Trudeau, an anti-Alberta alliance, one that has resulted in hundreds of thousands of Albertans losing their jobs under their watch, one that has seen our largest industry on the ropes under their watch. Those members have stood on the steps of this Legislature and protested against our largest industry, have protested against pipelines. This side of the House will not be lectured by the NDP when it comes to the oil and gas industry.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar has the third set of questions.

Climate Change Strategy

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I can assure the member opposite that members of the Alberta public will be lecturing them on climate change because last night's election results clearly show that climate change is a top issue for a majority of Canadians. Alberta will be pushed to do more. Yet our Premier has done nothing but ignore the problem and put Alberta in a position of being told what to do by Ottawa. To the member opposite: why has it been more than six months and we still haven't seen any action on climate change?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, looking forward to tabling TIER here in a few days, as I've said inside this House – but I think that hon. member misses the point. His federal party received less votes in this federal election in this province than Justin Trudeau's party did in this province. Conservatives in this province received the highest mandate in the history of this country in this province last night. Do you know why that is? Because Conservatives have stood up for Albertans. That side of the House, the NDP, have stood against Albertans. They've worked against Albertans. They've laughed at Albertans. They've called them Chicken Little. They told them to take the bus, and they called them embarrassing cousins. Shame on them.

Mr. Schmidt: Mr. Speaker, Alberta is running out of time to deal on climate change, and we can't waste it listening to the rhetoric from the member opposite. The fact is that our Premier has slashed Alberta's plan to fight climate change, and now we're going to get Justin Trudeau's plan. We've been waiting over six months for action on climate change. We only had to wait a few days for a 4 and a half billion dollar handout to the most profitable corporations in this province. Wouldn't it have been better to use that $4.5 billion to actually fight climate change?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, we now know that the NDP's climate plan only raised taxes and had no impact on climate. I look forward to releasing our plan in a couple of weeks.

But back to jobs, that hon. member was a cabinet minister in a government whose Energy minister told Albertans who were out of jobs that maybe they should move to B.C. for the time being to look for jobs. Again, this side of the House will not be lectured by the NDP. They've been outright rejected by Albertans. They were rejected again last night. Albertans want a party that will stand up for them. Their government will stand up for this province each and every day. The NDP, the Official Opposition, will sell 'em out every time they get.

Mr. Schmidt: Mr. Speaker, it's only been six months, and they've already lost 27,000 jobs. The member opposite couldn't create a job if he were given a job-creation kit for Christmas. Our government's plan cut carbon emissions by 50 megatonnes, created thousands of jobs, and funded green infrastructure investments all across the province. It was the leading plan in Canada. This government's action so far is only to troll those who want action on climate change. When will you release your plan, and will it come even close to the emissions targets Alberta has to meet?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, their leader already admitted that they did nothing on emission targets. It's ridiculous. Again, we will not be lectured by that member, who was a cabinet minister in the worst government in the history of this province, that oversaw the largest job loss . . .

Mr. Schmidt: Point of order.

Mr. Jason Nixon: . . . in the history of this province, that brought us on track to a hundred billion dollars in debt in this province, that chased away billions of dollars of investment under their watch, Mr. Speaker. It's rich for them to continue to lecture us inside this House, particularly when we know they continue to side with their eastern socialist overlords. They side with them against Albertans. When are they going to side with Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View has the last set of leader questions.

Municipal Funding

Ms Ganley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Municipal Affairs has written a column in today's Calgary Herald and Edmonton Journal deeming spending in Alberta's big cities unsustainable. It would appear this column is an attempt by the minister to carry out his plan to cut funding for municipal infrastructure. The Premier's own blue-ribbon report calls for up to 20 per cent in cuts. To the Premier: how exactly is cutting infrastructure for Edmonton and Calgary going to help residents of those cities?

The Speaker: The Minister of Municipal Affairs is rising to answer.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. Let me be clear. You know, in this province we saw for the last four years the devastation that the members opposite brought to our province. On this side at the provincial level we are working so hard to undo the extreme damage they have done to our communities, not-for-profits, businesses, and families. That is exactly what we are focused on, and that's what we are going to deliver later this week.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Ms Ganley: Thank you. The city of Calgary still has serious infrastructure needs, including the Springbank dam and the green line. When we ask about these projects, the Premier dodges the question. That's probably because the climate leadership plan that he ended was going to pay for these major projects. To the Premier: can you promise here and now to Calgarians that the green line and the Springbank dam will be built on the timeline set out by our government and that you won't force the cities to hike taxes to pay for these projects?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, again, we've already been through this with that hon. member. That hon. member knows it because she was part of a cabinet who messed up filing documents with the federal regulator when it comes to Springbank. The reality is that we're in this situation and conversation when it comes to Springbank because the NDP failed yet again when they were in power. This is a mistake that they made. Our government continues to move forward for solutions that will work for Albertans. Again, it's rich coming from the NDP, who make mistake after mistake after mistake and then come and ask questions about what's taking so long to fix their mistakes.

Ms Ganley: Yet another dodge. I wonder if Calgarians will ever hear an answer.

The Premier continues to talk out of both sides of his mouth, and he's not alone. The Minister of Justice claims that he will add 500 more police to Alberta municipalities, counties, districts, and villages, but he's offered no specifics on how to do that. Meanwhile his own officials are distributing documents that talk about a 70 per cent cut for rural police funding. To the Minister of Justice: rather than asking me to do your job, as you've done for days, can you please own your role as minister and explain how you will pay for these 500 police officers?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, we've had these lines of questions here. My record on that is clear. What we have here is a member opposite who wouldn't accept an invitation to come to Rocky Mountain House to hear about their legacy on rural crime, wouldn't accept when I offered to pay their transportation costs. Here is an offer for all the members opposite, Mr. Speaker. I am proposing to rent a bus. It's going to have on the side of that bus: NDP legacy tour on rural crime. I invite them to come on down. I've met with thousands of Albertans. I've had 5,000 responses online. Why won't they own up to their record on rural crime?

Condominium Owner Consumer Protection

Mr. Yao: Mr. Speaker, my constituents in Fort McMurray are dealing with significant issues regarding condominiums. For example, last fall I told the story of a man who purchased a condo in Fort McMurray in the Penhorwood complex. Due to discovery of faulty construction he, alongside 167 other units, was evacuated in 2011. Mortgages are still being paid on these units even though they were demolished several years ago. Every time these issues crop up, investor confidence in the housing industry drops. To the Minister of Municipal Affairs: what is your ministry doing to prevent these issues from occurring again?

The Speaker: The Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. As the Penhorwood complex issues came to light, the government developed and implemented a new-home warranty protection act, which was later expanded to require that residential builders, including condominium builders, be licensed. We are also working with national code bodies and industry to ensure that Alberta's codes are up to date and reflect best practices. My heart goes out to these residents, and I am working to ensure that we don't see a repeat of this situation.

The Speaker: The Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo.

Mr. Yao: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In the past a few condos, both in Fort McMurray and across the province, have had serious construction concerns. Most condo boards do good work, but they're not used to overseeing large rebuilds, which they're not prepared for nor designed to manage. Now my constituents are telling me about a condo complex which has no condo board but is managed by the builder even though multiple people own units within this complex. These issues have occurred even as previous governments updated the associated legislation and regulations. To the Minister of Service Alberta: how will this government ensure adequate legal protection for the buyers of condominiums?

The Speaker: The Minister of Service Alberta.

Mr. Glubish: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. While I cannot comment on any specifics, I am happy to provide some information to the Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo. First of all, let me just say that as a former condo resident and as a former condo board member I understand the pressures that boards face, and I cannot imagine what it would be like to oversee a rebuild. Second, I would like to clarify that according to current legislation, a board must be set up within 90 days once 50 per cent of the titles have been delivered to owners. Finally, I would encourage all condo owners and those who are looking at buying a condo to check out some of the materials we have online, including a tipsheet called Owning a Condominium.

Thank you.

Mr. Yao: Mr. Speaker, private consumer protection companies have stepped up to protect Fort McMurray residents where previous governments left my constituents unappeased. These same companies have told me that they are, quote, uncovering the largest failure in consumer protection that they have ever heard of; the scale is almost not believable. End quote. This is a multibillion-dollar industry in our province alone. To the Minister of Service Alberta: what will your ministry do to ensure that Albertans, especially those dealing with the largest purchasing decision of their lives, are sufficiently protected?

Mr. Glubish: Mr. Speaker, I'd like to thank the Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo for continuing to raise these concerns with me and with my department. He's doing great advocacy on behalf of his constituents. You know, our government provides numerous resources to help Albertans protect themselves as best they can and to provide them information on things they should be looking for before buying a product or hiring a service. I previously mentioned a condo owner tipsheet that we have available online, and in addition to that we also have other consumer protection resources that offer information to consumers before they buy or hire. If consumers have a specific complaint, they can file that complaint online, and our consumer investigation unit will look into the matter further.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre has the call.

Diagnostic Imaging Wait Times

Mr. Shepherd: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Now, recently I've been approached by many Albertans whose doctors have determined they need diagnostic imaging but find themselves facing wait times of up to seven to nine months even for cases marked urgent. CT scans and MRIs are essential tools to diagnose life-threatening illnesses like cancer. The longer a patient has to wait for that scan, the less likely they are to survive. These delays started recently, as in this past summer, so what did this Minister of Health do or what did he fail to do that created this backlog that is putting Albertans' lives at risk?

Mr. Shandro: Well, Mr. Speaker, for four years we saw wait times get longer and longer under the NDP government, and they did nothing. It's one of the many reasons that Albertans voted them out of office in the last election. Our CT and MRI wait times are longer than the national average along with many surgery waits as well. We have to do better given how much we spend here in Alberta on our health care. The previous minister claimed that she had intervened last year to fix wait times for CT scans and cataract surgery as well. The result was that the wait for CT scans went up, and the wait for cataract surgery soared from 39 weeks to 48.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Now, given that an Alberta Health Services spokesman told me just last week that this backlog is the direct result of this minister allowing imaging funding from the previous government to expire and given that this government somehow was able to move with lightning speed to give 4 and a half billion dollars away in a corporate handout, to this minister: are you content to leave Alberta families living with cancer to simply wait and worry as long as they get their diagnosis in due course?

Mr. Shandro: I see a theme in a lot of the questions that I get in this House, Mr. Speaker: why in five months have you not fixed what we couldn't do in four years? It's a ridiculous question. I reject the premise. We are going to fix the problems that the NDP left us in health care.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Shepherd: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Now, given that this choice of corporate handouts over health care comes alongside this minister's ongoing gross mismanagement of Alberta's lab testing systems and given that I've met with Albertans whose lives are truly at stake as this government allows medical scans and tests to fall behind, to this Minister of Health: why did you pick your no-jobs corporate handout over the safety and health of Albertans with cancer?

Mr. Shandro: What an irresponsible thing to continue to be said in this House, Mr. Speaker, these imaginary numbers that keep on being given out by our friends opposite, imaginary numbers about 4.5 this, or 4.5 that. The fact is that 95 per cent of the corporations where I come from in Calgary are small businesses. These are families who have invested their family money in those businesses. This job-creation tax cut will help them, help them be able to hire back their neighbours and help them reinvest in those businesses.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

Health Care Funding

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that this government has spent this fall session avoiding giving any details about their closed-door budget, Albertans are growing increasingly concerned about what services will get cut to pay for their 4 and a half billion dollar corporate giveaway. We know that the chair of the blue-ribbon panel shut down over 50 rural hospitals in Saskatchewan in 1993 as a cost-saving measure. Apparently, saving lives in Saskatchewan wasn't worth the money. To the Minister of Infrastructure: will your budget put a dollar sign on the lives of Albertans, and if so, how many dollars will each life save?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, obviously, we're rolling out a budget the day after tomorrow, so I'm not going to reveal details today. What I can reveal and this House knows is that the previous government left us on an unsustainable trajectory in the way they managed the finances of this province. The members opposite ran the province's finances into the ground, and ultimately we were elected to deliver a budget that responds responsibly for the financial management of the province.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, I'm looking forward to seeing how much every single life is worth on Thursday, then.

Now, given that in 2009 when reflecting on the closure of those over 50 rural hospitals, the chair of the blue-ribbon panel acknowledged that the savings from closing these hospitals was, quote, far less than what was expected and given, Mr. Speaker, that I would hope that all members of this House would agree that compromising health care for rural Albertans for a pittance in savings isn't worth it, again to the Minister of Infrastructure: since there is no business or moral case to closing hospitals, will you commit to keeping every single rural Alberta hospital open after the budget?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, what I can say is that the previous government's financial management would have resulted in the next generation having no hospitals at all. They were putting us on a trajectory where we simply could not operate sustainably. Expenses were rising; revenues were flat. In spite of the fact that they were raising taxes, they were collecting less. Why? Because investment fled the province, jobs with it, and, ultimately, government revenues. We will turn that around.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I guess Albertans will just have to wait and see how many hospitals will be closed.

Now, given that this Health minister has yet to lay out a clear plan for maintaining quality and accessible health care for all Albertans and given that the UCP are taking advice from someone who closed 52 rural hospitals for very little savings and given that protecting health care access for Albertans should be a no-brainer for every member of this House, to the Minister of Health: since the Minister of Finance will not give a clear answer or the Minister of Infrastructure, will you commit that not a single rural hospital will close while you are the minister?

The Speaker: Hon. Member for Edmonton-South, I concur; I'm sure that Albertans are looking forward to the budget on Thursday. However, that was a preamble, and they're not to be used.

The hon. Minister of Health.

Mr. Shandro: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, our campaign commitment to Albertans was to maintain or increase health care funding. That was our health care guarantee to Albertans. We're looking forward to being able to fulfill that commitment. We do have a plan. We're going to be providing the details for this plan on how we're going to bring down wait times for surgeries through our surgical initiative. We're incredibly proud of the many initiatives that we're already unleashing. The nurse practitioner initiative as well is expanding the scope of LPNs in this province.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Fish Creek.

Tourism Strategy

Mr. Gottfried: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In the 2019 election platform the UCP committed to developing a 10-year tourism strategy due to the high potential for economic diversification within the already burgeoning tourism sector. It ambitiously targeted doubling tourism spending in our province by 2030. To the Minister of Economic Development, Trade and Tourism: can you share with us your government's progress and reference the co-operation and collaboration you are developing between your ministry and industry partners in pursuit of this goal?

The Speaker: The Minister of Economic Development, Trade and Tourism.

Ms Fir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. Tourism is an industry that we are going to be working very hard to unchain in order to reach its full potential. We have already taken measures to free up red tape in the tourism sector through my colleague the Minister of Environment and Parks. As was in our platform, our government will be developing a 10-year tourism strategy in order to fully unleash our tourism potential.

Mr. Gotfried: Thank you to the minister. It's good to see progress on yet another platform commitment as we have on so many others.

Given the minister's insights on growth potential in the tourism sector beyond the traditional attraction of our magnificent Rockies and given the boundless experiential tourism assets across our great province, will the minister share with Albertans some of the specific goals and diverse offerings that reflect growth opportunities within the 10-year strategy?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Economic Development, Trade and Tourism.

Ms Fir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member. It is true that many areas of Alberta have great potential for tourism, including the Rockies, but also areas such as the badlands. The 10-year tourism strategy will be a comprehensive and innovative framework that will contain recommendations and strategies that will help communities to grow tourism. The strategy will furthermore have a very robust and ambitious target for tourism investment.

Mr. Gotfried: Thank you, Minister. Given the importance of the 10-year strategy in growing tourism in Alberta and given that it will require not only ideas but a depth of sectoral and marketing experience and given that it is also clear that our province has both the talent and entrepreneurial mindset in the field of tourism that can be engaged in developing this strategy, including some within our own government, can the minister please share with us who will be leading this all-important initiative for growth in Alberta?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Fir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. A bold strategy like the one we're developing requires an experienced and innovative leader. Travel Alberta, among others, will be one of the driving forces in the development of the 10-year tourism strategy, and we will be consulting far and wide across the province on ways to reduce red tape, grow the tourism sector, and bring private-sector tourism investment to our province.

2:20 Reproductive Health Care Access

Ms Renaud: Mr. Speaker, yesterday the UCP caucus voted unanimously against a motion that would have urged the government to take steps to ensure equal access to reproductive health care services in the province of Alberta. Firstly, I'd like to acknowledge the government members for staying in the Chamber while the motion was debated, which is a refreshing change from the mass exodus last time the topic was discussed. To the Minister of Health: can you please explain to this House why you didn't support this motion? After all, it is your job to provide accessible health care to all Albertans.

The Speaker: Hon. members, of course, it's sometimes difficult for members to comment on the decisions that have already been made by the Assembly, but if the minister of status of women would like to do so, she may.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Actually, our government has done some incredible work, and thank you very much to the Minister of Health for improving rural access. That includes adding 30 new nurse practitioners, expanding the scope of practice of 16,000 LPNs. This is a very important issue, and we just can't understand why the NDP is using this to create divisiveness in this House. That plan failed. We refuse to use these issues, women's issues especially, as a political football in this House.

Ms Renaud: Given that instead of sincerely engaging in the debate, the government chose to diminish the concerns of women and health care professionals and given that this government has no problem funding $4.5 billion for its no-jobs corporate handout but can't commit to supporting women's access to health care, to the Minister of Health: can you explain to the concerned women and health care providers what it takes for the government to respect their issues?

The Speaker: The minister for the status of women.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I find it very interesting that this member would mention that when they had four years to bring this forward if this was a necessity, especially when you're talking about rural care, rural health care, and women's issues in rural health care. We had the opportunity to discuss this. My door is always open. If you want to have a legitimate discussion about this and a bipartisan discussion, please come to me. This is very important to this caucus.

Thank you.

Ms Renaud: Given that the government and all members have an obligation to ensure that all Albertans have equal access to reproductive health care under the law and given that we've heard stories of the difficulties faced by Albertans, especially those living in rural, remote areas when it comes to being able to access abortion and reproductive health care services, to the Minister of Health: can you please explain to all of us in this House why people living in rural, remote communities get less when it comes to reproductive health care?

The Speaker: The hon. the minister for the status of women.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I think that's a question that she needs to ask her caucus and the Leader of the Opposition because if it actually mattered, maybe all of their members would have shown up to vote last night. On top of that, more than that, there is an opportunity to discuss – again I bring up that the Minister of Health has done an excellent job looking into rural care, looking into those matters, and making sure that there is access for these services wherever they are needed.

I bring up again that if the previous government was interested in these issues, they would have brought them up earlier and would have made this legislation a priority while they were in government.

The Speaker: The hon. minister for the status of women will know that we rarely refer to the absence or the presence of members. While you didn't do that specifically, I might just add caution when speaking about who may or may not have voted in the House.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Bill 203

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This government's priorities are showing. They took immediate action to give away $4.5 billion to corporations and created zero jobs in the process. But when faced with debating the bill and the importance of protecting the public health care system, this government won't even allow it to come into the Legislature. To the Minister of Health: do you reject public health care, are you scared of it, or can you just not afford it after the Premier kicked billions of dollars to big corporations?

Mr. Shandro: Mr. Speaker, again we hear these imaginary numbers from our friends opposite. They make stuff up. They're trying to create fear among Albertans.

We have a public health care guarantee. We are guaranteeing Albertans that we will maintain or increase our funding in this public health care system.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Your guarantees aren't worth the cardboard they're written on.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the government voted against even debating a bill that stakeholders told the committee would ban extra-billing for insured services in our health care system and given that this minister, with all of his non answers today, appears dead set on moving to an American-style health care model, where people will pay for service and those that can't afford it get the shaft, to the Minister of Health: just how high will you let people's health care bills go as you scramble to pay for your corporate giveaway?

Mr. Shandro: Mr. Speaker, American-style this, American-style that: we keep hearing that from our friends opposite. We spend world-class amounts of money in our health care system in Alberta, and Albertans expect world-class outcomes. That means comparing us to Scotland, Sweden, England, and Australia and not, as our friends opposite would have us do, comparing us to Cuba.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that Bill 203 would have also taken action to ban queue-jumping in our health care system and given that Bill 203 would also have banned the introduction of two-tiered medicine, to the Minister of Health: won't you admit that the corporate CEOs you're kicking handouts to will also get pushed to the front of the line?

Mr. Shandro: Mr. Speaker, again more fear and more smear among our friends opposite in trying to scare people. We have a guarantee to Albertans that we will continue to maintain or increase our funding of the publicly funded health care system.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland has a question.

Rural Housing and High-speed Internet

Mr. Getson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our rural areas, particularly in my constituency, are looking for support. Rent is becoming unaffordable for many, and our Internet connectivity and coverage needs some serious work. Many mobile-home communities in my area have landlords that are not being reasonable. They are increasing lot rents while not delivering services that are required such as snow removal. To the Minister of Service Alberta: can you please inform this House of your plans to make residential tenancy dispute resolution systems also available for residents of mobile-home communities so that they, too, can have this service?

The Speaker: The Minister of Service Alberta.

Mr. Glubish: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland. I want to also thank him for organizing the opportunity for me to come and visit with some of his constituents in a mobile-home community in Parkland. It was very helpful for me to hear directly from the mobile-home community residents and just to listen to their concerns and meet with them in their homes. That's why the tour that I did as Minister of Service Alberta this summer was so important. I toured across 36 communities in nine days, 4,200 kilometres, and I met with residents all across this province to discuss these kinds of issues.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland.

Mr. Getson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Minister. Given that rural Internet is lagging behind, quite literally, in comparison to what many cities in Alberta enjoy and given that the Internet is a major form of communication not only for households but for businesses as well and given that the quality of Internet access is essential for businesses when considering where to invest, can the minister please update this House on the plans to facilitate high-quality Internet service in rural areas?

The Speaker: The Minister of Service Alberta.

Mr. Glubish: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thanks again to my colleague here. To talk about the tour I did this summer and the discussions I had with his constituents and many others across this province, the fact is that the previous government promised a broadband strategy several times but failed to deliver. We know this is important, and that's why I spent so much time this summer speaking with so many municipalities and regional economic development associations as well as private industry and telecommunications companies to get a good, firm understanding of what the status of this industry is and how we can work with them to go over some results for rural Albertans.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Getson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Minister. Given that this minister has previously stated that we cannot afford to overbuild the infrastructure when it comes to ensuring high-speed Internet access and given that he has spoken regularly about the need to engage with other levels of government as well as large and small businesses and stakeholders in order to find solutions, can the minister please explain to us the work that he is undertaking to ensure that there is a co-ordination of efforts to solve this problem in the sharing of information between municipalities and others around the infrastructure that already exists?

The Speaker: The minister.

Mr. Glubish: Well, thanks, Mr. Speaker. You know, the most important thing here is that we need to take the time to do this right. We need to make sure that we're all pulling in the same direction and we're all working from the same information. That's, again, why the summer tour was so important. That's why the meetings I've been having since with telecommunications companies as well as with municipalities and with regional economic development associations are so important. It's important that we understand the issues on the ground in these rural communities because not all of them are facing the same challenges and constraints and it can't be a one-size-fits-all solution. I'm pleased to say that I had a great meeting with Telus just this week, and I'm looking forward to having some more meetings in the future.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview has a question.

Support for Seniors

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I've spent this summer and fall meeting with seniors and seniors' groups across Alberta. I can inform this House that the minister of seniors has created a high level of fear and uncertainty by failing to provide assurances that vital services will be protected from cuts. To the minister: can you promise Alberta seniors that they won't be forced to pay for your government's $4.5 billion corporate handout?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Seniors and Housing.

Ms Pon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our government's election platform included a commitment to make life better for seniors and their families, maintaining the existing seniors' benefits, and we take that commitment seriously. However, our government must also get spending under control, or we will endanger future programs and services for those who need it the most such as our seniors.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Ms Sigurdson: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that these agencies co-ordinate a large number of volunteers that provide high-quality care and support at a modest price to the provincial government and given that this support allows Alberta seniors to remain in their homes and communities and to live in dignity, to the minister again: will you put these seniors' minds at ease right now and say clearly that their supports will not be cut?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Seniors and Housing.

Ms Pon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our government must get spending under control. Seniors have made our province into what it is today, but they also understand that we need to live within our means. The MacKinnon report indicated that if we continue down this path of spending, we will soon be more than a hundred billion dollars in debt. We are spending $5 million a day on interest instead. Five million dollars is enough to buy 30 ambulances each day.

Ms Sigurdson: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It sounds like seniors are going to be left behind by this government.

Given that seniors' agencies provide preventative services that help keep Alberta seniors from needing costly ambulance trips and stays in the emergency room and given that we know seniors' health declines rapidly when they're forced to leave their homes and communities for care, to the minister. Your job is to stand up for seniors in cabinet. Why can't you put their fears to rest now and support funding for seniors' programs?

The Speaker: The hon. the minister.

Ms Pon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. This NDP government got us into this trouble. The NDP has repeatedly failed our seniors. For four unsuccessful years the NDP did not address the needs of our seniors. By 2035 one in five Albertans will be over the age of 65. Our government will ensure that our most cherished residents have the support they need.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for St. Albert has another question.

Seclusion Rooms in Schools

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. At this Legislature today I attended a rally with parents that are very concerned about the use of seclusion rooms in Alberta schools. Our government banned these rooms, and we were going to work with school boards on proper funding and supports to see the ban through. But this current Minister of Education ended that ban, and now the use of seclusion rooms is rising. To the minister: do you really think it's okay to lock away a student with complex needs rather than helping them succeed?

The Speaker: The Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. Nobody wants to use these seclusion rooms, but we also recognize that exceptional circumstances need to be considered from time to time. Numerous education partners, including the ATA, have called on us to rethink the NDP's ban, and we owe it to our staff and to students to ensure that schools remain safe work and productive learning environments.

Ms Renaud: Given that over 700 uses by Edmonton public isn't time to time and given that one person at a budget town hall held in St. Albert was asked to build an additional 200 seclusion rooms and given that this minister appears fully willing to sit on her hands while kids are locked up in seclusion rooms, to this minister: how do you justify putting teachers and students in harm's way by condoning seclusion rooms? Simple question. Now we need an answer.

Member LaGrange: I totally reject the premise of that comment. The example that she gave is a clear example of why we require strict standards and reporting processes, that the previous government failed to implement. We have brought together all these key partners, including the ATA and Inclusion Alberta, to the table to help finalize these standards, and they will be coming forward very, very soon.

Ms Renaud: Given that the parents I spoke to at today's rally were not consulted on the upcoming budget, which is no surprise given that you have to be a UCP donor to have a say, and given that the Finance minister has indicated that there will be no increase in education funding despite the student population growing, to either minister. You didn't attend the rally, so here's your chance. Please explain to these parents why you think that having a student locked away in a seclusion room is okay, is justifiable, and that corporate handouts are okay. I will table the proof so that you can have a look at it.

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you again, Mr. Speaker, for the question. Again, I reiterate the fact that nobody wants these seclusion rooms used. They are there to be used for the safety of the students and the staff. At the end of the day, school divisions are the ones in the best position to make these decisions. I will not micromanage school boards as the previous ministry did.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein has a question.

Alberta Energy Regulator

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In a recent report from the Auditor General we see that it cites inappropriate use of public money by the Alberta Energy Regulator. It also states that the AER was operating “outside of its mandate.” We’ve received additional reports from the Ethics Commissioner and the Public Interest Commissioner offering a scathing indictment of the activities of leaders within the Alberta Energy Regulator over the past few years. To the minister of environment: what is being done to change the tone from the top within our regulator?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, I was shocked to see the boondoggle that was the NDP’s mismanagement of the Alberta Energy Regulator when I was appointed as environment minister. It was described by the Edmonton Journal, after reading those investigations that the hon. member refers to, as Damning Investigations into AER Show NDP Was Asleep at the Pump Jack. I can assure you that is what it looks like. The NDP were asleep at the wheel at the very time that the energy industry needed them most, which is why the hon. Energy minister and I have taken action right away. We replaced the Alberta Energy Regulator board, and we started a review into the mandate, the governance, and the overall process within the Alberta Energy Regulator.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister for the answer and your leadership on this. I’m very happy to see accountability for taxpayers there. Given that it has emerged that some within the AER were more concerned with side projects like ICORE and enhancing their own profiles than they were with the core function of the regulator, to the minister: how did this happen, and how is this government working to ensure that the Alberta Energy Regulator is adhering to their core mandate?

The Speaker: I know that there may be a certain amount of admiration between the two of you, but I would still consider that to be a preamble.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, it was shocking to look through the reports and find out what a mess was taking place under the NDP’s watch when it came to the Alberta Energy Regulator. It’s very serious, an abuse of taxpayer dollars, and completely inappropriate behaviour, that this side of the House condemns. As such, we first replaced the board of the Alberta Energy Regulator. We also started a review both into the mandate and the governance of the Alberta Energy Regulator, which is taking place now, as well as a review into the overall operations of the Alberta Energy Regulator, with the goal of making sure that we have the best regulator in the world that maintains our oil and gas industry.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and again thank you to the minister for the answer. Given that in the last few years we have seen the regulator’s well approval time increase to among one of the longest in North America, which is shameful, to the minister: what is this government doing to improve efficiency to enhance this province’s competitive advantage in terms of our oil and gas industry?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, sadly, Mr. Speaker, under the NDP we know now what was taking place at the Alberta Energy Regulator. They were not taking our energy industry seriously, and they were focused on everything but the energy industry and making sure that it was working. As we go through this review process, the overall goal, as we pointed out in our platform, is to make sure that we have the best regulator, that is efficient and able to do the work that we need to do with the oil and gas industry, while still maintaining the best environmental standards in the world. The Minister of Energy and I are confident that we’re going to be able to achieve that through the review process.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika has caught my eye.

Red Tape Reduction

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. For the last two years Alberta’s NDP was given an F, a failing grade, in red tape from the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. We are the only province to get that failing grade in Canada, the same failing grade I give to the Leader of the Opposition for betraying Alberta and voting for Jagmeet Singh.

Ms Sweet: Point of order.

Mr. Schow: To the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction: how will this government address the heavy presence of red tape in all sectors of Alberta’s economy?

The Speaker: The point of order is noted at 2:40.

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, that is a great question, and the truth is that the CFIB did actually give this government an F, but in reality who gave them the F is the businesses, the job creators, the innovators of Alberta. Those are the ones who spoke loud and clear on April 16 and said: “No more. We want to have a better, more efficient way to be able to go forward.” This is why this government has approached this red tape reduction initiative in a way that we will be able to make sure we get Albertans back to work and jumpstart our economy.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, given that the CFIB stated that regulations cost the average business $6,700 per employee and given that the NDP voting decisions from their leader could cost us national unity and given that the cost of red tape is especially burdensome for small businesses across Alberta, can the associate minister please explain how this government will meet its red tape reduction targets of one-third to reduce unnecessary red tape causing burdens on Alberta businesses?

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, President Reagan once said while describing socialist governments: “If it moves, tax it. If it keeps moving, regulate it. And if it stops moving, subsidize it.” Well, that pretty much sums up the NDP’s four years in government. However, on this side of the House what we’re going to do is that we’re going to do something different. We recognize that businesses are actually the solution to the problem. We do not want to demonize them and make them feel like they’re not an important part of the solution, so we’re going to make sure that we free up their wings to be able to do what they do best, soar, and make sure that they get up there and do the jobs that they need to do.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the public sector is notorious for higher levels of red tape in areas such as municipalities, schools, universities, and other public-sector organizations and given that the NDP is notorious for not defending Alberta, can the associate minister please explain how this government will reach its red tape reduction targets, thereby allowing public sectors to focus on service delivery rather than cumbersome administration?

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, that is a very important point. What I would say is that within the public sector we have high-performing people that want to be able to actually get our job creators and free up our job creators and our innovators to do what they do best: create jobs. We know that it's not the role and responsibility of the government to do that, so we need to make sure that our public sector, the people who actually provide those application forms in a timely fashion, can do that in an efficient and effective way. What we're going to do is make sure that they have the best tools to be able to do this in the most effective and responsible way.

The Speaker: Hon. members, in 30 seconds or less we will proceed with the rest of the daily Routine.

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East has a tabling.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to make two tablings today. I have the requisite number of copies of letters submitted to the Standing Committee on Private Bills and Private Members' Public Bills, one from the Alberta Medical Association and the other from the College of Physicians & Surgeons of Alberta.

The Speaker: Are there other tablings today? The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. I have the five copies. From the Smithsonian it's a blast from the past under the Harper government: Canadian Scientists Explain Exactly How Their Government Silenced Science.

The Speaker: Are there any other tablings today?

Hon. members, we are at points of order. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Point of Order

Parliamentary Language

Ms Sweet: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I stand on a point of order under 23(h), (i), and (j), making false allegations against a member, imputing false or unavowed motives to another member, using abusive or insulting language of a nature likely to create disorder. In the last question we just heard the hon. member mention that the Leader of the Official Opposition did a betrayal to Albertans by voting in the federal election.

I would just like to remind all members of the House that although the members may not be very happy with the outcome of the federal election, there was an actual NDP member that was elected to the caucus within the federal jurisdiction in Alberta. So before you start saying that the leader betrayed Albertans by voting, I think you should take some reflection back on the fact that you're actually talking to a good percentage of Albertans within that constituency.

Again, using the language that she is a betrayer of Albertans is completely unparliamentary, and it is not a dispute of the facts. So I would ask the member to please withdraw and maybe rethink what language we use in this House.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, first, a point of clarification. I believe the hon. deputy House leader rose on two points of order. I think this is the later one. Maybe there's something else going on which you have under control. That seems to be what you're indicating to me, as always. Thank you. I just wanted to make sure I was on the right point of order.

Mr. Speaker, in regard to the issue raised by the hon. member, I want to be clear that I do not have the Blues – I know that you do – but I do have the hon. member's notes, and he says: the same failing grade I give to the Leader of the Opposition for betraying Albertans for giving Singh her vote. The reality is that the hon. deputy House leader wants to refer to the 11 per cent of Albertans who voted for the NPD, and they're welcome to do that, but today in the House that hon. member is rising on the over 70 per cent of Albertans who voted for a pro-energy party and are still shocked that the Leader of the Official Opposition would support somebody who's trying to block energy development, trying to block pipelines inside our province, and has repeatedly stood with people that are attacking our province. If that's not a betrayal of this province, I don't know what is. But at the end of the day, what this is, clearly, is a matter of debate on whether or not that is a betrayal of the province.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. members, for your interjections and your submissions. I think what we have here is a difference of opinion on what may or may not have happened as it relates to the federal election and how individuals may or may not have cast their ballots. I think that's best left up to Albertans. As such, this is not a point of order. I consider the matter dealt with and concluded.

On the point of order that was indicated at 2:02, that point of order has been withdrawn, so we are at the end of points of order.

Having said that, the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford would like to make a statement.

Imputing Motives

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I know you ruled on a comment I made yesterday,* but having had a chance to review Hansard, I feel it's important to correct the record. They've indicated that I did say something that was unparliamentary. I ask that it be withdrawn, and I apologize to the House.

The Speaker: Thank you very much to the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

We are at Ordres du jour.

Orders of the Day

Government Motions

Interprovincial Infrastructure Projects

34. Mrs. Savage moved on behalf of Mr. Jason Nixon: Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly denounce all federal political parties that would enable a provincial government to unilaterally prevent the construction of interprovincial infrastructure projects of national importance, including natural resource pipelines.

Ms Hoffman moved on behalf of Mr. Bilous that the motion be amended by adding "and that would roll back progress on efforts to reach Canada's current greenhouse gas emissions targets, including the abysmal federal TIER plan" after the words "prevent the construction of interprovincial infrastructure projects of national importance, including natural resource pipelines."

[Debate adjourned on the amendment October 17]

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, I rise to continue debate on this motion, with particular reference to the profound implications of yesterday's federal general election. Earlier today I spoke with the Prime Minister and congratulated him on his government's re-election. Albertans are democrats, and I have always said that we will work with any federal government to advance the interests of this great province. I was also clear with the Prime Minister that yesterday we saw the largest democratic mandate in the history of Alberta for a federal party, with nearly 70 per cent of Albertans voting for the Conservative Party of Canada, the same party that won a plurality of votes across the country in yesterday's election. I told the Prime Minister that behind those numbers lies a profound sense of alienation that must be taken very seriously.

Mr. Speaker, many Albertans feel betrayed. We have been proud Canadians throughout our history, always willing to defend our country and its values. For decades we have been the great engine of jobs and prosperity for the entire country, contributing over $600 billion more to the rest of Canada than we have received back from Ottawa over the past six decades. Even in tough times, with Albertans losing their jobs in recent years, with many losing their homes, and many having lost their hope, we have still contributed $20 billion a year more to Ottawa than we have received back. That wealth, generated by the blessings of our natural resources and the innovation and hard work of Albertans, has helped to build schools and hospitals from coast to coast.

We have been an economic refuge for Canadians struggling with poverty and unemployment, who for decades have moved to this land of opportunity to enjoy the dignity of work. We have been the great engine of middle-class job growth, of upward social mobility, of social progress. It is here that indigenous Canadians have experienced by far the highest levels of employment and income across Canada. The pensions and savings of Canadians from coast to coast have depended in large part on the resources that we develop here responsibly.

Yet despite all of that, Albertans feel like everywhere we turn, we are being blocked in, pinned down, and even attacked within our own country for what we do to contribute to it. We are tired – we are tired – of politicians demanding that Albertans pay the bills while at the same time undermining our ability to generate the wealth that we share across the country.

It was this federal government, Mr. Speaker, that killed the Northern Gateway and Energy East pipelines, that surrendered to a veto on the Keystone XL pipeline, and that has brought in the no-more-pipelines law and the tanker ban that attacks a product produced in only one of Canada's 10 provinces, Alberta. In this campaign Mr. Trudeau openly campaigned in Quebec against what he called les grands pétroliers Albertains, the big Alberta oil companies.

Mr. Speaker, can you imagine a Prime Minister or a leader of any Canadian political party openly attacking Ontario's auto sector or Quebec's aviation industry? The idea itself is unthinkable and rightfully so. In fact, to the contrary, the federal government is eager to subsidize both industries, that produce major CO<sub>2</sub> emissions.

Mr. Speaker, in this new Parliament the Prime Minister will likely depend on the support of minor parties that were even more openly hostile to the workers and resources that have heated our homes, energized our economy, created hundreds of thousands of jobs, and raised living standards from coast to coast. In fact, 4 of the 5 main federal parties campaigned on allowing provincial governments to violate the clear letter of the Constitution under section 92 by seeking to give provinces the ability to block interprovincial pipelines, which are, under section 92 of the Constitution Act, the exclusive authority of the national government, even though 12 of the 13 provincial and territorial Premiers have expressed their support at the Council of the Federation for energy and resource corridors across the federation.

As I said recently, what a strange world in which we live, where we had 4 of 5 federal parties seeking to give up federal power over major nation-building, job-creating interprovincial infrastructure but 12 of the 13 provinces saying they recognize that that is federal authority.

At least 3 of the 5 federal parties, including the Trudeau Liberals, supported Bill C-69's gross federal intrusion into our own exclusive provincial jurisdiction to regulate the production of our energy. Let me pause to restate what I said on this last week, Mr. Speaker, that Alberta's consent to the 1982 Constitution Act was predicated on the adoption of section 92A of the Constitution, which assigns to this Legislature and the other provincial Legislatures exclusively the power to regulate the production of natural resources, including our oil and gas. So what we saw in this federal campaign that ended last night from most of the federal parties, including that which won, was a complete inversion of the letter, the vision, and the spirit of the Canadian Constitution.

Mr. Speaker, what Albertans said in unprecedented numbers with their ballots yesterday is that they want to respect the Constitution of Canada. They want an economic union where provinces have the right, as Peter Lougheed fought for, to develop their own resources and the federal government has the responsibility to get those resources to markets. That is why Albertans in record numbers, joined by our friends in Saskatchewan and most of western Canada, spoke with one loud voice of defiance last night. Albertans in all of their diversity spoke out, urban and rural, young and old. Indigenous Albertans, the descendants of pioneers, and the newest Albertans spoke with their votes yesterday to say to the Prime Minister and to our fellow Canadians that we demand fairness, we demand respect, we demand the right to responsibly develop the resources and the wealth on which our whole country depends, and we demand that the Constitution of Canada be respected with its original vision of this federation as an economic union.

Mr. Speaker, last night the Prime Minister said to Canadians in Alberta and Saskatchewan, quote: I've heard your frustration, and I want to be there to support you. Unquote. Well, those are fine words, but if we are to avoid real, lasting damage to the unity and prosperity of this federation, they must be more than words. They must be followed by real action that demonstrates a commitment to fairness in this federation.

Mr. Speaker, to the Prime Minister, with whom I spoke earlier today, in congratulating him on his re-election, I made this plain. If you want to support us, then you must support us to get our oil and gas to international markets, support us as we reduce our emissions as well so that we can have the cleanest oil and gas industry in the world. Alberta's number one strategic economic imperative must be getting our energy to global markets, and there is nothing more important for that than the successful, rapid completion of the Trans Mountain expansion project.

It is important to remember, Mr. Speaker, that over two-thirds of Canadians voted yesterday for parties that support the expansion of Trans Mountain and that collectively those parties hold, I understand, 278 seats in the House of Commons. Therefore, I call now publicly on Prime Minister Trudeau, as I did earlier today in person. I call upon him not to make any deals or arrangements with either the NDP, the separatist Bloc Québécois, or the explicitly anti-Alberta Green Party that would endanger progress on the Trans Mountain pipeline, a project that Canadians support consistently in public opinion polls by a margin of 2 to 1, as do our friends in British Columbia. This is the first measure of good faith from this federal government.

I have sent a five-page letter to the Prime Minister this afternoon, which I will table for members to review, outlining other concrete steps that this federal government could take to demonstrate goodwill to the people of Alberta, who spoke with such a loud voice yesterday. Many of these ideas were included in this government's election platform, our blueprint for positive change for Albertans, including the many ideas we articulated for a fair deal for Alberta in the Canadian federation, including embracing resource corridors.

I underscore, Mr. Speaker, that this is a concept that is not a parochial interest of this province but, rather, has been endorsed, in fact, in principle by all 13 provincial and territorial governments, and 12 of those governments explicitly support the notion that resource and energy corridors ought to include oil and gas pipelines. I repeat: this is not a unique or special request of the government or people of Alberta. This is about nation building. This is about being partners in prosperity. This concept is about achieving the dream of the economic union embedded in the Constitution.

Similarly, Mr. Speaker, our fight for fairness demands fundamental reform to the equalization program embedded in section 36 of the Constitution. It is fundamentally unfair to expect the working women and men of Alberta, even at a time of prolonged economic decline and stagnation, to be the overwhelming contributors to the entire system of fiscal federalism with a net annual contribution of $20 billion a year.

That is why the federation created something called the fiscal stabilization program, which is supposed to provide a fiscal offset from the central government when a have province like Alberta faces a sudden and unexpected decline in its revenues, as we did in 2015 and beyond. Now, had that program operated without caps, Alberta would have received $1.6 billion in 2015 to recognize the precipitous decline in our revenues. Instead, it has been capped at $60 per person, meaning that we only received $250 million, which was a fraction of the multibillion-dollar revenue decline which in part drove this province into a deep deficit. So we also demand reform of the fiscal stabilization program.

Mr. Speaker, it is unacceptable to Albertans that they see provinces who refuse to develop their own natural resources, as we do so well here in the province, effectively being subsidized for that poor policy choice by increases in equalization payments. That is why we will press vigorously for fundamental equalization reform.

Let me restate our election commitment. If we do not see substantial progress towards or completion of the Trans Mountain expansion and if we do not see laws that prejudicially attack our vital economic interests repealed or substantially amended, such as Bill C-69, the no-more-pipelines law, this Alberta government will put on the ballot, in the form of a constitutional referendum, the principle of equalization by seeking the approval of the people of Alberta to delete section 36, equalization, from the Canadian Constitution.

Mr. Speaker, we do not say that lightly, nor do we say it with a lack of generosity. We Albertans have demonstrated our deep generosity to our fellow Canadians. We are proud to have been able to contribute over $600 billion to the rest of the federation in recent decades. But what we will no longer abide are governments, politicians in other parts of the country, including Ottawa, demanding that we pay the freight while refusing to allow us to develop the wealth that we then transfer through those equalization and other transfer programs. All we ask for here is fairness, the fairness to be able to develop those resources, the wealth from which we can then share with the rest of the country.

That is what I called for the night that we were elected as a government, which was for us to be partners in prosperity. That is all Albertans are asking for. The frustration that we hear from our constituents, the voice with which they spoke last night, is a plea fundamentally for fairness, and that is what we will fight for without relent.

Mr. Speaker, further in our fight for a fair deal I've renewed in this letter to the Prime Minister our call for the national government to exempt Alberta from the damaging impact of the stress test, imposed on homebuyers by the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, designed specifically to address overheated realty markets in Toronto and Vancouver but which has had, as Ottawa policies too often do, the consequence of damaging this province during a prolonged period of economic stagnation. It's not fair, and we demand its repeal. I raised this with the Prime Minister in person three days after having been sworn in, and we will be seeking like-minded provinces, such as Saskatchewan, to join us in this renewed demand.

Similarly, Mr. Speaker, we will continue to press for the federal government to listen to 9 of the 10 provinces and the vast majority of members of the Canadian Senate in reconsidering the devastating consequences of the no-more-pipelines law, Bill C-69. I can tell you, having spoken to major global investors, that this bill, recently proclaimed, has created massive investor uncertainty. A strong Canada needs a strong Alberta, and a strong Alberta needs a strong resource sector, and that requires investor confidence. This bill has shaken that confidence, in addition to so many other policies. Again, in this letter and in the measures that we will be taking in the months to come, we will demand a fundamental rethink of that legislation. If the Prime Minister is sincere in what he said last night about understanding the frustration of the western provinces, then one way that he could demonstrate that in good faith is to listen not just to Alberta but 9 of the 10 provinces in suspending or delaying the application of Bill C-69 and going back and reconsidering amendments that were even proposed by the former New Democrat government here in Alberta.

Mr. Speaker, these are some of the measures outlined in the platform upon which this government ran, but we do not think that they are sufficient – they may be necessary in our fight for fairness, but they are not sufficient – so for that reason, in the days to come, I will be announcing the creation of a panel of eminent Albertans tasked with the job of consulting broadly amongst Albertans on other ways in which we can secure our role and fairness in the Canadian federation. There are many ideas that have been offered by grassroots Albertans, by policy experts, by academics, and others, and this government will pursue and give serious consideration to every one of those ideas in a consultation process between now and the end of this calendar year and come back to Albertans early in 2020 with an expanded plan to fight for fairness in the federation.

Mr. Speaker, let me close by saying that for those Albertans who feel frustrated and angry as a result of last night's election, I and, I know, the members of this government share and feel that frustration. For those who have lost so much of their incomes, of their life savings, in many cases their homes, in some cases their families, we understand the adversity through which they have gone and, in many cases, continue to go. I want those Albertans to understand that they have, in this provincial government, leadership that is determined to do everything within our power to secure a fair deal for them so that once again they can play a role as leaders in this federation and enjoy the promise of opportunity that Alberta has always represented. I want to encourage those Albertans to understand that they have friends and allies across this country, that on most of the issues to which I have just spoken, the vast majority of Canadian provincial governments side with Alberta.

Indeed, on the critical strategic issue of building a coastal pipeline, last night 278 Members of Parliament were elected on platforms to build the Trans Mountain pipeline. We intend to hold this federal government to its word in that respect as we seek, Mr. Speaker, in the months and years to come, to do everything within our power to defend the vital interests of this province, which has played such a magnificent role as builders, as doers, as dreamers, as creators of opportunity and shared prosperity. That is the Alberta of which we are all proud, and together, united, we Albertans must fight for that Alberta in the future.

Thank you.

I move to adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Government Bills and Orders

Third Reading

Public Lands Modernization (Grazing Leases and Obsolete Provisions) Amendment Act, 2019

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Environment and Parks.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's an honour to rise and talk on third reading of bill C-16. Sorry; not C-16. The Premier's comments got me thinking of federal bills just a moment ago. I'll go with Bill 16, in regard to grazing leases. We have talked about this important piece of legislation in this House at length over the last few days. I am excited to see it in third reading, and I do hope that we have an opportunity to pass it off to Her Honour to be able to give it royal assent here as early as this week.

The reality is that this is a historical piece of legislation on which we've been able to get unanimous consent from every grazing association and ranching association inside this province to be able to modernize our grazing rates inside this province, something that has been in place, Mr. Speaker, shockingly, since the late 1950s, when the formula was created, and implemented in the 1960s and then was frozen in the 1990s.

It has been in that position for a long time, creating problems for the industry. You would think that holding the grazing rates at a low level would not create problems for the industry, but it has in a couple of ways. The first and the most important way is that it's put them at risk of a countervail suit, trade sanctions, against what is an important industry. I do understand, Mr. Speaker, that sometimes the members opposite don't fully understand the importance of agriculture to our community, to our province, but when you see the realities that we're facing right now with our largest industry, I think it should always continue to remind us how much we depend on our second-largest industry, which is the agriculture industry.

The second is that it's actually created a situation financewise within the province of Alberta where we haven't been able to get Albertans fair rates for renting grass, which in turn has resulted in the government not being able, sometimes, to fulfill their commitments when it comes to grazing leases, Mr. Speaker. That's the other component of this important piece of legislation. It ends up with a dedicated revenue source of 30 per cent of the increase in revenue from raising rentals, that ends up going into a dedicated revenue fund that will help us meet our objectives when it comes to our environmental responsibilities with grazing leases.

Then the third and most important part, in some ways, of this legislation is that it deals with the transfer fees when you transfer grazing leases amongst people. Often those are families transferring them to the next generation of the agriculture community, who are then going to go and use those grazing leases to produce cattle in the Canadian cattle market, Mr. Speaker. Sometimes those transfer fees have been as high as $25,000 or higher, just to transfer a grazing lease from one generation to another. This will enshrine in legislation that the fee will be $3,150 going forward, which is a significant saving, as we begin to encourage the next generation to be able to participate in the agriculture community in raising cattle. I think that's exciting. One of the biggest things that we need to do is to continue to encourage the next generation to participate in the agriculture industry, and this will help deal with that.

Mr. Speaker, at the end of the day, this piece of legislation shows that there is a new approach, when it comes to the agriculture industry, from Alberta's current government. There is an approach where we will work collaboratively to find solutions to problems. This is a problem that has existed for a while. Granted, it goes back to the former Progressive Conservative government and further back, but it was a problem that the NDP had ample opportunity to be able to try to address. In fact, stakeholder groups went to them and often asked, but the NDP ignored them, like they did with agriculture so much.

Our Premier and our government, Alberta's government, have a different approach when it comes to that, and this is a great illustration of it. We're willing to go in a room, find solutions together for a problem that was impacting an industry, which will ultimately protect that industry and allow them to be able to create jobs and economic growth inside our province.

I'm excited about that, Mr. Speaker, and I do hope that all hon. members support that going forward and that we recognize today, with this legislation, the importance of our cattle industry not just to Alberta but to this country and that we show solidarity with them in being able to implement this legislation into law in the province of Alberta to secure that important industry going forward for generations to come.

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, prior to moving forward with any other members looking to speak, with the changeover of Speakers I just wanted to confirm with the hon. Government House Leader that he's moving third reading.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It was a bit chaotic there for a moment, but I'm most definitely moving third reading.

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, looking for anyone else looking to speak, I see that the hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung has risen.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. A pleasure to rise to speak to this important piece of legislation that will be a very positive effect for our grazing lease operators. The minister is correct. Indeed, this is an issue that's been talked about through so many different governments, going back to, I would say, even the Social Credit days. However, this is a continuation of work that our government had started, and we appreciate the government continuing the work we were doing. It shows, definitely, that our government and this government can work hand in hand to determine that the economic development that we wish to proceed with and the environmental stewardship that we wish to guide our work with can go hand in hand.

We hope that the government continues to monitor the situation, but we know that the grazing lease operators are in support of this. We're happy to lend our support, and I encourage all members in the House to support this important legislation. It changes the grazing lease rental rates for cattle grazing throughout the province.

They were based on a market formula. Now, they had been low, and that was part of the concern of the grazing lease operators, that they were at risk of trade sanctions as a result of action that might be taken by U.S. competitors. It moves the formula and other parts out of the legislation, that can be changed by ministerial order. The additional flexibility, hopefully, will make it easier to keep the legislation up to date.

As many members will know, about 14 per cent of Alberta forage is from land with grazing leases, and it's an important part of our cattle industry. Bringing it up to date and moving it out of the realm of the risk of trade sanctions was an important piece of work that we were beginning to do in our term as government, and we're pleased to see the government continuing with this piece of legislation today.

We're in a position, I believe, to support it. When the government is doing something positive, especially when it concerns our second-largest industry in Alberta, we certainly want to get behind it. We encourage all members to support this legislation to make sure that our cattle are chewing grass in a healthy way for decades to come.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to third reading? I see the hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Yes, it's my pleasure to speak to Bill 16. The importance of this bill is that it relates to the farmers and ranchers in Alberta and, of course, deals with the grazing reserves that they have and the care that they take for that land. I know one thing for sure is that those people take a lot of pride in their grazing leases, and they manage them well. They take care of them well because it's in their best interest, but of course it's in the best interest of Albertans to have this land taken care of in such a manner.

I think one thing we need to do is that we need to know that these fees will balance the need to be globally competitive and, of course, the need of Albertans to get their fair share for the use of public land. I think the key to this, Mr. Speaker, is to have that kind of balance. Of course, this is public land, and Albertans deserve to get their fair share from the use of that land, and we do need to make sure that our farming and ranching industries are protected, that they can be competitive on a global scale.

Now, I think these new fees will better align with land values and make sure that ranchers benefit from any market fluctuations. I think that what we've seen, especially recently, are market fluctuations and how things outside of our control affect the markets in our agriculture industry. We've seen issues with China and canola, of course. That's something that's kind of at the forefront in our minds right now in the agriculture industry, how national and international situations affect the market for our agricultural producers right here in Alberta. In fact, situations like that can be devastating to our agriculture industry. I think that what's key for this bill is being able to take those things into consideration as they go forward so that we know that our farmers and ranchers are protected and we have an opportunity to adjust things so that we can make sure that they can stay in business and be competitive also on the global scale.

Now, of course, the government has worked closely with farmers and ranchers to develop this new fee structure. One thing that's for certain is that it has broad support from the grazing associations. In fact, over the past four and a half to five years I've met with the grazing associations multiple times, and this was their number one concern, to get this situation fixed. You know, these rates haven't been changed since 1994, and I think there was a lot of angst amongst them as far as getting this straightened out to make sure that we didn't have any problems with trade because of rates that maybe some might view as unfair. I know that they expressed some frustration with the last four years, where they really wanted to have this taken care of and it hadn't happened. Of course, within five months here now we're delivering this to them, and I think that's something that they're happy to have. Like I say, there's been widespread support for this from the grazing associations.

Now, by modernizing the fee framework, this will also help reduce red tape. Of course, when I speak to farmers and ranchers, a lot of times the only thing they ask for is to get government out of their way so they can just do what they do best, which is raise crops and raise cattle and other livestock. It seems like a lot of times government regulation is interfering in what they want to do and how they want to do it. Of course, we always have to have some regulation – some regulation is needed – but there's a lot of regulation that basically interferes with farmers and ranchers in their ability to move forward and do what they do. The other thing is that that red tape takes away from their competitiveness. Of course, we're an export industry when it comes to ag products and ranching products, so we need to reduce that red tape, reduce that burden from regulation that doesn't help the ag producer but, in fact, hinders the ag producer from being able to be competitive on a global scale.

As I've mentioned, these current rental rates have been frozen since 1994. Of course, I think that, in fact, probably around 1994, you know, the farming and ranching industry was having a hard time, so at that time they were thinking: well, okay; we won't adjust the rates now. But what happens is that the longer you go on, the worse the situation gets as far as making sure that it looks fair for Albertans as far as a return on the benefit of public land and also as far as a competitiveness situation when it comes to trade stability so that other jurisdictions can't accuse us of unfairly subsidizing our ag products.

The government is now ready to implement this new framework. Again, this will ensure that trade stability that the farmers and ranchers desire and that they also need. They need this in order to move forward. There are always organizations that would love to take some of our market share away from us. They're always looking for an excuse, and we don't need to give these organizations any excuses to take away from our market share, because we know that we have the best products right here in Alberta. Obviously, we're known world-wide for our beef, and when it comes to grazing leases, that's what we're doing on those grazing leases, raising cattle, raising beef.

Of course, around the world we're known for high-quality beef. I know that in my business previous to this a lot of my clients have come here, and they love our Alberta beef. They really do. You know, a lot of times when travelling, you'll have a steak somewhere, and you'll say: "That's a steak. Fine. Whatever." But when they come here and taste our Alberta beef, they make special note of that, of the quality and the taste. Of course, I think that's something that we can be proud of, and we want to be able to keep that pride. We need to be able to keep that opportunity to export our beef around the world and help benefit our economy both in Alberta and across Canada, too.

I think that this will help create dedicated funding because a portion of this rental revenue will be used to support rangeland sustainability initiatives. Of course, obviously, the cattle industry and the beef industry want to see this. They want to see their rangeland sustained over long periods of time. They don't want to do anything to damage this rangeland and these grazing leases.

They want to be proactive with this investment so that they can be assured that there will be a long-term benefit from their being able to use these grazing leases.

Now, another thing this bill does is that it reflects the geographic differences and their impacts on the beef production across the province. Of course, Alberta is very diverse as far as its geography when you look from the north to the south. In the south it's mostly prairie land. I've spent some time in the last week or so down there, on some of the grazing leases in southern Alberta. It's beautiful country down there, of course, but they don't have, like, the trees that we have in northern Alberta growing up through the fences and that kind of maintenance that it takes to keep the trees cut down. As soon as you clear any land in northern Alberta, if you're not constantly actively farming it and tilling the soil and everything, then immediately the trees just start growing up again. Those trees grow fast. The willows come first, then the poplars, and that hurts the fence quality, the ability for fences to keep cattle in. Along with that are the mature trees that are around. You have a big wind come through, and all of a sudden all of these trees are blowing down on the fences.

In fact, last weekend, when I had a chance to get out into the woods a little bit, I travelled around a grazing lease, and on the fenceline there were literally hundreds of trees that had fallen right across the fence. They were hard to manoeuvre around. I know that the rancher for that grazing lease is going to have to take a four-wheeler out there and physically use a chainsaw and literally cut all of those large trees off that fence in order to have his cows stay inside that fence. When we look at things like that, it's obvious that these geographic differences are important to consider when it comes to grazing leases.

Another thing, of course, between the north and the south is the length of the season that you're allowed to have your cattle on the grazing lease. It's longer in the south because it's warmer and there's a longer growing season. It's a little shorter in the north. These are things that need to be reflected in regulation, and that bill will do this, too.

Now, this bill also helps address demographic issues in the ranching industry by providing rental rates that are responsive to market conditions and reducing financial barriers to new producers entering the cattle industry by implementing a flat-rate assignment fee. Mr. Speaker, what happens is that when you buy and sell a grazing lease, there's an assignment fee that's associated with transferring that grazing lease from one person to another. Of course, we need to make sure that these assignment fees are reasonable and don't hinder the opportunity for somebody to sell their grazing lease to another rancher that needs it. We also don't want to hinder the rancher from buying by having excessive fees that will hinder that sale and that opportunity for that grazing lease to be used efficiently and effectively by the people that want to.

Of course, there's also an issue with transfer fees when it comes to passing on a grazing lease from one generation to another, when transferring a grazing lease from one person to the next generation within the same family. That's why it's so important to be looking at these assignment fees and making sure that they're reasonable and acceptable and don't hinder the opportunity for grazing lease holders to pass them on.

Now, we also wanted to create management efficiencies and align the act and regulations to current business practices and operations. When we look at the management of the grazing leases, of course, I think one thing that's been frustrating in the past is the length of time it takes to transfer a grazing lease from one person to another. I just talked about the fees associated with transferring a grazing lease, but there's also a timeline. Of course, when you buy a grazing lease, there's the legal paperwork and the bank paperwork to transfer title and transfer the finances back and forth between the buyer and seller, but the government has a part, too, to play to transfer that grazing lease from one person to the next. That situation itself has been, I think, somewhat frustrating for some grazing lease holders as they've had to wait an excessive amount of time for that transfer of ownership.

What happens is that once it's sold and the decision is made and the money is transferred to the lawyers, then all of a sudden there's a time of limbo waiting for the government to actually do that work to transfer those grazing leases over. That alone can create, I guess, a lot of angst, too, within the industry as far as what happens to that grazing lease while it's in limbo between the buyer and the seller. Who's responsible for it? Who's responsible for the fees? Can the person that's going to buy it put cattle on it yet, or is it still the other person's to use even though they wanted to sell it? There are situations like that that have come out, and I think that this bill and this kind of realization that something needed to be done about grazing leases in Alberta will be very helpful to the ranchers in Alberta as far as being able to do their business in a manner that's both effective and efficient and makes sense on a business scale.

We've got to realize, too, that as much as ranching and farming is a way of life and what some Albertans do generation after generation — families that farm and ranch just tend to continue doing that — it's also a business, and we need to treat it as such. When they're involved in this operation and they're working hours and hours and hours with this business of ranching and farming, in the end they need to have a profit. It needs to make sense. Any kind of encumbrances that the government throws in the way are something that hinder that development and their ability to do business and support their families in the way that they choose.

Of course, this bill will help maintain market access. I guess I've talked about that a bit already, how there are groups outside of Alberta that would love to see the market share of Alberta farmers and ranchers diminished so that they could take advantage of it. They will often use the smallest little things to be able to break into the market, so we need to keep those out. We need to keep those people at bay so that we can maintain the market access for our agriculture products which, of course, we know are the best in the world. Again, we talk about the dependable funding for rangeland sustainability initiatives. All these things are important for this bill and why this bill is so important.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you to the hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley.

We are now at the stage where 29(2)(a) is available should any members wish to make any quick questions or comments.

Seeing none, are there any members looking to speak? I see the hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon has caught my eye.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It gives me great pleasure to be able to rise today to speak to Bill 16, Public Lands Modernization (Grazing Leases and Obsolete Provisions) Amendment Act, 2019. You don't have to live in Alberta very long to realize that farmers and ranchers are a vital part of the Alberta economy and of Alberta life in general. I can say that my roots come from a ranching and farming background and that it was and is still almost a part of the birthright of the Smith family. I live in a constituency that proudly has the Cowboy Trail run through it, and I have grown up hearing stories of many of the families in Alberta as they have come in and they have immigrated into this province, have homesteaded, and have started their farms and their ranches. I can remember talking with John Bronson, who talked about a great-uncle that came up in the mid 1800s, driving cattle all the way from Texas all the way into northern Alberta, and he still had the bullwhip that his great uncle used as he was driving those cattle up into Alberta.

Well, that may be our history, but it is also time to address and to modernize and to update the framework for our grazing dispositions in Alberta. It gives me a great deal of pleasure to see that we're part of a government that has done the consultation and has the support of all of the major grazing stakeholders, that we have done the job properly, that these people have come to us and have said, "This is what we need. This is what we desire," and we have been able to fulfill the needs of this very important industry in the province of Alberta. Not to put too fine a point on it, but there is a certain amount of pride, when we bring Bill 16 before this House, that it has the support of those stakeholders, unlike the previous government when it seemed to bring forward bills like Bill 6.

Mr. Speaker, ranchers and neighbours are our friends, and ranchers and agricultural workers and farmers are our friends and they are our neighbours. This bill is a reflection of the life that they bring into this province. Bill 16 reflects the important difference in ranching and agriculture by geography, that what happens in grazing leases in the north is very different than what is necessarily needed in the south. There are, absolutely, two grazing zones in this province, and this bill is reflective of the north and the south. We know that ranching in High Level is very different from ranching in Lethbridge, so this Bill 16 is a reflection of those differences and addresses them.

We know that portions of the revenue that is generated from this bill are going to be used for environmental sustainability and stewardship. We know and ranchers know across this province that this is an industry that must last for generations, that we have a responsibility to the land and to manage that land and to do so in such a fashion that it will produce not only food but wealth as we move forward into the future of this province. This will provide funds for research and for land management. It will provide and invest in wetlands and grassland ecosystems to ensure that we have a growing ranching economy moving into the future. This will help to create an industry that is environmentally sustainable, and we are proud to be able to partner with this industry, our second-largest industry in this province.

Mr. Speaker, our world is rapidly modernizing. You know, I can remember. I had a great-grandmother that I got to know very well. She was born in the 1890s. She lived to be well over 100, and when she moved to western Canada, she moved into a province that didn't have roads. She lived in a world where the Wright brothers had not flown the first airplane. She did not have a telephone on the farm. We have changed. We are modernized. Unfortunately, much of our grazing leases and how we obtain revenue from it has not modernized. Today we have farmers that are air seeding, and I went to a sale of cattle for a cousin last year, and it was being done through the Internet and through video. Ranching has modernized. We see that much of the feedstock, many of the cattle that we have today – we've cut and reduced the methane emissions significantly simply by addressing the feed that we give our cattle.

So we need to modernize the fee framework for our public lands and for our grazing lands. We need to update these regulatory frameworks, and we need to make sure that they reflect the current economic reality of the industry that we depend upon here in Alberta. These rates were frozen and have been frozen for over 25 years, Mr. Speaker, and it's time to update. It's time to use market-based rental rates that will reduce the chances of trade retaliation from the United States. We depend on export in this market. We depend on having the capacity to export our beef into the United States, so it's important that we make sure that our grazing rates and leases are not going to be open to a challenge from the United States, which could damage this industry.

Our government has been able to move on this because our government has actually met and listened to the stakeholders in this industry. We're happy to be able to see in those conversations and in meeting with these people that we have met the needs that they have given to us, and I know that they're very happy with the openness of this government. I know that, for instance, when the minister of agriculture came to my constituency, my constituents were very impressed with his capacity to understand the issues that they were bringing to his attention and his willingness to listen and to move on those issues. I know and we can see again that the major stakeholders here are supporting this modernizing of the grazing leases because of the leadership of the Minister of Environment and Parks. We're very pleased to be able to see and to be able to move forward on this piece of legislation.

Our farmers and ranchers are critical to the Alberta economy. This industry helps to feed not only Alberta but Canada and indeed the rest of the world, and this industry has the capacity to continue to grow and to continue to feed Alberta and Canada and the rest of the world. This bill will increase the capacity for us to trade and to feed the nations of the world and to do it, Mr. Speaker, in a sustainable way.

We have had many ranchers and farmers in our caucus that have been able to make sure that, as we bring forward these pieces of legislation, they give their feedback to this. We know and I know that in this caucus we have advocated for these constituents, for our ranchers and our farmers, and we will continue to do so as the United Conservative government.

This act, Mr. Speaker, will provide the stability and the predictability that is going to be needed for our ranching economy. It's going to ensure that we are not faced with unreasonable trade sanctions, it's going to address red tape, and it's going to provide a profitability that will allow our farmers to move forward, confident that they can address the needs of society and create a sound business platform.

I am very pleased to be able to speak today to Bill 16 and to give it my wholehearted support. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available should anybody wish to take that opportunity.

Seeing none, are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill? I see the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West – Lethbridge-East. My apologies. Go ahead.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'll have to get a pin that says that possibly.

It is my pleasure to rise in the House today and speak to Bill 16, Public Lands Modernization (Grazing Leases and Obsolete Provisions) Amendment Act, 2019. I want to thank the Minister of Environment and Parks for responding to the needs of ranchers across this province and for taking this positive step forward. Alberta's ranchers and beef producers play an important part in Alberta's economy and environment. Our government wants to ensure that this portion of our cattle industry is set up for continued success. The proposed changes in this bill would create a system that better reflects the current economic reality. It is transparent and fair for ranchers, and it ensures that Albertans get fair market value for the use of the province's land resources.

In addition, modernizing grazing rental rates will be another positive step forward in our commitment to reduce the red tape by one-third to make life better for Albertans. The goal of red tape reduction is to modernize, update, fix areas that are burdened so that we can create jobs, get Albertans back to work, make it easier for Albertans to access important services they need.

I know that this bill isn't about red tape, but it is great to see that this will reduce red tape for Alberta ranchers. It will simplify and modernize an outdated and complicated system. In fact, it was implemented in 1960. That means Alberta has had the same rates for over 25 years. This change will also provide certainty for our potential and ongoing trade partners like our neighbours to the south, who also happen to be our biggest trading partner. By using market-based rental rates rather than outdated and arbitrary rates, we reduce the risk for trade action. We can't afford to continue to operate this way, so our government is taking action.

The hon. minister of the environment on behalf of our government has worked very closely with industry stakeholders to get their feedback and listen to their concerns. This is important for ranchers in southern Alberta, and they are an important economic driver in my constituency. I've had the opportunity to meet and speak with several ranchers with the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction and the Member for Cardston-Siksika, and it is meaningful legislation for them.

The hon. minister of the environment has ensured this legislative change is balanced, fair, and will transition Alberta's beef industry to a sustainable future, and it is based on sound environmental practices – not an easy job to do. He has confirmed that our government will work closely with farmers and ranchers to develop this new fee structure. It was evident when he spoke to the attendees of a media announcement for this bill that they were excited and optimistic for these changes.

If we can get things right in Alberta for Albertans, we've done what we've intended to do. We were hired by Albertans for Albertans, and by responding to their needs, by reducing this red tape, we can make life better in Alberta. This bill is a good example of a government that listens to its citizens, and I am happy to rise to support it.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

Standing order 29(2)(a) is available should anybody be looking to take that opportunity.

Seeing none, I see the hon. Member for Athabasca-Barrhead-Westlock has risen to speak.

Mr. van Dijken: Good. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to speak in favour of Bill 16, the Public Lands Modernization (Grazing Leases and Obsolete Provisions) Amendment Act, 2019, largely dealing with grazing leases throughout the province and dealing with producers, ranchers, farmers that are partnering with our government, with Albertans essentially, to maintain and properly be stewards of the grazing leases, the Crown land that they choose to take care of.

What's so refreshing with regard to Bill 16 is how it's been largely driven by the industry. In our previous term, as the Member for Barrhead-Morinville-Westlock in the previous four years, we had meetings with the Western Stock Growers', Alberta Beef Producers, and a number of the organizations that represent the beef producers in Alberta. This was an item that they were advocating for, recognizing the risks that were in place with regard to trade agreements with other countries. They needed to ensure that they were green, essentially green, for trade with other countries and did not want to have a situation where they would be challenged by improper subsidization of their industry. It was very refreshing to see an industry step forward, recognize a potential threat to their industry, and advocate to government on behalf of their producers to ensure that their industry could stay strong going forward.

I talk about the farmers and ranchers with regard to being stewards of the land, and one thing that this bill also will help to recognize – and it was identified by the chairman of the Alberta Beef Producers that they were quite pleased to see – is that a portion of the revenue from the grazing rates will be used for environmental stewardship and range improvement, which ensures the land will continue to be healthy and sustainable for future generations. It's an important part of understanding the need to take care of the lands that we are charged with being stewards of. All farmers and ranchers recognize that they are in a position to hand property down the generations in a state that is going to allow it to continue to produce.

One of the things that I did learn also – I don't have beef cattle, livestock at this time – is that the industry came forward with different needs for different regions within the province. There's increased cost to maintaining a grazing lease in the northern part of the province, so they recognized within the group that there were going to be increased costs for those producers, and that had to be recognized in the formulas going forward. They also recognized the need to have rates that would continue to fluctuate going forward based on market conditions, based on the things that are typically out of control of the producer but that they have to live with in a competitive environment with regard to being able to produce a commodity and produce it in a way that would allow them to stay in business. Coming forward with the idea of having those changes in rates based on market conditions was an important part of the consultation also.

I speak in favour of Bill 16, recognizing the good collaboration and the good consultation that has taken place to ensure that we have a bill before us that is acceptable to producers, acceptable to government, who are essentially partnering together to maintain these Crown lands.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available.

Seeing none, are there any other hon. members wishing to speak to the bill, third reading of Bill 16?

Seeing none, I'm prepared to put the question to the House.

[Motion carried; Bill 16 read a third time]

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

The Deputy Chair: I'd like to call the committee to order.

Bill 17 Disclosure to Protect Against Domestic Violence (Clare's Law) Act

The Deputy Chair: Are there any comments, questions, or amendments to be offered with respect to this bill?

Mrs. Sawhney: Mr. Speaker, it's been an honour to introduce and speak to Bill 17, Disclosure to Protect Against Domestic Violence (Clare's Law) Act, and to see such strong support across the province and from both sides of this House. It's important to ensure that we get this legislation right, which I've mentioned several times before already, because, ultimately, our goal is to prevent situations from reaching a stage where there is a risk of significant or imminent harm. There are victims and survivors in this province that understand the importance of this legislation as a mechanism to protect Albertans from the risk of domestic violence.

As I mentioned before, domestic violence doesn't discriminate. On that note, I am certain that there are many of you in this House that have friends and acquaintances or know someone that has been impacted by domestic violence. I would like to say that I value the feedback that I've received thus far, and I'm committed to working with my officials and colleagues to address any concerns and answer questions raised during this committee meeting. It will take the collective insight on both sides of this House and the feedback and lived experiences from our stakeholders to inform our next steps. As we are all aware, there are many details to be worked out in the regulations, and through stakeholder engagement and consultation we will ensure the regulations are as robust and as effective as possible.

I look forward to hearing your thoughts and answering your questions today. Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Thank you. I'm pleased to speak to Bill 17, Clare's law, and thank you to the minister as well for her brief comments.

I'm so proud of the commitments the NDP government made when it came to the issue of domestic violence and supports for folks, and one example of what I was so proud of as, of course, not a member of the NDP government, but I was so proud to watch MLA Deborah Drever introduce the Residential Tenancies (Safer Spaces for Victims of Domestic Violence) Amendment Act, and that made it possible for victims of domestic violence to end their tenancy agreements without any risk of financial penalty. This was a clear move to stand up for Albertans by making it easier for them to leave an unsafe home and maintain their independence as well. What was so powerful about this was that safety could now be a key consideration instead of any sort of financial and other barriers that folks faced.

It's one example of the many steps that this NDP government took to help break the cycle of domestic violence. I'm also happy to see that this government is continuing that and taking this issue seriously as well. You know, I don't believe it's a partisan issue, and it shows that we can see eye to eye on certain critical topics. Because, as the minister noted, it is clear that domestic violence does not discriminate, and those affected need to have supports in place.

I do think it is important to raise a few questions and ask a few things to clarify. In principle we've been clear that we support this bill, we support its intentions, but one of the main things that we need to get across is that without a commitment to provide the funding and the resources necessary to support victims and the services that they rely on, this bill will unfortunately not be able to be as effective as it could be. It is a positive step, for sure, but a legal tool such as this one will only be successful if it's supported by the well-funded social services and programs to keep people truly safe in our communities.

In my role as critic for status of women I spent the last number of months speaking with many stakeholders who work on the front lines of domestic violence, providing supports for women in particular. One of the things that I heard loudly and clearly through those conversations is that steps like this one, Clare's law, are undoubtedly important, but they need to be supported by funding and by resources. In fact, one stakeholder, who I respect greatly and has worked in this field for over 30 years, noted that, you know, without resources it actually has a potential to be harmful, and I take her at her word on this.

So I'd ask the government to ensure that with this bill there be clear resources and clear supports in place. It's light on details. As the Minister said, it is enabling legislation. It's quite skeletal at this point, so I'm very hopeful that the government will be quite specific in the support that will be provided. The law needs to be part of a larger suite of measures and supports. For instance, will there be supports in place for the potential victim who discloses? We know this can be a hugely traumatizing experience, so those supports need to be readily available. That victim needs to know where to go, where to turn to.

Another huge piece is looking at next steps. We know that victims often lack proper resources to safely leave dangerous relationships and have to overcome a whole lot of barriers, one of which is housing. There are examples of this being a clear issue in other jurisdictions.

In Saskatchewan, where Clare's law was implemented earlier this year, some advocates have pointed out that, particularly for folks in rural and remote parts of that province, the law is rendered ineffective because there aren't the resources available for those women needing to access them. One woman is on the record stating that the law is not helpful because, as she pointed out, not only did her husband have no prior criminal record, but she said that resources are what's needed, and they weren't available for her in rural Saskatchewan.

I represent an area where there are severe housing concerns, and nearly daily my staff and I hear from folks in neighbourhoods throughout my riding who are struggling to find safe, affordable housing. I just want to hammer home the point that it is so essential that these supports like housing be in place. I urge this government to lay out in their upcoming budget how they will offer housing supports not only to victims of domestic violence but to all Albertans.

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Member for Calgary-West has risen to speak.

Mr. Ellis: Why, thank you very much, Mr. Chair. I'm very proud to stand up here and, of course, support this law as brought forward by the hon. minister. I have listened intently both to my colleagues within the House and on the other side, and I believe that they as well have been supportive of this, so it's great.

You know, as I listened intently to the words of the previous speaker, it kind of made me reflect a little bit about the crisis that we face with the opioids, as an example, in that, yeah, I mean, this is a multilayered, complex problem. I don't believe that this particular piece of legislation is the solution, we'll call it, to all domestic violence or domestic situations; however, I do certainly believe that this is a tool in a tool box that would be able to help people.

Of course, you know, when I look here at the question of domestic violence disclosure legislation, will it protect people at risk of domestic violence? It looks like it allows people in domestic violence to obtain information on intimate partners and previous history of domestic violence and other relevant acts and could save lives.

You know, Mr. Chair, I think, as you're fully aware – and I'm very proud of this fact – that I spent well over a decade, certainly, policing on the streets of Calgary. It's very sad. I notice that there are some statistics that I've seen specifically where it says that Alberta has the third-highest rate of police-reported intimate partner violence of the Canadian provinces. I think it even had a date here, somewhere around 2008 to '17, which for a bulk of that time, actually, I was on the streets working as a police officer. Sadly, I got to be either a first responder as a constable and even in certain cases as a supervisor in those particular situations. They're very volatile. Really, to understand the complexity of domestics in itself is, again – I mean, there are a multitude of factors. Sometimes it's a financial issue, sometimes it's drugs or alcohol, or sometimes, sadly, in certain cases some people just stop getting along.

However, when I look at this, you know, key piece of legislation, which allows an intimate partner to really learn the history – I was thinking about this and I was reflecting upon this, and again I'm reflecting on my experiences when I was working on the streets. I think it's to really kind of understand the history, we'll say, of domestic offenders, right? I certainly don't want to categorize it as a gender; however, predominantly in my experience most males had tended to be the offenders in these particular situations, at least the ones that I attended.

My experience was that it was gradual, right? We saw this. At least, when I was investigating we'll call it the history of what led up to the moment where the police were ultimately called, you know, what I found that was very consistent, especially in really complex domestic situations, was that the history was, of course, that the people meet, and it's a very positive relationship, and then all of a sudden something happens. Usually the intimate partner is: "Okay. Well, I mean, that's not cool, but – you know what? – I can accept that. I really love that person." Okay. Then it becomes almost like a situation where you keep on moving the goalposts. Sadly, it leads to the point, almost the crisis point, where ultimately the police are called, and sometimes it's violent, and sometimes it's situations where, certainly, there's a lot of verbal abuse that goes on.

But having a piece of legislation like this, which kind of allows the awareness – you've heard me talk before in the House, Mr. Chair, about education, prevention, and intervention, of course. Letting everyone in Alberta know that this sort of tool is available in the tool box for people that may find themselves in these types of domestic situations is actually very vitally important, right? You know, that would give that person the opportunity to find out, maybe, that somebody has a pattern of behaviour, a history, we'll call it.

Many a time, other than when kids are, you know, we'll say, starting off, whenever they're starting to date – and I don't want to use any actual ages because I know that everybody starts dating at various ages. As a police officer, when you're starting to investigate folks in their 20s and 30s or even older, typically the offender may have a pattern of abuse that maybe predates the relationship which they are in. Sometimes they go back even further.

Mr. Chair, there were about two and a half years when I was a judicial interim release hearing officer, and we dealt with a lot of domestics, of course. I was the one that would do the bail hearings on these particular domestics. You've got to forgive me here, but there was a decision that was made – I think it was a Court of Queen's Bench decision – that essentially allowed that when I was giving my presentation, even though this may be an offender that has no previous criminal convictions, as an example, we could bring in the history of allegations because it was well documented in the courts that sometimes in domestic situations these offenders might have a history that, again, predates the relationship which they're in.

As you're aware, when we're going to detain somebody, possibly in custody, we use what are called primary, secondary, and tertiary grounds. Of course, the secondary grounds would have to do with likelihood of reoffending. When we go back and we look and we see that this guy, again predominantly men but can be a man or a woman, typically has a pattern of behaviour, sometimes where the person isn't even convicted – again, these become, ultimately, public documents, especially in the cases where you have a prosecutor and a defence. Sometimes, I can tell you, the victims in these particular cases are actually quite shocked. They had no idea that the intimate partner with which they had had a relationship for however long had a history of domestic abuse even though they may not have ever been convicted.

Having that tool when the possible victim of domestic violence or abuse suspects that, "Wait a second; I think I might not be the only one here" and then they're able to have this tool to find out that, "Hey, you know what? I was right," maybe – I say maybe, and I say this in a very positive way – that helps them in assisting with their choice not to be with that particular individual. Again, when we talk about saving lives, could that save a life? Yes. I think that you've heard me in this House before. I mean, if we can save even just one life, then it makes that piece of legislation worth it.

I mean, I think that with these situations, you know, especially when I see, again, some of the statistics that I've seen regarding the amount of domestic violence in Alberta and, sadly, even in Canada – from 2008 to '17 there were 166 deaths in Alberta due to domestic violence – yeah, everybody should be concerned about that.

Again, a tool in the tool box. I think there are a lot more things that can be done to help, certainly, victims in those sorts of domestic situations. Again, this is a multifaceted problem. It is very, very complex. There is no one solution to solving it, but I certainly commend the minister for bringing this forward. I think this is a positive tool in the tool box. I think this is going to be one that, especially with the awareness component, when we talk about just making sure that the people in Alberta are aware – right? – that this tool is available for them, can only have a positive repercussion on this.

I want to thank you, Mr. Chair, for the opportunity to speak on this. I want to thank the minister for bringing it up. You know, I want to thank all the members who are supporting this, and I'll thank the opposition as well. I thank you, and I yield my time.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud has risen to speak.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I'm pleased to rise today in support of Bill 17, Disclosure to Protect Against Domestic Violence (Clare's Law) Act. I'd like to begin as well by thanking the Minister of Community and Social Services for bringing forward this legislation. I apologize if I'm going to say things that perhaps many people have already said. It's just that this is an issue that is quite near and dear to my heart, and I wanted to be on the record to speak to it. I do recognize, of course, that the minister has already outlined, even in her opening comments today in Committee of the Whole, that there are some details that are missing from the legislation. I just wanted to take the opportunity to speak to that a little bit.

As well, I'd also like to begin by saying that I may be frequently referring to women who are survivors or victims of domestic violence. I recognize, of course, that not all victims of domestic violence are women. We know that any individual can be a victim of domestic violence, but we also know that predominantly it is women. I just want to say that while I will be probably speaking mostly about women, I recognize that men, of course, can also be victims of domestic violence.

As actually already mentioned by the Member for Calgary-West and as well by the minister herself, I do want to highlight that this is a very useful tool, as the Member for Calgary-West said, a tool in a tool box. I don't think it is the role of legislation to always fix all problems completely. We know that that's pretty much impossible in complex situations. I recognize that this is not being put forward as a solution to the issue of domestic violence. Rather, it is a tool in the tool box to address it, and I appreciate that.

I do want to mention that – again, I recognize that this might have been commented on before – while the bill is a good step forward, and I appreciate it is also enabling legislation, there is a lot of information and details that will have to be worked out in the regulations, and it's going to be very important how those things are fleshed out in those regulations.

Some of the things that I know I will be looking for in terms of what will come in those regulations: the bill does refer to, of course, an individual who may make a request but also that there may be other individuals who may make a request on behalf of an applicant. You know, just fleshing out who that could be, we understand that maybe it will be social workers – maybe it will be family doctors, counsellors, police – looking to see sort of who will be able to make those applications and if there will be any kind of requirements as to what needs to be met before an individual other than a person who is potentially directly affected by domestic violence is making that application. If it's a third party, what are the standards or who are the categories of people that will be captured by that? What is their position of trust or relationship with the person upon which they are making that request?

I think that will be very important to know because, of course, the reason that we care about this – we all care about this – is that the information we're talking about, not only is it very sensitive and potentially inflammatory information, but the person upon whom it's being requested for is likely in a very dangerous situation. We just need to be very cautious to know when those applications will be made and which third parties will be able to make it on their behalf. That goes to that question of that right to ask, right? Who does have the right to ask, particularly if it is a third party? I'm looking forward to some clarification. I know that in the Saskatchewan version of this bill they did set out within the act those individuals who may make application, and perhaps that's going to be a guideline for the regulation.

One of the challenges we have with respect to this kind of legislation is that it is relatively new, and there aren't a lot of jurisdictions that have had a great deal of time with its actual implementation. We know that it has been implemented in other countries, the U.K. in particular, but still relatively recently, so we don't have the benefit of a lot of evidence or experience. That certainly should not prevent us from taking those steps forward. It just means that we may need to be a little bit more cautious and thoughtful as to what we're doing because we don't have the benefit of others' experiences.

With respect to decision-making about when a disclosure will be made to an applicant or a third party making an application, you know, I think we have to think about – and I note from the bill that it is a police service that will be making that decision as to disclosing that information. I know that police services across the country, across Alberta have been doing a great deal of work to understand and to train with respect to domestic violence, but of course this is an additional responsibility. I do recognize that police will often make disclosures where it is seen to be important to do so already, but if we are going to be setting up a system or a process by which a police service is managing these applications and is making a decision about disclosing this information, we want to make sure that those police officers have the appropriate training to exercise that discretion carefully and thoughtfully, which I know they will. But just to make sure those supports are there for the police service to do that.

I think the other issue with respect to making a decision to disclose information to an applicant with respect to domestic violence is the timeliness of the disclosure. I note that there is sort of a wide variety sometimes in timeliness. In the limited experiences that we've seen from the U.K., sometimes a disclosure can be made quite quickly. Sometimes it takes a lot longer. This is critical, of course, in this area because, you know, when a woman is at a point where she might be seeking this information, it may be at a point where she's already considering leaving her partner or leaving that situation, which we also know by the evidence is the most dangerous time for those women. When they're at that point, we know that the numbers, the intensity, the violence associated with those situations increases exponentially when the woman is actually looking to leave the situation. It's a high-risk situation, so timeliness is important. We need to make sure that those requests can be handled in a timely way so that that information can be disclosed quickly.

However, there also needs to be a little bit of caution, and this speaks a little bit to how the decision will be made to disclose. Perhaps there should be input. When a decision is made to disclose, there should be appropriate input from perhaps other people who are in that individual's life. I don't know if it will just be the police service who will be making that decision, but there might be a need to seek a variety of information sources before making that decision to disclose because sometimes the police may not have all the information they need to make that decision. That could, of course, affect timeliness because bringing in other individuals to weigh in on that decision may take more time. It is a very delicate balance between needing to be timely but making sure that the decision is very thoughtful because the disclosure can be quite significant.

I also want to speak to the issue of what is disclosed to an individual, what information, the content of the information that is disclosed to an applicant. I understand that in other jurisdictions sometimes all that's disclosed is that the individual about whom the information is sought, the perpetrator in this case, all that might be disclosed is whether there's a high risk or a low risk of that person being a danger to the applicant. Sometimes, of course, more detailed information is presented, and it might be specifics about actual convictions. Again, those are just questions because I don't know what would go into making those determinations about whether or not somebody is high risk or low risk and how the recipient who's getting that information will interpret that or how they will understand that without more detail.

But if we do get to more detailed information such as convictions, which I think – I would imagine we can all agree that if there is a prior conviction with respect to domestic violence, that would seem to fit right within the scope of this legislation. My concern, of course, is that we know that domestic violence is tragically underreported. Not only is it underreported, but we know that for domestic violence, sexual violence, it's very challenging for a victim or a survivor to actually get a conviction. The fact is that there are so many instances where it would not be reported, and then even if it is reported, the chances of a conviction are slim as well. That's just supported by the statistics.

Again, if we're limiting the information that an applicant might receive to simply a conviction, I'm worried that it might give a false sense of security in some situations, where, you know, a woman might say, “Well, there’s no conviction,” but that might not mean that there hasn’t been a complaint made. Certainly, it would be limited to a complaint made to the police versus complaints made to other individuals. Now, I’m not saying – I don’t know how we would possibly capture all those other complaints, and there is an issue of fairness that we have to consider. I worry that if we are limiting the information that is disclosed to simply convictions, we’re actually not capturing a lot of potentially high-risk situations, and it may give a victim or a survivor of violence a false sense of security if they get a report saying that there are no prior convictions.

The other issue I’d like to raise – again, I’m sure that it’s been raised a number of times – is about privacy. On this case what I’m concerned about is: if a woman has received this information, how is that protected? We do not want it to be obviously known to the perpetrator that the woman has now received information about his prior conviction. Again, I realize that I’m using gendered terms here, and I apologize for that. I’m making some generalizations here. That is a concern because again I go back to – the point at which a woman might be making a decision about needing that information about her partner is usually a very volatile and high-risk moment, so if there is a risk that somehow the perpetrator of the violence will be notified or will become aware somehow that she has sought that information, that exponentially increases her risk. With respect to privacy I think that just speaks to the delicacy of the situation, and I’m hoping that, as part of the development of the regulations, conversations are had with, for example, the Privacy Commissioner to see if there is some advice with respect to how to manage that.

I note that Bill 17 does capture what’s known as the right to know, which means that there will be situations where a woman is advised of her partner’s prior convictions without seeking that information herself: she didn’t ask for it, but perhaps the police have become aware of a situation. They know that perhaps a perpetrator or somebody who’s been convicted of this offence is now in an intimate relationship. Perhaps that person is at a high risk, so they disclose it without the applicant asking. Again, I think that probably already happens to some extent with police services, but we want to make sure that there are additional resources because it’s now placing a somewhat proactive obligation on police to disclose. There needs to be the appropriate resources with respect to that.

Again, I want to reiterate that I do support this bill and the intent behind the bill. I think it is very important that we do move forward with this, but I do want to highlight that any time we talk about legislation, we do have to think, of course, about unintended consequences.

I note that there was an article published by the University of Calgary Faculty of Law’s blog. The authors are Jennifer Koshan and Wanda Wieggers. It’s specifically on Bill 17, and the article was published October 18, 2019. I will table this in the House as well if there’s an interest in that. The article is Clare’s Law: Unintended Consequences for Domestic Violence Victims? One of the things that the article points out is that a potential unintended consequence of this legislation is that victim blaming could become an issue. Actually, I should say that victim blaming is already an issue when it comes to domestic violence. We know that, you know, we have ideas, and we’ve seen the courts reinforce them although they have been moving forward to take those stereotypes down, but we expect victims of domestic violence to act in a particular way. If they don’t, we sometimes hold them accountable for that. In particular, we certainly tend to hold victims accountable to leave their perpetrators and perhaps situations where it’s not easy to do so. There are complex reasons why many women stay in violent relationships, and we don’t want to be doing anything to encourage that.

I do worry that by creating this one potential unintended consequence that, you know, if a woman either does not make an application for this disclosure or does make an application and it is disclosed to her that her partner has a prior conviction and she does not leave, she will then be blamed for that, for not leaving. It’s not just blamed in the court of public opinion, but what we see is that women can often be held accountable by having their children apprehended.

I’m going to quote now from this article that I referred to. The authors state:

A vast literature shows that women who do not leave abusive partners are at risk of having their children apprehended, because exposure to domestic violence has been legally defined as placing children in need of protection. Rather than providing supports to abused women in these situations so that they can remain in their homes and communities with their children, we often bring the full force of state intervention upon them – and it is well known that Indigenous women are disproportionately susceptible to this risk, explaining in some cases their reluctance to engage with the police.

I just wanted to raise this because we have to ask ourselves the question of whether victims who do obtain this information will be blamed if they don’t leave and they later sustain abuse. Does it put them at higher risk of having their children removed? This is not to say that we want children to remain in situations where there is domestic violence; rather, we want to create a situation where we can get involved and provide supports and resources to assist that family.

I think the question that these authors ask – and again I will quote – is:

How will Clare’s Law play out in cases involving women who have been criminally charged where they were defending themselves or their children from violence, or where they were wrongfully accused of abuse by their partners?

That’s something else I know. In my conversations with some organizations that are heavily involved in working with women who are survivors of violence have raised, they raise that often, you know, a violent partner will accuse the woman of being abusive. It creates a very tangled web, and what it does is that it creates a situation where both the woman who’s the victim of the violence feels both that she is now being blamed and that she might be held accountable. It also breaks the trust with law enforcement.

I raise those issues not to say that this is not a good bill. It is a good bill, but we just need to be conscious that there might be those implications. Those implications are probably higher for women who are indigenous, racialized, or poor. I just wanted to raise those issues for food for thought.

I appreciate that the minister has been very clear that she is going to be engaging in very thoughtful consultation with stakeholders. I know that there are a number of stakeholders that have already been engaged, and I appreciate that very much. I’m hoping that they will continue to be heavily involved in the development of the regulations, organizations like the Alberta Council of Women’s Shelters – there are a number of them – but also involving the police because, as we described, the police will now have a very big role with respect to handling these applications and making sure that they are resourced properly. Also, I mentioned the Privacy Commissioner as a potential, who might have some thoughts on how to navigate the privacy issues around this.

Overall, the comment has been echoed, I think, by a number of people here. The law is a really great tool, but resources need to be there. Resources need to be there when a woman gets information about her partner or a third party seeks that information and she’s at a potentially very high-risk, dangerous situation. Are there supports available to ensure that she can leave that situation in a safe way and in a safe way that protects her family as well? Those resources have to be available province-wide as well and in remote areas and rural areas, and we need to make sure that this isn't a situation where there are already strong institutions – those women might get supports – but we need to ensure that that's available throughout the province.

I do thank the minister again for bringing forward the legislation. I'll throw this out there if there's any appetite for this. I'm sure that members of the opposition are very much in support of this legislation. If we could be involved in any way in supporting the development of the regulations, I know we would be eager to do so.

Thank you again to the minister. I appreciate the opportunity to speak to this bill. Thank you, Mr. Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak? I see the hon. Member for Grande Prairie has risen.

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Chair. Well, it is also my honour to rise in the House and support this bill, the Disclosure to Protect Against Domestic Violence (Clare's Law) Act. I, too, wanted to take this opportunity to thank the minister for her hard work on this particular piece of legislation and just to talk a little bit about some of my experiences.

First of all, this bill is going to allow people at risk of domestic violence to obtain information on their partner about a potential history of domestic violence or relevant acts. I believe that this has the potential to save lives.

I also think it's refreshing when we encounter a bill and both sides of the House can stand in support of that bill. I think that's a lovely, refreshing experience for us in this House. I thank the members opposite for your continued support and also for some of the things that you've brought forward around ways to even make it better or improve it. I appreciate the thoughtfulness with which you've engaged in this discussion. Thank you to the members opposite for that.

I also want to thank the minister again for her work to ensure that there are funding and resources available for Alberta's most vulnerable, not just with respect to this bill but all of the Albertans that are impacted by her ministry. Thank you to the minister for that and for her diligence in advocating on behalf of Albertans.

I just wanted to give a little bit of background. I believe that it has already been read into this House, but I wanted to stand and rise again for those, you know, many, many Albertans who will be listening to me right now. I really appreciate their attention. I just wanted to say, in all seriousness, that it's very scary to me that half of all young women and girls who are victims of domestic violence homicide in Canada were murdered by someone with a prior conviction. I think that is a staggering statistic, and I actually did not realize that it was that high until this bill became available for us to discuss in this House. This conviction often is sort of relevant but not direct.

I just think that, in my personal experience – I'll step back a little bit. I've been an employer for 26 years, have employed literally thousands of people in the province of Alberta, and have had the unfortunate opportunity – I guess it was fortunate that I could be there for these staff, but it was unfortunate – to be a witness as an employer to some of the people embroiled in domestic violence in their own homes. How to support them as an employer was very, very challenging. You know, you want to be there for these people, but you also don't want to enable them. There's a fine line there.

I think legislation like this would have been very helpful for some of those staff to have some perspective. I think that sometimes when you're in these situations, perspective gets skewed, and you're in it for so long that what would have been unacceptable at the start of your relationship with your intimate partner – your defences get worn down, and you start to accept behaviour that would not have been acceptable at the start of your relationship. I think it just escalates, and it's a very slow and subtle escalation, but I also believe that what ultimately happens is that these victims of domestic violence don't have perspective anymore. To have access to third-party information, I think, would have been very empowering for some of the people, some of the women, in this case, that I supported through those challenges.

Unfortunately, the statistics are also that most of the people in these situations tend to go back again and again. I think, as the members opposite pointed out, there can be a stigma around that sometimes. We who haven't walked that road can judge how that happens or why somebody would go back, but I also know that, as many members in this House have risen to speak on this issue, it's very complicated and interconnected. Sometimes there are children involved or extended family. Sometimes the employment is impacted. Often there are cases where these people don't feel like they have another alternative but to go back. You know, my grandpa used to always say that love is blind, and I think that sometimes that's really the case: we love the person, but we don't know how to separate those feelings from the facts of what we're encountering in our relationship.

I'm very happy to rise in support of this bill today. I do believe that it will help prevent domestic violence, and I do believe that it will empower, hopefully, these victims. Again, as has been said in this House, if it saves even one life, it certainly was worth the time and the effort to stand and debate it.

It's also shocking to me that our domestic violence rate here in Alberta is the third highest in Canada. It's really sad to me, and I think that we have a responsibility to improve these statistics and also to educate the public on what this looks like and what this means for people.

I wanted to talk a little bit about the idea behind FOIP and the freedom of information and how this act will be sort of impacted in that way. I don't believe that the intention is to allow anyone to weaponize the act. That's certainly something that we were briefed on with the minister as well, that we have to balance the opportunity to empower these people who are in this situation and give them the knowledge that they need to make a more informed decision and a more unbiased decision in their relationships, but I also believe that we have to balance that with people's right to privacy. Certainly, the legislation: my understanding is that it is being developed with consideration for privacy and for the FOIP Act.

I believe that, you know, we're going to have a lot of work to do in the event that this passes or when this passes the House with respect to the regulations, that we do work to get it right. I'm grateful that we have a model from the U.K., Clare's law, to look to to see how it's been enacted there and what has worked well there. I also know that other jurisdictions in Canada are working right now, and I hope that we can work collaboratively to do the very best on behalf of Albertans and particularly these most vulnerable that are impacted currently.

I also wanted to say that there's been a lot of meaningful engagement – I can see that from the briefings and from the discussions in this House – with the stakeholders involved, and I appreciate that work that's been done already in advance, certainly around things like wraparound supports. Those have been anticipated. There will be needs for that.

You know, one of the things that happens – and I can certainly say again, as an employer who supported, unfortunately, multiple people in this situation over my 26 years in my work life, that each situation is unique, so we don't have a one-size-fits-all response or support that would work. In some cases it was just the emotional support required. In other cases there was financial support required. In other cases there were multiple supports required.

I find that without understanding, it's very challenging to step in in a meaningful and in a helpful way, so I appreciate the depth of stakeholder engagement that's been undertaken to draft this and to address each individual circumstance, hopefully. I know that we can't anticipate every single circumstance that could possibly occur, but I certainly think there have been serious efforts undertaken to look at the most common ones, anyway, services potentially for justice, sexual assault, housing, and homelessness.

You know, one of the stories I can hearken back to: I was a 22-year-old owner of a business, which is kind of amazing when I think about that now, and this young woman worked for us on the night shift. For her privacy I won't disclose her name. But she would come to work late or with sort of odd behaviour. She wouldn't meet our gaze. She was very shy, and it took us months and months of working side by side to realize that she was in a very, very damaging relationship. Unfortunately, in that case there were two very small children involved, so it's not as simple as saying: hey, we'll help you leave. There were two little babies at home, so the supports that she needed were extensive, and in her case in particular, homelessness would have been a very significant reality had she just walked out the door. It wouldn't have worked. That was a very challenging experience for a young entrepreneur, 22 years old, to try and figure out: how do I best help this woman?

Further to that, you know, mental health is just absolutely huge with respect to this. I think that when you've been in a relationship long enough – and I walked this road with, as I said, a number of people over the years in my business life and also in my personal life. To see the deterioration in mental health and the increase in the capacity to question oneself is really interesting to me, too. It's very, very sad to see women who are strong and, often, educated – not that it's just women; it could be anyone, but in my case it was women that I supported, these women who would be viewed in society as strong and independent, and no one would ever suspect that they were walking in a situation of domestic violence – and to see them not be able to discern what was appropriate behaviour anymore in their intimate partner relationship and also to see them struggle with perspective with respect to encounters with their intimate partner.

One house in particular I'm thinking of. I would go over to visit for coffee, and the spouse would come home. I would be shocked at the tone and the behaviour in the home and would ask, like: what's going on here? She would say: well, you know, that was fine. Again – I think I've said this already – what wouldn't have been fine at the beginning of the relationship had become fine over the time that they'd been together. Without the capacity to remove oneself from the situation, I think it really does take a toll on the mental health, and I think it becomes more and more challenging for these individuals to see the behaviour for what it is. To access information that would help these people, women and men, who are struggling with this, to see what's really happening and to see a history: I hope it would be sobering enough information for many of them to choose differently.

I also hope that these people wouldn't end up in the situation to begin with because they would have enough of a red flag to go, "Maybe I need to get more information," particularly now in our society. I'm talking 26 years ago. Now it's much more common to meet people online. People may not be from your town or even from your country, so to be able to investigate and find out, you know, what their background is and to do a more thorough search and find that out before you engage in something that you may not be able to get yourself out of afterwards: certainly, we would want to do everything we could to protect our society and protect people that are entering into these intimate relationships.

Another thing my grandpa used to say is that the person you marry is the making or the breaking of you. I think that quite often what happens is that people enter in with the best of intentions. It can make your life so wonderful, and it can make your life so devastating. In Clare Wood's case it cost her her life, so certainly there are high stakes here.

I also just wanted to touch briefly on indigenous and cultural communities. I've been proud to stand in this House many times with many of the ministers – I'm thinking of the minister of indigenous affairs – and support indigenous issues and support indigenous peoples' rights. I just think it's really great that this is another opportunity. I know it's not directly connected to the National Inquiry into Missing and Murdered Indigenous Women and Girls, but I also believe that had this law been here, it certainly may have assisted and stemmed some of that tragedy.

I don't have much more to add. I just, really, again wanted to thank the members opposite for their support, thank this House for discussing this, and thank the minister for bringing it forward.

With that, I will thank you, Mr. Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

I see that the hon. Minister of Community and Social Services has risen to speak.

Mrs. Sawhney: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I just thought I'd take a couple of moments to reflect and talk about some of the feedback that I've heard today. Certainly, I'm very grateful. It's been valuable. It's been very insightful. Maybe I'll just start with the comments that were made by the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood. It is critical that we do have wraparound supports available. Certainly, during our stakeholder engagement, which was quite extensive – we had two sessions that included a number of participants from multidisciplinary backgrounds – there was near unanimous consensus that we needed to make sure that we had robust wraparound supports available. That's something that I as the minister, obviously, take very seriously. Some of those supports could include obvious things like crisis or medical support, perpetrator intervention and programs, which is not quite as obvious, cultural support services, children's services, and community outreach wraparound supports.

There was also a comment made around housing supports. I think that that's a very relevant comment as well because I did hear that as well during our stakeholder engagement. I think this really does provide a good opportunity for some crossministerial engagement as well with Seniors and Housing and Children's Services. That is something that is also going to be investigated further as we work towards defining the regulations.

In regard to the comments made by the Member for Calgary-West, absolutely, this is another tool in the tool box that we can use in a preventative fashion to make sure that potential victims of domestic violence have something that they could use to be more informed about potentially entering a harmful relationship. One of the things that we want to operationalize in the regulations is robust risk assessment. That will incorporate qualitative and quantitative data that will help inform the decision as to whether to disclose information or not. That was a very important comment, and I think there is consensus in this House that this is a tool. It's not the solution, it's not the answer, but it is something that, in my hope, will definitely bring down the rates of domestic violence in this province.

I was listening very carefully to the Member for Edmonton-Whitemud because she brought up a number of questions, actually, around this legislation and how those questions will potentially be answered in the regulations. In regard to applicant eligibility, I know that in the Saskatchewan act third parties are named, but the actual eligibility hasn't been defined in that act as well. We're following Saskatchewan's example very closely, but as we make that decision to define eligibility, obviously it has to be informed by stakeholders. We want to make sure that we incorporate folks who have lived experience, who have gone through this terrible journey, to give us their feedback, to tell us what makes sense as we define eligibility for applicants in the regulations.

In terms of the decision to disclose, it's not necessarily the case that police services are going to make that decision. We are, again, obviously, engaging with stakeholders to determine who will be the best body to actually make that decision to disclose. It could potentially be a multidisciplinary panel that incorporates different areas of expertise that will come together and incorporate the risk assessment as well to ultimately make that decision to disclose. The actual disclosure most likely will be undertaken by police services.

There were a number of comments made about privacy, and I can't emphasize enough that we're very, very sensitive to privacy considerations. We're working very closely with the office of the Information and Privacy Commissioner to make sure that we can anticipate what potential pitfalls might be and also to ensure that we have mitigating responses put in place that will address privacy considerations.

The one thing that really caught my attention was the comment on unintended consequences, because this is something that I take very seriously, and we've talked about it at length both in the ministry and the department, that with everything we do, with every initiative that we put forward, we have to be extremely mindful of the unintended consequences. The article that was addressed by the member opposite: I'll read that; I'll take a look at it. Certainly, we also have to be very cognizant that we are taking into consideration all cultural sensitivities, particularly as they relate to indigenous women and indigenous communities. That came through loud and clear through our stakeholder engagement.

The Member for Grande Prairie brought up a number of issues as well, and I've already spoken about privacy and how mindful we are to ensure that privacy considerations are taken extremely seriously.

The reasons as to why women or men, any victim of domestic violence, stays in these relationships: I mean, the reasons are so complex and nuanced and sensitive and multifaceted. It's really hard to say or to speak to why these situations perpetuate, but I think it's also important to say that we should never judge. We never know what's happening in a person's life or what their individual circumstances are, what their family circumstances are, whether they've experienced intergenerational trauma. There are so many reasons as to why people stay in relationships. But, again, I'm so confident and hopeful in all of the above that this particular legislation will be preventative in nature and will give people options to stay away from potentially harmful relationships.

The statistic of Alberta having the third-highest rate of domestic violence in Canada: I mean, it's not just sad; it's devastating. How is it even possible in this province that we have such a terrible statistic? I go back to what I said earlier, when I did my second reading, that this stat is understated, because there are so many cases of violence where people just don't report, again for a variety of different reasons.

I know that there are more concerns yet to be articulated, and I'm very open to feedback and insight, lived experience, anything else that anybody might be able to offer as we go forward to define these regulations.

Thank you, everyone, once again for your support.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you.

I see the hon. Member for St. Albert has risen to speak.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Chair. It's my pleasure to stand up and speak to this a second time, to speak to Bill 17. I certainly appreciated all of the comments here today. I focused, the first time that I spoke to this piece of legislation, on the importance of wraparound supports. I understand that this legislation is what the government is calling enabling legislation in that most of the details will be determined at a future date. Most of the details will be in the regulations. Again, I just wanted to urge the government, as my colleague suggested, that I know that there are people on this side that would be more than happy to participate in that phase to help out wherever we can.

I did want to focus on the importance of wraparound supports but also on the importance of prevention. It is one thing to give, to provide another tool or to put another tool in the so-called tool box. The rates of violence and abuse in Alberta and Canada are far too high, and anything that we can do to address that or to bring that down is absolutely important. I think what we really need to talk about is: it is one thing to put in a document that, you know, we'll also have wraparound supports, but it's quite another to spend time and energy and invest resources in those supports. So I am going to focus my comments there.

A number of the members have talked about some of the people that are at risk, and some of the personal stories or examples they've shared have really highlighted that. But I wanted to go a little bit further to describing the populations that are at risk and then sort of linking it to supports, wraparound supports or preventative supports, and why those are so important and why it's such an important investment.

One of the groups that maybe we haven't spent a whole lot of time talking about are new Canadians. I know that in the community that I represent, St. Albert, there isn't a huge population of newer Canadians. However, there are a number of families that have recently moved to St. Albert and have been supported. We got to meet them a little bit, and we have heard stories, maybe not necessarily from those families but from other families, talking about sort of the pressures of moving to a new place, the isolation, the lack of relationships, whether it's family or friends, that leaves certain people particularly vulnerable. In those particular instances it was even more difficult for people to leave abusive relationships.

I imagine – I don't know this for sure – that the background information would not be accessible, whether it was to law enforcement or whoever, because there isn't a long history there. These are folks that are new to this community, let alone new to this country, yet maybe they have come with some issues that are problematic or with some violence and with a history of violence. I imagine being in a new community, with a new job or unemployed, with new stresses with the language, new schools: all of those things can continue to add to the stress.

This is a group, actually, that relies quite heavily on community service providers in the community. These are the kinds of wraparound supports that we need to continuously invest in, whether that is a subsidy for affordable housing, whether that's assistance with transportation or assistance learning how to drive. Sometimes it's even the food bank. These are the kinds of supports that we need to invest in.

There is another group that is particularly reliant on community service providers or wraparound supports, as this document talks about, and that is people with disabilities. I know I mentioned this the first time I spoke to this. I imagine it's true with men also, but I'm going to focus on women with disabilities. We do know that women with disabilities are particularly vulnerable, sometimes twice as vulnerable as women without disabilities, in terms of being victims of violence, whether it's domestic violence, familial violence of some kind. These are the kinds of women and men, I suppose, that are reliant on services in the community.

The reason I'm sort of harping on the need to invest in these services is that these community services rely very heavily on support from government. In some of the cases of the services that I'm describing, they rely heavily on FCSS funding. I mentioned that earlier. FCSS funding is dollars that the province gives to municipalities. The municipalities are also investing. I think it's about an 80-20 split. I know that when we were in government, we invested I think about $25 million each and every year because this is a growing need. It is one thing to say that we're adding a tool in the tool box to keep people safe and, you know, that we'll also look at wraparound supports, but it is quite another to actually make that investment, to make that financial commitment to continue supporting these programs.

You know, it's sort of a timely discussion. There are so many risk factors, I suppose, that lead people to the place where this becomes a reality and this legislation could potentially touch their lives, but there is so much that we can do to prevent it. I want to tie this back to a motion that came up yesterday. It was the motion about looking at: what are the barriers to reproductive health care for women in rural and remote Alberta in particular? The reason that I'm bringing this up – and I know that those opposite sort of thought that this issue was being brought up to weaponize some kind of issue. Actually, it was being brought up because there was a lack of support, a lack of access to these services in certain communities. Very often for women, in particular, that are isolated or that are in communities that are far away from services, it is more difficult for them to leave situations if they are unable to make the decisions that they need to make about their lives, their bodies, and their futures. I'm not saying that the lack of ability to access these services causes domestic violence. I'm just saying that it's one more risk factor. So this is one more thing that we can actually do to prevent, because I think prevention is the key.

I'm going to talk about, specifically, my community, the community that I represent, St. Albert. There are two services or two organizations that are doing some really amazing work around prevention and support, and that's where I think a big investment needs to be. While I do support this legislation and I trust that the details will be worked out in regulation, I trust that the government will do their due diligence to address all of the concerns that we brought up all through this debate and that we will also focus on prevention and support, the wraparound support. In my community we have two that I want to talk about. One is the Jessica Martel Memorial Foundation. I'm sure that people have heard about this organization. They're actually set to open emergency, first-stage housing in I think 2020. I think they're probably at around 60 per cent of their fundraising goal. They are set to serve the Sturgeon region, Morinville, and St. Albert.

For those of you who haven't heard about Jessica Martel, sadly, a bill or a piece of legislation that we're talking about here today could easily be named after her. This was a woman who was in a relationship with a man who was clearly violent, with two young children. Obviously, all of the red flags along the way. She actually had family close by, but she died. She was murdered. Her family and community rallied around, got together and decided that this was something that they wanted to do because she was murdered at the time that they were looking at creating a plan and bringing in the community supports and family supports to allow her to move. Would this piece of legislation have helped? I'm not sure. I hope so. Maybe it would have. It would have given her additional information that she didn't have.

The point of me bringing up Jessica Martel and the work that's been done around creating this housing is that this is a group that had to begin on their own. They had to do fundraising. They had to meet as volunteers, do all of the fundraising activities that so many groups have to do in order to create emergency shelter spaces in St. Albert, Morinville, Sturgeon county, because there's nothing. There really is nothing. We've been told that, you know, women wanting to leave will need to actually go to Edmonton, and that's not always possible. Although Morinville and Edmonton aren't that far apart, it can be very long. It can be, like, an insurmountable distance when you're in a situation like this. This is the kind of program or this is the kind of housing investment that we need to make. If we say that more than anything we want to prevent this and we want to support people after the disclosure, these are the kinds of programs that we need to support.

Also, one of the most effective ways of preventing this is investing in organizations like SAIF society in St. Albert. Again, they rely heavily – heavily – on FCSS, and of course we're nervous. We're bracing for a budget where we don't know where the investment level will be, and any kind of reductions there will directly impact their ability to prevent this kind of tragedy and this kind of violence. I don't know if people know about this: one of the programs that they invest in is called Cut it Out. Probably people have heard of that, and it's actually education with people that are involved in – I'll probably get the sector wrong. They work in salons. These are hairstylists, things like that, because very often there is that point of contact with women that are in violent relationships or are looking for assistance. That can be maybe the one place where they're not being supervised or there isn't somebody watching. It's about educating people that work in that sector to know what to identify – maybe there are patches of hair missing – and how to provide support and how to provide ideas to make a plan to get out.

That's just one of the types of programs that the SAIF society in St. Albert supports. Obviously, they do quite a bit of education in elementary schools, junior high level, and high schools. That's where it needs to happen, whether it's, you know, opening the door for a possible disclosure there or just teaching kids how to identify it themselves, how to identify that this is a problem. Very often, sadly, for kids that grow up in families like that, that's all they know, and unless they've been taught sort of what to recognize and how to report and to know that it's a problem, they don't know.

Again, you know, I don't mean to beat a dead horse here, but it is one thing to have legislation that empowers people with information, and it's quite another not to back it up with investment in prevention and wraparound supports. I just want to encourage everyone – I certainly appreciate any time any work is done around prevention, but I just want to point out that without these other investments, this will not impact the number of people that we need to impact.

I've heard members, again, say over and over again that the level of violence, the number of people that are forced to deal with this kind of violence in our province, is unacceptable. We need to do this. We need to pass legislation like this. We need to get the regulations right, but we need to invest in prevention and wraparound supports – and my colleagues touch on that – which are affordable housing and assistance finding work and getting work that people can support their families with. It's about affordable child care. It's about accessible child care. It's about outreach and wraparound supports to communities that are particularly vulnerable: people with disabilities, people in our indigenous communities, new Canadians.

There are so many groups that rely so heavily on community service providers that we can't let them down. If we are making a commitment to do everything that we can to keep people safe, then we need to do this piece, Bill 17, but we need to do more than that.

With that, I will end. Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford has risen.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I appreciate the opportunity to speak to Bill 17. I would like to thank the minister for bringing forward the bill, and of course I'm rising to speak in favour of it. I will take a few moments just to talk about my own background because I think it's important to what it is I'm going to say to the bill. Of course, as many of the members of this side of the House have done, there are some cautions, but we would not want those cautions to stop us from moving forward in the steps that we can take at this particular time.

Many of you may know that prior to being elected, I had a 33-year career as a social worker, with a specialization in the area of family violence. I had the great pleasure to work with many, many families struggling through this area. I say "pleasure" not because of what brought them to me but because I really, truly learned to value the truth that families brought to their experience and the incredible work that they do to resolve complex, traumatic situations in their lives in order to create a better world for themselves and their children.

I had an opportunity to work in this area initially as a child welfare worker for the Alberta government for a number of years, and subsequently I was in private practice for about a dozen years, working in the area of child sexual abuse. The last 11 years, of course, I was teaching in the Faculty of Social Work at the University of Calgary, where I taught a number of courses specifically on or related to family violence. At the same time I was doing some consultation work with some agencies, including, for example, the Association of Communities Against Abuse, which is a family violence organization in Stettler, Alberta. I had an opportunity to drive down there and, of course, provided consultation at that time to many northern communities, including many First Nations communities. I began to see these situations from a variety of perspectives, from both rural and urban perspectives. I had a sense of some of the patterns that develop in these situations but also of some of the ways in which the system – both myself as a child welfare worker and subsequently as a therapist and subsequently as a consultant – had a differential approach to a variety of situations, depending on characteristics of the moment.

I wish I could say that I did the right thing at all times, but, you know, none of us realistically can say that. I certainly always enter in my work with the best of intentions, but I'm quite aware that there are a variety of systemic pulls that make us move in a direction that sometimes we're unaware of for a while, and even once we've become aware of them, sometimes they're very difficult to get beyond. So even though you have the best of intentions, you can sometimes have some negative consequences to your behaviours. We talk about that in the House all the time. Well, it's true in the human services field as much as it is in legislation in the House or as it is in any other field that we work in.

The concern that I have in this particular case is the nature of defining a list that somehow begins to suggest that there is some power in that list to differentiate people who are offenders from people who are not offenders, and if it does, I accept that then there's some value. If it does help, you know, as we often say, even one person to avoid a situation where they potentially might become a victim, then I think there's some value in it.

The thing that concerns me as a former therapist, though, is that when we have a situation like that – and I know because I worked with people who were often in these kinds of situations – they begin to rely on that list as somehow an external indicator or marker of the veracity of what they're being told by the perpetrator. So if you have someone who is not on the list, then it becomes very easy for them to say: well, if I had done something wrong, then of course I'd be on the list; I'm not on the list; therefore, I'm safe. Now, some of us wouldn't buy that kind of an argument, but of course you have to understand that in a situation of violence and oppression there is a very systemic grooming behaviour that goes on that seeks to violate the self-awareness of the victim and undermine the victim's ability to respond appropriately to a situation. What happens is that they come to a place where they can't trust their own judgment. They begin to seek the list as an external measure of what is right and what is wrong and whether or not somebody is safe or is not.

That has two issues that I think we need to talk about. One of them is that it's very dangerous somehow to say that we have this list and that therefore people on the list are bad folks and then imply that if they're not on the list, they're not bad folks. That gives a very dangerous message. I just want to be very cautious about how this is presented into the community, that we don't start to identify this as the list that will help to separate out those who are dangerous from those who are not, because I think that puts vulnerable people who are seeking external guidance, given the dynamic of their relationships, into a place where they trust information that isn't trustworthy, because we cannot guarantee that the list in any way reflects systematically people who are dangerous versus people who are not.

We ran into that kind of situation often when we were looking at treatment as well. People would come to us and say: has this person gone through treatment? And we'd have to say yes or no. Yes, they've gone to that treatment. But that didn't necessarily indicate whether or not they were safe now that they had gone through treatment.

We found that in some research, particularly done in the jail system in Manitoba, women were looking at the jails to see whether or not the person that they were involved with had gone through the offender treatment in the jail setting as a determination as to whether or not they would get back together again with them. The research indicated in the end that having gone through the treatment didn't necessarily make you any safer. It was a big disappointment to therapists, people like me who said: well, that's pretty rotten; we were hoping that we'd be able to demonstrate that our work is effective. But in this particular case it wasn't. However, the list of who had gone through that treatment was being used by women to identify their own safety in terms of whether or not they should get back together again with somebody that actually left the judicial system. So I just worry about the power of the list in terms of identifying safety or nonsafety.

The other part that I think is of concern is who gets onto the list. Now, again, back to my comment that our best of intentions is that we put people on the list because they deserve to be on that list, but we know systemically that that isn't actually what happens. There are a variety of reasons why people get put on the list and a variety of reasons why people don't get put on the list that have nothing to do with their safety or not. Now, you may say: well, hold it; in this case we have the subjective measure that they've been charged with something and that that's what puts them on the list. But we know in the research about who gets charged that there's a differential rate of charging of people, depending on which ethnic community and which socioeconomic community they come from.

The research across North America would indicate that if you are a rich, white man, someone like me, the chances of me getting charged for this kind of misbehaviour in society is significantly less than people who do not come from that category that I have the privilege of accidentally falling into. What we have is a situation where, I know from speaking to the members of the indigenous community, very often their charges are quick to occur in situations where officers arrive and the apparent culprit is someone who is of the indigenous community, much quicker than it would be if they arrived in a situation where they were not part of the indigenous community.

The research also tends to indicate that this is generally true with regard to socioeconomic status as well, that if you arrive at a household that is a million-dollar house and has two cars in the garage, you tend to be a little bit more cautious, perhaps judicious in your decision to move forward and to impose charges. As a result, people in that category don't tend to get on the list as often.

I think, then, we have to be very cautious about how much power we give to a list when we know that getting on the list or not on the list is not a wholly appropriate mechanism, but there are structural reasons why some groups are overrepresented over other groups that are not specifically related to the actual issue of whether or not they are in danger of committing violence.

In my work with some of the indigenous communities in my life as a social worker, people would often tell me that vast numbers of members of the community were on the lists, whatever those lists were in those situations, of people who were dangerous, that that was really a reflection of white societal attitudes towards indigenous peoples rather than what actually happened in families, and that families saw the intrusion by the white justice system as problematic. Then it led to a situation of women needing to sort of move into this cognitive place where they say, "Well, if a guy is on the list, then it really is a reflection of racial intolerance rather than his dangerousness," therefore moving into a place of denial of the danger that was inherent.

We have a real problem if that begins to occur, if we start to have people say, "The list itself is problematic, and therefore I need to ignore the list." Why it becomes problematic is because there's a second part to this, that women then find themselves being asked, "Why would you get back together with this guy when you were told that he was on the list?" Now, the answer is: "Because I came to believe that the list was prejudicially constructed." But in the courts it may be viewed rather as a problem of: "You actually had some information that you should have used to protect your children, and because you didn't use that information, then we deem you to be less competent in terms of the protection of your own child and therefore more susceptible to having your children removed."

So you can see the double bind that a woman that is the victim of violence would be in. On the one hand, if she believes the list, then she is contributing to racial intolerance against her own people. If, on the other hand, she does not believe in the list, she is threatening her own ability to provide continuing care for her own children because she's being told by others that she's an inadequate parent.

It's just those kinds of double binds that are problematic. Double binds exist in many places in society, and we can't avoid them all, but we can do a number of things to ensure that these problems are resolved. I think that the Member for St. Albert spoke very well about the fact that just simply putting out a list could be dangerous if you don't also wrap that list with a variety of services and techniques of ensuring that the use of that list, both by professionals and nonprofessionals, is guided by the wisdom that we have gleaned over the years about the nature of violence in families.

