proposing quite a number of regulations with the bills that I've been debating here so far with this new 30th Legislature. There are quite a lot of regulations associated, for example, with reducing youth minimum wage. I mean, you'd have to have a legion of people to enforce through regulation whether a kid's going to high school or not and all of this sort of thing. I mean, I need more specific information around that, too.

So if I can, in summary, just, you know, review the questions that I just asked. How much is the budget for this new ministry? Number two, could you give me a list of, let's say, 15 or so pieces of regulation that you'd (a) consider red tape and (b) how you will reduce and (c) how is this pursued, right? Does the new Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction have the power to supersede decisions and procedure in each of the individual ministries, or is he deputizing individuals within those ministries to execute the reduction in the said regulations that he chooses to prioritize?

So, yeah, those are pretty specific questions, and I know he's up to the task because I can see he's ready to spring forth and edify us all with an answer. Thank you.

The Chair: The hon. Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'd like to thank the Member for Edmonton-North West for specific questions. They're good questions, and I will answer those. The first question is: how do you determine what gets cut? One of the things you said, Member, is that, you know, it was always better for you guys to consult with the professionals and the gurus in these different areas.

Mr. Eggen: I didn't say that.

Mr. Hunter: No, you didn't, actually, but I'll put words in your mouth. You guys do that all the time.

I agree a hundred per cent. Our approach is going to be very simple. We're going to allow those people who are in the trenches, that are dealing with these regulations on a regular basis to be able to come forward and present to us what's stopping them from being able to do what we want them to do, which is create jobs and innovate. As they come forward, there'll be certain things that we can do, and there will be certain things that we can't do. That will be, then, the departments, whether it be in Health or in Education or in Infrastructure, Transportation: they will then have the ability to make those decisions.

Now, we are taking a look at this strategy from the lens of believing people and not being so cynical. One of the things that we've heard from people is that, you know, we need to stop this strategy of when 1 per cent does the bad things, that we punish the 99 per cent. This is something that is completely backwards. Good legislation should punish the 1 per cent bad actors and reward the 99 per cent good actors. This is pretty normal in society. You're going to have the 1 per cent that are going to try to bend the rules to do things that they shouldn't do. Those people should be punished.

What B.C. did over the last 16 years, their strategy was, I think, fairly effective. Again, it was not without error, but we've at least had the opportunity to be able to take a look at what they did, look for best practices, and try to be able to learn from them in what we apply here. But what our strategy is going to be is to be able to free up the hands of our job creators, the good actors, the people who actually are willing to be able to make sure that we are healthy and safe and make sure that our environment is properly taken care of, free up their hands to be able to do what you guys could not do, which is create jobs. You could not do that in your strategy, so we are going to take a different approach, an approach that has actually worked in another jurisdiction. In fact, many jurisdictions, not only in Canada but throughout the world, are tackling red tape. This is a strategy that is being applied in many different places. We've looked for those best practices. This is what we're going to do.

Now, you asked what my ministry has in terms of authority. Can it supersede? This is, again, that cynical approach that we've seen far too often by the NDP when they were in government. This cynical approach is that it's us against them. In reality what's going to happen here is that we're going to work collaboratively together as ministries to make sure that we tackle this. What they did in B.C. is that they made sure that each of the ministries created a culture, a culture of reduction of red tape so that, again, those job creators could actually create jobs.

The question was also asked: what's the cost? I heard everything, you know, when they talked in second reading about how it was going to be so expensive or create more red tape. This is actually going to cost Albertans nothing because it's actually being funded through Finance. This is an associate ministry, and we did this specifically so that we could reallocate our resources to be able to tackle a job that needs to be done. This is what we're going to be doing. We're using the resources through Finance in order to be able to fund the efforts that this ministry will be doing.

The other question that you asked was: what are the regs going to target? We've been very clear on this, and we've said this many times, actually. In fact, it's the first paragraph of the preamble.

Whereas the Government of Alberta recognizes that a consistent, transparent and efficient system of regulatory and administrative requirements is necessary to protect the public interest, including health, safety, the environment and fiscal accountability.

This is going to be the litmus test that we will use for being able to bring forward good legislation and getting rid of the ones that are redundant, getting rid of the ones that are obsolete, and getting rid of the ones that are in conflict with each other.

Those are the answers to some of the questions. You've talked about targets, priorities, parameters. You know, what's interesting about this is the fact that they never counted. How can you know how deep the rabbit hole goes, Madam Chair, if you don't count? So we're going to count. We're going to actually find out how many of these pinch points, these regulatory hoops, our job creators have to jump through, and we're going to do a very exhaustive count.

When B.C. and Ontario did their counts, they found about 380,000 of these regulations. What's interesting about it is that when Manitoba did their count, they actually counted agencies, boards, and commissions as well, and they found an extra 60 per cent more pinch points, a 60 per cent regulatory burden added on to our job creators and to their job creators. They found almost a million of these pinch points. We're going to make sure that we count agencies, boards, and commissions and all departments. This is how we're going to be able to find out the problems and how deep it goes.

In terms of targets, priorities, parameters, I think what the NDP are trying to say is that they want this to be prescriptive. We've chosen not to make it a prescriptive approach because this needs to be enabling. This actually needs to allow us the ability, Madam Chair, to be able to move on bad regulations. What the NDP would like to do – and this is code for what they've been doing for a while now – is say: "We want to slow you down because we're really upset that you guys won that election. You guys need to stop. You can't move so quickly." With this, a lot of businesses, a lot of job creators, and a lot of workers are saying: "You know what? We need to do something about it. We need to do it now."

It's been 40 years since we've actually even taken any stab at this, and we're going to – actually, maybe I should just say this: I've got my scissors out, Madam Chair, and we're going to make sure we get rid of that red tape.

The Chair: Are there any more comments, questions, or amendments? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. That was very interesting. I especially like the question from the Member for Edmonton-North West around what the finances look like for this associate minister. It sounds like some creative financing possibly going on there. But, you know, we'll see how that rolls out, and hopefully Albertans will like the results of it.

You know, I heard some things around micromanaging, new strategy, and choosing not to be prescriptive around this, yet I still remember the Premier at the press conference saying: but, hey, we're open to amendments around that. I guess it sounds like we're not open to amendments but – you know what? – we're going to give it a try, Madam Chair. We'll see what we can do here.

I have an amendment here that I'd like to move on behalf of the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview. I will let those get to you and await your instructions.

8:40

The Chair: Thank you very much. This will be known as amendment A1.

Member, please proceed.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Madam Chair. It's nice to be able to move this on behalf of Member Bilous, that Bill 4, the Red Tape Reduction Act, be amended by striking out section 2(1) and adding the following:

Report

2(1) Beginning in 2020, the Minister shall, subject to the regulations, prepare a report recommending strategies and initiatives for the Government to eliminate and prevent unnecessary regulatory and administrative requirements, including the reasons for those recommendations.

What we're asking here is just simply to let Albertans know why it is that they're recommending that these be eliminated. You know, when I look at things like the incident in Walkerton, and we all know what happened there, when seven people died and over 2,300 became ill after a deadly strain of E.coli polluted the drinking water in the town of Walkerton, Ontario. The investigation into the causes identified that the government failed to put proper safeguards in place after privatizing the water supply, and the ministry of environment, weakened by deregulation, failed to detect the problem.

I think if what we could do is that we're looking to, you know, as the minister said, get out those big scissors and start chopping away there, maybe we can just quickly post some of the things: here's what we're going to be doing and the reasons why. It will allow, you know, not only Alberta job creators but also the public in general, because usually it's the public in general that work for those job creators. I've always said that there's nothing like a front-line worker that knows how to do their job best because every day they want to be able to come back to that job, do that, make sure that the employer is successful because as long as they're successful, they keep getting a paycheck, too.

I'm hoping that we can look at some of those reasons for the recommendations. Certainly, I would say that should those reasons be, you know, completely legitimate and understandable for why we're getting rid of them, Albertans will be more than happy to say: "Yeah. Let's do that because it might make my job easier, which will make my employer, you know, a lot better in the environment, and we can all be prosperous together."

I'm hoping that folks will take a good hard look at this amendment and will be willing to support it. I certainly look forward to, hopefully, maybe some comments on it from the associate minister.

The Chair: Any comments or questions on the amendment? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Ms Sigurdson: Well, thank you very much, Madam Chair. It's my pleasure to rise in support of the amendment. One of the things that the amendment does identify is really the lack of clarity of what has been put forward as the Red Tape Reduction Act. Certainly, I know that the now government very often spoke publicly about how they had about six months out of being successful and becoming government, had developed a transition team so that they could plan ahead, and they knew what was going to happen because they were certain a victory. Indeed, here they are. They are the government. They had a significant period of time to plan. But when you look at this document that is Bill 4, the Red Tape Reduction Act, it lacks much detail.

This amendment absolutely does ask for more detail, which I feel is fair. I would say, Madam Speaker, that if we presented this bill when we were government, many of the members who are currently in the government would have laughed us out of the House. It's just so minimal, giving hardly any detail and direction. It's really very disturbing. It has very little in specifics.

I know that it's all part of the larger plan, that this government is open for business and they're wanting to support the job creators. Another thing that I just was sort of struck by when I was reading some of this – it make me think about something that happened previously, when we were the government. It was when we created the new ministry, the ministry of economic development and trade. The joke was: oh, well, you've created one job, the minister's job. Well, I would venture to say that that's what you've done here. That's about all you've done. And, you know, it's not anything to be proud of with this whole vagueness.

When I look at something, I sort of ask a couple questions always, just generally: what is this, and how is it going to be implemented? When you look at the "what" – I am looking at this two-page document of the bill and it says:

Whereas some regulatory and administrative requirements result in unnecessary costs for Albertans in terms of time, money or other resources, putting burdens on businesses and non-profit and public-sector organizations and threatening jobs . . .

That sounds good. Certainly, we on this side of the House don't have any quibble with that. But I just would like some congruence from the government because already in their Bill 2 they have created much more administrative complexity and administrative burden, totally acting in contrast to what is written here, so creating more red tape for employers.

Bill 2, the pick-the-pockets bill, talks about how youth minimum wage will be reduced to $13 when they're in school, when they're not in school, when they've worked so many hours. Oh, well, these things change. Employers have to figure that all out and look back to when the holidays were. Was school in that week, or were they off on spring break? I mean, there's a whole myriad of confusing factors. I'm thinking: well, if indeed this government does want to get rid of red tape, why would they create that? It just flies in the face of another bill that they have presented. Of course, that bill, the pick-your-pockets bill, goes on to talk more about when we're just giving straight time, no overtime. Again, you have to sort of look at: okay, did you regularly normally work on this holiday? Do you get paid for that or not? Again, it is an administrative burden on employers. I guess I'm just asking the government to be congruent. If you care about this, then how come you're not doing it in another bill? That is something that I'm wondering about.

Because the bill was so minimal, I was thinking, you know: what did they mean by this? So I did go back to the throne speech to see what they said in the throne speech, and they do have about a paragraph in the throne speech about it. They talk about "This will provide the means to lower the regulatory burden on Alberta's economy by one-third." Oh, so they say something a little bit in addition to what the bill actually says. They do say that they want to reduce it by a third. But, like, how do they measure that third? How do we know? I mean, I don't know.

If you want to achieve a goal, usually you have to know what your goal is, how to measure your goal so that you know that you've achieved it. Or do you just arbitrarily say that we achieved it or not? It just makes sense. Of course, in a huge organization like the government of Alberta, I mean, that's just basics. Certainly, there are all sorts of measures that we use in government to see: are we serving the people the best way?

But this bill: it doesn't even bother to tell us when this is what success looks like. That's another question that I have about this bill. I did go back also to the platform because that's also referred to many times by the government: "Oh, well, it's in the platform. We're very proud of our platform. You know, it had a lot of pages to it," unlike this bill, but it had much detail in it. I see there is a page, an entire page, on this one. Some of it is just sort of a bit of a table and stuff, so it's not full of words. But it does give a few more details again. It reiterates the one-third reduction target that we're not quite sure reduction of what exactly, fees or just maybe a policy or something like that. I'm not sure. It does talk about appointment of a minister, which, obviously, there's an associate minister who was appointed, so that we can see is – that's part of the success, I guess, of this bill.

But it does, again, say, "Implement a 'One-In/One-Out' rule requiring ministries to identify at least one offsetting regulation for every new regulation created." Okay. There are some specifics. Well, that's helpful. How come that's not actually in the bill? Why isn't that in the document? It's in here. That's a measure. I'm just confused because some of their documents have it, but of course the bill is the legislation. It's very important that the legislation has that measure in. And because this is a new ministry – this wasn't a ministry that was created previously – I'm wondering if this one-in, one-out rule works for that. You've created this whole ministry. Does that mean that another ministry needs to be deleted? What ministry is going to be deleted? What one are you going to take care of? I'm just sort of extrapolating from your one-in, one-out rule. Just curious about a few of these things.

I also wanted to talk a little bit more about looking at the strategies and the initiatives. This is what it does say. It says in the bill that in 2020, in the beginning of 2020 – not quite specific but sometime in the beginning, so perhaps January – the associate minister is going to give us a report. Okay. It's going to be a report about strategies and initiatives to eliminate and prevent unnecessary regulatory administrative requirements. This amendment that my hon. colleague just presented is asking to add to that so that we know the rationale, really, for why certain things are in and out. Many of my colleagues on this side of the House have spoken about the importance of regulations. You know, regulations protect us continually. We know there are consumer protections, environmental protections, worker protections, and we know all the stories of regulatory disasters.

But I want to talk about a certain regulation that I think is very important, that sort of I haven't really seen any talk of at all. I'm wondering if this is one of the regulations they're going to get rid of because if they do, I think that there is some concern. You know, there are professional bodies in our province.

A bit of a history lesson: when Lyle Oberg was the Minister of Children's Services – now, this was some time ago – I was on the board of the Alberta College of Social Workers at that time and we had been working for 30 years with the provincial government to have the profession of social work regulated, made it mandatory registration, and the government had never agreed. We had spoken to them many times because if anybody just calls themselves a social worker, they have to be accountable to our code of ethics, standards of practice. We have to have important, clear boundaries with our clients. We work with people who are very vulnerable, and if we exploit them, you know, if we have an inappropriate relationship with them, this is all disastrous. It's very unhealthy for our whole society. But there was no regulation for our profession. It was just a voluntary process. Indeed, anybody could call themselves a social worker. They didn't have to have an education background in social work. They could just, you know, put up a shingle and say: I'm a social worker. And people did that.

Something shifted in the late '90s, early 2000s, when Minister Oberg was in office. Somebody in his town did run into a regulatory issue regarding an inappropriate relationship with a client and someone who called themselves a social worker, so he got it. He also was a medical doctor, so he understood regulation because he knew how important it was in the health professions, like nursing and being a physician.

So after 30 years we did have some success, and we were able to have mandatory registration in this province, and that meant that social workers had a standard of practice, they had to follow a code of ethics, and each year they must do professional development. All this is regulation, all of it. But it's so important to the well-being of our society. It's so important to vulnerable Albertans. I don't know. It's not mentioned anywhere that this is something that they're looking at. You know, I'm just talking about my own personal understanding of the importance of regulation. I mean, there are many other things that people can bring up.

I think we have to be very careful, and the vagueness of this bill, really, is not being responsible. It's not. I mean, the minister perhaps talks about that he doesn't want to be – how did he put it? I can't remember his words exactly. Sort of unfettered. They can just sort of make decisions. That's why this amendment is so important, because it does give us specifics and rationales so we can understand. What are the principles that this government will follow when they're cutting so that we can at least understand that? It only makes sense.

I stand in support of this amendment, and I encourage all of the members in the House to support it. I think it would be a great addition and do no harm to what exists already.

Thank you very much, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Are there any more comments or questions on the amendment? The hon. Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you. I have to say that there is lots of stuff to unpack there, but let's just get back to the existing amendment that you've brought forward. The only thing that I can see changed here is "including the reasons for those recommendations." Addressing that issue is maybe what I'd like to do right now.

I guess the problem that I have with this is that they're, again, adding more red tape. They're saying: let's just add more to this legislation. We have created the legislation to be small and precise and concise for a very important reason, that is to make sure that we walk the talk. We're not just going to talk about red tape reduction; we're actually going to do it.

I haven't heard any compelling reasons to be able to support this. It actually doesn't talk about principles, as the Member for Edmonton-Riverview said. This would not change anything about that. It just says "including the reasons for those recommendations." I don't see any reasons why. That seems redundant to actually say that. In our report we will be able to show what we've done, and in that report it will show who we've consulted and what we've done to be able to get to that point.

I would recommend that all members do not support this amendment.

The Chair: Any other comments or questions in response to the amendment?

[Motion on amendment A1 lost]

The Chair: Are there any other comments or questions or amendments to the bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Madam Chair. Well, gosh, I'm a little disappointed in that. You know, I remember the associate minister, back when he was on this side of the House, talking about, at great length sometimes, how the government was never clear about what it was doing and why. So here we are. I thought that maybe the associate minister was going to live up to all the things he criticized us for and show us how to do it better. Maybe not today but, hopefully, maybe going forward, we might see a little bit more movement on that.

You know, I've heard some comments again that it feels like creating red tape. It's almost like when you walk onto that used-car lot and you get this guy that comes running out to you after 30 seconds and says: I've got a great deal for you today; trust me. Well, we're being asked to trust you, Minister, around what you feel is necessary to reduce.

Again, we talked a lot about the job creators, but we didn't talk about how Albertans are the ones that are potentially going to feel the effects of what gets cut. I can't help but maybe bring another example again just to create that little bit of caution about how we're cutting things. Can you imagine, Minister, if we'd have known ahead of time that by choosing to, you know, delay water-testing rules for growers – at the time it would save them $12 million per year – in 2008 there would be a listeriosis outbreak at Maple Leaf, resulting in 22 deaths because of weak regulations? They were cited as factors in recurring E coli outbreaks from lettuce, and between 2006 and 2018 there have been 20 E coli outbreaks related to lettuce production, the most recent just in 2018, where 43 people in 12 states and 22 people in Canada got sick because of it. Wouldn't it be great if we could know ahead of time whether some of these things could create some problems?

Anyway, I'm not dissuaded, Madam Chair. I do have another amendment here that I would like to try out. Hopefully, the government will be a little bit more open minded to this one. I shall pass these forward and await your instructions.

The Chair: Thank you.

This will be known as amendment A2.

Member, please proceed.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Madam Chair. You know, I've made a couple of references to some things that put public safety at risk, and it certainly would have been nice maybe knowing ahead of time that those regulations were either being cut or affected in some way. With this amendment, hopefully, we are putting the public mind at ease.

I move that Bill 4, the Red Tape Reduction Act, be amended by adding the following after section 2(1):

(1.1) In preparing the report . . . under subsection (1), the Minister shall take into account administrative or regulatory requirements with a purpose of protecting public health and safety, consumers, the environment or workers as part of any strategies or initiatives developed by the Government to eliminate and prevent unnecessary regulatory and administrative requirements.

Again, we're talking about being very, very clear with Albertans around their safety. Again, I'd like to say that a successful company always has very healthy and safely working employees. They are the ones that know their jobs best, as they should. Certainly, when I was working at Lucerne, I would not expect my plant manager to be able to just step into my position at a moment's notice and be able to do it as effectively and quickly as I could or as safely. I really wouldn't expect that unless they go through a whole bunch of training exercises, that I would have been happy to do, around forklift operation and power jack operation and loading a trailer safely and all that stuff.

I'm hoping that the minister will very seriously consider this, just, again, being open to Albertans, making sure that they have peace of mind about the regulations that he's looking to take those big scissors to, that he was talking about a little bit earlier, and allowing Albertans to sleep at night knowing that their health and safety is top of mind for this government. At the end of the day, when workers are injured or people get sick or even die, I believe that creates a whole lot of red tape for this government that I'm pretty sure they don't want to have.

I look forward to the comments of others, and I'm hoping that all members will support this amendment.

The Chair: Any comments or questions? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. As always, it's a pleasure to get up in the House and speak to the bills that are before us. As always, I like to share little stories to help and entertain our members on the other side of the House so that I can see some smiles instead of just some sad faces because we're getting up to amend their proposed legislation here.

One of the things that I want to share with you is that I regularly am invited to go to speak to classrooms. You know, sometimes I go to a grade 3 class or a grade 4 class, a grade 5 class. I'm sure that many members of the House go and do the same. Whenever I get the opportunity to go and speak to a class, inevitably I start talking to them about: well, what exactly is it that we do here? They, of course, want to know. They know the whole thing about how a bill becomes a law, especially the grade 6 students because they're the ones that are studying that at the moment. Some of them have already visited the Legislature, so they've gone through the tour. They've gone through all of the educational opportunities that exist here at the Legislature for exactly that purpose.

But then, when I get into a little bit more of the details, I start talking about how our responsibility in making the law a lot of times has to do with safety and making sure that they are protected as citizens of this great province. We go through the whole process. I give them the example of – and I know this is a municipal issue, but this is the example that I like to give them because it's one that they can relate to. It's very easy to relate to. It's, "I want you to imagine what it would be like if there were just no safety regulations from the moment that you left your house, you walk down your sidewalk, and you make it to the public sidewalk." We talk about how it's the responsibility of individuals to make sure that the sidewalk is clean during the wintertime so that there's no snow or ice buildup and things like that. Why do we have that particular bylaw at the municipal level? Well, for people's safety.

Then I say to them: "Okay. Imagine now that you have to walk across the road. You have to walk across the road, and where do you cross?" They say, "Well, you've got to cross at a crosswalk, and hopefully there's a light at that crosswalk." Of course, I tell them... [interjection] Yeah, you don't want to be jaywalking, right? You don't want to be doing that. But they inevitably say, "You cross at the crosswalk for safety."

Long story short...

Ms Hoffman: Not that long.

Member Loyola: You want longer? You want me to keep going?

Mr. Nielsen: Crosswalks are red tape.

Member Loyola: Well, see, this is exactly the thing. Are crosswalks red tape? They're designed for safety.

You know, inevitably, whenever I have that conversation with students, we initially go through those municipal-level regulations, bylaws and things like that, so that they can get a better understanding.

[Ms Sweet in the chair]

Inevitably, I always tell them: "Okay. Now, I want you to imagine that you go to a restaurant. Imagine if there were no rules at the restaurant and that the people could just serve anything any which way that they wanted to because, of course, that would just be better for their business. It would be easier if there were no government regulations on food preparation, right?" But then I tell them: "Imagine what happens if you get sick. You go to a restaurant with your family. Let's say that it's your mother's birthday. You go there and you're having a wonderful time. You're celebrating a loved one's birthday. But some government regulation in food preparation was cut, avoided, not followed, and inevitably someone gets sick, and even, a worst-case scenario, someone could actually die."

So when the government gets up to talk about red tape reduction, you could only imagine that we're going to have concerns. We're going to have concerns. Just as a way of kind of highlighting this, I want to go over some past failures.

There's one especially dedicated to food inspection. There was actually $56 million cut from the Canadian Food Inspection Agency, which resulted in 100 fewer inspectors, and this reverse staffing measure was put in place in response to the deadly listeriosis outbreak in 2008, which actually killed 22 Canadians. Twenty-two Canadians died as a result of cutting $56 million from the Canadian Food Inspection Agency.

Now, Minister, I don't know what it is that you're planning on cutting when it comes to red tape, but when I look at things like this, that have happened right here in Canada, not somewhere else but right here in Canada, as a way of cutting red tape in other jurisdictions, at the federal level, you have to imagine that I'm going to be concerned. For us it's really important that we get a better understanding of exactly what it is that you are trying to get at.

For that reason, I'm really happy to support this amendment put forward by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore, and I hope that we can only get some support from the other side as well. Hopefully, we'll hear from other members in the House on why they would like to support this amendment.

Thank you very much, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Are there any comments or questions with respect to the amendment? The hon. Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Madam Chair. Just really quickly, I appreciate the hon. member for bringing forward the amendment. You know, it's worded well, but it's also in the preamble, so it's redundant. I think that putting this into the body of the bill serves no purpose in that it's already in the preamble.

I'll just read to you what it says, again, in the preamble.

Whereas the Government of Alberta recognizes that a consistent, transparent and efficient system of regulatory and administrative requirements is necessary to protect the public interest, including health, safety, the environment and fiscal accountability.

It's the exact same information that we have in this amendment, so I'm not sure if that is the definition of red tape because of the redundancies of it. So I would be hoping that the members would vote this down.

Thank you very much, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Any other comments or questions with respect to the amendment?

Shall I call the question?

Hon. Members: Question.

[Motion on amendment A2 lost]

The Chair: Are there any comments, questions, or amendments with respect to the bill?

Hon. Members: Question.

[The remaining clauses of Bill 4 agreed to]

[Title and preamble agreed to]

The Chair: Shall the bill be reported? Are you agreed?

Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chair: Any opposed? Carried.

The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. I move that we rise and report the bill.

[Motion carried]

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Mr. Getson: Madam Speaker, the Committee of the Whole has had under consideration and reports certain bills. The committee reports the following bill: Bill 4. I wish to table copies of all amendments considered by the Committee of the Whole on this date for the official records of the Assembly.

The Deputy Speaker: Does the Assembly concur in the report?

Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Speaker: Any opposed? So ordered.

Government Bills and Orders Third Reading

Bill 4 Red Tape Reduction Act

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to be able to rise to move third reading of Bill 4, the Red Tape Reduction Act.

Our government's mandate includes making life easier for Albertans. This means creating more jobs. This means bringing back investment. This means speeding up approval times. This means getting Albertans back to work. All of this can be accomplished by getting rid of the burdensome red tape that blankets government today. As we've discussed in the House, Bill 4 will enable government to develop strategies to reduce red tape in Alberta and keep Albertans updated on what we are doing, all while protecting the environment, upholding fiscal accountability, and ensuring the health and safety of Albertans.

The cost of doing business, the lack of efficiency, the barriers to investment, and difficulty navigating the system have all encumbered our job creators. This all needs to change, and Bill 4 will accomplish this. Ultimately, we're going to take Alberta from being the most overregulated to the freest and fastest moving economy in Canada. Bill 4 allows government to create an inventory of the regulations that are currently in place, evaluate them, and determine if they have had their intended effect. We all know the state of the deep red tape hole that we're currently in, yet the former NDP government refused to do anything about it. This government is taking action. We promised Albertans. We're going to deliver.

This bill would also direct government to adopt a regulatory approach that focuses on outcomes instead of processes. An outcome-based approach will set a standard of regulatory excellence in Alberta, where all regulations are necessary, effective, efficient, and proportional to the outcomes they are trying to achieve. Essentially, Bill 4 enables us to get rid of ineffective and burdensome regulations and prevent the introduction of unnecessary regulations and requirements in the future. In line with this, the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction, myself, falling under the Ministry of Treasury Board and Finance, has a lean and efficient team.

As mentioned, red tape is putting a stranglehold on doing business in Alberta. The NDP failed job creators for four years. We will not. We must act quickly to rectify this, and Bill 4 allows government to combine red tape reduction efforts into omnibus initiatives. This made-in-Alberta approach will allow us to address red tape more quickly and efficiently than anywhere in Canada.

While we anticipate that most if not all of our red tape reduction efforts will be addressed through policy, this legislation will also allow government to create regulations to administer the Red Tape Reduction Act if necessary. Centralizing red tape reduction under the leadership of one associate minister and one division within Treasury Board and Finance will promote efficiency, guarantee crossgovernment co-ordination, and promote accountability as we slash red tape for all Albertans.

We will also consult with Albertans by standing up a series of industry panels across major economic, nonprofit, and public-sector groups. These panels will represent business and industry experts from key sectors, including oil and gas, tourism and hospitality, agriculture and agri-food, bioindustrial, forestry, manufacturing, construction, and small business.

We've already heard from some of these industries, and they're excited about the potential that this bill will provide. They want a streamlined and efficient regulatory process, they want to help attract new business and investment, and they want Alberta to be open for business and be competitive once again. In fact, when we introduced this legislation, Janet Riopel, the president and CEO of the Edmonton Chamber of Commerce, said that cutting red tape gives Alberta employers more time to create jobs and grow the economy instead of being burdened by cumbersome and costly regulations.

We also want to hear from everyday Albertans. We will be launching a website where everyone can share their experiences with red tape and their ideas for making government more efficient. Taken together, these industry panels and online feedback will provide a holistic approach to identifying, eliminating, and improving regulations in Alberta.

Accountability of reducing red tape doesn't stop at consultations. Reporting our activities and progress is a key aspect of this legislation. We will do this in a transparent way, with a copy of the red tape report tabled in the Legislature and made available to the public beginning in 2020, and we'll continue to report back to Albertans through the website.

I'd like to thank all members for the debate and feedback on Bill 4. First, we must clarify the need for the bill. We need the legislative authority to begin this work, to begin identifying what the more egregious examples of red tape are within government before we start getting rid of it. I think that everyone in this House understands what we mean by red tape, and the desire to have a formal definition of it is a stalling tactic. Anyone who has waited for hours on hold, had to fill out the exact same form over and over and over again, or felt unnecessary stalls from inefficient government knows what red tape is.

Second, we're not taking the process of cutting regulations lightly. We understand that regulations exist for a number of reasons and that many of them do serve important purposes, including environmental protections and promoting the health and safety of all Albertans. Our goal is to not get rid of these regulations wholesale but to ensure that they are implemented in a way that achieves their intended goal without creating onerous red tape.

Lastly, we have stated our timeline on this process clearly. We aim to cut red tape in Alberta by at least one-third by the end of our mandate. We are developing a schedule for reporting our efforts publicly, but have initially committed to a report in 2020.

Bill 4 is an acknowledgement that Alberta's economy needs help right now, that our businesses need help right now, and that families need help right now. This legislation is the help that is so desperately needed by Albertans. By working to reduce red tape by one-third over four years and preventing new red tape from being implemented, we'll make it easier to do business in Alberta, easier to invest, and easier to navigate government.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, 29(2)(a) is not available.

Are there any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. It's been an interesting debate on Bill 4, the Red Tape Reduction Act. On first blush, of course, we're creating somewhat of a new ministry for red tape reduction, which in itself is red tape. We've heard a lot of really great buzzwords: moving our economy along, being the freest, and reducing costly burdens on our job creators. We've seen many examples where, supposedly, costly burdens ended up coming back to bite hard-working Canadians, hard-working Albertans where it shouldn't have.

I have to say that this bill is vague. It contains no targets, no timelines, no procedures to ensure transparency and accountability, something, again, that I noted the associate minister, when he was in opposition, very regularly chastised our government for apparently not doing. Yet when given a chance to do things differently, it was a little bit like I mentioned before, that the second verse sounds much the same as the first verse.

I had talked in earlier debate about how there seems to be a little bit of tunnel vision that's starting to occur here. You know, we are saying: well, we need to do it right now; it has to happen right now. Sometimes you get into that frame of mind – and I made a little bit of a reference back to my younger days playing basketball – of forcing that play. Again, sometimes it's really exciting to hear the crowd cheer when you do make that impossible pass, but more times than not, you end up throwing the ball away, and that just puts you further and further behind.

I'm concerned about the fact that this doesn't define red tape. It's been said: well, we want to keep ourselves open and flexible. I think that creates doubt in Albertans' minds because they have no idea what regulations will be on the chopping block, how it could affect consumer protections, health, labour, social services, things like that, again, all in the name of trying to do something right here right now because it's got to happen very, very quickly. I think we're going to find ourselves coming back here later and having to amend things that we weren't expecting to happen.

There's a commitment, of course, to report to Albertans eventually here, beginning in 2020, which, unfortunately, again, is vague – is that the beginning of 2020, is that the middle of 2020, or is that the end of 2020? – as long as it begins in 2020 sometime. By that time the damage could be done. You know, looking back in hindsight, we see many examples of that. I wish there had been disclosure around some of the things that we've mentioned in this House that put public safety at risk. I'm sure at some point in time somebody said to those people: well, we're going to save the job creators $12 million. Unfortunately, we made thousands sick because we reduced regulations probably haphazardly. I think Albertans deserved to know what was going to happen before it actually happened. To claim that that's just a burden, I think, is a little bit overinflated.

I'm also concerned around the one in, one out. It's been mentioned, and I think the wording was that every new regulatory burden proposed must be matched with a cut of an equivalent burden somewhere else. How is that determined? How do we weigh that this regulation that we're going to get rid of weighs the same as this one that we're bringing in? I've certainly seen that the minister of labour has said: well, you know, it's all right if we create just a little bit of red tape. But in that contradictory form to the associate minister's mandate around red tape, is there going to be a rush to get something out? It sounded like they were going to communicate, but then it sounded like they weren't going to communicate.

I hope that members across the way give a little bit of second thought to this. I think we could have done a little bit better. Certainly, I think there's agreement where we can find those efficiencies, something that is actually outdated. I mean, if we've got regulations that are, you know, back from before we even had the Internet, then certainly maybe we need to look at that. I've seen some crazy municipal regulations in other jurisdictions, for instance, where it said that if you were caught practising magic, you would be burned at the stake. That's probably something that we could get rid of. When we start looking at potentially deregulating things all in the name of trying to save a few dollars, it usually comes back to us as a lot more expensive to deal with. Hopefully, members will give this a second thought.

Unfortunately, I will not be able to support this going forward at this time. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, 29(2)(a) is still not available.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill?

Seeing none, would the hon. Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction close debate?

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's been a lively debate this evening, and I've appreciated the questions that were asked by the opposition members. I would like to close debate.

[Motion carried; Bill 4 read a third time]

Consideration of Her Honour the Lieutenant Governor's Speech

Ms Glasgo moved, seconded by Ms Rosin, that an humble address be presented to Her Honour the Honourable the Lieutenant Governor as follows.

To Her Honour the Honourable Lois Mitchell, CM, AOE, LLD, the Lieutenant Governor of the province of Alberta:

We, Her Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Legislative Assembly, now assembled, beg leave to thank Your Honour for the gracious speech Your Honour has been pleased to address to us at the opening of the present session.

[Adjourned debate June 10: Mr. Ellis]

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any members wishing to speak? The hon. Minister of Seniors and Housing.

Ms Pon: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I would like to share some stories about me. I would like to begin by acknowledging that we are sitting on the traditional ground of the First Nations and Métis people referred to as Treaty 6 territory. I would like to also acknowledge all the many First Nations, Métis, and Inuit footsteps which have marked this land for generations.

I'm very proud and humble to be the first MLA to represent the wonderful constituents of the new electoral district of Calgary-Beddington. Located in the north area of Calgary, the constituency is made up of the friendly communities of Beddington Heights, Country Hills, Hidden Valley, Huntington Hills, MacEwan, and Sandstone Valley. In addition to being Calgary-Beddington's MLA, I also have the privilege and honour to serve as the provincial Minister of Seniors and Housing. Both roles and titles I will not take lightly. I am committed to working hard every single day for the trust of my constituents and which the Premier has placed in me.

Our government is bringing a few priorities, one of which is crucial to my Seniors and Housing responsibilities. We will make life better for all Albertans by ensuring the quality and effectiveness of our public service and by supporting the most vulnerable in our society. With our senior population of more than 600,000, growing to 1 million by 2035, the challenges of an aging population cannot be overlooked. My role as the Minister of Seniors and Housing, representing all Albertans, will be at the forefront of my mind every day. I will work with my dedicated and trusted ministry staff to ensure that all seniors, who have spent their lives building this great province and the many generations to come, are not forgotten and have accessibility to the resources and care they need and deserve.

I will help seniors' live in the communities they choose to live in, help seniors increase their independence, and ensure that health and life expenses are met. As a part of my mandate, I will work closely with various housing providers, both in the nonprofit and private sectors, to ensure that there is flexible, affordable, and quality housing for all Albertans with low incomes.

As a representative of our government I'm committed to begin as a faithful steward of our province. I will work tirelessly to make Alberta the best place in North America to live, work, start a business, and retire.

As a teenager I emigrated with my family from Hong Kong. We appreciate how the community welcomed us with open arms in supporting my family as we began our new life. As my family prospered and grew, so too did Alberta's economy. Over the many years ahead this prosperity confirmed to my family that we made the right decision to relocate to Alberta. This hope of growth that I had when I moved is something that I would like for many future generations of Albertans.

But this goes beyond our future generations. I want to ensure the possibilities of growth back to the residents of Alberta. I believe our government has the power to rise as they relentlessly focus on policies that are designed to create jobs, growth, and economic diversification. I want to be part of an economy that is strong, where there are jobs for Albertans who can feel proud and raise a family in the same place that gave my family hope, in a place we proudly call home. With hope comes hard work, difficult choices, and sacrifice for the long-term well-being of family and community. I ask all Albertans to work together for common goals to bring in a brighter future.

I'm thankful for the community members that helped integrate myself and my family when we were new to the community. To reciprocate what we received, I have always enjoyed volunteering in the community and served on various boards to assist those who need it the most. As I pursued a long-term career in banking, with exposure to personal, commercial, and international banking, as a Canada Mortgage and Housing, CMHC, employee in mortgage insurance, affordable housing, and international trade and also as the vice-president of a medium-sized business, I know how hard people work every single day to support their families and ensure there's food on the kitchen table and to save their hard-earned money to buy a house for the family that they can call a home of their own.

I would like to share with you a story about how work can truly pay off. I was in a Tim Hortons ordering a coffee one afternoon. A young man behind the counter recognized me from a financial seminar I had given years ago. His English at that time was poor; still learning, he found it very difficult to find a job and integrate into the community. As we were chatting, he let me know that the seminar encouraged him to keep learning and to not give up. Soon after the seminar he obtained an entry-level job at Tim Hortons, and shortly after that he was training to become a management trainee. This can-do attitude we must bring back to our province, and let our great nation and beyond our borders know that we are back in business.

While we grow, we cannot forget those who are vulnerable: our seniors, the disabled, and those facing mental health issues or other challenges in their lives. All Albertans deserve the support they need in their healthy lives.

After volunteering in the community for many years and serving on various nonprofit and for-profit boards, I felt that the time was right to become involved in politics as a way of being able to improve our lives and to ensure that the many opportunities my family and I received are paid forward. We are here in the Alberta Legislature because we want to do our part to make positive changes for all Albertans. With the support of taxpayers, the residents of Alberta, and my government colleagues I'm confident that we will build a strong, vibrant economy for all Albertans for many generations to come. I'm very proud to be an Albertan, the first Chinese woman to sit as a minister with the Alberta government, and honoured to represent the constituency of Calgary-Beddington.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a): any comments or questions?

Seeing none, the hon. Minister of Indigenous Relations.

Mr. Wilson: Thank you, Madam Speaker. [Remarks in Cree] [Translation] Welcome. How are you? [As submitted]

It is with great respect and awe that I rise today to reply to the Speech from the Throne and offer my maiden speech as a first-time elected Member of the Legislative Assembly of Alberta for the constituency of Maskwacis-Wetaskiwin. I want to first acknowledge the lands we're on as Treaty 6 territory, traditional lands of the First Nations and the Métis people. They've been marked for centuries by the footprints of the First Peoples that call this area home.

I extend my congratulations to all the members of the Assembly on their elections. It is truly a team effort to get here, requiring the backing and support of our family and friends. No matter what political affiliations we represent, I think it's safe to say that we all have two common goals: one being to represent the best interests of our constituency and, two, to move this great province forward. Finally, I'd like to thank my constituents for allowing me the privilege to represent them in this esteemed House. I am truly humbled and blessed by their act of faith. It is a heavy responsibility and one that I take very seriously.

My constituency is Maskwacis-Wetaskiwin: maskwa, meaning "bear," and cîs, meaning "hills." Wetaskiwin is Spatinow. That means "the hills where peace was made."

Approximately half the population of my electoral division is indigenous. I grew up in the middle of the four bands. We called it Ma-Me-O Sâkâhikan, otherwise known as Pigeon Lake. Racism, sadly, was still an issue. When I went to school – I can remember my first day. I came home from school, my shirt was torn, I had a bloody nose, and my mom said, "My goodness, what happened to you?" I said, "Well, they were beating up on my friend Larry." My mother said, "Why?" I said, "Because they said he was an Indian." She said, "Well, he is. Why did you get beat up?" "Well, they said I wasn't an Indian." She said, "You're not." It broke my heart.

Maskwacis-Wetaskiwin used to be a big resource-producing area, but the past few years have seen a steady drop in resource, manufacturing, and oil and gas activity. This hurts the region as there are several manufacturers in my riding supplying electrical components, agricultural equipment, and oil field components. In fact, just last week I was at the Leduc-Wetaskiwin chamber of commerce, and it was there that I learned that the county of Wetaskiwin lost $1.6 million in tax revenue in the past three years. This has meant that they've had to dip into reserves to cover the shortfall. But my residents are hardy people, willing to dig in, tighten their belts, and get to work when times are tough.

Recently the riding has begun to revert to its agricultural roots, helped by some of the best topsoil seen in western Canada. We also have a large tourism base, which is really beginning to pick up, fuelled by the many lakes in my riding as well some of the best golf courses in the province, all in close proximity to the city of Edmonton. I would be remiss if I did not mention the Reynolds-Alberta Museum, a crown jewel to be found in Wetaskiwin, and I'm happy to report that the museum will be getting an expansion to the Aviation Hall of Fame this year.

Also, some good news on the economic front at home: a new grain-handling facility is being constructed along the tracks just south of Wetaskiwin. It's the G3 facility, and it'll be a state-of-the-art grain-handling facility which will feature a 42,600-tonne storage facility, with a 17,000-tonne main house and three 8,300-tonne steel bins, surrounded by a 134 car loop track on a property south of Wetaskiwin. This construction has meant new jobs and new money flowing into the riding and Alberta's economy. The unique JEDI partnership, the Joint Economic Development Initiative, between the county of Wetaskiwin and the town of Millet, was key to bringing this project to fruition.

I will now move to discuss how the four bands of Maskwacis are dealing with the tumultuous Alberta economy. We have the Montana, Louis Bull, Ermineskin, and Samson. They've been hit hard as well. Local leadership tells me that the loss of oil and gas activity has been a struggle. As we all know, the loss of economic prosperity often means an effect on socioeconomic well-being, and these communities are dealing with that fallout. The good news is that local leadership has been acquiring and opening new businesses and farmland to offset the resource development loss.

I'm excited to invite them to participate in the indigenous opportunities corporation once it is established. We had discussions about that today during our summit with the Alberta chiefs, a meeting not held in almost four and a half years.

I'm also proud to report that the four bands have amalgamated their schools into one district. They are doing an amazing job graduating students from their schools and their own college. They have their own health system, and I was there just two weeks ago and got a tour of that facility, which offers all under one roof dental, optical, community pharmacy, and a diabetics' clinic, with plans one day of opening up their own hospital. Eventually they would also like to add dialysis, IV therapy, and seniors' care as well.

The city of Wetaskiwin also has a great hospital and seniors' care facilities. I was honoured to be the chair of the hospital board and later chair of the region. One of the biggest accomplishments I was most proud of was to get a dialysis unit for the area's residents – and my own father is now also using that dialysis unit – so residents don't have to drive to Edmonton or farther to receive saving care. As we all know, it's incredibly exhausting for family members to drive long distances for this type of care, so it's critical that we get this type of support and medical service in the rural areas and indigenous communities.

There are so many little hamlets and towns in my riding I cannot mention due to time, but a quick shout-out to some like Millet, Pigeon Lake, Hay Lakes, Ferintosh, Falun, Rolly View, and Mulhurst.

A big concern in my constituency is addictions and mental health. I'm so proud our government has appointed an Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions. I will be meeting with the minister to discuss this important issue and look for solutions. Sadly, residents, especially the younger people – taking their own lives is a big concern in Maskwacis. They have made tremendous strides to slow down these terrible incidents, but as we can all attest, even one life gone too early is one too many.

I'd like to now discuss a little bit about myself so that my colleagues and Albertans have a better understanding of who I am and what drove me to accept running in this election. Was it the 15-hour days of endless meetings or having to memorize thick binders of public policy? It was the thought I could give back to my friends and family, my fellow citizens of Maskwacis-Wetaskiwin, no matter how small my contribution might be.

My family has a long history of public service. I'll start with my grandpa serving in World War I. You probably have seen the movie Passchendaele. A lot of that's based on my family's history. If you look up "love in a dangerous time" in the Edmonton Journal, you'll see a picture of my grandma and grandpa in there. My grandpa was one of 17 survivors of that battle of a thousand men. That's how many died from the Princess Pats from Edmonton here. He was pronounced dead on the battlefield, but somehow he was only mostly dead and came back. He was a medic so he dressed his own wounds and made it back to the clinic and six weeks later awoke in England to a little Welsh lady, who nursed him back to health. He married her, and that became my grandma and grandpa.

My dad was in the militia in the Korean War, and my dad's cousin is the late Lieutenant Governor Grant MacEwan. My dad was also on village council, and my oldest daughter was a councillor for the city of Wetaskiwin and is now a municipal administrator. Another daughter was a page here in this very Chamber. My father had a big influence on me, amazing me with his many talents. I can always remember him helping out in the community for anyone and anywhere he could. I remember when natural gas was being installed in the area. My dad became an expert in converting furnaces, and as a result, was gone every night helping where it was needed. One time I said that I was going along, and my dad thought, "Wow, my son is taking up the family trade," until he realized the house we were going to had five girls, one of which became my wife.

My mother's family came from Odessa, Russia, which is now the Ukraine. My mom was raised in a log cabin with a dirt floor but thought she was the richest person in the world as there was always so much love in the family, a lesson passed down to me. My mom always told me that you'll be remembered for what you give back to the community, not what you take out.

My wife's mother was widowed and had 10 kids all at home, and she raised them all by herself, including a pair of two-year twins, with no help on the farm, which my wife and I ended up buying. We just recently turned over that 120-year-old family farm to our son, who's now running it.

I'm blessed to have such an amazing partner as my wife. I call her my trophy wife after 41 years. She's patient and loving and has always supported me in my business ventures. In my political life I would not be where I am without her.

We have four amazing grown children, three girls and one boy, and seven grandchildren, and I love them all dearly. My youngest daughter and her wife and my grandson know that I love them so much, and I am incredibly proud of all of their accomplishments. I also have two Métis grandchildren. I look forward to talking to them as they grow up and telling them that their omosômimâw was Minister of Indigenous Relations.

I've always had various business ventures on the go to support my farming life. I've been lucky enough to be involved in a lot of development in my riding. I was also proud to open and support businesses in the Maskwacis area when a lot of people weren't willing to do so.

I want to conclude by thanking the Premier for his appointment. What an honour and humbling experience it has been in my short time so far. I'll always remember fondly being sworn in as Minister of Indigenous Relations.

I also want to take time to thank all the members of the House for your kindness and your support.

I also need to thank the many people who got me here. Some have closed up shop, spent weeks with doors closed, and volunteered on my team seven days a week.

I thank my family and my wife, who have seen my time with them diminish greatly. When we take this job, we also take our families with us. We owe them a debt we can never repay. I stand before you tonight and will continue to work hard, stay humble, and keep our commitments to Alberta.

[Remarks in Cree] [Translation] Thank you, your friend and partner. [As submitted]

And with that, Madam Speaker, I move to adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 8 Education Amendment Act, 2019

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It is my honour to rise and move second reading of Bill 8, the Education Amendment Act, 2019.

Madam Speaker, with this important piece of legislation we are taking a significant step forward for education in Alberta. The Education Act with these proposed amendments will provide a better foundation for unlocking the potential of our students today and in the future.

Let me first explain how we got to this point. Work began in the mid-2000s to replace an outdated School Act, which had been in place since 1988. The world was changing and so, too, were the expectations of parents, school officials, and students for their education system. Years of widespread consultation went into the Education Act, which this House passed in 2012. It reflected the priority of Albertans, that the student is at the centre of all decisions we make around education and learning. The Education Act never came into force, though, as work continued on its regulations.

After the 2015 election the newly elected government decided to take a different approach. They ignored the Education Act, and the act languished as they decided to bolt their changes to the 1988 School Act. That brings us to where we are today, and that's why our government promised to go back to the Education Act. It was the result of so much work and input and reflected what Albertans had said that they wanted. Once in place the Education Act will modernize our education system and bring to life the vision shared by thousands of Albertans.

Madam Speaker, the Education Act recognizes parents as a child's first and most important teacher. It strengthens local decision-making and puts school boards in the best position to determine the needs of their students and the learning opportunities necessary to meet these needs. It highlights the importance of choice and confirms our ongoing support for all types of education choices, including public, separate, francophone, charter, private, and home-schooling. It confirms that the school system should support every child of every background and every ability.

This act focuses on putting our kids first and making schools safe, welcoming places, where diversity is celebrated and bullying is not tolerated. As the members can see, the Education Act is based on values our government believes are fundamental to supporting our students.

Looking specifically at Bill 8, members can also see that our government is being pragmatic. We know that the next school year is only a couple of months away, and we know that certain aspects of the Education Act would add additional costs to the system. So to be mindful of the bottom line and to provide certainty for families and educators, we are proposing some amendments to the Education Act.

Madam Speaker, let me first start with those amendments related to access. We are proposing to keep the current rules for age of access, age of compulsory attendance, and residency rules. Some may be disappointed that we are making these changes to the original Education Act, and we recognize that one aspect of the act was about increasing access to education. However, the act was drafted under different circumstances. In 2012 the province was booming and more students were dropping out of high school early to go to work. We are not seeing this today. Maintaining the status quo will save taxpayers money while providing stability to school authorities. We are also being responsive to school board concerns. Some school authorities are currently facing space and capacity issues, and if we did not amend the act, they would struggle to find room for even more students.

School jurisdictions also expressed concerns over additional costs associated with these changes. We also proposed to keep the current timeline of 2020 for when changes to the common kindergarten age of entry come into effect. The Education Act would have this happen right away, which would mean the change in age would happen for the 2019-2020 school year. We estimate that 4,500 children would be caught in this change. Therefore, we know schools and parents have already made their plans for the next year, so we want to make sure that they have the stability within the system that they require. It simply makes sense to keep the timeline as is.

We also want to provide certainty and consistency for parents and school boards when it comes to student transportation, so we're proposing to maintain the current eligibility rules for busing. The coming school year's transportation schedules have already been determined and communicated to parents, so we know parents will support this amendment. They will understandably prefer stability for this upcoming school year to a disruption in the plans they have already made. This is particularly important for rural families. It is also important to maintain certainty in this area to ensure that families across the province have equal access to transportation and to ensure boards can contain their costs of providing transportation.

Also, to help contain costs this time for parents, it is to limit the school fees they pay. It is important that parents do not pay additional school fees for instructional supplies and materials required in a classroom such as textbooks and paper. Amendments will prohibit school boards from charging fees on these types of materials. School boards will be free to charge fees for other items such as for optional courses and extracurricular activities, but they would be accountable to parents for whichever fees they may choose to set.

Also related to minimizing cost drivers is superintendent compensation. I think all members of this House can agree that superintendent compensation should remain in line with executive pay in other Alberta agencies, boards, commissions, and postsecondary institutions. Therefore, we propose to amend the Education Act so the current superintendent compensation rules are carried over into the legislation.

We are also proposing amendments so that we can implement leadership certification and teaching-quality standards as currently planned. As many people know, school board leadership certification has broad support from all stakeholders, and a significant amount of work has gone into preparing for it to be in place for September 1.

Madam Speaker, we are also introducing additional amendments that relate to system governance or are administrative in nature. This is primarily to align the Education Act with other pieces of legislation or current practices. This includes updating language around establishing separate school districts and aligning dates for bylaws related to ward boundaries or trustee representation within the Local Authorities Election Act.

Taken altogether, these proposed amendments will allow for the smooth transition between existing legislation and the Education Act, which, if passed, will come into force on September 1, 2019, as promised.

In conclusion, from stakeholders to students, from policy-makers to parents Albertans have told us that they want an education system focused on student success. I'm confident that all members of this House would also agree with this statement. For this to happen, we need a modern piece of legislation that creates a strong foundation for our education system today and into the future.

We do not need to look further than the Education Act to find this. It is a foundation built on years of input from students, parents, teachers, principals, school support staff, trustees, employers, and many, many other Albertans. It goes beyond learning and speaks to the system as a whole, including teaching, leadership, collaborative and community engagement, all within a more flexible system that provides for local autonomy and is accountable to parents and taxpayers. The original Education Act together with the proposed amendments will deliver a provincial framework focused on educational excellence in Alberta, one that Albertans expect and deserve.

Madam Speaker, I'm asking all members of this House for their support of Bill 8, the Education Amendment Act, 2019. Thank you.

I would like to adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Consideration of Her Honour the Lieutenant Governor's Speech (continued)

Ms Glasgo moved, seconded by Ms Rosin, that an humble address be presented to Her Honour the Honourable the Lieutenant Governor as follows.

To Her Honour the Honourable Lois Mitchell, CM, AOE, LLD, the Lieutenant Governor of the province of Alberta:

We, Her Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Legislative Assembly, now assembled, beg leave to thank Your Honour for the gracious speech Your Honour has been pleased to address to us at the opening of the present session.

[Adjourned debate June 10: Mr. Wilson]

The Deputy Speaker: Are there members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie and Deputy Chair of Committees.

Mr. Milliken: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. At the risk of sounding a little self-serving given my election as the Deputy Chair of Committees, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate you on your election as Deputy Speaker of the House.

Now, having given this opportunity to speak some thought, I think it is best for me to start right at home, with my family. I would like to start by thanking my wife. She gave me the go-ahead to start door-knocking more than a year ago in order to win the nomination for the United Conservative Party. I don't think either of us at the time knew what we were getting ourselves into. So thank you, Christine. Your sacrifices mirror my own. To my son, Eric: you don't understand all of daddy's words yet. For those of you who don't know, he's only two years old. I hope that one day you will understand that everything I do – the late nights, all the travel away from home, the time that I spend away from you – I do for you to ensure that you have the opportunities in the future that I had when I was growing up in Alberta.

To my mother and father, Jane and Don, or Dr. and Dr. Milliken: your love and support throughout the years did not go unnoticed. In a weird way I actually owe my life to politics. It was actually an unsuccessful attempt at an election in 1979, one that didn't quite work out, that then allowed my parents to decide to have another child, and that child was actually me. To my brothers and my sister: I am still the kid who looks up to all of you. To the volunteers who helped me win and are the reason why I am here: I am forever in your debt.

By way of some background on me, I took economics and business at the University of Alberta, and then ultimately I became a lawyer. After several years of practising, I ended up starting my own business, so with all due respect to Parliamentary Counsel and the many lawyers in this House, I do often refer to myself as a reformed lawyer.

On the business front I've told many people throughout my door-knocking that it's great to say that I managed to build up this business to do business across Canada, but really it's actually a darker story in the sense that in 2015 and 2016 the economy of Alberta was turned in a way that I didn't agree with. Ultimately, it was out of necessity that I had to start looking for clients in other provinces and other countries in order to diversify my company away from Alberta. It meant long days of work, long business trips, time away from my family given the economic mismanagement of our province over the last four years. As such, I am honoured to be part of the United Conservative Party and the United Conservative government, one that is actively supporting job creators, entrepreneurs, and risk takers. Small businesses are the backbone of our economy.

I will be the first to admit that I was not asked by anyone to run for this office. A year and a half ago I was working hard, minding my own business, both figuratively and literally. I guess there's a pun in there. I was working, obviously, to help provide for my family. I was also fed up with how the province was being run. We need a government that supports the economy and responsible growth of our energy sector, which in turn helps support prosperity not only in Alberta but across all of Canada. Long story short, a year and a half ago I disagreed with the direction of Alberta, so I decided to change it.

I ran in Calgary-Currie because I live in Calgary-Currie. I'm raising a family in Calgary-Currie. I even started my company in a small extra bedroom that we had in a home in Calgary-Currie. Years ago, before I decided to run, I actually found fulfillment through volunteering and fundraising within my community. Once my company was sort of up and running, I had a little bit more extra time on my hands, and I filled that time within the community. Remember: getting to this point was not an easy task. It took many weeks of 100-hour-plus workweeks, trying to build my company out of nothing, with absolutely no guarantee of a paycheck. I can't say enough about the risks taken by small-business owners, and they need our support.

At the time, though, I was volunteering for my community association and providing a little extra hand here and there, labour wherever I could, moving guitars and helping store donated keyboards, things of that nature, flipping burgers at different events. I even helped fund raise for a 10-seater bus to help drive local new immigrant children to various sporting programs and after school programs. If I can say one thing with the platform that I have here, it's that if you have an extra hour, even just one hour, if you decide to dedicate that time to a local charity in your area, the marginal benefit of that one hour can be immeasurable. Take care of your community, and your community will take care of you.

Calgary-Currie is an amazing riding, Madam Speaker. To borrow some words from Mr. Speaker, who often talks about his riding being fantastic, I would arguably say that my riding of Calgary-Currie could be considered the best riding. I've heard many stories from the MLAs here. Well, some people have said that their riding is as big as Belgium. Well, my riding is a little different. On a good day if I don't hit a red light, I can probably drive across it in less than 10 minutes. Twenty-four per cent of Calgary-Currie's population are visible minorities, and that includes my wife and my son. It's a young riding, with about 40 per cent of the population being between 25 and 44. At 39, I'm in that category. It's an urban riding with bike lanes, senior living centres, great restaurants, and even a golf course. But it has problems, too.

Along with some of the highest rated schools, it actually has some of the lowest rated schools. Along with some of Alberta's most expensive homes, it also has several community housing projects. We have certain pockets of community members that have been in the area for generations, and we have pockets of new Canadians, new immigrants and refugees from various war-torn countries. The challenges facing Calgary-Currie are real. All you need to do is go to the Westbrook Mall C-Train station early in the morning, and you will see mass homelessness. You will get a glimpse into the opioid crisis. Door-knock the community's housing projects, and you will find many people struggling to feed and clothe their children without computers or TVs or phones. Then you can door-knock in some of the more affluent areas, and you will find what you think are people who, on the surface, are enjoying great successes, but if you dig a little deeper, you will find that some of these individuals have been out of work for upwards of three years. They are hanging on for dear life just to keep their homes. And then, if you go around, others are just gone; forced to sell and move recently to other provinces or countries in search of work.

Just as one example, I was door-knocking in Rutland Park, which is a relatively new area within my community. I ran into a lady by the name of Sarah, and she had two young kids about the same age as Eric. Immediately we started talking about kids, and the ice was broken. Then she quickly mentioned that her husband was in Houston. At the time, my wife was actually in Houston attending an energy conference, so I just assumed that the conversation was going to go down that path. I started to talk along the lines of Houston and conventions, and she said: "Whoa. No. That's not it, Nick." In this case her husband had lost his job 10 months before and was not able to find work in Canada and, ultimately, had to move to Houston. Now, the big problem with this, essentially, is that the family was forced to split and live in completely different countries. Once they were financially back on their feet, she had the full expectation that she was then going to move the whole family to Houston. This is just one of the stories of hardship that I heard over the last four years of a government that failed to support our workers and failed to support the economy.

The saddest part of this is that once these people leave, they almost never come back. We have experienced a province-wide brain drain over the last four years, but it has to stop now. We will support the free market, support our energy industry, bring back jobs to Alberta, and help create the prosperity which, in turn, allows us to care for marginalized portions of our population and protect the individual regardless of faith, lifestyle, or background.

I grew up in Alberta knowing that the opportunities would be there for me regardless of what I did with my life. I could be a drummer – Lord knows I tried – an artist, a plumber, an accountant. In my case I became a lawyer and then an entrepreneur, and I guess that now you could probably call me a politician. This is my chance to help restore those opportunities so my son can have opportunities for success right here in our great province.

Okay. So this is now also the time of the speech that we can all just sit back, stop for a second, take a deep breath, and take all of this in. All of us here today who are elected, on both sides, are now part of Alberta's history, and that statement is almost overwhelming to me. The responsibility and weight on all of us is enormous, and we have some big shoes to fill.

For me, I remember Christmas in Red Deer. I remember family trips to Gull Lake, and I remember hearing stories about my great-grandfather, William R. Howson, who was an MLA here from 1930 to 1936. He was the Opposition leader against Premier Aberhart. He was also the leader of the Alberta Liberal Party, but I don't hold that against him. At the time, though, as a child I could only imagine what it was like to sit in this Chamber. I remember thinking: man, my great-grandpa must have been really old.

But now here I am, and it's my turn. It's our turn. I walk around these marble halls, sit in the Chamber, sometimes even on the Speaker's throne, and I realize that we are all blessed to be here with the opportunity to help restore Alberta as the engine and Canada's economic leader and a leader in the world. No matter your political stripes we are here to support Alberta, support Albertans, support our families, and in many ways support each other. Together we can make Alberta the best place to live, work, and raise a family.

Thank you.

With that, if it pleases Madam Speaker, I would like to adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. What a great day. Lots of progress. Bill 4, the red tape bill, is through the House. As such, I think that we should be very happy with the progress today. I thank all members for all their hard work, and I will move that we adjourn the House till tomorrow at 10 a.m.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 10:14 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

10 a.m.

Tuesday, June 11, 2019

Prayers

The Speaker: Hon. members, the prayer. Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and to her government, to the Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of power and responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideas but, laying aside all private interests and prejudice, keep in mind their responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all. Amen.

You may be seated.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Municipal Government (Property Tax Incentives) Amendment Act, 2019

[Debate adjourned June 10: Mr. Feehan speaking]

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford has seven minutes remaining should he desire.

Are there others wishing to speak to the bill?

Seeing none . . .

Ms Hoffman: Yamahama.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora is rising to debate.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you so much Mr. Speaker, and thank you to all members for the opportunity to engage in this important dialogue. I definitely don't plan on using all 15 minutes because I think that the main message I want to leave all members with is that this bill – I love Seinfeld. Some of you may have heard me talk about it already once in this House. I'll probably talk about it many more times. I think that this bill actually doesn't do anything. Some people said that Seinfeld was a show about nothing. I think it was a show about a lot of things that were entertaining. I think that some of the things in this bill are entertaining but that what is in place already through the work that was done in the review of the MGA has already achieved the likely desired outcomes as proposed in this bill.

With that being said, I think the time in this House is precious. I think the time around the cabinet table is precious. I know that many individual members, in speaking to Bill 4 around a bill to create a press conference, talked about specific things that they wanted to see in terms of reductions to redundancy within the public service. I think that those are the kinds of things that government should be spending their time considering around the cabinet table, not a bill that indeed actually is redundant and creates more redundancy. That's the main message I want to leave people with. I think that going into details about what's good or not good in the bill is actually not useful because the main message I have is: this bill is redundant.

I understand that there is a desire to be able to have an extensive list of legislation and say that there are many things being done. I think this is a repackaging of what's already been done. Certainly, I welcome the government to talk about all the great things that the past government did, whether it's what our immediate past government or successive past governments have done, but what is in this bill has already been done. So I think that it is not beneficial for us as members of this Assembly to spend our time debating something that is completely redundant. That's my position, having read this in some detail.

The other piece I want to say is that I do believe that consultation with municipalities is absolutely important, and I think that if there had been consultation with municipalities in the lead-up to this bill, the main message that would have been heard is: we need certainty around what our revenues are; we need certainty around what our risk-share component is going to be when it comes to the price of natural resources in this province; we understand that provincial revenues ebb and flow; we understand that it seems reasonable to have some of that shared with the municipalities. But rather than actually developing that formula or making it a priority to act on the things that municipalities said in consultation, it seems like the government has repackaged a bill, rebranded a bill, and reinforced things that we've already enabled municipalities to do.

That being said, I think that this bill doesn't warrant much additional discussion. I imagine that there will be some amendments, and maybe one of them is to consider not reading it another time because these things are already in place. I'll be happy to offer commentary on it when it hits that point in discussion.

Definitely, my main message to all members of the Assembly is that this bill is a bill that is essentially about nothing or a bill to repeat things that have already been done in the past. Therefore, I'm urging members not to pass this new piece of legislation given that, in my understanding and through conversations that our critic for Municipal Affairs has had with municipalities, it sure seems like this is a bill to create more talking points perhaps, to create another press conference perhaps, but not actually a bill that will enable municipalities to do things that they don't already have the ability to do.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I will cede my time and urge colleagues not to support this bill but, rather, to work with their cabinet to move forward items that will actually create new opportunities for employment, new opportunities for partnerships with the municipalities all of us work with and represent, and opportunities to actually create new jobs rather than trying to repackage the opportunity for jobs that was already created under an NDP government and give it a new headline. Those are my key messages for my colleagues this morning.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available if anyone has questions or comments for the Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Seeing none, are there others wishing to speak to the bill? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview is rising for debate.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to speak to second reading of Bill 7. As pointed out by my colleague for Edmonton-Glenora, the proposed powers that this grants already exist in the MGA. I do look forward to the minister clarifying for us because I can tell you that as the former Minister of Municipal Affairs myself and my former staff went through this and determined that this was an authority or an ability that municipalities currently have.

Now, having said that, if this government is trying to shine a light on tools that municipalities already have, the questions that we've heard in engaging with stakeholders are: well, what is the province bringing to the table? Once again, they're saying to municipalities: here, use this ability you have to forgo your property taxes, which, let's be clear, is one of the only tools that municipalities have to pay for much of these service that they deliver.

I was very proud of the work that our government did working with municipalities. We had a revenue-sharing agreement with the city of Calgary and the city of Edmonton. Our former Minister of Municipal Affairs was busily negotiating with RMA and AUMA for a similar type of deal where we said to municipalities: we understand that you need sustainable, predictable funding, but if you want that, then you also need to share in some of the risk that the province bears. Much of our revenue comes from royalties and other sources that, again, fluctuate. Those aren't guaranteed revenues for the province of Alberta. We had said to municipalities: we understand the position that you're in, and we're happy to look at some revenue sharing, but that also means, then, that when times are good, yes, there will be more money flowing to municipal coffers, but when times are challenging or in a recession, that means that you're going to get less, similar to the state of the province.

With this, though, like I said, Mr. Speaker, municipalities are looking for funding supports. Right now they're busy scratching their heads now that there isn't a carbon tax, which was funding major projects in some of our larger urban centres like the green line in Calgary and the LRT line here in Edmonton. These municipalities are wondering how they're going to keep these projects moving forward or if they're about to get scrapped or shelved. Again, the province is conveniently saying: no, no, we have no money to give you, but we'll provide you or shine a light on a tool that you currently have.

Now, I can tell you that one of the things that our government prided itself on was encouraging municipalities to be much more collaborative. I don't just mean encouragement through words. There were tools that we introduced, including municipalities having to have an intermunicipal agreement with all that share their boundaries. We also really encouraged municipalities to work much more collaboratively together.

I can tell you that there were a number of municipalities that came with me on international trade missions, and the most successful ones were those that went as a region or as a hub. Alberta has, unless it's changed, I believe it's 342 different municipalities in the province. When all 342 are competing with each other for investment, they are losing the big picture because – guess what? – when you're travelling internationally, how many companies know where a tiny little community is in Alberta? None. How many know where Alberta is? Well, we have to explain where Alberta is and how important it is and the opportunities that exist here, which is why trade missions are so critical. I can tell you that municipalities or regions that have been the most successful in attracting investment are those that collaborate.

10:10

Here's a great example, Mr. Speaker: the Industrial Heartland. The Industrial Heartland is made up of a number of municipalities that work together that have a revenue- and cost-sharing agreement. When they go out to the world, to investors and to companies, to say, "Come invest with us; these are all the amenities and services that we have to offer," they have a very powerful message. I'm proud of the work that our government did with the Industrial Heartland. In fact, they participated on every single one of my missions. We have seen the amount of investment, billions of dollars, coming to the Industrial Heartland, and that's in part because of the collaborative approach that we took working with them, working with our municipal partners to show a Team Alberta approach, something that I would encourage this government to do.

I know that there's at least one minister that's busy on a trade mission. I will be finding out if there are municipalities that participated, businesses that participated. If you ask me, Mr. Speaker, government plays a critical role in opening the doors for companies for government-to-government agreements, but businesses need to be present in order to take advantage of these.

I was very proud, Mr. Speaker, back in November of 2016 to lead the largest trade mission the province of Alberta has ever led. There were 86 different businesses and business associations that accompanied me and our team to Asia. There were over 150 Alberta participants, and believe me, it left a significant impression. There were hundreds of millions of dollars worth of trade and investment that came from that trade mission alone. So it's very, very important.

My point, back to this bill, Mr. Speaker, is that if we want our municipalities and our regions to compete on the international stage, they need to collaborate. Shining a light on this and focusing municipalities to use this tool doesn't do that. It's a disincentive for them to work collaboratively.

As we already see, Mr. Speaker, municipalities do compete with each other. Now, not all. Again I want to applaud the many regions and municipalities that work together. A great example: the city of Grande Prairie, the county of Grande Prairie, and the MD of Greenview. Those three have created an industrial park with the help of our government. It took a while. But I'm proud of the fact that what we were trying to get to was really a plug-and-play model, that other parts of the province are very interested in. When we talk about expediting regulatory approval, well, this is one of the ways that we did it. We didn't just talk about it. We actually did it, and we're starting to see the fruits of our labour. I know that the former Minister of Municipal Affairs and myself, the former Minister of Environment and Parks, and the former Minister of Energy travelled the province and encouraged regions to look at how they can position themselves as a region.

Now, Mr. Speaker, like I said, part of the concern here is shining a light on the fact that this really is encouraging municipalities to try to undercut each other to get to the bottom. We have seen in some jurisdictions that you have one municipality that has higher property taxes, probably because they offer more services than an adjacent one, which can drop their taxes a little bit lower. You know, that's a factor in where companies are going to set up shop, so they'll go to the far corner of the lower taxed municipality. The workers and much of their products all come from the centre adjacent, but they don't benefit from any of the property taxes. Again, that's where our government tried to encourage this collaboration whereas this is something that is highlighting the opposite of that.

Now, it is interesting. You know, my colleague the Municipal Affairs critic did reach out and speak with Edmonton and Calgary and AUMA and RMA. At least AUMA and Calgary and Edmonton had no idea that this was coming. For a government that tries to say that they're collaborative and they're going to consult and lectured us ad nauseam in the past four years – again, I have some interesting adjectives I'd like to use to describe a government that claims one thing yet, as soon as they come into power, does the complete opposite. I'll leave it to our listeners' imagination, Mr. Speaker. Now I'm losing my train of thought here. The fact is that they weren't adequately consulted on this.

I think what I want to just touch on in my last few minutes is the fact of what this bill really is. It's not a bill enabling anything that municipalities don't already have the authority to do. What this is is an opportunity for this government to hold up a meaningless piece of paper to say: “Look at us. We’re helping to create jobs.” Once again, this tool isn’t introducing new powers for municipalities, but because there was, I think, one line in their platform during the election, they want to move forward with a bill that does very little, which I think Albertans should recognize. All that this is is a PR campaign of, “Look at us, and look at what we’re doing,” even though we’re not actually affecting much in the way of helping municipalities to have new powers, to be able to develop, and to attract investment.

I mean, what would be better spent on, quite frankly, are continuing programs that we introduced. The capital investment tax credit program has attracted over $2.2 billion of investment in Alberta. This is investment that has been deployed. What does it cost? I’m sure you’re curious to know, Mr. Speaker. About $200 million has been conditionally approved to attract $2.2 billion. Myself, I think that ratio is pretty solid, and that is a tool that we went to the international community with to say: this is another reason why you need to come invest in Alberta.

The other thing is, again, making sure that we’re leveraging the incredible international office network that Alberta has. I’m very proud of the fact that we added two new jurisdictions, both San Francisco and the United Arab Emirates, to that in order to have a presence in these two very, very important markets.

Mr. Speaker, I think that if the government wants to actually take meaningful action and meaningful steps toward helping to attract investment – I agree with that as a goal; I agree with creating jobs and supporting our private sector to create jobs – this, in fact, is not the right tool. In fact, this isn’t really a tool. It already exists, so this is a duplicate tool. This is like having two hammers in your toolbox. One does the trick; you don’t need both.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, anyone wishing to ask a question or to comment under Standing Order 29(2)(a)? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung was on his feet first. I don’t know if teamwork makes the dream work here or what.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I’ll take the opportunity to speak under 29(2)(a) and ask the minister a couple of queries that I had noted while he was speaking, that had to do primarily with the theme of collaboration. That seems to be a theme that the current government is opposed to. They prefer to find ways to weaken any bodies that might oppose them, whether that be municipalities or school organizations. They seem to be intent on making sure, under the guise of freedom of choice or school freedom or a municipal government’s local autonomy, that they will pit them against each other. It’s a divide-and-conquer theory that this government seems to be incorporating into many of their pieces of legislation in an attempt to weaken any bodies that might form some type of collaborative opposition to them.

Within the context of this piece of legislation, Mr. Speaker, I think it’s evident in the policy whereby municipalities are given the opportunity – or at least the awareness level is raised of their opportunity – to lower taxes to attract business if indeed that is a factor that is one that does attract business. I wanted the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview to perhaps develop this theme a little bit more and to ask him if he believes that the collaborative theme that we used during our time in office is something that he sees as a real significant loss, what progress he made not only in economic terms but also in some jurisdictions, for example, where schools were looked at as an economic anchor of communities. These schools decided in different jurisdictions, for example, to have certain grades operate in one community, and then a neighbouring community would operate other grades so that the schools in each community would be sustainable as a collaborative effort.

I think we’re looking at a significant loss, in my view, to this whole theme of collaboration that we tried to establish and really put forward in our term in office. It’s something that really changed the channel on how different jurisdictions operated. I know that historically in this province it has been a very competitive atmosphere, that was generated by successive Conservative governments, and it damaged local communities and didn’t really serve the economic purpose that they were hoping for in terms of creating efficiencies.

I’ve cited before in this House, Mr. Speaker, the example of the community and the county that I originally came from, that of Thorhild, where one community got the hospital – that would be Redwater – and the neighbouring community of Thorhild got the seniors’ lodge. There was a horrendous competition for both of those pieces of public infrastructure. It was a lasting, negative, adversarial relationship that persists to this day in those communities as a result of those fights over a competitive desire to win out over the other for infrastructure or economic incentive dollars.

I was wondering if the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview might want to expand a little bit on that theme of collaboration, which I think is being attacked by this government.

The Speaker: The hon. member has approximately one minute remaining.

Mr. Bilous: Excellent. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will endeavour to speak quickly. I appreciate the Member for Edmonton-McClung asking that question. Really, what pops to mind is a program that we introduced called the community and regional economic support program, or CARES, which was extremely successful throughout the province, I would add, especially in rural Alberta and smaller communities, where, really, we wanted to give them the tools to be able to pursue economic diversification and attract investment but, again, recognizing that at the local level they have the expertise. They know what strengths they have, their resources, they know their talent pool, so they should be the ones deciding how to diversify their economy, not someone sitting in the Legislature, not a bureaucrat sitting somewhere. It should really come from the local representatives.

We introduced the CARES program, which has given millions of dollars throughout the province and helped them diversify their economy and collaborate in order to compete internationally.

The Speaker: Hon. members, is there anyone else wishing to provide some debate this morning? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I’m pleased to rise today to speak in second reading of Bill 7, the Municipal Government (Property Tax Incentives) Amendment Act, 2019. I think my colleagues this morning have already given a great overview.

You know, we’re pretty skilled over here on this side of the House at talking for quite some time about things that the government is introducing. I don’t know if you’ve noticed, but we are struggling a little bit to actually fill our time here. The reason is because there’s pretty much nothing here in this bill that’s worth talking about. You know, look, I’ve mentioned it numerous times and I guess I’ll keep bringing it up: I am a lawyer. I’ve seen the Municipal Government Act. Many of you have probably seen it. It is a sizable tome of legislation. It’s quite large. I’m assuming that the government is counting on the fact that most Albertans have not read the Municipal Government Act. Frankly, why would you? It's quite large.

You know, I think that perhaps they're counting on the fact that nobody has realized that what they're doing here is already allowed for in the legislation, so I think what we're seeing here is a little bit of smoke and mirrors. We know that this government has a very clear agenda about – what was it? – jobs, economy, pipeline, so far, in fact, that they're actually creating fiction. They're going to take responsibility for things that actually already existed and then hope that it looks like they're open for business and that they're doing things to encourage business and investment when, really, those tools were already there.

For those of you who haven't read the Municipal Government Act, allow me to read section 347. Everybody's favourite thing: to hear a lawyer stand up and read a section from legislation. [interjection] Thank you. It's very popular.

Okay. Section 347(1) of the Municipal Government Act states:

If a council considers it equitable to do so, it may, generally or with respect to a particular taxable property or business or a class of taxable property or business, do one or more of the following, with or without conditions:

- (a) cancel or reduce tax arrears;
- (b) cancel or refund all or part of a tax;
- (c) defer the collection of a tax.

And subsection (2) says:

A council may phase in a tax increase or decrease resulting from the preparation of any new assessment.

I think that's exactly what Bill 7 is supposed to be doing. The UCP will claim that municipalities currently can only provide tax breaks in times of hardship. Well, actually, section 347 of the act says nothing about the requirement of a hardship. The UCP will claim over there that there's no ability to defer taxes under section 347. But, actually, as I just read, section 347(1)(c) specifically says that the municipality may "defer the collection of a tax."

Really, what we have here is a piece of legislation that's meant to look like the government is doing something, but that already existed. I think that fits a theme that we're seeing throughout this government's positions in the session in the last few weeks, which is that they're going to create smoke and mirrors to present as if they're doing something to change the economic situation in this province, but really they're either gambling on it or doing it based on poor research, or they're actually doing nothing and are just going to claim responsibility if something happens. That seems to be their plan.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

We saw that with Bill 3, with the corporate tax reduction. It's a gamble; we talked about that. My colleagues in this House presented very reasonable amendments to that bill, saying: "Look, you've got some research that says that corporate tax cuts will increase investment in jobs. Fine. There's also a lot of other research on it that suggests otherwise. Since it's a bit of a gamble, since you're gambling with Alberta's future and Alberta's resources, why don't we phase this in slowly and see how it goes?" But, no, the government has a very strong commitment to gambling with all of our resources, to putting all their cards on the table and, as we've seen previous Conservatives do for decades in this province, to putting all their eggs in one basket and "let's cross our fingers and hope."

This is part of a theme. Sometimes reading bills and Order Papers can be quite dry, but I actually feel like there's a really interesting story that's being told here by all the bills that this government has been introducing. It's about repealing, it's about gambling, it's about not planning for the future, it's about show, and it's about smoke and mirrors. That's what we're seeing here again today.

One of the questions I have. You know, this is a pretty jam-packed legislative session. We're seeing a lot of bills coming forward. I think a lot of us on this side are putting in a lot of work and a lot of time preparing and advocating for our constituents. What I was struggling with trying to understand is that given that this bill actually does not do anything to significantly change the powers of municipalities and given that the power to do what the government is claiming to do already exists in the legislation, why bring it forward now? Why bring it forward now, in a session where we're already incredibly busy? There's a lot of work going on. I thought: why is this a top priority of this government? I think that we've only been here – what? – less than three weeks in the House now really debating.

Ms Hoffman: It just feels like yesterday.

Ms Pancholi: It does feel like yesterday. It does feel like we just started. Yet it also feels like we've been here for years.

Anyways, I was wondering: why would they put this at the top of their agenda? Why are they bringing this in here? I think we've come up with so many other issues that seem to be very pressing for Albertans right now, yet they're nowhere on the government's radar. They're nowhere on the government's agenda.

Let's talk about, for example, the Conversion Therapy Working Group. When are we going to hear about that? Well, in due course. What did we get back from the minister after getting some pressure from members on this side, from members of the working group? "Well, sorry. We're just not going to really deal with it right now. But, sure, send me your letters. My office is always open," unless, of course, it is to receive bouquets of balloons from children who are attending the Conversion Therapy Working Group protest outside. Then the minister's office is not open. No. No time to deal with that. They'll deal with that in due course.

Climate change: that's just a small little thing – right? – no big deal. Oh, the response from the government: "We'll consult. We'll think about it. We're not going to take any action. In fact, we'll dismantle any action that has been taken to date on it." Okay. So that's not a priority. Climate change is not a priority. We've heard that message loud and clear from this government.

Education funding. Well, after stringing along school boards and stressing out parents and administrators for months, actually, because we were talking about this back in the election, and having to be asked multiple times by the Member for Edmonton-Glenora about what the status of education funding was, finally, after, by the way, school boards had to submit their budgets – certainly, no assurances were provided before that, so it wasn't a priority to provide their stakeholders or school boards who are delivering education in this province. No. It's not a priority to give any answers to them. Nope. They waited until yesterday to finally announce that, oh, yeah, they are going to be funding student enrolment.

Thank you. You know, Albertans thank you for funding the students in this province. But, more importantly, we're going to be asking and watching and paying close attention to see if funding student enrolment means maintaining the same per-student funding. We will be watching that.

The school nutrition programs: no; sorry; that's not a priority for you either.

10:30

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. member, I would just stress and caution about staying on topic, which is Bill 7.

Ms Pancholi: Oh, I am.

The Deputy Speaker: I know you were getting there.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I just want to highlight what's a priority and what's not a priority for this government. Education funding: not a priority. Alberta health care: also not a priority. They're doing a review – we know that – and we'll see how long that takes. Providing a budget for Albertans: also not a priority. Of course, they need to make sure that they do their blue-ribbon panel review first, although we already know that they've got their marching orders, so we know what they're going to be coming back with in terms of a response from that. Albertans, wait till the fall to get your budget. And $25-a-day child care: well, you know, we'll honour the contracts for right now, but all of those families who are counting on affordable child care beyond next year, sorry; you're going to have to wait and see about that.

You know what is a priority? Let's talk about what is a priority. A priority is creating legislative fiction. It's creating something that does not need to exist. But let's do that so that we can give ourselves a pat on the back and say, "Hey, look what we did for you, municipalities," regardless of the fact that no municipality was asking for this. Half of them, more than half of them, it sounds like from my hon. colleague here from Calgary-Buffalo, didn't even know – didn't even know – that this was coming forward. Yes, I anticipate we will hear the same responses as we've always heard, which is that it was in the 100-page platform. There were a lot of gems in that platform that I'm sure a lot of people did not know they were voting for. We'll see how long Albertans can tolerate being told: "We told you so. We said that in our 100-page document. You should have read everything. You agreed, by voting for us, to everything."

Maybe that's what the problem is. The government thinks that elections are consultations. Consultation actually requires feedback. Consultation requires taking the information from the people you're speaking to and incorporating them in. "But they voted," so there you go. You know what? That's okay. They're a new government. They'll figure it out. They'll figure out what the difference is between an election and consultation. Consultation actually means talking to stakeholders, hearing their feedback. You know, I was at a committee meeting this morning where I could already see what the government's priorities are around consultation. They don't exist. Let's just ram things forward.

Clearly, this government does not put forward any of those other issues, issues that everyday Albertans care about: their pay, their child care, their health care, their education, climate change. Those are not priorities. You know what is a priority? Let's just create new legislation that says the same as existing legislation. That to me sounds an awful lot like red tape.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, 29(2)(a) is available. Are there any comments or questions? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Wow. Thank you, Madam Speaker. I did not expect the heat to be brought on Bill 7 of all bills. Thank you for that. The hon. member laid out a lot of really important points. Just as she and the Member for Edmonton-Glenora as well noted, there does appear to be a whole lot of nothing. I appreciated the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview's summary of some of the incredible work that he and his previous government did to really approach issues in a collaborative manner, to really work with municipalities. As he mentioned, I mean, there are countless examples of being able to work together collaboratively and the rewards they were starting to reap.

Although there appears to be not a lot here, I do worry about the unintended consequences, and I worry about a degradation of a collaborative approach. We know that Mayor Nenshi from the city of Calgary spoke about some of his concerns. He noted, "We want to make sure that this does not lead to a race for the bottom with different jurisdictions who are competing for businesses, to start giving them tax breaks and tax breaks and tax breaks," the concern there being that this really transforms into more of a competitive model at a time when we really do need to be collaborating.

Mayor Iveson said something similar in the sense that, you know: "I think we've got to have a conversation because selective use by one of us to undermine the others could be a risk here," again, sort of pointing to the possibility of an undermining of relationships and an inability to move forward. I mean, this is a time economically where we should be collaborating, and our government should be promoting that model and should be the first ones to sort of lead the way on that.

I wanted to just ask the Member for Edmonton-Whitemud – I mean, both of us were not involved, obviously, in the previous government and some of the incredible work they did to advance relationships with municipalities. But I just wanted her to speak a little bit about, you know, from her legal perspective, some of the concerns she has around not moving forward in a collaborative manner and what this could mean, what some of the further consequences could be to such an approach.

The Deputy Speaker: Edmonton-Whitemud.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you to the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood for her question. You know, I think one of the important things when developing legislation is to do that consultation because that's important. You know, it's easy to talk to individual municipalities, perhaps, but when you talk to them collectively, that's when you get some feedback about how collaboration could be undermined by such measures as this. I think when we see a government quite quickly put together a piece of legislation that has not been consulted on, that has not actually been asked for, that is not actually serving to fix a problem or address a need, that's when we run into the very big risk of unintended consequences.

Especially, I actually think that from a very technical legal perspective one of the challenges, when you amend legislation to add provisions that essentially do what already can be done, is that you create confusion in the system. I think that's one of the challenges as well because if we don't have clarity around what the authorities are for municipalities and you've got provisions that are overlapping, have concurrent issues, it creates confusion in message and, again, red tape. It causes more administrative nightmare.

Again, I think that if the government felt confident that this was addressing a need, I'd welcome it. We still have not heard that, that it's been brought forward for municipalities, that this is what they've asked for or that this is what they need. In fact, I understand from the comments from my colleague the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo, who used to be a city councillor for many years, that really what municipalities are asking for is stability in funding. They're looking for: what's their future? They're not asking for provisions that allow them to do what they could already do.

Again, I go back to that I don't think the true intent of this provision is about providing something that didn't already exist. I don't believe that it was actually about providing incentives. I think it's about smoke and mirrors. I think it's about looking like you're taking action on a problem that nobody has identified with a solution that already exists. That to me is just grandstanding, to take credit for something or to look like you're taking action when the action was already taken. I think that had the government consulted and spoken with stakeholders – we learn a lot from stakeholders. We shouldn't be looking at consultation with stakeholders as some kind of way that slows down processes. It actually informs good decision-making.

I've been on the side as a nonpolitician, as a lawyer with policy development, and there are a lot of important considerations that need to go into play. Now I'm on this side, and I'm frustrated that stakeholders and engagement in consultation seems to be presented as some kind of barrier. It's easy for us to stand up in this House sometimes and talk about passing laws without talking to the people they're actually going to affect, the organizations that... [Ms Pancholi's speaking time expired]

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and speak to Bill 7, Municipal Government (Property Tax Incentives) Amendment Act, 2019. As some of my colleagues have noted, the Minister of Municipal Affairs has announced legislation that he says expands the powers of municipalities to create tax incentives for nonresidential properties for up to 15 years. Here's what's key. He claims that this will empower municipalities to attract investment, create jobs, and realize their full economic potential. Well, I agree with my colleagues. I do think this is a political stunt.

I think that when you look at this, the first thing that becomes very, very clear is that there was no consultation. I know that I met with the mayor of St. Albert late last week, and the simple question was, "Have you heard anything about this; did anyone contact you; have you been involved in any kind of consultation?" and the answer was no. You should know that St. Albert is the 10th largest city in Alberta, so it's a little bit disturbing.

An Hon. Member: I didn't know that.

Ms Renaud: You didn't know that? It is.

It is a little bit disturbing that the minister could not be bothered to consult some of the smaller communities, that aren't the large ones of Edmonton and Calgary.

I want to go back to the line about empowering municipalities to attract investment. I think it's important to think about this a little broader than just the dollar signs of investment because, ultimately, those decisions are made by people and, ultimately, it is the people that create the activity, that generate the revenue, that generate the growth in any kind of city, municipality, county. What is it that makes municipalities attractive for that kind of investment? It's not just about tax incentive. It's about quality of life. People are looking at: "Where am I going to lay down roots? Where am I going to invest? What's available to the employees that will come when I make this investment?" It's important to talk about that, and I think my colleague talked about that a little bit earlier. There are more things than tax incentive that sort of inspire companies and organizations to want to invest. Some of those things we invested in, and I think in four short years we started to see the benefits and the growth of that.

Some of the things that are often overlooked, particularly when faced with a recession like we were, are things like affordable child care. It is about people. When companies and organizations decide to invest, they look at: "What's available to our families? What's available to our employees?" Things like affordable child care are important. We began the pilot project of $25-a-day child care, and I think immediately saw relief for families. I think I read that economist Trevor Tombe was even referring to it. Now, certainly there were a lot of job losses as a result of the recession, but in 2018 we started to see a really steep growth in the participation of women in the workforce. We started to see income rates of women start to go up. There's a reason for that. We made some very strategic investments, some of those being affordable child care.

We also reduced the small-business tax, which was certainly helpful, but the other piece of this that's really important for communities is schools. Organizations are looking, scanning the province or scanning the jurisdiction: "Where do I want to invest? What is it that's going to keep my families and my workers engaged and part of that community?" Schools are certainly important. I know in St. Albert we spent years, actually the last four years, investing heavily, whether it was modernization or replacement of schools or building new schools. Where we had had empty lots with lovely signs before, we actually invested because when we came in in 2015, the advice that we were given was that now was the time to make those investments. So we did. We have new schools.

There's a brand new community in St. Albert called Jensen Lakes. It's actually still really muddy in some areas that you can't even get into, but there are two brand new schools there. There is one Catholic and one public. What that investment does is that it draws community. You'll see businesses popping up all over the place, very large ones, and I have no doubt that that will continue. What it is is that we've placed the infrastructure there in these communities, particularly in these newer areas, to be able to attract that. I would say once again to the minister: it's not just about tax incentives.

In fact, this legislation, although I understand the need to have distractions, really doesn't empower municipalities to do anything more than they could've done before. I'm not entirely sure, other than for distraction reasons, why they're doing this.

The lack of consultation, as I mentioned earlier, with municipalities on this legislation was astounding. I did sit in this place for four years, and I heard members of the Wildrose and Progressive Conservatives, then the UCP, just talk about the lack of consultation every single time that we introduced legislation. I mean, I don't know if it was in everybody's message box, but it was something that was said every single time. Then so quickly, just a few weeks after things have changed, they've forgotten that. They've forgotten that something that was so important to them previously doesn't seem to be all that important right now, which is concerning because you would think that with important legislation like this or legislation that related to municipalities, people would take the time to speak to organizations like the AUMA.

Going back to this, while the UCP claims that this bill will allow municipalities to defer taxes for up to 15 years, attract new investment and development as a result, it appears that the majority of the powers the UCP claim it's giving municipalities already exist under section 347 of the Municipal Government Act. I'm going to quote a member, actually the critic for Municipal Affairs, and this is a great quote: "I don't understand what the government thinks it's going to achieve with this act. The facts are that this is an empty bill that does very little but reinforce powers that municipalities already have." If you haven't consulted, if you haven't spoken to your municipal leaders, perhaps you should do so because I think you will hear that from them.

He also noted that the current government completely stalled on talks of new funding agreements for Alberta municipalities, causing further difficulties for local leaders hoping to plan for their communities' futures. Absolutely, that is essential. I think we all realize how important it is to know what you're dealing with in terms of revenue. What will municipalities be getting, what can they plan on, and what can they do going forward?

The very same stressors that we heard from school boards we're hearing from municipalities. Things are changing very quickly, funding is changing very quickly, and they don't have any reassurance that, number one, they'll be consulted, because already in their short track record this government has demonstrated that consultation isn't a priority. I think we hear again and again and again: "Who needs consultation? We won the election. Woo-hoo." I think it's really, really important that this government learn this lesson early, that you need to talk to folks, you need to talk to leaders from the municipalities, you need to talk to the umbrella groups that they belong to, and you need to find out from them: what is it that they need?

Going on, I'm going to give you a couple of examples. The UCP is claiming with this legislation that currently municipalities can only provide tax breaks in times of hardship or for brownfield redevelopments. This is patently not true. Section 347 of the Municipal Government Act sets no requirement for hardship and indicates that a tax break can be provided in circumstances where "council considers it equitable to do so." Also, the UCP claims that new authorities will be created to allow municipalities to establish tax incentive programs for businesses, job creators, and investors through bylaw. It is already possible for a municipality to create a tax incentive program through bylaw, and this is not prohibited under section 347 of the MGA.

I could go on because there are a number of areas or a number of things that the government is claiming this legislation does that it doesn't in fact do. I'm going to give you one more: allows for proactive cancellation of taxes, not just retroactive tax breaks. Again, this is not true. Under section 347 a council can cancel, reduce, refund, or defer the collection proactively.

In short, while this bill may clarify existing authorities and prescribe how municipalities can create tax incentive programs, it does not fundamentally shift the authorities that exist under the act. These are minor tweaks and not major shifts. Again, it begs the question: why on earth would this government introduce this bill, that was not consulted, that is really not necessary, that doesn't really do much except, you know, cause us all to debate this in this Chamber? Why are they doing this? Is this simply a distraction, or are they looking for time to get something else done?

What I can tell you, Madam Speaker, is that municipalities want to be consulted. Organizations like AUMA want to be consulted. I would encourage this government to take the advice of the previous opposition and not do anything without consulting, because that's certainly the message I heard from them. Again, to be clear, an election is not a consultation.

Based on that – and I could certainly go on for a while about why this is, you know, a bill about not much – I am going to adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate lost]

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other speakers under Standing Order 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker and to the member for her comments with regard to the importance of ensuring that larger organizations that represent municipalities are considered as well as consultation with local municipalities. I appreciate the fact that we have members in this House that represent many mid-sized cities. Given that St. Albert, which is the 10th-largest municipality in the province, failed to be consulted, I wonder how many other municipalities failed to be consulted. For example, I wonder if the municipality of Airdrie was consulted about this change and if this was the number one pressing issue.

This is the first bill from the Minister of Municipal Affairs, presumably the most important thing for the Minister of Municipal Affairs to be addressing given that it's the first item of business. Certainly, this wasn't the most pressing issue I heard from municipalities at RMA or AUMA. The last RMA, I think, was literally the first day of the election period. I think the election was called maybe two hours before the RMA bear pit, and I was there. Not one person asked about this. Not one. They did ask about rural EMS. They did ask about sustainable funding. They did ask about matching funding from the province of Alberta to ensure that the money that's on the table for federal funding that requires provincial investment not be ignored. They did ask about making sure that they have opportunities to engage thoroughly and thoughtfully in consultation.

Through you, Madam Speaker, to the member, I guess my main question is: what number one issues have you heard from your municipality or other municipalities that they think government should be addressing rather than bringing forward a bill to duplicate what we've already done?

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Madam Speaker and to the member for the question. There are a number of pressing issues. Obviously, what I heard first of all from the mayor of St. Albert was the lack of consultation. I think, number one, that without even realizing it, this government has set a tone that they're going to go ahead and do what they want to do without real consultation, without really speaking to the people that are impacted by the bill, which is disturbing, to say the least.

I know that the municipality that I'm very fortunate to represent is dealing with a number of pressing issues, just like most municipalities. Some of those things this government doesn't seem to like to talk about, but these are the things that they want to see legislation on, they want to see movement on. Those are things like climate change although, you know, I might see people roll their eyes: oh, climate change. What it is is that it has the ability to impact every single facet of our lives. To compare the need to address this crisis that we have – I think it was just yesterday or the day before that we're hearing from scientists that there is no question that the horrific fires in the north, the older fires and even currently, were certainly impacted and exacerbated by climate change, which is a very real focus that we need to be having in this House. I could tell you that I remember that day where it was smoky and awful in this place, the day that the smoke sort of enveloped the city, and it was really a jolt for me to think about.

You know, I'd heard the saying quite some time ago that it's hard to count your money when you can't breathe, so I think it's very important that we recognize that municipalities are struggling with very real issues, issues related to recycling, trying to manage the waste that municipalities generate, trying to plan for the future, needing to know: will our schools be built? Will the schools that we need be built? I know that in St. Albert we are desperately in need of another high school. Will that high school get built? Will our schools be staffed?

Will our people have clean air to breathe? Luckily, we have an air monitoring station in St. Albert, so we're able to keep pretty close tabs, but I'll tell you that when the smoke was really bad – I think it was last week – St. Albert was even worse than the city of Edmonton. I don't know if it was just the way the air was shifting that day, but it was sort of a picture that this could be our future. We could see these impacts more frequently, as scientists have been telling us for decades, yet we choose to ignore them. I'm not entirely sure why. But those are some of the pressing issues.

Some of the other things that we hear from municipalities is that they would like investment to continue to focus on small business. Now, keep in mind that the corporate tax cut that the government likes to talk about . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other speakers to the bill? The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I have listened carefully . . .

The Deputy Speaker: My apologies, Minister. You've already spoken at this stage of the bill.

Is there anybody else wishing to speak?

Mr. Ellis: Thank you very much, Madam . . .

The Deputy Speaker: To close debate?

Mr. Ellis: No.

The Deputy Speaker: Well, we're not – okay. As a learning opportunity for all members in the House, if the minister were to speak again on the bill, it would be to close debate, which is not where we're at at this point.

I will recognize the hon. government whip.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker, and thank you for the great debate that's gone on in this House so far. I think we'd like to continue on, so at this time I move to adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mrs. Pitt in the chair]

The Chair: Hon. members, I'd like to call the committee to order.

Bill 3 Job Creation Tax Cut (Alberta Corporate Tax Amendment) Act

The Chair: Are there any comments, questions, or amendments to be offered with respect to the bill? The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. It's my pleasure to rise to provide some comments on Bill 3 at this committee stage. It's great that we've gotten to this stage for this bill on this day. There are a few things that I'd like to remind hon. members about as we're in this stage of more of a conversation around the bill, as we do during committee, as members are charged with doing, a real opportunity for us all to consider trade-offs that are contained in each and every piece of legislation that we pass through this House.

Now, we have discussed, certainly, massive corporate tax cuts to large corporations. It bears repeating at this stage, Madam Chair, that small businesses are not in fact affected by this bill at all. The small-business rate, having been lowered by a third by the previous government, is not affected, not touched by this legislation, and it is only folks, companies with profits, that is to say, over $500,000 that this bill affects.

We know that many of the large players in the economy, where reductions of the corporate income tax rate affect companies outside of that small-business threshold, have engaged in other jurisdictions in a massive undertaking of shareholder buybacks. We have that occurring in the United States on the order of billions now, and certainly the economic evidence coming from the Congressional Budget Office and elsewhere in the United States is showing that those corporate tax cuts, again, for already profitable, very large corporations are in fact not delivering the kinds of jobs and economic growth as were promised during the public relations exercise undertaken by the Trump administration a little over a year ago to justify this policy change south of the border.

We also see some of the destabilizing effects of this policy. They have been now noted by organizations such as the International Monetary Fund and others, Madam Chair. Certainly, there are destabilizing effects. When we have so much shareholder buyback activity going on, when we have concentration of wealth in fewer and fewer hands in large economies such as the United States', then we exacerbate inequality, we reduce government's ability to provide basic services. We're not even talking about, in the United States context here, what's nice to have such as reasonable health care or education services across the country. We're talking here about the ability to provide basic infrastructure such as water infrastructure, roads, and bridges to justify large investments from the private sector. That is something that, certainly, American governments struggle to provide, at least in some states. It bears some repeating because there is ongoing evidence being published on almost a daily basis on what has happened as a result of the massive corporate tax cuts south of the border.

In any event, I have to wonder and I have to put to this House and put to the members assembled here: just what kinds of trade-offs are they willing to tolerate? Certainly, when we give away 4 and a half billion dollars, then we necessarily show that we have lower revenue forecasts in our budget and therefore less fiscal room to make good on policy or programmatic commitments that we either made in the course of an election campaign, in the course of development of an election platform, or on emerging responsibilities in response to emergencies. Not everything is planned for within an election platform, and I think the hon. members assembled will find, as they move along in their work as legislators, that they are less and less able to meet the questions and legitimate needs of their constituents when they choose to undertake trade-offs such as this one. When we reduce our revenues, we are then less able to deliver on the services and the investments that, in fact, we need in order to grow our local communities and the Alberta-wide economy.

Now, revenue forecasts. It bears going back into this a little bit because this corporate tax cut is being used as a cover for other softness in revenue forecasts, Madam Chair. We have, obviously, a lower WTI forecast now than, for example, private-sector forecasters were projecting in 2018. We've seen some change in global markets. Obviously, Alberta has no control over that.

Around western Canada select, which is actually a more important indicator for budget forecasting in Alberta and, to a great extent, Saskatchewan, that differential between world price and WCS, we do see that the government has had to, out of necessity, pull some of the levers in order to ensure that that price and those revenues remain stable so that we can turn around and pay for important things like health care, education, bridges, roads, and hospitals.

Now, with WCS, obviously we're continuing to experience bottlenecks due to takeaway capacity, but there were some things the government could do. One, we undertook the not insignificant decision around curtailment. This is not something that anyone wanted to do, and we certainly agreed on both sides of the House at the time, earlier this year, that we had to take that decision, that it was in the best interests of Albertans. But in the longer term, while we await the outcome of the Federal Court decision around Trans Mountain, there was also a crude-by-rail decision undertaken by the previous government and contracts executed with private-sector entities, and when government executes contracts, it is best not to rip them up. We end up in a situation where it would create investor uncertainty when we do that.

But that was designed, again, to shore up some of those revenue forecasts and not blow a hole in them and to do whatever we could to ensure that we could continue to pay for things like health care and education as well as keep people at work. Certainly, we know that our lack of takeaway capacity is affecting jobs and could have affected jobs in a much worse fashion than it actually did in early 2019. So we have that piece around the revenue forecast.

But as we know from various studies around volatility and budget-making – certainly, the C.D. Howe Institute has had a number of things to say about this over the years – volatility is offset, particularly in resource economies like Alberta and Saskatchewan, by provincial personal income tax and corporate income tax, and those are the more stable sources of revenue. So when we go in and we introduce elements of instability, relatively unnecessary elements of instability, as has been mentioned by my hon. colleague for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview, Alberta does have targeted capital and venture capital investment tax credits that are designed specifically to stimulate the economy and diversify the economy without blowing a hole worth several billion dollars in the budget for no specific end and with no way for legislators to then assess the utility or the efficiency or the wisdom of those revenue giveaways.

Certainly, we did introduce those. They have successfully begun to diversify the economy. Indeed, in 2017 and 2018 Alberta led the country in economic growth, and we saw growth in manufacturing, retail sales, other aspects. But we also, even through some of the softening in the economy due to the differential and some of the other actions that our government took really concrete steps to address, still saw, according to RBC, TD, and others, some strength in chemicals manufacturing and definitely some new investments in capital maintenance and new capital in the petrochemical sector.

Again, this was a targeted way of forgoing revenue in the out-years around royalty revenue in order to incent new capital investments in a value-added kind of way such that we are not shipping the jobs to Louisiana, that we're not shipping the jobs to the American Midwest, but we're keeping them right here and using our tremendous gifts of natural resources in order to create jobs right here in Alberta, good, mortgage-paying jobs that people can rely on, where they can invest in their communities, that have a number of associated service companies that can rely on them as well.

There are certainly ways to forgo revenue in a way that is much more thoughtful than what Bill 3 proposes, and with them come some other trade-offs that are actually worth it in the end. If you have a targeted capital investment tax credit, if you have a targeted petrochemical diversification program, what you end up with is a more thoughtful approach to diversification. You end up with a much stronger revenue base for municipalities, for example. You end up with a more diversified revenue base to even out some of that volatility that we talked about, that certainly has been studied by a number of different think tanks, economists, and others, Mr. Chair. So that was the approach that our government took.

But with this across-the-board reduction in corporate income tax revenue, we do not end up with any of those public policy outcomes. In fact, the evidence shows that we end up with hardly any public policy outcomes other than the concentration of wealth in fewer and fewer hands and tying at least one hand behind government's back in terms of ability to meet demands coming from communities, emerging issues coming from communities, whether those are the sorts that we can foresee such as a growing population, such as deteriorating infrastructure or need for new infrastructure, or indeed now the demands that we can foresee with respect to climate change. Climate change adaptation and ensuring that our infrastructure is able to withstand more frequent and severe weather events is something that we can now foresee that ought now to be planned for. Anyone who is not planning for it is a bit of a Clydesdale in blinders at this point, Mr. Chair.

When we talk about trade-offs in legislation, certainly we brought in the petrochemical diversification program, and for anyone who is examining the books, there are trade-offs in terms of forgone revenue. One ought to be thoughtful about that because it does inhibit our ability to meet the needs of our constituents. But with this massive giveaway, our constituents – many of the folks are not in Executive Council in this House – are not going to be able to deliver at all. All of us have schools in our constituencies that avail themselves of the classroom improvement fund. All of us. All of us have new educational assistants or speech-language therapists or counsellors or other supports in the classrooms, in particular for students with disabilities. Every single one of us has those in our constituencies.

Due to the fact that we are blowing such an unthoughtful and inadvisable hole in the budget, we will not be able – or at least the government will tell us we will not be able – to afford that classroom improvement fund, which is a specific, targeted fund of money that was to go towards a specific and targeted public policy outcome, which was to meet the increasingly complex classroom needs in the 21st century and give teachers the resources to be able to do that and give parents the resources to be able to do that.

Certainly, parents of children with disabilities: I heard from them over and over again in 2015, when we were facing the first rounds of massive cuts to the Education budget. Parents had real concerns about those increasingly complex classrooms, whether their child was one of the children who required some of those extra supports or not. Having a classroom overflowing with 30 children, four of whom or eight of whom are requiring some special assistance: that certainly is one of the trade-offs when you cannot pay for that, or at least when you allege that you can no longer pay for that, and you have built a budget that is structurally unable to pay for those investments.