That would mean putting this bill, Disclosure to Protect Against Domestic Violence (Clare's Law) Act, out there into the world without also ensuring adequate training for professionals so that they don't make statements like, "Well, did you check the list?" or "Why didn't you respond when you saw his name on the list?" — that would be revictimizing the person who was initially victimized — and also without significant support and training for women to understand how the list may be helpful but also may be limited in terms of their decision-making, both when somebody is on the list and when somebody is off the list.

If we had some commitment by the government to ensure that the wraparound services and the appropriate training of professionals were all in place and that this wasn't simply a tool that's thrown into the air hoping that people will catch it properly and use it properly, then I'd feel a bit more secure here. You know, I have said from the beginning that I'm going to support this legislation, but what I will do is that I will follow that up in our budget discussions, starting on Thursday of this week and next week, by saying: "Thank you. You've said that you want this act in the House. I agree with this act in the House. I want to now ask you what you have done to ensure that this act is not going to become a danger in the community. What have you done in terms of your budget?"

It isn't good enough to make a small move without understanding that that move is part of a larger, more complex need in the community and that only doing part of something can sometimes be more detrimental than doing nothing at all. Hopefully, that's not true. I'm giving you my faith that it's not true, but I certainly would like to see and have some assurance from the government, starting on Thursday and throughout next week, that they are going to do the right kinds of things, that they're going to actually take what we have learned in terms of the nature of family violence and act on that in order to ensure people's safety.

It isn't good enough just to say, "I'm against family violence" if your behaviours and your money don't follow that up. I think that's very important. I think that that's going to be a universal caution for the government side of the House, that it's not good enough that you say that you support some particular thing, but then you actually have to do something about it. I'll say the same thing when it comes to saying that they care about child poverty. I say: "So what are you doing about it? Are you providing services for children? Are you providing daycare spaces? Are you providing school lunch programs? Are you doing all those things that we did in our time and were able to reduce child poverty by 50 per cent?"

Those are the kinds of things that I will expect to happen. It isn't just a matter of declaring your moral stance on something. It's about taking brave and courageous behaviour to ensure that the outcome is the outcome that you desire and is satisfactory and not simply something to show good intent without actually trying to achieve the ultimate reward that one would hope to achieve from these kinds of bills.

I put my cautions out there. I appreciate the chance to speak to the minister and to the House on this issue. I would suggest that I'm even happy to have further conversations outside of the House if that's at all helpful at any time. I bring a certain expertise to these kinds of discussions.

But, most importantly, I guess I want to caution and cajole the government into making sure that they don't do the least possible to resolve violence but that they do the most possible to resolve violence. That includes putting the act out there and then ensuring that the implementation of the act is robust and focused on the ultimate outcome and the demonstration of achievement of success.

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Do I see any other members wishing to speak to this bill?

Seeing none, are you ready for the question on Bill 17, Disclosure to Protect Against Domestic Violence (Clare's Law) Act?

[The clauses of Bill 17 agreed to]

[Title and preamble agreed to]

The Deputy Chair: Shall the bill be reported? Are you agreed?

Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chair: Opposed? That is carried.

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Chair, I move that we rise and report.

[Motion carried]

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. The Committee of the Whole has had under consideration a certain bill. The committee reports the following bill: Bill 17.

The Acting Speaker: Does the Assembly concur in the report? All those in favour, say aye.

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Acting Speaker: Any opposed, say no. So ordered.

[The Speaker in the chair]

Government Bills and Orders

Second Reading

Electricity Statutes (Capacity Market Termination) Amendment Act, 2019

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise to move second reading of Bill 18, the Electricity Statutes (Capacity Market Termination) Amendment Act, 2019.

Although the previous government's planned capacity market is not yet operating, the current legislation and regulations direct that Alberta's electricity agencies are to continue implementing the capacity system until it is fully operational in 2021. This proposed bill will stop all that work associated with implementing a capacity market for electricity.

This, Mr. Speaker, will help restore investor certainty in Alberta's electricity system by returning the province to an energy-only market. This is a market system that has been operating in Alberta for more than 20 years. This is a market system that investors know and trust and want to work with. We know this because investors told us so.

Mr. Speaker, I met with stakeholders over the summer seeking their feedback on which market system can best power Alberta's future. Stakeholders, industry, and consumer groups were almost unanimous in their support for an energy-only market. So we asked ourselves: why do we even have legislation to implement a capacity market, that Alberta's electricity stakeholders and consumers didn't want? The sector didn't ask for it. They weren't even consulted until it was time to develop the legislation for it. Well, it was because the previous government policy at the time imposed the change.

Mr. Speaker, a number of economic and policy changes have occurred since that happened in 2016, when the capacity market was first announced. For example, government policy at the time supported a rapid growth in renewable generation, and while our government supports renewable generation, we will not subsidize it. We welcome market-driven renewables that compete with other forms of power production.

Our decision to retain an energy-only market for electricity was a deliberate part of our market-driven approach to renewables, and this decision is already paying off. In just the last two months four companies have invested more than $2.3 billion in electricity projects. These projects include Suncor's cogeneration unit at its oil sands base plant facility, Perimeter Solar and TC Energy's new solar power purchase agreement just south of Calgary – that's a $200 million project – Greengate Power's solar project in Vulcan, and BHE Canada Rattlesnake's wind project in southeastern Alberta, which has the potential to be the largest wind power project in Canada. These projects would not be happening without the investor certainty that returning to the energy-only marketplace provides.

Mr. Speaker, at the time the capacity market was announced, it was also assumed that Alberta would experience a coal cliff caused by retiring coal-fuelled electricity generation and no coal-to-gas conversions. Well, federal regulations now allow coal-to-gas conversions. It was also assumed, back in 2016, that Alberta would see a prolonged period of low wholesale electricity prices, but electricity spot prices have recovered.

Mr. Speaker, Alberta's energy-only market works. It has provided reliable and affordable electricity to Albertans and has attracted investment for more than 20 years. I know that the opposition wants Albertans to think otherwise, with their fearmongering about blackouts and price spikes, but the truth is that Alberta's energy-only market has successfully delivered favourable outcomes for Albertans.

Currently our electricity grid has a reserve margin of over 25 per cent. That's 10 percentage points higher than the target reserve margin recommended by the North American Electric Reliability Corporation. While it is true that price spikes are associated with an energy-only market, they are a necessary and desirable feature as they aid in generator cost recovery and they actually incent new investment, helping to ensure long-term adequacy of supply. Additionally, the energy-only market encourages investment decisions, where investors, not consumers, not taxpayers, bear the risk.

When I spoke to stakeholders and specifically asked them what market system they wanted to invest in, they couldn't have been more clear. They stated loudly and clearly that they want the certainty of an energy-only market. They don't want to gamble with an experiment, an untested capacity market system, that would take a long period of time to get right. Investors understand Alberta's well-established market, which offers them greater certainty regarding its future performance. It offers structural and administrative simplicity and regulatory clarity.

Mr. Speaker, as I previously mentioned, Bill 18 would halt the creation of the capacity market. The proposed act enables amendments to three different pieces of legislation that govern the electricity system in Alberta: the Alberta Utilities Commission Act, the Electric Utilities Act, and the Hydro and Electric Energy Act. The majority of the proposed changes in Bill 18 are repeals. They're housekeeping matters that remove all references to the capacity market. All capacity-market-specific policy objectives are being removed, and authorities enabling the electricity agencies to establish and operate a capacity market are being reversed.

Legislative and regulatory amendments that were enacted in 2018 to enable the creation of a capacity market included a few modernizations that were not directly related to the capacity market. The majority of those relate to how the AESO consults on and makes its rules. These provisions are being retained in the proposed bill. These changes better align Alberta's rule-making processes with best practices in other jurisdictions.

Additionally, there's some cleanup that has been done in other acts. Some of the terminology has been streamlined, and provisions that are no longer relevant have been repealed. Complementary changes will also be made to electricity regulations.

Mr. Speaker, Albertans and investors need certainty in their electricity market, not an experiment. If passed, Bill 18 will end the creation of the capacity market for electricity and return Alberta to the well-established, tried-and-true energy-only market, a market system that will continue to provide a reliable supply of electricity at affordable prices, a market system that investors understand and one in which they have confidence and want to invest and one that provides them with policy certainty. This proposed legislation will restore investor confidence in Alberta's electricity system and, when combined with other recent government initiatives such as reducing red tape and reducing Alberta's corporate tax rate, will ensure that Alberta investors know that Alberta is open for business.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others wishing to join the debate? The hon. Member for Calgary-McCall has the call.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to speak to Bill 18, Electricity Statutes (Capacity Market Termination) Amendment Act, 2019. Let me begin by saying that this is just more of the same: a big $4.5 billion giveaway to big corporations while Albertans pay the price. This move will cost Albertans. This move will cost consumers more on electricity bills and will take us back to rolling blackouts and price spikes. Certainly, this bill will impact many Albertans across this province, in my riding as well, and more concern.

I mentioned my riding because my riding has lower income than most of Calgary; for instance, in the Taradale neighbourhood. The Calgary average individual income is $43,000, and in Taradale the average income is $28,000. A huge difference there. Similarly, in Saddle Ridge the average median income for an individual is $30,000 as compared to Calgary's average of $43,000. In Martindale it's $29,000. In all these neighbourhoods almost 30 per cent of the people spend more than 30 per cent on their shelter needs. Certainly, this bill will result in a rise in their bills and will make life more difficult for Albertans.

The minister in her comments said that the sector didn't ask for it. I think that when we moved towards the capacity market, experts, analysts, and the Alberta Electric System Operator were all on our side. That transition was welcomed by the TransAlta Corporation, Capital Power Corporation, AltaLink, Western Interstate Energy Board, and many others. So saying that nobody was asking for it, nobody was behind it: I don't think that's true. In 2016 AESO was recommending that we move towards the capacity market, and among many reasons the reason was that the capacity market will ensure that Albertans have safe, reliable, sustainable, and affordable electricity. Clearly, our decision was based on advice from experts, on advice from AESO, and we worked with our producers, we worked with the sector to move towards the capacity market.

I think I will talk a little bit about how these two markets work, for the benefit of those who are listening. In an energy-only market I think those who generate electricity bid into the market pool the price that they want to sell the electricity at and the quantity that they can produce, and the system operator dispatches those units and merit orders based on the price until the generation matches the load of needed electricity. We know that the last unit of power that is dispatched, at whatever rate that unit is dispatched, sets the price that will be paid to all those who have bid into that market pool. That is determined on a per-hour basis.

Let's talk about administrative simplicity. Every hour that price will be determined, and that is the reason we see spikes. That is the reason we see fluctuation in our month-to-month electricity bill. It's the same product, but the price is determined every hour, not based on what it cost to generate electricity but based on what it can be sold at with the demand at any given hour.

As opposed to that, in a capacity market the producers are getting for what they are actually producing and delivering in the system. Also, in a capacity market, if needed, they can produce some. I think that Alberta is the only jurisdiction other than Texas, some states in Australia, and New Zealand, who uses this energy-only market. Everybody else has moved to some other form of market. For the most part the reason jurisdictions are moving away from an energy-only market is that the price is not stable. It doesn't give stability. It doesn't provide any stability for consumers, and they are subject to spikes because the price is determined every hour.

There are other things as well. I think that I would like to hear from the minister on those as well. The offer behaviour enforcement guidelines I think exist to ensure that a fair and efficient market exists, but those guidelines don't cover economic withholding. What that is and what that means is that sometimes generation is not offered at the price that it costs them to generate. Rather, they will bid on a sufficiently higher price and hope that they won't be called to run. What that does to the system is that then we see an offer price of $999 per megawatt hour, pretty much the price cap that exists in the market. That also gives rise to spikes in the electricity prices.

Again, that economic withholding has been used to jack up the price and ensure that everybody else will be paid at the same price, but at the end of the day it will be the consumers who will end up paying for that, who will end up paying for those spikes. If I leave blackouts, even those who were in Calgary – we have seen those blackouts, and we have seen them even during the Stampede.

The second thing that I want to talk about is the price cap of a thousand dollars per megawatt hour. That's the cap that you can get right now in the system, in the pool. There are reports, there were discussions that in an energy-only market we will have to remove that cap, and some even suggest that that may go up to even $5,000 and still may not guarantee that the lights will remain on.

So the question I have is: with the cancelling of this transition to a capacity market, will they be removing that cap and leaving Alberta consumers to the market forces and the per-hour price determination and spikes that were the case before this transition and are still the case? I think that if they remove that cap, Albertans may see their bills spike 10-fold.

The third thing. For consumers during the transition period we capped the electricity at 6.8 cents. When the minister announced the termination of the capacity market, she was asked multiple times whether they will keep that cap for Albertans, and they were not sure whether that 6.8-cent cap will go on to make sure that Albertans have some certainty that they will not pay more than this. Again, if that cap is removed, Albertans will end up paying way more in electricity bills than they are paying right now.

Just in her remarks the minister said that we are fearmongering when we talk about spikes and blackouts, but then at the same time she mentioned that it's true that price spikes occur and that it's the function of energy-only markets. It means that we are not fearmongering. Rather, with her own admission, these spikes are the function of energy-only markets. That was the reason that we moved toward capacity markets. That decision was taken on the advice of experts, on the advice of AESO – that report, the 2016 report, is still out there – for the benefit of all Albertans so that they don't have to see spikes in their monthly bills. Most consumers will spend a certain amount of electricity every month. It's the same electricity, same producers, but they pay a different bill every month. These are called price spikes, and that's the function of an energy-only market. That was the reason that we were moving away from this energy-only market. I started by saying that this is more of the same. Some may benefit from moving back to an energy-only market, but we know that Albertans will pay, will be on the hook for their decision to revert to an energy-only market.

They said that they have consulted. They initially announced that they would consult for 90 days, but after 30 days those consultations were closed. The reason? Somehow they got an overwhelming response. We have asked who they consulted. I didn't hear from any constituent in Calgary-McCall that somehow the Minister of Energy or the Ministry of Energy reached out to them to ask if they wanted an energy-only market or a capacity market. I didn't hear from a single person in my riding, even during that time, that they were reached out to by the government. I didn't see those consultations with Albertans.

Had they been consulted and it had been explained that that's what a capacity market would do and that's what we were doing and that now you're reverting to the same old days when they saw the price spikes and rolling brownouts and blackouts, I think they would tell you that they are better off with a capacity market, that would have ensured safe, reliable, sustainable, and affordable electricity for them and some certainty for their energy bills every month. I think this decision, again, is one of those decisions because they said in the campaign that because it was done by the previous government and without any consideration whatsoever for Albertans, for everyday consumers, they are moving back to an energy-only market. At the end of the day that will make life more unaffordable for Albertans by adding to their monthly bills.

As far as the investment goes, I think that in 2018 for our renewable electricity program auctions there were no subsidies offered or anything, but the price at times was as low as 4.5 cents. They attracted the lowest priced electricity in our market. With that, because there was a clear indication that we wanted to move towards small, greener sources of electricity, there were tens of billions in private investment in the renewable sector. With this decision to move back to an energy-only market, I think that we are shutting doors on that investment that was coming through, seeing that the previous government was open to investing in and promoting renewable electricity. Sure, I do recognize that there are challenges with the capacity market in terms of forecasting for a year and longer durations, but those challenges do exist in the energy-only market as well because we are doing that forecasting on an hourly basis. With all that economic withholding and all those things I think prices can go up and have gone up in the past considerably. We still remember price spikes in 2011-2012 in Calgary.

Again, I think we need to know whether that cap of 1,000 megawatt hours will remain or whether that will be removed as well, whether this government will protect consumers by keeping that 6.8-cent cap or not. These are the things that are important. These are the things that will impact everyday Albertans' bills. These are the things that will impact people in my constituency, and I think people need to know these answers. We need to know all these answers as well. At the end of the day we do know that we may not get any answers because this move is more ideological; this move is not based on any consultation or any research. Otherwise, the world is moving away from energy-only markets, and there are only three jurisdictions across the globe who follow this.

At the end I will say that this decision will impact consumers, and this move will move us away from getting more affordable and sustainable electricity through a capacity market. I will not be supporting this legislation.

Ms Issik: I notice that we are short on time, so I'm not going to give the speech that I intended to. However, I will address some of the issues that were just raised by the member across. First of all, Alberta has a good history of 20-plus years in the energy-only market. It has worked very, very well for us. Now, we may be one of few jurisdictions that operate under this system, but I can tell you that it has a good history. Others did not move away from an energy-only system; if they did go to a capacity system, it was usually from an only-contract system, which is very, very costly.

The capacity market relies entirely on crystal ball forecasting. I think that it's important for us to realize that when we take market forces out of play and rely on a crystal ball for demand forecasting, we often get it wrong, and that ends up costing consumers an awful lot more than what you're going to see in an energy-only market. At the end of the day, when we talk about consumers paying the price, I'd like to point out that the previous government, when they took office, put in the carbon levy without consulting Albertans, which set off the PPA crisis, costing us, I think, about $1.8 billion. Who's going to pay that? That will be Albertans.

Then they decided to accelerate the coal-fired generation shutdown, that they now won't even admit to. They want to blame it on Stephen Harper, but they actually accelerated it and caused yet another crisis. That's when the capacity market became a brilliant idea so that they could bring on more renewable energy faster. What do you think? Guess who's going to pay for that? Ratepayers.

At the end of the day, as they tried to make up for the shortage in supply that they created by shutting down coal at an accelerated rate, what did they do? Cap the price. We subsidized it with loans from the government of Alberta. Guess who's paying for that? Who's going to end up paying for it? Ratepayers. I don't think the members opposite should be lecturing anybody on protecting ratepayers because they did more damage to ratepayers than anyone could possibly imagine.

We consulted widely, and it was amazing the amount of agreement that was put forth in terms of moving and keeping the energy-only market. It was almost unanimous. At the end of the day ratepayers who are worried about price spikes will be able, as they are now, to buy into contracts that will protect them from that. There is protection for ratepayers there already.

I'm going to point out, though, that right now we are operating with a 30 per cent surplus margin. We're not going to run out of supply any time soon. What we did by keeping the energy-only market and not moving to a capacity market is that we created certainty for investors, and that has been an absolute boon for the renewables industry. There are more wind producers and solar producers wanting to come here now than there ever were. That green power is going to do amazing things for our economy. It's going to help us diversify our economy. In fact, I predict that renewables will actually bring diversified businesses to Alberta. They're coming here because of the energy-only market.

The market force does work. Government does not have to do everything. Consumers will benefit. Our economy will be diversified, and our grid will be greener than it's ever been. I'm really happy that we've been able to keep the energy-only market. I'm happy that our consultations resulted in the consent from the industry and consumers and distributors and retailers that we required, that we wanted to see. It was there. Consumers will benefit.

The Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt, but the time is now 6 o'clock. As such, debate has concluded for this afternoon, and the House stands adjourned until 7:30 this evening.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

7:30 p.m.

Tuesday, October 22, 2019

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Hon. members, please be seated.

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Electricity Statutes (Capacity Market Termination) Amendment Act, 2019

[Debate adjourned October 22: Ms Issik speaking]

The Speaker: Hon. members, the hon. Member for Calgary-Glenmore has 10 minutes remaining.

Ms Issik: I'm not quite sure where I left off, but I will continue to speak about our electricity system overall, why the capacity market needed to not go ahead and we needed to remain in the energy-only market.

Our electricity generation system under the previous government was fraught with uncertainty, and part of the reason for that is because the previous government broke it many times over, started out with bringing in the carbon tax. Breaking the PPA system cost us $1.8 billion to pay for that plus court costs, millions in court costs, because they didn't want to admit that they had broken the system.

Then the policy was brought in to accelerate coal generation retirement. Now, the opposition constantly wants to bring up that this was a Stephen Harper policy, and somehow they don't want to take any credit at all for accelerating coal retirement. Why is that? Is it because they spent $1.5 billion of taxpayers' money to pay off the coal generators in order to proceed with the acceleration, or is it that they don't want to call to attention the fact that there were hundreds of coal workers who were accelerated out of their jobs?

Then this was going to cause a shortage and bring the price up, so what do we do? The opposition, the government at that point in time, decided that they were going to basically try to cover it up by subsidizing consumers with borrowed money. That's another $800 million.

An invoice to the taxpayers of Alberta of about $5 billion for a system that they broke, that was working reasonably well to begin with: it's no surprise that we're returning to an energy-only market. It's predictable. It provides stability for investors going forward, knowing where their investment dollars are going to land and that they'll produce a profit for them and their shareholders. I know that the NDP government previously didn't trust corporations. Private enterprise couldn't be trusted to produce reliable, affordable energy even though they had done it for over 20 years already.

We need to understand that we are now changing some legislation to clean up some acts in order to put the energy-only market back into play in a responsible way, that's going to allow for increased investment in the electricity generation field, that will allow additional renewable energy without having to go through the REP process, that required RFPs and RFQs and bureaucrats to figure out whether they could even allow people, corporations to bid. At the end of the day, we've probably had more renewable energy proposals come forward since we made this announcement in July than were brought forward – more megas have been put into proposals now than were brought in under the REP, so I'm going to say that the energy-only market is an incredibly good investment attractor. It's also allowing players into the market that previously weren't there. We've got indigenous corporations now that are putting forward proposals for clean energy that didn't exist before.

We have a 30 per cent margin of oversupply right now – 30 per cent – so I'm really kind of curious why anybody would think it would be a good idea in a capacity market to pay producers of energy for energy that they never produce. The capacity market is built on nameplate, which is basically how much a project can actually produce. If they ran at 100 per cent, this is how much they could produce. The reality is that with wind it's going to produce 30, maybe 40 per cent at best of nameplate, yet we were going to pay for the other 60 per cent on top of it all. It doesn't make any sense. It never did. Wind producers have told us time and again that they're absolutely competitive in the energy-only space.

That's why I'm supporting these changes. That's why I support the energy-only market. It worked well for 20 years. I'm not sure why we needed to spend an additional $5 billion to break it, only to realize that it's actually the market we should have been in in the first place.

The member across was speaking earlier and mentioned that one of the big problems with a capacity market is forecasting, sort of brushed it off as if it's not a big problem, that somehow forecasting was just as big a problem in a 24-hour period as it would be in a three- to five-year period. Well, that's just not true. Human beings predicting the size of the economy, the rate of the economy, the need for electricity five years out is not very likely to be very accurate. You're going to be a lot more accurate in a 24-hour period.

It really boils down to this: whether or not you believe that market forces, that free enterprise and the free market are actually capable of supplying demand. We've shown time and again that the market works. The market works. Supply and demand: the laws of supply and demand work. Free enterprise works, and this is all about bringing free enterprise to this province, supporting the free enterprisers in this province. Free enterprise was what this province was built on. At the end of the day, this legislation is cleaning up some language to allow the energy-only market to proceed, to allow free enterprise and the free market to produce energy at an affordable rate, that's reliable. It's worked for 20 years. It's going to continue to work, and it will bring investment to this province because of predictability. It will have us in a very good place to diversify our economy as well as sustain and build prosperity for all Albertans.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available if anyone would like to join in the debate this evening. I see the hon. Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction has risen.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was listening with really bated breath as I was trying to figure out a little bit more about this really difficult understanding of the electricity market. I know that when we were in opposition and the NDP had talked about going into the capacity market, I did as much research as I could, but it was really almost Greek. I know that it's a very complex subject. I was actually very impressed with what the member knows about this industry.

When I was doing the research, I actually recognized that there were three parts to it. There was the retail, the distribution, and the transmission. Back when they actually moved into the system we have right now for the retail side, they didn't actually go into this free market on the transmission and the distribution side. What's interesting about the research I did was that I found that there are only a couple of markets in North America that actually have the system we have right now. Those are Texas and Alberta. Those two jurisdictions have the lowest retail price of electricity in North America, yet the parts that actually didn't move to that kind of a free market, transmission and distribution: we have seen substantial increases in that same period of time. If there was ever an argument about what you should be fixing – I don't think you should have been trying to fix the part that was already working very, very well as we can see the price of retail was down. What we need to really start taking a look at is whether transmission and distribution are actually working effectively for Albertans and for the price of electricity.

I'm very interested to hear from the member if she'd be willing to talk about this experiment that we started 20 years ago with deregulating because I'm actually very interested in the concept of deregulation.

Ms Issik: Well, back in the day, when we were deregulating, the government owned all of the infrastructure, so when we deregulated, the infrastructure was taken over by private enterprise, and they've been responsible for building the transmission and, of course, the distribution system. Transmission is, obviously, taking it from generation to the distribution system, and distribution is to take it to the end-users. I will tell you that at this point there is work to be done on the transmission and distribution side. I know that there are some inequities that rural folks are feeling in terms of the distribution system. I do believe much work is necessary in this field. I think that it affects users' prices, for sure, and that we need to do further work. I would suggest that the hon. Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction might have a great new piece of work there.

The Speaker: Hon. members, there's approximately a minute and a half left in 29(2)(a) if anyone has any additional questions or comments.

Seeing none, the hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview would like to join the debate.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and speak about Bill 18, the Electricity Statutes (Capacity Market Termination) Amendment Act, 2019, as we've heard from previous speakers, this government's legislation to revert to the energy-only market from the move to the capacity market. I just want people to know that it's going to hurt Albertans, and it's going to hurt Albertans in more than one way. It's going to hurt them, actually, in several ways.

I'd just like to identify first of all, number one, that citizens are going to be hurt adversely by the financial cost of this. Some research shows that actually these price spikes, that the minister herself spoke about, that are real in this energy-only system, could be almost 10 times more than what the price has been previously, so this is a significant issue. This is really putting a lot of burden on citizens of our province and creating some hardship. I know very well from sitting in this Chamber for many weeks now that this UCP government cares very much about making sure people have money in their pockets, so I'm a bit confused that this indeed is going to be doing the absolute opposite. I don't quite follow that, but I just absolutely wanted to make sure that people knew that the consumer, the citizen of this province, will be on the hook for those price spikes when they happen, and they do happen in this energy-only market.

Perhaps I shouldn't be so surprised because sometimes what is said and what is done aren't congruent; they're not actually consistent. Certainly, we learned this summer that – you know, another example of not putting money in citizens' pockets is the cap that we put on auto insurance rates. It came off. Many Albertans are experiencing an increase in their auto insurance rates because this UCP government decided that that cap shouldn't be on that. Certainly, I know this personally because I receive many e-mails and phone calls in my constituency office about these things, and people are definitely very concerned about that. Again, this is kind of incongruent with, certainly, the philosophy that I understand the UCP government espouses. Again, I'm a bit confused by it.

But, of course, these are legitimate concerns, certainly, of the voters in my constituency. I know that, unfortunately, even though we do live in a democratic state, there is a sense sometimes in this House that just because we are representatives of constituents in opposition ridings, somehow our voice isn't legitimate. Indeed, it is. Our voice is legitimate, and even if we are not the government, we have the right to speak and represent those people. Certainly, I'm very proud to stand and be the representative for Edmonton-Riverview, and I gladly, proudly will speak up for them because – you know what? – this is a very large province with millions of people who have diverse views, and we have a government and an opposition that have diverse views. That's what's healthy about democracy. It's that we do have political discourses that, hopefully, are robust, that one side doesn't only speak and the other is just quiet or vice versa, that all of us can speak. So I'm very proud to be able to represent those constituents of Edmonton-Riverview.

So besides the financial cost that is borne by the citizens of Alberta because of this change to the energy-only market, there's also an issue of accessibility with this type of market. We know that brownouts and blackouts are more likely to occur in this kind of energy-only market. They're more volatile and less reliable than capacity markets. Certainly, the research has shown that capacity markets are more safe, reliable, sustainable, and affordable. This isn't just, you know, someone's opinion. Experts in the field have talked about this. The Alberta Electric System Operator, AESO, is made up of corporations that actually provide the electricity in our province. They say this. This isn't only voices of our opinion. This is actually a fact and research that's been done.

We know that most markets in North America have moved or are moving to a capacity market, although there are a few jurisdictions where they do have an energy-only market, and one of those is Texas. From their experience we do understand, because they've had that kind of a market for a while, that they have a lot of challenges, and one of them is these brownouts and blackouts so that citizens don't have access to electricity at times or they're told not to use as much electricity because, you know, the grid could go into a brownout or blackout situation, so then no one would have the electricity they need.

Again, you know, the Minister of Energy herself said earlier this afternoon that, yeah, price spikes are part of that. So that means that the citizens of those jurisdictions – the citizens of Texas, the citizens of Alberta – will have to pay for that. The financial burden is there, and this example of Texas shows that that is going on. Citizens are vulnerable. Not only is access to electricity unreliable; it also can be extremely expensive. I know the hon. members in government certainly express deep concern for citizens to have to, you know, take on that burden.

Another area, besides the financial and the accessibility issues with the energy-only market, is that the capacity market was meant to transition an electricity market that would meet the goals of our climate leadership plan, so really moving to more green energy because we know that climate change is real and we are running out of time to take action on climate change. I mean, lately it's been identified as eight years that we really need to do something. Sadly, one of the first things that this UCP government did was get rid of our climate leadership plan, and we're still waiting to see what their plan will be, but it's necessary, and it's important. Of course, the capacity market was a structure that increases the share of renewable energy in the energy mix, so that's good. That's good for the environment. That's creating more green energy for Albertans to use, creating less carbon.

In fact, the shift to the capacity market encourages more capital investment due to the inclusion of renewable energy, and again this flies in the face of what the minister said earlier. She seemed to suggest that they want an energy-only market because what she had heard was that there'd be more commitment to investment. Yet this is information, certainly, from the Alberta Electric System Operator, so these are some important facts. I don't know if the minister has heard them or not, but I think it's important she does. In fact, energy investors show less willingness to invest in energy-only markets due to the risk of that.

Again, these are other concerns that we have, certainly, on this side of the House in terms of reverting to an energy-only market. We see the capacity market as the way to move forward, and it is the way to move forward in most jurisdictions in North America. This work is helping to decarbonize the electricity grid, attract green energy and investment, and provide reasonable prices on electricity. These are key issues, certainly, for citizens of our province, and it is important for us to know all the facts on this issue.

I have a document here that was published by the Alberta Electric System Operator. It talks about why it was important that they recommend to our government – they recommended it; they said that this is the best course of action – to move to a capacity market. This is why they recommended it.

One of the key objectives of any power market is to incent enough generation to meet demand today and in the future.

This capacity market does that.

The AESO recommended that Alberta's electricity market structure needs to transition following research that indicates the existing energy market structure will not ensure the necessary investment in new generation that Alberta requires.

That's something I referenced a moment ago, that having more of a mix and having more renewables in that mix means that investors actually come and want to invest in that market, again in contrast to the information that the minister presented earlier today, which was honestly a bit confusing for me, having been involved in consultations as a minister.

She presented information that everyone was in agreement – everyone. I mean, that seems almost, you know, unrealistic. I can't imagine that everyone is in agreement on any issue. People have diverse opinions and have questions, but she assured this House that everyone agreed. Here I'm standing before you with a published document that isn't in agreement, yet the people that she consulted with all agreed. I just can't really have faith in the system. Certainly, people have dissenting opinions, so for me it seems like it wasn't a clear or robust process because it's just a normal function: ask a question, and you may get many, many different answers. It seems a bit naive to think that there is no one who has a different opinion. I guess I'm standing before you today to say that I have a different opinion. Our caucus has a different opinion.

Certainly, the Alberta Electric System Operator has a different opinion.

The AESO studied a number of structures and found that a capacity market best fit Alberta's characteristics and objectives with the least amount of risk.

Okay. So this all again flies in the face of what we've been presented with previously.

A capacity market ensures continued reliability of the system in a cost effective manner while enabling the transition to a cleaner, lower-carbon electricity system over the coming years.

These are the reasons that AESO recommended to our government at the time to actually go with a capacity market. They really rejected the energy-only market and said that it was so important to go to a capacity market.

They went on and talked further about the key benefits of the capacity market.

A capacity market provides the following combination of benefits which no other single market structure can:

That means that the energy-only market would be one of those structures.

- Ensures reliability as Alberta's electricity system evolves
- Increases stability of prices

Again, that is something that the citizens of Alberta will be very interested in because those price shocks, which are inherent in an energy-only system, will be an issue for consumers and citizens.

- Provides greater revenue certainty for generators

So the people who are providing it actually will have a greater revenue because of all the mix of energy.

- Maintains competitive market forces and drives innovation and cost discipline

Well, that sounds like something about the free market that I think my hon. colleagues in the government would certainly feel very, very proud of. I mean, the AESO, which is made up of industry leaders, has published a document citing the merits of the capacity market as opposed to the energy-only market, and I'd just really urge my colleagues to reflect on some of the things that I've just shared and really look at how some of them are congruent with some of their values as UCP representatives.

Certainly, on this side of the aisle we care that citizens aren't burdened out of pocket by having to pay for these price shocks that come we're not sure when – it is kind of an erratic system – or by having issues with accessibility, like if there are brownouts or blackouts and we have to be very careful about the usage. I mean, that's one of the fundamental things, hopefully, about our electricity system, that we are confident that when we go into a room and turn the lights on, they come on; that the electricity is available for us, for our fridges and our freezers. I mean, we know we could waste so much. Those kind of things are so important to Albertans.

Of course, we care about having a green economy, and this will move us closer to that.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available if anyone would like to ask a brief question or comment.

Seeing none, is there anyone else that would like to join in the debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's always a pleasure to rise here at any time of day or night and speak on behalf of my constituents and with my opposition colleagues here about Bill 18, the Electricity Statutes (Capacity Market Termination) Amendment Act, 2019. That's quite a mouthful. Certainly, I think that my colleagues have made a lot of very good comments on the technical aspects, and hearing what government members have been saying, members like the Member for Calgary-Glenmore, who has just been so factually wrong on the issue, has left me at a bit of a pause. It really has shown that the government hasn't done their homework here. They don't understand the implications of the capacity market versus the energy-only market. They don't understand. Perhaps they needed more time in their briefings. Really, it shows how complex this issue is, that it's something that we need to get right. The government isn't spending the time to do that.

They're rushing through without proper consultation, without proper understanding, without understanding things like how this fails in Texas, without understanding how things like rolling brownouts and blackouts were a reality and will be a reality again here in Alberta, without understanding how the price spikes are going to affect consumers here in Alberta, without understanding all of these issues, Mr. Speaker, and really not even fundamentally understanding. The Member for Calgary-Glenmore spoke quite at length about how the purchasing agreements would be better than in a capacity market. Let me tell you – and some of my colleagues will speak to it later – that she fundamentally did not even understand how that worked. That was something that was very shocking to me.

What I will speak about instead, Mr. Speaker, of the technical aspects, because I know that in many cases Albertans won't have some of the expertise in some of these issues – that's okay; it is a very complex file. I want to talk about values. I want to talk about the values that the government is bringing forward with this bill, the values that they're failing to bring forward with this bill, and how important it is that we don't move forward with this bill. When we look at the bill that they're bringing forward here and how they've framed this, they've framed this as this idea that we have to go back to the good old days. That speaks to the government's planning, and that speaks to the government's depth of understanding. It speaks to how they don't understand or don't care. It has to be one or the other. They either don't understand or they don't care how this is going to impact consumers.

Those are the values we're talking about. We're talking about a party that would give a 4 and a half billion dollar corporate giveaway to the wealthiest corporations and then, on the other side, raise the rates of electricity for every single consumer and reduce the stability of the market for every single consumer. Those are the types of values we're talking about. We're talking about a party, a government that is willing to move towards American-style systems and not accept the great made-in-Canada, made-in-Alberta solutions that we're trying to bring forward here, that doesn't understand that nearly every single jurisdiction in the world except for a few select ones are on a capacity market because it is the one that works. It's the market that works the best and inspires innovation, inspires investment, and does all these great things, Mr. Speaker.

We're talking about values. We're talking about a government whose values are that they're going to give a 4 and a half billion dollar giveaway to wealthy corporations and then, on the other side, make life more expensive for Albertans. Those are the types of values that we're talking about, Mr. Speaker. It's something that's unfortunate, it's something that's reckless, it's something that's short-sighted, but it's what we're seeing from this government.

We're seeing that this government is leaving Albertans to pay the price. We're leaving the average consumer to have a less stable system, a less fair system, a system that is discredited by the experts that operate the Alberta electrical system here, and that's something that's very unfortunate. It's unfortunate that the government and government members would not listen to their own experts on why a capacity market is important.

Again, Mr. Speaker, it's about values, and they don't value that type of input. They don't value any Albertans who don't fall in line and get behind their 4 and a half billion dollar corporate giveaway, their Americanization of the Alberta system. They don't value any of that. The values that they have are to give 4 and a half billion dollars to their wealthiest friends and donors, the wealthiest corporations in this province, multinationals, and then leave in this case the energy-only market, which will then have increases for Alberta families and reduce affordability for Alberta families.

It's something that's really shameful, Mr. Speaker. It's something that's really unfortunate because it speaks to either how this government does not understand or does not care. They either don't understand or they don't care. They have to realize that when they look at the research, when they look at the Texas case study, that my colleague from Edmonton-Riverview spoke about. The price peaks that skyrocket all over the place and the brownouts that happen and all the types of scenarios that are really only possible because of the energy-only market: if they don't understand how fundamental that is to the energy-only market, then they don't understand the energy market at all.

That speaks to their values, Mr. Speaker. It speaks to that they don't actually care about how the energy market works. They care that they can move on and Americanize the system. They want to Americanize the system, and they want to give 4 and a half billion dollars away to the wealthiest corporations. Those are their values, and that's okay. Our values are trying to increase affordability for Albertans, trying to defend Alberta families, and trying to improve the lives of every single Albertan in this province. If the values differ, that's okay. We can look at the evidence, we can look at the facts, we can look at how the energy markets actually work, and we can realize that this government just doesn't care or doesn't understand. Both of those are something that government members should be very concerned about.

It's something where they should realize there is an unacceptable risk to that. They should realize that when they move forward with legislation like this, there is an unacceptable risk. We are making changes that will have impacts for decades to come, Mr. Speaker. We're talking about how this is going to affect investment in Alberta for decades to come, how this is going to affect innovation in Alberta for decades to come, how this is going to affect the growth of things like renewable energy in Alberta for decades to come and indeed the growth of conventional energy.

We know that these corporations that do conventional generation have spoken at length about why a capacity market is better. We know that, Mr. Speaker, because we can look at every other jurisdiction in the entire world except for a select maybe four or five, basically, and all of them have capacity markets. If the government doesn't understand that, let me tell you that four or five is the number of fingers most of you will have on your left hand. That's the reality. What the government doesn't understand or doesn't care about is that they think they've got it better than everybody else. Those are their values. They think that they're smarter than everybody else. That's what they believe. Unfortunately, that's not what the Alberta Electric System Operator believes, that's not what the majority of these corporations believe, and that's not what the majority of the other jurisdictions in the entire world believe.

So maybe either this bill has it wrong, maybe the government's implementation of this bill has it wrong, or maybe how everybody else does it is wrong, Mr. Speaker. I'm not usually a betting man, but I would probably wager that if everybody else is doing it, the capacity market, then maybe it's got something going for it. Maybe it is a bit more stable. Maybe it will improve affordability for consumers. Maybe it will have a more fair system for the average consumer.

But we're talking about values, and we're talking about a government whose values are to give 4 and a half billion dollars away to the wealthiest corporations, who are willing to give money away to their friends and donors, Mr. Speaker, and that's something that is not in my values. I think we should try to improve affordability for Albertans. I think we should try to make a more stable, more fair energy market. I think that we should have a system that encourages innovation.

I think we should have a system that encourages more renewables to come online, Mr. Speaker, that encourages projects like large wind and large solar to be brought here to Alberta, because we can diversify our economy, and we can have more streams of revenue and more jobs and more good jobs here in Alberta. We know that. We saw evidence and we see evidence that capacity markets do that. It creates things like good-paying jobs. Instead, we see a government who gives 4 and a half billion dollars away to wealthy corporations without creating a single new job and then goes and tries to cancel and terminate the capacity market, which is going to cost jobs in the future.

But we're talking about values, and those are the types of values the government wants to bring to the table. Those are the types of values the government wants to bring to this Legislature. And that's their prerogative, Mr. Speaker. It's their prerogative to try to destabilize the market, to try to Americanize the market, to try to make it less fair and less affordable for Albertans. That is the prerogative of the government, but those are not the values of this opposition. This opposition will fight to make sure the economy is more stable. The capacity market would have been more stable, and that's why we brought it in. We will fight to make sure it's more fair for the average consumer. We'll fight to make sure there aren't rolling blackouts and rolling brownouts. We'll fight to make sure there aren't drastic price spikes. We'll fight to make sure that when you go to turn on that light switch, the lights turn on. That's what we're fighting for here in the opposition.

The government maybe doesn't understand why that's so important. The government maybe doesn't understand why this is such a drastic change to the market, and that's okay. It's a very complicated market, Mr. Speaker. It is. The energy market takes a very long time and a lot of research to understand, but they must understand that when we talk about market forces, we talk about how, basically, the whole of all the wagers and thoughts will be able to make a better decision than one, right?

The government likes to talk about not picking winners and losers, and they like to talk about not interfering in the markets and whatnot. Well, if we're talking about that collective knowledge – and essentially what we're trying to boil it down to is collective knowledge – I'll use another sports betting analogy here, Mr. Speaker. They say that most betting systems are pretty good if you can get to what the Vegas odds have. The Vegas odds are basically the amalgamation of all the knowledge of everybody who is betting. That's what it is. Every single other jurisdiction in the world, basically, has bet that the capacity market is better than the energy-only market. Either the government knows something that we don't and they think that they've solved the entire world's energy market problems, or they're wrong.

I'm willing to bet they're wrong. I'm willing to say that it's very likely they are trying to Americanize the system. They're trying to Americanize the system while giving 4 and a half billion dollars away to the wealthiest corporations on one hand, and they don't have the values of trying to defend affordability for electricity markets here in Alberta. They don't have the values of trying to allow us to decide our own price of energy on any given day. They want to let foreign markets decide the prices. And those may be the values of the government. I wouldn't speak for any other member, but they have to understand that this is how the facts lay out, and they either understand that or they don't care about that.

That's okay. I mean, that's why we're here. That's why we're debating it here right now, Mr. Speaker. We're here to help educate the government. We're here to help them understand that this is going to bring us to an unstable system, an unfair system, one that makes life less affordable for Alberta families. They're willing to give 4 and a half billion dollars away to the wealthiest corporations while life becomes less affordable for the average Alberta family. That's something that I think is not good. If members of the government think it's okay to increase the expenses of a family, that is their prerogative, and they should get up and speak to that, on why they think it's okay to make life more expensive.

But that's not what the values of this opposition will be. It's not what we are going to be fighting for. It's not what we believe in. We believe in trying to have a fair system. We believe in a system that works for everybody. We believe in a system that means that when you go home and you try to turn on that air conditioner because it's the middle of July, you know that you're not going to be affected by a rolling brownout.

The reality, Mr. Speaker – you'll remember this, and I believe most of my colleagues remember this – is that just a few years ago we were seeing drastic numbers of rolling blackouts. I remember fondly – I don't know if “fondly” is the right word – that especially back then it was Klondike Days here in Edmonton, K-Days. The rolling blackouts would come, and we'd go into the kitchen and light our candles because the price spikes and the instability of the energy-only market didn't allow us to have electricity that day. We couldn't turn on any of our lights, so we had candles, and we'd sit around and read our books by candlelight like it was the 1800s or something. That's the type of system – I wouldn't speak to how far back the Conservatives are trying to bring us here – that they brought in. It was something that was very concerning for me, to see that they want to go back to the system that has these rolling brownouts. Albertans know that it was a system that didn't work. Albertans remember that it was a system that didn't work.

Mr. Speaker, we're talking about values. We're talking about how we want to have the values of fighting for Albertans, fighting for people's affordability, fighting for families. Instead of doing that, this government has decided that they're going to go out and Americanize the system, give 4 and a half billion dollars away to the wealthiest corporations and their wealthy friends and donors. They're going to bring in reckless and short-sighted changes that are going to make life more expensive. They're going to make the electricity system less stable. They're going to make the electricity system worse overall here in Alberta. I think it's because – they can stand and speak to this – they don't understand the system. I don't think it's because they don't care. That's something that we'll have to see. Really, it's all about our values and whether they believe in making life more affordable.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available if anyone has a brief question or comment. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore has risen. Oh, I'm kidding. Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Nellie will be mortified. Nonetheless, I thank you for that correction. Edmonton-McClung is indeed the glorious west-end constituency that I happen to have the privilege of representing.

Sir, as you may note, what we're having today probably in this House is not a debate of points of order, as you sometimes refer to, but a difference of opinion based on a varying interpretation of the facts, as I've heard you often say in this Legislature. We're looking to the Member for Edmonton-South, whose eloquence always evolves into a number of teaching moments whenever he opines on a subject. I'm wondering if he would care to mention in his upcoming response to my questions what he thinks or who he thinks this former system, the energy-only system that was in place for 20 years, as is so often referred to by members of the government opposite, was working for for 20 years. To the Member for Edmonton-South: for whom? For whom was this system working for 20 years? That, Mr. Speaker, is the question that I think begs to be asked.

Also, another thing that members of the government quite often refer to – and I think it might even be in the prologue to their legislation – is that things have recently changed. Well, they have changed, Mr. Speaker, and I'd like to hear the Member for Edmonton-South's opinion on it as well. They've changed from a system where the former government, PC or whatever rendition it was, now UCP, has gone from a system of asking the people of Alberta simply just to trust us to a system where that's no longer acceptable, a system where, yeah, things have changed.

The government is being challenged by a very strong and determined and competitive and, I would say, very astute opposition, that is embodied in the comments of the Member for Edmonton-South every time he gets up. It is a teachable moment. One of the lessons that I think he teaches is to make sure that we look generationally at not only my generation but also forward to his and to the people who will follow him and determine whether these price spikes and blackouts are, you know, a Halloween phenomenon or if they're something that we're going to be seeing regularly on an ongoing basis once this government seeks its mandate to determine that they will return to an energy-only market.

I'll wait. I've got much more to say, but I'd sure like to hear a bit more from the Member for Edmonton-South.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member. I, for one, certainly have missed evening sittings.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, it's always a pleasure to be here in the late hours of the night with you, actually. It is one of my favourite times that we get to spend together.

Mr. Speaker, I'd like to thank the Member for Edmonton-McClung for some of his comments. I look forward to hearing more of his comments later. I know they're going to be quite insightful.

But I think that, indeed, it is a concern when we talk about for whom an energy-only market is working, and when we talk about who the energy-only market is working for, we can go back to our values. We can talk about what we care about as people, as parliamentarians, as MLAs, as Albertans, Mr. Speaker. We can talk about our values and whether our values are standing up for working Albertans, everyday Albertans, or whether our values are standing up for corporations and giving them a 4 and a half billion dollar handout. I think that will tell you who the energy-only market was working for before, because we can talk about whether we believe in fighting for stability, fighting for fairness, fighting for fair prices, and making sure that when an Albertan goes to turn on their light switch, it works. We can talk about that.

We can also talk about why this government is ignoring the facts, ignoring the research, ignoring the evidence, ignoring the overwhelming consensus internationally, Mr. Speaker. We can talk about their values. We can talk about how they're giving 4 and a half billion dollars away to the wealthiest corporations while Americanizing our energy market right here in Alberta. They're trying to Americanize our systems right here in Alberta, and that's something that I think speaks to the values and speaks to who this market is trying to be working for. It's not for Albertans. It's not for consumers. It's not for ratepayers. I think that's becoming abundantly clear. It's becoming abundantly clear that this government isn't trying to stand up for working people.

The Speaker: Is there anyone else that would like to join in the debate this evening? The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It would be a pleasure to rise and speak directly to Bill 18, the Electricity Statutes (Capacity Market Termination) Amendment Act, 2019. I wish we weren't here at this point, but, yes, indeed some things have changed. We're sitting on this side of the House, the government is on the other. They're reversing something that we thought was high time, actually did change, and that was to bring Alberta to a capacity market for electricity.

The energy-only market is something that the government members correctly point out that we had in place for 20 years, but simply because we were there for 20 years doesn't necessarily mean it was serving us well. As I mentioned, government members suggested that it was working. I question: working for whom? Who was benefiting from the energy-only market? There are lots of questions that can be asked. I think you probably could go to the literature and find varying opinions depending upon what your motivations were when you're talking about the cost benefits of either system.

I do say that I'm enjoying this exchange between the government and the opposition because we are actually having a contest to determine the hearts and minds of Albertans on this issue. We firmly believe on this side of the House that a capacity market better serves the province, better serves the consumers, is a long-run cheaper method for provision of electricity in the province, and is one which also in the long run serves to incent generation capacity for industry as well as for residential consumers in the province. It's a debate that is a healthy one to have in a democracy, and this is the type of respectful debate that we should have more often. I think it is a complex issue and one that Albertans want us to share openly with them so that they can get a better grasp and make up their own minds about what type of electricity market serves them best.

Now, the NDP government that I was a part of the caucus of changed the way that Alberta pays for energy providers so it's more stable and fair, in our view, for the average consumer. That decision was evidence-based from experts on how to protect consumers and modernize our electricity market. Now the UCP wants to reverse this change, letting foreign markets decide the price of energy on any given day; in the words of one member opposite in the government, to have faith in the free enterprise market.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I'm not one who simply wants to have faith that something's going to work. I want to know the evidence. I want to make sure it actually works. Just because something is operating under free market rules doesn't necessarily mean it's in the best interest of the consumers or the citizens of the province. There are rules and regulations around every system that's put into place, and those rules and regulations have results that benefit individuals or parties in different ways, and in our view the capacity market is the type of electrical generation system that most appropriately serves Albertans now and into the long-term future.

I note one thing that I think Albertans can easily grasp, and that happens to be the number of jurisdictions in North America who actually operate under an energy-only market, and they are limited. Now, in North America, if you look at the number of provinces in Canada and the number of states in the United States, there may be some jurisdictions where the market is shared by a few states or other jurisdictions. But assuming, let's say, that that's taken into account and you have perhaps 40 different jurisdictions where the electricity markets are in place, that would mean, when you know that only two have energy-only markets, that the vast, vast majority of those jurisdictions have chosen, using the wisdom of their own capacities to make decisions, to have a capacity market.

That should be telling us something here in this province as Albertans, that when we have a government saying, "It's good for you. Trust us. It's been operating for 20 years. It's been working well," yet almost every other jurisdiction in North America has abandoned the energy-only market in favour of a capacity-only market or in some cases a slightly hybrid market. That should tell us, Mr. Speaker, that there's merit in reconsidering and having a capacity-only market in place in Alberta.

I'm not one who's willing to pledge allegiance to a faith in the free market. I want to make sure that that free market has got rules and regulations that are in place to benefit the jurisdiction and the people in that jurisdiction that it is intended to serve. Always it's the people of this province that will be uppermost in my mind, whether they be in Edmonton-McClung or any other constituency in the province, government or opposition. The long-term benefit for whatever system that we decide to put in place has to be for the individuals in the province, the owners of the resources of this province.

The mindset of the government seems to be that it's the individual corporations, who happen to be contracted to either extract or produce or manufacture in this province the resources that we own as the citizens of this province. They seem to be the ones that they want to aim the benefits of their legislation at whereas, ultimately, if you really look at what we should be doing in this province, it's focusing entirely at the bottom line, and that means: how do the people of this province benefit? What is ultimately going to be in their pocketbook at the end of the day? Certainly, you have to have a functioning economy. You have to have incentives that are going to be attractive to have businesses come and invest in the province, but by no means should we be putting our own citizens in second place to those that might come to exploit the resources versus those that actually own the resources.

Many Albertans, Mr. Speaker, really don't quite have a grasp on what the differences are between an energy-only market and a capacity market, and I found a fairly simple yet very useful couple-of-paragraphs definition that I'll recite to you now and then table at first opportunity. It's from an article that is easily accessible on the Internet from energyrates.ca. It talks simply about the Alberta energy-only market versus the capacity market. It asks the question in one paragraph:

What is an energy-only market?

It goes on to say:

First of all, it would be helpful to know the difference between these electricity markets. According to the Alberta Government . . .

That was the previous Alberta government.

. . . an energy-only market is where generators are paid just for the electricity that they produce, and this price is based upon the fluctuating wholesale price of electricity. In an energy-only market, companies are free to choose the type of generation they produce (for example, wind energy, solar energy, geothermal, etc.) and where their facilities are located.

It goes on to say in the next paragraph:

What is a capacity market?

According to the Pembina Institute, in a capacity market, electricity generators are "paid on both the ability to produce electricity, as well as electricity produced." In other words, unlike an energy-only market, electricity generators are also compensated having generation capacity available at all times.

I think Albertans can hopefully grasp these two explanations with some ease. It plays out pretty clearly that the energy-only market has some inherent risks in it in that it only produces electricity when demand calls for it. Yet that's not an immediate response, and the price hikes are caused by that energy-only demand requirement. Opposition to the capacity market on the government side has said that the capacity market is paying for people to produce standby electricity. Well, in fact, that's absolutely right. But that turns out to be cheaper in the long run, and you don't end up with these volatile price spikes.

In fact, the energy-only market relies upon the volatility, the price spikes that are created by the insufficient supply, by the shortage that's inherent in an energy-only market. They rely upon that volatility to produce an economic return for investors. That ends up being the incentive to reinvest in the energy-only market. The beneficiaries are the owners of the energy producers and the utilities. The ones who get spiked are the consumers. That's the energy-only market. That's one of the things that people in this province should be very aware of and rail against. We don't deserve to be exposed to that type of volatility, to that kind of a price hike as well as the potential brownouts and blackouts that have already occurred in previous times in this province and other jurisdictions which enjoy an energy-only market. Those types of things are things that a province, a jurisdiction, a government should be protecting its consumers, its citizens from rather than exposing them to it and saying: "Hey, the system is working fine. It's working great. It's been doing great things for 20 years." But for whom, Mr. Speaker? For whom, I ask? I think that I've covered the ground when I say once more that the "whom" is not the consumers of this province, not the citizens of this province, not now and not in the future.

An energy-only market will cost people big time, and it won't end up doing anything to incent a better, long-term investment in the electricity market in our province and also will not go anywhere near the lengths at which we need to draw investment in order to upgrade our grid, our infrastructure over the course of the next couple of decades. The whole of North America, in fact most of the world, knowing that we are getting off of fossil fuels and going to a lower carbon footprint, is going to end up having to adjust its electrical distribution infrastructure totally because we're totally insufficient in terms of being able to handle the load, the electrical load that we will be required to handle in all jurisdictions and basically globally as a result of the transition away from fossil fuels to more electrified vehicles and electrical energy that's used to power our world. That system is one that we will depend upon, and in short order we're going to be in trouble if we don't start renewing our grid. That's going to happen as a result of the long-term stability of a capacity market rather than the risky price spikes of an energy-only market.

I'll leave it there for now. There's lots more to say on it. I do encourage a healthy debate, as one would say: a difference of opinion based on varying interpretation of the facts and differing values, one might say as well, as the Member for Edmonton-South alluded to earlier today. I think we should always be asking who a certain system we wish to adopt is actually working for. Who benefits? Follow the money, and in this case, Mr. Speaker, if you do that, then I think you will clearly find that an energy-only market is not the system that should be adopted for this province. A capacity market is far more beneficial to the citizens, ratepayers, and in fact industry in this province.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available if anyone would like to make a brief question or comment.

Seeing none, is there anyone else wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford has risen.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to stand up and include my voice in this discussion of capacity versus energy-only markets. It's nice to be in this House to have a discussion on the merits of two ideologies and how they actually play out in terms of providing services to the citizens of the province of Alberta. Sometimes the debate in this House is not on such substantial factors, and this time it is, so I appreciate that.

I want to take some time at the beginning of my speaking this evening to talk a little bit about some of the things that have been said by previous speakers on the government side of the House and to talk about the fact that they have a tendency to throw out ideas as if they are substantiated fact. In fact, I think they often create false narratives. I just want to take a little bit of time to see if we can pierce the veil on those false narratives a bit to demonstrate that the fact that it comes from the government side of the House doesn't make it truth. In fact, it's quite likely that it needs to be challenged if it comes from that side of the House, and here I am to do that very job. How fortunate.

I noticed that when the minister introduced the bill earlier in the day, she made a comment that she was opposed to the idea of government resourcing and acting in any way to facilitate renewables, and that if they want to enter into the market, they should do so on their own merits. Then, subsequently, the Member for Calgary-Glenmore made the declaration that market forces do work and that we should just get out of the way. She had an opportunity to express her belief around that substantively. But one of the things that I thought was interesting is that in both of these cases the statement made by the member on the government side of the House implied that somehow the desire for members on this side of the House to have government substantially work with industry in order to create the change that we wish to see in the market – that is, the increase of renewable energies – is a violation of free-market principles and therefore is intrinsically wrong and that the outcome of achieving green energy and helping to move our economy along in the direction that the whole world appears to be going in is somehow mistaken.

The implication in saying that is that the very industry which they seek to defend most of the time, which is the oil sands and bitumen, which is a very significant and successful part of our industry in the province of Alberta, had somehow been created through market forces and that those market forces were left alone to do their own good and, as a result, we've achieved some great and wonderful outcome in the end. I think that any quick review of history will tell us that that is not in fact a supportable position. It was not market forces that got us to this place. It was in fact deep government intervention and continuing government intervention that has allowed us to have a strong oil and gas industry in the province of Alberta.

If we can prove that point, then we should also be aware, we should also take the position that the same should be true for other industries that wish to produce energy, and that includes renewable energy. When we seek to move the electricity market to a capacity market, in part the desire is to move us to a more stable, environmentally clean form of energy production, and government intervention is not only necessary but desirable in doing that, just as it was necessary and desirable in creating the oil and gas industry in this province.

Let me just do a small review, just a quick one. You know, as I've said before, I like to go to the research literature and look up a little bit about it. I spent a little bit of time here in the House looking up about this question: did free enterprise build the oil sands and the oil industry in this province? The answer, of course, is going to be in part yes. That's quite true, and it's also true for the renewables.

But it is a false narrative to suggest that somehow they did so without substantive government intervention and support. That continues to this day.

Originally the oil sands were developed by the Great Canadian Oil Sands company, which later became known as Suncor, one of our big and very successful companies in this province. But I want to remind people that even at the beginning of this enterprise Suncor didn't just go out and get started in digging up things in the in situ situations up in the Fort McMurray area. They had to raise some money. One of the things that happened at that time was that 25 per cent of the dollars that went into the development of the original company was from the government of Ontario. That's government money. I'm glad it happened. It's been very successful. I'm sure that the return for the government of Ontario has been positive. But it was the government that actually helped to put up some of the dollars to make that happen.

Subsequently, the federal government, after it was no longer the Great Canadian Oils Sands but rather Suncor, bought a 15 per cent equity investment in Suncor. The Alberta government bought a 10 per cent investment in Suncor, and the Ontario government held a 5 per cent investment in Suncor. Again, three different governments making sure that this corporation, apparently acting in a free-enterprise way, would be successful because they put dollars into it, with of course – I'm going to be told by the other side – an expectation of return. And that's reasonable. I appreciate that. But the same thing could be said about renewables as well, that if we put the dollars in, if we have government intervention and we expect a return, that's a reasonable mechanism of government intervention into the marketplace.

[The Speaker in the chair]

Then in 1974, I want to remind the House, the esteemed Premier Lougheed here in this very House set up the Alberta Oil Sands Technology and Research Authority, which I refer to as AOSTRA, to do the work of making in situ bitumen deposits commercially profitable. It was actually a government agency that looked at the existence of in situ bitumen and developed the strategies and techniques to turn it from a non-profitable enterprise into a profitable enterprise. That was government intervention. That didn't happen because the oil companies did that all on their own. In fact, that organization led to the very successful development of what we all refer to as SAGD, or steam-assisted gravity drainage, which is still in use today with some improvements, of course, some changes aided by the various forms of research and development not only within the industry but within government and within universities that are also paid for by government.

Then the National Task Force on Oil Sands Strategies, a creation of the industry and government, established a new royalty regime. Now, it's very interesting to see what happened with this royalty regime: only 1 per cent of revenues would be charged until capital costs were recovered. So the province of Alberta, the owners of the resource, said: "We are going to let you live free in our land, using our resources, until you have paid your own bills, and it doesn't matter how long you take to pay those bills. We're going to allow you to live rent free here."

Now, I can tell you, if that happened to any other industry, people would be thrilled. Can you imagine saying to the government: "Well, you know what? I'd like to open a restaurant, but until I pay for everything in the restaurant, I don't want to pay any taxes." How would you like it if you were able to say: I'm going to build a house, but until I'm finished building that house, I don't want to pay any civic taxes?

It would be wonderful if we had those kinds of things in terms of the ability to grow, but you have to recognize that that actually is a public service and a public contribution to the oil sands. It isn't getting out of the way, as the government may say. It's actually giving them our resources without expecting an actual return. Can you imagine if I went to Suncor and said: "Excuse me. I'd like to borrow all of your computers and other things that may be useful for us here to do research on this side of the House. But don't worry; when I finish getting full value out of all of those computers, then you can have them back." I mean, it's a ridiculous proposition when you put it that way, but that's exactly what we did with the oil royalties.

We have continuously given away our share of the benefits so that we can ensure the success of the companies. That's not the free market that is spouted on the other side of the House. I certainly wish that other industries could take advantage of such generosity on the part of government.

Then, later, the AOSTRA subsequently transformed into the Alberta Energy Research Institute, and later became Alberta Innovates, which has been, in fact, a source of significant amounts of investment in research and development in the oil industry, all paid for by government. So it isn't the free market that developed all the new technologies. It isn't the free market that has ensured that we have the highly educated by public funds scientists working on projects that are really important to us. It's government that's been doing that.

As a result, subsequent research has been largely financed by public dollars through agencies such as CanmetEnergy, the University of Alberta institute for oil sands innovation, and Emissions Reduction Alberta. All of those things are contributions by the public to the well-being of this particular industry.

Now, you may say that that was worthwhile, because we've certainly got some money back out of it. It's a good investment, you may say, and I'd agree with you. That's not a problem, but it's not the point. The point is that it didn't happen because free enterprise got on their lone horse and rode off into the sunset doing things alone and created all this generous wealth for us. It happened because government was there every step of the way, from the time of Ernest Manning until now, ensuring the success both financially and with supports and with technology enhancements.

Other government investments along the way have included things like the $440 million in December 2017 to help cut emissions. When we say to them, "look, we've got a problem here and we really need to be able to help clean this up," we didn't just say, "well, I think that free enterprise should take care of it." We said, "we're going to contribute." I can assure you that the industry came forward and received that money without throwing it back at us and took it well. Or how about the billion dollars for the partial upgrading facilities?

All of these kinds of things are government investments, not free enterprise. In fact, I want to just say that the International Monetary Fund – not a left-wing think tank, I can assure you – has said in their report that Canada subsidizes the fossil fuel industry to the tune of $60 billion a year. That's $1,650 per Canadian that's invested in and subsidizing the industry. Now, I'm not against it, by the way. I think that's good. I want government to subsidize successful industries because I know the benefits that come out of it. But I just don't want us to pretend that government didn't have a very significant role in developing this, which is exactly what we're talking about in this bill, the role of government to ensure that we have the resources that we need in this province for the people who need them.

Governments also provided a number of breaks to industry to encourage growth, such as the federal government, who often is told to be, in this House, somehow the evil enemy here. The federal government has actually created a number of things, such as the federal government's accelerated depreciation rate for equipment, and, of course, recently has spent $5 billion buying a pipeline.

The Speaker: I always appreciate it when the hon. member ties his comments to the bill, so thank you for doing that. It was a little unclear for a few minutes there.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar has risen on 29(2)(a).

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I listened with great interest to the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford's rundown of the history of government action to promote the oil sands industry here in the province. After hearing that, I'm sure that our socialist overlords are smiling somewhere, knowing that Alberta has a long socialist history of using government intervention to spur industry.

But he started off his comments, Mr. Speaker, by referring to the benefits of structuring an electricity market that would incent the addition of renewable energy. I'm wondering if the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford could expand on his thoughts about the value of creating an electricity market that would incent the addition of renewable energy capacity in the province of Alberta.

The Speaker: I, too, would be happy to hear those comments provided they're related to the bill. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate that. I think that the member has drawn me back closer to the bill, but I felt that it was important that, you know, if the government has a chance to throw these things out there, once they've opened that door, I think we need to be able to go through it to contradict the assertions that they make that clearly are not supported by reality.

But I do take the question from the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar quite well in that I think it is very important that we understand that we in this province are extremely likely to be moving into a world in which renewable energy takes a much larger place in the provision of energy not only within the province of Alberta but across the world. I don't think that's disputed, but, I mean, of course, I always welcome hearing contradictory evidence from other people in the House.

One of the questions we need to ask ourselves, then, is if we do have some insight into the future. Nobody has perfect, but, you know, every business makes projections and does analyses to determine where things are going in the marketplace so that they can be best positioned to take advantage of those conditions and return a profit to their shareholders. Well, the same thing is true with us here in the province of Alberta. We know that around the world we are seeing significant movement to reduce certain types of energy production, such as, for example, coal: India most recently just announcing the closure of dozens of coal plants, subsequently China doing the same thing recently, Germany having done so over the last number of years. We know that it's moving in that direction, so it means that we need to make sure that if that is the market reality that is going to exist in our future, we should be in the best possible place to take advantage of that.

One of the things that we can do is that we can create a market in which renewable energies, various renewable energies, not just wind – I know that the Member for Calgary-Glenmore has said that wind tells us that they are competitive. Thank goodness they are because they've received so much support from both the federal and provincial governments to get to that place where they are successful. We know that we want all of those renewable-type energies to be available for us. One way to do that is to create a place of stability in which they can predictably sell their energies.

When I was working with the Blackfoot Confederacy, for example, one of the things that they were very clear about with me was that they were hoping that when we did our renewable energy proposals, which the Blood Tribe were successful in getting, we would actually give them a guaranteed rate of return on the energy that they produced. What they were saying is, "We are most likely to get international investment in our project if we can be assured, somewhat, that we are going to get a return," which is exactly what a capacity market does in part.

I look forward to hearing the government speak a little bit more about these issues.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Is there anyone else that would like to join in the debate this evening? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise to speak to Bill 18, that's before the House this evening. In my four and a half years of serving the good people of Edmonton-Gold Bar, it's been made clear to me by my constituents that what they're looking for from this government is to provide Alberta with a strong economy, to provide Albertans with a lifestyle that they can afford, and to provide Albertans with meaningful action on climate change.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

In fact, the electricity system and how it operates have significant impacts on all three of those things, and for those reasons, Madam Speaker, I will be opposing Bill 18, the movement to repeal the capacity market in the electricity system. I'm opposing these changes because reverting to the energy-only market will increase prices of electricity for consumers, it will pose serious economic risks to Albertans, and it will significantly reduce the ability of Alberta to reduce emissions from our electricity sector.

Now, in the previous four years, our government made the change to the capacity market based on the independent advice of the Alberta Electric System Operator. It's important, I think, for everybody to understand why we based our advice so heavily on the Electric System Operator, and that's because they are an independent organization that has significant expertise. Well, they're tasked, of course, with running the electricity market, but they are an independent organization. They don't have a stake in the electricity market. We know that their advice is objective and not based on any personal interests that they may have, which puts them in a different category of stakeholders than other stakeholders. Everybody else who's involved with the electricity market has a financial interest in some way. Consumers, of course, want reliable electricity prices and affordable electricity prices. Generators of electricity want to maximize their profit. That's why we put so much weight on the advice of the Electric System Operator, because they were independent.

In their 2016 report they said that the energy-only market was essentially broken. They said that the capacity market was the best way to ensure affordability and predictability in electricity prices for consumers, it was the best way to provide investment certainty for producers, and it was also the best way to restructure the electricity market in Alberta to attract investment into the electricity market. The previous energy-only market was structured so that it actually discouraged investment into that market. When looking at the things that a capacity market provides – stable, reliable prices for consumers, certainty for producers, and the ability to attract investment, where the previous market couldn't do that – this is what people in Harvard Business School, I think, would call a win-win proposition. This provides the best outcome for all of the stakeholders in the electricity market, and that's why we decided to implement the AESO's advice and introduce the capacity market.

Now, I also want to review some of the other changes that we made to the electricity sector while we were in government. We phased out coal-fired power, as you know. More correctly, Madam Speaker, we accelerated the phase-out of coal-fired power. It should be made clear, time and again, that it was the Stephen Harper Conservative government in Ottawa that initially made the decision to phase out coal-fired power in this province. Everyone knows that I am not willing to praise Stephen Harper very much, but he, I think, demonstrated significant foresight in moving Canada's climate change agenda forward with that decision.

Now, what he didn't do was put in place a plan to aid the transition of the people working in that sector to other jobs, so it was up to us to put that plan in place. We worked very diligently with all of the stakeholders to not only achieve the phase-out of coal-fired power but also to achieve a just transition for those coal workers.

As a side note, Madam Speaker, I'm very concerned to hear reports from coal worker representatives in communities around Wabamun that they've heard nothing from this government about the plans that we had put in place to help them transition into new work, particularly considering that this government claims to be in favour of creating and protecting jobs when, in fact, they seem to have scrapped a program that was designed to protect jobs, on top of their record of losing 26,000 jobs over the last couple of months. But that's an aside.

I'm very proud of Alberta's record of phasing out coal-fired power because not only will that reduce our carbon emissions and help us tackle the existential crisis of climate change; it will have immediate positive health impacts on the people of Alberta. Now, Madam Speaker, my partner was born and raised in the city of Red Deer, and she grew up with significant asthma issues, as did many of her friends and neighbours. The reason that many people in Red Deer suffer from asthma and other respiratory conditions is because they are downwind from the coal-fired power plants around Wabamun. To think that 30 years from now the children who are born and raised in Red Deer won't have to suffer from the same kind of asthmatic and respiratory conditions that my partner and her friends and neighbours had to suffer with through their lives brings me a significant amount of joy, to know that we are working so diligently to make so many lives better through that motion.

We also set a goal of 30 per cent renewable energy by 2030. In doing so, Madam Speaker, we tasked the Electric System Operator with setting up a procurement process that would incent low-price bids for providing renewable electricity. It was tremendously successful. In our first round of the renewable electricity procurement we set record low prices for wind energy in North America. In fact, they were so low that at an event that I was at shortly after the announcement, an electrical engineer who had spent his entire life working in renewable energy came up to me and said that he couldn't believe the price that we were able to procure wind energy at. He said that in all his time working in renewable energy, he never saw wind prices that low. We were able to secure those low wind prices because of the way we restructured the energy market and the procurement processes around renewable energy, another electricity-sector change that I'm particularly proud of.

We also capped electricity rates at 6.8 cents per kilowatt hour. Madam Speaker, it will be interesting to see what the government does with that electricity rate cap, because, of course, that electricity rate cap was funded entirely with funds generated from the carbon tax. I had a look at the previous two or three months of my electricity bill. My electricity bill was capped at 6.8 cents per kilowatt hour for the last two or three months, saving me and my family a significant amount of money on my electricity bills thanks to the electricity rate cap. I'm curious to see when the government will make its plans for the electricity rate cap known given that the source of funding for that electricity rate cap has been scrapped. I am interested to see how members opposite's constituents will react when they're forced to pay suddenly higher priced bills if they scrap the electricity rate cap.

I think one of the most popular things we did with respect to electricity, though, was scrapping the pushy sales tactics related to electricity contracts. I think all of us have probably had experience with somebody from Direct Energy or Just Energy or some similar electricity contract provider who physically forced their way into your home and tricked you into signing a contract against your will and without your knowledge of what you were signing on to. We scrapped those. We made those kinds of shady sales tactics illegal in the province of Alberta, and in doing so, I had people literally crossing the street in the constituency of Edmonton-Gold Bar to come up to me and thank me for doing that, Madam Speaker. People were so sick and tired of having these shady salesmen come to their door and try to hoodwink them into signing a contract against their will that they were literally crossing the street to thank me for getting rid of that shady sales tactic. So I'm particularly proud of that as well.

We also structured regulations to support community generation, Madam Speaker. In my home community of Cloverdale the Cloverdale Community League, of course, received some incentives to put solar panels on its community hall. Now, it can only provide enough electricity to power the hall, but if the Cloverdale Community League wanted to expand its solar array to provide electricity through solar power to members of the Cloverdale Community League, they would now have the ability to structure a community power generation group, which was nearly impossible to do before we brought in those kinds of regulations. We made significant positive impacts on the electricity sector in addition to transitioning to the capacity market.

Now, going back to the energy-only market, as I said, will raise prices for consumers. On the day that the minister announced that she would be scrapping the capacity-only market, she sent the Electric System Operator a letter telling them that during her extensive – and I use that word loosely – consultations with stakeholders, she had heard concerns about some aspects of the energy-only market that needed to be changed. One of them was the existing price cap. Right now the maximum amount that we can pay generators of electricity is $1,000 per megawatt hour. That cap was determined to be so low that it discouraged investment into new energy-generating capacity in the province of Alberta. The Electric System Operator has suggested that if we were to keep the electricity-only market, a cap of at least $5,000 a megawatt hour would be required to attract the necessary investment to provide reliable, sustainable electricity, and it may be even more.

Now, the other issue around prices, of course, is not just the existing electricity cap but also the issue of market power. The minister outlined this issue in her letter to the AESO that she sent in July as well. She didn't go into details, but what I assume she was meaning was that the large electricity generators in this province have significant capacity to game the system for their own profit and put consumers at risk, and we know that this has happened in the past. In fact, we all remember that TransAlta was fined more than $50 million in 2015 because they were found to be withholding electricity for the purposes of raising the prices of electricity. Madam Speaker, it's important to note that even though TransAlta was fined for that activity, there are lots of players in the industry who do that, and the current guidelines around the electricity system operation do not actually prohibit economic withholding of electricity into the power pool.

By maintaining the electricity-only market, we will subject consumers to these excessive price spikes that are a feature of the system. By rushing into this scrapping of the capacity market without hearing back from the Electric System Operator what their recommendations are for a price cap and how to deal with market power, we are scrapping a system that is designed to reduce those risks to consumers, to protect them from that price instability, and we are instead tilting the scales again in favour of the electricity energy generators, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, 29(2)(a) is available. Are there any members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Madam Speaker, 29(2)(a)? Yes. Indeed, I know that the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar had plenty more to say, and I certainly wanted to hear him finish his comments, particularly around what the various consequences were of scrapping the current capacity market for a revisionary return to the energy-only market. I think he was just getting wound up on letting us know what risks Albertans face by the government undertaking that decision.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: The Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and I want to thank my hon. colleague for that question. The point that I am trying to make is that not only does scrapping the capacity market put those significant volatility risks onto the backs of consumers, tilting the playing field in favour of electricity generators, but it will also force consumers again into potentially buying these long-term electricity contracts, where they don't know what they're signing on to. That's my primary concern with what's going on here.

Now, it was a stated goal, when the province of Alberta switched from the old, regulated electricity system to the deregulated system, that consumers would move off the regulated rate option and onto long-term contracts. Now, economists have studied these, and it's been shown frequently that the regulated rate option is the more affordable rate option for most consumers and that in only very rare cases will long-term contracts be of financial benefit to consumers.

Madam Speaker, of course, most people don't have the wherewithal to understand fully the terms and conditions of these contracts and, in fact, find out only after the fact what the terms and conditions actually mean for how much they're going to pay for electricity, how they can get out of the contract. They find that they have signed a contract that they don't believe benefits them financially, but they can't get out of it, and by maintaining the electricity-only market, we are creating a strong incentive for electricity providers to continue to try to provide these contracts to the people of Alberta, which will not benefit them except in very rare cases.

Madam Speaker, I can't in good conscience support a bill that will subject the good constituents of Edmonton-Gold Bar to the kinds of pushy sales tactics that we eliminated when we eliminated door-to-door sales of energy contracts, because even though we eliminated the door-to-door sales, the energy salesmen are still out there. You don't have to walk very far down the street, through a mall, or through a big box store to find somebody from one of these electricity companies trying to push a long-time contract onto consumers. I don't think that a market that creates those kinds of incentives to take advantage of unknowing consumers and force them or convince them unknowingly to take on these kinds of contracts, that are not good for them financially to take on – so for that reason, for the protection of the citizens of Edmonton-Gold Bar against these kinds of terrible contracts, I have to vote against this move to scrap the capacity market.

I want to thank the hon. member for his question. I hope I answered it to his satisfaction.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other members wishing to speak to second reading of Bill 18? The hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday.

Mr. Carson: Well, thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It is an honour to rise this evening to speak to Bill 18, the Electricity Statutes (Capacity Market Termination) Amendment Act, 2019. As has been laid out by members on both sides, it is quite a complex file but important to the people of Edmonton-West Henday and all Albertans equally.

Simply put, looking back at the capacity market, which we were moving towards, in this type of market generators are compensated for electricity available to supply as well as the electricity provided to the grid. This is usually administered through institutions and contracts, making prices more stable. What this UCP government is proposing is that we revert to an energy market, which has failed Albertans for so many years, a type of electricity market where generators are only paid for the power that is actually produced, which results in massive swings in electricity bills day to day and hour to hour.

Now, of course, as has been explained quite well by the opposition here this evening and throughout the day, we moved towards this market in response to the climate leadership plan, transitioning off coal power and increasing the share of renewable energy in the energy mix. Beginning in October, AESO revised its forecast for Alberta's renewables, stating that Alberta is now expected to fall short of its renewable targets, mainly based on what this government is putting forward, reverting to the energy market, which is of grave concern to myself and should be very concerning to all members of the public.

Now, looking back at why we made this change, we changed the energy market because we saw that there was not the predictability that Albertans require when it comes to electricity pricing. We saw less stability, we saw less predictability, and we saw higher electricity bills across the province. These reckless and short-sighted changes that are being put forward by this UCP government are going to hurt Albertans. There's no other way to put it. The fact is that moving to a less predictable market is going to hurt them.

We've seen, really, this downloading of services in other pieces of legislation, in conversations that this government has brought forward. We look at the increasing school fees that parents are paying now as a result of this government being unwilling to bring forward a budget, leaving families guessing. We see it in the insurance industry as insurance caps have been lifted, the 5 per cent insurance cap that our NDP government put in. This government has moved forward and said: "You guys can do whatever you want. Hopefully, that works out. We'll let the free market handle it." We're seeing stories every single day rolling in about how that is harming consumers and everyone across this province.

Once again, I mean, our government moved forward on a dental fee schedule because we saw the importance of the government saying: "Look, we understand that your organization or your corporation or your place of business needs to make money. That's your prerogative. But we need to make sure that at the same time we are also protecting the people that require these services."

Now, once again, as we look at this legislation and this UCP government talks about reverting to the energy market, what they're saying is that they want to clean their hands of the responsibility of this. You know, these energy companies are going to come forward in the near future, I imagine, and we will see increased costs to consumers, and the government is going to say that it's not their responsibility to take action. Our government recognized the volatility of the energy-only market. As we were moving to the capacity market, we recognized the volatility, and we moved forward on a cap on electricity fees.

Now, this new UCP government has not offered any kind of opportunity to protect consumers from that volatility, so it's going to hurt Albertans doubly. On one hand, they're saying, "There's going to be less stability, there's going to be less price predictability, and when the inevitable happens and those rates go up, we are also not going to protect you from those costs," which is very concerning to me, really, moving to a market that, at the end of the day, is less transparent to Albertans. Once again, they're cleaning their hands of any responsibility to take action on behalf of Albertans.

Once again, we've seen this before. We've seen this, like I said, on the downloading of responsibilities. When we look at the $4.5 billion giveaway that this government has offered to corporations, well, that is a tax on Albertans. The fact is that you're giving away every Albertan's money, and you are going to download services onto municipalities to try and make up the extra costs. Well, what are those municipalities going to do? They are going to either cut services, as you are going to do as well, or they are going to increase taxes. But that's not this government's problem, because that's a different level of government. We see that this government is quite self-serving in their responsibility and not necessarily caring how municipalities deal with the damage that they are going to do to them.

Now, when we look back at how we got here, the Alberta energy system operator calculated that under the energy-only market the price cap in Alberta would have to be increased to around $5,000 per megawatt hour under the old system but would not be enough even at that $5,000 cap to ensure that Albertans aren't at risk. Once again, that $5,000 per megawatt hour also would not be a high enough cap to attract new investment to the province in the energy industry.

I just also want to point out a few things that have been brought up by my colleagues on this side of the House. The minister said in her initial comments on Bill 18 that in the discussions about moving to an energy-only market, there has been more interest from corporations and from the market since announcing this bill than there was in our initial announcement of moving to the capacity market. Now, I would really urge the minister that, with a comment like that, she should table those conversations that she's been having, that there has actually been more interest in investments in renewable energy and investments in energy overall in the province since announcing this with very little, if any, consultation. I would be very interested to see those conversations, so I encourage the minister to bring that forward.

The minister in her opening remarks earlier today also said that corporations are excited to move back to the system. Really, on that point my question is: why? Why are corporations excited to move back to this system? Going back to my earlier point, the fact is that corporations do business to make money for their shareholders and for their stockholders, so if there is a stampede of corporations saying, "Yes, yes; let's move back to the energy market," why are they saying that? Is it to the benefit of taxpayers? Is it to the benefit of regular Albertans?

As the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar also mentioned, we have seen in recent years that market manipulation under the energy-only system has happened. Now, I want to know how this government is going to hold these organizations accountable if that were to happen again. I really hope that it doesn't, but unfortunately, with this government's mantra of let the market decide, we may very well see that again. What is this government going to do if or when that happens? What accountability will we see from those organizations? Moving to the capacity market eliminated a lot of the concerns under the new system. Now we're going to move back once again to a less stable, a less predictable, and, at the end of the day, a higher costing system for taxpayers.

Now, the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar also raised a good point about how moving to this energy-only market system in conjunction with carbon pricing funds is going to affect generation across our province. When it comes to community generation, I know of many community leagues and community organizations that were interested in getting involved in the capacity market on a smaller scale. I want to know how these changes, once again in conjunction with the removal of funds from the climate leadership plan, are going to negatively, most definitely, affect these communities that want to generate their own electricity and especially so in indigenous communities, where we had already seen under the previous NDP government incredible talks of energy generation because of the funds that our Minister of Indigenous Relations was able to offer these communities under the climate leadership plan. Now, under this new government that money has entirely disappeared.

You know, the fact is that with the federal government that we have now, a price on carbon is going to be forced on us, and we are going to have less flexibility about how that money is spent. Now, I have an idea that this provincial government will let it go into the general coffers to pad their $4.5 billion handout to large corporations and that we will see very little given back to these communities who were promised this funding for community generation, which is very concerning. Once again, Albertans are not only losing on the fact that there's less predictability, that there most definitely will be higher costs, but they also have fewer resources and less ability to actually do something about it in their own communities.

Now, I just want to focus for one moment on some of the validators that came forward during our move to the capacity market, just pointing out that Dawn Farrell, the CEO of TransAlta, said that the move to the capacity market opens up our opportunities to invest both in our existing assets and in new assets as we move forward. The CEO of Capital Power said that a capacity market would not only encourage his company to resume investing in Alberta but probably get interest from larger North American and European producers. So my question to this government is: are you saying that the CEOs of large corporations got it wrong when they're saying that a move to the capacity market is the right thing to do, that it will increase investment in our communities, especially in renewable energy, bringing on more renewable programs throughout our province? Is this UCP government saying that these CEOs got it wrong or that they were lying, that they changed their minds?

Now, looking at another comment, the executive vice-president of PJM interconnection said that investors have shown a growing reluctance to invest in the riskier energy-only market, the market that this government is trying to push us back to, around the world, preferring the price stability and revenue certainty provided by a capacity market structure. Once again, who did this UCP government consult with to come to the conclusion that moving to a less stable, less predictable energy program was actually going to benefit the people of Alberta? Really, this seems to boil down to ideology. The fact is that the government does not want to take responsibility for the higher costs that will be coming to Albertans not only from this change but from the $4.5 billion that they've given away to large corporations on the backs of everyday Albertans and on the backs of municipalities. It's very concerning.

Now, when we look at cases like in Texas, in 2011, 2014, and 2015 they had brownouts, and in 2011 they also had rolling blackouts. Once again, as members on this side of the House have stated quite eloquently, we've seen in our province what the energy-only market has meant for consumers. We saw during the Stampede that power was just cut with no explanation and, really, no action that consumers or that Albertans were able to take against these corporations. Unfortunately, that's what this new UCP government is trying to take us back to, which is very, very concerning for me.

We have many questions for this minister. I would like to know who the minister consulted with to get to this point. Once again, the minister said that there's been more interest in investing in this energy market since announcing reverting to energy-only. I would appreciate it if the minister could table some of those conversations, because I don't necessarily see how that's possible. Maybe she could clarify that.

Once again, why are corporations so excited to move back to this system, and is it really to the benefit of everyday Albertans when it comes to their pocketbooks?

Also, how this is going to work against community generation and renewable generation across our province and how we are going to hold this government accountable for the manipulation that we may see into the future are very concerning.

Now, once again, I would just reiterate that capacity markets are better at ensuring reasonable costs to consumers. We see less price volatility. We see less incentive to hedge prices due to more certainty. We see that capacity markets are market-based structures; hence, they incentivize price competitiveness. This is why so many analysts told us during our consultations on moving away from the energy-only market that moving to the capacity market would reduce overall costs to the system.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any members wishing to speak under 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Calgary-Glenmore.

Ms Issik: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm quite interested in the comments of the member across. I wonder if he has read some of these items from wind power engineers. CanWEA, which is the Canadian Wind Energy Association, applauds Alberta's return to an energy-only market.

The Canadian Wind Energy Association... applauds the decision of... the Government of Alberta to return to an energy-only market. [This] market structure provides a critical revenue stream for wind energy facilities, allocating all revenues collected to generators based on the electricity they produce.

Near the end of the article it says that the structure is particularly important given the strength of Alberta's wind energy resource.

Wind is a resource.

The energy-only market... will continue to deliver significant investment in wind energy, in addition to ongoing landowner and property tax payments.

Perhaps we could talk about that if the member would like to comment on that.

Another piece. Solar Power is the Red-hot Growth Area in Oil-rich Alberta. This was published on October 7, 2019, in the Financial Post.

Solar power is beating expectations in oil and gas rich Alberta, where the renewable energy source is poised to expand dramatically in the coming years as international power companies invest in the province.

I just wonder if, after the comments that the member across has just made, he could maybe comment on some of what's addressed here in these two articles.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday.

Mr. Carson: Well, thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I do appreciate the comments from the member, and I think they are important points to the conversation. Of course I myself raised some quotes from some of our energy companies here in the province. I think it's important to hear a diverse range of proposals and opinions of these energy companies. It's very important.

The fact is that under our climate leadership plan and under our move to the capacity market we were able to procure some of the lowest if not the lowest wind and solar power contracts across Canada, unlike what we saw in Ontario, thankfully, because this NDP government took the responsibility of the energy market and the responsibility to taxpayers as very important, and we took it to heart. That's why we moved forward with moving to the capacity market, and we saw those contracts come in at such a low price. Those contracts would have served Albertans extremely well.

To the member's point, I don't disagree that there are going to be companies out there that do support the move to the energy market, but my question is: why? What does it mean to those corporations? What does it mean to the taxpayer? I appreciate those comments. The fact is that this government, once again, has taken $4.5 billion and given it over to corporations without any accountability.

Now, when we talk about the money that we were taking from the climate leadership plan and investing into indigenous communities, investing into community generation projects, we were able to see the results from that funding going forward. We were able to see if it was being spent well, and we were able to evaluate that funding. Now we look at what this government has done with $4.5 billion given away, and there is no accountability. The fact is that we have seen no return to Albertans in job results. We have seen a loss of jobs month to month, which is very concerning to myself, to my constituents and should be very concerning to all Albertans.

The move to the capacity market meant more stability, more predictability, and lower electricity bills. In the case that there always are going to be times when electricity costs are up, that's why our government took action to cap those electricity fees. Once again, this new UCP government has done nothing of the sort to protect Albertans, and they are doing the exact opposite by reverting to the energy-only market. That is very concerning to me. I appreciate the member's thoughts, and I also appreciate corporations, companies that are willing to come forward and state that they support the energy-only market. The fact is that we can find 10 more that say that they prefer the capacity market and that it actually better protects Albertans from the volatile price spikes and the fact that some days we'll have rolling blackouts and rolling brownouts.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to second reading of Bill 18? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadows.

Mr. Deol: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It is my pleasure to rise in the House and speak to Bill 18, Electricity Statutes (Capacity Market Termination) Amendment Act, 2019, on behalf of my constituents in Edmonton-Meadows. The NDP government brought some changes in for energy in a way that all of Alberta pays for energy providers so that the government could address the stability issues and bring more stability and fairness for the average customer in Alberta. This decision was based on, you know, feedback from industry experts with numerous experiences, the electricity system operators. The move was made to take into consideration that this bill will protect consumers, modernize our electricity market, and ensure that Albertans have safe, reliable, sustainable, and affordable electricity.

Also, another reason to make these changes was that the capacity market would enable the transition to an electricity market that could meet goals set in our climate leadership plan, such as transitioning coal and increasing the share of renewable energy in the energy mix. The capacity market was recommended by the electricity system operators independent of the climate leadership plan and early coal phase-out to ensure long-term reliability.

It was a move also made to basically protect our consumers from the, I would say, price shocks they had been experiencing. It was also acknowledged by many of the government-side members when they were proposing this Bill 18, the changes that they were going to make to the electricity statutes. They accept and admit that some of the disadvantages or weaknesses of the bill would be the price shocks that consumers will have.

So when we are discussing these two paths, the capacity market and the energy market, I'm looking at this, and I will say that they're two different visions. When I'm talking about those two visions, I would just want to reflect on: what are the basic, fundamental differences between those two visions? All I was hearing from the government members in support of this bill was that the words "protection," "consumer protections," "sustainability," and "reliability" were simply replaced by the words "investment attraction." Simply, this is what I have been witnessing since the beginning of the House in May of this year, when the government decided to move forward with their belief to give away $4.5 billion to the corporations in the hope of trickle-down effects, that these investments will create more jobs and bring more revenue for the government. In fact, it has been proven that this is not the case. But it seems like the government is very determined in their ideological moves, and I'm seeing this step as part of their systemic moves, that government wanted to move forward in the same direction that has been proven so far, for the last six months, not to work for the average Albertans at all.

It is obvious on Bill 18 that I see the government members are talking about the investment attraction. On the contrary, the House and the people of Alberta are continuously waiting for the budget from the government of Alberta. The school boards are waiting for their budgets. They're two months into school already, and they still don't know what's going to happen with their budget. The members from both sides of the House, you know, continuously until today keep bringing up their issues of the deteriorating infrastructure of their school buildings, hospitals, roads, bridges, and the government simply does not have answers on this because the government is really wanting to keep moving into what they believe, giving more funding to the big corporations, profit that might go out of the borders and does not really generate anything for Albertans. The government does not have the answer.

Instead of this, debating Bill 18 today, it would have been much better if the government would have, you know, a clear approach, the numbers, how they are going to fund their promises that they made during the election: that they will maintain the funding in health care, that they will not cut and will maintain or increase the funding in education. We are seeing this. The letters have been distributed in a number of different fields that the different services, different sectors are already confirmed that they're going to see cuts to their budgets going forward.

This is the basic difference. I rise in the House to oppose this bill because this bill does not promise, not only in the bill but also up to and until now – so far when all the members on the government side have spoken on the bill, they did not use a single word, even once, on bringing stability and protection to consumers by introducing this bill and supporting this bill. That is very obvious. That is the fundamental role that we as parliamentarians, we as the elected officials have in this House, to serve the public at our best, and this is what this bill is not really showing.

All this is talking about is more control to large corporations. It's talking about the investments that it did already, you know. It brought forward the argument six months ago that the $4.5 billion giveaway to the big corporations will bring thousands of jobs. Then, on the contrary, Alberta has lost 27,000 jobs up to now, and those effects are not really there.

I think this is the time to review your move and start off moving forward. This is the time to sit back and see what has been going on. It is very obvious today, this very day, that the workers at Husky Energy got to the job only to receive layoff letters when, in fact, that energy company has benefited from hundreds of millions of dollars in the name of creating jobs.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. member, please, can we focus on the bill at hand? There has been veering off track throughout this speech, but with the remaining four minutes of your time I trust it will be related to Bill 18.

Mr. Deol: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Coming back to the point, what I'm trying to elaborate on and make the argument through this discussion is this: the role of the government and the members of this House is to serve the public, to protect consumers, to provide stability to Albertans. This bill does not in any way, you know, provide those protections to Albertans at all. The government members and the members during their speeches in support of this bill have failed to demonstrate how, in fact, this bill is going to better serve consumers in Alberta.

The brief of the bill is just based on – I'm just trying to find the word – the lack of supporting facts, how it's going to contribute to our province and how it will be beneficial to Albertans, contrary to the move that the NDP government made to protect the consumer by bringing in transitioning a change to a capacity market.

So, not saying a lot, I would spend some more time to speak on this if I'm given the opportunity. What I wanted to elaborate on this was that, very clearly, this bill does not even have the intent, you know, does not even say that single word, that the intent of this bill is in any way to have a purpose to serve the consumers at large in Alberta but, in fact, the phony belief that this will bring investment in. In fact, it's clear so far, in the past six month that it does not do it. Due to this, on behalf of my constituents of Edmonton-Meadows and fellow Albertans I'm probably, actually, going to oppose this bill, and I do strongly oppose the bill.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, will the hon. Minister of Agriculture and Forestry please sit in his own chair.

Are there any other members wishing to speak under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none – I'll let the minister grab his seat – the hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It's been a very rigorous debate that we've had over the last several hours, and I would certainly like permission from you to adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you very much. Again, this has been a very rigorous debate. I know that everybody watching on television has been intently watching this, watching the back-and-forth action. With that, I can tell you that we're going to just take a break at this particular time, and I would like to adjourn the House until 9 a.m. tomorrow.

Thank you.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 9:47 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

9 a.m.

Wednesday, October 23, 2019

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Prayers

The Deputy Speaker: Good morning, hon. members.

Let us pray. Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and her government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideas but, laying aside all private interests and prejudices, keep in mind their responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all. So may Your kingdom come and Your name be hallowed. Amen.

Please be seated.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders

Electricity Statutes (Capacity Market Termination) Amendment Act, 2019

[Adjourned debate October 22: Mr. Ellis]

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any members wishing to speak to Bill 18 in second reading? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. We're certainly looking forward to hearing the government's rationale on this because I can tell you that when I sat around the table making decisions around the market and how we would be able to ensure a reliable, cost-effective, and sustainable energy system, Alberta was certainly an outlier. Alberta and Texas were the only two systems that had the market model that we had at the time, and as a result we saw massive variations in price, massive variations in supply.

Who paid the price were ordinary consumers, often small businesses and individual households, who, of course, have a harder time hedging the market given that – I know I run my dishwasher when it's full, maybe a few hours after it's full, but the ability for me to be able to game the market and to anticipate my energy usage in a way that others might say, "Well, you can just play the market and make sure that you're using it at different times," doesn't really reflect the needs of ordinary families and ordinary Albertans when it comes to their need for energy.

The decision was made to move to a capacity market based on advice from experts, both within government and third parties, around protecting consumers and modernizing our market so that it would give greater stability, certainty, and reasonable prices for consumers.

Seeing that this is being scrapped makes me wonder: where is the advice coming from? If it's not coming from within the public service, where is it coming from? What are the motives behind the desire to move to a system that, certainly, other jurisdictions across North America have shown, through their policy-making and through their own analysis as well as locally here in Alberta, has too much variability and too much risk for ordinary consumers, that certainly would see the price of energy on any given day see huge fluctuations even for a variety of different types of consumers? We know that the greatest risk is that Albertans will end up paying more for less, that there's going to be less stability, less predictability, and that at the end of the day there will be higher electricity bills that will be passed on to ordinary families.

I remember a time not that long ago – probably a decade-ish ago; in my memory of time not that long ago – where day after day after day electricity bills were being tabled in this House, electricity bills that showed massive variance from year to year in terms of the costs that were coming to local consumers. I know that they were being tabled in this House because grandparents, seniors, and young families were writing in saying: this is what we're dealing with, and you need to make sure the government of the day, then the PC government, is aware of what they're causing in terms of this hardship. At that time the then opposition tabled all of these and pledged to make sure that they brought greater certainty and affordability to Alberta families.

Here we are today seeing the government of today, the UCP government, move swiftly to return to a model that saw these ordinary families in great anxiety and disarray. I certainly hope that we don't end up back to the day when we're tabling the evidence that this failed experiment has yet again failed.

Actually, I probably shouldn't even call it an experiment because what we're going back to is something that was proven to be ineffective. If I was teaching a science fair and a student wanted to redo the same exact experiment that they'd done the year before and the results, we knew, were going to be the same as the year before, I'd say: "You know what? I get that you did this last year and that you had a good time with it and it was fun, and maybe some of your friends thought, 'Wow. That explosion was so exciting, so entertaining. Do that explosion again'." I don't think it would be the responsible thing to say: yeah, let's go ahead and re-engage in something that was an experiment that already failed and had very serious negative impacts for ordinary families.

So I don't even feel right calling it an experiment, because it's not. We know what the outcome is. We know that it leads to probably the same folks who benefited from the $4.5 billion no-jobs corporate handout benefiting from this type of direct attack on ordinary consumers. If $4.5 billion wasn't enough, here's a chance to gouge ordinary families yet again.

I have to say that the transition to the capacity market was something that was done in consultation with generators. Certainly, we worked with experts, as I said, within and outside of government to make sure that the supply would be stable as well as the electricity on the grid more affordable than seeing the variants that we see under a solely market-based model.

Again, I believe it was only Texas and Alberta that had such a model. If it was an effective model, I think one could wonder: why aren't other jurisdictions taking on this model? The answer is: because it wasn't effective, because it did have very serious negative impacts for consumers. In a market model, the type where electricity generators are only paid for the power that is actually produced, the price is based on changing wholesale prices, which can swing very significantly and can be very challenging for consumers as well.

I know that Alberta is relatively small and an isolated market in comparison to other jurisdictions, but again in terms of an energy-only or solely market-based model, Texas was the only area that had this model. There were some hybrid markets. Some might say: okay; well, maybe we'll adapt a hybrid market. There are not a lot. There are some of those in the United States, but again not a lot, and then there are a few jurisdictions, New Zealand and Australia, that have engaged in this. By and large, governments and electricity providers have reached a consensus that this model doesn't work.

Again, it begs the question: why are we rushing towards it when we know that other jurisdictions aren't?

When we look at other policies, one of the first things I always ask for is interjurisdictional comparisons. I think it's important for us to be able to see where we are in relation to the rest of the world. I guess my question to the minister and to anyone who can speak on the government's behalf would be: what was the driver here? What was the evidence? What was the motivator? When I asked for all that, it certainly did not point towards a market-based model. It pointed towards a capacity model. At the least I would have expected that there might be some type of hybrid system, but to go solely to – again, it's not even risk, because we know what the consequences are. We know that the consequences are greater instability and higher prices. What's the motivation? Those are certainly some deep concerns that I have.

In terms of the one model that we did talk about, the one jurisdiction, Texas has experienced a few different models. In Texas they had regulated and unregulated areas that were below the national average, and differences between them have lessened over the years. However, their market is highly volatile, and it's significantly larger than our market as well. Texas experienced brownouts, which I think are very concerning, in 2011, '14, and '15 as well as rolling blackouts in 2011.

I know that when I rely on my power and it's down even briefly, it can cause a lot of uncertainty. I know that the Facebook groups for the neighbourhood that I live in light up with people checking on what's happening, and of course the EPCOR lines light up as well. Asking providers to deal with this kind of uncertainty, I think, would be very detrimental to the people of Alberta.

In recent summers Texas had price spikes for electricity that were very significant. Of course, that's a jurisdiction where they rely a lot on cooling energy, so not being able to have certainty on prices when you're dealing with very high heat is maybe just as problematic or could be as problematic as dealing with peaks when we're in the middle of our winter season and the risks that come with those extreme temperatures as well.

Back to Texas, the price peak they saw on June 25 was $438 per megawatt hour, but on June 26, just one day later, that price variance was $3,000 per megawatt hour. Moving from $438 to $3,000 in one day is highly variable, highly problematic. It's more than 600 per cent above the average of the day before, certainly not giving stability or certainty or affordability to the families of Texas.

I know that government likes to say that they were elected with their mandate because they focused a lot around affordability, one specific issue that they said was about affordability but one specific issue nonetheless. Since they repealed the price on carbon, what we've seen are increases, certainly, to the cost that Albertans will be paying for electricity, increases to insurance, very overt flirtation with increasing postsecondary tuition, already the increases to school fees, including transportation, and now also a very clear, pointed – I can't really say "direction" because they are a separate, distinct order of government, but one that relies heavily on government funding is local governments, municipal governments – almost overt direction in the MacKinnon report to see rates of municipalities go up as well.

These are a number of the different areas. I know that I focused my comments with regard to electricity costs on individual households and individual consumers in that regard, but again some large consumers of electricity include municipalities. So we are very likely cutting the funding that they rely on for MSI and other areas, including policing, and at the same time downloading, through this move to a market model, more electricity costs onto those municipalities as well.

At the end of the day, members on both sides of the House will say that there's one taxpayer, and that is true. Continuing to meddle in the models that we have, models that are proven to be more cost-effective, supportive, sustainable, and reliable, and pushing to greater uncertainty and greater swings and greater opportunities for producers to hedge the market, with consumers being solely on the hook, I think, is unfair and doesn't speak well of where this government might be moving with other decisions down the road, because this one, again, has been studied extensively. This is one that the research across North America and around the world shows that the direction this government is moving in is not something that will be beneficial from a cost-benefit analysis for the people of Alberta.

I know that there is a significant history of government engagement in the electricity market here in Alberta over many, many years, and I imagine that all members of this House had some experiences, while they were door-knocking, with people talking to them about the cost of their power bills and how much is tied to areas on their bill that are aside from their actual consumption. I think there's a lot of concern around how much individuals are paying for grid access and fees that are outside of some of the areas that government had controlled. So if they wanted to tinker with things in the electricity market, I know that my constituents and, I imagine, many of theirs would have really appreciated it if they'd focused on some of those tie-ons that electricity companies often add to individual consumers' bills.

I remember one household where a woman showed me her bill from the month before and her bill from that month. Her consumption was down by about half, but her bill was almost exactly on par with where it was the month prior. Again, that was because of a lot of the other factors on the bill for tying into the grid and building additional infrastructure, things that have been downloaded onto consumers by Conservative government after Conservative government. I know that that constituent would have really appreciated it, if the government wanted to do some tinkering with electricity, if they focused on those areas where seniors on fixed income certainly have articulated to me their sense of being gouged more than once.

AESO began doing its work evaluating the sustainability of the electricity market back in 2013 – there was a Conservative government at that time – and they determined that the model was ineffective and that it wasn't able to provide the type of stability and affordability that they were tasked to examine. AESO recommended implementing the capacity market, and that was independent from the climate leadership plan. Members on the other side of the House may not be aware of that, so I really want to reinforce that. This isn't something that needs to be done because there was a mandate to eliminate the climate leadership plan, because this was done independent of that.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I know that the Member for Edmonton-Glenora has been around as a staffer and so on for many years around this Legislature. I'm wondering if she can talk a little bit more about what she has heard from people over the years around transmission and distribution and other charges, even back in the days immediately following deregulation, those years in the early 2000s, if she can talk a little bit about what she's heard on the doorsteps over the years and what's really bothered people about the deregulation experiment, particularly in those early Klein years but then even during the economic boom, how much it often put families' monthly bills under stress.

Ms Hoffman: Thanks to the member for the question. Yeah, she absolutely hits it. There was certainly a great deal of reluctance to move to a new model, but in those early days it had a chance to prove that it was effective. What happened instead is that it proved that there were greater opportunities for tie-in fees and other types of tariffs that, certainly, a lot of folks on fixed incomes were deeply concerned about their inability, if they really wanted to act like consumers in a market, their inability to be able to dictate how much they were actually paying because of how many of those additional fees were tied in through the new models and the new measures that were being imposed through the deregulation, at that time, experiment. I do have to say that for a market to be effective, in my experience you need to have the ability to control supply and demand, and you need to have an ability for consumers to control some of their own destiny through their consumption. Certainly, we hear members in the UCP talk about the need for energy and electricity, and I agree with that. There is certainly a need, especially in a province with such variable climates but also in a developed society where we all rely on technology in the same ways that we do now, to be able to have reliable, predictable, affordable electricity. By having so many of those additional tie-ins and, essentially, tariffs, it certainly eroded the ability of the market to actually be something that consumers had any ability to control in any way.

Thank you to the member for asking about that. Yeah. I imagine I'll probably be back with a stack of power bills, as will many of my colleagues, in the coming months and years. That certainly doesn't bring me glee. That isn't something that I look forward to. I think that some of the people who voted UCP, many, many, many, many people who voted UCP thought they were doing so because it was going to impact affordability. I know that there was a lot of messaging that: "Don't worry. Once we repeal the climate leadership plan, the cost of everything is going to go down." I have had many people say: you know, haven't felt it, haven't felt it. I worry that not only is this not going to make things better but that this decision is going to make things actually far worse. Thank you to the member for the encouragement to continue down memory lane.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak under Standing Order 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, any other members wishing to speak to second reading of Bill 18?

Mrs. Sawhney: Madam Speaker, I move to close debate on Bill 18.

The Deputy Speaker: Adjourn debate?

Mrs. Sawhney: Adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

9:20 Government Bills and Orders Third Reading

Bill 17

Disclosure to Protect Against Domestic Violence (Clare's Law) Act

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Community and Social Services.

Mrs. Sawhney: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today to move third reading of Bill 17, Disclosure to Protect Against Domestic Violence (Clare's Law) Act.

As many in this House are aware, this act was originally intended to be introduced in the next session. However, in late September we heard the story of Dianne Denovan, and it was yet another account of horrific abuse that could potentially have been prevented. This confirmed that we could not wait any longer, that we needed to move as quickly as possible to put this preventative measure in place.

I'd like to thank the Premier for championing this legislation and accelerating it, and I'd like to thank my government colleagues for their support. I'd also like to extend a very earnest and sincere thank you to my CSS department staff, who worked many hours on this bill with great professionalism, expertise, and competence.

I've spent the last few days thinking about all the ways that I have personally been touched or impacted by stories of domestic violence. As I had mentioned earlier, it is quite likely that almost everybody in this Chamber today knows someone who has been a victim of abuse. As I reflected on the numerous situations that I have come across in my capacity as a volunteer or personally, a common thread became evident, and I'll expand on that in a moment.

But first I'd like to share with you three specific stories. I have a friend that I grew up with. We went to school together. We went to university together. Shortly after graduating, she was introduced to a man, and after a whirlwind courtship she married him. Over the years we heard stories of turmoil in her marriage due to his abusive ways, but ultimately she did find the courage to leave.

Over a phone call many years ago, she recounted to me an episode where, in a fit of inexplicable rage, in the middle of the night her husband grabbed her by the hair, pulled her out of bed and down the stairs, where he continued the assault. Madam Speaker, my friend is a physician. She spent her whole life helping other people, helping people with their medical needs and supporting patients through mental, physical, and emotional clinical care. This is what her life had been reduced to in those years, just trying to get through the night unscathed while experiencing undeserved and irrational shame for being a victim of abuse. I can't express in words how difficult it was for me to hear that story over the phone several years ago, but ultimately I can't even imagine how unbearable those years were for her.

I have another story that I'd like to share with you. About 20 years ago – I was a 20-something then – I was a part of a group of friends who welcomed a young couple from India, a young bride who had left the country of her origin under very difficult circumstances. I was happy for her that she was here in Canada and that she had opportunities to further her education, her career and that ultimately she was with the love of her life. About a month later I received a call from her asking me to come to her apartment. When I arrived – and I still remember this vividly – I couldn't find her anywhere in her apartment. Eventually I found her in her room, in the corner, sitting on the floor. She showed me her scratched and bruised arms, and in her left hand she had a clump of hair that had been pulled out of her scalp.

Madam Speaker, I remember asking myself at that time: how is it possible that a couple that's highly educated, both of them from good families – like, how could this happen to them? At the time I didn't know about the situational complexities and cultural constraints that can keep a victim trapped in an abusive situation. I now know better – and I've said this before – that no one is immune from being a victim of domestic violence. The woman I'm speaking of is fine now. She's moved on, and she's also in a career where she helps others.

My final story is about a young woman I met at a social gathering. I'd never met her before, and shortly after meeting her, for some reason she confided in me. Her story was awful. I vividly remember telling her that it was not normal that her boyfriend called her names, that it was not normal that he checked up on her while she was at work, and it was not normal that he shoved her and threatened her physically. I don't know how she's doing because I never saw her again, and my hope is that she found her way out of that situation.

Madam Speaker, the common thread in all of these stories is that none of these incidents were ever reported, and I've talked about this earlier. This is a reality behind the statistics of domestic violence, that the numbers are understated and that the prevalence of this issue is way more common than we think it is. I do know, however, that in at least one of these situations, had the preventative measure outlined by Bill 17 been available, the victim would have made a different choice in her relationship. These victims also may have made a different choice about reporting this abuse if they knew it could save another woman's life after them.

This is why Bill 17 is so important. It is a preventative tool that can change the trajectory of a person's life and not only that person's life but potentially the trajectories of the lives of children that may be involved and the lives of other family members and friends that may be involved. The social costs of domestic violence are immense in terms of lost potential, lost time, and lost esteem. This bill can have far-reaching impacts that we can't even begin to quantify.

Madam Speaker, this past week I've received support and encouragement from my colleagues in the Legislative Assembly for the intent of Bill 17. We've received excellent feedback, and there's been a high level of interest in the legislation. I've heard overwhelming agreement that this law is needed to protect Albertans from domestic violence.

At this point, I would like to share the highlights of what I've heard in this House from my colleagues. My colleague the MLA for Central Peace-Notley said it best when he said:

When we think about the young lady that is somewhat the namesake of this act, Clare, and when we look at her situation, had she known about her partner's violent past, her murder could have been prevented. It is utterly tragic. Our goal is to prevent similar tragedies here [in our province].

My colleague the MLA for Lethbridge-East stated during second reading:

This is a mechanism that will be used to prevent abusers from hiding behind smoke, mirrors, and lies. No one should be allowed to continue to hurt others without consequence due to the failings of the law to fully expose their repulsive actions. We cannot stand idly by while harm is being done to one of the most vulnerable sectors of our society.

My colleague the MLA for Brooks-Medicine Hat eloquently stated:

Our government recognizes that domestic, sexual, and gender-based violence is a persistent issue in our province and across the country. Some organizations say that there is an epidemic. When there is an epidemic due to illness or disease, governments are quick to act in order to save lives. It only makes sense that the same approach be applied when it comes to domestic violence.

My colleague across the aisle the MLA for Calgary-McCall stated:

We believe that no one – no one – should ever face violence in any shape, form, or manner, and when that happens, I think it's the obligation of the government, it's our obligation as society to make sure that all the supports are available to them so they can rebuild their lives.

This legislation will help us address and curb and eliminate domestic violence. I know there have been many questions about what regulations will be required to implement this act and make it work in the Alberta context. Continuing to work with stakeholders and glean additional feedback in the implementation of this bill is a key and critical component to the next phases of engagement. This phase of consultation will build upon our first round of stakeholder consultations, where themes and ideas were identified, and we'll expand upon those in the second phase.

If passed, we will continue to use the next phase of stakeholder engagement to inform the law's day-to-day implementation. These elements will include things like defining the approach to the application process, decision-making, disclosure of information, definition of terms, protection of privacy, wraparound supports, and more. We're looking forward to continuing to involve stakeholders in our next round of engagement, to build on the plentiful, useful information during the first phase.

My colleague across the aisle the MLA for St. Albert highlighted the importance of ensuring that all stakeholders are invited to the table. I echo that sentiment. We've consulted with members from community organizations such as victim advocate groups, offender advocates, LGBTQ and multicultural organizations, indigenous communities, academics, Alberta police agencies, and the office of the Information and Privacy Commissioner. In the second phase of engagement we will involve a broader range of stakeholders from the community, including those with lived experiences, to inform the law's day-to-day implementation.

I also want to take this opportunity to thank the other jurisdictions who have been so open with us about their experiences in enacting Clare's law. Representatives from the U.K. have provided us with key information, including challenges they faced, to help us begin the process of developing a Clare's law suitable for Alberta. Our colleagues in Saskatchewan paved the way for Clare's law to be introduced in a Canadian context. We have gleaned a lot of insight from others' experiences, and we truly appreciate their openness to providing us with such useful feedback and advice. With this knowledge and through the next phase of consultations I'm extremely confident that we will be able to enact a law suited to the needs of Albertans at risk of domestic violence and to support potential victims to make informed choices.

I would like to conclude by saying that my colleague from Calgary-West said it best: "If we can save even just one life, then it makes [this] legislation worth it." Madam Speaker, I'll go a bit further and say that it is my hope, desire, and intention that this bill will not just save one life but many lives. It's been an honour to introduce and speak to Alberta's version of Clare's law.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm pleased to rise again, on third reading of Bill 17, to indicate my clear support for this bill. I'd like to once again thank the Minister of Community and Social Services for bringing this legislation forward. It has been a great discussion in this House between both sides of the House, and I think we've been clear that we do absolutely support the intent of this legislation. However – and I don't want to actually start with a "however." I do support the intent. We did have a great conversation in the House, and I do credit that it was a conversation, because it was an opportunity where members of the opposition asked some questions, and I was very pleased to see that the Minister of Community and Social Services responded to those questions and provided some comments back. I do appreciate that.

You know, in Committee of the Whole yesterday I spoke to this bill, and I said that I was pleased to rise and speak to it because, although perhaps many of the comments that I made might have already been stated by some of my colleagues, I believe there are many people in this House who have a personal connection to this issue and care a lot about it. That's perhaps why we've seen a lot of people choosing to rise to speak to it. It's not to criticize it or to indicate any opposition to it but, rather, because we are honoured to speak to this issue.

For myself, you know, I spent a significant amount of time in my early years at law school working in a clinic that was dedicated to supporting survivors of violence, domestic violence and sexual violence, and I got to work very directly with a lot of women who were in the process of trying to determine their next steps and trying to rebuild their lives and trying to wrap their heads around how they can go forward. Also, they have children to worry about and housing and their jobs. It was a privilege to work with those women, but I realize that it was just the beginning of a lifetime of work, and my piece was very small.

I do want to indicate again that we do support the bill, but there are some concerns and questions we've raised just with respect to the details, which the minister has assured us will be coming in the regulations. I do feel very confident that she has done some great work working with stakeholders to consult on the development of the act thus far. I do think that the bulk of the work in terms of consultation will be on the regulations because we do see a bill that is – and the minister has acknowledged this – a bit of a shell. It's an outline, enabling legislation. It doesn't have the meat of the details yet, and those details are going to be very significant.

One of the things that I just want to reiterate is that I am very concerned about any sense of false security that this legislation might have for women who receive a report that their abuser does not have a history of a prior criminal conviction for domestic violence related charges. My concern, of course, is because of even the information that the minister has given us, which is that it is significantly underreported. Domestic violence is significantly underreported, and as I mentioned yesterday, not only is it underreported, but it is very challenging to get a conviction in our system. Because of that, the question that arises is: what kind of information will be shared with an applicant or a third-party applicant? For this information, what happens if they get a report that indicates that there is no prior history of criminal conviction? Does that necessarily mean that their partner is safe or is not a risk to them? We know that that's not the case. I am concerned about what the content of that disclosure will be so that we don't give women a false sense of security.

I also referenced an article written by the University of Calgary Faculty of Law. I was pleased to hear the minister express some interest in receiving a copy of this article, which I did send to her yesterday, and I will be tabling it as well in the House today. It is an article from October 18, 2019, and it's by a couple of law professors from the University of Calgary, Jennifer Koshan and Wanda Wiegers. The title of the article is Clare's Law: Unintended Consequences for Domestic Violence Victims. I only pointed those out because we always have to be cautious. Of course, it's a rule of thumb when we're in the House and when we're passing legislation that we're thinking about unintended consequences. One of the concerns that the authors of this article, I believe, rightly raise is the risk that this bill could increase the likelihood that a woman would be blamed for not leaving a violent situation when they have received information about their partner's prior convictions or that they even could have and chose not to access it. We know that that could lead to the potential – and it's a very real potential – that women will be blamed for not leaving a situation when they could have accessed or did get information indicating that their partner had a violent criminal past and chose not to leave.

That could lead to what we know already happens, which is that often in situations of domestic violence we see that, obviously, the woman is struggling to take care of herself and her family, and often what happens is that the arm of the law sort of comes down and the state intervenes, and the children are apprehended. I'm not saying that we want any child left in a violent situation at all, but it doesn't necessarily move us further in terms of dealing with the situation to support that family with resources and supports if the response is simply that we are apprehending children. It doesn't actually move the family further ahead.

So it's a complicated situation. I don't raise these issues to be critical of the intent of the bill, only to highlight that there is a lot more to do. While I very much appreciate this bill being brought forward, I am a little cautious about the minister's optimism with respect to the potential impacts of this bill. I would love to see that it does eliminate domestic violence, but I think we know that that is unlikely to be the case. It's hard for us to say with any certainty what a woman who is in a violent domestic situation would have done had she known the information about her partner's criminal past. We do know that there is a complex set of reasons why women stay in violent situations. Sometimes even knowing that their partner has a conviction would not necessarily mean that that woman would leave that situation.

We hope it would, but of course there are very tangled, complicated psychological reasons why they may not. They may not have anywhere else to go. They may not have family supports. They may have children that they're worried about. So we can't say for certain and we don't have the evidence, because this is fairly new legislation here and in other jurisdictions, to indicate that this would actually lead to more women leaving those violent situations. We hope it would, of course, but we also should not blame those women who choose not to, because it is a very complicated situation.

While I do admire the intent of this bill, my optimism is a little bit more tempered than, I believe, the minister's is. We have no shortage of examples even within our own province. You know, the bill is titled Clare's law. That is how it's known, and it is of course referencing the situation from the U.K., but unfortunately we have so many of our own examples here in Alberta of situations where women are in violent domestic situations and have lost their lives. My colleague the Member for St. Albert mentioned yesterday the situation of Jessica Martel, who was right here in Alberta, who lost her life to a violent abuser. She had been in that relationship for 11 years, and that is a significant period of time. She had two young children. I think it's hard to know. I don't know if in that situation her partner actually had prior criminal convictions, and if she had been made aware, I don't know and we don't know with certainty what would have happened. But I do appreciate that women should have the right to know that information and to seek that information because it is very important.

I want to give a couple of examples, too, of the work that we still need to do around domestic violence. We also know that there are a significant number of domestic violence situations that, unfortunately, have led to violent death where the partners have been married for decades. They are partners that have been together for a very, very, very long time. Again, I don't know if there is a history of criminal conviction on either side, but it's hard to imagine a couple that has been married for 40 years where the woman finds out about a prior conviction from before she was even with her partner, if that would have changed the situation. Again, not to say that this doesn't mean it's not meaningful, but there are many, many domestic violence situations where this would not necessarily be relevant to that situation, so we have to still consider that.

In fact, in Edmonton alone, actually just last year, right around the corner from my children's daycare in a home there was a domestic violence situation where a woman was killed and her partner committed suicide. They had been together for 20 years. You know, we can talk about as well how those kinds of situations are reported in the news. I know there has been a fulsome debate in this province and probably across Canada about naming the victims of domestic violence, but in that situation there were no names, and the police used the code, which we all kind of know, that the woman died of homicide and the man died of noncriminal causes and that there will be no charges laid. We all know what that means. That means that that is a murder-suicide and that there was a domestic violence situation.

Just a year prior to that, in my riding of Edmonton-Whitemud the male partner of a couple that were in their 70s murdered his wife. They'd been married for over 40 years. I just raise this as there are some long-term domestic violence situations that perhaps this bill would not address. Again, there are lots of situations where this would be meaningful and where we hope it would be meaningful, but we need to be conscious that there is still so much more work to do around domestic violence.

To that end, I appreciate the minister's commitment. She has expressed it over and over – and I appreciate it very much – that she will be continuing to consult extensively with stakeholders, going forward, on the regulations. I do hope that this is just the beginning of a more complex strategy to address domestic violence. We know that there need to be resources behind training police services who will be handling those requests for disclosure, supporting those organizations that can support women to either get out of those situations or to survive them, essentially. We need a lot of work on that. While I appreciate the intent of the legislation, so much more is needed.

The other piece of this that I just want to lastly mention about the bill is that if we want women to have access to the rights that are going to be set out in this bill, they need to know they have them. I just want to highlight that it is going to be very important how we educate and how that message is sent out to women who are particularly isolated often, who are racialized, who are poor, who are in remote communities. How are they going to be made aware that this right is available to them and encouraged in a safe way to use it? Again, as we talked about yesterday, it is often at the point where a woman is thinking of leaving a violent domestic situation where things get the most dangerous for her. That is where we see the most likely occurrence of death and extreme injury to women, at the point where they are thinking of leaving. So when we're talking about them receiving this information, it's likely that the woman is along the way of thinking that this might be the point where she might be leaving. That's why she's seeking the information. That is a very critical time. Women need to know that this right is available to them if it's going to be meaningful.

It does raise the risk that partners will also know. Violent partners will also know that their partner has a right to receive this information, which leads to complexities as well.

This is obviously – and I appreciate that the minister acknowledges it – a complicated situation. There are lots of factors that go in, and we can't ignore the need for significant resourcing. I just want to again extend to the minister the offer from the members of the opposition, who've been very clear in our support, and we want to work to make this as meaningful as possible, to continue to work with you where we can. I appreciate the discussion that we've had in this House today around this bill.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill?

An Hon. Member: Section 29(2)(a)?

The Deputy Speaker: There's no 29(2)(a) available. There will be after the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Appreciate the opportunity to speak to this bill. As with everyone on this side of the House, I take pleasure in working with the government to support this bill and bring it forward. I have, you know, expressed concerns in previous stages of the bill to help the government hear some of the problematic areas that may arise as the bill is moved forward, but I don't believe that that should be a reason to stop this bill or other kinds of bills in which good things are happening. I just think that we need to ensure that the complexity of our response matches the complexity of the problem.

In hearing the minister move third reading of this particular bill, I notice she took the time to speak to some, well, frankly, horrific stories of three women that she had had some personal contact with or knowledge of and bring those into the House, which I think has some very clear value. I think, first of all, it honours those women and says that someone was listening to them. She's also honoured them by talking about how they have moved beyond that stage of violence in their life, at least the ones that she happened to know, so I think there's good value in bringing those stories forward. It also, of course, presses upon the listeners to those stories the deep emotional trauma that we're trying to prevent here in moving this kind of bill forward, again, a real value in terms of helping to bridge that experience out beyond the people who experienced it to the rest of Albertans, that we need to support this bill.