As we look at both sides of the ledger – and this bill proposes to reduce revenues by a significant amount – these are not boutique tax credits. These are significant, across-the-board reductions in revenues, with no specific public policy outcome attached to them. That will mean that members in this House cannot look their constituents in the eye and say, "Well, yes, I know you need a new school, and you're going to get it," because that will be an element of fantasy, Madam Chair. Those funds will not be available.

Similarly, funds will not be available, I suspect, for things like rural hospitals, Madam Chair. Certainly, the blue-ribbon panel that is examining the province's finances is now tasked with looking at only the expenditure side. I can tell you that that blue-ribbon panel is being chaired by someone who gleefully closed rural hospitals. You know, if members here think that they can look at their constituents in Milk River or in Beaverlodge and say, "Yeah, for sure, we're going to keep your hospital open," I rather suspect that the Premier's blue-ribbon panel has another thing coming.

Now, as for the promise of some mythical jobs that came out of some economist's model to justify this reduction in revenues, I would just commend to the hon. members the private-sector forecasters who are projecting no such uplift in the economy and no such job growth, at least at this time, Madam Chair.

The other folks that I would commend to the hon. members assembled, in terms of their feedback on what happens when you blow a revenue hole in the budget, is, in particular, small and medium-sized municipalities, Madam Chair. We were very close to an agreement on our side of the House with small and medium-sized municipalities, modelled upon the agreement that we reached with the large cities in the city charters discussion, obviously commitments that this government has already gone back on with Bill 1. It is unfortunate indeed that the legislated commitment that this government made to large cities has already been broken. Certainly, this government would have to break it because they are in fact blowing a hole in the revenue source that might sustain our two largest cities over the course of time.

But small and medium-sized cities are home to some of the youngest, fastest growing populations. For example, the city of Grande Prairie has probably the fastest growing school-age population, followed closely by Lethbridge and Airdrie, and I think there are a couple of others in there as well. We have a tremendous number of young people who are moving to these small and medium-sized cities. They do so because of quality of life, because of job opportunities. I know that when I was knocking on doors over the last three or so years in Lethbridge, people would say to me: "Oh, I'm new here. I came here because of work, because the economy was growing quite well in Lethbridge." But those municipalities are going to be looking to the province's revenue picture with great concern because they're not going to see a corresponding investment in their cities. The province will simply not have the ability to do so.

Going back to what I indicated earlier, Madam Chair, about the concept of volatility, we are chipping away at our second-most stable source of revenue in a provincial budget, the first being provincial income tax, the second being corporate income tax. We're relying ever more on commodity prices in order to pay the bills. Now, that had a predictable outcome – and municipalities remember it well – in 2015. But the fact is that their MSI remained stable while our provincial finances dropped, which was a good lesson for all members in this House around relying on one product, one market, at one price. Certainly, we are united in terms of being able to break that deadlock of one market and one price on the question of market access and our energy infrastructure. But where we're not united is around the value and the virtue of petrochemical upgrading.

The Chair: Any comments, questions, or amendments?

Mr. McIver: Well, Madam Chair, I'm just going to briefly make a couple of comments here. What we just heard: everybody should record it and play it back, because that is nonsense.

The comments about revenue giveaways are quite interesting. What the NDP considers revenue giveaways is actually allowing Albertans to keep more tax dollars in their pockets. In fact, they also heard along the way the comments that this doesn't help any small corporations. Well, Madam Chair, if you just imagine, for easy examples, the place where the hon. members across filled their car up with gas, it was probably some label of a gas station and probably a small business. But I would remind them that that small business is attached to a larger corporation, with the same label on it probably, that refines that product that the hon. members put in their gas tanks. Those businesses are connected. If the partner business is unhealthy, it doesn't help the small business.

The same thing could be held true for where the hon. members bought their coffee this morning, regardless of whether it was Starbucks or Tim Hortons. There's probably a pretty good chance that the local Starbucks and Tim Hortons are corporations, but there's also a hundred per cent chance that the local Starbucks or Tim Hortons is attached to the head office of Starbucks and Tim Hortons, which are corporations where the tax cut will help their health. Since they're partners, it does affect small businesses as much as large.

As much as the opposition would like to put their head in the sand and deny that there is a connection there, I'm just standing right now to help them connect those dots because they continually say things like this that just are flat not true.

I was also somewhat entertained by the comments: a budget structurally unable to pay. Well, I'll remind the hon. members that Albertans rejected the NDP budget that had Alberta going in deficit $6 billion, $8 billion, or $10 billion per year, a budget that now has Alberta paying almost $2 billion a year in interest on that debt. Madam Chair, I would remind the hon. members across that that's $2 billion unavailable now to pay for schools, $2 billion that's unavailable every year now to pay for hospitals, and $2 billion every year now unavailable to pay for social services. Their government, if re-elected, was going to increase that to $100 billion in debt, with $4 billion in interest payments per year.

Now, if you actually want to talk about a structural budget problem, there's a reason that Albertans rejected the past government's budgeting habits. That was a severe structural budget problem when you are looking at them adding $4 billion a year in interest payments not available to provide – listen, it's not going to be easy now because of the mess they made. But the biggest threat to providing public services that Albertans desperately need is an out-of-control government with an out-of-control budget and out-of-control debt and with an actual goal to go up to $4 billion a year in interest payments without even touching the principal.

Madam Chair, I just am amazed by the nonsense that came out of the hon. member just now, and I also love the expression the hon. member used: mythical jobs from some economist. The members across, their government, oversaw the biggest number of unemployed that Alberta has seen perhaps ever but definitely in decades. I would also say: very well-respected economists. Their plan didn't work. Albertans rejected it. We're going to try something different, and we are trying something different with the advice of well-respected economists.

I would advise them to actually support this because that's what Albertans want. It was in our platform. This is what Albertans asked for on April 16, a big majority of them. I would advise the members opposite to perhaps respect the decision that Albertans made on April 16.

Thank you.

The Chair: Any other comments, questions, or amendments to the bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I'd like to take the opportunity to speak a little bit more about Bill 3. You know, it's very disconcerting that here we have before us a bill in the House that absolutely betrays the evidence that the bill is not an effective way to proceed. Here we are again with a government that simply chooses not to look at evidence, simply chooses not to act on that evidence whenever it's not convenient in their relationship with the funders of their party, who will be contributing to them in future elections and, of course, contributing to their friends in the federal election coming up later this year, which is really the underlying intent behind this whole bill, simply to funnel money away from the collective common good and the average person in society to a small, select group of people, who will be using that money to fund a particular party. So the real intent behind this bill is essentially robbing the poor to feed the rich.

I think that Monty Python had a sketch about that. Dennis Miller – I can't repeat the whole song to you because it uses unparliamentary language, but I'd suggest the government look up Dennis Miller, because that's the direction that they're going.

I want to go back and speak for a few moments about the evidence that has been presented numerous times in this House, because I just want it on the record again. I know it's been presented, and it's been presented well. I know that the government is not going to pay any attention to this at all because they essentially deny evidence whenever they get a chance, you know, like climate change and other kinds of issues like that, so I anticipate that they'll all just deny the evidence here. You know, in order to be fair to the government, we've actually taken the opportunity to ensure that many of our sources of evidence are people that are well known not to be left-wing commentary on society but, rather, right-wing commentary on society and therefore should be reasonable and acceptable to members of the government, but of course it's not, because they don't even listen to their own evidence-based people when it's inconvenient for them.

You know, I had an opportunity in this House to mention the U.S. Congressional Budget Office and the fact that they published a study in April 2019, so a very recent study. This is not ancient news. This is the most modern information that we have available by one of the most dependable offices in the western democracy, looking at the very question of tax reduction. The conclusions of that study are very clear. I know it's a big report, so skip the whole report. Just read the conclusions. I'm sure you have the time, while you're sitting in the House, to flip open your computer and have a quick look.

You will see that the U.S. Congressional Budget Office is explicitly saying that across-the-board tax cuts are a bad way to create jobs. Now, there may be some other benefits from it, but if you're saying that it's about creating jobs, then you're not in fact acting on the evidence available. In fact, they suggest that, at best, the number of jobs that might get created per million dollars is somewhere around 4 jobs per million dollars if everything goes well, and in fact much of the evidence indicates that jobs don't particularly go up at all. If it does work, if it happens to be the right economic time and it goes in the right direction, you might create four.

The same report indicates that in many ways this is almost accidental, that it's a side effect. It's not a direct effect of tax reductions. It's something that just happens by accident. I think that's exactly what we have here with this government. They don't really care about the jobs. They're hoping that a few get created by accident on the side. What they really want to do is make sure that money is shovelled to people who will benefit them as a government, directly in their political life, and that's very disconcerting to me.

The U.S. Congressional Budget Office did indicate that there are much better ways to create jobs, that if you wanted to do a tax reduction, you could even improve the number of jobs created by shifting that tax reduction away from corporations and, rather, to middle-class and low-income earners. If you provide low-income earners with a lower tax rate, then the results indicate that you'll create somewhere in the neighbourhood of 7 jobs per million dollars, so at least a little bit better than what is being suggested by the government here at the present time.

However, they go on to indicate that that in and of itself is again problematic, first of all, because it's not really the most effective way to create jobs, and secondly, it has the same problem as the first one – that is, the corporate tax decrease – which results in less revenue for the government to provide public goods. It actually reduces the well-being of the lives of people in a society when it comes to all the other services that they depend on in order to make their lives whole and worth while. Services such as schools, such as health care, such as public roads: all of those are put in jeopardy by these kinds of tax reductions.

Now, thankfully, the report by the U.S. Congressional Budget Office goes on to talk about the fact that there are other mechanisms which have been demonstrated over time, over the last few hundred years, to actually create a greater number of jobs. The major thing that creates dollar for dollar a greater number of jobs is government spending on infrastructure and redistribution of dollars to people who are earning incomes and spending those incomes in the local economy.

Now, there are two pieces to talk about there. The first thing they say is that if you actually increase government spending by working on infrastructure, for example, then the average number of jobs that come out of that is 19 jobs per million dollars spent. We simply have a choice in front of us here in this House. We can create a policy which is good for a few and creates 4 jobs per million dollars, or we can create a policy that is good for the many and creates 19 jobs per million dollars.

Now, any objective person would start right away by saying that the measurable outcome that you are seeking would indicate that you need to spend more money as a government on infrastructure in order to create jobs. That's what the evidence shows us, yet this government is not doing it. We know they're not using evidence in terms of their bills that they're creating, but it also seems that they don't seem to care about the outcome that they say that they are intending to create – that is, they actually don't care about jobs – that the people who sit on the government side of this House, when it comes down to it, are fully prepared to deny that extra 15 people per million dollars spent, the jobs that would be available were they to increase money spent on infrastructure.

That's very concerning for me, what that might be about, and I think we need to explore a little bit about what these kinds of things may be about. We know that the reason why the cuts to corporate taxes do not work is because you don't have control over what corporations do with that money. You don't in fact have control over what the average citizen does with money either if you provide them with jobs through infrastructure development, as is suggested by all of the reasonable evidence.

What you do know is that there's a difference in what they tend to do with that money if we look backwards on the evidence of what's happened in the past. For example, in the United States last year they did a corporate tax cut, and a corporation, AT&T, for example, suggested that with that corporate tax cut they were going to create 7,000 jobs. Within the same year that they got that corporate tax cut, they did not create 7,000 jobs; they actually cut 23,000 jobs. So the evidence is there that they don't use the money for the thing that they say they're going to. There's a 30,000 job lie inherent in that tax cut.

In Canada, for example, under Prime Minister Harper's government, of which our Premier was a minister, there was, over a period of about 10 years, an intention to reduce taxes. In fact, they did reduce taxes over that 10-year period about 10 per cent. But the evidence that came out at the end of that period of time was that it had absolutely no real effect in terms of business investment back into the community. In 2009 business investment was almost exactly as it was in the year 2000, before these tax deductions came into place. Both were about 12.4 per cent of GDP. Again, we have our own evidence here in Canada that businesses did not reinvest.

What did businesses do? Businesses tended to buy back stock, and they started to hoard dollars. We know, for example, that in Canada those cuts, at the time of the assessment of the report, the latest report that was available to me, led to about a $500 billion stockpile in corporate cash, which subsequently, I understand from newspaper commentary, has actually risen closer to $700 billion, a stockpile of cash which is not being invested back into the Canadian economy. This is money that a former governor of the Bank of Canada, Mark Carney, indicated is dead money. We know that Mark Carney is a very brilliant man because he went to the same elementary and junior highs as I did, had the same high level of education received in public education here in the city of Edmonton. St. Rose and FX: a shout-out to you both. The point of the matter is that anybody who calls Mark Carney a leftist really doesn't understand much about politics.

What we're saying is that the very people who ascribe to your world view are telling you that your decision is wrong, that you are not indeed going to create the outcome that you are telling the people of the province of Alberta you're going to create. Now, if you know that ahead of time – we have a word for that. I can't use it here in the House, but it rhymes with pants on fire. On the other hand, if you don't know that, then I would suggest that it is time for you to take this bill and return it, to do some work on it, to look at the evidence, to create for yourself some knowledge.

I want to speak a little bit about some of the problems inherent in the shovelling of money away from the everyday, average Albertan, who we are here to represent, to a very few people in society. We know, for example, that over the last number of years, ever since this trickle-down, supply-side economics was introduced by Ronald Reagan, we have had a significant problem get created in our western democracies, and that is that the gap of inequality between the wealthiest and the poorest in society has absolutely increased dramatically. We know, for example, that over the period of time of the last 30 years the wealth of the richest 1 per cent in society has increased somewhere around, depending on which report you read, 165 times over what they previously had whereas at the same time, for the rest of us, for the common good, the common people, our wealth has almost increased not at all. If you were actually to take not the 1 per cent but the .1 per cent, that increases to over 360 times.

What's happening, clearly, with the use of this supply-side theory is that we are taking money and we are returning to a 14th-century notion of the Sun King and godly wealth all in a single individual and the rest of the people not benefiting. Now, I know that to Conservatives that's not a problem. It's okay if one person is wealthy and lives in the castle and everybody else has to, as my ancestors did, be peat bog farmers out on the west coast of Ireland while the kings were living rich in Dublin. Now, I know that you're quite comfortable with that. It doesn't bother you to look out your windows, as did King Wenceslaus, and find other people poor. Instead, you actually celebrate the fact that some people are wealthy to an extreme.

So I want to talk a little bit about why that kind of shift to inequality is severely problematic. First of all, we know, through the evidence again, which I know you don't have time to read, so I'll present it for you, that as inequality increases in society, a number of other undesirable things increase in society, and those are that the health of the average population decreases, that the rates of stress-related addictions and problems with criminality increase. We know that as the separation of inequality increases more and more, those few individuals with the wealth begin to have increased control over the lives of people without wealth. They begin increasingly to make decisions about what they can and cannot do in terms of their employment, where they can live, and what kinds of schools they can go to because the decisions are all being made by people with dollars in their pocket.

A great book written by Ortega y Gasset on the dictatorship of the majority talks about the fact that at a certain point you have people with power who begin to exercise that power over others simply because they can, because there's nothing stopping them from exercising that power. That means everybody who is not part of that elite power group suddenly becomes vulnerable to the whims of the power group.

That's what we're going toward, which is a complete betrayal of the last 300 years of democratic progress in western society. The very things we've been working against you are working to put back into our world. You keep going backwards in time. You haven't learned any of the lessons from the reform that we have seen, starting in Britain with the reform of public education, the reform of public health care, and how much that has benefited our society.

We know, for example, that the average life expectancy of people in society was more greatly increased by the implementation of public utilities such as public water than by all the invention of expensive medical procedures such as heart surgery. But, of course, you're not interested in everybody doing better. You're only interested in those people with money doing better. That's what happens when you make that kind of inequality possible, that money gets funnelled to those people who can afford particular surgeries that will only benefit a very small number of people but are very expensive.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Red Deer-South.

Mr. Stephan: Thank you, Madam Chair. It's my privilege again to stand and speak in favour of Bill 3, the job-creation tax cut act, which will restore Alberta as the most competitive and attractive place in Canada to start and grow a business. I honestly don't understand why the members opposite are speaking in opposition to restoring that status for Alberta.

Mr. Feehan: Because the evidence doesn't prove it.

Mr. Stephan: Well, we'll talk about that a little bit.

As indicated during second reading of this bill, I am a tax lawyer and a chartered professional accountant, and I work with private businesses, their owners, and their professional advisers. When the members opposite selectively cite some current successes to justify the status quo, I would suggest that Albertans are generally an industrious and innovative people, and in some instances they are able to succeed in spite of dysfunctional government policy and not because of it. Alberta does not have the lowest general corporate rate in Canada. Ontario and Quebec, for example, have a lower general corporate rate than Alberta. Bill 3, the job-creation tax cut act, is focused on the general corporate income tax rate.

The question I have for the members opposite is: what do they have against being the most competitive tax jurisdiction in Canada? Why is that embarrassing? You know, why are they content with mediocrity? [interjections]

The Chair: Hon. members.

Mr. Stephan: What we're doing here with the job-creation tax cut is not new. Having the lowest corporate tax rate has served Alberta very well historically. I know that the truth may hurt. It has served Alberta very well historically. We have actually had billion-dollar surpluses while at the same time having the lowest corporate tax rates. So we have evidence based on historical fact.

You know, my impression, Madam Chair, is that the former NDP government was, again, a government that really did not focus on real-world details. For example, the prior government does not understand the concept of corporate integration and the complexities of our tax system. When they increased the general corporate tax rate by 20 per cent, they did not decrease the corresponding eligible dividend tax rate, which impacts overall corporate integration.

For example, generally speaking, when governments in the past have altered corporate tax rates, they have adjusted the dividend tax rates to preserve the concept of corporate integration. The NDP government did not do this. So what's the outcome of that? Well, consider a small corporation that owns just a couple of rental properties. It may not earn much income, but because of the nature of its type of business, it actually doesn't qualify for the small-business rate and, as a result, is actually subject to the higher rate and, with the increase, the higher general corporate tax rate that the prior government brought in, and there became an underintegration in corporate income, with a five per cent increase in a disadvantage between earning that rental income in a corporation as opposed to earning it directly. Corporations that had these rental properties inside the corporation found them trapped under this NDP government when it increased costs.

You know, you increased tax rates by 20 per cent, and you shrank Alberta's private-sector workforce by tens of thousands of individuals during the time you were in power. While you may not wish it was true, you know, government services only exist – they only exist – if there is an economic strength from the private-sector businesses and those who work in them to pay for them. You essentially declared war on those individuals and businesses that actually fund the government services that all of us appreciate and value.

The Chair: Hon. member, a reminder to speak through the chair.

Mr. Stephan: Thank you, Madam Chair.

The members opposite like to think they are the champions of government services, but the truth is that they are not. You know, if we continue with irresponsible, undisciplined, uncompetitive, NDP-type policies and governments, by and by it will lead to the collapse of unsustainable government services. The NDP views business success as a zero-sum game. You know, in their heart they think that if businesses do well, then workers do not, and that is a fundamental flaw in thinking. They are not win-win in their thinking. They view success as someone else's failure.

This old government had a philosophy, you know, a socialist philosophy that was in direct opposition to what is required for economic prosperity. This was a government that did not understand how to compete and excel in the real world, and their record speaks for itself. It is a record of failure.

Let's talk about the culture in Alberta. You know, our Premier has correctly stated that Alberta is a meritocracy. That is how Alberta has competed and excelled in the past. That is how we have been the place of economic opportunity for the rest of the country, by being the most competitive jurisdiction to start and grow a business, and that has created the ability to create a record number of jobs.

Madam Chair, Bill 3, you know, represents a huge positive step amongst the other government initiatives to renew and restore Alberta as the most competitive and attractive jurisdiction in our country. But here's the litmus test, and I hope the members opposite are listening. In four years let's compare the record of the NDP losing tens of thousands of private-sector jobs, because that's your record. Let's compare it to the record in four years under the job-creation tax cut if it doesn't create tens of thousands of private-sector jobs. That will be the true test, and the record: again, the facts will speak for themselves.

Thanks, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Any other comments or questions? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Madam Chair, and I'll thank the member for that lecture on how taxes work. I appreciate that he's an accountant. I will start off by saying – and the hon. member knows this. If he doesn't, well, then I can only feel sorry for some of his clients. Alberta is the lowest tax jurisdiction in Canada. You can look exclusively at the corporate tax rate, but you're being either naïve or you're not looking at the full picture. Albertans don't pay a PST. We don't pay a payroll tax. We don't have health care premiums. That all is part of the taxes that Albertans don't pay. Because of that, even with the carbon tax Albertans paid $11 billion less than the second-lowest tax jurisdiction in Canada, which is their best friend Saskatchewan. Why? Because Saskatchewan has a PST, they have a payroll tax, and they pay significantly higher. Now, at 12 per cent Alberta was still in the top third as far as the lowest corporate tax rates in the country. Ontario, I believe, is 11.5 per cent, as is one of the other provinces. So it's not that Alberta was far over, but the difference is that Albertans don't pay a PST.

The logic of, "just have a low corporate tax rate, and that's all it takes to attract business" is my favourite logic to discuss because if that was the case, then for the decades that Alberta had a 10 per cent flat rate for corporate taxes – that was the lowest in Canada as a corporate tax rate – according to that logic every business should only be in Alberta if that's the only driver, your corporate tax rate. How is it that Ontario with a PST and a corporate tax rate – they're well north of 15 per cent in taxes – has businesses that somehow remain competitive? How are they attracting investment from other countries?

I can tell you, Madam Chair, that part of the reason, which I wish members would at least acknowledge when we talk about the Alberta advantage, is the fact that we're sitting on the third-largest oil reserves in the world. Now, that wasn't Ralph Klein out there with a shovel putting oil in the ground, despite the fact that the members would, you know, give him accolades like he was actually putting oil in the ground. We are very, very blessed as Albertans to have an abundance of natural resources. Now, we also have incredible innovators and entrepreneurs that discovered ways to extract and refine, especially when you look at our oil sands and bitumen and the viscosity of it and the challenges that come around it. I'm very proud of the fact that it was Alberta entrepreneurs and our oil and gas sector that designed SAGD technology that is used world-wide. That was developed here in Alberta.

Mr. McIver: You're welcome.

Mr. Bilous: I find it kind of funny that the Member for Calgary-Hays is saying "you're welcome" because I don't think you developed SAGD technology, sir. I will give credit to the entrepreneurs that did develop this technology.

My point is this, Madam Chair. I'm not arguing against the fact that, you know, we've been through a very, very painful recession over the last couple of years, that has had a significant impact on every single Albertan. I recognize that, and I recognize that the job rate is attributed to a number of different factors. I can tell you that when you look at companies in the digital or technology space, in which Alberta has significant competitive advantages, when sitting down with companies like Apple and Microsoft and others, their number one issue is not: what is the corporate tax rate? In fact, they couldn't give two hoots about what the tax rate is. What they want is talent. They want to see that there is a talent pipeline so that they can set up shop in a jurisdiction, which is what our government has been focused on, attracting and developing that talent.

The Chair: Hon. member, I hesitate to interrupt you. According to Standing Order 4(3) the committee will now rise and report.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. The Committee of the Whole has had under consideration certain bills. The committee reports progress on the following bill: Bill 3.

The Deputy Speaker: Does the Assembly concur in the report?

Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Speaker: Any opposed? Carried.
The hon. Minister of Transportation.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Based on the fact that it's 4 minutes to 12, we've made some good progress this morning, and heard some good debate from all sides of the House, I would move that we call it 12 o'clock and adjourn until 1:30 this afternoon.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Tuesday, June 11, 2019

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Please be seated.

Introduction of Visitors

The Speaker: Hon. members, joining us today in the Speaker's gallery is a long-serving Member of the Saskatchewan Legislative Assembly and former Speaker of the province of Saskatchewan, Mr. Dan D'Autremont. I invite you to welcome him to the Assembly.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Also joining us, basically, is everyone else, which is amazing. Joining us from the constituency of Red Deer-South is Eastview middle school. I invite you to rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Members' Statements

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Peace River.

Health Care Services for Wildfire Evacuees

Mr. Williams: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to give thanks to the many men and women of Alberta Health Services who have been absolutely essential in evacuating patients, continuing care for residents, and caring for essential services in evacuated areas. Front-line paramedics and emergency medical services have worked with hospital staff and physicians to provide seamless care in stressful, chaotic, and daunting circumstances. Through it all they've done their best to show every patient and family the respect and compassion we expect from our health care professionals every day.

While mandatory evacuation orders in High Level, the surrounding areas of Mackenzie county, areas within the county of Northern Lights, and the Dene Tha' First Nation communities of Bushe, Meander, and Chateh were lifted, several fires continue to burn out of control in northern Alberta while Paddle Prairie is still evacuated. Yet, Mr. Speaker, our health care providers remain determined as more Albertans require assistance and evacuation service and treatment every day.

In addition to evacuating health facilities, AHS is adding supports for people dealing with the stress of returning home, including a new, seven-days-a-week mental health service in High Level. I know, Mr. Speaker, that I speak for all members of this Chamber when I say thanks to our physicians and AHS staff caring for patients affected by these fires. They have our deepest respect and gratitude. They continue to uphold the values of our health care system every day as these forest fires continue to rage on.

Mr. Speaker, the AHS paramedics, nurses, physicians, and others alongside these brave firefighters are the real heroes of Alberta today. Their work saves lives as they continue to work as long as needed to protect us and property. As residents return home to High Level, I am reminded of why I'm so thankful to be an Albertan. The most essential Alberta advantage that we have is the dedication of the people, including our firefighters and health care professionals, serving us today.

Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo is rising to make a statement.

Provincial Fiscal Position

Member Ceci: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. They were dishonest with Albertans, and they fudged the numbers: these are the Premier's words on Alberta's finances. The disturbing and baseless allegation the Premier is making is not only the type of cynical mudslinging he pretends to despise; it is also simply not true. The budgets, financial records, and reports released under our government were prepared by professional and competent public servants. The numbers were audited by the former Auditor General of Alberta, a public servant this government chose to fire without cause.

Mr. Speaker, these are numbers based in fact and evidence, not numbers invented by politicians, but of course facts and evidence are not what this Premier trades in. The Premier has chosen to ignore the truth and alleges that public servants misled Albertans about our finances. This is a cheap, offensive attack on the integrity and professionalism of the same officials that work in the Premier's own government. As a former Minister of Finance I am disturbed and disappointed to hear these comments, but of course the Premier has not done this by mistake. This carefully crafted spin is to prepare Albertans for what is to come.

What is next according to the Premier? What he calls a shared sacrifice. Of course, Albertans can read between the lines. This means cruel cuts and austerity policies that everyday Albertans will be hurt by. The Premier has said that Alberta's finances are worse than he thought to convince Albertans that the only solution is massive cuts to our health care, education, and the services Albertans depend on. He is telling Albertans that good schools for our children, health care for our seniors, and supports for our families are all a luxury, one that he will not protect. He is preparing Albertans for his austerity panel's recommendations, which are a foregone conclusion: cut, cut, cut.

Mr. Speaker, Albertans deserve the truth, not cynical spin that will be used against them to gut their services, communities, and province.

The Speaker: The Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Energy Industries in Drayton Valley-Devon

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My constituents in Drayton Valley-Devon have for too long been burdened by ill-advised government policy, ill-advised policies which have caused local companies to go from 100 employees to 50 to bankrupt, all in the span of a few short years, all because of the devastating NDP policies which drove investment away from Drayton Valley-Devon and into the United States although, as the Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo previously pointed out, some investment has been driven from Alberta to Iraq and other jurisdictions which don't believe in environmental stewardship and do not care about even the bare minimum in human rights standards.

It wasn't just new investment we lost. Our equipment, our people, and much of our prosperity were shipped to other jurisdictions to produce energy there. These other jurisdictions are using our equipment to increase the production of oil and gas in their countries. With this new production, derived from our equipment, come new greenhouse emissions, and with our equipment, we exported our greenhouse gas emissions.

All of that exporting, not of our oil but of our quality of life, drove unemployment in my riding to 10.6 per cent in 2016, and of the constituents who hadn't lost their jobs, most of them took a pay cut or a cut in hours in some cases. Others gave up looking for work altogether. And it wasn't just oil and gas workers who suffered; it was youth and service workers and their families. Everyone suffered.

We cannot repeal the suffering. We have and will continue to repeal, though, the NDP policies, like the job-killing carbon tax. The spring of renewal has started, and it's to lead to a summer of promises kept. If we must, we will sit through the night to keep our promises because my constituents in Drayton Valley-Devon sent me here to keep our electoral promises.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West is rising to make a statement.

Postsecondary Convocation 2019

Mr. Eggen: Mr. Speaker, the month of June is a very special time for Alberta postsecondary students and their families as we celebrate convocation. Watching students cross the stage to accept their degrees and diplomas is a wonderful opportunity to stop and reflect on the incredible future for our province. These students are future business leaders, community activists, and some of them may even sit here in this House one day, elected to serve Albertans.

Unfortunately, these students are graduating at a moment of great uncertainty. Where are the jobs for new nurses and teachers? Will this government's commitment to the failed fiscal experiment of huge corporate tax giveaways mean that students will have to head out of the province, perhaps, to find their own economic prosperity? About a generation ago Albertans had to ask themselves these same questions when the government of the day made cuts that took a whole generation for this province to recover from. I, for one, am concerned that we are seeing the clock being turned back.

I hope these students will bring into the world the values that will make this province great. I hope that they lead the charge to keep on building an economy, a diverse economy, on a strong foundation of environmental stewardship, that they will help those in need, and that they will work hard to build a prosperous Alberta, where each and every Albertan is included.

On behalf of our caucus I would like to offer our congratulations to Alberta's class of 2019.

The Speaker: The Member for Lethbridge-East.

1:40 Canadians' Rights and the Role of Government

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was elected to represent Lethbridge-East based, at least in part, on my experience. I am a first-generation Canadian. I spoke German at home until I went to school, and I worked summers on the farm to pay for my schooling. My wife and I have five children, four daughters and one son.

My life experience makes me a passionate defender of our Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms for my children's future, particularly 6(2), that every citizen of Canada and every person who has the status of a permanent resident of Canada has the right . . .

(b) to pursue the gaining of a livelihood in any province, and section 7, that everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person.

This pursuit is deeply ingrained in Canadians, and they strive to achieve these goals through a free-market economy, which is one of voluntary exchange under the laws of supply and demand, that provide the sole basis for our economic system without government intervention.

This limited government is an important component of economic freedom, and higher levels of economic freedom are associated with higher annual incomes, better health, longer life expectancies, and greater political and civil liberties. Milton Friedman said:

Government has three primary functions. It should provide for military defense of the nation. It should enforce contracts between individuals. It should protect citizens from crimes against themselves or their property. When government – in pursuit of good intentions tries to rearrange the economy, legislate morality, or help special interests, the cost come in inefficiency, lack of motivation, and loss of freedom.

Government should be a referee, not an active player.

Private industry in a free economy, governed by a limited Legislature with clear, unencumbering laws, is the best and only true path for all citizens to find success through hard work and a level playing field. Then with the fair and responsible collection of taxes from private individuals and corporations, handled as stewards of other people's money, it can judiciously be spent to maintain the public services we desire and need. The very best scenario for a strong public sector is a free and vibrant private economy.

The Speaker: I might just remind all hon. members that there's a long-standing tradition inside the Legislature here in Alberta that members' statements are free from interruption or heckling.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar is rising.

Climate Change

Mr. Schmidt: Mr. Speaker, the Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre is on record as saying that he doesn't believe the world is in a climate crisis. However, a report released recently by the National Centre for Climate Restoration in Australia not only states clearly that we are in a crisis but outlines in horrifying detail the consequences of not taking action now to deal with it.

By 2050, if we continue to do nothing, global sea levels will rise by half a metre, wiping out the agriculturally important river deltas such as the Mekong, Ganges, and Nile. Some of the world's most populous cities, including Chennai, Mumbai, Jakarta, Guangzhou, Tianjin, Hong Kong, Ho Chi Minh City, Shanghai, Lagos, Bangkok, and Manila, will be abandoned. Some small islands will become uninhabitable. Ten per cent of Bangladesh will be destroyed, displacing 15 million people alone.

More than 30 per cent of the world's land surface will be turned to desert, with the most severely affected areas being southern Africa, the southern Mediterranean, west Asia, the Middle East, inland Australia, and the southwestern United States.

Agriculture production will decline sharply, food prices will rise sharply, and more than a billion people will have to leave their homes because they've become uninhabitable. In the words of the report, "The scale of destruction is beyond our capacity to model, with a high likelihood of human civilisation coming to an end."

But all is not lost. We still have time to act, but we must move quickly. The report calls for a massive global mobilisation of resources . . . in the coming decade to build a zero-emissions industrial system and set in train the restoration of a safe climate. This would be akin in scale to the World War II emergency mobilisation.

Mr. Speaker, the UCP needs to get off its hands and enact a real plan to tackle the climate crisis now. Albertans' lives and those all over the world depend on it.

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar has a tabling or four.

Mr. Schmidt: Yes. Mr. Speaker, thank you very much for indulging me. I have a number of tablings on the issue of climate change. I have a couple of e-mails from constituents that I received. One was from Kelly Granigan. She agrees that we need “large-scale, systematic change” to accomplish meaningful action on climate change.

Another one is from Caitlin Richards. She’s a parent of a one-year-old daughter and is increasingly concerned about the climate crisis. She says, “We are running out of time and cannot afford to lose what progress we have already made on developing new strategies, in addition to tree-planting programs and the Alberta carbon levy.”

Also on the topic of climate change, Mr. Speaker, I have an excerpt from Pope Francis’ 2015 encyclical, specifically section 26. It says: “There is an urgent need to develop policies so that, in the next few years, the emission of carbon dioxide and other highly polluting gases can be drastically reduced.”

The Speaker: Hon. member, we appreciate the member’s statement that you just made. I hope that you will table your documents in a much more expedient fashion.

Mr. Schmidt: Yes, Mr. Speaker, and I’m sure the Pope would like to know that you’ve cut him off. “Investments have also been made in . . . production and transportation which consume less energy.”

Finally, Mr. Speaker, of course, I have a number of tweets from online personality and radio commentator Charles Adler in response to a video that he saw on YouTube wherein the Member for Calgary-Lougheed brags about denying AIDS patients the right to see their dying spouses, and specifically . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member. [interjection] Thank you, hon. member. You are finished your tabling, sir. You are finished your tabling, sir. Have a seat.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: No. Have a seat. When the Speaker is on his feet, you are not on your feet. Am I making myself clear, hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar?

Mr. Schmidt: Crystal.

The Speaker: Excellent work.

Are there any other tablings? The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you. I have the five copies required. This is from the Canadian Press. ‘Can’t Be Any More Clear’: Scientist Says Fires in Alberta Linked to Climate Change.

The Speaker: Are there others?

I have a tabling. I have six copies of the Child and Youth Advocate report titled Mandatory Reviews into Child Deaths for the period of April 1, 2018, to September 30, 2018, received in my office yesterday, June 10, 2019.

Tablings to the Clerk

The Clerk: I wish to advise the Assembly that the following document was deposited with the office of the Clerk. On behalf of the hon. Mr. Schweitzer, Minister of Justice and Solicitor General, pursuant to the Statutes Repeal Act an undated report entitled Alberta Justice and Solicitor General, Statutes Repeal Act, 2019 List.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The Leader of the Official Opposition.

Labour and Social Legislation

Ms Notley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. This government’s election promises are not worth the paper they’re written on. Take this government’s attack on banked overtime. On April 2, 2019, the now Premier stated to the Edmonton Journal: “This does not affect overtime pay. I repeat – it does not affect or diminish overtime pay.” But we know that the average oil and gas worker stands to lose up to $320 a week. To the Premier. Promise made, promise broken: why?

The Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader is rising to answer.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Official Opposition continues to mischaracterize the situation around overtime. To be very, very clear, as we have been many times in the past, workers have options to enter into overtime agreements that have been in place for a long time inside this province. It was only changed just about a year or a year and a half ago or so under the NDP government. Workers would have that option. Nothing would be forced on workers. It would be a partnership between workers and their employers, something that we heard from many employees that they would like to see. I heard from several constituents on that issue, and the opposition should stop with that fear and smear.

Ms Notley: The new rules allow employers to impose those arrangements on the workers, and the members opposite know it.

Now, two weeks ago the Premier stood in this House and also made the same claim, but the information was not correct. We have been very, very careful to lay out exactly why the information is not correct. Still, the Premier said it here in the House, information which is not correct, just like the House leader, Mr. Speaker. To the Premier and the House leader: will you stop saying not correct things in this House, and admit that the Premier broke the promise that he made to Albertans on April 2 of this year with respect to overtime?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, let’s be very, very clear. I know that the hon. Leader of the Opposition wants to continue to say incorrect things in this Assembly. It is optional. It’s up to workers. They would have to enter into agreements with their employers. It’s taken place inside this province for decades. Nothing has changed from how it was a couple of years ago. Again, it would be up to employees.

What is shocking to me, though, Mr. Speaker, is to watch in this House, both in question period and during bill debate, the opposition, over and over and over, attack employers and job creators in this province, basically implying that they would force something on their employees and treat their employees in terrible ways. That’s ridiculous. They should stop attacking the people that create employment in our province.

Ms Notley: You know, the thing about legislation, Mr. Speaker, is that it’s in black and white, and even the UCP can’t run away from that.

Now, there’s more, Mr. Speaker. Albertans were shocked last November when audio emerged of the Premier praising those fighting against the rights of gay couples to adopt children. The Premier stated repeatedly that he would not legislate on social issues, except fast-forward to no less than three weeks into his first session, and he's introduced a bill to – wait for it – legislate on social issues by rolling back guaranteed protections for LGBTQ kids. To the Premier. Promise made, promise broken. How many more promises do you plan to break?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition and her caucus can't help themselves. They focus on fear and smear. You'd think they would learn. On April 16 they were fired by the people of Alberta exactly because of those tactics.

Let me also be very clear, as we have been in this House many times, that Alberta will still be the province with the best GSA protection in the entire country. That's important to our caucus. That's important to our government and to our party. That's what we will be focused on. This party across from me, the opposition, should stop with the fear and smear. They should stop making things up and stick with the facts. Alberta will continue to have strong GSA protection in place.

The Speaker: The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

Gay-straight Alliances in Schools

Ms Notley: Last week the Education minister held a press conference that can only be described charitably as a train wreck. She told the media that her Education Act restores balance to how different groups are treated in their schools. To the minister: can she please inform the House how an act that guaranteed timely and fulsome protection of vulnerable LGBTQ kids at schools in any way detracted from the experience of other kids who were not involved in GSAs?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, again, to be very clear, the opposition continues to make things up, continues with their fear and their smear. Alberta will have the best protection for GSAs, something that was voted in with Bill 10, that was supported by the legacy parties that make up the United Conservative Party and was supported by the NDP Party at the same time. That's what the facts are. So the opposition should stop playing with that.

Now, what will change is the attack that continued from the former government on all sorts of groups within our education system. We'll be focused on working with parents, focused on working with teachers to educate our kids in the best possible way.

Ms Notley: The Education minister's comments got even more out of touch. She said, quote: I care about every single student regardless of the label that they have; I care about every single student, whether they are – whatever. The word is not "whatever," Mr. Speaker. It's "gay." We know that private schools have been fighting against even using the word "gay." To the minister, not the House leader, will she say the word "gay," and will she make it clear that school board policies on GSAs should include the word "gay" if that is what students want?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, again, the approach that continues to happen inside this House, which borders on bullying of the Education minister, is similar to the bullying that took place over the weekend by the deputy Leader of the NDP Party against a singer who was trying to participate in the raising of the pride flag here on the Legislature Grounds. I can tell you – it's interesting – when I was home this weekend, Albertans said to me very loud and clear that they are so sick and tired of the bullying tactics of the NDP. It is ridiculous. It's inappropriate. I call on them to stop it in this House and, certainly, to stop it outside of this House.

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, when the minister is allowed to speak, her ill-informed talking points are just disrespectful to all who care about GSAs. There's no timeline for principals to act. There's no policy barring schools from discouraging kids from requesting a GSA. There's no longer an enforcement mechanism. Private schools can discriminate should they choose. And, of course, there's no guaranteed protection from being outed. Why won't the minister at least come clean to the kids she is bound to serve? Why won't she just, frankly, be better at her job?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, the Education minister is great at her job. I'm proud of our Education minister. I'm proud to stand with her inside this House. I'm proud of the work that she's doing inside our education system.

Now, Mr. Speaker, again, we do not support mandatory notification. We do not support outing gay kids. It is completely ridiculous for the opposition to continue to say that. We have fought, and we will make sure that Bill 10 and the protection for GSAs will remain in our system. The NDP should stop saying false facts.

The Speaker: The Leader of the Official Opposition has the call.

Ms Notley: We support gay-straight alliances; we wouldn't out our kids: now, those were the words of the current Minister of Justice during his bid to lead the UCP. Now he willingly stands by as the Premier plots to destroy to GSAs and, of course, out those who wish to start them. To the minister: if you can abandon your promises on matters that are this fundamental to basic values this quickly, what other promises can Albertans look forward to you abandoning?

Speaker's Ruling

Questions outside Ministerial Responsibility

The Speaker: I might just intervene that I'm not entirely sure that the hon. Minister of Justice – I'm not sure what government policy you might be referring to him abandoning, but . . .

Ms Notley: Outing gay kids, breach of the Charter: that's the one.

The Speaker: I think that the Speaker is the one who has the call at this point in time. I rarely intervene . . . [interjection] I would prefer you to fill me in when you have the call, not when I have the call.

The Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The hon. Justice minister has maintained his commitments, as has Alberta's new government, which is to keep Bill 10, to keep the best protection for GSAs and for kids who want to participate in GSAs. That's a promise made, a promise kept. That is what this government is going to do. Despite the fact that the opposition wants to keep making things up, we do not believe in mandatory notification. We do not believe in outing gay kids. We stand with Bill 10. We stand with having the best GSA protection in the entire country of any province. That's a fact. I thank the hon. Justice minister for supporting that.

The Speaker: The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition has a wonderful opportunity now.

Ms Notley: Speaking of making things up, Mr. Speaker, the hon. House leader is breaking new records today.

Anyway, according to the Attorney General, quote: as the United Conservative Party goes forward, we have a lot of work to do to build trust with LGBTQ people. To the Attorney General: do you actually believe that the best way to build trust with people is to tell them what you think they want to hear when you're running for something and then break your promise once elected?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, it's pretty rich for that member to talk about telling people when they run for something and then breaking their promise when they're elected when she didn't bother to mention the largest tax increase in the history of the province and then brought it in place when she came into this Assembly. Again, it's misinformation that's being presented by the Leader of the Official Opposition. The Justice minister and all of us inside the new Alberta government stand for the strongest protection of GSAs, stand for making sure kids are not bullied inside schools. We will continue to support Bill 10. That is the position that was taken by the legacy caucus of this party, and it's not going to change.

Mr. Bilous: Point of order.

The Speaker: Point of order is noted at 1:59.

The Leader of the Official Opposition on your second supplemental.

Ms Notley: Yesterday the AG claimed that Bill 8, or, as I like to call it, Bill Hate, will usher in the strongest protections for LGBTQ kids in Canada. That is not true. Now, while it appears very possible that the Education minister doesn't actually understand her own act, the House leader clearly doesn't understand it, as an AG and as a member of the Law Society you are expected to read legislation and to explain it to the public in good faith. Will the minister commit to reading the legislation from Ontario and the policies from Nova Scotia and correct the record in this House tomorrow?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, the minister and all of the United Conservative Party and the Alberta government support the strongest protection for GSAs in the entire country. The minister, when he says that, is correct. When I say that, I'm correct. The hon. Leader of the Opposition does not want to refer to that, but that's the fact. That's an important issue. It's important to this government. It's important to Albertans. We will still have the strongest protections for GSAs of any province in the country. Those are the facts. I'm disappointed that the hon. Leader of the Opposition keeps presenting facts that are not exactly truthful.

The Speaker: A point of order is noted by the Member for . . . [interjection] A point of order is noted by the Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

The rules around here are pretty simple. I stand up; everybody else doesn't speak. I sit back down; everybody else speaks. I hope that you'll follow the rules.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

2:00 Municipal Government Act Amendments

Member Ceci: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This government's changes to the MGA aren't changes at all. In fact, the entirety of Bill 7 is basically just restating powers that municipalities already have to defer or eliminate the collection of taxes. Earlier this year the city of Lethbridge provided a seven-year cancellation of taxes for a $4 million health development. To the Minister of Municipal Affairs: won't you admit that this bill is nothing but a trumped-up communications plan to give the illusion that your government is open for business?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for that question. The amendment that was put forward is geared towards giving flexibility to our municipalities to make sure that they attract investment and economic opportunities to all of our communities.

I want to correct the record. The section the members opposite are referring to is section 347, and in that particular section it clearly says: where "a council considers it equitable to do so." There is nothing in the MGA that is geared towards economic investment.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Member Ceci: They don't need flexibility; they need predictability and certainty, Mr. Speaker.

The nonlegislation brought forward by this minister has done one thing, and that's stir up confusion for municipalities. The mayor of St. Albert told her local newspaper: "I think the first phone call they should have [made] was to [call] both RMA . . . and AUMA . . . We could have given [them] feedback and helped develop the bill." My question to the Minister of Municipal Affairs: why didn't you consult with municipalities on the legislation? Perhaps they could have told you it was a nothing bill.

Mr. Madu: Thank you again for the question. Mr. Speaker, when I took office as the Minister of Municipal Affairs, the first thing that I did in my very first week was to reach out to mayors and reeves across this province to give them a heads-up on the priorities of our ministry. And on April 16 the people of this province voted in large numbers. We clearly laid out in our platform that we would specifically pursue this amendment. It was a promise made; it is a promise kept.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo on your second supplemental.

Member Ceci: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm glad he reached out. Did municipalities ask for this bill? No. The one thing this bill could do is draw more attention to the ability of municipalities to defer or lower taxes, but that added exposure has also caused worry with the mayor of St. Albert. She fears that overuse of these tools could spur a "race to the bottom" as municipalities attempt to outdo each other on the incentives for developers and corporations. To the minister: you introduced a nothing bill, you didn't talk to anyone before you did it, and now you're creating fear amongst your stakeholders.

Mr. Madu: Mr. Speaker, you see, when we put forward this particular bill, I had the mayor of Strathcona county, I had business leaders, and they were all part of that particular announcement. The one thing that the member opposite doesn't understand is that they have no understanding of what it takes to create an environment for businesses to do well. They presided over the near-decline of our economy. Our government would not let that happen.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Red Deer-South.

Mr. Stephan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would encourage the members opposite to set a better example for our youth.

Red Deer College Transition to University Status Postsecondary Graduates' Employment

Mr. Stephan: Red Deer College will become Red Deer university upon an order in council under the Post-secondary Learning Act, which authorizes the establishment of undergraduate universities.

The college is working with the ministry for the minister to initiate the order in council. To the Minister of Advanced Education: will he confirm that his ministry will support the college in its work to become a university to provide improved educational choices for Albertan families?

The Speaker: The Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaides: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Indeed, we are working very carefully and closely with Red Deer College to help it transition to university status. The transition process takes several years and includes a number of steps to ensure that the degrees that are offered are meaningful and are necessary within the broader community and within the province as well. Moreover, Red Deer is one of our fastest growing communities, so this transition will help to give the residents of Red Deer more educational opportunities.

Mr. Speaker, I think I'm out of time. Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Red Deer-South.

Mr. Stephan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that this government's platform states that it will focus on increased institutional and individual choices for universities and given that this government's platform also states that it will reduce provincial red tape and mandates on universities and colleges, freeing them to innovate and compete more and comply with bureaucratic mandates less, to the minister: what will this government do to apply these platform principles to support the college in its work to become a university?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaides: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. Indeed, getting out of the way and reducing unnecessary bureaucratic rules and red tape is critical to helping our institutions move forward. There are onerous reporting requirements that are preventing our institutions from innovating and competing, and as we look to strengthen our postsecondary system here in Alberta, we need to make sure that they have the capacity to innovate, to conduct necessary research, to help ensure that they are fulfilling the labour market needs not just of today but also of the future.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Stephan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that under the NDP's watch net private-sector jobs shrank by tens of thousands and given that there will be thousands of new university and college graduates looking for jobs, to the minister: what will you do to help improve the employment outlook of thousands of Alberta's postsecondary graduates?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaides: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Indeed, it's a top priority, making sure that our graduates have opportunities available to them once they finish their programs. In particular, we're going to be doing two very particular things. First and foremost, we'll be working and supporting a range of different organizations, including Careers: the Next Generation and Skills Canada, and expanding the registered apprenticeship program to help encourage more high school students to pursue postsecondary educational opportunities. As well, we'll also be evaluating the labour market impacts of degree programs.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Public Service Contract Negotiations

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. This government is just weeks old, but already they're making bold threats to public-sector workers that would make even the former PC government blush. A letter that we've obtained from the Finance minister's office threatens that if public-sector unions, including postsecondary instructors, don't agree to delay talks on wages, the government will consider "all available options up to and including legislation." To the Finance minister: is issuing an over-the-top threat to public-sector workers really the best approach to bargaining in good faith?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. At this point in time we have requested a delay in arbitration hearings. We believe that that's in Albertans' best interests as we determine a pathway forward out of the fiscal mess that the previous government left us in. We're waiting for the MacKinnon panel to report. We believe that we deserve to give a thoughtful response on a path forward for Albertans.

Mr. Eggen: Well, you know, as an English teacher, Mr. Speaker, I have to point out that there's a difference between a request and a threat.

Given that our public-sector workers include nurses who care for the sick, teachers who prepare our students for their futures, and guards who protect our Legislature, to the minister: will you apologize in this House today for this sham consultation that you claim to be running on wage talks and bullying tactics that you have turned to?

The Speaker: I know that the hon. member has spent 10 years inside this Assembly and knows that after question 4 preambles are no longer used.

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, we value the contribution our public service makes to delivering high-quality services to Albertans. We're committed to ensuring that we have a path forward, to continuing to deliver high-quality services to Albertans, and to being fiscally responsible. Albertans expect nothing less of this government. Therefore, we've requested a delay in arbitration so we can understand the best path forward on behalf of all parties.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the head of this government's own blue-ribbon panel has already called for public-sector wage rollbacks and given that the minister is hanging this hammer over the heads of public-sector workers with a threat of legislation, will the minister commit today to retracting his letter, sitting down with public-sector unions, and to start bargaining in good faith?

The Speaker: The Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, we're committed to working in good faith with all stakeholders, including our public service stakeholders and partners. We believe that a request to delay arbitration is reasonable, is responsible, and is in the best interests of Albertans so that we can deal with the fiscal mess that Albertans have been handed by the previous government, which is the members opposite.

Provincial Budget Revenue Forecasts

Ms Phillips: Recently it was revealed that Alberta's Minister of Finance devoted many hours to a private school that outlawed witchcraft, the occult, and casting spells, but the minister seems to believe he can wave a wand, balance a budget while blowing a 4 and a half billion dollar hole in it, and not touch education or health care. The minister is no Dumbledore, but for those who need health care and education, he may just be Voldemort. Will the minister confirm with this House that revenue forecasts aren't magic but are prepared by professionals and private-sector forecasting firms?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, our government is committed to being responsible with hard-working Albertans' tax dollars, and we will follow through on that. We're committed to delivering high-quality services to Albertans, and we're committed to balance in our first term. As a result of that, again, we will be working judiciously to bring forward a budget in the fall and believe that we can accomplish both ends.

Ms Phillips: Given that this Finance minister appears to believe that private-sector forecasters and dedicated public servants use a Ouija board to prepare revenue forecasts, why did this minister continue his attack on the integrity of officials in Treasury Board and Finance in question period yesterday?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, I absolutely believe in and have witnessed first-hand the very skilled capabilities of senior department officials. Again, we are working judiciously to clean up the mess that the previous government has left us. The previous government left us on a trajectory for $100 billion of accumulated provincial debt. That kind of debt would prevent future governments from delivering high-quality services to Albertans. Our policies will reverse that trend.

Ms Phillips: Given that this minister thinks he can justify eliminating the classroom improvement fund in his upcoming minibudget, does this minister think that supports for students with disabilities or help for teachers in managing increasingly complex classrooms will come by magic this fall, or does he have some other way to replace those funds up his sleeve? Is there another freelance government announcement coming in today's question period?

Mr. Toews: Again, Mr. Speaker, this government is committed to delivering high-quality services to Albertans. We made a commitment to Albertans that we would maintain education funding in spite of the fiscal challenges that we're facing. We're also implementing a series of policies that will return investment to this province and, with it, jobs and opportunities and will over time increase government revenues. We have the responsibility to clean up the mess the previous government has left us in.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Falconridge is rising with a question.

Violent Crime in Northeast Calgary

Mr. Toor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Sadly, there has been a rash of violence within the Indo-Canadian community in northeast Calgary. In April and May there were four murders of Indo-Canadians, which police suggest could be connected and linked to organized crime. We also know that sometimes new Canadians have a tougher time accessing police services. Can the Minister of Justice inform this House about what steps are being taken to combat this rise in organized crime in northeast Calgary?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Justice.

Mr. Schweitzer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I want to thank the hon. member for the advocacy on this issue. It's been thoughtful and timely. I'm looking forward to meeting later this week with some key community groups regarding this matter to make sure we can start hearing their concerns and addressing this. We're also going to be making sure that we continue to provide our law enforcement officials with the resources they need, including additional funding for ALERT to disrupt gang activity. We're going to make sure that our law enforcement officials have the resources they need to do their jobs.

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-Falconridge.

Mr. Toor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister. Given that the Liberal government of Justin Trudeau has gutted much of the tough-on-crime legislation introduced under the previous Conservative government and given that the violence we are seeing on Calgary streets is looking like the all-too-real violence in the Lower Mainland of British Columbia, what steps will our government take to combat that rise in crime in our community?

The Speaker: The Minister of Justice is rising.

Mr. Schweitzer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our platform outlined a detailed plan for us to combat crime here in this province, including funding for ALERT, and part of that funding for ALERT is going to go towards combatting gang activity. We're also going to be making sure that we provide funding to drug treatment courts to deal with addictions and many of the root causes of crime here in our province. I also want to flag as well that the ALERT team had a big drug bust this last week in Grande Prairie. There were seven arrests. They seized cocaine, fentanyl, drugs, and body armour.

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-Falconridge.

Mr. Toor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that children are worried about their safety in schools, hundreds of people rallied in northeast Calgary just the other weekend to protest the dangers of drugs making their way onto streets and into schools and given that our United Conservative platform promised to address issues related to organized crime and illegal drugs, can the minister tell this House what our government is doing to make the streets safer?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, unlike previous governments, we're going to be making sure that our law enforcement officials have the resources that they need to get the job done. We're going to be making sure that we hire 50 new prosecutors across Alberta to make sure that we can deal with the backlogs that often happen in our courts. We're going to be making sure that ALERT has the funding it needs to deal with these gangs. I do look forward this week, again, to meeting with the community organizations and start talking to them about a path forward.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Education Funding

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and a special thank you to the Finance minister, who yesterday pledged to fully funding enrolment growth for Alberta students. It took weeks of questioning by this opposition and, of course, terrible stories coming into the public about the lack of funding that the government had brought forward. Again, thank you for your announcement yesterday, Finance minister.

I want to give the Finance minister a chance to do good again today. Will he pledge to feeding the 33,000 students who rely on a school nutrition program and make sure that it's a priority in his upcoming budget? To the Minister of Finance.

The Speaker: The Minister of Education is rising.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. We understand, value, and very much appreciate this program. As we saw with enrolment growth funding, the NDP is using speculation and scare tactics to create undue stress in our education system.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm pretty sure it was the fact that the government failed to actually commit to funding.

Given that it was the fact that the government failed to commit to funding that led to 220 fewer teachers in the Calgary board of education, not this Official Opposition asking the government if they'd fund it, I think that that is completely off the mark, so to the Education minister: will you ensure that you personally talk to every single school board to see that any damage done by the minister's inaction and any job losses will be reversed; make sure that those teachers get hired back, who were let go because of the government's inaction for weeks to give . . .

The Speaker: Hon. member, I appreciate your efforts to make adjustments, but I think we could all agree that a preamble was used.

The hon. Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. I've always been available. My office doors are open. I'm speaking to all the stakeholder groups and will be continuing to do so. We've been very clear from the beginning that we are committed to funding education. It is a priority. We will continue to build schools. School boards are in the best position to make their own budgets, so they have that responsibility.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you. Given that just last week the Education minister at the eleventh hour cancelled a meeting with the Edmonton public school board, the second-largest school board in this province, and when they asked to reschedule that meeting, they were given a date far into the future, Mr. Speaker, will the minister demonstrate her open door policy, call the board today, and make sure that they book that meeting as soon as possible so that more teachers don't get laid off while this government dithers?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education is rising.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. I would have to turn that back over to the opposition. I had to cancel because of the filibustering that took place, and I had to reschedule. My next available time I did give to them. They are a large school division. I value their input. Unfortunately, I didn't have a block of time sufficient to give to them except further down the road. So it's on you. [interjections]

The Speaker: Members of the Official Opposition, I think I'm fairly lenient with when and how we heckle. I just might prefer you to do so when I am not on my feet.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Minimum Wage for Youth

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. This government's own caucus is doing its job to point out to the minister of labour just how damaging the attack on youth wages really is. Yesterday the Member for Calgary-Cross rightfully pointed out that youth will earn "significantly less." He went on to say that students work hard for their money, that students are saving for school or to put food on the table. I agree. To the minister of labour: if you won't listen to me, will you listen to your own caucus and stop the attack on youth wages?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member opposite for the question. As stated before, the student job-creation wage is about creating jobs for Alberta's youth. We made this as a commitment in our platform, and I know that our entire caucus supports this to get Alberta youth back to work. We are not afraid of the tough questions on this issue from any members in this House so that we can actually point out the concerns and misinformation that are out there and issues that are raised by constituents. This is about creating jobs for youth, and that is what we'll do.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Ms Gray: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the Member for Calgary-Cross also said that the impact of the attack on youth wages would be felt especially hard in "lower income areas" and given that this government has moved to cut people's pay before offering anything new in the way of social supports or housing supports, to the same minister: how can you be sure that paying Alberta's young workers less than the minimum wage won't leave some of them unable to afford the basics?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, this is about creating opportunities for our youth. The previous government raised the minimum wage to $15, nearly 50 per cent, in the face of one of the worst economic downturns in Alberta history, and this left thousands of youth without the opportunity for any work. We need to fix this. We are in a youth job crisis. This needed to be addressed so that youth can get on the job-creation wage, start earning, and contribute, whether it be to their families or for their education.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Ms Gray: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the minister revealed yesterday that the Calgary Stampede has chosen not to utilize the UCP's age-based wage discrimination and given that the minister said that government reached out to the Stampede after media reported that they may be retroactively cutting youth wages, to the minister: do you intend to call every business considering to cut youth pay? Will you counsel each of them to keep it at $15 per hour? Minister, do you not see that it is mind-boggling that you're celebrating that the Stampede is refusing to pay your new discriminatory wage?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Copping: Thank you. As the member opposite knows, the minimum wage is just that, a minimum. Employers may choose to pay higher than that, and in fact the Calgary Stampede chose to do that. The reason why I raised that point yesterday is to be able to demonstrate that a minimum is just a minimum. This is about addressing the issue created by the previous government, which eliminated tremendous amounts of opportunity for our youth in Alberta. This is about creating an environment where businesses can create jobs for Alberta youth. Mr. Speaker, $13 an hour is better than zero dollars per hour.

Rocky View School Division Concerns

Mrs. Pitt: Mr. Speaker, it is no secret that Airdrie is booming. It has been one of the fastest growing cities for quite some time. Last week CBC news reported that classrooms across the Rocky View school division, which covers my constituency of Airdrie-East, are amongst the most crowded in all of Alberta. Minister, can you please tell my constituents where the Rocky View school division lies on your ministry's priority list?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education is rising.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the hon. member for the question. I do realize the pressures that that area is under. Just for your awareness, for schools to be considered for modernization funding, school districts must submit a proposal to the government outlining their request. Once received, my department analyzes the request and prioritizes applications as a result of a series of metrics. More details on specific funding allocations will be released when we table the budget this fall.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Airdrie-East.

Mrs. Pitt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that, again, that's the most attention that the Airdrie school district has seen in the last four years while the class sizes are bursting at the seams and given that the United Conservative Party's campaign promise was to build new schools, Minister, can you please tell the parents and students in my constituency how this government will address the class size, overcrowding problem in Airdrie?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. Our platform committed to an audit of the class sizes. My department is already undertaking that good work. Our government is committed to strengthening education by working with our students, our parents, our teachers, our principals, our trustees, and other education stakeholders. As Minister of Education I am focused on strengthening our education system and delivering on our platform commitments, which schools are a part of.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The Member for Airdrie-East for the second supplemental.

Mrs. Pitt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister for those responses. Given that 76 per cent of the schools in the Rocky View school division have already surpassed a provincially set target for a desired class size and given that the school board is constantly shuffling grades around various schools trying to do their best to address our growth issues, Minister, my constituents want to know when new schools will be built in the Rocky View school division.

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you for the question, and to the hon. member, thank you. We were elected with a mandate to continue to build schools. I am looking forward to receiving updates on capital project proposals and working with my colleague the Minister of Infrastructure – in fact, we actually met earlier today – to ensure that we can modernize and build new schools across this province.

Thank you so much.

The Speaker: The Member for Edmonton-McClung is rising.

Support for Agriculture in Wildfire-affected Areas

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The last month has been a stressful one for residents of northern Alberta, particularly those who have had to leave their homes and those who have lost their homes. Farmers in northern Alberta produce 21 per cent of our crops as well as 10 per cent of our provincial livestock and are vital to our provincial well-being. Wildfires affect their growing season and threaten their livelihoods. To the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry: how many farms have been evacuated as a result of wildfires this year, and what supports, particularly, are available to them?

The Speaker: The Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Dreeshen: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and I thank the member for that very important question. This government is committed to helping the farmers that are affected in that area, that have been evacuated, and where the crop damage has occurred. As with the evacuees, that is something that this government is going to take very seriously.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I hope to hear more details on that in subsequent answers by the minister.

Mr. Speaker, our government understood the need to take action on climate change to support and protect all Albertans given that scientific evidence indicates wildfires are made more likely and extreme due to climate change and given that so far this year an area almost five times larger than the average five-year burn has burned, contrary to the Premier's assertion that the current situation is, quote, unquote, average, and given that we know that smoke in the air decreases the growing season, as occurred in 2018, to the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry once again: do you have any plans to provide actual support for farmers?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Dreeshen: Thank you again, Mr. Speaker. I'd be happy to go into more details on the BRM programs, business risk management programs, crop insurance that farmers have. That assessment has to be done at the end of the growing season, and it is something that we will work with the farmers on through this difficult growing season in northern Alberta.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you. I look forward to hearing those details.

Mr. Speaker, given that bees are vital to all areas of agriculture and given that northern Alberta produces some of the best honey in the world and given that honey is a vital component of food production in Alberta, including honey wineries and meateries – there was a lot of buzz around that in the province – and given that smokey skies cause bees to forage less, reducing production volumes, and given that we are being told that poor air quality due to wildfires and climate change could be the new normal, to the same minister: what plans does your ministry and government have to protect and support beekeepers?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Dreesen: Thank you again, Mr. Speaker. Again, for bee producers, any type of farmer here in Alberta we have a great BRM suite of programs that they can apply for, whether it's crop insurance, whether it's livestock insurance, whether it's beekeepers' insurance. We work with all farmers to make sure that they can be as sustainable as possible and also compete on the global stage.

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

2017 UCP Leadership Campaign Investigations

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday when I asked the Minister of Justice if his government would support the Election Commissioner's ongoing investigation into irregular financial contributions that emerged as a result of the UCP's kamikaze scandal, the minister accused me of "relitigating" the past. But there were new finds in this matter as recently as Friday, with the possibility of more. I'll give the minister a second chance. Were you really suggesting that because you won the election, any transgression by the Premier or his inner circle no longer matters?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, I reject the premise of this question. I would gladly answer questions about government business. We're not here to relitigate the campaign in the past. If we want to go through the campaign in the past – jobs, economy, pipelines – 55 per cent of Albertans, a million voters, voted for the agenda that this party put forward in the most detailed platform in Alberta history. We're not going to get distracted by allegations. We're going to be focused on jobs of the future.

Ms Ganley: That sounds dangerously close to being above the law. Given that yesterday I asked if the government would commit to not interfere with an ongoing investigation – practically, Mr. Speaker, a puffball – and given that the minister called the question "fear and smear" and not important to the people of Alberta and given that the Conservatives in 2008 got rid of the very same Election Commissioner for standing up for democracy, Minister, will you clear up the confusion you caused yesterday and vouch for the independence of the commissioner and confirm that you won't stand in his way?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, the Election Commissioner is free to investigate as he sees fit. Again, we're not going to be distracted by issues of past campaigns. We're focused on jobs of the future. We're focused on making sure that we do what Albertans sent us here to do, which is to implement the most detailed platform in Alberta history. We have the most detailed platform, over 300 commitments that we made. We're in the process right now of implementing that platform. Promises made; promises kept.

Ms Ganley: Given, Mr. Speaker, that Friday was almost two months after the election campaign and given that this government's own throne speech referenced democratic reform legislation in 2020 and given that it would be highly inappropriate to change any election financing law during an active investigation into contributions in the leadership race that the Premier was a part of and since that same campaign is also the subject of an RCMP investigation into voter fraud, can the minister commit that this government will not attempt to change the very legislation these investigations are relying on or replace those involved until the investigation . . .

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, I rise again just to mention the fact that the Election Commissioner is free to investigate as he sees fit.

We're here, again, focused on the priorities of Albertans, Mr. Speaker. We're going to make sure that we focus on jobs, the economy, pipelines, and getting Albertans back to work. We have a jobs crisis right now in Alberta. That's our focus. Also, the opposition was not funding law enforcement priorities. We're going to make sure that our front-line law enforcement officials have the resources that they need. We're not focused on light bulbs and shower heads; we're focused on jobs.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat.

Choice in Education

Ms Glasgo: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Alberta's legacy of school choice has long been seen as a model. Other governments have come to Alberta in order to study our system and learn how to apply it in other jurisdictions. Under the previous government, school choice came under attack. Whether it was the suppression of charter, private, independent, or even home-school programs, the previous NDP government took actions that harmed children in these programs and made life more difficult for teachers and loving parents. Will the Minister of Education commit to supporting school choice in Alberta today?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member. Alberta has a long and proud, successful tradition of supporting school choice, and our government is committed to preserving and protecting educational choice. Our government is committed to introducing the choice in education act – I'm looking forward to bringing it forward in the fall – which will affirm that parents have primary responsibility for education of their children.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat.

Ms Glasgo: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister. Given that charter schools increase options and opportunities for specialization and given that both Alberta's cap on charter schools and its enrolment cap have reduced these opportunities, will the Minister of Education commit to supporting Alberta's charter schools through expanding the rights of such schools and removing the cap on the number of charter schools it allows in the province of Alberta?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. Charter schools play an important role in Alberta's educational system by offering more choice to students and their parents. Once it is brought into force, the Education Act will lift the cap on the number of charter schools allowed in this province. Under our government, charter schools will continue to play a key role in our education system.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat.

Ms Glasgo: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister. Given that the United Nations has stated that “parents have a prior right to choose the kind of education that shall be given to their children” and given that independent schools in Alberta save the public education system $168 million annually and given that Newell Christian School in my riding of Brooks-Medicine Hat adds immense value by preparing students spiritually, academically, socially, and physically, will this government commit to protecting both the status and the funding of independent schools in Alberta?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and the hon. member for the question. Our platform was very clear. We will protect the status and funding of independent schools. More information on funding will be available in the near future.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, in approximately 30 seconds we will move to points of order. Please, if you are leaving the Chamber for other commitments, do so in an expedient manner.

Hon. members, the Official Opposition House Leader is rising on a point of order that was called at 1:59 and I believe again at 2:01.

Point of Order Factual Accuracy

Mr. Bilous: Yes. Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. If it pleases you and the House, I’m happy to combine the two points of order because they deal with the same subject. Shall I continue?

The Speaker: I would love that.

Mr. Bilous: Although I’m happy to speak twice as long, twice as often.

I’m rising on 23(h), (i), (j), Mr. Speaker. This is in regard to comments that the Government House Leader made regarding their legislation bringing in the strongest protections for kids regarding GSAs. If you’ll indulge me, I want to point to a couple of different examples of legislation that exists in other provinces that prove that the House leader’s comments are false, that there are stronger protections in other jurisdictions.

Really, the crux of my point in getting up with this point of order, Mr. Speaker, is that this isn’t a matter of opinion. It’s here in black and white. Their government has, through Bill 8, their policy on GSAs, and we’re comparing it to other parts of the country because the Government House Leader stood up and said: no, that’s false; ours is the strongest. Quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, I think that if members are allowed to speak inaccurately in this House when facts are in front of us in black and white, in printing, then it detracts from the very purpose of this place. Quite frankly, you know, then at any point anyone can say anything and it doesn’t matter; facts are completely irrelevant in this place.

I will point out a couple of things, Mr. Speaker. First of all, New Brunswick’s policy regarding GSAs: their policy E-9 is antihomophobia and antiheterosexism policy.

School District 10 is an inclusive anti-homophobia and anti-heterosexism organization.

In order that all members of the school committee learn and work together in an atmosphere of respect and safety, free from homophobia, transphobia, anti-gay harassment and/or heterosexism, District 10 recognizes its obligation to adopt appropriate administrative procedures and strategies, which shall ensure respect for human rights, support diversity, address discrimination, and create a learning environment . . .

District 10 recognizes that LGBTQ students, staff, and same-gender-parented families have the right to:

- self-identification and freedom of expression;
- be treated fairly, equitably and with dignity;
- inclusion, representation and affirmation;
- freedom from harassment, discrimination and violence; and,
- avenues of recourse . . . when they are victims of harassment.

Now, procedure 1, Mr. Speaker:

All employees of School District 10:

- have a responsibility to eliminate homophobia and heterosexism in the working and learning environment.

The Speaker: Hon. member, I recognize the point that you are making. It does come in the form of what sounds to me to be debate about dispute of the facts. You did ask for me to indulge you, so I will be happy to do that for a little bit longer, but if we’re going to go through every jurisdiction, I’m not sure that is the primary point of points of order. So please feel free to proceed but know that that is the direction that we’re heading.

Mr. Bilous: Mr. Speaker, the point of this is that it is in black and white. This isn’t a matter of debate or a difference of opinion. Bill 8 is in black and white, of what the government is proposing, which is not the strongest legislation protecting the LGBTQ community or GSAs.

There is a very simple difference even between Ontario and Alberta in that in Ontario there is a section that prohibits boards and principals from refusing to use the name of gay-straight alliance or a similar name for certain organizations.

In the current legislation, Mr. Speaker, there is no timeline, which means that principals can defer a decision forever. That doesn’t make their legislation stronger. For me, the concern here is that we have it in black and white: the current legislation brought in by the previous government versus what this government is proposing. Members opposite cannot continue to stand up in this House to say, “ours is the strongest” when it is factually incorrect. That is the crux of this point of order, that it’s not a difference of opinion. It’s that facts are not debated. It’s not opinion; it is fact printed in legislation.

The Speaker: Thank you for your interjections.

The hon. Government House Leader is rising to provide some comments.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, clearly the hon. Opposition House Leader is attempting to debate legislation. There will be an opportunity to debate Bill 8, which I think is the bill that’s before the House, that he is referring to, later today in fact. I would be interested in hearing his comments then.

There was also an opportunity to debate Bill 10, which was the bill that I primarily referred to during question period. I don’t think it’s appropriate to use points of order to try to redebate bills that have already passed this Chamber or to debate bills that are coming up at a later point. I will be very quick, Mr. Speaker, because the Opposition House Leader basically attempted to make several members’ statements during his point of order.

To be very, very clear, our point is this: we continue to support Bill 10, which was passed by both the legacy parties that make up the United Conservative Party and the now government of Alberta. It was supported by the NDP members opposite at the time. We will continue to do that: to protect kids, to make sure that bullying is not taking place inside our schools, and to recognize the importance of gay-straight alliances. That will remain. We believe that we have the strongest protection in the country and amongst other provinces. If we have some debate later on this legislation, we could have that conversation.

But, clearly, Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of debate, and the Opposition House Leader should not be using his points of order to try to bring forward debate on outstanding legislation.

The Speaker: Thank you.

Well, I might just suggest that this is very clearly a case in which this is a dispute of the facts. If the Speaker was put in a position where he had to rule or she had to rule every time one particular set of people inside the Chamber believed one set of facts and another group inside the Chamber believed another set of facts and the Speaker was put in a position to determine what set of facts is, in fact, correct, we would be perpetually asking the Speaker to determine who is saying what is right, is correct, and/or not.

I might just point to a tabling that the hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning tabled yesterday that I would suggest could create robust debate around the facts that she had used for evidence to strengthen a point of debate. This is exactly what we have, which is a point of debate. I might remind all members of the Assembly to refer to House of Commons Procedure and Practice, page 639, when it reminds members to not “engage in debate . . . under the guise of a point of order.”

I see the Official Opposition House Leader is rising on a point of order.

Point of Clarification

Mr. Bilous: Standing Order 13(2). I endeavour to ask if, then, the standing orders are just a matter of discussion as opposed to guidelines for this place, sir.

The Speaker: I would suggest there is a very wide range of facts that members will bring to the Assembly, one that I just pointed out to the hon. members. I would suggest that members of the Official Opposition believe one thing to be true, say, about a railcars contract, and the members of the government believe another thing to be true. This is very clearly a dispute of the facts, and while the Leader of the Official Opposition might not agree with my ruling, it is the ruling that's been made. We are carrying on. This concludes this point of order.

Orders of the Day

Consideration of Her Honour the Lieutenant Governor's Speech

Ms Glasgo moved, seconded by Ms Rosin, that an humble address be presented to Her Honour the Honourable the Lieutenant Governor as follows.

To Her Honour the Honourable Lois Mitchell, CM, AOE, LLD, the Lieutenant Governor of the province of Alberta:

We, Her Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Legislative Assembly, now assembled, beg leave to thank Your Honour for the gracious speech Your Honour has been pleased to address to us at the opening of the present session.

[Adjourned debate June 10: Mr. Milliken]

The Speaker: Are there those wishing to speak? The Leader of the Official Opposition.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's a great opportunity for me to rise and to respond on behalf of Alberta's NDP Official Opposition to the throne speech and take this opportunity as well to address some of the matters that we've just, in fact, been speaking about here, the whole issue of sort of truth in the post-truth world and all that kind of stuff, but we'll get to that. I'm very proud to rise.

I want to first recognize, Mr. Speaker, that we are gathered here today on the traditional territory of Treaty 6, and I want to acknowledge the Métis people of Alberta, who share a very deep connection with this land. Land acknowledgements are an act of reconciliation. The act of making a statement to recognize the traditional territory of the indigenous people who called this land home long before the arrival of settlers is an important first step in the path to reconciliation. The Truth and Reconciliation Commission has been very clear about this. So when we learned that this new government no longer sees land acknowledgements as a necessary component of public addresses by government representatives, I was surprised and disappointed, and I wasn't alone in that reaction. Indeed, First Nations leaders like Treaty 6 Grand Chief Dr. Wilton Littlechild are disheartened by this government's refusal to acknowledge treaties between First Nations and the Crown at public events and functions.

The process of reconciliation must be taken seriously by all levels of government, not just when it's convenient, and before we can even begin to have conversations about reconciliation, we need to at the very least acknowledge the histories of our two people and the treaties that define those relationships. This decision is unnecessary, this decision by the government, and it takes the good-faith steps that we've been making towards renewing our relationship with First Nations and Métis people in Alberta backwards. In light of the recently released final report of the Inquiry into Missing and Murdered Indigenous Women and Girls, an inquiry that the now Premier was not in support of having occur, the fact is that the need to take positive steps on the path to reconciliation is especially crucial. Now is not the time to lose ground on reconciliation. We must continue to move forward. Now, I feel very strongly about this, Mr. Speaker.

Also, let me be clear that I believe that the government's current response to people who raise this issue is also very disrespectful. They argue that their plan to create an indigenous opportunities corporation is all that needs to be done to show reconciliation. This is desperately wrong. While we do not take any issue with the idea of the new corporation – indeed, it is a new take on a series of initiatives that we were already considering and putting into play – it is not in and of itself the answer to reconciliation.

This corporation will facilitate money lending to indigenous groups who are participating in economic endeavours of which this government approves, and there is nothing wrong with that, but it denies the fact that a nation-to-nation relationship obviously allows that some First Nations may want to pursue different avenues for community and economic and social development. That is their right. But to suggest their primary mechanism of pursuing a productive nation-to-nation relationship or meaningful recognition of the need to pursue reconciliation or to enact the principles of the United Nations declaration on the rights of indigenous peoples is just one more example of disrespect. Mr. Speaker, we must do better than just that. It is not simply a matter of saying: we're lending a few groups that agree with us money; therefore, our obligation to pursue reconciliation has now been fulfilled. It has not, and I hope that this government will reconsider this issue because they are in the wrong place right now on this matter.

Now, before I go further, I would be remiss if I didn't, as one typically does in these throne speech responses, offer another round of thanks to the constituents of Edmonton-Strathcona. You've put your faith in me for the last 11 years and have asked me to serve for another four. This is not an honour I take for granted, and I thank you. It is my great privilege, though, today to not only offer this response as the Member for Edmonton-Strathcona but also in my new role as Leader of Her Majesty's Official Opposition.

The members opposite have already taken to suggesting that the fact that we were not returned to that side of the House is somehow an indication that I and my opposition colleagues are somehow at odds with Albertans should we offer up a critical analysis of the government's agenda or ultimate record or do anything to hold them accountable. Now, acceptance of this argument would include, of course, acceptance of the notion that our parliamentary system, the role of the opposition, and the very act of rigorous debate had been rejected by Albertans in the last election. This, of course, is ridiculous, Mr. Speaker. I would counsel members of the government to govern with humility and to remember that their mandate remains intact by respecting this Legislature, the democratic system upon which it rests, and, ultimately, the right of Albertans to be heard and accommodated through the next term of this Assembly.

It's with this mandate in mind that I rise to identify the common ground we share with members of this government while at the same time noting the areas where we believe that mistakes are being made and that the best interests of Albertans are being jeopardized.

Allow me to begin with the areas of agreement between our opposition caucus and the government caucus. There's absolutely no doubt that job creation and the economy were top of mind for Albertans in the last election and continue to be top of mind going forward. I think there is a great deal of agreement between our caucus and the government caucus on the urgent need to ensure that Albertans have more jobs, not fewer jobs. We all understand the stress and the anxiety that people experience when out of work, worrying about how to pay the bills, plan for the future, and support their family.

We all understand that with a historic drop in the price of oil confounded more recently by the inability of our oil and gas producers to get their product to market, Alberta's economy has been hit hard, and if it wasn't obvious before, the linkage between investment in the oil and gas sector and investment into many other sectors of the economy came into stark relief as jobs throughout the economy were negatively impacted. So it is true that we are all very seized with the need to create jobs. Now, let me go a bit further and say that we on this side of the House are also seized with the need to preserve jobs. Layoffs, say in the public sector, are not a means to creating jobs in the private sector.

I will admit that while we on this side of the House put a great deal of thought and planning into our strategy to create jobs, we were not as successful as we could have been in sharing either our record of job creation or a plan going forward with Albertans. As leader the responsibility for that shortcoming, of course, lies with me, but I do not believe that that should be allowed to undermine the merit of our plans going forward. Indeed, I believe they should be seriously considered by this House.

We had proposed more jobs, actually, than the current government has with their massive $4.5 billion tax cut for wealthy corporations. Our plan centred around putting some more support behind petrochemical diversification. This was a tried-and-true strategy. Indeed, our initial $1 billion investment earlier in the term had drawn in $13 billion in private capital investment and already created 10,000 new jobs. This is to be contrasted with the plan of the current government, which involves a $4.5 billion tax cut in return for a $12 billion bump in economic activity, this according to their own numbers.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Frankly, this is a starkly unimpressive performance rate, and it should be contrasted with our plan moving forward: $7 billion in energy value-added investments that was estimated to attract roughly $70 billion – $70 billion – in incremental private-sector investment over 10 years along with 70,000 jobs. Now, these estimates did not even take into account the additional economic activity that would arise from secondary investment coming from the production of new feedstock materials in the petrochemical sector. Now, we don't really know where this government stands on that program or any other efforts to diversify and get us off the boom-and-bust roller coaster. Not yet. We do know that they're moving backwards on carbon pricing and, in so doing, jeopardizing thousands of current jobs and walking away from the technological innovation and diversification work that was paired with that pricing. We know their corporate tax cut will blow a big hole in our fiscal foundation, and it's very risky.

For one, this government's own platform projects it won't generate a single dollar of economic return for at least two years. Frankly, other experts suggest that even that projection is overly optimistic. But let's go with that one: at least two years, Madam Speaker. With the loss of 19,000 full-time jobs in May alone, I would argue that Albertans want and need action now, and what we have is a plan to theoretically, under a best-case scenario, assuming the one economist out of the 10 economists is correct, create jobs beginning in 2021. I say "theoretically" because, as I've said before, it hasn't worked elsewhere.

Let's first look at the state of Kansas, where this experiment was supposed to deliver a shot of adrenaline into the heart of the Kansas economy. When it was all said and done, the Washington Post instead described it as "a shot of poison." Now, the Governor of Kansas had promised that eliminating corporate taxes for nearly 200,000 businesses would create 23,000 jobs, and he put his plan into action in 2013. The total hit to the state treasury was actually much less than the $4.5 billion that we have projected getting lost by Alberta's treasury. Nonetheless, it was a big cut. More importantly, it didn't work. Now the so-called Kansas experiment is ridiculed, and it sends shivers down the spines of job creators throughout the U.S. Job growth during the time of zero corporate taxes was slower than the national average, and the state debt load doubled. The greatest damage was felt – guess what? – in schools. Sounds familiar, doesn't it?

It got so bad that the Kansas Supreme Court ruled that one-quarter of students in the state were receiving such a poor education as a result of the budget cuts that it violated the state constitution. That's right. Students were being taught in illegal conditions to finance a corporate tax cut which did not create jobs or economic growth. Now, I'm not saying that we're in quite those circumstances yet, but this Premier's own Alberta experiment has only just begun.

Now, after weeks of the Member for Edmonton-Glenora grilling them and pointing out countless examples of how not funding enrolment would harm our schools, this government caved. Credit to them for doing that, I suppose. There are 15,000 new students coming this fall, and they deserve an incremental bump in teachers and classroom space for their learning.

But that's just the start, Madam Speaker. We know that more support is needed, especially for areas where students may be struggling, like reading and writing and numeracy. That was the intent behind our introduction of the classroom improvement fund, that and supporting special-needs students. The fund was due to add another 400 teachers to our schools this fall on top of the 600 we would see added to address enrolment.

There's more. We know that students can't learn on an empty stomach. That should be an obvious thing, but given how long it took for us to get this program in place, apparently it wasn't quite as obvious as we thought. Nonetheless, we knew it. That's why we introduced a school nutrition pilot program. Our intent was to rapidly expand it. We were getting such good results. Our $15.5 million investment each year was feeding 33,000 students every single school day. As the Member for Lethbridge-West has told me, some schools had actually taken it upon themselves to send food home with students on the weekend, too.

Prior to the election call we were close to finalizing a report on just how positive of an impact this program had. I would implore the government to release that report very soon, before coming to any conclusions as a result of their blue-ribbon panel. The initial feedback that we heard was very positive, Madam Speaker. Students participating in the pilot were better focused in class, their attitudes were better, and their academic results were trending in a positive direction. This was a relatively small investment when you consider the extent of the positive benefits. Schools were also teaching kids about food preparation, sanitization, how to share. A lot of good came from something so very simple.

So far we've heard nothing from this government on whether they will fund the classroom improvement fund that I just described or the nutrition pilot project. Let us be clear that enrolment funding is not the Holy Grail. It is simply the very beginning of the starting line. Even with funding enrolment, which I truly believe this government had no intention of doing prior to pressure from both this opposition and parents and school boards, I now worry where else this government will look to deepen the cuts they plan.

I fear, for example, that those who are sick or in need of care will also suffer or perhaps suffer more. We've already seen warnings from front-line paramedics that as many as five ambulances are being kept off Calgary streets at any given time. This leads to code reds, Madam Speaker, which means there's not a single available ambulance to respond to an emergency. This is dangerous and disturbing. This government hasn't even introduced a budget yet. That leads me to think that this is just the tip of the iceberg at best.

Again, we have seen this elsewhere. Now, in Kansas after four years of failure both the Kansas state House and the state Senate voted to end these ridiculous cuts. The experiment came to an end, but boy had a lot of damage been done over the time it took for them to learn their lesson. We have a chance to stop this experiment basically before it starts, before the damage is done in our schools and our hospitals.

Now, I'm sure the government will say that it's not apples to apples and that I'm simply cherry-picking the worst examples of where these types of tax cuts have failed. But, frankly, U.S. President Donald Trump has attempted similar changes since the Kansas experiment and hasn't really had much better in the way of results. Telecom giant AT&T promised his administration that it would hire 7,000 new employees if its corporate taxes were cut by $1 billion. The Trump government obliged. What did they get in return? AT&T cut 23,000 jobs.

I could go on and on about where these cuts have failed south of the border, but here in Canada tax giveaways to wealthy corporations haven't actually fared much better. The Premier's own cabinet buddies tried something similar. He has seen first-hand what happens. The Harper government pledged to cut corporate taxes by 7 per cent over four years to create jobs and spur economic renewal. It didn't work. Instead, corporations stockpiled the savings they had realized. Former Bank of Canada governor Mark Carney came to call these funds "dead money," dead as in not generating any economic activity, Madam Speaker. They totalled more than $500 billion at one point.

I guess time will tell what happens here in Alberta, Madam Speaker, but past precedent tells us that this Premier is pulling our economic future and the academic future of our children in a very risky spot. I've yet to see him stand in this House with evidence to prove that any of this will work other than the report of one single economist. This government has resisted calls by members of our opposition to slow down the corporate tax reduction. I believe the member for Edmonton-City Centre proposed dropping the rate at least to 10 per cent first, rather than going straight to 8. He argued: let's give it time to assess the impact and determine whether it's really creating jobs. But the members opposite voted against that very prudent suggestion.

I guess that's really it. The experiment is a go, and the budget hole it generates is larger than any we've seen in any other jurisdiction. We are talking about blowing a $4.5 billion hole in the budget over four years.

What's more is that this government also served notice yesterday that it really is continuing on its plan to cancel the oil-by-rail contracts. Now, the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar brought a motion forward yesterday looking for support for the contracts from both sides of the aisle. It was voted down by the government caucus. These contracts stand to generate $2 billion in net profit for the Alberta Treasury. And just let me be clear. By net I mean that it will cost $3.7 billion and would generate roughly $5.7 billion. Now this should seem obvious, but judging from comments made by members opposite during the motion and the debate of that motion yesterday, it appears that the need to explain "net" cannot actually be overstated, Madam Speaker. Hopefully, people get that now.

Regardless, we are now hearing that the Premier will legislate his way out of these contracts if he has to, and he's doing this as we learn that line 3 is facing further delays, and the Premier said last week that he's likely to extend curtailment into 2020. Now, I'm not saying that our government would necessarily have been able to end curtailment given the current line 3 situation, but what we do know is that a way to reduce the intensity and the volume of curtailment is to move our product by rail. With no pipeline to tidewater, delays to line 3 and KXL, and a backlog of demands on rail cars, we were in a difficult position, and that's why we signed the contracts. We did what was necessary.

Meanwhile, members opposite are so focused on running on an ideological platform that they repeat their platitudes and their talking points endlessly. The private sector will do it; the private sector will do it. A significant portion of the private sector that was moving oil by rail leading up to last fall was that portion of the private sector that enjoyed the benefit of buying the oil for $8 a barrel and selling it down to their sister companies in the southern U.S. at $40 or $50. Yes, those folks were using rail, and in the process Albertans were getting taken to the cleaners. The rest of the private sector was not using rail to the degree that they needed, and small producers were being pushed right out of the market. As a result, we were getting a situation where distressed barrels were being sold for $8 or less a barrel, thereby increasing the profit of certain groups and undermining overall the return to Albertans by unestimatable amounts of money. That's how it worked when we left it to the private sector. Albertans lost and most oil and gas companies lost. That's what the members opposite seem committed to returning to, and that was the situation that we were trying to avoid.

What's more is that while this Premier ran on a platform of jobs, economy, and pipelines, he seems to be ignoring the first two, jobs and the economy, and waiting on the third, with no end in sight. We'll see. Now he's looking for people to blame. As our Finance critic said yesterday, his path to balance is really "a path to baloney." Relying on who our Finance critic quite rightly referred to as the Premier's "favourite stenographer," the Premier is actually out there saying things which are not correct, in particular suggesting that there's some sort of conspiracy between our government and the public service to cook the Alberta Treasury books. This is insulting, Madam Speaker. It's insulting to the integrity of the officials who worked on the budget, many of whom now advise the Premier. It's insulting to the budgeting process, which is heavily scrutinized and audited. Indeed, the Conference Board of Canada, you know, that left-leaning ideological apologist organization for New Democrats, gave our government top marks in the country for the transparency and the accountability of our financial reporting, and this was due in large part to the public officials this Premier is now preparing to discredit as he begins yet another campaign of truthiness to the people of Alberta.

It's so clearly obvious that what this Premier is actually trying to do is find a scapegoat for the $6.5 billion hole he plans to blow into the Alberta budget. He won't balance the budget one year earlier than us, in 2022. In fact, with what he's currently trial ballooning, he may not even balance it in this term. Promise made; promise broken. But I guess we're not supposed to worry about all this because we have a new $30 million war room, Madam Speaker.

Now, to be clear, in some ways this is simply a continuation of the work that our government had already done and was already doing. We'd established a Market Access Task Force that consisted of key leaders from within the energy sector. We had set aside significant funds to advertise across the country to build nationwide public support for the need to build a pipeline to tidewater. These are things that we were doing, and our work had been paying off. The level of support for the pipeline had grown from about 4 in 10 to 6 in 10 across the country, and this was important. We did this by arguing the economics, by talking about how this created jobs not just in Alberta but across the country. We talked to Canadians about how much this meant for their economic security.

We also spoke to those who worried about the environment. We talked to them about how our climate leadership plan delinked pipeline construction from the issue of greenhouse gas emissions coming from the oil sands. What we didn't do was spend that money picking fights with Canadians, polarizing people on the issue, and dialing up the intensity of opposition to Alberta's and Canada's dire need for a pipeline to tidewater. That is to be contrasted with the Premier's current plan for his so-called war room. As a start, this appears to be the Premier's way of pitting the economy and the environment against one another once again.

Now, I will say that I don't agree with some of these folks that the Premier will be targeting either. I really don't. I'm not convinced, however, that suing Tzepporah Berman does a thing to help Albertans. Instead, it does do a lot to make lawyers richer, much richer, even though there's no evidence that we will be remotely successful in these costly court cases. What we will do, however, is backstop the Premier's desire to play divisive politics on the national stage, politics that are more focused on his partisan federal aspirations than the economic goals of Albertans. Ultimately, we should be focused on generating jobs for Albertans, full stop. The way to do that is to embrace both our energy sector and our environmental responsibilities, get pipelines built while also delivering on a real plan to combat climate change.

This Premier doesn't do that. He merely states that other countries pump more emissions into the air in some misguided way to offload our responsibility to those across the world. That's not leadership, Madam Speaker. Leadership is building consensus across every province and demonstrating that Alberta really is a responsible energy producer that is doing its part to combat climate change. As I said, when we were doing this work, we had grown support in Canada for the Trans Mountain pipeline significantly. We pushed the federal government for the first approval of Trans Mountain. We successfully demonstrated the limited ability of the B.C. government to interfere. We pushed the federal government to buy the pipeline when investor uncertainty threatened the future of the project.

If the Trans Mountain pipeline is approved by the federal government later this month, it will not be because of a war room that aims to strike down as some type of enemy to the state every single person who raises environmental concerns. On the contrary, if that pipeline is approved, it will be because of the work our government, many public service officials, and some allies in the energy sector did to build consensus across this country. Our strategy and the resulting success will prove that while the Premier currently is good at grabbing a microphone and yelling from the back of a truck, he may actually not know what's best for Alberta.

But I do fear, Mr. Speaker, that this Premier is so blinded by his ideology and his desire to make political hay that he's willing to openly ignore evidence that counters the positions he's taken, which takes me to Bill 1, the government's heavily touted plan to end the carbon tax. Now, obviously I have to acknowledge the success with which the Premier and his friends have created high levels of opposition to carbon pricing in Alberta and in some other parts of the country. As someone who respects the democratic system in which we operate, as much as I hope the people of Alberta will one day reconsider this issue, one cannot deny that carbon pricing was an issue in the election on which Albertans delivered to the Premier a mandate. That is true. However, I still do not believe that they gave the government a mandate to do nothing on climate change.

Now, I've spoken at length recently in this House about this government's unwillingness to tackle climate change. I've spoken about how it is bad for the environment and, therefore, the safety and quality of life of all Albertans to ignore this problem. I've also spoken about how ultimately it's going to be bad for the economy. Basically, this government's ongoing insistence on reverting to a place where the environment is pitted against the economy is absolutely and without question a recipe for failure.

I've just laid out their plan to go after those who would make tackling climate change a priority. We just talked about how that's also not a helpful way to go. We don't need McCarthyite investigations into people solely because they stand up to speak about the environment. We don't need an inquiry to look into who went to that group of 17-year-old high school students and suggested that they actually begin a demonstration and come to have their voices heard at a rally in front of the Legislature. Heaven forbid that this plan actually turns into that kind of thing. It will be a very, very dark day.

What I will say to the members opposite is this. I believe that somewhere down the road it will be proven that right now you are absolutely and completely on the wrong side of history and that your inaction on perhaps the single biggest threat facing our generation is deafening. That is all I will say at this point, probably more over the next four years, though.

Now, moving on, Madam Speaker, let's talk about the so-called open for business act, or what we call the pick-your-pockets legislation. It definitely shouldn't be called the open for business act because it doesn't open a single business or make it easier to open a business. All it does is cut wages. It's the cheap labour act. Actually, as I'd said before, it's the pick-your-pockets bill. It's the pick-your-pockets bill because when it comes to regular people, it is an act to take away your overtime and steal your holiday pay. Oh, and as a bonus, anyone under the age of 18 gets a nice $2-an-hour pay cut.

Now, Madam Speaker, Albertans work hard to put food on their tables and to take care of their families. They elected this Premier to create jobs. I hear him say it all the time. But, you know, they didn't elect this Premier to roll back banked overtime from time and a half to just straight time. During the election campaign this government told Albertans that they were going to change the banked overtime rules, but then they intentionally misled Albertans about the actual impact that this would have on their wallets. But the fact is this: no matter how they try to slice it, it's a cut. They, frankly, don't want to admit that it's a cut, but it's a cut.

The Premier backed away and said that there would be no negative impact on what people receive for overtime as a result of what was in their platform, and that was absolutely and completely and utterly false. It was untrue. It was untrue. He said it then, and people voted on the understanding that he would not in any way negatively impact their overtime, and then he introduced a bill to negatively impact their overtime. Then he came into the House and said: "Oh, no. I introduce this bill, but it doesn't negatively impact overtime." Then, of course, we had a conversation: "Well, let's just read the bill and see how it negatively impacts overtime." And then even after we did, he still said, "Oh, the bill doesn't say what it says." Apparently, it is now okay in this House to actually have a document in front of the House and say that it doesn't say what it says. That's a whole new standard for the post-truth world, Madam Speaker, I've got to say. But I'll talk about that in a moment.

Now, at the end of the day, it means less money in working people's bank accounts. In fact, roughly 400,000 Albertans who work overtime to care for themselves and their families – Albertans in oil and gas, construction, and the skilled trades – will be hit the hardest. These are Albertans working to a project deadline who often put in the extra hours to get the job done and then take the paid time off later. In fact, we did the math, and if you're an oil and gas worker making average pay, putting in 10 overtime hours every week on a 12-week project, that is 120 hours in paid time off. The difference between banking that pay at time and a half versus straight time is over $2,500 in monetary terms. That's a huge difference for working people. We're talking about hundreds of thousands of dollars for people going above and beyond in the workplace day in and day out. No one in Canada would pass legislation that does this. In fact, none of them have a rule like this, just here in Alberta.

That's why we changed it in the first place, because people were losing money. They were getting forced into overtime agreements because the legislation, the way it was written, before we changed it, actually created an incentive for employers to use the tools of the act to force workers into these banked overtime agreements. The act allows them to force workers into these overtime agreements. And the Government House Leader is categorically, completely wrong and saying things which are not true when he says that workers can choose whether they want to be in these agreements. Anybody who is capable of reading legislation will very quickly understand that that is not the way the legislation is intended to be used, nor was it the way the legislation was being used before we changed the legislation so that there was no longer an incentive for employers to force workers into these arrangements.

And why? Why were they pushed so hard to change it by their big friends in Merit Contractors, who spent so much money putting up election signs for them for two years before the election? Because it means more money for the contractors and less money for workers. So they did it. It's that simple.

Anyway, the Premier says that he wants to go back to the way it was before, when people were not getting the overtime they deserved. That's not what he said during the election campaign, but that is exactly what he is doing. That was a time when Albertans earned less in overtime than workers in B.C. and Saskatchewan and Manitoba. I guess he'll have to explain to Albertans why he thinks they shouldn't be treated fairly, just like every other Canadian.

But, hey, why treat people fairly? Let's pay young people less than the minimum wage. Not since 1998, Madam Speaker, has any government thought to go back to such an unfair policy, not our government and not the PC governments before us. In fact, the government of the late Ralph Klein got rid of it in 1998. Ralph's team knew it was unfair. They knew that rolling back the minimum wage for people demonstrates a lack of compassion and a lack of respect for young workers. They knew that the value of your work should depend on the effort and the skill that you put into it, not on what year you were born or whether or not you have class the next day. What a silly set of criteria. What a ridiculous set of criteria.

The real criteria are: how can we give our friends more money and take money away from the people who need it the most and earn the least? They came up with this: what year were you born, and are you going to school tomorrow? It's ridiculous. Our policy put more dollars into the pockets of hard-working Albertans, who live, work, and spend their money here.

The last big change in the pick-your-pockets bill, of course, is what we refer to as being pure Grinch. It was the changes to holiday pay. This change means that when Christmas falls on a Saturday, hard-working parents here won't get the extra pay to cover off presents for the kids, but in Saskatchewan they will. This puts Alberta out of step with every other province in Canada by making an unfair distinction about regular versus nonregular workdays. In every other province holiday pay is owed to workers regardless of whether it falls on a worker's regularly scheduled day off. That includes B.C., Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, and Quebec. But under this government, no, no. Albertans will not get holiday pay or time in lieu when the holiday falls on a weekend, but workers just across the border will.

Then we're told, "Well, that's a way to create jobs," and, "You know, a minimum wage is just a minimum." Of course, the logical conclusion of that silly statement is: "Well, why have a minimum wage at all? We can trust everyone just to pay what's fair. Why have a minimum wage at all?" Oh – I don't know – because of 150 years of clear evidence that if you don't have a minimum wage, people are exploited. I think that, actually, Madam Speaker, that's why you have a minimum wage. It is quite an atrocious argument to have the labour minister say that it's just a minimum. It's as if the minister doesn't understand the legislation that he has been tasked to oversee.

Taken together, this pick-your-pockets bill does just that. At the same time that we're giving multibillion-dollar tax breaks to wealthy corporations, we are also taking even more money out of the pockets of working people and handing that over to these corporations as well. Exactly when is enough enough, Madam Speaker? Suffice to say that if the government wants to pass this bill, they too will have to work some more overtime. We debated this bill for more than 24 hours, the longest Wednesday on record, and we will keep doing that and keep fighting it because Albertans were promised more jobs, not smaller pay stubs, and right now we are on a path to: promise made, promise broken.

The list of misleading legislation goes on and on. The government's act to reduce red tape creates a new associate minister position, who conceivably is relying on public service officials, one would hope. Otherwise, he's getting paid the premium for nothing. What it does do is that it adds regulation-making power to the minister, and it requires him to generate reports on the red tape he's cut. What does all this amount to? Well, frankly, it amounts to more red tape. Very interesting that when he was first introduced by the Premier, the original title was the minister of red tape.

Nonetheless, notwithstanding all the elimination of the red tape that we are frankly doing, there's no transparency. The Premier said, when this bill was introduced, that 17 regulations had already been cut, but his associate minister couldn't name a single one. What's more, there's no plan for consultation or stakeholder meetings before we cut all this red tape. This bill does nothing except lead members' minds to wonder about just which pieces of red tape will face the dull scissors of the associate minister, unsharpened probably because, you know, we wouldn't want to have too many staffpeople in the ministry creating less red tape. Will he be going after regulations requiring routine food inspections? What about those requiring proper safety protocols on work sites? Or how about the regulations requiring surgical equipment to be sterilized before surgery? You really do have to wonder, Madam Speaker.

Then there's Bill 7, another piece of the Premier's apparent plan to create jobs. This piece of legislation, the municipal government amendment act, actually amounts to a public service announcement, one that reinforces powers that municipalities already have. The act is supposed to allow municipalities to defer or eliminate the collection of taxes to entice businesses to set up in their little part of Alberta relative to other parts of Alberta. But many municipalities have already taken advantage of section 347 of the current Municipal Government Act to do just these things. The city of Lethbridge established the targeted redevelopment incentive policy, called TRIP, and in May they approved a seven-year cancellation of taxes for a $4 million development by Six08 Health Incorporated. In Chestermere the town council reported to local media that they had waived taxes for three years for a $10 million building development.

As far as we can tell, Bill 7 accomplishes nothing except cause confusion because all of this authority was already there. Meanwhile, though, confusion is the thing. We're hearing from municipalities that they are frustrated, that they weren't consulted on this legislation, and there is a real fear that this legislation could spur a race to the bottom, with municipalities undercutting each other to compete for the attention of new business or developers, all part of this plan to shrink government and let individual residents shoulder the burden. Really, that is the long-term objective of these kinds of plans.

That's the Premier's plan for the economy. It's risky. It has bankrupted other jurisdictions. It refuses to consider or plan for future challenges, it's financed on the backs of workers, and it consists of at least a couple of pieces of legislation that are mostly communications tools that do nothing.

Let's turn away from the economy to perhaps the most disturbing piece of this government's agenda as outlined – well, it's not as overtly outlined in the throne speech, but it has been clearly demonstrated once we've seen the details of what was referenced in the throne speech. Now, before the throne speech, this Premier promised that he would not legislate on divisive social issues. That was his mantra. When asked about support for gay-straight alliances during the campaign, he told reporters he didn't get distracted by issues that weren't on the minds of voters. Yet here we are in his very first legislative session, and he's legislating against LGBTQ youth. He is rolling back their rights, replacing four years of hard work our former Education minister did trying to improve the flimsy and weak Bill 10.

Let me just digress a little bit here. Now, I know that the other side love to – and in fact the Government House Leader already did today – rush to point out that our party and that I myself supported Bill 10. I will grant you that we did because Bill 10 was a second attempt to fix an outrageous bill that was brought in by the former PCs in the fall before Bill 10 was introduced. It was scandalous. They had to withdraw it. It was like Jim Crow legislation. They said that gay kids can meet away from the school, and in that way the scariness of them assembling together won't hurt the feelings of the other students who might see them all coming together and meeting. So they had to meet off-site.

3:30

Ms Hoffman: But they did say the word “gay.”

Ms Notley: They did say the word “gay” in that first round, but that was because, I think, they hoped no one would ever have to see the word or hear the word. Of course, they were going to be allowed to be pushed to locations outside of the school property. Anyway, it was offensive, and the members of the UCP's predecessor party, the PCs, had to back down from it because it was one of the most obnoxious pieces of legislation that we'd ever seen come into this House.

So then they brought in Bill 10 as an effort to stop the legislation that had previously been introduced as a private member's bill by an opposition member, the former Member for Edmonton-Centre. They brought in Bill 10, and on the face of it it seemed reasonable. It certainly didn't look as heinous as the thing that they had actually put their minds to creating a mere three or four months earlier.

Here's the thing. Then we got elected, and we discovered that there wasn't a whole bunch of new GSAs happening around the province. So we dug into it, and we discovered that, in fact, members of the UCP's predecessor party had quite intentionally constructed a piece of legislation that was not ever meant to be enforced and that was not ever meant to protect GSAs and to protect the vulnerable LGBTQ kids who need those GSAs. As soon as we dug in, we realized that they'd very thoughtfully written in a bunch of loopholes. What are those loopholes? Pretty simple. First of all, if in a public school a principal is asked to set up a GSA, the principal has no timeline within which to respond, so the principal can literally rag the puck for 18 months, and there's nothing to stop him from doing that.

The second thing that went on under the old Bill 10, which is what we are now returning to, is that there was nothing in the policy that prevented that same principal from otherwise systematically discouraging kids from asking for that GSA. Literally, that kid could be walking down a hall that was plastered with posters saying that marriage is between a man and a woman only – they could literally have that up in the hall – and then you'd be surprised that the LGBTQ kid in the school didn't ask for a GSA. Well, of course they're not going to ask for a GSA. The school as a whole is actively telling them that they are not valuable, that they are less than. These are things we heard about, Madam Speaker.

The third thing, of course, is that if a child actually goes to the principal after all these things are put in their way and insists upon asking for a GSA, then the principal can call up their parents and say: “Hey, did you know that your child here is looking to be part of the old GSA? You might want to know about that.” There goes privacy; there goes safety.