Of course, I also think that it's important that it be on the record as the motivation for this bill so that we have a really clear idea of what it is that we are trying to prevent and move forward. So there's lots of value in hearing those stories. I know as someone working as a social worker in the area of family violence for much of my 33-year career, I heard literally thousands of similar kinds of stories. Unfortunately, because my career was often focused on child sexual abuse, they often were coming from six- and seven- and eight-year-olds, so, I mean, another level of horrendousness, I guess, is what we'd say, but equally disconcerting.

One of the things that we found in our practice was that we could get drawn into a slightly erroneous place where we begin to deal with each individual person who comes into the practice as if it's an individual unique story. Of course, you know, in terms of therapeutic intervention it's very important that you do that. You stay present to the person that's in front of you.

But we also have a responsibility beyond that, and that responsibility is to recognize that this isn't a unique story. Unfortunately, the reality in the world is that violence of various natures is common. I mean, you almost hate to say that, but it's a relatively routine reality in our society. I noticed that the minister quoted the MLA for Brooks-Medicine Hat as saying that domestic-based violence is a persistent issue. I'm glad that she was able to draw that out of that member's speech because it really does speak to exactly what it is that I think is important for us to think about as we move this bill forward, and that is that domestic violence is a persistent issue. It is across cultures. It is across regions. It is across socioeconomic status. The reality is that we can't view this as a couple of bad apples. Domestic violence is, in fact, a characteristic of our society just as, you know, many other things even though, thank God, it's not a dominant characteristic. It's not representative of most of us, but it certainly is not one that we can say is one in a million or a one-off occurrence.

Because of that, I begin to get worried that we have this systemic problem, but our responses to the systemic problem are often not systemic as well. What we might say in terms of building structures is that they're not structural, that we don't actually look at not just a single, individual case but rather what's happening across society. How do we structure society in such a way that we can reduce the likelihood of these kinds of things happening in the first place and that we can respond to them effectively and efficiently when they do happen after the fact? Very much in the same way that, you know, we look around a city and realize that people need water in their house, we could go drill a well in everybody's backyard or do it one at a time, when somebody comes to us and says: I need water. But at some point you begin to realize it's a silly response. The city of Edmonton, almost a million people if you include the surrounding area, or the city of Calgary, which has a million people I believe: if you went around and tried to deal with each case individually, to drill a well in their backyard, people would say that, well, that's not a very systemic or structural response to the problem here.

What we do instead is that we build a societal-level response, and that societal – level response in the case of water is that we have a centralized water system with piping paid for by society, not by the individuals but by society, to make sure that water is equally distributed throughout the community, whether or not you happen to live in the tony areas of town or the areas of town that need more attention. Everyone would say: well, that's quite reasonable; that's exactly what we should be doing. We use the same kind of pipes when we build in the rich areas of town as we do in the poor areas of town because it's not about the individual case; it's about having the systemic structural response to the need for water in every house in our society.

That is also true in the area of domestic violence. We need strong, structural interventions that look not just at each individual case as they come forward but rather at what we do as a society to transform the things that we need to transform to ensure that domestic violence is, first of all, of course, prevented and, secondly, dealt with in an efficient and effective manner when it does occur. I guess that's the piece I want to bring to us in our discussion of the third reading of this bill.

I will stand and support this bill. I will vote in favour of it, but I will also remind the minister and the members of the government side of the House that there are a number of systemic problems that need to be addressed. You can't say, "I did something about family violence" by doing something as slim and as narrow as this particular piece, even with the inherent problems, which I addressed last night. It is only one step of many steps you must take because your response to a complex problem must be as complex as the problem itself. In this case we have, you know, a number of issues.

For example, we know that in this case women can find out about whether or not the potential partner had a history of domestic violence, but we know that's not the only kind of violence that's a predictor or a preindicator of domestic violence. For example, we know that people that have been cruel to animals, people that have done other kinds of violent acts in the community, that have conflict with work sites and so on also have indicators of potential for domestic violence, none of which will be recorded on this.

I realize it can't be in this situation, but it reminds us that we're really only taking a very small, slim piece of information and moving it forward, when there's so much more that could be and should be dealt with. I look forward to the government looking at: how do we better inform women about other indicators of potential for violence? Of course, you know from my conversation in the House last night my concerns about creating the list at all. That's an issue.

The second systemic issue is that we often have programs like this or other programs we put in that are intended to reduce domestic violence or to save people's lives, but we have a structural problem with severe underfunding. We put in the program, its intent is good, maybe even its design is good, and we know it may be effective in terms of research evidence, but then if we actually don't put the resources behind those kinds of interventions, they're just as useless as not being there in the first place.

I think it's really important that we not stand up and say, "We've done something about domestic violence," and then not immediately follow it up with, "Here's how we're going to ensure that the dollars and resources that are necessary for the full implementation of this program and the adjunct programs that will support this program are present in our society." That's what I'll be holding the minister to account for, not this bill. This bill I'm supporting. I'll stand up here, but I'm going to ask the same question Thursday afternoon and say, "Did you put money into domestic violence?" because if you didn't put money into it on Thursday, then what do I think about what you were saying to us in the House on Tuesday? I think that's very important that we remember that kind of thing.

We have to remember that the complexity of the problem, especially the complexity of women attempting to leave domestic violence situations, is that there needs to be a variety of other services available to them. We know, for example, that women that have children are more likely to stay because there's fear about what will happen to the children if they do not have an adequate place to go. Does that mean: do we have daycares that are available so that they can have their children cared for while they seek work so that they can provide for themselves because they can no longer depend on the partner who may have been providing for them up until that point? Daycares are extremely important in terms of this type of intervention.

What about women's shelters? Are they widely available? Are they available around the whole province? Are they available on First Nations and Métis communities as well as off? Those kinds of questions. Are they available in rural areas or only in downtown Edmonton, downtown Calgary? Those are the kinds of questions we need to ask. Are they adequately funded? That's very important.

Of course, women leaving a situation of violence also need actual, physical resources such as cash. What kind of transition allowances do we have available for women as they leave domestic violence situations? Are we actually providing supports for them so that they can sustain themselves, or do they return home because they find themselves living on the street with their kids? If we don't have those kinds of resources, we're not really doing what we say we intend to do when we put a bill like this forward.

10:00

A friend of mine, Tim Battle, who worked with Alberta SPCA for many years until his recent retirement, also talked to me about the fact that animals can be one of the reasons why women do not leave violent relationships because they are afraid to leave their animal behind with the violent offender. So what are we doing to ensure that organizations like the SPCA that do extremely good work in our society are receiving the supports that they need in order to facilitate women who are leaving violent relationships but need to make sure that their animals are well taken care of so that when they set themselves up, they can bring their animal back and help their children feel comforted by the reconstruction of their family, at least with their animal? Those kinds of things are very important.

Of course, the big issue is about social isolation; that is, how are we ensuring that we are reaching into those places and communities where people are confined by social structures? Now, I worry about that in terms of reserve communities, for example. They're often far from central areas and, as a result, don't always have access to the information and supports and immediate resources that might be available in a place like Calgary or Edmonton. Also, there are ethnic communities in which that's true. My experience in working with some of the communities is that people have come to me in my MLA office and said: "I am confined to my home. I cannot leave my home without the absolute and complete control of my husband." How are we going to make sure that that woman has the resources necessary, that she's got the information necessary in order to be able to leave this kind of situation? You know, language may be a barrier, availability in the community may be a barrier, and of course the strict structures of a social system within a particular culture or religion or so on may also be a barrier.

All of these things are things that I ask this government and this minister to consider as they move this bill forward. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) is now available. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you to the member for his comments. We were sitting there in awe at just his knowledge and his experience and so many really thoughtful points there. I need to note the point on animals. That's one that I hadn't even thought of, but you're exactly right. This is where he pointed to the fact that without the support, without looking at the systemic issues, we do worry about the efficacy of this bill.

As I talked about yesterday, we know – you know, the minister has been quite clear, and I appreciate that – that this is very much enabling legislation. One of the things that I really want to just hammer home again is the importance of victims knowing about what supports are available. The Member for Edmonton-Rutherford talked about some of those supports, and one of the ones I want to mention and have him speak a little bit more about as well is housing supports.

I know I represent an area, Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood, where we currently have a lot, the bulk I would say, of affordable housing in Edmonton in our riding, but I hear every day, my staff hear every day the need for safe, affordable housing. That's probably the most common concern I actually get, folks who are unable to access safe and affordable housing in our neighbourhoods. I worry about, you know, these potential victims, especially those coming from rural and remote communities, how they're going to be able to access supports like housing. As the member noted, without funding in place, what's going to happen? We can point to examples like Saskatchewan, where Clare's law was implemented earlier this year. There are some folks who've shared their own stories saying that they were in remote parts of that province and unable to access the supports, including housing, that they needed.

This law clearly needs to be part of a suite of measures, and I really appreciate the member's point around that we need to see those measures in place on Thursday. I would just like to ask the member to talk a little bit more about that obvious concern we have about victims lacking proper resources when they are wanting to safely leave dangerous relationships and how else this government can ensure that they feel fully supported when they do take that step.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to talk about the resources that are necessary. I think that the underlying theme here is that we need to do multiple things at once if we're really going to address a problem. The nervousness you hear on this side of the House – we support the bill; I'll be really clear about that – is that the complex response that is required is not going to be following this particular initiative, and that becomes dangerous. It becomes dangerous because we start to believe we have done something when we haven't. That leads to complacency and leads to an exacerbation of the problem. Not only do we have the problem in its first right, but we have the problem being ignored secondarily because we say: "Well, we already did something about that. We can move on." That is of deep concern to us here.

We know that these things are not easily resolved. There's not a jurisdiction in the world that can effectively tell us that they have ultimately resolved the problem of domestic violence. That tells us there is no quick, one-off solution, or else governments all around the world would have done it. It is very expensive to allow that to happen. That's not the reason why I think we should do it, of course, but I realize that governments worry about those things.

I think, then, we have to ensure that if we are going to actually resolve this problem as best as we possibly can, we tackle it as a real problem. We know that there are times in our society when we do tackle problems in very focused and complex ways, and we have resolved some incredible problems as we move forward in our society. I mean, when I just look at the accomplishments we've had with the development of the social democracies in the western world with the universal health care, with the universal education, with the universal water and food production and so on . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Any hon. members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure for me to stand today and speak on Bill 17, Clare's law. I've listened intently to a lot of the speeches as we discuss this bill, and I'm really grateful for the opportunity to actually have this conversation. I'm grateful to the minister for bringing this forward and seeing the need here, and I'm grateful to the members of the opposition for their input. Certainly, a lot of great points were made by the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford about that domestic violence isn't isolated to one socioeconomic group or one part of the world. I also appreciate similar comments from the Member for Edmonton-Whitemud. I can say her last name properly, too.

In particular, you know, there are two ways I can come at this, and I want to come at this. One is the emotional side and strictly says – I know that domestic violence isn't isolated to men or women. It's certainly both. But as a man what kind of sad sack or sorry individual would ever feel comfortable looking at themselves in the mirror after hitting, laying a hand on another individual, instigating any kind of violence, or even intimidating someone else? I mean, it just really goes to show what kind of a weak person they would be. Speaking more on the other side, it would be more the merits. I have witnessed domestic violence on two occasions in my life. When I saw it both times, it was like I was watching the movie Jaws before the shark attacks. That music just builds up in the back of your mind before you have to step in and do something immediately.

What I like the most about this bill is the preventative measures that it takes. You know, I was in Costco the other day, and I saw that you could buy 48 Duracell batteries for 27 bucks, and I'm thinking: that's a lot of money for some batteries. But it's a lot of batteries. You talk to any firefighter, and they'll tell you that the cost of a home is significantly more than the cost to replace smoke detector batteries. These preventative measures can cost you significantly less – significantly less – if you take them early on.

I think it's important that we are updating our laws in this province to meet the needs of those who live here, especially those getting involved in relationships. If you look at the evolving way that people are meeting each other online, what kind of response would you give if you saw a picture of someone online in one of these dating apps and above the picture it said: 2017, convicted of domestic abuse. Would you even be interested in talking with that person? The answer is no. There is no way to fully eradicate domestic violence, I don't think, with this law, but if anything, any measures that we can take to reduce it even by one case I'm in full support of.

Anecdotally, we hear some of the excuses as to why this happens and why people stay in these relationships that are, in fact, abusive. Again, I have never personally in my life been involved or been the subject of any domestic abuse, so I can't put myself in that situation, but I've heard stories of people saying things like, you know: "You don't know him like I know him" or "It was my fault" or "I instigated it. It was my problem. I made him mad. I made her mad." I often ask myself: how far down the relationship track do you have to get before that kind of an excuse that you tell yourself is acceptable? It's not. We have to find a way to help people get out of the relationship or avoid it altogether before it gets to that point.

As we talked about earlier, from the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford, these issues are not isolated to certain groups. You know, if you look at one of the most famous cases of domestic abuse, Ike and Tina Turner, over the course of 16 years of marriage Ike Turner raped, humiliated, abused, was unfaithful to Tina, and this is one of the most famous cases of domestic abuse that we know of. Sixteen years, Madam Speaker, this went on, this cycle of abuse. We have to find a way to end the cycle. It's also not isolated to men. Recently I was reading a news article just the other day, and I saw that in 2017, in May, there was a woman named Kandee Collind, who stabbed her husband to death in front of her children in the driveway of their home after her ex-husband Scott Weyland was awarded custody of their children. It just speaks volumes that this is not isolated to men only, that women can perpetrate domestic abuse as well. As legislators we have a responsibility to do something about it.

Now, I mentioned earlier that I have witnessed domestic disputes in two cases. One time when I was living in Russia, I came out of the grocery store, and across the street I saw a guy who at the time was clutching and grabbing on his partner's jacket. He was yelling at her, having a big argument in the middle of the sidewalk, so I crossed the street to get closer. What shocked me, as I was getting closer, was that everybody was just walking by. I was shocked. They were just walking by. As I got closer, it began to escalate to the point where he was going to raise a hand to her. By that point I got close enough to step in and break it up. I was really angry at this point. I told the one guy to take a hike, and he reluctantly did so. He walked away. But what was the most discouraging and sad moment of that encounter was that I said, "Are you okay?" She said, "No." I said, "Do you have anywhere to go?" She said, "No." She had nowhere to go. Madam Speaker, it just broke my heart because I could only do so much to break up this altercation in the middle of the sidewalk and send this guy somewhere, but I suspect that they live together, or if they don't, they know where each other lives. If she has nowhere to go away from him, what is there to do? Sometimes you can't get there in time to just break it up.

The second time that I saw a domestic dispute, I was actually coming out of a computer store in Calgary. As my wife and I were driving in the car, we saw across the street – there was a median in the way, so we couldn't go directly across – this man was following this woman and yelling at her and having an argument. I wanted to make sure they were okay, so we went around and got into the parking lot. By the time I got into the parking lot across the street, he was again clutching and grabbing her. I was probably a good hundred yards away from this because I couldn't drive my car on the grass. I get out of my car to start walking towards it, and he starts pushing her and hitting her. I just start full speed going. I start running at full speed, and by the time I got there, he's about to hit her again. I just laid in to this guy, my shoulder, put him on the ground because I wasn't able to step in. Like, this was a full on fight at this point.

So we get this guy on the ground – I wasn't going to try a wrap-him-up tackle, but I laid him out – and as soon as I did that, the woman just took off running. I was glad I was able to break it up. But, again, the discouraging part of the story was that one of their friends came over because he saw what happened. I said, "Do you know these two?" He said, "Yeah." I said: "What's going on? Call the police." He's like: "No. I'm not going to call the police." I said, "Why?" He said, "Because this happens every other day. It happens every other day with this couple." I couldn't find out if there was a place that I could help this woman get to because she had run away. By the time the police got there to deal with this, you know, I had learned a little more: that it happens all the time, that they're a couple, and that they're together. That's it. That was the story.

I thought: would this woman, in both instances, ever want to be involved with that man if right at the moment they met, there was, like, a thought bubble above the guy's head that said, "I'm a domestic abuser"? Would they be in that kind of relationship? I think the answer is no, but how do you find that out? I think that this bill is a great measure to get to that point where at least there is some means, some mechanism where those entering into a domestic partnership can get information about their partner's history. I can tell you, Madam Speaker, that if I knew or if anyone else knew the first time they met someone at a restaurant or a bar or on the street and said hi and shook hands or what have you, maybe at the beginning of a courtship, if right at that moment they knew that the person they're talking to would abuse them in three years, they would walk away. At least, I'd hope they'd walk away.

This is a preventative measure, and that's why I love this bill so much. It will help people avoid domestic abuse cases long before they ever happen. It will also avoid the need for people like me to step in. I'm happy to step in any time I ever see this kind of thing happening, but what if that altercation didn't have to happen? What if those two women that I mentioned earlier didn't need intervention because they had the information at hand at the beginning of the relationship to walk away?

Sometimes it's too late to walk away, as in the case of Scott Weyland. Scott Weyland died in his own driveway after being stabbed by his ex-wife. He didn't have the chance to walk away. Maybe she didn't have a prior case or a previous history of violence, but if we can prevent even one domestic assault, if we can prevent even one death, if we can prevent even one case of intimidation, I think that we've seen some level of success.

With some of the concerns from the members opposite – I'll let the minister respond to those – I wanted to stand up and personally voice my support for this bill because I think it's an important measure to support those entering into domestic partnerships, and I think it's a great way for us to show that we are taking concrete steps towards reducing the number of cases of domestic violence in this province. This is a promise we made, it's a promise that we are keeping, and I'm honoured to be part of this government that is in fact doing that.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, anyone wishing to speak under Standing Order 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to be able to rise in support of Bill 17, the Disclosure to Protect Against Domestic Violence Act, or what is also sometimes known as Clare's law. As we know, this language was created after a young woman in the United Kingdom was killed by her ex-boyfriend, who had a history of domestic violence. You know, as I've noticed and as the last few speakers have pointed out, this is something that's been ongoing for some time. We all have stories that we're able to connect with. I guess the big thing I want to be able to communicate is that it can happen in absolutely any community. It doesn't matter where it is. Edmonton-Decore has also seen, unfortunately, its fair share as well. Just a mere couple or three blocks from my home a young woman was shot and killed by her spouse through domestic violence.

I think one of the things that legislators can inadvertently get caught up in is that we bring forth legislation, and sometimes I think we might go: "Well, look what we've laid out. We've put in place the ability to prevent some of these things." Then we kind of just maybe step back and say, "Well, we've done our job" and we wash our hands. It's not enough. You know, we have to be able to follow up on that. Certainly, I'm very pleased that the minister has continued those steps forward.

I think the conversation around domestic violence isn't big enough. It needs to grow. It needs to be something that we're not afraid to talk about. I think we look at some of the steps that were made in the 29th Legislature, where former MLA Deborah Drever brought in private member's Bill 204, which allowed victims to be able to break their leases to be able to flee domestic violence situations. I know the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford had made reference around animals being one of the reasons why a spouse won't leave, because they're afraid that their fur baby will then bear the brunt of that violence. I remember some very good conversations with former MLA Richard Starke, who is a veterinarian, around this subject. It was definitely something that I had never really even considered before that moment. We've seen things like increasing funding for women's shelters by $15 million, which has supported more than 17,000 women and 14,000 children in 2017 alone.

Some of these statistics are staggering, Madam Speaker. From 2008 to 2017 there were 166 deaths in Alberta due to domestic and family violence according to the Family Violence Death Review Committee. I'm very confidently going to go out on a bit of a limb here: I think that that's only what we know about. When we think about missing and murdered indigenous women, how many of them have been victims of family violence through their partners and we don't know about it? So I think this statistic is a little bit low. You know, across Canada half of all young women and girls who are victims of domestic violence homicide were murdered by someone with a prior conviction. I don't think this conversation is big enough, but certainly Bill 17 is a really good way to get this conversation going.

We look at where Clare's law originated, in the U.K. It was introduced in 2014, and it's just a policy still at this moment. It's not law. But a new bill was introduced in January of this year with 120 commitments, including legalizing the law. Unfortunately, on October 2 it was held over. One of the other things I want to point out about that is that the national average for England and Wales had 3,612 requests granted from 8,490 requests for information. They also know that the right-to-know aspect is underutilized, and police are still working to improve knowledge and understanding within their own service to increase the use provided for early intervention. According to Sandra Walklate the jury is still out on whether the law that allows police to disclose a personal violent history actually prevents the violence.

One of the things that I guess I also want to know – it's great that we're going to pass this, and I'm in full support of this because every single step that we take forward is something. I'd rather have something than nothing. But I think the members for Edmonton-Rutherford and Edmonton-Whitemud were very, very clear that it's not enough to just stop there. We have to keep going. We have to provide those background supports and the education so that women know about all the supports that are available to them. You know, I think the Member for Cardston-Siksika had talked about: she didn't have anywhere to go. We have to change that. They have to know where to go, but that means backing up the supports in the background to be able to provide that education, to be able to provide the training for police to be able to be part of that equation, to make sure that they know where to go, where they have those supports.

Again, I too am hoping that in the budget tomorrow we will see those kinds of commitments to provide those types of supports to those individuals that are fleeing violence ahead of time, including things like maybe supports to the SPCA or animal groups so that they can take that family pet, put them somewhere safe as well. My gosh. I mean, to stay around because you fear for the family pet: a little thing like that should not hold somebody back. I think that as we move forward, I'm hoping that those supports will be in place in the budget to be able to move this conversation forward, continue that education, make sure that women know there is a lot around, things to help them.

I mean, being able to break a lease: I've still seen a couple of cases come into my office since that was brought in where they actually didn't know, so we need to do better on the education front. We need to make sure that we have the proper police training. We need to make sure that they have the support staff in place to be able to provide those types of services so that when somebody says, "I need to go," they can. I know someone very, very close to me who ended up finding out that their partner was a little bit controlling. Thankfully, she had the ability to grab the cat and say: see you later. She didn't even hesitate. But, again, we don't always see that, so let's provide those supports. Let's make sure that we have everything in place.

I'm happy to support this going forward, but, please, Minister, make sure that, you know, we have that background support, that we have the funding in place so that we can make sure that everything provides women a safe place to go.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any members wishing to speak under Standing Order 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaidis: Well, good morning, and thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm very pleased to have the opportunity to rise today to speak in support of Bill 17. As we know and as we've heard, domestic violence affects us all, and there are no simple solutions to this complex problem. As we've heard, indeed, from some of the examples already, it can happen to anyone of any age, of any culture, of any socioeconomic status or background or gender. Domestic violence is not just a social issue, a criminal issue, or a public health issue, but it's also a human rights issue. As well, it's important to know that the financial consequences of domestic violence include heavy demands on our health care system, education, social services, the justice system and law enforcement. But, most important of all, the human costs and impacts are absolutely immeasurable.

I want to talk a little bit more about domestic violence and, of course, why it's so important, but I want to talk a little bit more about what we mean when we talk about domestic violence. What we call and record as domestic violence is at the heart of the question about how it is made visible, how it is understood and treated not only by individual service providers but also by society as a whole.

The Calgary Domestic Violence Collective defines domestic violence as the following:

[The] attempt, act or intent of someone within a relationship where the relationship is characterized by intimacy, dependency or trust, to intimidate either by threat or by the use of physical force on another person or property. The purpose of the abuse is to control... [and to] exploit through neglect, intimidation, inducement of fear or by inflicting pain. Abusive behavior can take many forms including; verbal, physical, sexual, psychological, emotional, spiritual, economic, and the violation of other rights. All forms of abusive behavior are ways in which one human being is [ultimately] trying to [assert and] have control... over another [individual and exploit that individual].

This definition of domestic violence has been widely accepted within the community, and it recognizes the lifespan perspective of domestic violence.

Domestic violence includes the abuse of the youngest to some of the most senior in our society, in relationships including dating, cohabiting, marital, grandparent, grandchild, caregiver, and other persons requiring care as well.

Mr. Speaker – excuse me. Madam Speaker – you can tell I haven't finished my coffee yet – Alberta has the third-highest rate of domestic violence in the country. In 2018 the Calgary women's emergency 24-hour family violence helpline fielded 10,300 calls. The total number of clients that the Calgary women's shelter served was 15,400. In 2018 the Calgary Police Service reported that there had been a 13 per cent increase in domestic violence conflict calls. On average the Calgary Police Service receives 19,000 domestic conflict related calls per year; 1 in 5 of those calls involves some form of violence.

A study conducted by the Canadian Women's Foundation reported that 74 per cent – 74 per cent – of Albertans knew a woman who had experienced physical or sexual abuse, and the report similarly also found that domestic violence costs Canadians an estimated $7.4 billion a year.

In that same year, 2018, the Alberta Council of Women's Shelters released a comprehensive report entitled Strength in Numbers: A Ten-year Trend Analysis of Women, which looked at and utilized data from annual reports, including 24 emergency shelters, seven second-stage shelters, and other organizations. With respect to shelter admissions it found that 33 per cent of all shelter admissions took place in Edmonton and in Calgary. This report also found that the overall population of women of indigenous and other backgrounds utilizing Alberta's shelters rose from 64 per cent in 2003 to 71 per cent in 2012. It's important to know that indigenous women made up more than half of the shelter population in 2010, at 60 per cent, and this proportion continues to rise substantially, particularly in Alberta's northern shelters, where in 2013 it was reported to be at 70 per cent.

Each year in Canada it's estimated that approximately 362,000 children witness or experience domestic violence, and when we look at some of the information and data related to dating violence, it's highest among the 15-to-24 age group. Most troubling of all, in Canada a woman is killed by her intimate partner every five days. That's in Canada alone.

Madam Speaker, the statistics are absolutely staggering, and it's important to recognize as well that those are only the cases and the situations that we know about. It's quite difficult for us to obtain a clear picture of the extent of domestic violence in Alberta because it often remains hidden. Individuals who are impacted by domestic violence often experience isolation, shame, embarrassment, and humiliation. Individuals may remain in abusive relationships for fear of the violence escalating if they were to leave. They may not have the financial resources to leave, as we heard from the member earlier. The individual told them that she didn't have anywhere else to go, didn't have any other means, other resources or other places to go.

Madam Speaker, it's clear that we all have a role to play in ending domestic violence and ensuring that all Albertans are able to live safe, healthy lives, free from abuse. Clare's law is an important step forward in the movement to prevent and ultimately end the epidemic of domestic violence. Clare's law is a formal mechanism that can be used to break down barriers that victims or potential victims face when making informed choices about their safety. The law ensures that services and systems communicate with each other about a victim's risk and an individual's past abusive behaviours, which allows for appropriate supports and services to be put in place. There's no question that this law will be an effective tool to empower individuals, communities, and other organizations in the province of Alberta to work together to end domestic violence.

Madam Speaker, violence in our communities and within our families is never justified, and no one deserves to be abused. Clare's law will indeed save lives. It is a priority of this government to make life better for all Albertans, and I am incredibly honoured to be part of a team who is willing and ready to tackle domestic violence in such a meaningful way.

On that note, I want to conclude my remarks and thank the Premier for his leadership and, as well, my colleague the Minister of Community and Social Services for her leadership and dedication to the work that she's done to see this important piece of legislation through. Thank you very much.

The Deputy Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. Any members wishing to speak?

Seeing none, any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Sweet: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's an honour to rise and speak to this bill, Bill 17, Disclosure to Protect Against Domestic Violence (Clare's Law) Act. I will be supporting the bill. This will actually be my first opportunity to speak, so hopefully I won't go too long, but there were a couple of things that I just wanted to touch a little bit on around the importance of this bill and then, of course, the implementation of it.

Working in child protection, I obviously worked with a variety of different families, and many times, part of the reason why we would be called and go to work with different families was due to domestic violence. Now, what we know about domestic violence, as the hon. member across indicated, is that it can be demonstrated in many different ways. Of course, we see it through physical violence and sexual violence, but there's also the economic impact piece, which is not the violence but the financial piece that comes with that, where women or individuals in partnerships aren't able to actually access their finances, so of course they're not able to leave situations to find new housing, to move on with their lives because financially they have no access to any of the funds that they would have.

I think the important piece that we need to also acknowledge is that domestic violence is in all relationships, whether they be married, common-law, dating, same-sex relationships. Those relationships: when we're looking at the LGBTQ community, we tend to not talk about those communities, we don't acknowledge those pieces. It's a community that tends to get forgotten and also a community that, due to resource issues, doesn't always have the same ability to access the supports in place that should be available to all Albertans.

As we look at this and we talk about whether or not people should have access to information around criminal history and specifically around domestic violence, there are some questions and some concerns that, obviously, I have around how this information will be used. I mean, I would be interested to hear, actually, from the Minister of Children's Services around how she sees this legislation being implemented within Children's Services. Obviously, when investigations occur, Children's Services workers do have access to information to ensure the safety of children, but this is a new piece. This is a new tool that staff will have access to. I think it's the question around: for Children's Services workers, is this a tool that they would be then using, or is this a tool that they would be trained on so they can support family members, individuals that they're working with in being able to access this information?

Another question and a thought that's come to mind – and of course, as we see this legislation roll out, I think we'll be able to get better clarity around it – is also supporting Children's Services workers when there may be a call made by a family member that may have accessed this information that may or may not be trying to influence an outcome of an investigation.

An example of this – and I'm not saying that this happens often, and I'm not trying to insinuate any false motives of anybody when they do a report to Children's Services – as a worker there were times where I would be called out to do an investigation where a relationship was falling apart. People were separating, there may be a divorce happening, and custody was becoming part of the problem and part of the discussion, and people would sometimes try to use Children's Services as a tool to influence, maybe, the outcome of a custody dispute, to say: well, Children's Services went out, and they had to investigate this family member. Again, I'm not saying that that's common, nor do we minimize those calls. We always go out when there's a call made around potential safety concerns around a child. But when emotions are high – and sometimes different family members get involved in custody disputes; it could be grandparents, it could be a sibling, it could be a variety of different people – they will sometimes try to influence the court process when it comes to divorce proceedings and custody disputes.

My concern around this – and again I think it just goes back to: how will the bill be implemented, and then how does the minister work with her team around making sure that staff are trained and aware of how to address the issue? – is making sure that this isn't being used as a tool to start influencing custody components, because knowledge is power. We know that. It would be ensuring that this tool isn't being used to try to find out if there's information and just to be somewhat malicious, whether there's validity to it or not.

Again, I'm not saying that if someone has a history of domestic violence, they should have access to their children. What I'm saying is that I would hate to see this tool being used inappropriately for motivation around that piece. So I think that that's just a matter of making sure that, you know, police services are aware of how to use this legislation appropriately, that we're not breaching people's privacy components, and that Children's Services, whether or not they would have access to using this or if this would be a tool that we would be advocating that family members access – I think that that's a fine line, when you look at a Children's Services worker, when it comes to encouraging the use of access to information, what that looks like, because I think, going back to when I worked in Children's Services, I don't know how comfortable I would be sitting down with a parent and saying: well, maybe you should be applying for this information. I don't know if that is the role of a Children's Services worker or not. Again, that would be up to the minister and, of course, her department, to determine how this legislation would be used in those roles.

The other piece, I think, as well is that, you know, if this information does come back to an individual and they find out that someone has a history of domestic violence, the question also becomes – and again this goes back to training and a question that I have for the Minister of Children's Services – does that then perpetuate or does that become a child protection safety issue? Do we start saying that every time a mother – sorry; I shouldn't just indicate gender – or any partner, an individual, is aware that somebody in their relationship has a history of domestic violence, that automatically means that Children's Services becomes involved? Are we saying that because this information has now been provided, this person is automatically putting their children at risk? Does that become a problem? Is that something that the ministry is looking at to try to figure out at what point we say that this becomes harm and a protection issue versus acknowledgement of knowledge, like: you knew; therefore, you chose. I guess that would be the piece that I would ask.

You know, again, I'm not saying that people that have a history of domestic violence will not reoffend. I mean, I'm not saying that. There are indicators that violence can happen over and over, but I also want to make sure that we're not saying that every single person that has participated in domestic violence does not have the ability to rehabilitate and to make better choices around those issues. I would hate to see this being used as a tool to start being more intrusive in families' lives just because of the fact that it now exists. Again, I'm not saying that that's what's happening. I just would really appreciate the minister maybe clarifying sort of what preliminary discussions she's already been having with her ministry, recognizing that this was coming, and just sort of some of the policy development that might be coming because of it.

The other piece – and then I'll close – is just looking that we recognize that it usually takes about 10 attempts before someone is actually successful in leaving a domestic violence situation. You know, people are always, like: why didn't they leave the first time? Well, many people try to leave repeatedly, and due to different scenarios there are reasons why they end up returning to their relationships.

A lot of that has to do with resources and lack of ability to access shelter spaces or new apartments, financial impacts. Like my colleague from Edmonton-Decore indicated, pets are actually a huge factor. People don't want to leave their dogs because they're worried that the abuser may take it out on the animals. They've got children. Maybe they've got lots of children, and they're not able to find housing for all of their children. There are barriers with some of our shelter systems around if you have a 16-year-old child. Some shelters won't take 16-year-olds, 17-year-olds because of gender issues.

There are lots of different dynamics at play, and I think that as we look at this, we also have to look at: what additional supports can be provided? How can we be creative in ensuring that people leaving a domestic violence situation have access to the information and to the resources that they need?

Again, I'm not saying that I won't support the bill. I absolutely will. I just think that as we go forward, there will probably need to be some regulations or policy discussions within different ministries to ensure that this is being used appropriately and that staff are trained and able to address the issues.

Thank you very much.

The Deputy Speaker: Any members wishing to speak under Standing Order 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I want to thank the Member for Edmonton-Manning for her comments. One of the things that I just wanted to – I might be putting her a little bit on the spot here in terms of trying to quantify. She had great experience in her former position before becoming an MLA. I, of course, have spoken to this, and she just finished speaking on the supports in the background. I'm wondering if she might be able to make a quick comment around the cases that she has dealt with over the years. You know, if there were supports in place at those times, were they enough? How many cases may have possibly fallen through because those background supports, the funding, weren't there to essentially get those families out?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Sweet: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. There definitely were situations where trying to access a shelter bed for someone was definitely a struggle, even in Edmonton. Sometimes they're full. We would look at other neighbouring communities to see if we could find somewhere for someone to go, and sometimes those would be full. That was part of the reason why the legislation was introduced around being able to find apartments and get emergency funds for leaving domestic violence situations. It was because getting someone into an apartment so that their kids could come if they had, you know, teenage children, or different things like that, was always a struggle.

I think the other piece, though – and I know I've said this numerous times in the House – is that when we're talking about families, the complexity of these files, it's never black and white. There are many times when the discussion around intervention services and what supports should be in place: like, those conversations take a long time to figure out. You're looking at the safety of children, but you're also looking at trying to be the least intrusive and all the dynamics that go with that. You know, nobody wants to bring a child into foster care. I mean, ideally we would look at trying to find a family member or someone that the children can stay with so that they're with their family.

Domestic violence is extremely complicated partly because of the judgment that's attached to it, you know, the assumption about: well, why don't people just leave? It's not that easy. The relationships that people have with each other are complex, and you're dealing with a lot of emotions. People in domestic violence situations love their partners, whether they are in healthy relationships or not. So you're not only dealing with and talking about safety issues; you're also dealing with human emotions. The struggle with this is that even with this piece of legislation, even though information is there, it doesn't necessarily mean that that relationship will be terminated or that relationship will end. If that was the case, we wouldn't have children in care, we wouldn't have domestic violence, and we wouldn't have substance abuse issues. We wouldn't have all of the different things that we talk about in this House when it comes to social issues if we could just fix everything and wave a magic wand.

This is a good step. There are lots of different things that we can be doing. Again, it's just a matter of expanding services, making sure that people have supports – income supports, housing, shelter beds – addressing, maybe, the issue when it comes to teenage children. Like, where do these families go? Can they access shelters? The variety of different services that are supported still need to be there. If not, they need to be expanded so that we can address even more issues. It's definitely complex, and there will never be an easy solution to any of these conversations that we have.

Again, I will support the bill with the caveat of some questions that I'd love to hear about from the Minister of Children's Services. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: There are 20 seconds left under 29(2)(a).

Seeing none, any other members wishing to speak to the bill?

Shall I call the question? Would the hon. Minister of Community and Social Services like to close debate?

Mrs. Sawhney: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I've had the opportunity today to listen to members in this House, and I've been able to listen to their diverse perspectives and the positive feedback. It's clear that there's tremendous support for this bill. I've heard the comments about there being too many bystanders and not enough people willing to intervene in situations when it's required. I've heard the comments indicating that the complexity of the response needs to meet the complexity of the problem, and I've heard the recommendations of engaging other ministries as we navigate the journey of operationalizing the regulations. That's a very important comment to be made, and I just want to assure everybody that we're cognizant of that and working very closely with related ministries to make sure that we address all of the complexities that need to be looked at.

I've heard the comment that the conversation around domestic violence isn't big enough, and I echo that sentiment wholeheartedly. I've also listened very clearly to the comments about the staggering social costs of domestic violence, the social costs to society, particularly to children and particularly to indigenous women, who are disproportionately represented in these statistics that we've been hearing. I've taken all of these comments and all of this feedback to heart, and I will definitely incorporate the learning and the feedback that I've received today as we engage in phase 2 of the stakeholder engagement. It's clear that more work needs to be done to ensure that this legislation meets the needs of Albertans. Of course, I commit to doing exactly that.

Thank you, Madam Speaker. I offer my gratitude and thanks to everyone in this House again for their feedback.

[Motion carried; Bill 17 read a third time]

[Adjourned debate October 23: Mrs. Sawhney]

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any members wishing to speak to the bill?

Shall I call the question? All right. [interjections] Oh.

Hon. members, it's a good time to remind those wishing to speak to perhaps be a little bit quicker, before the question has been called. The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today to speak against Bill 18, the electricity statutes amendment act. I think it's important to remember how we got here, what a capacity market actually is, why it was introduced in the first place, why it was recommended by the AESO in the first place, and what the priority is in my speaking against the termination of the development of a capacity market.

I'm ideologically agnostic on the structure of a deregulated electricity market. We see a variety of them across North America and even in other jurisdictions. They have pluses and minuses in terms of how one structures a deregulated market. There are few useful comparisons to nonderegulated markets such as Ontario or other jurisdictions, B.C., between the structure of our electricity market and theirs because the existence of deregulation since – well, the original conversation was started in 1996, and then 2001 was when most of the major changes were made. It just sets Alberta apart in many, many important respects.

Let's just go back a little bit in terms of what happened when electricity was deregulated in this province. It means that, essentially, consumers were paying real-time prices for the bulk of their electricity demand, and that can have really difficult effects for consumers. One of the reasons why you end up in that situation is because you have different entities exercising different levels of market power within the system. There are a variety of ways that other jurisdictions have dealt with this in the energy market side of a deregulated market. It became really clear to us over the course of some time. There was some volatility in 2015, in particular, that made us take a second look at the structure of the market.

We had run on a promise to Albertans that we would have a look at the volatility that was beginning to take hold within the energy-only market and some of the really serious concerns that the system operator, consumer advocacy groups, and others had about the structure of the system. That's why the AESO began looking at a parallel capacity market functioning alongside the energy-only market and began that work in 2013. This is, again, why I sort of go back to how, you know, this is a pretty ideologically agnostic thing. If you're going to be in a deregulated electricity market, then you're going to just have to make particular choices within that rubric that best protect consumers and that best reflect the other circumstances in which we find ourselves. One of those circumstances was the phase-out of coal-fired electricity, that was passed at the federal level in 2012, and the sunset of PPAs in the early 2020s as well. I believe they're all done by 2021.

I'll just go back to some of my own interactions with this file. I remember being given a list, probably in the early summer of 2015, of all the coal plants that were being shut down as a result of Stephen Harper's coal regs in 2012 and a number of other factors, PPAs and so on. I remember saying to people, to officials and others: "So what's the plan? What's the plan for replacing this generation? What's the plan for dealing with the market volatility? What's the plan for the communities that are going to be affected by this?" Bear in mind that we had brought in no coal regulations whatsoever. This is a conversation that's happening in the summer of 2015 for regulations that had been consulted on and finally passed by 2012, but, I mean, the federal government began consulting on coal-fired regulations probably in around I would say 2009, 2010. Bear in mind, too, that the environment minister that handled the file around the federal cabinet table was none other than Jim Prentice, who then became the Premier here.

You know, everybody was well aware of what was happening in terms of Alberta's electricity sector and in terms of what was going to be happening to facilities like Keephills 1 and 2, but they still hadn't gazetted any regs around natural gas conversions, for example. Like, none of that work had been done, and people just looked at me blankly. I said: "So what's the plan? What's the plan for the communities? What's the plan for the volatility? What's the plan for the new generation? What's the plan for using all of the oversupply, the abundance of low-priced feedstock that is natural gas in Alberta?" The natural gas sector was even at that point hurting. People just looked at me blankly. There was no plan.

Inasmuch as this has any bearing on the introduction of renewables and the overall climate leadership plan – it doesn't, really. It's more about taking volatility out of the system, and not just for the reasons of consumer protection but also to ensure that we're creating the right market conditions to bring in new generation capacity. With the price of electricity at that time and in the subsequent months and years being so low, the economic case for bringing on new generation was quite weak. There needed to be much more of a sort of firm set of circumstances in which companies could make their investment decisions in order to have the stability of supply. But with stability of supply comes stability of price, to a certain extent, and transitioning the electricity market to respond to a number of public policy decisions that predated our government, in some cases by two decades and in some cases by a decade. That was what this was about.

This was also about taking advice from experts. You know, there are a number of expert papers that I could commend to the House. We could all, you know, take several days of our time to read about market design. You could go onto the AESO website and get your first tutorial about how the electricity system works. Then you can dive right into a number of econometric analyses that have been put out to weigh the pros and cons of an electricity-only market versus a capacity market. We can all do that. It's all very complex stuff.

But, really, what this was about was taking that advice from experts, that was given to us on an enormously complex file, to accomplish what was essentially the priority. The priority was a cleaner grid in response to the 2012 Harper regulations, stability of supply, achieving some of our lowest cost greenhouse gas emissions reductions by dealing with the plants that were to be in operation between 2030 and 2060, and dealing with the volatility that we had heard about from consumers. You know, I would challenge anyone to go out there and do a focus group on finding any kind of love for the early years of deregulation. You will find very few Albertans who were much enamoured of those early years of price spikes. They weren't interested at all.

I mean, some of that stuff happened because you had an overconcentration of market power, essentially, in the energy-only market. You know, if we are to move forward with capacity market termination, it would seem to me that there are a number of questions that must be answered while or if we do that. Now, I'm not sure that this government is prepared to answer those questions, because as far as I can tell, they haven't even received the proper advice yet. Their deadline for advice on issues related to energy-only and ancillary services markets in order to address concerns over price volatility and degree of market power: that advice is due from the AESO to the Department of Alberta Energy's review on November 29, 2019. That's not now. This government doesn't even have the right advice in place to know how to structure this bill. If there are any other pieces that they can deal with within this legislation to provide certainty around the energy-only market, they don't have the answers to those questions, so we're well and truly, Mr. Speaker, "Seat of pants, meet flight" on this one.

The other piece that I've heard this government talk a lot about is protection – I haven't heard them talk about protection of consumers, actually. That was the point I was trying to make. You know, a properly functioning market, Mr. Speaker, in some way, shape, or form should have long-term contracts between commercial entities that are doing forward contracting. This has not previously happened in Alberta, and we could enable that within this legislation. What would ensure that consumers are not exposed to real-time price risk is mandating forward contracting to happen for both load-serving entities and large consumers, that they procure some portion of their load forward on a continuous basis.

Then generators can use that long-term contract to secure financing to construct new generation. The big thing, Mr. Speaker, that people need to realize is that that was the main driver behind the creation of the capacity market. Nobody was able to get financing for a new natural gas plant based on historically low electricity prices and even with a lot of the volatility. That was one of the reasons why many in the sector came to us and said that we need to examine this. That was why the AESO was concerned, too, around new generation. Why? Because, again – let's trace it back – you have a number of coal plants reaching their end of life under 2012 coal-fired regulations.

You know, that contracting, that forward contracting that will then remove some of the risk for investors in new generation as opposed to putting that risk on the public – and consumers can be protected without having to enter into 20-year contracts on their own, which is obviously not practical for most of us – will not happen without a mandate for utilities to procure on behalf of consumers. We need to look out for them. This is one way that the government could write some language into this bill at this point to deal with what will inevitably be part, I believe, of the advice that the AESO gives the Department of Energy.

There are a number of other pieces that this government could put forward in this bill, thoughtful amendments or at least ways to open up the possibility of protecting consumers rather than throwing them to the wolves of volatility. They haven't done that. This is just simply: "NDP bad. This was a bad idea. We're going to repeal this because we listened to a couple of our billionaire friends or millionaires or whatever." A very small handful of companies can then continue to ride the market and ride those price spikes. Price spikes are nice for them. Maybe they can buy a new car after playing around on the market a little bit and generating some nice quarterly returns for shareholders. The rest of us, actually, are paying for that on our monthly bills. That was exactly what the capacity market was designed to take away, in addition, like I said, to ensuring that we had an orderly introduction of new generating capacity and that we had a competitive environment for new generation, too.

I think that's the other really important piece, that one of the ways that you end up with decent electricity prices on the other end is that you have companies that are actually competing against one another to ensure that the lowest cost generation is able to secure financing and come onto the market and bid into the pool at the lowest price possible. You don't want people building large or inefficient plants. You don't want people bidding in at high prices because they paid too much to build their plants. That's not what you want. You want to use the market to be able to achieve the outcome, which is good prices for consumers.

The way that this is structured right now, where it appears that we're listening to a small group of folks who really, really want to make a lot of money . . .

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud has risen.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the comments from my colleague the Member for Lethbridge-West. In particular, I think she is shedding a lot of light on the decisions, the consultations, and the research that went into the decision to move over to a capacity market. I appreciate her experience, having been part of those discussions as a cabinet member and really understanding what went behind the decisions and the thoughtfulness about that and how the intent was really about looking out for Alberta consumers and having a long-term interest in stability in our electricity market. I'm wondering if the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West would continue to share her thoughts based on her experience having been involved with this matter.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West, with about four minutes left.

Ms Phillips: Sure. Thanks, Mr. Speaker. Well, I think that when you have a number of different pieces moving, the first thing you need to do is kind of understand what the priority is in terms of structuring your electricity market. For us, the priority was phasing in new generation in a way that made it more stable and fair for average consumers.

I'm worried about what my constituents tell me on a daily basis, and not just my constituents who are now hedging against future volatility by putting solar panels up on their roofs, which many are, but also larger, industrial-power consumers who remember very well the days of deregulation and riding that roller coaster and how incredibly difficult that made life for business.

One of the stories that Mayor Spearman tells a lot is from when he was manager of the Black Velvet plant over in the industrial area of Lethbridge. He was one of the really early outspoken opponents of deregulation because of how difficult it made managing the expenditures out of that plant. He will tell anyone who will listen how difficult that was and how difficult it made life for business in the early 2000s.

You know, I think the last piece that I'll talk about here is that electricity grids are decarbonizing around the world because these are our lowest cost emissions reductions. If you believe in climate change – well, I'm sorry. If you understand the science of climate change, because science doesn't care if you believe in it or not, if you understand physics, basic, super basic, like my 10-year-old understands it, then you're going to look at where your lowest cost emissions reductions are, right? Regulatory solutions such as what was put forward by Mr. Scheer and rejected ultimately by the electorate are generally high cost per tonne abatement solutions. You're going to want to look for your lowest cost GHG reductions.

Across the world and certainly in Canada your lowest cost GHG reductions – and to be clear, this was appreciated by the Harper cabinet, who brought in the first, 2012 coal-reduction rules – are going to be, generally speaking, in the electricity grid, not just in the phasing out of coal but also in new technologies with natural gas, new and emerging technologies having to do with storage. I would encourage anyone here to go and tour some of the Enmax facilities downtown and some of the interesting things that they're doing there. Then also give your systems operator a mandate for efficiency and managing your increased load growth through efficiency, because energy efficiency is actually an energy source. It should be thought of as an energy source.

It's important to remember that this is happening around the world. The lowered cost of renewables and storage technologies and smart grid technologies means that there is a lot of investment interest in this area. There's a lot of opportunity for economic diversification and for companies to de-risk a lot of their future costs by investing in those technologies now. Certainly, we've seen this with a number of companies procuring on a private basis long-term contract renewals. We've seen Google, Amazon do this south the border, and you're seeing some of these arrangements happening up here now, too.

What you want is an electricity system that can respond to these new realities. Electrification, essentially, along with energy efficiency are the two solutions that are both the cheapest and the most readily available for reducing greenhouse gas emissions, because climate is real.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to this matter? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning has risen.

Ms Sweet: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Just following up on some of the comments that the hon. member mentioned, I wanted to speak a little bit about the history of the capacity market in Alberta and why we felt that this was something important that we did under our government and why we've got some questions for the current government about why they would want to move backwards on this issue.

I mean, the reason that we changed to the capacity market was, obviously, to enable the transition to an electricity market that met the goals set in our climate leadership plan, which was to transition off coal and increase renewable energy in the energy mix. I think that's something that we can all agree is important. It's important for reducing our carbon emissions. It's also moving towards a greener future for Alberta, recognizing that solar and wind are something that can be done, that is being done in this province, and that there's actual investment that is currently looking to be invested in Alberta around these things.

Of course, we wanted to make sure that we had the ability to make renewable energy cost-effective and to stimulate the investment in the province. In the beginning of October AESO revisited its forecast for Alberta for renewables, stating that Alberta is now expected to fall short of its renewable targets because of the changes in the electricity market. AESO began its work on evaluating the sustainability of the electricity market in 2013, and they determined that they would recommend a capacity market.

I find it interesting that, you know, now we see this government is asking AESO to go back and re-evaluate and give different advice on a deadline of November 29, 2019. We're only giving them six weeks to come back. Although they've already given advice to this government – and they gave advice to the previous governments around what they felt was an appropriate electricity market – the government is now asking for a different opinion, which I guess should have some concerns for Albertans.

The issue that we have here is that part of the conversation is about protecting consumers. It's about protecting Albertans and making sure that Albertans aren't paying outrageous amounts of money for their basic needs. You know, the government currently likes to talk about the carbon tax and how they feel that people had to pay more. Well, my question would then be: why would you look at reviewing an electricity market that is going to put and download the cost onto Albertans? This will create a market that can charge whatever rate they so choose to consumers.

Instead of having a cap and Albertans being able to know what their month-to-month costs are going to be, this will now create instability in the market. It will create fluxes. It could create outages. It could create a variety of different things. It doesn't work us towards a greener economy and look at wind and solar and the variety of hydro options that we could be looking at within the province because it doesn't support the investment to come into the province.

AESO also recommended that the reason we would implement a capacity market was to be able to deal with the global growth rates of renewables. Again, this is about Alberta moving forward and not backwards. Looking at the fact that there are other jurisdictions in Canada, there are international jurisdictions that are moving to more renewable resources when it comes to developing their energy and their electricity – yet we see again that this government wants to move us backwards and take away the option and the stimulus for investment when it comes to green energy.

When we were in government, we worked with the Alberta Electric System Operator, who showed us that the capacity market is the best choice to deliver reliable energy, green environmental performance, reasonable cost to electricity consumers, economic development, and the lowest transition risk, so they recommended that we adopt the capacity market.

Before our reforms, the market had less consumer protections and had economic withholdings. The capacity market was a good tool to ensure that the coal phase-out worked smoothly, and it's already saved three times the emissions of Vancouver. The energy-only markets are more volatile and less reliable than capacity markets, and we've seen brownouts in Alberta before.

Around 2016 investors were rather negative towards investing in the Alberta electricity market. A capacity market has been seen by some as a market design that would look at the long-term contracts such as Ontario has made, and they were more attracted to them. In 2012 they were very optimistic about the energy-only market, but it seemed to very strongly depend on the short-term market conditions and the long-term forecasts.

Alberta has also hit their retail price caps several times, in April 2018, July and September 2018, December 2018, February 2019, as well as October 2018, according to the Alberta Utilities Commission.

Ontario is using a long-term contract energy market. The model that we had introduced was going to be different than that one, and it wasn't going to have the same negative impacts as we've seen in Ontario.

Now, the government side has made comments about, you know, consultation and how it's important, and they talk to Albertans, and they hear from Albertans. Well, I guess the question that I have is: where is the evidence around the consultation around this issue? You've given AESO a deadline of November 29 to provide advice, which means that the consultation has been probably quite limited. I'm sure that Albertans would love to have some feedback on whether or not they want a price cap and what they would like to see their electricity market look like.

In saying that, Mr. Speaker, I would like to move an amendment. I move on behalf of the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View that the motion for second reading of Bill 18, the Electricity Statutes (Capacity Market Termination) Amendment Act, 2019, be amended by deleting all the words after “that” and substituting the following:

Bill 18, Electricity Statutes (Capacity Market Termination) Amendment Act, 2019, be not now read a second time but that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Resource Stewardship in accordance with Standing Order 74.2.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

We will take a few moments while we pass all the copies around to the House and, of course, bring some to the table immediately.

Thank you, hon. members. Going forward, this amendment will be referred to as REF1.

Hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning, should you choose to continue, you have eight minutes, 45 left. Please continue.

Ms Sweet: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I recognize that I read it into the record before it was handed out. Do you want me to read it again, or are you fine?

The Acting Speaker: I actually would, if that’s okay.

Ms Sweet: Yeah. I move on behalf of the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View that the motion for second reading of Bill 18, Electricity Statutes (Capacity Market Termination) Amendment Act, 2019, be amended by deleting all the words after “that” and substituting the following:

Bill 18, Electricity Statutes (Capacity Market Termination) Amendment Act, 2019, be not now read a second time but that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Resource Stewardship in accordance with Standing Order 74.2.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I just want to speak to the importance of consultation. Of course, we’ve seen a movement in this Legislature since this new government has taken over around changing our standing orders to speak to referring things to committee for consultation, for review. We recently saw that with private members’ business and the fact that, you know, they wanted to make sure that there was clear analysis and consultation done. Well, this is a good example of the government walking the walk when they’re talking the talk, and sending this back to committee, and having a very good and concrete consultation on an issue that will impact everyday Albertans, every single Albertan, will impact future investment in this province, will impact economic diversification in this province, will impact jobs in this province, which is something that I believe this government likes to talk quite often about. It might actually even increase some jobs in this province, which I know the government would like to see happen at some point.

I do believe that consultation is extremely important. I think it’s important that Albertans be allowed to come and tell the committee about what they feel is in their best interest as we move forward on this legislation. But I also think it’s important when we look at the industry in itself and hear from the industry, because the government side will say: “Well, the industry has been talking to us. They’re looking at this. This is what they want.” Yet when we were in government, we had validators from the industry saying the opposite.

I will read a couple of different quotes to support the capacity market, in a sense. Dawn Farrell, the Calgary-based chief executive officer of power producer TransAlta Corporation, hailed the overhaul as a courageous decision by the previous government: this opens up our opportunities to invest both in our existing assets and new assets as we move forward. That might be someone that you think should come to the committee and chat with us about whether or not we look at changing this bill and moving away from capacity markets.

Another one that I have is:

We welcome the clear roadmap emerging with [the previous Premier’s] announcement today of Alberta’s commitment to support the conversion of coal-fired plants to gas.

It is a timely signal to the market that financial [clarity] and stability are necessary to attract new investment, and will help generators ensure competitive electricity costs for businesses and customers as Alberta’s economy begins to recover.

TransAlta has already completed a significant amount of work on the logistics and timing of plant conversions. Accelerating TransAlta’s coal transition, while ramping up our renewables, including hydro, wind and solar, are critical to [helping] Alberta [be] competitive. We look forward to being active participants in the transition.

Capital Power said that a capacity market would encourage not only his company to resume investment in Alberta but probably get interest from larger North American and European producers. I would highly recommend that, you know, Capital Power be invited to be consulted with at the Standing Committee on Resource Stewardship.

Another one would be AltaLink.

New capacity will be needed to back up renewables in Alberta as it transitions to a cleaner energy future. We have seen the [previous] government take steps to ensure low costs for Albertans by requiring new generation be sited near existing transmission, by offering long-term contracts and by focusing on universal, or grid-scale, projects. We are confident the [previous] government will continue on this path and find the lowest cost way to add new capacity for Albertans.

Maybe AltaLink would like to come to Resource Stewardship and discuss what they see the future of the electricity market looking like in this province.

Western Interstate Energy Board:

The Western Interstate Energy Board applauds the [previous] Government of Alberta’s decision to transition to an electricity capacity market framework. This transition is consistent with the North American trend to decarbonize the electricity grid, attract needed generation investment and jobs, and provide reasonably priced power, all while maintaining electric grid reliability that individuals, families and businesses [can] depend on. Alberta is an important part of the western interconnected electricity system, and the co-operative efforts to enhance the economy and well-being of western states and provinces. Moving to a capacity market will further these aims.

Maybe we should invite Western Interstate Energy Board to come to Resource Stewardship and talk about how they feel about this bill.

I think that I’ve given a couple of examples where it’s very clear that the industry has supported looking at capacity markets in the past. This speaks to why it’s so important that the Standing Committee on Resource Stewardship actually be allowed to consult on this legislation with Albertans, with businesses, and with the investors that are going to come to Alberta.

If you want to be able to demonstrate that you’ve done good critical thinking on this legislation, that you actually have thought through the process instead of asking for new recommendations for November 29 – well, you said November 29, 2019. How about you have a meeting next week and talk about Resource Stewardship and get some consultation started? You’ve given a deadline of November 29. It’s in the legislation, so consult. You can’t just be consulting with one group of people and being, like: well, they told us this; therefore, it must be done. You have to consult with everybody: Albertans, businesses, investors. I've given you three examples of organizations that maybe should come and be on the record and be clear on what they're telling this government around how they actually feel about the capacity market.

Again, you represent your constituents. Your constituents should have a voice around whether or not they should have price hikes in their electricity market, whether or not they should have to pay for a decision that is truly being based on the fact that the previous government started it, and therefore we must move backwards because anything that the previous government did, in this current government's opinion, must be undone, apparently. Instead of being ideological about this, maybe do some research and show Albertans that you are willing to listen, that you're willing to consult, and have this sent to committee.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available should anybody choose to take that opportunity.

Going forward, then, are there any hon. members looking to speak to REF1? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you for the opportunity to speak to this referral motion, because I'm very concerned about this bill. As I say, it simply does not pass the smell test. The government has a silk bag with gold written on the outside and the essence of manure radiating from the inside. I'm very concerned about that because on the outside it appears that they are attempting to respond to evidence or conversations they've had in the community, yet not that long ago I was sitting in the cabinet with many other people receiving exactly the opposite recommendations from completely impartial people. It wasn't like we came and asked for a move to the capacity market; it was directed, largely from the AESO to us, that we should do this.

In fact, in their October 2016 report, Alberta's Wholesale Electricity Market Transition Recommendation, the AESO said:

The combination of increased renewables and a general global trend of investors and capital away from investing in markets with significant revenue uncertainty meant that the EOM [the energy-only market] is unlikely to deliver an acceptable level of reliability going forward. Even changes to the EOM are unlikely to deliver on the objectives.

I think it's very suspicious that in 2016 the AESO was giving us very specific recommendations to move toward a capacity market. Are we saying, on the government side of the House, that AESO was acting in some devious, nefarious manner to deceive the government of the day as to information that they should use to move forward? That's a pretty bold claim by the government about a respected provincial organization.

I'm very concerned that now, since they've taken government, all of these reports and many other statements made by industry leaders, not only in Alberta but across North America, suddenly have all disappeared. They all changed their minds one day. I'm very concerned that we ended up in this place, that we're getting recommendations from the professionals who do the assessments one day that say that we should move to a capacity market to ensure stability for our community, and I am now being led to understand somehow that the previous government was either being misled or perhaps even specifically lied to by hundreds of executives around the province of Alberta. This does not pass the smell test on any level whatsoever.

It's very important that we send this back to committee in order to have a chance to ask these very people: why is it that you have made a recommendation one day and suddenly appear to be, you know, not supporting your own recommendation shortly thereafter? I can tell you that I certainly arrived at a place of suspicion about whether or not this is a bill intended to provide appropriate services to the province of Alberta or whether it's simply a bill to manifest a rigid, fundamentalist ideology regarding free markets.

I spent a little bit of time last night piercing that false narrative that had been created by the opposite side of the House, that somehow the free market has been allowed to and been successful in developing the energy industry in this province. I demonstrated last night that there have been dozens of interventions by government that not only made it successful but probably were the only reasons why our energy market became so successful in the province of Alberta.

In this case, I believe, again, that this is an important area where government needs to take responsibility for what is being provided to Albertans, and the only way to do that is for us to properly meet with people who have the information that's necessary. There's clearly confusion here. They're clearly not acting on all of the publicly available information that has been provided by our respected agencies like AESO and the CEOs of major energy producers in this province.

We know that this government believes in referral to committees, by the way, because they introduced a bill in the spring session to force all private members' bills to go to committee before they come into the House. Ideologically, they fundamentally think it's the right thing to do. Why are they not acting on their own belief system at this particular time? Again, there's a smell question about what the intent is here although, you know, the intent of moving all private members' bills to committee obviously was a direct attempt to fundamentally subvert democracy. So I guess we know that there may be darker reasons why they choose to do that at some times and to not be willing to do it at other times. I'm very concerned about this.

Now, the reason why we want to move to having a further consultation around this is that the capacity market clearly does some things that the energy-only market does not do, and I heard yesterday both the minister and the Member for Calgary-Glenmore talk about some of the reasons why they were choosing to move in this direction. The free market they mentioned, but I pierced that one yesterday, so today I want to talk about a different piece that's of concern, and that is that there was concern that we would be paying people for their infrastructure, not for the delivery of energy but, rather, for the development of the structures that would provide capacity at the time that was necessary. They said that they didn't think that was the right thing to do: we should only be paying for actual, delivered goods – that is, in this case, electricity – and not for the infrastructure.

Yet I find a certain duplicity in that argument. The reason why I say that is because it was actually a Conservative government in this province that proposed that we separate out in our electrical bills the use of gas or electricity, separate from the transmission and distribution services in our electrical bill. That was a Conservative move, originally under Premier Klein, and the argument at that time was that even though you may not use a lot of electricity at a particular time, you still needed that infrastructure, that transportation and distribution system, in order to be able to use it at the few times you might be in need of using it. Therefore, you should pay a fair share of that infrastructure in order to receive the goods that you want to receive at the end.

I have an example. A good friend of mine, Jim, once brought me a bill to show it to me. Jim is one of those guys you really admire because he lives his life deeply in terms of his values, and he showed me that he had reduced his gas use in this particular month down to one dollar's worth of use of gas, yet the bill itself was over $25. I looked at it and said: why is that? He was paying the cost of the creation of the capacity to deliver his one dollar. He had to pay the transportation and distribution costs to have that electricity arrive at his house, and there's no way he could reduce that. He couldn't say: well, how can I only pay a portion of the transportation because I only use a portion of the gas? If there was a unified bill, if you could pay one price for electricity and reduce your use down to a little, then you would be paying only a little bit toward that infrastructure.

But the Conservative government was the one who said that that does not work for them in terms of their ideology. If you're on the system, you pay. It doesn't matter how much you use it. So the big users are paying exactly the same kind of transportation costs as the small users because you said that you believed that we should develop capacity in this province to ensure that the capacity is there whenever it is necessary for everyone. That's a Conservative philosophical stance. Here you are doing exactly the opposite. After having introduced this system into the province of Alberta that requires only consumers to pay for capacity, now that we're suddenly saying, "Okay; let's make sure that the capacity actually helps consumers by ensuring stability in pricing," all of a sudden you abandon your principles, and you say: "No; people shouldn't be paying for the establishment of infrastructure in this province. We should only be paying for the energy that they submit. That is an energy-only market."

That kind of contradiction is something which I think reeks of a secondary intent, and that's what I'm concerned about. The reason why we need to go to committee is because we need a chance to bring some sunlight to this odorous bill. We need to be able to shine upon it the vision of all of Alberta to ensure that there isn't some reason other than the good well-being of the citizens of the province of Alberta in establishing this choice. I don't see it right now. I don't see that it makes sense for us to move in this particular direction. It contradicts everything else the Conservatives have done in this province in terms of ensuring that the infrastructure is built by citizens and paid for by citizens. Now suddenly, when we say that citizens should then get some benefit out of that by having stability in terms of pricing – oh, no – our old values disappear, and we have a new set of values. I'm suspicious as to who that is that you are serving by moving in this particular direction.

As I said earlier, the October 2016 report from the AESO, Alberta's Wholesale Electricity Market Transition Recommendation, was not a partisan suggestion by an NDP government. It was the experts in the field telling us, as they did their analysis and looked forward, that we needed to move in a particular direction. If you're not receiving evidence from the experts in the field in terms of your decision-making, who are you receiving evidence from? That's what we need to find out in referring this to committee. We need to know who you're in bed with because it isn't with the evidence; it isn't with the experts in the field. It isn't with the structures of policy-making in the government such as the AESO, so it must be with somebody else.

The fact that you have actually introduced a bill into this House to force other people's bills into committee but do not wish to have your own bill go to committee is something that reveals again a hostility toward other members of this House, a hostility toward the traditions of democracy in this House. That has to be brought to light. Again, we need to put sunshine on that to reveal what is going on in the community. I'm very disappointed to see us in this place.

I had a notice that Terry Boston, the former executive vice-president of the Tennessee Valley Authority and former CEO of PJM interconnection, who knows a lot about this, had a lot to say about it. I'll report it later because I've run out of time.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood has risen to speak under 29(2)(a).

Member Irwin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I actually do plan to speak as well although I hesitate to ever follow the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford because his high energy – pardon the pun – is tough to follow, for sure, on this topic. I really appreciated his insight, especially his historical overview because I was younger when some of these moves to deregulation happened under Klein, in particular. I would love for the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford to just continue to share what he was about to say there, and if he could again just remind the House why it is so troubling that we're moving forward with this and why we need to urge the House to move this to referral because, again, consultation is so critically needed.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you. I was just saying that Terry Boston, the vice-president of PJM interconnection, said:

I spent the last eight years of my career as the CEO of PJM Interconnection, which has a mature capacity market structure. Private investors from around the world have built over 30,000 megawatts of new generation in PJM under this market structure, which kept the lights on at stable prices. Investors have shown a growing reluctance to invest in the riskier energy-only market designs around the world, preferring the price stability and revenue certainty provided by a capacity market structure. I am confident this model will work well in Alberta too, ensuring future stability in your admirable and smooth transition to a lower carbon electricity system.

It seems to me that here again we have somebody with deep levels of expertise making very clear statements about pieces that are important to Albertans: stability of prices, investment and, therefore, the creation of jobs, and talking about how important it is that we have a smooth transition to a lower carbon electricity system, which would be enhanced by this capacity market. All of these things are given to us by people who clearly know more than anybody in this House about the nature of the delivery of energy at a provincial level.

This is why I am suspicious of the intent of this bill and why I believe that we need to move to committee. I think that if we invite people with this level of expertise and with this level of knowledge not only about how to effectively run but also to build energy markets, we will find that the recommendations by this government lack some of the knowledge and virtue that they would like to pretend they have. This is why I believe that essentially we have here a silk purse inscribed with the word "gold" but reeking of manure. I think that when that happens, all of us need to be suspicious and not accept the pig in a poke and instead choose to be responsible with the expectations of the citizens of the province of Alberta and ensure that we do the right thing because it is the right thing to do, not because we have some fundamentalist, ideological reason for moving ahead, which blinds us to the evidence that is available to us and blinds us to good decision-making.

I'd like to thank the member for the question. I will now cede the floor for her opportunity to speak to this bill.

The Acting Speaker: Forty seconds left under 29(2)(a).

Seeing no one, are there any members who would like to speak to the referral? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am happy to rise and speak to this amendment for referral to the Standing Committee on Resource Stewardship. Again I very much thank the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford for his comments. If only I could invoke the animal metaphors and the imagery that he is able to invoke, I would be honoured.

I'm really proud of the fact – and I know I don't have a lot of time here – that the NDP government changed the way that Alberta pays for energy providers to make it more fair and to make it more stable for the average consumer in our province. They made that decision based on advice from the experts, based on consultation, hearing from them on how to protect consumers and how to move forward with the modernization of our electricity market. As we know, this UCP government wants to reverse this change.

You know, this is a huge concern for me for a number of reasons. As the Member for Edmonton-Glenora noted, we all heard a lot at the doors about affordability countless times. I know I've shared it here. A lot of folks in my riding of Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood do struggle with affordability. We have some of the highest rates of child poverty in the province in my neighbourhoods. I worry very much what this will mean, what the impact will be on my neighbours. It's a move back to deregulation. It's a risky experiment that has been proven in countless jurisdictions to cause challenges. As I said, these are the days that I remember as a youngster under the Klein era, which my colleague from Edmonton-Rutherford talked about so aptly. This is a shift to those neoliberal models in which the most vulnerable are hurt and hit the hardest. I worry very much about the impact that it will have on Albertans.

I know I heard the other day one of the members opposite saying that we are fearmongering. I will say in this House that I'm quite certain that we will see these impacts and that this isn't fearmongering at all. Of course, we've got some evidence from other jurisdictions to back that up as well. Capacity markets are better at ensuring reasonable costs to consumers. They've been proven to offer less price volatility.

Our government's move to an electricity market based on capacity would have ensured that Albertans have access to safe, reliable, sustainable, affordable electricity. This was something that I could be proud of as a candidate running and now obviously as an elected official to offer my constituents that certainty. We're quite certain that this move by the UCP could cost some of my constituents 10 times more on their electricity bills. Yet we've got a government here that's willing to give away $4.5 billion to big corporations while, again, the most vulnerable and the folks who are, you know, average Albertans just struggling to make ends meet will be hit the hardest.

It's not just the financial impacts, as has been discussed a little bit today. I worry greatly about the larger environmental impacts as well. I can actually think about some of those same folks in my neighbourhood who benefited from the carbon levy rebate. They're, again, going to be hit harder by this, and with the end of the climate leadership plan, obviously they're not getting that rebate, and we've got a government here that's now destroying any of that progress that we made on economic diversification.

Many of us do remember brownouts and blackouts, you know, even just a few years ago, and it's quite fair to predict that these same brownouts and blackouts will happen without a capacity market in place. When there's heavy demand under an energy-only market, particularly when it's the summer and there's hot, humid weather, the power grid is stressed. Again, we're not just making this up. We can point to Texas as a clear case study in what happens when you've got this sort of market in place. For instance, Texas experienced brownouts for a number of years, as well as rolling blackouts in 2011. Prices just maxed out at $3,000 per megawatt hour, which is huge. Again, I'm concerned about the broader impacts here.

Think about the impact on renewables as well. Again, I'm so proud. I heard so much at the doors from my constituents in Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood about their support of our investments in renewables: 800 per cent growth in solar, for instance. Those are things to be very proud of. I very much worry about what will happen to investment in renewables under a number of measures by this government but as well by moving to an energy-only market.

One thing that I would like to do is just reiterate the importance of moving this to the standing committee for further consultation. It's almost a warning to this government to recognize that as other members on this side of the House have spoken about today, you didn't clearly campaign on this, and I do worry . . .

The Acting Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Okay. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Seeing the time, under Standing Order 4(2.1) the House stands adjourned until 1:30 this afternoon.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Wednesday, October 23, 2019

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Hon. members, please be seated.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Hon. members, this afternoon, visiting from the constituency of Camrose, welcome grade 6 and grade 9 students from Bashaw school.

Other school groups joining us: from the constituency of Edmonton-Mill Woods, l'école Frère Antoine Catholic school; and from Leduc-Beaumont, please welcome l'école Notre Dame grade 6 students. Please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Also joining us in the galleries this afternoon, guests of the Minister of Seniors and Housing, are Danielle Zok and her father, Mr. Tony Zok, visiting from London, Ontario. Welcome. Please join in welcoming them.

Also, just a special note that a little bit later – they haven't joined us quite yet – there will be a number of folks from the public service, members of the public service, who are guests of the Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Members' Statements

Diwali

Mr. Toor: Mr. Speaker, on October 27 we will join members of Hindu, Sikh, Jain, and Buddhist communities in Alberta, across Canada, and around the world to celebrate Diwali, Deepavali, and Bandi Chhor Divas. The holiday, known as the festival of lights, symbolizes the triumph of good over evil, light over darkness, and knowledge over ignorance. Families and friends will gather to pray, exchange gifts, share meals, and light diyas in a spirit of hope.

Diwali is also a chance to honour the many communities that celebrate this occasion. Albertans of Hindu, Sikh, Buddhist as well as the large South Asian diaspora shape our province better every day. There are a number of traditions associated with Diwali. Many people wear new clothing to thank Mahalakshmi for providing prosperity and good fortune, and firecrackers are set off in the evening. Traditional sweets such as diya-shaped sugar cookies and savory, light mini-samosas and puris are eaten as well as full meals. In the Sikh tradition, we celebrate this day as Bandi Chhor Divas, the day of liberation. The story of Bandi Chhor Divas is a reminder to look beyond oneself and to use the privilege that has been conferred by the Creator to aid those who are less fortunate.

Diwali reminds us to keep the lights in our lives and communities by dedicating ourselves to service and kindness to others. We all want peace and prosperity for our families and communities. Diwali is a time to reflect and act on how we can reach those goals. This message and the meaning behind Diwali reach beyond the Indian community.

Ms Ganley: I can't believe what you say because I see what you do: in these days of increasing rhetoric this statement has become more important than ever. It's easy to be in support of something when all you have to do is say a few words or post a meme, but tomorrow we see the proof. Tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, is budget day, the day when the government will show us what their priorities really are, the day when all the talking points fall away, and they must actually demonstrate what they think is and isn't important.

So far the government has shown only one priority. They rushed to give $4.5 billion away to profitable corporations, money they admit has not created one single job. Sure wouldn't have been my first priority.

Here are some priorities I have for Calgary, just a small way for the UCP to demonstrate they have finally gotten their priorities straight and want to put Albertans ahead of profitable corporations: the green line and the Springbank dam, on the original timelines; an actual continuum of care for mental health and addictions instead of tired rhetoric and an abstinence-only model that's not supported by evidence; funding for enrolment growth for students, because investing in our children is an investment in our future; investment in economic diversification, because trickle-down doesn't work and certainly doesn't diversify; investment in affordable housing – it save lives, it prevents crime, and it saves money – court clerks, staff for the Calgary cancer centre, and, while we're at it, the $16 million missing from Calgary's police grant; and finally, a continuation of the child tax benefit, because we cut child poverty in half. That's our legacy, and I would take it over a $4.5 billion giveaway to profitable corporations any day.

South Sudanese Community Concerns

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: We all want our children to be healthy, happy, know that they are loved, and have every opportunity to thrive. It is why I was eager to join the Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions and the minister of social services as South Sudanese families gathered to demand better for their kids. They made the courageous journey of leaving their country of birth and everything they knew to seek a brighter future for their families, but now their community has been shocked by the loss of so many young lives. It was devastating to hear the stories of families that have lost their children to overdose and violence. One mother proudly wore a shirt with her son's graduation photo on it. He was a fellow Bishop McNally alumni.

However, in a room full of grief I felt the sense of determination and hope. This community is demanding better. It is why they have risen up as advocates for their children. I heard from the community that isolation is a major factor. How do we combat isolation? We get them involved, and we ourselves get involved. Parents, faith leaders, community members, youth-serving organizations, the Calgary police, local representatives, and youth gathered to start a conversation on how we do better. We all have a responsibility to reach out and care for young people. Government has a role to get behind initiatives like that. We also need leadership at the family level. We as adults need to have open conversations with our kids today.

There is a line in the movie Guardians of the Galaxy Vol. 2: he may have been your father, boy, but he wasn't your daddy. We can't be parents in name only. We need to be there with our kids, in the highs and the lows, to expose the lie of isolation that drives so many of our kids into self-destructive paths. This is why I ran. I wanted to see better for young people in our community, and I look forward to continuing this conversation.

Thank you.

Islamic Heritage Month

Member Loyola: Mr. Speaker, my son Alonso is in the public gallery, so to him, through you: I love you, son.

It gives me great pleasure to stand in the House today on behalf of my caucus colleagues to celebrate Islamic Heritage Month in our province. Last year our government proclaimed October as Islamic Heritage Month in recognition of the significant contributions the Muslim community has made to Alberta since 1900. Muslims from across our province enrich our lives and contribute to the prosperity and heritage of our province through their outstanding achievements in many fields, including literature, mathematics, science, sports, and the arts.

This month offers all Albertans a wonderful opportunity to reflect on and learn more about the history of Islam in Alberta and Canada and the cultural diversity of Alberta's large Muslim community. I would also like to thank the directors and members of the many Muslim organizations that work in Alberta to counter racism and Islamophobia. Your dedication and hard work are sincerely and greatly appreciated.

Together let's celebrate the people that make our communities so unique and dynamic. To all my brothers and sisters in Islam as well as all Albertans: happy Islamic Heritage Month to all.

The Speaker: Hon. members, perhaps we could all offer our special welcome to the hon. member's son.

The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West – East.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm going to get a pin.

Agriculture

Mr. Neudorf: Every Albertan knows the value that our farmers bring to our province and our economy. Farmers work extreme hours from planting to harvest to ensure that we are fortunate enough to have access to the highest quality food in the world. The benefits of a strong agricultural sector are well-known facts to most people who call our province home.

What some folks may not be aware of, however, is how vital Lethbridge is to ensuring our agricultural sector remains strong and vibrant. The area surrounding Lethbridge supports over 900 farms, generating farm receipts of approximately $1.1 billion per year, building on assets of $3.2 billion. Our fields yield potatoes, sugar beets, canola, corn, and pulse crops while also providing ample space to raise livestock and contribute significantly to our dairy and beef production. Lethbridge is also a clear innovator and hub in the agrifood processing sector. Most recently we celebrated Cavendish Farms' significant investment in a $430 million frozen potato processing plant. This direct investment into our agrifood processing sector is the largest private investment in Lethbridge's history.

Mr. Speaker, the importance of our agriculture sector cannot be understated but especially cannot be understated in Lethbridge. We are open for business, and we are ready to lead in this industry. That is why we need governments that will stand up for industries on the global stage. To say that our agricultural sector has had a challenging time over the past few years is an understatement. The ban placed on Canadian meat imports by China this past summer directly harmed hundreds of Alberta meat producers, as have similar restrictions to our canola products. Here in Alberta we support our agricultural industries and work hard to ensure that we will not fail them. However, we need to demand more from our federal government, especially when Alberta's agricultural interests are under threat due to unresolved international diplomatic disputes.

Part of my reason for standing in this House today is to recognize the importance of our agricultural industry and our farmers, but I'm also standing to recognize how important it is that we challenge those who don't into action. Our farmers deserve governments that will stand up for them, Mr. Speaker, and I hope to do so.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday has the call.

Westend Seniors Activity Centre

Mr. Carson: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my privilege to rise today to recognize the important contributions of the Westend Seniors Activity Centre in my community. I've had the honour of representing the centre and many of its members for the last four and a half years, and I've seen first-hand how important this community hub is to seniors and their families. Whether you are looking to stay active through their daily programming or just want to drop in for lunch, the centre is always bustling, and you are always among friends.

I was incredibly proud to join members of the board as they received the 2019 minister's seniors service award. Among over 50 nominations province-wide, WESAC was one of two organizations recognized with this award, and I truly couldn't think of a more deserving group of volunteers. Executive Director Haidong Liang, President Jay Pritchard, Vice-president Barbara Gibson, Treasurer Spurgeon Gammon, and all of the directors go above and beyond to serve the centre's over 2,000 members. With a wealth of knowledge and experience in the fields of gerontology, education, nursing, and more, the board understands the needs of seniors in our community when it comes to healthy aging, active living, and combatting the isolation that many seniors feel.

West Edmonton is incredibly lucky to have such an important community hub like WESAC. I have made many new friends at the centre and have learned so much from its members. I encourage all members of our community to visit the centre for one of their many holiday and cultural celebrations or on November 11 as we reflect and pay respect to those who have served our country.

Once again, I would like to thank the executive director, Haidong Liang, the board, and all of the centre's volunteers for making west Edmonton the best place to live for seniors and families alike, and congratulations on your well-deserved minister's seniors service award.

Thank you.

Energy Industry

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I rise today because I am deeply troubled by the villainization of Alberta's oil and gas industry. Under Trudeau's government we saw Alberta's energy industry attacked time and time again with bills C-69, the no more pipelines bill, and C-48, the export tanker ban, which blocks Alberta from exporting our resources but does nothing to stop tankers filled with oil from oppressive regimes sailing down the St. Lawrence or from Alaska down the west coast.

Our energy industry has been crippled by hostile activism, so today I want to highlight some facts that they missed. Albertan oil sands contribute only .15 per cent of global emissions. Last year total emissions from China and India were about 12,000 megatonnes, equivalent to about 150 Canadian oil sands. How is it reasonable for one to argue that Canada's oil sands are somehow a leading factor in contributing to climate change? This false narrative is extremely dangerous to Canada's economic and social well-being. We need a new form of humanitarian activism that is based on drawing these countries into a global response to climate change.

China, India, and developing countries continue to build coal plants. Canadian natural gas has the potential to displace coal as a primary source of power generation in these countries and lower global emissions. Canadian natural gas is some of the cheapest in the world, and when we block the export of this resource, we are telling developing countries that they must transition without our help.

I am also extremely concerned that three parties in the federal election openly discussed phasing out the oil sands in Alberta. This means phasing out one of Canada's most valuable assets, which pays for pensions, roads, health care, and education and employs hundreds of thousands across Canada. It is time we stopped treating our resources as a burden and started opening our markets. I am proud that our Premier is standing up for Alberta's oil and gas industry, and I am proud to stand there right beside him.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Fetal Alcohol Spectrum Disorder

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Recently I met with the hard-working, compassionate, and smart women of southern Alberta's FASD network. Fetal alcohol spectrum disorder affects 36,000 Albertans who suffer from this preventable injury that results from prenatal exposure to alcohol and is a lifelong condition with no cure. It can have a wide range of effects, from memory and learning difficulties to impulse control and complex social difficulties.

The women of southern Alberta's FASD network shared two things with me. First, FASD is entirely preventable, and much work still needs to be done to communicate and educate Albertans that it's simply safest not to drink alcohol during pregnancy. The southern Alberta FASD network is actively engaged in this work.

Second, these women shared their concerns about the UCP's approach to providing services to those living with FASD. Specifically, they are concerned that this government will amalgamate their organizations under PDD, leaving clients without specifically targeted and co-ordinated services that improve their lives. The UCP election platform on pages 77 and 78 promises to do just that. The advocates that I spoke with fear that this means fewer services, less co-ordination, and a lower quality of life for those living with FASD and the families that help care for them.

The Lethbridge constituents I met with expressed their confusion as to why the UCP would meddle in a series of programs and funding that already work, are already stretched thin, and demonstrate increasing need.

On behalf of the southern Alberta FASD network and all those they serve, I call on this government and this minister to resist the urge to cut these valuable services or otherwise introduce chaos into the FASD programs and supports. Please, Mr. Speaker, don't let it be persons with developmental disabilities or the FASD networks that bear the brunt of UCP arrogance and lack of empathy.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon would like to make a statement.

Genesee Gas Pipeline Construction Contracts

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Alberta provincial motto is "strong and free," and it reflects our desire as a people to be independent, capable of making our own choices. Albertans understand that strong societies are built by people who have the freedom to pursue their own economic self-interest. They understand that the goal is not economic equality but the freedom to pursue economic opportunity and to benefit from their hard work and wise choices.

Today in the constituency of Drayton Valley-Devon a large multinational company is building a natural gas pipeline to the Genesee power plant. This announcement was welcome news to the many service companies in my community that have barely survived the last five years. This project could mean the difference between keeping their doors open, keeping people employed, and paying mortgages. They looked forward to bidding on third-party contracts, but their dreams were dashed when it became evident that there was not going to be a free and open bidding process. This billion-dollar company had hired a unionized Ontario-based company to build the pipeline for them. Now the many non-unionized local companies would be excluded from the bidding process. Many local companies came to my office frustrated that union politics appeared to be restricting their freedom to bid on third-party work.

Let me be clear. These companies only wanted a shot at placing their experience and capacity into the bidding process, and that was not happening. It appeared that out-of-province workers were signing up at local union halls and were being hired while experienced local workers were having to rent out their homes to the influx of outside workers and move in with relatives in order to make their own mortgage payments.

Where was the freedom to compete? Why could they not be given the opportunity to prosper off the resources that are being harvested and transported in their backyards and that would be used to light their homes? This is not some esoteric university economics exercise.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The Leader of Her Majesty's Official Opposition.

Federal-provincial Relations

Ms Notley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. This Premier has raised the equalization formula as a matter he'll invite Albertans to weigh in on. Now, this is a complicated issue, and facts matter. Here are some of them. In 2007 the Harper government, of which this Premier was a part, changed the formula to give the province of Quebec more from equalization. In 2009 the Harper government, that this Premier was part of, made another change that cost Albertans well over a billion dollars every year. Will the Premier commit today that when he starts his public hearings, will they begin with an apology for his role in making the equalization formula even more unfair to Albertans?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, complete rubbish. In fact, the Harper government increased health transfers to Alberta by a billion dollars a year, and when the last equalization formula was set, we didn't have other provincial governments or Ottawa blocking and killing pipelines. But the Leader of the NDP just voted for a pipeline killer. She just voted for the party that campaigned against Alberta workers. She voted for the party that she said had thrown workers under the bus. She voted for the Leap Manifesto party. She voted for the leader who said: I'm firmly opposed to Trans Mountain, I've always been opposed to it, and I'll continue to fight against it. She was wrong to support that.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, this Premier claims to love Canada in one breath and then stokes notions of separating in another. He has announced a panel of Albertans to look further into our role in Confederation, but even Conservative Manitoba Premier Brian Pallister said that he doesn't like listening to talk of separation from western Canadian friends of his. To the Premier: why won't you listen to your colleague and refocus on uniting Canadians instead of driving them apart?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, it's precisely in order to listen to Albertans that we will ask some prominent members of Alberta society to listen to Albertans and their rightful frustration about having gone through a federal campaign where this province became a punching bag for federal parties, including the NDP. Now, all Albertans are asking for – and the NDP will never understand this – is a fair deal. What we're saying to the rest of the federation is: if you want to benefit from the resources that we develop in this province, then help us to get those resources to global markets instead of supporting parties like the NDP that are fighting to shut down pipelines.

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, to be perfectly clear, the equalization formula that the Premier is screaming about is one that he wrote. If Albertans are angry, they should be angry at this Premier.

Now, another thing that will not bring this country together is this Premier's continued efforts to deflect the very real threat of climate change. In the federal election two-thirds of Canadians voted for a meaningful plan. This Premier and indeed his own staff have done nothing but mock Alberta citizens concerned about climate change. To the Premier: why won't you admit that your polarization plan is a dead end that's letting down Albertans and letting down Alberta's oil and gas?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, what we're hearing from the NDP today, what we're seeing in their vote for the federal NDP, what we saw by them participating in the so-called climate strike is that they decided to go back to being a fringe rump party in this province. That's why they got 11 per cent of the vote this week. You know, the climate strike they're talking about is committed to the immediate shutdown of the entire oil and gas industry, leaving all of our resources in the ground, opposition to every single pipeline, that would create economic devastation in this province. The mask has slipped. Now we can see that they have always been against Alberta.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Provincial Fiscal Policies

Ms Phillips: Mr. Speaker, today I was joined by Albertans who will be paying the price in tomorrow's budget. I was joined by students, health care workers, parents, and persons with disabilities who are worried that the services they rely on have been put on the chopping block to pay for the Premier's zero-job, 4 and half billion dollar corporate tax giveaway. To the Premier: please explain to the people who came to the Legislature today – they're right up there in the gallery – why big corporations get billions and they get nothing.

Mr. Kenney: Well, they don't, Mr. Speaker. It's just a continuation of the NDP campaign to try to deceive Albertans. They tried it in the last campaign. You know what happened? They were first one-term government to be fired by Albertans. There is no, quote, $4.5 billion giveaway. There is the job-creation tax cut. Why? Because we are in a jobs crisis bestowed on this province by the NDP. Economists, multiple credible economists, indicate that will create 55,000 new full-time private-sector jobs. [interjections] Instead of heckling job creation, they should be part of a plan to actually create new jobs in this province. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Hon. members, we will have order.

The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Thank you. Mr. Speaker, the Premier's little arrogant trip down memory lane is cold comfort to the health care aide in Vegreville that was laid off earlier this month and that joins us in the gallery. The Minister of Health has refused to do anything to help her or the 51 other workers laid off. The minister for status of women told her to go back to school even though the Advanced Education minister is planning to hike tuition and cut postsecondary funding by 25 per cent. To the Premier: they're right up here; explain to the workers in Vegreville and right across this province why you aren't keeping them working and also are cutting off their access to further education.

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Shandro: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was very pleased to have the opportunity to meet with the workers from Century Park from Vegreville when they were able to come a few weeks ago to the Legislature. I thought it was a productive meeting. They had many questions for me. Just today we were able to reply to their questions through correspondence, and I thank them again for meeting with me and expressing their concerns throughout the process.

Ms Phillips: Mr. Speaker, this government moved to rush through a 4 and a half billion dollar giveaway claiming that it would create jobs, but yesterday we saw the results. Husky made almost a quarter of a billion dollars from the corporate giveaway and then laid off a large number of Calgary workers. This corporate handout is not a jobs giveaway. Premier, can we expect no more no-jobs policies in tomorrow's budgets, or are you too busy stoking the fires of separation and undermining the principles of a united Canada to think of any?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, you know what stokes the fires of separation? It's federal parties who campaign against this province and its workers. It's federal parties trying to shut down this economy and push Albertans out of work, federal parties like the NDP, supported by that member, a party that was rejected in a historic electoral mandate. They got 11 per cent of the vote because they spent weeks campaigning against this province and Alberta jobs. When will they listen to Albertans?

Budget 2019 Consultation

Mr. Bilous: Mr. Speaker, stay tuned: that's all Albertans get from this Finance minister as they brace for this government's budget tomorrow, one we know will cut health care, education, and other services Albertans rely on. A hundred and eighty minutes was all this minister could spare to talk to Albertans about this budget during a tightly controlled telephone town hall that was full of, frankly, nothing, no details, no confirmation of funding for schools or hospitals. To the Premier: for the record, on the eve of this budget do you think this was an appropriate amount of consultation?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, we spent five weeks consulting with Albertans nonstop during the last election campaign, and they gave this government the largest democratic mandate in our province's history to undo the massive damage to our economy, to jobs, and our province's finances inflicted by the NDP. We've spent the last six months listening to Albertans, and they've continued to tell us that it's time to stop kicking the can down the road, that we can no longer live off our credit card, that we can't spend money that we don't have, and that we need to make challenging decisions to get our fiscal house back in order.

Mr. Bilous: Clearly the Premier says one thing in this House and something else outside.

Now, Albertans can pay $125 to the UCP campaign war chest for a seat at a fundraising breakfast being hosted by the Minister of Finance this Friday, where it appears an actual conversation about provincial finances will occur. To the Premier: do all budget consultations hosted by this government require Albertans to sign up for a UCP membership and donate to your political party?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, I don't know where that member or his colleagues were on Alberta election day in April, but Albertans gave a very clear response to the consultation on the fiscal and economic direction of this party by over a million of them, for the first time in history, voting for a government that committed to balance the budget by growing the economy and restraining spending. That party left behind – they quadrupled the size of our debt. They had us on track to a hundred billion dollar debt, wasting $4 billion a year in interest payments. We are not going to let the future of this province be jeopardized by reckless NDP fiscal policies.

Mr. Bilous: Once again, Mr. Speaker, one thing in this Chamber, another thing on the campaign trail.

The budget will be introduced tomorrow, and I have no doubt it's a done deal, in this government's mind. They'll attempt to ram it through this House and claim that the election was real consultation. If that's so, to the Premier: can you please point me to announcements you made in the campaign about cutting postsecondary by 25 per cent, moving to an American-style health care model, or throwing a 4 and a half billion dollar corporate handout that hasn't generated any jobs to date? Premier, the clock is ticking.

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, this government will keep its platform commitments, on which we were elected. We will keep our word with Albertans, as will be evident in tomorrow's budget. But, you know, the member can take a look at the polling done by the government of Alberta on this budget. You know what Albertans are telling us overwhelmingly? To get our spending under control so that we stop mortgaging our future. They certainly agree. Albertans in those polls massively disagree with the NDP's alternative, which is to raise taxes on Albertans. No. We won't do that. We won't dig our hands deeper into Albertans' pockets. Instead, we'll get our spending under control.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo has risen.

Calgary and Edmonton Finances

Member Ceci: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In an op-ed published yesterday, the Minister of Municipal Affairs accused our two largest cities of spending recklessly without being able to provide any examples. When asked outside the Legislature on Tuesday to name an example of reckless spending, he couldn't. Perhaps the Premier can do the minister's job for him now. To the Premier: can you name one example of a project that the city council in Calgary wasted money on? Please be specific.

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, it is clear from the minister's opinion article that based on data, the two largest cities have increased both spending and taxes faster than inflation, economic growth, or population. That's the point he made, and that is statistically true. You know one of the reasons for that? Well, one of the reasons is the guy who just asked the question . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Mr. Kenney: . . . Alberta's worst ever Finance minister, who voted for massive spending increases and, year after year, tax increases. Albertans can't afford that kind of tax hike anymore. That's why that government was defeated in the last election.

Member Ceci: Distract, deflect, distract. You're coming after me because you can't do a thing for Calgary.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Point of order.

Member Ceci: Mr. Speaker, clearly this Premier and this minister are trying to demonize the city councils in Edmonton and Calgary as they search for scapegoats to justify cutting infrastructure funding for municipalities. While I don't agree with every decision those councillors have made, I fear greatly that the Premier will do damage to our cities. To the Premier: which project will be on the chopping block for Calgary tomorrow? Will it be the green line, the Springbank dam, or is it both?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, Alberta's worst ever Finance minister still doesn't get it. What does damage to our cities, to our public services, and to our future is a massive debt hole that we can't get out of. If we continue with the NDP's fiscal direction, with over $100 billion of debt, you know what that means? Didn't the finance bureaucrats explain this to him? It means spending billions of tax dollars on interest payments to bankers and bondholders instead of building infrastructure, schools, and hospitals. We won't do that. We will not allow this province to be sunk in a . . .

Member Ceci: Pay-as-you-go gets you nowhere and builds nothing, Mr. Speaker.

I find it disturbing that this minister and this Premier would accuse our cities of wasting money, when this government has handed over a $4.5 billion, no-jobs gift to big corporations. Their plan hasn't created a job. It's lost 27,000 since they came aboard. To the Premier: let me ask you this; do you really think you can take the moral high ground here on waste when you have failed us in Alberta and given money to corporations for a scheme that hasn't created any jobs?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, one of the reasons he's going to go down in history as the worst Finance minister since 1905 is because he increased taxes on everything, including on incomes and businesses, and revenues went down. He tried to play old-school socialist, soak-the-rich, class-warfare politics . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. members, order. Order. We will not have yelling from the back row.

Mr. Kenney: It's yelling from the entire Official Opposition because they can't defend their failed record. Mr. Speaker, he raised taxes on businesses. Less revenue came into the treasury. We, instead, are sending a message that Alberta is open for business to create jobs.

Support for Persons with Disabilities

Mr. Yaseen: Mr. Speaker, across Alberta people with disabilities face unique challenges, from finding employment to accessible housing. This group often faces barriers when it comes to accessing the services they need. To the Minister of Community and Social Services: can you please tell us how the government is removing barriers to these essential services?

Mrs. Sawhney: Thank you to the Member for Calgary-North for that question. Mr. Speaker, our government is committed to an open, transparent dialogue with the disability community. Through my new disability advisory forum I'm working with the community to gain insight and perspective on specific topics impacting people with disabilities. Input from the forum helps us identify how our programs can more effectively support Albertans. Alberta Supports offices across the province also help people with disabilities every day to access the services they need.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-North.

Mr. Yaseen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the same minister: given that roughly 400,000 Albertans are living with a disability and given that this group tends to have much lower incomes and higher unemployment, can the minister outline what our government is doing to help persons with disabilities find gainful employment?

Mrs. Sawhney: Mr. Speaker, our government supports Albertans with disabilities to live full lives and have access to equal opportunities. We are taking action on several fronts for inclusive employment, including building on successful programs like Abilities at Work and the Rotary employment partnerships. We are also providing funding to support these partnerships to facilitate job opportunities for people with disabilities.

Mr. Yaseen: Given that Alberta was left in a fiscal mess by the NDP's disastrous overspending and reckless policies, as verified in the MacKinnon report, and given that our government has committed to supporting those with disabilities, can the minister outline how our government will continue to support persons with disabilities while also staying on track to balance the budget?

Mrs. Sawhney: Mr. Speaker, a significant platform commitment was that we would enhance employment opportunities to individuals with disabilities. We know that the unemployment rates in the disability community are unacceptably high, and we're committed to making job opportunities for all Albertans. We also understand the fiscal constraints and financial realities that we're dealing with. This is why we need to ensure that our programs are sustainable for the long term, sustainable for generations to come.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora has the call.

Education Funding

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I was very pleased to read yesterday that the Minister of Education has decided to expand the NDP school nutrition program by 20 per cent in this upcoming budget. That certainly is good news, and I want to express our gratitude and appreciation for that. What I was surprised by, though, was the last comment in the media yesterday, when the minister said, quote: I wish I had enough money to feed everyone. News flash: you did. There was $4.5 billion that, instead of being given to focus on things like health care and education and poverty, has been invested by giving it away in a no-jobs corporate handout, so to the minister: you did. You made your priority . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education is rising.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. We're very happy to be increasing the budget for the nutrition program. We are absolutely committed to education. We've said that. You only have one more sleep to find out how much we are committed to it.

Ms Hoffman: Only one more wake-up, Mr. Speaker. If only this government would wake up.

Given that the minister could have tripled the nutrition program for the price of the Energy minister's war room alone and given that she could have fed even more hungry kids with the money that the Attorney General is spending on his witch hunt public inquiry, how many times did the Minister of Education fail to speak up for children, or is it that none of her colleagues listened to her? Why aren't you feeding all the kids you're so eager to feed?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. We've been very clear that there are no cuts to education. We are looking through the lens of what is best for children and what will improve student learning. Stay tuned tomorrow. You will see the budget.

Ms Hoffman: Given that shareholders are celebrating while Calgary workers are being laid off this week, Mr. Speaker, and given that we've also met with parents in Calgary whose kids are crammed into classrooms with more than 40 students and others who have complex needs seeing their students' bus times triple, to the minister: thanks for realizing that the school nutrition program has value. It really does. Will you now work to correct the other problems that you've caused in education through your dithering, delays, and cuts?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. Again, this is just more fearmongering. The NDP have been wrong on enrolment growth. They're wrong on the nutrition program. They're wrong again.

Energy Efficiency Alberta

Mr. Schmidt: Yesterday I spoke with the Deputy Minister of Environment and Parks at Public Accounts. Unlike this minister, she actually gave me some real answers. She told us that Energy Efficiency Alberta had invested $200 million, which will save Albertans about $700 million in energy costs, not to mention reduce greenhouse gas emissions by 6 million tonnes. The minister's own data shows that Energy Efficiency Alberta is a success. Is the minister still planning to cancel it and return Alberta to being the only province without an energy efficiency agency?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is going to have to wait to see a couple of things; first, the budget tomorrow, which he knows I can't talk about today. Second, as I've said, I'm looking forward to tabling TIER inside this Assembly to talk about our plan when it come to climate inside this province. I can tell you – and I've told this House many times – it won't be like that hon. member's plan, which was all economic pain and no environmental gain. We will not go out of our way to tax hard-working Albertans with no environmental benefit. Instead, we'll focus on technology, innovation, and working together with our great energy sector in this province to work our way through this problem.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, given that that was the closest thing to a real answer we've heard from that minister in weeks and given that Deputy Minister Yee went on to tell us that Energy Efficiency Alberta is driving $850 million in economic activity and given that that's $850 million more in economic activity than this government's no-jobs corporate handout has created, why is the minister so opposed to a successful energy efficiency program and yet so supportive of a $4.5 billion corporate handout?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, we're not not supportive of energy efficiency and things along those lines. What we are not supportive of – let me very, very clear – is the NDP's approach of taking hard-working Albertans' money out of their pockets and then spending it on companies, like from Ontario, on light bulbs and shower heads. This side of the House has a very different approach to climate change, one that will actually work and that focuses on technology and innovation. It's a big contrast, and Albertans made it clear in April which one they wanted. They don't want the tax NDP, they want the solution-based current Alberta government.

Mr. Schmidt: Given that our program bought shower heads for average Albertans while their $4.5 billion handout gives ivory back-scratchers to corporate CEOs and given that Energy Efficiency Alberta created 4,300 private-sector jobs, why won't the minister face the facts from his own deputy minister that Energy Efficiency Alberta is a success and his corporate giveaway is a big failure?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, let's be clear. That party, that member, and that member's leader of that party sold out Albertans by her own admission just a few days ago by voting for a party whose leader said: I am firmly opposed to the pipeline; I've been opposed to it, I will continue to fight against it, and I will absolutely continue to fight against it. This side of the House won't be lectured on how to stand up for Albertans because that side of the House has sold them out at every single opportunity. Albertans can rest assured that their current government will stand with them every day and continue to fight for our largest industry. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. We will have order.

The hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika has the call.

Animal Rights Activist Protests at Farms and Ranches

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Alberta's agriculture producers need to feel like this government has their back, and we do. Today we learned that four people had been arrested in connection with the dangerous and illegal invasion of the Jumbo Valley turkey farm, an issue that is particularly concerning to me as an MLA who represents 29 Hutterite colonies and over $2 billion in farm gate sales. Can the minister tell this House how this aligns with his new policy to protect farmers and ranchers?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Dreeshen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I'd like to thank the member for the question. The RCMP did arrest four adults and one youth that did invade the Jumbo Valley turkey farm. During the farm freedom and safety act tour that I did over this summer, there was a huge demand and a cry from rural Alberta to make sure that there was restored faith in our justice system. I think this is a big first step to be able to address that. RCMP are actually laying charges against individuals that were trespassing and effectively stopping farmers from being able to do what they do best.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that Alberta farmers and ranchers treat their animals well by adhering to world-class quality standards and given that they have the right to manage their operations without the threat of illegal harassment from militant trespassers acting like weak, petulant children and given that this government is committed to supporting our farmers and ranchers, how is this minister going to prevent future biosecurity breaches and deter individuals and organizations from putting Alberta farmers and ranchers at risk?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Dreeshen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and again I'd like to thank the Member for Cardston-Siksika for that great question. Radical activists who do this type of illegal activity, who actually go into barns, whether they be turkey or dairy or any barns that have biosecurity hazards protocols – it's a danger to the protestors, if you want to call them protestors, as well as to the animals. I'm committed to amending the Animal Health Act to be able to have for a first offence a $15,000 fine and for subsequent offences, $30,000 plus one year in jail. That's something that our farming community expects from this government.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister for that answer. Given that Alberta farmers and ranchers want action on this issue and given that the fine people of Cardston-Siksika are tired of watching these misguided trespassers run roughshod over the rule of law and given that we saw concrete action today by the RCMP, can the minister tell the House if this is the end of the story, or is there further action to be taken to deter this irresponsible and ridiculous behaviour?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Dreeshen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is reassuring to rural Albertans that there is a culture of enforcement. There seems to be a culture of enforcement from our police services. To me, it's important as a minister and also as an Albertan and as a farmer to see that rural Albertans' concerns are being addressed. There is something that the Justice minister is working on as well as amendments to the Animal Health Act, the Provincial Offences Procedure Act, so that compensation awarded by a court would go from $25,000 up to $100,000. Again, the Justice minister has been working diligently to make amendments to the trespassing act, again increasing fines and jail time for these radical activists, that have no place in our agriculture community.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre is rising to ask a question.

Vegreville Century Park Supportive Living Facility

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Now, Albertans should be worried about the health care they receive as this government continues to choose corporate handouts over funding quality public care. This Minister of Health turned his back on seniors in Vegreville when a B.C. corporation, Optima Living, fired all of their primary caregivers. "But don't worry," he says; he's monitoring the situation closely. Is this minister aware that the Optima Living facility in Vegreville has failed three consecutive Alberta Health inspections while he has been minister, including as recently as October 3?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Mr. Shandro: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yes, that is true. We are monitoring the situation closely. We are working with AHS, who is continuing to oversee the transition to the new provider. We're going to continue to get updates from AHS as they let us know what is going to continue to happen with Century Park.

Mr. Shepherd: Well, Mr. Speaker, given that this minister knew that and still has taken no action, it's equally disturbing and given that this Minister of Health has just apparently recently learned what a chemical restraint is and given that this inappropriate overuse of medication is common in these sorts of private facilities with underpaid, undertrained, and unfamiliar staff, will this minister explain why he's apparently okay with medicating Vegreville seniors into submission as long as it maximizes value for Optima's shareholders?

Mr. Shandro: Mr. Speaker, I'm sorry; I don't understand the hon. member's question. I don't intervene in the operations of AHS or our nonprofit partners or our private partners in continuing care or our public partners in continuing care. I have no idea – I'm happy to answer any questions that the member might have for me offline. I'm not intervening in the operations of this facility.

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, given that if the minister is watching closely, he's apparently not seeing much and given that the Vegreville workers are currently at the Labour board to make a last ditch appeal for these seniors and for themselves and given that this minister has refused to lift a finger to help them, is it any surprise that the lawyer that's been hired by Optima Living, the man arguing against Alberta workers and Alberta seniors, is a big money donor to the UCP? To the minister: how much do the workers of Vegreville need to donate to your party for you to lift your finger to do your job?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Shandro: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. While we're talking about continuing care and while we're talking about dollar amounts, let's talk about the debt that we were left with by the NDP. Let's talk about the amount of money that we spend every year on servicing that debt and the amount of money that we are sending to bondholders and to bankers. With that money we could spend on over a thousand new beds in continuing care per quarter, 4,000 beds per year. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Mr. Shandro: Instead, because of their debt we are not able to do that, Mr. Speaker. It's a problem that we're going to fix in this government because it's a problem that we were left by the NDP government.

Child Mental Health Services in Edmonton

Member Irwin: Last week I met with a constituent who is deeply concerned about her child's mental health. Her child has been waiting for months for access to mental health supports at the Royal Alexandra hospital. She was relieved to hear about the commitment by our previous NDP government earlier this year to fund and build a new $226 million children's mental health centre right here in Edmonton. To the Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions: have you advocated for the construction of this new centre, and if so, what have you done to make it a reality?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions or the Minister of Health.

Mr. Luan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This government has committed to caring for Albertans, and we have made an unprecedented commitment to mental health and addictions in the scale of $140 million to provide a comprehensive mental health and addictions strategy. While the members opposite recklessly spent government money and created this huge debt, that put the services for Albertans at risk, we are going to do it right.

Member Irwin: Given that my caucus colleagues have heard from constituents about the importance of funding supports for mental health and given that the supports such as those that will be offered at this centre are desperately needed and given that wait-lists are long for many families across Alberta, will this minister commit to supporting the mental health centre, or will these young people be more victims of his government's $4.5 billion giveaway to large corporations?

Mr. Shandro: Mr. Speaker, obviously we can't speak about what is going to be in the budget tomorrow. I think that the hon. member actually does not understand what was going to be built at CAMH. I don't think that the hon. member understands the amount of new spaces. It was actually only going to provide an additional five new beds. It is a project that was going to centralize a lot of the beds into the one facility. There is no crisis in child mental health right now, and our government actually . . . [interjections]

Member Irwin: Unbelievable.

Given that there is a crisis and given that kids are hurting as they wait for supports, whether it be through self-harm, suicide attempts, and, sadly, in some cases, lives are being lost and given that these supports have far-reaching impacts related to many other issues systemic to mental health, like homelessness and poverty, will this minister stand in the House today and pledge that he will choose children over corporations and commit his support to vulnerable youth and move this project forward?

Mr. Shandro: Mr. Speaker, obviously, what I meant to say – we were talking about the spaces for child mental health. That's what we were talking about. Obviously, our government is spending a hundred million dollars on a mental health and addictions strategy. This has been a focus and a priority for this government. It's going to continue to be. This is a focus. Quite honestly, if this is such an important issue for the hon. member, why is it taking us only five months to fix a problem that they couldn't do in four years?

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Stony Plain.

Support for Alberta Artists

Mr. Turton: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. All of us have been moved by art and culture at least once in our lives. We have all experienced the power of a favourite song or witnessed the beauty of a remarkable work of art. In my riding of Spruce Grove-Stony Plain art is visible everywhere. Stony Plain even offers a special tour of just the murals that dot the landscape of our downtown. To the Minister of Culture, Multiculturalism and Status of Women: what is this government doing to support made-in-Alberta arts, and what are we doing to encourage the next generation of Albertan artists?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Culture, Multiculturalism and Status of Women.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you very much to the member for this question. Our government, obviously, values world-class art and the artists that call Alberta home. Our government currently – we're really excited about this – is working to support Alberta arts and artists through the development of the arts professions act.

Mr. Turton: Thank you, Minister, for that answer. Given that artists work very hard at their craft and many artists have told us that receiving proper payment for their work is one of the largest issues for everyone in the sector and given, Mr. Speaker, that many of these artists are further asked to deliver work at a discount or even for free, what will this government be doing to ensure that artists are being fairly compensated for their work?

The Speaker: The hon. minister of culture and multiculturalism.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. The government's platform commitment is to grow the arts and cultural industries by $1.5 billion, or 25 per cent, over the next decade. As an artist and as anybody else who is an artist in this space knows, we dedicate and donate a lot of our time to causes that are very important to us. As a person who's involved in this work, we know that art is work. It's a very important piece. The adoption of the arts professions act will ensure that artists are given formal recognition. It will protect their freedom of expression, their freedom of economic and contractual . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Stony Plain.

Mr. Turton: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister. Given that we have hundreds of talented artisans all across the province and given that we should be shining a spotlight on homegrown talent within our communities and given that we so often see communities paying artists who live outside of the country for their work rather than supporting our local artists, can the same minister please explain how this government is encouraging our communities throughout the province to utilize our local artists?

Mrs. Aheer: Well, we are very excited to keep this platform commitment. Part of it, of course, Mr. Speaker, is building partnerships between the arts and the philanthropic and business sectors. These partnerships will provide more local opportunities for artists who work at home. Also, I think a larger piece of this puzzle is consulting with the artists – they are the experts in their field – to make sure that we understand how best to support arts and culture. Every one of these industries has an immense ability to grow. We're really excited to help get that job done.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods would like to ask a question.

Employee Labour Relations Support Program Law Firm Contracts

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. The Alberta government recently launched the employee labour relations support program. This new program is apparently meant to provide Albertans with information about working in unionized environments and about the certification and decertification process. It's been discovered that in certain cases this program will be providing inquiring Albertans with access to free legal advice, the cost of which will be covered by the government. Can the minister of labour share with us the full list of law firms that were part of the so-called limited request for proposal to do this work and how those firms were decided?

The Speaker: The hon. minister of labour.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As the hon. member across knows, Bill 2 established a program to provide support and assistance to unionized employees or employees that may become part of a union in order for them to better understand and exercise their rights. This was launched on October 1. It was part of our commitment that we made in our platform, and it was part of Bill 2. I was very excited that we actually were able to launch this and provide advice to employees so they can actually get the answers that they need when they sometimes don't understand the code.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Ms Gray: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that in the labour relations community it is very well known that some law firms are considered employer-side, some others are considered employee-side firms, it will be very interesting to see which firms this government is paying to provide free legal advice to those Albertans interested in union-related matters. Can the minister guarantee that there will be an equal mix of employer-side and employee-side law firms providing this government-paid-for advice to inquiring Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Labour and Immigration has the call.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The intent of this line is to provide neutral advice and provide advice in relation to the code, nothing more, nothing less. It's not going to be from either side. Really, the intent behind it was to allow employees – potential unionized employees and those who are already unionized employees – to get neutral advice, not from the union, not from management, but from the government and a government source.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Ms Gray: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that covering the cost of legal counsel could potentially quickly add up and given that the government claims to be making tough choices when it comes to spending in so many other areas to pay for the $4.5 billion hole they created with their corporate tax giveaway, to the minister. There are serious concerns that this will become a biased hotline offering free antiunion legal advice. Is that a good use of taxpayer resources?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, the suggestion that this program is biased in any way is simply incorrect. We are committed to providing Albertans with information so they can make informed decisions. The maximum amount that we will provide in terms of legal counsel is one hour for a question. It's primarily designed to deal with procedural issues.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Early Learning and Child Care Centres

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last week I tabled two petitions from over 2,500 Albertans from across the province urging this government to continue the ELCC $25-per-day child care pilot program and expand it to be universal. Twenty-two child care centres were part of phase 1 of that pilot program. The $25-per-day support from the ELCC program will end in these centres in March 2020, just five months from now. The Minister of Children's Services has said that no decisions will be made about the continuation of the program until she has completed a review. To the minister: when will your review be complete?

The Speaker: The Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. The terms of the pilot have not changed since they were put in place by the former government. The review will be complete also on the timeline set out by the former government. We're looking forward to receiving that data. But what I can tell you about the pilot is that it was set up in a way that tracked one ideological approach to child care, universality. It did not track need, it did not track income, it did not track employment, and it did not track wait-lists. I'll continue to work to listen to Albertans and ensure that parents have access to . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'll try again. Given that these 22 child care centres have indicated that they have to make decisions by January, two months from now, about how much they will be able to pay their staff and how much child care fees will have to increase for parents without the continuation of the ELCC grant, to the minister: will your review be complete by January?

The Speaker: The Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. We are continuing to work towards a system of child care to support Alberta families, not by picking winners and losers, not by choosing have and have-not child care centres and have-not parents. That is not going to be our approach. You want to talk about the record of the NDP: $5 million a day in interest, $2 billion a year; $100 billion dollars in debt. We will remain fiscally responsible, and we will support Alberta working parents and families.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm not asking questions about ideology or records; I'm asking a straightforward question about timelines, that the minister should be able to answer.

Some Hon. Members: Preamble.

Ms Pancholi: Given that these 22 phase 1 child care centres are saying that many of their current families would not be able to afford the child care fees if the $25-per-day program ends and given that these families will have to make decisions soon about whether they can find alternate low-cost child care or whether a parent will have to quit their job because they can't afford child care, to the minister: will you be able to give these parents an answer by January about whether they will continue to have affordable child care?

The Speaker: I appreciate the hon. members' support in determining what is or isn't a preamble, but I think that I'm capable of doing that.

The hon. minister.

Ms Schulz: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We've reached out to child care centres across the province, the 22 who were involved in the first phase of the pilot, to let them know that we understand their need for predictability. We will let them know as soon as the decision is made. I do want to point out, though, that the vast majority of child care centres in the pilot have been operating in Alberta and serving Alberta children and families long before this pilot was put in place. We will work with those child care centres no matter what we choose going forward, and there are also subsidy programs in place to support working Alberta families who need it.

Indigenous Opportunities Corporation

Mr. Long: Mr. Speaker, Justin Trudeau's time in office has been marked by a lot of platitudes and broken promises, particularly on indigenous issues. The indigenous people that I have discussions with are tired of empty gestures and flowery rhetoric. They're encouraged that our government is committed to making Alberta First Nations and Métis full partners in prosperity. Can the hon. Minister of Indigenous Relations tell this House what progress has been made in launching the Alberta indigenous opportunities corporation?

The Speaker: The Minister of Indigenous Relations.

Mr. Wilson: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, hon. member, for the question. I can tell you that we've been moving forward rapidly. When I was first elected, I met with the grand chief of Treaty 6, and he told me that there's been a lot of talk about reconciliation. He said: what we really need is reconcili-action. I just love that term, "reconcili-action." That's what this government is all about, action. We've moved forward quickly on this. We've put Bill 14 forward, and we've got third reading on it, and we're just awaiting proclamation and royal assent to put that into place. We've been working on the board. We've got members coming forward, and it's all coming together quite nicely.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for West Yellowhead.

Mr. Long: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Minister.

Given that indigenous peoples are one of the fastest growing populations in Canada but continue to be the least well-off demographic and given that despite billions of dollars having been spent at a variety of levels of government to improve living conditions for indigenous peoples, we have not seen the desired outcomes, can the hon. minister explain why this Crown corporation could prove a sustainable model for First Nations prosperity?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Indigenous Relations.

Mr. Wilson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and again thank you, hon. member. This summer we went out, and we heard from stakeholders across the province, and what we heard clearly was that they're looking for a hand up, not a handout. They're proud people, and that's what they're looking for. So we worked hard on putting the program together. We're looking at putting the board together right now. We've got some great applicants in there. We've got a lot of good indigenous people that have come forward and put their names up, and I'm really looking forward to getting the board in place and getting the whole program up and running. Like I say, there are some really good people that we're going to be putting on the board.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Long: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you, Minister.

Given that indigenous issues remain largely under the purview of the federal government and given that the legal framework surrounding subjects like consultation is complex and ever-changing, can the hon. minister assure this House that the Alberta indigenous opportunities corporation can overcome its legal hurdles?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Wilson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and again thank you to the member. Our staff has been working very hard putting this whole program together and reviewing it to make sure that it has no legal implications, to make sure that the Alberta indigenous opportunities corporation is being set up properly. I can assure you of that. Our government's consultation process is committed to making sure that indigenous concerns are heard and addressed and that industry has certainty out there. We need to make sure that everyone has been heard, and we've been working hard to get that all put into place.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein has risen.

Petrochemical Industry Development

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We are blessed to have a skilled workforce that has revolutionized the way we develop natural gas here in Alberta. We know that a lack of pipeline access has created an abundance of natural gas in Alberta, driving the price of this commodity down. Albertans deserve to get fair value for their resources. We also know that the low price of natural gas has created an opportunity for Alberta to attract major private-sector investment in petrochemical diversification and upgrading. To the minister: what is the government doing to attract investment to our province in the petrochemical industry?

The Speaker: The Associate Minister of Natural Gas.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Alberta is Canada's largest petrochemical producer, and we have a real opportunity to attract major private investment to our petrochemical sector by leveraging our abundant supply of inexpensive natural gas liquids. Our government committed to showing the world that Alberta is once again open for business, and we are doing this through things like our reduced corporate tax rate and speeding up the regulatory review process.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the petrochemicals diversification program was actually originally established by the PC government in 2014 to encourage companies to invest in Alberta through the construction of large-scale petrochemical facilities and given that members opposite ideologically thought that handing out millions of dollars in grants and loan guarantees would bolster our province's economy through programs like partial upgrading and petrochemicals feedstock infrastructure, to the minister: what has this government done to limit the financial risk that the former NDP government was quite willing to put on Albertans?

Mr. Nally: Mr. Speaker, it's become abundantly clear that the members opposite took absolutely no issue with saddling Albertans with billions of dollars in debt as they pursued their socialist utopia. That's why earlier today I along with Alberta's Energy minister announced that our government has discontinued the NDP's partial upgrading program as well as the petrochemical feedstock infrastructure program. These programs relied heavily on grants and loan guarantees, and it puts far too much risk on the Alberta taxpayer.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that tens of thousands of Albertans work in the natural gas sector, including related industries like the petrochemical sector, and given that a real estate company in Houston, Texas, is actively trying to recruit Alberta companies to relocate to the United States, to the minister: what are you doing to encourage petrochemical companies to come to Alberta and remain here?

The Speaker: The associate minister.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. Our government is working hard to restore our reputation with investors as a great place to do business. We've lowered taxes, reduced red tape, and we're easing the burdensome regulations on our natural gas industry. We've also given municipalities the power to offer tax holidays. Thanks to the actions of our government, we're putting our province back on track and making Alberta a more attractive place to invest.

The Speaker: Hon. members, in 30 seconds or less we will continue with the daily Routine.

Introduction of Bills

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Bill 204 Election Recall Act

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I request leave to introduce a bill being private Bill 204, Election Recall Act.

[Motion carried; Bill 204 read a first time]

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud has a tabling.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have here the requisite number of copies of an article that I referenced in my debate on Bill 17. The article is titled Clare's Law: Unintended Consequences for Domestic Violence Victims? by Jennifer Koshan and Wanda Wieggers, written October 18, 2019. It was issued on the University of Calgary law blog.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Ms Sigurdson: Okay. Thank you. I have a tabling that is from the Alberta Electric System Operator. It is, of course, concerning Bill 18. I referenced it in my remarks last evening, where they're recommending, of course, a capacity market. I have the requisite number of copies.

The Speaker: Now Edmonton-McClung if you'd like to table your document.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I also rise to table documents I referenced yesterday in debate on Bill 18 regarding the benefits of a capacity market versus an energy-only market. These documents were generated by EnergyRates.ca, and I have the requisite number of copies.

The Speaker: Are there others? The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have a tabling on behalf of the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood, supportive statements she read out during the debate on Motion 506.

I also have an article I referenced yesterday in question period, by the CBC, Seclusion Rooms Used Over 700 Times in 1 Month at Edmonton Public Schools: Report.

Finally, another article by CBC, Suncor CEO Slams Climate Change Deniers, Politicians Who Cater to Them.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Glenmore.

Ms Issik: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to make some tablings today. I have the requisite number of copies of each of these. The first is a news release entitled New BHE Canada Wind Farm Expected to Start Construction in 2020.

Second is a news article by Michelle Froese, published on August 1, CanWEA Applauds Alberta's Return to an Energy-only Market. CanWEA is the Canadian Wind Energy Association.

The third is from the National Post on October 7, entitled Solar Power is the Red-hot Growth Area in Oil-rich Alberta.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there other tablings?

Statement by the Speaker

Tabling Cited Documents

The Speaker: I would just like to offer a very brief comment with respect to tablings for the benefit of all members. If an article or a document has been previously tabled inside a session and then is referred to a subsequent time, it is not required for the article to be retabled, say, today or any other day. Just as a point of clarification for all members. Now, I recognize we may not keep track of every document that's been tabled, but if you are aware, there is no requirement for it to be done.

Now, hon. members, we are at points of order. I see the hon. Government House Leader shall rise.

Point of Order

Addressing the Chair

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I do rise on this point of order. I refer you to page 610 of the House of Commons Procedure and Practice, third edition, for those following along at home, yourself, of course, in the chair. In the Remarks Addressed to the Chair section:

Any Member participating in debate, whether during a sitting of the House or a Committee of the Whole, must address the Chair.