The final heinous part of Bill 10 is that it doesn't apply to private schools, many of which – I will say “some of which” – not the majority of which, but some of which have discriminatory, hateful policies in place right now as we speak, some of which, actually, are going to court and using the Premier's best friend John Carpay, Mr. The Pride Flag is the Same as the Swastika, as their lawyer and relying on his rationale for challenging this legislation. Thankfully for Mr. The Pride Flag is the Same as the Swastika Carpay, the Premier has come to his rescue, and if this act goes forward, he will not need to continue on with that legal challenge. Boy, oh boy. People have really got to think about their friends and what that says about who they are because who your friends are says a lot about you.

That is what is in Bill 10. That is why when members opposite get up and say, "our education act will provide the strongest protections for LGBTQ kids in the country," we will continue to call points of order. The reason is this: because this is actually about a piece of legislation in this House. It is black and it is white, and if we cannot expect members of this House to engage truthfully in what it is they are doing when they bring this legislation into this House, this Assembly that belongs to the whole province of Alberta, to all the people of Alberta, if members opposite will not speak the truth about the ink that is on the paper that they are bringing into this House for us all to look at and read and debate and vote on, then this whole House is being fundamentally compromised in a way that is historic in nature. All of you should be ashamed of yourselves. The House leader should be ashamed of himself. The Education minister should be ashamed of herself.

As I said earlier, I actually believe the Attorney General needs to give some very serious consideration to whether or not he should be conferring with the Law Society or getting legal advice on whether the Law Society might be conferring with him because it is disingenuous at the highest level to come in here and suggest that Bill Hate, that piece of legislation, is the highest level of protection to LGBTQ people in the country. The reason I get passionate about this is because it is a life-and-death issue for kids in our schools. It is about their safety, it is about their future, and if we come in here and we can't even get simple questions like that right, then what in God's name are we doing in here? It is ridiculous.

You know, I will talk for a moment about a real story that we heard about from people who describe what attempts to have a GSA were like under this bill. But I need to say that just yesterday – just yesterday – I was at a car dealership in Edmonton, and a fellow came up, walked up to me, a fairly burly fellow. He came up, and he said, "Are you who you are?" I said: here we go; we're going to have a good old conversation about overtime and maybe we're going to have a good old conversation about, you know, Bill C-69 or the pipeline. He says, "Yeah, I moved here from the east coast." He said: "You know what? Thank you so much for everything you're doing." "Well, we're trying. We're trying to get jobs. We're doing everything we can. We're all working on it." He said: "No, not that. I was married with kids before I finally came out, and if my parents had discovered that I was gay when I was living at home in the Maritimes, I would've been beaten by my father, and I am so glad that I can be who I am now here, and I'm so glad that you guys are fighting to make sure nobody else goes through what I did." That's what this means.

Anyway, that was just yesterday. So this is not a random thing. This is what we all hear each and every day, and it's why I'm so offended by people across the aisle clinging to talking points which are not true, because they should do better. They should take ownership of the pain that they are intentionally inflicting on vulnerable children in this province, at least take ownership of it. Don't cling to empty talking points that are not true.

Jane MacNeil was a young woman who met with our former Minister of Education, the Member for Edmonton-North West. She met with him after she attempted to start a GSA in Calgary under the bill that was previously in place. Jane's request was met with all forms of opposition. School officials attempted to change the name of the GSA, and then they pressured students within the GSA to vote against her and have the name of the GSA changed. Then she was sent to counselling, and she was told she was negatively impacting her school and creating a great deal of angst amongst students and staff. That is the kind of thing that happens when you don't have a policy in place to protect kids, and the policy, to be clear, is what is being eliminated by reverting to the old Bill 10 through Bill Hate. That's exactly what happened.

She said the whole experience was a like a slap in the face. She said that it was like everybody in the world hates you. Can you imagine that experience? So I hope that as this government attempts to ram through Bill Hate in this House, they think of Jane and what she went through and they understand that that's exactly what they are creating again and they think about that fellow that I met at the gas station and they understand that that's exactly what they are creating again. Now, Jane, thankfully, had the courage and the backing of some loving parents, and she was able to go public with her story. As we know, though, most students who need these organizations need them because they don't get that support from their parents, and they don't feel like they belong, and they feel vulnerable and scared.

It undermines them for much of the rest of their life even if they do finally find love and acceptance and welcoming because you shouldn't be going through this when you are that age. All kids need to feel that their sexual orientation, who they are, is okay. Basically, it comes down to this. It's okay, Madam Speaker, to be gay, and I'd love to see the Minister of Education actually say that in the House. I'd like see her use the word, and I'd like to see her actually tell school boards that they need to call these gay-straight alliances "gay-straight alliances" if that is what students want to call them, or "queer." Queer. Gay.

"Inclusion groups" is a way to whitewash it, and it is disrespectful to the people who are involved. At the end of the day, it is reflective and symbolic of the whole regime of discrimination that stands behind it and that stands behind the need for GSAs in the first place. Anyone that doesn't understand that – frankly, I think you understand it and you pretend that that's not what's going on. I think that's all that is really going on here. Folks here are not that obtuse; they understand it. They just believe that GSAs are bad, and they don't think that it's okay to be gay.

I want this government to know that we are going to fight Bill Hate with every tool that we have at our disposal, and we're going to keep fighting for all Albertans. We won't rest in this House until we have exhausted every tool to stop this government's plan to pick people's pockets. We won't rest until we have convinced them to start backing off their attack on youth wages, and we will keep fighting to protect properly funded schools and hospitals. We will keep standing up for Jane and the countless others who will be collateral damage as this government rams through its agenda.

Jobs, economy, pipelines: Madam Speaker, it's all well and good to have a catchy campaign phrase, but it's not what I see. I see no jobs. We lost 19,000 full-time positions in May. I see no economic success, only a risky experiment that has failed massively in other jurisdictions and caused illegal levels of underfunding to education in certain jurisdictions. I see no pipelines. Even if we get a pipeline, I don't believe it will be the doing of this government or its highly politicized, funding-the-political-aspirations-of-the-current-Premier war room. Lastly, what I don't see in that catchphrase is cutting people's pay, rolling back people's rights, and gutting the services that they rely on, yet that's what's happening.

We will fight this government at every avenue and hold them accountable for the decisions that they make because, to go back to my original points, Madam Speaker, we will not apologize for debating in this House. We will continue to insist at every possible turn that the members opposite tell the truth when talking about documents which are tabled in this House that are written in black and white. I appreciate that the member opposite would literally like to lift up a bill that says Bill 1 and insist that it says Bob 2, and he will do that indefinitely because he has that level of commitment to the facts, i.e. none. But we will continue to hold him to account, that when there is something in black and white on paper in writing that has theoretically earned the stamp of integrity that ought to be associated with this Assembly, we will make darn sure that the members opposite are held to account for actually not telling lies about what it means. That is the thing that we will continue to do.

In the meantime we will do that because we have been elected to be the Official Opposition in this province. I am quite sure that no matter how broadly the members opposite would like to describe or define their mandate, not a single, solitary Albertan suggested that their mandate extended to eliminating this Legislature, eliminating debate in this Legislature, eliminating the centuries-old parliamentary system of democracy within this Assembly. So I would again urge the members opposite to remember that as well.

Again, finally, I will say that on the matter of job creation, where I do know in my heart that we share a common cause, I wish them the best of luck, and I can let them know that we will not stop doing everything that we can to provide support and advice on the best means to job creation and doing so in a way where jobs are defined as a relationship where you get paid and that that pay itself is administered fairly and justly.

Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It's been a pleasure to address the throne speech this afternoon. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any comments or questions under Standing Order 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none . . .

Mr. McIver: You were supposed to adjourn debate.

Ms Notley: Was I?

Mr. McIver: Yeah, you were.
Can you do it on 29(2)(a)?

The Deputy Speaker: No. A member who has not spoken needs to stand up and adjourn debate.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise to move that we adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mrs. Pitt in the chair]

The Chair: I'd like to call the committee to order.

Bill 3 Job Creation Tax Cut (Alberta Corporate Tax Amendment) Act

The Chair: Are there any comments, questions, or amendments with respect to the bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Sweet: Thank you, Madam Chair. I rise to speak on Bill 3, the Job Creation Tax Cut (Alberta Corporate Tax Amendment) Act. As some members of this Chamber will remember, I rose last week to speak to this bill, and in those remarks I highlighted what many Albertans have been telling me, that this bill is a solution in search of a problem. This bill seeks to reduce the corporate tax rate by a third, from 12 per cent to 8 per cent. In doing so, it will reduce government revenue by $4.5 billion over the course of the next four years, and it will gift that $4.5 billion to large, profitable corporations.

Now, in the last election the UCP told Albertans that gifting $4.5 billion to large corporations will create jobs, not just a few jobs but a lot of jobs. The key message was, of course, jobs, jobs, jobs. In fact, the UCP promised Albertans that this measure alone would create some 55,000 net new jobs. That is a lot of jobs. To the credit of the UCP and the now Premier, they were very effective in that political communication, and they were very effective in their message discipline. When reasonable and knowledgeable people raised questions, they brushed them aside. When economists questioned the utility of the corporate tax cut at the time, they ignored it. When the deficit hawks raised red flags, they said that the tax cuts would pay for themselves, and when teachers and nurses expressed concerns about cuts, they said: don't worry. To put it another way, whenever someone questioned this government over their quest to reduce corporate taxes, they ultimately responded with the same message: jobs, jobs, jobs.

Now, Madam Chair, as I said, their political strategy proved effective. Albertans want good paying jobs, and they want security for their families, but let's not forget the promise the UCP made to Albertans. The promise was not a large corporate tax cut. The promise was jobs. The corporate tax cut was a mechanism, a mechanism to create those jobs, or so they promised. According to the UCP if we could cut the corporate tax rate, investments would flood into the province, the boom times would return, and everyone would have a job, not just any job but a good-paying job, those mortgage-paying jobs that all Albertans depend on.

Now, as all the members of this House know well, elections are about promises, but governing is about delivery, and when you govern, the rubber hits the road. With the election in the rearview mirror it is incumbent on this government to actually answer some questions and come clean with Albertans. We all agree that more jobs are a good outcome. We all want more jobs for hard-working Albertans. What we disagree with is the mechanism. On this side of the House we disagree that the main issue facing our economy is the corporate tax rate, and we firmly disagree with the idea that cutting the corporate tax will create 55,000 new jobs. There's good reason to believe that the facts are on our side, that the evidence is on our side, and that Bill 3 won't deliver on the promise. We know it, economists know it, industry knows it, yet here we are debating Bill 3, a quintessential example of a solution in search of a problem and a solution that won't deliver on that promise.

Now, before I get into the evidence, I'd like to say a few words about the UCP's solution to the job challenges facing Alberta. It's not an original solution; in fact, it's the same solution you've heard from Conservatives for the last 40 years to every economic problem. No matter the problem, the solution is to cut the corporate tax rate. What do you do in tough economic times? The Conservative's solution: cut the corporate tax rate. What do you do to keep a strong economy growing? You cut the corporate tax rate. What do you do to spur innovation in the economy? You cut the corporate tax rate. What do you do to improve labour productivity? You cut the corporate tax rate. How do we encourage investment in machinery, equipment, and human capital? You cut the corporate tax rate. I think you see the problem. No matter the problem, no matter how complex the issue, no matter the evidence, the solution is the same: cut the corporate tax rate. Corporate tax rates are a Conservative hammer, and in their view every economic problem has a nail.

Let's step back and look at the evidence. Let's actually consider what is going on in Alberta right now. If we look at what's going on in Alberta, it's quite evident that tax cuts aren't the solution to Alberta's economic challenge. As I've said previously in this House, Alberta is facing some real and substantial structural challenges in our economy, and most of these challenges are in our energy industry, the dominant driver of the economy.

What are the structural challenges facing our energy industry? First and foremost, it's takeaway capacity. We lack takeaway capacity. We need more pipelines, we need more market access, we need to get our product to market, and we need to get top dollar for our product. Right now in Alberta we are challenged. We've had to curtail the production in order to ease the differential. Storage utilization is still at record levels, and we've recently seen yet another delay in line 3 and more legal manoeuvring in the United States with Keystone XL. My point, Madam Chair, is that in this context cutting the corporate tax rate won't help drive investment in the energy sector. Companies won't make major new investments until the issue of takeaway capacity is resolved. Let's be clear. This is a problem that has been decades in the making.

On that note, Madam Chair, let me take a moment to acknowledge and thank the former Premier, the current Leader of the Official Opposition, for her steadfast commitment to addressing this specific problem. We know her tireless efforts were appreciated by Albertans, and we know that there was more work to do. But the former Premier picked up yards and brought the ball down the field. I know that her sophisticated approach helped put this issue squarely on the national radar. So while we've made progress, we still face real challenges when it comes to market access.

When I talk to folks in the energy industry, they tell me that lowering the corporate tax rate won't help stimulate investment. They say this because the corporate tax rate isn't the barrier to their investment. The main barrier, or the main hurdle, is being able to get their product to market. We have Bill 3, or what the UCP has labelled the job creation tax cut.

An Hon. Member: You can't even say it without laughing.

Ms Sweet: No.

But in our main industry, in the industry where we need to create the most jobs, industry is saying that the corporate tax cut won't lead to more investment and more jobs.

As I've said, we've got a solution here in Bill 3 that is in search of a problem. Let's be honest. Corporate leaders aren't asking for this tax cut. It's good for their shareholders. Their corporate leaders have been clear about what their short- and medium-term priorities are: increasing the dividends for shareholders, more stock buybacks, and deleveraging their balance sheets. Now, there's nothing wrong with these priorities. Our corporate leaders in the energy sector are responding to the market force. If Bill 3 becomes law, they will continue with their short- and medium-term priorities. They will continue with or perhaps accelerate their dividend increases and their share buyback programs, but Bill 3 won't lead to more investments. It won't lead to more jobs. It won't do these things because it won't address the number one structural issue facing our economy.

So what are the other structural issues facing our economy, in particular the energy sector? Let's spend a few minutes talking about the regulatory regime. It's more complex, more time-consuming, and more capital intensive than ever before. We've got a new legal structure coming with Bill C-69 along with new standards. When new regulatory standards come in, it creates uncertainty. What is also clear is that when you get new standards that companies have to adhere to, the regulatory bar isn't always clear. The bar is often clarified through trial and error and through courts. This creates uncertainty for companies that are considering new investment. It creates reluctance among companies to be the first to test the new standards. Quite simply, there is no first mover advantage here.

Madam Chair, my comments here on the regulatory challenges facing our economy are not particularly insightful. This challenge has been a point of discussion and serious contemplation in Alberta for much of the past five years. My point is that this is one of the real issues facing our economy, again, not corporate tax rates. To listen to some of the rhetoric coming from the UCP during the election, the solution to this problem and to all problems facing the Alberta economy is to cut the corporate tax rate. Indeed that's the silver bullet according to the UCP. We were told that it's the solution to all of our problems, but I don't see it. Again, nobody in our energy industry is telling me that that's the main challenge in our economy. Nobody is saying that the corporate tax rate is the main reason why investment is down from the boom times. Instead we're talking about market access, we're talking about regulatory regime, and they're talking to me about rapidly changing technology along with changing demand from global capital markets.

Now, I haven't said much yet about the changing technology in the energy sector, nor have I said much about changing demands from the capital markets. Let's take a few minutes to discuss these factors. We have all witnessed a monumental shift in global energy markets. These changes have been driven by new technology and new demands from investors. Ten years ago we all thought we were approaching a world of energy scarcity. There just wasn't enough oil coming online. We saw what this meant for Alberta: tens of thousands of dollars in new investment in the oil sands, lots of new jobs, lots of prosperity, long-cycle projects, particularly in oil and gas, an energy price approach that surpassed $100 a barrel, and investment flowed. We boomed. What was interesting in this era of energy scarcity was the behaviour of the capital market. They were concerned primarily about production. It was about volumes; it was about output. Companies would raise capital relatively easily for these projects, even in our cost structure in Alberta, which was competitively high. We had accessible reserves. Markets were willing to invest. Profitability was at that point a secondary concern, so companies could raise capital mostly exclusively based on their ability to bring product online.

Then the market changed. New technology came online. Global prices declined. Short-cycle plays became the flavour of decades. Production in these short-cycle plays, particularly south of the border, grew dramatically. Today we no longer find ourselves in a world of energy scarcity. In fact, today we are in an era of energy abundance. How did the capital market react? We read about it every day in the newspaper. We talk about it with our neighbours. For Alberta, production is no longer the primary objective. The goal is to lower the cost per barrel to increase free cash flow and to become profitable in the new lower priced environment. The capital markets aren't demanding more big, new investments that lead to local jobs and more activity in the patch. The capital markets are looking for increased dividends, more share buybacks, and better balance sheets.

So what does this mean for Alberta? Well, this means that our energy sector is facing challenges. On this side of the House we appreciated that this monumental shift in the global energy sector is real. We appreciate that it has had a profound effect on our economy.

Now we're here to debate Bill 3 and not the policy response of the previous government that I was honoured to be a part of. But I will take a moment and say that our policy response had some real merit. As members we will recall that our approach was to invest and diversify within the energy sector. To be more specific, through royalty credits we aimed to position Alberta as a global leader in the petrochemical sector, and we were on our way. Thousands of jobs were created, for example with the Inter Pipeline project in the Industrial Heartland, which I am proud to represent. When fully rolled out, we projected the creation of 70,000 direct jobs through our petrochemical diversification strategy.

Now, obviously, our strategy and the one proposed by the UCP government were different. The UCP plan for jobs was Bill 3. It's nothing more and nothing less than a corporate tax cut: cut taxes, and let the chips fall where they will. There's no strategy here, just a single hammer to deal with every economic nail. The problem, of course, is that Bill 3 doesn't respond to any of the main economic challenges facing Alberta. It does not address our market access challenge, that I've discussed. It does not address the regulatory uncertainty our energy sector faces. It does nothing to position Alberta's energy sector for success in this new era of global energy abundance and rapidly changing technology. In fact, the UCP plan for jobs seems totally detached from the reality of what's going on in Alberta's economy.

I guess it's a solution to a problem somewhere in the world, but it's not our solution. As I've said, this bill is the definition of a solution in search of a problem. Now, let me say that Conservatives don't always offer corporate tax cuts as a solution. Back in 2008, when the global credit markets froze and the global recession cast its long shadow, our Prime Minister came up with a response. His response was Canada's economic action plan, and the Prime Minister was Stephen Harper.

Now, the Prime Minister, an economist, was faced with real challenges, but he didn't let Conservative dogma get in the way. He responded to the specific challenges facing the economy. He bailed out the auto industry, he invested in infrastructure, and he was honest with the public. His policy response to the financial crisis in Budget 2009 laid out some key truths. He laid out how ineffective corporate tax cuts could be to stimulate the economy and create jobs. According to Prime Minister Harper every dollar expended on corporate tax cuts would only grow the economy by 30 cents, but $1 invested in infrastructure would grow the economy by $1.60. So he invested in infrastructure, and he said no to corporate tax cuts.

My point, Madam Chair, is that smart leaders roll out policy that responds to and addresses real challenges. The solution to every economic issue is not to reduce the corporate tax rate. Putting it another way, context matters, or, to borrow an old cliché, context is king.

As I wrap up my remarks, I want to return to an earlier theme. The UCP promise to Alberta was jobs, good jobs. The UCP promise to Albertans was not a corporate tax cut. The corporate tax cut was the mechanism. What the people were voting for was jobs. Bill 3, the corporate tax plan, won't create jobs. It's not going to work. It won't work because it doesn't address the actual issue to job creation in this province. I've said this more than once. This bill is a solution in search of a problem.

What this bill will do is create a $4.5 billion hole in our budget. That means cuts: cuts to classrooms, cuts to health care, and cuts for people who are out there working, who still won't have a job because this bill won't deliver. It seems this government is determined – determined – to offer a solution to a problem that doesn't exist. Fair enough; they won the election. But if they're going to engage in this triumph of ideology over common sense, then they need to tell Albertans what's going to come next. What are they going to cut? Are they going to fire teachers? How about teachers' aides? Will school fees rise? How much will they cut from highway projects? What's the forecast increase in the number of potholes?

Let's get some answers to the question of cuts on the record. If the UCP is willing to go down the Bill 3 path notwithstanding all of the evidence that I've provided that we know it won't work, then Albertans deserve to know what they're going to cut; $4.5 billion is a lot of money. That's a lot of teachers. That's a lot of school lunches. That's a lot of important capital projects like the bridge in Fort Saskatchewan.

So to the members opposite and to the ministers of the Crown, who have been honoured to serve Albertans with specific ministerial portfolios: what are you going to cut? How are you going to pay for this corporate tax cut? I think Albertans deserve to know, and I know I do.

Thank you.

The Chair: Any other comments, questions, or amendments with respect to the bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. It's a pleasure to have the opportunity to rise and partake in the debate on Bill 3 this week. I think this may be my first opportunity to engage in debate here in the Legislature this week. I've missed it a bit. It's good to be back.

We've had a fair amount of discussion around this bill. I certainly thank my colleague from Edmonton-Manning for the careful thought that she's given to this, I think, in bringing a variety of very strong sources to bear, including our former Prime Minister Stephen Harper and his own acknowledgement and recognition that indeed taking this kind of a radical step yields the lowest benefit of all the many ways that we could be looking at stimulating our economy. Indeed, as many of my colleagues have said, that is not a goal that we disagree with. Indeed, I think that's a goal that we're all in agreement with here in this Chamber. What we disagree with is the idea that the best way to create jobs in this province or to move us forward in the situation where we currently find ourselves is to pull 4 and a half billion dollars out of the budget for something that has been recognized to be the lowest yield for investment and for something which will show, according to the government themselves, absolutely no benefit to the province for at least two years.

As I talked about when I last had the opportunity to rise on this bill, Madam Chair, this bill is a gamble. This is the government rolling the dice with 4 and a half billion dollars on the table and hoping that they're going to hit it big. There is no evidence to show this has ever worked in any other jurisdiction in which it's been tried. There's nothing to demonstrate – in fact, this government has brought forward two individuals who support this, one of whom is currently sitting on their blue-ribbon panel. There has been some mild support in general from some other economists, including some that I respect, the gentleman Trevor Tombe, but even he has said that it is unlikely to yield the kind of result that the government has claimed it will yield.

Given the constant refrain we are hearing, given that this same Finance minister is now going and essentially lowering the boom on public-sector workers and telling them that they'd best back off in their requests for their duly contracted negotiations because we are in such dire financial straits as a province that he feels the need to abrogate their rights, it seems to me that this is a poor time to be looking at taking even more dollars out of our budget to gamble on maybe seeing a benefit for the people of Alberta.

That's why, Madam Chair, I would like to bring forward an amendment. I'll have the originals and copies here delivered to you. I'll give you the opportunity to take a look at that before I continue.

The Chair: It will be known as amendment A2.

Please proceed, Member.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'm moving this amendment on behalf of my colleague the MLA for St. Albert. It reads that she moves that Bill 3, the Job Creation Tax Cut (Alberta Corporate Tax Amendment) Act, be amended by adding the following after section 3:

Review by committee of the Legislative Assembly

4 Within 2 years after the coming into force of this Act, a committee of the Legislative Assembly must begin a comprehensive review of the amendments made by this Act, including any resulting economic impacts, and must submit to the Assembly, within 6 months after beginning the review, a report that includes any recommendations or observations of the committee.

This language may be familiar to you, Madam Chair. I believe you and your colleagues moved very similar amendments in your time on this side of the House. In fact, you yourself may have made one or two. In this particular case, I think this is a very appropriate and prudent amendment and follows very much on the amendment which I introduced earlier, on which we had some robust debate and which was, unfortunately, defeated in this House. In that particular amendment, as the Leader of the Official Opposition noted earlier today, I proposed that we stop at 10 per cent instead of proceeding down to 8 per cent so that we would have the moment, some time to take and reflect and, indeed, for the government to demonstrate the value of this significant gamble that they wish to make with Albertans' tax dollars and with our tax system.

Well, that amendment was defeated, but I'm happy to have the chance to bring forward another amendment along the same lines, Madam Chair, because, indeed, as many have noted, this government is making a gamble. They are rolling the dice with 4 and a half billion dollars of government revenue. If they fail in this significant gamble, that cannot help but impact our public services. That cannot help but impact everyday Albertans. However, as I also discussed earlier in my remarks, this does seem to be for members of the government an article of faith given that they have no concrete evidence, given that there has never been a jurisdiction which has demonstrated that this is an effective strategy to grow the economy or create jobs. Therefore, for members of the government this is an article of faith, something that without proof, without evidence they nonetheless believe is indeed going to be true.

So here is their opportunity, Madam Chair, to demonstrate their commitment in that faith. Here is a chance to put that faith into practice, as it were. If this committee is struck in two years after this act, when we will indeed have the corporate tax cut of 8 per cent in place, at that point this government should be excited to have the opportunity to have a committee sit down and study the effects of this cut, of this risky gamble on behalf of Albertans and demonstrate, in fact, that I am incorrect in my assessment. They would have the opportunity to sit down and have a committee look at this and come back to Albertans and say: "Here. We have the evidence. We have the proof of our promise made, promise kept and the actual result that we predicted."

Madam Chair, this is the opportunity for this government to be truly transparent with Albertans. To use the colloquial: to put their money where their mouth is. It is one thing to stand in this House and make claims about the numbers of jobs that this will create, to make claims about the fact that this will eventually, at some future point which they have yet to fully identify, pay for itself, to indeed generate more income than is currently collected.

It is one thing to stand in this House and make that claim without evidence, without any other proof that they can point to that this has ever worked. It is another to be willing to step up and say: yes, in two years we will sit down and we will do the work and we will release a report which proves that this gamble we are taking, that this 4 and a half billion dollars that we are pulling out of the budget has been well spent, that it is indeed beginning – because, again, this government has themselves identified that we will not see any real benefit from this for at least two years. But at that point they should at least be able to demonstrate that we are seeing the beginning of a trend, that there is some specific indication that this particular direct action itself has incented some number of jobs or increased some amount of investment.

Indeed, Madam Chair, as we've discussed and as my colleagues have said and as I will continue to say in this House, there is no evidence that this has ever taken place as a result of such an action. Indeed, I myself and the folks that I speak with in the business community and the folks that are starting and maintaining businesses here in my constituency and, in particular, amongst many of the young businesspeople, who are doing very well in areas that others have struggled with, for example the restaurant and cafe business, for whom some claim that we must slash the wages of young people who work in those industries – we must indeed sit down and do what this amendment proposes, have a committee to study whether or not those who serve liquor should in fact be paid less for their work.

I can tell you, Madam Chair, that I know a number of young, progressive businesspeople who are running successful restaurants, bars, pubs, and other businesses in the hospitality industry who did not need to take those steps and do not intend to take those steps in order to run a viable business. Indeed, they are telling me that they do not need this corporate tax cut to continue to employ people. They will create jobs as demand increases. They create jobs because they have innovative and creative business ideas that attract people and cause them to want to patronize their business, and they are seeing success.

Now, I recognize, Madam Chair, that there is a difference, say, between the folks that are starting, you know, new pubs or breweries or other sorts of businesses within my constituency and the oil and gas industry, certainly. We recognize that there is a difference there. Certainly, there are differences of scale, and when we're talking about investment in the province, at times we are talking about investments of billions of dollars as opposed to local individuals and entrepreneurs. However, I would note that this government tends to try to frame these sorts of decisions around small-business people, so it's fair to discuss how it affects them.

But even on that larger scale, as we have discussed, Madam Chair, we have not seen that even larger corporations are investing more because we give them a corporate tax break. Indeed, as the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview has noted, he has spoken with many CEOs who have told him that if they are given this tax cut, they will simply say: thank you. They will not reinvest that back into the economy. They have other places that that may go. In fact, that money may leave Alberta.

Indeed, we recognize that when the federal government did take steps to reduce the federal corporate tax rate, that did not end in a flurry of investment either in terms of capital or creating new jobs.

That ended with corporations sitting on large savings in their bank accounts, trapped capital that went nowhere. What drives jobs, Madam Chair, is demand. When people want more of a particular product or service, then existing companies will invest to expand what they're offering to meet that desired need, or others will spring up to fill it.

So I think it's reasonable that we take the opportunity in two years to sit down and have a look at this article of faith, this signature piece of legislation, on which this government campaigned and indeed is now loudly proclaiming is going to be redeeming the Alberta economy, that it be given a thorough examination and that this government be given the opportunity to prove their work and demonstrate to the people of Alberta the great value they have brought.

In two years, Madam Chair, I can guarantee that Albertans will already be aware of the effects that taking 4 and a half billion dollars out of the budget has had on them personally. They will be well aware of the size of the class that their children are in. They will be well aware that they have not seen progress in wait times at their emergency room. They, unfortunately, may be well aware that members of their family are still struggling to get access to mental health supports or indeed to accessible ground-level services if they are struggling with substance use. They will be well aware of the lack of opportunities for their parents to move into an appropriately staffed and quality seniors' facility.

Albertans will know, and they will be personally experiencing the results of many decisions of this government in two years, so I don't see how it could help but benefit this government to be able to also demonstrate in two years, then, that they have brought some value in taking away 4 and a half billion dollars that could go to address all of those issues on behalf of Albertans. Even this government themselves recognize that we do not simply have 4 and a half billion dollars just sitting around waiting to share, to just pull out and not invest in Albertans.

It makes sense to me that we would want to take the opportunity to bring together a committee of this Legislature, government members and opposition members, to have a chance perhaps to sit down and talk with some of these CEOs who are going to make these grand investments with the money they save, perhaps to call in some witnesses who can tell us how many extra jobs they created with the dollars that were handed back to them by government. We can have the opportunity to talk with the folks from the city of Calgary, and they can tell us how much of their downtown office real estate has been reactivated as a result of pulling 4 and a half billion dollars out of our budget. We would have the opportunity to sit down and do a proper economic impact assessment, which was a great favourite to be demanded by members of this government when they sat on this side of the aisle.

It's my hope that the government members would agree with this. I mean, there have been some troubling developments, from what I've heard, with some of the private members' legislation. They seem to be leaning in the direction of not wanting to take the time to conduct a review or to hear from folks who might be affected. I hope that's not going to be a general trend. It's my hope that we would instead see a level of thoughtfulness from this government. Indeed, I recognize, again, that they campaigned on this promise and that they want to keep that promise and they want to push it through. They have the numbers in this House to ensure that that happens. All we are asking and all we are wishing to do, Madam Chair, is, again, as yourself and many members that now sit opposite on the government side used to say, make a bad bill a little better. Take the opportunity to provide the chance for you to prove us wrong.

In two years' time, for members of government to be able to take part in that committee, to be able to call in their witnesses and demonstrate to us – and I promise you, Madam Chair, that if this amendment is adopted and you give us that opportunity and that proof is shown, I will personally eat my words. I will recant everything I have said in this House, and I will praise this government for their success in bringing investment back to Alberta by blowing this 4 and a half billion dollar hole in the budget. This is an opportunity we are presenting to government members to, as I said, put their faith into action, to demonstrate to Albertans that they truly believe in what they are about to do and the challenges that Albertans over the next few years may face as a result, that they are truly doing this out of a belief that they are doing this for the benefit of Albertans. This is providing them the opportunity to produce an actual report which will lay that out and provide Albertans with the kind of transparency which, again, so many members of this government, when on this side of the aisle, demanded.

I'm happy to move this amendment, Madam Chair. It's available on the floor, and I look forward to hearing some robust debate.

Thank you.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to the amendment? The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I rise to speak – and you won't be surprised – in favour of the amendment. I think this is a very good amendment. Obviously, I think this is a poor policy. I think it's headed in the wrong direction, but if, as my hon. colleague said, the members opposite are insistent on taking this on faith, I think we should test that faith. I'm a fan of science myself, so I think that bringing forward this amendment and allowing us to stop and reconsider this after two years to see if it actually has generated the things that they say it will generate is an incredible improvement to the bill. I would urge all members to vote in favour of it.

You know, I think that at the end of the day we don't all agree on much in this House, but I think we can agree on one thing, and that is that actions speak louder than words. The members across the way may say a lot of things about how they're in favour of the weakest among us, that they're in favour of creating greater social mobility, and that they're in favour of a whole bunch of things, but those things aren't borne out by their actions.

You know, what this bill does is that it creates a situation where essentially, especially when taken in combination with other bills that are before this House currently, it creates a transfer of wealth to the more wealthy. This bill cuts the corporate tax rate. What does that mean? It means greater profits to corporate shareholders. Now, many people out there are corporate shareholders, and that's fine. But I think the point here is that in a country like Canada, where we're meant to see greater social mobility, where we're meant to see individuals who can work hard and climb into an easier life for their children than maybe they had themselves, which I think is, at the end of the day, the dream that every one of us or our parents or their parents or whatever that came to this country had upon coming here – what this does is that it prevents that from happening.

What it does is that it says that those who have only their work to contribute, those who weren't born with money, who have nothing, who turned 18 and have not a dime to their name, who have nothing to give but their hard work: those people won't be paid for their overtime. They won't be paid for their holiday work. We'll let income inequality grow and grow and grow. Meanwhile those individuals who already have, who may turn 18 and have a bunch of investment come down to them from their parents, will make greater returns. The people who are just working hard, the people who have nothing when they turn 18: they're going to be so stretched and so strained and so unable to get ahead by way of something like working extra hours that they're never going to get to that position. They're never going to be able to climb to that higher position and become one who is sharing in this great wealth giveaway that we're presently engaged in.

I think that's incredibly sad. I think the job of government should be to create an equal playing field. It should be able to create the same opportunities for everyone to be able to participate, to be able to become full members, to achieve their dreams, to buy houses and put their children in school if they so desire, and live the life of meaningful contribution that we all so desperately desire. I'll borrow a famous quote and say, you know: don't tell me what you value; show me your budget, and I'll tell you what you value. In this case, this sends a really clear signal about what's valued and, more specifically, who's valued. That is to say, those who come in with money: those are the people that are being valued. Those who come in with their hard work and with their desire to advance themselves and their children: they're not being valued. I think that that's incredibly sad. I think it's one of the saddest things about this bill.

I would definitely be in favour of this amendment because I think that I'm absolutely willing to put my beliefs to the test. I'm absolutely willing to sit down in two years and look at this and say: what has happened? I don't believe that if you look back, historically, there is any correlation between corporate tax cuts and economic growth or the creation of jobs. I do believe that there is a link between policies like this, corporate tax cuts, and increased income inequality. I believe that that is the link that we're going to see. I believe that what we're going to see is that those who started without are having a more and more difficult climb climbing into a position where they're more comfortable whereas those who started with are having an easier and easier time continuing to be comfortable without perhaps working anywhere near as hard.

The problem with this, aside from its total failure to work – I'll just take some time to cite some statistics on that. Most recently I think it's worth looking south of us because this was identical rhetoric. It's basically Trump's rhetoric. The Premier basically borrowed Trump's playbook in the last election. Sorry. President Trump. We saw the U.S. cut their corporate tax rate from 35 per cent to 21 per cent, promising jobs, and 84 per cent of businesses have not changed their investment plan. I mean, that's pretty clear evidence that it's not working. Meanwhile the deficit in the U.S. is up by 17 per cent. I mean, there are an endless number of different situations I could cite, even sort of varying tax rates in the past here, but I think it's clear that this isn't going to have that impact.

It's interesting. When last I spoke to this bill, we were talking about this rhetoric that we see. We're seeing it here, as we do in many right-wing places: "Oh, no, the wool has been pulled over our eyes. It's all been a big magic show of smoke and mirrors. The budget isn't what we believed it to be." Never mind that the budget is prepared by professional public servants or that it's audited multiple times or that it pretty much is exactly what it appears to be, you know, we get this rhetoric. It's common rhetoric. I mean, it was almost expected, so much so that it almost wasn't a surprise when this government came forward with it.

I had assumed it was a signal for cuts, to be honest. That's usually what it is. Most right-wing governments who use this sort of "we've been lied to" propaganda: normally that's what they're about to say, that we're going to cut this and we're going to cut that and we're going to cut the next thing. Then they sort of tell the population: oh, well, you have to take it because this is what we have to do in order to get our house in order. Never mind that those who are wealthy, that those who hold shares in those corporations that are generating large profits aren't being asked to give up. They're in fact getting more, significantly more. I think that's sad.

I'm not against people who come from an easier situation. I mean, certainly, my parents did a lot for me. They had money saved for me to take my first degree. They provided a house and food and stability and everything that most parents, I think, hope that they can provide for their children. I'm not suggesting that there's anything wrong with that sort of privilege. What I'm suggesting is that there are people who don't come from that sort of privilege, that there are people who don't come with that sort of thing, that there are people who hit the ground running at 18 with no college fund and with no property to their name, that those people deserve the same chance to succeed, and that we ought to give it to them.

I mean, I had expected cuts. I'm hopeful that that's not what we're going to see. I'm hopeful that we're going to see continued investments in education. I'm a little surprised that under enormous pressure from teachers, from students, from school boards, from parents, and from the opposition the government stood up over and over and over again and refused to commit to funding enrolment growth, and then one day they woke up and changed their mind. I mean, this is fantastic. If this is sober second thought, I'm all for it. I'm a little curious as to why the Education minister didn't know on Thursday and the Finance minister did know on Monday, but I'll let you work that out internally.

Where are we headed, then? You know, I think one of the promises that this new government made to Albertans, one of the things that they claimed they were running on was this idea that they would get the books back in balance one year faster. Instead of 2022-23 it was '21-22. I mean, to me, the idea of cutting hospitals and education for one year faster: like, obviously, I'm not in favour. But, obviously, a lot of people were in favour, so I wonder now, given that we're not going to see those cuts, whether this new signal is that, in fact, we're going to wind up balancing in exactly the same time frame.

I think that this amendment, that we'll review this in two years, is an incredibly good one because I don't think that we should take it on faith. I'm not suggesting there's anything wrong with faith; I'm just suggesting that faith has a place. In the world of social policy, in the world of creating economic policy in particular, in a world where we can measure and count, why would we take it on faith? Why would we take this "we give money away to the rich, and that will benefit everyone" rhetoric, which we've seen fail over and over again? We can come back, and we can do a review of it. I think I know what it'll show.

I think it's worth saying some of the reasons I feel this way. You know, one of the reasons I don't have faith in this failed economic policy of cutting taxes on the rich and assuming it'll trickle down is because it just doesn't jibe with most people's understanding of how business works. As my hon. colleague mentioned before me and I will mention now, businesses work on a supply-and-demand model. Giving a business additional revenue is not going to cause them to expand if there's no demand there. If there was demand there and it's a profitable business – and it was a profitable business because, again, we're talking only about businesses that are posting profits in excess of half a million dollars – then they would scale up to meet the demand because they're profitable. So scaling up would result in more profit. I think this idea that this is going to create jobs just doesn't sort of jibe with common sense in the right kind of way.

I think one of the things that's worth commenting on, because I think it's been a gross misrepresentation coming from the other side, is the idea that over here we hate business or that we hate people who are wealthy. That's absolutely not true. It absolutely isn't. When you say, "Hey, we should extend the same benefits to everyone; everyone should have an equal opportunity in society," it's not because you hate those who already have the benefit. It's because you think that everyone deserves the same opportunity. Yeah. I think that to try and flip it around and say, "Oh, well, if you feel like wealthy shareholders shouldn't be getting their profits, then you must hate them": no, I don't hate them. I just feel that maybe those who are working hard to try and provide for their family, those who weren't born with that wealth in their family: they too deserve an opportunity; they too deserve a chance to climb into a life that's little less challenging.

I always find it very interesting. As I went through law school – I went when I was a bit older, and I had had some lower paying jobs before I went to law school – you know, there were a lot of students in my class who had come from relative privilege, who had come from situations where their parents were also lawyers. That's fairly common. They had had the occasional summer job, usually working for their parents' friends' corporate something, so it was relatively well paid. It didn't require evening work. It usually was gotten through someone knowing someone else. This, again, isn't always the case. There were many incredibly hard-working students. But there was this certain class of people that was in this position. Really, the first job they would get for themselves would be their articling job. They would leave school, their parents having paid their way through, and make $80,000 a year at their very first job. Many of these individuals that I talked to believed, like the members across the way believe, that their hard work entitled them to what they had.

I'm not saying that it wasn't hard work – I mean, I went there, too; it does require that you study long hours and invest a certain amount of yourself – but what I will tell you is this. I don't think it was particularly harder work than working 10 consecutive hours on my feet with no break, waiting tables. I don't think that it was particularly more stressful than working a low-wage job that put me in a position where every time I managed to put a little bit away, something would happen: the car would break down or there'd be some sort of extra additional costs. I'm not saying that that it isn't hard or that it isn't stressful. What I'm saying is that other people experience things that are hard and stressful and that they, too, should be permitted the opportunity to flourish.

You know, I remember when we were doing consultations, which we did excessively on a number of different bills, that there were often people who were very angry who had in the past been consulted by the government. They were still being consulted, but they were angry that in addition to just them, the government was listening to more people. The consultation circle was broader. More voices were permitted to come forward with their opinion, and as a result of this, these few who had previously been consulted were incredibly angry that it wasn't just their voice. What they were angry about was that they had a say, but other people who disagreed with them also had a say, and the government balanced those things.

I think it was very interesting to see, and I think that that's sort of what we're talking about here, a situation where – I'm not suggesting by any means that we should take from anyone. What I'm suggesting is that we should open up the circle and allow everyone to flourish. What I'm suggesting is that when we're creating economic policy, what we're talking about is: who's going to profit at whose expense? It's not a zero-sum game, obviously, but ultimately these have real-world impacts on real-world people, and what I'm suggesting is that everyone should be able to benefit, not just a few. I guess maybe that was the idea that ultimately drove me into politics, that everybody should be able to benefit, not just a few.

That's what troubles me about this bill, and that's why I think we should go back and take a look at it. I think we should take a look at the economic impacts, and I think we should take a look at the impacts on sort of income inequality as well because I think it's sad when it becomes harder for those who are born without to be able to achieve the same as those who are born with. Again, there's nothing wrong with corporations. They are our job creators. They are contributors to our economy, to our life, to our world, to our communities. All I'm suggesting is that when we're doling out the money, we should consider whether we want to give all of it to those who already have and none of it to those who don't or maybe whether we should find some balance.

I think those are my comments with respect to this bill. Those are the reasons that I think we ought to consider sending this to committee, because I do think it's the wrong policy, but I think that if we insist on moving forward with a wrong-headed policy, which it appears that we're going to, that we ought to have a mechanism to review that and to see what the actual impacts are. At the end of the day, every person may be entitled to their own opinion, but they aren't entitled to their own set of facts. All we're suggesting here is that we ought to operate in the land of facts and we ought to come back and consider the facts.

With that, I will support the amendment and suggest that others do the same.

The Chair: Are there other speakers, comments, questions? The hon. Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Madam Chair. I would like to speak against the amendment and make a few broader comments, I think, around our job-creation tax cut.

I will assert that lowering corporate taxes will improve the competitiveness of our business environment. There's not an economist in the world, I believe, that won't argue that case. We may find that there will be differing degrees, but a competitive business environment, of which the existing tax regime plays a big part, does affect investment. I appreciated the Member for Edmonton-Manning pointing out that there are a number of challenges in Alberta, and we recognize that. We recognize that we have great market access challenges here in Alberta, particularly with our energy products and, I might also add, with canola and other agriculture products at this point in time. We have a regulatory environment that needs modernization. I certainly acknowledge and agree with that.

These factors and others such as implementing a carbon tax and increasing corporate taxes by 20 per cent did contribute, I believe, significantly to our declining economy and reduced competitiveness for business investment and reduced competitiveness of our business environment in the last four years. That's why, Madam Chair, our plan is bold, and our plan is multifaceted. It includes repealing the carbon tax, which, again, affected every Albertan and certainly every business in this province. It includes passing the open for business act, which is going to reduce burdens on job creators in this province and provide more opportunities, particularly for young workers in this province. It includes initiating a dedicated effort to modernize and improve the competitiveness of our regulatory environment. I think all members of this House agree that that's an essential and important initiative. Of course, it also includes a major effort to increase market access, particularly for our energy products. I know that, again, every member in this House agrees that that's important. Our approach is multifaceted. Lowering corporate taxes is one important, critical piece of this initiative.

We know, Madam Chair, that capital is mobile, and we've seen that in this province. We've witnessed that at an incredible rate in the last four years. Capital is mobile, and businesses can pick up very quickly in this modern day and age, probably quicker now than they could 10 years ago and much quicker than they could 20 or 30 years ago. We compete for global capital, so a competitive business environment is absolutely critical moving forward. In fact, there are a number of studies from eminent economists who have demonstrated the correlation between a competitive business environment, including a competitive tax regime, and economic investment and economic growth.

Tax regimes have a significant impact on our business environment and economic development. Another advantage – and we've not spoken of this one – of a low corporate tax rate is that it encourages economic diversification at its purest form. Economic diversification is a goal, I think, again, of every member of this House. There are a variety of ways to seek to achieve that, and I would assert that creating the most competitive business environment is, at a baseline, the best way to encourage sustainable economic diversification.

The challenge with creating targeted tax credits to industries or maybe particular businesses and providing taxpayer subsidies, again, to particular industries or businesses to create diversification is not only that you end up picking winners and losers but so often that diversification that may result in the short term isn't sustainable in the long term. It's simply predicated on a very short-term incentive to a particular business or industry. Creating a broad-based, competitive business environment, in my opinion, is the best way to begin to diversify our economy. Again, it's the most sustainable way to do that.

We're confident that our job-creation tax cut will deliver economic growth, but it will also encourage businesses and industries of all stripes to come to Alberta, whether it's oil and gas and energy – of course, we depend on that significantly – manufacturing, retail, or the tech industry, which we believe has a great future here in this province with our educated, young, forward-looking, creative, innovative workforce and citizens of this province. We believe that the tech industry has a great future here. Again, we can create a competitive business environment, of which a competitive tax regime is a key part.

You know, our job-creation tax cut does not promote any one company or industry. It encourages agriculture and agriculture manufacturing as much as it does the energy industry. It encourages tech as much as it does the retail sector. It encourages every sector and, again, allows this province to play to its natural, competitive advantages, which, in the long term, prove to be the sustainable way of creating diversification.

Madam Chair, I'd like to thank the opposition for tabling a government of Canada budget report, I believe, the 2009 budget document, where they have quoted our previous Prime Minister, Stephen Harper. I would suggest that this document actually supports our assertion that lowering the corporate tax rate will in fact accomplish what we want it to. I quote:

Corporate income tax measures have limited impact on aggregate demand over the periods displayed in the table . . .

And I'll say that they're a short period of time.

. . . but have among the highest multiplier effects in the long run.

This is because they increase the incentive to invest and accumulate capital, which leads to a higher permanent capacity to create goods and services.

Madam Chair, we are after a permanent, a long-term capacity increase in this province, not only for today but for future generations that depend on this government to get it right. We've never said that our actions are about short term. We are in this for the long haul, and we're working towards permanent, long-term economic growth that Albertans today and future generations can benefit from.

While we're looking at studies, Madam Chair, we have a 2012 study by Dahlby and Ferede that shows that lowering corporate income tax rates has significant positive impacts on investment and GDP. There's also a vast amount of research out there that demonstrates that increasing corporate tax rates can have disastrous impacts. Quite frankly, we've seen that in this province. When they governed, the members opposite increased corporate tax rates, among other measures. We witnessed this economy tank.

A recent paper from the OECD indicates that corporate tax increases are the most harmful type of tax measure for economic growth. Other literature such as a 2017 paper from the Calgary School of Public Policy shows that corporate tax increases implemented in Alberta – and I've just mentioned this – by the previous government would negatively impact labour productivity and result in overall decreased wages for Albertans, and we observed that.

Madam Chair, again, we're not implementing short-term solutions. We're working to repair the long-term damage that we've recently witnessed. The job-creation tax cut is a long-term plan that will create sustainable economic growth and employment, again, not just for the next couple of years but, even more importantly, for the long term and even for the decades to come. Future generations will benefit from these changes, just like Albertans will in the next two to three to four years.

Thank you.

The Chair: Any other members with comments, questions? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Sweet: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. I'm glad to see that the Finance minister has stood up and responded to some of my comments. I appreciate that he read my tabling, which was nice because most people don't read our tablings. So thank you for that.

I just have a couple of questions, and I'm wondering if the minister will be willing to respond, and if not, that's fine. Part of the conversation that we've been having in the House recently around the projected budget and where the budget will be is the discussion around the blue-ribbon panel. Now, I recognize that when the Premier introduced the blue-ribbon panel, he said that they're not allowed to talk about revenue; they're only allowed to talk about expenditures. Here's my question, and here's where my concern is. If we're looking at what cost efficiencies we can find within the government yet we're acknowledging that a corporate tax cut is going to put a $4.5 billion deficit in the revenue, how can you as a government honestly be able to say that the budget overall makes sense? How can you not look at revenue and only look at expenditures and say that that's a fair budget? It doesn't make sense. There's always money coming in and money going out.

When we talk about this bill, Bill 3, I guess, to me, it feels a little premature, and it feels premature because although I recognize that you're saying that, well, this was a promise made and a promise kept and all the political rhetoric around that, the reality of it is that you're looking at deficits and you're looking at cost expenditures, and you're trying to say that we are going to introduce a budget without looking at revenue. How do you introduce a budget without looking at revenue? Corporate taxation in this province is going to put a huge hole in your budget, and the only way you're going to be able to balance that budget is by cutting in other areas. I really struggle with that component of it.

I recognize that when you talk about the corporate tax system, making sure it doesn't create winners and losers around your industries – I guess my question would be this. You have a royalty review projection, that your Premier has spoken about potentially coming forward, to discuss royalty revenue and whether or not you're going to look at a royalty review and whether or not you're going to have some legislation around royalty reviews. If you're going to do that, then you're actually looking at how you're incentivizing different industries.

We did this with the petrochemical industry. The reason we did it was because we need to encourage them to come from the United States to Canada and start looking at the production rate. We've seen it generate jobs by doing that. We've invested in the tech industry through different options and incentives that have actually brought Google to Alberta, have looked at Amazon coming to Alberta. There are different ways that you could incentivize the industry without putting a $4.5 billion deficit hole in your budget.

If you're going to do it – and we know you will; you're going to pass Bill 3 at some point because you're the government – how do you create a budget on it? How can you rationalize to Albertans that your blue-ribbon panel is going to give you the tools that you need to look at your costs and what you're investing in and what you're going to cut and not acknowledge that you have to look at this $4.5 billion deficit and also acknowledge the fact that you're already saying that it's not going to do anything for two years? You're right. The table that I tabled said that over projections – it was a long-term projection, but so is this plan. This plan says the exact same thing: over two years you're not going to get the return on the corporate tax cut. It won't happen.

What you're doing is looking at how you're going to cut a whole bunch of different things without looking at your revenue. You have to replace the revenue. That's just the reality of it. The only way you replace revenue is by having investments coming back into the province. How are you going to fill a $4.5 billion hole with revenue? What does it look like? If you acknowledge that the corporate tax rate will not bring investment into the province over two years and create the jobs that you're saying that it's going to – your personal taxation rate is not going to go up; you're not going to get a return on your corporate taxes because you're not going to have the industry investing right away – you are going to have a hole for two years. I mean, it's $4.5 billion over four. I get that.

I'm pretty sure that the chair of your blue-ribbon panel would challenge that you have to look at the revenue. She did in Saskatchewan. I mean, over a period of time maybe their corporate tax went down, but over a period of time their corporate taxes went back up. She cut a lot of different things, and, specifically for many of you in this House, a lot of rural supports were cut under that budget. Although the blue-ribbon panel can be your argument for many, many, many things, if you're not looking at your revenue, you have a fundamental problem, and the only way you're going to be able to solve it is by cutting. Unless you can tell this House how you're going to create revenue over the two-year gap when you don't have investment coming into the province, I struggle with the whole argument and why it is you just can't wait until you see what the blue-ribbon panel comes back with and says: look, this is what the problem is; this is what we can cut. Because, ultimately, your blue-ribbon panel is not going to be able to find the gap in that $4.5 billion to balance your budget. It's just not going to happen, unless you know something that I don't know.

The Chair: Just a reminder, members, that we are on amendment A2. There's been a bit of latitude all around the House on this one, but I just thought I'd mention that.

I believe that the hon. Minister of Finance is rising to speak.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'd like to respond to a couple of the thoughtful questions that the Member for Edmonton-Manning raised. I think that relative to the blue-ribbon panel we were clear in the terms of reference that we asked them to do a deep dive into Alberta's finances and focus on the expenditure side. I think that it's no secret that Alberta's per capita spending is very, very high relative to other provincial per capita spending, so we really believed we needed to focus there.

Again, as we take a look at long-term sustainability, managing this province's finances, I think we absolutely have to be responsible on the spend side, and that can help avoid the challenges we see in budgets as revenues fluctuate significantly in this province. Of course, we did campaign; we made a promise to Albertans that there wouldn't be tax increases, and we take that promise seriously. We intend to honour that. We've heard a lot about the hole that will be blown in the revenue, $4.5 billion, over the last several days. Again, we were clear with Albertans in our detailed platform in terms of the effect that this job-creation tax cut would have on corporate revenues. We were clear in the platform.

There will be benefit before the two-, three-, and four-year marks, however. I believe that in the way we're implementing this job-creation tax cut, by announcing it with certainty ahead of time, it will change investment decisions immediately. While that may not mean a significant surplus in corporate income tax revenue immediately, we believe that it will affect job creation quite quickly, and we know how important that is to all members of this House and, certainly, how important job creation is to Albertans. Dr. Bev Dahlby has also concluded that by 2023-24, I believe, without looking at the exact dates, in his opinion, this corporate tax cut will actually result in increased overall government revenues. Again, we're not playing the really short game here; we're playing the intermediate and longer game in terms of government revenues.

Again, this is a measure that is really focused on attracting investment, getting Albertans back to work, creating opportunities for small businesses, for those corner-store businesses out there, that benefit from a very competitive tax rate in this province already at 2 per cent but desperately need additional opportunity. This job-creation tax cut, moving our corporate tax rate from 12 to 8 per cent, I believe will provide significant increased opportunity for the smallest of our businesses, hard-working entrepreneurs in this province, and it will also return much-needed jobs to the province of Alberta.

The Chair: Who was first? The hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday.

Mr. Carson: Don't worry. We'll all get a chance to speak here, Member.

Thank you, Madam Chair. It's an honour to rise today and speak to this amendment, which I do plan to support. Just quickly I want to touch on some of the conversation that has happened so far today. I have some concerns. The Finance minister said – and maybe this is more of a personal issue – that taking action to reduce corporate taxes is a bold measure, and I would argue that it's one of the least bold measures that you could actually do as a government. You know, taking taxpayers' dollars, taking the money of the people of this province without any kind of question about how it's going to be spent, if the money will stay in the province of Alberta, if it will support the workers that you're trying to support – without any questions you're going to hand taxpayers' dollars to large corporations.

Now, another comment that was brought up – I apologize; I don't have the Blues in front of me – was along the lines that we need to stop subsidizing industry and offering them incentives that aren't sustainable. This was in regard to the tax credits. It sounds like the minister won't be supporting the tax credits that we had implemented over the last four years, which is of great concern to me. The minister must realize that while he's attacking the tax credits that we brought in, saying that we shouldn't be subsidizing industry if they're not sustainable, you are doing the exact same thing by cutting corporate taxes.

I'm supporting this amendment, once again, reviewing this legislation within two years, a comprehensive review, and making sure that the Assembly has the opportunity to review that report within six months of it being brought to the Assembly. I'm supporting that. I mean, right now I have many concerns that have not been addressed, concerns around: why is there no question around eligibility? How much of a corporation's workforce is in the province? What are they going to do with that money, for instance? These are questions that are addressed through programs like the Alberta investor tax credit. They're addressed through some of the other programs that we brought in, like the capital investment tax credit. There are strict criteria about how the money is spent and which corporations are able to get the money.

I do understand the concern about giving this money to specific industries, which is arguable, most definitely. There was a program or two where we did specify industries. Like, the interactive digital media tax credit was for a few industries. I suppose I understand the concern there. We were working to diversify the economy, of course, but also strengthening an industry that we have here in the province and that we have the opportunity to become leaders in the province. I think that there's room to support these tax credits.

When we talk about reviewing the results of cutting corporate taxes, as is proposed in Bill 3, I want to know, when we compare it to a tax credit program, if it's actually better. I think that's something that we should be able to discuss right now, and hopefully the government members will be able to provide some evidence that that is the case because I'm still not convinced.

I want to go back to a comment that the critic for economic development and trade, the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview, made. In 2015, when we ran in the election, we had a job-creation plan. When we were elected, we took it to businesses, and we took it to industry, and they said, "Look, this is not going to solve the issues that you think it will, so you should go back to the drawing board." And we did. We worked with those businesses and those chambers of commerce, and we came up with these plans for a tax credit. So I want to know, as I've stated, if you're going to keep these tax credits in place, and if not, why not? I mean, we worked with the chambers of commerce, and we worked with local businesses, and they recognized that there was a need for capital. Cutting corporate tax rates is not addressing the concerns that there is a need for capital in the province. We talk a lot about the importance of small businesses. Frankly, this isn't going to overall address the need for small businesses to get capital, address the need for small businesses to keep more of their money and employ more people.

One of the other questions that I have now, but I suppose we can get addressed if we pass this amendment to have this reviewed in two years, is: would it have been better for industry in the province and specifically small and medium-sized businesses if instead of doing a straight cut across the top corporate taxes for medium and large businesses, we'd actually reduced the small-business tax to zero? Maybe that's something that you have planned for us in the future. I suppose we'll wait and see and decide from there. But that's an important question that I think needs to be addressed. Why did you decide to only take care of large corporations and not lower small-business tax rates further or, instead, you know, balancing the two? Those are a few of the questions that I have.

Of course, some larger questions. The minister mentioned the blue-ribbon panel doing a "deep dive." If you're only going to address one side of the budget, I would argue that that's not a very deep dive, maybe a medium dive, maybe even a shallow dive.

Eggen: Wading pool.

Mr. Carson: Wading pool. Yeah.

I think that there's a conversation that the people of Alberta deserve to have from their government and deserve to have from their policymakers, and your blue-ribbon panel is definitely not going to address those concerns.

Of course, it's the easy thing to do, to put together a panel. They'll come back and say: you know, we need to give more money to corporations, but definitely don't want to touch the tax structure of anything. Well, yeah, once again, that's not very bold, Mr. Chair. I don't think you needed a panel, that you paid however much money for, to tell you that. I think that any one of your members probably could have said that in this House without pay.

I suppose I will stop there. I imagine I have more comments to make to the main bill, Bill 3. I am, of course, once again, going to be supporting this amendment that's before us. I think it's reasonable. I think that any legislation that we're passing should be reviewed at a certain time, two years. Maybe we should even review it before then, but the amendment before us says two years, and I do support that move.

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Any others looking to speak to this matter? I believe I see the hon. Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I recognize that we're debating an amendment here, so I'll reassert my position that I'm in opposition to this amendment, but I would just like to respond to a couple of questions that the member opposite has raised. You know, he raised the issue of small-business taxes. Why were they not considered? In fact, they were considered. Fortunately, at this point in time we do have a very competitive small-business corporate tax rate, a tax rate of 2 per cent, and we believe that's sufficiently competitive to not discourage investment, productivity, growth, and success, and even profitability with small businesses here in this province. So it was considered. Again, I'm a true believer in the fact that as we create a more competitive business environment, reduce our corporate tax rate from 12 to 8 per cent, in fact, the investment that will flow into this province will add significant opportunity for those small businesses and that they will be a large benefactor of this greater corporate tax reduction.

Again, the member opposite asserted that profits would be immediately, you know, withdrawn and perhaps kept in shareholders' pockets, that our tax reduction would create additional profitability within corporations and may be gone or lost to Albertans. Let me suggest this. As we get it right in terms of creating the most competitive business environment in this province, those profits will be reinvested in this province, and that is our goal. That's the goal that we're looking to achieve. The bold moves are not in simply appointing the blue-ribbon panel; the bold moves are basically ensuring that we have the most competitive corporate tax rate and business environment in this country and one of the most in North America. Bold moves include repealing the carbon tax, which was the largest tax repeal, I believe, in the history of this province. The bold moves are taking a concerted effort at modernizing and improving our regulatory environment, ensuring we have a world-class regulatory environment so Alberta businesses can compete on the global scale.

Lastly, I just want to respond to the point about credits and incentives to encourage diversification. I will say this. There can be a place and a time for specific incentivization, but I believe that a much more comprehensive, a much more sustainable approach, an approach we should use every time is to create a broad-based competitive business environment so that governments aren't picking winners and losers, so that governments aren't trying to presuppose what the next big thing is. Quite frankly, Mr. Chair, governments so often don't get it right. We need to create a competitive business environment where creative, innovative, educated, forward-thinking Albertans can invest in this province with the next big thing, and I don't believe governments will have that next big thing figured out.

With that, I'll say again that I'm opposed to the amendment. Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Are any others looking to speak? I believe I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-South standing.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Chair. It's really always my pleasure to get up and speak in this House and to speak to such important issues here. I do want to commend the Minister of Finance for getting up and speaking at such length to this amendment and to some of the questions that were posed to him. I mean, I think it's really interesting, though, some of the words he chose to use. Maybe I'll speak to what the minister said in regard to why I would support this amendment in such strong terms.

The minister spoke at length about how there will be benefits in the very short term. I just wish, Mr. Chair, that the Conservative platform had actually shown that. Very clearly, the platform itself actually didn't have those numbers. I know that the platform had to be revised, perhaps multiple times, under the cover of darkness. That's okay. I mean, sometimes you don't get the numbers right the first time. But really clearly, by itself this corporate tax cut does not introduce the revenues that the minister is speaking about in the short term or even necessarily in the long term.

The minister also spoke at quite a bit of length about the assertions that he was making, Mr. Chair, and how he asserted that corporate tax cuts would have these long-term benefits and whatnot. Then he spoke at length and asserted that this would create innovation, especially in industries like technology and other things like that.

As somebody who actually was educated in computing science and technology and mathematics, let me be very clear. The term "assertion" has a very specific definition. What an assertion is is something that is a base truth of your entire principle and philosophy and methodology and program and algorithm. The first thing we actually do in computing science and math and algorithms, Mr. Chair, is that when you do an assertion, you test that base truth. You test to ensure that your entire program will not fall apart, that it will not fail. If your assertion fails, then the entire system that you have built will also fail. It is a base truth that must be correct in every single case.

Of course, I know that the Minister of Finance is not educated in computing and in algorithms, and that's why I'm trying to enlighten him in this House as to how some of that works, how this actually works when you're dealing with the complex mathematics of it, Mr.

Chair. When we talk about that, it's really important that we understand that you must test that central, core truth.

Mr. Chair, this amendment does that. It takes us back to our basics and says that when we accept that we have an assertion, when we accept that we believe that this is true, when we have faith in what we say, we must then go on and test it and say: does this actually hold up? Does the thing that we stated will create all of these benefits actually hold up, that single thing? The members of the government and the members of the backbench can speak at length about how this will create all these great benefits. If they are correct, that is going to be wonderful. But what is most important is that we understand whether that base truth actually holds.

Otherwise, if that base truth is false, then the entire house of cards comes falling down, the entire benefits that the government has spoken about, the entirety of all the things they have spoken about: innovation, savings, revenues. Everything that they have based basically their platform on, Mr. Chair, the entire platform, the entire house of cards will actually fall apart if that base assertion that the minister was so nice to state many times is not true.

I think that's something that members of this House should be very interested in because members of the government very clearly believe that the assertion is true, and members of the opposition perhaps have a little bit more critical view and want to make sure it is. But if it's something that they truly do believe is true, they should have no fear at all, Mr. Chair. There should be no fear in testing that truth. There should be no fear in making sure that what they have stated is actually going to work.

This amendment does that. It strikes a committee that then goes on and reviews those economic impacts. It goes on and says: will what the minister said actually hold up? I think that's something that we can all aspire to because that's what we as legislators want to be doing in this Assembly. We want to be making sure that the legislation we create works. We want to make sure that the things we base our assumptions on, our assertions on work, Mr. Chair. We want to make sure our legislation does what it's intended to do, because if it doesn't, then we have to come back here and fix it. We have to come back here and change it.

Mr. Chair, I'm concerned that members of the government don't understand that. I'm concerned that they don't understand what happens when your base assumptions don't hold up. I won't say the whole saying here, but you know what happens when we assume. Really, that's what's happening here with the government. They're making assumptions that they are not willing to test. I don't know whether that's because they're ashamed or because they don't believe it actually will work. But, very clearly, one of the two must be true because they will not even begin to entertain the idea that we need to actually test what they say. They will not even begin to entertain the idea that a review of this bill might be a good idea.

Mr. Chair, to be very clear, I think the bill in its entirety is a bad bill, but I do think that we can make a bad bill better. I think that what we can do is say: okay; the government thinks it's a good bill; I think it's a bad bill. What we can do is that we can definitely say that in two years we will know. We will know because we will be able to test whether it's a good or a bad bill. If the government isn't willing to do that, maybe they're scared. Maybe in their heart of hearts they know that there is a little bit to be concerned about with a review here. Maybe they know that a review could show flaws in their bill.

That would be something that I would hope they would be willing to put up, because leaps of faith are not what this Assembly is paid to do, Mr. Chair. What this Assembly is paid to do is to make legislation that will work for Albertans and will help get Albertans the best province that we could possibly live in. Really, if the government doesn't understand the importance of that, if the government doesn't understand the importance of making sure we have legislation that is continually reviewed, continually tested and they don't understand how important it is that we check that the assumptions we're using actually hold up, then that's something that all Albertans should be concerned about.

That's something that all Albertans should be concerned about because the government needs to understand how logic works, basically, Mr. Chair, because it is fundamental to logical reasoning and deduction and philosophy. It is fundamental to these ideas that when you start with base truths, they must actually hold up. They must actually work. If the government doesn't understand that fundamental piece, I know that there are many people in the departments and bureaucracy who definitely do, and perhaps they can reach out to some of their colleagues and ask for a more in-depth explanation of how logic works. But if the government refuses to understand or perhaps is wilfully ignorant of how logic works and wilfully ignorant of how these things that the minister wishes to assert operate, then I think it's something that we need to be concerned about.

That's why this amendment would be so important, why it is so important, Mr. Chair. It's an amendment that ensures that we actually go out and do the job that Albertans elected us to do. It ensures that we don't go too rashly on legislation. I wish we had accepted other amendments that perhaps would have slowed this down a bit, but I think this is actually something that all members could agree about. We don't need to slow it down, but what we do need to do is ensure that the legislation works.

I think that members of the government should be glad to have a review because if their base assumption holds and if their assertion holds, then what will happen is that they will be able to go into a committee and do a full economic impact assessment and review and say to Albertans: look at how great we are; we the Conservative government were able to create this much economic activity. Mr. Chair, if it's absolutely true, then the government should be excited for this amendment. They should actually be jumping up and down on division and trying to get this amendment passed.

If they won't and if they don't think it's a good idea, then Albertans are left wondering: why? Albertans are left wondering: why is the government afraid to test their own legislation? Why is the government afraid to review their own legislation? What is it about their legislation that has them sitting on their hands? What is it about their legislation that they're so worried about?

Mr. Chair, I think that, for me, I'm concerned about the impact this will have. I'm concerned that it will blow a 4 and a half billion dollar hole in corporate giveaways while doing nothing to help actual workers here in this province. That's something that is very concerning to me. Unless the government is willing to speak about why they think that they never need to review any of their legislation and, in fact, that their legislation is always perfect the first time, then I think that we do need to pass this amendment. I think it's something that we do need to consider to be very important.

Mr. Chair, it becomes very clear that the government isn't willing to do that work. They aren't willing to do the work of understanding how good legislation is made. They aren't willing to do the good work of understanding how good legislation is maintained. They aren't willing to do any of that work, and I think that's something that's very concerning.

I think it's something that members of the government backbench should be very concerned about because they were sent here to also review government legislation, just as we in the opposition were. I think it's something that members on the front bench should be concerned about. If their own ministers that they've sent up to put legislation forward aren't willing to take criticism on their bill, that's something perhaps they need to discuss among themselves. It's something where I think Albertans expect better. Albertans expect a government which is willing to take a good look in the mirror and say, "Does this legislation work, and do the things that we assume about our legislation hold true?" or, as the minister would say, assert.

Mr. Chair, that is something that I think is very important because when we talk about the types of things this legislation will do, when we talk about how drastic and risky and ideological this bill is, it is something that is very important we get right. It's something that's very important we monitor. It's something that's very important we review periodically because when you blow a 4 and a half billion dollar hole in your budget in corporate tax giveaways, it really does make a difference.

It means that you're going to push back that balance date. It's means you're not going to be investing in your schools. It means you're not going to be investing in your hospitals. Because those are the things we need to keep an eye on, this amendment is important. We need to be reviewing whether this 4 and a half billion dollar hole, whether this giant giveaway to corporate friends and donors, Mr. Chair, will end up hurting our fiscal targets, will end up hurting our public services, will end up hurting our hospitals, no matter where they are in the province.

Mr. Chair, those are all very important things. It's very important that we get this right. It's very important that members on the front bench and, in fact, the backbench understand the logical fallacy they're trying to present here. They don't want to test their own bill, they don't want to test their assertions, and that's something that is very concerning.

I understand that the government thinks that they have it all figured out. But, Mr. Chair, we were in government over here for four years, and let me tell you that you never have it all figured out on the first try. I'm sure members of the government will agree with us. What happened was that you went back and reviewed things, you went back and you changed things. In fact, some bills came back to this Chamber two, three, or more times. That's the reality of governance, and the reality is that we need to make sure we get this right.

The campaign is over, Mr. Chair. What we are doing today is making sure that this legislation is good, and this amendment is a good amendment. I think there must be members of the backbench and, hopefully, the front bench that recognize how reviewing what you're doing periodically is a good thing.

Again, in computing science, Mr. Chair, one of the methodologies that is now very common is what we call being agile. Being agile is one of those things that you want to do because as a project moves forward, you want to be able to make changes. You want to be able to say, "Well, the requirements have changed" or "The expected results have not been working the way we thought," so you make changes to your project, you be agile and you make those changes on the go. That's what a review like this would allow us to do.

The government clearly doesn't want to be agile. The government wants to be set in their ways, and I think that's something that's very concerning. They want to be very slow, and perhaps that's something that the government is used to over there. But I think Albertans expect us to be nimble. Albertans expect us to make legislation that works, and if it doesn't work, they expect us to fix it, Mr. Chair.

Unless we can do a review and see what the economic impact is and see how this bill is affecting Albertans and affecting workers and job creators, Mr. Chair, we won't know. There will be no way to do that work that Albertans expect us to do. In fact, we will probably be letting Albertans down. I think that is something that we should all be concerned about, especially members of the government. I think they should be concerned that they aren't willing to put in that work.

I don't know whether they don't want to bother having committees – they think that committees are unimportant – or perhaps they think that the committee will take too much time out of their day, Mr. Chair. Maybe they just don't want to come up to Edmonton to do those reviews.

Mr. Chair, I am proud to stand here and fight for those Albertans that expect us to do our jobs. I'm proud to stand here and fight for those people that expect us to go and review legislation and critique legislation. I'm proud to do all of those things. If the government backbenchers think that that job is unimportant, then that's their prerogative, but I think it's very clear that Albertans will be expecting us to do that job. Albertans will be expecting us to go forward and to do that work and to guarantee that the government continues to update the legislation and continues to have legislation that is nimble.

Now, Mr. Chair, I think it's pretty clear that I believe this amendment is important. I believe this amendment is important, and I think it's pretty clear that members of the government, based on how little they've spoken to the amendment – I know they've spoken at this amendment regarding other things – think that it's something that may be a waste of their time. Perhaps backbenchers here who are texting away or listening with earphones in think that this is a waste of their time as well.

But, Mr. Chair, it is very important that Albertans get the best legislation, it is very important that we review legislation to the best of our ability, and it is very important that we don't rush through this process. It's very important that we don't go too briskly and blow a 4 and a half billion dollar tax giveaway to wealthy corporations and then leave Albertans by the wayside. That is something that would be very bad. That is something that I think Albertans would not like. That's something that I think my constituents would not like.

I think it's very important that we get this right. I think it's very important that we continue to challenge the narrative, and I think it's very important that we continue to challenge our assumptions because that is something that we understand as people who understand science and believe in science. I know that all of the members of this Assembly believe in science and understand science. We as people who believe this always challenge our base assumptions. We always challenge what we're doing because if you don't, it makes you a bad thinker, Mr. Chair. It makes you somebody who then suddenly becomes surrounded by sycophants, and that's certainly not what any member of this Assembly wants, I hope. It's something that I would be very concerned about, if members wanted it in this Chamber.

Instead, we need to make sure we continue to push forward and challenge what we believe to be true and review what we believe to be true because things change, as we know, and this is one of the best opportunities to do this review because this is actually allowing us to see if we are having the impact in Albertans' lives that we wanted, if we are having the impact in workers' lives that we wanted, and if we're creating the jobs and the economic impact that we wanted.

This amendment, Mr. Chair, is the best way for the government members to go out and speak at length in a couple of years' time of how great they've done if it does work. Of course, I've mentioned already that I don't believe it's going to have those impacts. I personally don't believe that it's going to work to the extent the minister and the government believe, but this would be their opportunity to prove me wrong. This is the government's opportunity to make me eat my own words, as the Member for Edmonton-City Centre has already mentioned. This is the opportunity for the government to go out and put me in my place. I'm sure there are many members of the government who would long for an opportunity to do that.

Mr. Chair, if they don't want to go forward with this amendment for whatever reason – and I'm not sure if it's shame or embarrassment or perhaps just a worry in the back of their minds that they may actually be wrong and they don't want to admit it. That's something that I think is very concerning because we as legislators should be happy to admit that sometimes we are wrong. We don't get it right every single time, but what we want to do is that we want to move forward and we want to push forward to make Alberta better. The way to do that is to go and look at what we've done in the past and see what succeeds and what doesn't succeed and see where we've made mistakes and see where we haven't.

Mr. Chair, by reviewing all of those things, we come out as better legislators, we come out with better legislation, and we come out with a better Alberta for all of our constituents. That's something that I think every single member of this House aspires to. Every single member of this House wants to have a better Alberta, and we do that by making sure our legislation holds up to the standards that we set for it. That's something that I want to encourage all members to support. I want all members to strongly and proudly support the legislation they put forward and they vote for.

But if they're not willing even to look at their legislation and say, "Did it work?" then what can we expect of our government? What can we expect if they're not even willing to look and ask the simple question: is what we're doing working? That is a very simple question, Mr. Chair. It's something that all Albertans will be asking, and they will continue to ask every single election: did the government's policies work? That's something I think this House should continue to ask every single time legislation is brought forward here.

Mr. Chair, I strongly support this amendment.

The Deputy Chair: Any other members wishing to speak on amendment A2? I believe I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair, and thank you very much to all my hon. colleagues who have been part of the debate on Bill 3, Job Creation Tax Cut (Alberta Corporate Tax Amendment) Act, and specifically the amendment that we're currently discussing, introduced by my hon. colleague our MLA for Edmonton-City Centre.

I think it's really important that we reflect on what this amendment says because it is not binding the government to action. It is not hindering them in any way from moving forward with their platform-stated goals. In fact, it allows the government to continue to move forward with the knowledge that within two years they will begin a review of the amendments made by this act, taking a look at economic impacts, which I know for a fact are highly important to all members in this Assembly, particularly the government caucus members who were in this Chamber in the 29th Legislature, because measuring economic impacts was a topic of frequent discussion during that 29th Legislature in each and every session, and submitting said report to the Assembly within six months.

Because we are dealing with something that is incredibly important and valuable, our Alberta economy, the services we are able to fund and provide to our citizens, and we are looking at making some changes that – as we have heard from the Minister of Finance, from members opposite, there are many different opinions about the impact and the results once these changes go into effect. We've actually heard that there are different economists who measure these impacts differently. I appreciate that the government is putting their best foot forward and is stating as fact that 55,000 jobs will be created, is stating as fact what this will do to our competitiveness, what this will do to attracting investment, but the government does not know these things as fact and has admitted as much and has acknowledged that there are differing models and differing opinions as we move forward.

This amendment, very reasonably proposed by my colleague, simply says:

Within 2 years ... begin a comprehensive review ...

We're not even giving a deadline for when it must be submitted, just started, please.

... including any resulting economic impacts ...

and then submit it to the Assembly

... within 6 months after beginning the review.

I guess there is a bit of a deadline on the other end, but it gives a great window of time for that review to take place.

Likely, a review and an impact assessment such as this can be done using a lot of the data that the government already uses to measure the performance of our Alberta economy, but we could add into that some very specific flavour as to what this bill is attempting to achieve and then measure if we are moving along in that direction. How many new businesses have been incentivized to move to Alberta as a result of this? The members in this Chamber have referred to some of the work done by our chambers of commerce, which often involves surveys. Perhaps survey data can be incorporated into this to give us a better sense of the impact of Bill 3 once it is put in place.

Mr. Chair, I support this amendment solely because we know there's such differing opinion, and we've heard in this Chamber a number of examples where the intended effect of decreasing corporate tax rates has not produced new jobs, has not produced new investment but instead has created large-scale deficits and cuts to public services. That's a pretty big risk. Being able to just keep an eye on what is happening and make sure that there's some sort of assessment or report back to the Assembly at large is not, in my mind, a very onerous requirement on this government. It allows them to continue and proceed down the path that not only did they put forward in front of Albertans during the election but they stand in defence of today and gives us that opportunity to review as an Assembly at that two-year mark.

Earlier we had an amendment, amendment A1, that would have essentially paused at that 10 per cent corporate income tax rate.

Mr. McIver: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Point of Order Items Previously Decided

Mr. McIver: The hon. member has decided to reflect upon an earlier decision of the Assembly, which is specifically not allowed in the standing orders. We're happy to hear all of her debate on this amendment. I don't think we need to relive the earlier amendment.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. If I may continue.

The Deputy Chair: Yeah. With regard to this situation I actually agree with the hon. Minister of Transportation on this point. Going forward, I'm happy to listen to the rest of your debate, clearing away from those issues.

Debate Continued

Ms Gray: Thank you, Mr. Chair. With amendment A2, making sure that the Assembly is reviewing, through the form of a report, after the implementation of Bill 3, the job-creation tax cut act, has already begun, I think is incredibly important.

As I was saying, members within this Chamber have already talked about other jurisdictions where financial measures such as this have been attempted and have been – I would characterize them as failures. We've heard a number of times about what has happened specifically in Kansas, a state in the United States that has quite a few parallels between it and Alberta as far as how their economy is structured, oil and gas investment and whatnot. We know that the Kansas experiment, as it's been termed, predicted job creation, predicted economic growth, predicted higher revenues, painted a very rosy picture for all of the things that would come as effects from a corporate tax decrease, but what they actually received was slower growth, a revenue drop that led to a shortage of funding for public services. Education became underfunded. Making sure that there was aid to help the poor wasn't sufficiently funded. In the end, the economy was damaged.

There's a reason why this story as well as several other crossjurisdictional reviews have been raised in this Chamber. It's because we are concerned about this happening in Alberta. By accepting this amendment, we know that within two years after coming into force, being able to review the impacts and what is actually being seen – of course, this is being called a job-creation tax cut, but we know that when it comes to job creation, cutting corporate taxes as a measure is considered one of the weakest options. We know that from a number of different reviews of previous examples of corporate tax cuts as well as the analysis therein.

In fact, many believe that spending on infrastructure has one of the biggest impacts when it comes to job creation. In fact, that was something that our government undertook to do, historic infrastructure spending: building schools, roads, hospitals, much needed across the province. That helped to support many, many Albertans and kept them working during a downturn in the economy.

Finance data also shows that spending on income supports for the unemployed and low-income Canadians: also a very good return on the dollars invested. Mr. Chair, I'm a really big proponent of building an economy from the bottom up because we know that when you give a little bit more money to the lowest earning, they spend that, and they spend that almost exclusively in the local economy whereas more money to the richest, to the top 1 per cent or even 10 per cent, often that money is invested or spent in other jurisdictions, in vacations, in a number of different ways.

If you raise minimum wage, for example, the people earning the least will take that additional money to buy healthier food, to get school supplies for their families, to go out to the movies in the local community, which helps boost the local economy. Every time someone spends a dollar in Alberta, that's going to Alberta businesses, which hire other Albertans who then spend their money, a really nice trickle-down effect. In that case trickle-up perhaps, where you're boosting the economy from the bottom up.

Here we have a plan which is predicated on the idea that if we give very profitable corporations a large tax cut, they will automatically turn around and invest that into Alberta, and when challenged on that, the Minister of Finance has not been able to say that that will for sure happen, other than that they're trying to set the conditions for that to happen. I understand that. But given that you cannot guarantee that that will happen and given, as the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview said in one of his responses to this bill, the importance of tying conditions to these types of incentive programs – as the Member for Edmonton-Manning talked about, the petrochemical diversification program, as an example, or some of the tax credit systems that have been implemented more recently to facilitate tech job creation – these types of measures can be more directly tied to the outcomes that we are looking for when it comes to job creation.

So I do support the amendment and making sure that this gets reviewed after several years.

The other jurisdiction that has been referenced a number of times in this Chamber is the one still happening under American President Trump, when they cut their corporate tax rates from 35 per cent down to 21 per cent. One of the interesting things there is that we already have several years of data showing that although the argument under which this tax cut was introduced, very similar to the one here in Alberta, sounded compelling, the analysis throws cold water on the idea.

What companies are actually doing with the additional funds are things like stock buybacks, things that allow them to amass more capital without necessarily creating new jobs. And this is not theoretical. Payroll data has been used to analyze the corporate tax cuts that were supposed to create jobs in the United States. The payroll data for publicly held U.S. corporations and an analysis of that shows that, generally speaking, this isn't what's happening, job creation. What's happening is that the rich are getting richer. That doesn't help to grow the U.S. economy, and something similar happening in Alberta wouldn't help us here as well.

Making sure that through this amendment we have a procedure in place, that we have a plan to review the economic impacts to make sure that there aren't any other surprises – because, of course, in the midst of doing this, other economic factors impact our province on a constant basis. Everything from access to tidewater with our pipelines to what's happening internationally with the global price of oil, all of these things are changing, shifting, so being able to come in and have checks and balances and to check in at the two-year mark to me seems eminently reasonable, particularly given the number of concerns that we've heard here in this Chamber as we've gone through the debate on Bill 3.

For these reasons, I will be supporting the amendment and would look forward to hearing more from the government members as to why even the act of writing a report and reviewing the economic impacts is something that is not supported. This is a reasonable amendment. I thank my colleague for bringing it in. I think significant concerns have been raised around Bill 3 and its impact on our economy, significant examples of where similar changes have been done, and they have not successfully brought in the prosperity that we are being promised exist here. This amendment gives us a reasonable step forward.

I want to say thank you, Mr. Chair, for allowing me to speak on my support to this amendment.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you.

I believe I saw the hon. Minister of Transportation standing.

Mr. McIver: Well, thank you, Mr. Chair. I'm grateful for this opportunity to rise on amendment A2. I've been listening to some of the debate from my esteemed hon. colleagues, and I have a few comments, I suppose, to make. Now, I think what we just heard here is a request from the opposition to have guaranteed results. I did; I heard that. I say that there's no proof this is going to happen. You can't be sure. They're looking for guaranteed results, and I would suggest, I hope gently, that such guarantees don't exist in this world. Predicting the future is a mug's game, as they say. I've said it here before, and I'll repeat it now. If I could predict the future, I would be a lot wealthier than I am today, and I think that truth could be said by all of us if we knew what was going to happen before it happened.

But here's what I do know. As a comparison or as a foil, I suppose, to what Bill 3 is – and I heard some talk about assertions. Well, there were some assertions made about four years ago that if we added the largest tax increase in the history of Alberta in the form of a carbon tax and if we raised the minimum wage by an unprecedented 30 to 40 per cent in a short period of time and if we added regulations and if we paid no attention to how much revenue was coming in and just spend on everything that we thought was a good idea to the point where we ran up a deficit of $6 billion or $8 billion or $10 billion a year, literally, not figuratively but literally, and if we changed the way that we do things, from a reasonable level of debt with a plan to pay it back to the point where we got up to $60 billion in debt for Albertans in one term of office and projected getting up to $100 billion in debt in the second term of office, and, of course, with interest payments of about $2 billion after one term of office and projected interest payments on the debt of $4 billion after the second term of office, that everything would be great. Those were some past assertions.

Of course, Mr. Chair, it didn't work. There's now about in the neighbourhood of 180,000 Albertans out of work. There's record unemployment among young people. Investment has fled, and the rich corporations that the NDP like to complain about – they like to call them rich corporations, when, in fact, many corporations are rich and many corporations are not rich. I'll tell you what corporations did en masse. The large ones left. Corporations like Total Energy and Murphy Oil and a whole cadre of other oil and gas companies left. You know what they took with them? Their jobs, mortgage-paying jobs, that Albertans used to have and hold and could support themselves and their families with.

The hospitality industry, that paid a big part of the incredibly fast increase in the minimum wage, weren't able to employ as many people, and now instead of making $15 an hour, a lot of those people, whether they're young people or seniors or other people, are making zero dollars an hour because the jobs that they used to have at $12 or $13 an hour no longer exist.

I guess I would agree with the hon. member that making incorrect assertions is a risk. We've seen an example of a whole suite of incorrect assertions by the last government that didn't work. Mr. Chair, we are actually making some different assertions that we think will bring different results. If the hon. member is looking for a guarantee, I don't suppose that a guarantee could be offered to the hon. member, but I think it's not a bad strategy to do the opposite of what failed in order to attempt to succeed. I think that's an assertion that we're making here, and Bill 3 is a part of that assertion.

Now, Mr. Chair, I notice it's 5 to 6, so I am going to, with your permission, make a suggestion that we rise and report progress at this point, and I would like to test the will of the House on that motion.

[Motion carried]

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

The Acting Speaker: I believe I see the hon. Member for Athabasca-Barrhead-Westlock standing to report.

Mr. van Dijken: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Committee of the Whole has had under consideration a certain bill. The committee reports progress on the following bill: Bill 3. I wish to table copies of all amendments considered by the Committee of the Whole on this date for the official records of the Assembly.

The Acting Speaker: Does the Assembly concur in the report? All those in favour, say aye.

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Acting Speaker: Those opposed, say no. Agreed.
The hon. Minister of Transportation.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Since it's 3 minutes to 6 and we had some very good debate today and I genuinely don't feel like we can get any more meaningful debate done before 6 o'clock, I move that we consider it 6 o'clock and recess the House until 7:30 this evening.

The Acting Speaker: Just to confirm, your intention is to adjourn the Assembly until 7:30?

Mr. McIver: Thank you for correcting me. I move that we adjourn the House till 7:30 this evening.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 5:58 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

7:30 p.m.

Tuesday, June 11, 2019

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Please be seated.

Orders of the Day

Transmittal of Estimates

The Speaker: The hon. President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, I have received certain messages from Her Honour the Administrator, which I now transmit to you.

The Sergeant-at-Arms: Order!

The Speaker: Hon. members, the Administrator transmits supplementary supply estimates of certain sums required for the service of the province for the fiscal year ending March 31, 2019, and recommends the same to the Legislative Assembly.

For interim supply the Administrator transmits interim supply estimates of certain sums required for the service of the province of Alberta and certain sums required from the lottery fund for the fiscal year ending March 31, 2020, and recommends the same to the Assembly.

Please be seated.

The hon. the President of Treasury Board and the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I now wish to table the 2018-2019 supplementary estimates. When supplementary estimates are tabled, section 4(5) of the Fiscal Planning and Transparency Act requires that an update to the consolidated fiscal plan be tabled. Accordingly, I wish to table the 2018-2019 third-quarter fiscal update, which serves as the updated fiscal plan. The quarterly fiscal update provides the framework for additional spending authority for the Legislative Assembly and for the government.

Mr. Speaker, these supplementary supply estimates will provide additional spending to the Legislative Assembly and 15 government departments. When passed, the estimates will authorize an approximate increase of $8.9 million to the office of the Chief Electoral Officer, $449 million in expense funding, $53 million in capital investment funding, and $362 million in financial transactions funding. Some of these commitments relate to important activities, including wildfire management and emergency assistance; however, one of the largest expenses was to lease railcars. It is required by the traditions of parliamentary democracy that we must request funding for this ill-advised initiative.

In addition, I now wish to table the 2019-20 interim supply estimates. These interim supply estimates will provide spending authority to the Legislative Assembly and the government for the period of April 1, 2019, to November 30, 2019. This interim funding authority will ensure continuity in the business of the province while our government assesses the province's finances before introducing a budget in the fall of 2019. When passed, these interim supply estimates will authorize approximate spending of $107 million for the Legislative Assembly, $27.8 billion in expense funding, $2.4 billion in capital investment funding, $786 million in financial transactions funding for the government, and $943 million for the transfer from the lottery fund to the general revenue fund.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Government Motions

12. Mr. Toews moved:

Be it resolved that the message from Her Honour the Honourable the Lieutenant Governor, the 2018-19 supplementary supply estimates for the general revenue fund, and all matters connected therewith be referred to Committee of Supply.

The Speaker: Hon. members, according to Standing Order 18(1)(i) this is a debatable motion. Is there anyone wishing to speak to Government Motion 12?

Seeing none, is the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board wishing to close debate on Government Motion 12?

Mr. Toews: I'll waive this.

[Government Motion 12 carried]

13. Mr. Toews moved:

Be it resolved that pursuant to Standing Order 61(2) the Committee of Supply shall be called to consider the 2018-19 supplementary supply estimates for six hours on Wednesday, June 12, 2019.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Motion 13 is not debatable.

[Government Motion 13 carried]

14. Mr. Toews moved:

Be it resolved that the message from Her Honour the Honourable the Lieutenant Governor, the 2019-20 interim supply estimates, and all matters connected therewith be referred to Committee of Supply.

The Speaker: Hon. members, this is a debatable motion based upon Standing Order 18(1)(b). Is there anyone wishing to speak?

Seeing none, would the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board wish to close debate?

[Government Motion 14 carried]

15. Mr. Toews moved:

Be it resolved that pursuant to Standing Order 61(2) the Committee of Supply shall be called to consider the 2019-20 interim supply estimates for three hours on Wednesday, June 12, 2019.

The Speaker: Members, this motion is not debatable.

[Government Motion 15 carried]

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 7

Municipal Government (Property Tax Incentives) Amendment Act, 2019

[Adjourned June 11: Mr. Ellis]

The Speaker: Would the hon. Member for Calgary-West like to continue with the time remaining?

Mr. Ellis: No. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Why, thank you.

Is there anyone else wishing to debate on Bill 7? The hon. the Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise to speak on the matter of Bill 7 that is before this House, that the Minister of Municipal Affairs has put before us for our consideration. The Minister of Municipal Affairs has put forward what he says is legislation that expands the powers of municipalities to create a tax incentive program for nonresidential properties for up to 15 years. That might be, in fact, a good idea, which is why it existed beforehand.

In 2015, Mr. Speaker, the city of Lethbridge established a targeted redevelopment incentive policy to promote new construction or major renovation of medium- to large-scale commercial, retail, and mixed-use building projects that generate significant and ongoing expansion to the assessment base in the downtown core.

In May 2019, under this policy, council approved a $680,000 tax cancellation over seven years for the redevelopment of Six08 Health Inc., which is a fabulous building in the downtown, about three blocks from where I live and where my dental hygienist has her practice. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that this redevelopment of the downtown has led to renewed optimism among the business revitalization zone in Lethbridge, that we have, through this policy, and in particular the mixed-use building projects, been able to redevelop the downtown. A decade and a half ago, when I moved to Lethbridge, the downtown was just at the beginning of these conversations at the level of council and in the business community of how to make the downtown an attractive place to be. Like in many prairie cities, it had a number of challenges related to poverty, crime, drug use, and so on. I can tell you that this new targeted redevelopment incentive policy, that has been in place now for some time and is an 11-year policy that has been enacted by the city of Lethbridge, has been successful.

Clearly, they didn't need this bill to do that. Clearly, they didn't even need the refreshed Municipal Government Act, which twice our government brought before this Legislature and brought in a number of modernizations to the MGA. It's a big piece of legislation. It's one of the biggest. That's why almost every year governments find themselves in the position where they are doing a tremendous amount of consultation around the contents of the MGA. It's also because there are so many municipalities in Alberta, and we have a very vibrant level of democracy at the municipal level. And that's why I think municipalities were quite taken aback by this bill. They're not used to that. They're not used to people just kind of doing things without talking to them first. They take a relatively dim view of that, which is why we've seen municipalities speaking out on this matter since the bill's introduction.

There are, of course, other places where these kinds of tax incentives have been used, these kinds of tax tools. You know, despite the fact that we have these examples, we have heard claims from the government side that municipalities can only provide some tax deferral in times of hardship or for brownfield redevelopments, which was also a change that we made, in addition to some of the brownfield reclamation regulations in Environment and Parks, which was also something the municipalities asked for and have been asking for since about 2013. In fact, the government previous to us consulted on that, but that didn't feel like it was even good enough for us. We went back and consulted again because that's how municipalities like to have their relationship with the government of Alberta.

In fact, section 347, despite the government's claims, sets no requirement for hardship and indicates that a tax break could be provided in circumstances where council "considers it equitable to do so." You know, in fact, what we have here is that those municipalities who have been largely supportive are largely supportive because it is a thing that they already can do, are doing, or may do in the future under their existing powers as they understand them and as had been consulted with the GOA regardless if it was the government previous to ours, our government, or even future changes that may happen. That is fine. You know, a government can take time to put something in the window to dress it up, if you will, but at the end of the day it's really not what municipalities are asking for.

Right after I was elected, I went about doing some community consultation in anticipation of this session, so I met with a number of different folks, including the business revitalization zone, the city of Lethbridge, various people in the arts community, people who work in the persons with developmental disabilities sector, both school boards, and others that will come to me as I talk. I had a number of meetings. You know, I think it's fair to say that many roads in many of those conversations led back to the question of stable, predictable funding for municipalities and a good deal for small to medium-sized cities fashioned along the lines of the deal that was put in place through the city charters conversation, which, again, was not something that happened overnight. It happened with a large amount of consultation, again, because that's how municipalities, in my experience at least – and I will give the minister this advice free of charge – like to be engaged with.

Really, what I heard from my mayor and council, and I'm sure many of you will hear as well – and I believe there's a small and medium-sized cities caucus meeting, a sort of impromptu group; I believe that the city of Lethbridge is hosting said meeting – is that what they're interested in is a long-term deal around MSI, what they've always been interested in, and some stable, predictable investments in the things that they care about that make their city more vibrant and more livable.

I spoke earlier about the tax plan, that this bill claims to enable, that has been happening in Lethbridge for some time. Layered on top of that, the city of Lethbridge has really taken its social responsibilities seriously, and we're a really good example of collaboration. I believe that you can do that sometimes better in medium-sized cities than you can in larger places just because everybody knows each other. It's hard not to collaborate when you see each other in the grocery store on the weekend. They obviously undertake Team Lethbridge as well, that whole effort of bringing a whole bunch of people, public and private sector, to the Legislature for a couple of days, typically in November, to make the case, you know, "Hello; we're here; there is a world outside of Edmonton and Calgary," which I think governments of all stripes probably need to be reminded of periodically.

Lethbridge has done these things, but it's also taken a really comprehensive approach to its downtown. Certainly, they've done this business around the tax deferral, and it has actually been quite successful. One need only take a tour of downtown Lethbridge to see all the vibrant small businesses and all the activity going on there. They also have very serious concerns about their safe consumption site; the housing investments that are supposed to be coming, that were in fact committed to; and the new intox facility, that was in fact committed to. We have some new detox beds, but we need more, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, the issues around housing are significant, and our government made a commitment to supportive housing, new units, approximately 40 units of supportive housing. Really, city council and the business revitalization zone in my discussions with them were really pinning their hopes for further development, for further growth, for a vibrant and inclusive community on those aspects, not on a bill that, quite frankly, enables them to do something they're already doing. That's in the past, and my city council, at least, is looking to the future.

The other piece that they take really seriously and that I think this government should, too, is around the Truth and Reconciliation Commission. The city of Lethbridge was the first city, as I understand it, in Canada to adopt the recommendations of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission. They do a land acknowledgement at almost every city event that I've ever been to. I cannot recall one where that was not done. In Lethbridge, Mr. Speaker, we say we're a Blackfoot territory. It's not even a treaty acknowledgement due to how the local First Nations wish to be referred to. That's as a result of history, and that history is important. It's important for the provincial Crown, the little Crown as I always call it, to recognize that just as much as the big Crown. I will leave that as a piece of advice for all government members because it's embarrassing that we're even having this conversation. Those are the kinds of priorities that Bill 7 does not speak to. Those are the kinds of priorities that, if anyone had taken the time for a 45-minute meeting with just a smattering of municipalities, they would have identified prior to introducing this legislation, which, as I said, does something that people are already doing.

One of the other really key pieces that municipalities are in fact worried about and that has already been on this government's legislative agenda, to our great chagrin, is of course the cancellation of further funding commitments from the climate plan to the large cities and instead taking whatever residual funds that were left over from the price on pollution and just putting those into general revenue, essentially removing the ring fencing around the revenues, the commitments in good faith, the legislative commitments that came before this House. It's rescinding that and just leaving the large cities with absolute uncertainty in the same manner as happened to the mid-sized city, the one with which I have had the most interaction, and that's, of course, the city of Lethbridge. Of course, that piece was also not consulted on, Mr. Speaker. Again, I think that that really shows that there's potentially a learning curve there for the new government in terms of how they engage other elected levels of government. I certainly look forward through the Education Amendment Act to some of that consultation happening with school boards. I certainly haven't seen that yet. Just as Bill 7 is not what municipalities are asking for, neither is Bill 8 what boards are interested in.

There have been years of consultation, both on the MGA and on the municipal sustainability initiative. Now, MSI was never designed to be permanent, despite what some municipalities will tell you. It wasn't. It was always scheduled to sunset in some way, shape, or form, but the trick for government was to negotiate a deal through consultation that was good for Albertans and had municipalities share in our fortunes and was good for municipalities.

It serves no one for me to have to take my car in for repair every three or four weeks because I hit another giant pothole. That serves no one. It serves no one to have a downtown that has social disorder and disarray and inequality and my municipality not being able to address those problems. It serves no one for our friends who own small businesses in small cities to not be able to work with their business revitalization zone and others to be able to make a living. That certainly serves no one. It certainly serves no one to have an arts community who is waiting on commitments around MSI for things like a performing arts centre. I was describing to one of our colleagues just this afternoon that the city of Lethbridge is waiting on some certainty around MSI for a new performing arts centre. The federal contribution has been made, and the city contribution will be through MSI if MSI stays as it is. Certainly, not just our arts community but also Tourism Lethbridge and our small business community are very much waiting for the commitment around that performing arts centre. That will really help us, again, in addition to the tax tools that are proposed in this nothing-burger bill.

Those are the kinds of things. If the province was really interested in legislating around municipal issues, then might I suggest a city charter that is not immediately in tatters? Might I suggest an MSI formula that somehow is fair for all involved? That doesn't mean that everyone gets everything they want, neither municipalities nor province.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available for questions and comments. I see the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood rising.

Member Irwin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to thank the Member for Lethbridge-West as well. I really appreciated her perspective and, obviously, being here in Edmonton, hearing the Lethbridge experience is an important one, particularly when it comes to this bill. As the member noted and others have noted in this Chamber, we really see that this bill is a whole lot of nothing given that much of the provisions are already happening across this province.

The Member for Lethbridge-West and a number of other members spoke about the collaborative approach that they took, particularly as ministers. I know the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview outlined the importance of working collaboratively. They were really able to see the fruits of their labour in their previous roles, particularly in rural areas, in the heartland, and a few other examples that were outlined earlier.

Now, I know the Member for Lethbridge-West mentioned that she met with, you know, business revitalization zones, business owners, and community members over the last number of years, which again highlights just that, the collaborative, co-operative approach, Team Lethbridge, as she called it. I worry about the perhaps unintended consequences of this government's approach because we saw that both mayors Iveson and Nenshi sort of raised their concerns about more of a competitive model, not the same collaborative approach that our government took. I know the mayor of St. Albert also raised some of her concerns. You know, I guess I would just like to pose to the member: should we be concerned about the approach that this government is taking with Bill 7? Perhaps we're issuing a bit of a warning here that, you know, if it ain't broke, don't fix it.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Ms Phillips: Well, certainly, Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member's query, the challenges for a large capital region or a large metropolitan region such as Calgary, where you have a number of bedroom communities and others who may be availing themselves of city services but living somewhere else and paying taxes somewhere else: those challenges are a little bit different in southern Alberta and certainly even distinct from a place like Grande Prairie, where we do see this phenomenon happening as well, where the city of Grande Prairie sometimes has a hard time keeping up with all the service provisions for people who live outside of it.

That may be less of an issue in Lethbridge, but something that is more of an issue, I would argue, is the vibrant arts community and the instability that this government has introduced through not actually meeting the concerns of municipalities. Because we have a vibrant arts community, they contribute mightily to the regional economy. We are home to a number of recording artists that we as representatives of this province might want to go out and brag about. They are some of the leading lights in terms of the alternative country, Americana, Canadian roots music scene in Canada, and they live in Lethbridge.

What the arts community, when I meet them, are very worried about is CFEP, CIP, and FCSS in particular; FCSS because a lot of the arts community, musicians, artists, and others also work with people with disabilities through a number of different programs. That's oftentimes what people's day jobs are. That's not just about quality of life for musicians having jobs. It's also about quality of life for people of all kinds of different backgrounds and differently abled people. Certainly, the arts community is concerned, as I mentioned, about the future of the performing arts centre and our ability to attract talent and, therefore, economic activity to the downtown and elsewhere.

The CFEP and CIP programs, too, are of deep concern to the arts community, and they have come up in other conversations in terms of city councillors who are more connected to the arts community. Those are smaller grants that sometimes make it easier for a nonprofit to do things like invest in equipment. The taiko society: I remember giving them a cheque for some new drums. Of course, we have a large Japanese-Canadian population in Lethbridge from the fairly sad legacy of World War II. We have a whole bunch of different taiko groups in Lethbridge. Certainly, the arts community is concerned about those things given that we are a regional hub for arts activity, Mr. Speaker, and Bill 7 does nothing to address any of those actual concerns of actual Albertans who live in southern Alberta.

The Speaker: Hon. members, anyone else wishing to speak to Bill 7 at second reading? The hon. the Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Mr. Speaker, thank you. Nellie would be proud of that long-drawn McClung and appreciate that emphasis.

I'd like to start my comments, Mr. Speaker, by letting the House know that I recognize the theme or pattern that the government has adopted here. The UCP government seems to be adopting a pattern that is not unlike that of the former Progressive Conservative government, the last one that we defeated when we came to power in 2015. That former PC government made announcements of phantom projects repeatedly, school projects in particular. They just kept reannouncing and reannouncing and reannouncing school projects beside signs that were in vacant fields, and these projects just never got built. Well, this Bill 7 reminds me of that theme and that process.

This enabling legislation just re-emphasizes powers that municipalities already have. It's like the young son who brushes his teeth for the second time in front of his mom, so she'll see what he's done, and says: what a good boy am I. Well, just repeating your steps, just reannouncing projects, or just revisiting or raising awareness of the powers that municipalities already have doesn't accomplish anything.

It appears as though in the process as well that the current government is looking to nail as many nails into the coffin of the collaborative approach to municipal and regional governments as possible. I'm just wondering if they couldn't see the collaborative approach more as something that would be described in the past as a barn-raising bee, where the community got together to help one another build their projects. That is considered perhaps by members of the opposition to be an enterprise, something where they got together, but not a collaboration. Well, in fact, Mr. Speaker, collaboration is the modern barn-raising bee if that's a way of having the members of the government accept the process.

It's a community effort. It's an effort where people get together to look at their strengths, to solve problems that they jointly have, and, for example, as I mentioned earlier today in the House, to perhaps have the economic anchor of a school be maintained in a community, where one community will decide to do grades 3 to 4 and the other community will decide to do grades 1 to 2 and thus keep the schools in both communities viable and, in so doing, allow the community to survive and maintain a threshold population. Those types of community projects, the collaboration, that effort, are something that this Municipal Government (Property Tax Incentives) Amendment Act, 2019, actually goes a long way to decimating.

It's a means of getting communities to pit oneself against another, and it ends up making communities the worse off for it. You know, competition is one thing if you're talking about the survival of the fittest in nature, where wolves or coyotes or other predators will compete against each other. We're talking about human beings and communities in Alberta, where collaboration is a more productive way of acting together in unison to accomplish goals that have a common objective.

Mr. Speaker, I really hope that the members opposite in the government can take another look at how they would describe the collaborative efforts that we attempted to enshrine in legislation and in the associations that we hoped to engender between communities and regional municipalities and maybe see it in the framework that helps them to grasp the concept. I suggest, perhaps, that it's the modern form of a barn-raising bee, and maybe that's something that they can attach themselves to.

I'd like to also suggest that the legislation is something that really is already in place. The measures in it already exist, so it's a totally unnecessary piece of legislation. I'll give you a couple of examples, Mr. Speaker, to detail that. For example, showing that this measure and ability already exists in current legislation, the community of Chestermere created a policy in 2019 to enable tax cancellations for nonresidential commercial developments, industrial developments, seniors' housing, and multifamily housing in the form of three- to four-story apartment buildings. The city provided an example of a $10 million building that qualified for a discount. Therefore, the developer would see municipal taxes waived for three years and could receive a total refund of approximately $235,000. That policy would expire at the end of 2020, and council said in the release that it hoped the incentive would fill some vacant lots. Mr. Speaker, that policy already exists and has been taken advantage of by communities in Alberta recently.

Calgary is another example. In May 2019 the council in Calgary provided a one-time cancellation of $94,000 in property taxes for the Royal Canadian Legion in Kensington. No secret. It's already in place. Unnecessary legislation. This Bill 7 accomplishes nothing that does not already exist and, in fact, is simply just a means for the government to reintroduce something and say, "What a good boy am I. Aren't we doing something for you?" when, in fact, there's no benefit that isn't already conferred upon municipalities in this legislation, so it's really unnecessary, do-nothing-new legislation.

I could go on with other examples and suggest that there would be current municipalities that do provide tax breaks in times of hardship or brownfield developments. The members opposite would suggest that that's the only time that they could perhaps provide these tax breaks currently, but that's not the case, as I've just cited that Chestermere and Calgary certainly do it already.

The mayor of Edmonton is largely supportive of the whole project, but he said that any additional flexibility is generally a good thing; however, we want to learn more. He's concerned. He said that I think we've got to have a conversation in our region to see how these tools will grow the regional economy because selective use by one of us to undermine the others could be the one risk here.

Mr. Speaker, pitting against one another municipalities who right now are more akin to look towards a collaborative approach is the exact wrong direction that we need to go in this province.

The regional government model that we're looking at in and around Edmonton and the surrounding areas of Calgary, even, dare I say, Red Deer, as well, where people are looking to see what they bring to the table and how they can benefit the larger group in terms of transportation and infrastructure projects and utilities and economic development: there's no end to the projects that they find a better way forward than collaboration. Collaboration is not a buzzword; it's a reality that's been discovered by government after government after government that works and doesn't pit communities against each other. In the end you end up having much more efficient use of resources and an excellent rapport between the regional municipalities and an integrated infrastructure that actually works for the long term and is more cost-effective.

Mr. Speaker, I'm really unhappy that this government has seen fit to bring forward a piece of legislation just simply to reintroduce something that already exists, claiming credit for doing something to assist municipalities when, in fact, they've already got the opportunity to do what the bill purports that they're bringing on new. I really do expect that the public will take notice of this although the government is probably hoping that they won't, and they'll realize that this government has got an empty piece of legislation here. I certainly am one who encourages all members of this House to make sure that they express their disapproval of it.

When we were government, Mr. Speaker – and I know that the current government doesn't like to hear us talk about it because they say, "Well, we were slammed in defeat. We got 55 per cent of the vote." True. Guess what? 45 per cent of the population didn't vote for you, so there's a significant dichotomy in this province, and there's room for plenty of debate, and that's what's going to happen. It's a healthy thing in this province. Good on you. You won the election, but I'll tell you what. You won a percentage of the vote, but those people that didn't vote for you also deserve a fair hearing and representation and to be respected as well.

There's a great debate going on in this Legislature, and I think it's a healthy one. It's basically a tug-of-war between two economic schools of thought. We're looking at demand-side economics, which, on this side of the House in opposition, we in the NDP caucus will purport as the best way to go. The other side of the House, the current government, is a supporter of supply-side economics. That's a long-time economic debate that's been taking place over a few generations already and will probably go on long beyond our generation and this Legislature. However, the current demands of the province, economically and socially, demand that we take the debate seriously and rather than trying to run roughshod over each other personally, seriously take a look at what applies best given the current economic frustrations that we face in this province.

Here on this side of the House we believe that demand-side, stimulating spenders, where we recognize 70 per cent of the economy in the aggregate is consumer spending – if you put more money in the hands of consumers, you're going to increase demand and therefore stimulate jobs and job creation. The opposite view is well expressed by the current government. We, of course, are at loggerheads on that, and I welcome a real, solid intellectual debate on that so that people in the province can really understand the choices that are before them. Maybe somewhere there are some ways to compromise, there are some bits and pieces that the two economic schools of thought can be in a collaborative way implemented. I think it's important that we take a look at the whole issue very intellectually and be honest about the fact that it's a healthy thing to debate amongst ourselves as parliamentarians and to present clearly the choices to Albertans.

There are a lot of people who are on both sides of the fence as far as support for the governing party and the opposition party regardless of the seat disposition in the House. You know, 55 per cent of the vote is 55 per cent of the vote, but 45 per cent of the population, Mr. Speaker, did not vote for the government. I think the government does itself damage if it forgets that. Certainly, boast about getting your 55 per cent. Fine and dandy. You won the election, you got a majority, and you rule the roost at the moment. But the 45 per cent of the people who did not vote also deserve the respect that currently doesn't seem to be forthcoming. I for one will stand up for those people, as I was elected to do, with pride, dignity, and an insistence that they receive the same from the other side of the House.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available for questions and comments. I see the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford rising to make a brief question or comment.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was just interested in the comments made by the previous speaker about the nature of co-operation and the fact that the government side of this House has sort of sold the farm and lost the plot and forgotten their roots with regard to the type of co-operation that helped to build this province, the idea that people working together can achieve so much more than people going after each other, attacking each other in order to get personal derived benefits.

I'm very interested in some of the experiences from his hometown of Thorhild, I believe. I know that there have been a number of organizations such as the farm-fair society and other groups that have demonstrated the benefits of co-operation and the notion that we as citizens in a democracy, particularly in Alberta and, of course, within the country of Canada, have been able to achieve great things because we have not allowed that terrible inequality of some people succeeding while others do not. We have not allowed that to get as extreme as in some countries in the world, where very few people derive all the benefits of the natural resources and the power within the society. Instead, we try to share those natural benefits.

I know that whenever I spend time speaking with the indigenous community, they highlight this very point, that a society really only does well when people are co-operatively working together to try to achieve the benefits for all. It's not simply a form of governance, but it's also a spiritual value within the indigenous community, that when one makes a decision, you don't simply make a decision for your own welfare and your own benefit but you actually think about the larger community and have the decisions that you make benefit the larger community. Of course, they're not just speaking about the community in the sense of, you know, the immediate relations that happen to live in the same home that they live in but, of course, all of the other people around them who live in homes next door and around the valley and down the stream and, in fact, across the country.

I know that they talk not only as a widely geographically – of course, you know, Cree people living in Alberta see their families extending not just in Alberta but across Saskatchewan and Manitoba and Ontario and Quebec. I know that the Blackfoot people, for example, still recognize a Blackfoot Confederacy that spans not just southern Alberta but, of course, through Saskatchewan, through the northern United States into the Dakotas. What they talk about is the fact that we work together to create an environment where everybody can have their needs met in a reasonable way. They talk not only about that geographical spread but also talk about a historical spread, and that is that decisions that are made should be made not only for this immediate generation but for future generations. I'm sure many people have heard the expression that a decision that is made should be made with forethought about the next seven generations down the road.

I do know that the speaker was speaking quite eloquently about the fact that that kind of belief system, that kind of philosophy is very important in terms of creating a society that is in and of itself a good society, that allows each person to achieve their greatest good in terms of their own skill set and their own ability to contribute but also to derive from that society a reasonable and fair share of the benefits of that society.

You know, in the indigenous community that was demonstrated largely when, for example, someone would have the opportunity to go out hunting and would shoot a moose and would return back to the community. They didn't put it back in their own home and stock up their own shelves and ignore the rest of the community. They brought it to the community setting, and they shared the benefits of that successful hunt with everyone around them. That's the kind of co-operation that built this province long before this province was a province, long before the settlers came and settled in this community. The value of a shared community is very important, and I'm sorry that we're losing it now.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there any others wishing to speak to Bill 7? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak to Bill 7, the Municipal Government (Property Tax Incentives) Amendment Act, 2019. We know that the Minister of Municipal Affairs recently announced legislation claiming that it's going to expand power to municipalities to create tax incentive programs for nonresidential properties for up to 15 years. Unfortunately, it doesn't do that. There's no real change that we see because municipalities already have the ability to provide tax breaks for nonresidential properties under the MGA. We've heard about a few examples already as we've been debating this, some from Calgary, Lethbridge, Chestermere.

We've also heard that there's been a significant lack of consultation around this. Our municipal leaders across the province haven't really had a lot of consultation or input into this legislation. Perhaps if consultation had occurred, something more than what already exists would have been presented in this bill. We know that municipalities are worried about the reckless cuts, $4.5 billion in corporate tax giveaways, and how this is going to impact their ability to serve their residents.

There are claims from the government that this bill will allow municipalities to defer taxes for up to 15 years, like I had mentioned, that it will attract new investment and developments as a result. Unfortunately, it appears that the majority of the powers that the UCP claims it's giving municipalities already exists under section 347 of the Municipal Government Act, the MGA, that I had referenced earlier. Where in the MGA does this exist? It's under section 347, Mr. Speaker. Let me read to you what it already does. Section 347 states:

(1) If a council considers it equitable to do so, it may, generally or with respect to a particular taxable property or business or a class of taxable property or business, do one or more of the following, with or without conditions:

- (a) cancel or reduce tax arrears;
- (b) cancel or refund all or part of a tax;

(c) defer the collection of a tax.

(2) A council may phase in a tax increase or decrease resulting from the preparation of any new assessment.

That is already currently written in the Municipal Government Act.

Municipalities that have created tax incentive programs or provided tax breaks for nonresidential properties include – we heard the Member for Edmonton-McClung talk about some of the stuff that was happening in Chestermere.

In Lethbridge in 2015 they established TRIP, the targeted redevelopment incentive policy, to promote new construction or a major renovation of medium- to large-scale commercial, retail, and mixed-use building projects that generate significant and ongoing expansion to the assessment base in the downtown core. Policy states that it will establish an 11-year municipal tax cancellation policy to provide incentive for the construction or major renovation of commercial, office, retail, and mixed-use projects. In May 2019, under this policy, council approved a $680,000 tax cancellation over seven years for a $4.85 million development by Six08 Health Inc., something that already happened under the legislation, that this government is saying they're going to implement in this legislation. It's already there, Mr. Speaker.

In Calgary one that I'm particularly proud of is happening. In May 2019 council provided a one-time cancellation of $94,000 in property taxes for the Royal Canadian Legion in Kensington.

Mr. Speaker, these are just some of the examples of how this current bill isn't needed. The municipalities are already doing these things. They can already provide tax breaks in times of hardship or brownfield redevelopments. Sorry, I lost my place. New authorities will be created to allow municipalities to establish tax incentive programs for businesses, job creators, and investors through bylaw. That's already possible, for a municipality to create a tax incentive program through bylaw. This is not prohibited under section 347 of the MGA.

They say: new authorities enable multiyear tax incentives to be created. Again, Mr. Speaker – I'm sure you're not surprised to hear this – this can already happen, as evidenced by Lethbridge, which established an 11-year tax incentive policy, and Chestermere, which we heard earlier has a policy in place until the end of 2020. They're saying that it allows for proactive cancellation of taxes, not just retroactive tax breaks. This again is not true. Under section 347 a council can cancel, reduce, refund, or defer the collection proactively.

In short, Mr. Speaker, while this bill may clarify existing authorities and prescribe how municipalities can create tax incentive programs, it does not fundamentally shift the authorities that exist already under the act. These are minor tweaks, not major shifts.

Mr. Speaker, if the government wants to attract investment, they need to take practical steps, like some of the things that we did. So I'd like to highlight some of the things that our government did to support business. We cut the small-business tax by a third. We made thousands of loans more readily available by a $1.5 billion increase to ATB Financial's borrowing limits. We worked with the Business Development Bank of Canada to establish a $1 billion fund for new business loans along with mentoring supports. The new Alberta investor tax credit has provided refunds to hundreds of small businesses on green technology investments. We doubled funding for a technology development program with Alberta Innovates, helping hundreds of small businesses go from testing to marketing. Small-business incubators were added to help businesses grow faster, and mentoring supports were expanded so entrepreneurs could launch more start-ups, innovate, and expand. Through a partnership with Business Link, one-on-one supports and resources for immigrant clients helped newcomers get ahead.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation that's been introduced under the Municipal Affairs minister doesn't do anything. It speaks to a whole bunch of things. It perhaps provides some clarity to municipalities. Municipalities were not consulted on this. I'm sure, had they been, like I mentioned, they would have come up with something that would have helped. This is just simply not a bill that does anything. I think – it was a reference to Seinfeld – it's an entire bill about not much.

Ms Hoffman: One press conference.

Ms Goehring: One press conference.

Again I would encourage members of the House to not support this bill because really there's nothing in here that allows municipalities to do anything that they aren't already allowed to do. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available if anyone has questions and comments. The hon. the Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I was quite enchanted with the speaker who comes to us from Edmonton-Castle Downs, who just spoke. I wanted to actually hear if she had any historical background from her family or her family's rural roots that would perhaps shed some light on the theme of collaboration, which seems to be under threat from this piece of legislation.

I know from my background that – you know, you were speaking about societies – well, ag societies are very much an important element of co-operation and collaboration in this province. They have a history that goes back to 1947. Currently there are 293 agricultural societies which operate and are relatively important to significant communities in Alberta, including Edmonton. Of course, Northlands is one. However, in my home village of Thorhild – I'm going to become an honorary citizen of that community, I think, if I have anything to do about it – the ag society there is still operating.

Of course, it was something that my grandparents belonged to in their roles as community leaders. It created the Thorhild stampede association, which still holds the Thorhild Stampede. It used to be July 1 and 2, but I believe it's just a one-day event. That brings people from far and wide. It brings the whole community together in a collaborative effort. When they first started the Thorhild Stampede, my grandparents and great-grandparents would bring their own stock to the stampede. Each of the community's townspeople would ride each other's most rank bulls and horses. Usually a little wager was on between them. It could have involved money, could have been corn liquor. I'm not sure. But there was certainly something on the line for whoever got to ride the longest or the hardest.

Now, other forms of co-operation also existed. There were community development projects. I know that my great-grandfather Walter Horne was involved in the community. There was a need for a school in the village, that was trying to attract a teacher into a teacherage. A building was required. So they got together with a few others and on a stoneboat, otherwise known as an old gate, hooked up to a team of horses, hauled a granary off my great-grandfather's farm to the village of Thorhild. That was the first school in town. These community development projects are collaboration amongst people to help each other out and get things done. In the same way, we're asking that this government consider maintaining that collaborative spirit in the province of Alberta by not pitting communities against each other.

I was going to ask the Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs if she wished to talk about some of the experiences of her family in the past or maybe even locally in Castle Downs where she's witnessed collaborative efforts to help keep community efforts going, whether it be a project or a community league, the construction of a hall or what have you, to ensure that communities survive. There are lots of ways that communities can express themselves, Mr. Speaker, to show how they can support each other and serve a need that's more regional in nature than themselves alone and thereby serve the wider community and people within it.

It's not only schools. It can be business. It can be a means of having local businesses decide that they're going to be, for example, serving one particular element of the farm implement business, and you will decide as an implement dealer, which, of course, my grandfather Horne was also one – he was a John Deere dealer. He was one who had a familiarity with tractors, and he was more the horsepower guy rather than the pulled implements. People would come to him quite often for their first tractor after being involved in farming using real horsepower, like two horsepower or four horsepower. They'd come in to get their John Deere from him, and that would be the first tractor that they actually ever owned after giving up their horses. So I know that at a community level and a regional level collaboration works. [A timer sounded]

The Speaker: We were so close to hearing from the hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs with respect to her rural roots. It's disappointing for the entire House not to have that opportunity.

Is there anyone else wishing to debate Bill 7?

Seeing none, would the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs like to close debate? You don't have to. [interjections] Perfect. Thank you for that very decisive decision.

[Motion carried; Bill 7 read a second time]

Bill 8

Education Amendment Act, 2019

[Adjourned debate June 10: Member LaGrange]

The Speaker: Hon. members, before us we have Bill 8 at second reading. Is there anyone wishing to join the debate? I see the Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Surprise, Mr. Speaker, and thank you very much, colleagues, for the opportunity to debate. Actually, I wish I didn't have to say thank you. I wish we weren't actually debating this bill. But we're here, so I will engage in my opportunity to say why I think this bill is so damaging and why I think we shouldn't be here debating this.

Let me start by referring to Bill Hate, an act to destroy GSAs, which, clearly, is just that. This bill has been a strategy to attack LGBTQ youth, queer youth, who said to us when the old Bill 10 was passed, after much pressure from the public particularly – the backstory to that was, as the former Premier, the Member for Edmonton-Strathcona, outlined earlier this afternoon, about how there was pressure because a member of an opposition caucus brought forward an independent bill, a private member's bill. Again, private members' bills are really important, I think, because not everyone has the opportunity to sit around the cabinet table and drive an agenda.

A private member from an opposition caucus brought forward a bill saying that they wanted to create GSAs, flowing from work that had been done in other jurisdictions, including Manitoba mostly at that time. The government was put in such an awkward position, where there were certainly a number of people in the party that didn't want them to move on this. Then there were also many people in society who knew how important it was.

The reason why they knew how important it was is because they had exposed themselves to the research, research that showed that students who were LGBTQ, gay students, are far more likely to be successful in completing high school, successful in maintaining a home address, not being homeless, and successful in terms of finishing an average life expectancy – not dying, Mr. Speaker, to be very frank – when they had opportunities to be part of gay-straight alliances, specifically, gay-straight alliances or queer-straight alliances, not general inclusion clubs, not diversity clubs, not everybody-is-in clubs, but specifically clubs where gay or queer was named in the title, where kids felt that they could be included.

One other thing, to go back even further, actually. The very first GSA originally started with a different title – it was called students and teachers opposing prejudice – and it started in Red Deer. Red Deer is the home of GSAs in North America. It was the first beacon of hope and of stopping prejudice and stopping discrimination. So that's an interesting point. It started at Lindsay Thurber high school, and those students definitely deserve a shout-out for the work that they did back then.

Back to the government being pressured through a private member's bill to bring forward something. They didn't have to bring in anything. They could have just voted on the private member's motion. But the government of the day was particularly hostile towards opposition caucuses and didn't seem to want to acknowledge that anything good could come from anywhere other than the cabinet bench, to be honest, it seemed to me. I'm sure the Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat can recall his experiences. I believe he was here during that time. The governing cabinet at that time didn't have much latitude given to their caucus members, didn't have much time for other caucuses outside of – well, really, for anyone outside of cabinet. That really seemed to be the way it was.

Lo and behold, the government decided: "Hey, we're going to fix this. We're going to come in with our own bill – our own bill – and then you can have two bills on the Order Paper that address the same topic, so the private member's bill will get bumped. Our bill will take precedence, and that will be just grand. We'll all get to debate our bill. Oh, and we also won't do all the things that are going to actually protect kids or include the word 'gay' or include measures that have proven to be necessary in other jurisdictions, including Manitoba."

That backfired. There ended up being, I think it was at the light-up at the Leg., hundreds of people coming out to protest. Rather than enjoying the light-up that December season, there were hundreds of people out there protesting, demanding an opportunity to have their voices heard.

Very quickly, the cabinet scurried. They drafted some amendments, and they came back and said: "Oh, never mind the horrible stuff that we said we were going to do. Remember when we said that we were going to make you kids go to Tim Hortons to have your support group? Clearly, that would be a safe place for you to discuss this. We can't force the school to make you have these conversations. It's just too controversial, so you'll have to go off campus. You'll have to go across the street, maybe. If you don't feel comfortable in Tim Hortons because somebody might overhear you, well, then, maybe you can just hang out in the back parking lot. That would be a nice solution, right?"

All of these things continued to shame and suppress rather than protect and demonstrate pride. My hon. colleagues, through you,

Mr. Speaker, this is why pride is so important. Because pride is the response to suppression. Pride is the response to oppression. Pride is the response to shame. For an eternity, people who were gender-identity or sexual-orientation minorities were shamed. So this is why pride is so important.

Here we jump to today – oh, no. There was some more stuff. Sorry. A trip down memory lane. So that bill came in: public shame. They amended it. They said: "Sure, kids can have GSAs on campus. Never mind, we just misspoke. Don't worry. That was a communications error. Sure, kids can have GSAs on campus."

Then we had an election, and that was one of the issues that certainly motivated many people. In the election before that, there was the lake of fire, but it seemed to definitely spill over into that election, some of the concerns around the way that the then PC Party had handled, or mishandled, queer youth so significantly, the way that they had absolutely bullied these youth and tried to push shame and stigma in terms of: go to Tim Hortons or go to the parking lot to have your GSA meeting.

So we had a change of government. We're sitting around the cabinet table, and the Education minister makes it very clear that the youth in this province haven't started creating GSAs or QSAs at increased rates. When we asked him why, he said: "Well, because the bill says you need to do all these things, but it doesn't say when. It doesn't say that you actually need to do them timely." "All right, then. That's something that we can address. You must do it immediately."

One of the reasons, again, why we acted on it immediately is because we used the evidence around information that showed that where there are students who are minorities in this way, who feel that they're at the point where they're asking for a club, often they're at the point where they really need somebody to turn to, and they really need somebody to give them that emotional or psychological support.

So saying, "Instead of us actually helping to create this support group for you, why don't you go for counselling; why don't you give it a little bit more thought; why don't you create a more inclusive group because you don't want it to just be the LGBTQ kids" – one more part of this trip down memory lane, of course, includes when I was at Edmonton public schools. We brought forward a policy to ensure that all LGBTQ youth have safe, respectful learning environments and that it be the same for staff, students, and families. We were very proud of the work that we did, and I think it's guided a lot of the policies around this province, and I'm very grateful for that.

We brought forward a resolution to the Alberta School Boards Association around that same time, and one of the trustees in debate said: "Well, you know, they wouldn't need these groups if they weren't acting so gay, right? If you didn't act so gay, you could blend in at school, and you wouldn't get harassed or bullied." It was outrageous, and it was something that I think a lot of Albertans were deeply concerned about. After he said that, CBC was, like: hey, do you want to come on the radio and explain your position? He basically doubled down on what he'd already said. So it was clear that there was a need for people who were entrusted to provide policies and take care of youth to have education themselves around how to actually take care of kids and provide safe, supportive environments.

So this has been a long and winding road, but the kids were very clear with us. The kids said: enough delay; we need it to be immediately. Fortunately, we had a fantastic Education minister, who acted immediately and brought in an amendment to Bill 10 to say “immediately.” Well, in this new Education Act that’s completely removed.

Then the kids also said: we really appreciate the immediate piece. There was another piece, turning to my hon. colleague from Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood: “immediate” and maybe it was “naming”? I’ll get back to that one when that second brainwave comes. It’s a little bit later. I’ve been speaking since my friends and I were in Public Accounts this morning, it feels like. Sometimes my brain is a little slower than my mouth.

This is how we sort of got to this point where kids said that they needed it to be much more quickly, and that they needed to make sure that there were staff on campus that would act immediately to support them. Making these changes to this act the covert way, of course, is intending to do this and just say, like: oh, we’re just going to go back to the way it was four years ago. Well, the way it was four years ago, kids were still in high – oh, of course. The guarantee that you not be outed, the guarantee that there not be parental notification: that was the second piece. Sorry. My brain caught up. So that was the second amendment that was made. Again, that piece hasn’t made its way into this act.

The reason why we did that – the minister will tell all of us, will say: well, PIPA and FOIP provide the protections. School administrators, school teachers told us: “We don’t know if we have an obligation in loco parentis to tell parents that their kids have joined these clubs or not. We need clarity from you, government. We need clarity. Should we tell them? Must we tell them? Or shall we not?” That’s it, three very basic things that they said. We didn’t just listen. We stood up and said: fair point; we will make sure that we give that clarity.

So those are the two main amendments that give youth the ability to join these clubs and do so in a way that enables that it’s done quickly and that it’s done confidentially so that they get the support that they need.

I also want to say that some people who’ve never been to a GSA meeting – and I’m sure they’re happening, probably, in most of our ridings. If they aren’t happening in your riding and you want to come see one in one of our ridings, we can probably invite you to one of them if you have questions or concerns about what GSA meetings look like. I know that, for example, in my own riding the Edmonton Catholic school teachers have a GSA, a GSA for the teaching staff, because not that long ago there were many teachers who felt that if they put up a picture of their family in their locker, in the staff room, or even in their classroom, they could get fired for putting up that picture. So the teachers themselves got together and formed a GSA.

I spoke to one teacher who, when his partner of many, many years – I’m going to guess probably 20 years – passed away, didn’t feel that he could actually call in to the school and take the time off because of the fact that he was grieving for the loss of his lifelong love. He had to say that he had a family emergency and get a doctor’s note. It’s very sad and very wrong that teachers not that long ago – we talk a lot about kids, but this is also about that whole school environment, which is why we said: staff, students, and families – did not feel that they could confide in their employer, confide in their colleagues to say: this is why I need time off, because I am experiencing this grief and this trauma in my life.

These amendments were done in a way to protect kids based on what the kids told us and based on what the people who work with the kids told us. That is why this bill, in my opinion and in the opinion of the youth that I spent time with in Calgary, at the protest that youth organized – and when youth organize something, kids are really good at organizing, you know. Like, let’s meet up on our phones. Remember when PokeStops were all the rage a couple of years ago? They’re really good at arranging that kind of stuff: well, let’s arrange a protest down at city hall, where we have to call, we have to book the site, we have to make sure the police know where we’ll be marching. Like, that is a lot of amazing co-ordination from students, mostly high school students, that went into organizing that protest.

The students told us – one person came up to the stage who had graduated a few years earlier and talked about how when she was outed by other people in the community to her parents, she was evicted from her home. Living homeless in rural southern Alberta, trying to find somebody to go from couch to couch, to get that little extra safety from, put her in a very precarious position. Now, her parents a few years later had another child come out. When that child came out, that child had an opportunity to make that decision on how to address it with their family themselves, had talked it through with some of the supportive staff at the school and come up with a plan, and when they came out, the parents responded very differently and, actually, welcomed that older daughter back into the home.

This is the power that support groups, specifically gay-straight alliances and queer-straight alliances, can have. They cannot just change and save lives; they can also support families. So by taking this tool away from school staff and from families, I think that we are not just putting kids at risk, which is – I am confident that there will be many times where members of the front bench will stand up and say: one child dying is one child too many; we need to act to make sure that this never happens. What we’re doing through consideration of this bill is creating conditions for that to happen.

I think that it was a parent who was talking about supervised consumption and about putting the blinders on being akin to being complicit to homicide. I would argue that by us putting these kids in this position of precarity, where these kids have told us that it causes unsafe encounters – and I want you to all know that I believe that the vast majority of parents are loving and kind and supportive. I really do. But if there is one who is willing to send their child onto the street and that child dies, I think we have an obligation to respond in a way that ensures that doesn’t happen.

The research is clear that there have been many ones. So if one child dying is one too many, we have an opportunity to prevent that from happening through our strong and vocal opposition to this bill. I know that for members of the caucus you probably haven’t had a ton of time to engage on this. You probably haven’t had an opportunity to really voice your concerns with your leader, with the Premier, and with the minister responsible for this bill. But I call on you to do so because one child dying is one child too many, and I don’t want any of us in this room to have that on our consciences.

I also want to mention that at that Alberta School Boards Association meeting that I was referring to, there was discussion and debate about: oh, well, if it’s gay kids now, what’s next; fat kids? I have to say that the person who came up to the mic next was a bigger gentleman, and he definitely – I was never sure what he was going to say when he came up to the mic. But what he did say was that he was a teacher in a school before he was a trustee and that there were kids in that school that were absolutely bullied, bullied for being gay or appearing gay, acting too gay, just like that other trustee had earlier said, and that the biggest regret he had in his life was that he allowed it to happen and in some cases he actually contributed to that harassment and that bullying.

As a 60-some-year-old gentleman he said: “I don’t want another teacher to ever have the guilt and the remorse that I feel today. I think that we owe it to teachers to make sure that they know what they need to do to keep kids safe and protected and loved. It’s pretty simple.” That was from Terry Riley, the trustee for Medicine Hat for many, many years.

It's not the same. It's not the same as being called out for the colour of your hair or your weight. I'm sure the trolls are having lots of fun with me talking about people being overweight. It's not the same, though. It really isn't.

That's the main thrust I want to address on this. I do call on all of the caucus members who are here who are not in the cabinet and haven't had an opportunity to really voice these concerns to, please, on behalf of the children who are telling you that they feel at risk because these changes have made a difference in their lives, don't let this get pushed through. Don't let your Premier and your Minister of Education tell you that this is the strongest law in the province or that it will still be the strongest law in the country because it's simply not factual. I think that we presented those facts earlier today. I know that there was an interesting ruling.

The facts are that other jurisdictions have taken it a step further from where Alberta was five years ago because other jurisdictions knew that their laws needed to be strengthened, their policies, their laws, their types of intervention to keep kids safe.

That is the bulk of what I want to say with regard to GSAs and, specifically, the act to destroy them.

There is another piece I want to touch on tonight, and I imagine I'll have opportunities to voice other concerns at other stages of bill consideration. The other piece I want to touch on is the piece where it's mentioned that trustees can be removed from the board if they breach the code of conduct and if the majority of the trustees vote them off the board.

None of us in this position can get evicted from our positions, can get kicked out from being an MLA because the other MLAs in this Assembly don't like us being MLAs, but that's what we're proposing in this bill, that trustees who have some kind of breach and other trustees deem to expel them have the ability to do that. It's only the people who hire you that have the ability to fire you in this place, right? You have the ability from your leader to get kicked out of your caucus, but then you get to sit in this lovely corner. You don't have the ability to get kicked out of this Assembly unless your constituents choose to expel you. Why is it that we think it's okay for trustees to be able to fire another trustee when the electorate are the ones that elect them? It just doesn't seem fair or just in any way to me.

I leave you with that. I think if you want to have a discussion about recall – and I know there have been discussions about that – sure, consider that through an amendment to this. But nobody should be able to fire an elected official other than people that hire that elected official.

The Acting Speaker: Under 29(2)(b) there is not an opportunity for questions and comments, but after the next speaker there will be through 29(2)(a). So are there any other hon. members looking to speak to this matter? It looks like the hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: That's right. Thank you. Thank you very much. Just as the previous member stated, I want to say that it's an honour to get up to speak to this, but it's not. For me this is a personal issue, as I think everyone in this House is aware, being a member of the LGBTQ community and also having a background in education.

I was a teacher in rural Alberta. I taught primarily senior high social studies in the metropolis of Bawlf, Alberta. Yes. Following that, I was a vice-principal in Forestburg, Alberta. I moved back to the city after being in Forestburg. As I said, you know, in previous conversations, I wasn't able to really thrive out there. I wanted a change. You know, people kept trying to set me up with their farmer brothers and whatnot, and it just wasn't right for me. But it was an incredible experience being out in rural . . .

Ms Hoffman: Appreciate the company.

Member Irwin: That's right. It was an incredible experience being a teacher and administrator in rural Alberta. I learned a great deal out there and a lot of lessons, and some of those lessons I will share tonight.

I came back to Edmonton about nine years ago or so, and I started working with Alberta Education, primarily in curriculum for the last number of years. Again, education is something that is quite dear to me.

Just as the previous member noted, there's a lot in Bill 8 that we can speak to, a whole lot of components that will require unpacking. But I would like to focus on GSAs as well, gay-straight alliances. As I said, I am a queer person and I'm proud of it. I'm what this Education minister would call a "whatever." I cannot joke about this. You know, it's not funny that this government refuses to acknowledge my community directly, refuses to use the language of queer, trans, bi, gay, lesbian, two-spirited. GSAs save lives. Students deserve safe, welcoming, caring schools. This is Bill Hate. This is an act to destroy GSAs. It's toothless legislation that simply won't do what it needs to do.

As was noted, we know that it's pride month. We know that this government made an attempt to raise a flag, but they were met by protest. They were met by protest from folks saying things like: "You know what? LGBTQ rights are human rights. You can't attack our rights and raise a flag. Simply raising a flag doesn't make you an ally. Your actions, including your actions in this Chamber, make you an ally." The culture minister told media at that flag raising that by doing so, it's a commitment from government to support all Albertans, and she added that love is love. Well, unless you're the Member for Drayton Valley-Devon, then it's not. Gay love is not love. His quote, not mine. I agree that love is love. But, again, by being willing to roll back, to repeal those supports for LGBTQ students, you're saying that our love is not real love.

In addition to flag-raising protest, as the Member for Edmonton-Glenora spoke about, we just saw a whole group of students on their own organize in response to this proposed legislation. She nailed it. I mean, again, I've talked before about being a social studies teacher and the role that we have as social studies teachers in encouraging active, engaged citizenship. What an example of citizenship in action, those kids taking it upon themselves to say: hey, if we as students aren't going to respond to this, then who will? But they're also looking to us in the Legislature, which is why it was so great that the members for Edmonton-Glenora and Edmonton-North West and, I believe, others as well were there in solidarity. They want us now to be standing up against this legislation right here, and that's what we're doing.

We saw folks in Edmonton as well gathering on conversion therapy, trying to bring attention to again another move by this government to show that they're not supporting LGBTQ rights. So we asked. We asked just the other day: how is this government claiming to be allies to the community when we're seeing that the changes that they're bringing in will traumatize, will harm the LGBTQ community?

And we're not talking about ancient history when we pull up some of the facts that I want to share with you. We know that the Premier stated on the campaign trail just two months ago that, you know, he doesn't want to get distracted by issues that voters aren't talking about. He was saying that in relation to GSAs. I'll tell you, I mean, I'm getting so much feedback on this. I do get the odd troll that says, "No one cares," that calls me a man, calls me ugly. But I'm not going to stop fighting because, as the Member for Edmonton-Glenora said, we know that this is about saving lives. So we're going to continue to move forward, and we are going to allow this to be a distraction for us because it's not a distraction. Saving lives is not a distraction.

Now, one of the things we shared was that the Member for Edmonton-North West did an incredible job as the Education minister, working tirelessly to ensure that Bill 24 was legislation with teeth, that truly protected LGBTQ students. We know as well that there were 28 schools that were unwilling – 28 schools out of a whole lot of schools – so I should say that our government was quite effective in getting schools to work with them, to follow the legislation. But there were 28 schools who were not willing to follow that legislation, and those schools were set to lose funding at the end of May under our plan.

I worry about the kids in those schools. I think about the kids in those schools right now who have teachers and administrators that aren't supporting them, who don't have a safe home environment. As the Member for Edmonton-Glenora noted, we know that a lot of parents are supportive and a lot of parents welcome their children and, you know, are open to them being members of the LGBTQ community; however, we know that there are some that are not. So I think about those students in those schools, and I worry.

Now, we know the statistics show that LGBTQ youth are particularly vulnerable to mental health challenges. The rates of suicide are higher, and the rates of homelessness are higher. Bill 8 is going to make these students even more vulnerable.

We know that Bill 8 removes the immediacy clause. What that means is that if I'm a student and I go to my principal, my vice-principal, my school administrator and say, "Look, you know, I really think it's important that we start a gay-straight alliance," that principal can take their sweet time in responding. I know. Again, as I said, I was a vice-principal. I know that, especially in a rural school, where we were, you do wield a lot of power. I worry that any delay at the school level – again, its not hyperbolic – could mean life or death for those students. I'm trying to not get emotional here. If you're struggling with your sexuality and you're being told to just wait, to just hold on: "We'll figure this out; let's talk about it," or "Let's not call it a gay-straight alliance; let's not call it queer because those terms offend," I can't imagine what those kids are going through.

This minister also claimed that Bill 8 is modern, that it's going to be some of the most modern – those are her words – legislation. I don't know what's modern about this. I don't know what's modern about turning back the clock when we can point to – again, I like to point to evidence. I told you that I worked in the Ministry of Education for many years. We always liked to do jurisdictional scans. We always liked to before making any decision. Particularly, I was working on curriculum, and before making any decisions, we'd say: okay; how do other jurisdictions approach climate change in curriculum? That is something we actually did review. I sure hope it stays. It's really important that you take that jurisdictional approach, that you look at what other provinces, territories have done. We know that other jurisdictions have ensured very strong protections for LGBTQ youth. Bill 8 puts us back, puts us near the bottom of the pack when it comes to these protections, despite what the members opposite will say.

The minister talks about balance. She's talked about that a lot. Balance between what? Balance about what? She said that LGBTQ students have told her that they want balance. I don't know who those kids are; I don't know who she consulted. I wish she were here so . . .

An Hon. Member: She might be.

Member Irwin: She may be. Perhaps she's listening.

I don't know what youth were consulted. I'm not saying that she didn't consult youth; I'm certain she did. But I'm hearing from countless youth, and they're certainly not saying the same. They're concerned. These were young people who weren't of voting age, right? You know, think about the countless kids who over the last number of months have responded.

We talked about the most recent protests, but go back to the walkouts weeks ago. Myself and a number of other members attended the walkout at Victoria school, and again we heard from kids first-hand just how important GSAs are. Of course, the Premier's response was that those students should be in class instead of doing politics outside of school during school hours. I was so proud to see those kids out there, again, organizing themselves.

I guess I ask: if the minister isn't listening to kids – again, I'm certain she's listened to a few – who else is she listening to? Well, this is the same Education minister who, we know, in the very recent past was aligned with Parents for Choice in Education, who, again, you can simply google to see that they've promoted anti-LGBTQ rhetoric in the past. She's the same minister who in 2016 said to a right-wing news site that it wasn't necessary to, quote, create additional policies for one group. That was in response to our government trying to fix the loopholes in Bill 10.

It's absolutely important to have protections for one group. Again, I mean, I'm a member of the community. I have some, I guess . . .

Ms Hoffman: Lived experience.

Member Irwin: . . . lived experience. That's exactly what I was looking for. Thank you for that.

We've also heard the real experiences from young people, and many of the members, at least on this side, have received letters, e-mail, Facebook messages, and so on. I talked the other day about an example of an LGBTQ student walking down the hallway having to experience an onslaught of homophobic, transphobic insults and then being told that they couldn't have a support club, that they couldn't call it a gay-straight alliance, and that kid dropping out. That's a real story. That's what Bill 10 allowed, and that's what Bill 8 will allow.

As a teacher I saw kids who could have used GSAs. Just as the Member for Edmonton-Glenora noted, you know, one of the things I regret is hearing homophobic insults and not doing enough. Years ago we didn't have gay-straight alliances at the schools that I taught at. We didn't. I think back to some of the experiences, some of the kids that I know were struggling. We just didn't talk about it. And it's something that weighs on me today. I should have stepped up, and I didn't. I regret that, but I also wasn't safe. I wasn't an out teacher. I myself was struggling with my own identity. So GSAs help teachers as well. They don't just help students; they help teachers as well. They help the entire school community. They bring about acceptance. They start a conversation.

I've noted that I've received a whole heck of a lot of correspondence on this matter. I know, actually, that some of the other members across have as well. I've got an example here from one young person who shared this letter with the Member for Grande Prairie, and he also shared it with me. I asked him today if I could share a part of what he said in the Legislature. So I would like to do that.

His name is Ethan Wohlgemuth, and he's writing to express his concern with the recent legislation.

Notably, I am disturbed by the move to remove protection of members of GSAs from being outed. I would like to provide you with a personal anecdote so that you can understand where members of the LGBTQ+ community are coming from when we are demanding protection of GSAs. When I was closeted ...

The Acting Speaker: Under 29(2)(a) I believe I see the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would just like to encourage the member to finish that quote, please.

The Acting Speaker: The Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Thank you.

When I was closeted, my fear of being outed dominated my entire life. It shaped everything I did. I actively modified my actions, my speech. Everything that I presented to the world was shaped by a fear of people finding out that I was gay, and continues to now, even though I am a proud openly gay man. I did not have access to a GSA when I was in high school, and the consequences of this lack of a safe space, where I could openly be myself, are still present today. Coming out is an extremely difficult and personal decision, especially when openly homophobic people are in government. It is completely unacceptable that your government believe that it is okay to take this decision away from people. Coming-out is our personal decision that we take when we are ready and when we feel safe. What your government is doing under Bill 8 would remove GSAs' legitimacy as actual safe spaces. If students are afraid that they would be outed for joining a GSA they will not have access to a safe space. They will not have access to a space where they can discuss LGBTQ+ issues. They will not have access to a vital resource for LGBTQ+ students. I have a close, personal LGBTQ+ friend who in her last year of high school wanted to join a GSA so that she could have access to a safe space. However, as the GSA was scheduled after school she could not attend as she would have to explain to her parents why she wanted to stay later after school. We, members of the ... community, are acutely aware of consequences of being outed. Among other things, we know that many children are kicked out of their homes for being members of the ... community. Teachers will not always be aware of the degree of or presence of homophobia of parents. Legislation should not assume that most teachers and most parents are not homophobic, and that they understand the complexities of the issues faced by members of the LGBTQ+ community. In addition to protection of GSAs, I believe that comprehensive ongoing teacher education training and parent support groups, developed in consultation with and vetted by the ... community, is essential. Legislation should be built for the worst case scenario, not an optimistic ideal.

And the letter goes on.

[The Speaker in the chair]

Thank you, Ethan, for sharing that with us. Ethan's story is a powerful one, and it's truly one of many. So I urge the members opposite to think about those individual stories because I would bet that nearly everybody across the Chamber from me knows somebody who is a member of the LGBTQ community. Perhaps that person is in your family. Perhaps that person is a friend. But I'm quite certain that you do. So think about this. This is not for political gain. It's for ensuring that no student has to come to school and be afraid of who they are.

Thank you.

9:10

The Speaker: Hon. members, there are a couple of minutes remaining under 29(2)(a) if anyone has any additional questions or comments for the hon. member.

Seeing none, are there any others that wish to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Calgary-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to speak to Bill 8, the Education Amendment Act, 2019. I want to say at the beginning of my speech that on April 16 the UCP won the election. They got a mandate, and I respect that. However, just two or three weeks into that mandate that was given to this government based on jobs, the economy, pipelines – during that election I think they made it clear that these are the priorities of Albertans, and certainly Albertans agreed. They would not talk about social issues. They would not legislate social issues. They were not high on their priorities. In their assessment that was not high on Albertans' agenda. All those things. So they got the mandate.

However, in the last couple of weeks we saw that Albertans, in particular young Albertans, young students across this province challenged that mandate here in Edmonton last week and last Sunday in Calgary. Essentially, they were challenging that mandate, that they didn't give a mandate to this government to put their safety at risk or whatever they were doing through Bill 8. That's not the mandate that they understood, and they openly and publicly challenged that mandate.

In their legislation they did a communication exercise. They even included in their preamble that they want to make the education system inclusive. However, that group of students didn't feel that they were included through this bill. Rather, they maintained and they voiced their concern that that change that's coming, brought forward through Bill 8, is not inclusive of them. Rather, they raised the concern that it will put their safety at risk.

They stated in their preamble that they are trying to provide "high quality and socially engaging learning opportunities ... to meet diverse student needs." That diverse group of students didn't feel like that. Otherwise, they wouldn't have come out in those large numbers here in Edmonton, in Calgary to voice their concerns. Clearly, they are feeling that they are excluded through this bill. They are feeling that it's not a socially engaging learning experience for them if this bill gets passed. It doesn't meet their needs. Not only that; it puts their safety, their security, their learning at risk. I think that if they don't want to listen to the opposition, they should pay attention to these students who organized those walkouts, and those rallies were huge, bigger than any UCP election rally. So I think they carry a bigger mandate, and they must be heard.

In my riding of Calgary-McCall I think education is really important. It was important in 2015 as well, when I ran the first time. At that point my own niece and nephews used to travel in a different quadrant of the city to get to school, and just in the last four years alone in Calgary-McCall we were able to open six new schools, fully fund enrolment growth in all those schools. We were able to support teachers, student aides, the staff that was necessary to support those students.

Not just that; I think province-wide we were able to build or renovate 244 new schools just in those four years, and on the operational side of things we were able to add almost $2 billion to fund enrolment growth, to fund classroom improvements, all those things. That's in contrast to what I think I already have once shared – but I think I should share it again because that was the previous PC government's record – that from 2008 to 2013 not a single school was built in Calgary, not one school. That's how much they cared about, I guess, education in Calgary.

When I was running this time around, again education was an important issue, and it still remains an important issue. After getting elected, I met a few stakeholders, even my trustee, who were concerned about education, and if government was responding to their concerns, that's not what they were looking for. None of them, whom I met, raised that there needs to be something different than what's already in Bill 24 about LGBTQ students. None of them mentioned that. None of them mentioned that in the education system, in the way changes were brought by the previous government, there was something that was completely broken.

Rather, the things they mentioned were enrolment growth, which we have to push for pretty much every question period since the session started, every single question period, and every time the answer we get: ah, we might maintain; we might increase; we're not sure. Yesterday there was some indication that there will be funds for enrolment growth, but today they were back to the main message: we will maintain an increase. Not sure where it's going still, and we are still waiting for a panel to come up with suggestions for how to cut and gut public service, public education.

All those who are in that system, public trustees, everyone is worried whether there will be enrolment growth funding. Like, CBE alone was predicting a $40 million shortfall, a deficit, and they were already planning to lay off teachers and other staff because they're left with uncertainty. They are not getting the answers.

They are not seeing this government focused on the priorities, focused on the concerns that the boards are facing; instead, we are seeing this piece of legislation, which nobody asked for, which nobody was looking for, and I think in just three weeks. Like many other pieces of legislation, there is no evidence before us that the government consulted with the school boards, that government consulted with trustees, that government consulted with parents, students, and all those who are concerned about education. I guess, looking at this bill, it clearly shows they didn't, because in our brief conversations, like, the first thing that comes up is funding predictability, and this is not what it's about.

The other thing I think I would suggest is that when you try to fix something, you clearly identify what the issue is, what is broken, and if something is not broken, you don't fix it. When this piece of legislation was introduced, I think there was no clear indication of what exactly they think is broken that they're trying to fix.

The argument we heard is that this piece of legislation will create the strongest protections across Canada. That was presented to us as a factual assertion. Today when they were challenged on it, and later on there was a point of order as well, the Government House Leader defended that, the government side defended that: no, no, there can't be a point of order because it's a matter of debate. On the one hand they want us to believe that this piece of legislation is bringing changes that will create the strongest protections for LGBTQ students, but on the other hand, when they're challenged on that, they will defend it, that: no, no, it's a matter of debate.

Clearly, it doesn't tell us what is broken; clearly, it doesn't provide the strongest protection across this country. If you don't want to listen to us, I think the students who gathered outside this Legislature, the students who gathered outside city hall in Calgary last week – had anybody gone there, they would have known that they don't agree with the government that this bill is bringing the strongest protection.

There are many other things that are concerning in this piece of legislation. If this legislation was to support students, if this legislation was to support education, literacy, and all those things,

I think they could have kept things that were better in the previous 2012 act like the age of access, but they knew, the government knew, that that will cost money, and they wanted to avoid that, so they changed the age of access back to where it was under the previous legislation.

Then they said that the transportation provisions would no longer apply to charter schools. In my riding, from that experience, transportation to school was a big issue because transportation was cut by CBE in 2014 and then in 2016. There are many students of many different backgrounds, like faith backgrounds, cultural backgrounds. In the absence of schools in our riding, students were travelling to other TLC schools, and those schools are also funded by public money. Those students are also Alberta students, and it should not be the criteria that if you choose to go, or if you don't have any other options and you choose a charter school or traditional learning centres, TLC schools, that you will not be provided transportation.

It's just downloading the responsibility onto the parents. The first thing that we did when we became government was that we brought forward the legislation that helped to reduce transportation costs and helped to reduce school fees and all those things to make sure that parents don't have to choose between their kids' education and their food. But here we are seeing a trend that they are off-loading the cost onto the parents.

Similarly, they said that it's about an inclusive education system. If we go through the bill, it even removes references to specialized support and all those things. If we were to make this education system inclusive and stronger, we would have seen more and stronger protections for those who need additional supports, who need specialized supports. Again, this bill is weakening those supports as well.

It also removes the duty-to-report requirement for charter schools re teachers and superintendents who resign, retire, or are terminated. I think all those schools, when they are getting public funding, should follow the same code. The public has a right to know the reasons why if somebody is removed or terminated.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available for brief questions or comments.

The Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member was in the middle of a thought on this matter of Bill 8, which is so important to so many of our constituents. I wonder if he might continue those thoughts.

Thank you.

The Speaker: That indeed was a brief question or comment from the Member for Lethbridge-West.

The hon. Member for Calgary-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the Member for Lethbridge-West for the question. What I was talking about was that this piece of legislation, Bill 8, removes the duty-to-report requirement for charter schools if a teacher or superintendent is terminated based on some questionable conduct. The reason it's concerning is that for those who attend charter schools, those who attend even private schools, there is some form of funding that comes from government. Regardless of what schools these students attend, they are all students, they are all kids, they are Alberta students. If something is not acceptable in a public school system; for instance, the Holocaust. If somebody is targeting one particular community, denying that, that may not be acceptable in public school systems and may create grounds for dismissal and all that. The same grounds should be valid for a charter school as well, that those kids should not be exposed to those kinds of discriminatory views.

This piece of legislation is in fact weakening our education system by removing those protections that kids should not be exposed to these kinds of hateful or discriminatory views. I'm just giving that example but, again, nothing was mentioned about why it was necessary to remove that protection. Again, if something is not broken, you don't fix it. But here I think it's a deliberate attempt to weaken our school systems and our education systems.

Another thing I want to talk about is that it also lifts the cap on charter schools and creates a process for that. I'm all about choice in education. I'm all about inclusive education. I'm all about that parents should be able to educate their kids in the way they see fit. However, that should not be done at the expense of our public school system, where all students can go. There is no indication of what kind of consultations were done with parents, with school boards and why it's needed, why those changes were needed at this time.

One last thing. With respect to safety in schools, safety of LGBTQ students in schools, I think that during the campaign and afterwards there was rhetoric that somehow we want to bypass parents and all those things. But we do have a child intervention system, which is based on similar principles, that when kids' safety is at risk, that takes priority. That's paramount over anything else. So our personal views should not be allowed to trump student safety.

With that, I would say that this Education Act doesn't do what it's saying it will do. It's not creating an inclusive education, a socially engaging experience for diverse student needs. Clearly, there are many students – there are students all across this province – who are protesting against this bill, these changes, and they are challenging the mandate you got on April 16. If that was in your mandate, I think those students would not be calling your mandate into question. I think it's important that this government should put the brakes on it and get back to the drawing board, reach out to these students who are protesting that, reach out to school boards.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others wishing to provide debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to speak to this important bill. While I have a number of important things I will address over the iterations of this bill coming forward in this House, I have a particular one I would like to focus on tonight. Before I do that, I'd like to just take a moment to thank the MLA for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood for what I thought was an incredibly important, profound discussion of the importance and value of GSAs in schools. I'd like to thank her very much for that. In my other opportunities to rise on this particular bill, I will follow suit and speak to some of those profound issues on a human level.

But right now I would like to take an opportunity to talk about an aspect of the bill that has not yet been widely spoken about, and in order to facilitate my point, I'm going to indulge in a little hyperbole, quite contrary to my natural inclination. I think it's important that we do that in order to show the problem inherent in the bill. As I talk about this, I want to identify at the beginning that I'll actually be talking about three aspects of the bill that, all together, provide a significant problem which is not necessarily identified by talking about the aspects individually. Tonight I would like to take the time to weave those together and demonstrate how the compounded effect of those three aspects of the bill are concerning, in fact I would say even potentially dangerous.

I'll start by just identifying the aspects of the bill that I will be discussing this evening and then go back and speak to them a little individually and weave them together so you can follow. Three things, I think, are really important that we must understand are happening in this bill: first of all, the diminishment of the protections and rights of children, who need the protection of GSAs in order to be able to exercise the full extent of their human rights; that is, the right to be protected in their status as a gay student, which is recognized by the Human Rights Commission in not only Alberta but, of course, all across Canada.

This bill tends to diminish what is, in fact, a human right in its practice. It doesn't say that they don't have that right, but it indeed interferes with that. We know that the Supreme Court of Canada, on other occasions and in other situations, has made the ruling that even if you don't specifically defy a law, if you prevent people from being able to enact the benefits of that law such as human rights, then you are indeed breaking the law. In this case, I am very concerned that that's the situation that we're in, that while people are being told that, yes, you can be gay and that you have the human rights that are associated with your free expression of your gayness, you can't actually enact it in a way that you choose to do so by having that protected GSA in the school. So I'm very concerned about that just on its own merits. I think the Supreme Court has actually indicated in other situations that they are concerned about that kind of undermining of human rights in a surreptitious way.

The second thing that I think is potentially concerning and that I will talk about here is the fact that there is clearly an intention to increase and make available the number of charter schools in this province. Now, I introduce that hesitantly because, in fact, I am in favour of having charter schools. I think that there's a positive benefit to having choice. I see that people have different needs and so on, but how that is done is very important in terms of the outcome that is experienced by the population. For example, in the city of Edmonton, under the Edmonton public school board and the Edmonton Catholic school district, a number of charter schools have been created but working within the present school board so that it becomes part of the public system, available to everyone, and, most importantly, following all of the rules of the public system.

In those cases, in a large city, where you have some choices available to you, you can choose to go to a school like Vimy Ridge, that's focused on military history and training, if you choose to do that. You can go to St. Francis Xavier high school and learn how to be a great hockey player. You can go to a number of schools and have a chance to focus on something particular. In that case, I'm quite happy to have those kinds of choices made available to people in a big city. However, I do have some concerns, which I will get to in a moment, about what happens in a place that isn't a big city, where the number of schools is much smaller and the segmentation of the school system in a small community, where there are just enough students to satisfy the needs of one school to remain open, may be affected by having people make the decision to separate out and not be part of the larger public school system. I'll get to all of that in just a moment.

But the third thing that I want to speak to is the fact that they are allowing trustees to make the decision to fire other trustees; that is, the power is being put into the hands of a majority to condemn and to disenfranchise a minority with whom they do not agree. Now, fundamentally, in our system we are very concerned when that happens. For the last few hundred years, in these parliamentary democracies that we have created in places like Canada, Britain, New Zealand, and Australia, and other places in the world, we have strived to ensure that while the majority does rule in a situation, that rule does not turn into tyranny of the majority over a minority, that prevents a minority from being able to enact their rights in a legitimate way.

I've identified three areas where this bill already is problematic on individual bases. That tells me that this bill is not ready for prime time, that this bill needs to be taken off the papers and brought back for reconsideration. Now I want to engage in a small bit of hyperbole by tying those three together and having you begin to imagine what happens when we have a situation where all three of those things occur at the same time.

Take, for example, a small rural community somewhere in Alberta that has a group of people arrive on their doorstep with an insular sociopolitical view of the world that has the intention of creating in this small rural area a sociophilosophical community that in some way wishes to undermine the human rights of others and that then comes into that community, breeds, draws in more members, and creates a large enough community that they then are able to say that there is a demand or a need for a charter school. They are given a charter school, and in that charter school they include their sociopolitical world view and defy the human rights that the rest of us in this province enjoy.

In doing so, they become essentially a dictator to everyone in the small community, who have no choice because the community cannot support two schools. The only one that becomes available is the one that this majority group has put together and called a charter school. So you have individuals from the minority, what has become the minority in this community, in a charter school. Should they wish to defy this, should they wish to challenge this, they may elect a trustee to represent their point of view, but now, because we have the ability for trustees to fire others, the trustees supported by this particular sociopolitical and -economic group will look for a reason and an excuse to fire the trustees that do not share their point of view.

Now, this is where the hyperbole comes in. I'm very concerned about the nature of a Waco, Texas, happening here. I'm very concerned about a Bountiful, B.C., happening here, where a group comes in, defies human rights, creates a situation, and now has been given control over not only their own school but the school for all the kids in the community.

I can tell you why this is concerning, why this is terrifying: because it's not hyperbole; it's happened. I can tell you that in the indigenous community they called them residential schools. A community came in with their own world view, created an education system that said: only our point of view is allowed, and all others will be not only denied the right to express their values but will be severely treated should they choose to challenge those values. I'm not talking hyperbole anymore, am I? I'm talking about the fact that in the history of this province we have allowed the combination of these kinds of thoughts to lead to the ultimate oppression and destruction of other people, of people who have lived on this land for thousands of years. I can tell you that that is why I'm worried about this.

I can tell you that they already tell me in the indigenous community that if you live on-reserve, you're not even allowed to vote for trustees. They have no voice in the school as it is right now. What happens if that school becomes a charter school and becomes the only school that your children can go to? What happens if that school decides that they do not like some of the human rights that are freely expressed in the rest of the province and begins to deny that?

Here's the hyperbole, the little, tiny piece of hyperbole I wanted to introduce there. Take, for example, a community that somehow decided that the disfigurement of children was part of their value system, that they took their children and decided to scarify them, that they decided to cut off parts of their body or to wound them in some way as part of some kind of a tradition within this community. It would be a defilement of human rights, but we've just said: if you don't like human rights, just form a charter school, and then you don't have to follow up.

Now, if I put it in those terms, if I say, "What you're asking for is the defilement of the bodies of your children," you'd all look at me and say: "That's ridiculous, Richard. That's hyperbole." And I'd agree with you. But then I'd want to remind you that nothing I have said has not in fact actually happened, not only in the province of Alberta but in other places in the world. Nothing I have said is science fiction. Nothing I have said is fantasy. It is, in fact, part of the history and tradition of humanity, and if we do not guard against those kinds of excesses, then we will find ourselves in a very negative place in society.

So I think it's very important that when we create a school system, we make sure that that school system reflects the values that we have created in the rest of our society, the human rights that say: if you are a gay person, not only do you have all the rights of everybody who is not gay, but you have the right to express that gayness in the way that makes most sense to you as long as it does not hurt another person. That's what GSAs are all about. GSAs are about being able to express who you are without any harm to anyone else. That's all we're asking. We're just asking for the children that we have in our society to be brought up with the same values that have created the great abundance and wealth of opportunity that exist for the rest of us here in the province of Alberta.

That's what we're challenging now, that's what we're threatening now, and that's unacceptable. It's unacceptable for duly elected members of a parliamentary democracy to undermine . . .

The Acting Speaker: Under 29(2)(a), I see the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member was in the middle of a thought, speaking to the effects of Bill 8, and I wonder if he might continue his thoughts on our duty in a parliamentary democracy to uphold basic human rights, our section 15 Charter rights, and the dignity of all people regardless of background, orientation, or other ascribed characteristics.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to just summarize my remarks. I introduced my comments earlier as understanding that I would be describing my concerns with some hyperbole, that I understood that were I to simply say to this House, "You are supporting the scarification of our children," you would immediately have dismissed what I had to say.

But I think that if you'd listened to what I had to say, you would hear the danger in us not being aware that there are others out there who are more than fully prepared to engage in that kind of behaviour today in Canada, that people come from all parts of the world and that there are practices in some parts of the world where people's bodies are harmed, where people's human rights to the integrity of the body and to the self are violated on a regular basis. If I tell you that you are supporting a system which is going to make it possible for those people to create an enclave in which they will be able to continue that kind of practice, I think you will recognize that the hyperbole is small and that the underlying concern and fear are legitimate.

When it's a practice that you find horrific, of course you as an elected member are going to say: that's terrible; I would never allow that to happen. But suddenly, when it's a practice that you don't find horrific, when it's accepted in your world view that people who are gay are not acceptable or somehow do not have human rights, are not allowed to practise and express those human rights in the way that they so desire, somehow it changes your response, and that's a concern, isn't it?

That's something that we have learned as a society to not allow ourselves to do. We have learned to say: it can't just be the things that I think are right or wrong, because then I simply become a dictator. It may be a dictatorship of the majority, it may be most of the people, but I can tell you that in the indigenous community, when that happened with residential schools, it was devastating. It was terrible and led to generations of trauma that continue to harm and undermine the health and well-being of our indigenous communities in the province of Alberta.

[The Speaker in the chair]

I guess I want to finish up by just cautioning the people in this House that if they continue to act on this bill without actually having concern for the combination of the things they're putting together, not simply the individual facts but the way they can be woven together by people with malevolent intent, then they are going to be unleashing on our society an undesirable characteristic which we have been working for many generations to expunge. I do not want to be part of a government that opens the door to that backward kind of thinking, that kind of belief system that results in a dictatorship by a majority, a tyranny of people who believe themselves to be right and who do not understand and therefore do not support or validate the truthfulness that lies in the world view of others.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. There are five seconds left under 29(2)(a), so if you're as brief as the Member for Lethbridge-West, you may have been able to ask a question.

Unfortunately, time has expired, but I do see the hon. Member for St. Albert rising to add some comments to the debate.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure, I suppose, to rise and speak to Bill 8, the Education Amendment Act, 2019. Every time I rise to speak to something like this, I always think: jobs, pipeline, economy; what happened? You know, it's like bait and switch. It's like: no, no; we're going to focus on the economy, but, no, we're going to address this Education Act. Honestly, nobody is fooled. I think we saw this coming. A lot of Albertans saw this coming, and I imagine this is just the beginning of transforming Alberta and this particular Chamber according to somebody's world view.

Anyway, I'm going to focus on part of this amendment act, I guess a triage of sorts, and focus on the GSA bit. The reason I'm going to do that is that on May 3 I had 60 handwritten letters delivered to my constituency office from junior high students in St. Albert. I'm just going to read some of them to you because I think it's important that you hear their voices. You hear us speak all the time. Well, you probably don't listen, but we're here speaking all the time. I think that if you have the opportunity as a legislator, as an elected official here, it's your duty to listen to the children, to listen to our children, who are the future. They're trying to speak to you. They're trying to say something. This isn't propaganda or politics. I didn't know they were writing them. They just wrote them, and they delivered them. They're pretty amazing young people, so I think you should listen to them.

To whom it may concern:

I personally think that parents do not need to be informed if [the] child is LGBTQ because not all children's parents think that being LGBTQ is okay and could try to make the child change. Another reason that teachers should not have to inform parents is that it's not fair that the kids don't get to open up to their parents. If a child is not comfortable with their parents knowing, don't tell them. The child will open up when they're more comfortable with their parents knowing. The reason I feel strongly about standing up for LGBTQ is [that] I'm bisexual and I feel [that] if my mom found out that I am bisexual, [she] wouldn't respect me, and she would want me to change. I feel that kids deserve the freedom to keep it to themselves that they're LGBTQ.

Then it says to flip the page, which I thought was awesome.

I would also like to point out that if an adult is LGBTQ and their parents don't know then why don't you tell their parents? People need to stop [bleeping] bossing kids around. We're people too. Thank you for your time. I hope that you take into consideration my note and make things right. I am bisexual so this means a lot to me and so many others so please open your . . . eyes and make the right choice!

And:

To whom it may concern:

I'm a member of the LGBTQ+ community. I have one question for you. Do you think that it is okay for us to take 20 steps backwards? We fought for our [own] voices to be heard. We want to be safe. Now you, our government, want us to stop being who we are. It is also a danger for us to be outed to our parents. Most people will respond badly . . . [some] people are homophobic. GSAs are a safe space and it is where we are heard and welcomed with opened arms. Just because you don't like what I'm saying doesn't mean I'll stop talking. I'll only talk louder until my voice is heard.

Sincerely, me.

Hello,

I am writing to you because I strongly disagree with your decision. School is supposed to be a safe and accepting place where kids can freely express themselves. As an asexual . . . female that participates in drag, I definitely do not feel safe at school as it is. Coming out to my friends was as hard as it is, and if teachers told my parents, I would be thought of differently, [and] I likely would be sent to live somewhere else.

I know kids my age get entirely disowned for coming out as queer, and most queer kids are horrified of what their parents might do to them. I know I am. My whole family is incredibly Catholic and follow their old ways. A young person came out as a transgender male in my class last month. Everyone was so supportive and it was beautiful to see how far society has come in these short years.

Let's imagine you get a call from your child's school. They have done something you strongly disagree with. This may be the reality of some youth.

I also think children should be educated in sexuality, gender identity, or romantic preference. I get teased and made fun of all the time just because of my sexuality. People accept gay and trans freely, but we aren't quite to the point where everyone is [as] accepted. I switched schools in fear of people finding out about my sexuality or romantic preference or gender identity. I'm still worried, but I'm glad I'm finally in a progressive school.

I just hope this isn't ruined for us.

Sincerely, [that] kid.

To whoever gets this letter:

Hello, I am a nonbinary, queer 13-year-old. I'm not a person to have strong opinions, but this is something I think a lot about.

Why are members of the LGBTQ-plus community allowed to be made fun of for something they have no choice about? Why do we have to come out? Why is that considered normal and accepted? I know you probably can't answer these questions, but they still have to be asked. It should be someone's own opinion on when it's time to come out, if they ever do. They shouldn't be forced to. They shouldn't be outed by a teacher to their unaccepting parents because they joined a club. It is who they are. I know it would be easier if everyone was accepting, but that isn't how it works, so just let kids choose for themselves. Let them decide when it's time.

From an angry 13-year-old.

I'm going to skip this one because the writing is really tiny.

To Mr. [Premier],

I believe that the students have a right to privacy and if they are part of the LGBTQ community . . . they should [still] have their own time that they [should] choose to "come out" to their parents and not find out through the government [or teachers]. Why would you want the parents to know if the child themselves hasn't told them? They don't feel safe letting their parents know yet, and you want to throw away that and make them know even when the kid doesn't want [their parents to know]. That's a violation of our privacy.

And:

Dear [Mr. Premier],

I believe that people who feel a certain way about the same gender should have their own time to come out to their parents, and not by a call home to the kid's parents. I think a lot of others can agree with me [in] that what you are doing is . . . bad. You shouldn't invade [someone's] feelings and tell their parents. I thought you would be a better Premier. Please rethink your ideas. I believe you can change [and] be good . . . [Please] change your plans.

Dear Mr. [Premier],

I'm a student at . . . [a] school in St. Albert. I'm not LGBTQ+, but there are people in my class who are, and I can comfortably say that it is not your place to out kids like that. That's their right, and I'm doing what I can to peacefully protest this change. You say you stand for your citizens, and the children and the LGBTQ+ youth are just as much your people as everybody else. I cannot support this change as I consider it a complete regression in how far we've come as an accepting community. I hope that you can see our side and what we stand for, and then make the decision to stand for all Albertans, not just some of them. People have the right to be who they want to be. The strongest thing I have [are] my words, consider myself and all the people this would affect don't have a vote [yet]. Young people are standing for young people, and I hope that's enough to change your mind.

Dear Government of Alberta,

We are 2 students from . . . [a] junior high . . . in St. Albert . . . We believe everybody should have a choice in who they are and what they believe in. This is why we are protesting the policy involving LGBTQ+ rights. We believe everybody should have the right to keep their identity confidential if they wish as it could lead to unsafe conditions for youth otherwise. This protest process is necessary to get our point across and to represent those who may not be able to do so themselves. If you were to not apply this policy, you would not only be respecting members of [the] LGBTQ+ [community] but everybody protesting the bill in Alberta.

Sincerely, a student.

To whom it may concern:

I feel there are many dangers in teachers telling parents if their children are in the LGBTQ+ community. Many parents are against the community and telling the parents could result in major consequences against the child such as being kicked out of their home, being shunned by their parents or guardians. These effects on students are life changing and shouldn't be ignored.

Those are just a few of the 60 letters that I received, and each one of them is really different. They are a little bit upset about some other things, about test weighting, but primarily they were focused on GSAs. There were some that were really quite emotional, that shared some stories. I will table these tomorrow, Mr. Speaker.

I guess why I wanted to read some of them – I'd actually like to read all of them, but I won't. I don't have time to do that. But what these children are telling you is that we've been out of school for a really long time. We've not needed a club like this, if any of us were involved with a club like this, for a very long time, and these students are telling us what life is like for them in junior high school. They just want a safe place. They want to know that their privacy will be respected and they're not going to be at risk for just seeking out other children, other kids and adults that are going to be nonjudgmental and are going to support them in whatever decisions they make, whatever they choose to share.

I think, you know, we've talked at length of the dangers of outing kids before they're ready. We've talked about how we know that far too many of these children – and they are children – end up on the street, end up homeless, end up dead by suicide, end up in really abusive situations. I think that if you could do something in this place to prevent one death, it would be worth it, just even one child, preventing one death. You can say all you like that this legislation brings in the strongest protection in Canada. It does not. It absolutely does not. I don't know what more proof you need. It just doesn't. I would ask you to think about it. Look in your community. If you could save one child, if you could prevent the injury or death of one child, wouldn't you do that? Wouldn't you do everything in your power to do that?

These are kids unprompted; there was no politics involved. They were unprompted. They took the time to write these letters and share personal stories about what their lives were like, what their friends' lives were like, and they don't get a voice in this place. They don't get to talk to us and to tell us what's important to them and what changes they want to see, so I was happy to read some of their letters, Mr. Speaker, because I think their voices need to be heard. I think that we saw a lot of students leave school peacefully for, I think, about 20 minutes not that long ago because they want to support themselves and their friends, and I think that this will continue because our children are our future, and they know that. They know that that's their power.

I think that we're seeing children all over the world that are leading the way and telling us, like: "Wake up. We have a problem with climate change. It is a climate crisis." You are seeing millions of children all over the world saying: "Pay attention. This is our future." We'll be gone. It'll be their future. I think that that's what these kids are saying. These kids in our communities are telling us: "Stop what you're doing. It's dangerous. Basically, you know, butt out. Let us have our clubs. Let us be safe. Let us know that whatever we do here, talking to our friends or a supportive adult or teacher, we don't run the risk of having information going back to our parent or guardians, information that we know can cause harm to us and our future."

I don't know. I mean, what else is there to say about this? We keep hearing the same things from the government side, that this is the strongest protection for this community. It is not. We brought in additional protection because we knew that there were problems and that people were dragging their feet. People were afraid to use words like "gay." I don't know what's wrong with saying the word "gay." It's just a word. It's just a word. Gay, gay, gay, gay, gay. I mean, really, it's a word.

Think about it. When you vote, when it comes down to it and you vote on this legislation, know that in the future when something happens – because we know it will. You know what the risk is for these kids. It will happen. You know what? You're going to have to own up to your part in this, that you had the information in front of you, you knew what was going on, you knew what the kids were saying, you knew what educators were saying, and you chose to turn the other way and look away. That'll be on you.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. I see the hon. Member for Calgary-McCall rising to ask a brief question or make a comment.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Member, for your remarks and for sharing the stories of young people from your riding.

Certainly, young people are trying their best to get heard. They're doing so in many different ways – writing letters, protesting out here, outside the Legislature, protesting outside city hall – and they are trying their best to protect their education system and protect the safeguards that were in place in the Education Act.

I do know that the Member for St. Albert has spent her life advocating for those who are marginalized, those who depend on government services, and those who need supports from government to be successful and be included in society, so I would want the member to elaborate a bit further on how this piece of legislation is taking us away from inclusion and how it's effectively excluding certain groups. It also takes out reference to specialized support, so what impact will it have on those vulnerable youth who may have been differently abled, who may have disabilities? If the member would like to expand on that.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, I can imagine, I think, that a number of school-aged children also are part of the LGBTQ-plus community and may also have a disability. It's a struggle enough to be included in school, not just physically included but included in everyday activities and education. Add to that another component where they are struggling, perhaps, with their own identity as it relates here. It's not unheard of, and it's not unusual.

But, you know, the Member for Calgary-McCall brought up something that just sort of reminded me of a question I asked the Premier, I think it was a week or two ago, about how he defined inclusion, and then the people that I asked after that sort of repeated his answer. How he defined inclusion was: celebrating diversity. I suppose if you're at a ceremony to celebrate diversity, you could call it that, but I think what is key, what he missed and what his ministers also missed, is that inclusion requires action every single day. It requires a plan. It requires resources. It requires an understanding. It requires people to work on it together not just somebody saying: well, this is inclusion; this is the way we're going to go, and this is how we're going to evaluate it.

Real inclusion brings everyone to the table, and they ask. You figure out together what that looks like, and then you work at it because it's never over. It's a process that requires constant effort and constant investment in energy and resources. That's what inclusion for people with disabilities requires, and that's what inclusion for this particular group requires. I would suggest that the first step to inclusion here is listening to the children.

You know, it's just like the other night when we were talking. I mean, it was so bizarre to me that we were spending the whole night talking about a bill to reduce the minimum the wage of youth. It was a bunch of people that make $150,000 a year talking about the value of reducing the minimum wage by $2 for youth. Here we are talking about a bill that has the potential to harm people, and we have young people saying: "Don't do it. It's the wrong thing to do. This is not what you should do. Listen to us. We're scared. This will happen. This is our life." Yet, still the government wants to say: "No. We're bringing in strong protection. We're bringing in the strongest protection in Canada." You're not. You're just not. You can look down all you like and look away, but you're not. You are putting children at risk, not to mention the other changes brought in under this legislation. I'm simply focusing on one piece of it that is hugely problematic and frightening for children.

On that, I will sit down. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, those wishing to speak to Bill 8. The Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Normally I would say that it's my pleasure to rise to speak to a bill. Under normal circumstance, if these were routine amendments to the Education Act or perhaps in some way, shape, or form modernized our approach to the education system, I would be pleased to speak to this bill. But I am not. I am profoundly annoyed to have to stand and speak to this bill because it is shocking that after all of the progress that we have made around Bill 24 and around protecting kids in this province, we are now going to take a step back. If we're going to take a step backwards, then let's zoom out a little bit and talk about how social struggle manifests itself in the education system and then a little bit about basic human rights.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, we see that some of the main questions of our time swirl around education policy. We see this not only in this country, but we see it in other countries. We see the policy of trying to "take the Indian out of the child," which was the saying at the time manifesting itself through the residential system. Canada's shameful history of colonialism expressed itself through a school system. We see that over the course of time it used to be that women didn't have an education past about grade 8, grade 10, or so because the expectation was: what was the point? They needed to learn how to do basic sums to run the household budget, and then they were just going to get married and have kids, so what was the point?

In fact, my own mom tells a story about – she was really good at math, probably still is – wanting to go and study to be a veterinarian. Her own dad was a big proponent of education. He was, in fact, the chair of the school board, as I understand it, and brought the high school to that area. I remember my mom always telling me the story that he said: "No. Women are teachers or nurses." So my mom never got to be a veterinarian. She was a teacher instead. She taught physics, which was a pretty unfeminine thing to do, but that's where the math skills went, the math and science skills.

The education system has reflected some of our better tendencies and some of our worse tendencies. The basic value here that we are talking about is our section 15 Charter rights, our basic rights to be free from discrimination on certain characteristics. It was indeed the 1997 Vriend decision, again, a decision that came out of a teacher in an education system, in this case the postsecondary system, that read sexual orientation into section 15 of the Charter, it then being a prohibited ground. I will note just as a sidebar, Mr. Speaker, our guarantee to be free from discrimination based on sexual orientation: on that Vriend decision, the Member for Drayton Valley-Devon as recently as a couple of years ago argued that teachers should be allowed to be fired for sexual orientation. Thankfully, the 1997 Vriend decision, that the Member for Calgary-Lougheed called a virus, has been made and it's been upheld in various forms in the intervening two decades.

The basic human rights proposition remains the same. This is not something that is in our ancient history. Although I often tell the story – when I spoke to Bill 24, I told the story of growing up in a small town west of Edmonton that isn't so small anymore. I described my high school as being aggressively homophobic, and it was. The first person who ever came out to me – I was 17. We were in grade 12. I have his permission to tell this story. I won't use his name. I remember him saying to me and my three girlfriends at the time: "Do not tell anyone. They will kill me. They will kill me." There was a pretty serious look on his face, and I had no reason not to believe him because I had also had my ears open from my time in high school.

We didn't have at that time any kind of GSA. It was not even heard of. This is ancient history. I'm very old. There was a lot of different kinds of bullying and intimidation that went on, and there was no place for students to be able to access any kind of support for that. What we also know about GSAs is that it's not – there's a "straight" in there, Mr. Speaker. We know that these kinds of clubs and these kinds of meeting spaces reduce bullying, intimidation, and discrimination of all forms and for all kids, and they make the entire school atmosphere safer. They're not just about LGBT kids although they are about gay kids. And you can say "gay." There's nothing wrong with that, and I don't know why the Minister of Education can't even bring herself to say the word. It's only three little letters.

We have these provisions because of our section 15 Charter rights. This is not an old-time problem to be solved. It is a problem right now in communities across this province everywhere that people are discriminated against based on their sexual orientation. When sexual orientation first begins to present itself in the teenage and older years, that is when people need the most support, and that is when some of that peer support can be the most meaningful in people's lives. The evidence shows that peer to peer, with adult support, is the most effective way of saving people's lives, of making the whole school safe so that people can go to school to do what actually the education system is for, which is to reach our full potential as individuals and exercise our individual liberty.

It never ceases to amaze me that Conservatives can't get their heads around a basic fundamental piece of conservatism, which is individual liberty, individual liberty to be free from discrimination and free to express oneself however they want. I know – I know – that there are people across the way who share my views, who are scratching their heads as to why, after being elected on a jobs, economy, and pipeline platform, all of a sudden we are making a beeline for young people's rights. I know that there are members across the way who are having a little bit of reckoning time to deal with this. But I also know that there are members across the way who feel very strongly that we should take away the immediacy and the confidentiality of children's rights, of young people's rights to avail themselves of a peer support group in a school atmosphere.

I would encourage those who have problems with this to speak out, both at caucus and in cabinet. We know that some folks have a profound discomfort with this. We know it because they've done things like put it in writing and put it on the record. For example, the Member for Calgary-Elbow and Minister of Justice has written to his supporters. In the past few weeks members of the LGBTQ community have publicly invited the Member for Calgary-Lougheed to meet with them on multiple occasions. Even former PC Education minister Gordon Dirks spoke out that similar meetings he took were helpful to him to better understand the importance of GSAs in protecting vulnerable youth. That was a missive sent by the now Minister of Justice to his supporters. He put it in writing that there were problems with his own leader's approach to gay-straight alliances.

How about this one, Mr. Speaker? We have the now Minister of Transportation urging people just over a year ago to reject this very GSA policy, this very policy on suspending the immediacy of people's ability to join or form a GSA and the confidentiality associated with it that our government brought in, rejecting this very policy that is under consideration by this House right now because this policy is – this is the Minister of Transportation's quote, not mine – outing gay kids and results in the UCP becoming, quote, a lake of fire party; don't be called a lake of fire party, I am begging you.

So, Mr. Speaker, we have people begging for Bill 8 not to present itself in the Legislature, yet here we are. Clearly there's a very strong appetite amongst the Premier and his inner circle to railroad any hon. members who may have questions about this bill and push through this highly objectionable approach to people's basic human rights. I can appreciate that not all members may have had a chance to provide that feedback yet to Executive Council and to the Premier's office staff, who seem full steam ahead on this. I can appreciate that maybe they haven't had time yet given that it has happened so quickly. I would beg those private members to continue to communicate with the Premier's office, because constituents do care about this issue, and I know that many hon. members across the way do want to uphold the honour of representing their constituents.

Mr. Speaker, I want to move on a little bit and talk about the comments that I got after speaking to Bill 24, a bill that I was happy to speak to. I am less happy today. I got a large card from a neighbour who had a community QSA that had formed through the Boys & Girls Club during the time of uncertainty.

In southern Alberta sometimes that uncertainty is not just a mild discomfort, but it actually puts kids at risk. When I go and tour places like Wood's homes in Lethbridge, there are pride flags and trans flags kind of everywhere. When I toured it a couple of years back, I asked why that was, and the staff there said: oh, well, a good majority of the kids who find themselves homeless and then find themselves at our door, availing themselves of our services, are LGBT, and they've been kicked out. That's the reality for many people in my community.

I got a big card after speaking to Bill 24 because as part of their QSA they watched some of the speeches. You know, people do watch, Mr. Speaker, and constituents do care. It's a big card. It's about this big, and it's still in my office. It certainly brought me to tears because the individual comments from at that time 16- and 17-year-olds – those folks are now voters, my friends – were at once heartbreaking and inspiring. They said things like: I never thought that I would have anyone elected who spoke for me and who represented me; I never thought I would have an elected representative who understood what it meant to be an LGBT youth.

I don't, but it is my job to speak here on behalf of those struggles because I understand that there are struggles, and my allyship is not an entitlement, as some folks have sort of alleged across the way, that just by virtue of the office people should be nice to them. No. No. Allyship is not an entitlement. One is not entitled to be adjacent to pride, to be part of pride, any of that. Pride is a struggle, it is political, and only through voicing values that are shared with that community do you earn the right to be anywhere near it, to wrap yourself in anyone's flag.

What that card said to me was that, one, folks are watching. Folks are watching. Some of the comments in that card specifically referenced the previous debates that the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora talked about when she walked us through some of the political history. In other words, when those kids were, like, 10, 12 years old, they were paying attention. They're watching us. We need to be accountable to them.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available for a brief question or comment.

Ms Hoffman: It will be, guaranteed, five minutes or less, Mr. Speaker.

Thank you so much to the Member for Lethbridge-West for walking us through some of that history. One of the things she said early on in her remarks reminded me to do some googling. Vriend versus Alberta: we often talk about Vriend and the successful case, but it started with Vriend versus Alberta, right? Like, it was the province, the government, the people of this province represented by the government, attacking the rights of a minority individual who was fired from his job.

Vriend versus Alberta: what it made me think about is the fact that Doug Stollery was chief counsel on Vriend versus Alberta. Doug Stollery is now the chancellor at the U of A. Doug Stollery took it all the way to the Supreme Court of Canada and won this landmark case, I'd say, for equal rights here in this country. He also happens to be a member serving on the conversion therapy working group, certainly somebody who has a legal background, a very distinguished career there, somebody who's very respected for his contributions to the community at large. Certainly, the Stollery family has given so much to all Alberta families, I would argue, and to many from other provinces who come here for the amazing support they receive through the Stollery children's hospital here in Edmonton.

I wonder if the member might be willing to talk a little bit about the Vriend decision and the conversion therapy working group and intersections that she might see there in the attack on sexual orientation and gender identity, minority rights, gay rights. Thank you.

The Speaker: Well, a brief question or comment, indeed.

The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West is rising to answer.

Ms Phillips: Yeah. I mean, the Vriend decision was one of the first Charter decisions that ever caught my eye. I was, I think, in second-year university, and I remember the day that the decision came out. My friend, who was a lesbian, was walking down the street holding hands with her girlfriend, and because the issue had been in the news, I think people's tempers were a little flared. She got spat on that day, and that was on Whyte Avenue. That was in 1997. Again, this is not old-timey history. This is now.

Discrimination happens, and that's why we need things like section 15, and that's why we need sexual orientation to be read into section 15, and that is why the court found it to be so. The court then also found, for example, the right to marry in the 2005 reference, again, that was vehemently opposed by the Member for Calgary-Lougheed and others, I'm sure, in this Chamber.

The fact of the matter is that our Charter rights have been upheld, our rights to security of the person, to individual liberty. That goes for conversion therapy, Mr. Speaker. Again, this is a question of: does the individual have sovereignty over how they take decisions, over how they approach matters of faith, how they approach their intimate relationships, how they approach how they are going to navigate the oftentimes complex questions of gender identity? The individual before the law is sacrosanct, and this has been upheld time and again.

It has also been upheld through our section 7 rights on the security of the person. For the women in this room, that particular decision in 1988 may interest them because that is the decision that guarantees our reproductive freedoms. Again, the liberty of the individual to take decisions in their own best interests is supposed to be that question of liberty, supposed to be a cornerstone of conservative thought but, like so many things, is subject to a great deal of both hypocrisy and convenient thinking, especially these days, in this moment of the life of conservatism in this country and elsewhere.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I've talked about our legal rights. I have talked about examples where I know that GSAs would have helped. I've talked about examples of kids who are in GSAs or QSAs right now and what they see us doing and how they see us speaking for them or not. The only thing I will say is that they will continue to do that and they're not going to be protesting at my constituency office. I can guarantee you that.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others wishing to debate?

I might just remind members that if they would like to have conversations outside of the debate, perhaps they might like to use any one of the lounges that are available to you.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung is rising.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased once again to rise to speak to Bill 8 in this Chamber. I want to pay particular thanks to the Member for St. Albert, who really brought home the crux of this debate by reading into the record a number of letters written by young people who self-identified in their letters as members of the LGBTQ community, who would be directly affected and in the line of fire of Bill 8 and the proposals therein.

Now, it's instructive to know that at the Youth Empowerment & Support Services, otherwise known by its acronym, YESS, at any given time more than 30 per cent of the youth residents there who've sought shelter have been students who were kicked out of their own homes because their own families didn't accept their sexuality. The result, of course, is that these children, young people, are homeless. They're seeking shelter, but they're homeless. They're out of their own home. They're despondent. Ultimately, many are on the street. They're vulnerable to pimps, drugs, prostitution, suicide, and other forms of violent death, which is what these people face if they're not able to come out in a way that's safe to their own families when they know that their own families have a real difficult time comprehending the human rights necessity to accept the sexuality of their children.

It's very astounding to me and maybe to other members across the floor that this is happening right here in our cities in this province, but it is on a daily basis, Mr. Speaker, and that's right at the heart of the matter. The letters that were brought forward on the record by the Member for St. Albert I think showed and demonstrated, more clearly than anything any member in this House can say, the fears that these young people feel for their lives in not having a safe, protected place, within their school, where they won't be outed, to come out and learn how to find a way to discuss their sexuality with their parents and ultimately find the acceptance they desire, to maintain that family bond rather than facing the ostracism that they know exists at the moment.

Organizations like YESS are really to be commended for giving shelter to those individuals who are at risk, as I mentioned, of being on the streets and vulnerable to pimps, drugs, prostitution, suicide, and other forms of violent death. We know that these GSAs have saved lives. Undermining them will do the opposite. It will result in young people dying. I know the Member for St. Albert is intent, along with the members on this side of the House and, I hope, all members of this House, on protecting the lives of young people who are critically vulnerable in facing the decision as to how to come out to their own family in a way that allows that family to remain intact, to find the language and the tools and the support to help them bridge the gap that exists between them and their family members.

Mr. Speaker, not all families have the acceptance levels necessary to allow a young person who is a member of the LGBTQ2S-plus community to feel comfortable coming forward. It's not a matter of giving choice to parents. It's a matter of providing a safe spot for these young people to come out so that when they do decide to make that commitment and reveal their sexuality to their parents, it is done in a way that will hopefully keep that family unit intact and allow a real communication and a dignified communication between those parents who don't fully comprehend what's going on with their child and the young adult or the young child who needs the assistance of peers as well as professionals in terms of a teacher who can help guide that individual to a place where they feel they are equipped and prepared to come out to their parents.

Undermining these GSAs, as has been said so eloquently by the Member for St. Albert and many others in this Chamber, especially on this side of the House, is a very, very wrong-headed move. It's a move that will not only be unhealthy. We've said in no uncertain terms – and I think the facts are incontrovertible – that we will be putting young peoples' lives at risk, and some people who otherwise might have lived a fruitful, healthy life after properly communicating their sexual orientation to their families will end up dead. That's the long and the short of it.

I'd like to thank the Member for St. Albert for those very, very heartfelt letters that she read into the record. I couldn't think of a stronger and more potent testimony to the value of the GSAs that we brought into force. To go backwards in time, to not recognize the value of these young people and the importance of providing them with a bridging mechanism to come out to their family is a shameful indictment of the government on this issue. I hope that the public outrage will be enough to cause them to backtrack and realize that this is a mistaken policy and that they decide that they will amend their legislation to get rid of at least this piece of Bill 8, which is a tragedy.

Thank you.

10:40

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available for brief questions or comments if anyone has any of the member. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods is rising to ask a brief question or comment.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to our Member for Edmonton-McClung for speaking to this very important issue and sharing his thoughts on Bill 8 this evening. My question to him was just if he'd heard from constituents or had conversations with members of the LGBTQ2S community in his time as a legislator, given the debates that have been had in the past on Bill 24 and seeing some of these issues return to the Legislature again now.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you to the Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods for the question. I must say that as a member of the NDP caucus, now in opposition and then formerly, of course, in government, it would have been impossible not to have had conversations with members of the LGBTQ community because they knew they had an ally in this caucus, whether in government or in opposition.

That was evidenced in the attendance at any event that we held to honour and respect and show the dignity to the LGBTQ2S-plus community that they deserved, whether it be a flag raising of the pride flag – we had people from the community in droves. We certainly had, I would say, hundreds. I don't know if there was a member of the LGBTQ2S-plus community who didn't come door-knocking with us during the last election campaign because, you know, they understood that lives depended on it. It was super important to that community. That's why we're here now advocating on their behalf once again, because we know directly, first-hand, how important it was to the community.

Of course, we have our one lone MLA gay, ML-gay, who is in the Legislature proudly advocating as well. We hope to see those numbers increase in subsequent elections, but for now we'll be proudly standing next to the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood and making sure that that voice is as strong as possible and multiplied by ours at every opportunity because this is not something, Mr. Speaker, that can go by the wayside. This is an important issue. I think all Albertans are watching not only how we perform; I think they expect us to follow through on our commitment to the LGBTQ-plus community. We well established our credibility on that file. It's something that we could never even dream of going backwards on.

We're doing our very best to gather public approval for our resistance to Bill Hate, as we refer to it. It's a bill that reflects an underlying misunderstanding and a very frightening lack of respect for the need of the LGBTQ2S-plus community to be protected, to be protected from those who would otherwise out them as students in school, who would suggest that they don't have the right as young people to come out at a time of their choosing.

That condescending attitude, to say it lightly, is something that will become and is already becoming reflected in street behaviour in this city, where you'll find people walking down Edmonton streets, three abreast, wearing colours of white supremacist groups, pushing people out of the way, expecting their way to be cleared. And you'll find it in other jurisdictions in the western world, where two lesbian women, for example, on a bus in London, I believe it was, were repeatedly smashed in the face because they refused to kiss at the demands of some absolutely abhorrent young people who were thugging their way into their lives. That is unbelievable evidence of the type of thing that is creeping into public discourse. We're not going to be immune to that type of tragic discourse, Mr. Speaker, and that's one of the things we need to combat.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, anyone else wishing to rise and debate today? I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo rising.

Member Ceci: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I, too, believe that Bill Hate is disappointing on so many levels. I believe it deliberately waters down the previous Bill 24, that was working for the majority. Youth, in particular GSA and QSA youth, were supported by Bill 24.

This Bill Hate, the Education Act amendment, will not be this Legislature's finest hour, Mr. Speaker. The 30th Legislature will be known, I believe, in the future, when people look back at it, as a socially conservative, activist Legislature, and I don't think the majority of Albertans are like that anymore. The 29th Legislature, I would think – and I don't think I'm just giving it, you know, a good spin – will be known as an environmental Legislature that updated labour laws, the MGA, and other big pieces of legislation that had been left untouched for a great long time. The work of this Legislature, even in its early days, I think, is moving things backwards.

I just want to touch a little bit on, you know, my own growing up, Mr. Speaker. I was in junior high school and high school in the late '60s and early '70s to the mid-70s. I grew up with many kids who I found out many years later were gay, but they were closeted the whole time they were in school, the schools that I went to. It was obviously not a safe place for them to be out. In later years some individuals that I kept in touch with would often tell me that they didn't have support in school, and those young people, obviously, weren't able to live their lives with the support of caring adults who created environments in their schools to make them feel comfortable. In fact, there was a great deal of discomfort shown to anyone who was not straight and a jock. The fact that people had to hide themselves from others was not that era's finest hour.

The retrenchment of the work that Bill 24 has put in place to address the needs of – I'm not sure whose needs are being addressed in this way, Mr. Speaker. Like, who is being listened to with regard to Bill Hate coming forward? It certainly can't be young people in schools. It's got to be other people. I would put it to the group over there: who's talking to you about needing to roll back protections for kids in schools? It's not kids. It can't be kids. They wouldn't be that cruel.

My own approach to life and living, Mr. Speaker: live your own life, don't impinge on other people's lives, live and let live, and accept people where they're at. This Bill Hate does not do that. It says that you have to be certain ways, and if you're not those certain ways, then you're not going to get comfort and support in the education system, the kinds of securities that are put in place already.

My question opposite – I guess I would just place it again – is: who have they been listening to who is pushing for the retrenchment of the safe places for youth who are questioning their sexual identity in schools, which is taking place today? Who is being listened to? It certainly isn't young people, and if it's not young people themselves, I'd submit that the people who are being heard most probably shouldn't have the loudest voices in this regard. We should be listening to the young people.

Mr. Speaker, I also read over Bill Hate again, and just looking at page 7, to move on to some exceptions from section 33, it says:

The Lieutenant Governor in Council may, by order, exempt an accredited private school or a class of accredited private schools from the operation of all or part of section 33.

Then when you go to the existing act and see what 33(1) is all about, it says:

A board, as a partner in education, has a responsibility to . . .

- (e) provide a continuum of specialized supports and services to students that is consistent with the principles of inclusive education.

What this bill is actually doing is saying that the principles of inclusive education: private schools and a class of accredited schools can be exempted from those.

Again, Mr. Speaker, it seems like it's a step back, certainly for young people who need the supports of inclusive education. I think what that means is – in my own family my young nephew has Down syndrome, and he has been going to schools along with other kids in his neighbourhood, and he's been supported in those schools with specialized supports. It looks to me like the principles of inclusive education are being removed from accredited private schools or a class of accredited private schools. I don't think it's a step forward.

Then there's another part here that talks about striking out "specialized," and it's at the bottom of page 7. When you go over to the part in the bill that it talks to, it says:

ensure that the student is provided with specialized supports and services in accordance with section 33(1)(e).

This act is actually striking out "specialized" and watering that down so it would read: provide with supports and services in accordance with section 33(1)(e). Who does that benefit, Mr. Speaker? It's not the young person in the school.

Additionally, there's a removal of striking out "a director" and substituting "a child intervention worker." The current act, the way it reads is:

On hearing a matter referred to it, the Attendance Board may, subject to any terms or conditions that the Attendance Board considers proper in the circumstances, make an order doing one or more of the following [things] . . .

- (d) reporting the matter to a director under the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act.

This is watering that down and saying that the director can be replaced by a child intervention worker.

Now, I've worked in social service agencies, worked with child welfare. I know that a director is higher than a child intervention worker, and I know that a director has a lot more stroke than one of their employees, so I wonder again: who is benefiting from this removal and watering down of the current act? It's not the child, Mr. Speaker.

The other thing I'd like to say with regard to the watering down of QSAs and GSAs is – I've read the whole bill, and it removes or waters down QSAs and GSAs by stealth, Mr. Speaker, because there's not one mention of what this government is doing with respect to that. It's probably buried under, you know: a section is amended by striking out the whole section in the current act. That seems very, very untransparent, and I think that the members opposite would agree that this Education Act amendment is not transparent in that regard.

Additionally, Mr. Speaker, the section where trustees can be banished from their own boards by other trustees is frankly shocking. I've been on five city councils and now in two Legislatures, and I have never, never seen that level of – I don't know what the word is. It's like reaching in and throwing a potential grenade into a council or a board of trustees or the Legislature.

There are ways to work these things out that council members have long used. The kind of thing they do, Mr. Speaker, is that if there's a council member who has gone off the rails and is acting in ways that are abhorrent to other council members – and I've been on some of those councils – you just stop working with that person. You freeze them out. You say, you know, "Your actions need to change, or we'll stop participating with Notices of Motions with you, with work on committees with you," and they quickly get the message that if they want anything to occur, if they want eight votes of council – I was on a council of 15 – they have to come around.

If they don't come around, Mr. Speaker, then you simply vote no when they bring things forward. That's how you deal with a council member or a trustee who is trying to do things that aren't in the best interests of the young people that they're there to serve or the constituents of the ward you represent. I've seen that action before, and it shapes people up pretty quickly. I've never been on that receiving end, but I do know that you have to watch yourself. If you want to get things done, you have to work together, and that's how you deal with people who won't do the things that they need to do to represent their constituents.

Mr. Speaker, I think that there are lots of good reasons for this bill to be brought back and changed so that we actually have something going forward that meets the needs of Albertans and kids in school in particular. I just don't see where the work has been done to make that happen. In fact, I think this is a reaction bill to promises made on the campaign trail, not in the best interests of young people. I don't know, as I've said, who was being listened to, but certainly in the case of QSAs/GSAs it wasn't the youth who were in those GSAs. It wasn't the teachers and others in schools who were supporting the young people in those QSAs and GSAs.

I've been to several schools in my riding, Mr. Speaker, not specifically to attend a QSA or a GSA, but the young people in those schools – and I'm thinking mostly of high schools – have a lot more comfort with the whole area of sexuality than, I can tell you, I and my cohort had when we were in the late '60s and early '70s and I was in high school and junior high school. With that, you know, I have a lot more trust that they're on the right path. They are being supported to be on that right path, and I think the adults in this room, frankly, have a lot to learn from those young people.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available for brief questions or comments to the member if anyone has one.

Seeing none, are there any others wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I rise to speak against the introduced Bill Hate, an act to destroy gay-straight alliances, that has come before us in debate this evening. One of my key concerns – and in my remarks at second reading I think I will speak to some of the overarching themes. There is a lot in the changes to the Education Act and the larger package, but at this point I think I'll stick to two main pieces of this legislation, specifically the impact to LGBTQ students. Because of my time as a member of the government caucus during the debate of Bill 24, I have had the opportunity to talk to constituents and stakeholders who've had direct experience with GSAs and QSAs, so I'd like to speak to that. Then, secondly, the other big change I'd like to speak to tonight is the ability for duly elected trustees to be removed. There are certainly a lot more changes to this bill, and in further debate I look forward to the opportunity to talk more about some of the other changes that are being brought in.

This Bill Hate can be called that act to destroy gay-straight alliances specifically because the government has chosen to make changes to how GSAs can be formed and the protections that students who wish to participate in GSAs are afforded by going back to an old piece of legislation, proclaiming and amending that, rather than trying to have a very upfront and honest conversation about the change that they're trying to afford. I also find that the government has been making very factually untrue statements regarding the strength of the protections that will be afforded to our LGBTQ students. This came up directly during our question period today, but with the introduction of Bill Hate, Alberta students will not have the strongest protections in Canada when it comes to making sure that they will not be outed, making sure that they have the right to form these gay-straight alliances in their schools and get the support that they need.

Keep in mind: what are we talking about? I'd like to go back to the fundamentals. We are talking about peer-support networks run by students, supported by school staff, and grounded in promoting equity for gender and sexual minority students; safe, caring and inclusive spaces for all students; healthy, respectful environments and relationships to prevent or eliminate bullying and discrimination; peer support being the key word because these are students helping other students in what can be very difficult times in their lives.

As someone who was not a gender minority student or a sexual minority student, high school was still tough for me. Adding those things on top is a lot to put on a young person. Making sure that somebody who is in the LGBTQ community is choosing when they choose to come out, how they choose to come out, and that they are supported is incredibly important. We know that because members of the LGBTQ2S community disproportionately suffer homelessness and other issues.

For this I'd like to go to our LGBTQ2S Youth Housing and Shelter Guidelines, that the government of Alberta has put out, because I think and I know that in conversations that I had with parents concerned when I was door-knocking, there are a lot of people who don't realize that we are talking about a vulnerable population because LGBTQ2S youth experience higher incidents of homelessness, mental health issues and suicide rates than their non-LGBTQ2S counterparts.

Research [shows]:

- Nearly one in three homeless youth in Canada identify as LGBTQ2S.
- LGBTQ2S youth identify the primary reason for homelessness as family rejection due to gender identity or sexual orientation.
- LGBTQ2S homeless youth face higher rates of discrimination, violence and abuse in the shelter system than their non-LGBTQ2S counterparts.
- LGBTQ2S youth are at a higher risk of mental health concerns and self-harm and exhibit higher rates of suicidality than the general population.
- Lack of acknowledgement or awareness of LGBTQ2S youth has led to inappropriate responses by front-line workers, adding to the marginalization of this group.

That last line is more about why there is a specific guide for LGBTQ2S youth, because they tend to need the social supports and the support network that government can provide more often.

When we're talking about GSA policies, I really want us to think about the youth who need these protections most, not the majority but the few who are trying to get by, who need that peer-support network to talk to someone. The rejection from a disapproving principal or school administrator or even other classmates can have devastating impacts. Because throughout a lot of the discussion that we've had in this Chamber so far in our 30th Legislature, I worry that we are losing sight of who we are talking about. We are talking about a minority who is vulnerable. If we don't listen to what they have to say through letters, like have been read out this evening, or through e-mails that get sent to our offices or through one-on-one conversations at the many pride events that are going on around our province, then we are at risk of doing a huge disservice – not a disservice. Honestly, we're at risk of harm or death because of those higher rates of suicide. That makes that really, really important.

[The Speaker in the chair]

The parallel between thinking about who we're talking about: we're also talking a lot in this Legislature about youth minimum wage. The minister has taken to standing up and talking about how this is only the minimum and that lots of people will pay higher than this. But we're losing sight of who we're talking about. We need to talk about who this policy is going to directly impact. When we come to a youth minimum wage, we're talking about the youth who is going to be forced to have to take $13 an hour.

When we're talking about Bill Hate, we're talking about the youth that is desperately looking for support through a peer-support group. Now Bill Hate may make that harder for them not in some theoretical way but in a way that we know actually has happened in this province and will continue to happen if there are not strong protections that protect the immediacy and make sure that there is no chance that a student will be outed. Because without the immediacy, students can be stonewalled, can be stalled. They can find the process very, very frustrating. Perhaps they are told that they can't have a student-led peer-support, teacher-supported club that has the name "gay" in it. A number of difficulties can come about. If they don't have the protections from being outed, then students necessarily won't even try to start a club. If there's any risk to themselves, they won't do that, and we've seen that.

Now, the culture around gay-straight alliances and how they've been used to support students I think is really important. I haven't had a chance to go through everything, but I hope to be able to revisit this in future debate. There are a number of scholarly articles and research being done on gay-straight alliances and, specifically, from my initial survey, research showing the incredibly positive impact they have not only on students who come from the LGBTQ2S community but also straight allies who participate in these clubs. I know I heard my colleagues talking about the importance of gay-straight alliances not only for the students but for the entire school community and the positive impact it can have on teachers as well. I think these are important considerations that we should be taking into account.

As we continue to discuss this bill and the risks that it poses to our community members in the province, the risks that it poses to vulnerable young people, it's very important that we always bring that back to who this actually impacts and thinking about those most vulnerable students and the protections that they deserve.

Now, during Bill 24 debate in the 29th Legislature I had the opportunity to talk to a number of members of the LGBTQ2S community as well as receiving their correspondence at my office. I hope to be able to bring some of that to read because I think that was incredibly powerful when my colleague from St. Albert was able to read into the record some of those items. Making sure that those voices are heard here in this Chamber is incredibly important.

I've had the opportunity to attend a number of events where members of the community have come to speak to me, including during the election when a teacher who is helping to run a GSA in our city came out to volunteer and spoke very passionately about how upset the students were that some of the protections could be repealed and that it was causing a lot of stress and harm just that the debate might come up. Of course, we were talking in the election. We didn't know what was going to happen. Of course, the UCP was running on their platform of jobs, economy, pipeline, yet here we are discussing Bill Hate. So obviously those students' fears had some grounding in reality. But it was incredibly touching to hear this teacher talk about the concern that was being raised from these students and the fear. The idea that students might not seek out a peer-support group because they're afraid is deeply upsetting to me, knowing the positive impact that GSAs, QSAs can have in the lives of these students. That is my primary concern at this point with Bill Hate.

I am also concerned about the idea that duly elected public officials in the form of school trustees could be removed from their positions by a majority who are not supportive of that individual member. As we get into further bill debate, I certainly hope to hear from the minister and other members of the government caucus why this is considered important in this bill and in what scenarios they envision it being used. Have they thought through the potential negative impacts to various communities if a dissenting voice is removed in that trustee position?

I think that's a really important failing in this bill. We need to be able to fully understand not only, "Okay, why did the government think this needs to be put in?" but I really, strongly disagree with putting in that language at all. I think it leads us down a very dangerous path when it comes to making sure that the voices that citizens elect are there and able to do their jobs even if the things they say are not always well received by everybody listening. I think that's really, really important.

My main concerns on Bill Hate, Mr. Speaker, are the fact that we are turning back the clock on protections, we are weakening protections students already have, something we know that students are concerned about, something I personally have had many conversations with students about. I'm very pleased that I was in the Chamber this evening so that I could hear so many powerful statements by my colleagues, including our ML-gay, whose perspective I appreciate very much having in this caucus, and the others who were part of the Bill 24 debate and discussions, that were very important and held during the 29th Legislature.

As we move forward, I hope that we can continue to have these important debates without devolving into misinformation, which is something we saw happening around Bill 24, making sure that we can be honest about what this bill does and doesn't do and who it impacts. Again, I will bring us right back around to: we need to be thinking about the most vulnerable students. When you're thinking about, "Who does this potentially negatively impact, these changes?" I want you to think about someone who could be removed from their family home if they were outed, someone who may need supports for mental health issues, or someone who might be at risk of committing suicide. That's who we're here to fight for, and I appreciate that opportunity tonight, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. Is there anyone wishing to make a brief question or comment?

Seeing none, the hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my privilege to rise and speak to Bill 8. Similar to my caucus members, I have a number of concerns with this bill, the Education Amendment Act, 2019, which has been characterized by my caucus colleagues as Bill Hate because, you know, quite frankly, it's undoing protections that our government brought in for the LGBTQ2S-plus community in addition to other things.

I know that the government and the Minister of Education characterize this as bringing in the act that wasn't proclaimed back in 2012. Really, this is a completely gutted version of that, minus the fact that it's an attack on the rights of our youth and of our students, Mr. Speaker.

I'm going to talk a little bit from my point of view as a teacher. You know, there are a lot of new members in this House, and I don't know if they knew that I was a high school teacher for a number of years before I got into politics. Again, I was very fortunate to teach at a school that was very inclusive and accepting. But I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that providing students with the opportunity to have a safe space – I never understood, and I was in this House back when a former MLA, Kent Hehr, first brought in I believe it was a motion, which was back in 2014, calling on the government to protect GSAs. It was voted down by the two parties, the PCs and the Wildrose, and then in November of that year a former MLA, Laurie Blakeman, tabled private member's Bill 202.