It goes on to say that they must not address the House, a particular Minister or Member, the galleries, the television audience, or any other entity.

Now, I chose to wait quite a way into question period though there are several examples of this issue. I rose in regard to the hon. member for — his constituency changed, Mr. Speaker, but whoever was asking the question at the moment that I rose on that point of order. The former Finance minister of Alberta was speaking. I will give you the example of what I referred to. I have the benefit of the exact quotes that were used during that time. I don't know if you have the Blues yet yourself. He says, "To the Premier: can you name one example of a project that the city council in Calgary wasted money on?" He goes on to say, "Do you really think you can take the moral high ground here?"

Now, Mr. Speaker, earlier in the order the hon. Opposition House Leader also said, "Do you think this was an appropriate amount of consultation?" He goes on to say, "Can you please point me to announcements you made in the campaign?"

And earlier than that, the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West goes on to say in a question that she provided the House, "why you aren't . . . Are you too busy stoking the fires?"

There are many examples of that, Mr. Speaker. These three members who I referred to are experienced members of this Chamber, former ministers of the Crown, members of Executive Council, who do understand parliamentary procedure and understand that they need to speak through the chair inside this place. I do understand that they are all posturing for future leadership races and what is going on and the turmoil in the NDP at the moment, but it's important, Mr. Speaker, that we follow the procedure in this House, that we speak through you for many reasons that you understand, Mr. Speaker, and I would ask that the House try their best to follow that rule in the future.

The Speaker: I think it's probably advantageous if we take it under advisement and move on.

As a result, we are at Orders of the Day. If the Government House Leader would like to be the Speaker, I'm sure at a later time he'll be able to do that.

Ordres du jour.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders

Second Reading

Electricity Statutes (Capacity Market Termination) Amendment Act, 2019

Ms Sweet moved on behalf of Ms Ganley that the motion for second reading of Bill 18, Electricity Statutes (Capacity Market Termination) Amendment Act, 2019, be amended by deleting all the words after "that" and substituting the following:

Bill 18, Electricity Statutes (Capacity Market Termination) Amendment Act, 2019, be not now read a second time but that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Resource Stewardship in accordance with Standing Order 74.2.

The Speaker: Hon. members, I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-North West would like to join the debate.

Mr. Eggen: Yes, I would, very much so. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In regard to speaking on the amendment in regard to Bill 18, the Electricity Statutes (Capacity Market Termination) Amendment Act, 2019, that I believe the Member for Calgary-Buffalo did bring forward, I believe that she brought forward a referral amendment, that this be moved forward to the Standing Committee on Resource Stewardship.

I think that, you know, considering the scope and the importance of the regulation of our electricity markets here in the province of Alberta and really the scope that Bill 18 is trying to encompass in regard to terminating a capacity market here in the province of Alberta, I believe that it's sometimes wise to take time to ensure that this essential service is supported through regulation, supported through legislation, and that Albertans are protected from wild variations in electricity prices both for family consumption and industrial consumption as well.

Our electricity markets have gone through quite a number of changes over the last number of years, and what I think we all don't want to go back to is the bad old days, where we had wild fluctuations in the market rate for electricity and we were not keeping up on a consistent basis to build capacity to meet the needs of our growing domestic consumption and industrial consumption as well.

I mean, it doesn't take very long to think back to, let's say, five or six or seven years ago, where you could almost predict when there was going to be a brownout, or an electricity shortfall, here in the province, and, you know, it caused a lot of disruption and confusion for people with both our domestic rates and in regard to industrial certainty as well.

I remember probably, maybe I'm thinking 2005 or 2006, when as the Energy critic for the New Democrat opposition I, again, perhaps jokingly with a journalist from the Calgary Herald said: you know, there's going to be a brownout tomorrow. Sure enough, like, boom, the end of June with a heat wave and extra pressure on the grid with people using air conditioners and so forth, there it was. He phoned me up and said, "Yeah. The brownout's on," and I said, "Yeah, for sure. I'm stuck in my garage right now because my electric door opener doesn't work." You know, it was funny, but it was also quite concerning because, of course, this was an annual occurrence at that time.

Having, I think, a stable market – right? – and a capacity market is absolutely essential. Reversing this change to allow fluctuations: I think, you know, there's a lot of concern. There's a lot of concern from the regulator here in the province of Alberta. There's a lot of concern from those who are depending on industrial certainty for electricity, both for prices and supply. I believe that there are other ways by which we can deal with this.

We know that the potential for exposure to considerably higher prices for electricity for both regular consumers and for industrial consumers is a big concern. I believe that, you know, while we don't want to be static in our approach to producing electricity here in the province, I think that taking further careful second deliberation on this is the appropriate thing to do at this time.

I think that, for example, one emerging area of development that we should be pursuing in the province here is having both domestic and individual consumer capacity and then industrial capacity to produce more renewable energy. We know that allowing a differential in price, let's say, for electricity that might be generated through solar panels, for example, to pump back into the grid has tremendous potential, that is being realized in other jurisdictions around the world. By always trying to diversify your electricity production, you are creating a built-in security and safety element to that same system as well.

Traditionally, when we have had only maybe six or seven main sources of electricity generation here in the province of Alberta, if one or more of those big generators goes under, let's say, for regularly scheduled maintenance or it goes down for any reason, then suddenly we're stuck. We're caught out. I know that different electricity companies such as Enmax realized early on, quite a number of years ago, that by having smaller generators in different locations around the province, you actually increase efficiency – right? – through the reduced line loss of electricity. But you also build in an element of certainty and security by having so many more generators available. If you lose one of the big ones or you lose a number of the small ones, you still have sufficient backup and capacity to serve the needs of Albertans.

I mean, all of these are factors that make it complicated – right? – to be able to ensure the safety and security of our electricity grid here in the province of Alberta. I'm certainly interested in ensuring that we do not go down the road of other jurisdictions that you can see quite literally, very clearly, had unregulated areas of their electricity market and ended up with a very volatile, expensive situation.

Again, I think back to when I was Energy critic, to a very classic case study in Texas, one of the states of the United States, where they experienced significant brownouts for a number of years and even rolling blackouts which had to be mitigated by rationing electricity and so forth. The extreme price swings also left Texas consumers exposed. You know, again, you leave yourself open, with a lack of regulation, to unscrupulous speculators in electricity. We certainly don't need to revisit that kind of situation, as they saw in Texas. We saw some small versions of that here in Alberta when we did not have a regulated market.

Again, thinking of other jurisdictions around the world in regard to unregulated electricity markets, we know that New Zealand was having quite a time with price spikes and so forth. You know, the price spikes do not just hit people in the pocketbook, right? They also create sort of an element of uncertainty that discourages economic investment to your jurisdiction. If the electricity supply is unstable – right? – or subject to surges and/or brownouts or even rolling blackouts, then, again, you know, that's one of the things that investment will tick off in the negative column. If you have electricity supply markets that are unstable, then I think that everyone loses as a result.

Really, again, I see this amendment – right? – that the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View is bringing forward as just, you know, a friendly, constructive, I think, addition to this debate. It's not to suggest that our electricity markets still do not need to evolve. I firmly believe that they do need to continue to evolve, as I said, to allow for more recognition and encouragement of renewable energy here in the province of Alberta by having domestic arrays of solar panels for domestic consumption and then to sell back into the grid. This is the next, I believe, way by which we can both produce electricity in a sustainable manner and reduce greenhouse gas emissions and also create more stability and security in our electricity system.

Yeah. I mean, I think that we see lots of potential here for growth in the province of Alberta and indeed greater co-operation with other energy grids here in Canada. I know that we're a big country, but, you know, it's a great way to help to share and build a spirit of co-operation and unity by having increased trade in energy.

We all know the tremendous difficulties that we've had with regard to moving our pipeline energy capacity through other jurisdictions and provinces around the country. Again, another way by which we can help entice, perhaps, other jurisdictions to allow us to build the pipelines that we need for the Canadian national economy and Alberta's domestic economy is to look for ways by which we can invite trade between our different energy systems, perhaps looking to encourage more hydroelectricity that we can buy and share with those provinces who produce more hydro – right? – Manitoba and British Columbia and so forth.

There are lots of different ways to approach this. I believe that there's a strength in building a diverse grid that extends not just throughout our province but across western Canada. There are lots of ways to approach this.

A way to make sure that we're doing it right is to have sufficient regulation built into the system. You can't just throw it back open, you know, terminating the capacity market in its entirety. I believe that this doesn't serve anybody's interests in a positive way necessarily. I think it's a bit reactionary, quite frankly, and there are other ways to approach this in a much more reasoned sort of way. Of course, one of the best mechanisms we have available to us in this Chamber and in the Legislature generally is to make reference to a bill to the appropriate standing committee, that might be able to cast better light and perhaps some different options available to us to ensure that the electricity market is stable and affordable and sustainable here in the province of Alberta.

I'll leave it at that. I'm certainly supporting this amendment, and I encourage other members of this House to do so. Thank you very much.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available should anyone wish to make quick comments or questions.

Seeing none, are there any members wishing to speak to REF1? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you very much. I am happy to again stand up and talk about Bill 18 and just the change this government wants to do regarding moving from our plan of the proposed capacity market and going to the energy-only market. You know, I have found it very helpful to refer to an independent body, the Alberta Electric System Operator, to understand, really, what this bill is about and what it will do and what it will change.

Certainly, our government previously had proposed to move towards a capacity market. To understand that, I just want to quote a bit from the AESO website. They explain:

A capacity market is actually two markets in one: a market for providing capacity, or the ability to produce energy, and a market for the actual production and delivery of energy. A capacity market pays electricity generators for having the ability to reliably make power available regardless of how often they sell energy onto the grid. The purpose of the capacity market is to ensure there will be an adequate supply of electricity to meet the province's demand.

So, you know, a capacity market, according to the AESO, is something that will create reliability and make sure that Albertans have the electricity they need when they need it.

This change by the current government to move towards an energy-only system is actually of concern. Really, there are three major concerns that I have regarding it, and the citizens of Alberta will be burdened with this shift. It's really them that will be paying for the cost of this shift. It's a step backwards, I would say. There are three issues. One is financial, the other is accessibility, and the third is just about climate leadership, which are, you know, three pretty significant concerns.

One of the things that's built into the energy-only market is that there are price spikes that happen. The minister herself spoke about this yesterday, that this is just something that happens. She actually referred to it in a more positive way and felt that this was good for the generators because they would receive more, you know, revenue from that. Not once did she mention the concern of: who's going to pay for that extra revenue that they're getting in these price spikes, that are erratic? It's the citizens of Alberta. It's maybe good for the big corps but not so great for citizens. That's a concern.

There has been some analysis done that says it could cost Albertans up to 10 times more on their electricity bills when these price spikes go. I would think that this would be something that the minister is very concerned about – certainly I am as a representative of constituents – that we can't create more stability. We know that people budget month to month, trying to make sure that they have enough funds to pay for all their bills, but when something is erratic, which is this, these price spikes, and you don't know, and really it's way beyond your control as a citizen, then you are absolutely vulnerable to that.

That could create great hardship for the citizens of Alberta. That's why the capacity market, which is the market that we were moving towards, was a much better, much more stable, much more fair type of process than these energy-only markets. Certainly it will hurt consumers, and that's something that I'm certainly very concerned about.

The second piece, of course, is accessibility. My hon. colleague was just talking about, you know, being sort of in his garage and not able to get out because there was a blackout. There was no access to electricity. He couldn't actually get out, drive his car out. That will create great havoc for Albertans, if they can't have access to something. Certainly, we're all plugged in. I have three sons. I can't imagine what would happen if they couldn't access electricity and just the chaos that would create in our family.

I know I'm not unique in that. We all rely heavily on electricity, and if we do not have stability, if we don't have a system that will make it certain that we have electricity, and the capacity market has been very clearly demonstrated to produce more than an energy market, then we will have this very volatile and less reliable situation with the energy-only market.

We know that a capacity market is safer, more reliable, and it's sustainable and affordable. These are just qualities of this type of market. That, of course, is why AESO, this independent body, did recommend to our government to actually, you know, move in that direction. I'm saddened that this government is taking steps backwards with this Bill 18. Certainly, the amendment that is before us: you know, I recommend that the House does support it because we do need to make sure that we have a capacity market.

Then, the third aspect of my concern – I've already talked about the financial; I've already talked about the accessibility, you know, the stability of having a system that is reliable for everyone – is climate leadership. We know that the capacity market was meant to transition to an electricity market that would meet the goals set out in our climate leadership plan. Of course, we know that climate leadership is real. We are a province that needs to have a plan. I know that we did have a plan, but, unfortunately, one of the first things that this government did was to eliminate that plan.

We don't have much time. The clock is ticking. There is apparently, you know, some say, eight years that we have to actually really make a difference so that we do have a proper climate leadership plan that's going to protect us all. I certainly hope to be living on this planet for a very, very long time and my children and potentially my grandchildren. It's something that is just a responsibility of the governing party, the government, the UCP in this case, to make sure that they're standing up and not really avoiding or putting their heads in the sand on this issue.

The benefit of the capacity market is that its structure increases the share of renewable energy in the energy mix. That means there's more green energy, and that of course is good. It's important for us to be responsible about our environment. In fact, this shift to the capacity market encourages more capital investment due to the inclusion of renewable energy. It's becoming less and less popular – you know, I know that some of the international investors in the oil sands are pulling out because they feel like it's not an investment that is green enough. They're looking for green investments. They're looking for alternative energy sources like solar and wind, so it really would actually increase the amount of investment.

Another thing the minister indicated is that the energy-only market was something that the investors wanted. It was more stable. But it seems a bit, you know, opposite, I suppose, of what she said and what, certainly, other experts in the field have shared, that investors are showing less willingness to invest in energy-only markets due to the risks of that, and they want this capacity market because it does have a greater mix of renewable energy.

Again, this is not something that is, you know, unique to Alberta. AESO suggested, recommended that we move in this direction. They didn't do this sort of in isolation. They looked around North America, internationally. The United Kingdom has this type of a market capacity. Many jurisdictions in North America have that. I mean, the majority of them do, so it is sort of a tried-and-true method in other places. In places where it isn't in place wholeheartedly, like Texas – I know I spoke about this last night, and my colleagues have, too – there are concerns with the things that we've already identified: the reliability, accessibility of electricity for all the citizens. There are rolling brownouts and blackouts much, much more commonly.

That price-spiking nature of the energy-only market means that citizens, consumers have to pay for that. That, again, is very difficult, you know, and it's something way beyond what an individual can control. Actually, it's incumbent on governments to sort of soften those spikes and set up a system that is more manageable and fair. Certainly, I think that that's the role of government. Moving to a capacity market would do absolutely that, but this energy-only market would not.

The other point about moving to this kind of a system, moving to the capacity market, is that it does support the decarbonization of the electricity grid. It attracts green energy and investment and provides reasonable prices on electricity. There are many, many positive aspects to this capacity market. This amendment, I really encourage my colleagues to look at it and see that this would actually create more stability for their constituents. It would create more accessibility of electricity. It would be a move to support our environment.

Of course, it would have less volatile price spikes, which I also know that citizens and consumers would really appreciate because that's tough when you're on a budget, and then all of a sudden you have a much higher bill that comes and you can't predict it. You can't predict it. It's a much more complicated system than an individual can control or understand, so it can be very hard. Let's face it. Certainly, for myself as a single mom and years ago when I was younger, I mean, it was very close. Sometimes I couldn't pay for all my bills. So when we're downloading this onto the individual Albertans, I think it's really, you know, disrespectful and not very responsible of our government to move to this energy-only market, and a big reason is just the financial burden on individuals.

I'm just going to go through, again, the Alberta Electric System Operator's very thoughtful, well-articulated reason for their recommendations. You know, these are experts in the field, and they have come forward and said to us: this is why we are recommending this.

The key objectives of any power market is to ensure enough generation to meet demand today and in the future.

The AESO recommended that Alberta's electricity market needs to transition following research that indicates the existing energy market structure will not ensure the necessary investment in new generation that Alberta requires.

It's to support, actually, more investment, and this is the best method that AESO felt would actually do that, not the energy-only market but the capacity market.

The AESO studied a number of structures and found that a capacity market best fit Alberta's characteristics and objectives with the least amount of risk.

Certainly, governments should care about that. They're looking specifically at what the characteristics of Alberta are and decreasing risk. I mean, these are all very positive qualities.

Again, these are all important reasons to move to a capacity market. It's through the research, evidence-based work that this organization did that they've come to these conclusions and had recommended to our government at the time. I just call on the current government to also see and review what AESO has put forward and reconsider this bill. We would really appreciate them looking at this amendment.

They go on further about the key benefits of a capacity market.

[It] provides the following combination of benefits which no other single . . .

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo has risen.

Member Ceci: I just wonder if the hon. member can finish her thought. Of course, she's talked a lot about the renewables and the benefits to society of a greener electricity grid. Could she perhaps expand on that?

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford. 3:20

Ms Sigurdson: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Riverview. I totally apologize.

Ms Sigurdson: Riverview, yes. Thank you.

Certainly, you know, as the hon. member just asked, focusing on making sure that we use more and more renewable energy, energy that will support our planet – we are running out of time to really make a difference. We need to be responsible stewards of the environment, and all the steps that we take in that direction can make a significant difference in our lives, our children's lives, and our grandchildren's lives. This market very clearly says that this helps move to a more green system, a system with much more renewables.

You know, besides just the sustainability of our planet, which is, of course, paramount, there is an economic argument for this. Investors want to be investing in more green projects and more green capacity markets because they're wise. They see the importance of making sure that we're responsible stewards of our environment. People are moving away from an energy-only market, so it's just such – I can't overstate how important it is and how the time is ticking and how much I really want to stress to the government to really take all these things into consideration when they're making decisions for Albertans.

I certainly know in my own riding of Edmonton-Riverview that I meet regularly with folks who are concerned about climate change and are working oftentimes in nonprofits themselves or advocating, volunteering, really raising awareness and making sure that we are being responsible stewards of our environment.

Just going on to the other question that the hon. member asked, it was just for me to sort of finish my thought. I was going through some of the key benefits of the capacity market that AESO did identify. One of them was:

- Ensures reliability as Alberta's electricity system evolves
- Increases stability of prices
- Provides greater revenue and certainty for generators [and]
- Maintains competitive market forces and drives innovation and cost discipline.

These are pretty significant benefits of a capacity market. I think that anyone who looked at this would see that this is, you know, obviously, a pretty strong argument to move toward a capacity market and not move backwards into an energy-only market.

I know some of my hon. colleagues on the other side of the aisle have said: well, we've had this for 20 years or so, and it's worked fine since then. Well, we do have a different conversation. I think 20 years ago we weren't so aware and knowledgeable, didn't understand the science about climate change. I mean, that in itself is a big reason for change, a huge reason that we should be moving to make sure that that mix of more renewable energy is part of the equation. Again, the capacity market, like this amendment suggests, is the best way to go about that.

But, I mean, then there are just the other fundamental things that I have expressed already, just the fairness to citizens of this province, not expecting them just to, you know, be able to manage something that really isn't manageable by an individual. That needs to be managed by government, so these price spikes that are endemic to this type of market need to be addressed. Again, the capacity market doesn't have that quality and therefore is much more fair for the citizens of Alberta.

Again, I just really encourage my colleagues across the aisle to see that and, you know, make sure that they are strong advocates for their own constituents because . . .

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members looking to join debate on REF1? I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo has risen.

Member Ceci: Thank you for the opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to debate on this and speak to it for the first time. I'm going to not go over the same ground that has been well researched and explained by my two previous colleagues who got up to speak to this. My colleague from Calgary-Mountain View has put a referral motion before us that would of course move this, if it were supported, to the Standing Committee on Resource Stewardship in accordance with Standing Order 74.2. I am the vice-chair of that committee. I have the pleasure of working with the chair and the other members of the committee. We have done good work of late, and I think there's no reason to think that we wouldn't capably take on this referral and work with it at that committee.

I do want to say that, of course, I support the work that we did as a government around the capacity market, and when I think about that work, I know at the time that there was extensive outreach to experts in the field. I don't consider myself an expert, and I of course take a great deal of counsel from people who work directly in the business, who have risen in many cases to the top of their organization. I want to be able to give a few thoughts about what those experts in energy have said, too, publicly on the record in places like the Globe and Mail and the Calgary Herald and different business circulars of theirs as well as news releases and those kinds of areas where this information has been gathered from.

It goes to the points that my colleague was just making. Many of these points go to renewables and the stability of prices. For instance, the CEO of TransAlta Corp. hailed the movement towards a capacity market or the overhaul, as she called it, as a courageous decision by the government. It opens up opportunities to invest both in our existing assets and new assets as we move forward. As my colleague was just saying, the attractiveness to companies that make energy from renewable sources is what this CEO is talking about, that this opens up opportunities to invest both in our existing assets and new assets as we move forward.

Further, in a release from the government of Alberta that CEO goes on to say: "We welcome a shift to the capacity market in Alberta. It will enhance our ability to make investments in existing and new generation to the benefit of [our] customers and other stakeholders in the services we provide."

There's one expert who goes on to say that it's a very clear roadmap emerging with the previous Premier's announcement with regard to Alberta's commitment to support the conversion of coal-fired plants to gas. As we know, many of those companies have taken the signal to start that work, and ultimately we of course have significant gas supplies in this province, which are being used close to source, and when that is done, there's a benefit to the economic production of cheaper electricity.

She goes on to say: TransAlta has already completed a significant amount of work on the logistics and timing of plant conversions; accelerating TransAlta's coal transition while ramping up our renewables, including hydro, wind, and solar, is critical to keeping Alberta competitive, and we look forward to being active participants in the transition. That, from an expert, all sounds like a significant endorsement of a capacity market, which this bill is going to be terminating or proposes to terminate.

That same person goes on to be quoted in the Calgary Herald. The quote is: if you don't have enough of a price signal in an energy-only market to attract new capital, you won't get new capital, and you'll run up against a wall. The number one change – this is not a quote – that the government has to think about is in pricing. Then it follows with that quote from the CEO: if you don't have enough of a price signal in the energy-only market to attract new capital, you won't get new capital, and you'll run up against the wall. We, of course, know that this current government's efforts to attract new capital across many sectors are not happening. We do know that the giveaways across the sectors to corporations are significant and haven't resulted in any new employment.

I'll go on to share what the Capital Power CEO said at the time. He said that a capacity market would encourage not only his company, which is Capital Power, to resume investing in Alberta but probably get interest from larger North American and European producers. All good news, to be sure, and that's what the CEO of Capital Power said.

He goes on to say:

We look forward to engaging with the Government of Alberta on the evolution of Alberta's [energy] market design, including participation in stakeholder consultations regarding the design and introduction of a capacity market. A well-designed ...

And, of course, that's important.

... and fairly implemented capacity market can deliver an affordable power supply for Albertans, reduce market price volatility, and provide certainty that generation capacity will be there when needed.

One of my colleagues talked about price spikes and how damaging they are to the affordability of a family's pocketbook. Of course, it was reported by that former member that there are all sorts of spikes that have happened in an energy-only market just to our south, which we compare ourselves to frequently, that being Texas.

There is another former executive vice-president of the Tennessee Valley Authority and PJM interconnection. That person at the time, when this quote was taken, said:

I spent the last eight years of my career as the CEO of PJM Interconnection, which has a mature capacity market structure.

Something we were trying to work towards in this province: a mature capacity market structure.

He goes on to say:

Private investors from around the world have built over 30,000 megawatts of new generation in PJM under this market structure, which kept the lights on at stable prices.

Stable prices are what we all look to to ensure that we can plan for our family's future and know what our costs are going to be.

He goes on to say:

Investors have shown a growing reluctance to invest in the riskier energy-only market designs around the world, preferring the price stability and revenue certainty provided by a capacity market structure. I am confident this model will work well in Alberta too, ensuring future stability in your admirable and smooth transition to a lower carbon electricity system.

Of course, the lower carbon electricity system is fuelled in part by the shutting down of coal-fired generators from 2050 to 2030. The move that this former government made was in the direction of ensuring that those coal-fired generators had a smooth transition, as is said here, and supporting their employees, their workers in that transition was an important aspect of the work we did as a government.

This collection of quotes goes on to include the president and CEO of AltaLink. At the time Mr. Thon said:

New capacity will be needed to back up renewables in Alberta as it transitions to a cleaner energy future. We have seen the government take steps to ensure low costs for Albertans by requiring new generation be sited near existing transmission, by offering long-term contracts and by focusing on universal, or grid-scale, projects. We are confident the government will continue on this path and find the lowest cost way to add new capacity for Albertans.

I know that there are many admirable things in that last quote that the president and CEO of AltaLink was speaking to, the sense of this effort made by the previous government. Of course, that's not the direction that this government is going in, but we believe that there are advantages, and they are highlighted by my colleague just before me, in terms of addressing them.

The managing director of Morrison Park Advisors goes on to speak to:

In our discussions with lenders, equity providers and electricity facility owners and developers, we found positive interest in a potential capacity market in Alberta.

Mr. Speaker, the benefits of a capacity market include, as one person said, getting your . . .

The Acting Speaker: My apologies for interrupting the hon. member. Though there has been no disorder caused or anything of the nature, I do, however, just want to take this opportunity to remind all members that according to House of Commons Procedure and Practice, third edition, 2017, page 614:

There is no Standing Order which governs the citation of documents . . .

A speech [however] should not consist of a single long quotation or a series of quotations joined together by only a few original sentences.

My intention for doing this at this moment is not to single out any individual member, because I don't think that that is the intention of anybody here. There are always opportunities to table documents, et cetera, but I would just like to take this opportunity to remind the House of those stipulations according to, again, House of Commons Procedure and Practice, which I'm sure you all have readily available at your desks at this time.

If the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo could please continue on this. You have another two minutes and 30 seconds. Thank you.

Member Ceci: Thank you. I will just point out that many individuals very high up or at the top of the chain of these organizations all applauded the government of Alberta for its activities in developing a capacity market, moving in that direction, the decision to transition from an energy-only market to a capacity market. We, of course, know that the current government is going to terminate that, but it doesn't address the support that was given at the time, when we made the decision to move in that direction.

We will of course have the opportunity, potentially, of debating these things in further detail at the Standing Committee on Resource Stewardship. You know, we have the ability at that committee, I believe, as we just showed through the examination of the sunshine list and the discussion about how we wanted to recommend to this House that the sunshine list should be amended or changed or improved. We had the ability to hear from people. Hearing from presenters, from witnesses, as it were, really helped all members of the committee better understand the issues with regard to the sunshine list.

That same sort of outreach to potential experts around the capacity market and the electricity-only market I think would be useful in regard to making sure that we take the right steps at the right time and not do anything that would be harmful to pricing for electricity for the citizens of Alberta.

Thank you.

3:40

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available should anybody wish to take advantage of that.

Seeing none, are there any members wishing to speak to referral amendment REF1? I see the hon. Member for Calgary-West has risen.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, certainly, I think we have some robust discussions that are going to go on today. I would like to ask unanimous consent of the House to go to one-minute bells so we can get through, hopefully, our agenda this afternoon.

Thank you.

[Unanimous consent granted]

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-West, should he continue speaking to REF1.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, thank you very much. I understand that this is my time to speak to this particular part of the bill, and I thank you and everyone for indulging me the opportunity, but I have no further comments at this time.

Thank you very much, sir.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar has risen.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I want to thank the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo for really bringing the thunder in that last speech. It's intimidating to follow such a barnburner, but I will do my best.

I'm rising to speak, of course, in favour of the amendment that we have before us. I think it would be wise for this House to send Bill 18 to be reviewed by the Standing Committee on Resource Stewardship in accordance with Standing Order 74.2, because what's become apparent to me and I think become apparent to all members of the House is that we all have significant questions around what reverting to the energy-only market will do for Alberta's electricity system.

Certainly, I think one of the benefits that sending this bill to committee would provide would be to allow the members on that committee to have a detailed briefing about what the current energy-only market is like, how it's structured, to get the appropriate briefing from department officials, perhaps other people, other stakeholders, I mean, in the electrical system operation so that all members have a clear understanding of what we're talking about when we talk about whether or not Alberta should stay with the electricity-only market or convert to the capacity market.

The electrical system operation is not simple, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, I know that our government was briefed for hours and hours on this issue before we made any decisions about any changes that we made to the electrical system here in Alberta, and I think it would be a benefit to all members of this Assembly to receive that same detailed briefing so that we can have a much more informed debate about the changes or – sorry – the reversion to the energy-only market that this bill proposes.

In addition to that, Mr. Speaker, there have been some questions that hon. members from both sides of the House have raised in this question about whether or not we should keep the electricity-only market. Last night in my remarks I expressed some concerns, that were echoed by my colleagues here on this side, about the potential for increased prices of electricity. Certainly, the minister shares some of those concerns because when she provided a letter to the Electric System Operator on July 25 informing them of her decision to stay with the electricity-only market, the energy-only market, she did raise some concerns that she had heard through the consultation process that she conducted through the summer.

In fact, I'll just quote briefly from the letter. She said that "the AESO must provide [her] with analyses and recommendations on whether changes are needed to the price floor/ceiling and shortage pricing in Alberta's energy-only market." And she asks that a status update on this work be provided to her on or before February 1, 2020.

Now, Mr. Speaker, obviously, the minister herself has some questions around whether or not the energy-only market puts consumers at significant risk of untenable price volatility. I think it's only fair that if she has questions, the rest of the members of this Assembly also get the chance to learn from the people that she is consulting with and have those questions answered as well because she's not the only one who has those questions. We've raised it on this side of the House. Other members from the government caucus have raised this issue around price stability. I think that it would be wise to send this bill to committee to share in the learning that the minister is willing to do so that we all have a clear understanding of what we're talking about before we make a decision on whether or not Alberta should stay with the energy-only market or convert to the capacity market, as we proposed.

In the same letter, Mr. Speaker, she also said that she heard repeated references to concerns with market power and market power mitigation. Last night in my comments I did refer to the issue of market power as having a significant negative impact on the price of electricity for consumers. Economic withholding is something that is currently allowed by the Electric System Operator. In fact, TransAlta, as we know, was prosecuted successfully in 2015 and fined more than $50 million for their activities, withholding electricity from the grid in order to drive up prices.

Clearly, the minister has seen that this is a problem that needs to be addressed as well, and I don't think it's fair, Mr. Speaker, that only she be informed about what changes the Electric System Operator is recommending to the energy-only market, and I specifically don't think that it's fair that we have to wait until after this legislation is passed to hear those answers. I think the prudent thing for this House to do would be to send this bill to committee so that we, too, can ask this question around market power and market power mitigation and what the AESO would recommend in terms of changes to the existing electrical system to prevent the exercise of market power to drive up prices and punish consumers for the ability of certain players in the electrical system to game the prices that consumers are charged for electricity.

Those are a couple of the issues that the minister herself has asked the AESO to chime in on, and I think, as I've said many times already, that it's only fair that members of the Standing Committee on Resource Stewardship be provided with the opportunity to explore these issues around price ceilings and floors, market power, and market power mitigation before we make a decision on whether or not we should revert to the energy-only market or remain with a capacity market. These are critical questions that need to be answered.

Now, I understand that the minister has introduced the bill. I don't think that she's answered these questions to the satisfaction of the members of this House. Perhaps during debate on this legislation the minister will provide us her insight into what she thinks will need to be the recommended changes made to the energy-only market to address these issues that she herself has raised. I would like to hear her thoughts on what she thinks needs to be done to the energy-only market to prevent these significant risks of price uncertainty for consumers.

The other significant question that we've heard over and over again in this debate is the question of whether or not lowering greenhouse gas emissions is best done through the capacity market or through the existing energy-only market. Now, when we were briefed on this by the AESO, they told us that the capacity-only market was probably the best way to facilitate the phase-out of coal-fired power and convert to natural gas and it was also the best way to incent the development of renewable energy in the province of Alberta. We've heard conflicting reports from members on both sides of the House as to whether or not the capacity market is the best way to do this.

Certainly, it's our assertion that switching to the capacity market would be the best way to facilitate that conversion of coal-fired power plants to natural gas plants. That's a significant question that I think the constituents in Edmonton-Gold Bar are asking me because climate change is a very important question to them, and they want the government to take meaningful action on climate change. Shifting from coal-fired power to natural gas is one of the significant moves that this government could do to reduce greenhouse gas emissions.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, allowing existing coal-fired power to switch over to natural gas is an important matter for the communities where those coal-fired power plants exist. The ability of those power plants to switch over to natural gas and keep some of their power plant employees on staff is a critical issue to many members in this House. Certainly, the Member for Drumheller-Stettler, the Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland both have a number of jobs at stake. I think it's really important that they understand as well as I do what not shifting to the capacity market will do to the jobs at risk in their constituencies so that if they vote in favour of this bill, they know the impact that it will have on the jobs in their ridings. Certainly, you know, the government does not have an admirable track record of job creation. They've lost 27,000 jobs in the last two months. I'm sure that those members aren't keen to go back to their constituencies and say: we're adding to the job losses by creating an electrical system that will not allow you to keep your jobs at the power plants here at home.

Now, on to the matter of renewable energy. Of course, through our renewable electricity program we set a target of 30 per cent of Alberta's electrical energy to be generated by renewable energy sources by 2030. Now, in the latest long-term outlook provided by the AESO, they've downgraded that target so that by 2030 less than 20 per cent of Alberta's electricity will be generated from renewable energy sources, which is remarkable, Mr. Speaker, given that the 30 per cent target is a legislated target. I know that the members opposite are keen to make sure that Albertans comply with the law. It is interesting to me that the minister and the government are so keen to not be in compliance with their own legislation to provide 30 per cent electrical energy from renewable energy sources here in the province of Alberta. I hope that the minister or somebody from the government can explain to us how staying with the energy-only market will allow us to meet the legislated target of 30 per cent renewable energy by 2030. If not, then I think it's only prudent that we send this bill to committee so that we can ask that question: what will the impact of staying with the energy-only market have on the legislated target of 30 per cent renewable electricity by 2030?

The Member for Calgary-Glenmore, of course, disputes our assertion that staying with the energy-only market will inhibit Alberta's ability to meet that legislated target. She tabled a couple of documents earlier today indicating that there is still strength in the renewable energy market here in Alberta. I've read those documents that she referred to, and certainly I'm glad that there is still enthusiasm for renewable energy. The problem is that there is no target anymore, Mr. Speaker. The government has, as I said, apparently quietly abandoned their 30 per cent target. They've certainly abandoned the renewable energy purchasing program that we started, so I'm wondering what the basis for this enthusiasm for renewable energy is, given the fact that the government is renegeing on its legislated commitment, as I said, to provide 30 per cent of Alberta's electricity from renewable energy sources.

I think that by sending this bill to committee, we would have an excellent opportunity to hear from renewable electricity providers their views on whether the current energy-only market is satisfactory for meeting that commitment or if changes to the capacity market are needed or if, perhaps, some modifications to the planned capacity market or modifications to the current energy-only market are needed.

But it's critically important, Mr. Speaker, that Alberta meet its legislated commitment for renewable energy because there are a number of jobs on the line. We know that renewable energy creates more jobs per dollar invested than many other industries here in Alberta. Certainly, every member in this Chamber is interested in creating jobs. Certainly, you know, if I'd been elected on a platform that included jobs, economy, and the pipeline and I'd lost 26,000 jobs since I was elected, I would be keen to do everything I could do to create some jobs in Alberta. Perhaps taking $4.5 billion and investing it in renewable energy would be a good way.

Anyway, we should send this bill to committee so that we can ask those questions. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available should anybody wish to make comments or questions. I see the hon. Member for St. Albert has risen.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, that was just riveting, and I'm wondering if the member would care to continue and expand on his line of thinking.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I want to thank the hon. Member for St. Albert for her question. As I said, the potential for the development of renewable energy and jobs that come from the development of renewable energy is something that everybody is excited about in the province of Alberta, but we need to have a market that's properly structured in order to create those jobs. So I think it's only appropriate that we send this bill to committee so that we can ask the question of how the electricity system can be structured so that we can properly provide the incentives for the creation of renewable energy here in the province of Alberta. There's a lot of investment on the line. There are a number of jobs on the line, and I think the responsible thing to do would be for this House to look at this question by sending it to committee.

Now, I see that the Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul is pointing to the Election Recall Act, so I'm sure that he's concerned about what his constituents will do when he goes back to them and says: not only have we lost 27,000 jobs since I've been elected, but we're keen to keep piling on the job losses by not properly incenting renewable energy development here in the province; oh, by the way, we're going to give $4.5 billion in corporate handouts that don't actually go to anybody in Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul but actually go to foreign shareholders, Hong Kong billionaires like the owner of Husky.

Anyway, I want to thank the hon. Member for St. Albert for asking that question. I urge all members here in this House to vote for this amendment and send this bill to committee so that we can get the information that we need to make the best decision based on the evidence available.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Standing Order 29(2)(a) for another two minutes and 20 seconds should anybody choose to have comments or any more questions for the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Seeing none, are there any members wishing to speak to the referral amendment, REF1? I see the hon. Member for Calgary-McCall has risen.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. A pleasure to rise on this important motion asking that the subject matter of this bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Resource Stewardship in accordance with 74.2 of the standing orders. The reason I say that it's important is because the subject matter of this bill will impact Albertans across the province. It will impact constituents in our constituencies. It will impact their bottom line, their monthly bills, so it's important that we take time to discuss the subject matter of this bill thoroughly and how it will impact Albertans. There are a number of reasons why we should do that, but one is that it will impact Albertans, it will make their life more expensive, it will make their electricity bills more expensive. So it's important that we refer this bill to the Resource Stewardship Committee, where it can be studied thoroughly.

There are a number of other reasons why we should study this bill in more detail. I think I can start with consultations. The UCP announced consultations on this bill, that they will consult for 90 days, and they cancelled those consultations after just 30 days. They didn't even consult for what they promised. Promise made, promise broken. I think that referring this to committee will be an opportunity for Albertans, for all those who are concerned, and for us MLAs to discuss this bill, discuss its impact more thoroughly. That's the number one reason: the UCP has failed to consult on this bill properly. They didn't even consult for the time period they promised they would. They cancelled their consultation after 30 days. That's simply wrong. This motion will make sure that Albertans have the opportunity to weigh in on this change. This will make sure that we as MLAs have the opportunity to weigh in on how it will impact our constituents and their bottom lines.

The second thing I would say: again, it was also claimed by the UCP that nobody in the sector was asking for it. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that there can be nothing further from the truth, that nobody was asking for it. When we moved towards the capacity market, I think we had experts, analysts, and, more importantly, AESO, the Alberta Electric System Operator, who were suggesting that we should move towards the capacity market. There is a written report from AESO that's on record. So saying this, that nobody was asking for it, can't be true when the Alberta Electric System Operator was clearly asking the government to move towards the capacity-only market.

Not just that, but they analyzed the energy-only market, and they outlined their reasons why they wanted the Alberta government to move towards a capacity-only market. Those reasons were that that move will ensure that Albertans have safe, reliable, sustainable, and affordable electricity. These are the things that Albertans wanted. These are the things that were recommended by AESO. Claiming that the sector was not asking for it and that nobody was asking for it: that's not true. When we moved towards the capacity market, at that time TransAlta Corporation, Capital Power, AltaLink, Western Interstate Energy Board – and there many other stakeholders who were in favour of this move, who supported this move, and who we worked with towards implementing the capacity market.

The third thing was that this government is claiming that an Alberta energy-only market works. It doesn't matter how many times you say that in the House – it works, it works, it works – the evidence is that it doesn't work. We have seen that from rolling blackouts. We have seen that from spikes. The fact is that under an energy-only market the price of energy is determined 8,640 times a year. The price of electricity is determined approximately 8,640 times a year in an energy-only market. It means that it's determined every hour. When you're determining that price every hour, I think the result is that you will see spikes because you're determining that price every hour. So it's the function of an energy-only market that you will see these price spikes.

Saying that that's the best market: that's not enough. It doesn't matter how many times you say in the House that it works; the fact is that it doesn't work. Except for Alberta, Texas, and some states in Australia and New Zealand, everybody has adopted some other form of market. Again, evidence was there that Alberta needed to move towards some other form of market that works better, that doesn't run into price spikes and rolling blackouts, brownouts, and those kinds of things.

Referring this bill to the committee will also make sure that we have that opportunity to verify those claims, whether it works or not, and why AESO was recommending just three years ago that Alberta needed to move towards a capacity market. What went wrong with their assessment that they did just three years ago? That's another reason why it's important that we send this bill to the committee, so that we can study the bill, its impacts, more thoroughly.

There were other things that were also outlined by my colleagues. When we moved towards a capacity market, the renewables auctions, we were able to procure electricity at really a very reasonable price, and I think that that was the lowest price that we ever got. There is also evidence that there are other forms of electricity that we can procure that are way cheaper and that will help lower the electricity bills for everyday Albertans.

Also, when you procure for a longer duration, let's say for a year, you know what the price is, you're able to budget for that, you're able to predict what your bills will be, and it's a lot easier to do so in a capacity market as opposed to an energy-only market, where the price is determined 8,640 times a year. That was another reason that we moved towards a capacity market, and that's another reason that we'd send the subject matter of this bill to the committee, to look into it further and to verify also the claims that the government is making.

Among other issues that were outlined, I think, when we were moving, one concern was economic withholding within the energy-only market. You can bid the generation at a sufficiently higher price, hoping that you would not be asked to run it. An example is that you can bid it at $999 per megawatt hour. When you are able to do that – and we haven't heard from this government what they are going to do about it – that spikes your price. That jacks up your price. That impacts everyday Albertans' bills. That changes their bill every month for the same product that they are using every day. They are paying every hour a different price.

The capacity market has that function to it that because of long-term contracts, because of yearly procurement, because of longer duration procurements, there is stability to it, and Albertans can have more reliable and sustainable and affordable electricity. It's important, from that standpoint as well, that we refer this bill to the committee and talk about economic withholding, discuss economic withholding: how it impacts the companies who are providing the generation, how it impacts Albertans, their bottom line, their bills on a monthly basis.

Another thing was that when we transitioned, we put in a cap that guaranteed Albertans that their bill won't spike more than 6.8 cents per kilowatt hour. That was, again, there to protect Albertans, to protect their bottom line, to protect their monthly bills, and at the same time they can have reliable, sustainable electricity while making sure that it's affordable as well. We haven't heard a word from this government, even when asked, on what they're going to do with the 6.8-cent cap. If they are going to remove it, certainly that will hit the bottom line of Albertans. That will hit Albertans' pockets, and they will be on the hook to pay for the spikes and whatever comes with the energy-only market.

Then there is another price cap, where nobody who is generating is able to bid more than $1,000 per megawatt hour. We have asked before and we will ask again: are we keeping that cap? Is it going to stay there? Are we changing it? In an energy-only market I think there are suggestions that we may need to raise the cap to attract investment whereas in the capacity market we already attracted a lot of investment, almost $10 billion in investment, for renewables. Again, these are the things where the Resource Stewardship Committee will be in a better position to invite experts, invite stakeholders, invite AESO and all those who are concerned and, more importantly, invite Albertans to weigh in on this important bill that will impact their bottom lines.

One other thing that I would like to highlight is that within the existing guidelines, the offer behaviour enforcement guidelines, economic withholding is allowed. If they are moving towards the energy-only market, reverting to the status quo, will they let companies continue with economic withholding, and if they will do so, how will it impact Albertans' bills going forward? These are all important issues that the public has a vested interest in, and they deserve an opportunity where they can discuss these things in more detail.

I do know that when asked about any consultation, any input from the public, they will start swinging their mandate and say that in the election there was a clear mandate, so they can do whatever they want. But I don't think that any Albertan voted for a higher electricity bill, that any Albertan voted for price spikes or brownouts and blackouts. They want a sustainable and affordable supply of electricity. We have seen from previous experience in Alberta that there were problems with the energy-only market, and that was the reason AESO and all other experts were asking the government to move towards . . .

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available for questions, comments.

Seeing none, anyone looking to join debate on REF1?

[Motion on amendment REF1 lost]

The Acting Speaker: Moving back to the bill proper, are there any members looking to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I certainly appreciate the opportunity to speak to the main bill in second reading, the Electricity Statutes (Capacity Market Termination) Amendment Act, 2019. You know, the main issue that I think that we all need to look at here is looking for reliability and looking for capacity and the incentive to build capacity in our electricity grid system and to reach across to build different ways by which we could generate electricity so to increase the security of the overall grid system.

As we had spoken briefly about before, with the way that our electricity generation has evolved, we had a reliance on a handful of very large generating facilities, coal-fired generating facilities, that, you know, left us exposed in quite a number of different ways in terms of both energy pricing and energy security. I had mentioned before that if we did have one or more of those plants go down for regular, scheduled maintenance or for a problem, then we were in a tight spot in terms of generating electricity, and if that happened to coincide with high-use, high-demand times such as in the summer during a heat wave, then you end up with brownouts or even rolling blackouts. We don't want to go back to the bad old days, when that was an issue.

We want to encourage generation from smaller producers in many different places across the province so that security can be achieved and that you can achieve higher efficiencies through reduced line loss between, you know, the source of generation and where the electricity is being used. Considering that, again, I think that we need to build incentives through regulation to expand the grid interaction between jurisdictions here in the province of Alberta and other provinces, including British Columbia and Manitoba, where there are lots of potential supplies of hydroelectricity. Again, all of those are ways by which we can help to strengthen the affordability of electricity here in the province of Alberta and reliability as well.

[Mr. Jones in the chair]

I'm not suggesting that the situation that we're in here now is static, that we should be using this current circumstance that we're in for generation of electricity. We know that we have the evolution, the phase-out of coal power, for example, moving to more natural gas electricity generation, which is a process in motion now, a process that I hope that this new government will continue to accelerate. I think that the benefits of the phase-out of coal power generation are not just to reduce carbon emissions but also particulate pollution in immediate areas around where coal plants are being used, right? We can see a demonstrable increase in health benefits by reducing coal-fired power, and we know that, you know, this is a path that we need to continue to move down and not have the interests of science and good health be delayed or compromised by political action.

4:20

I believe as well that, you know, we only have to be students of history to see that the market-only electricity systems have been notoriously unreliable in regard to security against speculation, right? You see electricity price spikes on an energy-only market that will curl your hair, quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, and will again expose Albertans to very expensive price spikes during different times of the year. I believe that we have learned to move past that.

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

You know, I know that this new government is interested in their summer and fall of repeal and terminating this and that, but common sense must prevail. I believe that there is a better way by which we can do this and there's a better way that we can look for both security and affordability in the market. I believe that as an opposition we will look to other ways by which we can strengthen the market through regulation and through perhaps the introduction of some amendments to this bill. You know, we certainly in the spirit of constructive criticism will offer those alternatives here in this Chamber in due course, Mr. Speaker.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Section 29(2)(a) is available.

Seeing none, any members wishing to speak to the bill? I see the hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and speak to Bill 18, Electricity Statutes (Capacity Market Termination) Amendment Act, 2019. I'd just like to sum up a couple of things that my colleagues have said this afternoon and also last night. I think it's important for Albertans to know and to remember that this decision was based on advice from experts about how to protect consumers while modernizing our electricity market. You know, obviously, the UCP want to reverse this change, again letting foreign markets decide the price of energy on any given day, where the bottom line will be that Albertans will have to pay more for less, resulting in less stability, less predictability, higher electricity bills, and some of the other related issues that my colleagues have talked about.

Although, you know, for a lot of Albertans affordability is, I guess, not a really big deal, for far too many Albertans not having the reliability and the predictability of monthly bills is actually a problem, particularly for people that are struggling, whether they're struggling on AISH, whether they're folks that are unemployed. We've heard repeatedly, sadly, how many people recently have lost their jobs, and there will be more and more Alberta families really struggling.

The electricity market, the one that we made alterations to, would have ensured that Albertans have safe, reliable, sustainable, and affordable electricity. This current move could potentially cost Albertans 10 times more in electricity bills and take us back to the time of rolling blackouts. I've heard some of my colleagues talk about some of their memories about rolling blackouts or brownouts, and I didn't actually recall those. I'm not entirely sure why. So I did a quick little search.

An Hon. Member: Maybe you didn't have your lights on.

Ms Renaud: Maybe I didn't have my lights on.

I did a little search and just reading some of the articles from that time, I guess it really caused me to think. I looked at some of the images that were available, and it really caused me to think of, you know, the harm that a blackout can do when something like that is entirely preventable with the creation of a new market.

It's interesting. One of the articles I looked at had a photograph of some traffic being backed up on I think it was 124th and 102nd Avenue because the signals were out, and we certainly rely on that. Think about the harm that that causes, and not just folks maybe being late for work or late for school or meeting a friend, but emergency vehicles not being able to get to where they need to go. Then I started thinking about, you know, certainly that our hospitals and clinics would have backup generators, but not everybody is being treated in a facility like that. So you think about an unplanned outage like that and the damage that that can cause to people's health. Again, it was caused because of heavy demand on the power grid, and it was caused by the first heat wave of the summer.

Now, I'm going to use this a little bit to swing into the very sad reality that – and I know that not everybody in this place believes it to be a crisis – climate change is indeed a crisis. When you have consensus of over 95 per cent of global scientists that study climate telling us that we have a global crisis, I believe them. Canada released Canada's Changing Climate Report, the CCR, on April 1 – I'm trying to think: was that last year? – and some of the things that I just wanted to highlight are why it's so important to have a reliable market so that rolling blackouts and brownouts aren't something that becomes normal for us. Again, I'm not saying that climate change causes summer heat waves or any of the other storms that we're seeing around us, but it certainly exacerbates things. Some of the highlights from Canada's Changing Climate Report: it is projected that Canada overall will warm at twice the global average regardless of what we do to fight it. This is what scientists are telling us. Now, certainly that doesn't mean that we can't mitigate these changes – there is a lot that we can do – but there are a lot of ways to reduce future global warming.

More than 40 scientists who worked on that particular report for Canada also presented evidence that humans have caused irreparable damage to the climate, primarily through our use of fossil fuels – of course, we know that – to the point that the Earth will continue to warm to some degree even if we stop all emissions now, which we all know. I think one of the things that I was really proud of in the climate leadership plan was the early phase-out of coal-fired electricity, recognizing that burning of coal does create a lot of pollution, but it also takes a heavy toll on people's health.

One of the things that I wanted to talk about and just to remind people – I'm sure that people understand that reducing coal-fired electricity significantly allows us to lower greenhouse gas emissions. I think it was Ontario that made a fairly quick transition from coal-fired electricity in 2014, and as a result you're seeing that their greenhouse gases have come down significantly. One of the things that the market changes that we introduced when we were government allowed us to focus on was climate leadership and some of the things that would help us to do that.

We know that coal-fired electricity is a very significant source of carbon pollution. Coal electricity is actually the largest source of air pollution in Canada. These pollutants cause significant impact on small children and the elderly, as I'm sure you can imagine, and really are a burden to our health care system. Once again – I think I talk a lot about the importance of prevention in terms of health – this is essentially something that we can do as a cost savings to our health care system. We understand and we realize that this causes problems.

On a more global approach or global scan, about 40 per cent of the world's electricity comes from burning coal, which significantly contributes to climate change. It harms the health of Canadians in a very significant way. It produces, actually, more than just carbon dioxide that contributes to global warming. Burning coal releases particulate matter such as sulphur dioxide, nitrogen oxide, and mercury, so the air pollution in burning coal produces particles that actually lodge in our lungs and are associated with worse respiratory and cardiovascular health, higher death rates for those near or around coal-burning plants. We also know that, actually, the burning of coal causes water and soil pollution, so we are contaminating the ground and the nearby surface water.

I talk a lot about climate change in this House. Almost on any topic I think that we can focus the discussion on climate change or on the climate crisis we have because it actually is a crisis and it does impact every aspect of our lives. When we looked at making the changes that we did, we did that because it allowed us to take some bold action, I thought, around climate leadership. The reasons for the changes to a capacity market were to enable the transition to an electricity market that could meet goals set in our climate leadership plan, such as the transition off coal, and increase the share of renewable energy in the energy mix.

Beginning in October, as my colleague mentioned earlier today, AESO revised its forecast for Alberta renewables, stating that Alberta is now expected to fall short of its renewable targets, the changes in the electricity market being an important factor. AESO began its work on evaluating the sustainability of the electricity market in 2013 and recommended implementing a capacity market independent of the climate leadership plan and early coal phase-out to ensure long-term reliability. As a government we worked with the Alberta Electric System Operator, who showed us that the capacity market is the best choice to deliver reliable energy, good environmental performance, reasonable cost to electricity consumers, economic development, and the lowest transition risk. They recommended to us to adopt a capacity market.

It's unfortunate that the members across decided to vote down the amendment to refer this to committee to allow more time for consultation or review because I think this is another lost opportunity. I mean, when I think of a theme for a lot of the legislation or changes that have been happening lately, it seems to be about going backwards, so going back to the old ways of doing things when, really, the challenges are in front of us, as are the opportunities. I think this is a lot of lost opportunity, passing on to Albertans a lot of unnecessary risk, and really missing the chance to take some bold leadership steps around this climate crisis.

I just want to remind people again why I continue to focus on this. It's that Canada is warming twice as fast as the rest of the world. [interjections] It's kind of weird that people think that's funny, but okay.

In northern Canada temperatures have risen by 2.3 degrees annually since 1948, and Canada's annual average has gone up by around 1.7 degrees Celsius. Now, that may not sound like a lot, but on a mean climate scale it is quite dramatic. Again, I don't think any of the scientists who, you know, publish their science – and it is peer-reviewed science – are telling us that it isn't climate change that is causing some of the very damaging weather events that we're seeing and not just weather events – we have flooding, we have horrific forest fires and drought – but that it will continue to exacerbate. You can't have this kind of warming happening in our country, particularly in the north, and not feel the impacts of it. We might not see it every day, but things will continue to get worse.

I'd just like to express my concern that once again this piece of legislation looks at taking us backwards and really is a missed opportunity while passing on a lot of unnecessary risk to consumers in Alberta. With that, I will end my comments.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member for St. Albert.

There is 29(2)(a) available should anybody be looking to take advantage of that.

Seeing none, are there any members wishing to speak to the bill? I see that the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View has risen.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to have the opportunity to rise and speak to this particular bill. I know it's something that's comparatively complex, but I actually think it's an incredibly important file. I want to begin my comments by actually complimenting a number of the staff that used to reside within . . .

The Acting Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member. However, given the fact that REF1 was moved on your behalf by Ms Sweet, it is my understanding that you therefore, according to that, have already spoken to the bill proper.

Ms Ganley: Okay.

The Acting Speaker: There are other members in the House who could join the debate. I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods has risen to speak.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I think I would like to start off along the same vein as the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View because I believe that the hon. member was going to start by complimenting the staff who work in the ministries supporting the decision-making and doing the work on what is a very, very complicated system.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

As I begin my remarks on Bill 18, the Electricity Statutes (Capacity Market Termination) Amendment Act, I really appreciate the opportunity to be able to speak to this bill. One of the things I'd like to say right off the bat is that in some of the communication that government has put out on this, they've stated outright or suggested using different language that the capacity market is complex and that going back to the energy-only market would be more simple and straightforward. I would like to dispute that because our electricity system is incredibly complex, and the people who work within and manage the policy around this – the work the AESO does is incredibly important. To suggest that the capacity market is complex and the energy-only market is simple would be incorrect. I certainly want to point out that we are dealing with something that not only is critically important to Albertans but is really complicated, something that I learned in my time being briefed on the files that relate to this.

As some of my colleagues have mentioned in their response to this bill, there were a lot of very, very detailed, very, very technical briefings made to us when the original decision was made to move to a capacity market, a lot of complex information that we needed to understand and evaluate as we considered how to move forward on this very important file. Moving forward in a way that would work best for Albertans, that would provide a strong, stable, predictable energy market was really important because we want Albertans to have that predictability. We want investors to have that predictability. All indications suggest that thanks to low-cost renewables, low-cost natural gas, and the capacity-market development that was under way, price stability and system stability were what we were achieving.

Now, when there is price volatility, instability – a number of my colleagues have talked about some of the impacts we know, a lot of potential impacts to consumers, individual Albertans. I would like to stress the impact that it has on businesses because in Alberta we have a lot of energy-intensive manufacturing. We have a lot of energy-intensive businesses. When we talk about the price spikes that happened between 2001 and 2014, not only was it individual consumers that were impacted, but business and investment were significantly impacted. There were incredible . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Order. Hon. members, the hon. member is speaking. If we could just keep the noise down, that would be great. Please proceed.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much. Madam Speaker, price spikes impacting businesses as well as individual Albertans had become frequent in that period between 2001 and 2014. In 2007 the price for electricity spiked up to 11.5 cents. In 2018 it went as high as 12 cents and spiked again to 11 cents. In 2011 it spiked to 12 cents. Then it spiked to 12.5. Then it spiked to 13. Each time those spikes were happening, please reflect not only on the individual consumers and how that can put stress on the family budget but on agricultural operations, on energy-intensive manufacturing. Cement in our province is very energy-intensive. Different industries had real struggles dealing with the price spikes. In 2012 it went as high as 15 cents, and if we're talking about that time period between 2001 and 2014, I believe that's as high as the spikes got. That puts incredible pressure on both household budgets and business budgets.

This was all happening under that energy-only market that the government is returning us to. The reason that the conversations were being had to move to a capacity market was informed a great deal by the recommendations of the AESO, including some very in-depth, ongoing grid sustainability analyses that they started back in 2011. That's when they started to notice shifts in the willingness of investors to develop new generation in Alberta. Combined with the global shift towards markets with more stable revenues and the trend toward increased renewable generation as well as coal retirement schedules, all of this caused the AESO to conduct a very in-depth market assessment.

In 2016 they presented the government of Alberta with four market structure options and a recommendation to introduce a capacity market for the added benefits of reliability as the electricity system evolved, encouraging competition in driving innovation, providing greater revenue certainty for suppliers, increasing price stability, and increasing investment confidence. That investment confidence is incredibly important because we're not talking just about investment in the electricity system. I believe that there is a real impact on business around the province when price spikes and price volatility can impact that business.

Now, the AESO is a really important player in our electricity system. We need to strongly consider their input because, of course, they're responsible for implementing changes to the electricity system. They're also responsible for ensuring sufficient investment in system reliability in whatever system is in place, so their perspective is critically important. They identified real issues with the energy market. Through the debate I have not heard of my satisfaction how confidence has been achieved that an energy-only market will provide adequate amounts as well as price stability within our province.

Now, we have heard that different industry players have a strong desire to move back to an energy-only market. I can certainly understand that that perspective is important and needs to be considered, but we also need to remember that industry also has a desire for market profits. Price volatility often improves profits. My colleague from Edmonton-Gold Bar spoke about different actions that had been taken to maximize those profits, and oftentimes that's done in a way that is not helpful to the consumers or to the businesses that need that electricity to run and to operate. So there are two competing drives: the market profit drive that industry has and then the consumers' desire to have lower electricity prices and to have that price stability.

When we're looking at and evaluating this, we need to make sure that we've got the modelling behind it and the certainty to know that there will be the investment necessary. In 2016, when the AESO was making its recommendations to government, it was incredibly clear. They created, in fact, an entire report with recommendations suggesting that in an energy-only market it would not be sustainable, that there were significant risks, that there would be inadequate supply, that there would be inadequate investment in the creation of additional electricity sources, that there wouldn't be a willingness and financial capacity of investors to build new generation in Alberta.

For these reasons I'm very concerned about what Bill 18 proposes to do in reversing that change to capacity market termination. I think that making sure we have an electricity market that ensures Albertans have safe, reliable, sustainable, affordable electricity not just when we're thinking about somebody's home but when we're thinking about the cement manufacturing that happens in our province or when we're thinking about chemical manufacturing that happens in our province or a number of other energy-intensive manufacturing that happens in our province, this is an important perspective that we need to take into account. The work that was done to move to a capacity market was done specifically to address concerns raised to us by the AESO.

I mentioned near the start of my comments my concern that the government is treating capacity market as if it was complex and energy only as simple. I strongly disagree with that characterization. The entire system is very complex, and we need to address that at face value when we're looking at these complicated issues. We know the history of the energy-only market in our province. We have the historical context. My colleague from St. Albert was reading about some of the impacts that previous price spikes and brownouts have had. There were regular price spikes happening between that period. I listed a few of them going as high as 15 cents. That causes uncertainty and that causes financial hardship. This isn't an imaginary bogeyman that the opposition is raising. Price volatility is a direct concern, and making sure that government is addressing that for both citizens and business is incredibly important.

Now, in their original report, including the analysis that they did, the AESO also spoke about how they would need to modify the current energy-only market if it were to be maintained. The modifications that they recommended to encourage the investment, make sure that there was enough power to run the province and all of the industry, included doing things like raising the price cap, that was currently at $1,000 per megawatt hour, up to $5,000 per megawatt hour. To simplify that or to explain what that means, it just means that there's way more room for volatile price spikes. The spikes that we saw in the past could get even bigger.

I look forward to the debate at Committee of the Whole, where we will have a little bit more back and forth with the minister and we can talk about how these things will be managed. Resulting in even bigger spikes than we saw in that period from 2001 to 2014 is of serious concern to me, and if the energy-only market modification, changing the price cap, is the only strategy put forward, then we have a real issue, knowing that volatility and what can happen looking into other jurisdictions like Texas and where similar market forces have performed.

In my comments in response to Bill 18 I strongly wanted to talk about the impact on Albertans, both homeowners and businesses, the risk to those consumers. I understand that there are industry voices with a desire to maximize their market profits. Those need to be weighed and balanced with the needs of consumers and the stability of the overall market, and I'm strongly concerned about this decision given the varying depth, briefings, and work that we really dug into and did on this file. The decision being made to move to capacity market was based on the advice of experts about how to protect consumers and modernize the electricity market.

Other colleagues of mine have talked about that need to get to 30 per cent renewable energy and the capacity market's ability to help facilitate those goals, to make sure that we have low-cost, reliable energy sources from renewable industries. Other colleagues have spoken at length about the interest in Alberta citizens, particularly our youth, in making sure that we have those renewable energy projects and that that's part of our system makeup.

Allowing Albertans to pay more for less, to get back to that time of volatile price spikes is of concern to me because higher electricity bills, I think, will come from Bill 18, and I'm concerned about the consumers in the province given all the information and all of the analysis that went into the original move to a capacity market termination. Through this process of bill debate I have not seen sufficient analysis or information that would assure me or other consumers that that's not going to be the result because the best predictor for future behaviour is past behaviour. The energy market in the past has had volatile price spikes as high as 15 cents, and with the modifications to the energy-only market those price spikes could go even higher.

What we need in our province is that reliable, predictable, sustainable, safe, and effective electricity system, and in my mind Bill 18 and the debate that we've engaged in so far does not give me confidence that moving back to an energy-only market will provide that for our businesses and our households.

Thank you very much, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. Are there any members wishing to speak?

Seeing none, are there any members wishing to speak to the referral amendment? Oh. My apologies. That's what happens when you come in halfway through.

Anybody else wanting to speak to the bill?

Seeing none, shall I call the question? Hon. Minister of Energy, would you like to close debate?

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. At this point I would just like to close debate.

[Motion carried; Bill 18 read a second time]

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mrs. Pitt in the chair]

The Chair: Hon. members, I would like to call the Committee of the Whole to order.

Bill 18 Electricity Statutes (Capacity Market Termination) Amendment Act, 2019

The Chair: Are there any members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Calgary-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Madam Chair. I would like to move an amendment, and I have the requisite number of copies.

The Chair: Just wait until I have a copy, hon. member.

This will be known as amendment A1. Hon. Member for Calgary-McCall, please proceed.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you. The amendment, I have to read that into the record, right?

The Chair: We'll make an exception this time, hon. member. I think it will be acceptable to not have to read it into the record.

Mr. Sabir: Okay. I will explain this amendment. In short, this will make it clear that the electricity market will have rules against economic withholding. That's the crux of this amendment. Economic withholding is . . .

The Chair: Sorry, hon. member, to interrupt you. I hesitate to interrupt. Just so everyone is aware, this amendment is two pages. As it is being distributed, please make sure that you have two.

Sorry, Member. Please proceed. Go ahead.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Madam Chair. This amendment is to make clear that the electricity market will have some rules against economic withholding. Economic withholding is illegal in many jurisdictions. It leads to higher costs to consumers, and it is questionable if this is a fair practice. It was explicitly allowed in Alberta under the offer behaviour enforcement guidelines, which were revoked by the Market Surveillance Administrator, MSA, in 2017. Economic withholding was allowed to incentivize investment, but the MSA stated that due to the capacity market, it was no longer needed. This means that our reform eliminated the need for intentional price spikes, and it is unclear if economic withholding is coming back with the changes that this UCP government brought forward.

Based on the MSA ruling, Bill 18 might be a way to reintroduce it back into the Alberta electricity market. This bill leaves it open, so this may be a way to reintroduce it through the back door, and if the government doesn't take action against it, it shows that they are just too happy to raise the cost of living of Albertans, just like their car insurance rates. Simply, this amendment is asking all members to think about whether they are in favour of economic withholding or not. It's that simple. If the government wants to continue with economic withholding and shift the burden to Albertans, they can certainly choose to vote it down, but we believe that economic withholding results in price spikes and affects consumers' bottom lines.

I will urge all my colleagues to vote in favour of this amendment, vote in favour of reasonable, fair, sustainable, and affordable electricity for all Albertans and your constituents.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to amendment A1? The hon. Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Thank you, Madam Chair. Certainly, the intent of the amendment – we certainly want to ensure that electricity is affordable and that there aren't spikes, and that's exactly why, when we announced that we would be sticking with the energy-only market, we asked AESO to come back to us with some proposals on how to improve the energy-only market. These are the types of things that we believe and we think that they will come back to us with, but I think that it's premature to put this in this piece of legislation because we know that we're going to get a suite of proposals coming back from AESO on how to improve the energy-only market. In that case, we would be proposing that we not agree with this amendment. We certainly do not have a problem with the spirit of it and certainly do not have a problem with something that supports the fair and efficient and openly competitive operation of the electricity market, and these are exactly the things that we've asked the AESO to come back to us with and tell us where we can find some improvements.

Thank you.

The Chair: Any other members? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. Always a pleasure to get up in the House and speak and specifically to this amendment. Of course, in representing the people of Edmonton-Ellerslie, I've had a number of opportunities to speak with constituents, from even before being elected to office, that were concerned about this particular issue in terms of price spikes, in terms of electricity and how difficult it was for a lot of families trying to make ends meet from month to month. In terms of costs when it comes to not just their electricity bill – but we're speaking specifically about that right now – it was mentioned by several constituents.

This is something that we really need to be concerned about because, of course, what the capacity market was intending to do was to really be able to address this issue for many Albertans, who were having issues making ends meet from month to month. The capacity market was a structure that would ensure reliability as the electrical system evolves. It also increases the stability of prices, as has been mentioned by several of my colleagues here. So we as the NDP government changed the way that Alberta pays for their energy providers so that it's more stable and fair to the average consumer. That decision was based on advice from experts, of course, on how to protect consumers and modernize our electricity system.

Here we find ourselves yet again, where we have this new government that wants to take us backwards rather than modernizing our province and really being able to address issues and concerns of Albertans that, quite frankly, are having to make ends meet month to month. The UCP wants to reverse this change, letting foreign markets decide the price of energy on any given day, and Albertans will have to pay more for less, of course. Less stability, less predictability, and higher electricity bills are what this bill will cause if it's passed. These reckless and short-sighted changes will cause uncertainty and instability, and Albertans are going to have to pay the price for that. Our electricity market would have ensured Albertans have safe, reliable, sustainable, affordable electricity. This move by the UCP could cost Albertans about 10 times more on their electricity bills and take us back to the time of rolling blackouts, as has been mentioned by a few of my colleagues already.

As I stated before, the government is turning back the clock and is destroying progress on economic diversification, and this is just more of the same. It's, you know, a big $4.5 billion giveaway to big corporations while Albertans are having to pay the price yet again.

One of the reasons for the changes to the capacity market was to enable a transition to an electricity market that could meet goals set, of course, in the climate leadership plan such as the transition off coal and increasing the share of renewable energy in the energy mix. At the beginning of October the AESO revised its forecast for Alberta renewables, stating that Alberta is now expected to fall short of its renewable targets and that the changes in the electricity market are an important factor. The AESO began its work on evaluating the sustainability of the electricity market in 2013, and the AESO recommended implementing a capacity market independent of the climate leadership plan and early coal phase-out to ensure long-term reliability, again, for the specific needs of Albertans.

As a government we worked with the Alberta Electric System Operator, who showed us that the capacity market is the best choice to deliver reliable energy, good environmental performance, reasonable cost to electricity customers, economic development, and the lowest transition risk. Of course, it was them that recommended the move towards the capacity market. Before our reforms the market had less consumer protection such as economic withholdings. The capacity market is a good tool to ensure that the coal phase-out will work smoothly. The coal phase-out already saved three times Vancouver's emissions, for example.

Energy-only markets are more volatile and they're less reliable than capacity markets, and of course this is what this is really about. As we turn back the clock towards a less reliable system, it's Albertans that are going to have to pay the price on this, and many of those are constituents of ours, people that we're supposed to be here to represent. It's really unfathomable that we have people from across the aisle who are here representing all Albertans – we understand that it's important that everybody's views are represented here, but we need to make sure that all views are represented. It's for this reason that I will be supporting this amendment, and I strongly encourage all members of the House to do so.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Yeah. Thanks, Madam Chair. I appreciate that. I'm really happy to see this amendment on the floor here this afternoon. One of my biggest concerns when there are changes being proposed to the energy market is that it creates a window of instability – right? – a window of transition that can result in an insecure electricity supply and potential insecurity around the determination of reliability of pricing. Both of these are essential consumer concerns, for individuals and for industry. I'm glad to see that these changes, as brought forward by the Member for Calgary-McCall, seem to address this issue.

You know, the AESO is very essential in making sure that we discourage scarcity pricing in the electric markets during tight supply conditions, and we need to make sure that that is enshrined and protected by law. We don't worry so much about the electricity when we flip the switch and there it is, but when you have a scarcity of supply due to a major generation system maybe being taken off for maintenance or whatever or you have some loss during some storms maybe or something like that, I mean, that's the time when you have to have fail-safe measures in place to protect the individual consumer and the industrial consumers as well.

I don't applaud just the spirit of this amendment to Bill 18 but its substance as well. I am completely behind this idea of strengthening Bill 18 to ensure that Albertans are protected, that our electricity supply is protected. This is an essential service that cannot be compromised at any juncture.

I certainly support this amendment, and I encourage others to do so. I will hand it over to someone who might be able to offer some more insight in that regard.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Are there any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I am pleased to rise and to speak to this amendment today. I think it's an incredibly important amendment. Obviously I, like my colleagues, am not generally in favour of this bill. I think the reasons I'm not in favour of the bill and the reason I am in favour of the amendment tend to tie together in this instance.

The concern, obviously, with the bill is instability. I think we've seen evidence in the past that this sort of energy-only market creates price instability. The evidence we had at the time we were making the decisions and the evidence that was put before us by the officials in this instance, who were incredibly good, who did an amazing job of providing summary and information on this, was that that instability would increase as time went on. That's a big concern.

It's one thing if you're a very large corporation that understands how these things work and can model it and can shut down your production to ensure that you're not hitting the peak rate. But if you're an average consumer, you don't know that. What that creates is a situation of unfairness, where people who are average consumers, who can't be expected to be watching this sort of thing, are the ones who are ultimately bearing the cost of the system. I think that's what bothers me about this bill. Ultimately, this is a decision about who will bear what cost in the system. I mean, really, every economic decision is basically about that, about how we're distributing costs and who will bear which cost. In this case what we're deciding is that consumers and average Albertans are going to bear the cost in terms of this massive, radical sort of price instability that we're likely to see, and I think that that's a huge issue.

One of the reasons that I ran for office originally was my concern about income inequality. We hear a lot about this. It's increasing. It's harder and harder for those sort of middle class and below to be able to get by. One of the things that's challenging about that is budgeting – right? – doing your household budget. I think that this sort of price instability makes it very, very challenging for people who are really doing their best in trying circumstances to keep their head above water, to put food on the table, to put a roof over their head, and to provide for their children. I think that that's unfair, and that's my sort of general objection.

What's important about this amendment is that it prevents what they call economic withholding, basically the ability of a company to withhold power generation at a critical moment to drive the price of power up in order to maximize profits. I mean, that's a huge concern. Again, it's large corporations with wealthy shareholders profiting while everyday Albertans pay the price. Obviously, that's not something that I am in support of.

I think it's worth sort of backing up and looking at what this bill is doing overall. They have for many years, and I suspect still do, you know, sort of taught in the first-year economics course – when you go there, they talk about natural monopolies. The example that tends to be given is power system infrastructure because the upfront cost to invest is so high that you don't generally get lots of participants in the market. That's actually the case here in Alberta as well. What that means is that when we originally changed to this market many moons ago, they had to sort of create what I would call the illusion of competition. It isn't actual competition. We have all the sort of, like, retailers, if you will, the Enmaxes and the EPCORs of the world, but actually they're not generating their own power to sell. They're not competing in that sort of way. They're purchasing that power, and then they appear to be competing even though they're really all competing with identical products with slightly different marketing.

Because of that extra layer, what is created is that there's a contract to sell to those retailers, and that contract has automatic interest of 8 per cent. You and I can't buy into that contract. We can't go out into the market and purchase that 8 per cent because we have to have a huge amount of capital to be able to buy into that. That's a pretty big concern for me, when you're creating a situation where those who have an enormous amount of capital, who were born with money, have the ability to go and invest that money and get an 8 per cent return because they are large investors or large funds. They're able to do that whereas small people don't have the access necessarily to the same opportunities. That's – I don't know – I guess one of the things about the world that has always sort of bothered me, right? Again, this is what we're talking about here.

This economic withholding, that we're trying to prevent: this is, in my view, incredibly bad behaviour. If we don't rule out bad behaviour, the obligation that falls on these companies is to maximize the profits of their shareholders. It doesn't say to maximize profits of their shareholders ethically. It doesn't say to maximize profits of their shareholders having regard to what the average person would think is fair. It's just to maximize profits. So the concern becomes that they can use this, essentially, to do exactly that, to drive a price spike intentionally to make you and me and everyday Albertans pay those costs, and then the companies get huge profits.

This amendment will remedy that. Obviously, it isn't a remedy to everything. My preference would be simply to move to the capacity market. There is a reason that the vast majority of jurisdictions in the world have gone in this direction, and that reason is that it works more efficiently. Now, that isn't to say that there aren't differences from jurisdiction to jurisdiction. Geography will actually have an impact on this. But, interestingly, geography is one of the factors that drives the decision towards a capacity market in Alberta. Our geography, especially in the northern parts of the province, where you have a small population spread out over a large area, is one of the things that drives this.

I think it's probably been said by many of my colleagues that Texas is the only jurisdiction that does it this way in North America, and with due respect to Texas I don't think they're necessarily right although they may have different geographic and population considerations than we do. All I can say with certainty is that the advice that we received from the experts in Alberta was that the capacity market was the way to go.

This bill will essentially mean that Albertans pay more. It will mean that there is less stability and less predictability, and it will mean higher electricity bills. I think it's a bit reckless, because even beyond the higher electricity bills, that uncertainty is very challenging for people who are living on a specific budget or on a very fixed income to deal with. I think, you know, of seniors, who have a certain fixed income. Students who are in university often have, like, a certain number of hours that they are able to work, and they have a lot of costs, and it can be super, super challenging if your power bill shows up with an extra hundred dollars on it that month. That's a real problem for some people, and I think this government should consider the fact that that's a real problem for those people and take that problem seriously because it's our duty to do that.

This amendment, while it won't fix that entire problem, will fix at least some of it. It will at least prevent deliberate bad acting. It won't do away with the volatility and, from what our advice was, what would be increased volatility over time. It won't completely prevent people from having sort of price shock on their bill, you know, one month or for a couple of months, but what it will do is at least prevent deliberate bad acting from causing a spike in the price or aggravating a spike in the price to essentially be able to move money from average Albertans to the wealthy. One wonders if perhaps that was the intention of this bill.

I think, yes, this is a complicated system, and, yes, it's very difficult to explain to people. I remember this. When they initially made this change, I was a younger person, and at the time my father, actually, had an enormous amount to say about this because he was very, very troubled by this move. I think for some of the reasons I've stated, that this tends to be unstable and because, I suspect, if you look at it in depth, it isn't really competition. It's only the illusion of competition. It's competition at the retail end, but if you're taking the vast majority out of the business, out of the competition stream, I mean, is it even competition anymore? I'm not sure.

I think that, overall, this bill is a huge concern. My preference, obviously, would be not to move forward with it at all. But I think that it is our job as opposition not simply to oppose what comes forward but to propose ways to make that better. Even though this doesn't solve all of the problems that this bill is creating, it will solve at least one problem, and that, at the end of the day, will help at least some Albertans out there who will have challenges paying their bills as a result of this piece of legislation. I think that if we can help those Albertans even a little, we ought to do it. I don't think there's any reason not to.

This, again, very clearly prohibits nothing but bad acting. You know, when the members of the UCP talk endlessly about markets and the wonderfulness, I don't think that what any of them are talking about is bad actors. I believe genuinely that when the members opposite talk about the market, I don't think they're talking about bad actors. I think it's my view that I would imagine that everyone in this House will be supportive of something which doesn't prevent what the aim of the bill is but simply prevents bad actors from, essentially, intentionally abusing that market to drive up the spot price and to gain profits at the cost of Albertans.

So, with that, I will say that I am definitely in support of this amendment. I would urge all members to vote in favour of this amendment, and I would urge members of the government to seriously consider what it is this amendment is doing, because I actually think that it's something that we can all agree on.

Thank you very much.

The Chair: Any members wishing to speak to the amendment? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Sweet: Thank you, Madam Chair. It's a pleasure to rise and support the amendment as proposed by the hon. Member for Calgary-McCall. I mean, this is an important conversation to be having when we speak specifically to this bill. I recognize that the minister did say, you know, that in the legislation it speaks to the fact that AESO has been asked to write a recommendation and that they have till November 29 to do that, to recommend what the capacity market would look like, what we would do moving forward. Maybe economic withholding will be part of that recommendation. We know that in other jurisdictions across the country economic withholding is prohibited.

Alberta is one of the few jurisdictions that doesn't do that. I think this is a way that we protect Albertans from being impacted by the volatility of the market and not having to pay when, as my hon. colleague said, there may be or may not be bad actors within the industry. Economic withholding, as we know, allows to incentivize some industries and some people within the industry to look at having a way to drive the market up. But what it also does is that when we look at our smaller producers, so our green energy producers – our solar, our wind – the ones that aren't able to produce the same capacity into the market as some of our bigger generators, it actually pushes them out of the market. The struggle with that is that there becomes a question around the ability to invest from small producers into the market to diversify and look at green energy.

Now, the reason I brought up the comment by the hon. minister was that when it comes to the recommendations – and I'm very confident that she is aware of this – on January 26, 2018, a report did come out about the Alberta capacity market and the comprehensive market design. It was drafted by AESO. It is public, online. You can read it. You can see what the different options are when it comes to looking at how capacity markets versus the current system would work, why this recommendation was made. In fact, the report speaks to the transition to the end of 2019 and how, in looking at this report and these recommendations, we would be able to do this with limited impact on the industry, minimizing the regulatory requirements, and about the fact that many of the industry partners that have been working with AESO were able to actually speak to the fact that they had been working towards this transition already.

They were prepared for 2019, which is right now. Because they are preparing and because they recognized what the price model was going to look like, they recognized the fact that there were conversations and commitments around the contact impact tests, all of the energy market monitoring and the mitigation requirements that would be required under the new system, and dispatching scheduling summaries. All of the questions that the industry was asking were written in a report to the minister.

I guess my question and what I don't understand – and I do appreciate this amendment – is when the minister stands and speaks to the amendment and says: well, we're waiting for the report. The report is done. It was done on January 26, 2018. It's not that old; it's a year and a bit. All the questions that we're talking about here have been answered, I think, in the report. So my question to the minister would be: what's missing that doesn't answer the question around why we would move to a capacity market? Why wouldn't we take the recommendations that already exist within this report that speak to the fact that economic withholding would actually be addressed within this? It wouldn't be allowed to continue. There is a comprehensive market design created to support the industry.

Why is the government now saying, “Well, we want a report for November 29, 2019, so that we can make a decision”? It’s been done.

My question, again, goes back to: who is this really designed for? Is this about protecting Albertans and making sure that they have a regulated, consistent energy and electrical market where they know what their bills are going to be every month, or is this about looking at giving another opportunity to big corporations on the backs of Albertans? That’s what it looks like, because the argument from the government right now that we need a report to tell us what to do when it already exists from a year ago doesn’t make any sense, except for the fact that it doesn’t actually say what the minister wants it to say, which is: let’s give money to big corporations while Albertans pay for it. That is what’s going to happen.

In saying that, I think that the consideration needs to be made and the honesty needs to happen around the direction that we’re trying to go when looking at not moving towards this capacity market given the fact that the industry is ready. It says right in this report that they transitioned. They knew it was coming. They had the map. They had the plan of what they needed to do for the market. They were prepared to go, and now all of a sudden we’re going backwards, and we’re telling the industry that we’re going backwards. I would be more than happy to table this report tomorrow for all members to be able to review it and to respect the fact that I’ve now referenced it.

I would encourage all members: when you’re standing here representing your constituents and talking about the fact that you want to make life more affordable for Albertans and that you don’t want them to have to pay any more than they’re already paying, when you’ve already increased their insurance costs and now you’re looking at removing the electricity market so that they’re going to have volatile bills every month to pay for their heating and for all the other things, you’re not really making life more affordable. So stand up for your constituents. Make sure that the economic withholding amendment is passed. Then at least your constituents will know that they have a consistent energy bill every single month because they won’t have to deal with the volatility of the market.

Thank you.

[Motion on amendment A1 lost]

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to the bill?

Mrs. Savage: I move that we rise and report progress.

[Motion carried]

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul.

5:30

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. The Committee of the Whole has had under consideration a certain bill. The committee reports progress on the following bill: Bill 18. I wish to table copies of all amendments considered by Committee of the Whole on this date for the official records of the Assembly.

The Deputy Speaker: Does the Assembly concur in the report? Please say aye.

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Deputy Speaker: Any opposed, please say no. Carried.

Government Motions

Interprovincial Infrastructure Projects

34. Mrs. Savage moved on behalf of Mr. Jason Nixon: Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly denounce all federal political parties that would enable a provincial government to unilaterally prevent the construction of interprovincial infrastructure projects of national importance, including natural resource pipelines.

Ms Hoffman moved on behalf of Mr. Bilous that the motion be amended by adding “and that would roll back progress on efforts to reach Canada’s current greenhouse gas emissions targets, including the abysmal federal TIER plan” after the words “prevent the construction of interprovincial infrastructure projects of national importance, including natural resource pipelines.”

[Adjourned debate on the amendment October 22: Mr. Kenney]

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any members wishing to speak?

[Motion on amendment A1 lost]

The Deputy Speaker: We are back on the motion. Are there members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. Thank you. I rise to move an amendment on behalf of my hon. colleague Heather Sweet. I will – oh. Sorry. On behalf of my colleague the MLA for Edmonton-Manning. I will let you distribute that.

The Deputy Speaker: Give it a moment, hon. member. It may be a good time to point out how hard it is to remember riding names every now and then, like myself.

This will be known as amendment A2. Hon. member, please proceed.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. What this amendment is attempting to do is to change the motion just a little, because I think that our leader and many of us have been very, very clear about our disagreements in certain areas with the federal party. I could go on at length with respect to my own personal disagreement. I think the position of opposing pipelines is generally incorrect, obviously, and I think it’s not well thought out for a number of reasons. So we disagree with that policy; we disagree quite strongly. We disagree with a lot of policies.

We also disagree with parties who refuse to take seriously approaches to tackling climate change. I think that that’s pretty important. I think it’s important to note that those two goals are not mutually exclusive, and as long as we see them as mutually exclusive, we’re going to continue to have this hyperpolarization, where people just sort of stomp their feet in an attempt to convince one another. Madam Speaker, I think this is a Legislature full of people with varied experiences, but all of us have been in rooms with someone we’re disagreeing with, that we have to negotiate with. I think that anyone who’s been involved in law, anyone who’s been involved in business, anyone who’s been involved in most anything can tell you that stomping your feet and shouting almost never results in progress, and it’s not really how most grown-ups behave, and it ought not to be, either.

I think that we are able to say that those things can work together. I think that we are able to say: “Yes. You can take climate change seriously. You can believe that it is human-caused. You can believe that we ought to do something about it, and that doesn’t mean that you have to be against all oil and gas development.” I think that those two things, economic development and the environment, can absolutely go hand in hand. In fact, I think I could cite a number of examples where investments that were made by the NDP when we were in government had huge effects, positive effects on economic development and positive effects on the environment. I think that making that a dichotomy choice is wrong-headed. It leads to divisiveness, and I just don’t think it’s appropriate. We disagree with those things.

We also disagree with parties who tolerate divisive, antichoice, homophobic, or xenophobic views in their parties. I think that that’s a totally legitimate position to take as well.

I think that what this motion should not be about is mudslinging at federal parties and mudslinging at individuals. I think it should be about standing up for Albertans, and I think that you can do one thing without doing the other. I think, Madam Speaker, that it is absolutely and completely possible to stand up for yourself, to stand up for your neighbours, to stand up for your province, and to do that without the name-calling or being petty or slinging mud. I think it’s possible to do it without misrepresenting deliberately the policies of other individuals.

I think we should absolutely continue to fight to secure market access for our energy. There’s very little, I think, that is more important to Albertans. I think that we absolutely can and should do that, but I think that we now find ourselves in a position where we know what the outcome of the election was, and a minority government brings us the possibility of co-operation, which can advance the interests of Albertans. At the end of the day, I think that should be our goal. If our goal is to advance the interests of Albertans – and I think we all agree in this room that that goal is significantly furthered by increased market access – then I think we should consider: what is the most reasonable way to achieve that goal? Then we should execute on that basis. We shouldn’t act on the basis of rage or fear or pettiness.

We should act on the basis that we are serious people here in this room who care about our province, who care about market access, who care about the environment, and who want to take reasonable steps to move forward, so we are going to do our best to achieve our goals. We’re not going to stand and scream because that doesn’t achieve our goals. Instead, we’re going to talk about policies and why they are right or why they are wrong because we don’t need to stand and scream, Madam Speaker. We’re right. I think that’s a significant advantage. The members on this side want Albertans to be heard and supported by the federal government, and I genuinely believe that the members on that side also want Albertans to be heard and supported by the federal government.

Again, I think this is about: what can we do to make progress? We believe that there is room for progress on a national pharmacare program, a national dental care program, and, at long last, real progress on establishing a national child care program. I think all of those things are fantastic goals. I think they’re incredibly important to Albertans. They’re important to me, and I think they’re important to a lot of people.

We urge the provincial government to accept this amendment. If the amendment fails, I think it’s worth getting one more thing on the record. If this amendment fails, I believe that the motion which is left isn’t about fighting for Albertans. I think that what it is is another disappointing attempt by this government to try to play partisan games ahead of focusing on what Albertans elected them to do, and what Albertans elected them to do is create jobs. I mean, every time this current Premier stood up, that’s what he said: jobs, economy, pipeline. I think that that is what people voted for. I think that we should focus on that and we should set about achieving those goals. I think that we’re all agreed on those goals. To play these sorts of games when instead we could be trying to move forward in the interests of all Albertans, I think, is inappropriate and beneath the dignity of this place.

I think, at the end of the day, what we need is a government that cares about Alberta jobs and families, and I think that many of the members around me in this room on both sides do care deeply about that. I urge them to very strongly consider this amendment because, at the end of the day, what the amendment is doing is altering the motion to talk about policies instead of people. I think it’s incredibly important to speak about policies instead of people because, again, we all have the same objectives. We want to further the interests of Albertans. We have the same objectives. We want market access for our products because that furthers the interests of Albertans. At the end of the day, it is absolutely and completely possible to do that in a way that doesn’t involve mudslinging. It is absolutely and completely possible to take that as our common goal and to all move forward together and to achieve that by the most likely means, which, like I’ve said – I think anyone who’s been involved in the business world probably knows – isn’t screaming and stomping your feet.

I urge members to seriously consider accepting this amendment, to seriously consider that we should be talking about policies and not people and that we should do our best to move forward for the people of Alberta. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other members wishing to speak to this amendment? The hon. Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. This amendment does not adequately reflect what happened in the federal election. In the recent federal election we had three – at least three – federal parties who ran a platform on anti oil and gas, antipipeline, and anti-Alberta. We had three federal parties who failed to understand that Alberta has the exclusive constitutional right to manage and develop our natural resources, including oil and gas and electricity. Clearly, they don’t understand the Constitution. Likewise, those same three federal parties don’t understand the Constitution and that it is a federal constitutional right to manage the interprovincial pipelines and projects of major national importance, and they’re prepared to give a veto to provinces.

Madam Speaker, this is what the resolution is about. This is about standing up for Alberta’s oil and gas industry and telling the federal parties to respect the Constitution. It’s not about single policies and saying we disagree with policies of some of those parties. It’s much beyond that. It’s a failure to understand the Constitution. Diluting this motion to say that we disagree with policies just doesn’t cut it because those parties ran on a platform that was unconstitutional, clearly did not understand the Constitution, was anti oil and gas, antipipeline, anti-Alberta.

We can’t support the amendment to this motion. It dilutes the whole, entire purpose of what we’re trying to achieve: to tell the federal government, the federal political parties to respect the Constitution. It dilutes it too much. I’m opposed to this amendment.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to this amendment? The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to say a few words in regard to the amendment that was brought forward on behalf of the hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning. Yeah. I mean, I think that it’s an important differentiation, to talk about policy, because, of course, the policies of any given political party or movement or so forth are diverse in their totality and have different meanings or different effects in different places. Certainly, we have been unequivocal in regard to the opposition of the federal New Democrats and their position on the TMX pipeline. You know, it's been a very difficult circumstance, and we have not wavered in regard to our opposition to this position.

We know as well, with the benefit of the outcome of this election that we saw in the last 24 hours, that now it is a minority government with a much-weakened governing party, the Liberals, and, I think, lots of opportunity, I believe, to – although, you know, it's unfortunate that there's no representation from either our province or Saskatchewan in that Liberal caucus. I think that they have a lot of motivation to make sure that they stand up for the best interests of both Alberta and Saskatchewan. Quite frankly, part of the engine of what has made Canada successful over this last 10 or 15 years is the success of the economy here on the prairies.

You know, we should look at this, and we certainly must redouble our resolve to ensure that Alberta's interests are reflected in the national interests. We must redouble our resolve to ensure that we have access to export markets through pipelines for our energy industry.

But I think as well that we must redouble our resolve to work through constructive ways by which we can achieve those goals because, you know, whenever we start to see polarization, either between provinces or between the provincial and federal levels of governance here in this country, more often than not that bears no productive result or the bitter fruits of division, that have a tendency to linger in people's minds, not in a rational way but an emotive. I believe that it's important always to keep the door open and to clearly express the logic and the passion by which we all, I believe, in this House will fight and continue to fight for our interests and our energy industry, access to markets and so forth, but to be able to differentiate between those policies and categorically building these divisions that can sometimes reach over and have unintended consequences, to the detriment of both our interests here in the province and the building of this nation of Canada.

I strongly believe in our place in Confederation. I strongly believe that Alberta's star is still on the rise, and for us to, you know, otherwise just look at the national situation and the circumstances of individual provinces as being different from our own and being opposed to our own – I think we have to be realistic, but at the same time we must stand to build bridges and to build a strengthened economy and a sense of understanding between the provinces and between Alberta and Canada.

With that, I certainly do support this amendment, and I encourage all members of this House to consider that as well. Madam Speaker, thank you very much.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other speakers to the amendment on the motion? The hon. Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat.

Ms Glasgo: Thank you, Madam Chair. I was obviously very intently listening to the Member for Edmonton-North West and as well the Member for Calgary-Mountain View before that. You know, they talked a lot about how this motion needs to be amended to account for co-operation and advance of Alberta's interests. Well, it would be news to me that Alberta's interests would include chanting, and I quote: no new approvals, no new approvals, no new approvals. It seems a little bit of a strange take on what the interests of Albertans really are, but I digress.

We have here a former Education minister, who politicized Alberta's curriculum. It's kind of interesting to think what exactly he might have put in there, but I think that "no new approvals, no new approvals, no new approvals" might be an indicator of, you know, what some parents might be concerned about.

I was also privy to a video that came onto a Facebook page just a few minutes ago, and in that video it showed multiple members of the NDP caucus supporting the Extinction Rebellion. Now, for the record, what is the Extinction Rebellion? Well, the Extinction Rebellion is the radical group that protested outside of the Legislature, and they had some really interesting things to say, including discounting fossil fuels and talking about how horrible our energy industry is, and then – my personal favourite, which was just ignorant, in my opinion, Madam Speaker – it was talking about the extinction of beef as well. I'm a proud Albertan, and I'm a proud Canadian, but there are very few things that I'm more proud of than our beef and our oil industry.

Then we also hear about them talking about us doing what we were elected to do. Well, the last time I checked – and it was drilled into my head as well. I believe it was one of our candidates in the election, her daughter. She said so eloquently: "What are our priorities? Jobs, the economy, and pipelines." Those priorities are very clearly articulated in Alberta's interest.

Jobs. We implemented a job-creation tax cut, that will see more jobs created. We see that with Telus's investments. We see that with investor confidence coming back to Alberta. As well, jobs: how do we stand up for Albertan jobs? By getting Alberta's resources to tidewater, Madam Speaker. We need to absolutely do that because people like my dad rely on those jobs, and what's happening right now is that you see Alberta's workers: they're uneasy, they're scared, they don't know what's going to happen next because of Justin Trudeau and his policies, his proclivity for radical groups and, let's just say, interesting behaviour outside of the House of Commons.

Now, our economy. As we know, our economy is – we need a strong Alberta to have a strong Canada. I heard that, you know, a minority government is a really good thing, according to the members opposite, for things like progress on pharmacare. Well, I think I would ask the members opposite: how do you plan to pay for that?

I would ask Jagmeet Singh the same thing, and he'd probably say: from the abundance of wealth that our country creates. Now, the next question I'd have for him, if that was, in fact, his response – I'm not even sure he'd know how to respond to that, but he would say probably something along those lines, and then I would say to him: "Well, you're probably going to need Alberta's help with that because you're going to need money from our oil and gas sector. You're going to need money from our resource sector and the hard-working men and women that contribute to Canada's equalization as well as the fiscal capacity of other provinces." When we're talking about that, it really doesn't make sense to me. I'm just trying to – you know, one plus one equals two, Madam Speaker. When it comes to these kinds of things, pipelines plus tidewater equals market access.

I'm just confused at how that side of the House can't seem to see that, and instead of actually voting in favour of our economy and voting in the best of Albertans' interests – and when they want to talk about being multipartisan: well, then show us that. Why didn't you vote for the Conservatives in the federal election? That was your opportunity to be multipartisan, and you didn't do that. I know, for me – like, I don't get up here and stand on some, you know, sanctimonious perch about co-operation, but I know for a fact that what we can do is that we can co-operate with all leaders in the federation, but what we can't do is to stand here and pretend to be acting in the best interests of Albertans when we're voting for an antipipeline leader.

On the topic of pipelines, you know, I've said many times that I'm very proud of my dad. He's one of the, I think, smartest guys I know. He often refers to himself as Joe Voter. He's saying that he's just an average Joe. He's just a guy. When he came to the Legislature, one of his first comments was just: how grand it is. He said: I never thought I'd be here, and I definitely never thought my daughter would be here sitting in this chair. He's very proud of Alberta. He's proud of the resources that we create because he's one of the guys who literally builds those pipelines. I'm proud of him. I don't need my dad to be in the ivory towers of Zurich. I don't need him to be some big fancy guy. I'm happy with him just the way he is. The way that he is is that he's a man of integrity who works extremely hard to put food on the table for his family and has for years, and so do my uncles, so do my cousins. People all around me are constantly working to make sure that Alberta is a better place and our country is a better place because they believe in Alberta.

I think it's really important here that we just take into consideration how important this motion is in standing up for our country and standing up for our province. But, you know, this amendment, Madam Speaker, doesn't do that at all. In fact, it stands in direct defiance of what we're trying to do here. We need to make sure that we are standing up for Alberta. This motion does that, but this amendment: all it does is that it puts us one step behind for getting this passed and showing Albertans how much we care about our energy industry.

With that, Madam Speaker, I'll resign my time.

The Deputy Speaker: Any members wishing to speak under Standing Order 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, any other members wishing to speak to the amendment?

[Motion on amendment A2 lost]

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any members wishing to speak on Motion 34?

Seeing none, shall we call the question?

Would the hon. minister like to close debate on behalf of the Government House Leader?

Mrs. Savage: I would simply say that we support this motion. It's about supporting our oil and gas sector. It's about standing up for our Constitution. It's about asking and imploring the federal government to respect our constitutional right to develop our resources and to act on and actually fulfill their constitutional obligation to get our resources to market. It's a very simple motion, it's a very timely motion, and I would just encourage everyone to vote for it.

[The voice vote indicated that Government Motion 34 carried]

[Several members rose calling for a division. The division bell was rung at 5:56 p.m.]

[One minute having elapsed, the Assembly divided]

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

For the motion:

Aheer	Long	Rutherford
Amery	Lovely	Savage
Barnes	Luan	Sawhney
Ellis	Nally	Schow
Getson	Neudorf	Schulz
Glasgo	Orr	Sigurdson, R.J.

Kenney

Against the motion:

Ceci	Gray	Sabir
Eggen	Loyola	Sigurdson, L.
Ganley	Renaud	Sweet

Totals: For – 31 Against – 9

[Government Motion 34 carried]

6:00

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. We have no evening sitting this evening. I think we had some excellent progress throughout this afternoon, and I would like to adjourn the House until 1:30 tomorrow.

Thank you.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 6:01 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Thursday, October 24, 2019

Prayers

The Speaker: Hon. members, the prayer. Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and her government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideas but, laying aside all private interests and prejudice, keep in mind their responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all. Amen.

Please be seated.

Introduction of Visitors

The Speaker: Hon. members, on such a historic occasion you can imagine that we have a number of visitors and guests today. Joining us in the Speaker's gallery are guests of the Minister of Community and Social Services: the newly elected Member of Parliament Mr. James Cumming. Also joining Mr. Cumming is the councillor for ward 2, Bev Esslinger.

Also in the Speaker's gallery today: a councillor from the community of Didsbury, Mr. Erhard Poggemiller, and his daughter Charlene Bowman; the mayor of the town of Lacombe, His Worship Grant Creasey; the mayor of the town of Blackfalds, His Worship Richard Poole.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Members, visiting schools today. I had the absolute pleasure of visiting with some students from the constituency of Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland, St. Louis community school. They are its grade 6 and grade 9 students. There are also, from the constituency of Chestermere-Strathmore, grade 6 students from Westmount elementary. Please welcome students to the Assembly today.

I have some additional visitors and guests in the Speaker's gallery today. I'm honoured to have Jordan Cleland, Tammy Forbes, Sundai and Terry Cody, school board trustees Holly Bilton and Melissa Copley.

I would also like to welcome to the public gallery guests of the Member for Grande Prairie: Terri Ellen Sudnik, Mark Tonner, Chris Pullen, and Gerald Feschuk.

Also, guests of the Member for Calgary-Falconridge: Mr. Kent Manning and Trevor Marr.

A guest of the Member for Livingstone-Macleod: Mr. Conrad Van Hierden.

As well, a guest of the Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat: Lorne Swalm.

Guests of the Minister of Infrastructure: Stephen and Karen Davis.

Hon. members, please welcome all of our guests to the Assembly today.

Members' Statements

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview and Official Opposition House Leader has a statement to make.

Small Business

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today I rise to recognize Small Business Week in Alberta and to celebrate and thank the entrepreneurs of this province, who have helped build their respective communities through their businesses.

Under the NDP government we cut the small-business tax rate by a third, introduced three different tax credits to help modernize the economic landscape in Alberta, and supported community and regional economic development. Many businesses, especially tech and artificial intelligence start-ups around the province, will not benefit from a 4 and a half billion dollar corporate handout because they reinvest every penny back into their business. These companies were growing and scaling faster because of the tax credits we introduced, but this UCP government is about to kill these tax credits and make Alberta companies less competitive while stifling innovation and diversification. The Premier is either wilfully ignorant or simply doesn't care. These tax credits have a 3 to 1 return on investment. They enabled Albertans to invest in companies in their own backyard, keeping the investments and jobs here in Alberta. The UCP's corporate handout still hasn't produced a single job to date and does nothing for these businesses.

In my riding of Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview there are dozens of locally owned businesses that serve the needs of our community with their hard work and dedication. From restaurants to cafés, flower shops to hairdressers, breweries to auto garages, small businesses are the backbone of our economy.

On Saturday I'll be visiting many of these small businesses in my riding that have contributed so much to the local economy, and I encourage all members to visit your local businesses as well and thank them for their hard work and personal sacrifice for the betterment of our society. Alberta would not be the economic engine of Canada without our small businesses.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-East would like to make a statement.

Diwali

Mr. Singh: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for giving me an opportunity to speak to the House today. Diwali is a fantastic five-day festival that is celebrated by millions of people around the world. It encases Hindu and Sikh culture through traditional shows, dances, music, food, and much more. During the festival small lamps filled with oil are lit and placed in rows along the parapets of temples and houses and set adrift on rivers and streams. The fourth day marks the beginning of the new year according to the Vikram calendar. It is generally a time for visiting, exchanging gifts, feasting, praying, fireworks, and celebration. The main theme of Diwali is the triumph of good over evil and light over darkness.

As a proud and practising Hindu I am honoured to be able to celebrate with my fellow constituents and Albertans. Tens of thousands of Hindus are proud to call Alberta home, and our government welcomes them with open arms. Festivals like Diwali are vital in promoting a better shared understanding of our shared culture, history, and civilization. Seeing the practices and traditions of other Albertans helps ensure strong social cohesion and fosters acceptance in our society. We are very fortunate to be living in a country that promotes diversity and multiculturalism and that allows us the freedom to publicly celebrate it. As a Hindu Albertan I'm extraordinarily proud to be able to call this beautiful province my home.

Happy Diwali to all. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Alberta in Canada

Mr. Schow: “A pessimist sees the difficulty in every opportunity; an optimist sees the opportunity in every difficulty”: Winston Churchill.

This past Monday tensions in Alberta were high as election results flooded in from coast to coast to coast. The news we anxiously awaited, a Conservative victory, never came. In its place: the declaration of a Liberal minority, which for most Albertans was the peak of western alienation.

Like many of my colleagues, my phone, my e-mail, and my social media feed blew up with messages from constituents: some cautiously optimistic about the future, others far more colourful with their language and calls to action, all of them justified in feelings that I share. Like many of you, I’ve heard cries for separation at near-deafening levels, and my response is simple: not today, because Alberta has survived boom times and recessions, feast and famine. We were here long before Pierre Trudeau gave Alberta the middle finger from his train car, and we will be here long after his son is voted out of office. So, no, not today, because Albertans have never walked away from a challenge, and justice for Alberta in a united Canada is worth fighting for.

Mr. Speaker, I choose to fight, but I can’t do it alone. When going to battle, it’s the person willing to risk it all, exhaust every option, give everything to win that comes out on top. I look around this Chamber, and I see a group of people willing to go that extra mile, make that sacrifice to get a fair deal for Alberta in Confederation. I pray that history will remember us fondly for making the right choice, standing united instead of falling apart as individuals. Like Churchill said: never, never, never give up.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

1:40 Taxation and Public Programs

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. One of the things we know for sure is that Adam Smith’s invisible hand does not create a just society. This invisible hand was supposed to create a society where the best interests of citizens would be fulfilled. The truth is that this did not happen. In fact, the free market created much injustice, pooled riches into the hands of a few, and the majority struggled to survive. We know that the market is not focused on stakeholders. Thus, it fell to the welfare state to ensure fairness. Redistribution of funds through collecting taxes and implementing public programs has created a robust middle class and a vibrant, healthy society.

However, this UCP government wants to turn the clock back and create more polarization of funds in the hands of a few. What we know for sure is that creating a progressive taxation system creates a society where those with less pay less and those with more pay more. In every jurisdiction in Canada this progressive system was in place except our province until 2015, when it was created by the NDP government. Progressive taxation is widely accepted as a just system of taxation.

We also know that profitable corporations are taxed significantly less than in other provinces, and only under the NDP government were they paying taxes commensurate with other provinces. This UCP government has eliminated this with their $4.5 billion corporate handout.

In addition, we know that when investments are made in public programs, our citizens are supported to live with dignity and fulfill their dreams. Our NDP government’s programs made a significant difference in the lives of Albertans, creating more fairness and justice throughout the province. This is in jeopardy under the UCP’s watch.

The invisible hand does not care. Politicians need to care. Politicians must create a just society for all Albertans.

Nauticol Methanol Plant Project

Mrs. Allard: Today I speak about a project that represents $2.7 billion of investment in Alberta. It is my pleasure to host representatives from both Nauticol and PCL Construction in the gallery today.

Nauticol is a privately held Alberta petrochemical company planning to produce value-added products from natural gas. They have chosen a build site in the county of Grande Prairie. This facility will include three identical methanol units capable of producing 3 million metric tonnes per year of methanol destined for Asian markets. The opportunity for Alberta is phenomenal, with global methanol demand expected to rise. Alberta’s access to Asian markets and reliable, low-cost natural gas feedstock provide a competitive advantage to secure this investment over jurisdictions such as the U.S. Gulf coast.

In partnership with PCL and with the support of this government through the Alberta indigenous opportunities corporation and the petrochemicals diversification program, Nauticol is proposing to build out their facility on an accelerated timeline and hopes to build all three units simultaneously, accelerating the project build by up to three years and creating an additional 5,000 jobs in the province of Alberta, including construction jobs right here in Edmonton at PCL. This project at full completion is estimated to contribute over $2.1 billion in tax revenue to our province. Nauticol is an industry leader in partnering with indigenous groups. On this project Nauticol is working closely with Duncan’s First Nation, Horse Lake First Nation, and Sturgeon Lake Cree Nation.

I am pleased to share that this government is working to expedite the approval and regulatory climate for investors like Nauticol. As we continue our efforts to reduce red tape and regulatory burden, companies are enabled to accelerate their investment decisions, creating jobs and bolstering our economy now. Nauticol is hard at work and has completed an agreement with TC Energy to connect its facility with the TC natural gas pipeline network, and geotechnical work is under way even this week. As the MLA for Grande Prairie I am working diligently to ensure permits will be issued before the end of the year to get this project under way in 2020 and get more Albertans back to work.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today we will finally see the results of this Premier’s closed-door, secret budget, that will attack Alberta families and make life more expensive. Last night he addressed Albertans in a televised address, where he told us that he will cut back and attack our public services in a misleading attempt to balance the budget. He’s doing this while, on the other hand, giving 4 and a half billion dollars away to the wealthiest corporations. Since then, his efforts have resulted in nothing but 27,000 job losses. These are the facts. He cancelled crude by rail, which will cost Albertans another $5.1 billion, totalling, with his 4 and a half billion dollar giveaway to wealthy corporations, a $9.6 billion hole in the provincial budget.

Families are scared, and the government calls it fear and smear. Families are scared that this government will attack schools so that class sizes will balloon. Families are scared that this government will attack our health care and bring in a dangerous and reckless American-style health care system. I've heard this from families in my constituency, Mr. Speaker. I've heard how the cuts to AISH are cruel and offensive, when the Premier talks about it not being onerous for families. I've heard how children, already in large, complex classes, and parents are worried that this Premier will only make it worse.

This Premier told Albertans he has to make cuts. He hid those cuts from Albertans this summer, but we are about to see the truth. We are about to see how cruel and heartless this Premier's attack on Albertans will be. I will never stop fighting these attacks on our communities.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Drumheller-Stettler.

Energy-only Electricity Market

Mr. Horner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Currently Bill 18 is before this House, the Electricity Statutes (Capacity Market Termination) Amendment Act, 2019. If successful, it will end the pursuit of a capacity market initiated by the previous government. It's been stated by members opposite that the capacity market is necessary to encourage renewables and ensure affordable power. According to Hansard the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar even went as far as to say that ridings like mine, Drumheller-Stettler, have many jobs at stake and that not shifting to a capacity market will put many at risk. I'm not sure how any member of the opposition can pretend to care about jobs anywhere, least of all in my riding, but I'll play along.

I have Battle River and Sheerness coal-fired power stations in the riding. Both are already in gas conversions; 70 per cent of the jobs will be lost, but at least they will keep making power. You see, when the emission taxes you pay go from $7.4 million to $100 million, you either shut your doors or start burning gas. At least the plants will keep generating power. In fact, they've been purchased by Heartland Generation since the provincial election, and they are fine with an energy-only market.

The opposition seems to believe that renewable energy can only exist in a capacity market. Really wrong there. I have 17 renewable energy projects in my riding before the AUC. I've met with most of them. Not one has advocated for a capacity market. I've been clear that this government was not prepared to subsidize wind and solar. They said: "That's fine. We can compete and look forward to it. Technology has levelled the field so you don't have to."

As far as affordable energy for consumers: two points. Number one, Alberta enjoyed the cheapest electricity in North America before the NDP started this mess. Number two, only a socialist would believe that operating two markets, one for capacity and the other for generation, could possibly be cheaper to the ratepayer.

From the power purchase agreement debacle to the complete disregard for the workers in coal communities, the previous government has cost the people of Alberta in my riding so much. The only time the members opposite should mention Hanna or my riding is to beg forgiveness and apologize.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Camrose.

Caregivers

Ms Lovely: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. "There are only four kinds of people in the world – those who have been caregivers, those who are currently caregivers, those who will be caregivers and those who will need caregivers." These are the words of Rosalynn Carter, who spoke ever so elegantly about caregivers: unforgotten, unpaid heroes in Alberta communities. A caregiver can be anyone: a brother, a sister, an aunt, or a grandparent. These unsung Albertans assist vulnerable individuals suffering from illness, disability, or aging and play an integral role in supporting our health care system.

Throughout Alberta there are approximately 1 million caregivers. They provide support in many ways. Most caregivers are responsible for navigating the health care system, driving loved ones to medical appointments, ensuring that medications are taken and refilled appropriately, and providing care within the community, facilitating aging in place. Without caregivers who would support Albertans in need? In absence of these individuals the strain on our publicly funded services would grow. The U of A estimates that this voluntary, unpaid workforce saves the provincial health care system approximately $5.8 billion annually. Their value cannot be understated, and it is imperative that we do all we can to support these individuals.

Caregivers Alberta is a not-for-profit organization that does a masterful job in achieving this by providing patient navigational supports and other services. This cost-effective, efficient civil society provides important services to approximately tens of thousands of caregivers annually, and I'm so proud to stand up for the work they do.

I'm also proud of our government's campaign commitment to develop caregiver supports to support patients in their homes and communities. These heroes deserve our recognition, our praise, and our effort in helping them achieve their goals, Mr. Speaker.

Point of Order

Addressing the Chair

The Speaker: Hon. members, before Oral Question Period begins, I would like to provide a clarification on a point of order that was raised yesterday by the hon. Government House Leader. Having referred to and reviewed Hansard – and if you would like to follow along at home, I'm referring to page 1971 of the October 23 issue. I see that the Member for Calgary-Buffalo did in fact refer to the Premier as "you" on a number of occasions during his series of questions. As all hon. members know, it is correct parliamentary practice to speak through the chair and therefore refer to members in the third person. My apologies for the confusion in the point of order yesterday to the hon. Government House Leader. I encourage all hon. members to refer to ministers in the third person.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The hon. Member for St. Albert has the call.

Assured Income for the Severely Handicapped

Ms Renaud: Mr. Speaker, this Premier should be ashamed of himself. The first details of the UCP budget have trickled out, and what's first on the chopping block? Albertans who have disabilities. The Premier has eliminated the AISH program indexing introduced by our government and attempted to tell a columnist yesterday that the cuts wouldn't be onerous. To the Premier: please explain to disabled Albertans, living on $1,600 a month, why you're forcing them to pay for your no-jobs handout to big corporations?

Mr. Kenney: First of all, Mr. Speaker, we're doing no such thing. This afternoon the Minister of Finance will present a historic budget, a balanced budget, not only balanced in terms of stopping this province's reckless dive into debt that jeopardizes social programs and our support for the vulnerable but also socially balanced by protecting support for the most vulnerable, including maintaining AISH benefits at the most generous level in Canada, including incorporating in those AISH benefits the large increase adopted by this Legislature last year.

Ms Renaud: The Premier went further. He claimed that his plan to cut supports for disabled Albertans was, quote, a very careful way to trim hundreds of millions from the provincial budget. Premier, I have a better way for you: don't give out a multibillion dollar no-jobs handout to big corporations. My question is to the entire government cabinet: do any single one of you have the ability to stand up to this Premier and reverse these heartless cuts?

Mr. Kenney: It didn't take long, Mr. Speaker. The balanced budget that will be presented by this government this afternoon keeps our word with Albertans to stop the reckless dive into debt that was begun by the NDP. Under their plan we'd be spending $4 billion a year in interest payments to bankers and bondholders. That's money that doesn't go to the disabled or to schools and hospitals. Why does the NDP so desperately want to enrich bankers in Toronto, New York, and Zurich instead of investing in public services here in Alberta?

Ms Renaud: Clearly, you've never lived on $1,600 a month.

Our government was proud to bring in legislation to index AISH and the Alberta seniors' benefit. During debate the Government House Leader himself rose to support the bill, stating, and I quote: I'm happy to see a piece of legislation of this kind here in the Assembly; I actually think it should have been here a long time ago. End quote. To the Government House Leader: will you explain why you no longer support Albertans with disabilities?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Albertans better get used to the fear and smear. It never really stopped since the last campaign. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to say that this balanced budget to be presented today prioritizes protection for the most vulnerable, including and particularly people with disabilities, including maintaining AISH benefits, which are 30 per cent more generous than the next most generous Canadian province. In terms of indexation, they love to get on their high horse, but in 2015, 2016, 2017, and well into 2018 under the NDP there was no indexation of AISH.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. When we warned about this Premier's plans for deep cuts and layoffs, he howled. He told Albertans that he wouldn't cut. He said that he would maintain or increase funding for services, for support programs, and for capital projects. Today we learn that none of it is true. The Finance minister is preparing to table the biggest bait-and-switch budget in Alberta history. To the Premier: when Albertans look up the word "dishonest" in Wikipedia, does your government have a reference there?

The Speaker: I'm certain that the hon. member wouldn't be implying that any member is dishonest, but the hon. Premier has the call.

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, one of the reasons that that member was part of the only first-term government in Alberta history to be rejected by voters was because of the profound dishonesty of the last NDP government that, for example, hid from Albertans the largest tax increase in our history, the multibillion dollar carbon tax. They ran on a platform to balance the budget. Instead they racked up our debt from $13 billion to $62 billion, headed to $100 billion.

In terms of honesty that's exactly what this budget is about, keeping our commitment with Albertans to come back to balance.

Mr. Eggen: Mr. Speaker, this Premier says that Albertans with complex needs need to get by with less. Meanwhile big corporations get their $4.5 billion handout. This Premier said: no cuts. Today we have nothing but cuts to programs, cuts to services, cuts to staff. To the Premier: when you said maintain or increase, in what universe does that mean a 2.8 per cent actual cut to the budget?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, the member is correct that our platform is predicated on no reductions in spending because they were based in part on the revenue projections tabled by the NDP. When we came to office, we were informed by our independent public service that the NDP had overprojected government revenues by $6 billion a year. Talk about honesty. On this $4.5 billion massive fib, here's Professor Trevor Tombe. "Why the 4.5 billion [dollar] claim continues is a real puzzle. It is demonstrably . . ."

Mr. Eggen: Mr. Speaker, this government is bringing down the biggest bad-news budget this province has ever seen. This Premier has spent weeks campaigning in Ontario, clearly learning from his friend Doug Ford. It's clear that he would rather be in Ottawa. Is this Premier's plan, then, to cut and run, literally, federally?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, I spent two and a half days campaigning in Ontario, not weeks, but I was proud to do so, to stand with the 70 per cent of Albertans who said no to the federal NDP's leave-it-in-the-ground Leap Manifesto, to say no to the pipeline cancellations of the Trudeau administration. While I and members of this caucus were standing up for Alberta's vital economic interests, that member was attending a protest in front of this Legislature calling for the immediate shutdown of our energy industry, which would put hundreds of thousands of Albertans out of work. Shame on them.

The Speaker: The hon. Official Opposition House Leader.

Budget 2019 and Provincial Revenue

Mr. Bilous: This Premier did not campaign on cutting the services Albertans rely on, unless he's forgotten. Today he's going to claim we all have to do our part to balance the budget. That is unless, of course, you're an international shareholder, and instead you get a piece of the 4 and a half billion dollar no-jobs handout. Through you to the Premier, Mr. Speaker: you've clearly been briefed on the ins and outs of your budget, so please enlighten us. If he hadn't have pushed forward with his failed experiment, what else could he have funded for 4 and a half billion dollars?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, Professor Tombe of the University of Calgary, who is widely regarded as independent and nonpartisan, said the following today. "Why the 4.5 billion [dollar] claim continues is a real puzzle. It is demonstrably misleading (I'd say false). But, I guess, [it's] politically convenient." Here's the truth. As today's budget will reveal, the forgone revenues for the job-creation tax cut this year: $100 million, 98 per cent less than the NDP is claiming. But when they were in office, they drove down corporate tax revenues after they raised the rates. We're going to create jobs.

Mr. Bilous: The Premier has denied our province $5 billion in revenue due to his ideological decision to rip up the crude-by-rail contract signed by our government. Through you, Mr. Speaker, to the Premier: we would have moved millions of barrels of crude to market by now. Will you apologize to the energy industry and admit that beyond ranting on Twitter, you have no plan to get our product to market?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, I feel sorry for that member of the NDP. That's called leading with your chin. That is a party that blew out 4 and a half billion dollars to do something the private sector not only would do but has done. We've gone from 120,000 barrels per day of crude by rail at the beginning of this year to over 300,000 barrels per day, all of it at the cost and risk of the private sector. But they are responsible for costing taxpayers, we estimate, a billion and a half dollars. We're going to get taxpayers out of that deal that stunk for the interests of this province.

The Speaker: The Official Opposition House Leader.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Clearly, the Premier has not actually looked at the file because $2 billion in revenue is what would have come into the government.

Two ideological decisions from this Premier have cost $9.6 billion all told. That's nearly $2,200 per person, Mr. Speaker. To the Premier: how long until you admit that your plan is a complete failure? And on behalf of Albertans, can we please get our money back?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, I'll tell you what. We have not ruled out getting our money back. We have put on the table, from day one, the possible cancellation of those irresponsible contracts, but what the member does not understand is that the incremental crude is moving by rail. Any incremental revenues associated with that are happening without risking billions of tax dollars.

I want to go back to the corporate tax cut, though. Mr. Speaker, they raised taxes on businesses by 20 per cent, and you know what happened? Revenues went down by $8.8 billion below what they projected. That's NDP economic policy for you.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Edmonton-Manning has a question.

Child Mental Health Services

Ms Sweet: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday the Health minister made the absurd claim that "there is no crisis in child mental health." It's imaginary. Just like the UCP's $4.5 billion corporate giveaway. It's all made up, apparently. I think the minister needs an education on children's mental health in Canada. The Mental Health Commission of Canada reports that 1.2 million Canadian children suffer from mental illness. To the minister: are you saying that we don't need to help those kids?

The Speaker: The Minister of Health is rising.

Mr. Shandro: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Obviously, in the supplemental answer that I provided yesterday, I made it very clear that what I was talking about was bed spaces in public hospitals. Obviously, mental health, especially mental health for our children and adolescents here in Alberta, is of the utmost importance to this government. It's one of the reasons why this government has already committed and will be spending a further $140 million on mental health and addictions. It's because mental health, especially mental health for our children and adolescents, is of the utmost importance to us.

Ms Sweet: Well, Mr. Speaker, the minister said it yesterday.

I have some more shocking statistics to help educate this Health minister. According to a 2018 report from the University of Calgary more than 1 in 10 Canadian teens suffer from depression and anxiety, 1 in 5 kids aged 13 to 18 consider suicide, and suicide is the second-highest cause of child death in this country. So I have to ask the minister: how many children have to suffer or die from mental health issues before you consider this a crisis?

Mr. Shandro: Mr. Speaker, I think I made it very clear that that was the reason why our government has committed to and is going to be spending a further $140 million on mental health and addictions. It's one of the reasons why we are working with the Stollery foundation as well as many community partners throughout Alberta, including and especially in Edmonton, to make sure that we're going to increase access to mental health services, including for our children and adolescents. For four years we saw access under the previous government decline, one of the reasons we have to spend this further $140 million.

Ms Sweet: Well, Mr. Speaker, I'm not surprised this Health minister is ignorant about those numbers, but I can tell you that hundreds of Albertan parents were shocked and appalled by his insulting claims, parents whose children self-harm, who consider or commit suicide, who suffer from depression, who face mental health crises that make it difficult to form relationships and enjoy a rich and fulfilling life. To the Health minister: will you stand up in this House right now and apologize to those parents and their children for your hurtful claims?

Mr. Shandro: I made it clear many times, Mr. Speaker. I was in the middle of giving an answer yesterday and was being heckled by the other side and wasn't able to give the finish of what I was trying to say, and I made it very clear in the supplemental that I was talking about bed spaces in public hospitals.

While that question has already been answered for the other side, I want to be able to have the opportunity to quickly address something that was said mistakenly by the other side yesterday in one of their questions. It was a question that claimed that Century Park in Vegreville failed three health inspections. That, Mr. Speaker, was patently false. I ask the other side to start being honest with Albertans. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. Member for Camrose.

Rural High-speed Internet

Ms Lovely: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Alberta SuperNet is something Albertans should be proud of. Since the Alberta government first started investing in it, rural communities have benefited from access to high-speed Internet in their school, hospitals, and libraries, which has increased the flow of ideas and assisted in the running of these communities. But questions and frustrations around access to the Internet for the general public still remain. To the Minister of Service Alberta: can you provide us an update about what specifically you're working on to help more Albertans obtain access to minimum speeds?

The Speaker: The Minister of Service Alberta.

Mr. Glubish: Well, Mr. Speaker, thank you for the question. You know, this is something I've been working on for the last number of months. I toured across the province to meet with a number of rural communities all across this province to make sure that I understood the challenges that they face in trying to improve connectivity for rural and remote Albertans. This is very important. One of the things that we're working on doing is to make sure that we harness the existing fibre that is in the ground to its fullest capacity. We need to work with telecommunication companies to understand how best to reach these underserved communities using that infrastructure.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The Member for Camrose.

Ms Lovely: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Minister.