Now, that was interesting. I remember that the government intentionally introduced another bill because you can't have two bills with the same concept or theme or amendments to legislation at the same time. So it torpedoed Laurie Blakeman's bill, and that was intentional. I know that there are some members in here, actually, that served in the PC caucus at that time, and quite frankly I'd love to hear them stand up and try to say in this House or outside of this House that that wasn't the case, that it wasn't meant to torpedo her bill.

Then I remember when Bill 10 was tabled. That was one of the later nights that we were in this House debating, Mr. Speaker. I remember that some of the government was starting to get swayed. There were cracks they didn't understand because of the push-back. The former Premier at the time was out of the province, and I remember that there was a crackdown.

Well, I'll never forget. The reason I remember this is that I stood up and I was speaking, and I said: wow, daddy has got a really long arm to swat down from outside of the province any type of resistance. He had heard that members were starting to grow concerned. In fact, the former Minister of Infrastructure, Sandra Jansen, was one of those that really disagreed with the government's approach and knew that it wasn't going to protect students the way that the government claimed. I mean, it was really a shell of, "It's going to protect students," but it actually didn't.

Mr. Speaker, we made history a couple of years ago when we passed protections and put them into law that students who want to start GSAs can't be blocked or sidelined or delayed or dragged out or, again, that teachers and principals can't out kids. If you ask me, that's their decision when they want to come out and express their identity, whether it's to their parents, to their friends, or to their family. No one has the right to force someone out. Personally, I think that's an attack on a person's human rights.

The other thing about this repeal. You know, the members opposite can talk about how this is the strongest protection in the country. I mean, that is the biggest load of baloney when you look at comparisons across the country, to what other jurisdictions do as far as protections. Quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, I think it's disingenuous and frustrating when one looks at the protections in place in other provinces. It's very easy to see that it falls far short. In fact, we currently are the strongest, under the legislation that the New Democrat government passed, and we're about to take about 20 steps backwards.

Now, the issues that I have around this are the students, first and foremost, and removing protections for them. We've heard over and over again that GSAs save lives, and we know that. That is a fact that no member can dispute. There, sadly, have been lots of young people who have taken their lives, whether it's because of bullying or pressure or stress. I mean, I can't even imagine some of the situations that young people have been put in because of who they are, which just seems ridiculous. We should truly, if we are an accepting and open society, do just that for every person regardless of the colour of their skin, their sexual orientation, who they love, what faith they practise. But we have a far way to go, Mr. Speaker. The protections we brought in were just that, to ensure that we are protecting our students and our young people.

I remember – and I know the Member for Edmonton-Glenora talked about this – that one of the amendments that the previous government under the PCs brought in was that they said, "Okay. You can have a GSA, just not on the school property; you can run over to Tim Hortons, you can go to 7-Eleven, or you can go somewhere else and have a club," which I thought was absolutely ridiculous.

The other piece of it, Mr. Speaker, is I think it's important to listen to the people of this province, especially the young people of this province, who said: "I don't understand why the government is so opposed to this. This is an after school club." I would love to know how many schools phoned parents to say: "Oh, my God. Johnny is taking chess. Did you know that Johnny has joined the chess club?" That seems absurd, absolutely absurd.

I mean, when I went to school, to my knowledge, teachers never called my parents to say what clubs or sports teams I joined.

Ms Phillips: They called them for other reasons.

Mr. Bilous: Well, that may be true. I might not have been the best model student back in high school, but that story is for maybe later on in the Bill 8 debate – who knows? – when the hour gets really late.

The other thing I just wanted to touch on briefly, Mr. Speaker, is the fact that the bill as it sits also is going to put teachers and principals in a very, very awkward position. As a teacher I can tell you that I would not be comfortable phoning a parent and outing a student, yet I would be in contravention of this bill and could potentially lose my job. The conundrum or quagmire or position that this bill will put teachers and support staff in is completely unfair to them, wanting to ensure that students are protected and safe, yet they will be blatantly breaking the law.

The other thing that I want to mention, Mr. Speaker, my issue with this, is the complete and utter attack on a democratically elected trustee through this bill. It is offensive that a group of other trustees can essentially remove a trustee from their position. That is a complete attack on democracy. Trustees are duly elected, just like every single member in this House, and I think that members would have an issue if that was proposed for this place. Could you imagine? I mean, very quickly you would become an autocratic, one-party state. We don't want to encourage groupthink. We want to encourage trustees to be able to come up with innovative ideas, to propose and have healthy debates. What this is going to do is stifle that.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I don't know how much time I have, but in the essence of time, for those reasons, I would like to move an amendment, that I will read into the record.

The Speaker: Hon. member, if you would just pass the amendment through to us. I can assure you that you have approximately five minutes left. If you can get that to us, get it to the table here, then we will proceed as such. If you can just hang on.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. If you don't mind, I'll read this into Hansard right now while the table is receiving it.

The Speaker: Just one second. Hang on.

Excellent. Thank you, hon. member. This will be referred to as RA1.

Mr. Bilous: Excellent. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm moving this amendment on behalf of the Member for Edmonton-Riverview that the motion for second reading of Bill 8, Education Amendment Act, 2019, be amended by deleting all of the words after "that" and substituting the following:

Bill 8, Education Amendment Act, 2019, be not now read a second time because the Assembly is of the view that further time is necessary to enable school boards to adjust their policies to comply with the proposed legislation and regulations.

Mr. Speaker, this is, I think, the most gentle way of giving time for this bill, that is completely flawed, to be reviewed and amended at the appropriate place and time, to which, I can tell you, I will have much more to say. As we all know in this House, I am not a member who's known for his brevity.

With that, Mr. Speaker, for the time being I will move to adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

The Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader is rising.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think we've had a great evening, lots of progress, and as such, I would move to adjourn the House until tomorrow at 9 o'clock a.m.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 11:29 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

9 a.m.

Wednesday, June 12, 2019

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Prayers

The Deputy Speaker: Good morning, members.

Let us pray. Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and her government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideals but, laying aside all private interests and prejudices, keep in mind their responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all. May Your kingdom come and Your name be hallowed. Amen.

Please be seated.

Orders of the Day

Committee of Supply

[Mrs. Pitt in the chair]

The Chair: I would like to call the Committee of Supply to order.

Supplementary Supply Estimates 2018-19 General Revenue Fund

The Chair: Hon. members, before we commence consideration of supplementary supply, I would like to review briefly the standing orders governing the speaking rotation. As provided for in Standing Order 59.02, the rotation in Standing Order 59.01(6) is deemed to apply, which is as follows:

- (a) the Minister, or the member of the Executive Council acting on the Minister's behalf, may make opening comments not to exceed 10 minutes,
- (b) for the hour that follows, members of the Official Opposition and the Minister, or the member of the Executive Council acting on the Minister's behalf, may speak . . .
- (c) for the next 20 minutes, private members of the Government caucus and the Minister or the member of the Executive Council acting on the Minister's behalf, may speak, and
- (f) for the time remaining, to the extent possible, the rotation outlined in clauses (b) to (e) shall apply with the speaking times set at 5 minutes as provided in Standing Order 59.02(1)(c).

During the first rotation speaking times are limited to 10 minutes. Once the first rotation is completed, speaking times are reduced to five minutes. Provided that the chair has been notified, a minister and a private member may combine their speaking times, with both taking and yielding the floor during the combined period.

Finally, as provided for in Government Motion 13, approved by the Assembly yesterday, the time allotted for consideration is six hours.

The Committee of Supply has under consideration the 2018-19 supplementary supply estimates. I will now recognize the hon. President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance to move the estimates.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Madam Chair. I would like to move the 2018-2019 supplementary supply estimates for the general revenue fund. I stand before you in this Assembly to present supplementary supply.

I would like to begin by introducing the Treasury Board and Finance officials sitting with me here today. To my right is Athana Mentzelopoulos, deputy minister, and to her right is Mary Persson, assistant deputy minister, budget development and reporting. I would like to take a moment to thank them and the staff at Treasury Board and Finance for their professionalism, their hard work, and their long hours. They've been a tremendous support to me and to our government as we navigate the challenging waters of Alberta's financial situation.

Madam Chair, our government respects the traditions of parliamentary democracy, and as a part of that, it is essential that we receive legislative approval of these estimates. This is to ensure there's the appropriate oversight of government spending by the elected representatives. The supplementary estimates are essentially the overspending of the members opposite. Prior to the election the previous government made several contractual commitments, and now the responsibility falls on our government to formally ask this Legislature for funding so we can pay for these items.

I recognize that some of these commitments are, in fact, related to important activities, some of which include wildfire disaster recovery and emergency assistance, support for persons with developmental disabilities, and the repair and rebuilding of flood-damaged homes at the Siksika Nation.

Our government also recognizes that events and natural disasters happen. In fact, we are seeing that right now as fires burn in northern Alberta. Thousands of Albertans have been evacuated from their homes and/or remain on evacuation alert. All Albertans need and can be confident that our government will be there for them in their time of need.

We also recognize that disasters and the magnitude of any disaster are not something any government can predict. However, these estimates tabled before you today go far beyond disaster funding. These estimates demonstrate a lack of discipline and respect for all Albertans. Madam Chair, not only do these estimates represent poor fiscal planning of the previous government, but they clearly demonstrate how our friends opposite played politics with Albertans' money.

What I'm referring to, Madam Chair, is the more than $310 million that the previous government used to fund an ill-advised initiative to lease railcars. My friends opposite have treated taxpayers' money like a credit card, and now we've received the bill. If they felt they needed it, they bought it. There was little consideration around who was actually going to pay for it.

Madam Chair, on April 16 Albertans elected this government with the most significant mandate in the province's history. They took a careful look at our platform. They saw that we were committed to bringing the budget back to balance and to making the effort that will be required to turn back the momentum of growing debt. They asked us to bring sustainability back to government so that hard-working Albertans can be confident that their children will enjoy the same government services that have sustained them, and we're going to do that, but first we must finish old business and put the recklessness of the previous government behind us.

So now, as a matter of law, our government must pass legislation including that money for prepayments to lease railcars despite our own misgivings of this rushed job. When passed, these supplementary estimates will authorize an approximate increase of $8.9 million to the office of the Chief Electoral Officer, $449 million in voted expense funding, $53 million in voted capital investments, and $362 million in voted financial transactions for the government.

The estimates of these overages are consistent with the fiscal plan presented in the previous government's 2018-2019 third-quarter fiscal update and will authorize increases to the office of the Chief Electoral Officer and the following 15 departments: Advanced Education, Agriculture and Forestry, Children's Services, Community and Social Services, Culture and Tourism, Economic Development and Trade, Education, Energy, Indigenous Relations, Justice and Solicitor General, Municipal Affairs, Seniors and Housing, Service Alberta, Status of Women, and Treasury Board and Finance.

Madam Chair, as we debate these supplementary estimates, I suspect that our members opposite will argue that this money was for the good of Albertans, but let me be clear. Rushing contracts worth hundreds of millions of dollars for political gain is not responsible spending, and it's certainly not good for Albertans. As President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance I've been given a great privilege. I've been tasked with making sure that Albertans' money is spent responsibly, and I'm taking on that challenge as a privilege and with the utmost respect for the people of this great province.

Albertans want to know that their hard-earned money is treated with the utmost respect. They also want to be sure that government has the money to help them when they need it most, and they want to make sure that there is money for the future.

Madam Chair, my role, my fellow ministers' roles, and the role of our government is to be responsible stewards of Alberta taxpayers' dollars. We know there will be challenges ahead, but we will bring this province back to balance and find better ways than pushing contracts through for political gain to do things differently.

Thank you for the opportunity to speak this morning, Madam Chair. Now my colleagues and I will be pleased to answer any questions from the members of this Assembly.

Thank you.

The Chair: The hon. members from the Official Opposition. Hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre, would you like to combine your time with the minister for the first 20-minute block?

Mr. Shepherd: Yes, if the minister is open to that.

The Chair: Hon. Minister of Finance, do you agree to combine the 20 minutes and go back and forth?

Mr. Toews: Agreed.

The Chair: Okay. Edmonton-City Centre, please proceed.

9:10

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Madam Chair, and thank you to the minister. I appreciated his opening comments and certainly look forward to the fall budget, when this government will have the opportunity to demonstrate whether they can indeed pull the rabbit out of the hat, that they seem to indicate that they feel they will.

I'd like to begin by asking a few questions, then, on the matter of Health. Speaking to the minister, he was indicating, I guess, some concerns with our government's plan on spending, but I do note that for Health there seem to be no supplementary amounts to be voted on, which I can only assume means that Health is proceeding on budget for the fiscal year in Budget 2019 and that our former minister, now the Member for Edmonton-Glenora, had things in good stead. To the minister: can you just confirm, then, that indeed, as there are no supplementary amounts, the budget that was proposed and put forward for Health has been successful and moved forward appropriately?

Mr. Toews: Madam Chair, I can confirm that there are no supplementary amounts related to the Ministry of Health.

Mr. Shepherd: All right. Thank you. Well, I can see, then, that the minister intends not to be only thrifty with spending but also with his answers.

To the minister. Can you tell us, then, based on that budget and given that you are agreeing with those numbers and that you're moving forward on the budget that we put forward: are you able to indicate how many full-time employees were allocated to mental health and addictions in Budget 2018 and what the increase in full-time employees for this fiscal year might be?

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Ms Sweet: Madam Chair, point of order.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Sweet: Just as a point of clarity, Madam Chair, can you please clarify for the House that we can actually ask any minister and that it doesn't specifically have to be to the Minister of Finance? Just for the information of all members of the House.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Madam Chair, this certainly is not a point of order, but with that said, I am interested in that point of clarification as well.

The Chair: Hon. members, for clarification purposes, the government can decide who responds to the questions.

The Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Madam Chair, in response to the question, for 2018-2019 there were 933 FTEs related to mental health, and for Alberta Health Services and the Health Quality Council of Alberta there were 80,605 FTEs. I think that in response to the member's question around 2019-2020, which is the upcoming budget year, as the members opposite know, at this point in time we have not delivered a budget. We are working and deliberating with ministries as they develop their plans going forward, and of course a budget will be forthcoming this fall.

The Chair: Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. Given that, as has been noted, the government seems to largely agree with the budget that we had put forward and recognizes that it was well put together and that they do not feel anything additional to add to it, I believe that would end the questions that I would have on the matter of Health.

At this time I would hand things over to the Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I'll seek your guidance on whether I need to ask to combine with the minister again or whether we'll just continue to proceed in that exchange.

The Chair: We're still in the first 20 minutes, so please proceed.

Ms Ganley: Fantastic. Thank you.

I'd like to begin by noting, if it's possible, something that actually isn't in here. In 2015, when we went through this exercise, also with numbers that weren't really our own, there was a large amount of overspending in corrections, and that was difficult to get under control. Over a number of years it required software and incredible hard work on the part of many individuals in the department. This year it's gotten to the point where the hiring and the staffing – and we made a bunch of moves around, ensuring that we don't have, you know, people who were in jail for a day and a half nearly as much. That is an incredible achievement on behalf of those staff, to make it the case that that isn't going into an overage. I'm not sure if you're aware of that, Minister, but I think it's worth noting.

My first question, I will direct, is on page 55, obviously having to do with estimates for Justice and Solicitor General, line 5.8. I'll direct this to the Minister of Justice, but I guess anyone can answer. I'm incredibly proud to sit here with my colleagues. I think we made a lot of changes that were beneficial to the people of Alberta. One of the ones that I'm proudest of is the change that you're seeing the last piece of in item 5.8. That's $14.8 million in additional funding for legal aid. Over four years it's part of a more than $70 million boost in funding to legal aid. It's almost 76 per cent over the course of our term. I'm incredibly pleased to see that this number is here. I hope that it continues to be here as we go forward into the future.

What I will ask is: does the minister agree, especially in light of the comments of the Minister of Finance about waste and overspending, that this investment to ensure that our system functions adequately and to ensure that those most vulnerable are able to access it is a good investment?

Mr. Schweitzer: Madam Chair, again, we're here to talk about the NDP's spending. We have a $14.8 million increase in legal aid spending. We have clear campaign commitments that we've made. Again, we're going to be going through a thorough budget process, and in that process we will refine our campaign commitments and our commitments to Albertans to make sure that we have an effective justice system. We're going to be making sure that we focus on the priorities of Albertans and our legal system to make sure it has the tools required to do the services that Albertans are expecting.

The Chair: Calgary-Mountain View.

Ms Ganley: Thank you, Madam Chair. With respect, I'm aware that this is a commitment that the previous government made. I remember making it. I see that it's been included in here, and what I'm asking is whether you think this was a good use of funds.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you to the hon. member for the question. I think that what she's attempting to refer to in a roundabout way is that the Finance minister's comments about concerns about the fact that we have to bring some supplementary supply components of this process here really have to do with NDP boondoggles and misspending. Asking if specific points of this still have value and are important and if that was a blanket statement by the hon. the Finance minister: Madam Chair, I think, through you to the hon. member, I can assure you that that's not what the Finance minister is referring to. The Finance minister, in fact, said in his opening comments that there are important parts of supplementary supply to be able to continue with the continuity of government, which is what we're doing here right now.

In fact, Madam Chair, through you to the hon. members of the opposition, I will quote their then Finance minister on March 13, 2018, sitting in the Finance chair in this place during supplementary and interim supply. He refers specifically to supplementary supply.

This interim funding authority will ensure continuity in the business of the province while the Legislature takes the time necessary to discuss, debate, and enact the full funding required for government business for the 2018-19 fiscal year.

That was on March 13, 2018, in this House. The fact is that there are important things within supplementary supply to be able to deal with the continuity of government. That's why this government is bringing supplementary supply to this House, to go through the process.

But as the Finance minister said, Madam Chair, the fact is that also within supplementary supply is a requirement, unfortunately, for this government to have to be able to follow through on some boondoggles and some, you know, misspending by the government, and that's what the Finance minister is referring to. In fact, I think a great example of that – and I think it's relevant to the hon. member's question because it was asked in such a broad way – would be crude by rail, which was an abuse, almost, of taxpayer dollars, that was brought forward in the dying days of the former administration during an election period, that utilized taxpayer dollars and put us in a tough situation. I hope we'll have more of an opportunity to be able to talk about that once some questions are asked about energy.

To close, Madam Chair, because I'm sure the hon. member would like some more time back, the answer is: yes, there are things that are important to supplementary supply. Unfortunately, there is also some misspending by the NDP that we have to handle. That's the reality of what we've been left with by the bad financial management of the former government.

The Chair: Calgary-Mountain View.

Ms Ganley: Thank you, Madam Chair. I think it's probably worth pointing out that the question was specifically about line item 5.8. It wasn't asked in a broad way. It was a question specifically about exactly $14.8 million for legal aid and whether or not that's important. I think it's pretty clear that if each of the things individually is important, they can't collectively add up to misspending on things that are unimportant.

The question I was asking, to which I am clearly not going to receive an answer, was whether or not that specific spending on legal aid, which spending came at the time that it came because we were in negotiations over the course of several years for a governance agreement that will make legal aid sustainable for years into the future – anyway, I will move on to my next question.

Again, very specifically, page 55, lines 4.3 and 6.5, which refer specifically to additional funding that went into our rural crime strategy. Six million dollars came in-year. This is the $4 million that came at the end of the year. Obviously, we were moving quite quickly when we were doing this. We thought we got it right. We continued talking to folks, and we ultimately landed on this.

At the time, of course, the members opposite singled out this particular rural crime strategy to vote against it, calling it overspending, and we know, I think, beyond a doubt at this time that that much-needed investment has already started to pay dividends. In fact, I've seen the hon. minister begin to reference sort of continued use of exactly that same strategy into the future. I'm incredibly pleased that we went through with that strategy. I think it's been incredibly effective. Again, in general, the comments of the Minister of Finance, having admittedly singled out some specific things that were important like disasters and other things, certainly not this particular strategy – but I don't think that this represents a lack of discipline. I think that this was a good idea. I think that it was something that was needed by the people of Alberta at the time. I don't think it was irresponsible at all. In fact, I think that not doing it would have been irresponsible.

So I'd like to ask the current minister to share his perception of this investment, whether or not he thinks that it was worth while to invest in RCMP officers and Crown prosecutors.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Madam Chair, I'll take this question on behalf of the government just because I think it's important for my colleagues who are new to the Legislature to have a little bit of the other side of the history lesson that was just presented by the hon. member when it comes to rural crime inside this Assembly. The fact is that the then Official Opposition, which I was proud actually at the time to be the leader of inside this Assembly, had to fill these galleries full of people from all over rural Alberta and beg for help for rural crime – beg for help for rural crime – to be able to make sure that that was addressed while that member, who was the Minister of Justice, refused over and over and over to help people. In fact, at the time, their leader said that there was really no rural crime problem and disregarded . . .

Ms Hoffman: Mischaracterization.

Mr. Jason Nixon: In fact, every member of that party that is an incumbent . . .

Ms Hoffman: What a mischaracterization.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Madam Chair, I know that the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora wants to get in and heckle away. She can rise and speak at any time. She has her block here.

Ms Hoffman: Right now. Yeah. Let's do it.

Mr. Jason Nixon: But the reality is this . . .

The Chair: Hon. member, please.

Ms Hoffman: Sorry.

Mr. Jason Nixon: The reality, Madam Chair, is that when it comes to rural crime, rural crime is an extraordinarily important issue. I know you know that. It's an important issue to your constituents; it's an important issue to my constituents. But this wanting to rewrite history by the hon. member so that all of a sudden the NDP has become the great champion of rural crime and standing up for rural Albertans is absolutely ridiculous when you know the history and the facts of the process that it took the Official Opposition at that time to get the then government to actually take action for people.

Now, the hon. member also is implying that the former opposition, by voting against the former government's budget, was automatically against every issue, including the funding of police officers, something that we called for in this Assembly for a very, very long time. It means that we would be against specific components of the budget. That's not true, Madam Chair. What we were against was a fiscally irresponsible budget that had already at that point become about five credit downgrades if I've got it correct – I have to look . . .

An Hon. Member: Six.

Mr. Jason Nixon: . . . maybe even six by that point and had us on track for $100 billion. If the hon. members want to spend their time in supplementary supply trying to campaign and talk about how good they were at budgeting or managing the province's finances, I certainly welcome that because I think that they were likely the worst government in the history of this province when it came to managing our finances. They had us on track for $100 billion in debt, and some of the issues that we have to come to this place today to be able to pass are basically fixing up many of the components of their mismanagement when it came to the finances of our province.

With that said, Madam Chair, through you to the hon. member, of course, funding police officers and standing up for victims of rural crime is a huge priority for this government. It was a huge priority for the United Conservative Party when we were in opposition. The real question is what took them so long to do it and why they hadn't gone all the way when they were in government. But the Minister of Justice, I know, will go all the way, and this government will always stand up for rural Albertans, and we'll always stand up against rural crime.

Ms Ganley: Through you, Madam Chair, thank you for the incredible lecture on that one. I feel like "mansplaining" was in fact ruled parliamentary, and it's probably worth using in this instance.

Returning, then, Madam Chair, to the issue of lines 4.3 and 6.5, I think it's just worth noting that in the instance of – and we're going to have this procedure again today, so you'll no doubt be incredibly familiar with it. When you're voting on something like a supplementary or an interim supply, you have the option to block vote all on one, or you have the option to single out certain items to specifically vote for or against them. In the instance when we introduced the rural crime strategy, the members opposite specifically singled it out so that they could vote against just that without voting against everything else. So let's be clear that it had nothing to do with voting against other portions of the budget that were not justice related.

Ms Hoffman: Facts.

Ms Ganley: Right.

With respect to this strategy, obviously, it includes a couple of different elements, some portion of which flows through to the RCMP and some portion of which goes to Crown prosecutors, most of those prosecutors now being in place, I think, and doing their job. I think at this point we have seen rather significantly the outcome of that strategy. I'm incredibly glad that at the time I chose to act immediately, while the members opposite yelled at me to take my time and study the issue and even went so far as to introduce a private member's bill to study the issue at length and to send it to a committee and to do a whole bunch of things.

I think this has been incredibly effective, and I'd love to hear, you know, from the minister. I've asked about specifically two things. I've asked about the rural crime strategy, which, again, just so it's clear that I'm being specific, is 6.5 and 4.3, those lines. I've asked also about line 5.8, which is specifically support for legal aid. I think those are all very important things. What I'm asking is whether the minister or the government more generally feels the same.

Mr. Schweitzer: Madam Chair, addressing rural crime was one of the cornerstones of our platform that we put forward in the most recent election campaign. It goes through in a detailed way and outlines a lot of the hard work that was done by the legacy members of both of our historic parties in putting forward our rural crime strategy. In that, we have our rural crime strategy, and when we get into our budget process and as we get going here, throughout this process we're going to be making sure we bring through in detail those policies.

9:30

We're going to be making sure that we fully fund things like ALERT to make sure that they have the resources to combat gang activity, also make sure that resources are there for our rural communities. Our priorities as well are to put in place 50 new prosecutors, Madam Chair, to make sure that we have the resources to deal with these backlogs that we have in our court system to give people across Alberta the confidence in our justice system, and make sure that they know that the policing is there.

The Chair: Hon. members, we are now entering our second 20-minute block.

Members of the Official Opposition, who would like to speak? The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Ms Ganley: Sorry. If it's all right . . .

The Chair: Hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View, would you like to continue going back and forth?

Ms Ganley: Yes, please, if that's amenable.

The Chair: Government, agreed?

Please proceed.

Ms Ganley: Perfect. I'm actually pretty much finished, so my hon. colleague can get up right away. All I wanted to do was just say thank you to the minister. I appreciate that acknowledgement. I'm glad to hear that we're on the same page with respect to that. I'm incredibly glad that you've managed to convince our now Premier, who cut ALERT when he was in Ottawa, of its value. Thank you so much for that.

The Chair: The Minister of Justice.

Mr. Schweitzer: Madam Chair, first and foremost, I categorically reject the statements that were made there. We're talking right now here in supplementary supply about the spending that was done by the NDP. Right now in Alberta we have clear priorities on justice to make sure that we provide the services Albertans are looking for. We have priorities. We're not prioritizing light bulbs. We're not prioritizing shower heads. We're prioritizing to make sure that our front-line law enforcement officials have the resources they need to get their job done.

Not a day goes by when I walk through here in these halls, Madam Chair, that I don't run into one of our MLAs representing a rural constituency who comes to me and says: "Look, I need you to come to my constituency. We have a crisis happening in our constituency." That's why I'm working with many of our colleagues in this Chamber to make sure we get to every community possible to talk to them about their concerns, to talk to them about our plan to combat rural crime. We're going to be going all the way up to Fort McMurray. We're going to be going to Grande Prairie. We're going to be going to Lethbridge, Medicine Hat, Red Deer. We're going to be talking to people about our plan to help make sure we address this crisis that's going on across our rural communities. So many people on farms just do not feel safe. We need to make sure that they feel safe in their communities.

It was the failure of the past government to listen to Albertans in a timely way. You heard the hon. House leader. His comments were about how many times he had to fill the galleries here with people to make sure that the previous government actually took steps to get the job done. Right now in Alberta we have to make sure we do more. We have committed the most detailed platform in Alberta's history – Alberta history. This is a platform with over 300 commitments. We're going to make sure that we have promises made, promises kept on this. Albertans are relying on us. They're relying on us to make sure we keep them safe in their communities.

Thank you.

The Chair: Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'm pleased to rise today and speak to supplementary estimates. I did have some specific questions related to the Agriculture and Forestry ministry, but I wanted to first note that the Minister of Finance in his opening remarks did specifically, basically, exclude Agriculture and Forestry from those ministries that might be spearheaded in their attack as overspending of members opposite because, of course, as is fairly typical on an annual ongoing basis, Agriculture and Forestry will be one of those ministries that does have a significant amount of monies that are called for in supplementary estimates.

For example, this year we see about $193 million for wildfire disaster emergency assistance provided for wildfire management costs. Some of my inquiries will relate to that number but not in a way that would be looking to condemn the practice because I know that when, in fact, we were in government, we were called out for perhaps budgeting only a small amount initially for this contingency. However, subsequently there was a much larger amount that was necessary to be spent during the course of the wildfire emergency on an annual basis. Therefore, supplementary estimates requests were made and the same is true for the past budget year.

I'm wondering if the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry and/or representatives on that minister's behalf could comment a little bit about the unpredictable nature of the financial requirements for this ministry with respect to fighting wildfires and natural disasters, particularly wildfires given that the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry has the responsibility for fighting forest fires, and also the inherent cost of disaster relief resulting from evacuations that are coming as a result of wildfires that are approaching more and more rapidly towards centres of population and which, increasingly, on an annual basis seem to be costing us more and creating a greater sense of fear and risk in northern communities in particular, who face threats of wildfire that may actually impinge right up to their community. I know that this year, of course, in High Level we were very concerned about that wildfire almost getting into the community. We lost homes in Paddle Prairie as a result of an unpredictable wildfire that took off and actually caused some 15, 16 homes to be destroyed.

One of the things that was undertaken, Madam Chair, during the High Level firefighting effort – and it was widely publicized – was an effort, during a period of time when the winds shifted and gave a bit of an opportunity for those heroic firefighters to do their work, to create significant firebreaks around the community of High Level at great cost and expense and using much heavy equipment and bulldozers in an effort to protect against the wildfire actually encroaching into the town of High Level. This type of expenditure on an ongoing basis during an emergency period when firefighting is actually taking place, when there's an active fire taking place: I'm wondering, going forward, if we can perhaps look at having some of this work done on a more ongoing basis as a measure of public safety and protection rather than on an emergency basis, making it part of ongoing fire protection and perhaps incorporating it into our FireSmart community protection efforts. We are seeing a higher level of risk on a regular basis to many of our northern communities, which are surrounded by forests.

I know that there's been a significant uptake in interest, and it's taken seriously by our northern communities, to engage with their fire departments through community planning and to make efforts to satisfy those plans. Because of the large amount that we see in supplementary estimates required on an ongoing basis, some of which are costs for work that's done during an emergent situation but possibly could be done on an ongoing basis on the community

FireSmart program, I'm wondering if that might kind of sort out or balance the expenditures that are made as a result of fighting wildfires that do occur: doing work that might be preventative in nature rather than doing these fireguards, in particular, in an emergency situation.

I wonder if the minister could perhaps comment on that and also, really, basically look at the predictability of supplementary estimate expenditures, the large ones that are being required on an ongoing basis. Of course, we're not going to be eliminating the sizable estimates, the supplementary estimates, the supplementary dollars that are asked for because of the unpredictability. But is there a way that the Ministry of Agriculture and Forestry foresees altering their budgetary planning process to perhaps balance out some of the expenditures so that they're not such a large amount called for during supplementary estimates? Is there a way of doing that? Is there any thought being given to that process?

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Madam Chair, and thank you to the member opposite for the question and for the thoughtful comments. In response to the member's question I can confidently say that this government is basically looking at our emergency response budget line. As we take a look historically and, I think, by virtue of the fact that we are having to deal with a large budget item expenditure right now in supplementary, this would point to an inadequate amount of emergency planning funding in previous budgets. Because of that this government is taking a look to ensure that we have adequate amounts built into emergency planning response for upcoming years.

Again, I would point out that we're here today dealing retroactively with expenditures that have been committed to by the previous government that were not budgeted, and I think it's important that all members in this House recognize the discomfort that we have in doing that. We all agreed that to be transparent with Albertans means that we should be coming forward with our spending plans in a budget, and to that end, we are looking at required budget levels based on historical facts and historical costs to deal with emergencies in this province.

I will say that the emergency response that we've observed this summer to the fires in the north has been exemplary. There's been a tremendous response by our emergency management personnel and officials. I think there's been a very efficient, co-ordinated response by all levels of government, and I commend all those that have been on the front line of those decisions. I recognize the hardship that many residents have experienced, the residents that have lived in and around those areas of the fires, residents who have experienced real loss as a result of those fires.

I appreciate the member opposite's comments on considering a proactive response around municipalities in terms of creating fireguards. I do know that our minister of agriculture and his team are looking into those possibilities. Our Minister of Municipal Affairs, I believe, is also very interested in what this government can do in fact prevent emergencies going forward.

A couple of things I would like to point out in the agriculture section of this supplementary ask. I don't believe that adequate budget consideration was given to the emergency response requirements that this province has typically had, so we're now here retroactively having to pay for this emergency response, which was needed, which was required, but which was not adequately predicted or budgeted.

Another concern. When we look at the expenditures by the ministry of agriculture, I think we want to take a look at the amount of $7.6 million that was paid out as a grant in response to, really, what I would call an ever-changing and ill-advised beer markup program or programs that were implemented and reimplemented and never quite struck an adequate tone to ensure that our manufacturing sector was properly looked after. When I say properly looked after, I know that for the business community predictability is critically important, and we had an ever-changing markup plan here over the last few years. We take a look again at a $7.6 million ask, again after the fact, and I would suggest that dealing with these kinds of expenditures after the fact is not acceptable in the eyes of Albertans.

Again, Madam Chair, I'll close my comments with this. The fact that some departments are not included in the supplementary ask, in other words, the fact that some departments, including the department of Health, does not have expenditures that we're now having to retroactively approve, I don't think should be confused with the fact that this government believes that all the spending in those departments was performed in as an efficient manner as possible or that all of the programs were delivered in the most efficient manner. The fact that we're having to retroactively approve expenditures in some departments, I think, demonstrates an irresponsible approach to budgeting in some cases and in other cases demonstrates simply a very irresponsible approach to spending. But, again, the fact that some departments haven't required supplementary expenditure approval does not mean that those departments acted in a fiduciary responsible way in every case.

We know that there's been much government mismanagement in the past by the previous government, and we know that there are opportunities in every ministry to find efficiencies and to deliver programs more efficiently, more cost-effectively, and with less government waste. Madam Chair, this government is committed to finding those efficiencies and to delivering high-quality services that Albertans expect but to do it in a very responsible, efficient, cost-effective manner.

The Chair: Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'm pleased to continue our conversation with the Minister of Treasury Board and Finance on behalf of the Ministry of Agriculture and Forestry. In his comments the minister just mentioned a couple of things I wanted to touch upon, particularly with respect to comments regarding a suggestion that the emergency response was inadequate or not adequately predicted. I think that this is something that has been an ongoing historical criticism of any Minister of Agriculture and Forestry, but it's something that's not necessarily warranted or prudent because it is a difficult department to predict because of the nature of the emergency responses that are required with respect to wildfires on an annual basis.

Now, certainly, there's always room for improvement on an annual basis to try to more accurately predict what expenditures might be required, but I think it's been noted as a very common and accepted practice in this ministry to have a contingency initially allotted and then a supplemental amount asked for in supplemental estimates, as we're doing now, because of the unpredictable nature of wildfires and the efforts to support firefighters and those individuals caught up in disasters who need disaster relief. I'm not sure if it's really a fair comment to say that it wasn't adequately predicted because this is not something that governments over the past number of decades in this province or right across the country, for example, have seen fit to try to pinpoint. It's been, I think, a proper practice to allot a smaller amount and then see what contingencies are required as the fire season progresses.

However, I concur that there are some things that can be improved upon on an ongoing basis. I think this is one of the things that had been done in the past as a result of practices that were looked upon by our government when we were in power with respect to the aircraft contracts. I believe that may be one thing that, you know, on an ongoing basis any government would look at attempting to control. Whether it's the procurement of aircraft on a standby basis or whether it's creating fireguards around communities that will perhaps prevent encroachment of fire into communities during an emergent disaster, those are things that, going forward, might lessen the amount of supplemental estimates that are required.

I wouldn't get into damning any particular Minister of Agriculture and Forestry, whether the past ones in our government or the current one, for relying on what seems to be a proper procedure by going ahead and asking for a responsible, small amount to begin with and then seeing how the fire season plays out to ask for supplemental dollars later on.

Just as a matter of principle, Madam Chair, the parliamentary practice of supplemental estimates and interim supply requirements is something that offers balance.

The Chair: Hon. members, we now enter our third 20-minute block.

Members of the Official Opposition, would you like to start? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora. Would you like to combine your time with the government?

Ms Hoffman: I'm happy to do that. We'll see how it goes, if that's the desire.

The Chair: The government agrees?

Ms Hoffman: Yes? Okay.

The Chair: Please proceed.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much. I first of all want to start by saying how grateful I am to the public service for all the work that went into, of course, the last four years but also into preparing for today. I know that preparing interim and sup supply can be very onerous, so to the public servants as well as to the government for the work in preparing for today's discussion: thank you.

I have a question to which I imagine there probably isn't an answer today, but it stemmed from some of the discussion earlier and if it's possible to get a written response later, I'd appreciate it. Maybe we can do the last 10 years or another timeline if the government proposes. How many years did we not require supplementary supply in Health? That would be something that I would appreciate knowing. I can probably get the library to look it up, but if it's possible for the folks who have that information available to provide that written response if it's not available today, that would be appreciated.

The other thing I just want to mention before I get going through Education, because I do want to spend the majority of my time on pages 43 and 44 of the sup supply document, is that I appreciate the comments around wanting to be able to anticipate natural disasters and emergencies to a better degree. I think that that's an important thing to aspire to. I also think that if we could anticipate the natural disasters and emergencies in a better way, we'd prevent them rather than just budget for them. I do want to say that.

With regard to page 43 I would love to discuss line 4. There are not a lot of lines, but line 4, school facilities. I'm hoping that the minister could please provide some detail on what the increased capital requirements are for the school building program, please.

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Madam Chair. We're looking at line 4 on page 43. The supplementary amount of $500,000 is requested today to provide fund increase capital planning requirements for the school building program. Today, right now, I don't have further details to provide this House. However, we could certainly provide those for that $500,000 expenditure.

I would like to just respond perhaps as well to maybe some comments by the member opposite in terms of emergency response planning. I absolutely want to acknowledge that any government cannot accurately predict what type of emergencies the people of Alberta might find themselves in from year to year. Again, I appreciate the suggestions of every consideration to be as proactive as possible and to ensure that communities are least impacted when we encounter an emergency. We all know that those emergencies can take place in the form of fire, floods, and other emergencies as well.

My concern is not that there was an inadequate response or that the response was not justified when we're taking a look at approving this supplementary supply but, in fact, that Albertans, I believe, expect their government to ensure that there is an adequate budget line to deal with emergencies that do occur. Even though we can't predict necessarily what they will be, when they will occur, I think Albertans expect that governments have an adequate line built into the budget to deal with those emergencies as much as possible, again, on a proactive measure.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much. I look forward to the written response with regard to the question around line item 4. That would suffice. I think that's what I heard the minister say. Certainly, my desire, of course, would be that everyone anticipate every possible cost we could possibly need, and I'm sure we'll have an opportunity to discuss that more in interim supply for disaster recovery. I know that it can be challenging, that not everyone can predict how bad the flu season is going to be, for example. That's not even a natural disaster. That's the Health minister's amazing analytics team doing their best to anticipate how effective the flu vaccine is going to be and how many people are going to get it, but sometimes things get in the way of good predictions. I certainly wish you all the best with that, Minister. And to the entire government, I think that that is a worthy aspiration, but I think that natural disasters and other emergencies are very, very difficult to anticipate.

My second question – and perhaps this is again for follow-up in writing – is around line 4 on page 43. Several school projects across the province are funded for planning, but schools and communities are anxiously awaiting information about if and when they will find out if funding is in place for the project to proceed after that initial planning investment. Is there any funding being moved between fiscal years to keep those projects moving forward with regard to that line item? If so, that's great. Can you tell us which ones and why? If not, the same question: why are we not moving fiscal years, making sure that we have that money there to move those projects forward? Again, that's page 43, line 4.

Mr. Toews: Madam Chair, just to respond to the question, I think, as everybody in this House knows, we are moving forward with the budget process. We will be tabling a budget this fall, and I know that ministries are active right now looking at their programs that Albertans expect this government to deliver. They are considering the best ways to deliver those programs, the most cost-effective and efficient ways to deliver those programs. You know, I would say in response to that question that, again, we will be rolling those details out in our budget deliberations. As we present the budget, obviously those details will become very transparent.

Ms Hoffman: My last attempt to clarify that. There is five hundred – oh. I guess it's only a thousand dollars identified there. So does that mean that none of those projects have been included in this sup supply document? If that's the case, I'd be fine with receiving that response as a written response.

My next question is about line item 4.1, again, same page. Could the minister address what a related party is and if there are any increased costs associated with operations and maintenance associated with them? That would be helpful. I think there was information provided around that there could be related parties that would be impacted by this line item, so I'd like to know in more detail what that means.

The Chair: The Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Madam Chair. We will respond to the member opposite with the details around the $6,667,000 of funds needed to address increased capital payments to related parties to provide funding for operations. Again, we will respond with the details. Of course, it is the members opposite that in fact incurred those expenditures, and if memory fails them, we will certainly provide the details for them again.

10:00

The Chair: Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you. Next, I would like to continue on again with line item 4.1, and I just want to give a little context.

I imagine that many of us, probably, in this room helped fund raise for playgrounds at new schools when they were being built. I know that I went to a few birthday parties where instead of asking for presents, children said: "Hey, we need a playground at our school. Can you give us a donation to help pay for that?" because their new school was built, and it was built without a playground. So when we were in government, we made the decision to work with parents and to provide a funding envelope for a basic playground when a new school would open, something that I think many of us would want. Of course, if school councils want to make it a priority to fund raise additional funds to supplement that, so be it.

But I'm looking for some clarification about whether that line item, school facilities infrastructure, does indeed, through the supplementary supply estimates that we're considering, still include the addition of playgrounds to new school builds, if that's something that did continue on during this period between when the election was called and today, when we consider sup supply estimates?

Member LaGrange: Yes, it does include all of commitments that were made by the previous government.

The Chair: Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thanks. I guess my supplementary to that would be: did the entire amount that was budgeted for school playgrounds get spent in this last year through this sup supply, and if so, do we know how many playgrounds were built and how many are under construction now with the remainder of the funds?

The Chair: The Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you for the question. We will have to get back to you with those fine details.

Ms Hoffman: Since we're on a roll for fine details, will the interim supply amount for ensuring these projects are completed also – that'll be a question I'll ask in interim supply, so you can start working on that now, I guess, because it makes sense if we ask in sup and carry over to there. Will there be an additional need in interim supply to offset any shortfalls in supplementary supply? That would be that question that flows from there. There's my heads-up for that next chunk of time, that we have to consider that.

My next question is on page 43, and it's about not just what's here but also what's missing. Of course, there are a few line items. I think it was the same when we came in and brought in sup supply, so I'm not criticizing that. Perhaps there were slightly more details, but I don't expect that there were significantly more details. In terms of reviewing last year's sup supply, I noticed that the Assembly was to consider an additional $18 million for enrolment growth, and I noted that that isn't here in this year's sup supply. Could the minister comment on what that means about her enrolment growth commitment that was made earlier this week, on Monday, and whether or not that will be funded in a different way since I don't see it funded through this sup supply line item?

The Chair: The Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Madam Chair. I question the relevancy of that question. Right now we're looking back at, really, expenditures and commitments that the previous government made that really don't impact future enrolment. In fact, these were spends for the previous year. So again I question the relevancy of that question to this House.

Ms Hoffman: Perhaps it's a question to raise with officials. I'd be happy to have the response. It's just that last year I know that in the same document, which was looking retroactively, there was a line item for $18 million that was identified for enrolment growth, and I know that it's not here. I'm just trying to be able to do apples to apples, so if there was a change in the way it was accounted for or the way that it was reported, I'd be happy to receive that information. I just want to confirm that the announcement earlier this week is being funded somewhere through one of these pieces of paper that we're being asked to consider and approved.

I also see that enrolment growth in the province is going to be maintained or increased. I think that the number that was mentioned through media yesterday was $150 million, so I guess I'm looking, again, to see – and the $18 million was only a very small subset of the hundred and whatever million dollars that were required last year to fund growth, but I thought that there would be something given that it was in last year's document. If either minister would like to elaborate further, I'd appreciate that.

The Chair: The Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Madam Chair. Again, I think that in terms of discussing future enrolment growth and expenditures, it's irrelevant to this conversation, to this deliberation today. If, in fact, there was an $18 million ask in the previous year's supplementary supply bill, that, again, I can't comment on today. There was not that requirement in this supplementary ask.

I would suggest that, then, in the previous year – again, the supplementary supply requests, in fact, really, in my opinion, indicate an overspend, over and above what was budgeted. In fact, if there was enrolment for the previous year that was not anticipated, that's unfortunate because then Albertans were not made aware through the budget process of the financial commitment that they had to fund education. We're fortunate that this year, in fact, there is not that request, but I can't comment on that particular year.

The Chair: Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thanks. Again, one of the things that I think makes this much more complicated than doing a household budget is that sometimes conditions happen that are out of our control. There might be things like an influx of student population coming from Ontario after significant cuts to special needs education in Ontario and those types of things that do result in some of these pressures, and I know that everyone does their best to anticipate what's going to happen and what the trends are going to be, but it's not just the 4-year-olds from Alberta that end up becoming 5-year-olds in Alberta when they enrol in school. Sometimes we get new kids from other provinces or other parts of the world.

I just want to clarify. When I asked my question about related parties, I said that it was page 43, but it's actually page 44, line item 4, capital payments to related parties. I'm hoping for some clarity on who related parties are and what that entailed given that it was a supplementary estimate that we're considering here today. Who are related parties, and what are the services that we are making these capital payments to them for?

Mr. Toews: Madam Chair, the related parties were, in fact, school boards and the expenditure related to school board projects that were in play.

The Chair: Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much. I don't expect a list to be here, but if we could get a list – it is over $6 million. I'd appreciate a list of which projects those are and which boards received that funding, at the convenience, of course, of the public service. It's something that I think would help us all understand this document better, ideally before we are asked to vote on it because I think it's an important financial amount. But I appreciate the clarity that it was to school boards. That is certainly helpful.

I think I'll cede the rest of my time to my colleagues. Thank you very much, and I appreciated the succinct responses to what I tried to make succinct questions.

Thank you.

The Chair: Edmonton-Riverview.

Ms Sigurdson: Well, thank you very much, Madam Chair.

I'm pleased to rise and talk a little bit about the Ministry of Seniors and Housing, which, of course, I had the honour to be the minister of in the last government. We know that that ministry does serve thousands of seniors in our province to live in dignity. They are parents or grandparents, community leaders, mentors, and our friends, and certainly we want to make sure that we have the support they need to live. They built our province, and of course we want to make sure that seniors are taken care of.

Unfortunately, there are some myths about seniors. Sometimes there's talk of the grey tsunami or the burden of the aging population, but we want to make sure – certainly, I did when I was minister – that these apocalyptic discourses are not heeded. It's very important to know what seniors contribute, actually, to our province. They contribute in so many ways. They contribute financially. Many seniors are business owners, investors. You know, asking mom and dad for a loan is often a thing that we do. It seems like older people have money, they have a lot of expertise, and they have a lot of love. We certainly count on the seniors in our communities.

When I'm looking at the supplementary supply estimates here, I see that there is an increase in this ministry of $16 million, a little over 16 and a half million. I'd like to talk with the minister, and if I could go back and forth, if that's amenable to the minister, I'd appreciate that. Is that okay?

10:10

The Chair: Please proceed.

Ms Sigurdson: The first question I have is actually on page 64, and it's number 1. Certainly, despite what the Finance minister said in his opening remarks that, you know, we planned poor fiscally, we were reckless, I see that there are some savings. There was actually $672,000 that wasn't spent. There's just sort of a general explanation that this was "lower than budgeted expense in . . . programs." I would like to ask the minister what that means.

The Chair: The Minister of Seniors and Housing.

Ms Pon: Hello, Madam Speaker . . .

The Chair: My apologies. Sorry, hon. minister. That marks the end of the last 20-minute block for members of the opposition.

We will now go to the proceeding 20-minute block for private members of the government caucus. The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Mr. Ellis: Well, Madam Chair, thank you so much for giving me this opportunity to speak. I hadn't originally planned on speaking, but listening to the debate from earlier here, I couldn't help but notice the opposition bring up the rural crime issue, which is something that immensely affects people all throughout Alberta. This is why under the UCP opposition we put together what was called the rural crime report. I would of course refer to page 55 of our supplementary supply book that we have here as it relates to the expenses that relate to crime in general.

Now, the opposition spoke at length on the crime issue as it relates, of course, to the supplementary supply. I'd love to talk about how the previous government refused to accept that rural crime was even a problem, let alone a crisis. I remember seeing the galleries filled with people. I remember talking to all of my colleagues. I can remember the expressions on the faces of the government members who were representing rural constituents, that crime was an issue in those communities. I remember how nobody on the government side went to the town halls. I remember the outright denial that rural crime was even an issue. I remember going to town halls myself, watching the pain in people's faces. I remember watching people cry because of the crisis that was going on. It was something that could not be ignored any longer, and it was to the point, Madam Chair, that they finally – finally – had to do something about it. It was almost like the fentanyl crisis where they denied that was a crisis until, finally, they had to do something about it.

Then they come up with this. Let's talk about it. Let's talk about the $10 million and phantom 39 officers, which I tried to articulate was something that was – when the RCMP are at any given time 20 to 30 per cent short in the number of human beings that they have in their service, it was impossible for them to fill those 39 positions, so it was like a shell game that was being played.

Let's talk about the Crown prosecutors now. They set aside $10 million, which I can see as it relates to Alberta Crown prosecutor services. They have criminal and youth prosecutors. Well, I consulted with the Justice minister. They still haven't filled those positions. So money doesn't solve all of life's problems.

It had to do with management, and whether you like it or not, the previous government had bad management. That was shown in the last election. I look at the rural contingent of MLAs in this room, and whether you like it or not, I see them all on the UCP side. I think that really shows that their plan to combat rural crime was a complete and utter failure. That's why we have a Justice minister who is going to take a look at the rural crime report, who's going to analyze the supplementary numbers, and he's going to make sure that the money that is being put into rural crime and, in fact, justice as a whole is going to be the most effective use of that money for what is best for the people of Alberta.

Now, I want to talk a little bit, too, about the denial that the NDP had when it came to rural crime. We'll even relate it to, again, the prosecution at that time of Mr. Eddie Maurice down in Okotoks, right? Again, we had a gentleman who was just trying to protect his home, protect his family. He discharges a weapon under sections 34 and 35 of the Criminal Code. What do we get from the NDP? Silence. The only consistent pattern that I ever saw from the NDP when they were in government is that when there were protests that reached an absolute crisis point, that was the only time that they ever reacted. That had to do with rural crime, that had to do with the fentanyl crisis, and that to do with poor Eddie Maurice and his situation, who, to let you know, had never, ever to that point even received as much as a parking ticket.

Why did he do what he did? Because the police were not showing up to his home. He had called the police weeks prior to that, and the police didn't show up. So he did what any normal human being, especially in the middle of rural Alberta, would do. Because he had a lack of faith and trust in law enforcement at that given time under the leadership of that government, he defended himself, and he defended his child, who was sleeping in the middle of the night. He gets arrested. That's wrong. The NDP were silent. They were silent. They did not do anything. To sit there and dole out some money to some Crown prosecutors who were never hired – I confirmed that with the Justice minister – is not a solution to a problem.

Now, I tried in a nonpartisan factor to talk with that former Justice minister, but they didn't want to hear what I had to say. That's fine. I put it all in that rural crime report, I put it all on that platform, and I fully expect the Justice minister to execute it. I've known him a long time, and I have faith in him that he will do a good job.

I want to ask this government and somebody who was here, the Government House Leader: what was his version and what did he see under the leadership of the previous government? Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: The Minister of Environment and Parks.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, and I appreciate the hon. chief government whip's comments. In regard to supplementary supply the question I heard in there, Madam Chair, was in regard to the hon. Member for – I think the riding has changed; it's a little bit confusing now – Calgary-Mountain View, if I am correct, earlier in Committee of Supply speaking to and asking some questions to the Justice minister and to the government in regard to supplementary supply, specifically some money that is in there for officers and Crown prosecutors, as it relates to the announcements that were made during the now famous rural crime debates inside the Legislature. Whether or not that's important was the first question that, I think, the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View asked at that time that the hon. Member for Calgary-West is referring to but, second, how that relates to the priorities of our government going forward.

I think, first of all, it's important to point out that, Madam Chair, as the hon. Finance minister has already said in this Assembly, we are working on supplementary supply. That is different than interim supply and certainly different than the budget process. When we go through the budget process, we will be able to talk a lot more about our priorities as a government and where we will fund things going forward, our vision for the province and the promises that we have made, whereas with supplementary supply it's more about, basically, this unique spot because of the transition that happened in government, really about this House having to do an administrative chore to be able to put through commitments that were made by the former government.

To answer the hon. Member for Calgary-West's question and the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View's question, the rural crime portion of this, the announcement for prosecutors and police officers, is important. Nobody has said inside or outside this Assembly, on the government side certainly, that rural crime is not. Our concerns with the former government's spending are not on every topic. The reality is that we have to fund important things like prosecutors and police officers, but we don't need to do boondoggles like we saw by the government with oil by rail in the dying days of their government.

It's rich – and I think that's the point of the Member for Calgary-West when we're speaking about supplementary supply and asking about those specific numbers – to try to imply that the government, who was then the opposition, does not care about the rural crime issue. I know that you, Madam Chair, care about it, and I know your constituents care about it. I certainly know that the hon. Justice minister cares about it and cares about the investment that we would make in that. In fact, I suspect he will find, as he looks through the rural crime report, an important job that I know he is already undertaking, and he hears from constituents like mine in Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre, that we have not fixed that problem. It is a very real problem that impacts people. For the now opposition to act like they were champions of that issue when they were in government and then ask about it in interim supply specifically is quite shocking. I think that's the Member for Calgary-West's point.

I will tell you that on November 27, 2017, I have the wording of a motion that I moved in this Assembly. I know you were there for it, Madam Chair. It goes on to say: "Mr." – and I can't say my name, obviously, inside the Chamber – but then it goes on to say that Mr. hon. Leader of the Official Opposition requests leave to move:

Pursuant to Standing Order 30... [to adjourn] the ordinary business of the Legislative Assembly... to discuss a matter of urgent public importance, namely the growing incidence of property-related crime and an accompanying escalation of violent crime in rural communities and the resulting fear for safety that is felt by the residents of such areas, which now constitute a state of emergency.

I moved that as Leader of the Official Opposition. It refers directly to the response that the hon. member brought up inside this supplementary supply, which she's indicated was a response to that motion. The reality is, though, that the now opposition, when in government, voted against that opposition with the galleries full. To say that they are the champions of rural crime and imply that somehow, when this side of the House points out with supplementary supply that the NDP, when they were in power, made some terrible financial mistakes then leads to the conclusion that all of a sudden the United Conservative Party and now government does not care about rural crime is a ridiculous argument. That, Madam Chair, is the argument that was made by the hon. members during supplementary supply, not an argument that was introduced to this Assembly this morning by me. It was an argument that was introduced to this Assembly by the now NDP Official Opposition.

The reality is that the NDP showed over and over in this Assembly that they do not care about rural crime. We certainly do care about rural crime. I have all the utmost confidence in my friend the hon. the Justice minister to be able to tackle that on behalf of my constituents and other rural members of this Assembly's constituencies. That's one of the reasons why we have to continue the continuity of some of these programs. It's one of the reasons why we brought supplementary supply to this Assembly even though we disagree with some of the financial decisions that were made by the hon. members when they were in government. The reality is that if Albertans are looking for confidence, we will support these components of supplementary supply to help with hiring prosecutors and hiring police officers. I think that the results of the last election in rural Alberta show clearly – I don't even think that any of the hon. members of the opposition can make that argument with a straight face, that the results inside rural Alberta show that they have confidence in the NDP to be able to accomplish anything, quite frankly, for rural Alberta, let alone tackle one of the biggest issues that faces the communities that I represent and other members represent in this Assembly.

To the hon. Member for Calgary-West, to answer his question: I assure you that this government will continue to take rural crime seriously, as we did while we were in opposition. We recognize that it's a priority. To the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View and the opposition: I also assure her that we will continue to take this issue serious sly. We'll continue to hear from Albertans who are struggling with rural crime. We'll continue to work through our rural crime report to be able to implement real solutions to try to help our communities.

You will never see us stand in this House like the Official Opposition did when they were in government, with galleries full of hard-working rural people who were being victimized, and stand up like the hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre, heckling away about this issue. I can assure you that, Madam Chair, unlike that, this government will continue to always stand for rural Alberta. We'll stand for the portions of supplementary supply that matter on that issue. They can be assured of that. The best part is that there's no longer an NDP government to continue to sit on this side of the House and work against hard-working rural Albertans who are being victimized by rural crime.

The Chair: Central Peace-Notley.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. It's interesting listening to the comments here talking about rural crime. I just want to take a few minutes and chat about the, you know, supplementary estimates 2018-2019. Obviously, this represents a lot of the promises and commitments the NDP made before they became unelected, I guess, would be the term. What we're doing here is that we're finishing up some the old business that they have brought forward.

Of course, it seemed like to start the day, we were listening to a lot of the NDP previous cabinet ministers get up. I guess they wanted pats on the back for their fiscal discipline and management over the last four years, but I'm afraid that Albertans don't feel the same way as they feel about how they managed the province's resources and finances the last four years.

Now, it came up already this morning about the crude-by-rail program that the previous government signed up for. I think that when we look at this crude-by-rail program and the cost to taxpayers and the cost that's being borne even though the previous government announced this in an election period – during the election period the previous government announces that they're going to do a $3.7 billion lease of railcars, burdening the taxpayers with that sort of expense, which may be one of the largest single expenses ever in Alberta's history.

One thing, Madam Chair, we have to make clear is that we've stated our opinion on those contracts right from the beginning. In fact, I think the day after it was announced, we were already trying to get a hold of these railway companies to notify them that it would not be our intention to go ahead with those contracts.

I think it's also important to remember that this $3.7 billion, almost $4 billion, deal was to be done with borrowed money. It isn't like there was extra money sitting around that the government could spend; this was money that we were going to be paying interest on on top of this huge expenditure.

Now, what's interesting to see, too, is that I think it was the head of Canadian Pacific Railway who immediately after the announcement voiced his displeasure at the whole deal. He said that he didn't like it at all because the government had stepped in to work out this plan, and he didn't think that this was healthy. But he did say that this deal was just as good if not better than other deals. Of course, when he suggested that it might be even better than other deals, that doesn't represent a good deal for Alberta taxpayers.

We know that this government rushed into these deals in a desperation attempt to save themselves in the upcoming election. I could go on a little longer on that, but maybe I'll just turn a little bit of time over to the Finance minister or one of the other ministers to discuss that issue.

Thanks.

10:30

The Chair: The Minister of Environment and Parks.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Thank you, Madam Chair. I believe there's only one minute in this block, so we may talk about this again in a brief moment.

I think the hon. member is correct. An interesting part of supplementary supply are the components of, I guess, $317 million within supplementary supply that have directly to do with, you know, the NDP boondoggle, the largest expenditure probably in provincial history, their crude-by-rail strategy, that they brought in in the dying days of their administration as they headed into an election that they likely knew they were going to lose, which would be the only reason why they would attempt to rush that, in a desperate attempt, as the hon. member said, to try to save their government. We know that the results on April 16 spoke loud and clear that Albertans agreed that they disagreed with this former government's approach when they gave the United Conservative Party and the hon. Premier a historical mandate, a significant mandate to come and fix these scenarios. I think, Madam Chair, that this is a great example of what the Finance minister was talking about when he opened up supplementary supply, that there are components within supplementary supply that, quite frankly, the government has to hold their nose to be able to deal with.

The Chair: Hon. members, we will now move to the five-minute speaking portion of estimates. The hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you very much. We were just discussing here, of course, the crude-by-rail plan and the cost that that's incurring to Albertans in supplementary supply estimates. Again, we've been clear from the start on our opinion of this deal, and I think Albertans were clear, too, during the election, when they had an opportunity to either endorse the government's plans that they had or to not endorse. I think there was a pretty clear message that was sent on election day that they did not endorse these plans that the government had.

Now, one thing we need to make clear is that our government is not in the business of competing with the private sector. Obviously, any time the government decides that they want to do that, that messes with the natural marketplace that is there. We know that a deal like this is a very risky deal for Alberta taxpayers' dollars.

Again, I just want to reiterate that this crude-by-rail deal that this government signed onto, that's costing hundreds of millions of dollars of taxpayers' money, is just not acceptable. Of course, that's one of the reasons we're here today discussing these issues that we're talking about right now.

Thank you.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Madam Chair, I move – and I suspect that the Assembly will agree – to rise and report from Committee of Supply.

The Chair: To report progress, hon. minister?

Mr. Jason Nixon: I apologize, Madam Chair. Yes, I move to rise and report progress from Committee of Supply.

[Motion carried]

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, the Committee of Supply has had under consideration the supplementary supply estimates for the fiscal year 2018-2019, reports progress thereon, and requests leave to sit again.

The Deputy Speaker: Does the Assembly concur with the report? All those in favour, please say aye.

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Deputy Speaker: Any opposed, please say no. Carried.

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mrs. Pitt in the chair]

The Chair: I would like to call the committee to order.

Bill 3 Job Creation Tax Cut (Alberta Corporate Tax Amendment) Act

The Chair: We are on amendment A2. Are there any comments, questions to be offered with respect to this amendment?

Hon. Members: Question.

[Motion on amendment A2 lost]

The Chair: On Bill 3 are there any comments, questions, or amendments to be offered with respect to the bill? The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Madam Chair. I am pleased to have at least one opportunity to rise and speak to Bill 3 here in committee because I think it's important to get our views on the record with respect to the strategy which is incorporated within this bill. The reason for that is because this bill, I guess, for all intents and purposes represents the primary foundation to the new government's so-called job-creation strategy. It is a gift that, unfortunately, will undoubtedly hamper and, in fact, dog the course of Alberta's fiscal health over the course of the next four years, at least, as well as serve to significantly undermine quality of life, significantly undermine the quality of important services received by Albertans, and generally grow inequality quite profoundly over the course of the next four years.

While it is a bill that they certainly ran on and was within their mandate, it is a bill that we think is profoundly ill advised and one that is going to create a huge number of difficulties for the people of Alberta. It's important to walk through those to some degree as we are in the midst of debating it. I suspect that the misadventure associated with this bill and the negative consequences that flow from this bill will be discussed repeatedly over the course of the next four years, but let it not be said that we didn't warn the members opposite – I know they find these things very inconvenient – about the facts and the history and the reality around this misguided, reheated version of 1980s economics.

In short, what's going on here, of course, is that the government has bought into this notion that if we hand over big tax cuts to new investors, somehow we will see manna from heaven fall to the ground, and jobs and economic activity will flow accordingly. I think the argument here is twofold: one, we'll attract new business or new investment here, and two, those companies which already exist in the province of Alberta will take all that new money that they get from this $4.5 billion tax gift and reinvest it in jobs.

Now, to be clear, I think one of the first things that we need to lay out here is that when we use the $4.5 billion tax gift, we are just talking about four years. We're talking about what it will cost Albertans over the next four years. Clearly, in terms of lost revenue that number will continue indefinitely. As long as this ridiculous tax giveaway, this big handout to UCP friends and insiders, is in place, it will cost Albertans. For instance, when you compare it to our made-in-Alberta economic diversification and job-creation plan, where we were looking at and talking about investing $7 billion, we were looking at doing that over an 11- or 12-year period. Over that same period of time this piece of misguided public policy will cost almost twice what our plan would have cost, and it will create not even close to the number of jobs or economic growth that our plan was predicted to generate. Anyway, we'll get into that in a moment.

Let's just sort of talk generally about this idea that if you cut corporate taxes, suddenly everybody does well. Now, the members opposite like to speak of the fact that Jack Mintz, from their favourite, rather right-leaning public policy group, at the University of Calgary, thinks that this is a good idea. Now, I'll also note that Jack Mintz advocates pretty much daily for a sales tax, so I'm not sure if there's another shoe that's going to drop at some point from these guys. Certainly, people need to understand that I don't think Jack Mintz's economic advice is intended to be cherry-picked. I think it's intended to go hand in hand. If you give a $4.5 billion tax break to Alberta's large, profitable corporations, then of course I think he intends that the other shoe is that you get to a sales tax. But I'll leave it to the folks across the aisle to have conversations with their platform adviser, Mr. Mintz, at other times.

Nonetheless, although Mr. Mintz is a respected member of the academic community, from the University of Calgary, I am quite prepared, first of all, to say in this House that it is a fact that for every two economists that you get into a room, you are likely to get four opinions. So the fact that they're able to track down one economist saying that this is a good idea proves nothing. Even with that, I will say: I will see you your Jack Mintz and I will raise you a Nobel prize winning economist from the U.S. who, just in the last few months, published significant commentary on the fruitlessness of these short-term plans to generate economic growth through corporate tax cuts. There I'm referring to Joseph Stiglitz, but I'll get into that in a moment.

Let's just talk for a moment about some other examples of where these kinds of strategies have been used in the past. Of course, it's no surprise that we can go back to iconic right-wing politicians and find that they have typically tried this. Let's talk for a moment about the U.S., where in 2003 former President Bush decided that it would be a great idea to engage in a series of very aggressive corporate tax cuts. Now, did it work? The answer is no. Where do I find that answer? Do I find it on some dark website run by a bunch of communists? No. I find that in the public commentary offered up by the economic advisers who sat on former President Bush's Council of Economic Advisers.

The first one is Andrew Samwick, who was the chief economist on President Bush's Council of Economic Advisers. He said that if you look at the growth between 2001 and 2007, the period over which the corporate tax cuts were put in place, the growth rate was mediocre. "There is . . . no first-order evidence in the aggregate data that these tax cuts generated growth" at all. That's the first thing that we need to know. What we did determine, though, was that the top 1 per cent of U.S. income earners enjoyed an average tax cut of $50,000 a year or $570,000 over an eight-year period. That was the top 1 per cent of Americans who enjoyed the benefit of that, but it did not actually generate any kind of growth.

Meanwhile what we did get during that period of time was an increase in the debt of the United States to the tune of $5.6 trillion. Economists identified that there was a $5.6 trillion bump in the debt of the United States entirely attributable to the tax cuts brought in by President George Bush, so mediocre growth entirely limited to the top 1 per cent of the population and paid for by a $5.6 trillion bump in debt. Ultimately, President Bush went on to say: "Oh, don't worry about it. Don't worry. This tax cut will ultimately pay for itself." That's what he said. Well, interestingly, Bruce Bartlett, who was a domestic policy adviser under President Bush, said, "to claim, as Bush . . . did, that his [tax cuts] . . . paid for themselves is the grossest of exaggerations." So that's how it went there.

Now, more recently we have the evidence that we saw from Kansas in – I believe it began in about 2012-2013. Nope; 2011. Sorry. We'll get it one more time. In 2012 they passed the largest tax cut in state history, meant to create jobs and stimulate growth. What ultimately happened, however, was that the Kansas economic growth rate fell way behind the overall growth rate of the rest of the U.S. as well as neighbouring states, so in fact economic growth did not arise as a result of this corporate tax cut. What it did do, however, was blow up their deficit and debt to a very large extent such that they ultimately saw repeated credit downgrades because they lost revenue.

They had credit downgrades, the cost of borrowing grew, the economy stagnated, and – oh, yes – because of the fiscal crisis that they created for themselves, they then had to cut funding from public services, did so in the education sector, and, as I mentioned yesterday, ultimately the courts in Kansas concluded that the Kansas government had breached the constitution of the state because the quality of education that they were providing was so low as to have breached the constitutional rights of the citizens of Kansas to receive an education. Therefore, they were in breach of their own constitution as a result of the forced cuts brought on by the misguided effort to engage in this experiment of eliminating corporate taxes in order to generate economic activity. It was a profound failure. The jury is now back in on that from all sides – all sides – and it failed. That's what happened there.

Then, again, we also have the whole example of what happened in Canada. We talked about that a little bit already. We have seen that when the government of Canada made a series of tax cuts beginning in 2011-2012, somewhere around there, they decided to forgo about $13 billion in the course of one year. What ultimately happened was that we saw that businesses accumulated the money, corporations accumulated the money, and they essentially rendered it dead money. That was a phrase that was used by former Bank of Canada governor Mark Carney. He said that basically it negatively impacted growth. It just sat in corporate coffers, and it did not generate growth. In fact, it took massive amounts of money out of the economy. Corporate bottom lines got much rosier, but the level of investment did not go up, and it served to act as a damper on economic growth. That's what we saw here as a result of the Harper government's attempt to generate economic growth through these corporate tax cuts.

Interestingly, we also see the whole matter of corporate tax cuts being gamed out in the U.S., and we look at what has happened as a result of President Trump's massive corporate tax cuts. Well, Warren Buffett, one of the wealthiest entrepreneurs and investors in the world, basically sums it up this way. He says, "the tsunami of wealth didn't trickle down. It surged upward," upwards to the people who need it the least. What we saw from that tax cut, from 35 per cent to 21 per cent, was that 84 per cent of businesses have not changed their investment plans one bit, while the U.S. deficit is already up almost a trillion dollars per year. We also have the example of where AT&T specifically promised the President that if they got their great big corporate tax cut, they would create 7,000 new jobs. Instead, what they did was cut 23,000 jobs. That's what we saw there.

Now, interestingly, there has been some analysis of what has happened in other jurisdictions where we have seen these kinds of corporate tax cuts. It's interesting. What we saw: a survey by Just Capital, which tracked 1,000 firms, found that 57 per cent of the benefits of the tax cuts were reserved to be given back to shareholders; 27 per cent went towards investment. That 27 per cent: that's what you guys are banking on at this point – 27 per cent – less than a third of this $4.5 billion tax cut. It's that 27 per cent that you're hoping will go towards investing in new businesses, new economic activity, creating growth, and creating jobs: less than a third of that $4.5 billion tax cut. Experience and evidence and research – I know that research is an irritating thing for you folks, but nonetheless – show past examples of where, basically, these kinds of huge tax cuts result in less than a third of the cost of that tax cut going towards that much-sought-after goal of new investment and job creation.

Typically, economists look at actions of government and the impact on jobs and they talk about a multiplier effect. So, if you spend a dollar in tax cuts, theoretically you'll get a multiplier of, you know, 1.2 or 1.3 or whatever. If you spend a dollar in child care, interestingly, you'll get a multiplier of about 7. There are multipliers all the way through. This particular study suggests that what you've actually got here with these particular tax cuts is a divider. It's not actually a multiplier. It's a divider. You give $10 billion in tax cuts, and you generate $2.7 billion of economic activity. That's not actually a multiplier effect. You're now dividing. You are reducing the value of your money, and you are giving 57 per cent of it, almost 60 per cent, to shareholders.

Well, that's great. Maybe those shareholders will take their money and invest in the Alberta economy, but then again why would they? Because the vast majority of those shareholders do not live in Alberta. So we're not actually ensuring that the benefit, the primary benefit, of this tax cut goes to Albertans. Nope. We are making sure that the primary benefit of this tax cut goes to shareholders, which typically in most multinational companies have nothing to do with the province of Alberta. They couldn't give a hoot about how many jobs are created in the province of Alberta.

The Deputy Chair: Are there any other members wishing to – I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora rising to speak.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much. I know that we're in committee, so members can speak multiple times. I just wanted to make sure that the Member for Edmonton-Strathcona had an opportunity to conclude her remarks because I think that they are telling of where our party stands on this and where, I imagine, many Albertans do. I wanted to make sure she had an opportunity to continue, Mr. Speaker – Mr. Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you very much. I appreciate the intervening Speaker aspect of that as well.

Please, the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much. I hope to not take too much more time, but I do want to finish walking through some of the evidence on what we're dealing with here. Fifty-seven per cent of the benefits of tax cuts went to shareholders, in our case the vast majority of which do not reside in the province of Alberta. Twenty-seven per cent went towards investment, and 6 per cent went to higher wages. The whole idea that if we give massive tax cuts to corporations, somehow Albertans will generate or enjoy the benefit of higher wages is utterly ridiculous, Mr. Chair. Again, it's that annoying little habit we have of doing the research and getting evidence-based policy-making and attempting to inject evidence-based policy-making into what we do here in this building. Anyways, what we see, then, is that it didn't actually work.

In all, then, we have examples in Canada. We have multiple examples, three separate examples, from the U.S.: one under President George Bush in the early 2000s; another in the state of Kansas, where they really eliminated all of the confounding factors and decided that this would be the great experiment to prove once and for all that wealth does trickle down and giving big handouts to right-wing friends and insiders is in fact the way to go. Unfortunately, the problem was that it demonstrated absolutely, unequivocally that that is in error and that is not the way to build an economy. Then we have the most recent examples from the U.S. where, again, we saw a short-term bump that immediately disappeared, and we now have evidence that shows that the vast majority of that tax cut does not get reinvested into the economy. It gets given away to shareholders, many of whom are not attached or have no loyalty to the jurisdiction in question. At the same time it blows massive – massive – holes in the fiscal situation of the jurisdiction in question.

I will say that, I mean, it really is quite ridiculous when I hear the members opposite do the so predictable and, quite frankly, tired talking points of: "Oh, my goodness. We inherited such a mess. Yada, yada, yada." I'll tell you something. Forty-four years of government, and the minute that the price of oil dropped, we had a deficit of $9 billion. That's what we inherited. We had to make a choice, and that is what we did. In fact, we had met or exceeded our deficit reduction targets from our second year onward, and we had done that while investing in jobs, while supporting communities, while not letting the problem get worse and not piling on. That is why, for instance, our economy continued to grow and we had inward migration while the opposite was going on in Saskatchewan.

We made a choice to support Albertans because it wasn't Albertans that made the decision to fail to plan for the inevitable challenges with our oil and gas sector for 44 years. It is a really tired talking point to have the members opposite try and argue these kinds of things. Again, I know that facts are things that they're very comfortable to blow right by. You know, I guess I'm a traditionalist that way. I think that truth and facts and reality is an environment within which we should all continue to try to operate in the best interests of the people we've been elected to serve.

The concern that we have, then, is that – and what we've seen from other economists all along is that, you know, government can do a number of different things to try to generate economic activity. As I said yesterday in my response to the Speech from the Throne, I think we all agree that we are all seized with this desire to grow the economy and to create jobs. There's nobody in this room that doesn't believe that needs to be done. That's what I think, anyway. I think the majority of folks on the other side do believe that what they're doing is the right thing. I think some actually know that it's not but don't care because they have friends who just told them that it'd be really nice for them if they could pay less in corporate taxes, and they decided: hey, let's go; let's have at 'er. But I do suspect that many folks over there just haven't had the time to do the research to understand that this experiment has been tried repeatedly and doesn't work. So I'll give you the benefit of the doubt.

The plan that we had in place to build off the work that the first PC Premier had commenced in the '70s and very early '80s to diversify the economic activity that we can extract out of the raw resources that we, that all Albertans, own: that was our plan. We had been very, very strategic about it and had taken some time to get moving because we needed to do our homework and we needed to make sure that it would work. But it did pay off. The major investments that we made are paying off, are creating jobs, are generating more economic activity. I know the members opposite understand that because at one point I saw a whole schwaack of them out there doing photo ops with the recipient of phase 1 of our PDP program as though somehow they had anything to do with it.

Anyway, our made-in-Alberta plan involves moving forward on that basis and doing more of that kind of work to very strategically support the kinds of major developments that need to occur in our oil and gas sector as far as initiating new economic activity within that sector. Rather than just sort of, you know, pulling it out of the ground and shipping it to somebody else as fast as we can, how can we be more strategic with it? How can we get more value from that product here in the province of Alberta? That plan was designed to ultimately cost Alberta taxpayers in the range of about $7 billion between now and 2030, and at the end of that time it would have generated $70 billion in incremental economic activity.

And those were conservative estimates because they didn't take into account the spinoffs that would happen. For instance, if you have a critical mass of a certain type of plastic being produced here in Alberta, you could ultimately attract manufacturing, because that plastic feedstock is so inexpensive here because we have so much of it being created here. Of course, you know, the PDP program: we essentially created the first or second place in Canada where that plastic feedstock was being manufactured and, in fact, I think, only the third or fourth on the continent, so we were well placed to actually attract additional business that would engage in manufacturing as a result of that feedstock that we were producing here in Alberta. When I talk about that $70 billion in incremental economic investment and activity, it didn't include the potential additional investment that would come from providing some of the basic components of additional manufacturing that might draw people to invest in Alberta rather than somewhere else.

But it's that kind of strategic investment that the people of Alberta need, not this blind, you know, "we're just going to throw money off the back of a truck at big corporations," most of which have no allegiance or roots in the province of Alberta, who are not being held to account for one cent of that money that they are receiving. They can do whatever they want with it. That's great, and we're going to cross our fingers and hope that it goes into new investment. Yet we have the example that we have in the U.S., where, in fact, we're seeing less than a third of it being used for those purposes, about 27 per cent. Really, a very, very sorry economic strategy, I would say for sure, and a poor, poor replacement for what we had queued up and ready to go.

In terms of economic activity, though, the last thing that I will say on this matter is that I must say: you know, this was our made-in-Alberta diversification plan.

I will say that one other made-in-Alberta plan that we had, contrary to all the rhetoric that we saw coming from the other side, was a made-in-Alberta pipeline, and it was our crude-by-rail deal, designed to move more product so that we could reduce curtailment as fast as possible and allow for more economic activity to begin again as we pulled back on curtailment. Every day that we fail to grow our takeaway capacity now past July 1 is an extra day and an extra barrel or an extra 10,000 or an extra 50,000, whatever, barrels of curtailment. That curtailment is slowing down economic growth in the oil and gas sector.

I sure hope that folks over there have a plan to be moving oil and gas by July 1 because every day past that is an extra day of curtailment thanks to the UCP government and ideological reasons, where they sort of shot and then decided to aim. That kind of approach to policy-making is very damaging to the people of Alberta, and it will be damaging to job creation, and it is something that they will wear. Best of luck to you, because I, too, care very much about people who are waiting for the jobs to be recreated once we can pull back on curtailment.

But I also believe that this government is fully engaged in the act of extending curtailment right now. Yes, curtailment is also being driven by the line 3 delays, but that is why fast, efficient, open, accessible takeaway capacity in our short-term, made-in-Alberta pipeline is so, so important. Every day that it gets delayed by the dithering, driven by ideological . . .

Ms Hoffman: Fantasy.

11:10

Ms Notley: . . . fantasy and misinformation, is a day that Albertans are hurt. You can use all the language you want to describe it, but that's what it is.

Anyway, that is most of what we have to say right now on the matter of the tax cut. We are very, very concerned.

The last thing I was going to say: 27 per cent of the tax cut in the U.S. went to investment and new jobs; 6 per cent went to higher wages for workers. Meanwhile working people, regular people, who can't afford to buy their own health care, who can't afford to buy their private education in this new world of educational choice, who can't afford to hire a nanny to take care of their kids, who can't afford to hire a private caregiver to take care of their parents and their grandparents and their uncles and their aunts as they age, will pay for this tax giveaway to wealthy corporations in the form of less education funding, less health care funding, less support for our seniors, less support for our kids. That is the cost. It's not just that working people are only getting 6 per cent of this ridiculous $4.5 billion gift to profitable corporations; it's that they have to pay for it as well, and they will pay for it through the things that matter most to them, that they need and rely on.

This is why this is a profoundly misinformed, bad plan, with no substantial evidence of success anywhere. I know members here have repeatedly asked the minister, over and over, whether he can provide evidence of any place where this ridiculousness has worked. Thus far he has been unable to do so. Anyway, we certainly have provided evidence where it hasn't worked, and we will work hard to stand up for the rights of all Albertans as these folks try to get them to pay for their big tax gift for their wealthy friends and insiders.

Thank you very much, Mr. Chair.

The Deputy Chair: I see the hon. Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board standing to speak.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I just do need to respond to a few comments that the hon. Leader of the Opposition has made. Firstly – I've made this point before, and I'll make it again – every economist and, I think, more importantly, every business owner, whether it's a large corporation or a small-business owner, will agree that as the business environment is improved, as the competitiveness of a business environment is improved, that environment attracts investment, that environment becomes more attractive for investment. The tax regime, the tax component of the business environment, is a key part of the overall environment. So to suggest that there's no correlation or an extremely weak correlation between corporate tax policy and investment, I believe, is nonsensical.

I find it, quite frankly, Mr. Chair, just a little rich to be lectured repeatedly on this topic by a government who presided over the largest flight of capital out of this province in recent history. We recognize that there are a number of factors at play, and I'll reiterate the fact that during a time of difficult economic circumstances, admittedly difficult economic circumstances, with the decline in global energy prices particularly, the previous government implemented the largest tax increase in this province's history, without consulting Albertans, by implementing the carbon tax. They then went on to increase corporate taxes by 20 per cent, at the same time adding regulatory burden on Albertan businesses. Those effects, policy effects, on top of difficult energy prices, again, precipitated the largest exodus of capital and, with that, massive job loss in this province. In fact, we've inherited a province with the highest unemployment rate outside of Atlantic Canada. For a province with this kind of wealth and resources we find that unacceptable.

So we do have a bold plan. A bold plan is required in order to attract investment, create jobs, and ensure that future governments and future citizens have enough wealth to continue to receive a high-quality education, to receive high-quality health care and other services that Albertans expect. Our plan is bold. It's multifaceted. It does include a corporate tax reduction, which will bring this province to the lowest corporate tax rate in the nation and to one of the most competitive jurisdictions within North America. It also includes the repeal of the carbon tax.

It also includes modernizing our regulatory system so that our businesses don't have to compete experiencing the extra regulatory burden that is upon them day by day by day, that incremental burden that makes doing business so problematic and so costly in this province. For that, of course, we are implementing a very specific effort through the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction, an effort that will involve seeking industry's advice, seeking the advice of everyday Albertans, and working with government departments to, again, reform our regulatory system and modernize it to ensure that it's the most competitive.

We recognize that there are ongoing challenges with market access for our energy products. I certainly agree with the hon. Leader of the Opposition that that needs to be a fulsome effort and that that's a critical effort for this government. We have a Premier who's on that job every day, seeking to do all that he can to ensure that Alberta and, in fact, the nation can develop the market access that we need to maintain the standard of living in this province and in this country.

I want to talk a wee bit about diversification again. The hon. Leader of the Opposition alluded to their diversification efforts when they were in government. Creating the most competitive, broad-based business environment, in my opinion, is the best way to encourage economic diversification within this province and, in fact, within any jurisdiction. That broad-based, competitive business environment doesn't pick winners and losers.

It, in fact, then creates a very competitive location to create, to innovate, to consider business opportunities that governments never could, and to engage the thoughtful foresight of our young entrepreneurs in this province. We have an extremely young, very educated, I think, forward-looking group of citizens in this province, and I have every confidence that as we create the most competitive business environment, those individuals will rise up with fresh ideas, that we could never contemplate ahead of time or predict, and will work to diversify this economy in ways that are sustainable. I think that's incredibly important not only to this generation but to future generations, Mr. Chair.

I'm going to again make reference to the document that an opposition member tabled a couple of days ago, and that relates to the 2009 federal budget that was brought down by previous Prime Minister Harper. This document states, and I'll read it again:

Corporate income tax measures have limited impact on aggregate demand over the periods displayed in the table . . .

And that was a very short period displayed in the table.

. . . but have among the highest multiplier effects in the long run.

Mr. Chair, we're interested in the long run for this province. We have a great responsibility to ensure that this province's economy, job creation, and long-term government revenues are sustainable in the long run.

And I continue to quote:

This is because they increase the incentive to invest and accumulate capital, which leads to a higher permanent capacity to produce goods and services.

That is ultimately our goal as we implement this job-creation tax cut as part of a broader strategy to create the most competitive business environment not only within Canada but one of the most competitive business environments within all of North America.

Job creation is the number one priority for this government, and this job-creation corporate tax cut is a key piece within that strategy.

The Deputy Chair: Any other members? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Sweet: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I just want to respond again quickly to the Minister of Finance and his comment about the tabling that I did table a few days ago in regard to the corporate tax cut from 2009 under the Prime Minister at the time, Mr. Harper. I recognize that he does keep using it and indicating that, you know, in the long term the table indicates that corporate taxation does support the stimulation of growth.

I guess my question around that is that it also indicates that when you invest in infrastructure and when you invest in low-income families, the return on investment is also higher. So in the first few years of that budget – and what we are talking about today is the fact that for infrastructure it was $1.60 for every dollar invested and for low-income families it was $1.70 for every dollar invested. Again, this goes back to the conversation that we're having around the interim financial gains that we need to be looking at.

In the platform that the UCP has put forward, they do acknowledge that it's two years out before this tax cut does generate any type of economic growth for the province. If the UCP is saying that, you know, it's going to be two years before we see any type of return for economic investment due to corporate taxation, then in those two years why would you not invest in infrastructure and see that for every dollar you invest, you get $1.60 back? Why would you not, then, also invest in low-income families, where for every dollar that you invest, you get $1.70 back? You still have the potential to do that over the next two years.

What I'm seeing us discuss is not looking at those two options. We're not looking at that in the next two years, even though your corporate tax will put a $4.5 billion hole in your revenue, any type of investment in infrastructure or in low-income families will give you the return and the economic growth that you're discussing. I mean, we can look at that tabling that I provided in two different ways. I know that the UCP is using it as, well, long-term gain, that corporate taxation cuts over the long term could potentially stimulate growth. However, the arguments and the economists will say that that's not necessarily the case, depending on which economists you discuss, which ones you're looking at.

Again, I think that's a dispute of the facts in the sense that the UCP have their economists that say one thing, and there are other economists that say another thing. There's evidence, specifically in Ontario, that has demonstrated that with the same bill, they actually haven't seen the economic growth. In fact, Ontario's economy has slowed, and their return on investment is actually not there. So if we're going to look at the tabling, and we're going to say, "Well, on one side, in the long term corporate taxation will do that," then over the next two years will the Finance minister agree that for every dollar in his budget that he invests in low-income families and infrastructure, he can get $1.60 to $1.70 in return on that dollar? There's two sides to every coin.

I would encourage, I guess, then, that the Finance minister consider while we're having this discussion that over the next two years when you acknowledge and your platform acknowledges that there will be no economic benefit to this taxation cut, you also acknowledge that you need to, then, invest in families and social programming to get that return. As well, you also need to be investing in infrastructure to be able to get a return on the investment. You can still drive the economy over the next two years by investing in infrastructure and low-income families, with $1.60 to $1.70 for every dollar, while you acknowledge that your corporate tax will not generate any type of financial gain.

The Deputy Chair: I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung standing.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I stand today to speak to Bill 3, and I'm happy to do so. I know that some commentators have called this piece of legislation a centerpiece of the government's economic platform. They've called it the big bet. They've said in commentary that they expect the government is hoping that this bet will pay off.

Well, I'll tell you what, Mr. Chair and members of the House. I've been to the races a few times. I know my grandparents loved going to Northlands, particularly on Thursday afternoons. They had

Thursday afternoons off. They were the postmasters in Thorhild, and that was the afternoon they took off. They would come into Edmonton and quite often grab a couple of grandkids, myself included, and back then we could actually be the runners. I made plenty of $2 bets on behalf of my grandparents at the window of the old Northlands, which had the wooden seats. The outside was exposed to the elements, and if it rained, it rained.

I know that my grandmother was a bit of a sucker for the horse with the least chance of winning. She would look at the odds and look at the horses as they paraded by. Quite often she'd bet on the underdog, my grandmother – she had a heart of gold – and maybe that's because of the one-eyed pony that she rode into Northlands and got a second prize for years earlier, that's why her heart led her to bet on the underdog.

But you know what? The underdog is not necessarily the horse that you should be betting on. I know there are a number of songs that relate to horse betting, but I'll tell you what. There's one song – I won't sing it because I've sung in caucus before, and it really didn't get a lot of accolades – and the lyrics go: I bet my money on a bobtail nag; somebody bet on the gray; I went down there with my hat caved in; I came home with a pocket full of tin; doo-dah, doo-dah; oh da-doo-dah-day.

Well, I'll tell you what. Betting on a nag is what this government is doing. It's a big bet that they're making on behalf of Albertans, and the treasury is betting on a nag, a nag of a government policy. They really are doing a disservice to Albertans in making this bet. It's not a throwaway $2 bet on a Sunday afternoon, a day at the races. This is an all-in bet, bet the farm, ideological jump off a cliff which will throw 4 and a half billion dollars into a corporate black hole.

Mr. Chair, I fail to understand why this government continues to hang its hat and bet all-in on this nag of a government policy when they know that the odds are against them. Historically, this policy has been discredited. This nag is called supply side, and that's the horse that they intend to bet on. They repeatedly saddle her up, knowing that she's going to come in last, and it's going to be Albertans who suffer. They're the ones whose capital is going to be invested into a corporate tax giveaway, which has been shown repeatedly not to have the results that the government hopes to have.

I know that our Leader of the Official Opposition went into great detail to demonstrate the faulty logic and the lack of wisdom in saddling up this pony once again and riding supply-side economics to dead last in the race. Mr. Chair, this nag is a horse that the government is intent on riding until the last race is run. It's a bet that they're sure to lose no matter how many times they decide to run the race.

So, Mr. Chair, I won't go into great detail about it. I know that our members on this side of the House have talked quite a bit about jurisdictional failures of this supply-side economic policy, something that also is called Reaganomics. We believe, simply, as I've stated in this House before, that it's a faulty decision on the part of the government to rely on failed supply-side economics, which don't do anything to help the population they're purported to serve and don't create the jobs that governments who ride that horse, who adopt that policy, purport that it will.

We oppose any plan that will call for massive tax cuts for corporations that will result in much higher deficits than we already face, that are systemic to this type of supply-side economics. It's really, as I mentioned before, all about an ideological jump off a cliff with no real expectation of a different result than supply-side economics have produced in years past.

I know that the Republicans after four years of failure in 2017 in the United States in a dominated state House of Representatives and state's Senate reversed the cuts. The government vetoed the bill, and a two-thirds majority in both Chambers overruled the veto, and their experiment came to an end. So supply-side economics has been discredited repeatedly.

If you really want to stimulate an economy, if you want to create jobs, putting money in the hands of people who spend it in that local economy is historically something that is a very proven, tried and tested, result-oriented policy, and that's what we did in our role as government previously, yet this government seems to think that the mandate they've been given will somehow reinvigorate supply-side economics to give them a different result than has been achieved by other jurisdictions, where it's failed so miserably in the past.

We do have a great debate going on here. It's actually unfortunate that we have to be sort of rehashing this old debate here in 2019 in the Alberta Legislature, when we know that it's an unnecessary debate to be having. We know that the real results that will improve the employment situation in Alberta and stimulate the economy will be as a result of demand-side policies, which put the money in the pockets of people who spend it, whether that be through helping those who are least able to afford it, whether it's through increased social programs, like making sure that AISH recipients have closer to a living wage or living amounts that they have as they were granted when we were government, increasing their monthly amount and tying it to the cost-of-living index. Those are things that will encourage people to spend the money here locally. You know, 70 per cent of your economy is actually consumer spending. You put money in the hands of consumers; they spend it here locally, and that drives the economic escalators to a point where you actually create employment locally.

I hearken back to the days at Northlands when I was running $2 bets for my beloved grandmother, who consistently bet on the nag. She didn't win a lot. She seemed to enjoy herself at the races. The only thing I remember her ever winning was a toaster, and that baby is all you get from betting on the nag. The bobtail nag usually comes in last.

This, unfortunately, is going to be the result, once again, with this government riding the supply-side horse. We'll end up, as I mentioned, dropping off a 4 and a half billion dollar economic cliff. It's an all-in bet, bet the farm, ideological jump off a cliff that will throw 4 and a half billion dollars into a corporate black hole, totally avoidable, unnecessary consequence that Albertans don't need to suffer, but this government is hell bent and determined to flog the supply-side horse until it's, in their view, truly dead.

We believe that nag is dead already and that they should leave that horse in the barn and try something that really works, and that is to put money in the pockets of people who spend it and truly stimulate the economy at the local level rather than parking it into corporate cash bins that simply allow them to pay out regular dividends. As Mark Carney, former Bank of Canada governor said, it becomes dead money and useless to the economy.

I guess, you know, since the government did win the election, we're going to see the big bet made, and the collateral damage will be the Alberta working force and the province's treasury in general. I hate to be the one later on who says, "I told you so," because there's going to be a terrific amount of damage to follow through on this experiment that, once again, the Conservative government is leading us into. The big bet on the bobtail nag, Mr. Chair, is going to hurt us all. I'm afraid to say that over the next two to four years we're going to see it, and we'll be counting on Albertans to recognize this and react accordingly come the next election, when they realize that this failed experiment has cost them dearly.

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: The hon. President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I just have to respond to the member opposite's comments. I think, on behalf of employers, on behalf of businesspeople across this province, I take offence to really being referred to as the nags in the race. Quite frankly, this province has a rich history of entrepreneurs stepping up, investing in this province, creating jobs and opportunity, and they are anything but nags. To be lectured by the previous government on suggesting that we continue down the path that we were on, that the previous government put us on, I would suggest is a downward spiral that Albertans simply cannot tolerate. In fact, I think if we take a look at the results of the last election, one can conclude that it was clear that Albertans did not tolerate the path that the previous government put us on.

I have every confidence that employers, that businesses, that corporations will respond to the most competitive business environment that we could provide and invest in this province, create opportunities, create jobs for all of Albertans.

[Mrs. Pitt in the chair]

I'd also like to respond to the Member for Edmonton-Manning with the questions around infrastructure projects. I will say this: this government recognizes the importance of infrastructure projects, and we place particularly high importance on those projects that will, again, improve our competitiveness, projects that will lead to more economic development and growth. We will be considering those projects very carefully, recognizing that it is a responsibility of government to ensure that we have capacity in this province, and we recognize some of the economic benefit in the short term as well in building those kinds of projects, but most importantly, the economic benefit in the long term is that we create capacity for future investment and job creation.

We will continue to support the most vulnerable around us, the most vulnerable in this province. We commit to that as a government. We did during the election period. We continue to do that as the government.

I'll say this: to simply spend money we don't have to create the mirage of true economic activity using hard-earned taxpayers' dollars is a downward spiral that we cannot continue on here. As a government, we have to live within our means, and we have to, again, ensure that we create the most competitive business environment and let the private sector invest in this province, create opportunities for hard-working Albertans and create jobs for Albertans in the future.

You know, there's a lot of talk, again, negative talk around profitability that I hear from members opposite. I believe that's very inaccurate. They talk about profits in an inaccurate way. As we create the most competitive business environment in this province, we will see corporations reinvest profits back into this province to create future and additional economic activity. That's the way it works. That's the way folks that are in business think. They look to reinvest profits where it will create and generate a fair return, and I'm confident that entrepreneurs within this province, that corporations and businesspeople within this province will reinvest profits to expand and enlarge this economy.

In fact, if we look at the history of this province, we have a great history of being the economic engine of the country. We have a great history and responsibility, in my opinion, of being the economic engine in this country, and we did that by creating a competitive business environment that attracted investment, that attracted creative thinkers, that attracted risk takers to invest, to create jobs, to create opportunity, to create wealth not only for the people of this province but for the people of this nation, and we must continue to ensure that we provide that environment for Albertans.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Sweet: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'm enjoying this back and forth that we have going on right now. I just want to chat a little bit about, again, some of the comments that the Minister of Finance is making.

We look at consumer spending and we look at the fact that we know that when there's a recession and things are slowing down, so does consumer spending. People are not spending money. They're not purchasing. There's no purchasing power that stimulates and helps drive the economy. Part of that is that people go into saving mode. They want to make sure that they have the money to pay for their basic needs, their mortgages, their child care, all of those things that we know good-paying jobs pay for. Now, because of that, when you're not investing in people and you're not investing in the infrastructure that employs those people to build the infrastructure, it also slows down the economy.

We can talk about business – and hiring people and driving the economy is important – but when we recognize, again, that the proposal of a corporate tax cut is not going to benefit the economy for two years, we still need people working in areas like infrastructure. We still need to be looking at investments in low- to middle-income families so that they have the money to have the purchasing power that we need to continue to be able to drive the economy. It's pretty basic. If people aren't spending money, the economy slows down. When people start spending money, the economy thrives. People need to be able to be employed such as investing in infrastructure. I mean, it's a basic economic fact: when you build things like schools and hospitals and roads and bridges and highways, people work, and when they're working, they spend. When they're not working, they don't spend.

When you are putting your eggs in one basket around corporate tax cuts, saying, "Well, at some point these corporations are going to start spending again, and they're going to start expanding their business, and they're going to start hiring," but we know that that's not going to be for, like, two to three years down the road, who is driving your economy in the interim? The people are, and the only way that the people are is if you're employing them through the building of infrastructure, which is why, when we were government, we built so much, because people got to work. People were building hospitals. People were building bridges. People were building schools. All of those tradespeople that were getting laid off because the price of oil crashed and the economy slowed down, all those tradespeople got to transfer their trade and build other things. Because they were building and because they were working, they were spending, which kept the economy going forward.

You can talk about corporate taxes in the global sense that the UCP does, but you have a two-year lag in your economic plan, so until you address the two-year lag, you're going to have a hole in your budget. You're going to have to cut spending, which means you're going to cut services. That's just the basic economics around it.

Again, I really encourage all the members of this House to consider what they plan to do over the next two years and how you're going to explain to Albertans why it is that their services are being cut because you put all of your eggs in one basket.

Thank you.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday.

Mr. Carson: Thank you, Madam Chair. It's a pleasure to rise to speak to Bill 3 again. I appreciate the conversations that have happened so far today. I do just want to speak to a conversation that came up yesterday in discussion with the Minister of Finance in this House. I had asked the question: why did you choose to spend $4.5 billion in reducing corporate income taxes for large corporations when you could have maybe found some balance – I know the government likes to throw that word around – in how you are investing this money? I brought up the small-business tax. Whether I support it or not is maybe not necessarily the point. Why didn't this government choose to lower the small-business tax to 1 per cent or to zero per cent compared to putting all their eggs in one basket with this large corporate tax cut?

The minister said: well, because the small-business tax is already lower than every other jurisdiction. Okay. Well, you have a bill before us that is proposing to do the exact same thing, to cut it much further than any other province. So the argument that was made by the Finance minister actually answers the question of: is this bill even worth it? And that's no.

In the grand scheme of things, I mean, I've spoken about it over the last week here as we discussed Bill 3. Really, the more I look into the consequences of this bill and the more that I have discussions with business leaders and economists – I'm not sure which economists the front bench here actually had discussions with because the people that I've been talking to are saying: no, cutting corporate income tax is not the best bang for your buck to get people working again. These tax credits that our government put forward over the last four years, as far as the discussions that I have had, are much, much better for getting people back to work, for bringing new investment to the province.

When we look at the corporate income tax, we're not only talking about money that's being invested now. We're actually going to start subsidizing old money, money that's already been invested in the province, so we're going to start handing these corporations money without any guarantee of new investments. As has been brought up, often these are shareholders that live outside of the province and often live outside of Canada, so that money is not even staying here.

When we're in a situation where our economy is in recession or just coming out of recession, we need to consider the implications of economic inequality. The corporate tax rate cut is not going to solve that issue at all. It is not going to put more money back into the workers' pockets. When we talk about tax credits, well, as I brought up in the House earlier this week, that money has to be proved that it is, to some extent, 50 per cent of wages for employees – excuse me; let me try that again. To some extent, the employees, of course, have to live in the province, and that has to be proven. The shareholders have to live in the province. Those are things that we can look at when we're talking about tax credits.

Now, the Finance minister also brought up the fact that he wasn't happy with the tax credits because they focus on certain industries.

Well, open it up, then. If you're concerned that we were focused on certain industries that you don't think we should subsidize or you don't necessarily support, then open it up. You can expand the tax credit programs, and still more often than not I believe it's going to be more effective than reducing corporate taxes. I just wanted to make sure I had that on the record.

You know, I had moved to Alberta during the Ralph Klein years, and I was actually here about six months before – I had just made the cut-off for getting my $400 cheque in the mail. Though I enjoyed buying a pair of roller skates with that money, I don't know how much that helped the economy. But I didn't think that I was going to come to a time where I disliked a policy more than that one. When I compare giving money back to Albertans, putting it in their pockets, or doing a massive handout to large corporations when we don't necessarily know if the money is even going to stay here, well, I think this one takes the cake. I might change my mind once I further research that, getting that money back. We'll wait and see, I suppose.

Once again, I absolutely do not support this bill. I really think that it's the most lazy way that you could have tried to incentivize new employers to come to the province. I think that the government should have done a better job of researching and actually having conversations with people. I think this was something that they just put in their platform because it was, you know, an easy slogan. I mean, lower taxes: sounds great. Yeah. Well, I think there were better options to create new employment here in the province and bring new investments to the province.

Thank you.

11:50

The Chair: Are there any other members wishing to speak?

Shall I call the question?

[The remaining clauses of Bill 3 agreed to]

[Title and preamble agreed to]

The Chair: Shall the bill be reported? Are you agreed?

Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chair: Any opposed? Carried.

We will now rise and report.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, the Committee of the Whole has had under consideration certain bills. The committee reports the following bill: Bill 3.

The Deputy Speaker: Does the Assembly concur in the report? All those in favour, please say aye.

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Deputy Speaker: Any opposed, please say no. Carried.

The hon. Minister of Finance and keeper of the Great Seal.

Mr. Schweitzer: Madam Speaker, we've made some excellent progress here today. I would propose at this stage, given the fact that we're very close to the lunch hour, that we rise until 1:30 p.m.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 11:52 a.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Wednesday, June 12, 2019

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Please be seated.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Hon. members, joining us today from the constituency of Camrose we have the Forestburg school in our gallery, and from the constituency of Strathcona-Sherwood Park is Strathcona Christian academy. I invite you to all please rise and receive the welcome of the Assembly.

Introduction of guests for all of us this afternoon. I'm very pleased to introduce, from the constituency of Peace River, Bob and Dana Blayone. On behalf of the Minister of Municipal Affairs: Dr. Chinyere Nwafor-Okoli, Kene Ilochonwu, and Juliet Boghean-Ogbu.

Members, all of you will be very excited to know that it's Philippine Independence Day today, so we have a number of guests from the Filipino community joining us. Mabuhay to all. From the constituency of Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview: Jeni and Symona Claire Tabile, and Belinda Orte. From Edmonton-McClung: Teresa and Jairus Banganan, Theodora Alingcotan, Charmaine Ria Celis, Joan Sacramento, Michelle Santiago, Joan Montemayor, Rossel Sagun, Allenita Dawne Alipio. From the constituency of Edmonton-Glenora – please feel free to rise if you recognize your name – Cynthia Luna-Pasagui, Jerwin Pagdonsolan, Clarizze Truscott, Fely Agader, Lucenia Ortiz, Nimfa Zoleta, Merla Tumacder, Gigi Suelo, Teodora Valles, Fely Della, Alan Sison, Nancy Naval, Marilyn MacDonald, Jeffrey Jose, Marietta Santos, Telesfora Balanag, Ricarta Abenojar, Eladia Garcia, Renz Zoleta, Teresa Uson, Katherine Yason, and Geoffrey Cimat.

Members, mabuhay the Philippines. I, for one, thought I was amazing.

Members' Statements

Philippine Heritage Month and Independence Day

Ms Hoffman: [Remarks in Tagalog] Mr. Speaker, a special mabuhay to all of our Filipino guests in the gallery today. I want to wish all Albertans a happy Philippine Heritage Month, and today I also want to wish everyone a happy Philippine Independence Day as well. Philippine independence has been celebrated since 1898, when the Philippine islands fought for and achieved independence from Spanish colonial rule.

Philippine Heritage Month has been celebrated in this province since 2018, when our NDP government worked with Filipinos across Alberta and declared June as Philippine Heritage Month forevermore in the province of Alberta. Some people asked me: why do that? My answer is that Alberta is home to more than 175,000 Filipinos. The Filipino community in Alberta is diverse in its generations, languages, economic and professional backgrounds, but what is consistent throughout the community are the values of compassion, hard work, hospitality, and fun. Filipino culture enriches our workplaces, our neighbourhoods, our faith, our civic and our cultural communities.

I want to come back to that value of compassion. Compassion is why our party invested in expanding home care to keep families together. Compassion is why we increased the minimum wage. Compassion is why we provided health care to Alberta children, whether their parents were living here permanently or not. We also supported more families in unifying rather than calling lolos and lolas a burden on the Canadian health care system, as members of the former federal Conservative government did.

[Remarks in Tagalog] Mr. Speaker, let us unite. To all Filipino Albertans: we won't stop fighting for you. We won't stop standing up for you and your families.

[Remarks in Tagalog] Thank you. Happy Philippine Heritage Month and happy Philippine Independence Day.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Sherwood Park.

Filipino Heritage Month in Canada

Mr. Walker: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today is Philippine Independence Day. I rise in this House to honour a vibrant and dynamic Filipino Albertan community that is proud of its culture and heritage. We take time today to recognize the richness of their languages, the depth of their culture, and to ensure that future generations never lose sight of just how important it is for us to reflect upon one's roots: the stories, struggles, and successes of previous generations.

Mr. Speaker, Alberta is the proud home to the second-largest Filipino population in the country. The community continues to grow in my own riding of Sherwood Park. I have the privilege of knowing many Filipino families, including Esmeralda Agbulos and the Abad family. One of Alberta's greatest strengths is our diversity, which is why it is so important for us to celebrate our diverse histories and culture. We educate and we learn together hand in hand.

Mr. Speaker, last year the federal government unanimously passed Motion 155. It states that the government should recognize the contribution that Filipino Canadians have made to Canadian society, the richness of the Filipino language, culture, and the importance of reflecting upon Filipino heritage for future generations by declaring June of every year Filipino Heritage Month. So now every June we officially celebrate the contributions of Filipino Canadians to Canada. This is long overdue, a recognition for a community that has given so much to Canada and Alberta.

Mr. Speaker, I hope you will join me in wishing all Filipinos in Alberta and around the world a very happy independence day and for the first time celebrate June as Filipino Heritage Month. [Remarks in Tagalog]

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadows.