Given that access to high-speed Internet is vital, to make sure that rural Alberta communities remain viable and give Albertans – rural communities often see many of their citizens, especially younger ones, leave these communities for larger centres, where they can easily access the world through Internet connections, and given that within the past year the federal government has allocated some funds towards a national broadband strategy, to the minister: how will you collaborate with your federal counterparts to ensure all Albertans have access to minimum speeds?

The Speaker: The Minister of Service Alberta.

Mr. Glubish: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yes. While it is true that the federal government has announced a small amount of funds to tackle this very large problem on a national scale, I will say that it is a disappointing, small amount of funds. It's a drop in the bucket compared to what is required. That said, you know, Alberta has been a leader in this space for a long time. Over the last 18 years we have spent a billion dollars in building out the SuperNet, which has connected over 3,300 schools, hospitals, libraries, and municipal buildings all across this province to ensure that there is access to high-speed connectivity. By comparison, the federal government's strategy is only to reach 1,100 of these institutions country-wide.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Ms Lovely: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Minister.

Given that in 2019 a community in my constituency of Camrose got tired of waiting for the government to help expand community Internet access and given that the residents of Viking waited too long for an expansion to their Internet availability and given that they have found their own private solution, will the minister consider Viking's solution to problems in other communities, and will the minister work with other communities to ensure access can be expanded upon?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Service Alberta.

Mr. Glubish: Well, Mr. Speaker, thank you for the question. I will say that we support local decision-making, and we understand that a lot of these communities know best how to spend their resources to deliver the services that their residents want the most. That's the case of what happened in Viking. It's also the case of what happened in your community of Olds, as you well know. I will just say this. One of the things I want to be sure of is that where there are other municipalities and communities that can benefit from the knowledge that Olds has developed or Viking has developed, we want to make sure that those communities have access to the same information so they can learn from that and implement the solutions that work best for them.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood has a question.

Child Mental Health Services

Member Irwin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday I told the Health minister about a mother in my riding whose child has waited for months for mental health supports here in Edmonton. His response was to unbelievably claim that there is no crisis in child mental health. Since then we've received hundreds of responses from parents and young people all across Alberta who were insulted and so disheartened by his claim. To the minister: please offer any suggestions on how to help these parents and kids since, according to you, they're not in crisis.

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Mr. Shandro: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think I've made it clear already in this House about what the comments were really about, but I do have a suggestion. Actually, the suggestion is for our friends opposite, that if they believe so strongly, as we do as a government, about what needs to be done with mental health and addictions, they vote for our budget and the $140 million that we are going to be adding for mental health and addictions

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that one parent told me that their child hasn't been able to find mental health supports for eight years and considers suicide on a nightly basis and given that another parent says that their suicidal 10-year-old has to pay privately to see a psychologist, which costs $200 an hour, and given that one young person told me that in one year 13 teenagers committed suicide in their rural Alberta county, to the minister. Here's another chance. Please just do the right thing and apologize for your comments, that were so completely devoid of compassion.

Mr. Shandro: Mr. Speaker, as I've said many times in this House, that's why mental health and addictions, especially mental health and addictions for children and adolescents, is so important for this government. I'm happy to hear that it's also a concern for our friends opposite. I look forward to them being able to vote with us on our budget, that we will be tabling this afternoon.

Member Irwin: Mr. Speaker, given that I'm sorry to all the folks out there and given that I've heard from many mental health practitioners and teachers who say that there are serious gaps in the system that leave Alberta's children without proper mental health supports and given that doctors and nurses in emergency departments have said that they've seen a massive jump in mental health issues – front-line workers are clear; it's a crisis – to the minister: we ask you to commit here and now to funding the much-needed children's mental health centre.

Mr. Shandro: I think that's why, Mr. Speaker, for four years under the previous government, it was disappointing to see access to mental health and addictions decrease, especially for our children and adolescents. It's one of the reasons why we are going to continue to work with the Stollery foundation here in Edmonton as well as other community partners to do our best in making sure that our $140 million further increase in spending on mental health and addictions is going to help our children and adolescents.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-McCall would like to ask a question.

Bitumen Upgrading

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The $4.5 billion handout is a complete failure. Drilling is down. Investment is down. Over 13,000 jobs have been lost in the oil and gas sector. Alberta had a real plan to support energy investments and refine our products right here in Alberta. To the minister. You said that you were disappointed that your corporate handout was failing. How do you explain cancelling another 4,000 real jobs and $5 billion in private investment to disappointed Albertans?

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you for the question. I'm not sure if the member is referring to the PDP plan, that we extended yesterday. Yesterday I was very pleased to announce with my colleague Minister Nally that we were extending the PDP program, petrochemicals diversification program. We were elected on a platform to stand up for our energy sector and attract investment while at the same time being fiscally prudent. That's what we're doing with that program.

Thank you.

The Speaker: I would remind all members that the use of names in the Assembly for whatever reason would not be deemed appropriate.

Mr. Sabir: Mr. Speaker, given that Calgary-based Value Creation Inc. received support from this program and given that their refining project would create upgrading of 77,000 barrels of bitumen each day and create 2,000 construction jobs, to the minister: why are you cancelling these jobs, and why are you against working Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. When we decided to continue the PDP program, we at the same time decided to cancel the PUP program and the PFIP program. That's because those programs would run at a significant risk to Alberta taxpayers. They were based on loan guarantees and government grants, so we're not moving on with those. We're continuing with the petrochemicals diversification program because, as I said, it will attract investment to Alberta.

Mr. Sabir: Given that when it comes to supporting oil and gas, this government is all talk and given that we have no jobs, no investment, and no support for companies taking a risk to create jobs, to the minister: can Tom Olsen's attack machine upgrade 77,000 barrels per day? If not, why are you wasting taxpayer money on him and not supporting Calgary?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The NDP legacy on pipelines is one of four years of a failed social licence and a one-and-done deal with Justin Trudeau. Let me tell you a bit about their legacy on pipelines. In fact, at the beginning of 2015 the pipeline takeaway capacity out of Alberta was about 3.4 million barrels a day. Guess what? At the beginning of January 2019, after four years of NDP government, the pipeline capacity out of Alberta was about 3.4 million barrels. Their legacy on pipelines is zero kilometres. [interjections]

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat. [interjections] Order. Hon. members, we will have order.

Cypress-Medicine Hat has the call.

Hospital-based Health Care Costs

Mr. Barnes: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last year a report was released on the state of acute-care funding in Alberta. Notably, hospitals in the province that are run by Alberta Health Services have been chronically overbudget and overspending, accumulating a deficit of nearly a billion dollars in just eight years. To the Minister of Health: what are you doing to ensure that AHS holds hospitals accountable to taxpayers by staying on budget and that hospitals are focused on putting patients first?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Shandro: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. As the hon. member points out, there are some issues about how AHS determines the funding for hospitals. The larger issue, though, that the hon. member is pointing out is the overall cost of care. Our cost per hospital admission here in Alberta is 30 per cent higher than the national average. Thirty per cent. We need to get our costs down and reinvest those savings to do more and to increase access. That's what we campaigned on, and that's exactly what this government is going to do.

Mr. Barnes: Given that the NDP dramatically increased health care spending, especially in regard to acute care, resulting in Alberta hospitals taking up 45 per cent of our health care budget, paid for by hard-working Albertans, and given that we spend more money on health care than the national average while still having some of the worst results, to the minister: what is your plan for getting acute-care spending under control while ensuring Albertans receive the very best outcomes?

The Speaker: The Minister of Health.

Mr. Shandro: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. While the NDP ignored the problem of cost of care, like they ignored all the evidence about how the system was performing, the reality is that we have a cost problem, not a revenue problem. We don't need new taxes so that we can keep paying $8,000 per case when the national average is $6,000. I would also note, though, that during their tenure, the previous government, the number of patients in acute-care beds who were actually deserving of continuing care increased to 18 per cent, another reason why we are going to be reviewing continuing care legislation.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Barnes: Thanks again, Mr. Speaker. In the report, that was released last year, 69 out of 86 hospitals in Alberta were unable to stay within their budget over an eight-year period, and two-thirds of these hospitals were chronically overbudget. That is not sustainable. Given that our government pledged to complete a full review of Alberta Health Services in an attempt to find efficiencies that could be redirected to the front lines, can the minister please identify any cost-saving measures that have been found and outcomes that must be improved?

The Speaker: The minister.

Mr. Shandro: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Through you to the hon. member, thank you for mentioning this key commitment in our platform, the AHS review. We'll receive the final report by December 31 of this year, and we'll be releasing it after we've had an opportunity to review it. We campaigned on getting the costs under control and using those savings to fund increases in services.

That's the point of the AHS review, and it's our commitment to Albertans, that we're going to deliver on.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods would like to ask a question.

Budget 2019 and Public Services

Ms Gray: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As we've already seen, this government's $4.5 billion corporate handout has failed to create even a single job in the private sector. Now, to pay for it, public-sector workers are getting the axe. Layoffs are coming in just a few hours, as reported by Postmedia. Can the minister of labour tell us how many workers are being given pink slips by this government today, and which Albertans will be impacted by the loss of their service?

The Speaker: The Minister of Labour and Immigration is rising to answer.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Once again, I have to speak to the $4.5 billion claim, that the hon. members on the other side continue to misrepresent. As indicated by our Premier previously, this simply is not true. I think we should talk about some other numbers. Perhaps we should talk about the $62 billion deficit that the previous government left this government to deal with, or perhaps we should talk about the $2 billion in interest payments associated. That's $5 million a day that we are paying, and this impacts our ability to provide services that Albertans want and need.

Ms Gray: Given, Mr. Speaker, that I hear a complete lack of compassion for the people that support this minister's work and the anxiety that has been caused in them and given that we only know about these layoffs because the Premier bragged about it in the media and given that these public servants work hard to serve Albertans and that they found out that they may be fired from reading the Calgary Sun, to the minister: don't you think you owe your own workers more respect than that?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, we respect the great work that our public service does for us. I'm sure that in the next coming hours, when we release the budget, we'll have more information in terms of what our government plan is to get our budget back on track and reverse the huge amount of debt that was created and the potential impact on our services. Up to a hundred billion dollars was the track that the previous government was on course for and $4 billion in interest payments on the debt. Those are the numbers we should be focused on and ensuring that we can reduce that and provide services that Albertans need.

Ms Gray: Mr. Speaker, given that it's clear this government's only plan for unemployment is more unemployment and given that Alberta has lost 27,000 jobs under this so-called jobs Premier so far – and that is going to climb even higher this week – to the minister: why does your so-called jobs Premier think firing people will create jobs?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, again, this is fear and smear that we're hearing from the members opposite. In a few short hours we will release our budget and have a better understanding of the path forward. But the hon. member opposite shouldn't be talking about jobs. Their legacy is 170,000 jobs lost. Our government was elected on a platform: jobs, pipeline, and the economy. We put in place a number of legislations: the job-creation tax cut, the elimination of the carbon tax, the open for business act, red tape reduction. We will get Albertans back to work.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Licensed Practical Nurses' Scope of Practice

Mr. Shepherd: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Now, the UCP Health minister recently announced an expansion to the scope of practice for LPNs, allowing them to perform a handful of procedures that were previously performed by RNs. Now, this could very well be a good thing if the minister wasn't also in court trying to tear up the contract for LPNs as a prelude to rolling back their wages. To this Minister of Health: will you be asking LPNs to do more for lower wages to help pay for your 4 and a half billion dollar, no-jobs corporate handout?

Mr. Shandro: Mr. Speaker, what an initiative. I am so excited and happy and proud to talk about it in this House. This expansion of scope for LPNs should have been done years and years ago. It started in 2003. All of the other health professions encouraged these five changes to the expansion of scope for these LPNs. This is not a zero-sum situation. This is an expansion of the scope of these qualified and talented professionals to be able to do what they've already been trained to do.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that they are indeed talented and resourceful and being fired in Vegreville because this minister won't act and given that a single human being can only do so much work in a given day and given that anyone working in health care will tell you that the resources available matter, whether it's at the nursing station or at the patient's bedside, my question, then, to this minister is: how many LPNs does he intend to hire, if any, and will this be done at any cost of existing RNs in the workforce?

Mr. Shandro: Mr. Speaker, the largest employer of LPNs in the province is AHS. I'm happy to work with AHS and to encourage them through their operational best practices program to encourage LPNs to be able to work to the full extent of their clinical knowledge and skills. As well, the most important thing is to be able to reduce the number of transitions in care, because that's where patients get hurt the most. The fact that the member opposite would not support this and not encourage this expansion of scope is quite confounding to me.

Mr. Shepherd: Given that this minister, as usual, is not listening and not hearing that I, in fact, support more LPNs and given the fact that when we add work onto employees and we give them additional duties without providing additional resources to assist, it leads to crunches, like I've heard about at the Holy Cross hospital in Calgary, where they say that staff attrition under AHS due to chaos from this government's budget has led to them having patients waiting days to access their cancer medication, and given that this government is willing to give out 4 and a half billion dollars to corporations, how much more is he willing to put patient safety at risk?

Mr. Shandro: Mr. Speaker, only a day after the hon. member was in this House making ridiculous and quite shocking claims about Century Park in Vegreville, about them failing health inspections, when it was patently – patently – false, again we see today further fear trying to be spread by the hon. member. We see another day of the NDP in this Chamber, another day of them acting like complete fabulists, trying to tell each other fairy tales and scare Albertans.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Airdrie-Cochrane would like to ask a question.

Methane Emission Regulations

Mr. Guthrie: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In late August the U.S. announced that it was joining Mexico and pulling out of the triparty agreement to reduce methane emissions, leaving Canada as the only remaining signatory. These federal regulations not only target Alberta but have potential constitutional challenges given the creep into our jurisdiction. To the Minister of Environment and Parks: the federal regulations come into effect January 1, so what is Alberta's plan, considering that this will lead to further industry competitiveness issues and considering that we already had strong regulations in place?

The Speaker: The Minister of Environment and Parks has risen.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for the question. We are leading discussions to achieve an agreement that works for the province of Alberta. No agreement has been reached at this time. But let me be clear to this House. We are working with Alberta's best interests in mind and will continue to work that way while working towards, ultimately, a solution that banks on the innovative potential of this great province. We'll have more to say when we get there.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Airdrie-Banff.

Mr. Guthrie: Cochrane.

The Speaker: Whatever you're called.

Mr. Guthrie: Thank you, Minister. Given that Alberta has had tough economic conditions over the last five years, especially in the resource sectors, and given that Alberta has lost tens of thousands of jobs over that same time frame and given that our economy is still in a fragile state, to the minister of labour: if the federal government sticks to this failed agreement, what are the potential consequences of these regulations in regard to financial impacts on industry and their ability to create jobs?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for the question. Too many jobs have been lost in Alberta, especially in our resource sector, and too many Albertans are struggling to find work. We were elected on a mandate to boost the economy and create jobs for Albertans. We have been working to ease burdens on job creators with the job-creation tax cut, our red tape reduction initiative, eliminating the carbon tax, and the open for business act, which reduced costs for employers and restored democracy to the workplace. We will continue to stand up for our industries and to fight for Alberta jobs, and we will not rest until we have restored prosperity to our province.

The Speaker: Apologies; the hon. Member for Airdrie-Cochrane.

Mr. Guthrie: Thank you. Thank you, Minister. Given that methane regulations are not being applied nationally and given that these regulations are only targeted at oil and gas jurisdictions and given that the people of Alberta are the rightful owners of these resources, can the Minister of Justice comment on whether he is looking at potential constitutional or other legal options to protect Alberta from this jurisdictional overreach in federal regulations?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, we right now have two challenges going on with the federal government, one to fight the carbon tax and one to fight the no more pipelines bill. We will not hesitate to defend Alberta. This is our home. Western alienation is at an all-time high. This government will not hesitate to defend our province. This is our home. We're proud to be Albertans. We'll defend our provincial jurisdiction.

Mobile-home Owner Consumer Protection

Mr. Schmidt: The residents of Twin Parks, a mobile-home community in my constituency, have repeatedly met with me to tell me about their frustrations with their landlord, Parkbridge. The landlord refuses to properly maintain roads and common areas, which causes intense flooding. Roads are impassable, and the foundations of homes are rotting out. On top of all that, residents are being slapped with outrageous rent increases. I know that the Service Alberta minister has already had an earful from these residents, too. When will he change the law so that they can have affordable ways to challenge their landlords instead of being forced to take them to court?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Service Alberta.

Mr. Glubish: Mr. Speaker, thank you for the question. Actually, the member opposite might be interested to know that those constituents actually came to the grand opening of my constituency office yesterday to thank me for all of the hard work that I've been putting in on this file and to say that they have a lot of faith in me. You know, I want the member opposite to know that this is something I take very seriously, and I'm working very hard on it, but it's a complex problem. It's one that they failed to deal with in their four years in government, and it's one that I am going to be very thoughtful and careful in how I approach it.

Thank you very much.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, given that we haven't seen any action in this House and given that many of my constituents already can't afford the lot rent increases and given that those constituents, many of them, are on AISH and seniors' benefits, that this Finance minister is going to cruelly cut this afternoon, and given that Parkbridge has already received part of the $4.5 billion corporate handout that this government has given, will the minister intervene further and ensure that constituents of mine aren't among the many, many victims of this Premier's 4 and a half billion dollar corporate handout?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Point of order.

The Speaker: Point of order is noted.

Mr. Glubish: Well, Mr. Speaker, I would like to just let the member opposite know that just because he doesn't like my answer to his question, it doesn't mean I didn't answer it, and it also doesn't mean that his constituents aren't happy with how I'm handling this file. This is something that I am putting a lot of time into. It's very important to me. They failed to deal with this in their four years in government. I have done more on this in the last six months than they did in four years, so I will not take lectures from him or any of the members opposite on how we handle the file of mobile-home communities. It's a tough one. It's important. There are a lot of vulnerable Albertans who live there. We care deeply about them. We're going to take the time to do this properly, thoughtfully, and continue to earn the respect of the members who live in those communities.

Thank you.

Mr. Schmidt: Mr. Speaker, given that this change will cost the province next to nothing to make and given that everybody involved wants those changes made immediately and given that the legislation is already written and that all the minister has to do is take it down from the shelf and bring it into this House, can the minister tell me why my residents still have to wait for help? Is it because they're not profitable corporations?

Mr. Glubish: Well, Mr. Speaker, if it was that simple, then why did the member opposite and his team, when they were in government for four years, not just simply do what he's telling me to do right now? The answer to that question is that he's wrong. It's a little bit more complicated than that, and that's why I've been working so hard on touring all across this province to meet with members from mobile-home communities across this province to fully understand the challenges that they are dealing with in their communities to make sure that we are thoughtful in how we address this and that we get this right. It is a lot more complex than what he's talking about. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. We will have order.

If the hon. minister has anything left in his answer, he's welcome to deliver it.

Mr. Glubish: As I said, Mr. Speaker, it's a lot more complex than the member opposite is alleging, but we are going to take the time to get this right. It's a bit rich for him to lecture me when they didn't do anything on this file for four years. Shame on them.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday.

Municipal Infrastructure Funding

Mr. Carson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last November our NDP government announced $1 billion in funding to build the valley line west LRT in partnership with the municipal and federal governments. This is a project that would create thousands of jobs, lower emissions, and serve all residents in west Edmonton. To the Minister of Transportation: will the minister honour that funding commitment to build the valley line west LRT? Yes or no?

Mr. McIver: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is well aware that the budget will be released before the sun goes down today, and he will have an answer to that question in more specific terms. But in general terms, we made a promise to honour the commitments for LRT funding to the two major cities. As in all things, I would like to think we intend to meet that promise that we made in our platform.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday.

Mr. Carson: Thank you. Given the deep cuts expected in today's budget to pay for the government's $4.5 billion corporate giveaway and given that the Minister of Municipal Affairs accused Edmonton of spending recklessly without being able to name a single example of spending that he'd like to see reduced and given that any changes to the MSI funding would put the fate of the Lewis Farms rec centre in jeopardy, will the Minister of Municipal Affairs commit that MSI funding will not change, or will he stand in front of my constituents and explain why a $4.5 billion corporate gift is more important than their rec centre?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. We have been working so hard with our municipal partners to make sure that we preserve the fundamental need for all infrastructure across our province. I think that what is important to point out at this point in time is that in less than a couple of hours we will be presenting our province with a balanced budget, a budget that seeks to rein in the recklessness that was left for us by those members opposite. We will rebuild our province so that we don't have to deal with the multibillion dollars of debt that the NDP left our province.

Mr. Carson: That does not sound promising, Mr. Speaker.

Given that this government rushed to give a $4.5 billion gift to profitable corporations and given that only days before the budget the Minister of Municipal Affairs chose to attack municipalities, using outdated figures to justify what we can only assume will be cuts to MSI funding, to the Minister of Municipal Affairs: how much less will Edmonton receive in MSI in order to pay for this government's $4.5 billion corporate handout?

Mr. Madu: Mr. Speaker, I have been very clear, you know, that we will continue to work with our municipal partners. At the provincial level we are working so hard to manage the mess that those members opposite left for us. This summer I travelled across our province listening to our municipal partners on their core priorities, and this afternoon that budget, our budget, will deliver on those priorities.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lesser Slave Lake.

Rural Crime and Justice Administration

Mr. Rehn: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My question is to the hon. Minister of Agriculture and Forestry. This week we learned that the devastating McMillan wildfire near Slave Lake was intentionally set. The fire grew rapidly and threatened several communities, leading to the evacuation of Wabasca and Peerless Trout First Nation. What is the government doing to ensure there is justice for those who put Albertans and their communities at risk?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Dreesen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I'd like to thank the Member for Lesser Slave Lake for this very important question. This spring the Member for Lesser Slave Lake, the Premier, and I went to the McMillan fire to support the Alberta wildfire personnel first-hand. That fire ravaged 273,000 hectares, about three times the size of the city of Edmonton, and Alberta wildfire investigators, the RCMP Forestry Crimes Unit did find that this fire was actually set by arson. To the families evacuated and to the forestry companies that experienced losses, I assure you that we will find the person responsible.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lesser Slave Lake.

Mr. Rehn: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My next question is to the hon. Minister of Justice. It is great to hear that the RCMP is working to catch the person or persons behind this act. This is an example of the kind of response Albertans expect. Many of my constituents have expressed concern about the response to rural crime, and they say that they want to see faith restored in our justice system. What have you been hearing from Albertans, and what is your plan to ensure that justice will be served when their families and communities are put at risk?

The Speaker: I think all hon. members know by now what a preamble is, and that's certainly a very lengthy example of one.

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, I talk a lot about our rural crime tour, and I've invited people to Rocky Mountain House to come to a town hall. Last night I had one of the hardest phone calls I've ever had to do in my life. I talked to a father, a husband whose wife this last week was beaten by four individuals that broke onto their property. Two of them were caught. One of them had a record that was longer than you could list. It was the second time in that week that their property was broken into. That's why I invited people to come to Rocky Mountain House to hear about the rural crime crisis that we have, because it's real. We'll be decisive in how we respond.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Rehn: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My next question is to the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs. Given that this devastating fire, caused by arson, burned more than 273,000 hectares of land and led to the evacuation of communities in my riding and others and given that this created undue financial, physical, and emotional hardships on Albertans, many of whom are still in the process of recovering, what has your department done to bring relief to these Albertans in their time of need?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the hon. member. This summer I had the privilege of joining the Member for Lesser Slave Lake to meet many of the wildfire evacuees. Like the hon. member, I am furious to know that this fire was caused by arson. While it relieves me to know that many of the evacuees qualify for emergency evacuation payments, with additional direct support for those with dependants, this fire took an undeniable human toll on our people. I urge anyone with information to contact 1.833.999.FIRE.

Rural Emergency Medical Services

Mr. Sigurdson: Mr. Speaker, I'm constantly hearing questions from constituents about the disparities of access to emergency care between our major urban centres and rural communities. While urban centres have an average response time of roughly eight minutes, rural communities' average wait time can be well over 40 minutes for an ambulance. Rural Albertans understand that due to geography our response times may never be as fast as urban centres, regardless. To the Minister of Health: is it feasible to increase rural emergency response rates from the current standard?

The Speaker: The Minister of Health has the call.

Mr. Shandro: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think the member has it exactly right. I think Albertans understand that access can't be exactly the same, but we do have to have standards. We've actually done quite a bit of work already to set evidence-based standards for ambulance response times. AHS reviews EMS performance regularly. They and I are very much aware of the concerns around response times, especially in rural areas. We can always do better, and I would welcome the input of any member of this House.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Highwood.

Mr. Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister for that answer. Given that many rural parts of the province are served by only a small number of ambulances and given that we can agree that rural emergency response rates can improve, are there any creative options on the table such as a nonambulance dedicated patient transfer service that the minister is considering right now?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Shandro: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Absolutely, there are. AHS is using a number of new approaches, and we're hoping that the EY report for the AHS review will also help us do more when they give us their final report at the end of the year. AHS does use nonambulance transfers, but there may be room to do more there. To take just one example, they also have a community paramedic program, the first of its kind in Canada. Paramedics work with a care team to do more care in the patients' homes and avoid a trip to the emergency department. It's the kind of innovation that we need in the system.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thanks again to the minister. Given that the previous government neglected rural Albertans' health care needs and given that the previous government somehow managed to simultaneously bury our province in debt without addressing this crucial issue at all, is there any possible way for the minister to save costs while increasing rural emergency response rates?

The Speaker: The Minister of Health.

Mr. Shandro: Yeah. Absolutely, there is, Mr. Speaker, and it goes to the core of the problem in the system that we have to solve. The biggest reason we run short of ambulances here in Alberta is that the other crews are waiting in the emergency rooms to transfer their patients. We need to free up the beds for those patients to then be decanted to by adding continuing care as well for patients to get out of the hospitals faster. We're doing that by bringing back the successful ASLI partnership. It's one of the many partnerships the NDP actually walked away from because of their bias against private partners in the system.

The Speaker: Hon. members, given the Budget Address today, we will proceed immediately to Members' Statements, but we will have a recess prior to the Budget Address. Please remain in your seats wherever possible.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley has a statement to make.

Oil and Gas Prices and Pipeline Development

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Personally, I see a victory for one Canadian as a victory for all Canadians. For example, if a car rolls off the assembly line in Ontario and is exported at top dollar, I'm happy. If a fishing vessel pulls into St. John's and can sell its catch internationally for top dollar, I will cheer as loud as any Newfoundlander. If hydro power is purchased by American states and the resultant profits enrich Quebecers, I'm all for it, and if timber from British Columbia is shipped to Asian markets, I see that as a win for Canada in emerging markets. Therefore, with the same rationale, I know that Alberta selling its resources world-wide at top dollar is also a win for Canada.

Alberta is a major contributor to the Canadian economy. People come from every corner of the country to work in the oil and gas sector. Not only does the money earned in the oil and gas sector enter into Alberta's economy, but it also buoys up the economies of all provinces. This is why we need pipelines. Otherwise, we sell our product at discount prices, reducing the benefit to all Canadians.

During the election and since, Prime Minister Trudeau promised that the $4.5 billion his government invested in buying the Kinder Morgan pipeline would not be wasted, that the pipeline would be built. I applaud that commitment, and I urge my colleagues on both sides of this Chamber to join me in exhorting the Prime Minister to immediately fulfill his promise and address the concerns of people across Confederation to ensure our oil and gas sector gets a fair shake.

Separation sentiment is at its highest point in Alberta history. People are mad, and that's understandable. As I've said earlier, I'm a firm believer that we should be promoting what we do well and we should be seeking top dollar for our products. Let cars from Ontario and Albertan oil be market standards for quality in foreign markets. Let Albertan gas and Maritimes fisheries be sources of prosperity for everyone across this country. We are stereotyped for being polite, but I believe our true character lies in a natural sense of justice and fairness that we know lifts our communities regardless of which province we reside in or what product we sell.

Thank you.

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: The hon. the Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to table today the appropriate number of copies of the 2019-20 main estimates schedule for the First Session of the 30th Legislature.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for St. Albert caught my eye.

Ms Renaud: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. I have an article from the famous Quirks & Quarks at CBC. It's entitled Understanding Extinction – Humanity Has Destroyed Half the Life on Earth. This is from October 18, 2019.

The Speaker: Are there other tablings this afternoon?
Seeing none.

Tablings to the Clerk

The Clerk: I wish to advise the Assembly that the following document was deposited with the office of the Clerk: on behalf of the hon. Mr. Shandro, Minister of Health, pursuant to the Health Professions Act, the College of Alberta Psychologists 2018-19 Annual Report.

The Speaker: Hon. members, we are at points of order. I'd like to inform the House that the point of order that was called at 2:30 has been withdrawn.

Hon. members, in order to allow adequate time to prepare for the Budget Address by the hon. President of Treasury Board and the Minister of Finance this afternoon, the House is recessed until 3:15.

[The Assembly adjourned from 2:46 p.m. to 3:15 p.m.]

The Speaker: Please be seated.

Orders of the Day

Transmittal of Estimates

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, I've received certain messages from Her Honour the Administrator, which I now transmit to you.

The Sergeant-at-Arms: Order! All stand, please.

The Speaker: The Administrator transmits estimates of certain sums required by the offices of the Legislative Assembly for the service of the province for the fiscal year ending March 31, 2020, and recommends the same to the Legislative Assembly.

The Administrator transmits estimates of certain sums required by the government for the service of the province of Alberta for the fiscal year ending March 31, 2020, and recommends the same to the Legislative Assembly.

Please be seated.

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, I wish to table the 2019-20 offices of the Legislative Assembly estimates as well as the 2019-20 government estimates. In addition, I also wish to table the 2019-23 government of Alberta strategic plan and the Budget 2019 ministry business plans.

Government Motions

Budget Address

32. Mr. Toews moved:
Be it resolved that the Assembly approve in general the business plans and fiscal policies of the government.

The Speaker: The hon. the President of Treasury Board and the Minister of Finance to present his first provincial budget.

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, I now wish to table the government's Budget 2019-23 fiscal plan and move Government Motion 32.

Mr. Speaker, it's my honour to rise today and deliver the inaugural budget of the first United Conservative government of Alberta. This budget is the result of the comprehensive platform our party ran on in this year's election and consultations with Albertans over the last few months. That program, titled getting Alberta back to work, was endorsed by over a million voters, representing 55 per cent of electors, in the highest single-party vote tally in provincial history. This was an overwhelming public endorsement of our three main priorities: getting Albertans back to work, making life better for Albertans, and standing up for Alberta.

This budget is a fulfillment of that promise made to Albertans. This is a budget that is ambitious in its drive for economic growth. This is a budget that is courageous, tackling the out-of-control spending of previous administrations. This is a budget that is compassionate, taking care of the most vulnerable and providing more resources to families and children. This is a budget that is thoughtful, reasonable, and precise in its execution. This is a budget that puts Alberta and Albertans first at a time when we're contending against a global campaign of misinformation and a federal government that has campaigned against our province's vital interests. It is in this context that this budget has been crafted.

Let me start, Mr. Speaker, with the ambition of Budget 2019. Budget 2019 takes action on our first priority: getting Albertans back to work. Albertans overwhelmingly endorsed our government's free-enterprise principles. Those principles support the entrepreneurial attitude and can-do spirit that made Alberta prosperous in the past and will restore our role as the economic engine of Canada. Budget 2019 will get Albertans back to work by restoring our competitiveness, reviving private investment, cutting red tape, and supporting training in the skills that will be needed in the future.

To make Alberta a magnet for investment, Budget 2019 is taking bold action to reduce taxes and regulation. Our goal is to make

Alberta the most competitive jurisdiction to do business in in North America. Our first act after forming government was the elimination of the carbon tax. That job-killing tax created a significant drag on economic growth and disproportionately penalized us for living in a geographically massive region in a cold climate with a resource-driven economy. At $1.4 billion this was the largest tax cut in Alberta's history. It reversed the skewed policies of the previous government, that raised the cost on everything from home heating to groceries for families and small businesses already coping with unemployment and less income.

I was incredibly proud to present legislation that implemented the job-creation tax cut. This legislation assures the reduction of corporate income tax rates from 12 to 8 per cent. Mr. Speaker, by 2022 Alberta will have the lowest business tax rate in Canada, and that rate will be lower than 44 of 50 U.S. states. The weight of historical evidence overwhelmingly shows that when we improve our corporate tax strategy, our provincial GDP goes up and our share of national GDP increases. So do jobs, and so do government revenues. Economists Jack Mintz and Bev Dahlby estimate that the job-creation tax cut will add up to 55,000 jobs by 2023. My own ministry estimates that the job-creation tax cut will boost real investment by approximately $4 billion per year by 2023.

We have ample evidence of what doesn't work, Mr. Speaker. After the former government increased the corporate income tax rate, tax revenue fell by billions of dollars. It is one element of their legacy that has been reversed in order to shift Alberta to a broad-based, low-tax structure that puts investment decisions in the hands of the private sector and not government. Success is the intersection between preparation and opportunity. This side of the House believes that opportunity in Alberta remains boundless. It is the preparation that has been lacking, and we will fix that.

We have also adopted the accelerated capital cost allowance provisions. This will encourage businesses to make capital investments, resulting in growth and improved productivity. Mr. Speaker, the job-creation tax cut along with the accelerated capital cost allowance provisions provide Alberta with a broad-based, low-rate corporate tax system that will be competitive with any jurisdiction in North America. These two initiatives are designed for optimal economic impacts.

They are a break with the habit of many modern governments to complicate fiscal policy with targeted tax credits. These invariably come with red tape, which makes them inefficient, and they undermine the efficiency of market-based capital allocation in order to achieve political or ideological objectives. Therefore, we will be taking steps to eliminate five tax credits: the Alberta investor tax credit, the community economic development corporation tax credit, the capital investment tax credit, the interactive digital media tax credit, the scientific research and experimental tax credit. We will honour our existing commitments under these programs. Going forward, companies that received these credits will now instead benefit from the broad-based, low-tax environment provided to all those who choose to do business in Alberta.

Mr. Speaker, since day one we've been working to transform Alberta's economy from one of the slowest and most overregulated in Canada to the fastest and freest in the nation. My colleague the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction is making excellent progress working with Albertans to identify roadblocks to job creation and economic development. Serious efforts to reduce red tape across the entire spectrum of government are projected to save taxpayers at least $140 million per year. Unlike the previous government, this government is not driven by dogma. We are pragmatic about economic intervention, not doctrinaire.

Indigenous communities, groups, and businesses face significant challenges when accessing capital to invest in natural resource projects. This impedes their economic growth and well-being. That's why our government is creating the $1 billion Alberta indigenous opportunities corporation, to help indigenous-owned enterprises become partners in energy and resource development. The Alberta indigenous opportunities corporation makes Alberta a leader in Canada on the path to reconciliation. I am proud to present a budget that supports this practical investment to create meaningful, lasting change and a brighter future for indigenous Albertans.

Mr. Speaker, Albertans want our government to take a realistic approach to the challenge of climate change. Our government's technology innovation and emissions reduction, or TIER, program is an ambitious and realistic plan to incent investment in new emission reduction research and technologies. It invests in the tremendous progress we are already seeing in the oil sands. Between 2000 and 2017 the emission intensity of oil sands operations has dropped by 28 per cent. This is the result of made-in-Alberta technologies and is a real outcome in the effort to reduce global emissions.

TIER builds on this success and keeps the focus on large industrial emitters responsible for half the emissions in Alberta. Regulated facilities can reduce or offset their emissions or pay directly into the TIER fund. Over the next four years TIER revenues are estimated to be $1.9 billion. This will be used to fund further development of emissions reduction technologies, ensuring that Alberta companies, who are already among the most environmentally responsible in the world, continue to innovate and improve by investing in clean technologies that reduce greenhouse gas emissions.

Mr. Speaker, Budget 2019 also invests in developing the work skills that are and will be needed to move our province forward. To develop the next generation of skilled tradesmen and -women, Budget 2019 expands on the apprenticeship model, with over $11 million for schools to work with Careers: The Next Generation, an organization connecting students with apprenticeships and skills that will lead to high-paying jobs and rewarding careers. It provides $10 million for Women Building Futures to encourage women to enter the trades and $2 million over four years for Skills Canada Alberta to help young Albertans build their technology skills and make connections on the national and world stage. Actions to attract and keep skilled workers include developing the Alberta advantage immigration strategy, with $2.5 million to recognize foreign qualifications so newcomers can accelerate their entry into the job market.

Mr. Speaker, we will also build on our strength in technology, data, and telecommunications and our leadership in artificial intelligence. We will spend more than $200 million on research, innovation, and commercialization to develop talent and attract global investment. This funding will commercialize technologies that will improve the productivity and competitiveness of our traditional industries and build the ones we've not yet envisioned. This funding will support a highly skilled labour force, world-class university programs, and a competitive business environment that will make lasting contributions to economic growth.

All of these measures, Mr. Speaker, will help the province recover from the past four years. With business investment picking up, real GDP growth is forecast to improve from .6 per cent in 2019 to 2.7 per cent in 2020 and then to 3 per cent in the final two years of our mandate. Our ambitious strategy for job creation will lead to marked improved in investment and economic growth. While we are confident in our policies, we are also aware of increasing risks to the global economy. In the event of a negative external impact beyond our control, additional spending restraint will be required.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I'd like to speak of courage. To rein in the excessive spending of Alberta governments dating back 25 years will take courage and resolve, not just by this government but by all Albertans. We all have an obligation to live within our means. It is unfair to saddle future generations of Albertans with debt, to effectively steal their opportunities and force them to pay our bills. We must be responsible today to ensure that the next generation can continue to access the high-quality public services we enjoy and can have opportunities for healthy, fulfilling, and prosperous lives.

As the MacKinnon panel noted, Alberta's annual expenditures would be $10.4 billion less if our per capita spending simply matched the average spending in Canada's three largest provinces – British Columbia, Ontario, and Quebec – and we wouldn't have a deficit. In health we spent almost $1,000 more per person in 2018 than in Ontario. This means that we would be spending over $4 billion less on health care if we matched Ontario's spending.

But all that money isn't buying us better results. The panel pointed to a number of metrics that demonstrate our health care service delivery is no better than comparable provinces and in some cases worse. For example, Alberta has the highest percentage of people cared for in hospitals who should be in a more appropriate setting, and we wait longer to see a specialist after getting a referral. It's clear that other provinces are doing more with less in health care. This is why our Minister of Health has initiated an Alberta Health Services review to identify a course of action that will ensure Albertans receive better value from our health care system.

Mr. Speaker, we are also spending more than other provinces on education. In K to 12 education, school board funding increased by 3 and a half per cent over the last decade, more than double the increase in student enrolment. In advanced education, funding to postsecondary institutions has grown by 40 per cent since 2009, about three times the growth of enrolment. To live within our means, government spending must adjust to a new reality. Oil prices will be lower for longer. We can't count on another boom to bail us out.

The MacKinnon panel concluded that a spending freeze would not be enough to balance the budget in 2023. Alberta must now bring spending to more affordable levels in line with other provinces. When Dr. Janice MacKinnon delivered her panel's report to me, she said something that has remained top of mind. It was: Alberta still has options, but you must take action now to restrain spending; do not delay; if you don't take action now, there will be far fewer options for Alberta in the future. Mr. Speaker, I will not be responsible for removing opportunities for Albertans in the generations to come.

The challenge of this restraint is the spending trajectory the previous government left us. In the last four years Alberta's operating expenses have been increasing at close to 4 per cent every year while revenues have remained flat. This budget is a first step in changing that trajectory as it rolls back operating spending. Ministries have put in countless hours finding efficiencies and are now beginning the work that will lead to transformative change. Redesigning and modernizing the way we deliver services has the potential to unlock savings and provide better outcomes. We are taking a thoughtful and surgical approach to spending restraint.

To ensure their sustainability, we are evaluating programs that were put in place and left to grow at an unrestrained pace. We're considering ways in which programs can be restructured so that they truly support the most vulnerable. We are taking efforts to simplify the supports that Albertans receive to cut down on administration costs. Where we believe Albertans could afford to cover more supports, we will ask them to do so. But I want to be clear. This is Budget 2019, not budget 1993.

Budget 2019 is making a 2.8 per cent measured spending reduction over four years. That's less than 3 cents on the dollar. This is not an 18 per cent across-the-board cut. In Budget 2019 front-line services are protected. We will maintain our platform commitment to fully fund education. Health care spending will rise. Funding will also increase for Children's Services, Community and Social Services, and Seniors and Housing. That is all possible because our plan to balance the budget is focused, thoughtful, and practical.

Mr. Speaker, what we can't ignore is the crippling legacy of unrestrained spending. Government's operating expense is now $1.2 billion higher than if it matched its population growth and inflation in the last four years. At the end of 2009 Alberta's debt was $1.2 billion. This number has grown exponentially, and on March 31, 2019, provincial taxpayer-supported debt totalled $63 billion. Interest payments on that debt consumed 3 and a half per cent of the budget. That's $2 billion a year, or $5 million a day, going to bankers and bondholders instead of paying for 30,000 teachers or 35,000 long-term care beds or a new school every week. Had the previous government continued with their plan, we would have generated over 100 billion dollars of debt by 2024, with annual interest payments of $3.4 billion.

Living within our means and getting spending down to comparative levels with peer provinces is the only way we will balance the budget, get out of debt, and strengthen public services for Albertans. Something we will not do, Mr. Speaker, is continue with the reckless crude-by-rail program that the previous government created on the eve of its demise. The program would have paid out $10.6 billion in expenses to get back $8.8 billion in oil revenues. Rail contracts alone were $3.7 billion, almost as much as the federal government paid for the Trans Mountain pipeline. The private sector can ship this oil far more cost-effectively than government without risking the tax dollars of hard-working Albertans. Budget 2019 includes a $1.5 billion provision to get government and taxpayers out of the crude-by-rail business.

Mr. Speaker, this budget honours previous commitments to build and maintain key infrastructure projects, but it also takes into account what we learned from the MacKinnon report, that infrastructure in Alberta is generally newer than in other jurisdictions. Capital spending in Alberta averaged $7 billion a year over the past decade. In this capital plan it will average just over $6 billion. The 2019 capital plan provides $24.2 billion over four years.

The MacKinnon report made it clear that municipalities must shoulder more of the responsibility for major projects. The panel found that Alberta provides over 20 per cent more grant support to municipalities than other provinces and recommended that we bring municipal spending in line accordingly. The four-year fiscal plan in Budget 2019 will put us on that recommended path.

Mr. Speaker, an important partner on the journey to a new and better fiscal future for Albertans will be our public-sector workers. Each and every Albertan who works to deliver government services, whether they're a doctor, a janitor, an administrator, a teacher, or a nurse, is an important partner in our work.

Labour costs represent 55 per cent, more than half, of the total operating budget, and in 2018 Alberta's total wage and salary expenses were $880 million higher than in British Columbia and $1.2 billion higher than in Ontario on a per capita basis. In keeping with the MacKinnon report recommendations, our goal is to bring Alberta government wages in line with other provinces.

Alberta MLAs demonstrated leadership by taking a 5 per cent salary reduction, and the Premier himself took a 10 per cent pay cut. We will be looking to the public service for restraint. Let me be clear. This budget does not contain any provision for wage increases, and over the next four years the size of Alberta's public service will be reduced and management-to-staff ratios will fall. This will be accomplished mainly as employees retire coupled with hiring restraint in the broader public sector. Next year almost every contract we have with union will expire. As we approach a new agreement, we must keep in step with today's fiscal reality, with other provincial remuneration levels, and with other Albertans who saw their wages decrease or disappear altogether due to our province's recent economic travails. So I speak directly to Alberta's public service – to the nurses, to the teachers, and to the committed professionals – who deliver to Albertans every day: work with us to bring Alberta's spending in line. This will protect jobs now and in the future, and it will show fairness and respect for Albertans' hard-earned tax dollars.

While Albertans are hard-working and self-reliant, they are also compassionate. They care about their neighbours and those who are less fortunate. Our government promised to maintain quality health care and education and social supports for the most vulnerable. Budget 2019 honours that promise while achieving the MacKinnon panel recommendation to bring Alberta's spending in line with the average of other provinces. True to our commitment and Alberta's priorities, Health gets a $200 million increase in this budget. Over four years Health will receive $100 million for a mental health and addictions strategy, $40 million to address the opioids crisis, and $20 million for palliative care.

That said, we must recognize that health care is the single largest government expense. We must stabilize health care spending to balance the budget by 2023, and it can't be accomplished in one year alone. Last year Alberta spent $20.4 billion on health care. That's 42 per cent of the entire operating budget. Between 2009 and 2019 health care spending has increased 60 per cent while government revenue has only increased by 26 per cent. Our goal is to establish a health care system that achieves better outcomes, provides more appropriate care for Albertans, and comes closer to the funding levels in B.C., Ontario, and Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, the Alberta government spends $8 billion every year to educate children from kindergarten through grade 12. Budget 2019 maintains this funding. We are allocating funding for the school nutrition program, as promised, with $15.5 million for schools and $3 million for not-for-profits. We are accommodating student growth with $1.8 billion in new capital funding for new and upgraded schools and 250 new modular classrooms. We will build and upgrade playgrounds for Alberta's children by contributing $11 million over two years. We will also act on a MacKinnon panel recommendation for Alberta's K to 12 system. Government will review and revise the education formula to address enrolment growth and provide incentives for sharing services and achieving better student outcomes.

We also want to ensure better outcomes for our postsecondary students. Postsecondary education accounts for nearly 11 per cent of our budget. Spending on postsecondary education has grown at a rate of 4 per cent per year, three times the rate of enrolment growth. We spend $36,500 per student per year. That's $5,000 more than British Columbia, $10,000 more than Quebec, and $15,000 more than Ontario. The Minister of Advanced Education is consulting with postsecondary institutions to set a new course that focuses on performance, accountability, and cost management.

Mr. Speaker, we will end the five-year tuition freeze and decrease institutional dependence on taxpayer dollars while maintaining a high level of student support through scholarships and endowments. Our postsecondary institutions will help hone the next generation of great leaders, and education is one of the best personal financial investments you can make. Removing the cap on tuition will incent our universities and colleges to compete for enrolment by focusing on the delivery of programs that directly meet student needs.

Mr. Speaker, Alberta has some of the most generous social programs in the country. The assured income for the severely handicapped, or AISH, is $400 more per month than the next most generous province. Supports for the disabled are also among the most substantial. Budget 2019 makes no cuts to social programs. In fact, it increases spending. This aligns with our government's commitment to protect the most vulnerable while living within our means.

Community and Social Services receives a 7.6 per cent increase to address human trafficking and sexual exploitation, caseload pressure, and a comprehensive review of programming to ensure value for money.

We are maintaining the low-income transit support pilot program for vulnerable Albertans so they can get to appointments, job interviews, and workplaces.

Seniors and Housing will receive an increase of $8 million to maintain overall seniors' benefits, and Children's Services receives a 15 per cent increase over four years.

The Alberta child and family benefit will replace the Alberta child benefit and the Alberta family employment tax credit. This single program will provide more benefits to lower income families while reducing administration costs.

Mr. Speaker, the third priority for our government and for Budget 2019 is standing up for Alberta, standing up for a fair deal in Confederation, and standing up against foreign-funded activists trying to land-lock our oil. Alberta is a proud and significant contributor to the national economy. We have 12 per cent of Canada's population but contribute more than 16 per cent to national GDP. We attract 25 per cent of all capital investment and are responsible for nearly a quarter of all Canadian exports. When our economy is strong, all of Canada benefits. Alberta's net fiscal contribution to the rest of Canada averaged over $23 billion a year in the past five years and $211 billion over the last decade. Alberta taxpayers make an extraordinarily outsized contribution to the federation, largely due to the energy sector.

When Ottawa enacts discriminatory legislation like the tanker ban or creates excessive, opaque, and unconstitutional government programs like the new environmental assessment regime of Bill C-69, they are not just attacking the Alberta economy; they are undermining the future growth and prosperity of the entire nation.

Last year Canada imported more than $18 billion worth of crude from foreign countries, including $1 billion from Saudi Arabia alone. At the same time, Alberta's reputation as the most environmentally friendly and socially responsible energy producer in the world has been unfairly maligned. We are fighting back against these defamations and disinformation with the truth with a proactive and relentless effort that will bring back international investment. Budget 2019 includes $30 million a year for the Canadian Energy Centre to do just that, and $2.5 million is budgeted for the public inquiry into foreign funding of anti-energy campaigns.

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Energy Centre is just the start of our campaign to stand up for Alberta. In light of the election results earlier this week, it is clear that we cannot rely on federal support to rebuild our province. It is absolutely essential that we put our fiscal house in order and take charge of our economic future. In the coming months we will be focusing our efforts on bringing fiscal fairness back to Alberta. We will be looking at each and every federal fiscal transfer program and demanding that our concerns are addressed. We will use all the tools at our disposal to get a fair deal for Alberta.

In closing, friends, fellow Albertans, I'm proud of this budget and the people who have helped put it together. It is a plan that, above all, will balance the budget in four years, but it is much more than that. It is a turning point in Alberta's history. It is a budget that will grow the economy and create jobs through an ambitious strategy to attract investment to Alberta. It is a budget that will chart a prudent and thoughtful new course, that breaks away from the excessive spending of past governments. It is a budget that provides certainty and stability, and it is a budget that demonstrates compassion for people and protects the most vulnerable.

We promised to get Albertans back to work in a growing economy. We promised to deliver quality health care and education. We promised to support the most vulnerable among us, and we promised to balance the budget in four years. Budget 2019 keeps those promises. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of all of my colleagues in government I would like to thank the people of Alberta for giving us this opportunity to return our province to prosperity. We will not let you down.

Friends and fellow Albertans, I want to conclude with this message. While we have no shortage of challenges today, I believe Alberta has a bright future. I'm hopeful today not only because we've been blessed with a truly beautiful province, abundant in resources, but because Albertans are resilient and responsible men and women who cherish and defend their freedom and know that reward does not come without risk or effort. This is the spirit of the men and women who built this province, and it remains today. It is for this reason that I'm incredibly hopeful for our future.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker. [some applause]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. Official Opposition House Leader has the call.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Well, that was a whopper. In the coming weeks I imagine that Albertans are going to have a lot to say about this, and there's much debate, I think, to what we heard.

But for the time being I suggest that we adjourn debate and move that we do so.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

The Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. First of all, through you to him, congratulations to the hon. the Finance minister and President of Treasury Board on an excellent speech. I have to say that it's much more refreshing than the last four that I've seen inside this Chamber. With that, as the Opposition House Leader did say, I do expect weeks of robust debate, that I'm looking forward to participating in.

But as it has been a long legislative week – and I do see the hour is drawing near to the end of the week – Mr. Speaker, I will, through you to all members of the House, thank them for their hard work this week, wish them safe travels back to their constituencies, and move that we adjourn the House until Monday, October 28, at 1:30 p.m.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 3:51 p.m.]

Bill Status Report for the 30th Legislature - 1st Session (2019)

Activity to Thursday, October 24, 2019

The Bill sponsor's name is in brackets following the Bill title. If it is a money Bill, ($) will appear between the title and the sponsor's name. Numbers following each Reading refer to Hansard pages where the text of debates is found; dates for each Reading are in brackets following the page numbers. Bills numbered 1 to 200 are Government Bills. Bills numbered 201 or higher are Private Members' Public Bills. Bills numbered with a "Pr" prefix are Private Bills.

* An asterisk beside a Bill number indicates an amendment was passed to that Bill; the Committee line shows the precise date of the amendment.

The date a Bill comes into force is indicated in square brackets after the date of Royal Assent. If a Bill comes into force "on proclamation," "with exceptions," or "on various dates," please contact Legislative Counsel, Alberta Justice, for details at 780.427.2217. The chapter number assigned to the Bill is entered immediately following the date the Bill comes into force. SA indicates Statutes of Alberta; this is followed by the year in which it is included in the statutes, and its chapter number. Please note, Private Bills are not assigned chapter number until the conclusion of the Fall Sitzings.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Monday, October 28, 2019

Prayers

The Speaker: Hon. members, the prayer. Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and to her government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideas but, laying aside all private interests and prejudice, keep in mind their responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all. Amen.

Please be seated. Hon. members, we will proceed to O Canada in approximately 30 seconds.

Hon. members, I believe that we are ready. I know it may be hard to believe, but I was visiting with the school children from Eldorado school who will be leading us in O Canada just prior to question period, and we got running just a couple of moments late there. I see they have joined us in the gallery, so if you would please rise and join the students from Eldorado school in Drayton Valley in the singing of our national anthem. I invite you to sing in the language of your choice.

Hon. Members:

O Canada, our home and native land!
True patriot love in all of us command.
With glowing hearts we see thee rise,
The True North strong and free!
From far and wide, O Canada,
We stand on guard for thee.
God keep our land glorious and free!
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.

The Speaker: Please be seated.

Hon. members, thank you for your patience. It was certainly well worth the wait.

Prior to the introduction of visitors and guests this afternoon, I would like to acknowledge the fifth anniversary of the election of a member to this Assembly. I would like to ask the government whip to join me here at the dais as we celebrate his fifth election anniversary. I'll grab a seat so you guys can quickly come while he joins us here.

Introduction of Visitors

The Speaker: Hon. members, joining us this afternoon from our eastern neighbours, former Saskatchewan Party MLA for Kindersley from 2002 to 2007, Mr. Jason Dearborn, and his colleague Peter Voldeng.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Hon. members, joining us today from the constituency of Edmonton-Glenora are students from St. Vincent. Also in the gallery are hard-working public employees from the Ministry of Service Alberta, and we've already had the opportunity to meet our wonderful anthem singers all the way from Drayton Valley, the grade 4 students from Eldorado school. Thank you to their teachers: Tammy Flett, Jennifer Landers, and Joyce Huska for doing such a wonderful job. If those who I have mentioned would please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

In the Speaker's gallery this afternoon are family members of the Minister of Environment and Parks and the Member for Calgary-Klein. Welcome to the Assembly their brother Shane, his wife, Karen, and possibly the cutest in all of the galleries today, Amelia. Definitely a Nixon.

Also in the gallery this afternoon in recognition of Air Cadet Week, I'm very pleased to welcome air cadets from the greater Edmonton area. Please welcome the air cadets in the gallery.

I'd like to introduce guests of the NDP caucus in the Legislature today. They are: Heather Smith, Karen Craik, Danielle Larivee, Cam Westhead, Jane Sustrik, Daphne Wallace. Also, guests of the Member for Edmonton-Glenora, from the United Nurses union: Erin Pankratz, Fajar Khan, and Charlotte Bragg. Please welcome them to the Assembly.

Last, but certainly not least, are guests of the Minister of Advanced Education in celebration of Greek independence, or Ochi Day. I am very pleased to welcome guests of the minister. Please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

Ministerial Statements

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Advanced Education.

Ochi Day

Mr. Nicolaides: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise today to mark and commemorate October 28. This day is remembered right here in Alberta and around the world as the day in 1940 when the Republic of Greece stood up against fascist domination. Earlier today I was honoured to stand alongside our Premier and dozens of members of Alberta's Greek community on the steps of the Legislature to mark this important day. Many of them, as you just mentioned, join us here in the gallery alongside my own family.

On the eve of October 28 Mussolini's ambassador to Greece handed the Greek Prime Minister an ultimatum demanding that Greece capitulate to Italian rule. Prime Minister Metaxas replied with a single word: no. This, of course, plunged Greece into the Second World War, and a new front was opened against the fascist march across Europe. Outgunned and outnumbered, Greek forces stood their ground in defence of the democratic principles that we now take for granted, including freedom of speech, religion, assembly, and conscience. Greek forces staved off the Italian invasion, which would come to be regarded as the first victory against the Axis forces. German forces would ultimately come to the aid of their Italian allies, and on April 18 the Greek Prime Minister chose to take his own life rather than see German forces enter Athens. Nine days later German forces stormed the Acropolis, and one of the greatest symbols of democratic ideals fell into darkness.

But, Mr. Speaker, as we all know, democracy, freedom, and liberty can never be subjugated, and Greece and all of Europe would eventually be freed from oppression. This is why on October 28 we remember those who paid the ultimate price in defence of freedom. They fought to preserve many of the fundamental rights and freedoms that we enjoy today. So let us pay tribute to the sons that never returned home. Let us pay tribute to the homes that were never rebuilt, and let us pay tribute to all whose lives were shattered by the devastation of war. When we commemorate this day, we are reminded of the brave men and women who gave their lives to defend the foundational values and principles we enjoy today. With a defiant “No,” it was made clear that freedom and liberty would triumph over hate, tyranny, and oppression.

Mr. Speaker, as Alberta’s first MLA of Greek descent, it is my distinct honour and privilege to commemorate October 28 in this Legislature for the very first time. Thank you.

Members’ Statements

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Leduc-Beaumont has a statement to make.

Air Cadets

Mr. Rutherford: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today the Seniors and Housing minister declared Air Cadet Week in Alberta. As our government’s military liaison to the Canadian Armed Forces I am happy to have the opportunity to speak about the importance of the Royal Canadian Air Cadet program. For young people interested in aviation, it is indeed an opportunity to learn about navigation, meteorology, and even have the opportunity to fly. Young cadets start out in a classroom and end up leaders in the program, teaching fitness classes and survival skills to new recruits, and piloting gliders. Air cadets support the veterans’ community, selling poppies and accompanying veterans to Remembrance Day events and other occasions. It is stirring to see these young people supporting the men and women of an earlier generation who also served in uniform. Throughout it all these cadets learn teamwork, self-discipline, leadership, and citizenship, lessons they will carry their entire lives.

Chris Hadfield grew up on a farm in Milton, Ontario, Mr. Speaker, and remembers dreaming of space flight. He joined the air cadets in Milton in the early ’70s, and he says that he kind of grew up with the organization, first learning to fly with the cadets. Hadfield says that the lessons he learned about self-discipline, teamwork, and flying, among other things, inform his life to this day. Mr. Hadfield, as we all know, went on to command the International Space Station and was the first Canadian to walk in space. Who knows if these young cadets will fly that high, but I would not bet against them.

I recently had the opportunity to visit with the 287 Beaumont Spitfire Royal Canadian Air Cadet Squadron and help to present awards to some very talented cadets and got the chance to learn about the great programs that are offered and the excellent work that they do in the community. There are more than 3,100 air cadets in Alberta, and I know all members will join me in saluting these outstanding young people and their leadership during Air Cadet Week in Alberta.

Thank you.

The Speaker: I recognize the hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Budget 2019

Ms Gray: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, now that the federal election is over, we finally got to see what this new government has in store for Alberta with their first budget, and, my goodness, it isn’t pretty. No wonder they hid their plans until after the federal ballots were cast, because the members opposite have taken many of the worst ideas that turned Ontario to quickly go against its Conservative government. These folks decided that rather than learn from Premier Ford’s mistakes, they’d double down on them.

Indexing of benefits for AISH recipients, something the UCP members spoke in favour of and voted for last term: gone now. What’s a little about-face and broken promises when you’ve got big corporate friends in need of a $4.7 billion handout? Indexing of benefits for low-income seniors, which ensures that those who worked their entire lives to help build Alberta don’t fall further behind: gone now. This Premier and the UCP felt it was more important to spend $30 million on a secretive and unaccountable one-industry war room dedicated to chasing ghosts on the Internet. It is almost Halloween, after all. Tax incentives for petrochemical diversification, for Alberta’s burgeoning film industry, for the important high-tech industries, that so many future jobs will depend on: all gone. Proper funding for educational enrolment growth: gone. Proper funding for high-quality postsecondary education: gone. Proper funding for Edmonton’s first hospital in over 30 years: gone.

After all these sacrifices, what will Albertans have gained? Certainly nothing approximating a debt-free province. Just like the Harper government did in Ottawa, this failed Conservative agenda will rack up record amounts of new debt while destroying vital services, because despite what they say about concern for Alberta’s books, this government is really only about one thing, protecting and providing more for their wealthy friends. Shame on them, Mr. Speaker.

Gathering of the Clans Festival in Sedgewick

Ms Lovely: Mr. Speaker, it was my distinct honour to participate in the second Gathering of the Clans Highland Festival in Sedgewick this August. The event was organized by the Flagstaff Scottish society. The chieftain for the event was Rosemary Imlah. Kevin Sorenson, the former MP for Battle River-Crowfoot, and Perry Robinson, the mayor of Sedgewick, and I had the pleasure of marching behind the Battle River Pipes and Drums.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

There is something magical about the sound of the bagpipe, and one day it’s my dream to learn how to play this fascinating instrument. As expected, there was a talented musician; storytellers, who told tales of dragons; Scottish dancers; bagpipe and kilt demos; and, of course, the most marvellous music one could ever imagine. The skill of the dogs and masters was shown in sheepherding and the strength of the participants in tug-of-war. Among the vendors you could locate your clan as the Macphersons, Grahams, Wallaces, Hays, and MacNicol’s had their family tartans and history available regarding many of their prominent family members. To determine if you have even a wee bit of Scottish ancestry, the Alberta Genealogical Society was present.

At the celebration I had my first opportunity to see Highland cows. These are lovely animals with long hair and horns, which they use to dig up plants as food during the winter months. Their stature ranges from about three to four feet, much shorter than cattle we normally see here in Alberta. The breed is known for being extremely hardy, and due to the decreased amount of cholesterol in their meat, the breed is becoming more popular and thriving in our climate.

A distinguishing portion of the event was the Scottish Highland games. There were many fascinating events such as putting the stone, heavy weight for height, hammer, sheaf toss, and caber toss. Watching the contestants participate in these events was fascinating. I was impressed by the number of people who attended the event. Although heritage ranged from all parts of the world, that day we were all a wee bit Scottish.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

The hon. Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland. [interjections]

Hon. members, the statement was for Lethbridge-West, which I did call. However, seeing the Member for St. Albert rise, I will allow the member to make a statement.

Please proceed.

1:50 Personal Income Tax Indexation Cessation

Ms Renaud: Albertans are outraged that this Premier is jacking up their personal income taxes, and he's trying to do it on the sly. Now, I know we're going to hear the Premier and his minister say things like, "If your income stays the same, your taxes stay the same," "Our rates aren't going up," or some other smokescreen. So let's talk facts. If an Albertan income goes up with inflation and so does the tax bracket – that's the system we have now – they pay the same. But if the bottom of the bracket doesn't go up with inflation, a bigger share of their income is exposed to taxation. They pay more. That's the UCP plan. If another Albertan's income stays exactly the same, an indexed tax bracket, like the one we have now, will rise and protect more of their income from taxation, and they pay slightly less tax every year. The UCP is abolishing this so that Albertans will pay more tax than they would have if the Premier would have kept his hands off personal income taxes.

The proof, the bottom line, is right there in black and white, right in the middle of page 149 of this government's fiscal plan. This scheme will produce $600 million in additional income tax revenue for the government. That money doesn't come out of thin air. That is $600 million pulled out of the pockets of everyone who pays personal income tax. Let's be clear: every single Albertan taxpayer in every single riding represented in this House will pay more income tax under this UCP budget.

It's shameful that this Premier broke his campaign promise – again – to Albertans, and it's very arrogant that he thought he could do so without anyone noticing. Albertans noticed, Madam Speaker. Now every government member will have to go home and explain why every single person that voted for them got stuck with a tax hike to pay for this Premier's $4.7 billion corporate handout.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland.

Government Motion 34

Mr. Getson: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I stood in this House on the 17th of October and offered my support to Motion 34, which really resonated with Albertans. I discussed our provincial motto, Strong and Free, how leaders should be out front to lead, and made clear my allegiance to our province and our country. I'm deeply touched by the response from across Canada. I made a post entitled Poke the Bear with the video of that speech and received nonstop support for it. People from across Canada support our province, our country, and our government. I've been told that that video has been viewed almost 500,000 times.

I would like to read a few key parts of an e-mail received from a couple of my constituents, Marion and Chad, after seeing that post.

Last night we watched you in action on your video at the Alberta Legislature regarding motion 34. We are... impressed with your... passionate message fighting for your constituents and representing your views [that] align with ours. Both myself and my husband worked at Suncor Energy and the Imperial Oil Kearn project for over twenty-five years.

This amazing industry has been part of our lives as Albertans for many years. We understand the importance of our resources and how the oil and gas industry has benefited all of Canada.

This past election has caused a great deal of anger from all of us here in Alberta. We are strong supporters of [the current government's commitments] and want cooler heads to prevail.

... I felt compelled to reach out to you and state that I really feel optimistic for our future... We support your efforts one hundred per cent!

[The Speaker in the chair]

Another note I received was from a gentleman by the name of Glen Brooks, a former Australia airborne member. He and his wife recently became Canadian citizens, living on Vancouver Island.

I've watched that [video] twice, and it's not politics you are talking about. It's about the life blood of belief. Belief that we can do better, belief that we can struggle and succeed, belief that the very smallest part of our society no matter what your religious or political beliefs... We are all Albertan... Canadian.

I am like you, my brother, a believer. A believer in the fragile system we see every day in Canada. In saying that, we are also dreamers... We dream of a better Alberta, a better Canada, and by solid belief in our constitutional process... we shall have it.

These are the Canadians that are standing together, speaking up about the kind of Canada that they believe in, one that's strong and free.

Thank you.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The Leader of Her Majesty's Official Opposition.

Personal Income Tax Indexation Cessation

Ms Notley: Vicious, pernicious, "an enormous, insidious tax grab": Mr. Speaker, that's this Premier describing bracket creep. Yes, his bad-news budget contains just that grab, picking $600 million out of the pockets of hard-working Albertans, all so that he can pay for this $4.7 billion giveaway to big corporations. To the Premier. He promised not to raise taxes, but he is. Why did folks over there lie to Albertans?

Mr. Kenney: Oh, Mr. Speaker, it is getting pathetic over there in socialist land, I'll tell you. That's the party that imposed the largest tax hike in Alberta history, the carbon tax, that punished seniors for heating their homes. The largest tax hike in history was from the NDP; the largest tax cut was the UCP's elimination of the carbon tax. We are cleaning up the NDP's terrible fiscal mess while also bringing jobs back to this province. We're going to keep our word with Albertans.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, this is more than a backpedal; it's a total backflip. He called bracket creep a serious systemic flaw in our tax system, a heartless and insidious tax. When the Liberals refused to index tax brackets, he accused them of, quote: screwing the taxpayer. So I'll ask the same question this Premier asked when he was in Ottawa. From the MP for Calgary Southeast, the current Premier: "Why is this government telling Canadians they will tax relief when in fact they will end up with less money in their wallets at the end of the day?"

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, I know I lost a couple of pounds on the keto, but I couldn't do a backflip if my life depended on it.

Mr. Speaker, what this government can do, though, what this government will do is clean up the fiscal crisis left behind by the NDP. They promised a balanced budget. Instead, they quadrupled our debt: six credit downgrades, a track to $100 billion in debt, billions in interest payments. Albertans could not afford an NDP government mortgaging our future. That's why we're bringing our budget back under control.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, this is about taxes, but it's also about integrity. In 2015 we told Albertans that those who could afford to pay a little more would, because I believe that when times are tough, people who can afford to pay more should pay their fair share. But what this Premier said in the last election was: no new income tax changes. Six months later every taxpayer in Alberta is forking over a combined $600 million in new income taxes. To the Premier: why did folks over there mislead Albertans in the last election?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, she just said that every taxpayer is going to pay $600 million more and that there's a $4.7 billion corporate giveaway. They're making it all up. There are zero increases to income taxes in this budget. There is a tax increase; it's $5 on a carton of cigarettes, so we average the other western provinces. That's going to bring in $50 million to help deal with health-related concerns that come from smoking. This is a tax-cutting government. We delivered the largest tax cut in our history, a $1.4 billion tax reduction through the carbon tax. They voted against it.

The Speaker: The hon. the Leader of the Official Opposition for her second set of questions.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, I lost count, after about seven, of the number of misstatements of fact by the Premier just there.

In addition to income tax, Albertans will pay in a whole bunch of other ways as well. For example, the Premier's budget jacks up property taxes. Calgary's mayor says: Calgarians will end up paying more or face massive service cuts. Edmonton's mayor called an emergency meeting: the options are – wait for it – big tax increases or abandoning major infrastructure. That's because of this Premier. Why is this Premier making municipalities do his dirty work for him?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, as the MacKinnon panel underscored, grants to municipalities in Alberta are significantly higher than in any other province. Under this budget we are going from having the largest infrastructure budget in Canada and the largest municipal capital grants prebudget to having the largest infrastructure spending and the largest municipal capital grants in Canada after the budget. It's a responsible 15 per cent reduction. The alternative is running up a hundred billion dollar debt, and we won't do that to Albertans.

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, this budget also slashes programs that make life more affordable for those who need it the most: a cut in child and family benefits to 165,000 low- and middle-income families, including 55,000 who lose them entirely; 46,000 people getting kicked off our drug plan; $44 million in rental assistance gone. Tell me: is this Premier so tone deaf that he believes out-of-province shareholders need help with affordability more than Alberta families who are struggling to pay their rent?

Mr. Kenney: I have to correct myself, Mr. Speaker. The reduction of municipal infrastructure grants is 9 per cent, not 15 per cent, and the overall reduction in operating spending in this budget is 2.8 per cent, three pennies on the dollar. What you hear with the NDP's fear and smear is the inability of a party to even identify three pennies of savings on every dollar of the biggest spending government in Canada. Albertans know that they're wrong. That's why they hired this government, in part, to bring order back to our province's finances.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, let's look at it the other way as this budget picks people's pockets. Take the family to the museum, five bucks more; register a vehicle, five bucks more; hauling a camper, 50 bucks more; need a benefits statement, 50 bucks more; land title fees, double them. And don't get me started on the bitter irony of a former immigration minister adding a brand new $500 fee for citizenship applications. Premier, will Albertans ever stop paying for your great, big, fat, no-jobs $4.7 billion corporate handout?

Mr. Kenney: There is no such thing, Mr. Speaker. As Professor Tombe said, "Why the 4.5 billion [dollar] claim continues is a real puzzle. It is demonstrably misleading . . . but, I guess, politically convenient." She just talked about citizenship fees. The government of Alberta does not process citizenship applications; the government of Canada does. Everything that she's saying, she's making up. But what's the alternative? A hundred billion dollars in debt that would jeopardize the future of public services. They want to send money to bondholders. We want to invest it in public services. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The Leader of the Official Opposition.

Ms Notley: I would certainly urge the Premier to maybe read his budget.

Education and Postsecondary Funding

Ms Notley: Anyway, in addition, it does hit kids, parents, and university students the absolute hardest. There are 15,000 more students coming into our schools this year alone, and this budget calls for larger classes, fewer supports, and cuts to programs. The Premier claims that he's funded enrolment, but school boards will get $200 less per student, a 2 per cent cut. The ATA calls it a shell game, Mr. Speaker. To the Premier: why are kids in school getting less while big corporations get more, $4.7 billion more to be exact? Look at his budget.

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, you know, I've got about 25 years of parliamentary experience. I've never seen a parliamentarian with the tendency to make things up so blatantly as the failed leader of the NDP. In this year's budget the forgone revenue from the job-creation tax cut, she says it's $4.7 billion. It's, in fact, $100 million. She's off by over 98 per cent. Here's the reality. If we don't act now, according to former NDP Finance minister Dr. MacKinnon, then we actually would have to cut deeply in the future. We won't do that. We're being responsible.

Mr. Bilous: Raising taxes on . . .

The Speaker: Order. The Opposition House Leader will come to order.

Ms Notley: Well, for an education I would certainly urge the Premier to rewatch his own clips in question period.

Nonetheless, the folks over there also lied about funding enrolment growth. Over the next four years 60,000 new students will come into our schools, and this UCP government won't hire a single teacher to greet them at the door, but for roughly the same amount of money this Premier has chosen instead to subsidize Husky oil's investments in Newfoundland and the U.S. To the Premier: is he really so tone-deaf that he thinks that kind of choice is what Albertans voted for?

Mr. Kenney: No, Mr. Speaker. What is she talking about? You know, this is why. They live in this socialist fantasyland. It all kind of hangs together based on making stuff up. The leader of the NDP has never come to terms with the fact that all of this that she is claiming was rejected by Albertans just six months ago. They gave this government a mandate to bring order back to our finances, and that's exactly what we're doing: maintaining the highest level of education funding anywhere in Canada.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, this Premier's budget also slams college and university students. As one student put it on the radio this morning: they're shooting us in the knees but telling us to run faster. A 21 per cent hike to tuition, college and university funding slashed, cancelled tax credits, high interest on student loans, Premier, explain this to me: our province's economic future depends on these students getting a world-class education, so why are you making them subsidize Husky's investments south of the border?

Mr. Kenney: No such thing, Mr. Speaker. But as former NDP Finance minister Janice MacKinnon underscored in her expert report, Alberta has by far the least efficient universities in Canada. We spend about $10,000 more per student than Ontario does, for example, although we get lower enrolment and lower completion rates than in the rest of the country. You see, this is the problem with the NDP. They thought it was a mark of success that we ran the most expensive and least efficient provincial government in Canada with substandard results. Albertans demand better, they expect better, and with this government they're going to get better.

AISH Indexation

Ms Notley: What Albertans have gotten, Mr. Speaker, is an unprecedented bait and switch. Unconscionable, mean-spirited: that's what Albertans are calling this Premier's decision to deindex support for disabled Albertans on AISH, and the Premier appears proud of it. He says: it isn't onerous. It's not onerous for disabled Albertans to get less so corporations can get more. Yet this spring his campaign clearly stated they would continue to index AISH. When did the Premier decide to break his promise to severely disabled Albertans, and also, where is your heart?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, even though the NDP left behind a fiscal crisis, this government worked very hard to ensure that we protect the vulnerable in this budget. The budgets for community, family, and child services are all going up in this budget. The budget for Health is going up: $150 million in additional investments for persons with mental health challenges and addiction crises. We've accepted the significant increase in AISH into this budget, which is by far the highest level of income assistance for the severely disabled in Canada. [interjections] We're proud of that. We will maintain that generosity.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for St. Albert will not make statements that say: why did you lie?

Ms Renaud: I'll try not to.

The Speaker: No. You won't try not to. You will not make statements that say . . .

Ms Renaud: I'll do my best.

The Speaker: No. You won't do your best. You will not make statements like: why did you lie? It's wildly unparliamentary and unacceptable.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, either they decided to break their promise very recently, or the CSS minister intentionally said things that were not true. Just last month on the issue of AISH indexing she told the media, quote, I think it's fair; it's compassionate. I think it's sensible. Inflation has made life much more expensive for all Albertans, all Canadians. I'm fully supportive. End quote. Yet today Albertans are seeing a government that's unfair, uncaring, and decidedly unsupportive. Why were folks over there so comfortable with lying to Albertans with disabilities?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, the previous NDP government in 2015, 2016, 2017, and through the end of 2018 had no indexation for AISH benefits. The previous government did increase AISH benefits. Our party voted for that; our government is maintaining that. It is $400 more generous than the next most generous province in Canada. We're proud, even while correcting the fiscal crisis of the NDP, to be supporting people who are most vulnerable in our society.

Speaker's Ruling Parliamentary Language

The Speaker: The hon. the Leader of the Official Opposition, I have made many comments around people indicating that members on one side of the House or the other are misleading the House. I haven't yet provided comments on saying, "Folks over there are lying," but the leader might want to consider her words as we move forward.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker. All of this is shameful. They voted in favour of AISH indexing. They spoke in support in this House. They promised to keep it during the election. They promised to keep it a month ago. This is more than a broken promise. This is despicable penny-pinching, and it's going to hurt the people who can afford it the very least. Every member over there should be ashamed. How does this Premier give corporations a $4.7 billion handout and then look these Albertans in the eye? Who does that?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, once again, this is a budget that finds 2.8 per cent savings in the most inefficient provincial government in Canada, which spends more on everything – 20 per cent more than our fellow provinces. What we're hearing from the NDP is that they are completely incapable of even contemplating us operating as efficiently as other provinces. What is the alternative? Over $100 billion in debt and billions of dollars going to bankers and bondholders. We will not follow the fiscal disaster of the NDP. We will get our finances in order to protect our public services.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie has the call.

Surgery Wait Times

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Under the former government our health care system here in Alberta delivered longer and longer wait-lists for surgeries to Albertans. A 2018 report by the Fraser Institute found that Albertans on average spend over 26 weeks waiting to go from a general practitioner to a specialist to receiving treatment, compared to a national average of 19.8 weeks. To the Minister of Health: how will this government address surgical wait times and ensure that patients will have timely access to care and not just access to a wait-list?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health is rising.

Mr. Shandro: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, the previous government spent four years watching our wait times in Alberta get longer and doing nothing about it. It's something that's now left to us to try to fix. For example, the wait for a hip replacement rose from 29 weeks to 38 weeks under their watch. Our wait times went, from before that government, from being mostly shorter than the national average to being mostly longer, and for those four years doing nothing about it. It's being left to us to try and fix it. We campaigned on fixing it. I'm looking forward this fall to being able to announce what our surgical initiative is going to be.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie.

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that surgical wait times for medically necessary procedures continued to soar under the previous government despite their having spent an additional $3 billion in health care and given that since elected I have heard from multiple constituents in Grande Prairie waiting in pain for their surgeries to be scheduled and given that a current review of Alberta Health Services is under way to pinpoint critical changes needed in our system, can the Minister of Health please explain how our government will ensure that Albertans are getting the care they're waiting for and specifically how this backlog will be cleared?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Mr. Shandro: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. There are many aspects to it. First, we need to increase system capacity. We're going to do that by adding continuing care beds in Alberta and by bringing back the successful ASLI partnership. We also need to work with clinicians to make sure that the right patients get listed for surgery so that we have the best outcomes, and of course we need to do more surgeries. We have about 70,000 Albertans now waiting on the wait-list. It now falls to us to fix that wait-list by adding more surgeries that will be getting done in the next four years.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that other provinces like Saskatchewan and British Columbia have benefited from allowing specialized private day-surgical clinics to bid for contracts with their provincial governments and given that these benefits include reduced wait times and less strain on government resources and given that there are people currently working while injured in this province as their benefits run out long before their surgeries are scheduled, to the same minister: is this government considering expanding the number of contracts available to private surgical clinics to reduce the current wait times for Albertans?

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. Minister of Health has the call.

Mr. Shandro: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. But first, I would just like to talk about these clinics and point out that here in Alberta we call them nonhospital surgical facilities or NHSFs. It's a difficult, horrible phrase that we use for these things. They've been around for decades. There are 42 of them. The surgeries that they're providing, though, are 100 per cent publicly funded. But, yes, we will be working with those partners, these 42 clinics that now are providing 15 per cent of those surgeries out of the 300,000 surgeries that we have done in Alberta in any given year. We will be working with them, yes.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-McCall has a question.

Husky Energy Layoffs and Corporate Taxation

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Husky Energy stands to receive a nearly quarter-billion dollar gift from this Premier, yet they moved quickly last week to lay off dozens, potentially hundreds of workers from its headquarters in Calgary. To the minister of labour: any termination of 50 employees or more requires you to be notified, by law. Will you finally tell this House how many people lost their jobs last week at Husky?

Mrs. Savage: Well, Mr. Speaker, we know that the root cause for lower drilling, the decline in investments, and job losses is the lack of pipeline capacity. This has led to curtailment and loss of jobs. The NDP legacy on pipelines is abysmal. [interjections] The jeer and heckling on that side of the House will not solve the problems they created. If we had pipelines, we would not have had the job losses.

Mr. Sabir: Given that Husky's CEO told reporters last week that while layoffs are occurring in Calgary, the company is still making capital investments in Saskatchewan, Newfoundland, and the United States and given that this Premier's $4.7 billion giveaway is creating no jobs here – in fact, we have lost 27,000 jobs – to the Premier: when you ran on your corporate giveaway and said that it would create jobs, did you mean jobs in other provinces? It's certainly not creating any here.

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, we're confident that our policies will attract investment, create job opportunities, and additional government revenues in the long term. Job growth in this province has been flat since May. We acknowledge that. It will do better in the future. We're confident, again, that as we implement these policies that create a very competitive business environment, we will attract the investment flows that the policies of the previous government sent south of the border. We will reverse that trend.

Mr. Sabir: Given that Albertans didn't vote for job creation in Newfoundland or the U.S. and given that this Premier's corporate handout is an epic failure and given that that $4.7 billion could be used to keep the Calgary cancer centre and Calgary green line and keep Calgary nurses and teachers in their jobs rather than cutting them all, like this Premier is proposing, to the Premier. My question is simple. If you're not creating jobs, can Albertans at least have their money back so that we can spend it on something useful?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, the opposition continues to play fast and loose with the facts. The reality is that in this current year our job-creation tax cut will only reduce government revenues by $100 million. The numbers the opposition is using are completely fictitious. Moreover, this budget is a budget of responsibility, a budget that Albertans elected this government to deliver to bring this province back to balance. We have accomplished our mission with budget number 1. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. The hon. members of the Official Opposition will come to order.

Tax Credit Program Cancellation

Mr. Bilous: I feel betrayed: that, Mr. Speaker, is how the CEO of Beamdog described the UCP's decision to eliminate the digital media tax credit. Beamdog employs 50 Albertans and had plans to double its operations before this government took office. Other companies are threatening to leave the province outright. Does the minister of economic development and trade think that it's a fair trade-off to see job creators leaving Alberta just to pay for her Premier's jobless $4.7 billion handout?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, this government is taking the approach to broadly improve the competitiveness of our business environment. We're confident that the private sector can make the best decisions in terms of allocating capital to businesses and sectors that in the long term will be sustainable. We are also incredibly supportive of our tech industry. [interjections] We recognize that innovation and commercialization of leading research will be critical to improving the competitiveness of the economy broadly. We're working with that sector to ensure that they're sustainable in the future.

The Speaker: Hon. members, it is useful for the Speaker to be able to hear the answer. I appreciate a good heckle from time to time, but if I could hear the answer, that would also be appreciated.

Mr. Bilous: Mr. Speaker, I think that the government's nose is growing. Given that the general manager of Improbable stated that the tax credit program contributed directly to their expansion from four to 70 employees in Alberta and given that the same company stated that this government's actions are causing them to look elsewhere to spend their money to grow – sound familiar? – is the minister of economic development and trade concerned about the harm she's inflicting on the Alberta tech sector, or is it only companies that profit from the zero-jobs corporate giveaway that get her attention?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, we recognize the importance of the tech sector in this province. We also recognize that we're a world leader in AI and machine learning. We're working with participants in that sector to determine how we can assist them to ensure that we continue to grow and, more importantly, so that we can assist that sector in commercializing their technology into the broader economy to improve the competitiveness of every aspect of our economy.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's abundantly clear that the Finance minister and the other ministers need to meet with these companies. Given that this minister has only produced spin and talking points for legitimate private-sector questions and given that this minister's choices are causing real harm, job losses, and companies moving investments out of Alberta, will the minister listen to these companies and reinstate these crucial tax credit programs, and if not, why not?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, we are continuing to invest in artificial intelligence and machine-learning technology. We are investing $40 million in AI and machine learning. We are investing $200 million through Alberta Innovates to encourage and enhance that sector to ensure that we continue to be world leaders. More importantly, we are going to work with the industry to commercialize those innovative concepts to ensure that, broadly speaking, Alberta has a more competitive economy on the global stage.

Supervised Drug Consumption Sites

Mr. Neudorf: Mr. Speaker, supervised consumption sites are a critical issue to many people who make Lethbridge their home. My constituents need to receive clear direction from this government regarding the continued utilization of Lethbridge's supervised consumption site and how this site is tackling the issue of addictions management in Lethbridge. To the Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions: can you clarify what this government's direction on the usage of supervised consumption sites will be?

The Speaker: The Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions.

Mr. Luan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for pointing out a very important question. Yes, he is correct. We heard it loud and clear at the doorsteps of Albertans that community and business have been impacted by these services. This is why we appointed a panel to conduct a robust socioeconomic review of the supervised consumption sites.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Minister.

Given that we need to invest in programs and services that will help lift individuals out of addiction and into positions of self-empowerment and economic betterment, to the same minister: how is this government ensuring that the dollars invested in supervised consumption programs in Lethbridge and across this province are making a real and measurable impact on those struggling with addictions?

The Speaker: The associate minister.

Mr. Luan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Unlike the previous government, who seemed to be focused entirely on the one-pillar approach and failed to consult business, we're going to do it differently. Our approach is going to be focused on a fair, firm, and compassionate approach. We're committed to getting Albertans into recovery, but we will not sacrifice the rest of the community while we're doing this to help others.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Knowing that overcoming an addiction is a lifelong journey for those who have faced it and given that we must consider a holistic approach to assisting those who struggle with addictions in order to truly provide the help that they deserve, to the same minister: what specific supports and programs is this government investing in that will bridge the gap between supervised consumption and recovery from addictions?

The Speaker: The Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions.

Mr. Luan: Thank you Mr. Speaker. It is time for Alberta to move from managing the crisis to helping Albertans, pointing a way to recovery. Our government in the next four years is going to work very hard at making life better for Albertans by increasing access to treatment and recovery spaces by 4,000 spaces. This means access to treatment beds, detox beds, outpatient spaces, opioid dependency programs, and long-term recovery support. We are focused on getting Alberta well.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview has a question.

Seniors' Drug Coverage

Ms Sigurdson: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Many Alberta seniors have dependent spouses who haven't reached their 65th birthday yet. These older Albertans were able to access the seniors' drug benefit program, but now the UCP government is throwing these older Albertans off the drug plan. This means these households, often on fixed incomes, will have to pay to manage chronic conditions and serious disease. To the minister of seniors: how many households are you pushing into poverty to pay for your $4.7 billion corporate handout?

The Speaker: I see the Minister of Health is rising.

Mr. Shandro: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I'm very happy to speak about the seniors' drug plan. The seniors' drug plan is, in its name, meant for seniors. We are going to make sure that it is going to be available, the $600 million that we spend on the seniors' drug plan, for seniors who are over the age of 65 to make sure it's sustainable and always available for our seniors. We're going to make sure it's sustainable by making sure that it is seniors who are on the seniors' drug plan.

Ms Sigurdson: Also, Mr. Speaker, given that children born into struggling families are frequently raised by their grandparents and given that these dependent children used to be able to access their grandparents' drug coverage until the UCP kicked them off the plan in this budget, again to the minister: how many children are you pushing into poverty to pay for your $4.7 billion corporate giveaway?

Mr. Shandro: Mr. Speaker, as we know and we've seen today, we live in a postfact world with the NDP. They keep on throwing imaginary numbers at us. We are making sure that our seniors' drug plan is going to be available for our seniors for years to come by being responsible and by making sure that it's sustainable, making sure that the $600 million that we continue to spend for our seniors is always going to be there for their seniors' drug plan.

Ms Sigurdson: Given that government officials estimated on budget day that 46,000 Albertans will lose their drug coverage as a result of this budget and given that Budget 2019 warns that income testing will be imposed on the seniors' drug benefit program soon, to the minister: how many seniors have told you they wanted to lose their life-saving drug coverage to pay for your $4.7 billion corporate handout?

Mr. Shandro: Mr. Speaker, as I've said, this is a $600 million drug plan that we provide to our seniors who are over the age of 65. We're going to make sure that this is always going to be there for generations to come and that this drug plan is sustainable by being responsible, unlike the previous government. We are going to make sure that it's going to be available for our most vulnerable seniors in this province.

The Speaker: The Member for Edmonton-City Centre would like to ask a question.

Registered and Licensed Practical Nurses

Mr. Shepherd: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. We've known for a while now that the UCP government had every intention to endanger the jobs of thousands of nurses to pay for their $4.7 billion corporate handout, and for months this Minister of Health has scoffed and dismissed that this was fearmongering. Well, now their plan to attack registered nurses is available for all to see on page 84 of their fiscal plan, "lower the number of . . . (RN) funded hours" being the euphemism. Why is the Minister of Health so eager to strip our health care system of hard-working, highly trained professionals?

Mr. Shandro: Mr. Speaker, I think what the question was was one gigantic euphemism for pitting one health profession against another, pitting our licensed practical nurses against our registered nurses. It's quite shameful. We are quite happy to see the expansion of the scope of practice for our LPNs in this province. The fact that the NPD want to continue to attack the expansion of that scope and want to actually see more transitions in care throughout this province, which, quite frankly, is against the best interests of patient safety, is reprehensible and shameful.

Mr. Shepherd: Given, Mr. Speaker, that the only person that has attacked LPNs is this minister and his government as he illegally tore up their contracts with AHS through legislation and given that he and his big-money UCP donors are fighting those same LPNs which he claims to respect in court and at the labour board as we speak, to this minister: are you asking LPNs, because you respect them so much, to do more? If you're going to do that, will you commit that you will not then try to pay them less as long as you remain the Minister of Health?

Mr. Shandro: Mr. Speaker, we have 16,000 LPNs in this province. I'm very happy to have worked with the college. Their regulation had not been touched since it first passed in 2003. They have been asking, this college has been asking for this expansion of scope probably since 2003. It was something that should have happened under the previous government. They ignored it for whatever reason, probably because, as we see today and as we've seen over the weekend, they're trying to pit one health profession against the other. It's shameful. I'm very happy to work with the LPNs to make sure that they are working to the full capacity of their scope of practice.

Mr. Shepherd: I'll take it, then, Mr. Speaker, that the minister intends to cut all of their wages equally.

Given that this minister is raising their taxes while cutting the wages of nurses of all designations and given that more than 56,000 Alberta households are supported by the hard-earned income of an RN or an LPN and noting that these nurses are overwhelmingly women, to the minister: why are you targeting female wage earners to pay for your government's failed $4.7 billion no-jobs corporate handout?

Mr. Shandro: Mr. Speaker, this is a budget that is responsible and balanced and supporting our front-line workers. I'll pick out a number from our budget. We were able to spend less on the amount of fuel that we spend on our ambulances because we killed the job-killing carbon tax so we could have that money going to our front-line workers rather than the NDP's carbon tax. That's the kind of balance and thoughtfulness that we were voted in to be able to bring to Alberta.

Animal Rights Activist Farm and Ranch Protests Automobile Insurance

Mr. van Dijken: Mr. Speaker, earlier this year one of my friends, his family, and their livestock were threatened. Criminals wearing ski masks trespassed on to their private property and feedlot with the intention of opening the gates and letting the livestock run free. With the help of neighbours the criminals were detained. The RCMP were called, arrived, but no charges were laid. To the Minister of Justice: will the government commit to ensuring that these eco radicals face justice in order to restore some sense of order in rural Alberta?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, this exact situation came up in town hall after town hall after town hall across rural Alberta. That's why we announced clear measures to send a signal to these folks that are illegal trespassers on our farmers' properties that no longer in Alberta will that be tolerated. We're going to be making sure that for first offences they could face a fine of $10,000 and subsequent offences $25,000. If you're involved in an organization that's organizing this, you could face a fine of up to $200,000. We stand with our farmers. They're the best in the world. We're proud of them, and we've got their back.

Mr. van Dijken: Given that the victims of the aforementioned crime did not need any more difficulties in their lives and given that my friend had his farm insurance dropped by his insurance company because he was, quote, too great a risk for eco-terrorism, to the Minister of Finance. My friend feels stuck. Criminals walk away without facing consequences, and insurance companies will not support him. Insurance companies need to know that we are taking rural crime seriously to prevent losses. Can the government commit to working with insurance companies to ensure that farms will be protected?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, I'd like to thank the member for the question. As a rancher myself this kind of activity is completely unacceptable, unacceptable to agriculture in this province. These perpetrators need to be prosecuted to the full extent of the law, and while insurance is delivered privately in this province, I'd offer to the member that he can deliver the details of this case, and we can certainly follow up.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. van Dijken: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the auto insurance industry is also dropping clients because auto insurance is no longer profitable and given that this is largely due to the previous NDP government's 5 per cent cap on insurance companies, to the Minister of Finance. This government recognizes that the 5 per cent cap is harmful and will not be renewing it. Does the government anticipate this will be enough to ensure that people will have access to auto insurance, and will the government provide any other support for these companies and consumers? [interjections]

The Speaker: I hear members of the Official Opposition interjecting, asking how this might be a supplemental. Very clearly, the question is about insurance and its availability to Albertans, so the hon. Minister of Finance and the President of Treasury Board can answer the question.

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, there are challenges in the automobile insurance industry, and they're challenges that were greatly increased because of the failed policies of the previous government. The previous government put a Band-Aid fix on a problem that needed much more substance than that. This government is doing a review of automobile insurance. We will have the courage to take this problem head-on and ensure that Albertans have access to competitively priced automobile insurance. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Hon members of the Official Opposition, you will know that when the Speaker is on his feet, you will come to order. You're a very excitable bunch today.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods has a question.

Support for Postsecondary Students

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. The UCP's first budget has bad news for almost every Albertan, but one group that has been particularly picked on is Alberta's young adults. With Budget 2019 allowing massive hikes to postsecondary tuition and even an increase to the interest rate charged on student loans, my question is for the minister of labour. Now that your government has chosen to make it so expensive to pursue higher education, will you commit to reversing your needless and unhelpful cut to the minimum wage for working students? Clearly, they're going to need that money to survive in your Alberta.

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Advanced Education has risen.

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Advanced Education is who I will recognize.

Mr. Nicolaides: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's interesting to hear some of the comments from the members opposite. You know, obviously, in my role I spend a lot of my time having very in-depth conversations with students and with young Albertans, and the single biggest concern is jobs and careers at the end of their program. They want to know that their program is going to connect them into the labour market and give them adequate jobs. It's clear. We know that with the NDP we've seen the highest youth unemployment in decades, and we're working to correct it.

Ms Gray: Mr. Speaker, given that Budget 2019 eliminates the summer temporary employment program, or STEP, as it was known, an excellent government wage subsidy program that helped matched youth with high-quality employment opportunities, and given that this minister professes to care so deeply about youth employment, although he did cut the wages for all working students, will this minister commit to immediately reversing the cancellation of the STEP program, and if not, why not?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Copping: Thank you for the question, Mr. Speaker. We sympathize with employers and students who were hoping to receive funding from the STEP program next summer. That said, Albertans elected us overwhelmingly to get the province's financial house in order. Difficult decisions are required when you are the recipient of a $60 billion debt. In this case other resources are available to support employers and youth. STEP was an inefficient use of government funds. It did not target those who actually needed the funds, and it didn't create long-term employment.

Ms Gray: Given that this minister's staff referred to it as free money for companies, I suspect his respect is not actually earned.

Given that on CBC Radio at lunchtime the Minister of Finance laughably said that the STEP program wasn't fully subscribed and given that every single year more municipalities, public libraries, nonprofits, and particularly small businesses applied for funding, way more than could be approved for $10 million, will the labour minister please correct the record, confirm that this was an incredibly popular and beneficial program, or is misleading Albertans the only way the UCP moves their agenda forward?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, this program was an inefficient use of government funds. We're committed to students, and we've taken action to make hiring students easier for job creators. We put policies in place, which include the job-creation student wage, and we also reduced unnecessary red tape for employers. In addition, the Minister of Advanced Education made an announcement just this morning that we will quadruple the number of students who can participate in programming through Careers: the Next Generation. We have a limited amount of funds. We need to put those funds to work in an efficient manner, and we're doing this through our programs.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

2:40                    Municipal Infrastructure Funding

Ms Hoffman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Friday I attended the emergency meeting for the Edmonton city council held here in response to the UCP government's massive cuts to municipalities; for example, the $150 million stolen from Edmonton infrastructure projects that had already been approved. Councillors and the chief economist for the city said that the cuts could push Edmonton into a recession like we saw in the 1990s. Why is the Minister of Municipal Affairs willing to risk a recession in his own city, our own city, to pay for a $4.7 billion no-jobs corporate giveaway?

The Speaker: I see the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs is rising.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. When we took office, we learned that the NDP had miscalculated Alberta's finances by more than $7 billion. Despite this, we are giving municipalities of all sizes the predictable funding they need to meet their long-time capital grant. This plan lies in accordance with the recommendations of the MacKinnon report. It will help to get municipal funding closer to the national average. We've received many endorsements for our plan, including from members of Edmonton and Calgary city councils.

Ms Hoffman: Given that the city charter agreement we landed with the big cities would have given revenue certainty to Edmonton and Calgary and given that the minister has now ripped this agreement up, cut the base funding by at least $45 million, and taken to openly chastising city councillors for wasting money, Mr. Speaker, we've asked several times – and I know the minister has had some time to consider it – can the minister rise in this House and name one project that he believes was a waste of money in Edmonton or Calgary?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have explained how our funding plan will meet the needs of our municipalities while getting municipal funding closer to the national average. But I won't be lectured by that member, whose government imposed the largest tax increase in Alberta's history in the middle of a recession, a government who gutted one-third of downtown Calgary and oversaw six credit downgrades in Alberta's history with the highest unemployment rate in the country. We are working to clean up their mess, the mess that that incompetent member and her friends created.

Ms Hoffman: Given that Mayor Iveson said at the city council meeting and afterwards in interviews that what was most frustrating was that it was in the UCP platform to respect the big-city charter, the legal agreement that was struck with Edmonton and Calgary, and given that the mayor feels that he's been lied to by this government, how can the minister stand in this House and continue to make excuses for a $4.7 billion no-jobs corporate giveaway? What did he say to the mayor in their meeting on Friday? How did he explain how the government lied about their campaign promise?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, the NDP should be asking themselves all of these questions. The NDP presented the most ridiculous fiscal projections to Albertans before and during the last election. They overprojected revenues by more than $6 billion. That's the fiscal surprise they inflicted on this government and on taxpayers. Every single challenging decision in this budget is a response to and is a result of the catastrophic fiscal irresponsibility of the NDP.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for [interjections] – order – Calgary-West.

Education Policies

Mr. Ellis: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Parents, rightfully so, are very concerned about the education that their children receive each and every day when they send their children off to school. Alberta was formerly one of the highest performing regions in terms of student performance in North America; however, recent years have shown a declining trend in test scores for Alberta students between the ages of five and 18. Can the Minister of Education please elaborate on what steps our government is taking to reverse this trend?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and hon. member for the question. Yes, we were elected with a clear mandate to reform student assessment and improve outcomes for our students. New grade reassessments will be developed in conjunction with the new curriculum. In the meantime school authorities are expected to share student learning assessment results with parents to ensure that parents understand how their child is progressing. We owe it to our students and their parents to get education right.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Given that our government recently passed the Education Act and given that the act ensures that school-aged children in grades K to 12 will be able to access education, can the minister please explain to this House how the government values the educational opportunities of all children?

Member LaGrange: Thank you again for the question. Alberta has a long and successful tradition of supporting choice in education opportunities for children, and our government is committed to preserving and protecting educational choice. In the future we will introduce the choice in education act, which will affirm that parents have primary responsibility for the education of their children. We value all the strong educational opportunities our system provides to students and their parents, and we'll continue to protect our strong and diverse education system.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Given that the previous government spent several years on a curriculum review and given that our government has created a panel to review the proposed changes of the former government, with the plans to finish the review in December, can the minister please elaborate on a timeline for these changes to be implemented?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Member LaGrange: Thank you again, Mr. Speaker and hon. member. Yes, my Curriculum Advisory Panel consists of individuals with diverse backgrounds and experiences that will enhance the vision and direction for student learning in Alberta. The panel members will draft an updated ministerial order on student learning, which will modernize and strengthen how students are taught in the classroom. The panel's work will be serving as a starting point for public engagement in the new year. I look forward to it.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, in 30 seconds or less we will return to Members' Statements.

Educational Curriculum

Member Irwin: The year was 1984. Stevie Wonder, Prince, and Tina Turner topped the charts, the original Apple Macintosh computer hit the markets, and Alberta introduced its new junior high art curriculum.

Now fast-forward 35 years, and while music trends have changed and technology has shifted dramatically, that new curriculum is – wait for it – still in place. I'm not ageist. In fact, I too was introduced in 1984, but it's shameful that we've still got curriculum documents as old as I am. It's just that our kids deserve a modern curriculum, one that acknowledges the realities of our time and equips our students to take on issues like climate change, reconciliation, comprehensive sexual health, consent education, and more.

We've heard from countless folks – long-time educators, brand new teachers – who were so excited about the work our NDP government embarked on to move curriculum forward across six subject areas. What a significant undertaking, not just because of the age of the curriculum but for moving towards a more interdisciplinary approach, a concept-based curriculum that encourages students to engage in deep analysis of big issues.

But what will become of this work, of the thousands of hours of teachers, students, parents, and other experts, of the millions of dollars spent? This government speaks a big game about fiscal responsibility and government waste, but when it comes to curriculum, they're certainly not playing by their own rules. This Education minister claims that the work isn't being scrapped, but there's very little indication that it's truly moving forward.

I was there this summer when she announced her Curriculum Advisory Panel, a hodgepodge group missing a key factor: currently practising teachers. This panel adds unnecessary layers. This government is literally asking students and their teachers to pay to delay moving the curriculum into this century. Students don't need more panels. Students don't need more consultation. Students need a modern, relevant, evidence-based curriculum.

While 1984 was a great year – and this government seems to love living in the past – it's high time that we acknowledge that our kids and even our grandkids shouldn't be learning from the same curriculum that we did.

Ochi Day

Mr. Amery: Mr. Speaker, I rise to commemorate October 28 as Ochi Day, which is commonly known as the anniversary of the no. This holiday celebrates the resilience, pride, and bravery of the Greek people in the face of imminent Fascist danger. This is a special day celebrated throughout Greece, Cyprus, and in Greek communities globally. It celebrates the complete rejection of Mussolini's ultimatum to the Greek people.

That ultimatum, Mr. Speaker, demanded that Greece allow Axis forces into Greek territory and occupy certain strategic locations or face imminent war. The Greek Prime Minister was rumoured to have pondered the statement briefly and then replied with a single word, "ochi": no. In response to that refusal, Mussolini's soldiers poured across the Greek border on October 28, 1940. This attack marked the beginning of Greece's participation in the Second World War. That morning members of the Greek resistance took to the streets shouting: ochi, ochi. In less than a year Greek and Allied forces drove their Fascist invaders out of Greece forever. From 1942 onwards, October 28 has been celebrated as Ochi Day and has become a public holiday in Greece, Cyprus, and in communities all across the world.

Mr. Speaker, Greek immigrants have been moving to our great province since at least 1903. Within 10 years of their arrival they had formed tightly knit communities in Calgary and Edmonton, and by the late 1950s and '60s Greek immigration to Alberta increased significantly due to our province's booming economy and job prospects. Greek immigrants have played a major role in their contributions to Alberta's culture, heritage, and economic growth through their hard work and dedication.

I rise on behalf of my colleagues to wish all Greek Albertans a joyous Ochi Day. Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-McCall has a statement to make.

Personal Income Tax Indexation Cessation

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. De-indexing of tax brackets, or bracket creep, is the Premier's scheme to break his central campaign promise and raise personal income taxes on every single Albertan.

Here are some thoughts on bracket creep from some prominent Albertans.

Bracket creep ... results in higher income-tax payments as inflation erodes the real value of personal exemptions and forces the payment of higher marginal income-tax rates ... Personal exemptions and brackets in the personal income tax should be fully [indexed].

That was Preston Manning writing in 1998.

Writing over the weekend, Professor Trevor Tombe of the University of Calgary, who the Premier often quotes, says:

Some are claiming that there are no tax increases. That is incorrect. De-indexing and removing some credits will increase income tax payments: roughly ~ $330m in additional revenue ... per year. That comes from taxpayers. What else shall we call it?

Of course, Mr. Speaker, the Premier himself has had a lot to say about tax policy. What has he said about the bracket-creep scheme contained in his own budget? He has called it: a hidden tax grab, an enormous, insidious tax grab, a tax grab, a backdoor tax grab, and the list goes on. So when the Premier presented this budget, he knew he was doing something hidden and insidious and backdoor to Albertans. Trying to jack up everyone's taxes and hoping they won't notice is not conservatism; it's hypocrisy of the highest order.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

Skilled Trades Training

Ms Armstrong-Homeniuk: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Alberta is facing the challenge of retirement among skilled workers with not enough new workers to replace them. Our government is committed to finding a solution to that problem. As the chair of the skilled trades caucus I am pleased to see that Budget 2019 invests in attracting the workers we need and developing the work skills necessary to move our province forward.

Budget 2019 expands the apprenticeship model with investment in Careers: the Next Generation, an organization connecting students with apprenticeships and skills that will lead to high-paying jobs and rewarding careers. The over $11 million in funding will double the number of schools that work with Careers: the Next Generation, from 500 to 1,000. It will quadruple the number of students and full-time apprentices, from 1,500 to 6,000, by 2023.

The budget also expands the apprenticeship model in its $10 million investment in Women Building Futures, an organization that prepares women for careers, leading to economic prosperity through awareness, training, and opportunity.

Budget 2019 expands the apprenticeship model by investment in Skills Canada Alberta, a provincial nonprofit organization that actively promotes careers in skilled trades and technologies to Alberta youth. By allocating $2 million over four years, we will help young Albertans build their technology skills and make connections on the national and world stages.

In an uncertain world where we can't count on the federal government, Alberta needs to be self-reliant so we're prepared for whatever the future might bring. Budget 2019 implements 24 of our platform commitments and was developed after extensive consultations with Albertans and with expert advice from the MacKinnon panel. Our government will live up to its promises, that we were elected on, to get Alberta back to work, to make life better for Albertans, and to stand up for Alberta. With Budget 2019 we are making life better for Albertans.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to advise the Assembly that pursuant to Standing Order 7(8) the daily Routine shall continue past 3 p.m.

Introduction of Bills

The Speaker: The hon. the President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance.

Bill 20

Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, 2019

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I request leave to introduce first reading of Bill 20, Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, 2019.

Our government campaigned on a promise to address Alberta's crumbling financial situation and to achieve real savings for Albertans. That's why I'm so pleased to introduce this legislation, that will help get Alberta's finances back on track. This bill makes changes to a number of dedicated funds and tax credits to better focus resources. It includes pausing indexation of the personal income tax system so that we can be responsive to changing economic and fiscal conditions. I will be clear. This does not increase personal taxes; it maintains the current rate and current exemptions.

We're proposing to merge the Alberta family employment tax credit and the Alberta child tax benefit into one tax credit, which will save on administration and increase benefits to support those who need them most. I will be happy to go into further detail on this legislation when I rise here in the House to speak to the act at a later date.

This being a money bill, Her Honour the Honourable the Lieutenant Governor, having been informed of the contents of this bill, recommends the same to the Assembly. With that, Mr. Speaker, I move first reading of the Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, 2019.

Thank you.

[Motion carried; Bill 20 read a first time]

The Speaker: The hon. President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance.

Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I request leave to introduce Bill 21, the Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019.

Last spring we promised Albertans that we would balance the budget within our current mandate, and that is a promise that we intend to keep. The proposed bill will help us keep that promise by making important changes to several pieces of existing legislation and create new legislation where appropriate. These changes will help government control growth and program spending, eliminate duplication and make government more efficient, effectively oversee and co-ordinate all public-sector collective bargaining, and update current fiscal rules and reporting. Mr. Speaker, we have an obligation to future generations to restore Alberta's fiscal health, and the proposed legislation is an important step we must take.

This being a money bill, Her Honour the Honourable the Lieutenant Governor, having been informed of the contents of this bill, recommends the same to the Assembly. It is with a great sense of pride and purpose that I move first reading of Bill 21, Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019.

[Motion carried; Bill 21 read a first time]

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have two submissions today. One is a letter from a constituent, subject line "Afraid in Lethbridge," referring to the SCS. I have the requisite number of copies.

The second is a newspaper article from the Lethbridge Herald, Police Chief, Mayor Allay Fears to Recent Uptick of Crime in City, again addressing these issues.

Thank you.

3:00

The Speaker: The hon. Member for St. Albert has a tabling.

Ms Renaud: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. I have an article entitled If Alberta Is the Front Line of Climate Change, Young People Are in the Trenches, and this is dated the 24th of this month from the Huffington Post.

The Speaker: Are there any other tablings? The hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you. Yes. I'd like to table an article that's titled Kenney Budget Not Perfect, But at Least It's a Plan. It quotes:

Bravo! Coming after four years in which the NDP ramped up spending, hiring and borrowing in the public sector while the private sector languished in recession, Finance Minister Travis Toews blueprint is a very welcome change.

The Speaker: Are there other tablings?

Seeing none, I do have two tablings today. The first tabling is in accordance with section 28(1) of the Ombudsman Act. I have six of the requisite copies of the Alberta Ombudsman 52nd annual report.

Also, in accordance with section 33(1) of the Public Interest Disclosure (Whistleblower Protection) Act I am tabling the requisite six copies of the Public Interest Commissioner's sixth annual report.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders Third Reading

Bill 202

Child, Youth and Family Enhancement (Protecting Alberta's Children) Amendment Act, 2019

[Debate adjourned October 21: Mrs. Aheer speaking]

The Speaker: Are there any members wishing to join the debate on Bill 202? I see the hon. Member for Livingstone-Macleod.

Mr. Reid: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise in this House today in support of Bill 202, the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement (Protecting Alberta's Children) Amendment Act, 2019.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

It is a measure of how busy the past session was in this piece of legislation, formerly known as Bill 216, because it was not passed by session's end. But I am confident that with the full support of this entire House we can make Bill 202 law as soon as possible.

Madam Speaker, all of us are here to serve our constituents, a responsibility to all Albertans, young and old. As legislators we develop the laws that serve and protect the families of all Albertans to provide a safe, secure present and a safe, secure future. This is why my colleague the Member for Calgary-West has worked so diligently in preparing this bill. I invite my colleagues from all parties to join me in support of these efforts.

What we seek to do through this bill is to aid the protection and rescue of Alberta's children, its very future. This bill works upon the foundation set by the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act by clarifying and enhancing the protections currently enshrined in that law. Currently the law requires adults to contact a director, as defined by section 122(2) of the act, if they are aware of a child that is in need of intervention. Bill 202 would instead direct Albertans to contact a police officer, as not only was the method of contacting a director left vague, but the very definition of a director was ambiguous. This government was elected on a promise to make common-sense decisions, and what makes more sense than to report a suspected crime to a police officer? Just this simple clarification has the potential to save children's lives and to avoid preventable deaths from abuse while a blind eye is turned. Let us all open those eyes.

Sadly, child abuse takes many forms. It can be neglect. It can be emotional, physical, or sexual abuse. It can happen to a child from any background. There are many reasons that abuse can happen in a home, but there are signs that anyone can see. Neglect of a child can be seen. Neglected children often have poor hygiene; their clothes are ripped or torn and look dirty. Neglected children are hungry. They are often underweight and dehydrated because of poor nutrition. The tragedy in this is how strong these kids are because they must struggle. Neglected children often step up around the home, trying to take on the responsibilities of the adults.

Emotional abuse is another common form of child abuse. Children's personalities are deeply impacted by this emotional abuse and the legacy that can carry on through their entire lives. They can develop anxiety and depression. They can be too eager to please, constantly apologizing without reason. They are scared, and they are fearful. They certainly deserve better. Emotionally abusive parents are cruel. They humiliate their children and expose them to behaviour that no one should have to experience.

I've mentioned emotional abuse and neglect. There are signs and behaviours that the children exhibit that we can all see. They can be less obvious for other forms of abuse, like physical and sexual abuse, but we don't need to dwell on them. We all know the difference between a child that scrapes their knee on the playground versus something much more sinister.

Bill 202 is intended to send a clear, unequivocal sign to everyone that there is no place for indifference when children are in danger and that there are consequences that will be enforced on those who stand aside as children suffer. This bill increases the maximum penalty for failing to report an instance of abuse from $2,000 to $10,000 and up to six months in prison. To allow abuse to go unreported is to be complicit in the abuse in and of itself, and we cannot let this occur. Some have wondered if perhaps this goes too far, that a false report does as much damage as an unreported case, but I urge the members to err on the side of responding to every call rather than self-censoring and missing those we need to help.

Let us not think that the provisions of Bill 202 are happening in a vacuum. Day and night there are countless nonprofits and other organizations that work tirelessly to support our children. This government will work just as tirelessly in co-operation with these organizations to ensure that the most vulnerable among us, especially those who form our future, are given the protection and tools they need to succeed.

I urge all of my colleagues in this House, on either side of the aisle, to come together and make this bill law. Do what is right for our province's youth. I thank the member for his tireless work in returning this bill to the Order Paper. I hope that everyone will join me in standing with him and this bill, that adds teeth to our existing legislation.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other members wishing to speak to Bill 202? The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Stony Plain.

Mr. Turton: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm rising in this House today to speak in support of Bill 202, the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement (Protecting Alberta's Children) Amendment Act, 2019. I wish I could also rise in this House to share with you that we do not need legislation like this bill. I hope for a world where the incidents that this bill aims to protect children from are few and far between, but for the children affected by all forms of violence and abuse, this is not the reality.

The difficult truth we must face is that while these crimes against the most vulnerable members of our society are absolutely abhorrent, they are also some of the most undetectable. These crimes are against those that may not have a voice to advocate for themselves. Often the victims of these crimes are not able to put into words what is happening to them. In the cruelest way they are frequently unable to recognize and alert responsible parties to what is happening to them. In this way, justice for these survivors and their situations may never be seen.

Here is where we must step in as a voice for those affected by violence and abuse. As legislators, parents, and mentors to the valued youth and families we interact with across the province, we must do our part in standing up against child abuse, child exploitation, and violence within our families. We must all bear the responsibility of stewarding and protecting the next generation of Albertans, who will fill these halls, walk our streets, raise their own families, and live in our wonderful province. Beyond these obligations, we have the simple human ask of taking care of one another and looking out for one another.

This bill will bolster the importance of our duty to ensuring that children in our province remain safe and cared for. In situations where children are being abused or taken advantage of, a caring and informed adult may be the difference between safety and immediate danger for the child in question. We are all responsible for acting as the eyes and ears and voices for those who cannot advocate for themselves.

Bill 202 makes significant adjustments to standing legislation which will allow us to protect the vulnerable in a more tangible and effective way; namely, through reprimanding bystanders who witness these signs and atrocities. The addition of the requirements for adults to contact police officers and the increased penalties for failing to do so will save lives. We must be driven and determined in our commitment to inspiring actions where we witness signs and symptoms of abuse in the youth and families we interact with on a daily basis. We cannot afford to turn a blind eye to children at risk of abuse.

In recent years there have been repeated instances of children suffering preventable deaths despite warning signs that should have been accounted for by responsible adults. Beyond what is reported by the news media and the horrible stories we hear year after year after year, we have to pay attention to the children that so frequently go under the radar. We have to be here and be aware of their stories and circumstances. Bill 202 will drive adults who witness these warning signs to action and place the importance of reporting and addressing these issues at the forefront of our collective responsibilities.

Some worry about the validity of going to authorities with what they have witnessed. Others have concern about overthinking what they have observed or are hesitant at reporting less than a full picture to police or child welfare agents. I urge members in the House to report what they see and what they bear witness to. In cases of harm against children one act is too many, and it's better to err on the side of overreaction than fail to react at all.

Bill 202 addresses the needs and concerns that many nonprofits and advocacy organizations that work with vulnerable youth have identified to our government. Further to this, Bill 202 will aid in the prosecution and resolution of those who commit these heinous crimes against our youth, better ensuring action for youth who have been impacted by these crimes. There is no question that stands as to the importance of this legislation.

According to the Zebra Child Protection Centre approximately 36 per cent of adults have experienced some form of abuse in their life. Of those supported by the Zebra centre, 90 per cent of children and youth under their care know their offenders. If Bill 202 is effective in saving even one life or makes a difference in permanently changing the course of an at-risk youth's life, then it has fulfilled its mission and purpose. We need to be stepping in and stepping up for one another as being the one adult who cares enough to notice when something is amiss in the life of a child.

I would like to take a moment to acknowledge the tireless work of nonprofits and other organizations across every corner of our province that support our children on their darkest days. The work of supporting and advocating for our youth is undoubtedly exhausting but wholly noble and important. Moving forward, Bill 202 will ensure that this work is not completed in vain and that both action and inaction have meaningful consequences.

You know, I urge everyone in this House to set differences of opinion and difference of perspective aside to do what is right for our youth. The future of these vulnerable young people rests in our hands today. I invite you to take a moment to recognize the weight and importance of the decision we have in front of us, but beyond that, I encourage you to consider the responsibilities we have identified and discussed throughout the presentation of this bill. While I hope for a world where there is no need for a bill of this nature, I fully recognize its necessity and encourage that we stand in this House . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. member, I hesitate to interrupt, but under Standing Order 8(7)(a)(iii), which provides up to five minutes for the sponsor of a private member's bill to close debate, I would like to invite the hon. Member for Calgary-West to close debate on Bill 202.

Mr. Ellis: Well, thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It's humbling. It's been a journey. It's been a several-year journey, you know, to a bill that I believed to be common sense.

You know, I just want to take a moment and thank the young girl who this bill is named for, who was, sadly, murdered. I want to thank her family and the opportunity to get to know her family. I made a promise to Serenity's mom, especially when we were faced with barriers, when she was sitting in the gallery along with family members and the previous government said no to this bill. I told her: I will get this passed. I made a promise to her. I didn't know how, and I didn't know when, but I told her: even if I don't get re-elected, I make this promise to you that in some way I will get this bill passed. I'm proud to sit here today and say that this is a bill that, from my understanding, has the consent of everyone in this House. I look forward to voting on this.

[The Speaker in the chair]

I am proud of all involved. I'm proud of my friends from the previous opposition party when we were there and we fought: my friend from Calgary-Hays, who fought for this, and my friend from Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre and all those of us who were in opposition who knew that this was a bill that was just the right thing to do.

You know, I have so many anecdotal stories about my time as a police officer and the children that I've seen. I've seen things, sadly, that for sure would make a lot of people feel very, very uncomfortable. If I may do so, Mr. Speaker – I know I have a little bit of time here – I do remember a time where I had conducted this traffic stop at about 3 o'clock in the morning. It was a vehicle that matched the description of the person driving, and I remember phoning the RO and talking to this grandmother, and she said that her granddaughter was missing. I remember going to the guy who had the vehicle. I just wanted to know where the little girl was; that was my sole focus. I don't want to get into the nuances of the traffic stop, let's say, but, you know, he told me where the little girl was. She was in a crack house.

I remember saying to my sergeant at the time that I wasn't waiting for the tactical team. I really wasn't waiting for backup. It was just me and my partner. To me, it was a child at risk. I kicked in that door, and sure enough there was a little two-year-old girl surrounded by drugs and alcohol and everything that you imagine a crack house to be. She was there. Her diaper was full. I remember grabbing her, pulling her from that house, and we saved her. There were people in that house. There were users in that house. Of course, the drug dealer knew that she was there. It's unacceptable, Mr. Speaker.

Every adult Albertan is now on notice. No longer will you be able to turn a blind eye to a child who is at risk. No longer will you be able to sit there and say: well, that wasn't my problem. There are consequences. There are consequences for ignoring child abuse. There are consequences for ignoring a person like that little two-year-old girl, who was in such a vulnerable state.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I thank everyone here for the support and kindness you have shown. Thank you.

[The voice vote indicated that the motion for third reading carried]

Motions Other than Government Motions

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Indigenous Consultation on Crown Land Sales

507. Mr. Feehan moved:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly, in recognition of the United Nations declaration on the rights of indigenous peoples and the traditional territory of indigenous peoples, urge the government to undertake robust consultation with indigenous communities prior to the sale of Crown land in northern Alberta and adopt a comprehensive consultation process as a standard for all future proposed Crown land sales.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm very happy to be here in the House this afternoon to speak to this motion. I know that people have had it in documents for some time.

Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I think that we'll be talking a fair amount about the United Nations declaration on the rights of indigenous peoples here over the next hour. I think that many people will know that under the previous government we had adopted the United Nations declaration and that we had given copies of the declaration to every single ministry as well as to all of our partners in the community – Treaty 6, Treaty 7, Treaty 8, the Métis Settlements General Council, the Métis Nation of Alberta, the friendship centres, the Institute for the Advancement of Aboriginal Women, and other groups – and asked all of those people to please look at government rules, regulations, legislation, policies, and practices in order to determine where we were not in line with the United Nations declaration.

As a result of that important work that we did, we were able to create many significant initiatives to enhance the well-being of indigenous people in this province, and it led to things, for example, like being the only province in the country who had put money into bringing clean water to reserves, and also changing the school curriculum; offering training to all 27,000 members of the public service on indigenous histories, traditions, and cultures; and putting money into indigenous language retention in the community, amongst many others. People in the House have heard me mention a number of these things on many occasions. In fact, the list of things that we did to ensure that we were working more closely with the indigenous community was well over a hundred. I'm always happy for people to ask me about that. I certainly would take the time to read a list into the House if people were interested about the many things that we did.

On the other hand, on May 23 I rose in this House to ask the Minister of Indigenous Relations:

Does this government acknowledge the calls to action of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission and the articles of the United Nations declaration on the rights of indigenous people, which outline the right of indigenous people to free, prior, and informed consent with matters regarding their treaty rights outlined in treaties 6, 7, and 8?

At that time the Minister rose in the House, and after some hesitation and perhaps confusion the Minister replied:

Thank you for the question. I'll get back to you.

Here we are now, Mr. Speaker, some 150-plus days since that time he said that he'd get back to us, and we haven't heard a thing.

I think this is a great opportunity for members of the government side of the House to address this neglect of the United Nations declaration on the rights of indigenous peoples. I'm very concerned, however, that what I see coming from the government is not a respect for the United Nations declaration but, rather, a movement away from real and true reconciliation with the indigenous people and a change in policies that would enhance their well-being.

Here I have brought a motion into the House as an attempt to give them very specific action to take on the United Nations declaration. All they have to do is in one hour from now stand up and vote in favour of doing this. I have some concern as to whether or not that will happen given what I saw with the budget on Thursday, in which the Ministry of Indigenous Relations was effectively reduced by about 36 per cent, and of course, you know, my concern that overall the use of the word "reconciliation" by the government side of the House really is only used when they're seeking to co-opt the indigenous community in supporting their plans to provide handouts to their paymasters in Texas and Oklahoma.

But here's an opportunity for us to actually take specific action in this House to do something right, to read the articles of the United Nations declaration and to take very specific action that flows from specific requests by chiefs and councils in northern Alberta to have this kind of legislation in the House. I know, as I was the Minister of Indigenous Relations, both the intent and the specific idea of the motion before us in the House came directly from those chiefs and councils, so I feel somewhat comfortable in suggesting to the House that we should do that.

In order to give us some context here, I wish to read out a couple of the articles of the United Nations declaration so people will understand what it is that we are attempting to do here and what it is that the chiefs and councils are telling us is their expectation in terms of the nature of reconciliation in this province. Article 26 of the United Nations declaration reads that:

1. Indigenous peoples have the right to the lands, territories and resources which they have traditionally owned, occupied or otherwise used or acquired.
2. Indigenous peoples have the right to own, use, develop and control the lands, territories and resources that they possess by reason of traditional ownership or other traditional occupation or use, as well as those which they have otherwise acquired.