Incitement to Hate

Mr. Deol: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last month the MP for St. Albert-Edmonton, Michael Cooper, disrespected antiracism advocate and Muslim witness Faisal Khan Suri during a parliamentary committee meeting on online hate. Mr. Suri provided factual testimony on extremists who commit racially driven mass murders and stated that they consumed content from "anti-immigrant, alt-right and conservative commentators." Cooper told Mr. Suri that he "should be ashamed," and then went on to name the perpetrator and quote directly from the manifesto of the man charged with the mass murder in Christchurch, New Zealand. Cooper's actions came the same day that Conservative leader Andrew Scheer gave a speech where he said: bigots are not welcome in the Conservative Party. Of course, despite his promises Scheer has refused to remove Cooper from his Conservative caucus.

We have seen similar behaviour here in Alberta. During the last election the UCP stood by candidates and party faithful who were revealed to support white supremacy and anti-Semitism, and since then they have been absolutely silent and unwilling to denounce their friends like Michael Cooper.

Mr. Speaker, this is inexcusable. As politicians and leaders in this province we must stand up against ethnic division and intolerance. I know first-hand what a difference it makes to have public figures stand up for the rights of the many, not just the few. I stand with my NDP caucus colleagues in ensuring that those who continue to face these threats will always find an advocate in our party.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-East.

Unemployment in Calgary

Mr. Singh: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am saddened to discuss the struggles of many of my constituents to find stable employment. During the election the biggest issue that I heard from my constituents was of the high unemployment in Calgary and of the job losses that Calgary has seen over recent years. As of this March unemployment in Calgary is 7.6 per cent. This is with three-quarters of the city participating in the job market, which is 10 percentage points higher than the national average.

This past weekend I've heard from hundreds of my constituents who were angered by the NDP's filibuster last week on Bill 2. My constituents voted for our government because they fiercely rejected the last government's nonstop attacks on job creators. Of course, their record tells all. Under their government Alberta's unemployment was above the national average, and while Canada is enjoying the benefits of record low unemployment, thousands of Albertans are still unemployed following four years of NDP policies.

Further, Calgary's city council is hurting the city's economy even more by raising property taxes on businesses and mismanaging the city's finances, which is only harming Calgary taxpayers and businesses more. Mr. Speaker, I don't know about you, but that sounds like a certain previous government's fiscal record after four years.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I'm happy to say that this government won't be all doom and gloom. I'm proud of this government for standing up for Albertans. Despite the opposition's best attempts, Bill 2 proceeded past second reading last week, and Bill 3 will move forward soon. But most importantly, the NDP's job-killing carbon tax was repealed, much to the joy of all Albertans. I'm proud of our government for focusing on creating jobs for all Albertans, fixing our finances, and renewing the Alberta advantage.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika.

Agriculture

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In my unbiased and completely objective opinion Cardston-Siksika is the greatest constituency in the province, the world, and, dare I say, this solar system. It boasts some of the hardest working Albertans I have ever had the pleasure to meet, and I'm willing to debate anyone on that point until I'm Conservative blue in the face. Among those workers are the men and women who toil each day to feed this province. That's right. I'm talking about our agriculture sector.

Mr. Speaker, the farmers and ranchers in Cardston-Siksika have contributed significantly to Alberta. A farmer will tell you that there are never enough hours in a day, and they give up most of their hours to help feed us and help put food on our tables. I am grateful for the work they do. In Cardston-Siksika alone our ag sector is raising over 1 million cattle and calves and nearly half a million pigs. They are out from dusk till dawn working nearly 3.5 million acres of cropland spread across 3,000-plus farms. They are growing barley, canola, wheat, oats, potatoes, corn, sugar beets, and the list goes on and on.

Our Blackfoot members of the Kainai Nation have also established themselves as competitors in the ag market. Speaking with Chief Roy Fox recently, I learned that the Blood Tribe agriculture project is Canada's largest irrigation project. They're striving to become western Canada's premier processor and supplier of quality forage products to international markets and are currently exporting to countries such as Japan, the United Kingdom, and Korea.

These hard-working people are exporting our amazing products across the world, they are driving innovation within the agriculture industry, and I could not be more proud to stand here and advocate for them. But we need to do more than just advocate; we need to make sure that our farmers and ranchers are taken care of. This government is committed to doing just that.

To the farmers and ranchers in Cardston-Siksika and across the province: we have heard you, we hear you now, and we are here for you. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-West is rising to make a statement.

Carbon Tax Repeal Act

Mr. Ellis: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It is my privilege to rise today and address this Chamber. It has now been a week since our United Conservative government repealed the carbon tax. This was a proud moment for our government and for me in particular as the Member for Calgary-West: a promise made, and a promise kept. Now, Calgary-West constituents who I have spoken with are appreciative that we have delivered on this key campaign promise, and we will continue to deliver on the rest of our promises.

The carbon tax was a tax on everything, Mr. Speaker. It didn't just affect the prices we paid at the pump. It also increased the cost of heating our homes and hiked up the prices of our groceries. Worse than that is how this tax impacted our most vulnerable. People like our seniors and people receiving AISH were hit the hardest because of this tax. These are precisely the people that we had in mind when we repealed this tax. We want to help instead of hurt those who are struggling to get by. By repealing the carbon tax, our government has introduced the single biggest tax relief measure in our province's history. We believe that Albertans should not be punished for heating their homes or taking their kids to hockey practice, and I am proud to say that under our government they won't be.

Thank you.

Notices of Motions

The Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader is rising with notices of motions.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to provide oral notice of two bills, actually, for the Order Paper, those being Bill 9, the public-sector wage arbitration deferral act, sponsored by my friend the President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance; and second, Bill 10, the Alberta personal income tax amendment act, 2019, also sponsored by my friend the President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance.

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods has a tabling or three, I believe.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I have the requisite five copies pursuant to my speech on Bill Hate last night: first, the LGBTQ2S Youth Housing and Shelter Guidelines, from which I quoted statistics; secondly, I have a document, 1 in 5 Queer Young Adults Attempted Suicide in the Past Year, Study Shows: “mental health issues aren’t widespread in the LGBTQ community because of identity or orientation – it’s because of discrimination”; finally, five copies of a document titled UCP’s Education Bill Plays Games with Students’ Lives.

The Speaker: Are there any other members who have a tabling today? The hon. Member for Strathcona, please.

Ms Notley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Edmonton-Strathcona, I believe it is.

I rise today to table policies and legislation from Ontario, Nova Scotia, and British Columbia that show higher support for LGBTQ youth in those jurisdictions. If this government passes Bill Hate, they claim their protections will still be the strongest in the country. These documents are on the record to prove that that is not the case.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have copies of the 61 letters that our constituency office received on May 3, some of which I quoted last night, and I will table those.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Are there any others wishing to table a document? Seeing none, the Leader of the Official Opposition.

Oral Question Period

Nurses’ Contract Negotiations

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, they think they’re above the law and that laws that they don’t happen to like they just get to ignore: that’s the United Nurses of Alberta responding to the Minister of Finance’s threats – apparently not threats – to legislate his way out of his legal obligation to bargain in good faith with Alberta’s nurses. This letter and any potential move to legislate is a gross abuse of power and is profoundly disrespectful to the tens of thousands of hard-working people who care for our loved ones when they need it the most. To the minister: why do you believe that you’re above the law?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, we appreciate the contributions that our public sector makes on behalf of the government and on behalf of all Albertans. We are seeking to delay wage arbitrations. We believe that it’s the responsible thing to do at this point in time as it gives us time to consider our path forward: a way forward to deliver high-quality services to Albertans and a path forward to balance for this province.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, the responsible path forward would be to delay a $4.5 billion hole in the budget, not to breach the Constitution, to break the law, to break the contracts and grab money out of the pockets of hard-working nurses. Why are you going after nurses when you couldn’t wait two weeks to give a gift to your friends in corporate Alberta?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our job-creation tax cut is a very, very important initiative in order to attract investment, create job opportunities for all Albertans, and, in fact, in the long term create additional government revenues so that we can continue to have a world-class health care system and a world-class education system. The previous government put us on a trajectory to $100 billion in accumulated debt. That would mean the next generation would not have a world-class health care system or education system.

Ms Notley: “A common misconception is that governments can only reduce public sector salaries of unionized employees if the unions agree.” Those are the words of the chair of the Premier’s blue-ribbon panel. I would advise the minister to find more informed legal advice on labour negotiations and the law and what the Supreme Court of Canada says. Why does this minister believe that it is fair and reasonable to give a $4.5 billion tax gift to profitable corporations while at the same time breaching the Canadian Constitution and reaching into the pockets of nurses to grab their money?

Mr. Toews: Again, Mr. Speaker, we are seeking to delay wage arbitration to ensure that we have a responsible path forward to balance in this province. Albertans expect us to be responsible with their hard-earned tax dollars. We’re also committed to working together in good faith with the public sector as we work to ensure that we can deliver high-quality services to Albertans.

The Speaker: The Leader of the Official Opposition.

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, how in heaven’s name can the Minister of Finance get up with any sense of integrity and use the words “good faith” when he is about to breach the Constitution of this country to take money out of the pockets of hard-working nurses while at the same time justifying a $4.5 billion tax gift to wealthy, profitable corporations? Does he really believe Albertans are going to agree with this?

The Speaker: The Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I’ll tell you what Albertans will agree with. They’re going to agree with a government that puts Albertans first. They’re going to agree with a government that creates a business environment that attracts investment and jobs for all of Albertans. That’s what Albertans are going to agree with.

Ms Notley: Apparently the members opposite don’t believe that nurses are Albertans because clearly they’re not coming first; they’re coming last. Foreign corporations and their shareholders: that’s who’s coming first under this government. This government didn’t say a word about breaching the Constitution to break the law in order to steal money from nurses in the last election. Why didn’t they come clean about that plan in the campaign?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, again, we absolutely appreciate the contribution the public sector makes to this government and certainly to Albertans in general. We, again, are simply seeking to delay arbitration until we have enough time to adequately build a path forward that will both be responsible economically and also ensure that we can deliver high-quality services to Albertans. It’s seeking simply a delay in the arbitration time.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, it’s not a simple delay in arbitration. It is the breach of a legal contract with the nurses and other public-sector workers. It is a breach of a contract that the Supreme Court of Canada has said must be protected and is protected by the Constitution of this country, and the only way you can do it is by bringing in the notwithstanding clause. Why did you not tell Albertans that you were going to break the law to steal money from nurses?

Mr. Toews: Again, Albertans expect this government to be fiscally responsible with their hard-earned tax dollars. We are seeking this delay to ensure that we have a path forward that includes both returning to balance in this province and delivering high-quality services to Albertans. Mr. Speaker, we know that this delay is the responsible path forward, and we believe Albertans will support it.

The Speaker: The hon. Member . . .

Ms Notley: I've got one more. This is my third one?

The Speaker: Yeah. It's up to you guys. That's not what I have, but I'm happy to call you. The hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Ms Notley: Well, to be clear, the responsible way forward, Mr. Speaker, is not to break the law.

Gay-straight Alliances in Schools

Ms Notley: But let's move on to a new topic. Yesterday the Government House Leader repeatedly made claims in this House that were not true. I am a stickler for people telling the truth, so I just can't let this go, Mr. Speaker. Bill Hate removes guarantees that students can use the word "gay" in describing gay-straight alliances. Ontario's legislation says that neither the board nor the principal shall refuse to allow a pupil to use the name "gay-straight alliance." Black and white. This is stronger. Will the House leader acknowledge it, or have we officially entered the posttruth era in this Legislative Assembly?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, let's be very clear. Our government will have the most comprehensive statutory protection for LGBTQ students in the country. That's important to us. It's a priority of this government. It's something we campaigned on. It was a priority of our parties when they were in opposition as well. It's disappointing to see the Leader of the Official Opposition still misrepresenting facts inside this place. To be clear, students will continue to be protected. Section 35.1 of the Education Act specifically guarantees students' entitlements to create inclusion groups, including GSAs and QSAs. Those are the facts.

Ms Notley: The House leader just can't stop saying things that are untrue. He just can't help himself.

On June 3 the Premier told this House . . .

Mr. Ellis: Point of order.

Ms Notley: . . . "Our government will maintain the strongest legal protections for gay-straight alliances of any province in Canada." Now, Nova Scotia's policy, which I just tabled, requires all schools to provide GSAs, including private schools, clearly stronger protection than Bill Hate's private school loophole.

An Hon. Member: Point of order.

Ms Notley: Will the House leader apologize on behalf of the Premier for providing members of this Assembly with information that is not true, or has the Premier also embraced the posttruth era in this Legislature?

The Speaker: Hon. members, I would just like to note both points of order at 1:57 and 1:58.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, we won't be lectured on not telling Albertans about things from that member, who lied about the biggest tax increase in the history of this province. Again, let's be very clear.

Mr. Bilous: Point of order.

Mr. Jason Nixon: We will continue to have the strongest statutory requirements when it comes to GSAs. That's a priority of our government. The Official Opposition should stop misrepresenting the facts. We want LGBTQ students to know that we stand with them. This is an important issue to this government. It's an important issue to the Education minister. It certainly is an important issue to the Premier, and we will continue to make sure that we have the strongest statutory requirements in the country. Those are the facts. That's how it will be.

Ms Notley: Well, let's try again. On June 10 the Minister of Justice said that the UCP will make sure "that Alberta has the strongest gay-straight alliance provisions in all of Canada." In British Columbia ministerial orders compel private schools to have a policy that protects kids from discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation or gender identity. I've tabled it. Bill Hate removes . . .

Mr. McIver: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Ms Notley: . . . those requirements from private schools. Will the Solicitor General be allowed to rise and apologize for providing this House with incorrect statements and, in so doing, attempt to salvage his legal reputation?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, the only person who should rise in this House and apologize is the Leader of the Official Opposition for continuing to misrepresent facts and act the way that she and her party have inside this place. It is disappointing. LGBTQ students are important to us. GSAs must be protected and maintained. It's important to the Justice minister, as it is to every member of this cabinet and every member of this government caucus, to make sure that we follow through on our campaign commitments, make sure that we have the strongest statutory protections for GSAs. We stand with LGBTQ students inside our school system. We trust teachers; they don't. That's really what this comes down to.

The Speaker: The point of order at 2 o'clock is also noted.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Lesbian, gay, bisexual, trans, queer, two-spirit, intersex, pansexual, asexual, nonbinary. Words matter. Yesterday our leader asked the Education minister to correct her horrendous comments in which she identified LGBTQ youth as "whatever." Our leader asked her to simply say the word "gay." She couldn't do it, and she won't answer media questions today. I'm going to give her another chance right now. To the minister: again, will you state that you unequivocally support the use of the words "gay" and "queer" in your government's GSA policies?

2:00

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education is rising.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. Again, I find it very disappointing. I find it personally hurtful to our government and to myself that the opposition continues to imply that we do not support our LGBTQ students. [interjections] Our government will have the most comprehensive statutory protections for lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, queer, two-spirited students, period.

The Speaker: I was happy to hear the question. I'm also happy to hear the answer. If we could keep the volume level similar, that would be helpful.

The hon. member.

Member Irwin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Quite frankly, respectfully, it's not about your feelings. It's about the feelings of LGBTQ youth.

When our leader asked the question yesterday, it was the Government House Leader who rose and accused our side of the House of bullying the minister. Let's talk about bullying. We're talking about kids who experience the worst forms of bullying because of their sexual orientation or gender identity. We're talking about these kids' lives. Outing kids is dangerous, destroying GSAs is dangerous, Bill Hate is dangerous. To the House leader: can you seriously stand in this House and play the victim while you put these students in harm's way?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, I was not referring to myself or the Education minister. What I was referring to in those comments was the outrageous behaviour by the MLA for Edmonton-Glenora over the weekend when she went out of her way to bully a musician playing at a flag-raising event here at the Legislature and, in fact, on Twitter called for more people to join in that behaviour. These are the tactics that continue to come from the opposition. I reject those tactics. I think it's ridiculous that they continue down this path. What's interesting enough is that Albertans have rejected them in record numbers. The fear and the hate from this side of the House won't be accepted by Alberta anymore.

Member Irwin: This government is rolling back the rights of LGBTQ youth, and their minister stays silent. I'm curious if this is an issue for her alone or if it's rampant throughout this government cabinet. We know the minister of culture raised the pride flag last week and ignored protestors who were behind her. That minister and the Justice minister claim to be allies, so will they commit in this House that they will advocate in cabinet so that students won't be prevented from using the words "gay" and "queer" when they establish a GSA or QSA?

The Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader is rising.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Again, Mr. Speaker, the Education minister and the Justice minister, the Premier, and others have been clear on this issue. We continue to have support for the best statutory requirements in all of the country on GSAs. We will stand beside LGBTQ kids to make sure that GSAs will be called GSAs and that kids can participate in GSAs. That's an important issue to our government. It was an important issue to us when we were in opposition. We made it clear in our platform. We've made it clear over and over in this Assembly. We will continue to have the best statutory requirements when it comes to GSAs in the entire country. That's a fact.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Banff-Kananaskis.

Wildlife-human Coexistence

Ms Rosin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Rocky Mountains are beautiful, and tourists come from all over to witness them themselves, but there are more than just mountains to see out there in the wilderness. A number of areas in Banff-Kananaskis have seen bear warnings and area closures due to bear activity over the last month. In fact, just two weeks ago a poor black bear was put down by RCMP after he innocently wandered into Canmore one too many times. My constituents love the wildlife. The animals are integral to the beauty of the Rockies, and we don't want to see them in harm's way. To the Minister of Environment and Parks: what steps are our government taking to minimize the occurrence of bear-human interactions in the area?

The Speaker: The Minister of Environment and Parks.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for the question. Wildlife rehabilitation is a key component of our long-term strategy to minimize negative interactions between humans and bears. Bears that spend less time in rehabilitation facilities are less likely to engage in behaviours that put them in conflicts with humans, thus increasing their chances to survive and thrive in the long term. The Department of Environment and Parks is currently planning to launch a new community practice form for wildlife rehabilitation so that experts are able to share information and best practices. We are also continuing to partner with a number of experts on population and DNA studies to keep tabs on the real-time locations of our province's bears.

The Speaker: The Member for Banff-Kananaskis.

Ms Rosin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister. Given that proper education is critical when it comes to keeping our wild animals wild and minimizing dangerous interactions with people and given that over recent years we've seen tourists get a little too comfortable with the wildlife, some even approaching them for selfies, it is only a matter of time before one person gets too close and the animal gets spooked, causing injury or death to an unsuspecting tourist. What is the ministry doing to ensure that visitors are properly educated on the dangers and best practices of wildlife encounters?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, as part of our BearSmart campaign we're working to reduce human and wildlife conflicts. Albertans can do their part to avoid human and bear conflicts by carrying bear spray and air horns, keeping dogs on a leash, and travelling in groups. People are asked to adhere to the warnings and closures due to bear activity. Campers are also encouraged to keep food, beverages, scented material, and garbage in airtight, bearproof containers or inside a vehicle and store anything that may have a smell of food or garbage away from humans and out of the reach of bears. Campers are encouraged to pack up their garbage when they leave their campsites.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Ms Rosin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister. Well, given that human-wildlife interactions aren't the only dangerous interactions as vehicle-wildlife instances are increasing as well and given that, in early May, 15 elk were killed on the Trans-Canada highway during one single snowstorm, luckily with no human fatalities this time, and given that just last week a black bear was struck and killed on that same highway, one proposed solution is to install simple wildlife fencing from the gates of Banff national park out to Dead Man's Flats, guiding the animals to cross in the underpass. Is this a priority for our government, and if not, what is our government going to do to ensure the continued safety of both humans and wildlife?

The Speaker: The Minister of Transportation.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The government of Alberta has allocated $25 million over five years in the budget to identify animal-vehicle collision-prone areas to assess the best ways to redirect wildlife and to design and install mitigation measures such as fencing and underpasses or overpasses. The commitment will be reviewed as we develop the 2019 capital plan along with all the other important projects. The department has already retained an engineering consultant to determine the best location of a wildlife crossing and to design a wildlife overpass and fencing on the Trans-Canada between Lac des Arcs . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Gay-straight Alliances in Schools

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My constituents and I are appalled that this UCP government is laser-focused on denying GSAs and destroying GSAs. Even before Bill Hate was introduced, my constituency office received . . .

Mr. McIver: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Ms Renaud: . . . 60 letters from students addressed to the Premier. Here's one. I quote: "I am a member of the LGBTQ+ community. I have one question for you. Do you think that it is okay for us to take 20 steps backwards? . . . GSA's are a safe space and it is where we are heard and welcomed with open arms." To the Minister of Education: will you acknowledge and answer this concerned student? Answering "whatever" won't cut it.

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. Again, I reiterate that we will have GSAs available to students. Under 35.1:

If one or more students attending a school operated by a board request a staff member employed by the board for support to establish a voluntary student organization, or to lead an activity intended to promote a welcoming, caring, respectful and safe learning environment that respects diversity and fosters a sense of belonging, the principal of the school shall

- (a) permit the establishment of the student organization or the holding of the activity at a school, and
- (b) designate a staff member to serve . . .

And it goes on and on.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given the fact that the students I'm hearing from don't believe that Bill Hate is balanced . . .

Mr. McIver: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Ms Renaud: . . . and given the fact that 60 students wrote to the Premier, I'd like to read another one.

I feel the need to tell you that it is hard to come out. I should know. You're sending a message to the people around you that they can't be themselves without you exposing them. You're telling kids that they don't have a choice, that they can't be heard.

Everyone knows this is wrong [and] you should . . . too.

To the minister: do you know that this is wrong, to out kids without their consent?

The Speaker: The Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. Schools cannot disclose a student's membership in any inclusion group as there are student privacy considerations that trump all other legislation. We trust professional educators to navigate these difficult situations and do what is in the best interests of kids. FOIP and PIPA are the law.

Thank you.

Ms Renaud: Given the fact that I, like the students who wrote to me, don't believe what this government is saying – and you can use all kinds of words – I have one more question to the Premier. I quote: taking away the ability to reach out and tell someone in your school or join a club to feel safe is, quite honestly, disgusting. There is absolutely no reason for which a student's right should be taken away. What if the only reason a child hasn't come out to their parents is because it isn't a safe environment? You are putting members of our community in danger. They could be kicked out, beaten, or sent to be turned straight.

2:10

The Speaker: The Government House Leader is rising.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, to the hon. member's students and constituents, I want to assure them that, again, under this, students will continue to be protected under section 35.1 of the Education Act, which specifically guarantees students entitlement to GSAs and QSAs. In addition to that, schools cannot disclose a student's membership in any group, as there are student privacy considerations that trump all other legislation. We trust our professional educators to navigate these difficult situations and to do what is best for the kids. Those are the facts. Despite the opposition continuing to want to misrepresent them, those are the facts.

The Speaker: The Member for Edmonton-Glenora is rising.

Education Funding

Ms Hoffman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On Monday this government caved to pressure from this opposition and parents and confirmed that it would fund enrolment. Good on the Finance minister, but Calgary public and Catholic school boards wrote a letter to the Education minister on Tuesday stating that they have no clue about this government's plan, and they warn that they've already started cutting in anticipation of a terrible provincial budget. To the Minister of Education: why leave school boards in the dark? Is your announcement to fund enrolment just a smokescreen to find other places to cut?

The Speaker: The Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the questions. Albertans can be very confident that our government is making thoughtful, prudent decisions to ensure that there is funding for the high-quality education they expect for their children. The NDP need to stop with their scare tactics. They have to stop playing politics with our children, and we will give the information to the school boards as soon as we can.

Ms Hoffman: Given that the chaos in our schools has been created by this government and given that it's harming student learning and given that the chaos has already resulted in job losses and that I've learned specifically from a family counsellor who was laid off in the Palliser school district on Monday, the same day this government claimed to be funding enrolment, that he lost his job, will the minister guarantee that any of the staff that lost their jobs as the mismanagement, as the bungling, as the waiting until due course will be rehired? Yes or no?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. We have continuously been here in the Legislature stating that we are funding education. We are maintaining funding. The boards have to make the decisions that they feel they need to make, but we have continuously said that we are funding education. It's a priority, and we will continue to build schools. Thank you.

Ms Hoffman: Given that words don't cash cheques and given that there are more challenges confronting our schools and the government looks to rush through a decade-old piece of legislation, the Education Act, or Bill Hate – cue point of order – and given that the province's second-largest school board, Edmonton public, held an emergency debate on the Education Act yesterday and given that the trustees in the meeting said that they can't see any reason to rush implementation of the act, as did the members of ASBA, will the minister agree to delay the act?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. I feel that the opposition has been the one to delay the act. It should have been passed. It was passed in 2012, amended in 2015, and we've been waiting for it to come forward, so we're quite ready for it. I have quotes from Lorrie Jess, president of the Alberta School Boards Association.

We are pleased with the amendments to ensure that residency and age of access are remaining the same as in the School Act. We look forward to working on successful implementation of the amended Education Act in support of public, separate and francophone school boards.

I have similar . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville has a question.

Highway 15 Twinning Projects

Ms Armstrong-Homeniuk: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Since 2009 the traffic on highway 15 and the adjoining bridge into Fort Saskatchewan has increased by 50 per cent. Daily more than 23,000 vehicles travel across the bridge. The bridge is narrow and single-lane each way. Collisions on the bridge are all too common, and when they occur, the bridge is often shut down for hours at a time. Starting the twinning of the highway and the bridge construction have been repeatedly promised. Can the Minister of Transportation explain to the House why this project has not been started, and when it will start?

The Speaker: The Minister of Transportation.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The project described by the hon. member is in two parts. Part A is east of highway 28 to highway 37. It started on May 15 and will be completed by October 15 of this year. Part B is east of highway 37 and west of highway 21 within the city of Fort Saskatchewan. The twinning project also includes construction of a new bridge over the North Saskatchewan River, and construction is expected to begin in August of this year.

The Speaker: The Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

Ms Armstrong-Homeniuk: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Minister. Given that the previous government constantly promised money for the project and announced that it was going ahead multiple times, dating back to March 23, 2017, and given that construction has not started more than two years after that and given that this is a key project to help commerce flow back and forth, particularly from the Industrial Heartland, can the minister please tell the House when the project, in actuality, will have money allocated?

The Speaker: The Minister of Transportation.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thanks to the member for the enthusiasm in listening to her constituents. The funding has been allocated for the twinning of highway 15, which includes the construction of the new bridge over the North Saskatchewan River. While the first part of the project has begun, the plan is to begin the second part, which includes the bridge, in August of this year. That's the schedule, and we intend to keep it.

The Speaker: The Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

Ms Armstrong-Homeniuk: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Minister. Given that the Minister of Transportation has been talking about the twinning of the highway and of the bridge and promising such since 2017 – and it hasn't started – and given that the capital region is growing and showing little sign of slowing down, to make the problem worse, and given that highway 15 is a major corridor into the Industrial Heartland that is required for economic growth, can the Minister of Transportation please tell the House again when the bridge construction and twinning will start?

The Speaker: The Minister of Transportation.

Mr. McIver: Well, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's persistence on this matter is impressive. I will remind the hon. member again that it's a major corridor. We understand that it's vital to the economic growth of the Industrial Heartland, which matters to all of Alberta. Again, construction between highway 28A and 37 is under way. It has been for about a month now. Again, the bridge and the other piece of the infrastructure, including the bridge in Fort Saskatchewan: it's budgeted. It's intended to start in August of this year. We plan to keep that schedule.

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-McCall is rising to ask a question.

Oil Transportation by Rail

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My question is not about Bill Hate. Our government did what was necessary to move our product while waiting for pipelines to be built. We signed oil-by-rail contracts that would have generated $2 billion in revenues for Alberta's economy. Oil was due to begin moving by rail as a result of these contracts in three weeks' time. The Premier is now saying that he wants to move these contracts to the private sector. To the Minister of Energy. A simple question: will these private companies be able to move our products in three weeks, or will we be waiting for another year or so?

The Speaker: The Government House Leader is rising.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, our government is working on every avenue to be able to get our products to market. It's one of the most important issues facing our province and something, quite frankly, that the former government completely failed on. When it comes to crude by rail and the conversation about that, I think it's important that we, actually, quickly talk about the boondoggle that the NDP brought in in the dying days of their administration, bringing in one of the largest expenditures in the history of the province, maybe even the largest expenditure in the history of the province, at a time when they knew that they were going to lose the election, in an election period, in a last-ditch, desperate attempt to be able to maintain government. It was ridiculous.

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that there are further delays coming for the line 3 pipeline expansion and given that the Premier is now saying that he will have to extend curtailment into next year and given that moving oil by rail would help to ease the impact of curtailment, to the minister: will you commit to continuing on with the contracts we signed if you cannot find all the takeaway capacity we secured in the private sector?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, what I will commit to is that we will continue to work to find every avenue that we can to be able to get our product to market. What I can also commit to is what the Premier promised back in February, before the last election, that we will examine every contract that was made by the NDP government in the dying days of their administration, during that election period, to make sure that it is appropriate for taxpayers. Our job is to protect taxpayers' interests. We will look at all of these contracts with that lens. That's the lens that we will use. Now, the problem, again, is that the opposition does not want to talk about their boondoggle that they put in at the last minute to try to save their government.

Mr. Sabir: Given that now the Premier has spoken out against the oil-by-rail contract without knowing any of the details and given that he jumped to conclusions that the private sector could actually handle the needed takeaway capacity despite not having any evidence to suggest that and given that the Premier and the minister have now been briefed on the contracts we signed, to the minister: will you admit that you are putting ideology and campaign rhetoric over protecting people's jobs and our industry?

The Speaker: The Government House Leader is rising.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, this government will not be lectured by the NDP opposition when it comes to jobs. When they were in power just a short while ago, they oversaw the largest job loss in the history of this province and then brought in a tax increase that devastated families across Alberta even more.

When it comes to the oil-by-rail contract, that they brought in during an election period in a desperate attempt to be able to hang onto government . . .

Mr. Bilous: It wasn't during the election.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Yes, it was during the election period, Mr. Speaker.

Again, from day one the Premier was very, very clear that there were concerns with this. Nothing that we have seen since then has changed that. We will continue to look at it in the best interests of taxpayers.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview is rising.

Corporate Taxation, Tax Credits, and Job Creation

Mr. Bilous: Mr. Speaker, corporate tax reductions are risky and unlikely to create jobs or ensure companies are supporting economic growth. Several economists are skeptical at best that this UCP government's risky 4 and a half billion dollar giveaway will do little other than boost the bottom line. Will this minister admit that there is no single silver bullet and that to promote job creation, he must listen to the chambers of commerce and other business groups, who know best?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Alberta is in a difficult way today in terms of job availability and job opportunity for all Albertans. We've witnessed – in fact, the members opposite presided over a government that witnessed – the largest flight of capital out of this province in recent history. Bill 3 is one measure of many that will again create a very competitive business environment, attract investment to this province, and create jobs and opportunities for all Albertans.

Mr. Bilous: Mr. Speaker, given that chambers of commerce have been asking successive governments to level the playing field with other jurisdictions and introduce an investor tax credit and given that every $30 million in tax credits generates a hundred million dollars' worth of investment in Alberta companies through our program, the Alberta investor tax credit, is the minister refusing to commit funding to this job-creating program because he knows better than the job creators in chambers of commerce, or will he commit to funding the Alberta investor tax credit?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We have heard from many chambers of commerce. We've heard from countless businesspeople in Alberta. We've heard from many, many investors. What we've heard is that we need to make a 180-degree turn from what the previous government did during their time in office. We have a comprehensive plan, including a large corporate tax cut that will attract investment, jobs, and opportunities into Alberta.

The Speaker: The Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I'll thank the minister for his non answer.

Given that this government doesn't want to give Albertans the opportunity to invest in companies in their own backyard and given that the capital investment tax credit has been incredibly successful, where $200 million in conditional tax credits has leveraged $2.2 billion worth of investment – that's an ROI of more than 10 times, Minister – if the minister will not commit to this program, will he apologize to Albertans for driving away investment and jobs and admit that he believes he knows better than the business community?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, this government is committed to a comprehensive plan to create a very competitive business environment. That includes reducing our corporate tax rate from 12 to 8 per cent. That includes a full-on commitment to modernize our regulatory environment to ensure that Alberta businesses have the most competitive regulatory environment to compete not only nationally but globally. That includes repealing the carbon tax, which was the largest tax repeal in the history of this province. I'm confident our measures will create jobs and opportunities for Albertans.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

Apprenticeship Training and Skilled Tradespeople

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. There are more than 50,000 registered apprentices in Alberta, training in over 50 designated trades and occupations, with over 800 high school students enrolled in the registered apprenticeship program. Many of these students attend Lethbridge College, utilizing their new trades building for their education. These apprentices are part of the backbone and future of our province. Will the hon. Minister of Advanced Education ensure that trades and apprenticeship training in this province continues to thrive?

The Speaker: The Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaides: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Indeed, encouraging more people to enter the trades and pursue vocational training opportunities is a top priority for me and for the government. We will be spearheading a number of initiatives that will encourage more people to pursue skilled trades, including expanding the registered apprenticeship training program and providing more scholarships for high school students who show promise in the skilled trades. Let me just say unequivocally that our government believes that apprenticeship education and skilled trades have every bit as much value, weight, merit, and worth as a university.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

Mr. Neudorf: To the same minister: given that apprentices who complete an apprenticeship program have seen increasing starting wages since 2005 and that these graduates of apprenticeship programs bolster the provincial economy and strengthen our middle class here in Alberta, what will the minister do to ensure that new graduates of trades and apprenticeship programs have access to the kinds of jobs they have spent years training for?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Nicolaides: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. It is imperative that young Albertans have access to good jobs after graduation. We're working to strengthen the ability of our postsecondary institutions to fill labour market needs in a proactive manner. We recognize that from now until 2025, 3,000 skilled tradespeople will retire each and every year. This so-called grey wave will create opportunities for Albertans, and by supporting the skilled trades, we will ensure more Albertans have access to good jobs.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the minister for his answer. Given how critical tradespeople are to our province's success and how tradespeople sacrifice time away from their families to work across our province while enduring long and demanding work hours on projects where they may not receive a thank you for their efforts, what is this government doing to recognize and celebrate the contributions of Alberta's tradespeople, like myself?

The Speaker: The Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaides: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our government completely respects and honours the tradespeople who quite literally helped build this province and who will be on the front lines of our economic recovery. These highly skilled men and women power our economy and have created a lasting legacy for all Albertans. That's why we are committed to honouring these tradespeople, who have left their mark, in a manner worthy of their contributions to our province. In fact, tomorrow I'll also be having a meeting with several private members to continue to explore opportunities to recognize the great work being done.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Child Intervention Panel Recommendations

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our government established an all-party panel to review the child intervention system in 2017. For over a year members from both sides of the House engaged with indigenous leaders, academics, front-line workers, nonprofit organizations, and families and youth receiving services. The panel delivered 26 consensus-based recommendations. The UCP then played politics and voted against legislation to put an action plan in place to implement those recommendations. To the Minister of Children's Services: will you tell me where you stand on the recommendations your colleagues endorsed and then abandoned?

The Speaker: The Minister of Children's Services is rising.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. The all-party panel undertook consultations for more than a year, speaking with people across the province, including indigenous leaders, people with lived experience as well as members on both sides of the House, so that we could learn and make improvements to the child intervention system. I've spoken with my colleagues who participated in that important work as well as with other panel members to better understand the feedback that went into that report, and we will continue to consult with our stakeholders as we move forward on the longer term plans.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I know that some of the panel members that were on this side of the House would also be interested in engaging with the minister on that.

Given that in the most recent Child and Youth Advocate report he notes that our action plan works to improve services for young people and, more specifically, to improve disability services and support for permanency services and given that leading experts in the field see the value of the full implementation of the action plan, will the Minister of Children's Services confirm her commitment to full implementation of the action plan by 2022, as our government committed to, or will we get another non answer?

2:30

The Speaker: The Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Just so that the member opposite is aware, one of the people that I did reach out to was the former Minister of Children's Services to get her thoughts and feedback on how the panel worked, what some of the background was on what went into that work. I haven't yet received confirmation as to whether or not she would be willing to meet, but I would more than welcome a meeting with anybody on the opposite side of the House who wants to discuss that further. We do need to make sure that we have the best interests of these vulnerable children top of mind when making decisions.

Ms Pancholi: Well, unfortunately, I didn't hear from the minister any comment about full implementation of the action plan.

Given that the minister's answers are lacking the clarity that Albertans deserve, I will try something more straightforward. Can the minister at the very least confirm that indigenous children and families in Alberta will receive the same level of services and funding regardless of where they live and that she will not cut that funding to pay for a tax giveaway for wealthy corporations?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As the members of this House may be aware, there were short-, medium-, and long-term recommendations within the work that the panel undertook. A lot of the short-term recommendations have already been put in place or work has begun or they've been completed. A number of the recommendations are to take place within this year, and then a number are longer term. Many of those do require ongoing discussions – and that's very clear in the report – with our stakeholders, including indigenous communities, and I'm happy to say that we had a number of those discussions this week.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods is rising to ask a question.

Public Service Contract Negotiations

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. The right to collectively bargain is recognized through international human rights conventions and has been protected by our Supreme Court of Canada in very clear decisions. To the minister of labour: could you please explain to this House the importance of good faith bargaining and its relationship with the government legislating contractually obligated negotiations to stop?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, this government is just seeking to delay arbitration, and we believe it's in the best interests of Albertans. We're seeking to delay arbitration to build a path forward that will ensure that we can deliver high-quality services to Albertans and will ensure that we can get on a path to balance. We're waiting for the MacKinnon panel to deliver their report. That's our simple request, just a delay in arbitration.

The Speaker: The Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Given that the Minister of Finance used the term "bargaining in good faith" yesterday when he was speaking to the collective bargaining process with public-sector unions and given that we're now learning that he's going to break the law and delay contractually mandated talks on wage reopeners, to the minister: can you please clarify for the House what you mean when you say "good faith bargaining"?

The Speaker: The Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We appreciate the public sector and all that they provide to both this government and to Albertans as they deliver high-quality services. Again, we are just seeking to delay arbitration. We're working in good faith with all stakeholders, quite frankly, to ensure that we can have a responsible plan going forward in the best interests of all Albertans.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Ms Gray: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the minister does not appear to understand bargaining in good faith and given that the minister invited unions to a consultation on wage reopeners and given that he attempted to brush off questions yesterday about why he would legislate himself out of these contracts, to the minister: will you admit that you had no plan to bargain legally and that you are going to use your majority in this House to break the law?

The Speaker: The Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, Albertans expect this government to make thoughtful, prudent decisions and not be rushed into hasty decisions that will not be in the best interests of Albertans. Therefore, we are simply seeking a delay in the wage arbitration so that we can build a responsible plan going forward, a plan that ensures that the best interests of Albertans are top of mind.

Highway 63 Maintenance

Mr. Yao: One issue that I hear about is highway maintenance, Mr. Speaker. What my constituents in Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo are concerned about is the current contract because the maintenance of highway 63 is abysmal. It is poorly maintained. In the winter the plowing and clearing happen infrequently. People rely on the buses and larger trucks to literally carve through the snow that has piled alongside the lanes on the bridge. What assurances does this government have that Albertans are getting the services that they are paying for? Have standards been lowered over the years in regard to these highway maintenance contracts?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Transportation.

Mr. McIver: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Snow clearing standards, to my knowledge, haven't been lowered, and I assure the member that highway 63 remains a priority. Our maintenance contractors are required to respond to winter conditions in a timely manner and to monitor highways three times a day. Department staff are able to monitor the contractors' performance through both visual inspections and by GPS monitoring, which is required on the service vehicles.

Mr. Yao: Given, Mr. Speaker, that the highway still has not been swept, leaving our busiest road uncleared – the sheer amount of gravel and sand on the provincial road can cause motorcycles to slip, injuring riders; rocks get spit up by vehicles into the windshields; it's dangerous, inconvenient, and expensive – and given that the contractor's reply was that the delay is due to equipment breakdown, my constituents wonder: why wasn't this company ready as they had all winter to prepare? Do they have more than one sweeper? To the Minister of Transportation: what contractual mechanisms are in place to ensure that Albertans receive the services that they are paying for?

Mr. McIver: Well, I thank the hon. member. As a motorcycle rider myself who rode up this week, this is a matter that I'm familiar with. The contractor did indeed bring in a subcontractor to begin sweeping operations following some equipment difficulties that that contractor was facing. I can tell the member that the sweeping operations are under way, probably as we speak but certainly this week, and will be completed as soon as possible. I will follow up based on the hon. member's comments.

Mr. Yao: Given, Mr. Speaker, that all winter my constituents noted the abundance of highway street lamps that were burned out and now they question whether they will be repaired in time for next winter and given that the delivery on this contract is a reflection of what Albertans think about all government contracts, what assurances do Albertans have that the highest standards and measures are in place, and will this contractor be held accountable to repair these lights, clean this highway, repair the highway, and clear the snow?

Mr. McIver: Well, Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the litany of complaints and drawing them to my attention. We review the performance of our contractors on a regular basis. If deficiencies are identified, they are addressed directly with the contractor. Contracts contain specific standards and obligations, and there are financial penalties for not meeting those obligations.

In the case of the lighting the majority of the lights have now been replaced or repaired, I understand.

I thank the hon. member for bringing this important situation to my attention, and we will follow up.

The Speaker: Hon. members, in approximately 30 seconds or less we will move to points of order. I'd ask all members who are leaving the Chamber for other commitments to do so in an expeditious manner.

The hon. Government House Leader is rising.

Point of Order Imputing Motives

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you for the opportunity to rise. I believe we have a few points of order. I could probably speed it up, if the Opposition House Leader and the Speaker are so inclined, to three points of order: one at 1:55; then one at about 1:57, roughly, would be the time; and then the remainder of the points of order called by the Member for Calgary-Hays could probably be looped into one point of order. If that's okay with you, Mr. Speaker, I would start with the one at 1:55. I assume we're on the same page?

2:40

The Speaker: Agreed.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise on that particular point under 23(h), (i), and (j). The Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition at the time made comments a few times that I thought were bordering on imputing false motives on members of the House as well as language that could create disorder, particularly around – and I will quote what we heard; you have the Blues, so you have a bit of an advantage over me at the moment – what basically was: steal money from Albertans. You know, there is no intention by any member of this House to steal from anybody. I would not say that about the opposition nor about the government. I think there are lots of rulings in the past that make that clear. I won't spend too much time on it because I'm more interested in discussing the other points of order, but I think it would be appropriate for the opposition to withdraw and apologize for that remark.

The Speaker: The Opposition House Leader.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. What we have here are two sets of facts. Quite frankly, we have the fact that the government seems to think they're above the law while we believe that violating the constitutional rights of Albertans is profoundly inappropriate and abusive of their office. So the reference the hon. member was making was in regard to taking money from nurses.

That's what would be the case if they do in fact legislate versus negotiating. These are two different sets of facts.

I would argue, Mr. Speaker, you know, under Beauchesne's section 75 that what the members are trying to do is curtail our ability and freedom of speech in this Assembly. According to Beauchesne's:

The privilege of freedom of speech is both the least questioned and the most fundamental right of the Member of Parliament on the floor of the House and in committee. It is primarily guaranteed in the British Bill of Rights which declared "that the freedom of speech and debates or proceedings in Parliament ought not to be impeached or questioned in any court or place outside of Parliament."

Mr. Speaker, this is a difference in sets of facts, as you yourself even on Monday, May 27, had said when dealing with a different point of order. You said, "What we can agree on is that it's quite possible that there will be times in this Chamber when there are two sets of facts around the same issue." I would argue that this is one of them.

The Speaker: I would say, with respect to the point of order around the Official Opposition making accusations about what the government may or may not have done, that this, in fact, is a disagreement on the facts. As such, this point of order is not well taken. We can proceed with the fact that this was merely amongst debate.

The House leader, please.

Point of Order Parliamentary Language

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you. I'm rising on what would be the second point of order, at 1:57-ish, I believe. Just making sure that we're on the same page. Am I roughly there with you, Mr. Speaker?

I again rise under 23(h), (i), and (j) in regard to parliamentary language. I will refer you, Mr. Speaker, to a Speaker's ruling on November 28, 2012. Interestingly enough, it involved the hon. Opposition House Leader back when he was in opposition the first time. He got himself into a little bit of hot water using words like "intentionally misled" to describe the government projection on a budget. Not only was it unparliamentary, but it was directed at an individual member, and those words did cause disorder. It was ruled on at the time by the then Speaker, who cautioned the hon. member at that time on that. I just think that's important to point out because, again, it was back in 2012, so clearly the Opposition House Leader is aware of these circumstances.

At the time, Mr. Speaker, what the hon. member said was:

Mr. Speaker, given that this Conservative government intentionally misled Albertans by using a budget based on overly optimistically projections – in other words, rainbows and unicorns – and given that the price of oil is still lower than this government's projected price, to the President of the Treasury Board: will he admit that the way to rectify this situation and ensure that Albertans get the public services they need is to increase royalties to an amount competitive with every other jurisdiction in the world?

I don't think that question includes the "misled" quote, so that's where I'm confused, Mr. Speaker. I do apologize to the House. I'm on the wrong one.

Where I'll go with this is this: the member on that day, November 28, 2012, intentionally misled the House. The Government House Leader at the time said, "I will leave aside all the other points of order but one, and that is when the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview rose to ask a question" and went on to talk about misleading the House. I'm not going to read all of it, Mr. Speaker, because it's longer than I thought. The point is that the opposition over the last few days has continued to skirt around the issue of our parliamentary rules on calling people liars, saying that they've misled. Context matters – I agree with that – but it's pretty clear, if you read the Blues, that the opposition continues to imply that members of the government are lying or telling mistruths to this Assembly. In fact, that is, one, not true, but, second, it is certainly unparliamentary, and I think that you should caution the members not to do that anymore in the future.

The Speaker: The Opposition House Leader is rising.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. First of all, I'm confused because I don't know if the Government House Leader actually identified what was said. Again, I think it's very important that specific words are dealt with. That's why there are words that are listed in the unparliamentary language and others that are not.

Now, to my knowledge – and you have the Blues, Mr. Speaker – there was nothing in today's QP, from this side of the House, that either said “lied” or “misled.” On my point of order, that I will be arguing shortly, it was the Government House Leader that actually said “that member, who lied about” the carbon tax. He used the word “lied” in his own point of order, so it's a little bit contradictory to be arguing now that it's a point of order if we use language like that.

I am very careful and try to encourage this side of the House to be careful in the language that they use so as not to cause disorder with words. We do have a list, all members of the House, as far as words that are ruled unparliamentary. This point of order is no point of order. At no point did – I don't know if that was against our leader – the Member for Edmonton-Strathcona use a word to incite disorder in this House. In fact, as you ruled just yesterday, Mr. Speaker, on two different sets of facts, two different sets of opinions, we believe that our facts, as the leader tabled today, are in black and white and are the truth. The government believes there is a second variation on that truth, but you did rule that each of us may have our own version. Therefore, this is not a point of order.

The Speaker: I thank you for your interjections. Based upon my ruling, maybe we will be able to deal with your point of order in our discussion at present.

Here is what I would say. I do happen to have the benefit of the Blues. At approximately 1:56 the Leader of the Official Opposition and the hon. Government House Leader were engaged in excitable debate when the Leader of the Official Opposition said the words “The House leader just can't stop saying things that are untrue. He just can't help himself,” at which point a point of order was called. The Leader of the Official Opposition also went on to say, “Will the House leader apologize on behalf of the Premier for providing members of this Assembly with information that is not true, or has the Premier also embraced the posttruth era.” I think we were all there for that.

What I would say with respect to this half of the point of order – over the past two days both sides of the House have been doing their very best to get as close to doing things which you are unable to do intentionally and doing them through other means – is that many rulings have taken place in the House in the past and that when members might be trying to do this, they would be speaking to “all members” or “the government,” making broad strokes. What we saw today was the Leader of the Official Opposition very clearly imply that the Government House Leader was saying untrue things, which, in fact, is unparliamentary. In the second half of my ruling I will give the Leader of the Official Opposition, or the Opposition

House Leader on her behalf, the opportunity to apologize and withdraw.

Having said that, the Government House Leader also behaved in a manner that is not becoming of a member when he very specifically used the word that we all know is unparliamentary and wasn't just skirting the rules but, in fact, broke the rules when he said, “That member, who lied about the biggest tax increase” in Alberta's history.

What I might say is that in a few moments I will give the Government House Leader the opportunity to withdraw and apologize. The challenge that is before the House is that both sides of the Assembly are trying to do, through whatever means possible, what we are not allowed to do, and that is to imply that a member of the House has lied. In this case, the Leader of the Official Opposition or the Opposition House Leader will apologize and withdraw because she implied that, specifically, the Government House Leader said something that was untrue, and the Government House Leader will also apologize for using the unparliamentary language saying that the opposition lied.

The hon. Government House Leader is rising.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Do I get my opportunity to apologize and withdraw now, or would you like me to do it later?

The Speaker: Oh. Right this second, and then you can sit down.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Yes, I did use the word “lied” today, and I do apologize for it and withdraw my remarks.

The Speaker: The hon. Opposition House Leader.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On behalf of the Member for Edmonton-Strathcona I apologize and withdraw that comment.

The Speaker: Excellent. Thank you. Good work.

The Government House Leader is rising on the point of order. At your pleasure.

Point of Order Epithets

Mr. Jason Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'll rise again under Standing Order 23(j), “uses abusive or insulting language of a nature likely to create disorder.” I'd also refer you to a citation in Beauchesne's which refers to the concept that one should not provoke debate. I raise it in the same manner that I raised it on previous occasions on this issue. I'm going to just refer you to a Speaker's ruling on March 22, 2000, on the issue. What I'm referring to is the opposition continuing to rename Bill 8, which is the Education Amendment Act, and at the time this issue was raised before in the House, the Speaker ruled this way. He said:

Thank you both . . . hon. gentlemen.

To the Opposition House Leader and the Government House Leader he says:

The reality is that a bill does have a name. A bill does have a title. One can use . . . an adjective to describe it, and all that ever does is lead to provocations and a whole series of other things. In other words, it leads to a debate in the question period. Of course, the purpose of question period is not to have a debate. The purpose of question period is to raise a question.

I do believe there is some merit to the point [of order] raised by the hon. Government House Leader with respect to this and would like to advise all members of the House that I really wonder what this question period is going to be like as of April 4, when second reading is given to Bill 11. If one looks at the traditions in anticipation of what's on the Order Paper for that particular day, perhaps the environment here will be quite different. So we can think about that and how we're going to deal with all that and read the rules.

He goes on to say:

This is not a lecture. This is . . . a suggestion or advice. Bill 11 does have a name, as all hon. members have names, and all hon. members are referred to [in] that way. We do not denigrate the names of their constituencies or other individuals or anybody else. It's kind of an honourable thing.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I would submit to you the same thing as the Government House Leader did on that day. Like they did on Bill 11, we have Bill 8, which does have a name. Question period is not a time for debate. Question period is a time for asking questions. I ask that you caution the hon. members to stop using the term "Bill Hate," particularly in question period.

The Speaker: The Opposition House Leader.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm about to cite a number of examples where the now government, when in opposition, misnamed or intentionally renamed my own Ministry of Economic Development and Trade, a number of our bills. In fact, the Government House Leader on December 12, 2016, referred to our bill that was being debated at the time, the fair trade act – I will get the name in a second. The Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre had said in Hansard:

It should be probably named the unfair elections act, or how about the kneecapping the opposition act, or the incumbent election act, or the NDP election act, or the act to stack the deck? But I would not want to do the same as the NDP and use political purposes in names.

That's rich, considering that the previous six examples were just that.

Mr. Speaker, I also want to draw attention to the fact that the opposition continually refers to our carbon tax as the job-killing carbon tax. I want to also draw your attention to the fact that the opposition, or the government when in opposition and even today, actually used the adjective "kill" in many different examples, which, in my opinion, is a much more aggressive term: killing coal communities, killing the economy, killing jobs, job-killing carbon tax, which, Mr. Speaker, neither you nor the previous Speaker have ruled as out of order.

I will go back to Beauchesne's section 75, which is all about the freedom of speech for members. What the Government House Leader is trying to do is stifle members' ability to be able to speak freely. Nowhere in today's question period was any particular bill named, Mr. Speaker. What members were referring to is Bill Hate, as what some Albertans have referred to in communications with us.

Mr. Speaker, this is not a point of order. I feel that we should not apologize, considering that the shoe now is on the other foot for the government, who used this over and over again in this House for the past few years, and it has never been ruled out of order.

The Speaker: Thank you.

I was just about to recognize the Minister of Transportation.

Mr. McIver: Mr. Speaker, I'm always grateful when you are kind enough to recognize me in this House.

The Speaker: For clarity's sake, you are providing new information, not rehashing debate, correct?

Mr. McIver: I am. My hon. colleague did make some good arguments, but what he did not do and the reason why this is new information is that under 23(h), (i), and (j) the phrase "Bill Hate" is really, truly abusive. Mr. Speaker, it's your ruling, but I'm not sure how anyone could think it's not abusive and insulting language. It imputes false and unavowed motives to another member simply because it suggests that someone in this House hates Albertans or a subset of Albertans, and I can't think of anything more abusive or insulting than that. By so doing, also under 23(h), "makes allegations against another Member," it's abusive and insulting language that could create disorder in the House. The fact that we're on our feet right now I think is proof enough that that's the case.

The Speaker: Are there any other members wishing to provide new or relevant content who have not yet spoken? The Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Yeah. Respectfully, I would argue again, as the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview said, that using inflammatory rhetoric like "job-killing carbon tax" to refer to other bills, legislation would be just as inflammatory. I would point out Beauchesne's 69.

The Speaker has reminded the House, "It is very important . . . to indicate that something can be inflammatory, can be disagreeable, can even be offensive, but it may not be a question of privilege unless the comment actually impinges upon the ability of Members of Parliament to do their job properly."

And I would argue that this does not.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. members. I appreciate the additional interjections. I think part of the question will be not on whether it infringes on someone's privilege but on: is the comment likely to create disorder? The question that is before us, though, I don't believe is clear cut, be it a point of order or not. I think that all of the members have taken reasonable positions with respect to the importance of free speech, with respect to times in which the name that you're using for the bill, Bill Hate, may or may not be used.

I think that it is prudent in this case, as I spent some time this morning thinking about whether or not this particular issue would arise in question period today, and given the new information that's been provided, I will report back to the House, likely tomorrow, with respect to my decision on the ongoing use of Bill Hate. I would provide some context.

With respect to phrases that have been considered parliamentary one day, they may in fact be unparliamentary on other occasions. I think Speaker Zwozdesky spoke to this on a number of occasions when a statement that was not initially deemed to be unparliamentary certainly became unparliamentary because it continued to create disorder in the House.

My reservation is that I believe that is the path that we're currently heading down, but I will reserve my right to rule until tomorrow.

Are there other points of order that I have missed?

Mr. McIver: Mr. Speaker, I have four or five other ones on the same matter, about the same words. I think it would be appropriate to let you rule on what we just talked about, not relive the last 10 minutes, and wait for your ruling tomorrow. As such, I would withdraw them because we've had that discussion just now.

Orders of the Day
Government Bills and Orders
Third Reading

Bill 3
Job Creation Tax Cut (Alberta Corporate Tax Amendment) Act

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to move third reading of Bill 3, the Job Creation Tax Cut (Alberta Corporate Tax Amendment) Act.

I would like to thank all members of this Assembly for their input and debate with regard to this bill. This is a subject where our viewpoints differ, but I know that fundamentally we all share a desire to get Albertans back to work, and our government is confident that this bill will assist us in accomplishing that.

To recap, this common-sense legislation proposes to cut the corporate tax rate by a third within the next three years while maintaining the small-business tax rate at 2 per cent. This bill will also make minor technical amendments to ensure that the rate cuts are implemented properly.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Over the past few years we've seen investment and capital leave our province as a result of poor economic policy. We need bold action to renew the Alberta advantage, create jobs, and get Alberta working again. The previous government increased corporate tax rates, and revenues fell as the province became a less desirable place to do business. Our plan will help attract the investment needed to stimulate the economy, which will grow the overall size of the tax base and eventually lead to additional revenue.

Leading economists such as Dr. Jack Mintz and Dr. Bev Dahlby have estimated that this tax reduction will create more than 55,000 new jobs over the next four years and generate nearly $13 billion in economic activity. Dr. Mintz and Dr. Dahlby are both highly respected economic experts across the nation, and both are based here in Alberta at the University of Calgary. They have a keen understanding of Alberta's unique economy, and I value their opinions.

I also value the opinions of the chambers of commerce across this province who stood with me after I tabled this bill to show their support. I was also graciously joined by members of the Alberta Enterprise Group and the Canadian Taxpayers Federation. Their support for this action was clear.

Franco Terrazzano, the Alberta director of the Canadian Taxpayers Federation, said that "by lowering business taxes, this government is giving Albertans a chance to get back on their feet and get ahead." I agree with him. Businesses are the backbone of our communities, and by supporting businesses, we're supporting all Albertans. Without successful businesses there are very few jobs and there is far less government revenue. Businesses invest significant amounts in our communities and provide Albertans with the opportunities they need to feed their children and house their families. Overall, more workers and a healthy business community mean that we can better meet our commitment to protect government's vital programs and services.

Madam Speaker, I would like to remind the opposition that when they were in government, they told the Legislature on more than one occasion that their industry-specific corporate tax breaks would stimulate thousands of jobs and millions in investment. I find it very interesting that they are now saying that these broad tax reductions, that will benefit all sectors, will not create jobs or stimulate new investment.

We are working to correct the course of our province, and we are confident that these tax reductions will help create jobs and reignite our economy. This is what we were elected to do. Alberta's businesses have been punished for far too long with carbon taxes, red tape, and increased corporate taxes. Business efforts to expand and support our communities have been hampered, and I'm proud to be part of correcting this situation.

When the Premier and I spoke about this bill at Lafarge Canada's Edmonton infrastructure building, many workers and management were happy to stand with us in support of this action. Their western Canadian CEO, Brad Kohl, spoke of Lafarge's large investment plans and how they are looking forward to quick returns on those investments. He spoke of their desire to work in a province that is open for business and their intent to hire more people, which is welcome news.

Beyond supporting local businesses, these tax reductions will attract new companies to Alberta and encourage the development of new businesses by creating an enticing tax regime for expansion and job creation. Madam Speaker, by July 2 of this year Alberta will have the lowest corporate tax rate in Canada, and within a few years our province will once again be one of the most attractive business destinations in North America. We are proud to support job creators and help regain investor confidence. By laying out the dates of each rate reduction now, we are giving investors the certainty they need to rely on to make sound business decisions with confidence.

Madam Speaker, I know that Alberta's businesses want to grow and that they want to grow here in our province. Easing the tax burden on job creators was a core promise we made, and I'm proud that our government is keeping that promise. I would again like to thank the members of the House who are supporting this bill as well as those who offered considerate debate.

With that, Madam Speaker, I am pleased to move third reading of Bill 3, the Job Creation Tax Cut (Alberta Corporate Tax Amendment) Act. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) is not available.

Are there any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

Member Ceci: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I'll just start by saying that of course our viewpoints differ on this matter. We are not confident on this side that the bill will generate the investment that the hon. Finance minister talked about. He talked about his economists, the economists on his side, those expert economists who know Alberta well, saying that this will generate investment, that this will generate jobs, et cetera, et cetera. He did not say that there are other economists who don't agree with his economists, and there are. We have quoted those people, those reports, extensively in our earlier debates on this topic. I don't need to quote them right now, but I'm sure my colleagues here will do the same thing.

The fact is that the province struggled mightily after the crash in the world oil prices in late 2014. It caused our economy, because of its overreliance on revenues coming from the energy streams in this province, to struggle mightily and go into recession over a couple of quarters and longer than that. We soon got news that it would go into recession in early 2015.

We chose to work to mitigate that, Madam Speaker, and we did that in a far different way than this government is taking to mitigate the difficulty in our economy. We brought in former Bank of Canada governor David Dodge, who said: to mitigate the steep decline in your economy and the loss of jobs, the retrenchment of investment and capital, you should look at investing in your province to keep people working, to keep businesses afloat.

We did that through our capital plan, as everyone remembers, by targeting a 15 per cent increase on top of the approximately $5 billion to 5 and a half billion dollars that was in the capital plan at that point, when we took over government in May 2015. We contributed more than that $5 billion to 5 and a half billion dollars, and we got that capital plan up over $7 billion, Madam Speaker. That, as I said, was a way to stop the economy from nosediving and kind of smooth it out somewhat.

That helped people all over the province who were involved in construction of all kinds to stay on the job. As you know, Madam Speaker, the track record of this side, when we were government, was pretty remarkable in the area of school modernization and construction, something the previous PC government was unable to really deliver on. We chose to invest. And, yes, there was a cost to that investment. That cost was to run deficits while the economy was in free fall, and that had the support of economists. When I would meet with those economists in my role as Finance minister, they would come here and say: look, your government is doing the best it can with the hand that it's been dealt.

Madam Speaker, I was pleased to be able to stand up in this House and talk about how we were keeping Albertans employed, how we were mitigating the steep decline in the GDP in this province. For that reason, I don't understand why the government believes that we're on the best track to reduce the corporate tax by $4.5 billion over four years, not to see a gain in corporate taxes as a result of that for two years.

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Finance minister mentioned that – you know, that side seems to be against something that we did in a very targeted and selected way, and that is, Mr. Speaker, that we worked and we put royalty credits out there for companies in the world, really, who wanted to use our really affordable gas stream products and value-add to those. Inter Pipeline and another company took advantage of those royalty credits in a very targeted, specific way, and it paid off big time in terms of investment to this province.

We didn't do a scattergun approach, as this Finance minister and government is doing. We did a targeted approach, where we knew that there was cheap feedstock for the kinds of things like polypropylene or plastics that could be manufactured easily in this province, but companies weren't doing it. They weren't doing it because there were some particular challenges around the financial environment for those kinds of companies in this province. So we made it specific to those kinds of industries. They took it up, going great guns, Mr. Speaker, and we're seeing a return not only on the construction side but on the long-term use of cheap feedstock in this province that will create an industry that wasn't here.

Now, I don't know what industries the Finance minister is talking about that are magically going to happen as a result of a reduction in corporate taxes. What we've heard from many people on this side, Mr. Speaker, is that that reduction, as former Bank of Canada governor Mark Carney has said, will create dead money, meaning that the $4.5 billion reduction over four years that this government is giving away to corporations will sit on their balance sheet, or it will sit in their shareholders' pockets. It won't get reinvested because of the uncertainty of so many things, including the tariff environment that's being upset all over the place as a result of the United States going to war, not literally, on regulations and trade regulations with other countries in the world.

The upshot is that the kind of activity that this government is taking is really a Hail Mary. They're hoping, hoping against hope, that it's going to return more in the long run than their investment up front will cost. Mr. Speaker, that's a bit of a wish, and for that wish, for that opportunity, for corporations to put the monies in their pockets and potentially give it back by way of investment and jobs, as being indicated from the other side, we all get to have a lot less revenue in this province to address the needs of Albertans today, tomorrow, next year, and the year after that and after that and after that.

What that means, Mr. Speaker, what that likely means, almost one hundred per cent means, is that the government is going to be finding efficiencies across all of the programs and services that get delivered to Albertans, and those efficiencies is a kind way of saying that they're going to start cutting back on the quality and quantity of services for Albertans. If the wish of investment does not realize itself, as I doubt it will, then they're going to be saying: well, we've got to find a way to cut back because we don't have the revenues.

Well, Mr. Speaker, we know now that Alberta is growing in terms of population. We know that our population is getting older as we speak and that the needs of an older population are more expensive than a younger population. Relative to the rest of Canada we're younger, of course, but that won't stay forever. The needs of our older citizens are going to be increasing as we go forward in terms of the cost. So it's not a responsible thing to do, to look at the reductions to the extent that the Minister of Finance is talking about.

You know, I want to point out that we're at the low end of the scale already in terms of taxes in this country if you're looking at corporate taxes. We know we're the least taxed jurisdiction when you add up the fact that we don't have a PST, we don't have a health care premium, we don't have a payroll tax. Those things are present in many other provinces, and an apples-to-apples comparison of this province to other provinces would show that we're doing well already. So I don't understand why the Minister of Finance believes he can operate with even less money going forward on the hope that, I guess, lots of investment will occur with the scattershot approach that he's taking and that his government is taking to address the needs of corporations and forgetting about the needs of citizens in this province.

Mr. Speaker, the targeted approach we took with the investments on what is the sweet spot in Alberta, you know, the energy stream that we are blessed with having in this province: we targeted investments there, and it paid off big time. Now, I'm not sure where – there is no target for what the Finance minister and the government is proposing. They're just saying: you'll all pay less. The message I want to continue to deliver is: if you're not a corporation, everyone else is going to pay more, essentially.

I think the best interest of Albertans is to stay with the current tax regime we have, to stay with the targeted investments that have paid off mightily that we have, and to continue to follow the route of pushing for pipelines, pushing for a medium-term solution to get crude by rail happening so that we can get better value for every barrel of oil, Mr. Speaker. That would have been the bill that should have come forward as the continue-to-work-on-pipelines bill, the continue-to-get-value-added-from-energy-products-in-this-province bill, instead of the Hail Mary that is here before us.

I just want to assure people that there are speakers on the other side, leading economists, this one economist who talks about a 2012 study survey conducted at the University of Chicago, that trickle-down economics, the kinds of things that are being talked about here, don't work. A person no less in stature than Warren Buffett talked about how trickle-down economics really just surges upwards towards the shareholders and corporations.

Mr. Speaker, I, for one, won't be supporting this bill, and neither will folks on this side. Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, is there anyone else wishing to speak to third reading? The hon. Member for Calgary-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to speak to third reading of this bill, that would bring a huge tax break, which nobody is asking for and nobody has explained how it will help create jobs, bring investments. I think it's a very famous definition put forward by Albert Einstein, that insanity is to keep doing the same thing over and over and over and expecting different results. What we see with this bill is exactly that. As the Member for Calgary-Buffalo mentioned, Alberta has a tax advantage of $11.5 billion to the next jurisdiction. We are already competitive, and we have an advantage when it comes to taxation because we don't have health premiums, we don't have a payroll tax, and that gives us an edge of $11.5 billion.

What we know, if we look at the history of tax breaks, is that these experiments, the tax break experiments, have been tried in the developed world many times. Under President Reagan, under Prime Minister Thatcher there were massive, massive tax cuts. There was a tax on trade unions; there was deregulation; there was privatization; there was outsourcing: all in the name of competition. But what we saw was that growth was low, and because of these policies, inequality rules, we created a society of have and have-nots, and assets of the state were put in a fire sale. And every time those policies were put forward to respond to a crisis. In other words, crises were used as an opportunity to impose these policies, these failed policies, these trickle-down economic policies.

Exactly what we are seeing here is that this government is fixated on their rhetoric and ideological agenda, and they're bringing in the policies that have failed across the globe. They failed in the U.K., they failed in the States, and they even failed in Canada as well. If tax cuts were to create jobs – I think the U.S. saw the biggest tax cut just a year ago, a couple of years ago from 35 per cent to 21 per cent, almost a 14 per cent break, and the analysis of that is that 84 per cent of the businesses who are benefiting from that break haven't changed their investment plans. That's 84 per cent of the businesses. And as is common with these policies, like supply-side economics or trickle-down economics, they always create deficits. The U.S., clearly, has seen the deficit go up 17 per cent, to $779 billion.

In fact, the evidence is that it didn't create jobs. AT&T promised somewhere around 7,000 jobs under this tax cut, but they actually reduced their job numbers by 23,000 people. That's exactly what we are seeing here in Alberta, too. Just on June 6 the China National Offshore Oil Corporation, CNOOC, announced that they will be laying off a hundred staff from their operations. I think if a tax cut was to work, if the carbon tax was an issue, they have clear indication of both, that this government is willing to cut tax and that this government has gotten rid of the carbon tax. But that didn't stop them from laying off workers. That's a clear example. That's clear evidence that the path you're heading on is not working. It has not worked in the past, and it will not work this time around.

In recent federal tax breaks that were awarded by Prime Minister Stephen Harper – I think when you look at those breaks, those breaks also didn't have any significant impact on investment. That break, yes, gave some flexibility and more money to businesses, but that money was accumulated in accounts and didn't create jobs, didn't go to investing in new businesses. I think it was called dead money by Mark Carney, former governor, Bank of Canada. I think the evidence is there, even from our own Conservative experience.

The evidence is there that when the federal Conservative government cut it from 22 per cent to 15 per cent over four years, that didn't create jobs, and that left the federal government with revenue shortfalls and in fact deficit. What we are seeing in Alberta is that we have a tax advantage of $11.5 billion, and we are seeing deficits. How can we improve that? I don't think that's the recipe for that. This has failed everywhere, and there's still time for the government to reconsider this experiment.

Look at evidence from other jurisdictions. Like, look at evidence from Conservative governments across the world. Look at evidence from the Thatcher cuts in the '80s. Look at evidence from Ronald Reagan's cuts in the '80s, Prime Minister Brian Mulroney's cuts in the '80s. Like, all those cuts have not created the results that people were made to believe, that somehow they will create jobs and create investments. It just takes revenue away from that, and those revenue shortages then, I guess, result in cuts to education, cuts to services, cuts to health care. And here we are, I guess, heading down that path already with massive cuts.

We are seeing legislation coming in to attack workers' constitutionally protected rights under the contracts to negotiate and to have a pay raise after three years or so. Those were frozen. We are seeing the same pattern, that attacks are coming on trade unions. We are seeing deregulation. I think there was some news out there on driver examinations, that after a report was taken in-house, government is looking into deregulating that again, outsourcing those things.

I think what we need at this point is policy that is more common-sense and that is more tailored to Alberta's economy and what the Alberta economy is facing today. We are facing many issues. If I talk about just the energy sector, we have enough production. We have investment in oil sands, and we can produce. The issue we have is that we don't have takeaway capacity. When it comes to that, instead of helping industry with the steps we were taking, they are insisting that they will reverse those things, for instance oil by rail. That contract alone would have provided 125,000-barrel-a-day takeaway capacity for our energy sector, and 125,000 barrels a day means new jobs, new investment, and new revenues for the government. What we are seeing here is this four-plus billion dollar tax break. At the same time, what the economy really needs, that takeaway capacity, we are turning a blind eye to. I don't think that's what Alberta's economy needs.

I think every time we have heard from Albertans, we have heard from different political parties that we are aligned on one industry and one customer in terms of our energy industry. What we need here is investment and diversification of the economy. When we were facing these crises, we responded differently. We responded differently. We didn't make the situation worse, which this corporate tax break and the policies that government is pursuing will. We responded by helping the energy industry to create that takeaway capacity. We invested in schools. We invested in child care. We invested in green infrastructure. We invested in the green line in Calgary. The result was that in 2017 Alberta was leading the growth across Canada by 4.9 per cent.

Here, I think, in second reading the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board commented on it, that this cut will see job creation by '22-23 of 50,000 and some billions made up – I don't know, $12 or 13 billion – in investment in '23. But Albertans are hurting now. They are looking for jobs now. That was the platform: jobs, the economy, and pipelines. This government needs to focus on the things that matter to Albertans. They need to pursue policies that create jobs. There is no evidence that tax breaks automatically create some kind of jobs. What we are seeing in our industry is that investment is not coming in because we don't have takeaway capacity. Government policies, government efforts need to be focused on creating that capacity so that we can get our economy going, we can attract investment, and we can create new jobs. This bill, coupled with their other policies like the Municipal Government Act, will also somehow attract investment, although there is nothing in that piece of legislation, and then there is red tape reduction that will create investment: all those things may be good photo opportunities, but they are not the policies, economic policies, the kinds of initiatives that Albertans elected this government to pursue. They will not create jobs.

Instead, this cut will create a revenue hole in our budget, and Albertans: those in school will suffer; those who require health care will suffer; those Albertans who rely on critical government supports like income support, AISH, PDD will suffer. That's an irresponsible thing. I think government should not pursue this giveaway, so I will urge all colleagues in this House to reject this policy and to reject this break for the benefit of all Albertans.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. I see the hon. Member for Taber-Warner rising.

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, I rise just to address some of the things that we've heard on a regular basis from the members opposite, stating that there is no evidence that this can create jobs. The absolute truth to this issue is that a majority of the members opposite are the evidence. The members opposite, a majority of them, have moved to this province because we did something different here than they did in other jurisdictions. We made sure that we had some of the lowest marginal tax rates in Canada and sometimes in North America. We made sure that we had a sustainable government. We made sure that we had a lower regulatory burden.

During that time, Mr. Speaker, what we saw was over a hundred thousand people move into this province each month. In fact, many of the people on that side moved here for that very reason. They moved here because we had this thing called the Alberta advantage. That was the winning formula that allowed us to be able to get to some of the best jobs in North America, some of the highest paying jobs in North America. Yet the members opposite continue to say that there is no evidence. They are living evidence that it worked because they moved from other parts of the country or other parts of the world. People from all over the world moved to this province because we did something different here, because we had the – now, the interesting thing about the members opposite is that they can continue to say how bad it was over the last 44 years, yet they continue to quote Ralph Klein. The hypocrisy of this. They will argue out of one side of their mouth that . . . [interjections] We had a great opportunity to be able to listen to them. It'd be fantastic if they could listen now as well.

The arguments that they are making . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

Mr. Hunter: . . . about there being no evidence: the truth is that we had 100,000 people move to this province during a 10-year period. We had over 150 corporate head offices move to this province because of this concept of having a lower marginal tax rate. We had some of the best growth in terms of GDP growth. We competed against juggernaut states like Texas in terms of GDP growth. Now, they could say that it's all about the oil, the price of oil, but we did that when the price of oil was $20 a barrel.

There's a very good book Mark Milke wrote, and I think that it would be great if the members would read that because their revisionist history lessons that they try to say don't fly with Albertans. In fact, it's interesting. I had an interesting conversation with one of their colleagues, that actually didn't get elected again in Calgary because he followed the NDP strategy to the T. I was asking him: where have your socialist strategies worked? I kid you not, Mr. Speaker. He quoted Star Trek, Gene Roddenberry's Star Trek. Now, what's interesting about this is that I think, as I listen to the arguments of these members, that they are still living in this fantasy world. There are economic principles that work and that have worked in the past, and we're getting back to that formula that has worked. It's important for the members opposite to be able to leave that fantasy realm and come back down to Earth and realize that there are economic principles that have worked in the past, and they'll work again if we implement them properly.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-McCall, if you'd like to respond.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think the comments that the member made were somewhat confusing, offensive as well. If you are not indigenous, you moved from somewhere, from some part of the world. The only difference is when you got here, whether by boat, whether by ship, all those things.

The evidence I was suggesting there was academic evidence based on economics, based on experiences in the States, in the United Kingdom, in Canada. The right-wing governments that followed the supply-side, trickle-down economics that this government is now following – that policy has failed across the globe. That policy is rejected by all economists across the globe.

Thank you.

3:40

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise to the third reading of Bill 3, which drastically reduces Alberta's corporate tax revenues from large and already wealthy corporations. The reasons why I am pleased to rise and provide my comments at third reading are, well, a couple of different things.

I think the first thing I want to talk about is what this bill says about the priorities of this government and what it sets up for the future framing of how this government is going to interact with Albertans, particularly either Albertans with whom they disagree, Albertans who are of lower income, Albertans who potentially work in the public sector, and Albertans who are working on an hourly basis just to get by. Let's talk about the priorities that this bill revealed and the values that are so different from Conservatives and the folks on this side, who were elected to bring a certain perspective to this House.

We elect governments in a parliamentary democracy, not dictatorships, so while, yes, in a two-party system one party wins more votes – that is how elections work – the fact of the matter is that the opposition has a duty to speak to why their constituents sent them there and what kinds of values sent us here. Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to do so because they are starkly contrasted within the contents of this bill and what it says about a government that has started its record of governing this province with essentially three themes.

That is, they tend to make decisions with horse blinders on with respect to evidence. We see this in climate change. We see it with respect to the international evidence around large tax giveaways to the already wealthy. This is not about small business, Mr. Speaker. We see that it is a government that makes promises based on political games. It is a government that, when they do that, is then left with the consequences. When you blow a very large, multibillion-dollar hole in the budget, one cannot then meet the needs of health care, education, roads, hospitals, bridges, child intervention, child protection, seniors' care, child care, and the like. It then reveals this priority of giving away four and a half billion dollars to the already wealthiest among us. It shows that that is the priority, that that wealthy class of shareholders is the priority over working-class people.

Furthermore, it shows that they are willing, Mr. Speaker, to give away that security of health care, education, other services, and other supports to the least privileged among us because there is a streak of uncaring, lack of empathy that runs through certainly the record of . . .

Mr. McIver: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: A point of order has been called. The hon. Minister of Transportation.

Point of Order Imputing Motives

Mr. McIver: Mr. Speaker, under 23(h), (i), and (j) it talks about attributing motives to other members of the House. The hon. member just said that other members of the House were uncaring and lacked empathy. The only thing missing in 23(h), (i), and (j) is an example like accusing other people of being uncaring and having a lack of empathy. I would be happy to listen to the hon. member's debate on policy. She ought to stick within the rules that we actually as a Legislature have all put in place for ourselves through the standing orders.

The Speaker: The hon. Opposition House Leader.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. First of all, this is not a point of order. Second of all, I appreciate the fact that the Member for Lethbridge-West gets under the skin of the Member for Calgary-Hays. Saying that some members may be uncaring about certain issues is not unparliamentary. Quite frankly, I mean, my Lord, had we when we were in government jumped up on points of order every time the opposition talked about – again, as we talked about earlier today, using the word “killing”: killing communities, killing this, killing that.

You know, referencing that, in her opinion, this move or decision by the government to reduce the corporate tax rate is a decision in their priorities, meaning that other things, then, will be either not funded or adjusted, is a difference of opinion that the Member for Lethbridge-West feels demonstrates that that, then, is an action that shows the government doesn't care about X or Y, Mr. Speaker. This is not a point of order.

However, while I am standing talking to this point of order, I should have jumped up on a point of order to an earlier comment that was made.

Mr. McIver: Mr. Speaker . . .

The Speaker: Thank you to the hon. Minister of Transportation. However, I am the one that determines how points of order work around here.

Mr. Bilous: As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, the fact that there were comments questioning members about how Albertan they are, depending on how long they are in this province . . .

The Speaker: Thank you to the hon. member. As you'll know, a point of order needs to be called at the time of the challenge.

Having said that, the question before us is on whether or not the Member for Lethbridge-West used unparliamentary language when referring to hon. members. I think that the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview will recall that there's a significant difference between saying that the government is doing something and that there are members that are something. Unfortunately, I don't have the benefit of the Blues, but to my recollection the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West said that the members are uncaring. It does present a challenge when you attribute, although you didn't say, “The Member for Camrose,” a motive to members. Feel free to imply or state your strongly held opinion – and I encourage you to do so – that the government may or may not be responsible for something, but I would encourage some significant caution with respect to attributing it to members as being one thing or another.

Without the benefit of the Blues, I would consider this not to be a point of order because I'm not a hundred per cent sure of what was said, but if you feel it appropriate to apologize and withdraw and attribute those strongly felt opinions to the government, I would encourage you to do so.

Debate Continued

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. To my recollection, I indeed did say: the members of the government. However, I can appreciate that my third point, which is about the priorities of this government – given that what is going to happen here is a massive giveaway to the already wealthy, to folks who least need help after we are pulling ourselves out of a recession caused by the drop in the price of oil, we demonstrate that when we give away billions of dollars with pretty scant evidence that it will lead to policies that will demonstrate the priority of this government, it is my values that when you put the already wealthy before those that need a little bit more in society, that is, in fact, a fairly disconnected, entitled, and uncaring approach to public policy that this government has taken.

Now, I can appreciate that there are some members opposite who do not like being called out on entitlement or being out of touch or not understanding the priorities of Albertans given that some of those members, in fact, have a great deal of experience with policies that led to those kinds of conclusions being drawn by Albertans. It's very important that Alberta politicians keep ordinary people first and foremost in their minds so that when they're making public policy decisions like when we saw them, for example, signing off on the sky palace, those kinds of decisions, Albertans will conclude that the government does not have its priorities straight.

What we have here is a massive giveaway that has been sold as a job-creating initiative. We have demonstrated on this side of the House, using evidence from a former governor of the Bank of Canada, from other economists, and from others and certainly evidence from south of the border – I can appreciate that the members opposite don't like hearing about that given that the record in terms of the highest level of public policy initiatives hasn't exactly emanated from the White House, south of the border. But, certainly, members opposite have a high tolerance for those kinds of shenanigans, as I understand it.

Certainly, what we see here is that we have priorities, which are that the already wealthy get billions, that nurses will get a pay cut, that toonies will be taken from teenagers, that thousands of dollars will be taken out of the pockets of, in particular, oil and gas workers – private-sector, non-union oil and gas workers who are working overtime – and that LGBT kids will not enjoy the same human rights as they did under a previous piece of legislation. Otherwise, there wouldn't be the changes made. Those are the priorities that we are revealing with the government's first moves.

Bill 3 sets up the fiscal framework for those themes of this government, which are that they make decisions based on politics, based on putting things in the window, based on making unsubstantiated claims, based on a fact-free analysis, based on a lack of information and evidence. They make policies that lead to a society that is more unequal, a society where we care less about what happens to our neighbours, where we are less able to meet the needs of an increasingly unequal society. They make decisions, Mr. Speaker, that reveal that they are out of touch with ordinary Albertans, ordinary working people, because they put wealthy people first, and the working class among us get their toonies taken away and their overtime scooped. That is what we see coming out of Bill 3.

I can appreciate that some members don't want to hear that and that some members in this House want to go back to the one-party state. I can appreciate that some of these comments fall on ears that are used to those 44 years where nobody ever stood up and the opposition was significantly weaker. You know what, Mr. Speaker? I'm here to tell those hon. members who don't want to hear those kinds of comments about a massive giveaway to the already wealthy at the expense of ordinary working class folks that, you know, those days of the one-party state are over. I hope folks enjoyed it while it lasted. I hope the sky palace was fun and the airplane rides and all the rest of it. I hope everyone had a good time because this opposition will speak out.

We will not be silenced. I won't be silenced. Nobody sent me here to sit on my hands or to not say what I mean. Nobody sent me here to not come to work or to whine about doing my job. I've heard all of those things from the folks across the way because they just can't understand that their role here is actually part of a vigorous democracy and a vigorous legislative process, which means that sometimes you've got to go to work and sometimes you've got to work overtime, Mr. Speaker. There's no crying in this business and no whining and complaining either. Take your snivelling elsewhere.

Now, going back to some of the issues around Bill 3, what we've seen around budget projections is that, of course, budget projections have softened for this year, and that is obvious when one takes a good, solid run at one's revenue. If you quit your job, you're going to have less money coming in. Certainly, what's happened here is that a number of economic indicators have, in fact, softened, both the economic performance forecasts coming out of private-sector forecasters and, it is no surprise to anyone, the revenue forecast. This isn't anything that is any different from the situation that we faced, Mr. Speaker, in 2015 or indeed the Prentice government, prior to us. They saw increasingly worsening economic conditions brought on by the global collapse in the price of oil – that's why the election came early – but it's also why they brought in a budget early, because they knew the forecasts were just going to get worse.

Of course, your budget projections are going to be worse, one, because the global price of WTI has softened over the last three, four months and, two, because the differential remains, outside of the curtailment policies, a significant risk to Alberta's balance sheet, and the price of WCS right now is dependent on those curtailment policies. The whole idea was to phase out curtailment and phase in some crude by rail as a bridging mechanism before TMX and line 3, Mr. Speaker, but folks across the way are choosing not to go with that particular piece of evidence-based decision-making either.

But the biggest thing is that projections do change, Mr. Speaker, over time. That's because the private-sector forecasters and the professional civil service provide different advice to government over time, particularly in such a volatile budget situation as we find ourselves in here in Alberta. Much of that is structural right now, and we understand that. But to blame that, the fact that forecasts change, on the professional civil service when it's very obvious that we've got both global economic conditions and the fact that a massive hole has been blown in the budget: that is really beyond the pale. A lot of the rationale for Bill 3 is around getting Alberta's economy back on track. In that respect I couldn't agree more with the hon. Minister of Finance, and I suspect that over a beer we would probably have more agreements than disagreements although I don't share his views on magic.

The fact remains that this is one way to allege to stimulate an economy. We have made the case on this side, using facts and evidence, that it is very unlikely to actually work. In fact, what it will do is concentrate wealth in fewer and fewer hands and make Alberta an even more unequal society. Now, over the last four years we took great pains to reduce that inequality, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, after 44 years of governing with the wealthy in mind, with folks just focusing on their own entitlement, building sky palaces and various other monuments to their own greatness or of the PC Party dynasty, we saw lots of that. Some folks certainly paid an electoral price for that; some didn't. Over the course of those 44 years Alberta became one of the most unequal provinces in Canada.

Through that balance of ensuring that we had appropriate revenues coming in from the small-business tax, which we, I believe, appropriately cut by a third; through various other tax incentives that the hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview introduced, targeted tax incentive programs; through the petroleum diversification program, which, we know, has created thousands of jobs and ushered in $13 billion worth of private-sector investment, in particular into the Fort Saskatchewan Industrial Heartland area; through diversifying the economy and ushering in, at a minimum, $2 billion in new renewables investments, much of which is into rural ridings that surround Lethbridge and Medicine Hat: Mr. Speaker, all of that is new investment.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Through those policies that targeted the private sector and through a variety of public-sector, again, targeted investments – I'm speaking here of the child benefit and associated child care policies, which lifted hundreds of thousands of children out of poverty and, in fact, reduced Alberta's child poverty rate.

The Deputy Speaker: Comments or questions under Standing Order 29(2)(a)? The hon. Minister of Transportation.

4:00

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm grateful for this opportunity to respond to the fact-free information that I think we just listened to.

An Hon. Member: Careful.

Mr. McIver: A word to live by for all of us, sir: careful.

Madam Speaker, I'm actually amazed at what passes for thoughtful discourse here. What we need to do when we think about these things is try to connect the dots on cause and effect, I think. The hon. opposition party loves to talk about the wealthy corporations. To be clear, some corporations are wealthy, and some are not. That's a fact, but the dots that they fail to connect is that their disdain for corporate Alberta, their disdain for corporations that support charities and arts and so many other things that make Alberta great, was partially responsible for 80 billion plus dollars' worth of those corporations leaving Alberta in the last four years.

Now, I suppose the opposition probably doesn't care about that. I don't know. But the place where I'd prefer they connected the dots is that when they left, a lot of jobs, tens of thousands of jobs, left with them, leading to the abysmal track record that the government that the previous speaker was close to the centre of left Albertans with, the highest unemployment rate in decades, for sure, perhaps forever. It has left us with the highest unemployment rate of young people forever.

That's why their disdain for corporate Alberta – one thing that is consistent, I suppose, is why they wouldn't like the job-creation tax cut, because that is actually designed to undo some of the very, exact damage that the opposition did when they were in government, the very, exact damage that had Albertans saying: "We just want them gone. Make them stop. Make it go away. We'll vote for you if you'll win because we have to stop the damage that this NDP government is doing." That's what we heard consistently from Albertans. It's so bad that, you know, family members, friends are losing their jobs, and that's where it actually affects working people, Madam Speaker.

On this side we certainly appreciate that. I myself worked as a meat cutter, a butcher, if you will, for a number of years. We have a police officer on this side, I think a number of farmers, an EMS person, lots of people that have done lots of work, and lots of people that have family members, friends, and other people that we love and care about who are working people. You know what? Those working people that I met when I was door-knocking and still when I walk around today: they say, "Thank goodness you're here, and thank goodness the NDP are gone because they were making it impossible to make a living so that I could look after myself and my family and pay my taxes and be as productive a citizen as I want to be."

Those are the dots that the opposition fails to connect, Madam Speaker. They talk about taking toonies from teenagers, which is a wonderful catchphrase. They're actually good at catchphrases. I'm going to give them credit for that. They're good at catchphrases. But what they fail to again connect the dots on is that while everyone in this room and probably everyone in Alberta would rather make $15 than $13, the dot that they fail to connect is that everybody would also rather make $13 than zero dollars. There are thousands and thousands and thousands of Albertans making zero dollars instead of $13 an hour, and that's what our party, our government is trying to correct, not so that people can live on $13 but, rather, so they can have a job so that they can get on the first rung of the economic ladder so that they can then move to the second rung and the third and the fourth and work their way up to a good, mortgage-paying job to support themselves and their families and increase their quality of life if that's what they choose to do.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Red Deer-South.

Mr. Stephan: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's my privilege yet again to stand and speak in favour of Bill 3, the Job Creation Tax Cut (Alberta Corporate Tax Amendment) Act, to restore Alberta's place as the most attractive place to start and grow a business in Canada. As indicated, I am a tax lawyer and a chartered professional accountant, and I work with private businesses, their owners, and professional advisers. These job creators know how to compete and succeed in the real world much better than government. I admire and respect these individuals, and I care deeply about their ability to create and support other Albertans to succeed, to be self-reliant and provide for their families without government intrusion into freedom. For many years it has been an honour and a privilege to speak on taxation matters to various professional groups and promote Alberta as the most competitive place to start and grow a business. Alberta was the land of opportunity.

Let's consider the facts. The former government increased corporate tax rates by 20 per cent and brought in other additional uncompetitive changes to hamstringing Alberta businesses. The result was that corporate revenue actually fell, and their multibillion-dollar deficits resulted. This is the truth. It would be a mistake to perpetuate the failure of the prior government. That would not be in the public interest. Our government is making a course correction to do the opposite of the NDP.

What has served Alberta very well in the past? Madam Speaker, Alberta is a meritocracy. That is how Alberta has competed and excelled in the real world. A socialist mindset is content with mediocrity. Most Albertans do not share their world view. Alberta does not have the lowest general corporate income tax rate in Canada. Ontario and Quebec, the largest provinces, have a lower general corporate income tax rate than Alberta. That was not the case prior to the NDP. Bill 3, the job-creation tax cut, is focused on the general corporate tax rate.

Madam Speaker, I do not understand why the NDP is against having the most competitive tax jurisdiction in Canada. Why is this embarrassing? Why are they against us being the very best that we can be? Why are they content with mediocrity? This corporate tax cut is all the more expedient given that we are not only competing in Canada, but especially in Alberta's circumstances, we compete for capital from a global perspective.

What we are doing, Madam Speaker, is not new. Having the lowest corporate tax rate has served Alberta very well historically. We have actually had billion-dollar surpluses with the lowest corporate tax rates, so we have evidence based on historical fact.

Madam Speaker, my impression of the former NDP government, with a constitution that states as its purpose to establish and maintain a democratic socialist government, is that it does not understand the private sector or how to compete in the real world. The NDP increased corporate tax rates by 20 per cent and shrank Alberta's private-sector workforce by tens of thousands during the four years they were in power. That is failure and an embarrassment.

4:10

This NDP government likes to think they are the champion of government services. The truth is that they are not. While the NDP wishes it wasn't true, government services only exist if there are taxes from private-sector businesses and those who work in them to pay for them. The NDP shrank the economy and, by so doing, crippled the sustainability of government services, necessitating billions upon billions of increased government deficits and debt. That is their record. How can a government be a champion of anything they have no idea how to pay for? Irresponsible, undisciplined, uncompetitive: NDP governments would by and by lead to the collapse of unsustainable government services. Doing it their way failed miserably.

I have sat and listened to the NDP criticize the job-creation tax cut as an attack on workers. We have reputable economists that have said the following. According to Jack Mintz the job-creation tax cut will lead to the creation of at least 55,000 full-time, private-sector jobs. Contrast that with the historical fact of failure by the NDP, losing tens of thousands of private-sector jobs, a very uncomfortable truth, Madam Speaker. Furthermore, University of Calgary political scientist Dr. Bev Dahlby estimates that this tax cut will generate a $12.7 billion increase in nominal GDP, a 6.5 per cent increase in per capita real GDP, and $1.2 billion in additional government revenues by 2023-24. Again, contrast that with the NDP record that when they actually increased corporate tax rates, corporate tax revenue dropped.

Madam Speaker, the NDP views business success as a zero-sum game. In their heart they view that if businesses do well, then workers do not. That is a fundamental flaw in thinking. They are not win-win in their thinking. The old NDP government had a philosophy that is in direct opposition to what is required for economic prosperity from a government that does not understand how to compete and excel in the real world, and the results speak for themselves.

It's time to renew and restore Alberta as the most competitive and attractive jurisdiction in Canada to start and grow a business. Enacting Bill 3, the job-creation tax cut, is an important step on that path. Again, here is the litmus test. In four years let's compare the NDP record of losing tens of thousands of private-sector jobs with the job-creation tax cut and the other important measures we are taking to support Alberta businesses, to support the important government services that all of us in this House value and rely on. I know what the answer to this question will be. My prediction is that the members opposite will be uncomfortable when they are confronted with our factual success and confronted with their factual failure.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Comments or questions under Standing Order 29(2)(a)? The hon. Minister of Transportation.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member that just spoke for bringing some reality and sense to this debate and for bringing his genuine expertise in what he does for a living. I'd like the hon. member, if he wants, to comment on what we heard as the disdain that the NDP has for what they call wealthy corporations and the politics of jealousy that actually holds people that are in corporations that are successful in disdain, how that affects the livelihoods and the quality of life for Albertans in the future and what the policy decisions are and how that affects the future. I think he'll have some wise words to say about that if he chooses to do so.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Red Deer-South.

Mr. Stephan: Well, Madam Speaker, I've had the opportunity to work with private businesses and their advisers. These individuals care deeply about the success of and ability to provide for their employees. Successful businesses actually work as a team. Valued employees: they strive to treat them as best and as generously as possible. The members opposite seem to have the perspective that business owners are actually in opposition to their workers when the fact is that successful businesses actually value and appreciate their employees.

The socialist ideals that kind of underpin the NDP, as per their very constitution, which they cannot escape, are in opposition to the economic prosperity that has served Alberta very well in the past. Their socialist mindset informs their world view that business owners are somehow inherently evil, and by so doing, trying to legislate and box them in has basically sent the message that Alberta is not welcoming of innovation and business growth. You know, unfortunately, because of that, a lot of businesses have either left – and I've certainly witnessed that in my own personal practice, seen businesses see that Alberta has become less competitive and, unfortunately, make decisions to invest elsewhere. It's unfortunate that the NDP doesn't appreciate the important intrinsic connection between the ability to pay for sustainable government services with a strong economy.

You know, Alberta has done very well in the past as we've supported businesses and helped them succeed. Those businesses return the favour in kind by paying a lot of taxes, by employing those individuals and families in Alberta to work in their businesses. It's also very interesting that when you are the most competitive jurisdiction, businesses will actually seek to centralize and move their income into the most attractive jurisdiction. That has served, again, Alberta in the past very well. The NDP seems to miss that connection with being competitive and with the normal, rational behaviour in the real world of seeking to have your business carried on and grown where it makes the most economic sense to do so, Madam Speaker. Throughout many of the policies that the NDP have brought forth, they seem to miss the connection that Alberta businesses and the workers who work in those businesses are friends, that they want to work together, that they want to succeed together.

The Alberta corporate tax cut does not benefit the wealthy. As corporations may distribute those profits out to individuals, those individuals will pay the personal tax rates on those distributions.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate you recognizing me and allowing me to stand up here in the third reading of Bill 3, the Job Creation Tax Cut (Alberta Corporate Tax Amendment) Act, which kind of sounds more like a giant gift card to billionaires act. As you can imagine, I was absolutely riveted by some of the speakers in the last few minutes talking about working people. I seem to, you know, remember some of the members from the last Legislature in this House right now belittling some of the different working people that were within our caucus at the time. So it's interesting that all of a sudden that's a really great thing. But I am glad to see some diversity there.

I want to get back to one of the comments, though, around the Member for Red Deer-South, talking about the real world. Let's talk about the real world for a second, Madam Speaker. I'd like to quote something: this huge tax cut will be rocket fuel for our economy; the biggest winners from this transformation will be everyday families from all backgrounds, from all walks of life, and our great companies, which will produce jobs; they are going to produce jobs like you have never seen before. That kind of sounds a little bit like what I've been hearing over the last little while around this job-creation tax cut. That was said on October 11, 2017, so it's pretty close to real world, I guess, depending on how you like to work your calendar there, and that was said by President Donald Trump.

Now, the problem we have here is when they reduce their corporate tax rate, Madam Speaker, from 35 to 21 per cent, all promising more jobs, and so far 84 per cent of businesses have not changed their investment plans. That was "not," by the way. They did not change their plans, and the deficit is up 17 per cent to $779 billion. As a matter of fact, a big company – you know, there might be only one or two people in this House that recognize the name – AT&T, promised to create 7,000 jobs. That sounds fantastic because we got a tax break, right up until they cut 23,000 jobs. That, sir, is real world.

Let's talk about some other real world. I'd hate to get some headlines like this: The Great Kansas Tax Cut Experiment Crashes and Burns. For five years Kansas's Republican Governor Sam Brownback conducted the nation's most radical exercise in trickle-down economics. Those measures were supposed to deliver a shot of adrenaline into the heart of the Kansas economy and ended up being a shot of poison.

So when we talk about the real world, I always say, you know, that when somebody says, “Look, if we just do this, there’s the light at the end of the tunnel,” sometimes I have to tell them that it’s actually a train coming.

When we talk about factual success, it sounds like you’re pretty confident in your position. So I’m kind of curious, Madam Speaker. A while back, when we had a chance to prove your factual success of a two-year review, you should have just jumped on that because that would have been the time to shut me up and make me eat humble pie.

More facts. You know that great Kansas experiment? Oh, my goodness. What they got was slower growth, a revenue drop that forced officials to shorten school calendars. Wow. That kind of makes me a little nervous, Madam Speaker.

I also noticed that you had touched a little bit on the deficit that was left. I’m interested, Madam Speaker, because I never seem to hear anybody talk about their leader’s debt when he was in Ottawa. It’s funny how that kind of gets left out of the sentence. So we had the chance to potentially course correct, like I said. You could have proven your factual success. You voted it down. I kind of wonder if you really are that confident in your position.

I do know that there are others that would like to speak on this bill. As you can imagine, I’m not very overly excited about giving companies like the Walton family a great, big corporate gift card all in the name of creating jobs, because when I’ve spoken with students – I have 26 schools in my riding, Madam Speaker; great to talk to students there – even they were able to figure out that if my boss only needs five people on shift, just because you pay me $13 an hour isn’t going to mean that he’s going to need six to do the job.

The Deputy Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. Any comments or questions?

Seeing none, any other speakers to the bill? The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Well, it’s not a surprise, actually, that I will not be supporting Bill 3 for a number of reasons, but, you know, the members opposite wanted to tell us some hard truths, so let me fire some back at them a little bit.

Every single oil-reliant province lost jobs when the price of oil fell: fact, right? We know this. Prices were falling before 2015, and they continued to fall, and then we entered into a recession, the worst in a generation: fact. The government would like us to believe that it’s all because the NDP formed government, but that was not the case, and we know that.

Let’s talk about the previous Conservative government. When oil was $100 a barrel, there were failures on all kinds of levels. One of the things that particularly bothers me quite a bit when these guys talk about paving roads and building schools and hospitals is that when oil was $100 a barrel, they continued to allow the infrastructure deficit to grow and to grow and to grow . . .

An Hon. Member: And didn’t balance the budget.

Ms Renaud: . . . and could not balance a budget.

You know, I think it sums it up. One of the Premier’s sock accounts on Twitter – I’m sure he’s got an army of them now with his war room – mentioned something about how there could not be compassion in Alberta without prosperity. I guess that kind of sums it up – doesn’t it? – what their world view is.

You want to talk about world view? Let’s talk about some world view. The government of today would like us to believe that there’s really only one way out of this. There’s really one way, as they see it, and that is to continue to do things that we know don’t work. We’ve seen them not work in other jurisdictions, and we have certainly seen them not work here. But there actually is another way, and we were on track with that other way.

I’m going to focus a little bit on that. Of course, the Premier, before he swooped in here, would like us to believe that he is the saviour. Only through him will we get to a prosperous place, and then when we get there, we can be compassionate. But, you know, like he says when we ask questions, Madam Speaker, I reject that completely. We were focusing on some other things. We were focusing on things that had been neglected for years, like infrastructure, like focusing on our assets and strengths in our communities, focusing on local ownership, and then focusing on something that this government fails to focus on but will be the one thing that will derail their plans, and that is climate change and the climate change crisis.

One of the things that we expended a lot of resources and energy on and, honestly, political capital was creating a plan that would get us to a place where we could continue to be a leader to address climate change, because it will impact our revenues. It will impact our jobs. We were creating a plan that was a well-thought-out energy transition, recognizing that we needed to continue to work to get the best price for our resource while we needed it. We can’t stop using fossil fuels. That is our resource, and we owe it to Albertans to get the best price for it. We were working on that, but we were doing it at the same time as addressing some other things because we can walk and chew gum at the same time. [interjection] I’m glad the members find that funny. It’s a bit of an old saying, but okay.

An Hon. Member: It’s super old.

Ms Renaud: Yeah, super old.

We continued to address infrastructure deficits. Let me give you an example of what that means. In my community of St. Albert, the community that I represent, we had a lot of infrastructure deficits. We had a lot of fields with signs on them and no schools. We also had a hospital that had a boiler that was 25 years old that needed to be replaced and, of course, had been deferred, deferred: “No, we can’t afford it,” “The price of oil,” yada, yada, the same stories. Finally, when we got to a place where we could make those decisions, we addressed that and we replaced that boiler, but we took it a step further because we were investing in people. We added an operating room. We added a NICU. We added capacity at that hospital that is not only serving the city of St. Albert but is serving that area, so that includes Morinville, Redwater, Legal, Gibbons. We were looking at the people that lived there that needed health care and access to health care in their community. We also invested in some other things because we realized that investment, diversifying your investment and investing in people, pays off.

It’s odd to me that the members opposite are willing to take a risk, a massive $4.5 billion risk, to give wealth to already very profitable corporations and then hope that it trickles down when, in fact, they have seen it again and again fail in other jurisdictions. What we did was invest in people. We invested in people, in minimum wage. That is an investment in people because we know that – I don’t know how many of you have had to work minimum wage while perhaps carrying a child, caring for a child, raising a child, going to school – when you have additional funds, when you’re earning a little bit more, you are investing it right back into your community, whether that’s child care, whether that’s the local grocery store, or buying clothing. Whatever it is, it goes back into your community. That’s not wishful thinking or wishful trickle-down; that’s actually fact.

We also invested in indexing AISH. We did that in a time where we were slowly recovering from the worst recession in a generation. We invested in indexing AISH, and what that meant for people with disabilities – I don't speak for them, but what I've heard is that it removed the need for them to continuously have to lobby government to say: "Hey, over here. We're living in grinding abject poverty. Not only do we face an astounding unemployment rate, but we can't possibly live on what we're earning." So we invested in tying it to inflation. We gave them a small bump. I wish we could have done more, Madam Speaker, but the reality was that things were tough. But we indexed it. That took courage. That took political courage, and that's an investment that will pay off.

We invested in diversification, not just using the word and the phrase, but we invested in a plan. It's an energy transition recognizing that the world is indeed changing. You can laugh. You can ignore it all you like.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. member, I suspect you're going to tie this back to the bill, right?

Ms Renaud: I will absolutely tie it back.

The Deputy Speaker: Thank you.

Ms Renaud: What I'm saying is that this is the other way. The government would like us to feel like this is the only way; they have the only answer. The only answer is to do something that has been done again and again and again and failed – and failed. But they want us to believe that this is the only way. We were on another path because we believed that there is another way. We had four years. After four decades of one government, it was a little tough to do everything in four years.

Madam Speaker, with that, I am going to end my comments, and I'm going to sit down and allow my colleague to say a few words. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. Any comments or questions?

Seeing none, any more speakers to the bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I'll make my comments fairly brief. I appreciate that we're in third reading. I just want to address a number of things. The issue that I have with this bill is that there is no guarantee that reducing the corporate tax rate will result in massive job creation. There isn't. Will there be some jobs created? I'm sure of it. I'm not about to stand up and say that not a single job will be created.

Ms Phillips: One job.

Mr. Bilous: No, I created one job. More than that, actually.

The truth, Madam Speaker, is that there isn't a guarantee. What I had talked about I think in second reading was what I would have liked and what we would have liked to have seen. If you're going to introduce a corporate tax reduction, tie it to or ensure that companies are using that to reinvest in their company, invest in machinery and equipment and job growth. The number of companies that will take that tax savings and pocket it and say, "Thank you very much. We need to make up for the recession and the tough years that we just lived through," I think, is going to be the majority of companies that are going to do that. Again, I have a small sample size, but the number of businesses that I've spoken with have said: "That's exactly what we're doing. We're not going to use it to expand and hire. We're going to take it as additional profits for the difficult few years that we had."

For me, the challenge is that with this tool, the government is trying to use it as a silver bullet. I appreciate they have other pieces of legislation. We know and we've spoken to the legislation on the MGA, which does nothing new. That gives municipalities the powers that they already have, so that's a smoke-and-mirrors bill.

Really, we have introduced tools over the last few years like the different tax credit programs that were asked for by the business community, by the chambers of commerce that said: "Help us compete. Help us encourage Albertans to invest in the province to keep our dollars here, to help our companies grow in scale." We've seen successes that way, Madam Speaker. Our government focused heavily on trade and attracting investment into the province. You know, we've seen companies relocate to Alberta, and that's even with the 12 per cent corporate tax rate of companies that have come. Again, I think this is where my frustration is. This UCP government thinks that the only tool to attract companies is reducing the corporate tax rate. The reality is this. Even with the 12 per cent corporate tax rate and the carbon tax Albertans still paid billions of dollars less than any other jurisdiction across Canada. When members stand up and talk about how uncompetitive Alberta is because we're 12 per cent, Ontario and Quebec are 11 and a half per cent, but they have massive PSTs. We have none. That is significant.

The other thing is, you know, that when we look at the billions of dollars being invested northeast of Edmonton in our petrochemical sector, so adding value to our resources, they weren't here when we had a 10 per cent corporate flat tax. Alberta had that for decades. Why is it that Inter Pipeline is building the first propane-to-plastics facility in Canada? If the corporate tax rate being at 10 per cent flat is all it took, they would have been here decades ago, but they're not. You know why, Madam Speaker? I've spoken to this company numerous times. They said that that simply does not level the playing field because in jurisdictions like the Gulf coast in Louisiana they receive significant incentives and subsidies to set up shop there.

Our government introduced a program that levelled the playing field, that saw that kind of investment. We're seeing investment in Grande Prairie through Nauticol. We're seeing investment through Seven Gen. We're seeing investments all over the province. Cavendish in Lethbridge: the largest investment that they're making or that they've made in Canada is in southern Alberta, and they did it with the corporate tax rate being 12 per cent, Madam Speaker. For me, it's not a matter of saying that this isn't going to work. It's a matter of saying that there is no guarantee. What the government is doing is blowing a 4 and a half billion dollar hole in the budget that will come at the cost of presumably – and the government has already hinted at this – teachers, nurses. We now are anticipating a piece of legislation that's going to legislate contracts for public-sector workers, which is unbelievable, quite frankly.

The one thing that I also wanted to mention. You know, the member – forgive me; I don't remember where he's from – who got up and spoke about that we'll compare the numbers under their term versus our numbers: well, first of all, you're comparing apples and oranges. In the last four years Alberta has been in the middle of a massive recession because of the global collapse in the price of oil, something that this government still thinks – now, I appreciate how powerful the former Premier is, but she's not that powerful that she sets the global price of oil. I know the members opposite would paint our government that way. Interestingly, she does not. Alberta does not.

You know, talking about the job numbers, yes, we recognize Alberta has been through a very, very tough recession, where many Albertans have lost their job because Alberta's economy, first of all, was not adequately diversified. We were overreliant on a single commodity, selling to a single buyer for a single price, which we didn't sell.

This is part of the reason our government focused on pipelines, on diversifying the economy, on market access, on attracting investment back here into the province, on supporting Alberta businesses with accessing new markets through programs like the Alberta export expansion program. Programs that we have seen have supported businesses to grow despite the fact that we were in the middle of a massive recession. I will continue to ask this government if they will continue to fund these programs that are seeing job creation and helping the economy to recover.

The other thing I just want to comment briefly and quickly on is that, you know, the one member stood up and tried to characterize the NDP position on business, which couldn't be further from the truth. We support Alberta businesses. We support the job creators in this province. That's why we reduced the small-business tax rate to 2 per cent. It's the second lowest in the country. That was done under the NDP government. News flash for members across the way: the only province that has a zero per cent small-business tax rate is Manitoba. Was that under a Conservative government? No. It was a New Democrat government that took that small-business tax rate to zero.

We have worked with the private sector, and I'm proud of the relationships and work that I've done with the private sector to introduce programs like these tax credits that they asked for to help them grow and diversify. So I take offence when members opposite get up – first of all, that doesn't do anyone a service. I mean, the arrogance that has come out of some of the mouths of the members in this place is quite, I think, offensive to Albertans. That doesn't reflect how Albertans feel. What I can tell you is that we know that there is more work to do, that the economy has been tough, that businesses have been struggling. The former Premier and our government admitted that over and over again, that there's more work that needs to be done.

With this bill I appreciate the spirit of it and where the Minister of Finance wants to go. I'm not convinced it's going to deliver the results that this government is betting on. Again, the cost is a 4 and a half billion dollar hole. That has to come from somewhere. Even the minister has said that in the first two years there won't be the recovery of what we are giving up, so something has got to give. I'd appreciate if the minister would talk about what services or programs are on the chopping block in order to fund this 4 and a half billion dollar corporate tax break and how the government will keep their campaign promise of a balanced budget by 2022. I think now we're going into the realm of unicorns and rainbows.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. Any comments or questions?

Seeing none, the hon. minister to close debate.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Thank you for the opportunity to close debate. I rise feeling very privileged to close debate on Bill 3, the Job Creation Tax Cut (Alberta Corporate Tax Amendment) Act. During the election campaign we made a commitment to Albertans to bring in a series of policies, a series of legislated commitments to improve the business environment in this province and to create jobs and opportunities for Albertans, and Bill 3, the job-creation tax cut, is a major piece in that commitment to Albertans.

I've made many comments around Bill 3, so I will keep this short. I do want to note, though, that I've heard concerns from members opposite that this job-creation tax cut will simply result in profitability for shareholders and that money will be gone. Well, I want to suggest this, Madam Speaker. Profits don't sit idle. Profits land somewhere, and they will be reinvested. Profits will be reinvested at some point. We're looking to create a business environment that will attract that investment, where profits will be reinvested in this province. I think we have a long history of, in fact, profits being reinvested by successful businesses in Alberta, and our goal is that we will create that type of business environment through a series of measures, with the job-creation tax cut being one of those.

I think the other point that I would like to just again make on closing is that this very broad-based tax cut will encourage diversity. It will encourage every sector in this province. It will encourage, certainly, the energy sector. It will encourage agriculture, it will encourage the tech industry, and it will encourage those sectors that we haven't even thought about in this House. We know that forward-thinking Albertans will bring forward creative ideas. They'll bring forward opportunities that all Albertans can benefit from as they invest in this province.

Again, this corporate tax reduction is a key piece of a multifaceted approach to improve the competitiveness of the Alberta economy. We're confident that this will attract investment. We're confident that this will create jobs and opportunities for all Albertans, Madam Speaker.

[Motion carried; Bill 3 read a third time]

Committee of Supply

[Mrs. Pitt in the chair]

The Chair: I'd like to call Committee of Supply to order.

Supplementary Supply Estimates 2018-19 General Revenue Fund

The Chair: Hon. members, before we commence this afternoon's consideration of supplementary supply, I would like to remind members where the committee left off in rotation. There are four hours and 30 minutes remaining for consideration of supplementary supply pursuant to Government Motion 13, agreed to yesterday. We will begin with the members of the Official Opposition. The rotation in Standing Order 59.01(6), which was outlined this morning, is deemed to apply for the time remaining to the extent possible. The rotation outlined in clauses (b) to (e) shall apply, with the speaking times set at five minutes at one time, as provided in Standing Order 59.02(1)(c). The rotation will then repeat for any time remaining.

Speaking times are now limited to five minutes. However, provided that the chair has been notified, a minister and a private member may combine their speaking times, with both taking and yielding the floor during the combined 10-minute period.

Finally, at the conclusion of six hours of consideration, including the one hour and 30 minutes taken this morning, or earlier if no members are wishing to speak, the Committee of Supply shall vote on the supplementary supply estimates. Understood?

The Official Opposition. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. Just to clarify, I'll have five minutes for my first question, or are we blocked total time 10 minutes, and then it can rotate through the opposition?

The Chair: Total time 10 minutes combined for all speakers from here on out if you go back and forth, but five minutes max in that time period for any one speaker.

Mr. Bilous: I prefer to go back and forth with the government.

The Chair: Okay. Do you agree?
Okay. Please proceed.

Mr. Bilous: Excellent. My first questions are under Culture and Tourism, page 34, for the government. There is $7.8 million for capital grants for the federally funded investing in Canada infrastructure program. I was hoping that the government can give some detail as to the specific programs that this funding will go towards.

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Madam Chair. The government of Canada has approved two investments in Canada infrastructure projects for Culture and Tourism. These projects, though funded by the federal government, are the YWCA Calgary hub facility project for $6 million and the Jerry Forbes centre for community spirit renovation project for $1.8 million.

4:50

The Chair: Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you. Thanks, Minister, for that answer. I'm curious to know the funding percentage. Is it 50-50? How much is Alberta putting in compared to what we're getting from the feds?

Mr. Toews: Madam Chair, we will have to get back to the hon. member on that question.

Mr. Bilous: Okay. Thank you, Minister. I appreciate that. If it's possible to get that in written correspondence, that'd be greatly appreciated.

I'm going to jump to the ministry of economic development and trade. That's page 38. It's a sup of about $500,000 to enhance funding for industry associations. I know that the Small Brewers – or at least my understanding is that the Small Brewers were one of the associations getting a grant. I'm wondering if the minister has the other associations readily available of who will get the increase in funding.

The Chair: The Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Madam Chair. The industry associations include the Alberta Estate Winery and Meadery Association, the Alberta Small Brewers Association, and the Alberta Craft Distillers Association.

The Chair: Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Yes. Thank you very much, Minister. That's what I had thought, but I appreciate the clarification.

I'd like to jump now to Energy. That's page 46. I appreciate the minister jumping around with me on these. These are questions related to crude by rail. I can see here that there's a sup amount of $6.7 million together with the $300,000 that was made available from other budgets that came in lower, so $7 million for costs associated with the crude-by-rail initiative. Now, I'm curious if the minister can give details as to where the $7 million will go. What is the breakdown of cars? I see an additional amount. I believe it's an additional amount of $310 million for payment to secure the needed rail cars. If I can get a bit of a breakdown on how this applies to the crude by rail, that'd be greatly appreciated.

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Madam Chair. The $310 million was for payments needed to secure rail cars from CN and CP. Of course, that is an expenditure that this House will need to approve today, but I do want to note that this is an expenditure, again, that we really believe was an irresponsible decision by the opposition just prior to the election, when they were in government. The $7 million was for estimated or set-up costs, and I believe that related to infrastructure related to the load-out terminal. If it is anything different than that, we will advise the member opposite.

I would also like to respond to a couple of questions that we committed to responding to this morning, the questions around some education capital planning, if I may, Madam Chair. There was $500,000 for capital grants, and they were to support school boards in preparing their capital plan submissions. There was a question as to where these funds went. They went to Northland school division, $116,000; Pembina Hills regional division, $12,100; Northern Lights, $78,500; Lakeland Roman Catholic, $155,500; Foothills school division, $16,000; and $123,000 was used for value scoping sessions led by the department.

Value scoping is a structured problem-solving process. Value scoping aims to identify solutions that provide the highest value for money while maximizing the utilization and functionality of school infrastructure to optimize the learning environment and educational program delivery for Alberta students, just in case you didn't know what value scoping was.

There was $6,667,000 for capital payments to related parties for operations and maintenance for school facilities and for school playgrounds. I know there was a question on the details of that spend. One million dollars of this was provided to three school boards for four new playgrounds: Edmonton Catholic, Father Michael Mireau Catholic school, $250,000; Edmonton Catholic, Christ the King Catholic school, $250,000; Red Deer public, Don Campbell elementary school, $250,000; Calgary Roman Catholic, St. Marguerite school, $250,000.

And $1.3 million of this was provided to the Alberta schools alternative procurement contractors responsible for providing operations and maintenance services to the 38 schools over the life of the contract. These were ASAP schools, Alberta schools alternative procurement. The amount relates to indexing of the original payment stream to the contractor, and this indexing recalculation is a provision within the contract that the contractor exercised.

The list of 40 school projects covered under the three ASAP school project bundles are as follows, and bear with me as I read these out. These are: Bridlewood; Cranston, Evergreen; Royal Oak; Saddle Ridge, West Springs; Cranston, Christ the King; Evergreen, Our Lady of the Evergreens; Saddle Ridge, Light of Christ; Rutherford East, Monsignor Fee Otterson; Terwillegar Heights Monsignor William Irwin; The Hamptons, Sister Annata Brockman; Belle Rive, Florence Hallock; Carlton, Elizabeth Finch; Hollick-Kenyon, Dr. Donald Massey; Rutherford West, Johnny Bright; Tamarack, A. Blair McPherson; Terwillegar Towne, Esther Starkman.

Schools that were also included were: Sarah Thompson school, Ted Harrison school, Captain Nichola Goddard school, the Twelve Mile Coulee school, Nose Creek school, Westmount school, St.

Isabella Catholic school, Major General Griesbach school, Bessie Nichols school, Michael Strembitsky school.

An Hon. Member: It's a lot of schools.

Mr. Toews: A lot of schools.

There was also the Beaumont school; Penhold; Uplands elementary school; Red Deer, École La Prairie; Cochrane, École Notre-Dame; Medicine Hat, Dr. Roy Wilson.

The Chair: Hon. members, it is now time for private government members to ask some questions. Same rules: 10-minute block; you may take no more than five minutes per person. Are there any government members wishing to speak?

Seeing none, we will go to the Official Opposition. Hon. Member for Lethbridge-West, would you like to combine your time?

Ms Phillips: Yes, I would like to share my time if I could.

The Chair: Okay.

Ms Phillips: I'd like to go back and forth with the hon. minister.

Thank you for this opportunity. I have a series of questions that are mostly in the yes or no, sort of confirm kind of column of seeking information from the government estimates. I'm wondering if, first, on page 8, the minister can just provide a little bit of information on which projects are contained in the $3.3 million in transfers from expense of E and P for emergent climate projects to I believe the Department of Indigenous Relations. If the minister could provide some detail on which projects Indigenous Relations will be funding through that $3.3 million transfer.

5:00

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Madam Chair. We will have to get back to the member opposite with the answer.

Ms Phillips: Yeah. That is fine and perfectly reasonable. If the minister would like to – if a follow-up is undertaken, that would be great.

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

I have a further question on – we're going to move around a little bit. Sorry, Minister, but we're going to go over to culture and tourism now, on page 34. Can the minister just confirm with me two things: one, is the $2 million for the antiracism community grant program part of the commitment around security for mosques, and if yes, when can the officials undertake to communicate some of the details around disbursement and how the geographic disbursement will be determined?

The Deputy Chair: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I just want to again point out that these were funds that were already spent in the previous year that this House has been asked to approve in order to conduct the business of the province.

Ms Phillips: Yeah. The province.

Mr. Toews: Okay. Sure. Very good. I will say that antiracism is a high priority for this government, and I know that there will be very comprehensive details coming from all the ministries on all of our priorities as we present a budget this fall.

The Deputy Chair: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Yes. Thank you. Thank you for that answer, Minister.

I want to now bump over to page 46 in the Energy supp, $1.2 million and change for payments to mineral land right owners as a result of the conservation of land areas. I suspect that this is the biodiversity stewardship area that was part of the four-party agreement between Teck, the government of Alberta, the government of Canada, and the Mikisew Cree. I was just wondering if officials can either undertake later or confirm now that that's what this supplementary supply is going towards.

The Deputy Chair: The hon. Government House Leader is standing.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Chair, we think so. We will confirm with the department as well and table something to that effect and provide it to the hon. member.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Minister.

On page 50 now, moving over to the Indigenous Relations sup estimates, we have enumerated here – and forgive me; I don't think this question has been already asked – $6.6 million for consultation and land claims in addition to the $18.5 million for the Lubicon land claim settlement. Thank you, first of all, for ensuring that those funds are there. That is an important land claim, the Lubicon one, and one I think that we can agree on all sides of the House needs to be funded. Around the additional $6.6 million, I'm wondering if there is any detail there on the specific consultation and land claims. Is this, in fact, the regularization of the Big Horn reserve or the highway 1A regularization that is contained within this? Those were close, and I'm wondering if the minister can confirm with me what is contained in that $6.6 million.

The Deputy Chair: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I would remind the member opposite that, in fact, this was their spending. I will say this. We are happy to get back to the member opposite with this level of detail. Our officials just don't have it with them at this point in time.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Minister. I'd now like to turn our attention to page 74, the Treasury Board and Finance supplementary supply estimates requested in the amount of $25 million to provide $30 million for market access advocacy in communications and public engagement. I just want to confirm with the minister that that $30 million has been and will continue to be accounted for in the same way with respect to third-party contracts, done in the usual way with RFPs, the usual way of contracts being disclosed in the blue book subsequently. I'll start with those two questions.

Mr. Toews: Mr. Chair, could we just ask the member to repeat that question, just so we're clear?

Ms Phillips: Sure. Here we have $30 million for market access advocacy in CPE, for which, I think, on all sides of the House, while we may not agree on the content of those communications, we agree on the virtue of talking about market access, and indeed we undertook some of those activities as well. So I'm asking if the minister can confirm that that $30 million that is providing for market access advocacy – in the CPE branch, that is now within Treasury Board and Finance, after some changes that were made a couple of years ago – will be accounted for in the same ways as it has been previously; that is to say that any third-party vendors will go through the normal RFP process, that things will be disclosed in the usual way, that they are within the blue book, and that contracts for any additional employees will be posted, as is usual practice.

The Deputy Chair: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Thanks, Mr. Chair. The $30 million here that this House is ultimately being asked to approve, as by virtue of approving the total supplementary supply, of course, are funds that have already been spent. Those funds are gone. They were spent by the previous government. Of course, this government has a significant advocacy effort planned, and that advocacy effort is certainly beginning even right now as we work to advocate with a very sharp and focused campaign advocating for approval of the Trans Mountain pipeline. Our advocacy efforts, of course, are going to be much broader than that. We laid out our plans to Albertans prior to the election, and they wholeheartedly endorsed our efforts to be advocates and defenders of our energy industry. The $30 million that we're looking at right now, again, relates to a spend made by the previous government. Perhaps I'll leave it at that.

Ms Phillips: Sure. Looking at the Children's Services estimates, then, can the member provide some insight into what is being funded around the early learning and child care centres and whether $8 million fully covers the recommendations of the child intervention panel?

The Deputy Chair: That is the conclusion of that 10-minute block. This now is an opportunity for members from the government side, private members, to speak.

Seeing none, moving back towards the opposition side, I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud. Is it safe to assume that you'll be sharing the 10-minute block with the minister?

Ms Pancholi: Yes.

The Deputy Chair: Okay. Go ahead, please.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I'm just going to pick up on, actually, the comments from my colleague the Member for Lethbridge-West. On the Children's Services numbers, just going to those – and I believe that's on page 26 – I just wanted, actually, to pick up on those comments to ask if there could be some clarification as to whether or not the $8.3 million in child intervention and early intervention services for children and youth in support of the implementation of the public action plan for the ministerial child intervention – I believe it means the Ministerial Panel on Child Intervention. Could the minister update this House on the progress of that plan and whether or not that commitment is going to ensure that that work is continuing without interruption and that it's the full implementation of the action plan from the panel?

5:10

The Deputy Chair: The hon. Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you. As we chatted about a little bit earlier today, there are three different phases that were outlined in the action plan in terms of steps that need to be taken moving forward.

In 2018-2019 Children's Services did request funding, $8.3 million for costs associated with implementation, mostly around the first phase of actions within the action plan. Some examples of where that funding went were to establish a funding model for the seven child advocacy centres, which provide vital front-line support to survivors of abuse and their families; assessing a made-in-Alberta kinship care program to better support caregivers and children across Alberta – that was something that not only came forward in the report but also in the conversations I had with the people who are on the panel, something that certainly needed to be improved – and to strengthen services and placement options for children with extremely complex needs.

This includes reorganizing how services are delivered across the province and improving how we support our young people with disabilities and making important changes and updates to the child intervention practice framework program policies and our case management system to align with the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act so that we can better meet the needs of children, youth, and families and ensure that those most vulnerable across our province are safe and supported.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you to the minister for that response.

I'm wondering, with respect to the child advocacy centres, whether or not the minister is able to speak to whether or not that includes a child advocacy centre located in Lethbridge, if that was completed.

The Deputy Chair: The hon. Minister of Children's Services, if she wishes to speak.

Ms Schulz: I don't have that level of detail with me right now, but I'd be happy to get back to you on that.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you to the minister for that. I would appreciate it if perhaps she would provide that update in writing.

Can I just clarify, then, in terms of the $8.3 million into the implementation of the action plan? Can the minister speak to whether or not this means that the timelines that were currently outlined in the action plan will be met, not just for the short term but as well for the medium-term and the long-term commitments?

Ms Schulz: That's a great question. The previous government had outlined the actions that came from the report into short-, medium-, and long-term actions. While funding was allocated for the short term – and this is what this $8.3 million has gone to support – not all of the longer term recommendations have specific pieces that require a budget, but, you know, those are things that I think we will work towards in the coming months as we lay out our province's budget this fall.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you to the minister for that.

Just some fleshing out a little bit of the $14.9 million, almost $15 million for additional funding for child care subsidies and supports. I understand, of course, generally what that would include. Can you just break that down a little bit for clarification? Is that to support the continuation of the early learning and child care centres until the end of – will that fund them for the remainder of their contracts, or is there an investment in funds there that will go beyond the extension of their contracts right now?

The Deputy Chair: The hon. Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you. The child care funds that were outlined, the $14.988 million for caseload pressures and carry-forward of the ELCC funding: the Alberta child care subsidy program provides financial support to lower income families with children in a licensed child care program. Additionally, the funding supported growth in specialized child care caseloads. Their supports assist child care programs to care for children who have high behavioural or developmental needs and can include additional staff, training, coaching, and other resources to support children.

As the member opposite does know, this was developed as a pilot program, and I think that, you know, to be responsible, the benefit of a pilot is to gather data and information and ensure that any program is meeting the needs of parents. Certainly, as a working parent, and the member opposite being one as well, I know that we do understand that different parents need different things for their families, but we also know that not every child is the same. Certainly, we need to ensure that we have accessible child care, but we also need to make sure that we have choice in child care.

We have committed to maintaining the pilot for the three years, which is a good amount of time to get a baseline of feedback and data and information to make good decisions moving forward.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you to the minister. Yes, I do absolutely understand the pressures as a working parent as well as the minister is, especially, and I'm sure the minister would appreciate as well, how important it is to have some predictability when you do have children in child care. I think that for those parents who do currently have their children enrolled in one of those ELCCs, there's a lot of uncertainty about what's going to be happening at the end of those contracts and whether or not they'll continue to be able to afford child care and how to make arrangements if they can't. I appreciate the comments, but right now I think what we're looking for is some predictability and some assurances we can provide those families and those centres that are offering those programs.

I'm just wondering if the minister can comment at all about how the numbers that we see here on page 27 of the supplementary supply bill address indigenous services and indigenous services funding and whether or not there will be continued support for ensuring that there is no distinction in service between on-reserve and off-reserve services in the area of children's services. I'm wondering if the minister could comment on whether those numbers reflect that.

Ms Schulz: I do just want to remind the member opposite that supplementary funds are helping to keep services stable for Albertans and, obviously, are numbers that were put forward by the previous government. I certainly wouldn't want to presuppose what might be in upcoming budgets, but I can tell you that a lot of that work was what was brought forward in the action plan and part of what – you know, the changes to practice were a hugely important part.

Certainly, as I mentioned about supports for kinship care and supporting families and ensuring that our most vulnerable children, the things that we did learn through those panel consultations, things like, you know, looking at kinship care, ensuring that our children have connections to family and to culture – you know, I think that sometimes we look at the dollar amounts first. But I think that respect for indigenous culture and changing practices based on the good feedback – I know that members on both sides of the House took part in those discussions, and I really did, when I said it earlier today, take it really seriously. I know we put forward a lot of reports as a government, but I felt like it was really important to speak to the people who informed that work.

You know, if you have more specific questions about the budget and what's coming forward, we'll be in a better position to speak to that in a couple of months, but this is based on previous spending and keeping services stable and making good on the commitments that were made previously.

The Deputy Chair: The hon. member.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you. Nothing further right now. Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Any others with 50 seconds left?

Going to the government side of the House, I see the hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I appreciate this opportunity to rise right now.

The Deputy Chair: However, is it my assumption that you'll be sharing time?

Mr. Schow: Yes. I'll be sharing time with the minister. Thank you, Mr. Chair. I apologize.

I do have a couple of questions for the minister, if I could, and I would start by saying that I'd like to ask the minister if the $317 million in the supplementary supply for crude by rail was earmarked during the campaign period.

The Deputy Chair: The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you to the hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika for the question. I appreciate it. I think it's an important question, Mr. Chair, and the answer to his question is quite simple. The answer is yes. At least the commitments would have been made during the campaign period. I suspect he probably has a follow-up question to that, but that's when the commitment would have been made.

5:20

The Deputy Chair: The hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Chair. Yeah. I certainly do have a follow-up question to the minister. I have been knocking on a lot of doors, wearing out shoes during the campaign period, and heard from a lot of constituents with concerns about this purchase of these railcars. They were worried about some of the ethical lines that this manoeuvre may or may not have crossed or, frankly, blown right over. I wanted to know if the minister could maybe comment about that and if he has anything to say about the ethical lines that may or may not have been crossed by this.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Chair, the process, how it works in our province – in case some hon. members are not aware – is that in February 2019 we entered what is called the campaign period. While we know that the writ was dropped in March and ultimately the election date took place on April 16, our province ends up in a campaign period from February until, actually I think it ends on June 16 or something like that upcoming, when certain fundraising rules and those things that apply to our campaigns happen. At the same time government is to enter into a mode of starting to prepare for an election while recognizing that the end of their mandate is there.

Certainly, Mr. Chair, through you to the hon. member, I don't know specifically whether or not, you know, we could quote specific laws that were broken or something along those lines. What I can tell you is that I have heard from my constituents as well that it certainly looks inappropriate to do that during a campaign period, especially to make a commitment that ends up committing Albertans to spend almost $3.5 billion in a desperate attempt in the dying days of an administration. [interjection]

I think the hon. member's point – and I know the hon. Member for Calgary-Fort would like to get involved. Calgary-Buffalo now. See, the ridings have changed. I'm always happy to hear from the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo. He's welcome to rise when he has the floor, but I have the floor right now. We will stick with me talking for a little bit, if that's okay, Mr. Chair, and to the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

The reality is that the outgoing government committed us to $3.5 billion. Of that, they've had to spend in supplementary supply, which has already been spent, about $317 million as the hon.

member articulates very, very well in his question and I've confirmed. The point of his question, though, is whether or not it was appropriate for the government to make that decision in the dying days of their administration. I would submit to this Assembly and through you to the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo that, no, it was not appropriate.

That is why our leader, the now-Premier of Alberta, the hon. Premier, made a commitment in February 2019 that any contract that the government entered into during that campaign period would be examined in the lens of what was appropriate for taxpayers. We made that very clear. In fact, he held a press conference. I remember we had a premeeting, the leadership of our caucus, to make a decision on what that announcement would be. We made it very, very clear that we would not automatically honour every agreement that the outgoing government did because our job, we recognized, was to protect taxpayers.

When you're dealing with something that is of a magnitude of that, $3.5 billion, the largest expenditure, as far as I'm aware, probably in the history of the province for a one-item expenditure, certainly it was, I think, very appropriate of us as the opposition at that time to be able to position ourselves in a spot, if we were fortunate enough to form a government, to be able to stand up for taxpayers. I think it was certainly inappropriate of the government at that time, now the opposition, the NDP, to make a decision like that, which is turning out probably to be a boondoggle. I think you're going to hear more about that in the coming days and the mistakes that they made along that line.

Again, I'll close with this and go back to the hon. member, with his time that is remaining. Certainly, I think it was inappropriate, and I think most Albertans would think it was inappropriate.

The Deputy Chair: The hon. member.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I do have a couple more questions for the minister. This was certainly a large expenditure, my understanding is the largest expenditure in the history of the province. A number, I think it was $3.5 billion or $3.6 billion – maybe the former Finance minister can enlighten us at some point. But I'll move along. This is a big number, one that actually rivals a number that the former Premier's best friend, Mr. Trudeau, paid for a pipeline, a pipeline that he, as we understand, overpaid for by almost $1 billion. Now, I think sometimes people have a difficult time comprehending how much a billion dollars is. I can only imagine how many teachers' and how many nurses' salaries can be paid with that kind of money.

So, you know, I'm hoping the minister here can help me understand. Does this move, this purchase, this $3.7 billion that we paid for these rail cars, put us . . . [interjections] I appreciate the members opposite trying to occupy some time. The time is in fact mine to ask these questions, and I ask members to show some level of decorum in this House.

Does this move put the government in a bit of a financial crunch to pay for essential services like education and health care, and if it's an irresponsible move, which it possibly is, would it not be considered an attack on teachers and nurses, Mr. Chair?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, again, thank you to the hon. member for the question. Certainly, that would be the concern, the outgoing government making a decision of that magnitude, again, in the dying days of their administration, when they knew that they were in fact more than likely to lose the election, in a desperate Hail Mary pass, if you will, to try to be able to save their government. Yes. They do position the next government in a tough spot. I think that's what was inappropriate about that decision. But mostly what's important, Mr. Chair . . . [interjection] The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo, I know, doesn't have the same view about the protection of Alberta taxpayers as I do. Certainly, if you look at his time as Finance minister, that speaks for itself when it comes to how he cares about taxpayers.

But the reality is, to answer the member's question: yes. That makes another thing to add to the mess that the NDP have left us, some of which we're talking about here in supplementary supply and the challenge that we have to be able to overcome. What I can assure this House, though, as we have many times, is that we will work diligently to make sure that we can overcome the challenge that they left us with crude by rail, and Albertans can be confident that they now have a government in power that cares about taxpayers.

The Deputy Chair: The hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika if he has more questions.

Mr. Schow: I am done.

The Deputy Chair: Any others looking to finish off the last minute and 45 seconds?

Seeing none, we'll push it back over to the opposition side. I see the hon. Member for St. Albert standing.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Chair. Okay. I'd like to focus on page 31, line 4.2, the Ministry of Community and Social Services. My question specifically focuses on PDD services, persons with developmental disabilities. On page 31, line 4.2, we see an increase in funding for PDD services. Under our government we increased funding to this program by $150 million and launched a comprehensive PDD review of the program. To the minister: first of all, what has been the caseload growth for PDD over the last three years? You are going to need this information to budget. Does this supplementary supply amount adequately account for the mid-year changes in caseload?

Mr. Toews: The answer to that is yes. It does.

Mr. Chair, if I can just respond to a couple of questions that were asked earlier previously that we didn't have an answer for, I would like to take that time and do that. There was a question related to the climate leadership projects and specifically to the $3.3 million spend, what that related to. In fact, it was an increase in capital grants for an off-diesel program for four locations.

I also wanted to respond to a question related to culture and tourism. There was a question around the federal-provincial split for the YWCA Calgary hub facility. The federal amount was $6 million. The provincial amount was $8.6 million. Again, for the Jerry Forbes centre for community spirit renovation project the federal amount was $1.8 million, and the provincial amount was $5.8 million.

5:30

Ms Renaud: Okay. Thank you. The PDD review panel has been hard at work to make recommendations to improve the PDD program. A couple of things. Number one, when will the report be released to the public? Two, do the supplementary amounts reflect any supports for the panel?

Now, also to note, in the UCP platform document there was a reference to removing the IQ criteria for determination of eligibility under this program, so I'd like to know if that was factored in and how you got to those numbers.

Mr. Jason Nixon: We've gone quite a way into supplementary supply, and I think the hon. the Finance minister has done an excellent job of trying to answer detailed questions, which are fair inside this Assembly, and come back with information. Again, we are in supplementary supply. Mr. Chair, through you to the member, this is about money that your government formerly, just a few weeks ago, spent. If your question is about something to do with supplementary supply, the hon. Finance minister will continue to do his best to answer that. But as far as policy direction or budget direction some of those questions that the hon. member just asked probably would make sense in interim supply later on today, when we get to that conversation, and I would submit to you that the bulk of them actually make more sense when we discuss the budget this fall.

Ms Renaud: Well, thank you for that, but I'm going to ask it again. Will this government actually commit to releasing the report publicly? The financial implications of this report are huge. I think the member knows that. You can deflect all you like. Let me skip that. Clearly, you're not going to answer that.

Maybe this question is better directed to Treasury Board. I'm wondering if or where there are supplementary amounts to support the work of the office of the Advocate for Persons with Disabilities.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Chair, again, the report that the hon. member refers to is not a part of supplementary supply debate. I think that the best way for her to handle that is to send a note to the Minister of Community and Social Services, who is very accessible to all members of this House. I do know that. She's been able to provide me information on the same types of questions in the past. I think that would be probably the more effective way for her to be able to get a question about a specific report.

Again, I remind all hon. members, Mr. Chair, that this supplementary supply. It's not interim supply. It's not a budget debate. This is about money that the former government spent, and we're happy to answer the detailed questions about where that money went and what types of projects it was spent on. But this is not an opportunity for the opposition to have a conversation about interim supply or, more importantly, our budget process.

We've been clear that our budget process will take place over the coming months. There will come a day when we will first come before our standing committees as a part of the 30th Legislature, which includes members from all sides of the House, where we'll have to answer detailed questions on that. We'll be happy and excited to show what we intend to do on behalf of the province and how we think we've solved some of the problems that we have inherited. Then ultimately we'll come back to this Chamber, where this belongs, to have a budget that is passed and debated in a fulsome way – I welcome that – but not during supplementary supply.

The Deputy Chair: The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Well, thank you. With all due respect for that second lecture I'm going to ask that again. To Treasury Board and Finance, I'm wondering if or where there are supplementary amounts to support the work of the office of the Advocate for Persons with Disabilities. It's a pretty straightforward question. Yes or no?

The other part is that the member referred to how accessible the minister is. Well, I'm sorry, but I've offered a few times to meet as the critic for that particular ministry, and I've not been successful so far, nor have I been able to have a meeting with the office of the advocate. I'm not sure what that means. I will turn to Treasury Board and Finance and ask that question. Are there supplementary amounts to support the work of the office of the Advocate for Persons with Disabilities? Yes or no?

The Deputy Chair: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I can only assume that the member opposite is asking whether the money spent actually went to that office. Again, this is all past tense. This was money that the previous government spent, and it is not money that this current government has any discretion in spending. It's gone. This money is gone.

I will just go through the summary of the supplementary amounts: $31,385,000 are related to the ministry; $18 million was for income support to people expected to work or working to support core and supplementary benefits rate increases indexed to the Alberta consumer price index and increased demand for financial benefits; $5,455,000 was spent for assured income for the severely handicapped, including $16,900,000 to support the benefit rate increase and indexation of benefits with the Alberta consumer price index, less $11,750,000 made available from lower caseload growth in financial benefit grants and $305,000 for the workload assessment model in program planning and delivery; $7,930,000 was for disability services, including $7,180,000 in persons with developmental disabilities supports to Albertans, including $7 million for caseload and cost-per-case growth and $180,000 for the workload assessment model; $750,000 in family support for children with disabilities for their workload assessment model.

The Deputy Chair: The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Chair. First of all, that is quite interesting that there is a lower caseload – okay – considering AISH offices across the province get about 50 applications a day. I'll wait to find out more about that. Let me ask about AISH. On page 30 the ministry states there is a lower caseload growth than expected for the AISH program. Can you explain what the historical caseload growth rate has been, and how is it possible that there are fewer Albertans with disabilities in need of support?

The Deputy Chair: The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Chair. Again, to the hon. member, her commentary, quite frankly, probably not helpful to the conversation, but that's fine. That's her prerogative with her time. I would suggest that as she's looking for answers to these questions on how this money was spent before we were in government, that she ask her colleague the hon. Member for Calgary-McCall, who just a few short weeks ago was the minister that was responsible for the spending that she's referring to. Through you, Mr. Chair, to the hon. member, if there are concerns with the caseloads and whether or not the hon. minister formerly spent enough money on caseloads, I don't understand why that hon. member would not take it up with the hon. Member for Calgary-McCall, who was the former minister and ultimately responsible for the spending that the Finance minister is discussing with this House today.

Again, Mr. Chair, through you to the hon. members across the way, I know time is short, and I want to respect their time . . .

The Deputy Chair: Looking to the government side, are there any private members looking to ask questions? I see the hon. Member for Lacombe-Ponoka sitting. Seeing none, looking to the opposition side. I believe I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie standing with the call.

Mr. Deol: Thank you, Mr. Chair. It's my privilege and honour to serve one of the most diverse ridings in Alberta. In my riding numerous organizations do plenty of work promoting multiculturalism through cultural, literary, and theatre collectives and help communities integrate into the greatest, largest Canadian mosaic. I just wanted to bring to your attention that on page 35, line 2.9 there's an antiracism community grant program. Our government was proud to create this historic program to fight racism, build awareness, and collaborate with amazing community groups that are championing antiracism work.

I think I forgot to ask for my five minutes. Do I take my five minutes?

The Deputy Chair: Oh. Yeah. There was actually . . .

Mr. Deol: I'll just read my questions, and you can respond.

The Deputy Chair: I hesitate to interrupt. One quick thing, I believe I introduced you as Edmonton-Ellerslie and not Edmonton-Meadows, so to clear that up.

Mr. Deol: It's good. I didn't hear you.

The Deputy Chair: Also, just as we get into the rhythm of this sometimes people just assume that the time is going to be shared. Is that your intention?

Mr. Deol: No.

The Deputy Chair: No, so five minutes to yourself. Please continue.

Mr. Deol: Thank you. I have a question. To the minister: do you agree that the program we created is important and should be supported going forward to support antiracism work in Alberta?

I have another question. Question 2: given the Islamophobic incidents we have seen in the province, will any of the funding go towards combating Islamophobia in Alberta?

I have question 3. Can you explain why your government has ended all acknowledgements of indigenous land given your supposed commitment to antiracism work?

Many multicultural organizations have advocated for antiracism training and education. Will any of these supplementary funds be directed to antiracism education, including education for elected officials?

Question 5: will you ensure that antiracism and LGBTQ2S organizations may apply to this grant as seed funding, or will this community be sidelined once again by your government?

Question 6: is this supplementary amount requested for one-time investment into the grant program, or will the program be maintained every year going forward?

Question 7: to the minister, will you be changing any grant criteria for the program?

Question 8: to the minister, given that the latest submission deadline was June 1, can the minister please advise when successful grant applicants will be notified?

Last question, question 9: will any of this funding support the antiracism council?

I will be happy to have answers for all those nine questions. Mr. Chair, the minister can get back to me even in written responses. I will be happy to have those answered in writing. Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: The hon. minister, with five minutes.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Chair. Again, I want to preface my comments with: the amounts we're looking at here have already been spent. They've been spent. It's not discretionary spending. There's no ability for this government to make decisions around these funds. They were spent by the previous government, and so they're gone.

I think the other comment, though, I would like to make in response to your questions about efforts around antiracism. I just, again, want to assure all members in this House that this government takes racism seriously, and we certainly will make it a high priority to support efforts, antiracism efforts, going forward. Again, there will be very thoughtful and detailed budget deliberations by all the ministries over the course of the next weeks and months, and we will be rolling out a budget that will basically demonstrate our priorities in all areas, including the area of antiracism.

The Deputy Chair: The hon. Minister of Transportation.

Mr. McIver: Well, thank you, and, Mr. Chair, I tried to listen to the hon. member's questions carefully. I have to say that, to the hon. member, I think you asked some important and meaningful questions. What we're having some trouble answering you about is that you're asking about the government's intentions in the future. There will be a place for you to ask those questions in interim supply and when the budget comes out and other times in question period and other committees and places to do it. This, respectfully, might not be your best source of information in this committee because we're actually asking about historical expenditures and what they're on. That's what's before us. A lot of your questions were on future intentions and expenditures.

I'm not berating your questions. I'm not berating the hon. member's questions. I'm actually saying that I think they're important. I'm just, I hope, in a friendly, helpful way suggesting the hon. member maybe ask his questions again in the future, in parts of the discussion, in parts of the budget discussion, in parts of the interim supply, where they would have a better chance of being answered. Because all we're really here to answer on this is on the way money was spent when the party that the hon. member belongs to was in government before we were here. This is an interesting piece, that we're actually answering questions about things that we didn't do or that the previous government did. I hope you'll accept my answer in the spirit of helpfulness with which it is offered.

The Deputy Chair: There are a few minutes remaining, and therefore there's an opportunity. None?

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

7:30 p.m.

Wednesday, June 12, 2019

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Please be seated.

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 8 Education Amendment Act, 2019

Mr. Bilous moved that the motion for second reading of Bill 8, Education Amendment Act, 2019, be amended by deleting all of the words after “that” and substituting the following:

Bill 8, Education Amendment Act, 2019, be not now read a second time because the Assembly is of the view that further time is necessary to enable school boards to adjust their policies to comply with the proposed legislation and regulations.

[Adjourned debate on the amendment June 11: Mr. Bilous]

The Speaker: Hon. members, we are on amendment RA1. Is there anyone wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'll just ask at the start. I'm not sure how much time I have left.

The Speaker: Four minutes.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

I appreciate the opportunity to speak to Bill 8. I believe that I left off moving a reasoned amendment to give school boards a little bit more time to adjust to what this bill is proposing. I highlighted earlier some of my concerns with Bill 8 and how it's currently written. One of the big concerns that I have – and there are a few – is the fact that this bill gives school boards the ability to essentially vote off or out one of their elected school board trustee colleagues. Now, that causes the alarm bells to go off, Mr. Speaker. School board trustees are duly elected, as is every member in this Assembly, and to give the authority to the other school board trustees to remove one from the board, quite frankly, is going to not only stifle innovation and robust democratic debate; it's going to stifle ideas, it's going to promote groupthink, it will ensure that members of a school board all think alike, and if anyone steps out of line, well, be careful. You could end up without a job.

The fact of the matter is, Mr. Speaker, that school board trustees are elected to serve the people that they represent, similar to all 87 members in this Chamber. As soon as you give the authority to the other members of the board, the majority of the board, to vote off a trustee when they may disagree with the person's opinion, they may tell them – if they're raising too many questions, maybe if they go to the public to disagree with a decision that the board has made, well, the board can then remove them.

I think of a number of school trustees who have spoken out with what they believed was right when the will of the rest of the board was incorrect. I can think of a couple of trustees that would have been voted off or out by the board. They have a responsibility to the people that elected them, not a responsibility to toe the line of the rest of the trustees, Mr. Speaker. This is a very dangerous precedent and quite shocking that the government has this in their Bill 8, the current Education Amendment Act, 2019.

Of course, other concerns that myself and my colleagues have raised are how much this weakens provisions to protect students when it comes to the LGBTQ2-plus community. I think that throughout the course of the day we've heard the government say that these are the strongest protections. There's nothing that could be further from reality, Mr. Speaker. We see in black and white what this bill is proposing compared to other jurisdictions that have much stronger protections, including here in Alberta under our government. These changes are actually going to remove protections for students, expose our young people again to bullying and being treated differently because of their sexual orientation. You know, to talk about how this is going to create more inclusive spaces, I don't think any Albertan is buying what this bill is trying to sell, quite frankly.

For that reason, I will encourage all members of this Assembly to support this reasoned amendment and ship this bill off.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. Does anybody have any questions or comments for the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview?

Seeing none, is there anyone else wishing to speak to the amendment? I see the hon. the Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak to this reasoned amendment in regard to Bill 8, the Education Amendment Act, 2019. You know, I was quite surprised that the government did go forward with this Education Act. We know that it was created quite a number of years ago by the former Conservative government and was never proclaimed. The consensus among school boards and people that worked on it and, I think, members of that Conservative government was that the Education Act as it stood was not ready for prime time. It had a number of controversial elements to it that were very difficult both to pay for, to accommodate for, and, as the previous speaker, the hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview just pointed out, it had some basic undemocratic elements to it that just made it so that it was not to be proclaimed.

When our government was in office, what we did do was a very practical thing and take some elements of the Education Act that were practical, reasonable ideas and incorporated them into legislation rather than taking this whole big chunk of legislation that, quite frankly, by that time was starting to, you know, show its age. Mr. Speaker, then, instead, we just took some practical elements of it and had a bill that, I think, was quite successful.

Now analyzing what has led us to this moment, Mr. Speaker, I think is that the government during their election was looking for a way to move backwards on GSA legislation and was looking for a way to do that that could provide some cover – right? – instead of just having, you know, an act to reverse GSA policy, which so brazenly sort of goes against, I think, both popular opinion and what's right, what's correct, the right thing to do, using the Education Act as some cover. So here we are today. I know that the hon. minister has taken out some of the other elements in Bill 8 that otherwise cost money and were a problem and so forth, so here it lays even more bare this sort of rebirth of the Education Act in a Frankensteinian sort of way. It is even more clearly and brazenly just an act to get at the GSA legislation.

I think most people can see through it. If they haven't, they are seeing clear as day now. You know, it's a problem, quite frankly. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, from being witness to the evolution of protections for gay-straight alliances and queer-straight alliances from the debates that took place around what was Bill 10 from the government as well that this was a very divisive and difficult process.

What I saw when I became Minister of Education is that Bill 10 was fraught with peril, quite frankly. It had lots of loopholes in it that either by design or by omission allowed schools and school boards to not act in an expedient and prompt sort of way when students wanted to form a gay-straight alliance or a queer-straight alliance and thus could just kind of rag the puck and maybe wait for that group of kids to leave the school and then try to forget about it, right? So obfuscation was very common. I had lots of people from around the province coming to me with stories about how they just couldn't get the principal and the school board to act.

Then, you know, it was kind of hoping that it would die on the vine, this notion of having a GSA in a school, so we knew that we had to make some law about that to say that when students would ask to form a GSA or QSA, a principal would act in an expedient way, as soon as possible, to help to expedite that request and to provide a responsible teacher to be supervising this and to make sure that the kids could call it a GSA or a QSA if they chose to do so, okay?

I mean, these were all rules and advancements and sort of reforms that we put into what was Bill 24 because we actually saw people using and displaying these behaviours in the field, in our schools, around the province. It was the same with protecting the confidentiality of students who were joining a GSA or a QSA, that if they chose to have that confidence to respect that, right? Again, we had to make that rule because schools were putting out newsletters and so forth here and there in and around the province. You know, the whole basis of a GSA or a QSA is that it provides a safe haven for very vulnerable students, so any notion that a teacher or an administrator could put out the names of the people joining a GSA or a QSA, again, was defying or eroding the very reason for a GSA or a QSA to exist.

That's it. I mean, those are all the things that we basically did in Bill 24 to strengthen GSAs and to make a safe place for kids in schools around the province. You know, I must say that it wasn't an easy thing to accomplish, but over the last couple of years we did see all public school boards in the province put up safe and caring policies that were not just adhering to the law but were exceeding and were very inspired, I think, in regard to protecting GSAs and QSAs.

Every Catholic school board put up policies, again, that were safe and caring and met the requirements of the regulation and exceeded it and, you know, kept the integrity of faith in all of those Catholic school policies as well – right? – of course, respecting that faith-based schools can have those things infused into their regulation and into their policy and into their teaching. The Catholic school boards came up with that and made it very well with flying colours. They did great, and I was very proud of that.

All of the charter schools in the province of Alberta, again, came up with very salient and often quite moving safe and caring policies that were in line with the policy of the province and were, you know, adhering to the spirit and the intention of a safe and caring environment for all students.

All of the francophone schools: same thing. They all came up with policies that were in keeping with the law. I had to presume that they did because I don't read French, but I was told that their policies were excellent, always. I'm very proud of the work that they did.

The vast majority of private schools did as well write policies that were in keeping with the spirit of what their private school was intending to do, and if they were a faith-based one, they had the infusion of faith into their safe and caring policies and did a great, great job.

I'm telling you this, Mr. Speaker, because this is an indicator of just how far we came here in the province of Alberta in regard to school boards embracing the notion of the utility and the absolute necessity of GSAs to be protected in the way that we had outlined here in the province of Alberta, not just, you know, reluctantly following the law but embracing those ideas and, quite frankly, not just teaching students but also teachers and parents and all of us about the importance of creating a safe and caring place for all people regardless of their sexuality. You can move that further to their ethnicity, their gender, their geographic location, their socioeconomic condition, right? This was all part of what I would suggest is a movement to a greater understanding about each other as people.

I could see it and I'm sure you could see it, too, in your places. I can tell you that some of the most flourishing and, I guess, enthusiastic GSAs I saw were in, you know, places that you might not expect. You know very well, Mr. Speaker, the awesome GSA that is in Olds high school, for example, right? I went there. It was absolutely one of the best attended ones that I've seen, and it embraced this larger sort of social justice issue and learning about other issues as well and had reached out into the community as well. I think that when I went to that GSA meeting, there must have been at least 30-some people there, including teachers, the principal – I think there might have been a town councillor there – lots of kids, and really moving stories about this safe place for kids to talk about whatever, right?

You know, it's a place where people planned – like, they're raising money to send to a developing country, I believe, and were advocating for greater mental health supports for kids and stuff like that. It was just a really great GSA: organic, student-led, and something that I think everybody in the school and then, in affiliation with the college, the whole town could be proud of.

Here we are moving along on a very progressive track that, I think, gets the head nod from people right across the province, and I would go as far as to call it something of a sea change – right? – where suddenly it's like you build up this sort of accumulation of information plus understanding plus things happening and suddenly you had a collective head nod from Albertans, saying: "Yeah. You know what? LGBTQ-plus students and people in general are just citizens of this province and deserve the same respect and understanding." Not just tolerance but acceptance, Mr. Speaker, acceptance and inclusion. This happens over time. It's not easy, but – just think about it – we really did come a long way here in the province of Alberta. I'm not going to begin to say it was just because of the GSAs, but it's an indicator. It's like a litmus test. It's a test of the composition, of the chemistry of who we are.

People might say, "Whoa; you know, what's the big deal here with the Education Amendment Act?" and so forth. Well, you know what, Mr. Speaker? It's going backwards. People know it. People who understand this situation know that this is regressive. I mean, I think it's up to the government to explain why they are choosing to do so. I'm not going to put words in other people's mouths, but here it is: you can only judge a person or a government or a bill based on what it intends to do, and here it is moving backwards on a lot of progress that we did do and have done and will continue to do despite road bumps like Bill 8, right? Some people are calling it Bill Hate, which I don't disagree with because it sends an underlying message that destroying or undermining or eroding the progress that we've made around GSAs is, quite frankly, unconscionable, and I won't stand for it. If you want to try and do this, I mean, I would say that it is at your own peril.

I know that there are lots of splits of opinion amongst people around how and why we should do such risky legislation as this and what the implications are. Well, I can tell you, as a cautionary tale, that it divides people. You can spin it all you want around saying: oh, well, you know, it's just the same as the one before. Well, why are you doing this, then? If it's just the same as it was before, why make those changes, Mr. Speaker? I think that the answer is obvious.

I don't think that it's good legislation. I don't think it's good, responsible use of power here in this House. Quite frankly, I mean, who am I to give advice to the government? But I'll do it anyway. You will lose from this. You will lose support, you will lose moral authority, and you will lose literally hundreds of thousands of young people, especially, who really think that something like this is regressive and a step backwards to building a modern, more just, inclusive, and accepting society, that they want to live in. You know, take that advice for what it is, and I would be happy to give you more.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung rising on 29(2)(a). No, I don't see him. Interesting.

Is there anyone else wishing to speak to the amendment? Now I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung rising to speak to the amendment.

Mr. Dach: That's right, Mr. Speaker. Thank you so much. That's what I did want to speak to, the reasoned amendment that is before us now, an amendment that would allow school boards to do things that, frankly, I think are abhorrent, in particular, the measures which would allow school boards to fire an elected official, an elected trustee from amongst their numbers.

I really question the motivation behind this legislation. As well, I know that the former Minister of Education the Member for Edmonton-North West, the newly named riding of Edmonton-North West, spoke just recently about the risks the government was taking and told the government members that they could enact this legislation at their own political peril. Yet the government seems intent to go ahead, notwithstanding that inherent risk, and damn the torpedoes. I'm wondering aloud to myself and to this Chamber why exactly the government is so motivated to go ahead with measures such as this.

[Mr. Loewen in the chair]

Once again, it seems to be something that's on the Premier's list of pet peeves and something he wishes to accomplish in an effort to minimize any possible threat of opposition to his authority. It's another means and another way, another example of the Premier getting other people to do his dirty work. I think that that will be forthcoming in the future when we see, if indeed this measure is passed, that school boards who are actually looking to get rid of a member from amongst themselves are doing so in a manner that reflects the desire, the ideology, the wishes of this particular Premier. It's a rather insidious way of getting the central power's fingers into the workings of lower level political bodies such as school boards. I don't think I'm being overly concerned about it. I think it's something that's evident to me. I think the proof will be in the pudding.

Firing an elected school board trustee from amongst a body of trustees is a pretty serious measure, as was mentioned before in this House, Mr. Speaker. If indeed that was something that this body, this Chamber, this Legislature, was enabled to do, there would be an outrage. By the same token, there should be outrage in considering that the government wants to invoke this measure in the province of Alberta, to allow such a thing to take place, where an elected member of a school board can be trounced out of office simply by a vote of the members of that same school board. Those individuals were elected to serve their constituents, and it should not be a vote of the body that they belong to that forces them off that school board. It's a very, very concerning and dangerous political precedent, and I think it's a threat to local democracy and thereby the whole democracy that we espouse in this province.

If school boards are on the hit list, what next? Where else will we expect the insidious central power to invade? This body, this Chamber? Will we see legislation next where the government wants to take aim at any member of the Legislature, perhaps, that they don't particularly like and would like to take measures to force out of office? I think that that's not beyond comprehension here in this Legislature. This government is capable of any type of attack on democracy, and I'm not surprised that this measure has come forward; I'm certainly disappointed.

Once again, we've seen in the past, previous to the election of this government, while they were having legacy parties get together, that before he was Premier, when he was attempting to gain leadership of the legacy parties, he revelled in getting other people to do his dirty work. This is an extension of that same theme here in the Legislature, and it's applied now to school boards. I think that I honestly have a right to wonder what's next. It wouldn't surprise me to see the members opposite bring forward legislation to enable them to attack and rid themselves of members of this Legislature who they feel are mounting opposition to them and represent a political threat to them. It's a concern. I raise that red flag and hope that other members opposite as well as our own caucus recognize this as well.

In other matters, though, the other side of the coin is the issue of the GSAs. Really, this legislation is an effort to destroy the gay-straight alliances, as has been mentioned by many members of this House, and this reasoned amendment, Mr. Speaker, is something that would allow school boards time to catch their breath and react properly to the measures that the government proposes. There are a lot of changes inherent in what these proposals are, and school boards, I think, should be given the opportunity, at the very least, to mount a defence, mount arguments, perhaps, to persuade the government that this is really not a direction that they should be going in.

I don't think it would take, you know, a year, but I'm wondering if the amount of time that is asked for in the reasoned amendment is enough. I'm certain that members of the various school boards throughout the province are already freaking out and wondering just what the heck is going on with this particular government. Three and a half weeks into a mandate, and they're, first of all, putting children's lives at risk and, secondly, looking at allowing the democratic process to be perverted by enabling school boards to get rid of duly elected members: a pretty roughshod piece of legislation that's been proposed. This amendment is, I think, a reasonable measure designed to basically tell the government: "Whoa. Take a breath and realize what you're doing. This is pretty dangerous stuff."

I echo the words of the Member for Edmonton-North West when he cautioned the government about the political risk they take in implementing these measures. There's a very, very large chance that this will be the government's Bill 6 right here. This is your Achilles tendon, and you're offering it up, so thank you very much. Go ahead, but the reality is that in the process you're damaging kids. It's incumbent upon us as members of the opposition not to goad you on to go ahead and jump over the cliff with this; it's to put a stop to it if at all possible, using every means that we have to protect the children of this province and protect the democratic rights of elected members of school boards in this province. We're going to exercise that responsibility at every turn.

That's what we're doing here tonight by making sure that we voice on behalf of our constituents who respect democracy, who really don't want to be attending the funerals of children who were outed by members of the teaching profession, as they'll be enabled to do by legislation this government wants to enact – those things are some things we are going to do our very best to halt by at least giving the school boards an opportunity to make representations seriously to the government to seriously do a double take on what they're talking about doing and perhaps even put a full stop to it with respect to the GSAs as well as the ability to allow school boards to fire duly elected officials.

I fully support this amendment, and I expect that members on this side of the House will do so as well. I know that there are other members of our caucus who wish to express themselves and let their constituents know how strongly they feel and how strongly they carry forward their views that these are very damaging pieces of legislation and measures that are contained in this legislation, dangerous measures, that will actually cost children's lives, cost students' lives.

The proof is in the pudding as far as the GSAs are concerned. We know they save lives. Eliminating them, restricting them, making them ineffective will cost lives. That is not something that is to be taken lightly. As members of the Legislature, as a government, as a responsibility you have, number one, to protect life and limb. When a government goes ahead and actually enacts legislation, proposes legislation that will do the opposite, it's unfathomable. It's irresponsible. It's unconscionable.

Yet here in Alberta in 2019 we have a government that is saying: look, ideologically we're opposed to the concept of people having rights as members of the LGBTQ community. We wish to go back to 50 years ago, perhaps, even to when I went to high school, when those who were identified as members of the LGBTQ community were beaten up, seriously beaten up, and nearly killed. In every high school in this city and around the province identifying yourself as a member of the gay community was an invitation to be abused – and seriously abused – and that's the type of thing that we're going to end up going back to. We're inviting that type of abuse of our members of the LGBTQ-plus community by enabling legislation that allows students to be outed and basically creating an open season for those who are not in favour of the LGBTQ2S-plus community having similar human rights to all the rest of us.

Although the members opposite pay lip service to how they believe they're supporting the LGBTQ community and that they have legislation and measures that are just as strong as they ever were and that there's nothing to worry about here, folks, that's not the case. We had many, many letters – read into the record earlier in this session by the Member for St. Albert – whose strength goes beyond anything I could ever say on the issue regarding what they felt as a result of this government's measures to weaken and cut the legs out from under the GSAs that right now students in this province enjoy. The government should take heed, not of me but of every student that wrote those heartfelt letters. They were direct. They were very powerful. They were challenging to this government. They were real. They were scared. They were angry. Those letters from those students who are in the crosshairs of this government should be something that is taken very, very seriously and not just swatted aside with indifference.

[The Speaker in the chair]

I risked being called out of order, I think, today when I asked if members of the government opposite would attend the funerals of those individuals who lost their lives or took their own lives as a result of changes to legislation that this government is making. In the past, without the GSAs, children lost their lives. They took their own lives. They ended up on the street. Now taking away this protection that has saved lives is going to do the opposite. It will end up with children being dead, and I don't know if members opposite would be welcome at those funerals. I certainly would want to make sure that the public knows about every one of those individuals who end up dead as a result of not being valued, not being allowed to protect their identity until such time as they are able to properly bring forward their desire to come out to their parents at the time of their choosing and in a way that they felt would allow the family unit to be kept intact.

Mr. Speaker, I know that there may be others on this side of the House who wish to express themselves, because it is a deeply, deeply concerning measure that the government is bringing forward. At the very least, school boards should be given the opportunity to step on the brakes to this piece of legislation. The population of the province should be given an opportunity to have a dialogue with school boards, and the school boards should have an opportunity to consult their own constituents and bring their fears and concerns to the parents of the students they represent and to the students also who are attending those schools, saying: "Look, this is what's happening. This is what the government is wanting us to do. Please, for crying out loud, let us know what you're thinking, and let's get onto it."

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available if anyone has a brief question or comment to the member. Under 29(2)(a), the hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate very much the Member for Edmonton-McClung's comments on this. We were both in here last night as well, and we both spoke to the bill then as well. Just on the amendment here, I wanted to let folks in this Chamber know that this certainly is a personal issue for me.

I wanted to just piggyback a little bit on what the Member for Edmonton-North West noted. He noted a few things that were really, really important and worth repeating. He said to members opposite: you know, who am I to tell you what to do? Well, I can tell you that as the former Education minister that member did so much work. He was able to take a very collaborative approach to get a number of schools onside, to have those deep conversations to explain just why GSAs, QSAs are so darn important, just why they do save lives. He was very successful. He's certainly being modest, but he was so successful in that role in really moving the conversation forward.

We've come a long way when it comes to LGBTQ2S rights. We've come a long way in advancing acceptance – as he said, not tolerance but acceptance – in our schools. There's still, obviously, more to be done, and of course our fear is that Bill 8 will roll that back, which is why we're urging this government to reconsider and, in this case, to delay.

To talk a little bit more about that member's successes, I mean, there were 28 schools, only 28, out of hundreds and hundreds across the province that didn't create policies to support GSAs. Under our plan those schools would have lost funding at the end of May. As I talked about last night, I worry for those students in those schools currently because we know there are students in at least some of those schools who are struggling with their identity as we speak. What's going to happen to those students? If this act were to be implemented for September 1, I worry about a whole lot of other students across the province in schools where they perhaps have conformed to our previous legislation but will now be able to revert to the government prior to ours.

I just want to maybe throw back to the Member for Edmonton-McClung. You know, I'm certain that he, like myself and others in this Chamber, has heard from a number of folks in the community. If you could just share a little bit more about what you've been hearing first-hand from your own constituents.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Thank you to the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood for the opportunity once again to speak to the concerns of my constituents in Edmonton-McClung. As I mentioned in the House before, many, many people who worked very closely with me in the lead-up to the last election were from the LGBTQ-plus community, because they know that they are supported by this caucus and have always been and will always be supported by this caucus. They have a home with us because they know that we value them as equal citizens no matter what we're looking at, whether it be school boards, whether it be in the Legislature, whether it be any order of human rights that one can think of.

These constituents of mine who happen to be members of the LGBTQ2S-plus community are very much a part of the fabric of the community. They're very beloved as members of my inner circle. They are also, I know, very integrated in other elements of the community, whether it be their community league, whether it be their faith group, whether it be the community efforts with youth. There are a host of efforts that people in the LGBTQ2S-plus community involve themselves in because they know the necessity, the value of community service and community effort, of getting together, of coalescing, of collaborating. That lesson, I guess, is one of necessity.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie is rising to debate.

Member Loyola: Yes. Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I remember being in high school, and being in high school, I was one of those kinds of guys who just kind of fit into various different groups. You know, I was big enough to play football back at Holy Trinity high school. I was part of the offensive team. But on top of hanging out with all the jocks – we well know them by that name – I also hung out with the drama club because I was really big into drama as well. I remember hearing it all, the kinds of derogatory names that would be called to people who were from the LGBTQ community.

You know, I'm so thankful because my parents always taught me to respect everybody no matter what. It didn't matter what their sexual orientation was, where they were from, what ethnic or cultural background they were. My parents taught me that treating everybody as equals is probably the most important thing that we can do and, not only that, to understand that because of the discrimination that exists in society, not only should we not contribute to the discrimination but also do our best to give that individual a hand up or help them out in some kind of way.

When I see the bill before us, as has been well stated by many of my colleagues, this is actually trying to reverse what our government so diligently was trying to set up here in the province of Alberta. You know what's unfathomable about this, Mr.

Speaker? The fact that this was all about creating a safe space for people who are discriminated against, a place where, because they are going through and perhaps even suffering with issues before them in terms of their own orientation, they can go and talk to other people, a safe space where they can discuss what they're feeling – their ideas, what's happening to them – where they will have other students that they can talk to. That's what unfathomable about this. It was only trying to create a safe space. I have to ask you all: what does that say about our society and our community if it's absolutely essential for us to create these safe spaces for individuals who are questioning and wondering about their sexual orientation and don't feel safe in their communities?

As was well stated by the Member for Edmonton-McClung, I remember times where people were actually abused and having to stand up for people and say, "Hey, hey, you can't do that," all because of sexual orientation. Not that these individuals even knew. They just assumed. That's what happens, unfortunately, in our communities and in our schools. People just assume: "Oh, this person is a little bit different. So what's the thing that we should do because they're different? Well, let's beat up on them." What does that say about our society, our communities? Where was that learned? Not only where was it learned, but why does it continue to happen?

So here our government tried to create safe spaces inside of schools, where every child, every student has the right to feel safe, and now this government wants to turn back the clock on that. And I know. I get it. I've heard it so many times, members from the opposite side saying: oh, this will be – I can't even remember the wording that they used. I'll be honest with you. I tend to unplug because we don't believe it.

You can't convince us that what this bill is going to do is create a safe space for all of those students that desperately need it. Desperately need it. This abuse is going to continue in our schools if we don't do anything about it. The bullying is going to continue, all because people are assuming about someone's sexual orientation. For me, that's what's incredibly unfathomable about this. We all should be able to feel safe in our communities and especially in our schools.

This bill is going to remove the protections, and school staff will be allowed to out students participating in GSAs. Now, I don't even want to imagine what it's like to be in a situation where you're questioning your sexual orientation and you don't even feel safe enough to tell your own parents because you know that if you tell your own parents, one of the things that they could potentially do is even kick you out of the house.

We know that this continues to happen here in Alberta. There are people that are so closed minded when it comes to sexual orientation that they would even be willing to kick their own child out of their home. Now, that's up to them what they do. But I know that the members on this side of the House want to make sure that that individual is well taken care of and that that individual feels safe.

So now what does it say when a government bill is willing to strip this protection from an individual, when even a teacher could then go and say, "Hey, your child is participating in this group; you should be concerned," when that child is so scared to even tell their own parent about what they're feeling, what they're experiencing? What right does another individual have to actually do that to a child? To a child. We're supposed to be a society that is supposed to protect children, and here now the government is putting forward a bill that is actually going to remove that protection from a child, which could actually lead that individual to be kicked out of their own home. They could be homeless. I just can't understand why the government would do that.

I think this is very important, and members on this side of the House have already said it. I think that we should be really concerned and that the members opposite should be really concerned, because there are many in Alberta who will not stand for this. They will make their voices heard. I know that there are members in my community, people that I represent in my own riding who have already been very vocal on this issue. I'm here to make sure that their voices are heard when it comes to this bill. I want to ask the members opposite to really think about what they're putting forward here and how they are affecting the lives of children, students here in our province of Alberta. Ultimately, we are supposed to make sure that they have a safe place to live, and they should feel safe in their own community.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I think I'll just leave it at that for right now. Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available if anyone would like to make a brief question or comment with respect to the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie's comments. I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was appreciating the comments from my colleague from Edmonton-Ellerslie – thoughtful, measured, and very heartfelt, I thought – and I would appreciate the opportunity to hear him finish his thoughts.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the Member for Edmonton-City Centre. I can only relate what it was like growing up for me. As I've already shared in this House, my family came here, fleeing the violence in Chile, back in 1973. I remember what it was like to be made to feel like the "other." Now, I know that this isn't the majority of Canadians or even Albertans that discriminate against others.

I'll tell you that one of my first memories of being here in Canada – I wasn't even old enough to go to school yet – was being out on the front lawn of my house with my father and my older brother. We were raking up the leaves, and three young boys rode their bikes in front of our house. They remembered my brother, and they yelled at him: go home, you dirty Chilean.

Now, I'm not saying that the majority of Canadians are like this. That's not the intention of my words. What I am saying is that all it takes is one to leave that memory burned into your psyche. I haven't forgotten that day since. I was probably only three or four years old, something like that, but I remember that day. I am never going to forget that day.

That's exactly the kind of dehumanizing attitudes that we're trying to fight against. With this bill we're providing space for people to actually continue doing that same thing but just now in terms of sexual orientation. You're allowing it to happen by putting this bill forward. If you make this legislation, you'll continue to make sure that that kind of discrimination can continue to take place here in this province. That's what you're doing. I ask the government members: is this really what you're about? Is this really what you want to be about?

I can tell you that many constituents of mine are not very pleased with this, and I can only assume that there are constituents of your own that are not happy with this bill being put forward in the House. You're actually allowing this kind of discrimination to continue here in the province of Alberta by putting this bill forward. Even worse, not only are you making sure that the discrimination can continue, but then the people who actually feel that their discrimination is warranted against people on sexual orientation feel that they can now act upon their discrimination, making it even worse.

I've already said it before, during my original statement. You're creating a situation where children will actually be in danger by putting this bill forward. So I'm really asking the government members to give this a sober second thought.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, anyone else wishing to speak to the amendment this evening? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I really appreciate the opportunity to speak to this amendment. As the amendment suggests, it is very important that we take the time to reflect on this bill and the consequences, I think largely unintended consequences – I hope they're unintended consequences – of this bill so that we can ensure that we do the right thing before we enact in a rushed way an ill-considered bill. I want to do that by talking a little bit about the fundamental nature of human rights and the attack on human rights that is implicit in this particular bill.

Now, I think it's important that we start with the notion that human rights are a fundamental part of western democracies. It's a major reason why our societies are better in many ways than many other places in the world where human rights are not noted, are not respected, are not protected within the laws and particularly within constitutional law. It's something that in the past this Legislature has been particularly proud about.

In fact, indeed, it was a Conservative government that brought in the Alberta human rights legislation. I remember members at the time talking about how proud they were to stand up in this House. I'm talking about Conservative members who were proud to stand up in this House and to talk about the fact that they wished to protect human rights, and I celebrate them for that. I think that was something that was well beyond the time it should have been done, and I'm very happy that the Conservative members of this House at the time chose to pursue that.

Now, within our human rights legislation we have over the last number of years arrived at the place where we have clearly said within the province of Alberta and, of course, within the country of Canada that the human rights of members of the gay, lesbian, and transgendered community are to be protected, that it is a fact within human rights that sexual orientation is an article and, therefore, is deserving of the human rights. That's the basis of our concern here today with regard to GSAs.

There's a second part that I think is fundamentally important. I'd like to just read a couple of short lines regarding the nature of human rights. These short lines are in reference to what is referred to as the hollow rights doctrine. I'll read the lines first, and then speak to them. "It is an important doctrine of constitutional law that constitutional rights once granted must not be minimized nor diminished to 'hollow rights'. They must, in all interpretations, be given a large, liberal interpretation." I will of course bring into the House copies of the article I just read from for people to see.

I also want to indicate that that article, called The Guarantee of Catholic Education: The Doctrines of Hollow Rights and Permeation, was written by a lawyer in Edmonton by the name of Kevin Feehan, who was subsequently put on the bench, Queen's Bench, and has just recently been elevated to the Court of Appeal, so obviously a very well versed scholar in the area, actually quite well known for his teaching of constitutional law at the University of Alberta.

The reason I bring this in is that it's really important that we understand what's being said here, that once we have declared that human rights exist and that they are protected under constitutional law, we cannot minimize them or diminish them to hollow rights; that is, we cannot say that, yes, they exist but then act in a way to diminish the actual practice of those rights. We can't do that. And it's fundamentally important that we do that. Otherwise what happens is that minorities and people who are members of minority groups end up having their rights taken away from them.

Now, in this particular case he's speaking about the right of Catholic education in the province of Alberta. He's appeared in front of the Supreme Court on five occasions to protect the rights of Catholic education in the province of Alberta and has been successful on all five occasions. I think we have to hear what it is that we learned from these times spent in front of the Supreme Court of Canada; that is, we protect rights because we have a positive duty to protect the vulnerable, and we have to recognize their rights, and we have to act in such a way that the exercise of those rights is also protected.

What we're saying here is not simply that we identify that gay people have rights to their own sexual orientation, but we also must recognize that they have a right to the expression of their orientation and the protection of their expression. As soon as we start to put a knife into that, then we start to put a knife into all minority groups. Originally this was written about the minority group which was the Catholic school system here in the province of Alberta, but the same concept applies to other minority groups. You must be able to protect their rights as long as their rights, of course, do not infringe upon the well-being of other people. I respect that. There are limitations. We get that.

In this case what we're asking is that gay students have the right to gather together, to be in free association with each other, and to do so without that right being impinged upon by people who do not respect their rights. What we're doing here in this act is that we are essentially trying to say that while we respect the rights of the gay community, we are trying to suffocate the expression of those rights by not allowing them the opportunity to gather together in gay-straight alliances without threat of being outed. That's the concern.

The piece that I want you to reflect on is how much energy over the last 50 years has been put into protecting people's rights to association. If we look at America and we look at the McCarthy era, the whole point of their anti-Americanism doctrine was to out people who disagreed with the majority, and in outing them, of course, people lost their jobs and indeed lost their lives. We as a collective in North America and many other parts of the world quite rightly look back on those eras as terrible times in the protection of human rights. Now we are strongly against those un-American activities commission type of behaviours. Yet in this bill we have just instituted the possibility of exactly that same kind of oppression of a minority group occurring.

Now, we know that it's quite possible even within faith-based communities to meet the requirements of the present legislation that was put in by the former Minister of Education, now the MLA for Edmonton for Edmonton-North West, because it's been done by school boards all across the province. It's been done by faith-based school boards across the province, Catholic schools in Edmonton and Calgary, for example. So we know it's possible.

What we do know, then, is that we have 28 schools, and perhaps there will be others, because part of this act is to create more charter schools, more alternative schools, others who will come and say to the government of Alberta: we know that you have instituted laws that protect human rights, but because we don't like them, we are not going to abide by them. Think about what it is that you're doing when you do that. You are actually supporting people to defy the laws of this province when their personal belief systems go against the underlying human rights notions that we have in western democracies. Now, that's a scary thing for you to be doing as legislators, to be saying that while you will put in laws, you will turn a blind eye to people who are defying those laws in a clear and direct way, standing up publicly and saying: we will not obey that law. When you begin to do that, then you begin to open the door for many, many other oppressions of minorities.

I've got to ask the Education minister: are they prepared to stand up in the House and say that they believe in human rights? Or are they saying that personal belief systems supersede human rights? I'd like to see the Education minister stand up and make a declaration on that. When people are making decisions to defy the human rights of others, will the Education minister have the fortitude to stand up and protect human rights? Or will the concern about gathering votes for the next election supersede the idea of the protection of human rights? It's very important that our legislators are very clear on this kind of thing.

I always want to go back and remind you that we have been through this before. In the United States when the southern states were told that the black people had the same rights as the white people, they tried to do the same thing. They tried to suffocate the actual enactment of the right by saying: yes; the rights are equal but different. In other words, black people could have schools but not go to white schools. That was the whole point of Brown versus – whoever it was. Now I've forgotten.

Mr. Eggen: The Board of Education.

Mr. Feehan: The Board of Education. Thank you.

Do you in fact believe that black people do not have the right to go to the same schools as white people? That's the question at hand. What we decided as democracies is that it is absurd to say that people have rights but they cannot enact those rights and that somehow some people's rights are diminished or devalued as compared to other people's rights.

Yet here we are in this place now suggesting that we are going to open a door, a large door now, to groups of people coming forward and doing the very things which civil rights people in America and many others in Canada have fought against, helping us to create a new modern democracy in which people's human rights are respected. That's the fundamental question underlying this act here. It's not simply finding some kind of nice little balance between these people's beliefs and those people's beliefs. You either believe in human rights or not.

If somebody came along – and I know I have to move into hyperbole sometimes; I've talked about this – and suggested doing something terrible to other people in society, would you stand up and say, "I'm against it"? If they were to suggest, for example, that they were going to physically harm other members of society, that they were going to hurt them, would you stand up and say, "You cannot do that"? Or would you say: "It's a balance. We'll let you harm a few, or you can harm them a little bit, or you can harm them only when they're in your neighbourhood or your school"? Would you put those limitations? Would you allow their rights to become hollow rights? Of course not. You wouldn't do that. If they were asking to do something that you yourselves recognized as absurd or hurtful or harmful, you would be the first to stand up and say that that is not acceptable. But here we are in a place where we're clearly being told that the consequences of outing kids in schools who are part of the gay community is hurtful and harmful.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Under 29(2)(a), I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie standing to speak.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I was so enthralled with the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford in terms of pinpointing specifically not only that people have these human rights but that they must be able to enact them, that they can live them. I think that's so important. I want to ask the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford if he could continue specifically on that, and why standing up to this bill is so important for him and his constituents.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you very much, and thank you to the Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie. I appreciate the opportunity to just say a little bit more.

You've heard my argument around the fundamental human rights that are in danger by proceeding with this act and how it is contrary to the movement of societies and democratic societies for the last 50 years, everything that has happened from the great revolutions of the 1960s forward, where we started to understand and protect individual human rights, and they were actually brought into this Chamber by members of the Conservative Party at the time.

I want to add to that a second piece. Not only do we have a right to respect the laws of human rights and to ensure that they do not become hollow rights and that they're not diminished in any way in their enactment, but more than that, I think that when it comes to a question of rights and the moral imperative behind why we have rights in society, we actually have a positive duty. It's not simply a duty to not trample the rights of others. We have a positive duty, a duty that says that we must act on behalf of and protect and bring up and raise up those people who are most vulnerable. So it's not simply a matter of saying: we won't allow other people to harm you. We actually have the positive duty to ensure your well-being, and I think that's very important in terms of our work as legislators in this House.

We have a duty of protection for minorities because we have learned over the years that majorities have a tendency to diminish the rights of minorities, not always intentionally, but often, as we've seen in the last century or so or two centuries in the western world, sometimes majorities intentionally diminish the rights of minorities. You have to ask yourself: are you okay with that? Are you in a place where you've decided that as long as you've won the vote, as long as you're here with the majority, then other people don't matter? Is that the world in which you want to live? Is that the constitutional democracy that you want to support, or do you believe, as so many people have over the last few hundred years, that we actually bring society to a better place when we proactively recognize the rights of minorities and act to protect them so that they can express themselves, they can enact their rights in a way that they choose to do so?

Of course, on a very basic level of morality you want to make sure that majorities are not allowed to diminish the rights of minorities because someday you likely to be a minority in some way, perhaps the colour of your skin, perhaps the religion you choose to celebrate, perhaps the marriage you choose to enjoin will be viewed by others as outside the majority, as beyond the pale, as they would say in Ireland, in Dublin. So on a very basic level you want to protect minority rights because in some way or somehow you yourselves will be members of a minority in one way or another, and you have to ask yourself . . .

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, any other individuals looking to speak? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre rising.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am always honoured to rise and speak in this place. Tonight as I stand to speak to this bill, I'm honoured to represent the voice of my constituents, but I guess I am also disappointed. I am disheartened. Indeed, there is a part of me that is disgusted at this legislation that I am speaking to here tonight.

Mr. Speaker, I recognize that I enjoy rhetoric. I enjoy making a good and grand speech. I enjoy from time to time indulging even in a bit of hyperbole and taking a bit of poking and fun, but tonight I am going to endeavour to speak honestly about my thoughts on this particular piece of legislation, in particular, on the portion of the legislation which has led us to dub this bill Bill Hate, and I do not use that word lightly. I truly believe that the foundation of the changes that this government is choosing to introduce in what is, frankly, an incredibly underhanded and disingenuous way is ultimately rooted in hatred. Now, that is not hatred that I ascribe to any particular member of this House though I am well aware – and, again, I'm saying this honestly – of at least at times the contempt in which some members of this House hold myself and my colleagues.

I sat in this House today as we had questions to the Minister of Education and some others about this particular bill, and those were passionate questions, Mr. Speaker, with all the same passion and verve that members of this government used to deliver some of their questions from this side of the House on things such as the carbon tax or other things on which they felt passion. I listened to a member of this government referring to us as a gang of thugs, a gang of truth twisters, a gang of bullies, and then again as a vicious gang. It is unfortunate the level of partisanship and vitriol, the amount of political gamesmanship, which, frankly, this Premier has chosen to apply to an issue of such import and which will have such effect on vulnerable youth in our province.

To be clear, Mr. Speaker, the roots of this discussion in this Legislature: it is a history of cowardice on the behalf of the government, on the behalf of the Conservative government of that time. When members of opposition brought forward a bill asking for the simplest of things for students who need peer support, who are in that vulnerable position, simply to have the ability to form a peer support group in their school, that government was afraid. They were afraid of members of their base that they felt would punish them, would grow angry. There were members of that government, indeed, themselves who were resistant to the idea for their particular moral or spiritual beliefs. When they saw that that bill was about to gain momentum and that there was no way they could hide from it, they tried to circumvent it. That was my predecessor, the former MLA for Edmonton-Centre, Ms Laurie Blakeman.

So they brought in their own bill, Bill 10, to try to circumvent and try to bring what they called balance. The Premier at the time, Mr. Jim Prentice, tried to frame Bill 10 as a balance between the rights of LGBTQ students and parents and school boards. The question at that time was really: what had to be balanced? Vulnerable youth simply wanting to create a club in their school where they could be safe: what was there to be afraid of? But that government was afraid, and they attempted to bring forward and attempted to move a bill in this House which was a sham, to try to replace a bill that actually did something to support and protect those youth. Albertans would not have it.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, that was at that time a point of my own political activation, where I had begun to closely watch the politics of this province. I had watched the evolution of that particular government. I had watched the growth of arrogance. I had watched, frankly, what approached corruption, and then this.

What we had, Mr. Speaker, was that finally that government realized what this was going to cost them. They realized that they needed to do something if only to redeem their reputation, to save their electoral prospects, if not actually to do the morally right thing. So we had Bill 10. Yes, it was supported by all parties in this Legislature because it was a darn sight better than the garbage they had initially tried to push, and it was a significant step forward for the rights of LGBTQ youth in this province.

But as others have spoken before me, as the former Minister of Education, the Member for Edmonton-North West, laid out, it became clear that Bill 10 was designed with loopholes big enough to drive a semi-truck through, that it was all too easy and all too possible for any school, any administration that wanted to to simply put up obstruction after obstruction in the face of – let us remember again, Mr. Speaker – vulnerable youth. They were being forced to pit themselves against authorities without the tools to be able to fight back.

So our government took action. We closed those loopholes. We made sure that administration couldn't simply indefinitely delay the formation of a GSA or the appointment of a teacher to help with that GSA. We made it 100 per cent crystal clear what the rules were in terms of revealing a student's participation in a GSA, and teachers thanked us for that clarity.

As we brought forward that legislation and as we had that discussion, we saw the Premier, the then Leader of the Official Opposition, put out disingenuous argument after disingenuous argument, echoed by his members. Indeed, I remember the Member for Calgary-West standing in this House to move an amendment suggesting that GSAs were not, in fact, peer support groups but that they were a secret way for the government to attempt to smuggle in teaching on sexuality, that they were a secret way to smuggle in politics, the gay agenda, Mr. Speaker. That at heart is the paranoia, the conspiracy theory, the false belief that lies at the root of what this Premier, who I believe to be an intelligent enough man that I do not believe he truly believes that, though he has certainly made suggestions on the record about all sorts of other indoctrination that he does believe happens in public schools.

Frankly, we saw members of this House standing up and doing everything they could to misrepresent what a GSA was, I believe, to a certain extent simply for political gain, Mr. Speaker. We saw those same forces mobilize to support the now governing party. We see them revealed in individuals like Mr. John Carpay, who has been praised by his Premier and has had the most reprehensible views on the record, again promoting those same conspiracy theories and false ideas, polluting the public discourse around something that simply exists to support and protect vulnerable young people.

That brings us to where we are here today. We are debating this bill and we are looking at these changes so that the Premier, in my belief, can pay off a favour. Every member in this House that chooses to vote for this bill is choosing to support him in that work.

Mr. Speaker, I endeavour to hold every member of this House in respect and regard. I make every effort, despite the fact that I will proudly fly my party colours and I am proud of the caucus that I sit with, not to engage in cheap partisanship. It gets to me sometimes in the heat of the moment. Sure, I've thrown a heckle or two. I try to honestly give every member in this House the benefit of the doubt in what they believe in and not to judge them for the decisions that they make, but I can tell you that there's no way around this for me. Any member in this House that votes for this bill that allows these provisions regarding gay-straight alliances in the province of Alberta to go forward, rolling back protections for students, exposing them, making it more difficult for them to access a simple safe space – I'm sorry – I will lose respect for that member. This is simply one line that for me I can't cross. This is my line in the sand.

Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, the number of people from the LGBTQ community that came to volunteer on my campaign, specifically stating their fear of this government and what it was going to do to GSAs, the fear of this Premier who indeed has been now called to account, and indeed the estimation even for some of his most Conservative friends dropped, like Mr. Charles Adler – this is shameful what this government is choosing to do. And members can rationalize it. They can try to say, "Well, it's just about finding balance. We just want to make sure that parents have their rights," but then, by all means, bring forward an amendment that principals must immediately grant a GSA when asked. That will not, in any way, abrogate any parents' rights or any individual's beliefs, but it will remove yet another obstacle from the path of young people who are struggling.

The Acting Speaker: Under 29(2)(a) I believe I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday standing to speak.

Mr. Carson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the comments that the Member for Edmonton-City Centre has made, and I really appreciate all of the comments that have been made by all members of the Assembly here this evening from this side of the House.

I know that the member had the opportunity to stand with students at Victoria school in the not-so-distant past with a few other members. Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood was there, a few others, I believe, as well, the leader of our team over here on the Official Opposition, possibly the Member for Edmonton-North West, or definitely the Member Edmonton-North West. But I'm just hoping to find out – I mean, we've heard from the Minister of Education that this bill is in response to people asking for balance and we really haven't heard a clear definition or we haven't been able to find out what that balance is, where that balance is coming from, or who is asking for it and why they felt so strongly the need to weaken the legislation that was already approved by this Assembly. In the member's conversations with the students at that school I'm just hoping to find out if you heard them looking for more balance, how they felt about the idea of weakening this legislation.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I was saying, it is simple enough for this government to demonstrate their goodwill. There are some simple amendments they could make to improve this legislation that would show that they in fact do care about these students, that they are not simply paying the bill for social conservative activists, like Mr. John Carpay and others, who out of a misguided sense of paranoia and conspiracy want to take away this opportunity for young LGBTQ youth. This government has that chance.

My colleague asked about the question of balance. Indeed, that is, I believe, likely the talking point that was handed to the Minister of Education to move forward with. Again, I want to speak honestly tonight, and that is what I truly believe. Frankly, it is an incredibly poor one, Mr. Speaker. Of all of the individuals that I've spoken to from the LGBTQ community, youth who are currently in schools, who came through schools, who participated in a GSA, who wished they had a GSA, not one has come to me and said: "Gee, I wish there had been better balance. I wish somebody would have thought about how my school felt about the word 'gay'." None have come to me and said, "I'm awfully afraid that if I want to tell my parents that I'm part of the GSA, I'm not going to be able to do that." The minister claims she has had young people come to her and say, "We need better balance in how we have GSAs." I would look forward to seeing one of those young people stand with her at a press conference, as we had many young people stand at ours.

This bill is not about balance or at least not about achieving a balance. It's about removing balance. It's about tilting the scales backwards and against the very youth we are saying that we are here to help. That is the effect this bill will have. That is the message this government will send to the LGBTQ community, LGBTQ youth, and their allies in this province. This government and members that vote for this bill will wear that like a scarlet letter, and I, Mr. Speaker, will make sure that Albertans know. This bill deserves to be called Bill Hate.

Speaker's Ruling Parliamentary Language

The Acting Speaker: I would just advise every member in the House that it's the current Speaker's opinion that given that the term was just used for the second time – the first time it seemed more considered. Long story short, the term Bill Hate is currently being reviewed. It's a decision that will be rendered by Speaker Cooper – I believe he mentioned tomorrow – and if that's the case, then I would advise members of this House to be wary about using that word as it could technically become unparliamentary in a past tense if spoken today. I would just mention that my current view of this going forward is that I think it would probably be advisable for individuals to refer to it, perhaps, as Bill 8 or something a little more measured given that it is currently being considered and a decision is coming soon.

Please continue.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. At such time as the Speaker renders his ruling, I will be happy to follow. I would note that looking about this House, I see no disorder.

The Acting Speaker: Okay. I have seen disorder from that. In fact, the reason why I stood up when it was stated the second time was for that exact reason. I would just ask people to be measured with regard to using that term until a decision on it has been rendered.

Debate Continued

The Acting Speaker: Any other members looking to speak to RA1? I believe that the Member for Edmonton-West Henday is currently standing.

Mr. Carson: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's an honour to rise today on behalf of the constituents, well, hopefully, most of the constituents, of Edmonton-West Henday to speak to this motion to delay the passing of this legislation, recognizing that there is a complete lack of consultation that has been done on the bill that is before us. Of course, using the phrase that has been used several times in this House in regard to the name of this bill I understand is under review, whether it's right or not, but I would say and I don't think that it's a stretch to say that this bill is mean spirited.

Now, I was so proud – one of the proudest days in my time as a Member of the Legislative Assembly was when the former minister, the MLA for Edmonton-North West, MLA for Edmonton-Calder at the time, put this bill before us. I had the opportunity to rise in this House and speak about the importance of this legislation to my constituents and to the people that I have met both in my time in high school, and even before that, but also in my time as a member of the Assembly and even through the friendships that I've built through this role.

You know, I've had volunteers come to me, and I shared a story of a volunteer that wanted their story to be told in this Assembly. When Bill 28 was before us, they asked that I speak to the fact that when they were in high school, they were discriminated against because of the way that they identified or the people that they chose to love. Being a member of the LGBTQ community negatively affected them because they didn't have something like a GSA in place at the time. They didn't have legislation to protect them. The story I shared went into some detail about the discrimination that they faced, about the sexual abuse that they faced by other students. I spoke about the fact that they had a home situation where their parents were not accepting of the way that they identified, and they had counsellors at school that did not understand how they identified. Even when they wanted to come out, even when they wanted somebody to talk to, there was no one for them to have these discussions with.

Now, I have concerns with the fact that over the last few weeks discussions of conversion therapy have been before us. The Minister of Health has said that they recognize the fact that conversion therapy discriminates against segments of our community, and that minister thinks it's wrong. Yet here we are debating a piece of legislation that is likely to push more people into situations like conversion therapy. Here, once again, we have other ministers, ministers that were happy to raise the pride flag – and I'm happy that they're willing to recognize sometimes the rights of the LGBTQ community. I'm sure that that's going to offend that member, but the fact is that they are going to stand with this government and they are going to support a piece of legislation that weakens the rights of the LGBTQ community, that weakens the responsibility and the role of educators to protect those students. So, no; I'm sorry. You don't get to be an ally if you don't stand with the community at every opportunity that you get. You don't get to be an ally if you're going to abstain from certain parts of the conversation because you had supporters or volunteers that got you here that you now owe something to. That's not acceptable.

Now, there are many flaws with this legislation before us. Of course, we've heard a great deal of conversation about how it's going to weaken GSAs. When Bill 24 was introduced, it was introduced recognizing that there were instances – many schools were already following these policies, and they were willing to support GSAs, gay-straight alliances. They were willing to recognize that this population was being discriminated against and that something needed to be done, but that wasn't the case in all schools or with all school boards, so something had to be done. We saw instances where, when requested, GSAs weren't being created and other instances where GSAs were trying to have meetings, and for whatever reason rooms were being booked over when they were trying to have meetings. Other times they were just told that they weren't allowed to.

It's very concerning for this piece of legislation to come before us and be touted as finding some balance. Really, I question the Education minister. I want to know where this balance is. I want to know who is telling them that something was wrong with the system. When I went to a local school in my community, I stood with the students at Michael Phair school. Now, it's not lost on me, the symbolism of going to Michael Phair school and standing with them as they walked out against what they knew was coming in this piece of legislation.

Now, of course, other pieces of this legislation in regard to creating recall mechanisms for trustees are also very concerning. Just like any member of this Assembly, board members to local school boards are elected democratically, so I'm very concerned that we're going to start having conversations about being able to recall trustees, especially in an instance like this. If one of these trustees stands up against this harmful policy that this government is trying to implement, and the rest of the board stands with this government for whatever reason, there might be a concern of being recalled. That's very concerning to me. I think that people are elected democratically, and that vote should be recognized and respected.

Now, what is just as concerning is the fact that this government is leaving a bunch of the oversight in this legislation up to regulations. They're saying: "Don't worry. Trust us. We'll get it right after the fact. We can't tell you the details right now, but trust us." That's very concerning to me.

One of the main issues – and this is a discussion that we had in the 29th Legislative Assembly – is around school transportation. The 2.4-kilometre limit on being able to get your child access to transportation was a major concern to people in my community, people in Westview Village, the mobile-home community in Edmonton-Meadowlark at the time but Edmonton-West Henday now, that I have the honour of representing. They were concerned because they were being left out, and they were paying for yellow bus services. We were able to fix that, but now this piece of legislation that's before us is saying: "We'll figure it out after. In due course we'll figure that piece out."

And once again with the school fees. We worked very hard to reduce school fees. Once again: "In regulation. We'll figure it out." Well, when we have a budget that's not being presented until the fall, that's very concerning to hear the minister say: "Wait and see. Wait and see."

Now, we're seeing an underlying message coming from this government, whether it be with Bill 2, taking away pay from people under 18 years old, when we talk about the unwillingness of this government to stop conversion therapy from happening in this province, and with this bill before us talking about taking the rights of the LGBTQ community away from them. I'm very concerned with the direction of this government. I'm concerned that there is an effort or at least a perceived effort to attack kids. That is not your role as a government, to start taking rights, start taking pay away from youth in our province, and they are going to be very upset with you. Well, they already are.

I really don't know where this legislation is coming from. They were elected on economy, jobs, pipelines. They said that they were not going to focus on social issues; those were a distraction. Yet here we are in the first weeks of our first sitting, and they're taking the rights away from the LGBTQ community. They're taking pay away from young Albertans. It's very concerning that those are your top priorities.

The Acting Speaker: I hesitate – I truly hesitate – to interrupt the hon. member, but having taken a look at the amendment, RA1, that we're looking at right now, the idea here is Bill 8. This is the amendment itself.

Bill 8, Education Amendment Act, 2019, be not now read a second time because the Assembly is of the view that further time is necessary to enable school boards to adjust their policies to comply with the proposed legislation and regulations.

I just want to ensure that we stay within the realm of this, because there will be opportunity to discuss the bill. There will be ample opportunity for that. That way we might be able to just move towards that as well.

Mr. Carson: Well, I appreciate that very much, Mr. Speaker, and I was getting to that point.

I think that it's important. I would argue that this legislation is rushed. I would argue that there has not been adequate time to consult with Albertans, which brings me back to the amendment. I think that there needs to be more time for school boards to work with this legislation. I think that there needs to be more time for teachers and school administrators to work with this. A lot of time and effort went into putting Bill 24 under scrutiny in terms of making sure that school boards were following the legislation to the T and respecting the law.

Now, the majority of elected school board trustees across the province were not around when the original Education Act was debated, so it's incredibly important that they have an opportunity to review what these changes mean to them and to their school boards.

Now, once again, Mr. Speaker, I want to just wrap back to the importance of consulting with everyone. You know, the opportunity that I had to go to local schools when we were first elected, I went with the then Minister of Education, once again the MLA for Edmonton-North West, to my high school, Jasper Place high school. They had a GSA at the time. They still do. Very inclusive, very supportive of the LGBTQ community, and I imagine that they were one of the earliest adopters of the legislation even before the legislation was in place. If we can get to a place where every school – I really don't understand why it's so hard to respect the rights of students.

When I had the opportunity to go to Jasper Place high school, when I had the opportunity to go to Michael Phair school, none of these students were saying that there was an imbalance of the legislation that was before them. So once again I would ask the Minister of Education – and I appreciate that that minister has been here to hear our concerns and take them into consideration. I really hope that the minister will support this amendment to delay this, to give school boards more opportunity to review this legislation.

I would also ask the other ministers that this legislation affects, as I said, the Minister of Health, the minister in charge of ensuring the end to conversion therapy, which they say that they support the end of – the minister of housing, who will have to house these vulnerable youth that, if they are outed by a school, God forbid, and they don't have a supportive relationship with their family or at least in the context of coming out to them, if they are pushed onto the street, what does that mean for the minister of housing? What does it mean for the minister of labour? I would appreciate it if we heard some more from ministers of this government on why they think that there needs to be a better balance here, why they didn't support the legislation in Bill 24, and why they think that this is strengthening opportunities for the LGBTQ community.

Mr. Speaker, you know, I think that members on this side of the House in the opposition have done a really good job of explaining why this legislation is not going to better the relationship between the LGBTQ community and school administrators or school board trustees. I think that they've done a good job of respecting the fact that this is a very sensitive situation, and while we always need to respect the rights of parents, it is just as important to respect the rights of the youth of our province.

The Acting Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. I believe the hon. Member for Edmonton-North West is ...

Mr. Eggen: Well, thanks, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the comments from the hon. member. You know, it's kind of a trip down memory lane in a way, but these are important memories because it helps me to reconstruct both just how difficult it was to move and get Bill 24 on board, but how successful it was, right? Sometimes, you know, the best things in life are the most difficult to achieve, and this was one of those cases, for sure.

You know, the hon. member is in a unique situation compared to me, certainly. He could visit his old high school, which is Jasper Place high, with me ...

Mr. Carson: They'd think I'm a student.

Mr. Eggen: One of the teachers grabbed him and said: get back to class. No. That didn't happen.

... you know, within a period of a number of years and go back to that same place and see how things had changed over time, right? What I've heard from anecdotal evidence is that in schools that have strong GSAs and QSAs, the overall feeling of belonging and sort of safety and security is enhanced by the presence of a GSA. So it doesn't matter if the kids belong to it or not, but they know they can see that vulnerable kids that need help and need some safe sanctuary are being looked after and respected in the school, thus, by association, they can feel more respected and looked after in general, too. Maybe they're not part of a GSA or QSA, but they can see that: "Here we are. We're in a caring environment. This is happening around me, and I feel safe and secure by proxy." You know what I mean?

I'm just curious to know. You can remember, hon. member, us going to visit there. You probably went there a few other times, too, because you represented the area. How did you see the change and the development of a safe and caring school environment not just for the members of the GSA and the QSA, which are quite strong at Jasper Place, but for the whole school population? Let's not forget that Jasper Place high school has the largest school population in the entire province. It's like the size of a small town. It's, like, 3,000-some kids. That's a pretty good sample size to test this theory, that GSAs and QSAs don't just save lives of vulnerable LGBTQ-plus kids but also help to create a more safe and caring environment for everybody.

Could you help me with that?

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday.

Mr. Carson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the Member for Edmonton-North West. I'm sure the member was asking that rhetorically because he spent a lot of time in schools as well. I'm very proud of the work that he did not only on this file but on all files, so I do thank him for that work.

You could definitely see a change. I mean, I will give a plug, actually. This year is my 10-year anniversary of graduating from high school in 2009. You know, I had the opportunity to see the change over the last 10 years. Even though while I was attending Jasper Place high school in 2009 – I was in grade 12 – and it was only a short period of time, as the conversation around supporting and protecting the LGBTQ community, you know, went on, you could see it reflected in the population of the school. As more people became allies to this population, it opened up the conversation for other people, too.

Overall, it just made people more inclusive and it made people respect that we all come from different places. We all have different values, to some extent. We should be free to love the people we want or to identify how we want. That's an important part of the conversation.

In this legislation – once again, it's incredibly important that we delay this, not only because of the repercussions of school boards and administrators not understanding what this legislation before them implicates but also the fact that it is turning back the clock. That is the exact opposite thing of what we should be doing. We need to show the province of Alberta that we are allies. If we are going to call ourselves allies, then we need to show it as well.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview standing; however, it is my understanding that because the amendment was moved by Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview on behalf of Edmonton-Riverview, it counts as though you have already spoken to this amendment.

Do I see any others looking to speak to amendment RA1? Anyone? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadows.

Mr. Deol: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As much as I have tried to, you know, go through notes and listen to my colleagues on this side of the House and also the members opposite, I really want to support the amendment that my colleague moved yesterday.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Looking at all this, to me it did not really show that we are going through a crisis or we are in a situation that we can call an emergency that this bill has to address, so this amendment, to me, is a very, very reasonable proposal. It would help not only the school board, to give them time to adjust to the policies, but I also think it will provide opportunity to the stakeholders to give more input. As this bill states, the stakeholders – one of the most affected communities are the students, the children – have not been consulted while preparing the bill. They're the ones who are going to feel the biggest effect after this bill is passed.

Generally speaking – I don't know – I even have some problems understanding what the heck we are trying to address through this bill. GSA, QSA: why are we so afraid of these two names? How do we interpret, like, that this is a GSA or friendship group? When we are moving forward, is this the kind of example that we're going to just set or the signal that we're going to give to our community and to our children, that they are not able to be friends with the people or their colleagues or their classmates in the school?

It seems like this is something the members opposite are really, really offended by, without coming up with real proof that GSAs and QSAs, you know – why are they so offended? What real danger do they have in reflecting to the school boards or schools or the democratic institution itself? They have provided protection to the most vulnerable children in school.

I think the government has a duty to serve the public, serve the society. The right to live, the right to be free from harm are their fundamental rights. They should have actually moved forward to protect the children. In this case, it seems like every single act they have proposed in this act is actually weakening the protections of the GSAs and QSAs.

The other thing I've seen proposed in this bill is, basically – I don't know – an attack on democratic institutions, you know, or I will call it more of an attack on public sectors, maybe, as it says that it's enhancing the ordered requirements for school boards and it has language respecting the prior rights of parents with respect to their children's education and it creates recall mechanisms for trustees that were democratically elected members to the board.

On the contrary, it removed the cap on charter schools, so it changes the requirements for establishing charter schools and extends rules on the fees of charter schools. And my colleagues, you know, mentioned how it's going to affect the children's ability to access the buses to school given that the changes were made so the students can, you know, qualify for the school buses and some of the moves the prior government has made to make education more affordable by eliminating the fees.

It didn't really seem like kind of the challenges and emergencies, basically, we are facing in this province that the urgency of this government is – seeing that they want to pass this bill right away when my colleagues just didn't really ask that. They asked to give it more time so that it will provide opportunity to stakeholders, the parents and teachers, to participate in the consultation process.

I really, you know, want to support the amendment as it reads on this.

Bill 8, Education Amendment Act, 2019, be not now read a second time because the Assembly is of the view that further time is necessary to enable school boards to adjust their policies to comply with the proposed legislation and regulations.

I really wanted to actually support this amendment, and I ask my colleagues and the members of this House to please support this amendment. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. Certainly, you know, I concur with the comments from my colleague here. You know, the amendment speaks to, really, the rushed way in which the UCP government is ramming this bill through. Having sober thought, a good consultation, things that he spoke of: I mean, that is just so important to us making sure that we have legislation – education is a very important area that we as the provincial government are responsible for and, of course, making sure that human rights are upheld in our province. That's also significant and important. I mean, there is much to be reviewed if, you know, just with one fell swoop this UCP government is now going to not make GSAs mandatory.

It's very important because we know that GSAs make a big difference not only for students in the LGBTQ community but also students who are just of the regular population. I know that the hon. member is concerned about people being treated well, so we want to make sure that all students are. So students who are part of a GSA – not only does it reduce suicide for LGBTQ students but also all students. Specifically, this research study that I was looking at that needs to be part of the consultation process says that, you know, male students who are heterosexual are also very much impacted by that. It makes a difference for them because it's a more inclusive environment. All are welcome. All people's human rights are upheld. It's just such a fundamental right in our society.

It's really a travesty what's going on here in this Legislature. You know, on this side of the House we're very proud of the work that we did on this issue. We know it saves lives, not only LGBTQ students but all students. I just thank the member very much for his contributions, and I just want to give him an opportunity to say a few more words.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadows.

Mr. Deol: Madam Speaker, thank you for giving me the opportunity to give me time to elaborate on what I was trying to say on this. You know, my biggest challenge: I am also refraining from saying something and trying to find the parliamentary language when I'm trying to express my views on anything I have to rise and say and give my views on in the House. Bill 8, I'll say this, is – I don't know. It's very hard for me to understand, basically. It's an attack on fundamental rights, and we say I don't know what kind of...

Ms Sigurdson: Do you want to read the study?

Mr. Deol: I can read this. I'm proud to be in the NDP caucus and working with my colleagues on this side of the House. This is not something, how would I say, if I get friends with my opposite members, Member for Calgary-McCall, on those days when we were discussing. And what we are afraid of in GSAs when it says: how do you interpret it? That's the biggest thing that's bothering me. Going forward in the 21st century it's right to mingle around, talk to your friend, and defend your friend in case of somebody's bullying after you see that your friend is in danger if you want to enjoy your time together. To address this issue – I don't know why this became so prevalent an issue for this government.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other speakers to the amendment? The hon. Member for Edmonton...

Mr. Dang: South.

The Deputy Speaker: South West.

Mr. Dang: South. Just south.

The Deputy Speaker: Just south?

Mr. Dang: Just south. No west this time. It's okay, Madam Speaker. It's getting a little bit late in the night tonight. I'm always pleased to rise and speak no matter how you name me.

Madam Speaker, it is really a great pleasure to be here tonight with the rest of my colleagues in the Assembly to speak to Bill 8, or perhaps Bill Hate, which really is something that is so unique in...

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. member, we're on the amendment.

Mr. Dang: Sorry. On the reasoned amendment to Bill Hate.

It is really something that I think is so important that we really do take a deep dive into in this Assembly. The amendment makes it very clear that we do need to have more time available to school boards to make sure their policies are going to be able to comply with the proposed legislation and the regulations, that I'm sure will be forthcoming from the minister.

I think that this is important because we can look at, really, the lack of consultation that happened, and we can see that we saw different school boards across the entire province come out and say, "Well, yes, there are good things that the government decided to do in terms of changing some of the numbers around here and there," but it would have been nice if they'd gotten a phone call to let them know it was coming. We heard that from the Alberta School Boards Association, we heard that from a number of the major boards in this province as well, and I think it's very clear the government didn't do their homework.

I think this has become a recurring theme in this Assembly, Madam Speaker. I think it's becoming a common sight that the government really doesn't put in the work required to make sure their bills are ready to go, to make sure that their bills are well thought out, to make sure their bills are written properly, and to make sure that all the relevant stakeholders have been consulted. This is something that we've seen time and time again.

I really do want to thank the hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview for bringing forward this amendment, because I think it's something that's very important. Legislators have a duty to make sure that our legislation will work for the people it affects. I believe school boards and families are the people that this will affect, and none of those people were consulted when the government brought this forward.

I mean, really, clearly, we can see that the protections that Bill 8 would take away from vulnerable Albertans and vulnerable youth are quite substantial, and I think it speaks so clearly to how little the government either went out to seek advice or perhaps how little they listened. But, really, there needs to be more time to make sure that these policies and adjustments are possible. What is going to happen is that we are going to have some significantly weakened legislation that really does not protect gay-straight alliances or queer-straight alliances in this province, and that's something where we need to take a step back and let school boards understand the ramifications and let families understand the ramifications and let vulnerable youth understand the ramifications, Madam Speaker.