3. States shall give legal recognition and protection to these lands, territories and resources. Such recognition shall be conducted with due respect to the customs, traditions and land tenure systems of the indigenous peoples concerned.

Article 27, the next one, is also very important and is readily available in the United Nations declaration. I'd be happy to provide members of the government with copies of the declaration if they'd like. Article 27 reads:

States shall establish and implement, in conjunction with indigenous peoples concerned, a fair, independent, impartial, open and transparent process, giving due recognition to indigenous peoples' laws, traditions, customs and land tenure systems, to recognize and adjudicate the rights of indigenous peoples pertaining to their lands, territories and resources, including those which were traditionally owned or otherwise occupied or used. Indigenous peoples shall have the right to participate in this process.

I think that's very clear, Mr. Speaker, that around the world, as this document has been accepted by nations around the world, this is the expectation of relationships between settler nations and indigenous peoples. I'm very proud to remind the House that those words were largely written here in Alberta by many people, of course, and one of the primary movers being Grand Chief Willie Littlechild, who has been cited as a friend of the Minister of Indigenous Relations on more than one occasion.

So I would hope that there'd be pride in the words written by the very people who are now asking you to support this kind of motion. This is what you've been asked. This has been accepted around the world, and you would be in union with the most progressive, advanced governments around the world if you were to do this. It means that there is a requirement that the government consult with indigenous people prior to making decisions about Crown land sales in treaties 6, 7, and 8.

Unfortunately, I have another piece to address because I've recently received a copy of a letter from Grand Chief Arthur Noskey of Treaty 8, dated October 18, 2019, that expresses serious concern that this government has failed to adhere to the United Nations declaration on the rights of indigenous peoples, which I will of course submit to the House in due time. The letter reads in part:

We expect that no resources will be extracted from Treaty 8 without our free, prior and informed consent and that our Nations will directly benefit from and remain involved in the management and protection of our territories. We also expect the Crown to act in accordance with the spirit and intent of our Treaty relationship, and to fulfill its obligations pursuant to section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. This includes attempting to justify infringements of our Treaty rights, and consulting with us prior to decisions which could affect both our Treaty rights and our unextinguished inherent Aboriginal rights.

The reason for this letter was the discovery by the nations of a request for proposals regarding deciduous timber allocations in the north, which have been ignored by this government.

The Speaker: Are there others wishing to join the debate today on Motion 507? The hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to get up and speak to this motion here today. I guess, first of all, I want to say that I appreciate the intent of what the hon. member is bringing forward here.

I just wanted to talk a little bit about the processes going on right now with indigenous consultation. Indigenous consultation is a distinctive and ongoing process that is initiated in the preplanning stage and continues through the regional plan development process. The government of Alberta recognizes and respects that those indigenous communities that hold constitutionally protected rights are uniquely positioned to inform land-use planning.

The Land Use Secretariat maintains ongoing consultation engagement forums with First Nations and Métis organizations in the South Saskatchewan, North Saskatchewan, lower Athabasca, and north Peace regions. These forums are designed to facilitate early and ongoing consultation on the development and implementation of regional plans as well as land and environmental issues. In accordance with the government of Alberta's First Nations and Métis settlements consultation policy the government consults with First Nations and Métis settlements on decisions that may potentially affect their ability to practise their treaty rights and aboriginal rights.

Mr. Speaker, we also think back here to just a short time ago when this government brought in the indigenous opportunities corporation to provide real opportunity for First Nations to have involvement in resource development. It also, I think, brought real change to the relationship between the Alberta government and First Nations.

Now, I guess, at this time I would like to bring forward an amendment. I want to make sure that the hon. member understands that in bringing forward this amendment, we'd like to ensure that this amendment is representative of the intent of the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

The Speaker: Hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley, if you'd just hold your comments – we'll stop your clock here – so I can grab a copy of the amendment, then I'll ask you to proceed in just a couple of moments.

Please proceed, Member for Central Peace-Notley.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you. I move that Motion Other than Government Motion 507 be amended by striking out “, in recognition of the United Nations declaration on the rights of indigenous peoples and the traditional territory of indigenous peoples, urge the government to undertake robust consultation” and substituting “urge the government to continue robust consultation” and by striking out “Crown land in northern Alberta and adopt a comprehensive consultation process” and substituting “Crown land in Alberta and maintain a comprehensive consultation process.”

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think it's important that what we'd like to do here today is to actually strengthen this motion, and I think we can agree that by making these changes, we have an opportunity to make this motion even better and stronger. Now, never have I doubted the sincerity in the hon. member's care and concern for First Nations – he speaks passionately about them every time he speaks about First Nations in this House – but I think there's an opportunity to make sure that we in Alberta here have control and responsibility of the consultation process and that we don't hand that off to any other organization, that we take ownership of it right here in Alberta. I think we can all agree that consultation should be done across Alberta when we're dealing with public lands, not just northern Alberta, and I think that, obviously, the hon. member would agree with that.

Now, I just want to read article 37(2) from the United Nations declaration on the rights of indigenous peoples. It says, “Nothing in this Declaration may be interpreted as diminishing or eliminating the rights of indigenous peoples contained in treaties, agreements and other constructive arrangements.” I think we would have to agree that we here have agreements. We have constructive arrangements and treaties with the First Nations people. So I think we are quite in line with the intent of the United Nations declaration on the rights of indigenous peoples. I think that if there are any changes we need to do with consultation with First Nations, then we can do that right here in Alberta and in this Legislature.

I would encourage all members and encourage the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford to consider this amendment as a friendly amendment, as something that we hope will help strengthen this motion and help make it more acceptable – I shouldn't say "more acceptable" but, I guess, stronger – and help it as far as helping our processes with indigenous peoples in Alberta.

Thank you.

The Speaker: I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford rising, presumably to speak to the amendment as he's already spoken to the main motion.

Speaker's Ruling Admissibility of Amendments

The Speaker: Hon. members will know that we are in the middle of private members' business, and amendments on private members' business are not as common as otherwise amended motions inside the Assembly. I am reluctant to proceed with debate on an amendment prior to having a sense – in 2007 Speaker Kowalski identified the need for private members' business to, in fact, just be that, so amending a private member's motion is somewhat of a unique circumstance. Some of you may recall, in 2016, when the hon. Member for Calgary-Hays had moved a motion on I believe it was choice in education at the time, and there was some significant discussion around that amendment.

I have reviewed the amendment. Certainly, Parliamentary Counsel would rule that this amendment is, in fact, technically in order as it is not a direct negative. It doesn't change the opposite of the motion. Having said that, it certainly makes some significant changes to what perhaps the member intended when he moved the motion.

All members, including government members, will know that it is the Speaker's job to defend the private members inside this Assembly. All members will also know that private members' motions only come around every number of years. There have been a number of rulings specifically on cases just like this, and I appreciate the hon. member's comments with respect to the intent of the motion and certainly the intent around – I appreciate his comments. Of course, the Speaker is indifferent on the content of the motion, merely the process of the motion today.

I'd like to point out just a couple of ways that this type of situation has been handled in the past, including in March '99, which can be found on page 273 of Alberta Hansard from that day, when the Deputy Speaker actually ruled that an amendment that was inconsistent with the limited amount of time that we have to debate the motion was, in fact, out of order and was not proceeded upon.

I also recognize that the authority to move this type of amendment can be found at 567 of Beauchesne's, sixth edition. To amend a private member's motion must be carefully considered by the chair in terms of content and purpose.

Speaker Kowalski in 2007 ruled on an amendment to a private member's motion, and you can find this ruling on page 351 of Hansard for that day. In considering whether or not to allow that amendment to go forward, Speaker Kowalski went on at some length, as is your Speaker today, it would seem. This is quoting from page 351 of Hansard.

The chair has looked at that, heard the words, and basically is of the view that the amendment does change the intent of the motion.

In keeping with tradition, particularly since 1997, while I've had the privilege of [serving as] your Speaker, a great deal of deference is shown by the chair to the position of private members and the business of private members.

I would like to reiterate Speaker Kowalski's comments that, frankly, I am indifferent to the motion that has been moved here today. In keeping with tradition, particularly since 1997, when he had the privilege of serving as the Speaker, this indifference is important with respect to private members' business.

There's limited opportunity for members to have their motions considered by the Assembly. Even prior to the arrival of [him] . . . in 1993, when major amendments were made to the Standing Orders, there was a spirit of those amendments that the work and the advocacy of [their] private members was to be paramount in the Assembly. Successive Speakers have limited the scope of acceptable amendments to private members' motions so that their intent is not substantially [changed].

He went on to mention the ruling, that I already mentioned, in 1999. At that time, in 2007, the Speaker of the day said:

The solution that the chair would suggest would be that the chair would ask the member for St. Albert, the sponsor of the motion . . .

In this case, obviously, it's the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

. . . to advise whether he is of the view that the amendment is in keeping with the intent of his motion. If he agrees and advises the chair that the amendment is in keeping with [his] intent . . . then the chair would be inclined to allow the amendment to be moved [as presented] and it would be subject to debate and subject to a vote on the floor.

I think that in keeping with the traditions of the Assembly and upholding a private member's ability to move a motion in which they believe in the intent, it would be reasonable for the Assembly to consider the position of Speaker Kowalski when he asked if the private member believed that the amendment would then, in fact, keep with the intent of the motion.

So I put the question to the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford: are you of the opinion that the amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley keeps with the intent of the motion as you, a private member, have provided here in the Assembly today? I am not interested in debate on the amendment, merely on whether or not you believe it keeps with your intent.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm very happy to address the question that you put before me. I can simply say that I do not believe that this reflects my intent as there are two pieces to the motion, both of which have been eliminated by the amendment. I think that the recognition of the United Nations declaration is inherent in the nature of the motion, which has been eliminated by this amendment. Secondly, it suggests that no ongoing, consistent, collaborative framework be established for work in the future but simply maintains the historical record, which, frankly, in this province has not been very strong.

The Speaker: Hon. members, I'm prepared to rule as to whether the amendment is in order or not. Members, it is imperative for your Speaker that we protect the intention of private members' business. While I also appreciate and respect the position that the hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley has taken, he too as a private member has every opportunity to move amendments as they impact private members' business. I think it is also imperative that we keep with the long-standing tradition of not allowing private members' motions to significantly be changed through amendment, for us to be able to debate the intention of each member, and it's my hope that future Speakers will continue to defend this principle and allow motions that have been presented by private members to be debated in the great tradition of our parliamentary democracy.

While I am certain not all members will agree with my decision today, it is my decision to rule the amendment out of order, and we will continue to proceed with the motion as it was presented before the Assembly.

The hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley has seven minutes and 35 seconds remaining in his debate. Is that not correct? Correction: the hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley has four minutes remaining in his debate.

Debate Continued

Mr. Loewen: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I respect your decision there, of course. I am a little disappointed that the hon. member didn't feel that this was in keeping with his motion as far as the intention, because I think what we're talking about here is consultation. When we talk about indigenous consultation and that process that we go through, again, I think that if there was anything that we were lacking, I guess, in Alberta as far as consultation with First Nations, we could have dealt with that just on its own, without a motion like this one here. Now, obviously, if there was anything lacking in consultation, I would have thought that the members opposite would have probably taken care of that in the last four years, when they were in government.

Again, I think it's important to note that there's no lack of desire on this side of the House as far as consultation. We know that consultation with First Nations is important. We know it has to be done appropriately. The process that we have in place now: obviously, the previous government used it, too.

It's important, too, that we in Alberta have unique circumstances here that I think we can recognize, and by having these unique circumstances, I think we can develop and work with over time our consultation process to make sure it's acceptable to all parties. I think we have that opportunity here. We know that it's an ongoing process, and it's done right from the preplanning stage. You know, when it comes to a regional plan development process, it's done in a preplanning stage and continues on.

We know that indigenous communities hold constitutionally protected rights, and we know also that they have unique positions to bring forward when it comes to the consultation and, of course, to land use in their traditional areas. We know we have to respect that. We know we have to have the opportunity for them to be listened to and to have that opportunity to speak freely on what they feel about the processes as they go along and, of course, as the land use is decided.

I'd just kind of go back to what it says in the motion about northern Alberta. I guess that when I look at that, you know, I'm not sure what the intent is here in this motion, where it's going to exclude southern Alberta, western Alberta, eastern Alberta. I don't even know, maybe, what the definition of northern Alberta is. I guess I'm a little concerned that this motion is actually limiting the process of consultation and the importance of consultation as we move forward.

You know, I think we can all agree here today that consultation is important. I think we can all agree that by the amendments that were brought forward, we would be able to have that consultation going forward and actually strengthen that.

Now, if we look at even the Land Use Secretariat, they maintain ongoing consultation and engagement forums with First Nations and Métis organizations, so I think there's a lot of, you know, good consultation going on right now. Do we need to work on it? We need to work on it going forward also.

Thank you.

Speaker's Ruling Admissibility of Amendments

The Speaker: Hon. members, if I could just provide a little bit of clarity with respect to the process moving forward. The amendment that has been circulated, obviously, has been ruled out of order and so, as such, will not be debated on or voted on. We will be voting on Motion 507 as it was read into the record by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford, obviously assuming that no other amendments are moved with respect to that motion that may be slightly different.

With that said, we will proceed on debate, and I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud has risen.

Debate Continued

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise today in support of Motion 507, brought forward by my colleague from Edmonton-Rutherford. I certainly express my wholehearted support for this motion, and I do urge all members in the Assembly to do so as well. I actually think this is an opportunity for the government in particular to demonstrate their true commitment to the United Nations declaration on the rights of indigenous peoples.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

As my colleague from Edmonton-Rutherford indicated, that question was put forward to the Minister of Indigenous Relations. Unfortunately, we have yet to receive a response on that question although I do note that within the platform for the governing party they did express a commitment to UNDRIP, as it's called. Yet we did not hear unequivocal support for that from the Minister of Indigenous Relations. What we are seeing is unequivocal support for the principles set out in UNDRIP as put forward in this motion by my colleague the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

In particular, my colleague put forward a very clear example – and it's a very immediate and current example – of why this is necessary. Why this is necessary is in the letter – I'm just going to carry on from the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford's comments – from Arthur Noskey, who is the chief of Treaty 8. He spoke to the very issue which is the heart of this motion, which is that to date the government has not shown a commitment to reconciliation and to UNDRIP with respect to how it is seeking to dispose of Crown lands in northern Alberta.

In particular, this relates to an RFP that was issued regarding deciduous timber allocations within the territories of the Lubicon Lake and Loon River First Nations. These are not our words; these are actually the words of Chief Noskey from Treaty 8, who sent out this letter, sent it to the government, indicating:

The fact that the RFP includes, in its criteria, consideration of proposals which include Indigenous partnerships, exacerbates this issue. In the absence of respectful consultation, decisions to accept proposals based on the support of individual Indigenous communities is divisive and dishonourable.

That's because, in that context, Chief Noskey is putting forward that there was no consultation done with those First Nations with respect to the RFP that was issued on this land.

So this government has a little bit of work, some work, to do already although only being six months into their term. We've seen the Minister of Indigenous Relations stand up and, you know, express his support and have indigenous members in our gallery and indicate that this government is committed to reconciliation. Yet while they make these grand statements in the House, what we're seeing is that that is not carried through in their actions with respect to disposition of lands and Crown lands and how they are consulting with First Nations.

It would have been preferable to not have to bring this motion forward. The Crown, as it is expected to when dealing in consultation, is expected to act honourably. Had the Crown acted honourably on this issue, the motion would be unnecessary. But I think we are seeing that there is a very clear example of the fact that the First Nations, particularly in northern Alberta, are not feeling like they are being properly consulted with when it comes to the disposition of their lands. I'd put forward again that this government has stated in their platform that they support UNDRIP, but we have not yet had a clear statement of support from the minister.

I can say that with respect to even the budget that we saw rolled out last Thursday, again, it's really easy – and I think governments have done this for centuries in this country and in this province – to give lip service to reconciliation and lip service to treating First Nations and indigenous communities with respect but then doing something else when it comes to actually making decisions. We see that in the budget that was brought forward from this government just last Thursday, a significant rollback with respect to Indigenous Relations. I believe the budget was cut by 10.8 per cent, and at the end of the term of the budget it will be reduced by 17.4 per cent.

Many programs that other ministries offered and that indigenous people were profiting from were also cut. In fact, I'll give an example from my own critic area, which is Children's Services. You know, I note that as part of the business plan for Children's Services under the previous government a commitment to UNDRIP and to reconciliation and to working with indigenous communities was right in the business plan. I think it is quite remarkable that the first business plan issued for Children's Services from this minister is silent. In fact, UNDRIP is removed. In fact, there are very few clear strategies targeted at reconciliation or working with indigenous communities.

Again, I say that it's been very moving to see the Minister of Indigenous Relations come into this House and welcome members from indigenous communities here and raise a red dress in the lobby of the Federal Building, but those are just symbolic actions. What we need to see, what indigenous communities deserve and, in fact, have an entitlement to is true reconciliation and true consultation. We know that that is already not happening.

I think this should be an opportunity, that I hope the government will take, to demonstrate their true commitment to the principles set out in UNDRIP and to establish a comprehensive process. We know that the consultation process that has been carried out thus far with respect to this particular RFP has not been a true consultation process. To suggest that we just need to continue what we're already doing: well, you know, we've got this letter from Chief Noskey saying that, no, you're actually not consulting. So we should not be doing what you've been doing. We should actually enter into true reconciliation and true consultation, which under UNDRIP requires that there is robust consultation with indigenous communities prior to the sale of Crown land and that there needs to be a comprehensive process.

You know, my experience to date with respect to indigenous issues has been when I worked within the Ministry of Education, Alberta Education. I worked with treaty areas 6, 7, and 8 and the federal government on developing a memorandum of understanding with respect to First Nations education in Alberta. I was brand new to that area of work. I can tell you that the very first lesson I learned and the most important lesson I learned was to listen. We all have an obligation to do that, particularly if we're truly talking about reconciliation. We know that that is what indigenous peoples in this province, in this country have been saying for centuries, that it is our obligation to listen, and to listen means true consultation and truly engaging with those communities.

We're hearing that this government is not embarking on true consultation and is not listening to the communities when they're talking about disposing of Crown land. This is an opportunity for the government to recommit itself – they've said it in their platform; they haven't said much since – in a concrete way to reconciliation and to actually listening to indigenous communities and to committing itself to the principles set out in the United Nations declaration on the rights of indigenous peoples.

I am proud to support this motion brought forward by my colleague from Edmonton-Rutherford. I think it is demonstrative of a continuation of the commitment he has demonstrated for years to indigenous peoples in our province and how he fulfilled his obligations as Minister of Indigenous Relations when he was part of cabinet. This is just the continuation of that commitment. I think it would be beneficial for this entire Assembly to commit to those principles set out in UNDRIP in a clear and unequivocal way. I'm proud to vote in support of this motion today.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Minister of Indigenous Relations.

Mr. Wilson: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. Thank you for the opportunity to speak on Motion 507 this afternoon. Thank you to the member opposite for his concern on this issue. The hon. member has crafted a motion that speaks specifically to the government's commitment to consult on Crown land for agricultural land. I've had this conversation with indigenous leaders who are also concerned about how Crown lands could be used, especially as it concerns treaty rights or traditional use of lands, and I can appreciate that concern.

Our government has been clear about our priorities: jobs, economy, and pipelines. Budget 2019 confirms those priorities, but it does another thing, too, Madam Speaker. It manifests a commitment to indigenous peoples as partners in Alberta's prosperity through initiatives like the Alberta indigenous opportunities corporation and our litigation fund. We're solidifying a commitment to reconciliation by paving the path with real actions that will help more indigenous communities benefit from Alberta's renewed economy. The reality is that the policies and legislation by successive governments have kept these communities dependent by restricting their opportunities for economic security. I would like to explore this motion from the perspective of partnerships and prosperity with indigenous communities.

Madam Speaker, Alberta is good at many things, and one of them is upholding the duty to consult. My ministry, as the hon. member knows, has the aboriginal consultation office, which is dedicated to working with land-based indigenous communities and industry members to be sure there is appropriate consultation on development projects that could disturb the land in ways that affect treaty settlement rights. We go further by also considering traditional uses and Métis settlement members' harvesting or traditional use activities. We consult with First Nations and Métis settlements before making decisions on land and natural resource management. This is vital, especially when community members depend on hunting, fishing, and trapping in order to survive. Yes, this is a constitutional right, and it is a matter of dignity and of worth.

I and my staff have worked hard and continue to work hard to earn and hold the trust of indigenous leaders even while having the courage to make difficult decisions for the future of everyone in this province. Reviewing or creating protocol agreements was one of the first actions we embarked on, Madam Speaker, and we are upholding our framework agreements with the Métis people as well. Why did we organize a full government-to-government meeting with First Nation chiefs in June, not even 50 days into this government's mandate? It's because our commitment is strong.

We are moving forward as partners. When the Premier announced Bill 14, the Alberta Indigenous Opportunities Corporation Act, he was surrounded by indigenous government and business leaders. Do you know why that was, Madam Speaker? Because they want to be partners with this government, because they know we are willing to move beyond the rhetoric to take real action so that indigenous people can truly be partners in prosperity.

With respect to the hon. member and his motion, this government's practice is robust consultation with indigenous communities when their rights and uses could be harmed. Every land sale and exchange transaction does include an assessment about whether consultation needs to happen before decisions are made. Madam Speaker, the Supreme Court made a decision in the Mikisew Cree First Nation versus Canada case clarifying a requirement for consultation where there is taking up of Crown land upon which First Nations have access to exercise treaty rights. Being able to exercise these rights is a part of a community's prosperity, and we want to be sure that they have a chance to take it even further through opportunities to participate as owners and investors of major natural resource development projects.

My colleague the hon. Minister of Environment and Parks is responsible for administering Crown land for sales for agriculture. His ministry has established processes to assess and determine consultation requirements about this kind of land sale. His staff work with my staff, and they seek advice from the constitutional and aboriginal law team with the Ministry of Justice and the Solicitor General. Madam Speaker, we have processes in place. This government is committed to honouring our constitutional obligations, which include the duty to consult, and we will always ensure that Alberta fulfills its duties under the honour of the Crown to consult with First Nations and Métis settlements. Moreover, our government is strongly advocating for a consultation process that provides clear timelines and legal certainty for project proponents to promote economic development. We are working to strengthen the consultation process to consider support from indigenous communities for projects that affect them.

We respect First Nations' efforts to urge the federal government to work collaboratively on matters that concern them. One of our platform commitments is to advocate for the federal government to pursue a consultation framework and policy that aligns with Alberta's nation-leading consultation policy. In this way, Canada will be encouraged to continue its path towards economic reconciliation while fostering investor confidence and legal certainty.

This motion is another attempt by the opposition to bring forward an issue that they promised but failed to address in the previous government. The NDP campaigned on implementing the United Nations declaration on the rights of indigenous peoples in 2015 but failed to implement it because of the inherent concerns on how it would impact Alberta's economy.

The fact is that our policies and practices already align with UNDRIP insofar as we seek input from indigenous communities prior to making any decisions on land and natural resource management. We are deeply committed to our relationship with the indigenous people of this province. We continue to uphold our government's constitutional obligation to consult with indigenous peoples, and we are committed to the mutual prosperity of indigenous peoples alongside all Albertans. Although I agree with the intent of the motion, we do consult with all indigenous peoples, not just in northern Alberta, so that's why I'll be voting against this.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other members wishing to speak to the motion? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker and to the mover, my colleague from Edmonton-Rutherford, for bringing forward this important debate for consideration today. I'm going to try to step back a little bit from where we are and just tell a little bit about – first of all, I think that most people know northern Alberta when they're in it. I think that if anyone is concerned about how to define northern Alberta, certainly the Northern Alberta Development Council has a region that it's responsible for. That's a government agency that's been created. There are definitely folks that receive a northern living allowance. I think that we have many times where we've defined the north.

I actually don't think we need to worry about defining the north or about whether or not the north is enough. I think that what we're debating today is whether or not to pass this motion, which speaks specifically to one region, northern Alberta. Certainly, it would be becoming of the government if they chose to expand it even further than that, as the Member for Central Peace-Notley spoke to earlier. It would certainly not be in breach of this motion to exercise the same practice in other parts of the province. But I don't think that we need to debate what is northern Alberta and what isn't northern Alberta. I think there are lots of folks that have defined that in the past.

Again, I want to go back to what brought this about, and that was in December 2018 the great concern and frustration felt by many folks in northern Alberta around blanket statements about selling Crown land without acknowledging the treaties that that land is a part of and without acknowledging the UN declaration on the rights of indigenous peoples. For those points, I think that the wording of the motion is certainly appropriate for us to be considering here today.

I grew up – many of you have probably heard, but I'll tell you one more time – in Kinuso in northern Alberta, about 50 kilometres west of Slave Lake, just south of the southern shore of Lesser Slave Lake. The neighbouring First Nation is Swan River First Nation. I literally could see Swan River from my house. We spent a lot of time between Kinuso and Swan River as students engaging with one another. Part of the history of Kinuso, as I understand it – and if I'm wrong, I'd be happy to have Alberta historians set the record straight for me – is that the railway line was supposed to run along the north shore of Lesser Slave Lake. It was going to stop at Grouard. Grouard was actually set to become the provincial capital, so rather than Edmonton being the provincial capital, Grouard was supposed to be the provincial capital.

But when the railway came through – there are a bunch of stories about what the political motivations were, what the personal and economic motivations were. They decided instead to go along the south flank of the lake, not exactly along the lake but south along much of the lake. As a result, Swan River had a railway come through the middle of the First Nation, and Kinuso later was established as a provincial settlement to serve that region. This is one example back in history of why consultation is so important. The fact that there failed to be consultation, from, again, the reports that I received growing up in the community over those many years, is exactly why the geography of that part of the province came into existence. Whether or not it was the right decision, it was a decision that was made. But I think there are opportunities for us to reflect on how we make decisions and how best to live up to an international standard, that being the UN declaration on the rights of indigenous peoples, something that was an international standard that's been set and that indigenous people in leadership positions across Alberta have told us is important for us to achieve here in the province of Alberta.

I also want to say that the traditional right to harvest and to engage with Crown land is something that I don't take lightly and that I know the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford doesn't take lightly, and that's why he brought forward this motion. The fact that he has wording in it that specifically speaks to achieving the standard of the declaration and having fair and thorough consultation I think is absolutely critical.

I think that if the government wants to achieve what they put on the cover of many documents around jobs, economy, and pipelines, if they do it in conflict with indigenous communities and with indigenous people, it won't get us to the finish line. I think that the only way that we achieve those outcomes is by following the letter of the law, following the intent of declarations like UNDRIP, and making sure that we work in full partnership. I think that the more we see governments choose to make announcements without actually considering the legal and very real consequences of breaking treaties or breaking the UN declaration or breaking other established pieces of law, we will put ourselves in a more vulnerable position on those three pieces, that seem to be part of the focus of this government at this time.

For those reasons, I'm really proud to support the motion brought forward by my colleague the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other members wishing to speak to the motion? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Perfect. Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm proud as well to rise to speak to this motion. I just have to point out as well that I'm so proud to support the work of my colleague the MLA for Edmonton-Rutherford. You know, I wasn't, obviously, in government in the last term, but I was able to see his work as our Indigenous Relations minister and just how passionate he was about it, and he continues to be passionate in his current role.

One of the things that I want to talk about is just the importance of the United Nations declaration on the rights of indigenous peoples. I worked for years with Alberta Education, and I was really, really proud of the NDP government's work at the time to ensure that UNDRIP was fully implemented across ministries. I know there was a lot – a lot – of work that went into that, a very clear analysis. In Alberta Education we looked at the role of UNDRIP as well as the commitments to the Truth and Reconciliation Commission in the areas of curriculum, for instance, and of course in the areas of First Nations, Métis, and Inuit education. My world was curriculum, and I was really proud to just see the movement that we were making on this.

As we saw from the amendment that was introduced, I'm a little bit worried that some of that work is very much in jeopardy. As my colleague from Edmonton-Whitemud pointed out, we're seeing references to UNDRIP being dropped in various ministries. I haven't done a full analysis across ministries, but knowing that it's already been dropped in Children's Services is alarming. A quick scan of the Indigenous Relations business plan pointed out that it's in there once, which I think is a shift as well from previous business plans. I'm quite concerned about that.

I want to as well refer to the letter that my colleague from Edmonton-Rutherford pointed out. This was from Chief Arthur Noskey, the grand chief of Treaty 8. He points out: we expect that no resources will be extracted from Treaty 8 without our free, prior, and informed consent. He goes on to talk about the importance of, you know, a nation-to-nation relationship. We've heard this government talking a lot about the importance of consultation and relationships and really building a commitment together, yet we're already seeing – this letter is dated October 18, by the way. We know that the Alberta indigenous opportunities corporation was announced just prior to this letter, so just days – just days, mere days – after the conversations around the AIOC, the Treaty 8 grand chief and some of the other nations are feeling rejected, feeling neglected by this government. This should be quite concerning to all members of this House.

I'm not going to speak too much longer on this, but I really want to just hammer home the point that this government speaks a big game about consultation; it's time to prove it. This government speaks a big game about reconciliation; it's time to prove it. They've said multiple times recently in this House that they're focused on indigenous economic opportunities and true partnerships; it's time to prove it.

One of the things as we go into budget consultations here: we have seen a significant reduction in the Indigenous Relations ministry's budget. My colleague from Edmonton-Rutherford can speak a lot more about this, but so many of the programs that the NDP government was so proud to put forward, including everything under the indigenous climate leadership plan, are now either cancelled or in jeopardy. I find it curious that, you know, again, this government opposite speaks this big game, yet all the actions they've taken since this minister rose in the House and spoke about reconciliation and his commitments have proven otherwise.

I think that by supporting this motion, they'll be able to mend some of those relationships and show that they really are committed to reconciliation and consultation. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other members wishing to speak to the motion? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Member Loyola: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I want to applaud the work of the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford because, of course, he's been so incredibly dedicated to issues involving indigenous people in the province of Alberta when he was Minister of Indigenous Relations and now continues to work on exactly that, being in opposition.

I want to applaud him for that because he's very dedicated to a very important principle, and that is maintaining relationships with indigenous people. The reason why I bring that up specifically is because for far too long historically, not only here in the province of Alberta but across this great land, the relationship with indigenous people has been a paternalistic one. Even the imposition of governance of chiefs and councils was one imposed by the nation of Canada or, better stated, by the Crown on indigenous people even before Canada was a nation. This is something that's so important to understand because, within that whole historical perspective, the relationship that existed not only was a paternalistic one, but it was also one that marginalized people.

I would be remiss to remind this entire House that the whole reservation system imposed here in Canada was one that was attempted to be redone in South Africa under the apartheid system. I want us all to think about that for a second.

Now, of course, historically speaking, when the treaties were signed – and I'll put a parenthesis in there. I've spoken to so many indigenous members of different communities. When you bring up the treaty, it's kind of a love-hate relationship with the treaty. Of course, the treaty that was signed on to by so many indigenous communities and by the Crown has so many great things written inside of it. But at the same time, those same members of the community will tell you that those treaties were never upheld or respected.

That's what UNDRIP is really all about. UNDRIP attempts to rectify the fact that these treaties, although idealistic in nature in what is written within them and what was agreed upon by representatives of these communities, were never actually upheld. Because of that, indigenous people had to organize on a world scale, and I'm not just talking about here in Canada or even the United States. Indigenous people organized all over the world, went to the United Nations and decided, worked feverishly to really understand and really establish how their rights could be respected and, through the body that is known as the United Nations, developed what we now know as the United Nations declaration on the rights of indigenous peoples.

It just seems so awkward and strange to me that this government and, historically speaking, traditionally Conservative governments regularly do not want to recognize declarations made by the United Nations. I don't know why. We're talking about individuals that have worked all over the world to really understand how the rights of individuals could be respected and not only the rights of individuals but the rights of communities, of groups. Now, I understand that within the Conservative framework and mindset and perspective they stand up wholeheartedly when it comes to the rights of the individual, and that's to be applauded. It's great. It's wonderful. But also within human rights are the collective rights of communities.

Indigenous people have a different perspective than those who carry a more Eurocentric perspective of rights, and that has to do with the rights of communities, and it starts with the right of the land. Now, indigenous communities – maybe you've heard it before; maybe you haven't – don't think of ownership of the land held by people because the relationship that exists spiritually, a cosmological understanding of the relationship that exists between people and the land, is actually one that has nothing to do with ownership. It's a reciprocal relationship, one where we don't own the land, but in fact it's Mother Earth that has more control over us as people than we have over her. This kind of really turns the whole Eurocentric perspective upon its head, head over heels. Now, we may not agree with it, but that doesn't mean that we cannot choose to at least listen to indigenous people and choose to understand the perspective from which they are coming. I personally really like the perspective of indigenous people of not really owning the land.

You know, we've seen this come through lately, more and more, through communities here, not only in the province of Alberta but all over North America, this whole understanding of stewardship, that we have a responsibility to take care of the land. This is something that I believe has come through that indigenous cosmology and understanding and perspective and has been shared with so many communities around the world. Now we can all share in this perspective: okay; if you want to say that you own that piece of land, you own it, but more important than owning that piece of land, you have the responsibility of taking care of it and making sure that people will be able to continue to live on it for generations.

Again I want to applaud the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford for his continued work and advocacy on all of this. I would just like to finish by saying to all members of this House: please support this motion. Let's continue to look more deep into this and what we can do to actually work with indigenous communities as has been described in the United Nations declaration on the rights of indigenous peoples. Please support this motion.

Thank you.

4:40

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. government whip.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I'd like to propose a motion to move to one-minute bells not only for this vote but for the remainder of the afternoon as well.

[Motion carried]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday.

Mr. Carson: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It is an honour to rise to speak to Motion Other than Government Motion 507, of course, proposed by the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford. I just want to quickly go over this again.

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly, in recognition of the United Nations declaration on the rights of indigenous peoples and the traditional territory of indigenous peoples, urge the government to undertake robust consultation with indigenous communities prior to the sale of Crown land . . . and adopt a comprehensive consultation process as a standard for all future proposed Crown land [sites].

I think that is a very reasonable motion, a motion that I plan to support.

I would also just like to take a moment to thank the Speaker for ruling the previous amendment to this motion out of order because I do believe that it completely changed the intent of this motion before us. Thank you for that.

I did also just want to point out, not specifically concerns with that amendment but something that was said by the Member for Central Peace-Notley and the fact that just looking at the Alberta Indigenous Opportunities Corporation Act and that member's statement that – I don't have the Blues in front of me, but it was essentially that things have gotten a lot better since this new government has come in because of the program like the Alberta Indigenous Opportunities Corporation Act. I take great concern with that because we have not actually seen how that program has rolled out, first of all.

Second of all, we have not seen any money within the 2019 budget committed to that program, and that was a concern that was brought up by the Beaver First Nation chief in conversations with the media recently as this budget rolled out, I believe. In the Toronto Sun it quoted that chief saying: we knew it was coming, the budget was coming; just like the universities were ready, we're ready, and that's why we can never have a true relationship with the province . . .

The Deputy Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt, hon. member, but under Standing Order 8(3), which provides up to five minutes for the sponsor of a motion other than government motion to close debate, I would like to invite the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford to close debate on Motion 507.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to close debate. I really, truly appreciate the opportunity to have private members' bills brought forward, and I would like to thank the Speaker for protecting that great tradition here in the House from assault by the government side. I'm glad that we're here actually debating the motion as put forward.

I did have an opportunity to listen to some of the comments from the other side of the House. I'm afraid that the minister said a number of things that I thought could be misinterpreted by listeners who are acquainted with the facts, so I think that we need to spend a little bit of time being really clear that consultation as it is happening in the province today with regard to land sales is not adequate. We have letters from the chief here indicating what their concerns were because, for example, in this case, this one particular incident which he refers to, there was no consultation at all. I think that to suggest that we have a robust process as it exists right now is inaccurate, as demonstrated by the comments made by the chiefs in the northern communities.

I just want to, you know, talk about the fact that they have a reason to be concerned. There have been previous land sales in the north under the Conservative government where there was no consultation whatsoever, which is why I'm bringing this forward. I am reflecting the things that I was told repeatedly as Minister of Indigenous Relations. Essentially, the history of the Conservative government has been to break the trust of the indigenous peoples.

The previous land sales that occurred did occur in the area surrounding the Dene, the Beaver, the Tallcree, the Little Red First Nations without any consultation at all, and they had a lot of effect on those communities because the loss of the land was significant in their ability to engage in the practices which they've been doing since time immemorial. It was significant for hunting, for the gathering of medicines, for engaging in teaching and ceremony. The land is now turned into farmland, which denies the indigenous people the right of entry and significantly intrudes on the landscape not only for the indigenous people, of course, but for the wildlife that use that land: the deer, the moose, the caribou, and other animals.

It's very much a concern here because if this land is taken out of Crown land, then we have a problem where not only are we not consulting appropriately with indigenous people – they are telling us that we are not consulting appropriately – but it also affects their ability to fulfill their treaty land entitlements, and we know that there are some that are presently being pursued in northern Alberta.

Under the natural resources transfer acts you can only transfer lands for treaty land entitlement that are unencumbered, and this province is about to encumber a bunch of land. That means that land that should be considered first and primarily for First Nations to fulfill our obligations under the NRTA are being taken out of consideration, making it impossible for them to fulfill their rights here in this province, and I'm very concerned about that.

I know that the minister mentioned that we do have the ACO, the aboriginal consultation office, but he did not remind the audience, the people that are listening, that the ACO does not consult on land sales. Now, the fact that he brought up the ACO I think is important because what we're saying here is that we should have a robust process for consultation on land sales when we already know we have a consultation process with regard to resource development. It was mentioned by the minister himself for that exact purpose, so we know what a proper consultation process is. We know that indigenous people are given an opportunity to respond to concerns and to have their voices heard in a very particular, defined protocol. We know that does not occur for land sales, so to suggest that somehow land sales are covered by the ACO or by a process even close to the ACO process is perhaps a bit of playing with the truth as we know it.

I would like to suggest to this government that it is important that they take this to heart, that they adopt the United Nations declaration and that they develop a robust process.

[The voice vote indicated that Motion Other than Government Motion 507 lost]

[Several members rose calling for a division. The division bell was rung at 4:50 p.m.]

[Motion Other than Government Motion 507 lost]

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mrs. Pitt in the chair]

The Chair: Hon. members, I would like to call the Committee of the Whole to order.

Bill 18 Electricity Statutes (Capacity Market Termination) Amendment Act, 2019

The Chair: Are there any more speakers? The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I'm pleased to rise and have another opportunity to speak to Bill 18. I think I last spoke to this bill in an amendment. With respect to my position on the bill, I think I laid it out there, but I'll lay it out here again. I am definitely not in favour.

I think, again, the reasons I've laid out for not being in favour of this bill are that this creates a market that is significantly more volatile, and that's problematic for people. It's not just that it's going to cost people more overall to move back to the energy-only market. It's that it also increases unpredictability. If you're a family struggling to make it by, which a lot of people right up to the middle class are these days, it can be a real challenge to have that kind of volatility because it makes it very challenging to budget when you don't know what you're going to expect in terms of your electricity costs. In the past, with the energy-only market, we've seen some fairly wild fluctuations. Certainly, the advice that we received – again, the department officials were very, very good, and I'm sure the same goes here in terms of briefing folks on this – is that that volatility was only going to increase as time went on. So I think that that's a real concern.

I know that energy markets seem like a thing that's incredibly complicated, but that's why we're here to do this work. That's why we're to do this work as government, in part to communicate to the public about what it is that's occurring in this place. This bill takes us from a capacity market, which is the standard in North America. It's really only Texas that has this energy-only market remaining in terms of North American jurisdictions, of which there are, obviously, a significant number. There's a reason for that. It's because it costs more, and it's because of the volatility.

I think that what frustrates me about this is that it's attempting to be sold as competition, but it isn't actually a competition. It's the illusion of competition because, as is taught still to this day, I imagine, in most introductory economic courses, electricity tends to be a natural monopoly because of the incredibly high cost of investing in the infrastructure. That tends to create amalgamations; it doesn't tend to create competition, which is what it's taught as an example of. The electricity market is taught as an example of a natural monopoly because it's sort of a market failure because the cost to get into the market is so very high.

In fact, that is the case in Alberta, or at least it was previously in the energy-only market. Essentially, the folks that retail it are buying from – we've added another level, so we don't actually have that much competition amongst those who generate. The competition is sort of illusory in the sense that it's just the retailers that are permitted to sell the power that are buying it from exactly the same source, so their sort of ability to impact the price is pretty limited. I think that that's a big concern.

You know, if we're selling this as, "Hooray. Competition," well, that's not really what it is. Like I've said, one of the things that concerns me about this is the way the contracts were signed, the fact that they were hidden, and the fact that they contain a guaranteed rate of interest which is accessible only to some and not to others, which is always something that frustrates me about the world. When certain folks who have access to more capital or who have more access to more money or had the right connections happen to have access to a higher rate of interest or a special deal compared to other people, that bothers me. It always has bothered me. It's one of the reasons I got into this. That is the frustration. The frustration is that this is illusory competition. There's a reason it's not like this in any other North American jurisdiction except Texas, and this will hurt the bottom line for families.

I think that the people who are doing their best with the income they have to get by, which is increasingly difficult because of increasing income inequality, shouldn't be punished with fluctuating electricity rates. They shouldn't be punished with situations in which their electricity bill may go up a couple of hundred dollars in a month because people aren't prepared to plan for that. I feel like we should reward people for planning in that way and not punish them with higher electricity rates.

Of course, one of the other challenges with this – I've focused sort of mostly on the financial implications in terms of volatility. Certainly, we had an amendment on the floor, that we were hoping the government would support, which at least prevented individuals from doing that intentionally. Unfortunately, I don't think that survived. One of the other challenges is that we get rolling brownouts and blackouts, which is a huge concern in terms of deregulation. So not only is it the case that people will have unpredictable power bills; they'll also have unpredictable power. I think that, you know, in this day and age electricity is no longer a luxury. I don't think that it has been for quite a long time. Our lives and almost everything about them rely on the presence of electricity. It is important to us to be able to turn on the light and know that it will go on.

You know, there have been a couple of case studies on Texas, obviously. They experienced brownouts in 2011, 2014, and 2015, as well as rolling blackouts in 2011. This resulted in consumers not necessarily having power every day on a bunch of different days. They had a price of $438 on June 25, and the next day, on June 26, it maxed out at $3,000 a megawatt hour. It's pretty big. When I'm talking about volatility, this is pretty intense volatility that we're dealing with, so I think that that is a huge concern.

I mean, overall, people need the ability to be able to plan their lives. They need to know that their electricity will be there. They need to know what price they're going to pay for it, or at least within a reasonable range what price they're going to pay for it. I think that that's really important. I think that this bill is taking us in the wrong direction, and I would urge all members to vote against it.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to the bill?

The hon. Official Opposition House Leader.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I proudly represent the riding of Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview but as well equally appreciate the position that has been bestowed upon me to act as House leader on behalf of the opposition.

I rise to speak to Bill 18. As no surprise to members in this House, there are quite a few concerns that I have in changing the course that our government laid out, moving Alberta from a capacity market back to an energy-only market. For context – and I'm sure that much of what I'm going to say members have already heard – I think it's important to reiterate. Alberta is only one of two jurisdictions in North America that have an energy-only market: Alberta and Texas. Every other state and province in this country has a capacity market, and that's for a number of reasons, Madam Chair. We know that a capacity market actually provides consumers with more stability as far as prices for their electricity.

Part of what we did when our government started the transition of Alberta going off an energy-only market to a capacity market is that we brought in legislation to put a price cap on electricity rates. Really, what we're trying to avoid here are price spikes but also rolling brownouts. Anyone who's lived in this province for more than a handful of years will have experienced the rolling brownouts that have occurred throughout the province. That's something that I know frustrates not only, you know, Alberta individuals and their families, but it also has a significant impact on business and on the economy. One of the ways to ensure that there is sustainable electricity and that it's reliable is through a capacity market.

Now, I know, again, that some of my colleagues, I'm sure, have talked at length about the value of a capacity market, recognizing that this is where it came from. You know, on the record, obviously, Madam Chair, the decision to move to a capacity market from an energy-only market wasn't a decision that was made as a political decision. It wasn't a decision made by the NDP caucus. This was after consulting with many different industry experts from the AESO to others, including industry themselves saying: we definitely need more stability in our electricity system. Ensuring that there's a reasonable cost to customers is something, the AESO said, that the capacity market is better at delivering, that consistency, less volatility. There's less incentive to hedge prices, which, of course, can happen in an energy-only market. Capacity markets are based on market-based structures, so their incentives are for price competitiveness, which, again, is important, that those savings get passed on to Albertans.

I'm going to speak a little more at length here, Madam Chair, but I would like to propose an amendment. I have the appropriate number of copies. Of course, the top copy is the original. That will come to you shortly.

The Chair: Thank you, hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview. Just give us a moment to get the amendment.

Okay. This will be known as amendment A2. Just for all hon. members' sake, there are two pages to this amendment.

Mr. Bilous: Correct. Thank you, Madam Chair. I'll read it into the record to give our pages a chance to ensure that members can get this into their hands to look at. Correct; it is two pages. I'll read the amendment, and then I'll make my comments.

I'm moving this amendment on behalf of the hon. Member for Calgary-McCall. This amendment states that he moves that Bill 18, the Electricity Statutes (Capacity Market Termination) Amendment Act, 2019, be amended in section 2

(a) in subsection (3) by striking out clause (b) and substituting the following:

(b) by repealing clause (c.1) and substituting the following:
(c.1) to ensure that a reliable supply of electricity is available at reasonable cost to customers.

(b) in subsection (5) by striking out clause (a) and substituting the following:

(a) by repealing subsection (1) and substituting the following:

Duty to act responsibly

16(1) the Independent Systems Operator must exercise its powers and carry out its duties, responsibilities and functions in a timely manner that is fair and responsible to provide for

(a) the safe, reliable and economic operation of the interconnected electric system,

(b) the promotion of a fair, efficient and openly competitive electricity market, and

(c) the reliable supply of electricity available at reasonable cost to customers.

(c) in subsection (8)(a) by striking out subclause (i) and substituting the following:

(i) by striking out clause (a) and substituting the following:

(a) that the ISO rule

(i) is not technically deficient,

(ii) supports the fair, efficient, and openly competitive operation of the electricity market,

(iii) ensures a reliable supply of electricity is available at a reasonable cost to customers, and

(iv) is in the public interest.

(d) in subsection (17)

(i) in clause (a)(iii), in the proposed section 25(1)(b) by adding the following after subclause (ii):

(ii.1) that the ISO rule does not support ensuring a reliable supply of electricity is available at reasonable cost to customers;

(ii) in clause (b) in the proposed section 25(1.1) by adding the following after clause (b):

(b.1) that the ISO rule does not support ensuring a reliable supply of electricity is available at reasonable cost to consumers;

(iii) in clause (d) in the proposed section 25(4.1) by striking out "or" at the end of clause (b) and by adding the following after clause (b):

(b.1) that the ISO rule does not support ensuring a reliable supply of electricity is available at a reasonable cost to customers, or

(iv) in clause (e) in the proposed section 25(4.11) by striking out "or" at the end of the clause (b) and by adding the following after clause (b):

(b.1) that the ISO rule does not support ensuring a reliable supply of electricity is available at a reasonable cost to customers.

Now, Madam Chair, if you're wondering – and I appreciate that members are looking at this amendment for the first time. It can be challenging to flip through the bill, so I'm happy to speak to this.

Essentially, what we're doing is that Bill 18 in its current form would strike out that our electricity market has the goal of a reliable supply of electricity and that it's available at a reasonable cost. So we want to ensure that that gets put in. It's been a part of legislation that has governed Alberta's electricity system. It was in the past, quite frankly, even under the energy-only market. We incorporated it into our transition to a capacity market, and my hope is that the government meant to include this and didn't.

Again, you know, I've been on the other side. I appreciate that sometimes things get missed. Quite frankly, this is why we are in this place and why it's important to have a healthy, robust debate, and one of the roles of the opposition is to say: hey, folks; you missed this one part which, again, is critical because this helps direct the ISO to ensure that there is a reliable supply of electricity for Albertans and that it's available at a reasonable cost. We know that, obviously, we need electricity in all corners of the province. It's relied on for everything from our schools and hospitals to our businesses, to our communities, and, obviously, our homes and families. That gives the AESO the ability that, should prices spike, they can intervene, which I think is quite critical, Madam Chair. It's consistent with government changes. It is not changing the direction of this bill.

We know, as other members have spoken, that energy-only markets can lead to price spikes and to rolling blackouts, and we just want to make sure that the market can guarantee a reliable supply of electricity and that it's available at a reasonable cost. Again, this fits with the spirit, I believe, of what this bill is proposing. It's a simple amendment to ensure that we are protecting Albertans, that we are asking the government to consider. At the end of the day, I appreciate that the government believes that an energy-only market is the best form of an electricity system for consumers, for businesses, so what this does, sticking with that spirit – again, we may disagree on that, where I'm a fan of a capacity market, but recognizing that they want to move to an energy-only market, this codifies the reason behind legislating or moving back to an energy-only market, ensuring that there is reliable electricity for Albertans available at a reasonable cost.

For those reasons, I encourage all members of the Assembly to vote in favour of this amendment. Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Any members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you, and thank you for the amendment. We just are receiving it now. When we conducted the review of the capacity market, we asked stakeholders for three things: to tell us which system gives us the most affordable electricity market, the most reliable, and the one that would attract investment the most. Our proposal and our bill is weighing and balancing all three of those things.

We have also asked the AESO to report back to us with a series of improvements to the energy-only market, things that will actually make the energy market perform better. I think that's what this amendment is seeking to do, telling us how the energy-only market could perform better. We've asked for a thorough review with thorough recommendations coming from the AESO, so at this point I wouldn't support this amendment. I don't recall the stakeholders asking for these specific changes at this time. At this point we've got a whole comprehensive set of proposals to come back from the AESO on how to improve that market, and I'd like to see that process unfold with some policy changes and some policy direction and some advice on how to make it perform the best possible.

Thank you.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. Might I put for your consideration, through to the minister, because it sounds like she's not opposed to what's being proposed here – she just doesn't know that it would be helpful in the long run – that rather than voting against it, perhaps there would be an opportunity to consider this with more time, certainly moving to adjourn and going to another piece or something else. It didn't sound like the minister thought that this would be counter to what she's hoping to achieve. I just want to put that out for reflection while I give my other comments on this.

My notes have been taken from me, but I will get them back. I want to say how – certainly, the electricity team that came to brief us at cabinet over and over and over again spent a considerable amount of time walking us through the pros and cons of the various markets and the importance of having stable, predictable power, affordable rates, and reliability.

As was mentioned by colleagues, only Edmonton and Texas have the market system that is being proposed through this bill and is being considered again. I have a number of concerns about whether or not that will result in significant increases to costs. It seems almost certain that it will be based on all of the briefings that we had from folks both within the public sector and outside stakeholders. There also are concerns about whether or not we'll see brownout conditions, that we saw previously and that other jurisdictions, including Texas, see in extreme weather, which is certainly a safety risk.

Rushing to blow up what was a very thorough consultation and research around this to move forward with a new model, without knowing whether or not we will have those implications, I think, doesn't benefit Alberta consumers. I think it certainly would behoove us to take the time to do the consideration of the proposed amendment and to ensure that we are indeed – if the minister and her entire cabinet, the caucus, and all members of this House indeed do believe that this is the best model moving forward, I think it would behoove us to have the time to consider whether or not these amendments are indeed counter to the intention of the bill. I think that they certainly could benefit that goal of stability and affordability.

I have to say that the amendment puts this language in to make sure that Albertans know that their electricity market should provide “a reliable supply of electricity [that's] available at reasonable cost.” I know that for many folks that I did talk to about electricity costs, those were the two things that they were hoping to achieve. While sometimes those conversations focused around a price on carbon and its impact on electricity rates, certainly throwing the system into disarray would also result in higher costs. Making sure that we have the addition of a reliable supply of electricity at a reasonable cost, I think, is important.

The amendment also changes the language from “capacity market” to “electricity market” around these sections, so it's consistent with the government's changes, something, again, that I think probably was their intention and that just didn't make it in through the amendments. I'm happy to provide that through our proposed amendment. We know energy-only markets can lead to those price spikes that we mentioned.

Again, I get it. This is a massive piece of legislation with a lot of changes, so taking the time to be able to consider this amendment, particularly around some of the wording not being consistent with the actual wording and intention of the government's own bill, I think, would be warranted for consideration. We certainly want to make sure that we have a market that guarantees a reliable supply for all Albertans.

We know that we've heard about a lot of things happening through the budget that will drive up costs on ordinary families in a number of areas. We've talked about insurance rates on vehicles. We've talked about land transfers when you're registering a land title, those costs doubling. We've talked about the fact – or maybe we haven't talked about it yet – that there's a line item in the business plan about $100 million more in school fees, essentially. I think that the language is: “Revenue from sources other than government.” So school fees are going up. We know that there are going to be increased fees for folks who are on drug plans and in other areas.

I think one of the ways that we could certainly give some greater certainty to Albertans at this time would be to take this amendment into consideration, act on it, and make sure that we actually do move forward with the focus of a reliable supply at a reasonable cost. That's the rationale for this, and that's the motivation for bringing forward these amendments. If the government has had time to consider how they might be able to move on this, because certainly they aren't counter to what I believe their intention was, particularly in the language of saying “energy-only market” as opposed to – sorry; my brain is having a hard time catching up to me at this time – the other market model . . .

Mr. Bilous: Capacity.

Ms Hoffman: Capacity. Thank you, my colleague from Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Certainly, getting the language right in the government's own bill, I think, would be of benefit to improving this legislation and the way it is.

Those are some of the key points that I wanted to raise in regard to this debate. Thank you.

Mr. van Dijken: Madam Speaker, the Committee of the Whole has had under consideration a certain bill. The committee reports the following bill: Bill 18. I wish to table copies of all amendments considered by the Committee of the Whole on this date for the official records of the Assembly.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, does the Assembly concur in the report? Those in favour, please say aye.

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Deputy Speaker: Those opposed, please say no. Carried.

The hon. Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm pleased to advise that pursuant to Government Motion 31 there shall be no evening sitting tonight, and I therefore move to adjourn the House until tomorrow afternoon at 1:30.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 5:30 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Tuesday, October 29, 2019

Prayers

The Speaker: Hon. members, the prayer. Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and to her government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideas but, laying aside all private interests and prejudices, keep in mind their responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all. Amen.

Please be seated.

Introduction of Visitors

The Speaker: Hon. members, joining us today in the Speaker's gallery are guests of the hon. Minister of Health: Manitoba's Minister of Health, Seniors and Active Living, the Hon. Cameron Friesen; accompanied today by Tara Jago; and Nathan Clark. Welcome to our fair province.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: This afternoon in the galleries we have two school groups. Joining us today from Morinville-St. Albert, guests of the Associate Minister of Natural Gas, are students in grades 6 and 9 from the Legal school. Also with us today from Edmonton-Mill Woods are grade 9 students from the Millwoods Christian school. Please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Members' Statements

The Speaker: Welcome to the hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Arts and Culture Industries

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to stand up for the arts and culture community. In my role as the culture critic I've had the opportunity to reach out to stakeholders across the province in varying industries. Their stories are incredible. In those meetings I heard concerns and fears about the potential cuts affecting the culture ministry from this UCP government. After last week's budget address my office has been inundated with questions, concerns, and fears regarding the now imminent cuts to the ministry of culture.

Despite these doom-and-gloom days I want to highlight the incredible work being done across this province. In our communities many families and individuals are embracing and learning about culture, heritage, and diversity in many different venues and mediums. So many in the industry are on the front line of providing safe spaces for Albertans and visitors to learn about the arts, culture, and our history. The work is so important and so impactful. Working to tell the stories of Alberta involves time, research, and a human touch to make it relevant to today's audiences. I want everyone in the arts and culture community to know that their work is positively impacting Albertans, specifically the next generation. Hearing how our little ones are learning about art and culture and having a safe place to ask these questions is incredible.

In closing, I want to extend an invitation to everyone in the arts and culture community that I am here as your advocate for culture. My door is always open, and I will stand with you to fight to preserve and empower the arts and culture community here in Alberta.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Sherwood Park has the call.

Budget 2019

Mr. Walker: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last week Albertans were presented with something novel, a reasonable and credible plan to balance Alberta's budget. It's refreshing to see our government take fiscal responsibility seriously and present a realistic plan to get our fiscal house in order.

Years of fiscal mismanagement have led us to a serious financial situation. The mountain of government debt accumulated in the last few years means that we now spend almost $2 billion annually on our debts. The signs were there, Mr. Speaker: deficit after deficit, credit downgrade after credit downgrade, tax hikes that collected fewer taxes. Nothing went according to the so-called plan. Investors were scared away and jobs disappeared, making life worse for Albertans. The old, tired, tax-and-spend ways of the past just don't work anymore. We needed a more realistic approach to budgeting.

Budget 2019 is a budget we can all be proud of. It lives within our means while caring for those who need our support. It reflects the true desire of this government to stand up for Alberta. It uses investment in the true sense of the word, targeting realistic opportunities with a measurable return on investment. We will have better and smarter public services that deliver for Albertans after years of overspending, with mixed results in return.

The budget tabled last week is a reasonable, measured approach, Mr. Speaker. It protects our cherished health care and education systems. Essential social services are also supported. While my opponents across the way make over-the-top claims about the budget, I've heard from many of my constituents, saying how reasonable it is. What government can't afford 3 cents on the dollar?

Mr. Speaker, unlike others, this government is up to the challenge.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat would like to make a statement.

Education and Health Care Funding

Mr. Barnes: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Following the introduction of our first budget the Twitter trolls rapidly spread misinformation in an effort to create divisiveness in our province. I am not at all surprised that they have been echoed by the members opposite. It is true that this budget is not anything like that of the former NDP government. We actually understand the importance of living within our means while simultaneously improving results.

Now, the Twitter trolls and the NDP would have you thinking that we have removed funding from the public school system to support religious schools. That is not the case, Mr. Speaker. The former NDP government spent $396 million to support students in private, private ECS, charter, home-schooling, and alternative education. Our government has maintained that level of funding and has boosted it by investing another $4 million in order to support enrolment growth while holding public school funding steady. Our campaign platform promised Albertans that we would not cut public or private education, and this budget commits to just that. Let me be clear. Our government did not increase spending for private schools by $400 million. We increased the amount spent by $4 million to support enrolment growth.

But it doesn't end there, Mr. Speaker. The NDP and Twitter trolls would also have you believe that we cut health care. The fact of the matter is that investments in public health care went up by $200 million. But we also promised Albertans that we would find efficiencies in how we deliver our public health care services while improving outcomes. Any reductions in certain departments were because of efficiencies, and that money has been reallocated to focus on patients, not managers that manage managers. We promised to maintain or increase spending in health care, and that is exactly what we are doing. We promised to find efficiencies in how we deliver health care so that we can better serve Albertans, and this budget reflects that.

The Speaker: I recognize the hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Agriculture and Forestry Funding

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As critic for Agriculture and Forestry I was very disappointed to see the budget on Thursday and learn what the government was planning for our agriculture and forestry industry. But from the unending-cuts-and-pain party this is what we have come to expect: unending cuts and unending pain; all pain, no economic gain; a 9.1 per cent cut in one year and 15 per cent over four years for one of our biggest industries. That is a big hit and totally unnecessary. Agriculture and Forestry, like every other ministry, is being pillaged to finance the UCP government's $4.7 billion corporate tax giveaway.

We have seen austerity economics fail repeatedly. A recent example was Saskatchewan, which decided to cut while Alberta decided to invest. The result was clear. In 2017 Saskatchewan grew only half as fast as Alberta.

Something that concerns me a lot is the cut to scientists in Agriculture and Forestry and the lack of commitment to take action on climate change. The budget cuts the government's ability to produce its own research on important issues to our agricultural industries. This opposition to science we see throughout the budget and is very concerning. Science should not be the victim of the government's $4.7 billion tax giveaway to profitable corporations. Then, again, we should not be surprised. It is what we have seen from the Harper Conservatives, who strategically muzzled scientists, causing all of Canada to fall behind on important research fronts. Unlimited cuts and pain once again, Mr. Speaker.

This decision will have negative impacts on our agricultural communities and producers in the years to come. I hope that the government reverses course and supports science, but unfortunately, from what we have seen from this government, they will likely just keep their ears plugged to concerned Albertans and continue to downgrade the role of science in their decision-making processes. A sad period in Alberta's history indeed: unlimited cuts and pain, no economic gain.

Mother Earth's Children's Charter School

Ms Issik: Mr. Speaker, in late June I visited the Mother Earth's Children's Charter School, which opened its doors in 2003 and serves the children of the Paul First Nation and other communities. As Canada's only indigenous charter school it has a unique cultural approach to teaching and learning. Founded on traditional indigenous teachings, it creates strong, confident indigenous learners. It features a robust academic program tailored to individual student needs, offering student enrichment opportunities to explore art, music, archery, karate, golf, and many more. Mother Earth's Children's Charter School provides substantial opportunity to its student body, which averages around 85 students all the way from kindergarten to grade 9.

While there I heard stories of students participating in these activities and also growing closer to their cultural roots through participation in cultural ceremonies and events. The school is not only unique for its foundation on indigenous teachings, which instills an appreciation for Mother Earth and the Creator, but also for the innovative funding model supporting the school. The Mother Earth's Children's Charter School is supported by both federal and provincial governments and also by corporations, who support the school's nutrition program and transportation for students. Through this partnership model Mother Earth's Children's Charter School is able to transport students to school and provide an important nutrition program without charging additional fees.

School choice allows parents to choose the educational setting that will best support their children and give them the best opportunity for success. For many indigenous families that school is Mother Earth's Children's Charter School. In the spring I spoke about the amazing example of Connect Charter School and how they demonstrate the success of school choice. Now I hope, with the excellent example of the success of Mother Earth's Children's Charter School, that other members of this Assembly can see that school choice is essential to Alberta and essential to our children.

Seniors and Budget 2019

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I have always made it a priority to connect with all of my constituents and hear their concerns, regardless of how old they are, where they come from, how much money they make, or who they love. I believe it's especially important that I listen to our seniors, who worked so hard to build this great province and who deserve to live in dignity and respect.

Last night I had the opportunity to attend a resident and family council meeting at the Eaux Claires seniors' facility in Edmonton-Decore. I have to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that this government's bait-and-switch budget has a lot of people, especially our most vulnerable, feeling scared and betrayed. I heard from residents who are worried about how deindexing AISH would cut into their financial independence, leaving them isolated. I spoke with residents who are deeply concerned that high turnover rates among front-line staff will get worse and worse, hurting their quality of care. I heard from folks who are scared that changes to the Alberta seniors' benefit program may force them to have to choose between getting the prescriptions they need and getting enough food to eat. I talked to family members who don't know how they'll be able to support their parents now that personal income taxes will rise with deindexing. We are still weeks away from debating this government's budget plan, and the very people that built this province are terrified at how much it could hurt them.

This government campaigned on making life easier for Albertans, but then released a budget that will make life more expensive for the most vulnerable of Albertans. This government campaigned on jobs and the economy, but has seen more than 27,000 jobs disappear since they took office. This is a government that promised to reduce government waste and red tape, but has allocated $10 million to a brand new ministry dedicated to cutting red tape. Tragically ironic, isn't it?

This is a government that needs to explain to Albertans why they continue to break the promises they were so boastful of over the summer. Our seniors and all Albertans deserve that at the very least.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo.

Syncrude Milestone

Mr. Yao: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I think about Syncrude celebrating the production of 3 billion barrels of oil from one of the world's largest energy deposits, I think about what that has meant for my nation. Because, you see, it doesn't just benefit my constituency. Within my constituency lines alone, though, there are over 2 million barrels of oil a day being produced. This equates to approximately $40 million a day, or $14.6 billion annually.

If we look at the jobs that the energy sector in my community creates, well, there are a lot. During peak turnaround there are over 30,000 workers flying in and out of my region. That's over 20,000 jobs here in Alberta alone, and the other third comes from the rest of Canada.

Of those over 10,000 workers that fly in from our confederation, about 4,300 are from British Columbia. Eleven hundred are from Ontario. Newfoundland has about 1,200. Nova Scotia has over 800 workers flying in, and New Brunswick has over 600 commuters coming back and forth. For an industry that is being shunned by other provinces of our nation, it sure benefits those very same provinces.

At an average salary of $100,000, and, Mr. Speaker, I do lowball that number, Ontario is making $110 million in salary claims when these folks are reporting to Revenue Canada. B.C. residents are claiming $430 million. This is money that, after taxes are paid, is being spent on mortgages, on food, on education, and on common and luxury items.

Don't forget the spillover jobs, Mr. Speaker, those peripheral jobs created, because these folks are spending that money in their local stores and on services. We must not forget the taxes that Albertans pay that are being rerouted to the rest of the nation under our current equalization formulas.

Thank you, Syncrude, for your investment in our resource, in our people, and in our nation. Let's hope you can continue to succeed to benefit all Canadians despite our federal Liberal government.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-West has a statement to make.

Serenity's Law

Mr. Ellis: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my honour to rise today and address this Chamber.

As you know, my private member's bill, Bill 202, was passed in this House yesterday afternoon. Bill 202 is an amendment to the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act. It is also known as Serenity's law. This bill is named after the young girl, Serenity, whose life was taken from us far too soon.

Bill 202 represents a promise I made to her mother, and it is a promise I am proud to keep. The bill makes two key changes to existing legislation. First, it clarifies that anyone who has reasonable and probable grounds to believe that a child is in need of intervention must report it to a director or a police officer. By adding the option of a police officer, this fundamental change will enshrine an existing practice into law. Second, this bill increases the consequences for those who fail to report. Serenity's law will provide clarity on who to report to and the consequences of not reporting.

This bill sends a clear message to all Albertans that we cannot turn a blind eye if we suspect that a child is in need of intervention. It will also ensure that Albertans are held accountable for the protection of our most vulnerable children. I have said it before, and I will say it again, Mr. Speaker, if this amendment saves the life of even one child in this province, then surely it was worth it.

Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleagues on both sides of this House for supporting this bill. This has been a long journey, and when I spoke with Serenity's mom last night to tell her about the passing of this law, she was filled with emotion and gratitude.

The passage of Serenity's law is indeed bittersweet. This family may never get the justice that they deserve, but I am proud to say that Serenity's legacy will be one of hope for the vulnerable children in our province. The children of Alberta are safer today, Mr. Speaker, than they were yesterday, and that can only be viewed as a step in the right direction.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Budget 2019 and Federal Policies

Mr. Toor: Mr. Speaker, I rise today to thank the Finance minister for tabling our United Conservative government's first budget last Thursday. The budget outlined our priorities for getting Alberta's fiscal house back in order while maintaining the service Albertans rely upon.

Unfortunately, in the same week as the Finance minister released his prudent fiscal plan, Canadians in the other regions decided to re-elect the Trudeau Liberals in Ottawa. The Liberal fiscal plan can be summed up in a single word: spend – running multibillion-dollar deficits when they promised to balance the books, robbing future generations to pay for the reckless spending of today.

Bill Morneau and Justin Trudeau provide a lesson in fiscal mismanagement. Albertans are keenly aware of the lack of support for the hard-working men and women of the oil patch. Their pipeline laws make it impossible to build new pipelines.

Mr. Speaker, there couldn't be a bigger difference between our government and the federal Liberal government of Justin Trudeau. While we make responsible decisions to protect our vital public services and grow the economy, I am afraid that they will simply continue to spend our children's future. While we cut red tape and try to bring investment back to our energy sector, I am afraid that they will continue to drive it away. And while we fight for our country and our critical economic interests, I am afraid that they will continue to divide by setting regions against regions and provinces against provinces.

So I want to thank the Finance minister and the Premier for their leadership. I know that despite a hostile federal government in Ottawa, Alberta's best days still lie ahead. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The Leader of the Official Opposition.

Tax Policy

Ms Notley: Yesterday the Premier did not seem aware of the statements made by Husky Energy, so allow me to brief him. On July 25 they told their shareholders that the corporate tax cut meant more than $230 million in their coffers. Last week Husky's CEO said: we really appreciate it. But instead of investing here, they said that they would be investing in Newfoundland and Wisconsin because taxes are not the issue. To the Premier: why did he give $233 million away to subsidize investment to Newfoundland and Wisconsin?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, this government has given no subsidies to Husky or any other oil company or any other company, for that matter. What the NDP did was that they raised business taxes by 20 per cent, and guess what? We got billions less in revenue, in fact,

$8 billion less in revenue than they had projected following their corporate tax hike, clear evidence that their class-warfare economics hurt Alberta jobs. Economists project that the job-creation tax cut when fully implemented will create 55,000 full-time, private-sector jobs. That's our focus: creating jobs for Albertans.

Ms Notley: Well, according to Husky they got $230 million from this Premier, so they should probably get their stories in order.

The reckless $4.7 billion corporate handout is a failure, and Albertans are paying for it. No jobs; in fact, at Husky hundreds fewer. No investment. Just higher income taxes for everybody. Mr. Speaker, again: why are we handing over $230 million to be invested elsewhere, and why are Albertans paying for it as, what the Premier calls, an insidious higher personal income tax?

Mr. Kenney: You know, Mr. Speaker, whenever the NDP talks about tax relief constituting a giveaway, what does that really say? It says a lot about their socialist ideology. They think the government has a prior claim on every dollar earned by somebody and every dollar generated by an employer. Now, they continue to make up numbers. As Professor Tombe at the U of C has said, "the $4.5 billion claim . . . is a real puzzle. It is demonstrably misleading. (I'd say false)." Even on national television the NDP leader was humiliated and corrected with that falsehood. She should just stop.

Ms Notley: Well, this Premier's $4.7 billion corporate handout is not working. Right now we should be shipping oil by rail; we should be ending production cuts; we should be seeing higher royalties. Instead, we have a budget that cuts funding for school buses just so companies like Husky can spend it in the U.S., which, coincidentally, helps to pay for school buses there. To the Premier: how much longer are you going to make Albertans subsidize investments outside of Alberta?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, the economic illiteracy that is implicit in that question demonstrates why that Premier is the first Premier in the history of this province to have been fired by voters after just one term because of the economic and jobs crisis that she helped to create in part by raising taxes on employers. Now, we're not able to undo all of their damage overnight. In fact, today the business tax rate is still higher than when the NDP came to office. But over time, prudently but with determination, we will demonstrate that this is the best place in North America in which to invest and create new jobs.

The Speaker: The hon. the Leader of the Official Opposition for her second set of questions.

Calgary Police Service Funding

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, not so prudently, he will make Alberta's kids pay for a major corporate handout to wealthy corporations. That's what he's going to do. But he is also doing the exact opposite of what he promised in other areas. He promised lower taxes. He promised more police. But guess what? Everyone's income taxes are going up. Calgary's property taxes are going up, and get this: Calgary is about to lose the equivalent of 130 police officers because of this government's ticket clawback. To the Premier: why are you forcing Calgarians to pay more property taxes?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, wrong, wrong, wrong. There is no reduction in provincial transfers to municipalities for police. I certainly hope there are no property tax increases because, I can say as a Calgarian, I know that Calgarians expect their city council and mayor to live within the means of taxpayers. For years both municipal and provincial spending has grown faster than our population, faster than inflation, and faster than economic growth. Families and small businesses have had to find savings. It's time that governments at all levels did the same.

Ms Notley: You know, Mr. Speaker, this government's budget is in writing. When they say things that are not included in the budget, people can tell that they are saying things that are not true. They promised 500 more police, but we're getting 130 less. At the same time they're now charging the police for forensic testing, a user fee for doing their jobs and catching criminals. Good Lord. When push comes to shove, the Law and Order Party is more interested in big handouts to big corporations than actually protecting citizens. To the Premier: why did you table a budget that cuts police in Calgary?

Mr. Kenney: We did not, Mr. Speaker. There are no handouts to any corporations. What there is is a fiscal crisis, according to NDP former Finance minister Dr. MacKinnon – a fiscal crisis. It is incumbent on the leader of the NDP to tell us: what is the alternative? How much higher would she allow the debt to go? How many billions would she be prepared to waste on interest payments? Whose taxes would she be prepared to raise? How many jobs would she be prepared to kill with those tax increases? They were supposed to table an alternate budget, but they haven't. They chickened out because they're not prepared to be honest in answering those questions.

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, what we won't do is claw back $13 million from Calgary's police when we promised them more police. Now, the Member for Calgary-Cross has actually spoken this month about the devastating crime wave in northeast Calgary, but this Premier's answer is to cut 130 officers. This comes after CPS has already done its part to cut costs by reducing training and trimming its fleet. These officers put their lives on the line every day to protect us. Will the Premier reverse the cuts? Read the budget, figure out what you did, get your guy to tell you what he did, and actually change these decisions.

Mr. Kenney: Sounds like a playground over there again, Mr. Speaker: no respect for this place, no respect for taxpayers, no respect for the fiscal future of this province. I just challenged the NDP to tell us: what would they do in the midst of this fiscal crisis? By how much more would they raise the debt? How much more are they prepared to borrow to pay the interest on the debt? How many billions are they prepared to take from schools, hospitals, police, and infrastructure to send to bondholders in Zurich, Toronto, and New York? I can tell you what the answer for this government is. We are going to bring our finances back under order with a modest and smart plan this budget. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order. The Leader of the Official Opposition will come to order.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

Calgary LRT Green Line Funding

Member Ceci: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Building Calgary's green line will create 20,000 badly needed construction jobs in that city, yet the Premier has raided the budget for this crucial Calgary project to pay for the $4.7 billion corporate handout that has created no jobs. Mayor Nenshi now says that the project is in jeopardy. To the Premier: do you realize how damaging it is to Calgary's construction sector to cut this project?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, it's not being cut. The funds from the province are being reprofiled into future years. The province maintains its commitment. But if Alberta's worst Finance minister in history wants to know who is responsible for the 2.8 per cent reduction in this budget then, to coin a phrase, he should look in the mirror.

Member Ceci: I actually supported Calgary and its infrastructure. This Premier is forcing the city to delay the green line, which will create millions of dollars in unnecessary costs for Calgary taxpayers and delay employment for tens of thousands of Calgary workers. The Premier has touted himself as a champion of the green line in the past but has done nothing to back up his claim since taking office. To the Premier. This is crucial economic infrastructure, and we need to be building the green line now. Why can't you understand that?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, classic NDP: he started by saying, in question 1, that it was being cancelled; then he changed it to "delayed." Neither is true. The federal cash will allow the city to proceed with its current construction schedule, and our reprofiling in future years will allow us to achieve a balanced budget, which is urgently needed because that member quadrupled Alberta's debt, from $13 billion to $62 billion. He oversaw six credit downgrades. He jacked up our interest payments by 1 and a half billion dollars. He had us on track for $100 billion in debt. He ran the largest per capita deficit in the country. He's responsible.

Member Ceci: There are emergency council meetings in municipalities all over the province because of that government, Mr. Speaker.

Stage 1 of the green line would carry more than 60,000 Calgarians per day, rising to about a quarter million trips per day when complete. It is a critical project, and now it's in jeopardy. This government has also raided money that was meant for highway upgrades in Calgary for its failed no-jobs corporate handout. Premier, what do you have to say to Calgarians who've been left stuck in traffic for hours instead of spending quality time at home with their families?

Mr. Kenney: Well, Mr. Speaker, what I have to say to Calgarians is that I as a federal minister committed a billion and a half dollars to the green line in 2015, that was supposed to run 46 kilometres from the far north to the far southeast. It took the NDP government four years to finally make an equivalent fiscal commitment of a billion and a half dollars for half as much rail, half as many people served. They cut the green line in half. That's classic NDP economics. We're going to make sure the transit is there in a way that's affordable for taxpayers.

Ms Phillips: Mr. Speaker, on track to $100 billion in debt, $93 billion to be exact; the deficit is up $2 billion over last year; the budget is not balanced for years into the future; 2 million Albertans will pay more in personal income taxes than they did last year: why won't the Premier fire the worst Finance minister in Alberta history? [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order. The opposition will come to order.

Mr. Kenney: Because we already did last April, Mr. Speaker. [interjections] Biggest deficit in Canada, $60 billion in new debt, six credit downgrades, on track for $100 billion in debt, higher taxes on everything – the carbon tax, higher income taxes, higher taxes on employers, higher property taxes – a jobs crisis, the worst economic record since the Great Depression: that's why we fired him in April. [interjections]

Speaker's Ruling Oral Question Period Practices

The Speaker: Order. I can assure the Official Opposition that I'll be more than happy to call the government to order at the end of their 35 seconds, which is exactly what happened to the Official Opposition mere moments ago. I don't need your help. Thank you very much. I am very capable of doing the job on my own.

Ms Phillips: A Finance minister that hiked personal income tax for every single taxpaying Albertan, a Finance minister that brings in his deficit $2 billion higher than the NDP, yet all these backbenchers are going to have to explain cuts to food banks, arenas, pools, cops, roads, bridges. They will have to explain to each of their constituents why their taxes went up. He's racking up debt and deficits so he can pay for the billions in giveaways to the already wealthy that are detailed on page 144 of the budget. When is the cabinet shuffle, Mr. Premier?

Mr. Kenney: Our deficit, Mr. Speaker? When I was briefed the day after the last election, when that guy was fired by Alberta voters, guess what? I was told by our public service that he and they had overprojected revenues by $6 billion. They left taxpayers holding the bag. This government is cleaning up their mess, including their disastrous deal on crude by rail. The private sector has doubled its shipments without a dollar of public money at risk. This government is committed to getting our finances in order so that we can preserve our public services in the long run.

Ms Phillips: Well, the average family will pay $150 more per year in taxes, and the Premier said yesterday that he is a, quote, tax-cutting government, so is the Finance minister prepared to resign – he has undermined his own Premier – or are the folks over there going to continue to lie to Albertans about their high-debt, high-deficit, high-taxes, zero-services budget travesty?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Point of order.

The Speaker: I recognize that a point of order has been called at 2:06 in the afternoon.

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, this Finance minister has inherited the worst fiscal crisis in this province since the Great Depression. This Finance minister, even in that context, took great care, working with his colleagues, to develop a modest, thoughtful, and prudent approach that finds 3 cents on the dollar of savings. This is unbelievable. The histrionics from the NDP tell us that they don't even think it's possible to find 3 pennies of savings on the dollar. That's why they had the worst fiscal record in our history. We're cleaning up their mess with determination.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Calgary-South East.

Investment in Alberta

Mr. Jones: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. For too long oil investment has been leaving our province in favour of other jurisdictions that have become increasingly competitive with taxes and regulation. In 2014 Alberta was ranked 14th out of 156 jurisdictions in terms of investment climate, first being the best. Unfortunately, Alberta dropped to below 40th on this ranking under the previous NDP government. To the Minister of Economic Development, Trade and Tourism: are we beginning to see more confidence and interest in investing in Alberta with the change to a government that actually supports the energy sector?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Economic Development, Trade and Tourism.

Ms Fir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. It is true that there was a great flight of capital from our province under the NDP and that our competitiveness took a blow thanks to their job-killing policies. Our government has taken action to increase our province's competitiveness by repealing the NDP's job-killing carbon tax and through our job-creation tax cut, which will benefit over 100,000 companies, and our red tape reduction measures.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-South East.

Mr. Jones: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Minister.

Given that billions of dollars have left our province's oil and gas sector – in 2018 it was reported that investment had fallen by 12 per cent in 2017 alone, equivalent to over $20 billion – and given that it is our government's priority to see Albertans return to work by reattracting economic investment to our energy sector and given that executives of companies that left Alberta pointed to previous government policies and tax increases as one of the main obstacles to staying, can the minister please explain to this House what our government is doing to bring investment and jobs back to Alberta?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Economic Development, Trade and Tourism.

Ms Fir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and again thank you to the member. As I previously mentioned, our government has already taken several measures to attract investment back to Alberta, and we see results already, with Telus making the largest investment announcement in our province's history, $16 billion, which will create 5,000 jobs. A few other measures include changes that will allow municipalities to attract investment through tax incentives, and we stabilized the royalty regime for natural gas companies.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Jones: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you again, Minister. Given that Alberta is more than just energy and given that it is prudent to work towards a sustainable and diversified economy and given that private investment is critical to helping Alberta come out of this serious economic downturn, that the previous NDP government's disastrous policies intensified, can the minister please report on what is being done by this government to attract investments and what other industries we are looking to attract? [interjection]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. minister.

Ms Fir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you to the member for their interest. Our government is taking action to grow investment in all sectors of the economy. That is what our tax reduction and red tape removal measures have been designed to do. My department will also be investing $75 million over three years in attracting investment to Alberta, growing our economy, and protecting the taxpayer. The NDP drove investment out of our province, and we were hired by Albertans to clean up their mess.

2:10 Edmonton Infrastructure Funding

Mr. Dang: Mr. Speaker, this Premier declared that his Minister of Municipal Affairs would be a voice for Edmonton at the cabinet table. He is the lone member of the government in this city. But now, in my and his constituencies, residents are shocked and devastated that this minister put a halt to plans for Terwillegar Drive expansions, has cut more than $150 million annually from city infrastructure funding. To the Minister of Municipal Affairs and the MLA for Edmonton-South West: why have you failed the residents of our constituencies and the city of Edmonton?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Municipal Affairs, working with the Minister of Finance, managed to develop a budget plan that solves the fiscal crisis that we inherited from the NDP while continuing to maintain the highest level of capital spending and provincial transfers to municipalities of any province in Canada, while maintaining $686 million of capital grants to Edmonton. With the gas tax transfer, that's $1 billion to the city of Edmonton. We're going from the highest support for municipalities in the country to the highest level of support . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It looks like, just like in cabinet, the minister is being benched again.

Given that it would appear that not only does the Minister of Municipal Affairs not have the ear of the Premier, he also has no sway over his fellow ministers – the Minister of Infrastructure has delayed the opening of the south Edmonton hospital; the Minister of Education won't commit to a new and badly needed south Edmonton high school – to the Minister of Municipal Affairs and MLA for Edmonton-South West: is it that you aren't speaking up for Edmonton and for your constituents, or is it that your colleagues aren't listening?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs will answer in just a moment, but the hon. member will know that we're past question 4, and that is a very clear use of a preamble. If he chooses to do it again, we'll move immediately to the answer.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-South West and Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. Madu: Thank you so much, Mr. Speaker. Let me enlighten this Member for Edmonton-South: $3.25 billion in overall capital funding commitment to the city from our government. We are supporting projects at the U of A, the Stollery, the Jubilee, the Royal Alberta Museum. We are building the Norwood long-term care facility, moving forward on Big Island provincial park, and so much more. We are delivering for Edmonton, and while I understand that this member is currently chasing shadows, we will stand up for Edmonton.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. But that's not what municipalities say.

Given that members of Edmonton city . . .

The Speaker: I'm pretty certain that I, immediately prior to the question, gave you a very clear explanation that a preamble would not be accepted. You are testing to find out if that's the case. A question begins with "given." You can create a question following the rules. Let's see if you can do that now.

Mr. Dang: Mr. Speaker, given that members of Edmonton city council are warning that cuts to operating and capital spending could spur another recession and given that the lone Edmonton minister in the government cabinet is the Minister of Municipal Affairs, to the same minister: why is it that you have completely failed to deal with these affairs and represent your own constituency?

The Speaker: Well done.

The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. Madu: Thank you so much, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, I will not be lectured by this member, who was part of a government that led economic policies that devastated our entire province. If any member in this particular House ought to be ashamed, I think it should be that particular member, who helped, when they were in government, pursue policies that saw more than 200,000 of our fellow citizens out of work. It was the same members opposite, you know, that pursued policies that left us on a path to $100 billion in debt. This side of the House will not be lectured by that member.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Timber Allocations within First Nations Territories

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On October 18 the grand chief of Treaty 8 wrote to the Agriculture and Forestry minister to express surprise and great concern that the ministry had issued an RFP for the sale of timber allocation within the territories of Lubicon Lake and Loon River First Nations. The grand chief writes, "We will not stand by while your government takes steps to give away the resources in our territories without our involvement or consent." The grand chief calls on the minister to suspend the RFP. Will the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry do this? Yes or no?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry has the call.

Mr. Dreeshen: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member opposite. We have an open, competitive process when it comes to forest management areas in the province of Alberta, and we're open to all different types of investment opportunities that are forthcoming. I've mentioned to them and to others the great leadership and work that the minister of aboriginal affairs has done as leading to the aboriginal opportunities fund. It is something that's a great opportunity for indigenous people here in the province of Alberta, to be able to be partners in prosperity and develop our great resources that we have here in the province of Alberta.

Mr. Feehan: I have a copy of the United Nations declaration that I'll send to your office.

Given that the Minister of Indigenous Relations recently said in the House, "It's time . . . to do the right thing, to show indigenous communities respect instead of patronizing their path to prosperity," and given that these First Nations are demanding respect and control over their own economic resources, will the Minister of Indigenous Relations actually do the right thing and urge his cabinet colleagues to immediately call off this RFP, or were all his fine speeches in this place just patronizing words?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Dreeshen: Thank you again, Mr. Speaker. Again I'd just like to reiterate the partnerships, the leadership that this government is actually taking, actions to partner with our aboriginal partners here in the province of Alberta versus the fake rhetoric that came from the previous government. We're not just speaking in hollow words or terminology; we're actually taking concrete economic actions to be able to partner with aboriginal groups here in the province of Alberta with our forestry sector. It's great. The economic opportunities that we have in our forestry sector are amazing. There are tens of thousands of Albertans employed by this industry, and we're going to continue that great work.

Mr. Feehan: They'll do anything for the community except for listen to them, apparently.

Given that this government only yesterday voted down a motion that I introduced that would have called for First Nations to be consulted before the sale of Crown land and given that this government is disregarding the wishes of the Lubicon Lake and Loon River First Nations regarding their own resources, again to the Minister of Indigenous Relations: is this complete disregard for nations' treaty rights what reconciliation looks like to you?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, let's be clear. It already is the process for the Alberta government to consult when it comes to any Crown land sales, including with indigenous communities. We have committed to that as a government to continue that process. We are continuing to do that consulting with our First Nations partners across this province. It's unfortunate that the NDP government continues to make things up when it comes to that. What's also, I think, significant is the action this government has taken to build partnerships with indigenous communities all across this province. That party, when they were in power, would not even bring indigenous communities up to Government House to have meetings with them. That's how we started our relationship as a government.

Mr. Loewen: Mr. Speaker, following the introduction of the budget last week we started to hear yet more of the typical fear and smear from the NDP. Then again, I suppose it's not surprising that the party that dedicated its failed one-term government to spending Alberta into a $60 billion debt hole with $2 billion in interest per year would be opposed to a measured and fiscally responsible path to balance. That said, I heard one particularly outlandish accusation on personal taxes that I wanted to ask the Finance minister about. Minister, can you tell us if personal income taxes will be going up?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and the President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our government committed to Albertans that we would balance the budget in our first term without raising taxes, and that's exactly what we're doing. We paused indexation of personal income tax brackets and exemption, but this will not result in additional taxes for Albertans. This is not a tax hike. If you earn the same amount next year as you have this year, you will pay the same amount of income tax as you do this year.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley. [interjections] Order.

Mr. Loewen: Given, Mr. Speaker, that that's what I understood, too, and given that the NDP have been doing their best to spread fear and misinformation on personal taxes and given that they feel that if they say the same lie over and over again, it becomes true, therefore I have a clarifying question just to remove all opportunity for the NDP to misunderstand the facts. If I have a constituent who made $75,000 last year and paid $2,655 in provincial income tax last year and that constituent is set to make $75,000 again this year, how much will they pay in taxes this coming year?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and the President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We have not raised taxes, so the member's constituent would pay the same amount, $2,655, in personal taxes next year. Not only that, but Albertans continue to pay the lowest income taxes in the country.

Mr. Loewen: Given, Mr. Speaker, that we are on the topic of the NDP and taxes and given that it was these NDP members who were the architects of the single largest tax hike that has ever been forced upon Albertans by any government in our 114-year history and given that our government repealed that job-killing carbon tax that they never campaigned on, that punished Albertans for driving to work and heating their homes, to the minister: how much will our government save Albertans next year thanks to the repeal of the job-killing carbon tax?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, I'm proud to say that by repealing the carbon tax, the tax the previous government put on Albertans, Albertans will save over $1.2 billion a year. Moreover, the previous government also jacked up income taxes on corporations and sent billions of dollars of investment south of the border and with it jobs and opportunities, and with it lower government revenues. We have delivered a budget that will change the trajectory, that will change the course, that will attract investment, create jobs and opportunities, and increase revenues.

Community Grant Programs

Ms Goehring: Mr. Speaker, when asked on a recent telephone town hall if CFEP and CIP were being maintained, the Minister of Finance could only answer, quote: stay tuned. Well, they stayed tuned and saw a devastating 35 per cent cut to CFEP and a $5 million cut to CIP in last week's budget. These programs are essential to nonprofits, and those cuts will be devastating to them, all to pay for a $4.7 billion giveaway that hasn't created a single job. What will the minister of culture say to the nonprofits and other groups gutted by her cuts to CFEP and CIP?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, CIP grants will continue to be available to Albertans going forward. Most importantly, we have presented a budget that will undo the wrongdoing of the previous government. We've introduced a budget that will bring this province back to balance, that will lay a foundation for future Albertans, a foundation of economic growth, responsibility, and prosperity.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that when asked about the impact that slashing CFEP and CIP would have, the Minister of Finance responded by saying that community groups will be required to do more with less and given that this minister has worked in the arts community in the past and she should know that they are often on extremely lean budgets and don't have a dollar to spare, to the minister of culture: have you done an analysis of how many arts groups will cease to exist or significantly reduce operations as a result of your cruel cuts?

Member LaGrange: Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Culture, Multiculturalism and Status of Women we are continuing to invest in the arts during this tough fiscal situation, and grant programs are being streamlined to ensure dollars are going to communities, not bureaucrats. When Alberta's economy was booming, funding for the arts grew to more than 40 per cent higher than the national average. I just wanted to share that with you.

Thank you.

Ms Goehring: Mr. Speaker, given that this government expects arts groups and nonprofits to do more with less after giving away $4.7 billion to profitable corporations and given the minister of culture should know the impact that a 35 per cent cut to CFEP and a $5 million cut to CIP will have on arts groups and nonprofits, can the minister of culture please inform this House how many job losses in the arts community and nonprofit sector will occur because of her cuts?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. Our arts funding keeps Alberta in line with the national average for provincial arts funders. To support this mandate, we are developing strategies to preserve and enhance the unique heritage and traditions of all Albertans. This is the first ministry dedicated to supporting multiculturalism in Alberta in over 25 years.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Summer Temporary Employment Program

Ms Gray: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. When it comes to the summer temporary employment program, the minister is all over the place. Online he said that these businesses who supported STEP as a way of hiring young Albertans to give them training and experience were just looking for, quote, free money. Yesterday he called STEP an inefficient use of money. To the minister. You supported a $4.7 billion corporate handout that has so far only created jobs in Wisconsin and Newfoundland. Are you really arguing STEP is more inefficient than your Premier's failed no-jobs corporate giveaway?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, we sympathize with employers and students who were hoping to receive funding under this program next summer, but STEP was an inefficient use of government funds. At the cost of $10 million it created on average 2,500 to 3,000 summer jobs, and that's only temporary employment and not even in their fields. We are investing in other programs that will deliver, and just yesterday we announced a $6 million investment in Careers: the Next Generation. This will lead to more than 6,000 paid internships that lead to full-time employment, and it also brings private sector to the table. We have limited funds. We need to invest them wisely.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Ms Gray: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that Dana Cramer, a University of Calgary student said, quote, without STEP I would not have received some of my internships during undergrad; in one STEP placement my work led to the creation of two new Calgary-based tech jobs; this was a government program that created local jobs; it should not have been cut, end quote, and given that that this minister keeps rising to defend a $4.7 billion corporate giveaway that has so far only created jobs outside of Alberta, to the minister of labour: why won't you take action to create jobs in Alberta?

Mr. Copping: As indicated, Mr. Speaker, this was an inefficient use of government funds, and we are focusing on programs and policies that will make a difference and create jobs. For example, some of the policies and the action we've taken is introducing the job-creation student wage and reducing unnecessary red tape. We are being responsible for our youth. We are not going to leave them with hundreds of billions of dollars of debt. This government was on track to do that. We are going to get our spending under control and create jobs here in Alberta for youth.

Ms Gray: Mr. Speaker, given that the job-creation youth wage leaves university students out in the cold and given that the STEP program placed over 10,000 students in good jobs since we reinstated it, providing them with essential training experience and supporting their employers during tough economic times, can the minister please tell young Albertans why his jobs plan is more focused on generating corporate profits than quality work experience for young Albertans?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, our government will not be lectured by a government that pursued policies that not only put us in significant debt but also resulted in the destruction of anywhere between 170,000 to 200,000 jobs. We ran on and we were elected on a platform of jobs, the economy, and getting pipelines built. That is what we are going to do, and that is our focus, ensuring that we have policies in place for quality jobs for our youth and all Albertans.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Peace River is rising to ask a question.

Human Trafficking

Mr. Williams: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Between 2009 and 2016 across the country there were 1,100 incidences of human trafficking reported. Human trafficking has been on the rise across the country since 2010. Ninety-five per cent of those victims have been women, and 70 per cent of those women have been under the age of 25. Human trafficking is a growing evil in our society and one this government promised to take seriously during our election campaign. To the Minister of Justice: what is this government doing to combat human trafficking in Alberta and defend these young women?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General.

Mr. Schweitzer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We'll be acting by launching the Alberta action plan to combat human trafficking, a nine-point plan that will take immediate steps to establish a task force that will ensure government and partners work collaboratively, increase education for at-risk individuals and public awareness, and create legislation consistent with the Saving the Girl Next Door Act.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Peace River.

Mr. Williams: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister for answering. Given that human trafficking disproportionately affects the vulnerable population of young girls and given that our party made a campaign promise to protect these young girls and given that these commitments include adoption of the Palermo protocol for the definition of human trafficking and an eventual task force to deal with human trafficking, to the Minister of Justice: what steps are being taken today to crack down on those convicted of this heinous crime?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, we're dedicated to making sure that we lobby the federal government to amend the sentencing guidelines related to exploitation to add the offence of trafficking in persons to the list of offences to which the forfeiture of proceeds of crime apply. We're also going to advocate to provide consecutive sentences for offences related to trafficking in persons and also create a legislative tort so victims can sue their abusers.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Williams: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the minister: given that human trafficking victims face horrible conditions and suffer often from mental, physical, and sexual abuse and concerns and given that human trafficking is a scourge that degrades women and young girls far too frequently in our society across the country and given this government's multiple campaign promises to support the victims of human trafficking, what is this government doing to ensure that these vulnerable victims and not the criminals themselves have the support that they need?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, thank you to the hon. member for that thoughtful question. Victims and survivors need to know that their government stands with them, hears them, and will provide the tools and resources necessary to support them. In the budget we committed $6 million to fund a 24-hour hotline to support survivors of sexual assault and sexual violence. We're also committed to providing additional resources to sexual assault service centres, that provide counselling, support, and advocacy for those in need.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadows is rising to ask a question.

Alberta Immigrant Nominee Program Fees

Mr. Deol: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday, when we asked the Premier about new fees for the people immigrating to Canada, he insisted, "There is no such thing," but a quick scan of the budget shows on page 191 of the government's fiscal plan that the Premier was wrong and that there is a new $500 fee for the Alberta immigrant nominee program. To the Premier: will you apologize to Albertans for the inaccurate statement made to the House yesterday?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, I made no such inaccurate statement. The leader of the NDP said that we were raising fees for citizenship applications. I said that the government of Alberta does not process citizenship applications. I think I should know because I was the minister of citizenship for five years. The government of Canada processes citizenship applications. But you know what this reflects . .

Ms Hoffman: Well, I'm sure the people paying $500 for AINP appreciate that.

Mr. Kenney: I'm sorry. The heckling and anger from the Member for Edmonton-Glenora won't make this right for the NDP.

What it reflects is that the NDP leader, after four years as Premier, knows nothing about Canada's immigration and citizenship programs. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order. When the Speaker is on his feet, members will come to order.

Mr. Deol: Given that while the Premier was making inaccurate claims in the House yesterday, he failed to answer the very serious question raised by the opposition leader yesterday and given that we have cleared up that the Premier did in fact create a $500 fee for the Alberta immigrant nominee program, can the Premier or the minister of labour please explain why they are imposing a brand new $500 fee on new immigrant applications?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, the Alberta immigrant nominee program is not the citizenship program. They have nothing to do with one another. You know what? The confusion on the other side: it finally explains something to me that I've been puzzling over. Why is it that the NDP for four years so grossly neglected and mismanaged Alberta's immigrant nominee program? Now I know why. The former Premier doesn't even understand anything about it. This government is doing consultations on the new Alberta advantage immigration strategy. This province has brought in the fair practices act. This government is bringing in the action plan for fair . . .

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Deol: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that this is another example of how the UCP budget will be hurting Albertans and given that this $500 fee didn't appear once in the UCP platform and given that the Premier and the labour minister have claimed that they want to encourage more people to immigrate to Alberta, to the Minister of Labour and Immigration: will the minister remove this harmful policy, or is subsidizing a $4.7 billion corporate giveaway the new requirement for moving to Alberta?

Mr. Kenney: Every province in Canada charges an application fee for their provincial nominee program applications. The government of Canada has always, of course, charged application fees for permanent residency applications. This government is investing an additional 2 and a half million dollars in our action plan for fairness for newcomers. The NDP did the square root of nothing in four years to knock down barriers for newcomers trying to get work at their skill level, to get their credentials recognized. This government is implementing the action plan for fairness for newcomers and bringing onboard the Alberta advantage immigration strategy.

Environmental Monitoring Funding

Mr. Schmidt: The residents of Edmonton-Gold Bar live right next door to two refineries, a waste-water treatment plant, and a whole host of other sources of industrial air pollutants. While many rely on these industries for their jobs, they also rely on the provincial government to make sure that their emissions don't pollute the clean air that we all need to breathe. Thursday's budget includes a $1.5 million cut to environment's air quality monitoring and management programs as part of this government's attempt to pay for its $4.7 billion corporate handout. Can the minister tell my constituents why it's more important to make sure that corporations get a handout than that they have clean air to breathe?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, Alberta Environment and Parks will continue to monitor air and water. It's a very important part of our mandate and our file. We are confident, to the hon. member's constituents, that we will be able to continue to do that job, finding some efficiencies within the department and doing our part to be able to help get Alberta on a path to balance, but it will still remain a priority to monitor the water and the air. At the end of the day, what this comes down to is that that member was part of a government who absolutely destroyed our economy, and this government is going to do its part to get it back on balance.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, given that the minister seems to be intent on increasing pollution with his answers and given that a number of air pollutants, including particulate matter and ground-level ozone, in the Edmonton area are already high enough that the ministry is implementing a management plan and given that the $1.5 million cut to environment's air management budget will only make it harder to implement that plan, to the minister. My constituents are already choking on a $4.7 billion corporate handout. Why do they have to choke on polluted air, too?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, this is the difference between the NDP and Alberta's current government. Alberta's current government recognizes important obligations that we have, like monitoring air and water. We will continue to monitor the air and water in this province to the same standard that we always have. At the same time, we will work to be able to get our budgets on balance, to be able to make sure that we can get this province to a place of balance so that we stop wasting millions and billions of dollars on interest payments to bondholders that that member's government did.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, given that the minister is intent on wasting money on corporate handouts and given that increases in these air pollutants will mean that my constituents will have more visits to emergency rooms to treat asthma and other respiratory illnesses and given that this budget includes cuts to health care, meaning that those emergency room wait times are only going to go up, and given that CEOs and shareholders who receive that $4.7 billion handout get to breathe the clean air of Switzerland, the Cayman Islands, or other luxurious locales, why is the minister making my constituents sit longer in emergency rooms while corporations get to sit on $4.7 billion?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, that is a ridiculous question. First of all, it's already been proven by experts and the media that the assertion of 4 point whatever billion dollars the NDP keep talking about is not true. But if you want to talk about questions that constituents have, my constituents have been asking that hon. member, his former government questions for a long time. Why did you tax our seniors with a carbon tax? Why did you tax our health care system with a carbon tax? Why did you tax our school system with a carbon tax? Why did you punish everyday Albertans with a carbon tax? When is that hon. member going to stand up and apologize for his ridiculous environment policies that hurt this province?

Mr. Schmidt: Why are you poisoning my constituents?

Mr. Schow: Point of order.

The Speaker: A point of order is noted at 2:39.
The hon. Member for Calgary-Falconridge.

Hospital Laundry and Medical Laboratory Services

Mr. Toor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My constituents have been pleased to see our government keep many of our platform promises since the election. In our platform we committed to cancelling the NDP's planned nationalization of laundry services as well as their ideologically motivated plan to spend $50 million of taxpayers' money to buy out lab partner DynaLife. To the Minister of Health: is our government still planning to deliver on the commitment to allow laundry services to be delivered by the private sector?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Mr. Shandro: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yes, absolutely, we are. This is a perfect example, actually, of the difference between our government and the NDP. Three years ago the NDP proudly announced that they were blocking AHS's plan to contract out laundry services. It meant spending up to $200 million to buy new equipment, and most of the country already contracts out laundry services as well. To the NDP all that matters is public ownership, not value to patients, not value for money. It's ideological nonsense, and we're reversing it.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Toor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that there are contracts in place and given that the NDP pursued these contracts as part of their ideological agenda and given that we are not interested in breaking our word and given that we were elected to uphold our promises, to the Minister of Health: how and when will our government's plan to undo the NDP's reckless pursuit of the nationalization of health care services be implemented?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Mr. Shandro: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. AHS has contracts in place already for about 70 per cent of their laundry services. The contract for Calgary expires this coming February, and the one in Edmonton runs to March 31, 2023. We have confirmed to AHS that they are free to issue a request for a proposal aligned with those dates, as they intended to do before the NDP stopped them. Depending on the response to the RFPs, we will avoid up to $130 million in capital costs and up to $2 million in annual operating costs.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Falconridge.

Mr. Toor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister.

Given that the NDP pursued a consistent political agenda that was biased against private partners and in favour of public ownership of all assets in the health system, no matter the cost to the taxpayers, and given that Alberta taxpayers want a government that focuses on patients, not on ideology, can the minister assure the House and Albertans that he will put the interests of patients above ideology?

Mr. Shandro: Well, Mr. Speaker, we ran on a commitment to strengthen our publicly funded health care system. We need to focus on patients, not on ideology and not on who owns a building. That means working with nonhospital surgical facilities to get waiting lists down. That means bringing back the successful ASLI partnership with all partners in continuing care. That means working with DynaLife to avoid a $50 million buyout. We will keep 700 jobs in downtown Edmonton.

Notices of Motions

The Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Pursuant to Standing Order 59.01(5)(b) I wish to advise that the Assembly must meet beyond the daily Routine tomorrow, Wednesday, October 30, for Royal Assent. Although the standing order provides for estimates meetings to be rescheduled if necessary, we anticipate that the ceremony will be concluded prior to the commencement of the committee meetings tomorrow afternoon.

Introduction of Bills

The Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader and Minister of Environment and Parks.

Technology Innovation and Emissions Reduction Implementation Act, 2019

Mr. Jason Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to beg leave of the Assembly to introduce Bill 19, the Technology Innovation and Emissions Reduction Implementation Act, 2019. This being a money bill, Her Honour the Honourable the Lieutenant Governor, having been informed of the contents of the bill, recommends the same to the Assembly.

This bill fulfills the commitments of our campaign platform by setting the TIER system in motion. We're proposing changes to fulfill the government's commitment to protect Albertans in our valuable, large industries from federal intrusions while continuing Alberta's 20-year history of taking meaningful action on emissions management.

[Motion carried; Bill 19 read a first time]

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there any tablings today? The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm tabling page 144 of the fiscal plan 2019 – I would recommend its reading to all members of the Assembly – where it states clearly that all the government's $4.7 billion no-job corporate giveaway costs exactly $4.7 billion.

Tablings to the Clerk

The Clerk: I wish to advise the Assembly that the following documents were deposited with the office of the Clerk: on behalf of the hon. Mrs. Aheer, Minister of Culture, Multiculturalism and Status of Women, pursuant to the Alberta Foundation for the Arts Act the Alberta Foundation for the Arts 2018-19 annual report; pursuant to the Alberta Sport Connection Act the Alberta Sport Connection 2018-19 annual report; pursuant to the Historical Resources Act the Alberta Historical Resources Foundation 2018-19 annual report.

The Speaker: Hon. members, we are at points of order. At 2:06 the hon. Government House Leader rose on a point of order.

Point of Order Imputing Motives

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, I have some indication from the other side of the Assembly that they would already like to withdraw and apologize for this. I don't know if that made it up there. If that's the case, I'm happy to yield the floor to them to do that and not waste your time this afternoon.

The Speaker: That's awfully kind and noble of you, hon. Government House Leader.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I would in fact like to withdraw and apologize on behalf of the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West for her comments during that question.

The Speaker: Hon. members, at 2:39 the hon. Member for Calgary-West rose on a point of order, and the hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika also rose.

Mr. Schow: Thank you. I rise on a point of order under section 23(h), (i) and (j), specifically (i), which states: "imputes false or unavowed motives to another Member.” At the time, mentioned by you, Mr. Speaker, while the hon. House leader . . .

Mr. Ellis: Just yield the floor. They’re going to apologize.

Mr. Schow: Can I continue or not? Okay. Well, I’m going to continue if I can.

Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre was answering a question, and the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar stated, “Why are you poisoning my constituents?” Now, I’m certain that the hon. Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre and their favourite son has no such intention. The only poisoning that I can see here is the poisoning of the decorum in this Chamber by the members opposite. I hope the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar will apologize for his comments.

The Speaker: I might just provide a cautionary tale. This might be your first point of order, but we rarely use points of order to create language that might also create an additional point of order, so I would just caution the Member for Cardston-Siksika.

I’m not sure if the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar would like to rise.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, taking your advice that you just gave us, I will also not use my arguing of the point of order to use language that will create another point of order although it’s very tempting.

I do apologize and withdraw. The heat of the moment got the better of me, and I wish to withdraw the statement that I made.

The Speaker: Hon. members, I consider that point of order dealt with and concluded.

Hon. members, the daily Routine has now concluded. On Tuesdays and Wednesdays during consideration of the main estimates the Assembly stands adjourned upon the completion of the daily Routine and any matters arising in conjunction with the Routine to allow for committee consideration of the main estimates. Pursuant to Standing Order 59.01(5)(b) the House stands adjourned until this evening at 7:30.

The legislative policy committees will convene this afternoon for the consideration of the main estimates. This afternoon, the Standing Committee on Alberta’s Economic Future will consider the estimates for Culture, Multiculturalism and Status of Women in the Parkland Room, and the Standing Committee on Resource Stewardship will consider the estimates for the Ministry of Transportation in the Rocky Mountain Room.

The House stands adjourned.

[The Assembly adjourned at 2:50 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

7:30 p.m.

Tuesday, October 29, 2019

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Please be seated.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders Third Reading

Bill 18

Electricity Statutes (Capacity Market Termination) Amendment Act, 2019

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased today to rise to move third reading of Bill 18.

The proposed legislation will halt the implementation of a capacity market for electricity and return Alberta to an energy-only market. Alberta's energy-only market has been operating for more than 20 years. It's well established, tried and true. Investors have confidence in the energy-only system, and their willingness to continue to invest in it underlies our decision to stop implementing a capacity market. It's telling that despite their involvement in designing the capacity market that would be operational in 2021, industry overwhelmingly supports retaining Alberta's current market structure. They want the structural and administrative simplicity. They want the regulatory clarity. They want the certainty that the energy-only market provides them. Mr. Speaker, Alberta's energy-only market works. It encourages efficient investment decisions where investors, not consumers or taxpayers, bear the risk, and it has and will continue to deliver an adequate supply of electricity at affordable prices.

Mr. Speaker, Albertans and investors need certainty in their electricity market. If passed, Bill 18 will restore that certainty by ending the creating of a capacity market.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, is there anyone else wishing to join in the debate on Bill 18 tonight? I see the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise to speak to Bill 18, the Electricity Statutes (Capacity Market Termination) Amendment Act, 2019. You know, I think I made these comments a little bit at second reading, but I'll expand on them a little bit. I think it's fair to say that both the energy-only and the capacity market have pluses and minuses.

When one reviews the work done by the AESO in having a look at reliability and supply, which is their mandate, over the next while, it's clear why the AESO recommended at the time that we undertook the decision, in '15, '16, '17, to transition to a capacity market. The analysis is right there. It's been made public by the AESO.

As recently as about a year ago, at Public Accounts AESO underlined again their strong support for the development of a capacity market for the two reasons of reliability of supply and affordability. Of course, those things rely on new investment in the sector. New investment is required as many coal plants have reached their end of economic life, and indeed 2012 regulations passed by the Harper government phased out a number of facilities.

That generation supply will have to be replaced in some way, shape, or form, and attracting that investment is important to having security of supply and also an adequate supply so that we avoid price spikes. That was what underpinned the transition to a capacity market.

Now, as I've said, both publicly and privately, many times, within the context of a deregulated electricity market there's no ideological reason to support one over the other. They're both deregulated market mechanisms. That means that a whole bunch of private-sector players, not state-owned companies like in Saskatchewan or elsewhere, are making the decisions about how the lights get turned on and what you're going to pay for it when you do that. In that way, the guiding decision-making, then, in terms of government's approach has to be: what is the best regulatory environment that will ensure that we don't see price spikes and we don't see a threat to security of supply? That was why we got the strong advice that we did from the AESO, and that is why we moved ahead with the development of a capacity market.

Now, as I understand it, this was rejected by the current government for a number of reasons. A number of folks would make a lot of money off price volatility, right? We know this from people who are stockbrokers and make a lot of money off volatility in the stock market. The same sort of thing prevails in electricity.

We also know that one of the reasons why the AESO was recommending the implementation of a capacity market and a few other market reforms at the time was that people were observing – folks who were writing for the U of C School of Public Policy, the AESO, and others were observing; the MSA certainly observed this over the sort of 2010 to 2012-13 period – companies using market power in order to extract excessive rent out of the system. That's another way of saying: gaming the system and the rest of us pay for it, to the extent where the MSA issued new directives prior to our government's time, in '13 or '14. I can't remember when. A number of structural difficulties came from the existence of an energy-only market in a market the size of Alberta's.

Now, the only other place where we see a deregulated market prevailing in an energy-only form without a parallel capacity market functioning is, of course, in Texas, which is a much larger grid with a much different kind of complexity to its electricity system. There are reasons for that. Smaller places with fewer interties and some of the other characteristics of Alberta's electricity system certainly have that capacity market for some of those reasons, curtailing the exercise of market power and for reasons of ensuring better control over price.

Now that we are not moving forward in any way, shape, or form with a capacity market – and I know that some generators have said, "Okay; we don't want this," and that's fine. Others did and likely, depending on its structure, still would, but when the government, this new government, only consulted on a very narrow set of proposals, it was, I think, easier for a number of different interested stakeholders to just go back to the energy-only market structure because the different capacity options that were put before people weren't terrifically good.

I think what we'll have to watch for now are any subsequent reforms to the energy-only market. One of these things that we could do is write straight into the act that affordability is key to the system, but that was something that was rejected by this government, and that is too bad. That amendment along with the removal of the regulated rate option, the so-called electricity cap, are two reforms in the electricity sector that I don't believe will have positive consequences for the vast majority of ratepayers.

That's really what we've got to kind of come back to out of this, Mr. Speaker, which is: what is in the best interests of Albertans? It's not just those of us who pay a utility bill to keep the lights on in our homes. It is also about our smaller industrial operators. It is also about folks who are doing things like value-added upgrading, whether that's in the oil and gas sector or in the agricultural sector. Electricity is a massive input cost or can be. It has been kept under control for the last few years, and certainly we've seen historically very low prices currently, but with the complete rejection of all capacity market options and, it appears, a number of rejections already of systems to ensure affordability by this government in order to satisfy a very small group, I would argue, of self-interested lobbyists to the exclusion of everyone else who has a stake in the electricity system, it doesn't bode well.

I think a number of things need to be done in order for us to properly support a bill of this nature, which is why we are not voting in favour of it. For example, the Department of Energy has not yet received its advice from the AESO on reforms to the energy-only market. That advice is due on November 1, after this bill passes, so we certainly have a situation where, you know, it appears, anyway, that the government is just doing what will satisfy a certain small group of self-interested lobbyists at the expense of everyone else and at the expense of all of the fulsome advice that they could be getting around other reforms that could potentially be in this legislation, or they will have to come back to this place if they want to actually address some of the volatility issues and some of the issues around exercise of market power that we talked about.

You know, I think it's important to talk about some of the reasons why a capacity market would incent new investment if appropriately structured and if there was, on the part of the province and the Department of Energy, I think, a good-faith effort at actually taking a 360-degree view of the problems inherent in an energy-only market, some of the problems inherent in a capacity market – we have many examples everywhere to learn from – and then moving forward on that basis for a plan that works for Alberta if they were actually making that good-faith effort.

It's not just about the AESO. There are places where we have seen good advice; for example, Terry Boston. Terry Boston was the former executive vice-president of the Tennessee Valley Authority. Of course, the TVA was an FDR initiative to build about 16 dams and give people good work after the war. Terry Boston also negotiated our agreements to phase out coal, which is, of course, the lowest cost – post-2030, because, of course, coal was being phased out already. But anything between 2030 and 2062: Terry handled that file and did a great job.

Here's what he said about a capacity market.

I spent the last eight years of my career . . .

I will not do Terry Boston's accent although it is delightful.

. . . as the CEO of PJM . . . which has a mature capacity market structure. Private investors from around the world have built over 30,000 megawatts of new generation in PJM under this market structure, which kept the lights on at stable prices. Investors have shown a growing reluctance to invest in the riskier energy-only market designs around the world, preferring the price stability and revenue certainty provided by a capacity market structure. I am confident this model will work well in Alberta too, ensuring future stability in your admirable and smooth transition to a lower carbon electricity system.

There's a guy from the south, very much the south. What I remember most fondly of him is his propensity to add syllables in words and say them extremely slowly. It's a delight to listen to. But not exactly a card-carrying socialist, Mr. Terry Boston. Far from it. I don't think that he was feeling the Bern – put it that way – in the United States. Very much a businessman and very much a lot of experience with very mature, well-developed electricity markets in the eastern United States and in the south.

You know, I think that, really, what this shows is that it was a long time coming, our decision to move forward with the capacity market. Like I said, those decisions were not made quickly. They were made over a period of some months and even, essentially, a year of deliberating on the matter. They weren't made without consultation, and those decisions weren't made without expert advice. It would appear to me that there is a bit of a philistine streak in terms of listening to experts and understanding expert advice and understanding what might be motivating expert advice. That is certainly something where I would caution this government in terms of taking on that sort of posture. It does not reflect well. It does not attract investment, and it does not mean the best kind of well-deliberated-upon public policy.

I will look forward to reforms in the energy-only market, and I will be watching for them because what I care about at the end of the day are people whose doors I knocked on who said: "What are you doing about the transmission and distribution charges? What's going to happen to my bills?" At the end of the day, the people who sent us here, every single one of us – nobody ever asked me about the capacity market versus a well-designed energy-only market on the doorstep, my friends, and I don't know if they ever will. I don't live in any CEO neighbourhoods, but I do live in neighbourhoods where people worry about the cost of living. And removing the cap and putting them back on a roller coaster, in addition to all of the other cost-of-living increases that are contained within other pieces of legislation that we will be deliberating upon tonight, have left me concluding that this Bill 18 does not merit my support at this time.

Having said that, I will reserve my full-throated criticism because I think there are some places where we could indeed undertake some reforms around the energy-only market. Hopefully – cross our fingers – the capacity market would have been a more certain path towards the AESO being able to fulfill its mandate for affordable power, a reliable supply, and a grid that is built to accommodate new investment and growth in the province.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, is anyone else wishing to join in the debate this evening?

Seeing no one, I'm prepared to allow the hon. Minister of Energy to close debate should she choose to do so.

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you. I just have nothing further to say.

[Motion carried; Bill 18 read a third time]

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 20 Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, 2019

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Tonight I would like to move second reading of Bill 20, the Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, 2019.

This important bill addresses our overspending problem, improves how we manage our cash resources, promotes fiscal accountability, and helps bring Alberta back to balance. Specifically, Bill 20 focuses on a number of tax-related issues, including pausing indexation of the personal income tax system, eliminating specific tax credits, and the restructuring of important tax-funded services that Albertans rely on. It also closes a number of regulated funds that are no longer required and shifts specific funding dollars to directly come out of the general revenue fund. This will save on administrative costs, reduce borrowing requirements by about $650 million, and improve accountability of our spending. In total, it proposes 17 changes across seven ministries.

Mr. Speaker, I'd like to provide an overview of these changes and explain how they contribute to the positive fiscal health of Alberta now and into the future. I'll begin with changes from my own ministry, Treasury Board and Finance. First, we are pausing indexation of the personal income tax system. This includes credit amounts and tax bracket thresholds. This is a temporary measure until the fiscal situation improves. If passed, Albertans will continue to pay far lower taxes than people living in other provinces. In fact, if it passes, Albertans will pay the same amount of income tax next year as they did this year. We would also pause indexation of other programs, which will be touched on in another bill to come.

Next we're amending dividend tax credits to enact new rates for the '20-21 tax year and onward. The change is in recognition that corporate income is now subject to a lower tax rate, and this measure ensures proper integration of dividend income.

Moving on to tax credits that support the most vulnerable Albertans, we're proposing to restructure child tax benefits in Alberta to be more efficient and better focused on the families who need the support most. Two current programs, the Alberta child benefit and the Alberta family employment tax credit, would be consolidated into one program, the Alberta child and family benefit. Under this new benefit approximately 70,000 families would receive increased benefits, and an updated phase-in approach sees benefits increasing as household income increases. This encourages parents as they return to employment while still providing meaningful supports during this transitional period. Merging these two programs is expected to save government up to $55 million annually when fully implemented while supporting those who need the funding most.

This legislation would also eliminate Alberta's education and tuition tax credit amounts. This change aligns with other provinces like Ontario and Saskatchewan, who have eliminated these credits in their respective jurisdictions. Individuals with bank credits from previous years will still be able to claim them in subsequent tax years, but additional new incremental credits will be eliminated from 2020 onward. This change is poised to save more than $85 million in 2020-2021 alone. We will continue to help thousands of students receive postsecondary education through scholarships, awards, and student loans.

We would also eliminate the scientific research and experimental development tax credit in favour of a broad-based, low-rate corporate tax system. This is one of a few boutique tax credits we would eliminate in order to improve our cash management. I'll speak more on those in a moment. The job-creation tax cut, combined with the recently adopted accelerated capital cost allowance provision, will benefit Alberta businesses much more than targeted tax credits.

Next we would eliminate the lottery fund and redirect gaming revenue to the general revenue fund. The programs that the lottery fund supported would continue to be funded but through the general revenue fund. This change lowers administrative costs and reduces red tape by simplifying reporting and improving accountability.

Lastly for Treasury Board and Finance changes, we've increased tobacco tax rates by $5, to $55 per carton, and will be applying an equivalent increase to other tobacco products. This was effective at 12:01 a.m. on October 25. This change accomplishes three important things. It aligns us with other western provinces, increases government revenue by approximately $50 million annually, and furthers our efforts to reduce tobacco usage among Albertans. That last point is key as it also has a positive impact on our health care system.

Next I'll run through the changes to legislation for Economic Development, Trade and Tourism. The majority of these changes are focused on existing tax credits. Like the aforementioned scientific research and experimental development tax credit, we are focusing on moving away from boutique tax credits. First up is the elimination of the interactive digital media tax credit. This tax credit is narrowly focused and limited in scope. This tax credit has not had the broad impact on this sector as was intended. Instead, again we will be focusing on broad corporate tax cuts and supporting all Alberta businesses.

We're eliminating three other tax credits for similar reasons: the capital investment tax credit, the community economic development corporation tax credit, and the Alberta investor tax credit. We know that we can better build on Alberta's competitive strengths through broad supports for all sectors, creating the best economic conditions for businesses to thrive.

However, we aren't solely cutting tax credits. We are creating them where appropriate and where we believe they will have significant impact. That's why this bill creates the film and television tax credit, consistent with our platform, which will replace the existing screen-based production grant program. This is more in line with offerings in other provinces and will support and grow an industry that adds up to $250 million to our economy and supports more than 3,200 jobs annually.

Moving on to Advanced Education, we would dissolve the access to the future fund. This dedicated fund was established within the Alberta heritage savings trust fund, and in 2014-15 the government suspended cash transfers to it. At this point it is effectively unused legislation, and this will allow us to better use the approximately $58 million that has sat idle for several years as these funds will be moved into general revenue.

We would also dissolve the environmental protection and enhancement fund. This fund provided support for environmental emergencies, and its sources included forfeited reclamation security, tax forfeiture, and timber royalties. However, a new mechanism has been developed to appropriate funds for environmental emergencies. This is largely about improving our cash management, and we will continue to ensure that funding is available to protect communities from emergencies.

Another dedicated fund that we would dissolve is the Alberta cancer prevention legacy fund. Let me be clear. Funding for cancer research or treatment would continue to come through the general revenue fund. Our government believes deeply in supporting the important work in preventing cancer and other chronic diseases. However, this change, again, would improve our cash management and would allow us greater flexibility to invest in initiatives aimed at preventing cancer and other chronic diseases that share similar root causes.

The bill would also amend our funding agreements with municipalities. We are committed to delivering predictable, long-term municipal capital funding so that Albertans have the local infrastructure and services they depend on. The new fiscal framework is affordable and responsible. It balances the needs of municipalities with our provincial priorities and fiscal capacity and aligns with recommendations from the MacKinnon panel. Municipalities have asked for more predictable funding in order to develop their annual budgets and five-year capital plans. This legislation delivers this. Together, under the new Local Government Fiscal Framework Act and Budget 2019, Alberta would provide similar per capita funding levels compared to other provinces. This legislation includes a funding allocation formula for Edmonton and Calgary.

Lastly, we are introducing new legislation that would provide flexibility in funding for Calgary's green line and Edmonton's LRT. We remain committed to supporting light rail development in both cities, with funding remaining at $3 billion over nine years. However, we would revise the funding cash flows to help us meet our funding commitment in the current fiscal climate of restraint.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank you and the rest of the House for the time and patience to outline each of these changes. I understand that Bill 20 is complex and touches on a number of facets of government operations. There is a lot for members in the House to digest. However, I do believe that all of these changes represent a positive step forward for Alberta and our financial situation. These changes are about transparently transforming how we operate, with a deep focus on fiscal accountability.