When we look at the bill and we look at how significantly this legislation will roll back the protections for the students, when we look at how significantly this will weaken them and how far behind other jurisdictions in Canada this will put us, it is something that is very concerning for all members of the opposition here and, I hope, for members of the government as well, that they would be concerned that this puts us behind the pack in protecting gay kids.

Madam Speaker, it's very important today that I use the word "gay" and the word "queer" because they are words, I believe, that are essential to the identity of so many Albertans that this legislation ostensibly is supposed to protect. Bill Hate: what it actually does is that it rolls back those protections.

We know that the Minister of Education took many days before she was comfortable enough to say those words. I'm here to reassure her that those words will not in fact affect her in any way. She should feel comfortable using those words, and perhaps the Premier should feel comfortable using those words as well. Gay-straight alliances and queer-straight alliances matter, and consultation with school boards needs to be done to ensure that we get them right. If the minister felt that it wasn't important enough to consult on this issue or that students didn't matter enough to be consulted on this issue or that vulnerable Albertans really didn't need to have a say, that gay kids themselves didn't need to have a say, then that's the minister's prerogative, Madam Speaker, but I really think that that's something we should all be concerned about in this Assembly. It's something that we shouldn't encourage in this Assembly.

That's why this amendment is so important, because it allows us to slow down and re-evaluate the implications of this. The implications of rushing through this legislation and this dangerous ideology will hurt LGBTQ2S-plus youth all across this province and all across the education system. Really, this act to destroy gay-straight alliances is something that we really shouldn't condone, so we really should be spending that time to make sure that we understand what it actually does and that school boards have the opportunity to understand what it actually does.

When the minister spoke about how this bill was introduced almost a decade ago now, she spoke about how timely it was because it was almost a decade old. Madam Speaker, I was still in primary school when this bill was first introduced in this Assembly. I think I've come a long way since then, but I think that certainly the people that were consulted then perhaps aren't around now, and the people that were involved in GSAs back then perhaps are now lobbying to make sure we can get more GSAs put into this province and perhaps fighting against this very bill. I think it's very important that we have these conversations today in this Assembly. I think it's very important that we look at this bill and say that this reasoned amendment makes sense. It's something that we should move forward with. We should slow down this bill, and we should look what the actual implications are.

Gay kids matter, and that's one of the reasons that we're here, to stand up for all Albertans. It doesn't matter whether they're gay. It doesn't matter whether they're queer. I hope every single member of this Assembly will get up and at least say those words. I know it will make some members uncomfortable to say those words, but, Madam Speaker, I think it's important that they're recorded in Hansard here today. We know as the Official Opposition and I hope all legislators in this Assembly know that these are the people that we're trying to fight for. These are the people that this bill needs to protect, and it doesn't do that job. It doesn't do the job of protecting vulnerable youth, and that is something that is very concerning. That's why we need to slow down and take the further time that's necessary to enable boards to adjust to and comply with this legislation.

But, really, Madam Speaker, Bill Hate does not allow any of this to happen. Bill Hate puts us behind the pack. It puts us, in fact, well behind many other provinces' legislation, and that's something that we should not be standing for here in Alberta. We should not be standing here and letting gay kids down. We should not be standing here and watching our students across this entire province having to walk out of their classrooms to protest this minister's risky, ideological, and dangerous policies. That's something that's very concerning.

[The Speaker in the chair]

I know the Premier thinks that students shouldn't be politicking on their time, but students understand – perhaps they understand even more than this minister understands – how detrimental this bill will be, how detrimental and how dangerous this bill will be. I think it's something that we should be very concerned about. If students are concerned about it, then the Education minister should be concerned about it because the Education minister's job is indeed to ensure that these students have the best possible and safest learning environments, and the GSA legislation that's being brought in in Bill 8 really does not do that job. It really lets every single student down. It certainly lets every single gay student down and every single queer student down, and that's something that the minister should be concerned about. It's the minister's job and the minister's duty to protect these students and ensure they have a good education. It is the minister's job to ensure that.

This amendment allows us to go back and look at why the minister is failing to do that job, Mr. Speaker, because very clearly the minister has failed. The minister has absolutely failed to help protect GSAs in this province. When we look at this legislation, we can see very clearly that students across this province are outraged. They are standing up against this government, and they do not believe in the risky, ideological decisions of this government.

Mr. Speaker, I think, very clearly, this amendment absolutely needs to be passed. This is the right amendment at this time to move forward. It allows us to have a strong framework to begin figuring out how we can protect gay kids in the future, and that's why I'm going to encourage all members of this Assembly to vote for that amendment.

I'd also like to move that we adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Government Motions

The Speaker: I see the hon. Government House Leader is rising to ask for unanimous consent.

Mr. Jason Nixon: That is correct, Mr. Speaker. I request unanimous consent to waive Standing Order 39(1) to move a motion to rescind Government Motion 14, agreed to on June 11, 2019.

The Speaker: Hon. members, it is important that we listen closely to the direction of the Speaker over the next few minutes or so. I will ask only one question. Is anyone opposed to granting unanimous consent?

[Unanimous consent granted]

17. Mr. Jason Nixon moved:
Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly rescind its approval of Government Motion 14, agreed to on June 11, 2019.

The Speaker: Hon. members, the hon. Government House Leader has moved a motion. This is a debatable motion. If anyone has any reason to debate, please feel free to do so now.

[Government Motion 17 carried]

The Speaker: I see that the hon. Government House Leader is rising, perhaps to move unanimous consent.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, you are correct, Mr. Speaker. I believe that if you seek it, you will find unanimous consent for the following motion. I request unanimous consent to waive Standing Order 39(1) to move a motion to rescind Government Motion 15, agreed to on June 11, 2019.

[Unanimous consent granted]

The Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader is rising to move a motion.

18. Mr. Jason Nixon moved:
Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly rescind its approval of Government Motion 15, agreed to on June 11, 2019.

The Speaker: Hon. members, the hon. Government House Leader has moved a motion to rescind Government Motion 15, agreed to on June 11, 2019. This is a debatable motion. Anyone wishing to add to the debate?

[Government Motion 18 carried]

The Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader I believe is rising to ask for unanimous consent.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, I believe that if you seek it, you will find unanimous consent to revert to Notices of Motions.

[Unanimous consent granted]

Notices of Motions

The Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that, I will move the following motion:

Be it resolved that the message from Her Honour the Administrator, the 2019-20 interim supply estimates, and all matters connected therewith be referred to Committee of Supply.

The Speaker: Thank you for providing notice to the Assembly.

The hon. Government House Leader would like to move oral notice of perhaps Government Motion 20.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, I'm glad we're on the same page, Mr. Speaker. That's always helpful. I will move the following motion, that I just provided oral notice for, which is:

Be it resolved that pursuant to Standing Order 61(2) the Committee of Supply shall be called to consider the 2019-20 interim supply estimates for three hours on Tuesday, June 18, 2019.

The Speaker: Hon. Government House Leader, I feel like perhaps we've made some good progress in the last few minutes. Do you have any other motions that you might like to move?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, we are on a roll, so with that, first of all, pursuant to Standing Order 3(1.2) I will advise the Assembly that there shall be no morning sittings for the following days: Thursday, June 13, 2019; Tuesday, June 18, 2019; Wednesday, June 19, 2019; and Thursday, June 20, 2019.

With that, I will move to adjourn the Assembly until tomorrow, Thursday, June 13, at 1:30 p.m.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 9:59 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Thursday, June 13, 2019

Prayers

The Speaker: The prayer. Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and her government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideas but, laying aside all private interests and prejudice, keep in mind the responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all. Amen.

Please be seated.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Hon. members, joining us today in the galleries: from the constituency of Camrose, let us welcome the Holden elementary school and, from the constituency of Strathcona-Sherwood Park, the Strathcona Christian academy. Please feel free to welcome our students.

Those seated in the gallery, I invite you to rise when you hear your name or a reasonable facsimile of your name. Hon. members, if you'll keep your applause till the end as we do have a number of guests with us. Guests of the Member for Calgary-Klein: Mr. Kishore Kumar, Mr. Nash Kooner, Mr. Garry Bhandal. Guest of the Member for Calgary-Falconridge: Mr. Kal Toor. Guests of the Member for Edmonton-West Henday: Alice Nycholat and Nancy Steward. Guests of the Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods: Gil McGowan, Siobhán Vipond, Heather Smith, Brad Readman, Mike Parker, Greg Jeffery, Guy Smith, Rory Gill, Jolene Armstrong, Karen Weiers, Brendan Bruce, Jerry Toews, Guy Desforges, Joy Correia, Susan Slade, Brendan Van Alstine, and Bonnie Gostola.

Members, please welcome them to the Assembly today.

Members' Statements

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

World Elder Abuse Awareness Day

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. When door-knocking in my constituency, I talk to many seniors who required family, friends, and sometimes a stranger to assist them with their day to day, whether that be shovelling the walk, repairs around the house, their finances, or even, in some cases, help with preparing her will. This requires significant trust on behalf of our seniors. That is why it is so devastating to hear of the many cases of elder abuse in Alberta.

On Saturday, June 15, people all over our province will lift their voices against elder abuse as we recognize World Elder Abuse Awareness Day. We must speak openly and honestly about the terrible reality that many of our seniors face. We do so to reduce the stigma and to let people in our communities who are affected know that they are not alone and that there is help available.

On Friday my colleague the Minister of Seniors and Housing will recognize World Elder Abuse Awareness Day here in Edmonton. It will be an important moment to help us continue raising awareness about how we are all affected when older people are mistreated. Our government will continue working with our civil society partners to prevent and end abuse.

On Saturday please join me, Albertans, Canadians, and the entire world in raising the visibility of this issue. I encourage all of you proudly to wear purple, the colour of World Elder Abuse Awareness Day, and stand against elder abuse. Let us work together to end elder abuse and do our best for the safety and well-being of Alberta seniors.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Public Service Front-line Workers

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of workers. I stand in support of every teacher that stays after the bell to go help a student with their math homework. I stand in support of every nurse that spends some extra time at the bedside of an elderly patient who's just looking for someone to talk to or show that they care. I stand in support of every emergency responder who puts themselves in harm's way to keep us safe. I stand in support of the caseworkers, the counsellors, the firefighters, the paramedics, the front lines, the working-class heroes. You name it, I stand in support of them all.

What I do not stand in support of is a government that would vilify these dedicated individuals. I do not stand in support of a government who would break the law and rip up contracts that protect workers' rights, Albertans who work very hard every day to feed their families. I do not stand in support of picking the pockets of Alberta families to pay for a $4.5 billion tax giveaway that will do nothing to put dinner on the table in homes across Alberta.

I urge the government members in their caucus – many of them, I think, secretly worry about the state of their schools and hospitals in their constituencies when this Premier and this Finance minister are through – to think long and hard about who they stand in support of.

We know where we stand, and we stand on this side of the House with the workers of Alberta.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Athabasca-Barrhead-Westlock.

Farmers

Mr. van Dijken: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm honoured to rise in this Assembly and celebrate the compelling history of Alberta farmers. In 1951 the government of Alberta recognized the importance of setting aside every second Friday in June to honour farmers from across Alberta.

I am proud to be one of those farmers. Rural Alberta has been home for me for my entire life, and I feel blessed to have had the opportunity to raise my family on the farm and among the rural community.

Communities and businesses from across Alberta thank local farmers for their contributions to our province. Simply put, farmers feed the world, and the fruits of their labour serve to nourish our souls. Unsurprisingly, Alberta farmers demonstrate distinction in their profession and have repeatedly proven themselves to be models of agricultural efficiency. Alberta farmers are not only innovators; we are also shrewd and rational businesspeople who have contributed to the Alberta economy just as expertly as to the crops and the livestock we tend. There is something very special about producing safe, nutritious, and sustainable food. As farmers we are the proud caretakers of our land and livestock.

Mr. Speaker, agriculture is Alberta's second-largest industry but is by far the largest renewable industry we have and the backbone of our economy. We understand that 20, 50, 100 years from now the world will still need Alberta farmers to feed them, likely more so than ever before. As such, we implement the most sustainable farming practices possible to ensure a strong and healthy future for all Albertans for generations to come.

Mr. Speaker, may God bless all of our farmers this growing season. If you ate today, remember to thank a farmer.

Rural Health Services

Mr. Loewen: Throughout my constituency and northwestern Alberta in general the accessibility of health services continues to be a pressing concern. Residents in rural Alberta understand that rural health care does not fit a one-size-fits-all model. Of course, we know that there are unique challenges we face delivering health services to rural and remote populations. We face issues such as longer wait times to make appointments and wait longer for ambulance services at times. Rural Albertans are often forced to subsidize the cost of their care by travelling long distances to services centralized far away from home. Some of these are the unavoidable result of geography and sparser population.

But I believe that innovative solutions exist and that this government is committed to finding them. Rural health care requires different solutions than in larger, urban settings. In the rural north we require the ability to make local decisions to improve the delivery of our services. We require flexibility to attract skilled professionals and incentivize them to come to our smaller towns.

I will continue to work with this new government to find ways that rural health care can be adaptive and responsive to our needs. I know that by involving various health professionals and looking into other opportunities, we can provide timely care that rural Albertans need. There are solutions to be found, and we need to continue to consult, listen, and react to these ideas. Simply improving access to a family doctor can avoid many costly hospital visits.

I have had productive conversations with both the ministers of Health and Infrastructure. We have discussed how our valuable tax dollars can be allocated more efficiently in order to get the care we need while keeping costs reasonable. We have discussed increasing flexibility in local decision-making to allow the outside-the-box solutions to be considered. I have toured the new Grande Prairie hospital, an important hub for care in the Peace Country, to discuss how this project can be effectively and quickly brought to completion, and I have spoken to the minister of seniors to talk about how we can keep our loved ones closer to their home communities in their elder years. I know that in this government we have both a true voice for rural health care and a committed listener.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Albertans

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday the Member for Taber-Warner stood in this House and implied that the majority of the opposition caucus members were outsiders to Alberta. This is the same member who bragged about, quote, superior stock of certain groups and admitted his comments, quote, reeked of Aryan overtones. I am disturbed that the member opposite appeared to be sending a signal about which members of this Assembly are true Albertans based on how long they've lived here. It is deeply disappointing to see this government continue to use coded language, fear, and division to imply that some people are not true Albertans, that there are outsiders whose voices are less worth listening to because of when they came here or, perhaps, the way they look.

Of course, it is extra rich because this is the party whose own leader was not born here, a party that shipped in candidates from Ottawa to run in Alberta, including one candidate who had to step down over white supremacist comments, and a party that is full of senior staff from Ottawa and outside of Alberta. By highlighting the opposition caucus members who moved to Alberta from other provinces or countries but failing to point out that the same is true of many members in his own caucus, it was clear that the member was using coded language to send a message. I've heard the members across the aisle complain about identity politics. Maybe it's time they looked in the mirror.

Mr. Speaker, all Albertans who are not indigenous to this land came to Alberta from other places to enjoy opportunity, freedom, and the beauty of this province. On this side of the aisle we believe in our duty to listen to the voices of all Albertans, not to pick and choose between insiders and outsiders. Whether someone came to our beautiful province a year ago or whether their family has been here for generations, all people should be welcomed and deserve to be represented in this House. This government would be wise to remember that. But I can assure Albertans that my colleagues on this side of the House absolutely do.

Filibuster of June 5 to 6

Ms Rosin: Mr. Speaker, it is my honour to rise in the House today to discuss the learning experience that I underwent in the last week of my life. I came into politics knowing that the NDP and I had very different world views, but over the course of a 24-hour filibuster last week it became clear just how different those world views are.

I believe in democracy and free enterprise. After that marathon I can confidently say that our opposition does not. You see, governments typically filibuster to raise awareness on things the public may not be fully aware of. For example, Rand Paul filibustered to raise awareness of drone strikes on American soil, but the NDP: no; they filibustered a campaign promise. Nothing disrespects democracy and the voice of the people more than filibustering the very things that the largest number of Albertans in Albertan history just voted on with resounding support. There are no surprises in the legislation we are putting forward. Albertans knew what they were getting into when they voted for us at the polls, and it is a shame that our opposition would rather tell Albertans that they are wrong than listen to them.

It has also become clear to me just this last week how differently myself and the NDP view free enterprise. Time and time again, members of the opposition insulted job creators, assuming the worst in their character, and called our tax cut a giveaway. How socialist. They truly believe that every dollar Albertans earn and every dollar Albertan businesses generate belong to the government, not those who raised it. A tax cut is not a government revenue giveaway because that money that hard-working Albertans raise was never the government's money in the first place. Governments are not entitled to our money. Governments exist to serve the people; people don't exist to serve the government. Perhaps your opposition would have been a little more satisfied with the outcome of the democracy had they come to realize this.

Mr. Speaker, respect for democracy and free-enterprise spirit are what made Alberta the great place it is to live today. After listening to our opposition's rhetoric for 24 hours too many last week, I can confidently say that there's a reason that voters sent such a clear message at the polls in April, and I am confident that our United Conservative government will be the ones on the right side of history.

Presenting Reports by Standing and Special Committees

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Mr. Ellis: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As chair of the Standing Committee on Private Bills and Private Members' Public Bills I am pleased to table the committee's final report on Bill 201, Protection of Students with Life-threatening Allergies Act, sponsored by the hon. Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville. This bill was referred to the committee on May 30, 2019. The committee's final report recommends that Bill 201, Protection of Students with Life-threatening Allergies Act, proceed. I request concurrence of the Assembly in the final report on Bill 201, Protection of Students with Life-threatening Allergies Act.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, the motion for concurrence in the report is debatable pursuant to Standing Order 18(1)(b). Are any members wishing to speak to the motion for concurrence?

Seeing none, the chair of the Standing Committee on Private Bills and Private Members' Public Bills has requested concurrence in the report on Bill 201. Does the Assembly agree to the report?

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Speaker: Any opposed, please say no. In my opinion, the ayes have it. That is carried and ordered.

The hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As deputy chair of the Standing Committee on Private Bills and Private Members' Public Bills I am pleased to table the committee's final report on Bill 202, Child, Youth and Family Enhancement (Protecting Alberta's Children) Amendment Act, 2019, sponsored by the hon. member to my right, Calgary-West. This bill was referred to the committee on May 30, 2019. The committee's final report recommends that Bill 202, Child, Youth and Family Enhancement (Protecting Alberta's Children) Amendment Act, 2019, proceed. I request concurrence of the Assembly in the final report on Bill 202, Child, Youth and Family Enhancement (Protecting Alberta's Children) Amendment Act, 2019.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, the motion for concurrence in the report is debatable pursuant to Standing Order 18(1)(b). Are there any members who wish to speak to the motion for concurrence?

Seeing none, hon. members, the deputy chair of the Standing Committee on Private Bills and Private Members' Public Bills has requested concurrence in the report on Bill 202. Does the Assembly agree to the report?

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Speaker: Any opposed, please say no. In my opinion, the ayes have it. That motion is carried and so ordered.

Point of Order Epithets

The Speaker: Hon. members, I am prepared to rule in response to multiple points of order raised yesterday regarding the use of the mock bill title Bill Hate instead of the official title for Bill 8. Members, arguments on this matter can be found on pages 758 and 759 of yesterday's Hansard. I deferred my ruling to consider these arguments as I noted yesterday that many valid points were made on both sides. On one hand, members of the Official Opposition have an important role in holding the government to account and may on occasion feel the need to use strong language to emphasize their position. However, as noted on page 100 of House of Commons Procedure and Practice, third edition, one limitation on free speech of members "is provided by the authority of the Speaker under the Standing Orders to preserve order and decorum."

On November 30, 2011, Speaker Kowalski delivered a ruling related to comparing the contents of a bill to historical atrocities in Europe. While the former Speaker did not find a point of order on that occasion, he did provide the member with the opportunity to make a clarification and noted at page 1528 of Hansard for that day that "with the great privileges that... members enjoy permitting freedom of speech in this Assembly comes great responsibility."

A term used in one context may be parliamentary, but that same term in another context may be unparliamentary. As noted in Beauchesne's, sixth edition, at paragraph 486(1), "It is impossible... to declare beforehand what expressions are or are not contrary to order; much depends upon the tone and manner, and intention, of the person speaking." For that reason, lists of unparliamentary terms may be of limited utility without context.

I might note that the Official Opposition House Leader yesterday referred at some length to lists that may or may not be available. As such, this is why I'm reluctant to declare a particular term to be or not to be parliamentary.

As I noted yesterday, Speaker Zwozdesky struggled with a similar issue during his time as Speaker. Ultimately, in a ruling on April 8, 2013, at page 1719 of Hansard for that day the former Speaker concluded that the repeated use of a particular term had taken so much time of the House that it was time for the House to move on and choose different language.

I also acknowledge the ruling referenced by the hon. Government House Leader in his arguments yesterday, which was delivered by Speaker Kowalski on March 22, 2000, at pages 595 and 596 of Hansard for that day. Like the matter before us, it also related to mock bill titles. In that case, as in the 2013 ruling, there had been repeated use of a term for many days prior to the ruling. Speaker Kowalski ruled that the reality is that a bill does have a name. A bill does have a title. He concluded that using a synonym or adjective to describe a bill instead of the proper title can provoke debate during question period and found that there was some merit to the point of order as question period is an opportunity for the government to provide information or for the opposition to try to get information, not for debate.

I ask members, as we move forward, to choose their language carefully. Ask yourself whether your intention is to insult or to inflame debate or to levy an accusation against a member opposite or – and perhaps this is the important part – to knowingly cause disorder. If so, I would suggest that you find another means to make your case.

As this is the first opportunity for members to be given this direction on the matter, I for today do not find this as a point of order. However, this ruling should not be considered carte blanche to proceed with using the mock bill title Bill Hate on a regular basis. In fact, I will be listening very closely to any use of the term and the context in which it is used. It is difficult to envision a scenario where the term might not cause disorder. Should we get to the point where order can no longer be maintained by the Speaker on any occasion on which the term is used, I will be prepared to deliver a similar ruling to that of Speaker Zwozdesky in 2013.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The Leader of the Official Opposition.

Public Service Wage Arbitration Postponement

Ms Notley: The most comprehensive platform in Alberta history – 117 pages, 375 commitments, yada, yada, yada – yet I can't find a single word giving this Finance minister the green light to break legal contracts in order to grab money from teachers, nurses, youth support workers, you name it. It looks to me like: promise hidden, workers broken. To the Minister of Finance: why didn't the UCP come clean on their plan to break the law with workers before the election?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, we are just simply seeking to delay these arbitration hearings until this government can build a responsible path forward to ensure that we can bring this province to economic and fiscal balance and deliver high-quality services that Albertans expect, not only for this year but for years and generations to come.

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, yesterday I informed this House of a recent study referenced by a Nobel prize winning economist that shows that less than a third of the Trump corporate tax cut went to investment or to jobs. Meanwhile what we know here in Alberta is that every dime paid to, say, a nurse or a rehab worker goes directly to caring for our loved ones. To the minister. His corporate handout will waste 70 per cent of every dollar, and he is paying for this fiasco by attacking the wages of front-line health care workers. Why?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, Albertans elected this government to not only bring fiscal balance to this province but to create jobs, to attract investment, to create opportunities for all Albertans. Our job-creation tax cut is one piece in a major initiative that will attract investment, create job opportunities and opportunities for all Albertans, and will guarantee that we can have a world-class education and health care system for today and in future generations.

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, this Finance minister is completely ignoring the people who devote their lives to caring for and keeping us safe. He wants to suppress the wages of nurses, of caregivers for seniors, of child therapists, you name it. There is no front-line worker that this minister won't force to bankroll his $4.5 billion corporate tax giveaway. To the minister: when you're looking to find places to fund your gift to your inside friends, can you do Albertans a favour and not go after the very people caring for our loved ones when they need it the most?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, this government respects and greatly values the contribution that our public sector makes not only to the work of this government but, more importantly, to all Albertans. Again, this is not a removal of rights but simply a postponement of process. We're seeking to postpone the arbitration hearings. This is not about taking money from teachers and nurses.

The Speaker: The hon. the Leader of the Official Opposition.

Worker Overtime Pay

Ms Notley: This government is not stopping just at public-sector workers when it comes to attacking people. New, independently verified data released today shows that this government's pick-your-pocket bill could cost up to 400,000 Alberta overtime workers an average of $150 per week. This works out to an average of $600 a month, most of the grocery bill. To the Premier: why won't he come clean and at least explain to these 400,000 Albertans why he believes they need to be giving up grocery money as part of the so-called UCP job-creation plan?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is truly disappointing that the members opposite continue to talk about changes that we're making to banked overtime hours as impacting overtime pay. That is simply not the case. The objective of this change is to provide flexibility for workers and for employers. The old policy led to many construction and seasonal employees having their overtime hours limited. This means they didn't earn money at time and a half or get the opportunity to bank overtime. This change will actually correct that failed policy.

Thank you.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, it is incredibly disappointing when the minister of labour continues to give untrue facts to this House.

Now, the news on wage cuts gets worse when it comes to the oil and gas sector. On average, overtime workers stand to lose $320 per week. Folks working in this sector have already borne the brunt of the drop in oil prices and now the decades-long failure to build a pipeline to tidewater. To the Premier: does he really think that taking $320 a week from the pockets of oil and gas workers is the fairest way to bring jobs back to this province?

2:00

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, I can tell you what the Premier thinks the fairest thing to do is, and he's already done it. That is to kill the job-killing carbon tax that that hon. member brought in while she was Premier, the largest tax increase on Albertans that was ever brought in . . .

Mr. Bilous: Point of order.

Mr. Jason Nixon: . . . in the history of this province. Our Premier brought in the largest tax decrease in the history of this province. I'm incredibly proud of him. As we know now today from the announcement from the federal government, we know for sure that at least until January 2020 we're going to have the lowest gas prices in the entire country. Thank you again to the hon. Premier of Alberta for that.

The Speaker: A point of order is noted at 2:01.

Ms Notley: That temporary respite, Mr. Speaker, will help pay about 3 per cent of the pick-your-pockets bill that . . .

Mr. Jason Nixon: Point of order.

Ms Notley: . . . these guys just imposed. This $320-per-week pick-your-pockets plan for oil and gas workers comes as we learn of more U.S. government delays to pipelines, this government's move to cancel our made-in-Alberta pipeline, and the federal government's decision to double down on slowing pipelines. Talk about piling on. To the Minister of Energy: when she attends rallies in support of the industry, do her speeches talk about her government's plans to cut the wages of those in attendance?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, there's no intention to cut the wages of anybody in attendance. There's just no intention. It's a ridiculous comment from the Leader of the Opposition.

But now that she is talking about the hon. Energy minister, let me just express to the House how proud we are also of the hon. Energy minister, who is out fighting hard each and every day for our energy industry, our oil and gas industry, and the men and women who work in it, unlike the former government, who worked against them every day. I am so proud that we have an Energy minister that is out there fighting tooth and nail each and every day for our industry and the people that work in it.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Public Service Contract Negotiations

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. This Finance minister says one thing and does another. On Tuesday in this House he said that he wanted to bargain in good faith with public-sector unions. The very next day he served notice of his intention to break the very contracts that those unions have signed. To the minister: if this is what you consider good-faith bargaining, could you please explain what bargaining in bad faith looks like?

The Speaker: The Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This government is committed to working with all stakeholders going forward. We also have a great responsibility to Albertans to ensure that we're making fiscally and economically defensible decisions and to ensure that we can deliver high-quality services to Albertans. We're simply seeking a delay, a temporary delay, in these arbitration hearings until we have the best information to make the best decisions on behalf of all Albertans.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. This from the party that continually talks about the rule of law. Well, let me educate this minister. Working in good faith involves constant communication, collaboration, and consultation. Many of this province's labour leaders have barely heard a word from this government. These labour leaders are gathered here today to keep the government honest. I'm curious: just what consultations did the Minister of Finance or the minister of labour do before plotting to rip up the contracts of nurses, sheriffs, and countless other workers?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our department officials have reached out to all affected stakeholders, including affected unions. We certainly intend to co-operate with all stakeholders and work together towards a mutually beneficial solution, a solution that will ensure that we can get onto a path of fiscal responsibility. The opposition, when they were in government, put this province on a trajectory to a hundred billion dollars of provincial debt. That's unacceptable.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Threatening letters are not good-faith consultation.

The moves by this Finance minister show where this government's true allegiances are. Wealthy corporations: they get a tax giveaway. Restaurant lobbyists: they get a whole menu of changes. Nurses: nothing but cuts and broken contracts. Teachers: nothing but layoffs and broken contracts. To the minister: when you're done paying off your friends, how long will emergency wait times be? How crowded will our classrooms be?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, Albertans elected this government to ensure that we can deliver high-quality services to Albertans in a sustainable manner. That's high-quality education and health care services for this generation and the next. [interjections] The previous government had us on an unsustainable path to bankruptcy, which would have meant the next generation would not have had any kind of a world-class system for health care and education.

Mr. Bilous: Point of order.

The Speaker: A point of order is noted at 2:06.

Public Service Wages and Women's Economic Equality

Ms Phillips: Let's be clear, Mr. Speaker. This government's plan to pick the pockets of workers specifically targets women. Surprise, surprise with these guys. But the facts are clear: 66 per cent of teachers are women; 92 per cent of nurses are women. To the Minister of Finance: why is he making the second-worst gender pay gap in the country even worse?

The Speaker: The Minister of Finance is rising.

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, that is a ridiculous allegation. The reality is that we are moving forward to be the responsible government that Albertans expect and need at this point. We will bring balance and responsibility to the finances of the province and ensure that we're delivering high-quality services to Albertans.

Ms Phillips: Mr. Speaker, we know that this government caucus has trouble with women's issues. The Government House Leader once fired a woman who raised that she was being sexually harassed at work. While in opposition that same House leader directed his caucus to walk out on voting on women's health care a record 13 times. To the Finance minister: he does know that he's not supposed to bring those objectionable views towards women into public policy with this unconstitutional raid on nurses' wages, doesn't he?

The Speaker: The hon. minister for the status of women.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I find it absolutely reprehensible that the opposition brought in a carbon tax that absolutely impacted everyone at an unbelievable level – women, people of the middle class, people that were suffering, choosing between heating their homes and feeding their families – yet this member has the audacity to ask us, based on a platform that we ran on, on making sure that we get back to balance and making sure that ... [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. members, we will have order.

Ms Phillips: Mr. Speaker, a history lesson. When the late Premier Ralph Klein went after health care workers in the 1990s, who stopped him? And Calgary laundry workers? Most of them were women. My question to the minister is simple. Why is his priority writing cheques to fancy lawyers in $5,000 suits so that they can fight court challenge after court challenge for a law that is blatantly unconstitutional rather than acting fairly and lawfully towards hard-working women and men in scrubs? [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. We will have order.

The hon. minister for the status of women.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is obvious that the opposition absolutely did no door-knocking, did not spend any time with their constituents, had absolutely no idea about the impact that their policies had on oil workers, gas workers. They keep talking about oil and gas. Do you know how many women are employed . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. members, I had no challenge hearing the question. I'm having significant difficulty hearing the answer. I would like to do so. The minister will have as much time as she needs to answer the question if I'm having a hard time hearing her.

Mrs. Aheer: Do you know how many women are employed in the oil and gas sector? Thousands. Do you know how many women are employed in all of the sectors that this government brought absolutely detrimental policy to, which impacted hundreds of thousands of jobs, families, everybody, the difference between feeding your family and heating your house?

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Leduc-Beaumont is rising.

Mental Health Services

Mr. Rutherford: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Alberta's youth are often overstressed from trying to balance work, school, and their social life. During this formative time for our young people extra stress can create a platform for mental illness and anxiety to fester. Can the Minister of Health please inform the House about the resources available to aid youth struggling with mental health problems.

2:10

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Mr. Shandro: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise and answer the member's question. We campaigned on a fresh approach to mental health and addiction and a real plan. That includes the appointment of the Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions and a commitment of over $100 million for a mental health strategy. We're investing in a full continuum of care, with a strong focus on prevention and youth. Our strategy will increase access in primary care because that's where we can intervene earlier to address a mental health problem before it becomes a crisis.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Leduc-Beaumont is rising.

Mr. Rutherford: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister. Given that all young people can benefit from having access to these resources and given that my constituents may not be aware of these resources and given the importance of lowering the stigma around mental health and increasing access to information, can the minister comment on how these services are advertised to those young people who need them the most? [interjections]

The Speaker: I believe that the Speaker is on his feet. As we've learned on numerous occasions this week, when the Speaker is on his feet, everybody else stops talking, and when he's seated, you all have your opportunity.

The hon. Minister of Health.

Mr. Shandro: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We do know that youth can be hard to reach, especially when they're dealing with mental health issues. Information about accessing mental health services is provided through 811, 211, through the AHS website, through social media. We're going to put patients at the centre of the health care system. That means working with providers in the community because they know their clients better than the government ever can. Minister Luan is doing exactly that. In fact, just yesterday he had a great meeting with CASA here in Edmonton.

The Speaker: I might just remind the Minister of Health that no matter what the reason is, we wouldn't want to use the name of a minister or otherwise.

The Member for Leduc-Beaumont.

Mr. Rutherford: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, again, to the minister. Given that the larger municipalities have greater access to mental health resources when compared to rural areas or smaller communities such as Leduc-Beaumont and given that youth in these communities are just as likely to suffer from mental health illness as the youth in larger municipalities, can the minister please inform my constituents about how these mental health services and advertising will be made accessible to the communities?

Mr. Shandro: Well, Mr. Speaker, there are more than 135 addiction and mental health community clinics throughout Alberta. There are also three youth integrated hubs in the province which provide drop-in services. The hubs are a partnership with primary health care providers and other community services. We also fund services in schools across the province through the mental health capacity-building program. Those are the foundations of the system, and we'll build on them with our mental health strategy to make sure of real improvements in access across the province.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last week members on all sides of this House spoke to a motion about the value of public-sector jobs and what they bring to their local communities. We heard how important public employees like nurses and paramedics are to supporting their families and local businesses, not to mention improving and saving the lives of others. What could be more Albertan than that? Yet yesterday in this House the Minister of Finance repeatedly suggested that forcing them back from the bargaining table at the barrel of legislation is somehow putting Albertans first. To the Minister of Health: do you support your colleague's suggestion that front-line health care workers are somehow not everyday Albertans?

The Speaker: The Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This government greatly appreciates the contribution that our health care workers make to all Albertans. We recognize their incredible skill set and their deep commitment to better the lives of Albertans. Again, we're just seeking a delay in arbitration hearings – that's all we're seeking at this point – so that we can build the best plan forward on behalf of all Albertans.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that front-line health care workers have the biggest impact on quality of care for Albertans and given that there's no way this government can keep its promise to improve services while reducing costs without tapping into their knowledge and expertise, to the Minister of Health: do you recognize that when your colleague breaks their contracts and talks about them like a problem to be solved or a cost to be reduced instead of as being valued partners in providing care, he insults them, lowers morale, and makes it harder not only for them to do their jobs but for you to do yours?

Mr. Shandro: Mr. Speaker, we campaigned on a commitment to Albertans to maintain or increase health care spending, and that's our commitment to Albertans. We began a process where we are reviewing the processes and the structure of AHS to make sure that we can find efficiencies so we can reinvest in our front-line workers. Our commitment is to continue working with our health care workers and making sure to continue to deliver world-class health care in Alberta.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. They did not campaign on breaking contracts.

Given that people, like capital, are mobile and given that uncertainty is every bit as damaging for workers as it is for business and given that under Premier Klein we saw a mass exodus of nurses, doctors, and other health care workers fleeing the uncertainty caused by his cuts and attacks on the public service, to the Minister of Health: do you recognize that the path your colleague is starting down could very well end in a significant loss of trained, experienced front-line workers at a time when Albertans need them most?

Mr. Shandro: Mr. Speaker, again, as my colleague the Minister of Finance has said, this is about process. It's about a delay of process. We're going to continue to work with our civil service and make sure that we are going to continue to deliver world-class health care. It's incredibly rich that we're now being lectured about cuts to front-line workers when that is a government that cut 28 positions and nurses in the central zone in Red Deer. We are going to continue to make sure that we're going to work with our front-line workers and have patient-focused decisions.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Children Living Independently and the Minimum Wage

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As we know, the government is implementing a minimum wage rollback for youth in this province. What concerns me about this attack is the youth and how it will affect our most vulnerable. Many foster-age children, aged 15 to 17, actually live independently. They balance going to school and working to pay the bills. Has the Minister of Children's Services spoken with foster children to get a sense of how this rollback on their income will affect their ability to keep a roof over their heads, or are children in care just less important than pleasing the UCP's donors?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, it's so ridiculous to continue to watch over and over the opposition stand up in the House and do these tactics. If they want to have a reasonable conversation and ask reasonable questions, it would be . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The reality of the process the opposition continues to want to do in this House is to go through fear and smear. We talk about it all the time. It's all they want to do. It's such a ridiculous tactic. It's so disappointing to watch that behaviour. I mean, if you look at the Leader of the Official Opposition, I've never seen anything like it in my life.

Mr. Bilous: Point of order.

The Speaker: Point of order is noted at 2:17.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud is rising.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given the response, I guess that's: no, foster children have not been spoken to.

Given that foster children living independently are often our most vulnerable youth in the province and given that this government is actually creating an incentive for these kids to drop out of school, the very students whom we should be supporting to stay in school, and given that these youth will now have a reduced income, making it difficult to put food on the table and support themselves, can the Minister of Children's Services update the House on any increased supports her ministry will offer these youth living on their own, considering they are cutting their wages?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, this is about jobs for youth. This government made a commitment during the election to make sure we would stand up for youth, who are having some of the largest unemployment in our population because of that NDP government when they were in power. This is about standing up for the most vulnerable. This is about standing up to give youth opportunities inside our economy, something that the other side of the House just does not seem to understand. This is about jobs, and that's what this government is focused on with a laser focus – jobs, the economy, and pipelines – the complete opposite of those across from us.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that I've heard nothing so far to address my concerns about youth living on their own – and clearly that means that this government has not talked to them – and given that this government is in a rush to attack youth wages with just two weeks to go until this minister's plan comes into effect, will the minister of labour commit to delaying any cut to youth wages until he has properly consulted with his colleague the Minister of Children's Services, who will hopefully speak with foster children as well as other relevant groups supporting children and youth?

2:20

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The student job-creation wage is about creating work opportunities for youth. Over 15,000 youth between 15 and 19 are currently looking for work in Alberta. We need to address this. We ran on this platform. We made this commitment. We're going to follow through on this commitment, and I think that our youth can't wait more than two weeks to actually make this happen.

Thank you. [interjection]

The Speaker: The Member for Edmonton-Glenora will come to order.

Farm and Ranch Safety

Mr. Rowsell: Mr. Speaker, some of my constituents have raised concerns about the safety rules on farms and ranches. In particular, they're concerned about mandatory morning safety meetings and that family members who work on the farm have to attend these meetings. They think it's unnecessary and delays the start of the day. My question is to the Minister of Labour and Immigration. Why are these safety meetings mandatory for family members, and will the minister consider changing this?

The Speaker: The Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster-Wainwright for the question. Occupational health and safety rules only apply to farms and ranches that have waged, nonfamily employees. The rules do not apply to family members or to farms that don't have waged, nonfamily employees. Morning safety meetings are not mandatory under OHS rules; however, it's always good practice for everyone working on the farm to assess potential hazards and talk about safety issues. Just a few minutes at the beginning of the day can help ensure that no one gets hurt during the day.

Thank you.

Mr. Rowswell: Thank you for clarifying that, Minister.

Mr. Speaker, my constituents also raised concerns about having to record the hours and work activities of family members on the farm. Given that these recorded hours are for WCB insurance, that was mandated by Bill 6, can the minister explain this requirement and what the government's plan is for mandatory WCB coverage on farms and ranches?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Labour and Immigration has the call.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Like the OHS rules, WCB coverage is only mandatory on farms and ranches that have waged, nonfamily workers. Family members are exempt. A producer may voluntarily have WCB coverage for family members, but it's not mandatory.

As we promised in our platform, we will replace Bill 6 with the farm freedom and safety act. One part of that is giving farmers a choice of WCB insurance or getting workplace insurance from the private sector. I can tell the hon. member that my ministry is in discussions with both WCB and private insurance companies about options for farmers and ranchers.

Mr. Rowswell: My constituents will be happy to hear that, Minister.

My final question is also for the Minister of Labour and Immigration. Given that the previous NDP government drafted the current legislation without consulting Albertans and given that our government will be changing this flawed piece of legislation, will farmers and ranchers get to have input on how OHS rules apply to their operations, and when will this happen?

The Speaker: The minister.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and again thank you to the member for the question. As I said in my previous answer, we promised to replace Bill 6 with the farm freedom and safety act. In our platform we also promised to consult with farmers and ranchers before we did that. Their input will help us develop new rules that will work for farms and ranches. The new laws will balance the unique needs of farms and ranches with the need for a common-sense, flexible farm safety regime. We will ensure safety standards on farms and ranches while giving employers flexibility and choice. My colleague the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry and I will have more to say about consulting with farmers and ranchers in the near future.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Red Tape Reduction and Job-creation Strategies

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, government can't work when one minister says one thing and another says another thing. Last week the minister of labour defended all parts of the pick-your-pockets bill, saying, "even if it creates just a little bit of red tape." This is in direct contradiction to the mandate of the associate minister of red tape. My question to the minister: do you agree with the labour minister that imposing red tape on job creators is worth it, or is it just more evidence that your mandate is just a little bit bogus?

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, in four years our government will reduce regulatory burden on our job creators and innovators by one-third. We'll take Alberta from being one of the highest compliance-cost jurisdictions to the lowest-cost jurisdictions in North America. In a nutshell, we are going to make Alberta one of the freest and fastest moving economies in the world. In four years we will be able to look Albertans in the eyes and say: promise made, promise kept.

Mr. Nielsen: Make sure to give the minister a copy of that.

Given that the words of the Minister of Labour and Immigration essentially question the reason for the existence of the associate minister's portfolio and given that the associate minister's mandate says that his job will be to target unnecessary and burdensome overregulation that is currently weighing job creators down, my question again is to the associate minister of red tape. With the labour minister saying one thing and your mandate saying another when it comes to red tape, who is actually being straight with Albertans?

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, you will remember that when that government was in office, I brought forward a private member's bill to be able to reduce regulatory burden, and they rejected that. Albertans have rejected them and said that there is absolutely no way that they can continue to do business.

This is one of our important measures that we are going to be bringing forward to Albertans to make sure that we can get them back to work and that Albertans can actually have a great place to live.

Mr. Nielsen: Sounds like none of them are being straight.

Given that the minister has committed to repealing regulations when new regulations are introduced and given that the labour minister's new zeal for imposing regulations on job creators with your pick-your-pockets legislation, to the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction: can you list any of the regulations you've repealed to counter the additional red tape coming from the labour minister? And please be specific this time, Minister.

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, that member was in my office twice, and we had the opportunity to talk about these issues. He's grandstanding right now, as this ND Party continues to do. What's so sad about it is that they are Team Angry. Rather than actually looking for real solutions to be able to actually create jobs and increase the economy for Alberta, they continue to be Team Angry. We will not. We will fight for Albertans every day.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Driver's Licence Road Tests

Member Loyola: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In 2018 our government took the necessary steps to reform the driver examination system. We heard about issues and concerns from Albertans about the existing system. High fees, poor service, and lack of service in rural Alberta were all matters that Conservatives completely failed to address during their time in office. Now we see the Transportation minister moving to repeal these changes. To the Minister of Transportation: why are you committed to reimposing on Albertans a system that was generating seven complaints per day from Albertans? Is it ideology or another favour to your donors?

Mrs. Sawhney: Thank you for the question. Mr. Speaker, our government is committed to ensuring that new drivers in Alberta are adequately tested in a safe and timely manner. That's why we will be reviewing the public takeover of the driver's licence examinations to ensure that Albertans can reasonably access the testing system.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Member Loyola: Thank you again, Mr. Speaker. Given that a 2016 report found that the previous system of driver examination had the highest fees in Canada and was perceived to be full of mistrust and, I quote, flawed and given that our government acted on this report to improve the system and given that the UCP is now publicly talking about going back to the problems, concerns, and issues that the report highlighted, to the Minister of Transportation. High fees, mistrust, no oversight, and flaws all around: is this really what you want to go back to?

Mrs. Sawhney: Our focus, Mr. Speaker, is on meeting demand at registries across the province so that Albertans can take a road test in a timely manner, and we're committed to clearing the backlog.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Member Loyola: Thank you again, Mr. Speaker. Given that the tragic Humboldt bus crash shocked all Canadians and given that our government responded by increasing the testing requirements through the mandatory entry-level training, or MELT, program and given that there is a fear expressed in the media today that the UCP might cancel the MELT program, which could dangerously send unqualified drivers onto the roads, to the Minister of Transportation: will you do the right thing and commit to this House that your government will maintain the MELT program?

Mrs. Sawhney: Thank you for the question. Mr. Speaker, we're committed to driver safety, and we are continuing to review this initiative closely. We'll review the effectiveness of the publicly delivered model to ensure that Albertans have the services that they need and that they require.

Thank you.

2:30

Support for Agriculture

Mr. van Dijken: Mr. Speaker, Alberta farmers rely heavily on exporting our commodities, whether that be wheat, canola, barley, beef, pork, or any of the vast array of products we produce. To the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry: what is this government doing to help develop new markets for trade?

The Speaker: The Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Dreeshen: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm proud to inform this House that Alberta's economic development and trade minister just returned from a trade mission to expand market access opportunities in Asia. That contrasts very sharply to the former NDP minister of economic development and trade, who just last week in this House said, "I'm sorry; if paying a few thousand dollars extra a month [in carbon taxes] means you went out of business, maybe you need to look at your business plan or at least the management." I'm proud of our minister of economic development and trade, who works with Alberta businesses instead of ridiculing them.

Mr. van Dijken: Mr. Speaker, given that Alberta's agriculture industry has been facing challenges due to the restrictions on selling our canola and pork in China, can the minister tell us what this government is doing to help open up the canola trade in China?

The Speaker: The minister of agriculture.

Mr. Dreeshen: Thank you again, Mr. Speaker. Market access is extremely important to Alberta farmers, and improving trade relations with China is critical for our canola farmers. We are working with the federal government as Alberta farmers should not be paying the price of this diplomatic dispute. As the member opposite mentioned, when it comes to wheat, 90 per cent gets exported around the world; canola, 80 per cent; cattle, 60 per cent; 55 per cent for hogs. We're doing everything we can to help farmers during this difficult trade time.

Mr. van Dijken: Mr. Speaker, given that farmers are faced with many different stresses and uncertainty, whether that be weather, markets, equipment failure, or the like, and given that spring input costs can be difficult to manage at the best of times but even more so in this time of uncertainty, Minister, what is this government doing to help farmers struggling to pay their spring seeding bills during this time of uncertainty?

The Speaker: The minister.

Mr. Dreeshen: Thank you again, Mr. Speaker. Seeding is almost a hundred per cent complete here in Alberta, and by this fall farmers will have access to the full suite of business risk management programs that we have and farmers have used in the past, whether it's AgriStability, AgriInvest, AgriInsurance, and others, to help farmers out directly. But ultimately, with the carbon tax cut, the largest tax cut in Alberta's history, farmers know that they have a very supportive government.

Bill 8 Consultations

Member Irwin: The Minister of Education has made a number of references to balance and the groups she's consulted in her attempts to destroy GSAs and QSAs. In October of last year she hosted an event for a known anti-LGBTQ organization, Parents for Choice in Education, that's been vocal about their opposition to GSAs. Can the minister please tell this House and all Albertans who else she's consulted in relation to this hateful bill, and, specifically, has she consulted anyone who doesn't agree with her on the attack on the rights of LGBTQ youth?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education is rising.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. I have consulted broadly. I've consulted all of the major stakeholders. I've talked to children. I've talked to parents. I've talked to all of them, and that's what they... [interjections] To a large number of students and stakeholders. Thank you for the question.

Member Irwin: Well, you know, I've heard from a whole heck of a lot of kids, and they sure don't see balance in the legislation this government is proposing to destroy GSAs.

Given that Parents for Choice in Education is a front group for UCP VIP member John Carpay and given that Carpay compared the pride flag to the swastika and given that when those comments emerged, the Premier refused to revoke Carpay's UCP membership, stating that it was up to the party's board, to the government: is John Carpay still a proud UCP member, or are you working to find balance with him, too?

The Speaker: Hon. members, I fail to find any government policy in the question: is an individual a member of a political party or not?

Having said that, if the Government House Leader chooses to answer, he's welcome to do so.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, I agree with you completely, but I will appreciate taking the opportunity to respond to the continued misrepresentation of facts by the opposition when it comes to GSAs in this province. I want to be clear again to this House that even once we pass this new legislation with Bill 8, we will still continue to have the strongest statutory protections when it comes to GSAs inside this province. That is a fact. I know the opposition is struggling with facts. They often do struggle with facts. It's, I think, kind of a symptom of the NDP. But the reality is that those are the facts. We'll have the strongest statutory protections in the country.

The Speaker: Hon. members, I have no idea what the hon. member might be asking, but if it is about a particular individual and party-related matters, I will rule that question out of order. I encourage you to choose your words wisely.

The hon. the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Given that Carpay also brought forward a legal challenge attempting to stop the protections for LGBTQ youth that we introduced in Bill 24 and given that it was shot down in the courts, who ruled that the bill in no way restricts parents' rights, and given that the courts found that destroying GSAs would have negative effects on improving student performance, reducing drug use, and providing an increased sense of safety in schools, to this government. GSAs actually provide plenty of balance in our schools. They save lives. Why are you set on destroying them?

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity again to make clear what this government's policy is. It's certainly not what the opposition is saying. It is to protect GSAs. That was in our platform. It is inside every act that we are making as a government when it comes to education. The Education minister has been clear on that. The Premier has been clear on that. I've been clear on that. By the end of this process we will continue to have the strongest statutory protection when it comes to GSAs. That's a fact. The hon. members, I know, are struggling with those facts. That fine. But the reality is that that is a fact. We will have the strongest statutory protections in the entire country.

Abortion Rights

Ms Goehring: Mr. Speaker, trigger warning. I'll be asking about bubble zones, so now may be a good time for the government to leave the Chamber. In the last Legislature our caucus voted 13 times to affirm the right of a woman to access legal health care without fear of harassment. The UCP rose 13 times and ran away. Our caucus showed the leadership needed and passed Bill 9 to create bubble zones around abortion clinics. Now we see the media reports that the bubble zones have worked to deter harassment of their patients. Does the Government House Leader regret directing his colleagues to walk out on women's rights, and will you apologize to Albertans for . . .

The Speaker: The hon. the minister of status of women. [interjections]

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. I don't know if anybody is going to be able to hear me. The interesting thing about the questions that are coming right now from the opposition is that they're attacking. There's absolutely nothing to be able to be answered on this side because of the rhetoric. They're campaigning. They are still smearing and fearing throughout this entire House. If there is a question that is relevant, I would be happy to answer it.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs has the call.

Ms Goehring: Given that an entire caucus walking out of 13 votes has never been recorded before in Alberta history and given that a former Clerk of the Assembly described the UC's walkout as a total abrogation of opposition's responsibility and given that the Kensington clinic is now reporting that as a result of Bill 9 it is now safer for women to access their services and for the workers at the clinic, to the Minister of Health: will you commit to providing any and all supports and resources needed by any abortion clinics in Alberta to properly serve their patients?

The Speaker: The hon. the minister for the status of women.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you very much for the question. I am absolutely committed to being able to do work to make sure that we adequately consult and make sure that all appropriate things are done.

Thank you so much.

Ms Goehring: Mr. Speaker, given the astonishing 13 times the UCP walked out on their duty to serve Albertans and given that the improvements in safety that Bill 9 has made to the patients and workers of Alberta's abortion clinics and given the concern that the clinics have expressed regarding ongoing electronic harassment through e-mail and phone calling, to the Minister of Health: will you admit that Bill 9 was necessary and commit to working with clinics to combat electronic harassment, or will you and your colleagues turn your back on women's health care once again?

The Speaker: The hon. the minister for the status of women.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you. Again to answer the question: absolutely we are committed to working with all parties that are asking these questions. As always, our doors are always open, and we are very happy to consult and make sure that we are protecting women's rights.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Education Act

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My question is for the Minister of Education. As a father of four I was incredibly happy to see the minister recently announce plans to modernize our Alberta education system by replacing the School Act with the Education Act. Unlike the previous NDP government, the minister has affirmed the government's commitment to respect the hard work done by stakeholders over multiple years of robust consultation. Can the minister please explain how the Education Act will improve our province's education system?

The Speaker: The Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and the hon. member for the question. Proclaiming the Education Act will make Alberta schools the diverse, excellent classrooms that all Albertans desire and deserve. It modernizes our education system by replacing a piece of legislation originally introduced in 1988. To put it into perspective: cellphones and the Internet barely existed. At the end of the day, this legislation is based on values we believe are fundamental to supporting our students.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister for the answer. Given that modernizing our education system will require adjustments for our school boards, with the current school year coming to an end and the summer break about to begin, can the minister please explain to this House how the government will ensure a smooth transition for school authorities across this province?

The Speaker: The Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. With our commitment to have the Education Act come into force for the next school year, we recognize that some updates to the legislation are needed. We have proposed that the current age of access, the age of compulsory attendance, and residency rules remain in effect under the Education Act. These existing rules are working well for students and school boards at this time. We believe our proposed amendments will provide schools with the certainty that they need to effectively transition for the upcoming school year.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister for the answer. Given that a concern that I've heard around the Education Act is about the rules for student transportation, school districts across this province are already communicating busing schedules to parents, and families are already creating transportation plans for the upcoming school year, can the minister please explain how the Education Act will affect transportation for students across this province?

The Speaker: The Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and the hon. member, for the question. I'm most happy to provide certainty and consistency to parents and school boards. We are proposing that we maintain the current rules for busing. Changes to eligibility or service this close to the coming school year could lead to significant financial implications or major service changes for families. We will remain committed to supporting our families and students and providing them with the supports they need to succeed during their studies.

Thank you so much.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul is rising with a question.

Fishing Regulations

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Over the last four years I have attended many town halls and meetings in communities concerned about the lack of fish harvesting opportunities. Although the message was consistent from anglers and guides that walleye populations were exploding in many northern lakes, the previous government's answer was to close more lakes and impose more restrictions on others. To the Minister of Environment and Parks: will you review the consultations conducted over the last few years, meet with concerned groups, and lift the new restrictions imposed in the 2019 regulations?

The Speaker: The Minister of Environment and Parks.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the important question. The answer is simple: yes. We will be reviewing all prior consultation. I'm happy to meet with any stakeholder group involved in this important issue. I know that they struggled to get meetings with the previous government. I met with them often in opposition, and I look forward to meeting them as the Minister of Environment and Parks.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much for the answer, minister. Given that residential licence purchases dropped by 35,582 from 2015 to 2018, a loss of $996,296 in Alberta revenue, and given that nonresident licence purchases also dropped by two-thirds over that period at a loss of between $400,000 and $500,000, not to mention the tourism dollars lost — people are not coming to Alberta to fish — and given that at the same time walleye special draw applications doubled and 27,000 Albertans purchased licences in Saskatchewan ...

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Environment and Parks.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member raises an important issue, and I think it's worth the conversation. To be clear, though, the Environment and Parks department, going forward, when it makes decisions in regard to species harvesting will be based on science that's available in making the best decision for the species to make sure that we have an opportunity to harvest now but will also have an opportunity to harvest for future generations. We will continue to balance both those issues. What I can assure the hon. member and through him to his constituents is that we will be open for that conversation and making sure that they are included in that process.

Mr. Hanson: I'll try to speak faster, Mr. Speaker. Given that the Cold Lake fish hatchery in my constituency was designed for and has the capacity to produce between 40 million and 60 million walleye fingerlings per year and those fingerlings have the potential to grow to 40 centimetres in just three years, Minister, we are losing opportunities for tourism to Saskatchewan, we are losing over $1 million in license fees alone, and municipalities are willing to participate to diversify their economies. If a financial case can be made, will your ministry consider restoring the walleye program in Alberta?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Environment and Parks.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you again to the hon. member for the question. It's obvious that he's passionate about this issue. It's an interesting conversation around hatcheries. I think it's worth having that conversation. Just recently I had it with my department. We'll have a look at it going forward. We have a few ideas, and I think we'll have more to say in the coming days, but I appreciate him bringing it forward, and I encourage him through you to continue with that passion. We'll make sure that we get it right.

Introduction of Bills

The Speaker: The hon. President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance.

Bill 9

Public Sector Wage Arbitration Deferral Act

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I request leave to introduce Bill 9, the Public Sector Wage Arbitration Deferral Act.

This bill will enable government to postpone wage reopener arbitration for a number of major public-sector agreements. By deferring the arbitration hearings, we will know more about our economic situation and be able to consider the MacKinnon panel's expert advice. Mr. Speaker, I want to make it clear that no decision on how to proceed with the arbitrations has been made. Our intent is to merely postpone these proceedings until after October 31, 2019.

Mr. Speaker, I hereby move first reading of Bill 9, the Public Sector Wage Arbitration Deferral Act, and I look forward to providing more details shortly.

Thank you.

[The voice vote indicated that the motion for first reading carried]

[Several members rose calling for a division. The division bell was rung at 2:47 p.m.]

[Fifteen minutes having elapsed, the Assembly divided]

[The Speaker in the chair]

[Motion carried; Bill 9 read a first time]

The Speaker: I recognize the hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I seek unanimous consent to extend daily Routine past 3 p.m.

[Unanimous consent granted]

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance.

Bill 10

Alberta Personal Income Tax Amendment Act, 2019

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I request leave to introduce Bill 10, Alberta Personal Income Tax Amendment Act, 2019.

Alberta's personal income tax system is closely linked with federal legislation that changed in the spring of 2018. The previous government failed to amend legislation that will ensure our tax system works efficiently with the federal system. Our government is introducing the amendments to ensure that Albertans, and especially members of the Canadian Forces and veterans, will have access to the tax credits they're entitled to. These changes also protect small-business owners from tax increases on the dividends they earn. Mr. Speaker, these amendments are largely technical in nature, but they ensure the continued, efficient functioning of our income tax system in harmony with the federal system.

With that, I move first reading of the Alberta Personal Income Tax Amendment Act. Thank you.

[Motion carried; Bill 10 read a first time]

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Bill 203

An Act to Protect Public Health Care

Mr. Feehan: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I rise to request leave to introduce Bill 203, An Act to Protect Public Health Care.

Mr. Speaker, access to health care should not depend on the size of your wallet or the balance on your credit card. This act will strengthen our ability to defend Albertans from American-style health care creeping into our province. This legislation will address issues associated with fee-based private health clinics that charge fees for access to necessary health services. The goal is to make sure that no Albertan will need to fear going into debt to pay for the medical services they need, and it will reduce the risk of preferential access to medically necessary health services.

Bill 203, An Act to Protect Public Health Care will protect access to publicly funded, publicly delivered health care in Alberta. This side of the House will continue to stand up and say no to American-style health care and ensure that our hospitals and health centres are available to everyone who needs them.

[Motion carried; Bill 203 read a first time]

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: Hon. members, is there anyone wishing to table a document? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods is looking to table a document.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I have the requisite five copies of documentation, statistics from Statistics Canada, that show that the average employee who earns overtime will lose $150 per week; oil and gas: $320; and construction: potentially $200. Thank you.

The Speaker: Are there any other tablings today?

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise with the requisite number of copies to table a document I made reference to last evening in this Chamber called Legally Speaking: the Guarantee of Catholic Education: the Doctrines of Hollow Rites and Permeation, in which they tell us that it is an important doctrine of constitutional law that constitutional rights, once granted, must not be minimized or diminished to hollow rights. They must in all interpretations be given a large, liberal interpretation, and that includes rights for gay people. Thank you.

Tablings to the Clerk

The Clerk: I wish to advise the Assembly that the following document was deposited with the office of the Clerk: on behalf of hon. Mr. Copping, Minister of Labour and Immigration, pursuant to the Engineering and Geoscience Professions Act, the Association of Science and Engineering Technology Professionals of Alberta annual report, 2018.

3:10

The Speaker: Hon. members, we are at points of order. I might just add that I would hope that we will stay focused on the points of order and not have a continuation of debate from question period on a Thursday afternoon.

With that said, the hon. the Official Opposition House Leader.

Point of Order Epithets

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I rise on Standing Orders (h), (i), (j). The Minister of Environment and Parks, who, I will say, coincidentally rose on a point of order minutes after my point of order for the exact same thing, yet the shoe is on the other foot. He referred to the “job-killing” carbon tax, which, of course, is a nickname that he and the UCP gave to a bill when we were government, yet he’s about to rise on a point of order for the “pick-your-pockets” bill, which it is, you know, affectionately referred to as by some Albertans and this side of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I think, again, this is a matter of debate. There is a freedom of speech allowed in this House, as we spoke about yesterday. I have a number of examples of the members that are now in government when they were in opposition. In fact, the Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo, April 12, 2017, during question period referred to the job-killing carbon tax. On October 29, 2018, the Premier, the Member for Calgary-Lougheed . . .

The Speaker: Hon. member, I’m not entirely convinced if you are defending a point of order or calling a point of order. Clearly, I heard in your statement that this is a matter of debate. It certainly sounds a lot like a matter of debate to me. Let’s see if you are correct in your assertion of what the Government House Leader was going to do on the second point of order.

Point of Order Epithets

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I do rise on a similar issue but from a different context, and I think that, as we talk about this point of order, context matters.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, I am rising on 23(h), (i), and (j). I will be brief as it is Thursday, and I know you are probably anxious to go home to your family as much as everybody else in this Chamber.

But it’s disappointing that the opposition continues to choose to ignore the very warnings you issued in your ruling before question period. I don’t have the benefit of the Blues, but I believe you made reference to a ruling by the former Speaker on April 8, 2013, and at that time the former Speaker concluded that repeated use of a particular term has taken so much of the House time that it was time to choose a new language.

I draw your attention to the question asked by the Leader of the Official Opposition when referring to Bill 2 as the “pick-your-pocket” bill. I stress the word “bill.” Personally, I find that offensive. We’ve let it slide on numerous occasions. I believe the term . . . [interjection] Again, Mr. Speaker, to the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora, I have the floor. I believe the term has been used over 30 times in this sitting alone. Let’s be clear, the intent of the opposition is to imply that the members of this government are committing a crime with our legislation. I can tell you and the opposition that the provisions of Bill 2 were very well publicized in our platform commitments as part of our proposal to get Albertans back to work. In my opinion, I find the language of “pick-your-pockets,” in particular, to be offensive and, further to that, an allegation.

The Speaker: Thank you for your interjections, hon. member. I would just note that you are correct in your assertion that the context of how the statements are made is very, very important. I would suggest to you that using names for bills certainly could become unparliamentary, and, you know, with respect to my comments previously around Bill 8, I would say that this language is significantly stronger. You yourself said that this particular statement, “pick-your-pockets” bill, has been raised 30 times, and at no point has that created disorder inside the Chamber up until today. I clearly would say that on this occasion and the previous 30 occasions, that is not a point of order.

Point of Order Parliamentary Language

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, the hon. Opposition House Leader has indicated to me that he can’t remember the order of the points of orders, which is probably fair because, I think, several were called, so I’ll rise on my second and last one.

I’m a little bit concerned that the timing may not have been quite noted in the chaos of question period, but again I’m rising on Standing Order 23(h), (i), and (j). During question period the Leader of the Official Opposition stated in a question that would ultimately go to the labour minister: I’m disappointed when the minister of labour continues to give untrue statements. I think it’s quite clear that the Leader of the Opposition is trying to use language of a nature likely to create disorder. She had to apologize yesterday for making a similar statement, so to do it again in a second period seems kind of troubling. Yesterday you ruled that the context of the statement that she made yesterday, which was “the House leader just can’t stop saying things that are untrue” – perhaps the Official Opposition House Leader forgot to inform the Leader of the Opposition that he had to stand in this place yesterday, withdraw, and apologize on behalf of his leader, or she just has no respect for your rulings in this Chamber. Again, Mr. Speaker, I would submit to you that it’s the exact same situation and the Official Opposition House Leader should rise and apologize and withdraw on behalf of his leader.

The Speaker: The Official Opposition House Leader, I’m happy to hear your interjections on this point of order.

Mr. Bilous: Mr. Speaker, the Government House Leader can’t have it both ways. Today in question period he used the phrase:

misrepresentation of the facts. The point of order yesterday was for the Leader of the Official Opposition using the word “stealing.” Today’s language is nowhere near yesterday’s language. It is not unparliamentary language. This is a difference of opinion, two different sets of facts that you have ruled on numerous times over. I will not apologize for the Leader of the Official Opposition’s language today when it is in line with language that the Government House Leader used today as far as a difference of opinion when it comes to the facts.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member. I would like to provide some comments around this particular point of order because during that particular question that was asked and answered, I was inclined to send a note to the Leader of the Official Opposition and remind her that yesterday she was corrected for saying that the member is making untrue statements. At that time yesterday I said that if the government or the opposition wants to use strong language referring to something that the government is doing, that would in fact be parliamentary, but implying that a member of the House is making untrue statements, like I ruled yesterday, is moving in the direction of saying that a member has lied. We all know that’s unparliamentary, and the Leader of the Official Opposition is welcome to apologize and withdraw.

Mr. Bilous: Well, Mr. Speaker, seeing that you have provided some advice and direction in your infinite wisdom, I will take such advice and withdraw and apologize for her comment.

The Speaker: Please proceed. The Official Opposition House Leader.

Point of Order Language Creating Disorder False Allegations

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise on a point of order. The time was around, I believe, 2:15. The Minister of Treasury Board and Finance said that we put the province on a path to bankruptcy. Now, I rise on 23(h), (i), (j) for a couple of reasons. The first and most obvious is that this comment is, of course, extremely insulting language that was intentionally used. We talk about context. That was used intentionally to create disorder in this House. Number two, the statement is also patently false. Our government was not about to run the government of Alberta or the treasury into bankruptcy. I think that’s a pretty clear black-and-white comment that is false. For those two reasons I rise on a point of order and request that the Government House Leader apologize and withdraw that comment.

The Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I’ll be brief. This is clearly a matter of debate and, you know, a difference of opinion when it comes to facts. I do recognize that the opposition is probably a little bit sensitive about the fact that they oversaw a government that put us on track to $100 billion in debt, but the reality is that’s something that’s very free to be debated in this place, has been debated for a long time, and is a matter of debate.

The Speaker: Hon. members, the statement that was made – I do have the benefit of the Blues, and the hon. Official Opposition House Leader is correct. It says, “The previous government had us on an unsustainable path to bankruptcy, [interjections] which would have meant the next generation would not have had any kind of a world-class system for health care and education.” One of the particular challenges that is before us and something that we all need to be considerate of when we are using language that is strong, that may create disorder is also the context in which we may or may not be making allegations about another member. I would remind all hon. members that we wouldn’t want to make to an allegation about the Leader of the Official Opposition, just like she wouldn’t want to make an allegation of you or of other members here in the Assembly. Having said that, I do agree with the Government House Leader that this is a matter of debate but would caution all members about the language that they choose.

Lastly.

Point of Order Language Creating Disorder

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise on a point of order that was then between 2:15 and 2:30, when one of our members was asking the Minister of Children’s Services questions – I believe it was the Member for Edmonton-Whitemud – to which the Government House Leader insisted on responding to the question. Obviously, that’s the prerogative of the front bench. However, the Minister of Environment and Parks went on to chastise the member for asking a question which was a question trying to derive information from the government, which is part of the reason for question period.

Quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, I jumped up on a point of order because the Government House Leader is trying intentionally to interfere with the opposition doing their job, which, during question period, is to derive information from ministers. At that point the Government House Leader used the 35 seconds to try to chastise the opposition for “fear and smear” when, quite frankly, their questions were directly to the Minister of Children’s Services trying to derive information about children and government policy. I find it very important that the opposition is able to do its job in this place, especially during question period, which is to hold the government to account and to ask for information. In this instance it was clearly a question deriving information. It was not a partisan question or attack. I think it’s extremely important that the government doesn’t interfere with the opposition trying to do their job, as the Government House Leader did.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member. I agree with many of the statements that you’ve made, including that it is important for the government not to interfere with the opposition trying to do your jobs. I also know that you know that, much to the chagrin of the Speaker from time to time, it is not the Speaker’s job to determine the quality of the answer. While I have no opinion of the Government House Leader’s answer, I don’t see any language that is likely to create disorder. I do not make the determination on who answers a question or who doesn’t answer a question. As such, I’m struggling to understand how the Government House Leader answering your question in a way that may not have been an effective answer would in fact create an inability for the opposition to do their job. As such, this point of order is not well taken.

We have concluded points of order.

Orders of the Day

Consideration of Her Honour the Lieutenant Governor’s Speech

Ms Glasgo moved, seconded by Ms Rosin, that an humble address be presented to Her Honour the Honourable the Lieutenant Governor as follows.

To Her Honour the Honourable Lois Mitchell, CM, AOE, LLD, the Lieutenant Governor of the province of Alberta:

We, Her Majesty’s most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Legislative Assembly, now assembled, beg leave to thank Your Honour for the gracious speech Your Honour has been pleased to address to us at the opening of the present session.

The Speaker: Are there any other members wishing to speak who have not yet done so?

[Motion carried]

Government Motions

The Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader on behalf of the Premier.

Address in Reply to Speech from the Throne

16. Mr. Jason Nixon moved on behalf of Mr. Kenney:
Be it resolved that the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne be engrossed and presented to Her Honour the Honourable the Lieutenant Governor by such members of the Assembly as are members of Executive Council.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, this is a debatable motion according to Standing Order 18(1)(a). Are there any wishing to speak?

Seeing none, the Government House Leader to close debate.

[Government Motion 16 carried]

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

The Deputy Chair: I would like to call the committee to order.

Bill 7 Municipal Government (Property Tax Incentives) Amendment Act, 2019

The Deputy Chair: Are there any comments, questions, or amendments to be offered with respect to this bill? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora rising.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair and to the members for this opportunity to continue discussion with regard to the bill about nothing. But here we are debating it nonetheless. Just to reiterate, there was extensive – extensive – consultation that went into work with municipalities around the Municipal Government Act and subsequent reg packages. I think there were actually three substantial sets of reg packages that came forward that related to the MGA. This was done over a number of years under both governments, definitely the government under the time that Premier Hancock was Premier, probably Premier Redford, and definitely continued under future Premiers after that as well. This is something that worked quite extensively over many different iterations not just of government in terms of provincial government but government in terms of local municipal governments. There were extensive consultations – oh. [Disturbance outside the gallery] Sorry. It's hard to continue discussing this when clearly there is great enthusiasm in the rotunda to discuss labour law in this place.

The Deputy Chair: I can hear you, just so you know.

Ms Hoffman: You can't hear them?

The Deputy Chair: I can hear you.

Ms Hoffman: Oh, you can hear me. Yeah. I can hear myself. I can also hear them. Thank you very much.

I want to continue on by saying that through that very extensive consultation that happened over many, many years with municipal officials, both elected and nonelected, there was a commitment to develop a municipal governance act, and through that, again, subsequent sets of regulations that brought about significant changes, many of the changes that are actually in this proposed bill. I imagine there are more things that municipalities would like to see amended in terms of their working relationship and future encounters with provincial government and their autonomy and definitely their need for sustained funding that is sufficient to meet the needs of their municipalities. That's probably the number one that I've heard.

At the last event, I believe, I attended, it was important that municipalities talk about the funding model, that they make sure that they have opportunities for sustainable funding. They did not, I think I mentioned, at RMA bring up this proposed bill about nothing even once. Not one person there brought it up at RMA prior to the election, and I certainly haven't heard directly from municipal leaders that they wanted this since the election either.

Again, I believe that most of the municipalities that we've engaged with said that they found this confusing and weren't exactly sure why it was being proposed, that there were certainly a number of other things they would love the Minister of Municipal Affairs to bring forward to cabinet and subsequently to this Chamber to support them in doing their jobs. But this is not one of the things that they mentioned as being a barrier to them or desirable through the engagements we've had with mayors of mid-sized cities, and then of course the mayors of the large cities have been very vocal in what they've had to say about this.

That being said, I again feel that this bill is about nothing, and it doesn't behoove us to continue moving this through the process as I think that there are many, many, many things that are important for us to consider our precious time being used for. Certainly, discussing changes to labour law, I know, is something that members in the public space outside this Chamber are interested in us being accountable and transparent about, especially things that weren't mentioned in the election process or the platform.

I will cede my time at this point and turn the floor back to you, Mr. Chair. Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: I see the hon. government opposition – sorry. We're just going to go with Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. I am rising to speak to Bill 7, Municipal Government (Property Tax Incentives) Amendment Act, 2019. The reason I rise is that I know that my hon. colleague the Member for Calgary-Buffalo has been engaging with mayors around the province, trying to determine, you know, as quickly as he can, to what level this government consulted with municipalities. Quite frankly, he's heard from a number of mayors who are kind of scratching their heads as to where this came from.

For that reason, Mr. Chair, I am moving an amendment, which I will pass through the pages to yourself. Obviously, the top copy is the one signed by Parliamentary Counsel. At your direction I will read this into the record.

The Deputy Chair: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I will read this, again, on behalf of the Member for Calgary-Buffalo. Moved that Bill 7, Municipal Government (Property Tax Incentives) Amendment Act, 2019, be amended by adding the following after section 9:

Report

- 10(1) In this section,
- (a) “city charter” means a charter established for a city under section 141.3 of the Municipal Government Act, and includes an amendment to a charter;
  - (b) “intermunicipal collaboration framework” means a framework as defined in section 708.26(1)(a) of the Municipal Government Act;
  - (c) “Minister” means the Minister of Municipal Affairs;
  - (d) “municipality” has the meaning given to it in the Municipal Government Act.
- (2) The Minister shall consult with municipalities on the amendments made by this Act, including any impacts on regional collaboration, city charters and intermunicipal collaboration frameworks.
- (3) Consultations required under subsection (2) shall be completed by September 1, 2019.
- (4) The Minister shall prepare a report outlining the results of the consultations required under subsection (2), and shall
- (a) make the report available to the public by September 30, 2019, and
  - (b) lay a copy of the report before the Legislative Assembly as soon as practicable if it is sitting or, if it is not sitting, within 15 days after the commencement of the next sitting.

Coming into force

- 11(1) Section 10 comes into force on August 1, 2019.
- (2) Sections 1 to 9 come into force on October 1, 2019.

Again, Mr. Chair, the purpose of this, for all members of the Assembly, is to ensure that the Minister of Municipal Affairs consults on these proposed changes to ensure that municipalities have a true, comprehensive understanding of the proposed changes.

As well, Mr. Chair, I think one of the concerns – and it was one that I outlined, the Member for Calgary-Buffalo, and other colleagues of ours. A number of changes that we had made to the Municipal Government Act, MGA, and also the direction that our government went were really trying to encourage collaboration between municipalities. That was whether through regional collaboration on intermunicipal collaboration frameworks as well as through funding. The CARES program, community and regional economic support, was for municipalities to be able to work together to be able to compete on the world stage. We want to ensure that we’re not going to cause municipalities to undo the incredible collaborative work that they’ve done in a race to the bottom in competition with each other in order to try to attract investment.

I’ve given examples in second reading of this bill, Mr. Chair, as far as examples like the trimunicipal partnership up in Grande Prairie, with the city of Grande Prairie, the county of Grande Prairie, and the MD of Greenview, as well as areas like Alberta’s Industrial Heartland Association, that has a number of municipalities that have agreed upon a revenue-sharing model in order to go out and attract investment and businesses. Had they followed the tools that the Minister of Municipal Affairs is outlining in this bill, they would be competing with each other instead of coming together as a region to say: “Come to this area. We recognize that we all benefit from it.” It’s not just property taxes; it’s the jobs, it’s the workers, and it’s the services that they rely on.

With that, we feel – and I’m proud to move this amendment on behalf of my colleague – that this would ensure that the Minister of Municipal Affairs takes the time to consult with municipalities, because, Mr. Chair, I do want to point out the fact that the current government, when they were opposition, would constantly talk about how our government didn’t go out and consult when, in fact, we did. We’ve spoken to mayors who have said: they never talked to us about this. For me, it’s pretty rich that now that the shoe is on the other foot and the opposition is in government, suddenly consultation doesn’t matter. They talk about how they had a mandate. Well, you know what? The government may have won a significant number of seats, but they did not win the ability to be a dictator. They do still need to go out and consult with stakeholders. The mandate doesn’t give them carte blanche to do whatever they want.

What we’re doing through this amendment is saying: “We want to make sure that the municipal leaders have been properly engaged in this. Here’s an opportunity.” We’re not trying to kill this bill or end this bill. We’re just saying: go out and consult with municipal leaders, come back to the House, but let’s make sure that we preserve the incredible work that municipalities have made in collaborating with each other in order to compete on the world stage.

With that, I encourage all members of the Assembly to support this amendment.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you.

Do I see any other members wishing to speak to amendment A1? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore standing.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Mr. Chair. I appreciate you recognizing me so I can just add a couple of quick thoughts here on Bill 7. It won’t take very long. As you can imagine, I am in support of this amendment. I think the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview was very, very clear. I know there was a mandate from the people of Alberta that elected a UCP government, but they didn’t elect them to blow off consultations. There’s a responsibility on that part, and certainly in the last Legislature I heard from members who are sitting again in this House that would repeatedly, almost ad nauseam, talk about how our government wasn’t going out and consulting.

When I looked at the bill itself, I was trying to figure out what we were trying to accomplish here, and quite honestly it kind of started to revolve around creating some red tape here to do – I don’t know – something that it was already given the ability to do through changes to the MGA.

The Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview also noted quite well about potentially creating conditions for municipalities to compete against themselves, which is that, as he said, race to the bottom. I’m starting to see a little bit of a theme here where we’re blindly racing to the bottom: “We don’t need to check because, you know, we knocked on a few doors, and that’s our mandate. We know what to do. We don’t need any consultations.”

I would certainly urge members in the House to look at this very, very closely because municipalities are rightfully concerned given that the government has already committed to a $4.5 billion tax break here. They want to know where, quite honestly, their money is coming from, too. I think that by accepting this amendment, we give our municipalities the opportunity to quickly add their voices to the discussion, and we are able then to potentially create some legislation that they can work with. But at this time I’m getting a pretty good sense that that’s not the case.

With that, I will take my seat. I think I’ve added my comments there. I just don’t want to see this, again, bit of a conflict between: well, let’s get rid of red tape, but we’re going to create red tape. I’m trying to figure out how ministers are going to balance this kind of thing out.

The Deputy Chair: Other members looking to speak to amendment A1?

Hon. Members: Question.

[Motion on amendment A1 lost]

The Deputy Chair: Moving back to Bill 7, are there any members looking to speak?

Hon. Members: Question.

[The remaining clauses of Bill 7 agreed to]

[Title and preamble agreed to]

The Deputy Chair: Shall the bill be reported? Are you agreed?

Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chair: All those opposed? Carried.

Mr. Jason Nixon: I move that we rise and report the bill.

[Motion carried]

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

Mr. van Dijken: Mr. Speaker, the Committee of the Whole has had under consideration a certain bill. The committee reports the following: Bill 7. I wish to table copies of all amendments considered by Committee of the Whole on this date for the official records of the Assembly.

The Acting Speaker: This is a nondebatable report under Standing Order 18(1)(b). Does the Assembly concur in the report?

Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker: Any opposed? So ordered.

I see the hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you again to all hon. members from all parties in the House for another great week of progress. I wish everybody safe travelling back to their homes. With that, I will move to adjourn the Assembly until Monday at 1:30 p.m.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 3:44 p.m.]

Bill Status Report for the 30th Legislature - 1st Session (2019)

Activity to Thursday, June 13, 2019

The Bill sponsor's name is in brackets following the Bill title. If it is a money Bill, ($) will appear between the title and the sponsor's name. Numbers following each Reading refer to Hansard pages where the text of debates is found; dates for each Reading are in brackets following the page numbers. Bills numbered 1 to 200 are Government Bills. Bills numbered 201 or higher are Private Members' Public Bills. Bills numbered with a "Pr" prefix are Private Bills.

* An asterisk beside a Bill number indicates an amendment was passed to that Bill; the Committee line shows the precise date of the amendment.

The date a Bill comes into force is indicated in square brackets after the date of Royal Assent. If a Bill comes into force "on proclamation," "with exceptions," or "on various dates," please contact Legislative Counsel, Alberta Justice, for details at 780.427.2217. The chapter number assigned to the Bill is entered immediately following the date the Bill comes into force. SA indicates Statutes of Alberta; this is followed by the year in which it is included in the statutes, and its chapter number. ## Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Monday, June 17, 2019

Prayers

The Speaker: Hon. members, the prayer. Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and her government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power or desire to please or unworthy ideas but, laying aside all private interests and prejudices, keep in mind the responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all. Amen.

Hon. members, ladies and gentlemen, boys and girls, and children of all ages, we will now be led in the singing of our national anthem by R.J. Chambers. I would invite you to all join in in the language of your choice.

Hon. Members:

O Canada, our home and native land!
True patriot love in all of us command.
Car ton bras sait porter l'épée,
Il sait porter la croix!
Ton histoire est une épopée
Des plus brillants exploits.
God keep our land glorious and free!
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.

The Speaker: Thank you. You may be seated.

Hon. members, welcome back. It's a pleasure to see all of you. I might just add that I particularly appreciated the tempo of the national anthem today. It's like we won a national championship in basketball or something over the weekend.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Joining us today, this afternoon, we have a number of schools from the constituency of Red Deer-South. Please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

I'm also very pleased to welcome to the Speaker's gallery this afternoon with a very, very, very warm welcome our very own Deputy Chair of Committees' parents, Dr. A. Don Milliken and Dr. P. Jane Milliken.

As many of you will know, there are a number of constituency assistants in the capital region, and I have the pleasure of introducing mine. From the outstanding constituency of Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills, Brenda Berreth and Alana Gibson are with us in the Speaker's gallery.

I'm also pleased to welcome constituency assistants for the following constituencies: Central Peace-Notley, Spruce Grove-Stony Plain, Strathcona-Sherwood Park, Innisfail-Sylvan Lake, Lacombe-Ponoka. Also, guests of the Member for Banff-Kananaskis: Owen Neal, Ed Masters, Roger Grant, Chuck Collins, Wayne Peterson. Guests of the MLA for Highwood: Mrs. Sigurdson – I believe that's the lovely spouse of the Member for Highwood – also Michele Mason and Drew Mason. From the constituency of Calgary-Fish Creek: Tasha Schindel, Justin Gotfried, and Vanessa Siso. I invite you to all rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

Members' Statements

Toronto Raptors' NBA Championship

Mr. Schow: We the North, Mr. Speaker, and board man Kawhi Leonard is king. Shortly after this House adjourned last Thursday, the Toronto Raptors won the NBA title and brought the Larry O'Brien trophy home for the first time in the team's storied history. This is a big deal for Toronto since it doesn't see a lot of championships come through town, especially if you're a Toronto Maple Leafs fan. But I digress.

The Raptors' playoff journey began on April 13, when they opened their first series with a loss to the Orlando Magic, only to come back and win four straight and advance to face a young, energetic Philadelphia 76ers team. Round 2 proved to be a real test, forcing the Raptors to a game 7 and the brink of elimination. It saw one of the most dramatic buzzer beaters I have ever witnessed. In the dying seconds Kawhi Leonard hoisted a high-arching jumpshot, while falling out of bounds over seven-foot Joel Embiid, that bounced around the rim for an eternity and finally went through the mesh, sinking the City of Brotherly Love, an odd title for a city that once threw snowballs at Santa Claus.

With that, the Raptors made the eastern conference finals for the second time in franchise history, to face the Milwaukee Bucks. The Bucks fought hard, taking two early games in Toronto. However, in four consecutive games the Raptors completed a stunning come-from-behind series win to advance to their first-ever NBA finals, setting up a historic faceoff with the defending champs, the Golden State Warriors. The final series tipped off on May 30 and, with it, a battle that would last six games, but on Thursday, June 13, the final buzzer sounded, and the score clock read 114-110 in favour of the good guys.

Bill Russell famously said, "This game has always been and will always be about buckets." Well, the Raptors got buckets, and the board man got paid. This is the first championship of what should be many more, and I couldn't be more proud of this moment. We the North, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: We the North, indeed. I might just let the House know that I believe that the Member for Cardston-Siksika is the first-ever Member of the Legislative Assembly of Alberta to also have been a professional basketball player.

The Member for Calgary-McCall.

Federal Bill C-69

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Under our government we worked hard to fight for our energy industry and protect the environment because we know that creating jobs and protecting our land, air, and water is not a zero-sum game. Unfortunately, we have failed to see this kind of leadership from current provincial and federal governments. In Alberta this government has repealed the climate leadership plan and questioned whether climate change is real. Federally the government has demonized our province's industry and ignored the debacle that is C-69. These efforts to polarize Canadians are dangerous and disturbing.

This is why our government put forward a number of common-sense changes to improve C-69. This included exempting in situ projects, establishing common-sense timelines, and ensuring that the federal government cannot overreach into our provincial jurisdiction. We were pleased to see that the new government here in Alberta fully adopted our amendments. Unfortunately, the federal government didn't follow suit. They rejected the vast majority of these amendments just this past week, which is likely to create uncertainty and unnecessary delays and put important projects at risk.

1:40

There is no question that this is a step backward for all Canadians. Mr. Speaker, while this legislation may create many jobs for lawyers, it will do nothing to help our industry. Our caucus stands fundamentally opposed to this legislation, and we call on the federal government to reverse this attack on Alberta's industry and workers.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lacombe-Ponoka.

Ponoka Stampede

Mr. Orr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would first of all like to thank the voters of Lacombe, Ponoka, and Blackfalds for trusting me to be their voice in the Legislature for a second term.

Now for a few minutes I will speak about Canada's largest eight-day pro rodeo, that happens every year in my constituency. No, not the Calgary Stampede, the Ponoka Stampede. Yes, it is the largest rodeo in Canada on the professional circuit. This year the stampede will award $800,000 in prize money. It is one of the five largest payout rodeos in the world, and the pro bull-riding event is the largest payout single-day event world-wide. This amazing week-long event will be from June 25 to July 1. What a great place to celebrate Canada Day.

The first Ponoka Stampede was held in 1936. Today it is way more than just a rodeo. It's a week-long party, a rural cultural pilgrimage, and a community achievement. From the volunteers to the competitors and visitors that it attracts from across Alberta and the world to the beer gardens to the many chuck wagon races to the country music shows to the three-mile-long parade, it is a week-long western whoop-up. The Ponoka Stampede is far more than just a rodeo; it's an 83-year tradition.

I say thank you to the many volunteers for the hours they put in. Year after year they build the stampede into a bigger and better experience. The Ponoka Stampede truly reflects what it means to be Albertan: work hard, ride hard, play hard, hang on for a wild ride, and get back on every time you get bucked off. When times are tough, your community rallies behind you. That's the spirit of western culture and Ponoka. They are willing to put everything aside to put on a great show, Albertans coming together from all walks of life to create something truly special. Eighty-three years of tradition, 800 volunteers, 80,000 visitors, $800,000 in prize money: you don't want to miss it.

Federal Bills C-48 and C-69

Mr. Guthrie: Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak to the incredible disservice the Trudeau government has done to not only the people of Alberta but all Canadians with the rejection of the Senate amendments to Bill C-69 and the Senate's decision to proceed on Bill C-48. This is far from what the provinces, industries, indigenous groups, the chambers of commerce, and municipalities across this country were asking for. The federal government has demonstrated incompetence with this devastating legislation and lack of respect for this country.

Mr. Speaker, this is more than just an attack on the energy sector. This is an attack on Alberta. This is an attack on our constitutional right to make exclusive laws in relation to the development, conservation, and management of our natural resources, and the simplicity of this attack is not lost on anybody in this province. This House, our cabinet, and, to my knowledge, all provincial parties stand united against this intrusion and the Trudeau government's attempt to shut down our way of life. This is something that is unheard of. It takes a significant act of aggression towards our province for all major political parties to stand together, unequivocally, against such a foe.

Mr. Speaker, this House will not stand idly by while such incompetence threatens Alberta and the entire country's well-being. Our UCP government will continue to fight for Alberta's resources – our resources – and our ability to develop, conserve, and manage them. I ask all members and all Albertans to reach out to their MPs in Ottawa and tell them this is not right. This is overreach. This is fundamentally egregious to our economy. We, united as Albertans, will not go quietly into the night. The Trudeau Liberals had better brace for impact because Alberta is ready to rumble.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Filibuster of June 5 to 6 and Political Discourse

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Fallacies are mistaken beliefs based on unsound arguments. Last week, in particular, the government made several unsound arguments. I'll begin with the Member for Banff-Kananaskis. In her member's statement she declared that the opposition doesn't believe in democracy. Her logic for this is based on the fact that we filibustered Bill 2. She goes on to say that we "filibustered a campaign promise" and that that is disrespectful to Albertans because the UCP is government. Excuse me, Mr. Speaker? On this side of the House we stood up for workers' rights. We said no to reducing youth minimum wage. We said no to denying time and a half for working overtime. Her comments on June 13, 2019, are ridiculous. They are fallacies, unsound arguments.

There are several other fallacies that the UCP members promote. However, due to time constraints I'll bring forward just one further egregious fallacy. The UCP members like to say that since they won the election, all dissenting voices, particularly those of the Official Opposition, should be dismissed. Again, Mr. Speaker, excuse me? Pardon? This is the very essence of democracy. Opposition parties have a valuable role to play in shaping policy. We shine the light on concerns that legislation proposed may cause. Indeed, that is what we are doing in our challenges regarding Bill 2, a bill that picks the pockets of workers.

Mr. Speaker, I caution UCP members to not act arrogantly. Voices, including minority voices, deserve to be heard. In fact, this is a fundamental aspect of human rights. Just because you have the majority doesn't mean you trample on the rights of others. In addition, 45 per cent of Albertans voted for a party other than the UCP. That's a lot of Albertans. I encourage some humbleness. A government has a responsibility . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lesser Slave Lake.

Northern Wildfire Evacuations

Mr. Rehn: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. While in my constituency of Lesser Slave Lake, visiting evacuation centres that welcomed thousands of individuals who were forced out of their homes – and as I flew over fires that now cover more than 260,000 hectares in Lesser Slave Lake alone, I was deeply concerned. I felt the uncertainty, and I could see the displacement. I could hear the chaos amongst the families at the registration centres and throughout my communities. It was just last week that constituents in Wabasca, Peerless Trout, and Bigstone Cree Nation were granted access to their homes after more than two weeks of evacuation. These are not just constituents; these are families, colleagues, friends, and neighbours.

Reflecting upon the last month, I can only say thank you. Thank you to all the firefighters from across Canada as well as those from the United States who helped us in our time of need. Reflecting upon the U.S. Forest Service, they provided their own experienced, selfless, and brave individuals from Montana, Idaho, California, Nevada, Oregon, and Wisconsin. In total there are 219 Americans fighting Alberta fires. Each of them, along with the thousands of Canadian first responders, represents hope. They represent unity, and they represent an Alberta that's not going down without a fight.

I am particularly grateful to the hon. Minister of Agriculture and Forestry and the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs as well as their staff for their relentless availability, maintaining open lines of communication with chiefs, mayors, reeves, and myself as well as providing assistance that assured comfort among evacuees.

Mr. Speaker, Les Brown once said, "Our ability to handle life's challenges is a measure of our strength of character." If such is the case, I am blessed to represent some of the strongest communities with some of the most vibrant character one can find. On behalf of these communities I would like to thank all of those who helped us in our time of need.

Notices of Motions

The Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader is rising.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to give oral notice of Government Motion 21.

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly express its support for the government in its efforts to challenge the federal government's attempt to impose a carbon tax on Alberta, which this Assembly views as a clear violation of provincial jurisdiction, including the launching of a constitutional challenge if necessary, acknowledge the negative impacts that the carbon tax has had upon the people of Alberta, including the increased cost to heat homes and run businesses in the midst of an economic downturn, and recognize that Alberta's oil and gas industry continues to be global leaders in emission reductions.

I also want to give oral notice of the following bills: Bill 11, fair registration practice act, sponsored by my friend the hon. the Minister of Labour and Immigration; and Bill 12, the royalty guarantee act, sponsored by my friend the hon. the Minister of Energy.

1:50

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The Leader of Her Majesty's Official Opposition.

Public Service Contract Negotiations

Ms Notley: Well, welcome back to the Premier. You know, over the last little while your ministers have been involved in quite the pattern of incorrect fact provision. For instance, your Minister of Finance claimed last week that your bad-faith bargaining bill merely imposes a delay in legally mandated wage negotiations with public-sector workers, but the bill actually contains an omnibus clause that allows this government to impose new contracts on these workers without ever returning to the Legislature. To the Premier: will you at least admit to Alberta's front-line workers that your plan is to do a lot more than just a little delay in negotiations?

Mr. Kenney: I thank the hon. the Leader of the Opposition for the question. Mr. Speaker, it's incumbent upon the government to respect collective bargaining rights as well as to respect the best interests of taxpayers. Therefore, the only prudent and responsible way to proceed is to have the time to receive the complete information on the fiscal state of the province, which we'll be doing next month, when the MacKinnon commission reports back to government, after which we can make an informed and prudent decision about the way forward on collective bargaining agreements.

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, the bad-faith bargaining bill's omnibus clause authorizes any regulations required to carry out the intent of the act, and it references the so-called blue-ribbon panel, the chair of which is on the record advocating for wage cuts to front-line workers like nurses, paramedics, and teachers. To the Premier: will he assure this Assembly and, through it, the people of this province that under no circumstances will he be seeking wage rollbacks from unionized public-sector front-line workers?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, unlike the Leader of the Opposition, we will not be prejudging the outcome of that eminent panel, which is chaired by a former NDP Finance minister, an NDP Finance minister, Dr. MacKinnon, who actually balanced budgets, which has long been the tradition for the NDP in Saskatchewan but certainly wasn't the tradition for the NDP in Alberta, that drove us from a $13 billion to a $65 billion debt and had us on track for $100 billion in public debt, running the largest per capita deficit in the Dominion of Canada.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, the Premier's bad-faith bargaining bill is illegal. His minister has hidden the fact that it tries to authorize wage cuts to be made in the backroom, and he will not guarantee the hard-working front-line workers of this province that he will refrain from taking money from their pockets. To the Premier: why didn't you come clean with Albertans during the election, that your $4.5 billion tax gift to wealthy corporations was going to be paid for by cutting the salaries of nurses, ambulance drivers, paramedics, teachers, and many, many more?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, it's evident that the NDP anger machine still has not learned that after they raised taxes on job creators, revenues went down. The Alberta government collects less from businesses today than it did before the NDP raised business taxes by 20 per cent. Why? They punished job creators, who ended up creating fewer jobs. We're going to do the opposite. We're going to grow the economy so that we can increase government revenues, in part to ensure the future of high-quality public services.

The Speaker: The hon. the Leader of the Official Opposition.

Ms Notley: So, in short, he kept mum about this plan during the election. No mandate there, Mr. Speaker.

Worker Overtime Pay

Ms Notley: This UCP government is also attempting again to pull the wool over the eyes of working Albertans. The labour minister posted a graphic this weekend claiming that workers will earn the same once he's through cutting banked overtime from time and a half to straight time. This minister either doesn't understand basic math, doesn't understand his legislation, or, worst of all, intentionally says things publicly he knows are incorrect. There's a word for that, Mr. Speaker. To the Premier: why won't your minister come clean on the fact that cutting people's banked overtime rate means they earn less?

Mr. Kenney: Because it doesn't, Mr. Speaker. The legislation is very clear. We're simply returning to the rules that existed throughout Alberta history until about a year ago. Of course, it will not affect any employee who does not enter into an agreement with their employer with respect to banked overtime. It empowers those employees with additional flexibility in dealing with employers. It does not affect conventional overtime pay whatsoever.

Ms Notley: Well, it appears the Premier is doubling down on things that are not true.

The minister claimed his ridiculous math was actually verified by academics and experts but, strangely, did not list any of them, and he did not respond to questions seeking their names when asked by an interested public. To the minister: can you please list the experts and validators, or was that, too, a continuation of the pattern of regularly intentionally saying things that are full of incorrect facts?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, there have been no shortage of comments from labour lawyers and others confirming what is clearly black and white in the legislation, that this does not, contrary to the NDP's fear-and-smear tactics, affect in any way conventional overtime. Rather, it returns to workers the ability to negotiate voluntary agreements with employers to give them additional flexibility in how they schedule their time at work. We're empowering workers, and no one will be losing conventional overtime as a result.

Ms Notley: The Premier is incorrect. These agreements are not voluntary. He knows it.

Let me simplify this for the minister and the Premier. Before the pick-your-pockets bill a construction worker who puts in two weeks of overtime can take his family camping this summer for three weeks and get a paycheque every week. After the pick-your-pockets bill that construction worker will only get paid for two weeks on his camping trip and will have to have no pay in the third week – guess he's going hunting with the House leader – so a week less of pay. What part of this is too complicated for the minister or the Premier to understand? Would perhaps a meme help, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, the hon. the Leader of the Opposition clearly misunderstands the simple meaning of the bill, but I grasp that because the NDP understands economics generally, which is why they drove us into a jobs crisis in this province, with nearly 200,000 unemployed Albertans. Our economy shrank by 4 per cent under NDP mismanagement. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order!

Mr. Kenney: Average family incomes were down by 6 per cent under the NDP. Taxes were up; jobs were down. We're turning it around with our job-creation strategy.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud has the call.

Gay-Straight Alliances in Schools and Bill 8

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As a public servant I worked directly on the Education Act under previous Conservative governments. Under Bill 8, the government's act, the major pieces of policy in the original legislation have been shelved while the amendments the NDP government made to the School Act around school fees, superintendent compensation, and trustee code of conduct have all been kept. All that's left is an act to destroy GSAs and out LGBTQ students. Like my colleagues, I think this legislation is better described as Bill Hate. To the Minister of Education: why are you in such a rush to ram through an attack on LGBTQ youth while letting other pieces of the Education Act slide?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. I'm not sure what the MLA for Edmonton-Whitemud means when she said that the bill that we have proposed is nowhere close to the one that she worked on. Nothing has changed in the Education Act since that MLA worked on it. It was passed in 2012, amended in 2015, and I actually have a copy ready to go to print from 2016.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps the Minister of Education would like to read her own bill, Bill 8, which significantly amends the Education Act as well as the previous versions – Bill 24, the School Act – and she'd see that changes have been made.

Thank you. The minister has said that critical pieces of the original Education Act, like extending the age of access, compulsory attendance, and other items will require further consultation before they're put into effect, but the minister apparently sees no need to consult further before destroying GSAs despite mounting opposition from students, teachers, and parents. To the minister: are you worried about consulting further before you take away the rights of LGBTQ youth because you know that the majority of Albertans don't agree with it?

The Speaker: The Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. My office and I have met with numerous, numerous stakeholders, including students, parents, system administrators, trustees, and teachers – and I can quote many of them – who support the amendments that we're bringing forward, including the college of Alberta superintendents, who say that they believe Bill 8... [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. members, including the Minister of Education, we heard the question; we will hear the answer no matter how long that takes.

Hon. Minister of Education, if you'd like to conclude.

2:00

Member LaGrange: Thank you. Bevan Daverne, president-elect of the College of Alberta School Superintendents says, quote, CASS strongly believes Bill 8 demonstrates a willingness of the government to consider stakeholder feedback and to collaborate with education partners to support students in Alberta's world-class education system. We are looking forward to the opportunity to support them.

The Speaker: Thank you.

The Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It doesn't sound like the minister has spoken to any LGBTQ students, but that's fine.

The Education Act that's before this House is not transformative; well, unless you're a queer or trans student. It is simply a vehicle to drive through an anti-LGBTQ agenda that this Premier has been working on for decades. Students will be outed, they will have no right to form an actual gay-straight alliance, and schools won't be held accountable for refusing to support GSAs. To the Premier. This clearly is not the Education Act. This clearly is not transformative. Why are you so determined to create a vehicle to harm LGBTQ youth?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. Again, our government has been very clear. We oppose the mandatory parental notification for any student. We will have amongst the most comprehensive, which means that someone has to be on top I reiterate that we will have the most comprehensive protections for LGBTQ-plus students in Canada.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much. What a timely statement from the Education minister.

On June 3 the Premier told this House and I'm quoting from Hansard, "Our government will maintain the strongest legal protections for gay-straight alliances of any province in Canada," and his cabinet ministers repeated it many times since. Yet late Friday afternoon the Minister of Education released a statement that says that Albertans "will have among the most comprehensive statutory protections for gay-straight alliances (GSAs) in Canada." Those two are very different things. Has the Premier read his Education minister's statement, and is he now ready to apologize for making misleading statements to the people of Alberta?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education is rising.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. The Premier and I are on the same page on this. We know that we will have the most comprehensive protections for LGBTQ students in Canada. Nova Scotia and B.C. have ministerial orders and policy, not statutory protections like we will have.

Thank you.

Ms Ganley: Last week this opposition tabled written proof that Nova Scotia, Ontario, and British Columbia all have stronger legal protections than those in Bill Hate. Now that they have been caught, the Education minister has conceded in writing that Bill Hate rolls back the rights of students seeking to form a GSA, taking us from the best in the country to somewhere in the pack. Has the Premier actually read his own legislation, or is he relying on the advice of people like John Carpay and the member for Drayton Valley-Devon to advise him on how best to take away the rights of LGBTQ youth?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. The opposition knows that regardless of how it describes it, the legal protections are clear and comprehensive under Bill 8, the Education Act, and our province's privacy legislation, FOIP and PIPA, which supersedes other pieces of legislation. It's time for the NDP to stop using these students as political props. [interjections]

Thank you.

The Speaker: Order. Order. We will have order.

Ms Ganley: Strong, stronger, strongest: I think you learn that in the third grade, Mr. Speaker. We know that there were 28 Alberta private schools due to lose their funding for refusing to accept gay-straight alliances, refusing to allow the words "gay" or "queer" in their school policies, and for developing GSA policies that were hateful or discriminatory. Schools that don't follow the law should not be funded. Accepting the rights of LGBTQ youth is the law. To the Premier: will you admit that the reason you're ramming through Bill Hate is because you want these schools to get a pass?

The Speaker: The Minister of Education is rising.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. Once again, our government will have the most comprehensive statutory protections for lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, queer, and two-spirited students, period. As far as the private schools, students attending private schools will receive the same protections under section 35.1. It is the law. They will have to follow the law.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Stony Plain.

Highway 628 Capital Plan

Mr. Turton: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Highway 628 is a vital transportation link that runs in an east-west direction and connects the town of Stony Plain to the Whitemud freeway in Edmonton. Previous governments committed to a reconstruction of highway 628, a project that is of an extremely high priority to everyone in the tri region. However, after years of neglect resulting in unsafe driving conditions that have claimed many lives, this project remains unfinished. To the Minister of Transportation: what is the current status of this project, and can the residents of Spruce Grove and Stony Plain finally get this major transportation link completed?

The Speaker: The Minister of Transportation.

Mr. McIver: Thank you. Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the question and for his advocacy. We understand the importance of highway 628 to the local residents and commuters that use it. Approximately 5,000 vehicles a day use this road. This summer, as necessary, maintenance work will be continued to ensure surface and gravel sections of 628 remain safe for travel. The project will be considered along other important capital projects in the province as we go through our capital planning and budget process. [interjection]

Mr. Turton: To the minister: given that this government has committed to working with our First Nations communities to provide greater access to economic opportunities and given that a better, safer reconstruction of the highway will increase access to multiple urban centres, will the minister commit to extending highway 628 eastward past highway 60 to the Whitemud freeway in Edmonton, giving Enoch First Nation better transportation options for the benefit of their residents?

Mr. McIver: Well, Mr. Speaker, I heard the member of the opposition calling to toll the road. We won't be doing that. What we will be doing is that we're committed to working with our First Nations communities on projects that will contribute to their success. We understand the importance of this project to First Nations communities and other citizens of Alberta that use this road. As noted, the project is under review. We will put it through our capital planning and budget process. This is an important project. We'll take it seriously, and when we make a decision, we will report the decision.

Mr. Turton: Again to the Minister of Transportation: given that the congestion on highway 16 is a barrier to a timely commute for the many constituents of Spruce Grove and Stony Plain who work in Edmonton and given that highway 628 in its current state is not at this point in time a safe alternative and given that this project has been a major issue for my constituents for a very long time, what is this government doing to make sure that the reconstruction of this important highway is completed in a timely manner?

Mr. McIver: Well, Mr. Speaker, I would like the hon. member to know that safety is a top concern of our ministry. Based on what I just heard in the House, we will make sure somebody goes out and makes sure that is in safe condition today. The project will be considered in upcoming budget discussions. Our capital plan puts a high priority on safety among improving commute times and reducing congestion on highways across Alberta. [interjection] Even if the hon. member across doesn't care about safety, we do, and we'll look at it.

Alberta Energy Regulator Board of Directors

Mr. Schmidt: Mr. Speaker, during the election the UCP made a bunch of promises, hundreds of them, actually. Some of them they're actually keeping, like rolling back protections for LGBTQ youth, but some of them we're not so sure of. One of the strange and petty pledges that they made was to fire the entire board of the AER. To the environment minister: what's the status of the board of the AER, and when will you be handing out their pink slips?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, it doesn't surprise me to see the opposition critic again making things up inside the Assembly from what I can tell. We will evaluate the AER. We're in the process of doing that together, the Energy minister and I. We will work together through that process to come up with a plan that works for Albertans. We'll have more to say about it in the coming weeks.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, Mr. Speaker, I would refer that hon. member to several points of order that he's made up in the past about me.