Again I'd like to thank members for their time and attention, and I look forward to a healthy debate moving forward. Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there others wishing to join in the debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora has risen.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm not going to go through each section of the bill. I appreciate the minister walking through some of the highlights as he sees them, and I will do the same.

I am going to begin with one that he mentioned towards the end, which is the Alberta cancer prevention legacy fund, and say how dismayed I am that this is one of the areas for I think it was referred to as "streamlining" or "helping the balance sheet." It's had a number of different phrases around it. I think that when it comes to both sides of this House, I've seen members on both sides of this House make very moving personal statements and talk about their families' involvement in cancer prevention as well as surviving cancer or dying of cancer. I think that there isn't an Albertan who hasn't felt a direct connection to cancer or an Albertan who wouldn't want us to prevent cancer. Having funds dedicated to the prevention of cancer – a dedicated fund, the ACPLF – is something that I thought would have been sacred in this province.

I should stop being shocked. I guess I'm not shocked. I'm very disappointed that this is one of the areas that is seen as an easy cash grab in this current fiscal and political climate. There isn't a lot I look south of the border to for inspiration, but one thing I've noticed among one of the leadership candidates seeking the Democratic nomination is the lofty goal of eliminating cancer. I believe it was former Vice-president Biden who said that finding a cure for cancer was something that he was really going to focus government on should he become president. I think those are the kinds of discussions of cancer that I certainly would much rather be having in this place than eliminating the Alberta cancer prevention legacy fund.

I'm going to talk about a couple of other pieces. One is around the end of the education and tuition tax credits. This is something that's been in place – I'm sure the Finance minister could say the date that it came into place. I can tell you that, being a kid growing up in the north, in a riding not too far from where the Finance minister represents today, the idea of coming away to university was a scary enough idea, moving from a village of 300 to a city of probably at that time a little more than half a million. But my parents said to me: "We know that this is going to be a big financial burden for you, but we will help. We will pay your tuition. We get the tax credits, but we'll pay your tuition, and then you just need to worry about your cost of living." And, to be honest, they probably helped with that quite a bit, too. But one of the ways that they were able to do that is because they knew that they would get that tax credit, so I was able to come to Edmonton and not worry about tuition. Most kids in the north don't have that luxury, but I certainly felt very fortunate to be in a position where my parents were able to make that a priority, and in turn they got a tax credit.

Often it's students themselves who claim those tax credits while they're going to school if they're doing something like an apprenticeship and they have an income as well and they're paying taxes. Of course, their income has dipped a bit while they're doing their postsecondary, further studies, and they're able to use those tax credits to help offset some of the significant costs that are associated. Sometimes it's spouses. Sometimes your combined family income when somebody is going back to school takes a significant dip, and it would be even more significant once we deal with some of the other pieces of legislation that seem forthcoming. But at least having that tax credit was something that sort of ordinary, middle-class folks could take advantage of in this province.

This student I spoke with yesterday, Fajar: she's amazing. I'll get the spelling of her name to Hansard because it's complicated. She is a fantastic example, I think, of somebody who is seeing the compounding downloading onto her. She talked about the difference with the increase to tuition, which, of course, is not in this bill; with the elimination of the tax credit, which is in this bill; with the elimination of the STEP program and increases to student loan repayment, that is moving from prime to prime plus 1. When we add it up – some of it was nickel and diming, but most of it was rather big – it was about $600 at least that her tax credit would have been for this upcoming year. For, you know, a 19- or 20-year-old in her second year of university and probably for most Albertans, $600 is a lot of money.

I know we heard a lot of stories in a previous sitting of this Legislature about people talking about downloading costs around the price on carbon. I remember there being stories from members in central Alberta about $300 bills and how devastating those were. I think a $600 bill is something that I didn't expect to see. Again, I should get better at predicting the future given what we've seen as some of the priorities in this place, but it was still very disappointing.

Another one I want to talk about is the tax brackets. We certainly heard quite a bit about that in question period both yesterday and today. I know that the Finance minister and, I think, the Premier as well stood and said that taxes aren't going up, but they are by $600 million by the end of the 2022-23 fiscal year – $600 million – simply by suspending the indexation of tax brackets, which is absolutely a move to increase personal income tax.

One that I think will probably be the biggest, actually – well, who knows? These are all big. They all have it seems like at least three zeros behind them. But one that's coming up as well is repealing the city charters. These, again, were legal agreements struck between the cities of Edmonton and Calgary and the provincial government to put a local government fiscal framework in place, starting with Edmonton and Calgary. Of course, the desire was to expand to other municipalities. We've seen across this province, in response to the budget on Thursday and now this bill here today, that municipalities are in a state of significant angst trying to anticipate exactly how they will respond to these significant changes and downloading onto municipalities. For example, the city of Edmonton had I believe it was over $150 million in dedicated infrastructure projects that were planned based on the agreements that were in place both for MSI and for the big-city charters.

The big-city charters actually didn't even come into effect yet. They were something that was negotiated, that was put in legislation, that the governing party of the day put in the platform to maintain. The then aspiring government, the now government, said in their platform: don't worry; we're going to leave the big-city charters alone; we're going to respect the legal agreements that were struck with Edmonton and Calgary. That has since been broken. I was going to say derailed. I was going to say deviated from, but it's completely being broken.

I believe one of the ministers said: well, we're still going to respect the intent; we're just not going to respect the actual agreement. Well, that's like saying: I'm going to respect the intent of a speed limit; I'm just going to go double the speed limit. Well, that doesn't actually respect the speed limit, doesn't respect the actual law. It's completely breaking it. If an individual were to do that, it would be seen as reckless, dangerous, risky, and there would be consequences for that individual. There could be consequences for other individuals who were involved as well, but there certainly would be legal and punitive consequences for somebody, quote, respecting the intent but completely breaking the actual law. Those are a couple of the ones that I wanted to start with.

One that I'm going to touch on a little bit more is the lottery fund. I certainly welcome members of the government stepping up and providing clarity, because the lottery fund is something that I know has helped every community in the riding I represent, every community league in the riding I represent, and probably every community, social agency, charity, and nonprofit in ridings right across this province. It's something that I get asked, to help find volunteers to work casinos, on a regular basis. Community organizations rely on those funds from the lottery fund to do important things.

My own community league last week talked about the fact that between some of the lotto funds they had plus the climate leadership fund, "We've put solar panels on the roof, we're further insulating our building, and we'll be net zero by the end of the year," something that they're really proud of. This is a community hub, adjacent to the school, that provides dinners to members of the community. It provides yoga classes, it provides soccer clubs, it provides a simple drop-in space for parents and tots, and it is a place in the building that has been able to access some of the money through the price on carbon as well as money through the lottery fund.

I don't think anyone – well, maybe; I hope not – would say that we should be encouraging gambling or that we should be encouraging pollution, but these programs were put in place to help community organizations meet the needs of the many without having to charge exorbitant fees. Some community associations probably charge a lot of money to be members, but because we had access to programs like this, we charge nothing to be a part of the community league in Inglewood, for example.

I know that there are others that have done major renovations to their hall, renovations that haven't been done in 40 or 50 years that now have been able to be done, and as a result the facilities are used far more than they were before. Woodcroft Community League, for example, just did a major renovation, and again that was possible because of good long-term planning, accessing the lottery fund, and the community pulling together to do those initiatives to make sure that that funding was there to support that.

There are others that use funds for ongoing basic operations, operations of things like seniors' programs. Again, I recall the Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre talking about, you know: how dare you download costs onto seniors. But that's exactly what this bill and this budget are doing, downloading costs onto organizations like seniors' organizations that do social activities and do different things. I know that the Member for Edmonton-Riverview often talks about elder abuse programs that are available through the province. They do get some grants directly from government, but I think that those have been reduced, again, this year. I know that they were discussing it this morning. If I was wrong, I'm happy to be corrected by my colleagues on either side of the House.

They get some grant funding specifically for that, but these seniors' organizations also access lottery funds so that they can do important work in our communities. Ending the lottery fund and moving money into general revenue I think is something that has been done in a significant way to, quote, streamline costs or reduce expenses. Well, those reduced expenses have significant impacts on our communities and on the programs and work that's done in our communities to support one another.

Again, I'll recap sort of the five points I've mentioned: the elimination of the Alberta cancer prevention legacy fund, heartless and backwards and, I think, shameful; the lottery fund, something that I think has benefited probably any community organization that you can think of in your own ridings and in others; suspending the tax brackets for income tax. Again, that's $600 million. I'm sure that people have probably asked: are we really, really seriously doing this? Isn't this something that our leader pushed back hard on in Ottawa before coming back here? It was. Repealing the city charters for Edmonton and Calgary: I know that a lot of folks are probably going to feel that. These cities are two of the largest cities in western Canada. They provide important services for the people who live in them, and also they're hubs for people who don't.

I know that when I was at an Oil Kings game not that long ago, I was talking to a family that was here because they were accessing the Stollery children's hospital, and they were taking in a game while they were here. They were from out of town, significantly out of town. These are hubs, and an attack on Edmonton and Calgary is an attack on Albertans and all Albertans who use these cities and live or work or come here to recreate here as well.

And then, of course, the end of the education and tuition tax credits, something that I know helped me get to where I am today. Probably many members in this House have claimed them themselves, either for themselves going to postsecondary or for somebody they love going to postsecondary. There's something that made that big bill, that's only going to be bigger because of this budget, a little bit easier to digest come tax time, at least, something that I think was put in place because we had a vision in this province of helping people who wanted to access higher education be able to attain that, and we wanted to encourage that as a society. Unfortunately, in the first two sittings of this Legislature we've seen a two-tiered minimum wage, one for students and one for non students. If you're not a student, you get paid more. Now we're seeing attacks on postsecondary through the elimination of things like the STEP, increases in tuition, cutting grants to postsecondary institutions, and repealing the benefits that people who are paying those additional fees saw over many, many years. If one of my colleagues has a chance to find out when Alberta brought in that tuition tax credit, I think that that would be something worth considering. I know that at least for one generation it's been in place and, I imagine, even longer.

When I visit with school groups, I talk to them about how some of my priorities include a really strong public education system, which, to me, means that every kid is in, every kid is welcome, and every kid can succeed. I talk about how we're investing in them, how we choose as a province to give them opportunities through their education to ensure that they can attain their fullest.

This bill is saying to postsecondary students or aspiring postsecondary students – I also am concerned what message this sends to them, to students who are thinking, “One day I want to go back to school,” whether it’s somebody who’s already been out for a number of years or somebody who isn’t yet done high school and is thinking about their future. What message does it send to them that we are eliminating – this reminds me a lot of when, on the eve of the 2015 election, charitable tax credits were being attacked, and I think that many of us, especially those who ran in that election, remember how angry the public was that government was eliminating tax credits for charities or reducing at that time tax credits for charities. Here we are proposing the complete elimination of a tax credit for those who are going to postsecondary, and I think that that is not something that anyone in this place should be proud of.

Again, the cancer prevention legacy fund: I don’t think that was in the platform; I don’t think that’s something that your constituents asked you to do. I doubt they said: “You know what we need less of? Less prevention of cancer. Let’s spend less time and less money preventing cancer.” I imagine you probably had some stories of people who are living with cancer and how much they desperately needed increased supports and access. I know that, especially in rural communities, there are a lot of rural hospitals that are advocating to have more access to cancer treatments. I know that when I was in Hinton for the opening of the new wing there for cancer treatments, a beautiful facility where chemotherapy happens, that was something that the community was incredibly proud of, not just because it was a beautiful facility with a view of the mountains – it certainly is – but because it meant that people didn’t have to spend time on the highway and they didn’t have to ask their loved ones to take a day off to drive them for their treatments. It was about actually working to make life better, which I know is a slogan on the government documents these days.

I think one of the ways that that could be done is if, instead of cancelling or cutting Alberta cancer prevention, instead of cancelling or cutting tuition tax credits, instead cancelling or cutting the deals that were reached with Edmonton and Calgary, instead of cancelling or cutting the indexation of personal income tax, we could all be in this place actually fighting for things that will make life better. Again, as has been mentioned, the stark contrast between giving $4.7 billion in a no-jobs corporate handout and being able to maintain some of these programs and at the end of the day actually having a $2 billion bigger deficit than there would have been otherwise, I think, is deeply disappointing. I imagine that members on both sides of the House paused to ask themselves: is this really what we were elected to do? I don’t think it was, Mr. Speaker.

That being said, I think I’ll cede the remainder of my time to my colleagues and ask that members on both sides of this House pause to consider why we were sent here and if these are really the kinds of cuts that we were proud to campaign for.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, anyone else wishing to join debate?

Unfortunately, the minister has already spoken, and 29(2)(a) isn’t available until after the third speech. I’m sure that if you would like to join the debate, 29(2)(a) will be available following the next speaker, assuming that there is one.

Is there anyone else wishing to speak to the bill this evening? The hon. Minister of Transportation has the call.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I wasn’t going to speak, but because the hon. Finance minister can’t speak twice on this reading, I just need to point out that there will be no less cancer prevention that goes on. A bank account closed. All the activities of that bank account to prevent cancer will continue. It will continue from a different bank account. It will just be a less expensive overhead for the taxpayers.

What the hon. member said, whether it was intentional or not intentional, was not accurate. There will be no less cancer prevention as a result of what the hon. Finance minister has included in this bill.

The Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. I see that the hon. Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board would like to add a brief question or comment.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member who responded. I’d just like to add to that. By dissolving these funds, specifically the Alberta cancer prevention legacy fund, we will not be reducing funds spent on cancer prevention, research, or treatment. I concur that there’s not one of us in this House that has not been touched personally by cancer in one way, shape, or form, and this government will continue to fund cancer research, cancer prevention, and cancer treatment at the same levels even though this fund will be dissolved.

Similarly, with the lottery fund, Mr. Speaker, we will not change the use of those funds. Community groups and charities will continue to be able to access those funds in the same way and at the same level that they did before. The fundamental difference is that Albertans elected us to manage the province’s resources responsibly, and this is part of a measure that will streamline the operation of government, save Albertans $13 million annually, and save on administration costs so that more money can go to front-line service delivery such as cancer prevention, research, and treatment.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: There are three minutes and 30 seconds left under 29(2)(a) if anyone else would like to add a brief question or a comment. I see that the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora has risen.

Ms Hoffman: Yeah. I guess that the tough thing is that there used to be a dedicated area where we knew every year how much was going towards cancer prevention, the cancer prevention legacy fund, and it had dedicated financing focused towards it every single year. So we knew overtly through this place and through the presentation of financials what the government’s priorities were when it came to cancer prevention.

What we are seeing is the elimination of the fund. The minister says that the funding won’t actually be cut. I would love a reference to where that is and what confidences can be given. Certainly, I know that when we were dedicating money specifically to a fund and we had staff specifically cast with conducting research and supporting postsecondary research, often in cancer prevention, we knew that that was a focused, dedicated mission of that organization.

Of course, general revenues have a variety of focused, dedicated missions, including things like setting corporate rates for taxation and other things. I would love it if the minister would like to show us exactly where and how we can have that public confidence through this place in receiving public documents about the budget and about how much is actually being allocated towards cancer prevention because certainly under the elimination of the fund I don’t have that confidence, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: There’s approximately a minute and 40 left under 29(2)(a) if anyone would like to add a brief question or comment. I see the hon. Minister of Finance has risen again to do so.

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, I would just like to respond to the member opposite. We will be continuing to support cancer prevention, treatment, and research to the same levels that we would have had we maintained the fund. We're able to do this through the budgeting process, and the Minister of Health will be able to manage his budget in his department to accommodate this type of spending. Cancer prevention, research, and treatment remains a very high priority for this government, as it is for all Albertans.

The same can be said again for the lottery fund. We know that community groups and charities benefit significantly from these funds. I hear about this regularly in my constituency as various groups conduct their operations this way. Mr. Speaker, this funding will remain in place. It will not change for those groups that rely on it.

The Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available for brief questions or comments.

Seeing none, the hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung has caught my eye. He would like to join the debate this evening.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I certainly would enjoy speaking on the item of the day, Bill 20. I must say, not with any delight, that the Unlimited Cuts and Pain Party is living up to its name once again this evening. All pain, no economic gain once again.

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

The governing party does not acknowledge and refuses to acknowledge that the royalty windfall era, from which we've been rescued from economic disaster numerous times and which we've relied upon to fund our government and public services mistakenly over 44 years of Conservative rule – that era of relying on fossil fuel windfall revenues is winding down. The time now is for transitional investment, Mr. Speaker, not retrenchment, not shrinkage, not magically hoping that trickle-down economics will once again cause the oil and gas sector to rebound to what its former glory was. They are fundamentally and for all Albertans, present and future, tragically wrong in their assumptions about the Alberta economy and what they're doing to prepare this province and its citizens and its economy for the transition that we are facing. It's a transition away from reliance on fossil fuels for 30 per cent of our budget, and it's a transition to a new economy, which features things like artificial intelligence and a much smaller reliance upon labour in many resulting cases because of the application of artificial intelligence.

What we need now is, fundamentally, a shift to retraining and preparing our population for that new economy that's coming upon us, whether the government wishes to acknowledge and accept it or not. We need to transition away from risk that is not only – I wouldn't say in slow motion; it's a fairly rapid approach that we are having over the next two to three decades. It's commonly talked about globally, but this government seems to want to resist the reality of climate change and the transition away from fossil fuels and refuses to do things to take advantage of our opportunity that we have to develop a strategy to make the best use of our natural resources, our oil and gas resources, over the time frame of the next couple of decades and transition to a use of them that would be more oriented to plastics and perhaps other products we don't even know about yet.

That requires an investment, Mr. Speaker, an investment in education, an investment in our younger generations. In order to improve your financial picture because of the loss of this revenue, it doesn't mean that you go ahead and take the knees out from underneath the rest of your society. Because one element of your workforce is hurting, it doesn't necessarily mean that you have to go ahead and say: "Well, good grief. We're going to make everybody else hurt equally, and that's going to make things better." That doesn't address the fundamental problems that we're facing.

Those things are things that this government seems to be blind to. It's going to be very hurtful for the province over the long run to do things such as the measures that are envisioned and proposed under Bill 20. It touches on ending some of the tax credits and capital investment tax credits, the digital media tax credits that were in place, some from our government and others that even preceded our government, that were incenting new activity and really recognizing the change and transition to a new, intelligent economy that took advantage of the young generation that we have here. It took advantage of the investments that have been made in the past in our universities and our colleges, and it would continue those wise investments while we are in need of taking all the opportunity we have from this short window in order to transition our intelligentsia, our young people, our brain trust to getting onboard with the new economies, that are forthcoming quickly.

Unfortunately, we're getting lots of people now in this province who are saying: "What the heck are we getting out of this government? We're not getting prepared for the future. We basically keep sticking our heads in the sand like someone who is afraid of the future." You have to recognize what's going on in this province, Mr. Speaker, and look forward without fear and without trepidation. The government is looking, in Bill 20, at ways of grabbing bits of money here and there and attempting to, in many ways, stealthily create a budget that looks like it's not going to hurt anybody, but indeed the pain that's going to be caused unnecessarily is astronomical. The tax bracket suspension, the deindexing of the tax brackets, is going to cost taxpayers about $600 million by the end of the '22-23 fiscal year. Yet the minister this afternoon stood in the House and talked about how, if your income didn't go up beyond $75,000, your taxation wouldn't change, so where's the hurt? Well, I'll tell you what. The measure will end up taking in $600 million by the end of '22-23, so somebody is paying it.

It's called bracket creep, and it's something that the current Premier, while he was with the Canadian taxpayers' association and also an MP in Ottawa, spoke about numerous times. In fact, I think that if you search openparliament.ca for the words "bracket creep," you'll find that the current Premier of this province comes in second place to Monte Solberg: 36 search hits for Monte Solberg and for our current Premier 26 mentions of bracket creep on the parliamentary record in Ottawa. He railed against it constantly, yet in fact here he is implementing the same type of tax policy here, one that he criticized repeatedly and vociferously in the House of Commons when he was a Member of Parliament there.

So be careful about what you said in the past, but also watch out for those that are very quick to criticize, because they may indeed know more about the implementation of measures to impose bracket creep than anybody else, and indeed that seems to be what's happening here. The Premier's experience in Ottawa has told him that there's maybe one way that he could increase tax revenue by $600 million, an increase in taxes, which he never promised anybody in his platform, yet $600 million, at the end of the day, is going to be taken out of the pockets of Albertans of every tax bracket. It's going to be a tax increase that wasn't promised.

Yet, of course, we're getting a song and dance from the government that, in fact, it's not a tax increase. Well, I'll tell you what. That $600 million is going to be in the coffers of the provincial government at the end of '22-23. It came from somebody's pocket, and the only pocket, we're constantly reminded about, that is available to pay taxes in this province is the taxpayer. So if it quacks like a duck and walks like a duck, it's a duck. That's a tax increase of $600 million that this government has promised to implement as part of this omnibus Bill 20.

I can't wait to hear the cacophony of stories and, I would say, anger and upset and probably surprise from many, many long-time former Conservative supporters, maybe current Conservative supporters, about the proposed ending of the lottery fund and moving the money into general revenue. Now, we may hear yet the government suggesting that the programs and so forth under the lottery fund will be maintained. I am not certain of the details on that, and I'm certainly eager to hear. But there's a lot of uncertainty out there among many, many people in communities, rural and urban, right throughout the province who really relied upon the funding that came out of the lottery fund as community initiatives that would otherwise never get the funding or receive money to launch a community initiative. So whether it's a small community like Thorhild, that I originally came from, or your own local community league, there were lottery funds that were at work. They could be matching funds. They generated a huge lot of community infrastructure and events that otherwise wouldn't have happened. It's become something that the province has relied upon and has been a great community-building fund of money that people expected to see into the future.

I'm thinking that perhaps with the Premier's distance from the communities he purportedly served when he was serving in Ottawa, perhaps he has not really realized the depth to which the lottery fund has been appreciated in this province. I'm staying tuned to listen to the supporters, the former supporters at least, of the current government and past Conservative supporters from the time when this lottery fund was initiated to the present. You're going to have a lot of people wondering out loud at community meetings, at perhaps even ag societies, at local skating rinks, Boy Scouts, 4-H clubs, and all kinds of organizations that look forward to receiving some form of grant or assistance or matching fund from this lottery fund. I don't think it'll take long before the voices are loud and clear that this is a wrong-headed move and perhaps one that this current government will live to regret.

The number of things that they're contemplating doing under one bill always begs the question: why an omnibus bill, and why the move to block things together? Well, typically it's because a government wants to bury things by volume. One of the things that they had perhaps hoped to mute somewhat was the repealing of the city charters for Edmonton and Calgary and putting a new local fiscal framework act in its place.

We had the Minister of Justice today shrieking at reporters about how the mayor of Calgary should get his own house in order and then hightailing it back in behind closed doors, perhaps in embarrassment over what he said. But I can tell you that that interview will be one that's going to be replayed many, many times, perhaps not as many times as the cookie interview, but it certainly was a memorable piece of television news this afternoon, that I think the Minister of Justice probably regrets already but that I think epitomized the attitude of this government as we move forward through its mandate, how it's solidifying and retrenching and circling to hold fast to a mistaken belief that if they simply maintain loyalty to trickle-down economics, somehow the austerity budget will get us through to the other side and, lo and behold, the resurrection will take place and oil prices will rise again.

That, in fact, isn't something that most researchers support in terms of predictions, and I think that we'll come to see pretty soon how easily it's told that the economic predictions of boom or this UCP-predicted boom because of their $4.7 billion tax giveaway turns into a busted theory. It has been proven time and time again that giving a tax cut to major corporations, expecting them to incent the economy, is not something that economically works out.

Why we had to go through this failed experiment again is beyond me, but, you know, this is the bet they're making. They're making a big bet, and – I'll tell you what – they're taking Alberta's economy along for the ride on that bet. The bet is one that, unfortunately, this government appears willing to risk everything on, and that means our economic future, that of our children, and it so didn't have to be this way, Mr. Speaker. The problem is . . .

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore has risen.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I really appreciate the comments from the Member for Edmonton-McClung. One of the things I was hoping he might just spend maybe a moment on is around the deindexing, the student tuition tax credits being removed. Throughout his travels within his constituency – I know that in Edmonton-Decore I have all three of the high schools in north Edmonton, so I get a chance to chat with my high school students on a regular basis – I'm wondering how excited, maybe, some of the students in his riding or maybe their parents, that are going to be helping out those students heading off to university, are around losing out on these tax credits. Also, maybe just in general thoughts around his constituents and the deindexing of the brackets and how, you know, his constituents are looking forward to, hopefully, not getting a raise just so that they won't pay any more. I was hoping you might be able to share some thoughts around that.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung, with about four minutes remaining under 29(2)(a).

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Glad to respond. Thanks to the Member for Edmonton-Decore for his questions and concerns about his constituency. Of course, we're all here to serve our constituents, and that's what's at the bottom of my comments when I express my concerns about this government's proposed Bill 20 to end so many of the things that were put in place to get us through and bridge us through a downturn in the economy, so many things that we relied upon on a community basis such as the lottery fund grants and so forth and also things such as the tuition tax credits.

Now, this government seems intent on targeting students and young workers in many measures that have been implemented or that are proposed to be implemented under Bill 20. We've already seen a $2 decrease in the minimum wage based on age for young workers. That's a huge hit. That's 3,400 bucks on an annual basis that a young student is going to be forced to come up with or that their parents are going to be forced to come up with to put them through school because of that $2-an-hour wage cut.

On top of that, now with Bill 20 we're seeing an attitude towards young people that, in fact, they're kind of dispensable. We don't realize, through this government, the value of our young people, and it's disheartening to see that as a result of some of the tax credits and tuition tax credit changes, parents are going to end up having to pay more to put their young people through school. Mr. Speaker, it's a time frame when we need to be taking advantage of the window we have to get our young people educated in areas that they are going to take advantage of and that allow them to enter into the new, intelligence-based economy, that is rapidly upon us. It's coming very quickly, and it's in many cases already here.

So many of the things that our past government was doing to incent activity in the new economy are being swept aside by this government in a short-sighted effort to reach a balanced budget. The result is long-term damage to our population, to our young people, to the intellectual capacity that we have as a population. It's more than short-sighted; it's irresponsible. I'm deeply, deeply concerned that we will become not only barren ground for young people, who are going to be going elsewhere to do things with their degrees, if indeed they even decide to take their degrees here. There are lots of reasons why we might find that the people who are looking to invest may just decide to invest elsewhere, and part of that is because they've got a workforce that can't afford to go to university here.

I'm thinking not only about this generation, Mr. Speaker; I'm thinking about, you know, 20, 30, 40 years from now. That's the type of effect and impact that the measures of this government are having upon future generations by implementing omnibus bills like Bill 20 and the elements within it that will have a long-lasting, damaging impact. The Premier would have us think that the goal of reaching a balanced budget as a result of his measures is a worthy one, but it's really damaging.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I see that the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford has risen to join debate.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to speak to Bill 20 and bring my concerns to the table on a bill which probably should be renamed The Bill to Centralize Power and Money in the Hands of a Small Oligarchy in the Province of Alberta, because when we look at what the intention is here in this bill, it's clearly to remove control from community groups, from individuals and money from those people and centralize it into the power of the government to make decisions and, of course, as we know, to reward their paymasters in the political realm and in a small section of our economy, to ignore everyone else who doesn't fit into their vision of the universe.

You know, I'm very concerned even that this bill exists in this nature, that we see this happening increasingly in Canada and around the world, where an omnibus bill is put together, in this case bringing together 15 different actions and putting them all into the same act, because it has the very clear purpose of limiting the ability to address them in a clear and independent way so that we can respond to them one by one. The cloud that is created from an omnibus bill makes it very difficult to communicate to the public.

Of course, we know that that's exactly the intent of this government. We know that they put earplugs in because they don't really want to hear what anyone who isn't part of their elite corporate group has to say, and now they try to find repeated ways to take the voice away from people so that not only do they not have to hear but that, in fact, people do not have an ability to speak to issues. This is just another way in which they are doing this, just as they have here in the House by limiting, you know, the voice of the opposition through a number of changes to House rules. Of course, they have done so by changing rules around unions and changing rules in a variety of other areas.

What we see, you know, is a government that's intent on a path that is so antidemocratic, as are so many other things that they have done since they got into government a mere six months ago. We see them essentially acting in a way which betrays that which we have learned as a western democracy in terms of ensuring the voice of the people in the governance of the province. I know that I can say that kind of thing in this House and it won't get very far, and they know that as well because it's very difficult for people in the community to have a deep understanding of how it is that their rights are slowly being taken away from them, how the sands that hold up democracy in western parliaments are being slipped away by people whose only intent is to centralize power to themselves and a small group of people.

Now, having said that, I think I will make some attempt to talk to some of the articles of the bill because I think they're very concerning. Of course, what they all have thematically the same amongst them is the idea that the things that give opportunity and advantage to a variety of people are taken away from them. Each and every action within this bill is intended to reduce the ability of people to live a good life in their own way and to make decisions in their own lives that are positive.

I want to start with a statement by the minister who presented the bill. In the House earlier this evening he was addressing the question of the pausing of the indexation, and he said something much along the lines of: you will pay the same amount this year as next year. We can check that in the Blues later, but I'm fairly sure that I caught that right.

What I think is really important about this is that this is clearly a statement that's intended to mislead the House, because we know that there actually is money to be gained from this. The minister himself said that there is money to be gained from this; $600 million will be gained from this. What he is saying is that if you have $25,000, the tax rate for $25,000 will stay the same this year as it does next year. So technically he's saying that the number is the same. What he's not telling you is that this is ignoring the reality that this has a differential effect on people when you don't index things and that, in fact, you will be paying more even if the numbers on the chart in the tax bill remain exactly the same. Now, he knows that, but more importantly, we know that the Premier, his boss, also knows that because he's addressed this as an issue, this behaviour which we refer to as bracket creep.

I just happened to have an opportunity to look up Hansard from the Canadian Parliament, on March 2, 1999, when the Premier was a member of the national Reform Party, and he actually had something to say about this very issue. I will quote a little bit from Hansard because I don't want to put words in the Premier's mouth. I want the Premier to tell you what he thinks about this sort of behaviour that his own Finance minister is engaged in. What he says is:

Again, as I pointed out in question period, with the new Liberal math they forget to tell us the whole story. Part of the story is that since 1993, 1.2 million low income Canadians, those who can least afford it, many of whom are under the poverty line, single mothers and single parents struggling to get by or seniors on fixed incomes, have seen themselves pushed on to the tax rolls by the government's pernicious back door tax grab called bracket creep, by the pernicious tax on inflation.

Ms Hoffman: Who said that?

Mr. Feehan: That was Premier Kenney at a time when he was a Member of Parliament in Ottawa.

Ms Hoffman: The current Premier.

Mr. Feehan: That's right. The current Premier.

The Acting Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt at this juncture; however, I just want to remind the House that names of individuals in the House won't be used even when responding to questions between each other. Going forward, just make sure that we refer to each other in the third person, through the Speaker.

Thank you.

Mr. Feehan: I believe I did say Premier Kenney, but I will keep it limited to Premier if that's the correct procedure. Thank you.

I think that's very important, that this very thing that is being introduced by the Minister of Finance here today was described in that one sentence twice by the Premier as "pernicious" behaviour. I think that's very disconcerting, that he would be saying that about what, effectively, is behaviour by his own minister. And I think it's important that we speak about the fact that this is what he refers to as a "tax on inflation"; that is, inflation, which naturally happens, will push people into a place where they are paying more taxes. We know how much it is because the minister himself has said that it's $600 million. That is particularly assaultive. Listen to the group of people that the Premier was concerned about at the time, that is "many of whom are under the poverty line, single mothers and single parents struggling to get by or seniors on fixed incomes."

So what we have is a government who knows that they are attacking the most vulnerable people in society. We know because these are the words of the Premier himself, and he says that this is "pernicious." You know, what do you say about a government that has those kinds of judgments about a behaviour that they in fact are engaged in?

He goes on to say, by the way:

If these people get a cost of living adjustment in their pension cheques or their minimum wage income from working in the labour force, if they get an automatic COLA, a cost of living adjustment, they end up paying taxes not because they are making more in real terms – they are making the same in real terms – but because the government decides to generate more revenue to finance its insatiable appetite for spending in a way that is not transparent, in a way that Canadians cannot see it and in a way that parliament cannot approve it.

That's a very serious condemnation of this behaviour on the part of the very government that he is now in charge of. You know, there are words we can't use in this House to describe people's behaviour, but when someone publicly makes a statement decrying a behaviour and then engages in that behaviour, we all know what words apply. And I think it's very upsetting that here we are in the province of Alberta doing that exact thing.

This is just one of 15 ways in which the government has extended its reach, extended its power, and pulled away resources from members of the community in a way that is the least transparent possible, by sticking it into an omnibus bill so it cannot be debated individually on its own merits, each individual piece.

Now, I know that the minister has stood up and suggested that these things don't really matter, that the elimination of the Alberta cancer prevention legacy fund will not mean less money for cancer research, that the elimination of the lottery fund will not mean less money for community groups. But what he's not saying, as the Premier said in Ottawa – the language that the Premier used was that it was "not transparent" and that it was done "in a way that Canadians cannot see it and ... that parliament cannot approve it."

What is happening here is that they're taking all of these dollars and they're bringing them in under their control, where there will no longer be legislation that controls how much money is being sent out into the community. They can say to us now: don't worry; we'll take in those lottery dollars, but we will send the same number of dollars out into the community as happened under the lottery fund. But the difference is that under the lottery fund there is an act that controls how much that money will be, what percentage of the lottery funds come in, how that money is allotted to various community groups and then goes out again. There's an act that controls that decision-making, and in order to change that, you would have to change the act.

What they've done is they have subverted the act. They've subverted that by taking the dollars out of a transparent, accountable process and slipping it into the government's back pocket, where they can begin to distribute money in any way they choose to do so without accountability to an act. Before, when the lottery dollars came in, they would have to demonstrate to the public that they actually did with the money what the lottery act said that they should do with the money.

Now, instead, they could decide on any average day to reduce the amount of money put out in the lottery fund by, let's say, 50 per cent and would not have to be accountable to any kind of an act. That's the perniciousness of this whole bill. That's what they're doing. That inherent level of dishonesty in the creation and construction of this bill is appalling to me.

We look at the number of things that they're doing. They are eliminating the interactive digital media tax credit. We know that gaming companies that were taking advantage of this are saying that there was absolutely no consultation on this and that it's devastating to them and that it's going to have them reconsider whether or not they really want to be investing in the province of Alberta.

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, 29(2)(a) is available. I see the hon. Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland has risen under 29(2)(a).

Mr. Getson: Yeah. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. There are a couple of things here that I've been quiet on, and the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford made reference to it again, about the earplugs being worn in the Chamber. The member that he keeps referring to from the UCP: well, that was me. For those that were here that night, I measured the level of decibels that were being expended by the member that sits over here. It was over 98 decibels, towards 101 that evening, where the noise-induced hearing loss issues are at 85 decibels or higher. I had shared with the Chamber at that time that I had tinnitus, as it is. At that time I also had some allergy issues or some other issues that were taking place, and I had actual pressure on the inside of my ear. So, yes, indeed, for the record – and it's been stated before – I am the Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland, that wore one single earplug in my left ear – one single earplug in my ear – that, yes, the Premier put in. [interjections]

The Acting Speaker: The Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland has the call. I will listen to his question or comment for four more minutes. That's what you have left in time.

Mr. Getson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. So, yes, in fact, I did put one single earplug in that was made available to me because my head was splitting out wide.

Now, I find it very hard to believe that the folks over there, who want to stand up for the little guy all the time, are actually picking on me, a little six-foot-two guy who had a hearing issue. What I am going to be doing for the record and since they want to keep going on this: I did have an audiology report that took place once we were out of session because I sucked it up – as my dad used to say, "Suck it up, Buttercup, when you're working" – and I put up with that issue for a while. This summer I had an audiology report, and indeed I do have problems in my left ear. The tinnitus was an item, but I had unequal pressure in my left ear, for which now I have a meeting with an ear, nose, and throat specialist on November 8, again, which I would be more than happy to table.

I find it very insulting to be picked on, quite honestly, again by the bully crowd that wants to point out a medical condition. If I had a hearing issue, well, I guess that's just not good enough to be taken at its word. It continues to come up nonstop, and I don't appreciate it. So if the members could please refrain from talking about my issues and making light of it or anything else, it would be much appreciated.

Even with my left ear, that still hurts a bit, depending on the environment, I still heard the minister quite clearly say that coming down to the lottery fund, it was going into general revenue. It was going into one bucket that could be drawn from. There wouldn't be any shortfalls. Even with my left ear, that still doesn't work as well, in listening to that, I can hear clearly that it was said, again, when it comes to the cancer type of items, that it wasn't going to be reduced in funding. It's simply a matter of efficiencies.

To save the Alberta taxpayers about $13 million through efficiencies: to make that out to be something else is actually a disservice to what we're doing. So quit scaring, quite honestly, the members, the province. Quit scaring the people that have those different conditions. Quit scaring the people in my area, that rely on those lottery funds, and listen to the points. Instead of speaking to the camera for the 10-second sound bite that they're going to throw up on their Facebook feed, perhaps let's do some service to the Alberta population and listen to the questions and listen to the answers that are provided.

With that, I would like to see if the member would actually like to retract it or maybe restate his position on the hearing issues and the earplugs. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Two minutes left under 29(2)(a). The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Absolutely no one is mocking the member for his hearing issues. That's absolutely sad to hear about. We're all with you on that.

I was in the House when the Premier handed out earplugs, laughed. We all witnessed it. A number of us witnessed it. What the member was referring to was nothing to do with you, the Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland. The member was referring to the continued attacks on democracy, the shutting down of debate, as we've seen many times, and he linked that quite adeptly, I would say, to this bill ahead of us, Bill 20, this omnibus bill. It's an omnibus bill, the same tactic that Harper used, combining multiple pieces of legislation, each of which could be independently reviewed and debated, but this government is choosing to do otherwise.

I'm going to sit down so the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford can also respond, but he is absolutely in no need of apologizing. That's a fact.

The Acting Speaker: I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford has risen with about 30 seconds left.

Mr. Feehan: Thirty seconds. Thank you. I thank the Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland for his comments, and I assure you, if I ever refer to earplugs, I explicitly will tell him now that it is not a reference to him individually but, rather, to the general behaviour of the government and of the Premier, who generally handed out earplugs to people who did not have a problem with their left ear. I for the record exclude you from all such comments in the future.

Mr. Williams: Point of order.

The Acting Speaker: Having heard a point of order called, I see the hon. Member for Peace River is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Williams: You'll forgive me, Mr. Speaker, if this is the wrong point, but the hon. members across the way referred to "you" multiple times in reference to my colleague, and as the Chamber knows, the only "you" in this Chamber is the Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member. I don't find a point of order with regard to that at this stage. Using certain terms in this House can be dealt with circumstantially. In the case that we've heard so far this evening, I haven't found something that crosses over. I assure you that when I do, I will be the first to stand up and call the House to order.

Considering that to be dealt with and looking to any other members who wish to speak to the bill proper, I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore has risen to speak on this.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to add some of my thoughts around Bill 20, the Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, 2019, which – I don't know – has been pointed out by the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford as a bit of an omnibus bill. You know, I can't help but find some of the irony a little bit around this. We have a couple of members that were around during the 29th Legislature who went on, shall we say, ad nauseam around what they thought were some omnibus bills that were presented by the former NDP government. It's always interesting when you hear objections to those kinds of things and when somebody is finally put into the position of being able to do it differently: here we are, second verse, same as the first. But I won't dwell on this.

I want to get into some of this bill that's being proposed. Initially, during the opening of second reading here, some of the comments that I heard from the Minister of Finance, you know, some little things that we are talking about here around, say, for instance, reducing red tape – and as the red tape critic, I've always said that I'm very much onboard. You know, do we need to make 15 copies when only 10 copies will do, things like that? But when I look at potentially moving this lottery fund into general revenue under the claims of reducing red tape, I wonder if perhaps we might be creating some red tape around how we monitor these funds. How do we ensure that what is actually coming in is going back out just like it used to do? So we've eliminated some red tape, yet we've created some.

You know, I find that comments around making changes so that those that need the funding the most get it – and here I'm looking at things like deindexing – don't necessarily work for getting the funding to those that need it most.

The other one that I couldn't help but kind of cue in on was around aligning us with other provinces. It's interesting when we talk about that phrase. One minute we're aligning with other provinces and that's a great thing because, you know, that brings us up, yet we have legislation that is getting rolled back, is being moved backwards, that did align us with other provinces. But now, all of a sudden, that's a bad thing because, well, we don't want to be aligned with other provinces. So I couldn't help but cue in on a few of those things.

I guess one of the first things I want to talk about around Bill 20 is the elimination of the five tax credits that were available: the interactive digital media tax credit, the capital investment tax credit, the community and economic tax credit, the Alberta investor tax credit, the scientific research and experimental development tax credit. Obviously, my time is limited. I can only speak for so long here, so what I think I'll do to make my point, Mr. Speaker, is that I'll cue in on the digital media tax credit.

Now, I'm pretty certain that I've mentioned in this House before that one of the things that I do in my free time, what very little of it I get – it's usually very, very late at night or maybe very late at night on a weekend – is that I do like to participate in computer video games. When I was first elected, in 2015, and got a chance to chat with some of the stakeholders in that industry, one of the things I remember very, very clearly them saying to me: you know, there's this fantastic industry out in Quebec and out in B.C., and one of the things about the gaming industry is that it's only limited by the imagination and a little bit of money. One of the things I very, very clearly heard was that if we could somehow balance us out – we didn't even have to get it exactly but just kind of get close – around supporting that industry, they said very, very clearly that the businesses will come here.

What would eventually become the digital media tax credit was very, very quickly taken advantage of. You know, we saw businesses coming here because they had the expertise that was being trained right at our very excellent postsecondary institutions. We had the infrastructure in terms of public services that are attractive to businesses as well as one of the lowest tax structures in the entire country, with no payroll tax and no sales tax here within the province.

So when I see the elimination of this digital media tax credit, I can't help but wonder: why? You know, I've heard very clearly from some of the members here about their experience in business, so I can't help but ask: what kind of potential is available to Alberta within the gaming industry?

I've always managed to try to explain to people that I get to talk to within my communities that we need to think a little bit like a grocery store, Mr. Speaker. We need to have many products on the shelves. We need to have many different prices for those products. People will come in, they'll take what they need, they'll leave the rest, and that's exactly the way it's supposed to work. By bringing this industry here to Alberta, that was one of those products that we get to put on the shelf.

When I look in 2017 at what the gaming industry was bringing in, you know, Mr. Speaker, you might be quite surprised to learn that that industry was bringing in almost $109 billion. So why doesn't Alberta get a piece of that action? When I look in 2018, the industry grew by almost 11 per cent over 2017 and was now almost a $135 billion industry. Predictions are that in 2019 the industry is going to grow by almost another 10 per cent, 9.6, and they're predicting just over $152 billion. That's quite the industry, Mr. Speaker, and I think we should be getting a piece of that action. I think we should be getting our thumbs in that pie as a province, and the digital media tax credit was providing that avenue, and those companies were coming here. They were relocating here because here is where we could get a piece of that action.

Obviously, I'm incredibly disappointed to see a tool that this government had to create jobs – I always use BioWare as the example. I mean, it's an absolutely amazing company: located, born right here in the city of Edmonton, over 25 years old, and at any given time it would employ anywhere between 300 and 400 people with an average salary of between $70,000 and $75,000 a year. Those are really good, mortgage-paying jobs. Here we are telling the industry: "Nah. We're not interested in that." I thought this government was elected to create jobs. That's what was in the election platform.

So here we are. We're about to set things up so that we're going to miss our own boat, Mr. Speaker, and that's really, really disappointing. You know, I know the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview can speak at length about this around things like the capital investment tax credit and the Alberta investor tax credit and how those have helped smaller businesses to really get a foothold and start to grow their business. I know all this data is out here where we've heard, you know: well, you've just got to lower the corporate rate. The smaller companies are saying: "I'm sorry.

It's not working for me. I don't get to take advantage of that." Here were programs that that business community asked for, and now we're saying: "Nah. We'd rather give that money to big, massive companies like Walmart." The last time I looked, Walmart wasn't making these kinds of gains like the digital media industry is doing.

Getting back, I guess, a little bit to the red tape discussion here, the repeal of the city charters from Edmonton and Calgary: if this is their idea of red tape reduction, Mr. Speaker, then it's no surprise why the mayors of both Edmonton and Calgary are so upset with this government. This very clearly is not red tape reduction. I know it's proposed that the ministry is going to have a $10 million budget over the next three and a half years, but I think some of our members have said before that, you know, maybe we could potentially ask for our money back. Maybe this red tape reduction could be money better spent. Maybe we could back the STEP program for $10 million and actually get some jobs going. So far we're at 27,000 minus and counting.

I guess that now starts to lead me – I've had the chance to ask some of the other members around their students and parents and how excited they are to find out that, you know, students will pay more to go to school. It's funny. I have yet to find a single student in my riding that says: "I am completely excited to be paying more on my loans to be able to go to school. I can't wait." I haven't found one.

I also haven't found any of their parents that are excited about not getting that tax credit. Some parents are in the position to be able to help their students go to school, but it was that tax credit that just kind of pushed it over the edge. I haven't found one yet that's excited that they're losing that. I also haven't found one single taxpayer yet that's excited about hoping their boss doesn't give them a raise so that they will make the same amount of money so their income tax won't go up. I'm still waiting to have somebody call me or write me around that.

With some of the moves that are being made here in Bill 20, besides the fact that it's just an omnibus bill, Mr. Speaker, I don't think that this serves Albertans. I guess that maybe if we were able to separate it out, there could be some things that we could debate on their merits and get those through, but, you know, clearly there are other things that are just not productive. It doesn't grow our businesses here in the province. We've heard that very, very clearly, as I'd mentioned, through the digital media tax credit. Giving big $4.7 billion corporate handouts to places like Walmart does not move our economy forward.

I'm finding myself not in a position to be able to support this. Certainly, I guess that if the government side wants to maybe break things up a little bit, we can discuss those things. Otherwise, I'm just not seeing how this is going to move us forward.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I would move to adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Bill 21

Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019

The Acting Speaker: The hon. President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to move second reading of Bill 21, the Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019.

Like Bill 20, this important bill addresses our overspending problem, promotes fiscal accountability, and helps bring Alberta back to balance. Bill 21 focuses on promoting fiscal sustainability for Alberta today and in the future. It addresses public-sector compensation, the largest expense in the Alberta budget. It also pauses indexation for a number of programs and makes amendments that ensure we are prudent with taxpayers' money. All told, it proposes 18 changes across eight departments. I'd like to provide an overview of these changes and explain how they contribute to the good fiscal health of Alberta.

As I did with Bill 20, I'll begin with changes in my own ministry, Treasury Board and Finance. First and foremost, we are taking two important steps to ensure the sustainability of the public-sector workforce. The public-sector employers act would provide legislation to be in place for the forthcoming round of collective bargaining in 2020. At $26.9 billion annually, public-sector compensation accounts for more than half of all government expenses. As stewards of taxpayers' dollars, the legislation helps to ensure that the costs of all collective agreements bargained by government and its public-sector employer partners are aligned with the province's fiscal realities.

It would do so by formalizing existing government oversight levers, including fiscal bargaining mandates already informally in place over a large percentage of agreements bargained by public-sector employers. This includes both the Alberta public service and Alberta Health Services. It will also extend greater accountability to government-funded employers such as postsecondary institutions, education support services, and agencies, boards, and commissions. Albertans expect government to be fully accountable for how their tax dollars are spent on public-sector wages.

Second, we would amend the Public Service Act limits on reasonable notice of termination and severance pay for non bargaining unit employees appointed under the act. Amendments would provide notice and severance requirements for these employees, from four weeks per year of continuous service to a maximum of 78 weeks.

Next we would improve the government's fiscal accountability and transparency by updating our budget processes and reporting. Amendments to the Fiscal Planning and Transparency Act would replace spending limits with a transferable supply vote, eliminate the contingency account, improve fiscal reporting, align business planning and financial reporting, and add an annual infrastructure report to provide details on the progress of major projects and programs relative to the budget.

Lastly, for Treasury Board and Finance this legislation would amend the Financial Administration Act to improve transparency. This includes creating a transferable supply vote for contingencies and emergencies such as responding to natural disasters, which are clearly in the public interest and cannot be delayed. Any transfers from the supply vote will be required to be explained via an order in council, which are public documents, thereby ensuring accountability.

Other minor changes include adopting a cohesive approach to approving Crown loans, indemnities, and guarantees, allowing Treasury Board to delegate some policy-making functions, removing government control of two health and welfare trusts, creating a right of offset to reduce payments to Crown debtors, and removing references to repealed legislation.

Moving on to changes in the Ministry of Labour and Immigration, we're taking more steps to better manage public-sector compensation. This bill proposes to reverse the replacement worker ban in the public sector. This would ensure essential services that Albertans need are not impacted by strikes or lockouts. We would reinstate the exclusion of specific public-sector jobs from bargaining units where it makes sense to do so. This includes auditors, systems analysts, and budget officers. Historically these roles were excluded from bargaining units, and for good reason. In many cases, individuals in these roles are privy to information that would put them in a conflict of interest.

Lastly, for Labour and Immigration we would establish the authority to make retroactive regulations and define "employee" in the employment standards regulation. This change primarily clarifies that amateur athletes are not employees of the athletic associations that they belong to and allows them to follow existing agreements for providing benefits to athletes. This also better aligns our employment standards with other provinces.

Continuing on to the Ministry of Health, we are proposing changes to better ensure all Albertans have access to qualified doctors. First, we need to ensure that the $5 billion the government spends on physicians every year is spent in a way that best serves Albertans' needs. To help achieve this goal, we're proposing amendments to the Alberta Health Care Insurance Act and regulation to give the Minister of Health the authority to place conditions on obtaining a practitioner identification number. The intent of this change is to improve access to physician services for rural and remote areas and to manage the physician services budget.

Next Bill 21 introduces provisions to change the doctors' master agreement in the Alberta Health Care Insurance Act. While we're committed to good-faith consultation and negotiation with the Alberta Medical Association, we need to be able to achieve the goals of budget certainty and good governance. Under the current agreement with doctors the growth in physician spending will only continue in the years ahead. This change would simply provide the minister and cabinet more authority regarding the physical contract.

Next the bill addresses how we fund policing in our province, with a focus on addressing rural crime. We're proposing amendments to the Police Act to update the police costing model for rural municipalities. A new, sustainable police funding model would address long-standing inequities in how police services are funded in our province, particularly between rural and urban areas. A new funding model would not only address this inequity; it would help direct needed resources to policing and justice services in rural Alberta.

Bill 21 would also increase the fine retention percentage for the province. Fines and penalties paid to municipalities are enforced through the Provincial Court, and the province keeps a percentage to offset expenses of administration. This additional revenue will help pay for programs and services that benefit all Albertans.

9:30

On the postsecondary education front Alberta currently spends significantly more for a full-time student equivalent than B.C., Ontario, and Quebec and without achieving better results. We would begin to address this inequality through a few measures. First, we would lift the tuition cap for three academic years in order to set an alternative cap in regulation. The current cap has been in place for the last five years. Untying the hands of institutions would reduce their dependency on government funding and would mitigate the impacts of funding reductions. Second, we would implement an interest rate increase on student loans by 1 per cent for all borrowers. This change would increase government revenue and would also save taxpayers on loan provisions. The impact on students with loans would be relatively small. For example, a student with a $30,000 provincial loan amortized over a decade would see an increase of approximately $15 a month.

As mentioned earlier and alluded to when speaking to Bill 20, we're pausing indexation for a number of programs. For this bill, the first of these is the assured income for the severely handicapped, or AISH. This is a program that supports some of the most vulnerable in our society. Alberta's spending in this area is currently the highest in Canada, and I'm happy to report that current benefit rates for AISH will be maintained. This is only a temporary pause. Once Alberta's finances improve, we can look at reinstating indexing.

We would also be pausing indexation of the employment and income support benefits. This includes programs such as the learners' and employment training program at Advanced Education and the expected to work and barriers to full-time employment programs offered by Community and Social Services. Two additional programs would also have their indexation paused; the Alberta seniors' benefit and the seniors' lodge program would both have their funding maintained at current levels. Again, we would not cut any funding to these programs. Recipients will not see a reduction in their benefits. We will maintain existing levels while we get our finances back on track.

Lastly, in Bill 21 we would be eliminating the cap for the regulated rate option for electricity prices. To date the cap has cost the province more than $90 million. If the program were to run until its legislated end date of May 31, 2021, it would cost government an estimated $388 million. By ending the previous government's regulated electricity price cap, we are saving taxpayers millions and maintaining consumer choice.

Mr. Speaker, once again, I'd like to thank you and the House for the time and attention to outline this important bill. Like Bill 20, there are many pieces involved in Bill 21. It is complex, but then again our financial situation is complex. We need these changes to address our fiscal reality and get Alberta back on track.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to speak to Bill 21? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood has risen to speak, with 20 minutes.

Member Irwin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to say that I'm honoured to rise to speak to this, but I'm actually quite concerned about what I see in Bill 21, the Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019. Wow. What an interesting name for an act that takes so much away from hard-working Albertans and attacks the most vulnerable. We'll have to think of a better name for this act because that's certainly not – ensuring fiscal sustainability on the backs of a whole lot of Albertans is quite shameful. We know this is just another example of the budget taking money out of the pockets of our neighbours just so that they can pay for their $4.7 billion handout to big corporations.

As my colleague the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford spoke about earlier, this Bill 21 is a huge omnibus bill that combines a whole heck of a lot of things that should all, truly, be handled independently. I mean, I'll point to a lot of those measures here in my comments. These are huge. There are some huge pieces to this bill. It's hard for me, actually, to not get emotional because some of these hit really close to home in my riding of Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

But just to get back to conclude my comments about the omnibus bill, as I noted earlier, this was a technique that PM Harper used a lot as well. It's a sneaky attack of really just combining a whole lot of things and not allowing the fulsome debate that they should each have separately. There's so much in here, and I have a little bit of time to analyze Bill 21. The impact that each of these pieces will have on people across the province is going to be huge, and I don't think we'll know that full impact immediately either.

One of the things I want to speak about first of all and one of the ones, like I said, that hits very close to home in my own neighbourhood – of course, I live in the riding that I represent, Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood, and I've got a lot of friends, neighbours, people that I would call close friends, actually, who are on AISH, assured income for the severely handicapped. Let me tell you: I've heard from a lot of them over the last few days. A lot of them didn't believe it. They said: "No. There's no way this government is actually going to be attacking AISH. They're not actually going to do that."

Ms Hoffman: Fear and smear.

Member Irwin: Right. Exactly. That's the fear and smear sort of, you know, technique that they would say of us.

You know, prior to seeing this in writing, I would have said, "You know what; you're probably right," because truly it's a mere pittance in budgets that are billions of dollars. Yet here we are. It's happening. The indexing of AISH is being postponed.

Now, I was so proud when our government indexed AISH. I know my colleague from Calgary-McCall did a lot of great work. I actually had the honour of being able to work a little bit on that and connect with a lot of stakeholders who were so happy I was at that announcement. It was at Boyle Street Plaza in my riding. Right by Boyle Street Plaza there are actually a number of affordable housing complexes, and I've had the pleasure of visiting and knocking on doors there. Many of those folks are dependent on AISH.

When this government and when this Premier say things like, "You know, it's not onerous; it's small; it's a drop in the bucket," I can tell you – and I'll be the first to admit it; I don't know how much I should say – that we definitely should have done more. We know that. We started to do good work to support low-income Albertans, and I will say, because I don't mind being fully transparent, that I think there was more that needed to be done, absolutely. But for the members opposite to say, "You waited this long, and it's just going to be a delay, and it's not going to be onerous," it's absolutely false. A few dollars a month makes a significant impact for folks who are struggling.

In fact, I had someone message me just yesterday, someone who is on AISH, someone who is severely disabled, and she's worried. She said: I'm already struggling day in, day out. I'm not someone who wastes money. She said that she manages her budget as closely as she can, and she's worried. I'm sure many of my colleagues in this House have heard similar stories. I know some of the ministers have the habit of saying to us to come visit their ridings and hear from people in their ridings. Well, you know what? I would like to extend that offer to the Finance minister. I could probably set him up with 20, 30, 50 meetings with folks who are going to be severely impacted by the choices that this government is making, and they'd love to be able to talk to him about that face to face. Please, the offer is out there, Minister. Consider taking it up.

Now, with this omnibus bill, in addition to AISH, I mentioned that affordable housing is impacted, because the indexing of benefits also impacts income support, the seniors' lodge program. I, too, have the benefit of having a number of seniors' lodges in my riding, many of which are for seniors on fixed incomes. Now, let's look at some of the attacks. This is another attack on seniors. We've seen that their drug plans for dependants have been stripped back. Again, I can point to a whole heck of a lot of seniors in my own riding who would say that the cuts to the seniors' lodge program are going to impact them quite severely.

Where else? So far we've talked about attacks on folks with disabilities, AISH recipients, attacks on folks living in affordable housing. Postsecondary students: this was another one that the minister just tried to again minimize. I just heard him say – I'm not sure if I captured all of what he said there – that, you know, the student loan increase is hardly going to make an impact on our postsecondary students. I think he said something like: oh, it's only $15 a month. Again, if you're a postsecondary student who's facing a whole heck of a lot of expenses right now, any increases are not just minimal. I find it offensive that this government continues to minimize things. I don't know if they've just never been in that situation – I know I certainly have been there, and I think a lot of my colleagues have as well – when you are trying to get by at the end of the month and you're not sure how you're going to pay for things and how stressful, how unbelievably stressful, that is. So I find it quite offensive that this government continues to minimize these thousands of cuts that keep coming.

[The Speaker in the chair]

Bill 21 includes – again, I know folks are just starting to learn about some of the impacts of Bill 21 – increasing student loan interest rates by 1 per cent. Okay? It also ends the tuition freeze. You know, we heard the Minister of Advanced Education saying something along the lines that he heard students saying that they wanted this. Well, what a farce. We've got families trying to make ends meet, families sometimes that are trying to support their children who are in postsecondary education, and we've got students who are having to support themselves entirely, again, attacks on many students who are already struggling.

You know, I met, actually, with two folks, with students' union executives just a couple of days ago, and they were recapping some of the impacts of this government's budget. This was prior to seeing all the details of Bill 21, in fact, so I'm quite interested to hear what they have to say now.

In addition to the end of the tuition freeze, they also spoke about the tax credits – right? – which is in the other bill, Bill 20, the point being that this is, I think, a three-pronged attack on postsecondary students right there: the tuition freeze, a student loan increase, and the tax credits. I'm sure I'm missing things. My colleagues can certainly . . .

Ms Hoffman: STEP.

Member Irwin: STEP. Thank you. Yeah, so a lack of employment opportunities.

Not only are they getting – I've got to watch my language – hooped when it comes to affordability . . . [interjections] Yes, hooped. That's right. They are also getting equally hooped when they're trying to access employment opportunities. So it's, in fact, a four-pronged attack on postsecondary students. Again, I'm sure I'm missing some elements there as well.

So I can't imagine being in postsecondary. It was hard enough being a postsecondary student years ago. You know, even when I was a university student in the early 2000s, it was hard, but tuition was even a little bit more affordable back then. So I'm quite worried.

This argument, you know, that the minister mentioned, that it's because we're spending more than other provinces – we're spending more than other provinces; thus, let's gouge kids and their families – like, why is this the argument? Why is it: other provinces do it – or don't do it, depending on the case – so we should, too? Right? Why can't we just be world-class leaders in postsecondary education? Why can't we just be good for the sake of being good? Why do we have to lower our standards to match other provinces? I mean, taking the lead from provinces that have been named already this evening like Ontario and Saskatchewan: I'm not sure if we should be taking a whole lot of lessons from those jurisdictions. Again, this argument that, well, other provinces did it: I don't buy that, and I certainly don't think postsecondary students should have to suffer because of this very low bar.

Okay. So where are we at now? We've talked about attacks on – I'm just going to keep recapping because this is a giant omnibus bill and we need to be reminded of all the elements within it – postsecondary students, AISH recipients, those living in affordable housing. Let's move on.

Ms Hoffman: Seniors.

Member Irwin: Seniors. Thank you. I missed seniors in that recap.

Workers. Now, one of the interesting things – “interesting” is probably not the right word. One of the elements of this large Bill 21 is allowing the government essentially to have greater oversight over collective bargaining. We've seen today the Finance minister talk about the need to restrict the salaries of civil servants, and as I noted on social media, mark my words: this is not simply an attack on a few civil servants. This is a sign of what's to come. This is an attack on the wages of the teacher that's teaching your kids, of the nurse who's caring for your loved ones, of the social worker who's protecting the most vulnerable, and a whole heck of a lot of other hard-working Albertans. We've already seen these attacks in a number of ways, and I very much worry that there's going to be further intervention over collective bargaining agreements and further attacks on the constitutional rights of Alberta's workers.

I could go on about a number of other things. I'd rather have some of my colleagues who are far more knowledgeable on a few of the other pieces like, for instance, the attacks on medical professionals and so on – I'm quite concerned about that. I know we've heard from some medical professionals who are already concerned about the government in Bill 21 having the ability to unilaterally terminate the doctor compensation agreement. I point out that example without a lot of specifics just to say that, again, we can add medical professionals, we can add doctors to the list of hard-working Albertans who are being attacked by this government under this budget and, in this case, Bill 21.

What I would like to do is end my comments by just again noting that Bill 21 is very much an attack on Albertans. It's an attack on my neighbours. It's an attack on many folks who I call friends, and I'm going to challenge this government to think about how much in this bill was actually in their platform. Judging by the feedback I'm getting from commenting on this government's budget, I would bet that many of the members opposite are hearing a lot as well, that they're hearing from those public service workers who are feeling that their rights are being stripped away, hearing from AISH recipients, hearing from seniors, and hearing from postsecondary students.

I would urge the members opposite to consider not supporting this bill. I mean, you were all told – we had this discussion earlier in the year – that you had a right to sort of vote by conscience. My conscience is definitely telling me that there are a lot of morally indefensible elements in Bill 21.

On that note, thank you for the opportunity to speak to this bill.

The Speaker: Hon. members, anyone else wishing to join in the debate this evening? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora has risen.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the members for the opportunity to engage in debate on Bill 21. I definitely have a number of concerns that align with those raised by my colleague the hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood, who so accurately identified the AISH cuts and how problematic those are for many Albertans living on fixed income.

I want to tell you about door-knocking in 2015, actually. One of the buildings I went to was entirely occupied by people who are living on AISH income alone. They'd never had anyone door-knock on their building, they told me. They were very excited to have an opportunity to engage about political issues. They weren't exactly sure how and what to say, and one of their support workers who was there said: tell them about what it's like to live on AISH.

They told me that they don't have enough money to take a taxi to go see their mom on Sundays and that if they could take a taxi across town to go see their mom on Sundays, that would make a big difference in their lives. About 30 bucks. They can take DATS, and DATS can do their best to get there at the right time, but DATS is funded through provincial funding to municipalities. That's now being cut as well. So DATS, which was already very difficult and not as reliable as being able to take a taxi on a Sunday to go see your mom, has now gotten even more downloaded on them, and we'll see what the municipality does to determine how they will address their budget pressures that are being handed down to them by the province.

In 2015, when they told me that it would make a big difference to have just a little bit of extra money to do things like take a taxi, I brought that forward to the then Premier and the minister responsible for community and social services. It was clear that if we wanted to show respect, rather than nickelling and diming folks, we would find a way to make sure that their already quite tight cost of living would at least be indexed so that when the Conference Board of Canada says that there's 2 per cent inflation, they'd at least get 2 per cent more to be able to meet their needs, not a huge luxury but something that would make a tangible difference and not in a way that was demeaning or disrespectful to people about making their own decisions about their own money. We often hear folks say, you know, that a dollar in the pocket is more empowering for somebody to make their own choices if it's their own dollar. That's being taken away from people who are living on the necessity of AISH, which, again, is assured income for the severely handicapped. These are a lot of folks who don't have the ability to work a little bit more or to access another program, so I am very disheartened by that.

Also, the seniors' lodge program, income support and the seniors' lodge program. Again, these are things that I often hear members talk about, the importance of having seniors' lodges in their ridings. This is being eroded through this failure to index these programs this year. I think that it's quite cowardly to go after folks who require the benefits of the government to be able to live, quite frankly.

Excluding budget officers, system analysts, auditors, and employees who perform similar functions from the bargaining units: just another way of sort of hacking away at some of the folks who are part of a bargaining unit, have the ability to actually work collectively and be able to do their work as part of a larger team. Okay. Maybe not quite as vindictive, but again I wouldn't call that exactly something that was a big campaign promise or that somebody put in a platform.

Reversing the replacement worker ban on public sectors: I don't believe this is constitutional. There was a Supreme Court ruling. The government of the day acted in accordance with the Supreme Court ruling to bring in this replacement worker ban in the public sector. You know, I said it in the last session a number of times, and I don't want to have to keep saying it in this session, but this bill seems incredibly ripe for legal challenge, legal challenge that we will almost certainly fail in. I don't know why the government seems so focused on spending so much money hiring lawyers to argue things that the Supreme Court has already determined.

That just seems like irresponsible fiscal management. When you're making an investment in a business, you would look at your business's viability. You would look at the market conditions. If I'm opening a small business, I'd look at similar small businesses and what they've experienced in the market and if there's enough room for them to succeed and, therefore, for me to succeed. If there's a small business that tried to open that had a similar model to mine and they were proven to have failed in that market, it would be irresponsible of me to take money, especially taxpayer money, and invest it in something that was exactly the same that had already proven to be a failure.

That's what we're doing here through this bill because jurisdictions already tried this, and the Supreme Court already made their ruling. All we were doing was complying with the ruling, complying with the order of the law, the letter of the law. Now we're going to change it, fight it, go back to court, spend a bunch of money on legal challenges, and almost certainly lose. That, to me, doesn't seem fiscally responsible or morally responsible. It certainly isn't fiscally responsible.

Ending the tuition freeze for three years. This I find, again, quite rich given that many members of this House – the Speaker of this Assembly was elected as a member of the government caucus. The Speaker of the Assembly, I know, was a member of this House when we brought in this freeze, and I believe it was voted on by all parties represented in this House – the members for Calgary-Fish Creek, Central Peace-Notley, Athabasca-Barrhead-Westlock, and the hon. Speaker. When these things were voted on, if it was never the intention to actually follow through on them, why did they vote in that way?

I can tell you that if they said, "Well, we have a different fiscal situation now," the difference is the $4.7 billion no-jobs corporate handout. The difference isn't the market conditions because I think anyone who can read projections knew the kind of downturn that we were in and that it wasn't something that Alberta was isolated from. In fact, Alberta was rebounding more quickly than other jurisdictions. You know, when the conditions were very similar, in fact a little bit better – there were 27,000 more people working at that point than now – why was it okay to vote for a freeze at that time and now, today, tear up that freeze? Is it because that wouldn't be popular? Is it because that wouldn't be seen as something that voters would probably be keen to support?

Well, what about increasing student loan interest payments by 1 per cent? One per cent doesn't sound like a lot, right? Again, it was, I think, over $600 per year when we sat down with Fajar and did the math. Right? Pretty significant when you're actually coming to the time when you have to repay, which is, essentially, right after you graduate, whether you have a high-paying job or not. Again, something that seems to be going after people who are choosing to invest in their own futures by going to postsecondary.

Ending the regulated rate option cap for electricity. Again, not something that any of the seniors in my riding or any of the families in my riding said: "You know what we need to do? We need to get rid of the cap on electricity prices. That would really fix things." Most of them say: I want my electricity to be more affordable; I want it to be lower. This bill is allowing the exact opposite to happen.

Here's the one I want to talk about for a little while, though, because I've spent a lot of time thinking about it from a number of different angles. That again is one that I think is setting us up for a legal challenge that we will lose. That's the allocation of prac IDs, or practitioner IDs, for new practitioners of medicine to be restricted in the province of Alberta. I know that all of us, I hope all of us, want patients to be able to access a doctor or a nurse practitioner when and where they're needed. The right care in the right place at the right time, somebody once said.

To go through with this bill, which puts limits on that and actually says – let's imagine. Let's imagine that I am a young person living in the city of Calgary. Let's imagine that I work hard my entire schooling, that I'm successful and get into university, that I get an undergraduate degree, that I eventually become a doctor and that I want to practise medicine in my hometown, my home city of Calgary, Alberta. If the Minister of Health, which seems very likely, based on all of the back and forth there's been about this in the last few days, determines that Calgary isn't a place where the minister, he or she, may want me to practise, then I don't have the legal right to practise medicine in my home city. Insert the name of community here. It could be Athabasca; it could be Barrhead. Barrhead: lovely hometown. The lovely hometown of Barrhead.

I think one of the things that the Health minister is hoping is that by grandfathering existing practitioners, they won't push back. I want to say that I looked at the court challenges from other jurisdictions. I think it was B.C. where they almost didn't push back, but you know who did? The residents, the med students, and they convinced their association to go to court. When they went to court, the court said: "Absolutely, it's unconstitutional. You can't tell people where to live and where to work. If they want to live and work in their province in a variety of places, they have the right to do that."

10:00

Why wouldn't we look at these court challenges that seem very parallel – Quebec had a very similar one even more recently – and think: "What's our probability of winning? Before I hire a bunch of lawyers, before I create a bunch of chaos, before I cause a bunch of disarray, what's my probability of winning if I do this thing that so many have said is unconstitutional? Let's actually look and see if it is?" I strongly, strongly believe that it is. I think that this is ripe for lots of lawyers to be very busy for maybe a short time, maybe a long time, but I think that at the end of the day the government will lose.

I don't think it's just about Edmonton and Calgary. I know that some people are saying: well, this is about making sure that folks end up in rural Alberta. I think that there will be many positions – again, the minister has talked about wanting to control the bundle, control the compensation. I think there could be many conditions where prac ids wouldn't be given in communities outside of Edmonton and Calgary as well. If I were that long-standing physician who the minister says will be grandparented into this system and I wanted to sell my practice in Barrhead, Alberta – let's say that I'm nearing retirement, I've been saving my whole life, I have a private practice, and the Minister of Health chooses not to allow a prac ID for a physician who chooses to come and buy my practice, then that actually impacts the physician of today in a very meaningful financial way as well as the community because the community would in turn lose their physician.

For a government that has so often said, you know, "Supply and demand, and let the market play out," in this situation to really constrain – I believe that is unconstitutional – where people work and how they work in this way I think is ripe for a legal challenge, and I think it's also ripe for disarray in our communities and distrust. I know that it can be tough. The buck does stop with the minister. This is putting even more on the minister, saying that we are going to determine where people work and if they can work. I don't think it will stand up. I think that there will be a lot of push-back both from the medical community as well as from communities right across this province. I imagine the minister has heard from some towns already that really want more physicians to be working in their communities, so putting on further limitations,

I think, is going to be highly problematic. Again, to that kid who's living in your riding, who aspires to become a doctor and work in their hometown, this is completely counter to their hopes and dreams. I think that that is highly problematic. I think also that allowing conditions on those new practitioners is something that, again, won't stand up.

I want to say that one of the other things is that it allows changes to the master agreement with the Alberta Medical Association, allowing changes, essentially, around unilateral implementation of an agreement. I want to say that I know it's hard and I know that this is a powerful collective that the government is negotiating with, but one of the reasons why they are so powerful is because they are so needed in our society. I have to say how concerned I am that these changes are being brought forward, and I don't think that the ramifications have been considered.

The Speaker: Well, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. I just might note that I thought we were very close to playing a game of question period Jeopardy! there with the right place and the right time and the right care, for those who have been around for a little while.

We're at 29(2)(a), and I see that the hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore caught my eye.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate that very much. You know, I always appreciate the insights from the Member for Edmonton-Glenora. I especially appreciate her insights around education not only as a former school board trustee but as a school board chair as well. As folks know, Edmonton-Decore is home to 26 schools, three of them being high schools, and all of the high schools north of the Yellowhead freeway. When I look at Bill 21 and ending the tuition freeze and increasing student loans by 1 per cent, I'm just wondering what kind of conversations the Member for Edmonton-Glenora has had with the students that she's come in contact with, not only just over the last few months but over the last several years and including her time as board chair. I'm wondering how excited students are. Do they come running up to her, excited about paying extra for their student loans, having to pay extra in order to attend university after 12 years of school? I was wondering if she could share again some of those insights around that from some of the students in her area.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, a number of students have talked to me about their hopes and dreams for the future, and that's a good thing. Thinking about a career path and how one might be able to embark upon that is something that I was really proud to make part of our focus at Edmonton public when I was on the board and that they continue with to this day. I was in a grade 6 class recently where a student put up their hand and said: "What university should I go to? What should I do now to build my resumé to become an MLA?" I thought that was a really exciting question for them to be thinking about already in grade 6. "If I want to be on this career path, how can I set myself up for success?" I had a lot to say in response to that, and maybe that will come up another day, but today I will say that I told them we have the best public institutions in this province.

I had the honour of attending both a private university here, Concordia University – at the time it was Concordia University College of Alberta; I think now it's Concordia University of Edmonton – as well as the University of Alberta. I said: "You know, we have great institutions here. I don't think you need to move away to pursue a career in politics or, really, any other career." I think that we have worked to expand career options in the province. For example, we recently brought in the vet program at the University of Calgary. You don't have to move out of province anymore to become a vet. A lot of kids want to be vets – right? – so that was something that they were very excited to hear.

Now, I will still talk with hope and optimism, but I have to say that the despair that I feel around the significant increase to tuition that is being unpacked through this budget, about 7 per cent a year for the next three years at least, is substantial. When you compound that, that's about 24 per cent in such a short period of time. When I think about the increase to tuition, when I think about the elimination of the tax credit, when I think about the differential rate in what students and nonstudents are paid at their jobs now, when I think about the elimination of the STEP program, which gave summer temporary employment opportunities to so many Albertans, something that is very rich in the fibre of this province – I imagine many of us in this House worked as STEP students.

I'll take a moment to tell you about my first STEP placement. It was the only STEP placement because it turned into long-term employment for me. It was with the Alberta Community Crime Prevention Association. I wasn't studying criminology. I wasn't studying to be a police officer, but I was in education. They said: this is something that we think would be an asset for somebody with an educational background to be a summer student here, and we also think it would be beneficial for you as a future teacher to understand the realities of crime and crime prevention in our province. I was really glad that they took that opportunity to invest in me. They were able to, as a nonprofit operating with a very, very tight budget, because they had a government grant through STEP to be able to do that. Down the road it was able to be parlayed into part-time employment that lasted for a few years, indeed. Actually, I was employed by the sister of the principal of one of the high schools you just mentioned, hon. member. Sue Bell's sister ended up being my employer at that time.

It's amazing how all of these come back together and how when we take away from the opportunities that students have, I think it really hurts us as a society. I'm deeply concerned about this budget in that regard.

The Speaker: Hon. members, anyone else wishing to join in the debate today? I see the hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Shandro: Well, yes, Mr. Speaker. Just to bring some clarification about the amendments that would propose to allow the Minister of Health to issue prac IDs, or practitioner IDs, to physicians after April 2022. Just to bring some clarity to that, I appreciate the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora's concerns about Quebec, but this is something that has happened in other jurisdictions, most notably in New Brunswick, where it has been rolled out with some success. I suggest that the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora research what is happening in New Brunswick with the prac IDs there and the success there so that a future Minister of Health here in Alberta could have the opportunity for us to ensure that as we see continued increases in physician supply, we can make sure that after 2022 the physicians that we have, depending on geography, depending on specialty, depending on any other condition that the Minister of Health or its designate may see, can allow us to ensure that physician supply is distributed throughout the province in the most efficient way and in the best interests of patients in the province.

The Speaker: Standing order 29(2)(a). If anyone has a brief question or a comment, you're welcome to make one if you'd so desire. The hon. Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd just like to follow up on the comments from the Member for Edmonton-Glenora, just on one narrow issue in regard to the removal of the replacement worker ban. The hon. member suggested that this was unconstitutional. I just want to state that, you know, this is incorrect. The hon. member is correct, however, in stating that in response to a Supreme Court decision on the Saskatchewan Federation of Labour, the previous government changed the legislation here in Alberta. In that change, where at one point in time government employees did not have the right to strike, they gave them the right to strike, but at the same time they ensured that essential services needed to be provided, and they put in place essential services provisions. That is all correct, and that was in response to the SFL.

What they also did was that they put a ban on replacement workers, and that was not noted in the Supreme Court decision. Quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, there are a number of jurisdictions in Canada that have essential services legislation, which include Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, and New Brunswick. These are all constitutional, and they do not include a ban on replacement workers.

In this legislation we are removing the ban on replacement workers. This was a campaign commitment that our government made, and we are following through with that campaign commitment. Promise made, promise kept.

The Speaker: Is there anyone else that would like to make a brief question or comment under 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Calgary-South East.

Mr. Jones: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the ministers for clarifying for the members opposite. I, too, had an interesting door-knocking experience, like the member opposite who spoke before the minister. I was door-knocking in real life – it's about as far away from Twitter as possible – and the person that opened the door reminded me of a quote from the previous and worst Finance minister in Alberta's history. His comment went something like: we will not balance the budget on the backs of Albertans. This person asked me a great question. He said: do you think the NDP will ever realize that the source of the fiscal restraint measures they're protesting is them? I just wanted to leave that with them to think about.

The Speaker: Anyone else have a brief question or comment?

Ms Hoffman: Just to get this straight, I think what I just heard the member say is that the reason why they're taking $30 away from somebody living in their own riding who's surviving on AISH is because the last government gave an increase to that same AISH recipient in the final year of its term. If that really is what the hon. member is advocating for, I have to say that I hope that the next time he knocks on the door of somebody who's surviving on AISH, who can't afford to take a taxi to go see mom on Sunday, he says that to their face, because I don't think it would pass. I don't think they would say: yeah; you're right; the reason why I don't deserve increases here is because I got one last year.

I think that that is quite disrespectful both to Albertans who are living on such a fixed income as well as to Her Majesty's Official Opposition. I think it is our job to stand in this House and fight for ordinary families. I think it's the job of everyone in this House to stand in this House and fight for ordinary families, not make excuses for a $4.7 billion corporate giveaway, that is listed on page 144 of the fiscal plan, that outlines specifically that the returns are not being seen in jobs or income.

So, you know, I appreciate that folks try to say, "Well, fear and smear; we're not going to cut AISH," but then AISH gets cut.

“Well, fear and smear; we’re not going to attack students,” but then students get cut. “Well, fear and smear; we’re not going to go after seniors,” yet we’re kicking 46,000 of them off the drug plan. Like, the list goes on. I will very proudly stand up in this place for people who deserve to have a government have their back in times of fiscal challenge as well as fiscal surplus.

Again, if this was done and the budget was going to be balanced any sooner, maybe those arguments would have some validity. But the budget is not going to be balanced any sooner. In fact, this year’s deficit is $2 billion more than the projections were for it to be. I think that is a sad reality, that sometimes people try to misconstrue or divert blame or responsibility. The government today has made the choice to take $30 away from somebody who is living on AISH, and I think that that’s disrespectful and shameful.

Speaker’s Ruling Question-and-comment Period

The Speaker: Hon. members, I’d just like to provide some clarification about the use of 29(2)(a), and to be very clear, this comment is not directed at the Member for Edmonton-Glenora but is more of a broader discussion around the use of 29(2)(a). The purpose of 29(2)(a) is a brief question or comment for the previous speaker. In this case that was the Minister of Health. This particular Speaker has taken a very wide swath on the use of 29(2)(a). If the House will roll into question period, where any member will ask any question, then perhaps the swath may have to be narrowed in order to maintain order inside the Assembly.

Debate Continued

The Speaker: Are there others wishing to join the debate this evening? The hon. Member for Calgary-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to join debate on the Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019. In general, I think that over the last four years in particular, when you see the title of an act, you would guess that it would somewhat remotely be touching on what the title is. In this case it’s an omnibus bill that touches on many different pieces of legislation, policies, and services and fundamentally changes many things for many Albertans. All those changes could have been easily debated as stand-alone pieces in this House.

It reminds me of a bill that we brought forward in the Third Session, Bill 30, An Act to Protect the Health and Well-being of Working Albertans. Essentially, the bill was dealing with two areas. One was the Occupational Health and Safety Act, and the other was the Workers’ Compensation Act. Many of the members who I see on that side now, when they were on this side, basically found every argument from the book Beauchesne and all those procedural books to argue how omnibus our legislation was and how we needed to split that legislation. Essentially, there were motions to that effect.

Generally speaking, I guess a bill will be termed as omnibus if it consists of a number of related but separate parts, but generally there will be some common theme when you add all of those in one piece of legislation. But when I look at this Bill 21, I think the only common theme in this bill is that through these changes, through all these amendments to these pieces of legislation, this UCP government is taking money away from Albertans and using it to pay for their $4.7 billion corporate handout.

Let’s look at the list of acts that it’s changing, amending. It deals with the Alberta Health Care Insurance Act. It deals with the Alberta Housing Act. It deals with the Alberta Utilities Commission Act. It deals with the Assured Income for the Severely Handicapped Act, and I will talk briefly about that.

When we were in government, we worked with Albertans, many advocates, many individuals who were living with disabilities on how their supports have not kept pace with inflation. Even when there were increases like $400, even after those increases, the value of their benefits would erode with the passage of time because of inflation, and they would have to beg government after government, in particular Progressive Conservative, PC, governments, for an increase in their benefits. All they were asking was that we should index these benefits to the CPI so that over time the value of their benefits doesn’t erode and they don’t have to ask for these increases, beg for these increases every year or every election cycle.

Essentially, with the changes we brought forward through Bill 26 – that was the number of that bill – they were precisely doing that. They were indexing AISH benefits, they were indexing employment and income support benefits, they were indexing seniors’ benefits, and taking politics out of these benefits so that for these individuals, who are often among the most vulnerable ones, their benefits are protected from inflation.

During the campaign, when we were saying that this UCP would cut these benefits, again it was said that that was fear and smear. I even remember this Premier, then the leader of the UCP, making a video and essentially saying that whatever I had said about the UCP cutting benefits, that was not true, that that was not in their platform.

Ms Hoffman: It sure wasn’t.

Mr. Sabir: It wasn’t there.

I think the video ended with: shame on you, Minister, and whatnot; we will always stand with disabled people. What we are seeing here is that if these changes were not made, AISH would have seen a $32 increase – this may not be huge, but for a person living on $1,688, it’s a huge increase – on January 1. This pause, so far, is indefinite. There is no time limit. They are saying that it’s temporary, but there is no sunset clause in it on when it will end. So you are taking $32 out of the pockets of these most vulnerable individuals. When I was saying that back then, I guess I was right, and shame on all of you for taking $32 out of the pockets of disabled Albertans.

This act will also change An Act to Cap Regulated Electricity Rates. Under this piece of legislation the regulated rate for electricity was capped until mid-2021. This change will change that date to November 30, 2019. As early as in December Albertans can expect that their bills will be higher than what they ought to be because today the rate is capped at 6.8 cents to protect consumers. If we look at the August rates, they were somewhere at 10.17 cents or something. Even on that rate every Albertan household will be paying an average of $20 to $25 more. As early as November people can expect, Albertans can expect, that their bill will be higher by $20 to $25. That’s what this change is doing, again, taking money out of the pockets of Albertans, out of the pockets of families.

Then it also changes the Employment Standards Code, the financial services act, the Fiscal Planning and Transparency Act, and the Income and Employment Supports Act. I will speak to that Income and Employment Supports Act. The Income and Employment Supports Act will also deindex those benefits. Those benefits were kept low by successive Progressive Conservative governments for 44 years. When we became government, they were somewhere around $640 for an individual. We increased them and we indexed them so that people, who from no fault of their own if they are not able to find employment or if they are in the category of barriers to full employment, where they have multiple other issues, get the supports they need to live with dignity and be able to put food on the table, a roof over their head.

Even with that increase, I think that still those benefits were quite low, and it was still very difficult to get by with those benefits. But what this UCP government is doing, with those minimal increases, maybe $10 or $15 that they were supposed to get on January 1, they are taking that $10 away from them so that they can pay $4.7 billion in corporate handouts.

Then they're making changes to the Labour Relations Code, to the Police Act. My other colleagues have talked about it and, I guess, are better equipped to talk about it, so I will leave that, but I will speak to the Post-secondary Learning Act. In this province I think the Minister of Advanced Education was the only person who was told by students that they want their fees to go high, and they didn't like the tuition freeze. That's why they're removing that cap, so that tuition can skyrocket. Not only that, but they are making changes to the interest rate that is payable on student loans, making it more expensive for students to pay off their loans.

They're changing tax credits, how students were able to claim those taxes, and they're changing grants and all those things, thus making postsecondary education a luxury for few. That cap, when it was there, was there to make sure that postsecondary education remains affordable for all Albertans. It was saving students somewhere from $2,000 to $3,000 over the course of their education. Again, this government is attacking students and their parents, their families to pay for their irresponsible no-jobs $4.7 billion corporate handout.

Ms Hoffman: No jobs.

Mr. Sabir: Yeah. Instead, we lost 27,000 jobs after that.

Then they're changing the Provincial Offences Procedure Act. Again, the fines, the larger portion of fines, will be kept by the province. They are changing the public-sector employment act. They are changing the Public Service Act. They are changing the Public Service Employee Relations Act. They are changing the Seniors Benefit Act.

10:30

What the Seniors Benefit Act was doing was that it was indexing their benefits – that benefit is somewhere from $150 to $275 – and that senior would see an increase of $6 to $7. And they still refuse to pay that $6 to $7. On the $315, that other benefit, another $6 to $7 increase, they are taking away that money from seniors. That's on top of other things that are in this budget where seniors will see their services cut, like seniors' drug plans. Wherever I look in all these changes, I think only one thing is common: through this piece of legislation this government is taking money from seniors, from their seniors' benefit, they are taking money from employees, taking money from municipalities, taking money from students, taking money from AISH recipients, taking money from income support and employment support recipients, and they are giving it to the wealthiest in the shape of a $4.7 billion corporate handout.

One last thing, and then I will conclude. This year . . .

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. Would anyone like to add a brief question or a comment under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, is there anyone else that would like to join in the debate? I see the hon. deputy government whip.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I move to adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

The Speaker: The hon. the deputy government whip.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for recognizing me again. I move that we adjourn the Assembly until tomorrow, October 30, at 1:30 p.m.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 10:33 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Wednesday, October 30, 2019

Prayers

The Speaker: Hon. members, the prayer. Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and her government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideas but, laying aside all private interests and prejudice, keep in mind their responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all. Amen.

Please be seated.

Statement by the Speaker

Royal Canadian Legion Poppy Campaign

The Speaker: Hon. members, before introductions today I would like to just make a quick note. I know that I sent an e-mail to all of you yesterday morning regarding Legion poppies. Thank you, all, very much for making your donations. My office will continue to collect those donations for the duration of the annual poppy drive. It has also been brought to my attention that should you forget a poppy and you're seeking one from a page and you are unable to provide them with a donation for your poppy, you are able to text the Royal Canadian Legion, obviously not from the Legislative Assembly Chamber floor but immediately following question period or otherwise, at 20222 to make a $5 donation.

I thank you for your continued support of this important cause.

Introduction of Visitors

The Speaker: Hon. members, I had the opportunity to meet with a very special visitor, and this afternoon it is my great pleasure to welcome him here to the Assembly. In the Speaker's gallery is the minister of national security, police, and correctional services for the government of the Solomon Islands. You'll note that the government of Solomon Islands offered a gift to the Legislative Assembly today, and I thought it would be nice for us to be able to display it in the Chamber while they are visiting. The Hon. Anthony Veke is an accomplished minister of the federal government there as well as the former Premier of the province which he represents. I invite him to rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

Also, accompanying the minister today is the honorary consul general for the Solomon Islands, Mr. Ashwant Dwivedi. Accompanying him today is Mr. Deepak Hari. Thank you so much for joining us. Please rise and receive the welcome of the Assembly.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Hon. members, visiting us today from Calgary-Beddington are grade 6 students from the Simons Valley school. Thank you so much for joining us, grade 6 students.

Also joining us today are guests of the Minister of Health from Diabetes Canada. Welcome Randeep Birdi, Barb Warechuk, Rhonda Stevens, Melanie Hibbard, Lynne and Lilly-Anna LeClerc, Tammy Wilson, Qandeel Shafqat, and Isabelle Emery. Welcome.

Hon. members, please welcome all of our guests to the Assembly.

Provincial Fiscal Position and Government Policies

Mr. Gotfried: Mr. Speaker, my late father spent over 30 years with MGM, so in his memory I embrace the cinematic theme of Back to the Future. Yes, I'm talking about my favourite blockbuster, the Alberta advantage, a Panavision of a bright, widescreen future as each and every Albertan yearns for the sequel. The star: a thriving energy sector honouring our blessing of rich natural resources, with a backdrop of pipelines that we continue to fight for as our right within Confederation.

The scene unfolds of the railway of the new millennium and a remake of the scenes of The Last Spike as the first of many pipes. The screenplay reflects our spirit of environmental stewardship and energy innovation with a cast of globally recognized superheroes. Supporting players deliver Academy Award winning performances as world-class health care zooming in on nation-leading patient outcomes. Education takes centre stage as future generations embrace limitless choice and blur the lines between academia and trades in setting the scene for ambitious lifelong learners.

A thriving cast emerges in the building, development, and nonprofit sectors, ensuring that housing choice and affordability truly are pillars of the Alberta advantage. Cameos from our emerging stars of innovation and entrepreneurial spirit will continue to drive our province forward as a beacon of free enterprise in Canada, North America, and the world. From the wings emerge transportation and air services essential to our province and connectivity to the region, nation, and world markets. The spotlight shines on agriculture, forestry, and tourism as our rising stars in investment diversification and employment growth.

As the credits roll, applause breaks out for our incredible nonprofit, charitable, and faith-based sectors carrying the day and ensuring that the Alberta advantage is not just a box office hit but a classic to be enjoyed by all generations in the future to come.

Mr. Speaker, let's all work together as we embrace the concept of Team Alberta: prosperous, strong, and free in our fierce battle for a return to the Alberta advantage.

Thank you.

The Speaker: I recognize the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Fort Edmonton Park

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As the MLA for Edmonton-Whitemud I have the distinct pleasure of representing the constituency that houses Edmonton's premier cultural attraction, Fort Edmonton Park, the largest living-history museum in Canada. In the 45 years since the Fort opened, it has served countless kids, seniors, families, and field trips, descendants learning about their past, and new Canadians learning the history of their new home. From the fur trade era to the time of early settlement and the development of Edmonton as a city, the fort houses over 200 years of our history. Through interactive exhibits, historical structures, and excellent staff and volunteers, Fort Edmonton entertains and educates any Albertans that cross through its gates. I have many fond memories of my time at Fort Edmonton Park over the years, memories that I'm now creating with my young children.

The Fort Edmonton Foundation has undertaken a landmark initiative to expand and improve the fort and the experience of its visitors. Dollars invested by the NDP government along with funding from the city of Edmonton and extraordinary fundraising by the foundation are being used to expand the attractions we love and to make important additions. I'm particularly excited for the planned interactive indigenous peoples experience to better understand and immerse in the lived experiences of First Nations and Métis ancestors.

Fort Edmonton Park is a shining example of how investment in history, art, and culture grows the tourism industry, stimulates the economy, and creates meaningful employment, yet this UCP government refuses to see the multitude of benefits that these investments bring to Albertans from every walk of life. They have instead chosen to cut our history and culture in favour of corporate friends, prioritizing $4.7 billion in giveaways to wealthy corporations over the needs of Albertans and communities. Preserving our foundations and our past are not inefficiencies, but this government is treating them this way.

I'm proud to continue to support the great work of the Fort Edmonton Foundation, both personally and as a member of a party that values our history and understands that knowing where we come from will guide where we're going. On behalf of my children and so many families and Albertans I want to thank the Fort Edmonton Foundation for their work to enrich our lives and preserve the history we should all value.

Diabetes Awareness

Ms Issik: Mr. Speaker, I'm honoured today to speak about an issue that is important to me and to many Albertans. November is Diabetes Awareness Month, and global diabetes awareness day is on November 14. Diabetes is a serious disease that affects Albertans every single day. Today in question period we have advocates from Diabetes Canada visiting us here in the Legislature. These representatives are not just advocates. Many of them are either living with type 1 or type 2 diabetes, are parents of children with the disease, or health care professionals, and they are here to emphasize the seriousness of diabetes in Alberta and in Canada.

On diabetes awareness day Canadians across the country will wear blue in recognition of the millions of Canadians living with diabetes. Today I wear blue to recognize the 1.1 million Albertans that are living with diabetes or prediabetes and to recognize the work of organizations like Diabetes Canada, who bring awareness of and provide education on the disease.

Each year World Diabetes Day has a theme. This year's theme is the family. It is important for us to recognize that this disease also impacts the family. With one-quarter of our population affected, diabetes is a serious health concern for our province. Not only does diabetes affect a sizable portion of our population, but some very serious complications can also result, including heart disease, stroke, kidney disease, blindness, and nerve damage.

Mr. Speaker, this can strain our health care system, but that's not why we strive to bring awareness. We bring awareness to this disease so that Albertans can reduce the risk of type 2 diabetes and ensure that the very serious health complications of both types of diabetes are avoided. Quality of life and the health of Albertans: that is why we bring awareness to diabetes, and that is why I'm so thankful for groups like Diabetes Canada and the work that they do.

The Speaker: I'll recognize the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Indigenous Relations

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Over the last few weeks I've been listening to members of the government side of the House talk about their approach to reconciliation with indigenous people. As often as not they like to suggest that no true path to reconciliation has been engaged in until recently. The idea seems to be that never have indigenous people been given the chance to truly participate in Alberta's economic blessings, stating that everything that has occurred in the past was merely a handout and not a hand up.

So let's plumb the depths of ridiculousness intrinsic to this UCP narrative. First, it is telling that the members opposite suggest that any actual monetary resource-sharing with indigenous communities is a handout. This shows an ignorance of treaties 6, 7, and 8, in which we agreed to share the land and the benefits of the land. When dollars flow to indigenous communities, it isn't some form of charity; it is the payment of a bill owed, just as when Albertans receive royalty payments from resource development, it is our right to receive the benefits of our resources. It is further telling that when programs are announced by this government that are directed at nonindigenous people, none of the government announcements refer to the monies involved as handouts.

Now let's take a look at the indigenous opportunities corporation. In the budget presented in this House, money only exists for the creation of the bureaucracy, not for any actual backstop of dollars. This is because the government is betting on never actually having to provide a single dime in actual resources to indigenous communities. If things work out the way government intends, the loans will be received and paid back without the government ever providing any actual assistance. We know this because the government has not booked a single dime in liability for the corporation in the budget.

Our government, on the other hand, worked with nations in all three treaty areas for large-scale wind projects that will mean long-term income for the nations. We worked to create solar projects in over 30 communities, and we worked with indigenous communities on over 100 projects related to the fulfillment of the United Nations declaration on the rights of indigenous peoples. That is the path to reconciliation.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Support for Persons with Disabilities

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. When I was much younger, I managed the Millican Ogden outdoor pool in Calgary, and every summer we were joined by Steve, who was a gentleman with Down syndrome in the community.

Steve would help run the store, check in the swimmers, fold the towels, and hang out with the patrons, but what made him such an important part of our team was the attitude that he brought every day. You couldn't help but smile and be in a good mood when Steve was on shift. The mark of a great society is our ability to lift up those around us, and I can tell you this: Steve lifted us up every day.

I have the good fortune of representing Calgary-Klein, which is home to hundreds of not-for-profits and civil society organizations. SCOPE and URSA are two of these amazing organizations, and over the last seven months I've had the good fortune of being able to hang out with them and spend a lot of time with their clients. Both of them work to create community and opportunities for persons with disabilities in our community, providing support and training for individuals and families. SCOPE and URSA work with hundreds of clients in dozens of programs with hundreds of volunteers, businesses, and staff throughout the local community.

Government's job is not to take over from the amazing work that's being done in our community by NGOs and community members, but it is to get behind these initiatives. Our civil society partners improve the livelihoods of Albertans because they provide something that is very difficult for government to provide. They provide community, a place of belonging, and opportunities for individuals of all walks of life to come together and be together and contribute.

Pam, the executive director of URSA, described the relationship like a cake. Government provides the flour and the milk, NGOs provide the sugar and the icing, and community brings the plates and the cutlery. I can tell you this: cake is a lot better with icing and even better when you have someone to share it with like my friend Steve.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Health Care Workforce

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Now, back in June I asked the Minister of Health a question. Did he recognize that breaking contracts with health care workers, talking about them like a problem to be solved or a cost to reduce instead of a valued partner in providing care, insults them, lowers their morale, and makes his job delivering quality and cost-effective health care for Albertans much harder to do? Well, with their recent actions, he and his colleagues have made it abundantly clear that they don't.

To be completely honest, though, it's not a big surprise. After all, this is a Premier who's on the record suggesting that health care workers are entitled and lazy, putting their feet up for coffee between surgeries. This Minister of Finance led his colleagues in disrespecting and breaking their contracts through force of law and had the audacity to claim that that was putting Albertans first. This Minister of Health threw out hundreds of hours of consultation with workers on developing much-needed lab services infrastructure, with no alternate plan, and at every turn this government works to disparage and shut out the union representatives that workers democratically elect to advocate for their interests.

Now, Mr. Speaker, after the sustained attack on workers' morale, this government, as we knew they would, is coming after the wages they earn and depend on to support their families. Despite the claims of the Minister of Finance these are Albertans – our neighbours, our families, our friends, partners of oil and gas workers – whose hard work supported their families, communities, and local businesses through difficult times. They are not entitled. They are not lazy. They are not overpaid. They're everyday people who've worked hard and sacrificed to hold our health care system together through years of chaos under Conservative governments because they're committed to providing the best care they can for each and every Albertan.

We will not achieve a stronger, more stable, and efficient health care system by attacking the workers who make it possible. We will not find success by telling them to do more with less for lower pay to fund a $4.7 billion corporate giveaway. I call on this minister and this government to drop their heavy-handed tactics and start treating our front-line health care workers with the respect they deserve.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul.

Lakeland Centre for FASD

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It is my pleasure to rise in the Chamber to bring attention to the Lakeland centre for fetal alcohol syndrome, based in my riding of Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul. FASD is an underestimated disability in this province. It affects roughly 4 per cent of the population of Alberta, or 172,000 people. However, these numbers may not fully reflect the depth of the problem as it is considered an invisible disability. Statistics show that there are more people with FASD than with Down syndrome, cerebral palsy, spina bifida, and autism combined.

The Lakeland FASD has a tremendous number of accomplishments under their belt. They are a leader in Alberta and Canada and are known for their work in developing innovative and effective ways to provide prevention, diagnostic, and intervention supports. The FASD centre in Cold Lake is the first of 12 service networks in Alberta, with the entire network system being modelled after it. The Lakeland centre plays an integral role in setting up new treatment facilities. Lakeland FASD was the first to offer diagnosis in Alberta. They established the first adult diagnostic clinic in the world. They've developed the first rural parent-child advocacy program, the first women-only live-in treatment program, and they have summer camps for children with FASD and the only FASD-specific summer employment service program. All of these programs and services serve 600 individuals each year, and they have diagnosed around 750 individuals since the year 2000. Over 75 women each year are served in the outreach support program to be alcohol free during pregnancy, and 237 women have attended the women's recovery program since 2012.

This organization is doing an extraordinary amount of good for a large and unseen problem many Albertans face. They serve more clients each year per capita than any other FASD clinic in the world. That is why I am proud to stand in this House to recognize and commend them for all of their hard work sincerely.

Thank you.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The hon. the Leader of the Official Opposition.

Budget 2019 and Public Service Front-line Workers

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, in the election this Premier said that he would, quote, find some savings without affecting front-line services. Instead, this budget slashes services, lays off front-line workers, and now he's pushing for a 5 per cent wage cut, all to pay for his $4.7 billion handout to wealthy corporations. To the Premier: when he said that he would cut wasteful spending to maintain the front line, was he referring to the paycheques belonging to the nurses who care for our loved ones, and if so, why didn't he come clean during the election?

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

1:50

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, with respect to the $4.7 billion figure, the leader of the NDP now knows repeatedly that that is a complete falsehood. You know, my mom used to say that repeating a lie doesn't make something true. With respect to the fiscal situation, the reason why we have to reduce spending is because the NDP left us in a huge hole by overprojecting revenues by $6 billion and leaving us holding the bag on their multibillion-dollar crude-by-rail fiasco, but we're going to do the responsible thing and get our finances in order.

The Speaker: A point of order is noted at 1:51.

The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition has the call.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Maintain or increase: that was this Premier's mantra just a few months ago. But his budget increases are actually bad news: increases to class sizes, increases to stress on persons with disabilities, increases to the amount every Albertan pays in personal income tax. When the Premier said "maintain or increase," was he actually referring to the amount of money he wants to take out of a child protection worker's wallet, and if so, why didn't he tell people that during the election?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, our commitment was to maintain or increase health care funding: promise made, promise kept. Our commitment was to maintain or increase education funding: promise made, promise kept. The promises that we did not make were to maintain or increase funding for Children's Services and for Community and Social Services, but we actually are increasing the budgets in those departments. For persons with disabilities: $150 million in additional investments to support people with mental health challenges and with addictions. We have prioritized the most vulnerable while getting our finances back in order.

Ms Notley: This Premier has prioritized the most vulnerable for their attacks, Mr. Speaker, and he has no respect for the nurses and caregivers who look after our loved ones. He has no respect for the officers and sheriffs who keep us safe. He has no respect for the paramedics and social workers who do so much for the vulnerable he was just trying to dine out on. Seems that if you're not a big corporation, this Premier has no respect for you. This government claims to be about law and order, but when it comes to working people, they can't break the law fast enough. Why are you engaging in bad-faith bargaining and breaking the law in the process?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, another hysterical NDP whopper. Nobody is breaking the law. The NDP leader is just making all of this up. There is an arbitration coming up. The unions have put forward their position, which is for a 6 and 7 per cent increase in the midst of this time of economic decline, when most Albertans are still making less than they did five years ago. Our response to their request for a 6 or 7 per cent one-year increase is a modest reduction. It will go to the arbiter, and the arbiter will make a decision.

The Speaker: The hon. the Leader of the Official Opposition for her second set of questions.

Calgary Police Service and LRT Green Line Funding

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, yesterday a member of the alleged most respectful and decorous cabinet in Alberta history was reduced to a petty Twitter fight with the mayor of Calgary. How embarrassing. But the truth is that this Premier's budget takes a greater chunk of ticket revenue from cities than ever before: less money for policing, more money for his corporate handout, and over 100 officers gone. To the Premier: when the stakes are high and police call for backup, will the newly enriched shareholders ride in to save the day, or should we maybe just fund the police they promised in the election?

Mr. Kenney: Well, we are funding the police, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Justice will be keeping our platform commitment, in the days to come, to increase by 50 the number of Crown prosecutors to help combat crime in this society. There are no reductions in provincial grants to municipalities for police services. We expect all governments, including the municipal governments, to live within taxpayers' means, something the NDP knows nothing about because they were driving us towards over $100 billion in debt. Instead of paying for police officers and nurses, they wanted to pay for bondholders and bankers.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, this Premier can rewrite history and the facts all he wants, but the numbers are the numbers. The Premier's budget cut $12 million in police funding to Calgary by way of a $10 million change in ticket revenues and $2 million for forensic testing. Let's talk about that second one for a moment. Is the Premier really telling Albertans that from now on, when the police have to test for blood or for DNA to solve a murder or a rape, they have to pay him first?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, we're saying that there is a cost to delivering public services, and we must ensure that every level of government is doing its part to pay for those costs. Now, the real question is: what is the NDP's alternative? Is it to run the province forever on our credit card? Is it to borrow money to pay the interest on a growing debt? Is it to wait and kick this can down the road so that instead of 2.8 per cent spending savings, we have to cut by 20 per cent, like happened in the past? That is what they're recommending, the path to fiscal recklessness. We won't let that happen to this province.

Ms Notley: Well, you know, Mr. Speaker, when it comes to the cities, the broken promises by this government from the last election just keep coming. This Premier promised the people of Calgary that he would fund the green line, but now we're seeing that he has hidden a clause in his omnibus legislation that enables the cancellation of the green line with only 90 days' notice. To the Premier: why are you giving yourself permission to break a promise to the people of Calgary? Will you commit today that you will fully fund the agreement that is currently in place, and if not, why not?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, we've been clear that we are committed to the green line. It will continue to be funded, initially through the federal transfers, then the provincial transfers, in a way that allows us to get to balance within four years. The NDP promised that they were going to offer a shadow budget, and they haven't. They gave up. Why? Because they know that they would be presenting Albertans with a massive blowout in the deficit that they already left behind. These guys couldn't manage a popsicle stand. One of the reasons they were fired is because they quadrupled our debt and Albertans knew that we couldn't afford four more years of the NDP.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona and the Leader of the Official Opposition.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, the fact of the matter is that we promised a shadow budget. We will deliver a shadow budget. The Premier is making things up when he suggests that that is not coming.

Calgary LRT Green Line Funding

Ms Notley: However, what the Premier did was promise Calgary a green line, and he has now put a 90-day cancellation clause, for no reason, into a piece of legislation, that is causing huge anxiety in the city of Calgary. Why, if he wasn't planning on using that clause, is that in his legislation? Now, come clean, Premier.

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, I can tell you what's causing huge anxiety for Calgarians: a jobs crisis created by their tax hikes, by their driving tens of billions of dollars of investment out of this province, and a fiscal disaster. What's creating anxiety are tax increases on property, tax increases on incomes and on businesses and on payrolls by the NDP. We're reversing course on the green line. They cut the green line in half, with half as many people served for the same amount of money. Not only did they hammer us with higher taxes; they cut our green line in half.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, one minute he supports the green line exactly as we approved it, and the next minute he criticizes the green line exactly as we approved it. So we just don't know what's up, what's down, what's true, what's false with this Premier. I have never seen anything like this.

Now, Jeff Binks, who's with LRT on the Green, says: if they are truly committed to this project, why does this language need to exist at all? That is a really good question, Mr. Speaker. To the minister:

will you please answer Jeff and the tens of thousands of Calgarians eagerly awaiting construction of the green line?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, what I would tell Jeff is that in the spring of 2015 I committed on behalf of the government of Canada $1.5 billion to build a 46-kilometre-long green line that would serve the far north to the far southeast. What I would tell Jeff is that the NDP cut that in half. It took them four years to come up with the same amount of money for half as much rail. And I would tell Jeff that that's why he and his neighbours were right to fire the NDP last April.

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, I just can't keep track of all of the broken promises. This Premier promised to cut taxes, and he's raised personal income taxes on every single taxpayer in Alberta, all of that to pay for his corporate handout. He also promised to fund the green line as approved, and what we hear from him now is that he's critiquing it. But he's not saying what Calgarians need him to say. Will he or will he not honour the current agreement?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, a pro tip to the NDP: shouting louder is not going to regain them the confidence of Albertans. Making stuff up is not going to enhance the total destruction of their fiscal credibility. We've been clear that we will fund the green line on a cash basis that allows this government to get to balance, but what we will not do is continue with the NDP's drive to over $100 billion in debt that would have us spending billions in interest payments to bondholders instead of infrastructure and social programs. [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. members, I have enjoyed hearing the question. I would also like to be able to hear the answer, so if I could get a little assistance on that this afternoon, I sure would appreciate that.

But at this point in time the hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview has a question.

Corporate Taxation and Job Creation

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday PrairieSky Royalty released their third-quarter report. They banked $24.4 million from the Premier's corporate handout, which they did not use to create jobs. Instead, they bought back 200,000 of their own shares. Good news for the traders in Toronto; another loss for Alberta workers. How many times does the Premier need to see this pattern repeat before he admits that his $4.7 billion corporate handout has been a complete failure?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and the President of Treasury Board has risen.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This government inherited an absolute economic disaster that was in part driven by lower commodity prices and greater global challenges but greatly magnified by the failed policies of the members opposite as they increased corporate taxes by 20 per cent, added layers of regulation, added a $1.4 billion carbon tax. Our policies will lead to improved investment, increased job opportunities. It will simply take some time.

Mr. Bilous: This minister is so arrogant and full of himself that he can't admit his plan is a failure: 27,000 job losses and counting. PrairieSky reports drilling on their properties is down 21 per cent compared to the same quarter last year, and I'm sure the Premier will suggest in a moment that the real issue is pipeline delays; however, he hasn't done a thing to speed up pipelines. To the Premier: if you knew that pipelines are the real reason jobs aren't being created, why did you waste $4.7 billion on a corporate handout?

Mrs. Savage: Well, Mr. Speaker, the NDP continue to mislead Albertans with their made-up claim of a $4.7 billion corporate giveaway. There is no such thing. Maybe they're following the advice of the federal environment . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford, I'm hearing you very clearly this afternoon. The Minister of Energy has the call, however.

Mrs. Savage: Mr. Speaker, I have to think that maybe they're following the advice of the federal environment minister, who recently said: if you say it louder, if you repeat it, if that's your talking point, then people will totally believe it. They're following the advice of the federal environment minister.

Mr. Bilous: Minister, it's on page 144 of your plan.

It's been months since the Energy minister first shrugged off the failure of the $4.7 billion corporate handout, saying she was, quote, disappointed, but little else. Drilling is at an all-time low. Husky Energy has laid off people and is taking their corporate gift and spending it in Saskatchewan and Newfoundland, not in Alberta, and under this UCP government 27,000 jobs have been lost. To the Premier. Explain to 27,000 out-of-work Albertans why all you can do is shrug.

Mrs. Savage: Mr. Speaker, we would have had 525,000 barrels a day of additional capacity to move Alberta oil to markets, we would not be in this job crisis, we would not be under curtailment, and we would have full value for the resources if Northern Gateway had not been cancelled. Now, the former Premier was sitting in the office of Justin Trudeau the day he killed that project. She was smiling. She was taking a photo op. She was celebrating the day that Northern Gateway was killed. That will go down as the biggest mistake in this country.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for the great constituency of Calgary-Cross.

Crown Prosecution Service

Mr. Amery: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Since Alberta went through an economic recession in 2014, crime rates in our province have risen dramatically. Crime in both rural and urban municipalities has skyrocketed, and although improving slightly since 2017, the crime rate is still nowhere near its prerecession levels. Can the Minister of Justice please tell this Assembly how he will allocate the new prosecutors promised in the UCP platform amongst our provincial jurisdictions?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General.

Mr. Schweitzer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Prosecutors will be allocated across the province based on the caseload. I was just in St. Paul last night, and the immense amount of casework that is going through that courthouse there is too high for the prosecutor level that we have there, but that pressure isn't simply in rural Alberta. It's also in Calgary and Edmonton. We're going to make sure we provide the resources where they're needed. That's why we're dedicated to hiring 50 new prosecutors here in the province of Alberta.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Cross.

Mr. Amery: Thank you once again, Mr. Speaker. Given that many criminals are not being held accountable for their actions due to backlogs in the court system and given that our police service can only be effective when criminals they catch face consequences for their actions and given that members of the Calgary Crown prosecutor's office have specifically approached me with this question, can the Minister of Justice give this Assembly a timeline of when Albertans can expect the 50 new prosecutors to be hired?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, when we came into office here, I was shocked at the number of unfilled positions that we inherited from the previous government, over 25 unfilled positions in the prosecution service here in the province of Alberta. We are hiring those positions now. We actually have a number of our civil lawyers coming in to fill prosecutor positions as well. We'll be rolling out our plan as to how we're going to hire 50 more prosecutors once we get those 25 in place.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Amery: Thank you once again, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister. Given that our province is facing a massive deficit due to years of poor financial planning from previous governments and given that our UCP government takes a staunchly pragmatic and fiscally responsible approach on deficit management, can the minister please tell this Chamber where the funding for the Crown prosecutors is coming from?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, the funding is in our budget to hire 50 new prosecutors in the province of Alberta. We also want to make sure that our justice system is efficient, and it's time for a little tour down NDP legacy lane. Right now in the justice system we still use MS-DOS. I was two years old when MS-DOS was first invented. That's the level of investment that the previous government neglected in the justice system. We're fixing that with an investment to make sure we can have e-courts in our system.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Education Budget 2019-2020

Ms Hoffman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. For many months the Education minister has been passing the buck about education questions, questions about overcrowded classrooms, longer bus ride times, vanishing supports for students with special needs. This morning when I asked the minister in estimates how much money school districts were getting, individual school districts, big ones like Calgary Catholic, the minister refused to answer. To the Premier: is that acceptable, for an Education minister to fail to give a response about something so basic in her own budget, and if not, what are you going to do about it?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education is rising.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. What I was able to share this morning in estimates is that, as promised during the election, we have maintained education funding for our K to 12 system. We have accounted for enrolment growth. Every single student that walks through our doors will have the same basic funding that they had in previous years. That's what I was able to share with the hon. member.

Ms Hoffman: Given, Mr. Speaker, that education stakeholders seem to have a much better grasp of the Education budget than the Education minister and given that the Alberta Teachers' Association says that flat funding and growth with regard to students amounts to at least $200 less per student and given that educational assistants are telling us that they're being laid off, effective notices going out last Thursday, the day of the budget, to the Premier: is it acceptable to him for his minister to be so wrong about the budget and to pass the buck? Seriously, this is embarrassing. We're asking reasonable questions about the budget. We deserve reasonable answers, not roundabout talking points that are so delusional from reality.

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education has risen.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. The truth about the reality is that we collect $2.5 billion in educational tax dollars, but we are spending $8.223 billion. We spent $8.223 billion last year. We are going to spend $8.223 billion this year. We are maintaining funding to education, and we reallocated restrictive grant funding and eliminated reporting requirements. That has reduced red tape, provided boards with additional flexibility to meet local priorities, flexibility they told me they wanted.

Ms Hoffman: Given, Mr. Speaker, that one thing we did learn this morning in estimates is that the Minister of Education is giving permission to school boards to jack up school fees in the middle of the school year and given that our government invested $60 million annually to take the burden off school fees and now the minister is actually increasing school fees potentially in the middle of the school year, how does the Premier feel about this? Does he think it's fair for parents to get a bill in September and another one in November? When's it going to stop? This is absolutely an abomination of the responsibility of the Education minister.

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education has the call.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. Through the Education Act we restricted school authorities from charging fees for instructional materials and supplies. We respect that school boards are in the best position to set the fees for their local boards.

I would otherwise like to highlight that when the hon. member was in a leadership position as board chair of a major school board, they collected almost $127 million of school fees. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Indigenous Housing Capital Program

Ms Sigurdson: Mr. Speaker, after a significant and extensive consultation our government introduced the indigenous housing capital program, which provided $120 million in funding to increase the supply of affordable housing to Alberta's indigenous communities. Sadly, this program doesn't appear anywhere in the budget and has seemingly been cancelled. Can the Minister of Seniors and Housing explain why her government will give corporations $4.7 billion but won't give a single dollar to indigenous housing?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Seniors and Housing is rising to answer.

Ms Pon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Indigenous people in Alberta often face an additional challenge finding welcoming, appropriate, affordable housing. We will partner with indigenous people and communities to build more affordable housing that meets their unique needs. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Ms Sigurdson: Mr. Speaker, given that our government consulted extensively to create that program that would work best with indigenous communities and given that when I asked the minister yesterday in estimates about the program's cancellation, she could only point to $35 million in funding for general affordable housing, to the minister: is it that you don't understand the serious housing needs of the indigenous communities, or is it simply that you don't care about these communities, only about corporate profits?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Indigenous Relations has risen.

Mr. Wilson: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. A key part of our government's mandate includes lifting Alberta's population out of poverty, getting people back to work, and improving the lives of all Albertans. Our government recognizes the continuing need for adequate housing both on- and off-reserve for indigenous Albertans, and we're committed to ensuring vulnerable Albertans have access to safe, suitable, and affordable housing options.

Ms Sigurdson: This is a program from Seniors and Housing. Given that the minister can't adequately explain why she removed the indigenous housing program from the budget and given that the minister claimed that it was being reviewed for "alignment with our platform commitments" but that does nothing to support indigenous communities, can the Minister of Seniors and Housing please cut the nonsense and commit to this House right now to restoring the indigenous housing program?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Seniors and Housing.

Ms Pon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you for the member's question. It's a very important question. If you look in the financial statements in the estimates, it's important to show that we spend $30 million in the capital grant for the next three years. The previous NDP government failed indigenous people in Alberta needing affordable housing. Under the indigenous housing capital program not one new unit of housing was built under the NDP. Our government is committed to being a true partner with Alberta's indigenous people.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Sherwood Park.

Petrochemicals Diversification Program

Mr. Walker: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As the MLA for Sherwood Park I can tell you that my constituents were thrilled to hear the government keep its promise by implementing recommendations from the Natural Gas Advisory Panel such as encouraging economically viable projects with royalty credits. Instead of placing millions of dollars of financial risk on Alberta taxpayers, this government has rightfully looked to the private sector to encourage new infrastructure in our province. Can the Associate Minister of Natural Gas please explain why royalty credits are a more financially sound approach to petrochemical development than grants and loan guarantees?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Natural Gas is rising.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The members across the aisle seem to think that they got away with saddling Albertans with billions of dollars of debt as they pursued their socialist fantasies. Well, we're going to be doing things differently on this side of the House. We're going to be using royalty credits and royalty credits alone to attract petrochemical jobs. It provides less risk to the taxpayer than grants and loan guarantees.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Sherwood Park.

Mr. Walker: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Back to the associate minister: given the importance of the petrochemical sector to Strathcona county and the Industrial Heartland and given that Alberta is home to Canada's largest petrochemical manufacturing industry and petrochemicals are, in fact, Alberta's largest manufacturing industry and given that there is significant potential for petrochemical manufacturing in the Strathcona county area, can the associate minister please explain how round 2 of the petrochemicals diversification program will create private-sector, market-driven jobs here in Alberta?

The Speaker: The Associate Minister of Natural Gas.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Alberta is blessed to have a highly skilled workforce and access to international markets for its petrochemical industry. Round 2 of the PDP will not only make Alberta competitive with Louisiana and Texas, but it will also encourage the construction of additional petrochemical facilities in our province. The NDP waged an all-out assault against job creators in this province. We're going to stand up, and we're going to fight to get good-paying jobs back to this province. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. member.

Mr. Walker: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Minister. Given that the previous government's policies like the carbon tax, tax hikes, increased red tape, and royalty uncertainty undermined investor confidence and drove capital away from our province to the tune of billions and billions of dollars and given that our government committed in April to make life better for Albertans and stand up for Alberta's economic interests, can the associate minister please tell the House how this government will continue to fight to restore investor confidence right here in Alberta?

The Speaker: The associate minister.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Two weeks ago the NDP caucus stood on the steps of the Legislature shoulder to shoulder with Extinction Rebellion, and they protested the energy industry. Now, perhaps they were looking for photo ops for their leadership run. I don't know. All I know is that the Leader of the Opposition comes in this House during question period with the cameras rolling, and she says all the right things, but her caucus was protesting energy. Albertans want to know: what's it going to be? Are they for energy, or are they against it? [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

Technology Innovation and Emissions Reduction

Mr. Schmidt: Mr. Speaker, I hope you gave our visitors from the Solomon Islands some scuba gear as it's going to be under water because Alberta is doing nothing to deal with climate change. Under our government we were on track to reduce 50 megatonnes of harmful emissions over the next 10 years, and now that's down to about 30. That's a drop of almost 50 per cent. To the minister of environment: is 50 per cent less your idea of success?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, I'm excited to say that the hon. member is wrong, actually. We're projecting 57 megatonnes in reduction by 2030, significantly more than the NDP were projecting, while at the same time lowering costs on industry by hundreds of millions of dollars and not taxing everyday Albertans like the NDP wanted to. What this side of the House is doing is real, concrete action when it comes to emissions. That side of the House, when they were in government, were taxing your constituents and my constituents, hockey moms and hockey dads, seniors, kids, on and on.

Mr. Schmidt: Mr. Speaker, given that it's rather rich for the minister opposite to accuse us of making up numbers and given that Alberta has had a price on carbon since 2007 and in all that time all of the revenues collected from that price on carbon have been dedicated to innovation and green initiatives, until now, will the minister admit that he's using this money collected from his price on carbon to fund his $4.7 billion corporate handout?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, as my dad used to say, that dog won't hunt. This side of the House knows, without a doubt, that the NDP had a slush fund. This side of the House is clear and transparent on how we are going to spend the money in TIER. We've been transparent. We campaigned on that. We're proud of it, and we stand by our commitment to that. That side of the House, we now know, used their carbon tax as a slush fund. They took away from everyday Albertans, reached into their pockets and took it, and spent it on their pet projects, often by employing people from Ontario, which is just ridiculous.

Mr. Schmidt: Given, Mr. Speaker, that the minister should be awfully careful when he talks about hunting and given that I'm glad to see that some of the best parts of our plan remain in place, particularly when it comes to the electricity sector, but given, however, that when it comes to the oil sands, this government is letting facilities choose to measure themselves against their own personal best rather than an industry standard, rewarding the worst actors and punishing the best in class, to the minister: if being the best is now the worst and the worst is now the best, would you agree that we have a race to the bottom?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, you see what the NDP think about our energy industry and about our large industrial partners, that drive our economy and are the job creators inside our province. That's why, when they were in power, they went out of their way to cause them so much trouble, to hit Albertans when they were down. Our approach is different. We're partnering with industries. We're actually getting real, concrete action done on emissions. What the NDP did was that they took money from Albertans, and then they went and spent it in Ontario, installing light bulbs and shower heads across this province. Our approach is completely different.

Lottery Fund Dissolution

Ms Phillips: Mr. Speaker, it takes a special kind of talent to raise taxes for everyone, raise the deficit by $2 billion, run up $93 billion in debt, and also cause panic among charities and nonprofits across the province. This Minister of Finance has caused all this with his terrible budget, so let's try to clear up some of this chaos. To the minister: can he confirm that the closure of the lottery fund still means that all of the programs that the fund gave money to will still exist, that all of the funds that went to those programs will still flow to those programs, every dime, and that all of the same AGLC rules for charities will still apply? People are confused.

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member opposite for the question because this deserves clarification. We will be dissolving the lottery fund, amongst a few other funds, to streamline government processes and save taxpayers' money. All of the functions of the lottery fund, all of the benefits that go to charities and nonprofits will be completely maintained. It will function as it has in the past. Charities and nonprofits can continue to benefit from these funds in the same way going forward.

Ms Phillips: Mr. Speaker, given that CFEP, CIP, Status of Women, and antiracism grants are all taking multimillion-dollar cuts every year, to the minister: please explain to the nonprofits that while the lottery fund change may not be something to immediately panic about, the raiding of that fund and diverting it to a massive no-jobs giveaway to his corporate friends and getting nothing but a higher deficit and higher taxes in return actually is something to panic about.

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, panic seems to be the operative word across the aisle these days. This is a government that delivered a thoughtful, prudent, responsible budget on behalf of all Albertans, for this generation and the next. We are taking steps to streamline government, dissolving funds where it makes no sense to continue with them, and continuing to ensure those functions are delivered to Albertans. I don't expect the members opposite to know what good financial management means. That's what we're delivering to Albertans.

Ms Phillips: Mr. Speaker, given that when parents work an overnight shift at a casino for their kids' soccer team, they want to know where the money is actually going and whether it's going to benefit their kids and given that that's the case especially now given that this minister has raised taxes for all of those parents and given that this minister has no problem communicating with his rich friends in the form of a $4.7 billion cheque, which is contained on page 144 of the budget, to the minister: will he clear up some of the terrible communications rollout of this budget and commit here and now to hosting a telephone town hall with charities and nonprofits to clean up the mess he has caused?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, we have delivered, again, a thoughtful, prudent, responsible budget on behalf of all Albertans. The lottery fund function will continue as it has. Charities and civic groups, that provide such value to Albertans every day, will continue to be able to access these funds on a go-forward basis. Moreover, Albertans will save $13 million every year by our good fiscal management, by cleaning up and dissolving funds that no longer serve a purpose, something, again, that I don't expect the members opposite to understand.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland has the call.

Fire-retardant Polymer Gels

Mr. Getson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The impacts of the forest fires that hit our province this spring and summer have affected us all. In all likelihood we either know someone directly or indirectly that has been impacted by forest fires. It's my understanding that the direct costs of this were about $600 million for this year, the indirect impacts to families being more difficult to quantify. Earlier this year I suggested the use of polymer firefighting gels, which are more effective in action and cost. We were advised of additional trials to show the efficiency of this product and its delivery. To the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry: can you please provide us with the status of those trials?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Dreeshen: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and I'd like to thank the Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland for all his great work and the studies that he's provided to the department. I am happy to update him that there are a variety of fire suppression products out there, and we are actually reviewing the science – the great men and women at Alberta Wildfire are reviewing them – to see if the use of gel and polymers can work with our conventional ways of fighting fires. We are committed to a lessons-learned report, reviewing how all forest fires across Alberta were actually being fought this year. If there are better ways to fight these fires, we're all ears.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland.

Mr. Getson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Minister. You almost stole the thunder from my second part, but I'll go on anyway. Given that the forest pine beetle issues are real and given that the valley surrounding Jasper is now a sickly red due to the pine beetle killing trees and creating a tinderbox and given that the chemical retardant deployed from water bombers and free-standing structures would flatten them but that polymer gels do not have this effect and they work well in protecting structures, extinguishing the fire where retardants could not, and given that the use of these chemical retardants are ineffective or less effective in this application, is the minister able to reinstate the pre-existing contract, as a pilot perhaps, to help protect places surrounded by dead trees?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Dreeshen: Again, thank you, Mr. Speaker. We are committed on the fight against the mountain pine beetle – it's something that we did campaign on – to increase it by $5 million, from $25 million up to $30 million, something that reversed the four-year trend that the previous government had of almost a $10 million decrease in the fight against the mountain pine beetle, although it is a national issue and something that we're lobbying the federal government to be able to step up to the plate on. It was great that a couple of weeks ago we even signed an MOU with the Saskatchewan government for a million dollars in our fight against the mountain pine beetle.

Mr. Getson: Given that Alberta recently experienced one of the largest wildfire seasons to date and given that fighting fires here in the province takes a lot of human capital as well as monetary and given that Alberta is currently looking to spend taxpayer dollars as wisely and as efficiently as possible, will the minister allow this product and this applicator a chance to be put to work here in Alberta, the same as they have in Australia, giving our brave firefighters a better chance and better tools for the job? It's more cost-effective to both us and Alberta taxpayers.

The Speaker: The minister.

Mr. Dreeshen: Again, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yes, when you look at the fires that we had here in Alberta – 60 per cent were man-made, and one was actually an arson issue that happened in Slave Lake – it is clear that wildfires are here to stay. It's a natural phenomenon that happens with our high and dry forests that we have here in the province. It's about an 80- to 100-year life cycle that they actually have, and it's forest fires that eventually ends them and regrows the forest. When you look at logging and the sustainable management practices that we have, it's something that actually saves carbon dioxide. It's actually being used for . . .

Postsecondary Education Costs

Mr. Eggen: There will be no net difference for Alberta students: Mr. Speaker, that was the Premier defending his government's harmful decision to increase interest on student loans, but as Don Braid of the Calgary Herald rightly points out, this increase will cost students $1,800 more on a $30,000 loan amortized over 10 years. To the Premier: are you really trying to tell students that they won't notice that you're stacking hundreds of dollars in interest payments onto their budgets?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaidis: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Premier, of course, was indeed correct in that, and I think it's important to understand some of the dynamics. Although there'll be an increase in student loans for Alberta student loan holders, the federal government will be reducing their interest rate from prime plus 2.5 per cent, down two points. The vast majority of student loan holders in Alberta hold both an Alberta student loan and a federal student loan. Most students will not actually see any increase or a very negligible increase in their payments.

Mr. Eggen: Well, you know, Mr. Speaker, given that math doesn't lie, on $30,000 it's $1,800 more in interest payments based on this new policy. Shameful.

Given that this government went further in what Don Braid described as a "bizarre pounce" on students in their budget and given that they cut tuition credits and given that this minister said that they would increase apprenticeship by $4 million – but really they're taking $110 million out of the postsecondary student grant system – to the minister. Please explain yourself. Why are postsecondary student supports being sacrificed to pay . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaidis: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd be happy to explain and provide some more clarity. The member is correct. We have provided $4 million. In terms of other funding as well we just, on Monday, made an announcement with Careers: the Next Generation to quadruple the number of students that participate in the registered apprenticeship program. At the moment that program has about 1,500 students that participate in it. With our investment we'll see about 6,000 students be able to participate in that program, which is critical to helping our students get access to postsecondary education.

Mr. Eggen: Well, Mr. Speaker, given that perhaps this government's most heinous act against students is the lifting of the tuition freeze, allowing those rates to increase by as much as 21 per cent over these next three years, and given that this government has tried to insist that students actually want to pay for more tuition – crazy – to the minister: explain how tuition increases, no tax credits, added student loan interest are supposed to make life better for our postsecondary students.

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaides: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The MacKinnon panel report was quite clear that despite the fact that we're investing more in our postsecondary system, our outcomes don't appear to be quite comparable with other jurisdictions. Nine out of 26 of our postsecondary institutions have below average completion rates. Moreover, the MacKinnon panel talked about the importance of allowing our institutions and working with our institutions to achieve a broader revenue mix. In the last few months I've been talking with a lot of our institutions, and they want the handcuffs that the former government placed on them removed.

Agriculture and Forestry Budget 2019-2020

Mr. Dach: Mr. Speaker, on page 27 of the UCP platform the party boasts about how it apparently understands that the agricultural sector is vital to Alberta's economy, yet the Unlimited Cuts and Pain government has slashed the Agriculture and Forestry budget by 38 per cent over the next four years. That's decimation: 38 per cent. Now, he failed to do so in estimates on Tuesday. Can the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry now please explain how his understanding of the importance of farmers and ranchers led him to support cuts for our agricultural sector by $545 million? How can farmers thank you, sir, for presiding over this historical gutting of your . . .

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Dreeshen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I thought we had a very civil exchange in estimates yesterday. But, no, the biggest issue that happened – and every minister of this entire government has had to go through a process. We're spending $2 billion every year on interest payments. We are in a financial mess, and we need to clean up the mess, the intergenerational debt that the NDP government has burdened future generations here in the province of Alberta with. We are doing everything we can to get our fiscal house in order because that is not only the prudent and responsible thing to do today; it will be for future generations of Albertans.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Let's be clear: 44 years of Conservative rule is at the root of all these problems.

Given that among the long list of items on the minister's chopping block is a $34 million reduction to the world-class research done within the ministry and given that I'm hearing that that could harm our ability to innovate and develop leading agricultural practices and given that this Unlimited Cuts and Pain government rushed to give a $4.7 billion handout to corporations but can't apparently afford agricultural scientists, can the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry explain what impacts slashing research and scientists will have on his ministry's intellectual capacity?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Dreeshen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm glad to reiterate: $36 million of research that we are actually committed to in this budget and also $43 million of additional research through the CAP, Canadian agricultural partnership, program. Again, as I said yesterday in estimates, we are committed to consultations with the entire breadth of the research industry in agriculture, whether it be academia, within our own government researchers, private researchers, commodity groups. We are committed to starting those consultations in December to ultimately find out the best way we can actually achieve the research results that best benefit farmers here in the province of Alberta.

Mr. Dach: Mr. Speaker, we rely on science in this province increasingly, but given that 11 days ago I asked this minister about what he was going to do to support Alberta's beekeeping and honey industries, which have had a difficult year, and given that while the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry claimed that he was working to find support for them, there's not a single line item of support for emergency help for Alberta beekeepers in this budget, can the minister of agriculture please explain why beekeepers in Alberta will get sweet nothing from this budget while profitable corporations get a $4.7 billion gift from the Unlimited Cuts and Pain Party?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Dreeshen: Again, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. About five or six hours ago I was actually in Lacombe talking with AFSC, the Agriculture Financial Services Corporation, to discuss not just with honey producers here in the province of Alberta but every farmer that there is estimated to be about $700 million of crop failures that AFSC is looking at currently. There is 20 per cent of the crop currently that is unharvested. It is something that this government takes very seriously. We do have a suite of programs that is being offered by the province, but we are looking at ways that we can improve them, and at the end of the day we're going to be there for farmers in this difficult year.

The Speaker: The Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville would like to ask a question.

Workplace Health and Safety

Ms Armstrong-Homeniuk: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We know that our industrial workers, including tradespeople and those who support them, work long hours in difficult conditions, frequently away from their families. We know that these individuals often do not receive a thank you for their work and can be physically removed from resources that they may need to keep them healthy. To the Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions: what will this government do to make mental health supports accessible to industry workers across our province?

The Speaker: The Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions.

Mr. Luan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's essential that we support our industry and workforces in accessing mental health and recovery supports. Economically, addiction alone costs us $5.5 billion a year in Alberta. A large portion of that is in the loss of productivity. That's why last week I was in Fort McMurray working with industry leaders, service providers, and union reps, trying to look at creative ways for how we can make made-in-Alberta solutions to help our workers remain healthy and productive.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

Ms Armstrong-Homeniuk: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that we know the high amount of risk in many of these trades and occupations and given that workplace safety programming must be responsive to and comprehensive of risks present in modern workplaces, to the Minister of Labour and Immigration: how is this government ensuring that workers are prepared with the knowledge they need to be safe on the job site and that that knowledge is relevant to current workplace practices and technologies?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for the question. Under our occupational health and safety laws workers have the right to know about workplace hazards and also the right to know that their employers are eliminating or controlling the hazards. Employers also have the duty to ensure that workers are competent in the tasks that they are performing. Through WCB a number of safety associations throughout the province are funded to offer training for workers and employees, and on top of that, our ministry has many online OHS resources, including publications, webinars, and templates. I encourage employers and all workers to use these resources to help ensure a healthy and safe workplace.

2:40

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Ms Armstrong-Homeniuk: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that balance must be struck between workplace regulation and worker safety and given that workers must be able to do their jobs in an environment that best supports the tasks at hand while not overburdening workers with regulatory restrictions, to the Minister of Labour and Immigration: how will our government ensure that regulations imposed on workers and workplaces are what industry needs and do not hold back employers or employees?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is very important that Alberta has healthy and safe workplaces, that workers can come home safely at the end of their shift and at the end of their day. One of our goals is to have fair and balanced labour legislation that protects the rights of workers while reducing unnecessary administrative burdens on employers and job creators. We have made a number of changes already in terms of labour relations and employment standards, and we'll be doing further reviews of labour laws in the near future to see what else can be done to support job creators and protect workers without inhibiting innovation and flexibility. We will remove what doesn't make sense and keep what makes sense.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, in light of the Royal Assent ceremony happening in just a few minutes, we will proceed immediately to Members' Statements.

Budget 2019 and Edmonton's Economy

Mr. Schmidt: The Premier is fanning the flames of Alberta separatism. It's a dangerous game because it runs the risk of breaking Alberta itself apart. One could well imagine a hypothetical separatist mayor of Edmonton giving the following address. "Fellow Edmontonians, we're living through very challenging economic times. This time of adversity will be prolonged by bad UCP policies that will chase away billions in investment, will kill economic diversification, will kill the south Edmonton hospital and the west LRT, and will raise the cost on just about everything: tuition, cigarettes, car insurance, prescription drugs for seniors, and property taxes. On top of all that, the storm clouds of a global recession are on the horizon and we have a provincial government that has actively campaigned against our city's vital economic interests.

"The challenges are real, but you know what? We're Edmontonians. Through our whole history we've proven that we are the can-do city. We're resilient, hard-working, and innovative, and together we can and will overcome these challenges. Simply put, in an uncertain world where we can't count on support from this provincial government, we must be self-reliant so that we are prepared for whatever the future may bring.

"Edmonton is a proud and significant contributor to Alberta. We have a quarter of the population but contribute over a third of the provincial GDP. Our net fiscal contribution to the province is billions of dollars a year, but when the UCP enacts discriminatory legislation like ripping up the city charter, it's not just attacking the Edmonton economy; it's undermining the future growth and prosperity of the entire province. I'll be focusing my efforts on bringing fiscal fairness back to Edmonton. By getting a fair deal for Edmonton, we will emerge through this time of adversity stronger than ever. Edmonton: strong and free."

Separatism talk must stop. As Canadians we don't always have to be friends, but we will always be family, the true north strong and free.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-South East.

Alberta Heritage Savings Trust Fund

Mr. Jones: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Alberta heritage savings trust fund was created in 1976 with savings from Alberta's nonrenewable resources. For over 40 years the fund has been invested with the aim to deliver the greatest financial returns possible for Albertans. While its capital has always been earmarked for the future, the fund has been used to diversify the economy and meet the needs of our growing province. Since its inception the fund has contributed a staggering $43 billion to support spending in areas such as health care, education, infrastructure, and social programs.

The fund is professionally managed by the Alberta Investment Management Corporation, also known as AIMCo, to provide the greatest returns over the long term. Its diversified portfolio of investments includes bonds, mortgages, public and private equities, real estate, infrastructure investments, timberland, and even hedge funds. The fund's portfolio is also global, with investments in Canada, the United States, Europe, Australia, Asia, and other emerging markets.

Last week I had the pleasure of attending and participating in the annual public meeting for the fund. I am pleased to report that the fund earned an 8 per cent rate of return, net of fees, for the period ended March 31, 2019. This exceeded the benchmark for the same period. This represented a net income of $937 million, and the fund had net assets of $18.2 billion at fair market value on this date. The fund has consistently outperformed and has an impressive 10-year average net-of-fees return of over 10 per cent. The public meeting included an informative Q and A session between Albertans, AIMCo, and Treasury Board and Finance.

We truly do have a world-class organization managing our savings, and I would like to thank the staff at AIMCo and Treasury Board and Finance for another strong year for the benefit of Albertans.

Presenting Petitions

Mr. Sigurdson: Mr. Speaker, I would like to present a petition on behalf of over 1,600 constituents of Highwood area requesting that the government relieve the ongoing financial burden of obtaining costly water licences and consider providing funding and services for the representatives and the municipalities to ensure that the Sheep River and deepwater wells are no longer the only source of water available.

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there any tablings today? I see the hon. Member for Lacombe-Ponoka.

Mr. Orr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to table a document that was tweeted out by Colin Craig of secondstreet.org detailing the intent by some public-sector unions to seek pay increases of over 7 per cent courtesy of Alberta taxpayers.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm tabling an article in The Tyee that's entitled Alberta Can Transition from Oil and Gas and Have a Strong Economy: Here's How, dated July 2019.

The Speaker: Are there any other tablings today? Oh, I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm tabling a document today entitled Energy Efficiency Alberta Gets National Accolades for $850M in Growth.

The Speaker: Are there others?

Seeing none, hon. members, we are at points of order. At 1:51 the hon. Official Opposition House Leader raised a point of order.

Point of Order Parliamentary Language

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise on 23(h), (i), (j). This was when the Premier was responding to the Official Opposition leader. The Premier said: repeating the lie. I can pull out Erskine and Beauchesne's and cite all of the different examples of when Speakers have ruled the word "lie" out of order, including yourself, sir, from, I believe, earlier this week. Again, there are certain words that are completely unparliamentary. I know that the Government House Leader has had to apologize for members on his side using that term.

Because the Premier was referring to the Leader of the Official Opposition and, actually, even if he was referring to members on this side – as you have ruled, as have many other Speakers, including Speaker Kowalski, the use of the word "lie" in this House is unparliamentary. Therefore, the Premier or the Government House Leader on his behalf should apologize and withdraw.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Certainly, it is unparliamentary to refer to somebody as lying or to imply that they were lying, but the argument that the Opposition House Leader seems to be presenting to you is that the word "lie" can't be used inside the Chamber, which, in fact, I would submit to you, is not true. Mr. Speaker, I do not know if you have the Blues. I do have an advantage of having the exact quote that the hon. Premier said in question period, which is: "Mr. Speaker, with respect to the $4.7 billion figure, the leader of the NDP now knows repeatedly that that is a complete falsehood. You know, my mom used to say that repeating a lie doesn't make something true." Well, I do agree with the hon. Premier. My mom used to say the same thing: repeating a lie does not make it true.

The hon. Premier did not at any point refer to any member. He did not refer to an MLA. He did not imply that the Leader of the Official Opposition was lying. He stated a very important fact, that repeating a lie does not make it true. Now, I will submit to you that whether or not certain statements were a lie, in fact, or not would be a matter of debate. That would be a fair point, maybe, for the Opposition House Leader to raise, but to imply that the Premier implied that anybody in this Assembly was lying is, in fact, false. I do not see any reason for the Premier to withdraw his remarks.

The Speaker: Are there others wishing to join in the debate? I think the hon. Official Opposition House Leader has already provided his comments with respect to the point of order, so unless he has something completely new to provide and not just a rebuttal of what the Government House Leader has . . .

Mr. Bilous: I do, Mr. Speaker. The new piece of information is that the use of the word "lie" is not subject to context. It is not whether it is put against a member or members. The word, regardless of how it is used, is unparliamentary.

The Speaker: You're incorrect in your assessment of the word "lie." There are lots of contexts in which someone could say the word "lie" inside the Legislative Assembly and it wouldn't be unparliamentary, particularly if they weren't referring to another member of the Assembly. I could say, "My brother used to lie to me" at any point in time, and that wouldn't be unparliamentary at all, but I appreciate your submission.

With that said, in this case, Beauchesne's paragraph 494 does speak about: "It is not unparliamentary temperately to criticize statements made by Members . . . contrary to the facts," but it may not impute the intentional falsehood in that being permissible.

I'm not sure that I agree with the Government House Leader when he says that the Premier didn't refer to a member of the Assembly because very clearly he did when he said, "The leader of the NDP . . . knows repeatedly that that is a complete falsehood." All the way up until that point, certainly not unparliamentary. But when he goes on to say, "You know, my mom used to say that repeating a lie," implying that the falsehood was then a lie, it certainly gets us very, very, very close to unparliamentary language given the context in which it's used. I think it would be reasonable in this case for the Premier to apologize and withdraw the statement.

Mr. Kenney: I would be happy to do so, always to comply with your orders, Mr. Speaker. My own parliamentary experience's context is that it's unparliamentary to imply that another member deliberately misled the House. It was not my intention to do so; therefore, I'd be happy to comply with your order by withdrawing.

The Speaker: Well done, and thank you. A spectacular apology, and I hope to see many more like that when other members are apologizing inside the Assembly.

Hon. members, the daily Routine has now concluded, but pursuant to Standing Order 59.01(5)(b) and the notice that was provided by the hon. Government House Leader, the Assembly will now proceed to Royal Assent. Hon. members, as is the practice in this Assembly during ceremonial occasions, I would ask that you close all computers, ensure that all electronic devices are stowed in any way, shape or form out of the respect that we will show for Her Honour. We are at Ordres du jour.

Orders of the Day

Royal Assent

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, Her Honour the Honourable the Lieutenant Governor will now attend upon the Assembly.

[The Premier and the Acting Sergeant-at-Arms left the Chamber to attend the Lieutenant Governor]

[The Mace was draped]

[The Acting Sergeant-at-Arms knocked on the main doors of the Chamber three times. The Assistant Sergeant-at-Arms opened the doors, and the Acting Sergeant-at-Arms entered]

The Acting Sergeant-at-Arms: All rise, please. Mr. Speaker, Her Honour the Honourable the Lieutenant Governor awaits.

The Speaker: Sergeant-at-Arms, admit Her Honour the Honourable the Lieutenant Governor.

[Preceded by the Acting Sergeant-at-Arms, Her Honour the Lieutenant Governor of Alberta, Lois Mitchell, CM, AOE, LLD, and the Premier entered the Chamber. Her Honour took her place upon the throne]

Her Honour: Please be seated.

The Speaker: May it please Your Honour, the Legislative Assembly has at its present sitting passed certain bills to which and in the name of the Legislative Assembly I respectfully request Your Honour's assent.

The Clerk: Your Honour, the following are the titles of the bills to which Your Honour's assent is prayed.

- 14 Alberta Indigenous Opportunities Corporation Act
- 15 Real Estate Amendment Act, 2019
- 16 Public Lands Modernization (Grazing Leases and Obsolete Provisions) Amendment Act, 2019

17 Disclosure to Protect Against Domestic Violence (Clare's Law) Act

18 Electricity Statutes (Capacity Market Termination) Amendment Act, 2019

202 Child, Youth and Family Enhancement (Protecting Alberta's Children) Amendment Act, 2019

[The Lieutenant Governor indicated her assent]

The Clerk: In Her Majesty's name Her Honour the Honourable the Lieutenant Governor doth assent to these bills.

3:00

The Acting Sergeant-at-Arms: All rise, please.

[Preceded by the Acting Sergeant-at-Arms, the Lieutenant Governor and the Premier left the Chamber]

[The Mace was uncovered]

The Speaker: Hon. members, please be seated.

Pursuant to Standing Order 59.01(5)(b) the House stands adjourned until this evening at 7:30.

The legislative policy committees will convene this afternoon for the consideration of the main estimates. This afternoon the Standing Committee on Families and Communities will consider the estimates for the Ministry of Education in the Rocky Mountain Room and the Standing Committee on Alberta's Economic Future will consider the estimates for the Ministry of Advanced Education in the Parkland Room.

The House stands adjourned.

[The Assembly adjourned at 3:02 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

7:30 p.m.

Wednesday, October 30, 2019

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, please be seated.

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 20 Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, 2019

[Adjourned debate October 29: Mr. Nielsen]

The Acting Speaker: I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore has risen with about a minute left.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Obviously, one minute is not a whole lot of time, but I guess one of the things that I do want to comment about this bill is around the fact that it's incredibly an omnibus bill. I mean, things like deindexing of the income tax brackets: for some of our guests that are in the gallery here this evening, our hard-working public-sector workers, they're going to see some of their income coming back to the government just because simply, maybe they get a raise, things like that.

Also, you know, I think that when we look at the different tax credits that are being eliminated – I had mentioned this the last time we had debated – just simply from one simple industry like the gaming sector, which is poised to make over $150 billion this year alone: there's been some incredible growth there. With the decisions that this government is going to be making around that, we are going to proverbially be missing our own boat, Mr. Speaker, and they're good, high-paying jobs.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

We are immediately into 29(2)(a) should anyone wish to take five minutes for quick questions and comments. I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I rise on 29(2)(a). I wasn't able to hear the first part of the Member for Edmonton-Decore's speech. I know he's very passionate about some of the initiatives our government brought forward to help diversify the economy and spur investment – one of those was, of course, one of the tax credits – in fact, all three of the tax credit programs. But the interactive digital media tax credit: the member just acknowledged that that industry world-wide is significant. We're talking trillions of dollars. I'm wondering if the Member for Edmonton-Decore can talk about some of the dollars that would be coming to Alberta but are likely going to be diverted to places like British Columbia and Quebec and Ontario that have interactive digital media tax credits.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to respond to that. Yeah, he's quite correct. You know, the funny thing is that when you look at the comparative districts, say, Quebec and B.C., the tax credits that they actually offer are significantly higher than what was being offered here in Alberta. When we kind of take that approach of, "We seem to be wasting our money on these tax credits," like I said, I highly, highly disagree because Alberta was starting to become a very significant competitor with those provinces that were offering much, much more so that we see companies like Improbable that have moved their head office here and started to create jobs in that industry.

You know, as I probably mentioned before, when I spoke with people at BioWare, we're talking about salaries ranging somewhere in the neighbourhood of $70,000 to $75,000 a year. Those are very good, mortgage-paying jobs, so when you can offer what is apparently significantly smaller incentives than what's being offered in the other jurisdictions, Alberta was poised, quite honestly, to cash in.

Again, a $150 billion plus industry just within the gaming itself. That's not even talking about all the underindustries that Alberta would have been able to take advantage of. It kind of makes me feel that – you know, sometimes the way I've explained it to some of my constituents: it's like there's been this bowl of money with Alberta's name on it, and here we are going back to the same old same old like we used to do way in the past. We just kind of pushed that bowl of money away and said: "No, no, no. That's okay. We don't need that. We've got this sector over here. We're doing just fine." I would say that strictly from a capitalist point of view you'd want to be getting your thumb into that pie, grabbing some of that money. We're missing out here. It's an incredible opportunity that we are going to let slip through us.

Now, I remember even back I believe it might have been in the '80s. Of course, I'm probably dating myself here a little bit, Mr. Speaker, when I'm talking about that. Edmonton and Alberta had an opportunity to start, some even touted, a bit of its own Silicon Valley right here in Alberta, in Edmonton on the south side, no doubt. Again, you know, decisions that were made back at that time ended up making those industry players decide to not invest here in Alberta.

With things like the digital media tax credit, it clearly was an incentive for these businesses to come set up shop here in Alberta, to take advantage of the very highly trained people that were being trained and educated here in the province plus all of the other social infrastructure that was there like our very, very strong public-sector workers delivering our services to Albertans. Those are also the kinds of things that companies look at when they are investing in a jurisdiction. It's not simply about a big $4.7 billion corporate giveaway. That might help the Walton family, okay? Walmart: that may help them, absolutely. But, you know, these growing tech industries, AI, things like that: they are not able to take advantage of that.

It was these things, these tax credits that the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview had mentioned, that had really spurred some significant growth within those industries, that would have allowed Albertans to gain access to very good-paying jobs, which, again, gets them to be able to pay mortgages, pay income tax, things like that, and we wouldn't have even had to introduce deindexing of bracket creep. It's unfortunate that we're seeing those things leave.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to join debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-North West has risen.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I welcome the opportunity to speak on Bill 20, Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, 2019. This just came forward after the budget, and it's a remarkable piece of legislation. I've certainly seen a lot, and just the breadth and the scope of this omnibus bill is quite uncommon. I find it concerning because, of course, there are quite a lot of significant changes in regard to anything ranging from the tuition tax credits to the digital media tax credits, that the hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore was just talking about. It has the consolidation of many different funds that have existed in different parts of the budget and the government of Alberta.

You know, there are definite things that we could add up here along the way that will cost individuals, families money: the deindexation of tax brackets – right? – some of the tax credits that help to stimulate the economy, which would have benefited individuals and families, and the rollback of the Alberta child benefit and Alberta family employment tax credit. Again, I was just listening to the radio this morning, and an individual was talking about how people would lose money from that choice as well.

I mean, obviously, globally we know that this government is making a choice here around making cuts to the public service, making cuts, most of which we really weren't aware of during either the electoral period or even up to almost budget day. You know, we kept getting reassurances from this government that they would maintain funding and they would make sure that people would be able to get ahead and all these kinds of things. Then this budget has come, and we see quite a different story.

There are a couple of areas here that I want to talk about in particular. I think that the education and tuition tax credit issue: we were just discussing this in the estimates this afternoon, and a lot of people really depended on these tax credits. These are deductions that you can make for tuition and so forth in both your provincial and your federal income tax returns.

Considering how expensive postsecondary education is to begin with, most families have to plan for years in advance to make sure that they can provide that opportunity for their young students or someone who might be an adult who wants to go back to school or what have you. I mean, you don't just do it on a whim; you make plans, through saving and choices and sacrifice, to pay for postsecondary education because, of course, it does provide a tremendous benefit in regard to potential employment. It demonstrably helps an individual's income to be considerably more if you do have a postsecondary education. You know, quite frankly, it's part of our own personal growth as individuals and citizens to engage in postsecondary education, to learn about the world and learn a trade and get on with your life.

So when you change the rules around a very expensive and considerable moment to make a choice to go to postsecondary school and then suddenly, you know, the financial rules change midstream or just at the beginning or even before you even started, this is a problem. Lots of people say, "Oh, well, you know, you can take that tuition tax credit; people's parents are just getting it anyway," and so forth. Well, for a lot of people, it's the students themselves who are paying – paying through student loans and paying through working in the summer and all of that kind of thing – and looking for that extra bit of money back next April when you file your income tax.

This end to the tuition tax credit: I made myself available this afternoon and this morning, actually – we had six hours of debates on Advanced Education – to people from across the province to submit questions and so forth to the Advanced Education ministry. I would say, Mr. Speaker, that this was one of the most common themes that I saw during the day and over the last week or so since this choice was made to cancel tuition and education tax credits. It's a thing; it's real. When you combine it with the increase to tuition that the government has in their own budget, a 23 per cent increase to tuition over the next number of years, you know, it hits you coming and going, basically, where you literally are paying more for tuition. You get the elimination of the tax credit, and you end up paying more and getting less. I really take exception to this choice that is being made.

You know, it's interesting. A number of student advocacy groups did talk about making changes to the tuition tax credit, but that was to build a fund, a granting fund, to offer more low-income students an opportunity to go to school. I mean, that was a creative idea. That was, I think, a useful idea. I think that's sort of a society- and community-building idea. But the only part of that concept that the government seemed to take was just to cancel the tax credit and leave the rest to the wind. Again, that's part of this Bill 20. I certainly don't agree with the choice that is being made here, and I think that the government would be wise to reconsider that.

Moving on to the interactive digital media tax credit, I think that we heard a lot of talk about this in the last few days, since the budget was introduced last week. We saw quite a number of individuals and companies that were making investments around this digital tax credit to build a gaming industry here in Edmonton and other places, in Calgary as well, and suddenly the rug got pulled out from under them – right? – people who were making significant investment.

Let's not forget that the digital media industry is a very fluid and transferable industry. It can move from city to city, jurisdiction to jurisdiction, even to different countries, quite quickly. For these digital media companies to choose to invest and build here in Alberta was a credit, I think, to this tax credit. I think it was a credit to our education system that we have so many talented computer programmers and so forth that would want to choose to live, stay, and raise a family in Alberta, because probably that's where they're from. But now, again, with the ending of this digital media tax credit, they ended up hitting an abrupt brick wall in regard to that investment.

You know, it's interesting to dig a bit deeper into digital media entrepreneurs. I know that the government said: well, they'll benefit from the reduced corporate tax rate. But, no. When they're building a business like this from scratch, they invest every dollar, plus probably some, back into the business, quite frankly. So this notion that a reduction in the corporate tax rate would be the equivalent of the digital media tax credit, I mean, that's entirely erroneous. The people who were actually building these businesses will tell you that, and they have been doing so emphatically in the media and on social media. I've been following that quite closely, and I just really find it quite disturbing.

It's a very high value-added industry, right? The hundreds of billions of dollars, really, that are being generated from the gaming industry, from games and so forth, is a global phenomenon, and thus it is a very transferable and fluid phenomenon that can move from jurisdiction to jurisdiction, as we probably will see here in the province of Alberta as these companies choose to not stay here as a result of this tax credit being eliminated in this budget with Bill 20.

Another tax credit that came to my attention that is being removed with Bill 20 is the capital investment tax credit, which is a way by which businesses can claim some of the machinery or start-up costs, physical machinery, and perhaps even digital computer parts of their business as a way to enhance and help with start-ups in the industry. You know, this has been a very successful program. We've seen that an investment, probably in the form of a tax credit, in the region of $200 million has thus leveraged more than $2 billion worth of economic activity that's directly attributable to the capital investment tax credit. I mean, that's an astounding return that I think is a credit to the innovation that the capital investment tax credit does allow and afford us. It allows lots of flexibility, and it has paid great dividends to businesses across the province.

You know, losing that, again, I think is very short-sighted, and I believe that we could definitely do better. There's a basket of other community and economic tax credits. The Alberta investor tax credit, the scientific research and experimental development tax credit: again, gone. I guess I would perhaps ask the members opposite: why would you do something like that? It was a demonstrable success that helped to build and diversify our economy here in the province of Alberta. [interjection] I always feel good when the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview gives me affirmation on those things.

I mean, again, like, the scope of this Bill 20 is just breathtaking. This also is enabling legislation to repeal the city charters for Edmonton and Calgary and put a new local government fiscal framework act in its place. Again, an astounding about-face from negotiated agreements with our largest cities that were years in the making, quite frankly. You know, sometimes I think that this government is motivated by their summer of repeal, now stretched into the fall and winter of repeal, for the sake of repealing. But, again, this has represented years of work, these city charters, that could help to really bolster the economic development of our larger cities. You know, we need to remember that our energy industry certainly forms the backbone of the infrastructure of our economy and will continue to do so for a long, long time, but we must recognize the key assets of how we can help to diversify our economy and where the most economic activity is actually taking place. You know, it's our cities that provide that infrastructure for a knowledge economy, for diversity in the widest possible way, and to repeal the city charter, which was quite, I think, very far-reaching and visionary, to replace that with something more regressive I think is a huge mistake.

The next one – it feels like I'm travelling around the world here with repeal – is the suspension of the indexation of tax brackets for the income tax system. Now, this is a significant change. I found it astounding to be speaking on the same side as the Canadian Taxpayers Federation. I saw Colby Cosh going on about this the other day in the National Post, but, I mean, you can see what a broad sort of swath of anger and disbelief the suspension of these tax brackets did engender here in the province of Alberta and, indeed, right across the country, I think, as well. You know, it is probably projected in the government's own figures to produce at least $600 million by the end of the 2022-23 fiscal year. Well, guess where that money is coming from, Mr. Speaker. That's $600 million over the next few years that comes out of everybody's pocket, quite frankly.

You know, this notion – I saw it as a meme and it was repeated in here yesterday – if you earn exactly the amount of the money that you did . . .

The Acting Speaker: Thank you.

Hon. members, 29(2)(a) is available. I saw the hon. Member for Edmonton-South has risen.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's always a pleasure to hear from my colleague from Edmonton-North West on omnibus bills like this. Sometimes it feels like we're going back in time. I know he spoke to a number of omnibus bills years ago. I guess this type of regression is bringing us back in time in a couple of ways. But I know the member spoke at quite a bit of length about how this is damaging for the economy, it's damaging for Albertans, it's damaging for workers. We're joined by I think it's over 25, 30 workers now in the gallery here who are really interested in seeing how important these bills, these two omnibus bills we're debating tonight, are going to be for them.

So perhaps the member could talk a little bit about how the $4.7 billion, no-jobs handout is hurting these families, hurting these workers. Perhaps the member can talk a little bit about how, really, these types of drastic cuts to the economy and these types of drastic attacks on the economy really will hurt families. It's something that is so important that when we're in this place, we focus on making sure that communities and Albertans are who we're looking out for.

The Acting Speaker: The Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you. I appreciate that very much. You know, my main concern is that when you make a series of quite significant changes to the economic structure, the tax structure, fiscal structure, you can create a spiral of events that can exceed each of the individual things that you've put into place, right? It's like the cumulative effect of, as you say, having a significant reduction in our capacity to raise revenue through this corporate tax giveaway and other mechanisms as well. I mean, we know that a government needs money to run. It's not money to run to pass it off into the winds. It's money to pay for schools, to pay for hospitals, to pay for roads, and so forth and build the infrastructure and the social structure that a modern society needs.

By creating that significant fiscal restraint or inability to raise money, then that's what has precipitated all of these other things that we saw in education and health care and these fiscal changes as well. I mean, these are choices that a government makes. It's not like: "Oh, no. You know, we have no choice. This is what we've got to do." We do see Alberta's economic situation in a precarious place, but we show lots of signs of hope. What I find particularly to be troublesome is that, you know, some of these ways by which we did stimulate hope and optimism for the future, like the capital investment tax credit, the digital media tax credit: again, each unto themselves individually they might seem not huge – mind you, the capital investment tax credit could be demonstrably attributing at least $2 billion worth of economic growth – but when you start adding all these things up together, that's when you can have a problem.

These are choices that this government is making. It's not as though it's as inevitable as the winter coming to Edmonton every fall; these are choices. We talk about ways by which we can strengthen and diversify our economy. Well, the best way, the most fundamental and time-proven way, is to invest in your people – right? – to make sure you have money in people's pockets. They don't have to be loaded with cash. It's just to make sure that people are spending in the economy, that they're using the local facilities inside of our province and participating in the economy. Each thing that you take away, like this other aspect to Bill 20 with the Alberta child benefit and the Alberta family employment tax credit, again, I heard pretty compelling arguments this morning on the radio that people will lose money. It will literally take money out of your pocket. The suspension of indexation of tax brackets: it's good for $600 million over the next three or four years. That's money that comes right out of people's pockets, just like that.

Again, we want to make sure that we're prudent and careful in how we make choices in this Legislature. I would strongly suggest that Bill 20 and Bill 21, that we'll take a look at here shortly as well, are strong signs that there's a problem.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any others? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview and Official Opposition House Leader has risen to speak.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my privilege to rise and speak to Bill 20, the Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, 2019. Before I get into that – because as many members in this Assembly will know, brevity is not my strong suit – this bill is awful. Quite frankly, it's terrible, and I'll tell you why it is. And you don't have to believe me. You can listen to the private sector: the folks that you claimed to listen to, but who clearly you didn't listen to. You can say what you want and spin it how you want, but I will explain how dismantling the tax credits will severely hurt many Alberta businesses, including their ability to diversify the economy.

You can point to your corporate tax giveaway: it does nothing for them, and if you believe that it does, then you clearly haven't spoken to the industry, nor do you understand that small businesses reinvest every penny that goes into their company. They do not pull it out, therefore they don't pay corporate tax rates. Therefore, you could put the corporate tax rate to zero, and how many of these tech companies would you support? None, Mr. Speaker. Not a one because, again, they reinvest every penny. What they need help in is growing and scaling faster, which means they can hire more people, which means we will create more jobs. The tax credits that you folks are dismantling did that very thing.

Before I get to that, Mr. Speaker, I do want to acknowledge the incredible men and women that have joined us in the gallery tonight. I know they're quite upset, and they wouldn't be here if they weren't. For Bill 21, that we're going to get to in a moment or in about an hour or maybe an hour and a half, I appreciate that – sometime tonight – where that bill is an attack on working people. Again, we've seen now in the short six months that this government has formed office that they have gone back on their word a number of times. The government has misled Albertans – we're losing track of the number of times. But we'll talk about that in a little bit. I just want to bid you all welcome. Thank you for being here tonight and representing. There may be 20 or 30 people in the gallery, but I promise you that they represent tens of thousands of Alberta workers. They are here to make it known and send a message to this government that the working people of this province are the backbone of this province. You are attacking the very fibre of our society through Bill 21.

Now moving to Bill 20, this bill dismantling the different tax credits. I appreciate the comments that my colleague from Edmonton-North West made. The statistics are there. I challenge every member in this House. Don't take my word for it, okay? You can accuse me of being political or partisan, and that's fine. These tax credits, first of all, came from the private sector. It wasn't a New Democrat political strategist somewhere that thought of these. This came from regular consultations with Alberta businesses, with chambers of commerce. I encourage the minister to go and speak with the Calgary Chamber of commerce, because they essentially designed two of the four tax credits, to tell them: "You know what? You were wrong. We know better. We're government. We know better. We know that this corporate tax giveaway is the silver bullet to get the Alberta economy back on track."

Well, if we're looking at facts, Mr. Speaker, so far what we've seen – and today in question period I talked about PrairieSky – is that these companies are saying: "Yes. Thank you for reducing our tax rate. We're going to take this money and either, you know, make it work on our balance sheet or we're going to do share buybacks or we're going to invest it in other provinces." On this gift from this UCP government, Husky Energy said: "Thank you very much. We're going to spend the money not in Alberta; we're going to Saskatchewan or Newfoundland to spend the money." So if that's not an indicator that this corporate tax giveaway is not working – or I should say that it's not working for Albertans; it's working great for the people in other parts of the country – then I don't know what is.

But I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that what was working to help diversify our economy and grow our economy here in Alberta were the multiple tax credits that we introduced. I appreciate the fact that the other side hates the fact that the NDs introduced it. I would ask them to set their partisan ideological glasses aside, take them off for a second, and look at return on investment. The investor tax credit is a 30 per cent tax credit. An additional 5 per cent we added as a diversity portion. And this is what I love. I encourage members to look at the stats of the number of women and of minorities that make up boards of companies – right? – either board positions or CEOs. You will see that there is a really, really bad inverse of the number of women and people of diverse backgrounds that go to university and postsecondaries to become programmers, et cetera, but you look – now I'm criss-crossing with the digital media tax credit. You look at the number that make up the boards, and there is a huge deficit.

I was quite proud of the fact that we wanted to encourage companies not only to have more diverse boards, but here's the thing – and I encourage you to look at this. Companies that are more diverse are more innovative and have stronger balance sheets and do better financially. So never mind the feel-good reason or the reason of equality. Look at even the bottom line. Companies that have diverse boards do better. So let's encourage that, which is what this investor tax credit did: $30 million conditionally approved by government leveraged $100 million of investment. That's over a 3 to 1 return on investment, Mr. Speaker. I would ask the members: what's your ROI on your current corporate tax giveaway? You're actually negative. It's not creating jobs. I believe that the government is down 27,000 jobs – not the government. Pardon me. That's a whole other issue. The province is down 27,000 jobs.

So this was one of the tools to help diversify the economy. Other provinces have had tax credits for many, many years. In fact, the province of British Columbia, since 1985, has through this one vehicle – and I appreciate that this is just one tool, but it's a tool that's working. It's a tool that the numbers speak for themselves. We introduced a tax credit. It was sector-wide, so there are applications to oil and gas, there are applications to agriculture, and there are applications to our health care sector. I mean, the benefits go on and on, Mr. Speaker. But the 3 to 1 return on investment is significant.

I think that it's shameful that this government – and I know that the Premier knows better. I know that he might be claiming that the corporate tax reduction helps every company. I think he's well enough informed that he knows that that is not the case because it's the companies – I mean, I encourage the minister to go talk to companies like Improbable or other companies that wanted to use the investor tax credit, that were going to investors to say: we can offer you a 30 per cent tax credit. Then this government yanked the rug from under them, and suddenly now these companies are in limbo trying to raise money to grow, to hire more people, to scale, create jobs, to do better, to compete globally, and this tool was taken from them. I mean, that's just the first tax credit.

The other one, the recent one – and I hope that the minister of economic development and trade sits down with the long and ever-growing list of interactive digital media companies that are livid about a support that was helping to level the playing field. You folks claim that you want to level the playing field. You didn't. You actually just brought in the Alberta disadvantage when it comes to digital media companies. You know why, Mr. Speaker? Because companies can go to B.C., Ontario, or Quebec and receive a very handsome tax credit for their biggest cost, which is the cost of labour because these are programmers and designers, very well-educated people who are good at their job, who are paid well, fantastic.

A company like BioWare, founded in Edmonton, started here in Alberta. They're still in Alberta. But you know what, Mr. Speaker? They had at one point 800 employees in the province of Alberta; 500 of those have moved to Quebec. Why, you ask? Great question. Because they have an interactive digital media tax credit, and it doesn't make sense to stay in a province that doesn't have that. Again, you know, I'm sure you're thinking: what about the corporate tax cut? Well, you know what? These companies are not looking for a corporate tax rate reduction. They're looking for supports like through the digital media tax credit.

Those companies were growing and scaling here. I encourage the minister to meet with Beamdog and a list of other companies, Improbable, who came to Alberta and convinced their shareholders and their boards: "Alberta, they get it. They're levelling the playing field. Let's go to Alberta now. We're competitive." Not anymore we're not, not in the interactive digital media space. There's a disconnect between what the government is saying and what they are doing.

You look at the capital investment tax credit. My colleague from Edmonton-North West talked about this. This is a 10 per cent, nonrefundable tax credit up to $5 million. All fancy speak to say, "Hey, company X, if you're going to build a new facility, expand, or invest in new machinery and equipment, you can qualify for up to $5 million worth of tax credits if you spend the money now. You pull the trigger, you make the investment. You were thinking about it. This was that incentive to take your money from the sidelines and inject it into the economy." Two hundred million dollars over the last three years has leveraged $2.2 billion of new investment in this province. That tax credit now, under Bill 20: gone.

I would love for a member of the other side to get up and – let's look at the return on investment, let's look at the jobs created, let's look at the positive impact and argue: no; this was the right decision. I think that even in the Budget Address, Mr. Speaker, it shows that the Finance minister is either out of touch, doesn't get it, or doesn't care because it refers to these tax credits as boutique and complicated. I'm going to venture a guess that the Minister of Finance has never actually looked at the application process for these tax credits because one of the things that industry said to us was: "Make it as simple as possible. We don't have time to be filling out reams of paperwork." But you want the money to get into the hands of these businesses to be able to make those decisions.

What we do know, Mr. Speaker, is that the world is shrinking, everyone is going global, and we're competing. We're competing with every other country and jurisdiction on this planet, and where the folks over there don't get it – and I encourage them to go down to Silicone Valley – is that companies will tell you that one of the things that they want, in fact their number one wish list item, is talent. What we just heard from estimates today: the Minister of Advanced Education and this government are making significant cuts. The 3,000 tech spaces that we proposed, which are needed to help produce the talent for companies like Amazon, Facebook, Google, and Apple to come to Alberta, these guys have just gutted it, saying: "No, no, no. Clearly, we don't need those investments here."

A company called Google – you may have heard of it, Mr. Speaker – decided to invest in Alberta, their first-ever DeepMind lab outside of the U.K., and they came to little old Edmonton, Alberta, Canada. Why? Because of investments that our government – and I will give credit to previous PC governments – made, investments in artificial intelligence and technology.

Now, this government talks a good game about how they're committing some new money to AI. I learned from the Advanced Education minister today that despite the fact that in the budget documents it actually says postsecondaries, zero dollars of that is going toward postsecondaries. You know what, Mr. Speaker? We need to invest in the people of this province to ensure they have the skills so that we can attract those companies to come to Alberta. Not even that. I mean, there are companies like MobSquad out of Calgary that are doing incredible work, that are looking to other jurisdictions because they don't have the talent here in the province.

Again, I know the Leader of the Official Opposition has said this many times, but it's worth repeating. You know, what made Wayne Gretzky a brilliant hockey player is that he never went to where the puck was; he went to where the puck was going. These guys don't see where the world is going and the value of technology and supporting our tech industry through things like tax credits. You know, it's just disappointing.

I encourage the minister and all the folks over there to listen to the private sector. They're the ones who are the most outraged about these decisions, as they should be. They were creating jobs. It's – you know, frustrating is an understatement. I think that it's offensive – that's more of an appropriate word – to hear: well, that only helped a few hundred companies, and our corporate tax gift is going to help, whatever, many, many more. Well, okay. So far it's helped none. Actually, that's not true. It has helped them. It helped them free up money to invest in other jurisdictions, so kudos for helping Newfoundlanders and folks in Saskatchewan with their job numbers, but as far as here in Alberta, it's not. But these tax credits, albeit maybe smaller: a newer program that was starting to pick up momentum.

My point is this, Mr. Speaker. I mean, every company starts off really, really small. So these tax credits may have helped a small company that could be the next Google or Apple or Facebook. You know what? Uber was started in Calgary.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you.

Hon. members, 29(2)(a) is available. I believe I see the hon. Member for Red Deer-South has risen.

Mr. Stephan: Thank you. I'd just like to respond to my friend in terms of some of the comments he made. I really do appreciate, though, hearing my friends on the other side speak about their concern for the economy and for Alberta competitiveness. I know that when I was campaigning and knocking on doors of my neighbours and friends, they too were concerned about the economic damage and trials that they were encountering.

You know, I remember observing the tax policies of my friends opposite. Of course, the NDP campaigned on raising corporate income taxes by 20 per cent. They were quite hostile and quite pleased when they did raise corporate taxes. I expected that they felt that they would get a large amount of revenue to pay for some of their socialist programs that they wanted to pursue. But what really happened when we raised the corporate taxes by 20 per cent? Well, Mr. Speaker, corporate tax revenue actually fell. The corporate tax revenue in 2015, prior to them taking office, never recovered during the four years that they were in government to what it actually got to. I think they panicked. I think they saw the failed policy that they had, so they brought in these investor tax credits, the Alberta investor tax credit and the CITC.

I want to read a comment. They talked about how this was so simple and so good. One of the top tax law firms in the country, focused in Alberta, is a firm called Moodys Gartner. They're a firm that has locations in Calgary and Edmonton. They, you know, are really deep thinkers and analyze – they live and breathe tax policy. They looked at these new Alberta tax credits. This is an article in 2017, because, of course, these tax credits came about in 2017, after the NDP experienced how terribly they failed, essentially, in generating economic growth. The title of this article is New Alberta Investment Tax Credits – Great for Business or Bureaucrats? The article goes on and says:

The procedures for receiving these credits were released in January 2017. The real winners appear to [be] the bureaucrats who will be hired to administer these programs . . .

The AITC credits will work as follows. I'll put a frown . . . next to every step that involves interaction with a government employee:

1. Create a user account through the online application portal . . .
2. Register as a Venture Capital Corporation . . . or Eligible Business Corporation.

There's an interaction.

The government will evaluate your application and, if approved, [they] will let you know within 30 days of approval. The instructions even say that "program staff will thoroughly evaluate applications to ensure they meet eligibility requirements" . . .

3. Apply for approval to raise additional equity capital . . .

Again, a little frowny face.

Once you have been approved in Step 2, you are required to submit an application to the government to ask for permission to raise additional equity capital.

4. Raise [additional] equity capital.

5. Apply for Tax Credit Certificates . . . Once you raise the equity capital, you are required to go back to the government by completing and submitting a "Share Purchase Information Form" to apply for Tax Credit Certificates on behalf of investors.

Lots of red tape here.

6. Delivery of Tax Credit Certificates.

I almost said red tape certificates.

The Tax Credit Certificates will be issued starting in January 2018. Once received, you'll be responsible for distributing them to your investors.

This is what Moodys Gartner kind of summarized. He said:

By now, the weaknesses of this program for Alberta business should be painfully obvious.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview has risen to speak.

Ms Sigurdson: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and talk about Bill 20 – it's a pretty hefty bill – the Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, 2019. I guess they call this an omnibus bill. Many years ago, when I was doing my master's degree in social work, I took a social policy course. In that course there was a key question. When you look at any kind of policy, you ask that question, and that question is: who benefits? Who doesn't? This bill – I thought: hey, I'm just going, you know, to go back to that class and do that analysis of who benefits and who doesn't by these proposed changes in legislation because I think that that can be very informative, and I think that that would support Albertans to understand this bill a bit more.

As my hon. colleagues have already shared, this bill ends the interactive digital media tax credit. It ends the capital investment tax credit. It ends the community economic tax credit. It ends the Alberta investor tax credit. It ends the scientific research and experimental development tax credit. So who benefits, who doesn't from that? Well, certainly, Mr. Speaker, I would say that the people who are risking, people who are creative, people who are putting themselves out there are being hurt by this. Okay. The government is choosing to not benefit these people.

End education and tuition tax credits: oh, okay; well, that's students. Students getting their postsecondary degrees are going to be burdened even more heavily by the funds that they'll have to pay through students loans, maybe, or having to work extra jobs that may take away some of their ability to focus on their studies. Okay. So you're going to hurt young people who are trying to better themselves. Got it. That's who does not benefit.

The third is to repeal the city charters for Edmonton and Calgary and put a new local government fiscal framework act in place. Well, I mean, I think we've heard loud and clear from the two big-city mayors that they're not happy. They see this as not benefiting their cities at all, and in fact they feel betrayed. It's really a profound broken promise. The UCP, when they were campaigning, said that they would respect the agreement that our government created. No, they haven't. So the big cities aren't going to be benefiting.

Another thing this bill, this omnibus bill, does is suspend indexation of tax brackets for the income tax system. That means that everyone will be paying more in taxes. I know that the UCP does like to say that taxes aren't going up under their watch, but this very clearly shows that they are. They can try to split hairs, use special words to describe it, but for the average family the reality is that their taxes are going up. Again, you know, regular Albertans aren't going to benefit from this change in legislation.

They're going to end the lottery fund so that, you know, groups – I mean, I've volunteered at many a casino when my kids were playing soccer or other sports so that those teams could have support. Community groups: the lottery fund helped a lot of groups be viable. Child care centres: it helped them be able to give those extras. Community groups, kids' sports groups: they're not going to benefit.

End the access to the future fund and the Alberta cancer prevention legacy fund and the environmental protection and enhancement fund: ah, okay. So people who are trying to make Alberta a better place, people who are trying to help people, you know, if they have an early cancer diagnosis, for example, live in healthy environments: oh, okay. That's going to be taken away. They're not going to benefit from that.

Oh, yes, our environment: well, you know, that's not important to this government, so that, too, will be taken away. People who care, want to be conscious about how they live on the planet to make sure that we can be here for a long time, so our children, our grandchildren are really responsible stewards of our province: no, those people aren't going to benefit.

This one is really of special interest to me. The Alberta child benefit and the Alberta family employment tax credit are going to be rolled into one, and what that means is that fewer families will be supported. I'll talk about that a little bit more. But, again, who benefits from that? Well, I know who doesn't, and that is families with children.

The increase in tobacco tax: I guess smokers don't get any benefit from that, so they're not going to benefit because they'll have to pay more.

Finally, they'll amend the funding agreements for the LRT in Edmonton and Calgary. That means that those projects aren't going to go ahead as quickly, so that does not benefit people who take public transportation, people who do care about the environment, because we know that public transportation pollutes less than everyone in their individual cars. Again, that's another group.

And guess who does benefit from these kinds of programs? I think we know very clearly that with this UCP government it's about people who run wealthy corporations, with their $4.7 billion giveaway to corporations. I mean, the elite stay elite. That's one of the things, that's one of the reasons I got involved in politics, because Alberta – and it continues to this day – has the largest income inequality of any province in Canada. You know, there are certainly people who are at the very top, but there are also a lot of people at the bottom. We have that biggest discrepancy. We know a healthy society has a robust middle class, where there is tremendous equality and people have access to public programs and supports. Of course, this omnibus bill seems to be wanting to make all of that worse, make more inequality in our province. Of course, this concerns me greatly.

I want to talk about sort of the combination of the child tax benefit with – what's it called now? It's got a bit of a longer name – the Alberta family employment tax benefit or credit. What's happening is that it's going to be combined so that actually fewer Albertans are eligible. Actually, about 155,000 will receive less from that combination, and 55,000 won't actually receive anything at all. The thresholds have changed so that their incomes will be too high, so those families will not have the benefit of that program at all.

This is a concern to me, especially because of – you know, I must say that it was something that I was so proud of when we were government, that we cut child poverty rates in half. You know why? Largely because of the work that we did on the Alberta child benefit. It made a huge difference. This government's regressive policy now to combine it, increase the threshold is creating more families that will be in distress because they won't be able to access that program or they won't be able to receive that equivalent amount of money. It really was extraordinary what our government did.

You know, I think that on both sides of the House – I can't imagine that the UCP wouldn't want children to not live in poverty. We know that children are our future. We want to have them supported so that they can grow up to be healthy, engaged citizens so that they can contribute to their communities, their families. I mean, any politician would want those things. Children don't live in poverty by themselves. They live in poverty with their families, and their families need support. This combination is kicking a whole bunch of families off this program, and it's going to increase child poverty.

What's really important is that we had a dramatic plunge in child poverty rates, driven largely by both the provincial and the federal government benefits targeted at low-income families. Figures released in February of this year, 2019, show that Alberta's rate was cut in half between 2015 and 2017, falling from 10 per cent of children living in poverty to only 5 per cent. Economist Trevor Tombe, who the other side likes to quote quite a bit, says that the decline is largely due to the Canada child benefit introduced by the federal Liberal government and also the Alberta child benefit, a policy proposal first introduced by Premier Jim Prentice and later enacted under our NDP government. These two policies made a huge difference for families in Alberta.

So it's distressing to see that the UCP government is deciding that families, families with children will receive fewer services. This is part of this omnibus bill, and this is something that will create more inequality in our province and, certainly, more injustice and a lot of, I think, suffering for families who are struggling.

Myself, I'm a single mom. I have three sons. I mean, when I was younger, I struggled a lot, and I did depend on some supports from government. I know that I was in university during the Klein era, and there were grants for grad students that were seen as disadvantaged. That made the world of difference for me so that I could go on, because, you know, I was strapped financially. As we know from history, Premier Klein cut public programs in half, and those grants were taken halfway through my education. So I had an extremely heavy burden, and it was very difficult for me to raise my children not under the poverty line.

I think this is really misguided, it's a mistake, and I really urge this UCP government to see who they're hurting, who's benefiting from their programs and who's not. They're telling us that, you know, kids should not live out of poverty. They seem to be pushing them further into poverty, and that certainly distresses me.

Something that I want to focus on, too, is the Alberta cancer prevention legacy fund. I certainly have, you know, again, personal experience with this. I mean, I was diagnosed with leukemia, I guess it's over a year ago. I was treated and, happily, things seem to be going well for me. But I still have a bit of a road to go before I'm cured. I'm not sure. They just sort of follow you; they won't say that you're cured. But it is a type of leukemia that is curable, so I'm very grateful for that.

So I have some sensitivity, you know, when programs like this, the Alberta cancer prevention legacy fund, are cut because it makes a dramatic difference in people's lives and can help people know – I mean, one of the big challenges about cancer is diagnosis. People may not be feeling well. I didn't feel well for a long time, but I just thought: oh, it's because I'm the Minister of Seniors and Housing and I'm super busy all the time. I just thought I was burnt out, so I kept minimizing it all the time. I'm so fortunate that I did have some people close to me that could see that something was wrong beyond burnout.

If we have healthy communities, healthy environments, if we have practitioners – like, I had been to my doctor, my GP, three times during that time but never got a diagnosis. Well, this cancer prevention legacy fund works with primary health care and helps physicians, nurses, people in the community know what some of the warning signs are. It creates more awareness about the things that could be done to diagnose properly. I mean, I'm fortunate that I was diagnosed, but I think some people aren't diagnosed because people don't have enough information. This fund actually created more awareness in the community and helped people, you know, live healthier lives.

Some cancers, of course, are caused by lifestyle issues. Leukemia is kind of just, you know, a mutation of the cells. It's not so much about how you live your life. But if you have skin cancer or, you know, depending on if you drink or what you eat, there are some lifestyle issues. Again, this fund helps people to understand that, helps medical professionals with knowing what to do, and actually helps by encouraging positive lifestyle choices in the community.

They're made up of a team of innovative leaders, scientists, and public health experts who specialize in cancer prevention.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you.

Hon. members, 29(2)(a) is available. The individual who caught my eye was Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am very engaged by the speaker from Edmonton-Riverview in terms of her analysis of the question of who benefits from a policy versus who does not benefit from a policy, which I think is a very good question to be asking. It's a good, basic question in terms of intent and direction of a policy.

I just want to speak about the fact that one aspect of this bill is the deindexing of the taxes in the province of Alberta, something that's often referred to as bracket creep. Last night I had an opportunity in this House to read some of the speeches by the Premier when he was actually in the House of Commons commenting on the nature of these kinds of deindexing policies, particularly ones that happened when he was in opposition, and the fact that he was very concerned about those most vulnerable people who do not benefit from these tax breaks. In his speeches he mentioned single parents and people who are of low income and so on, and he referred to this type of tax break as “insidious.” So his own description of the behaviour of his own minister, I gather, is that it’s insidious behaviour.

I wonder if the former speaker might take a moment to reflect on a quote that I’d come across in which the Member for Central Peace-Notley asked the Finance minister yesterday about those tax creeps. At the time the minister was quoted as saying that this will not result in additional taxes, that if you earn the same amount this year as next, you will pay the same amount. However, Professor Trevor Tombe from the University of Calgary responded to that statement made by the minister in this House with this answer:

Misleading answer, for (at least) three reasons:

1. Anyone [with education] credits will pay more tax, even if their income remains the same;
2. Most people’s income will rise [because of] inflation; they’ll pay more tax;
3. Everyone will pay more than they were going to under prior rules.

He goes on then to clarify that inflation wouldn’t have previously increased anyone’s . . . tax burden. Now it does. So if your “real” income doesn’t change, your taxes now go up.

So an esteemed professor, who is often in fact quoted by the Premier and other members opposite, is suggesting that the Minister of Finance made a misleading statement in the House the other day, and the point of his misleading statement was to suggest that there are no people who will be negatively affected by this bill.

It brings us back to the question that the member just reflected on: who is benefiting, and who is not? The esteemed professor is saying that the minister is not speaking in a way which we may refer to as truthful in this House. He is saying that his speech yesterday in answer to questions in question period was misleading because indeed there are people who are going to suffer from this bill. Clearly, this government is picking winners and losers. Of course, as they always do, they seek out the most vulnerable people and attack those vulnerable people and, in this case, take money away from those most vulnerable people.

Mr. McIver: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, the Minister of Transportation on a point of order.

Point of Order Imputing False Motives

Mr. McIver: Thank you. Under 23(h), (i), and (j), imputing false motives to another member of the House. Now, there were about 10, 12, 20 examples that I could have used in the speech that was going on. I tried to be tolerant because the member is performing, though, clearly, accuracy wasn’t the biggest part of his performance. He just actually said that a member of this House seeks out weak Albertans in order to cause them harm. That might not have been the exact words, but that was pretty close to what I just heard, and I think that falls exactly under the definition of imputing false motives to another member of the House. I would ask, respectfully, that you have him apologize and withdraw those remarks.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford in rebuttal on the point of order.

Mr. Feehan: Mr. Speaker, I don’t believe that we have a point of order here. I think it’s a reasonable debate as to whether or not the most vulnerable are attacked by policies presented by this government. I think it is quite within my right to declare that the government acts intentionally. Although I will concede, if the member opposite is willing to stand up and say that the government does not act intentionally. Then I will apologize. But given that I believe that they do, I don’t believe that there is a point of order in this case.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. members. With regard to this point of order I would like to take a moment and just remind the House that I do believe – actually, I’m going to just take the opportunity and say this. I think we are beginning to come close with regard to the line, not necessarily just on this issue per se but also with regard to moving from third person to a more direct discussion of individual members. I would say, though, that I would like to take this opportunity to caution the House.

With regard to this specific point of order, I think that everyone in the House should of course avoid implying that a member is intentionally trying to harm or is causing harm to Albertans. I think that that is a fair assessment of my recollection of what was stated, not having the benefit of the Blues. I still do think that perhaps the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford may want to just, if anything, go back and restructure the language that he was trying to make with regard to the point that he was discussing.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I accept the judgment of the chair. I ask that my comments be withdrawn, and I apologize to the House.

Debate Continued

Mr. Feehan: I’d still like to hear the member who was speaking speak about how the vulnerable are being hurt by this bill, which I think is the point of the discussion at hand, so if I could defer to the speaker to respond.

Ms Sigurdson: Well, thank you very much, hon. colleague, for this. Of course, you know, both he and I are social workers. Both of us have our master’s in social work. I think both of us got involved in politics because we care about people in the community. We care about the most vulnerable, and certainly we stand very deeply in our shoes to make sure that their voices are heard. I think in the political arena . . .

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to join the debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-South has risen.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is always a pleasure to rise here in this place and speak at this hour. I’ve got to say that it occurs to me that we have over 30 people joining us tonight in the gallery, which, honestly, is more than we sometimes get during question period, so I think it really speaks to how important these two omnibus pieces of legislation are, how important and how impactful this is going to be for so many Albertans, so many workers right across this entire province.

It’s something that I think is going to be very important because we see with Bill 20, the Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, that it’s a bait-and-switch plan. It’s a plan that is going to make Albertans pay more and get less. It’s a plan that attacks the most vulnerable Albertans. It's a plan that makes life more expensive. It's something that is, I think, Mr. Speaker, not very well thought out, frankly.

I mean, we see it go after multiple tax credits that were creating good jobs. We see the digital media tax credit disappear, we see the Alberta investor tax credit disappear, we see the capital investment tax credit disappear, the scientific research and development tax credits disappear, all tax credits that were targeted, creating jobs. Instead what we get is a $4.7 billion handout to the wealthiest corporations. Mr. Speaker, instead of actually using and continuing programs that the NDP government brought in that were out there making jobs, helping workers get back to work, the government has decided that it is their prerogative and a higher priority for them to give money away to their friends and donors and the wealthiest corporations. I think that's something that's too bad. I think that we were doing a good job of trying to diversify the economy, but it appears as though this may not be a priority of the new Conservative government.

We also see that a number of funds were eliminated, Mr. Speaker. We see the access to the future fund, which is worth approximately $58 million, the environmental protection and enhancement fund, worth approximately $150 million, the Alberta cancer prevention legacy fund, worth about $451 million, and the Alberta lottery fund, worth about $52 million. The shocking thing: all of these funds have been eliminated and brought into general revenue.

I know that the government is going to get up and say, if they do get up tonight: well, we're still funding a number of these commitments through general revenue. Well, what they've opened the door to doing is raiding these funds – well, they won't exist anymore – raiding the assets that were there, raiding the investments we were making for the future of Alberta. We saw the Conservatives do this decades ago with the Alberta heritage savings trust fund, and we're seeing them do it again with the Alberta lottery fund, where they're going after communities, communities like playground organizations, parent organizations, community leagues, Mr. Speaker. They're going after these types of groups, and those are the families, those are the groups that are going to suffer from this.

We see the Alberta cancer prevention legacy fund, which now contributes $25 million a year to cancer research and cancer awareness – those are the types of organizations that we are now opening the door to being raided by general revenue, to no longer being funded properly by the government, to no longer having this ongoing support, no longer having responsible investments so that the funds can continue to grow and can continue to sustain these investments in important projects in our communities like the access to the future fund, which enabled Albertans to get higher education, or the environmental protection and enhancement fund, which protects the air we breathe. These are the types of projects the Conservatives do not think are important. It's clear they don't think they're important, Mr. Speaker, because they've eliminated them and raided them and put them into general revenue. They've opened the door so that they could take that money away, out of the pockets of Albertans, and that's something that I think is shameful.

We're seeing them raise taxes on every single Albertan. The average Alberta family, Mr. Speaker, every single worker's family that's in the gallery today: all of them will see an increase of $600 a year just in personal income taxes. This government ran on no new taxes. This government ran on jobs, economy, and pipeline. Instead, what they've done is they've gone and given $4.7 billion away to the wealthiest corporations, and they've reached into the pockets of Alberta families and taken $600 out of those wallets. That's what's shameful about this bill. That's what's shameful about what this government is doing.

They don't understand how they are hurting families. They don't understand how workers are seeing the brunt of this attack. They don't understand how this is something that is not supported by Albertans. It's not what Albertans voted for. It wasn't even in their platform, Mr. Speaker. When conservative organizations are calling it a sneaky tax and a sneaky raise in income taxes, that's how you know you've messed up as conservative. That's how you know you've done a bad job, when people on both the left and the right think you messed up. That's simply the case when they're taking $600 away from every single family right here in this bill, right here in black and white.

It's such a shame because we see time and time again the Conservatives talking about how they have this huge mandate, how they have this platform that they're going through with, and we're seeing so many things that just weren't in the platform, so many things that they just simply did not talk about and now have sprung on Albertans, now have decided to attack Albertans with, and not shown to anybody. They didn't talk about it through their so-called consultation, Mr. Speaker. They didn't talk about it through their campaign. They didn't talk about these issues at all. Instead, what they decided to do was that they're now going to bring them forward. They're now going to make families hurt. They're now going to make their constituents pay more, and that's a shame.

We see the Municipal Affairs changes, Mr. Speaker. We see them ripping up agreements with cities. We see them legislating away long-term funding agreements. We see agreements like the green line for the LRT in Calgary here today. We see that they actually have a clause that they can tear up the agreement if they want. I know the Premier has been up a number of times in this House saying that, well, he funded this line, and he's so proud of the work that he did in the federal government funding this line. But, then, why did he put in this bill and why did he allow his ministers to put in this bill a clause that lets them tear up this same deal?

That's the question Calgarians will be asking today. That's the question that Albertans will be asking. Why are they unilaterally setting decisions on how the conditions of an Edmonton LRT agreement will be made without even going to the negotiating table yet? Why are they telling municipalities how the funding is going to work? Why are they telling them how they're going to pay for the transit system, what the framework has to look like, Mr. Speaker?

That's not how you negotiate in good faith. That's not how you have a discussion about what we want to invest in. That's not how you have a discussion about what's best for our province. What that is is a heavy-handed government that does not care about the best interests of Albertans, Mr. Speaker. They may get up, and I hope they do and speak to that. But it shows very clearly that these ministers and this government don't understand the needs of Albertans. They don't care.

What they're doing is that they're trying to make life more expensive. They're trying to make life more expensive while giving $4.7 billion away to the wealthiest corporations and creating no new jobs, Mr. Speaker, not a single new job. In fact, this government has actually lost jobs since they brought in the $4.7 billion handout. They've lost 27,000 jobs. That's what's so shocking.

What's so shocking is that they claim they are the fiscal masterminds, they claim that they are going to balance the budget and all these things, Mr. Speaker, but in fact when we look at this bill and when we look at their fiscal documents in black and white, they're on track to over $90 billion in debt. Their deficit is larger than ours ever would have been this year.

And we're seeing shocking things. We're seeing that they really don't understand how this will hurt families. They really don't understand. They've gotten up in this House and spoken to it, Mr.

Speaker. They themselves are talking about how this isn't actually an increase in personal income taxes. That's right here in this omnibus bill, the increases to personal income taxes.

When every single economist in this province agrees that this is an increase to personal income taxes because they deindexed it, they're going to say: well, no, no, no; we're just pausing the indexation. Well, every single economist, the ones they've been quoting included, agree that this is actually a raise to taxes because it costs families $600 more a year – $600 more per family – $600 million over four years for the province, Mr. Speaker. It's what's so shocking.

What's so shocking is that this government insists on misleading, that this government insists on not telling the whole truth to Albertans because they are afraid of what will come, they are afraid of being able to speak openly about this. That's something that's really unfortunate. That's something that's really sad, I think.

We're here as the opposition. We're here, and there are Albertans. I think there are more Albertans than when I looked up the first time, Mr. Speaker. There must be 35 or more Albertans in the gallery here today that are hearing and understanding how this affects them, how this affects their pocketbooks, how this affects their rights, how this affects their families, because we understand that you don't create jobs by giving $4.7 billion away to the wealthiest corporations. We saw this government try, and in fact what happened is that Husky put the money overseas and then laid off workers right in Calgary.

That's not what Albertans voted for. Albertans voted for jobs, and this government has failed to deliver, Mr. Speaker. This government is failing on their promises. They're failing on what they promised Albertans, and families are realizing it. Families are seeing the costs, they're seeing the problems, and they're seeing that these ministers and this government are tearing up agreements, are delaying funding, and are moving rapidly ahead with projects that will hurt this province, hurt our communities.

We see all of these things, like how they're ending the screen-based production grant in culture, Mr. Speaker. That's right here in the economic development and trade portions of Bill 20. What we're going to watch and what we've already been watching over the last several months is film companies and operations move out of Alberta. They've been fleeing to other provinces. They've been fleeing to other jurisdictions. And those are good jobs. Those are good jobs that are diversified.

But instead of having them right here in Alberta, instead of having different income streams for Albertans, instead of having different income streams for the provincial government, and instead of having all of these different programs and different services that we would be able to invest in and be proud of, what this government has done is that they've given $4.7 billion away to the wealthiest corporations and then driven investment right out of this province. They've driven investment right out, and that's going to cost every single worker, Mr. Speaker. That's going to cost every single family.

It's what happens when you simply don't understand what this means for families and what happens when you don't understand what a tax actually is. Everybody else agrees that this government is raising taxes except for this government. So who should we believe: every single economist, every single columnist, every single reporter? Or should we believe the government, which has a history of misleading Albertans, Mr. Speaker? Should we believe the government, which has a history of tearing up agreements with the city of Edmonton, with the city of Calgary? Should we agree with a government that has a history of legislating away the rights of its own employees, legislating away the rights of its own workers? Is that who we should believe?

I don't think Albertans believe so. I don't think Albertans will fall for the same tricks over and over again, Mr. Speaker. I think they know better. I think we know better. Government members, I hope, are hearing some of this and are starting to understand what the implications of this are. I hope the government members understand why it's so damaging to try and go in and legislate agreements and not negotiate in good faith, why it's so damaging for government members go to in and try and act unilaterally without listening to both sides of the table.

I think those are very important things because what this Premier didn't tell you, Mr. Speaker, is that every single Albertan will pay more for the services they count on, every single Albertan will suffer more for the services they count on, while this government will give $4.7 billion away to the wealthiest corporations. It's something that is so shocking. It's something that is so shameful, that we can see them just simply not understanding the ramifications, not understanding how critical this is, and not understanding how important this is for families because, again, they're going after every facet.

That's the best part, I guess, if you can call it that, of an omnibus bill like this. The best part of an omnibus bill like this, Mr. Speaker, is that they literally go after almost every pocket and every community. When you look at things like – I really can't believe they dissolved the cancer prevention legacy fund. That is shocking, that they don't think that cancer prevention is something that they need to invest in, that they think they can raid that and take it into general revenue. Albertans will be watching. Albertans will realize and they will understand the implications of that.

[The Speaker in the chair]

We can see the Alberta lottery fund being ripped away and torn apart and, instead, brought into general revenue so that those investments that go into communities, those investments that go to families, those investments that go into community leagues and playgrounds, those are the investments that will no longer be made after this Conservative government is done tearing them apart. We've seen them do this before with other funds, Mr. Speaker. We've seen them do this before with the heritage fund just a few decades ago. We know that this is the type of thing that the Conservatives are capable of. It's the type of thing that they're willing to move forward with.

I think it speaks to values. It speaks to the types of values that we want to bring forward. We want to have a government that fights for affordability. We want to have a government that fights for jobs. We want to have a government that keeps their promises, Mr. Speaker. Instead, what we see, in my opinion, is a government that has done none of those things. They have broken their promises on taxes; they have raised taxes. They have broken their promises on jobs; they have created no new jobs. They have broken their promises on investing in communities by giving $4.7 billion away to the wealthiest corporations.

That's what's so shocking. It's almost shameful, Mr. Speaker, because instead of families getting what they voted for, they're going to see a $600 per year increase in their personal income taxes. That's what's so shocking, because families did not vote for that. Families thought they were going to be voting for new jobs. Instead, they lost 27,000 jobs. Families thought they were voting for more affordability. Instead, what they're seeing right here in black and white in this bill is more expensive products, making their lives more expensive.

I mean, certainly, I think we need to vote against this. We need to see the importance of this.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available, and I believe the hon. Member for Red Deer-South rose first.

Mr. Stephan: It's one of the advantages, Mr. Speaker, of being able to see the countdown.

The irony of what was said is not lost on me. I want to just kind of repeat a few phrases that the member opposite said. He talked about businesses fleeing Alberta. Certainly, when I was practising law, I knew of many business activities that unfortunately fled Alberta during the tenure of the government over there attacking workers. They actually indicated that this government was attacking workers, yet during their tenure there were tens of thousands fewer private-sector jobs when they finished their term than when they started. That is a profound failure. It's a profound failure, but it's also a tragedy because this represents individuals and families and real hardship. I know I was able to, you know, meet some of those families during the campaign where Albertans overwhelmingly rejected the ideology of the prior government.

I want to just continue reading a few comments that I didn't quite get the opportunity to finish from Moodys Gartner, which, again, is one of the top tax law firms in the country, their evaluation of the NDP tax credits, that really they brought in as a response to try and stem businesses fleeing our province. This is what he says in summary of the Alberta investor tax credit:

Heavy bureaucratic involvement in the process, government discretion to refund or not, government selection of eligible businesses and industries, and short sunset of the program. All of these issues lead to a program that is unlikely to attract any new business to Alberta.

They go through a number of the red tape steps with the corporate investment tax credit, and this is kind of what the summary says at the end:

Similar to the [Alberta tax credit] the [corporate investment tax credit] program is fraught with bureaucracy, is short term in nature, is not refundable... is overly prescriptive and full of unnecessary reporting steps.

This is kind of the concluding paragraph. I think it's really good.

The real winners under these two tax credit programs appear to be the government employees who will be hired to administer the programs. While the use of investment tax credits can often be good to stimulate economic investment, the AITC and CITC programs developed by the Alberta government are a textbook example of the creation of a program that is overly bureaucratic, ridiculously uncertain... and condescending. Apparently the Alberta government, being the NDP government, knows better than the marketplace which investments are worthy of a credit and which ones are not. Very disappointing.

9:00

There was a follow-up article, and it's titled Alberta Investor Tax Credit Program: Even More Bad News. This is a really disturbing element of the Alberta investor tax credit. It says that there was ministerial discretion, based on public policy, as to whether or not you got the credit. This is the concern: "At face value, it would appear that any technology company that might not share the same views on public policy as the reigning government could be disqualified from eligibility for the AITC program." Disappointing. I find it very disappointing, actually, and concerning that the NDP government would inject into an investor tax credit program a necessity to comply with their world view, you know, their socialist world view. We know that in their constitution their goal is to establish and maintain a democratic socialist government in Alberta. We saw the awful, awful failure that that NDP government inflicted on the rest of Albertans.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) has expired.

We are back on the main bill. I might just add, to the hon. Member for Red Deer-South, if he hasn't already suggested that he might do so, that it would be reasonable for him to table the documents he referred to.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar has risen to join the debate tonight.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I want to assure all the members in the gallery that the dream of social democracy is still alive. We're only in a four-year pause – well, possibly even less – but we are still working to make sure that we achieve our dreams of social democracy here in Alberta. I'm sure that we will get there, the shining city on the hill, as Tommy Douglas used to talk about it. It will be built here in Alberta one day. I have complete confidence in that fact.

There are many things in this bill that I wanted to talk about. Unfortunately, I only have 15 minutes, Mr. Speaker, so I want to focus those things on what I'm personally interested in, and that's video games and the interactive digital media tax credit. Now, I was really excited when we brought in this interactive digital media tax credit. At the time, when we argued in favour of that tax credit, when we brought that legislation before the House, I admitted my penchant for playing video games. Given the statistics approximately two-thirds of all Canadians play video games. Chances are that some of the members here in the House right now are probably playing video games on their laptops or phones as we speak.

The interesting fact, Mr. Speaker, is that Canada has the third-largest video game industry in the world, behind only the United States and Japan. The reason that video games have exploded in Canada is because our major competitors – Ontario, Quebec, and B.C. – all have interactive digital media tax credits in those provinces. Those programs have been incredibly successful. The latest data that I was able to get from the Entertainment Software Association, which is the industry association that represents video game makers here in Canada, is that there are over 20,000 people across the country employed in the creation of video games. The majority of them are in the province of Quebec. The bulk of the remainder are divided up evenly between Ontario and British Columbia. A very, very small number of video game creators are in the other provinces in the country.

We tried to address that fact with the creation of the interactive digital media tax credit. There's no reason that a video game company couldn't set up shop here in Alberta as opposed to British Columbia or Ontario or Quebec. In fact, Mr. Speaker, there are a lot of things that would recommend Alberta for the creation of video games. Certainly, we have a low cost of living, a highly skilled workforce, and weather that can't be beat. It just makes sense to set up a video game company here in Alberta if we levelled the playing field, which the interactive digital media tax credit did. It levelled the playing field. It created similar conditions for video game companies here in Alberta that exist in British Columbia, Ontario, and Quebec.

As soon as we introduced that interactive digital media tax credit, a number of companies set up shop here in Edmonton. I know that one of the former members of BioWare, which is a very well known – world-wide known – video game company, created many successful video games. This person set up his own shop here in Edmonton. A number of other companies set up shop shortly after that, Mr. Speaker.

You know, we were well on our way to fostering a successful video game industry here in Alberta, and the members opposite seem to think that those aren't real jobs and decided to scrap this digital media tax credit and send all of those jobs to Quebec, which is really strange, Mr. Speaker, because we've certainly heard from the Member for Calgary-Lougheed, the party chairman, how concerned he is about resources fleeing Alberta and going to Quebec. He thinks it's grossly unfair how the country is structured so that so many resources are taken out of Alberta and given to Quebec, and here he is with the interactive digital media tax credit repeal doing exactly that.

He's telling companies that they're not welcome to set up shop here in Alberta and that it only makes sense to move to Quebec and set up shop there, which is a real shame because I know that there are many young people in the province – I certainly speak to them in my constituency all the time – who are enthusiastic gamers and certainly would love the opportunity to grow up and create games for other people to love as much as they've been able to play the games that they've loved as children. It really breaks my heart, Mr. Speaker, and it's disappointing to the young people that I talk to that they won't get that opportunity under this regime to do that.

Mr. Speaker, I want to debunk some of the myths that continue to be perpetrated by the members opposite around taxation and the impact on economic development because, you know, we've heard from the Finance minister and we continue to hear from the front bench that all you have to do is lower the general tax rate and that will spur businesses. My colleague the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview has been quite clear that you could have a tax rate of zero, a corporate tax rate of zero, heaven forbid, and that wouldn't do anything to promote start-ups in this province, right? You need to have a tax credit structure to incent start-up of new companies, and the general tax rate does nothing to promote the start-up of new companies.

We can see that when we look at the evidence from our competing provinces. British Columbia has a corporate tax rate of 12 per cent. Ontario has a corporate tax rate of 11 and a half per cent. Quebec has a corporate tax rate of 11.7 per cent, Mr. Speaker. The video game industry is thriving in those three provinces and suffering in Alberta not because of the general corporate tax rate but because this government is repealing the interactive digital media tax credit and slamming the door on the creation and growth of an exciting industry.

I also want to talk about personal income taxes because, of course, we continue to hear from the members opposite that personal income taxes incent people to move around wherever the tax rate is most favourable. Well, Mr. Speaker, of course, we know that that's not true because all of these video game companies are very successful at attracting some of the most talented and productive members of the video game industry from all around the world, and the income tax rates in British Columbia and Ontario are higher than ours. Most interestingly, the lowest tax bracket in Quebec is actually higher than our highest tax bracket, and that's where most of the jobs in the video game industry are being created.

So to continue to hear these myths perpetrated by the members opposite that corporate tax rates and personal tax rates are somehow the magic wand that needs to be waved in order to create new industries here in the province is very concerning to me. It fundamentally disregards all of the evidence that's plain to see here in Canada.

I now want to talk about what's at stake for Alberta. We've talked about the number of jobs that currently exist in the video game industry, 20,000 jobs. You know, the members opposite have killed 27,000 jobs in only six months in government, which is a track record that I certainly wouldn't be proud of. They are intent on killing even more by scrapping this interactive digital media tax credit. The video game industry is worth about $6 billion to the entire country of Canada. The members opposite are looking at this $6 billion pie and saying: "Ah, we don't want a piece of that. Why don't we let Ontario and Quebec have that money? We'll continue to put all of our bets on lowering corporate taxes and hoping for the best." We know that that won't be successful.

Mr. Speaker, I have to emphasize that these jobs that are in the video game industry are good jobs. The average salary in the video game industry is approximately $75,000 a year, which is well above the average salary that Albertans make. Certainly, right now in Alberta, with the economic conditions that we're experiencing, there are lots of people who would love to have a job that paid them $75,000 a year. Members opposite are saying: "No. We are going to deny them that opportunity because we just don't believe in tax credits." They're opposed to anything that the NDP has ever done. "So we're going to scrap the tax credit, and we don't care about the consequences to the people of Alberta." It's disappointing to me.

Now, you know, we've got a lot of labour representatives in the gallery watching tonight. I do have to couch my praise of the video game industry with concerns about the poor unionization rates in the video game industry. Certainly, we've seen a number of cases, particularly in the United States, of poor treatment of video game employees. They work really, really long hours for extended periods of time, they can be fired at a moment's notice, and they're not able to get the kinds of benefits – pensions, those kinds of job protections – that come from being in a union. Now, Mr. Speaker, it's heartening to me to see the move towards unionization that's taking hold in the video game industry in the United States. It's my hope that the video game industry here in Canada follows suit. Of course, we won't have to worry about that in Alberta because with the scrapping of the digital media tax credit, we won't have a video game industry.

I wonder if perhaps the threat of having more unionized workers in Alberta, regardless of what industry it is, is one of the reasons that's driving them to scrap this tax credit. We know that the members opposite are ideologically opposed to unions, and certainly we've seen a number of pieces of legislation since the April election that have been designed to destroy the power that unions could have. Regardless of the problems with the labour conditions in the video game industry, these are highly skilled, highly paid, valuable jobs that a lot of people would seek, and I'm very disappointed that this government sees fit to slam the door on the future economic development of Alberta. I will mourn all of the potential video games that will not be born because this government has chosen to scrap the digital media tax credit.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I would move to adjourn debate on Bill 20.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Bill 21

Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019

[Adjourned debate October 29: Mr. Schow]

The Speaker: Hon. members, is anyone wishing to join the debate on Bill 21? I see that the hon. Member for Edmonton-North West has risen.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to speak to Bill 21, Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019, once again a very ironically named bill considering the scope and the breadth by which it revokes and claws back both the rights of workers here in the province of Alberta and the ability to properly fund people with severely disabled, handicapped supports. It's just another gigantic omnibus bill, the likes of which I have not seen in the considerable time that I've spent here in this Legislature.

I would like to just spend some time to talk about what this bill seeks to do in terms of giving sweeping powers to the government in regard to collective bargaining here in the province of Alberta. You know, I'm not a lawyer, but I give fair warning that many of the aspects of this bill and the powers that it gives the government to roll back collective bargaining, to exclude individuals from being part of a collective bargaining unit, to bring in replacement workers during strikes and so forth are unconstitutional provisions that this government is trying to bring forward. They've been struck down in other jurisdictions across the country, so not only are these elements of this bill in terms of collective bargaining vexatious, but we also know that you end up in a legal situation that has been proven in many other jurisdictions to be against the law, to be unconstitutional, and to move against and to move backwards the right to collectively bargain here in the province of Alberta.

You know, we have these rules in place for a reason. By allowing workers to negotiate their working conditions, to negotiate wages and benefits, this is part of the fabric of what makes a society stable, that ensures that essential services will be provided to the population and ensures peace and security, quite frankly. We've learned over many, many years, the more than 100 years of collective bargaining action here in the province of Alberta and across the country, that this has evolved into a way by which you can resolve and move forward in a constructive manner. These provisions in this bill are very much the opposite. They're regressive, and I believe that, as I say, they will be sought as illegal and unconstitutional as well.

Some of the individual aspects to this bill that I think are particularly vexatious: first of all, allowing the government to have greater oversight over collective bargaining with public-sector employees, including the length of the agreements, the use of salary surveys, and to determine who gets to collectively bargain or not as well. It allows certain individuals like budget officers, systems analysts, auditors, and so forth to be removed from collective bargaining units. I mean, again, I'm not an expert in history, but this is particularly, I think, a historic move backwards in regard to collective bargaining and to unions. To exclude individuals from being able to join those units, to provide for their families, to make sure that they have the wages and the benefits that they deserve, and to be able to bargain for those things, I think that is particularly onerous and very disappointing as well.

What this provides is the framework for this government to engage in wage rollbacks. We saw the Premier of Alberta yesterday saying quite emphatically and clearly that this government here in the province of Alberta wants to roll back public-sector wages and benefits across a broad swath of our public service, including nurses, teachers, public service workers, social workers, and the like, right? More than 180,000 people that are represented under a collective bargaining process are having those rights, which are constitutionally guaranteed, put at risk by this bill.

Again, we know that over the last number of years fair and open tables for bargaining is a precondition to ensure the safety and the integrity of the essential services that nurses provide, that teachers provide, that social workers provide, that the police, correctional officers – you name it – provide, by far the largest working force represented here in the province of Alberta.

You hear some language about division, talking about who is Albertan or who is less Albertan or whatever. The sheer volume of the number of people that they're talking about here with these wage rollbacks – illegal wage rollbacks – represents the largest working population in the whole province. I mean, who is more or less of an Albertan than the teacher that works in the local grade 2 classroom or the nurse that's on the night shift here tonight in one of our hospitals or the correctional officer that works weekends under very difficult circumstances, right? We know that the basic fabric of who we are as a society depends on these essential services. They're there for a reason. They're not a liability to the budget. They are an investment to who we are as Albertans, an investment to ensure that we move forward as a modern industrial society that pays fair living wages and contributes to the economy in all ways.

Each of these individuals lives in our communities. These 180,000 or more individuals live in our communities, they have mortgages, and they buy food in the local shops and contribute to the economy. The economy is not just a single industry or a single corporation or a handful of those things. It is the collection of all of us, 4 million plus individuals contributing to the economy in a fair and reasonable way.

I know that in education, for example, I would say that in the majority of the municipal counties in this province the education system is the number one employer, Mr. Speaker, for not just teachers but support staff and custodial workers and bus drivers and so forth. So when you had, for example, an economic downturn here in this province due to the energy prices across the globe, many of those were jobs that helped to sustain a family when someone in the family might have lost a job or had reduced hours from working in the energy industry. You don't choose to double down on those aspects of our economy. A teacher's job is no less a contributing factor to the strength and the health of our economy than someone who works in a natural gas plant. That person is contributing just as much. They're contributing to education, they're contributing to that aspect of investing in our children, and they spend money in our shops just like any other member in our society.

This whole idea of making choices around making cuts to the public service: that's exactly what they are. They're choices that are being made by this government, and they are choices that are being driven by a significant reduction in this government's capacity to generate revenue. They've made choices about reducing corporate tax by $4.7 billion. They've made other reductions to make it so that it's difficult to pay for all the public services that we know and expect and need to run our province.

When you hear the arguments – you'll hear them on both sides. I've heard them ad nauseam from the members opposite, that this is the only route that we have left to us, that we're in an economic crisis and that we all have to tighten our belts and so forth. Well, you know, we can make choices around those things. Certainly, our government had a path to balance, and we had a path to reduce deficit. I mean, don't forget that this same budget that has produced this offspring of Bill 21, which is so onerous, also produced a significant deficit, I think $8.7 billion in deficit, right?

Mr. Nielsen: Two billion dollars higher.

Mr. Eggen: Two billion dollars higher than the last one that we posted, right?

You know, there are ways by which we can achieve balance over time but not compromise the social and economic fabric of who we are as Albertans. Part of who we are is that we look after each other, so we build institutions like public health care. Public health care is a symbol and a manifestation of the values that we together hold as Albertans, as people, that we look after each other and we're willing to contribute collectively in order to ensure the health and the security and the safety of ourselves, our neighbours, and our families, right? These are expenses – yes, they are – but they're investments as well, Mr. Speaker. To look at them as anything but a way by which we move forward as a society I think is reductive, and it goes against not just logic and reasoning but against the values of who we are as Albertans as well.

Like I said before, I find it difficult to, you know, get behind any legislation that comes forward that is clearly illegal and unconstitutional. But in this case, considering all of the other ways by which it makes a direct attack on the collective bargaining process and all of the essential services that those 180,000-plus workers do represent, I find this bill being brought forward here this evening to be particularly troublesome.

Other aspects of Bill 21, just to list them, to assure Albertans that certainly these other aspects are just as difficult and onerous as well: the suspension of the indexation of benefits to assured income for the severely handicapped, income supports, and the seniors' lodge program. I mean, it feels like I'm reading something out of a 19th-century Dickens novel, you know, with cutting the assured income for the severely handicapped and cuts to seniors, right?

Again, reducing or ending the tuition freeze, that we put in place to ensure that going to school for postsecondary education is affordable for our population; increasing the student loan interest by a percentage – as we calculated earlier this afternoon, this represents at least an $1,800 extra expense on a typical student loan being paid over 10 years based on a $30,000 loan – ending the regulated rate option for electricity here in the province of Alberta: I mean, the scope of this. [interjection] Yeah. Prices go up, you get less, and you end up paying significantly more as well.

Allowing the minister to change regulations for how municipalities pay for policing. Again, you know, the minister has been jumping up and down, saying that it ain't so about this whole issue, but it seems pervasive. Here's another clue that paying for policing is going to get a whole lot more expensive for municipalities. Where do municipalities get their money from? Municipal taxes. Where do municipal taxes come from? Your pocket, right?

I mean, there's a whole range of things here. I wanted to particularly focus on the direct attack that this Bill 21 has in store for workers here in the province of Alberta. You know, we all need to get our heads past this idea of adversaries between workers and so forth and this government. It's important to just go back to the first principles of why we have a public education system, why we have a public health care system, why we provide social services for people at various stages in their lives – to ensure security and good health for yourselves and your families when you need it – and remind ourselves that that is a sacred responsibility that is generated from this very Chamber. For any of us to compromise that – I mean, certainly, you can negotiate, right? It's good. I was part of that as a government over the last four years. But the key to negotiating at the table is to bargain in good faith. You do that, and all things will follow, every step of the way.

I think about something, again, that was eliminated by this government – we were debating it today – the classroom improvement fund, which was generated purely at the bargaining table in good faith, to ensure that teachers and school boards could have a say in how to improve classroom conditions for students and for workers, right? That was a good thing.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-South has risen.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's always a pleasure to rise in this place. Of course, again, it's a pleasure to hear from my colleague from Edmonton-North West. He's been here for a very long time, so he's seen a few of these types of attacks on workers. He's seen a few of these types of attacks by Conservatives on Albertans. I think it's something that's really important that we hear about. I think it's a very important perspective we had. I know he talked a little bit at the end about how it's so interesting that we see families paying more, communities paying more right out of their pocketbook and, at the same time, we're seeing attacks and the creation of American-style health care right across this province. That's the type of thing that I think is so shocking when we look at these omnibus bills, especially this one when we look at this omnibus bill, how pervasive it is, that it attacks so many different programs. It attacks so many different people while, at the same time, not only attacking workers, it also attacks people on AISH, also attacks people on limited income supports, on the Alberta seniors' benefit, and the seniors' lodge program.

Mr. Speaker, I know my colleague spoke to all of those, but I think, perhaps, my colleague can speak a bit towards how this isn't unusual for Conservative governments. It's not strange that Conservative governments would go in and try and make life more expensive while giving $4.7 billion away to the wealthiest corporations. That's something that I think we've seen before. We've seen Conservative governments right here in Alberta try to do it before and try to do similar things where they Americanize health care, where they go after the most vulnerable of Albertans, where they reduce supports for communities and families, and then where they attack workers and do things like bring in replacement workers during a strike or even lockouts in areas.

Mr. Speaker, I think those are the things that are really shocking, but I do want to hear from my colleague, and I want to give him a bit of time to talk about how this isn't something that's new. Conservatives have been doing this for decades, and they're going to continue doing this unless we keep fighting back.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton-North West has the call.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you to the member for asking me that question. Yes, I mean, you know, certainly we've seen some problematic legislation over the last 10 years or so, but the scope of this one and the audacity of this one is what I find to be particularly troubling. It's almost like they went for the big throw to just go for everything; for example, this whole idea of formalizing bargaining oversight by laying out that the minister can issue confidential directives to employers "before, during and after... collective bargaining" respecting the mandate, terms of agreement, and so forth. In other words, change the rules every step of the way as you're negotiating: before, during, and after. I mean, that is absolutely audacious and unprecedented in this Chamber or probably almost any other one in this country.

Another one is talking about the replacement workers, to allow replacement workers to be put in to a striking situation, right? I mean, the level of animosity and division and trouble that's associated with this is historic. I really don't think that anyone wants that sort of hostility and that sort of animosity in any workplace.

I didn't mention this one. It prescribes limits on termination and severance pay as well. Here you are reducing peoples wages, potentially laying off people – that was not put out of the realm of possibility from the previous comments yesterday that there would be layoffs – and then limiting their termination and severance pay as they're shown the door. All of these things add together, and they form a pattern. I think that what we've heard pretty loudly and clearly is that it is this government's desire to reduce wages here in the province of Alberta for nurses, teachers, public service workers, social workers, police, and the like, to reduce wages and to do it with the strong arm of the law – right? – not to negotiate, not to talk about working conditions. I mean, like I said before, the element of negotiating in good faith is that you can negotiate not just for wages and pensions and so forth, but you can negotiate about the quality of the services that you are producing for Albertans. If you give people that respect, if you give them the time of day and you listen to the people who actually deliver those things, you will learn something.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, is anyone else wishing to join the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore is rising.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I wish I could say that it's a pleasure to rise to be able to speak to Bill 21, but it certainly is not.

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

You know, to begin with, the scale of this, the omnibus bill, Bill 21 here. I know that when you were on the opposition benches, you had argued very, very passionately around what was believed. Some of the members from the 29th Legislature that sit across the way also argued quite passionately around what they felt was an omnibus bill around labour legislation. Quite honestly, I remember them almost setting their hair on fire in this Chamber around that. Yet here we are. We have a government that has come here, claiming to have the backs of hard-working Albertans. Some of those hard-working Albertans are right up there in the gallery here this evening. They're the ones that sit here and deliver all of the services that Albertans rely on each and every single day, and you're telling them that you have their backs by introducing a piece of legislation like this. Are you kidding me?

Why don't we dig into this here just a little bit? Bill 21. There's a temporary suspension of indexation of benefits for assured income for the severely handicapped, or, of course, what we also happen to refer to as AISH, and income support for the seniors' lodge program. According to some of the budget numbers that we've seen tabled in this House, we will see that this will generate for the government coffers by the 2022-23 year to the tune of about $300 million. I'm curious, Mr. Speaker. I wonder what people receiving AISH – I think on average they receive about $1,600 to $1,700 a month, something like that. What would they do with $300 million? I bet you they would not say: why don't we give a $4.7 billion corporate handout to the Walton family? I'm willing to bet that wouldn't happen. I would say: hey, why don't you give me some of that money so that I can improve my lifestyle, so I can live in dignity and respect, so I could maybe even go into some of my local businesses and support them and buy the stuff that I want? Unbelievable, Mr. Speaker.

Then we want to see things like ends to tuition freezes, student loan interest increased by 1 per cent. You know, I was actually hoping I would have had the opportunity to quickly ask the Member for Edmonton-North West, who is a former teacher and a former Education minister in this province, as someone, as I've mentioned, who is, you know, very passionate about all the schools that I have in Edmonton-Decore – I have 26 of them. Three of them, all three high schools north of the Yellowhead in Edmonton, reside in Edmonton-Decore. You know, I would have asked him how many of his students, how many of his parents, maybe parents that are sitting up there in the galleries this evening at this late hour of 9:30 at night, would have come running to us to say: "Hey, can my students pay more on their loans? Hey, can you raise my tuition over the next three years by 21 per cent?" I'm wondering how many of them would have come running to us asking for that.

When we make those kinds of moves, Mr. Speaker, these are the kinds of things that affect the quality of education that the people of Alberta have, which will then affect the ability for Alberta to be prosperous, because we won't have the highly skilled, highly technical people to be able to put in the jobs of the tech industry. Oh, that's right. We're going to be eliminating a whole bunch of tax credits and eliminating that. I guess it doesn't matter, does it?

We're going to see the Health minister place conditions on new practitioner identification numbers. Essentially, we're going to say to some of these doctors, that spent a lot of time in school and probably a lot of money: "Oh, hey, congratulations. Your loans are going to be going up, too." Then we're going to say, "No; I'm sorry; I know you live down in Calgary, but you're going to have to go work over here," and maybe to somebody who lives up in Fort McMurray, "Ah, sorry; you're going to have to go practice down in Medicine Hat," when maybe really they wanted to practice in their hometown. I'm wondering what kind of consultation occurred on that. I wonder if the doctors or potential doctors came running up to you and said: hey, please tell me where I can work.

We've heard a lot about policing over this session of the Legislature, yet here we are making changes through regulation, no doubt, to tell municipalities how they're going to pay for policing. We've already clearly seen some of the reaction from Calgary on this and what the mayor thought about this. I'd be willing to bet that Edmonton's mayor is not too excited about that, and we've heard very clearly from some of our rural mayors and councillors that they are definitely not excited about this.

That brings me to things around the labour movement. As everybody knows, I'm very proudly from the labour movement. I was a very proud UFCW local 401 member. I was very happy each and every day to be able to advocate for my members not only in my own workplace but across the different bargaining units the 401 looked after. I was even happy to advocate for hard-working Albertans all over this entire province. Some of those people are up there in this gallery each and every day, and they have been trying to tell this government very, very clearly that if you want to create labour unrest, all you have to do is – oh, I don't know – legislate wages, pass Bill 21. Yeah. Or maybe we'll impose things like the length of agreements, or maybe we can just opt out of arbitrations. Wait; we did that, and we're surprised that our folks in the hard-working labour movement and our public sector, the ones that deliver services to everyone in this province, are a little upset. We're surprised, Mr. Speaker.

But here we are reversing the replacement worker ban in the public sector. Nobody ever wants a strike. I can say that. I was in the labour movement. In a strike the honest truth is that nobody wins. The employer doesn't win. The employee doesn't win. Nobody wins in a strike, but strikes usually occur because of a failure to listen. The reality is that when they do, the one and only thing – companies are never really bound by this – an employee has is their ability to withdraw their labour, to be able to tell the employer: what you're doing is wrong, and you need to come to the table and bargain in good faith. I wish I had the faith to believe that this government is going to do that, but what I've seen so far is not looking good. As a matter of fact, I would say that it is bargaining in bad faith, Mr. Speaker.

Why would this government insist on creating labour unrest? Do you want to reduce the length and divisiveness of a strike or lockout? Do you want to know one of the best ways you could do that? Ban replacement workers. Companies will come to the table.

They will bargain in good faith. You'll get a deal done. Life goes on, and everybody prospers out of it. The use of replacement workers by employers during a strike or lockout has been deemed "a serious violation of freedom of association" by the United Nations International Labour Organization. When employers can use replacement workers, negotiations are undermined, work stoppages are prolonged, conflict is heightened, and, yes, Mr. Speaker, even the risk of picket line violence rises. Nobody wants to go in that direction, but I'm telling you that by taking this language out in Bill 21, that's the exact thing that this government is trying to set up. Quite honestly, it is shameful.

We can do better, and the funny thing is that under the previous NDP government we did do better. I'm not saying that the former government certainly didn't see its share of protests, but I have not seen protests in the number and the size in such a short period of time as when this government took over. It just seems to be growing. I wonder why, Mr. Speaker. Well, if we're going to start setting term limits on the length of the agreement – hey, I know a great idea. I wonder. If we ask these hard-working people up here tonight, if they brought out a salary survey, would you say: lower my salary, please? [interjections] I'm already seeing heads shaking.

The Acting Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but I believe what I heard was a member of the gallery attempting to influence debate, which would not be a privilege afforded to an individual in the gallery. Without knowing who that individual was, I would just issue a caution to the gallery to ensure that they do not act as such.

Hon. member, please continue.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate that, and I'm sure that our folks in the gallery will be able to exercise some restraint.

When we see things like excluding budget officers, system analysts, auditors, and employees who perform similar functions from bargaining units – we want to exclude those – I think we are violating people's rights to association. What we're telling those people is: "Yeah. Sorry. We don't think you're allowed to do that." I believe there's a Supreme Court decision around that, just like there's a Supreme Court decision around striking workers.

What I fear, Mr. Speaker, is that with the passing of Bill 21, in which we're seeing things like reversing replacement worker bans, including length-of-agreement language around the oversight of collective bargaining, being able to issue directives outside of the bargaining process, I think that's going to start to set up this government for lawsuits although from what I've seen since this government took over, they're certainly maybe trying to create jobs for lawyers. I'm hoping that at least those lawyers are Albertans and not out of province.

We seem to be just absolutely on this quest to fight with everybody. We're fighting with other provinces. We're fighting with the federal government. We're fighting with our own workers. If you want labour rest, if you want workers to come to work every day happy to be there, happy to serve, pay them fairly, treat them with dignity and respect, give them some benefits, and don't come up with hare-brained ideas like this for labour laws. And don't be surprised; maybe there will be a protest about how great the government is. Wouldn't that be a change?

So, Mr. Speaker, I'm certainly not in favour of Bill 21. I am urging all members to not support this legislation. We cannot go backwards. We have to move forward, and Bill 21 won't do that.

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, 29(2)(a) is available. I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford has risen.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am just caught by some of the remarks made by the Member for Edmonton-Decore and would like to hear a little bit more given that he has, I think, extensive experience in the labour movement and has had the opportunity to speak to many people in the labour movement about the reasoning for their participation in the labour movement and why it is essential to them.

I noticed in his speech that he particularly mentioned about the right of an employee to have control over their own labour. I think that's an interesting concept, that an individual not only has a right to the integrity of their body but for the ability of that body to engage in activities, such as labour, which are a benefit to themselves and their families, really speaking to why people would want to gather together in a union environment to provide each other support for that very essential need to have control over oneself and one's own body. Of course, the alternative is one that we in this House would all find quite devastating, you know, leading to some concerns that we have now, that that essential core value of humanity is being attacked. I wonder if the Member for Edmonton-Decore might speak to the importance of being able to have control over yourself in your labour and the fruits of that labour.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Member for Edmonton-Rutherford is quite right. Most times when you see people that are involved within the labour movement and trying to move that forward, it's about raising conditions for all. It's not just people in the labour movement that we're thinking about. It's the people that aren't in the labour movement that we're thinking about as well. We want to see the lifestyles of everyone brought up. We want to see everyone making more money so they can go and spend it in their local businesses, making the economy go around. We want everyone to be treated with dignity and with respect.

You know, Mr. Speaker, I remember one time having to file a grievance because a manager who didn't get proper training to be a manager, which is too bad in itself, ended up yelling at another employee right on the shop floor in front of customers. That's just not a way to conduct yourself. There's a better way to do it. When people come together in a collective bargaining union, they're able to say to their employers that maybe aren't treating them as well as they could – and I can think of a couple of employers right off the top of my head that do that. We get the opportunity to bargain as a collective for better conditions, to be able to work in safer environments.

And those safety standards go up for everyone, Mr. Speaker, not just for ones in the union. For everyone. I would hazard a guess, you know, that I don't think there's a single MLA who holds a position in this House that would say that nobody deserves a safe work environment. I'm pretty sure they don't think that somebody out there doesn't deserve to come home safely each and every night to their family.

What I worry about, though, with this bill, Mr. Speaker, is that we are making the steps that will create an environment that will be a race to the bottom. We will start to see pay lower, we will start to see working conditions lower, we will start to see dignity and respect lower, and then we will see the people that don't have a labour union looking after them suffer these same consequences. This is about improving conditions for all, but the best way to do that – to answer the question from the Member for Edmonton-

Rutherford – is to be able to come together as a collective and to be able to set those precedents, to be able to set those conditions, to be able to set the bar for everyone.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford has risen to speak.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate this opportunity to speak to Bill 21. As I myself often find in this House, I think it's very important that we take this opportunity for the record to oppose legislation being brought into this House which we think demonstrates a complete lack of learning from the history of democracy in the western world and the establishment of people's rights. I think that will be the point of my short time available to me in this conversation this evening, that while there are many things being done in this bill, all of which are despicable in one way or another, the theme of undermining the rights of people in a western democracy is one which I personally take umbrage at. I am very concerned that it's being done in such a cavalier manner, by tossing a variety of different negative actions into a single bill as a way of covering them up and hiding them in an omnibus bill, which has in its very nature the intent to hide from the sunshine that should be cast on all bills by clouding the issue with putting in too many things it wants to address.

Because they cannot all be addressed, I'll take my opportunity now to address the underlying concern about the denial of human rights. I want to point out that the piece of this bill that is changing or reversing the replacement worker ban that had been put place is one which will be challenged legally and has been previously tested in the courts to the highest level, at the Supreme Court. In fact, when we brought in the Alberta essential services legislation, it was entitled An Act to Implement a Supreme Court Ruling Governing Essential Services. The very name of the bill told you that this had already been brought to the Supreme Court, had already been tested, and had been found to be not only legitimate but a desirable part of a free, democratic society.

That's what it is that concerns me here today. The Supreme Court has said, with regard to the issue of collective bargaining rights, that the right to strike is an essential part of a meaningful collective bargaining system. That has been tested. We found that it is absolutely critical that if we wish to acknowledge that individuals have rights, they also have the right to gather together to protect those rights. You can't have rights and then not have the mechanism by which you protect them. So collective bargaining is established to ensure that no employer or, in this case, no government can pierce the rights of individuals by piercing their right to work together with other individuals to collectively bargain on behalf of all of those involved. The Supreme Court has been absolutely clear on this.

What does that say about a government that would bring forward a bill that they know has already been tested in its intent at the highest levels of judicial concern in this province and still bring it forward knowing that it couldn't possibly stand should it be brought again before the Supreme Court of Canada? Well, I can tell you the reason why they do it: because it gives them time. It gives them an amount of time to do that which they know is wrong, that which the Supreme Court of Canada has said is wrong, before they are forced to go back to appropriate and legitimate legislation. That's what they're doing. They're clearing for themselves a space which will allow them to do that which they know they should not do and which others have told them they should not do because they can get away with it long enough to achieve the nefarious outcomes that they wish to achieve.

We are all here, elected in a Westminster democracy, because we believe in the nature of people to speak to their own rights and to have their voices represented in the construction of the society in which we live. Everyone in this House has participated in that process, believing that that is an essential, fundamental right. Then, essentially, when they achieve victory using the rights that have been hard fought for by union members and democratic society members throughout the western world, they want to pull up the ladder behind them and deny those rights to other people. This is completely unacceptable. This is such an underhanded way of achieving what it is they wish to achieve, knowing that they will be caught one day, but by then they will already have done the damage which they had intended to inflict. This is not acceptable.

Everyone in our society should be very concerned about this, should be very concerned when a government steps forward to begin to impinge upon the rights of its citizens. We have hundreds of years of history where we learned how important those rights are and why we should protect those rights. Learning from that history has been lost on this government. I'm surprised that they continue to fail to learn from history, because they certainly seem to want to live in some historical time before these rights were established, before we arrived at the place where we understand how important it is that we protect human rights. We know that the courts have said that collective bargaining is an essential part of our democracy. They have essentially acted in a way to make kind of a blanket ban on denying the right to strike and have established that denying the right to strike is unconstitutional.

Now, we know that this legislation is not specifically directed at that, but there's something else that the Supreme Court has done, another principle of the Constitution and human rights that the Supreme Court has been very clear about, and that is the doctrine of hollow rights. Once we have determined that a people have a right, then it is also important that we not undermine those rights or minimize or diminish those rights such that they become hollow rights. It is no good to say that an individual has a right but then to act in a way that prevents them from enacting that right in a way that they wish to do. You can't say, "Yes, you have a right to a free election" and then deny everybody access to a voting booth, because denying them access to a voting booth would create a hollow right of the right to live in a free and democratic society.

Yet that's essentially what they're doing in this bill. While they can't actually take away the right to collective bargaining, in the spring they delayed collective bargaining against this idea of the doctrine of hollow rights. Today they have acted in two different ways to begin to undermine that right yet again. They seek to reduce the number of people that can participate in unions. They've identified a group or a class of people that they don't want to be participating in the union, people such as budget officers, systems analysts, auditors, and employees who perform similar functions. They can't actually take the union away, they can't take the right to strike away, so what they'll do is that they'll actually diminish the ability for people to participate in those unions and to participate in those strikes.

That is in defiance of what the Supreme Court of Canada says that you must not do. Once a right is established constitutionally, you must give it a broad and liberal interpretation. That is the language. But here, instead of a broad and liberal interpretation, we have a narrow and conservative interpretation, and it's completely unacceptable.

The intention to ensure that people have the right to control not only their own body, their bodily integrity, but the fruits of the labour of their body is intrinsic to the desire in our democracy for people to express themselves and to receive the benefits of taking action on their own behalf. If we begin to say to people that when you engage in a behaviour to take care of yourself, to take care of your family, and to take care of others in your community, we are going to begin to remove from you the ability to have control over that, then we move to a place where we have to be very concerned about the imbalance between the power of a dominant government and the citizens that should be represented by that government. That's what we're concerned about here.

This isn't a small, little piece of legislation. This is a deceitful piece of legislation, a piece of legislation that pretends to just be a bunch of small administrative changes being thrown together and slid underneath the door so that people don't become suspicious about what's happening.

But I can tell you that this is not by accident. This is a government that is choosing to find ways to subvert the Constitution of Canada and the statements by the Supreme Court on the rights of people to collectively bargain, to join unions, and to engage in strikes when necessary. They know they can't do it all at once, so what they do is that they engage in a process of slowly undermining and diminishing and eroding those rights, because if they did a direct assault on the rights, people would be more likely to notice and to react with rage. But when they do it in this particular way, people quite legitimately would not necessarily see it as a problem, would not necessarily understand the implications of what's happening here. So they achieve in the end the negative outcome which they have always wished to have without being transparent in their desires or transparent in educating the people about the actions they're taking and the outcomes of those actions.

[The Speaker in the chair]

This is something that we have to worry about. We have to worry about it in society because as we begin to take rights away from people, we diminish our society as a whole. It's been said that the course of history is such that the rights of people are being written in a more expansive way as time goes on and that we each year understand more about how we ensure the well-being of all citizens by defining those rights.

10:10

The last 40 years or 50 years have been very clear on that. The women's rights organizations that started in a renewed way in the '60s and '70s and '80s identified ways in which women's rights were being diminished, and as a result we began to change legislation. This was equally true in the LGBTQ community, where we understood in a clear way in the last 30 years how the rights of members of that community had been diminished by the rules that we had established in society, so we expanded our rights. In the indigenous community it wasn't that long ago that the rights of the indigenous people were dramatically restricted compared to the rights of other members of society.

That is what's happening here, an attempt to diminish the rights of members of unions who are part of our essential, core services in this province.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-South has risen.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's always a pleasure to hear from my colleague from Edmonton-Rutherford here. I think that he has a few more things to say. I mean, he is quite eloquent in his speech here in informing this House – and, hopefully, the government members are listening – on how these things historically have been problematic and historically have been unconstitutional and historically have caused harm to workers. Perhaps my colleague here can provide a few more comments.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford if he'd like to respond.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you. I appreciate the opportunity to say a little bit more about this because I think it's fundamentally important. Members on this side of the House know that history will prove us to be right. We have seen the lessons of the history of human rights over the last, well, hundreds, perhaps thousands of years. From that, we look not just at the simplistic, concrete rules of what right a person does have, but we understand the underlying principles, that having those rights is important to the creation and the ultimate maintenance of a successful society, just as we have learned that the establishment of good structures in society provides for the greatest well-being of the greatest number of people.

We've learned that when we decided, for example, that public water systems should be available for everyone. The greatest health intervention in the history of humanity is the provision of clean water, not the drilling of an individual well by an individual person but the provision of clean water throughout the public. From that, we've learned that the structures of society are such that if we carefully hone them and design them, then we will be able to provide well-being not just for the fortunate few who can afford to do that on their own but for all of society, not just the wealthy but those who are more impoverished, not just the most powerful but those who are most vulnerable.

That is what we are talking about today. We're talking about establishing and building a society and protecting the lessons we have learned over the centuries about how we create a society that will benefit all peoples, that will give them opportunity through access to resources, to education, that will give them good health through a publicly funded and presented health care system, where members of the public service provide the resources necessary to ensure that all people can take advantage of the goodness that the province of Alberta gives us and can contribute to that goodness on behalf of themselves, their families, and the future generations.

Here we have a beginning edge of a wedge attempting to take all of that away from us, an attempt to diminish rights that have been articulated by the Supreme Court of Canada and have been defended by the hard work of union members across this country and across many countries in the western world to ensure that the next generation will not have to deal with suppression by those with more power, will not have to deal with poverty as they once did, will not have to deal with the destruction of their bodies through labour that is unsafe or unacceptable in some other way. Having learned those lessons, it is now requisite upon everyone in this House to stand up and defend those lessons and to be on the record, to be on the right side of history when we say that people by their nature possess human rights and that those human rights are fragile in the face of power which is uncaring and used for the purposes of one individual over another. We stand today to defend those human rights, as we always have and always will.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) has expired.

Is anyone else wishing to join the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure today to rise and speak to Bill 21, the Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019. I think, as my colleague from Edmonton-North West already pointed out, it's a bit of an ironic name. It does none of those things. I think I'm going to go briefly over some of the things this bill does do and how it does hurt families, and then perhaps I'll speak a bit more on some of the specific issues that I take particular offence to.

I mean, we can see that it's suspending, as the government likes to say, the tuition cap for postsecondary students. Perhaps, they say, the tuition cap could be set again in the future at some point. But what we know, Mr. Speaker, is that this will cause tuition and enable tuition to go up by as much as 23 per cent for postsecondary students. It's going to make life less affordable for families. It's going to make education inaccessible for some families. That's something that I think is very shameful.

It pauses indexing for a number of really important programs. It pauses indexing for AISH, which is the assured income for the severely handicapped. It pauses indexing for employment and income supports benefits. It pauses indexing for the Alberta seniors' benefit and the seniors' lodge program, Mr. Speaker.

They use these terms that are very technical and complicated, "pauses indexing," but let's be very clear: it's a cut. It's a cut to these families. It's a cut to these communities, Mr. Speaker, and these families – that are already being asked, on AISH for example, to get by on only $1,600 a month – who are being asked to make do with less. That's shameful. It's something that's very difficult already, and this government is making it more expensive for those families.

They're eliminating the regulated rate cap for electricity. They're making electricity more expensive while also moving to Americanize the electricity system. I think that's something that's very troubling as well.

We're seeing in some of the health legislation, Mr. Speaker, that they're trying to limit practitioner IDs. They're trying to force doctors to go to certain areas in the province, something that's actually been found unconstitutional in at least two other jurisdictions that I'm aware of here in Canada. So I think that's something that's very concerning. If their own lawyers can't figure that out, then perhaps we need to take a look again at this legislation.

We also see that the government is giving itself the ability to unilaterally tear up doctor compensation agreements. They time and time again are going to attack the public service, the services that Albertans rely on. Time and time again they're giving themselves the unilateral ability to tear up agreements with our professionals, tear up agreements with our health care workers and the services that Albertans depend on every single day, Mr. Speaker.

This government is also moving forward to claw back monies from municipalities. They're giving themselves the ability to take over a number of the fines that municipalities collect.

They're also doing things like giving the minister the ability to change the police costing model. This is something we've been talking about for weeks, and the government has said time and time again that it's not true. Now we see it in black and white. Indeed, it is true. This government is changing the police costing model. They're giving themselves that ability, and they tried to do it by sweeping it under the rug with this omnibus bill. But, Mr. Speaker, the opposition is here. We are going to shine the light on this bill. It doesn't matter whether it's 10:30 at night or 10:30 in the morning; we're going to talk, we're going to understand this bill, and Albertans are going to be watching this bill, as we can see tonight in the gallery.

We're also seeing some other changes that I think are particularly egregious. We're seeing quite a significant number of labour changes, Mr. Speaker, and I think this is where we can start talking about values. This is where we can start talking about: "What values do we care about in a government? Who are we fighting for when we talk about government?" We can see it in past legislation that this government has been bringing forward already; in Bill 9, for example, where they brought in a big hold or delay in arbitration, in negotiations with workers, and we saw that get challenged in the courts. It's still in the courts because this government doesn't have respect for that process. And just like when they brought in Bill 9, we're seeing the same things, the same types of issues being brought forward here. We're seeing a complete lack of respect for Alberta workers. We're seeing a complete lack of compassion. We're seeing a complete lack of understanding of the types of issues that Alberta workers face every single day, the people that are in the gallery watching us right now.

We're seeing them bringing in repealing the essential services replacement worker ban, which means, Mr. Speaker, that this government will actually have the ability to not only, first, lock out those workers that are in the gallery but then bring in replacement workers to replace them at their jobs. That's something that is shameful. That speaks to the values and the value that they put on these workers, because we know that workers in Alberta, the people that provide us with the services every single day and indeed especially the essential services, deserve our respect and deserve our gratitude. Instead, what this government has said is that they are willing to go in and replace them the moment they disagree, and that's something that is particularly concerning to me. I think it speaks to how this government views the very people that keep this province running, the very people that contribute every single day to the services that run this province. That's something that is very concerning to me.

We also see the government bringing in exemptions for bargaining units for budget officers, systems analysts, and auditors, and I think that's very concerning as well. This government is systemically trying to degrade the authority and power of our labour in this province, Mr. Speaker. They're trying to break up the solidarity of workers. That is very concerning because those are the types of organizations, and having that solidarity is what ensures that we have fair and even negotiation on both sides of the table.

But, again, we know that this government isn't concerned with that. We've seen that the government isn't concerned with being fair, because they've been willing to legislate away those rights. They've been willing to attack those rights with legislation. They've been willing to delay. They've been willing to, in this case, bring in replacement workers. Now they're trying to actually break up the organizations themselves. That's what's so shocking about this bill. It's that this government is moving so quickly, that this government is moving so aggressively to break up the very organizations that represent the workers that keep this province running, that keep our services operating every single day. It's something that is absolutely shocking.

It also does things like formalize bargaining oversight, where the minister can lay out different things around term agreements and fiscal limits and requesting information from employers. That means, basically, that this minister is trying to go out and tell organizations and tell our workers what they need to know. What they want: to take the information from the workers, Mr. Speaker. That, I think, is very concerning, too, because we don't see this respect for a two-way negotiation. We don't see this respect for bargaining. We don't see this respect for our workers,

Again I want to bring this back to values because the real question, when we talk about legislation like this, when we talk about basically anything we do in this House, is always about values. It's about: who are we fighting for? Are we fighting for affordability for every single Albertan? Are we fighting to protect the rights of every single worker, or are we fighting to give $4.7 billion away to the wealthiest corporations, Mr. Speaker? I think it's pretty clear who this government is fighting for. This government is fighting for the wealthy corporations and leaving every single Albertan behind. They're leaving workers behind.

What they're also doing, as I already mentioned, is that they're giving themselves the ability to tear up things like doctors' contracts. It shows you, Mr. Speaker, that while they attack the workers on one hand, they also try to Americanize the system on the other. Health care is a perfect example. When you're talking to nurses, whether they're LPNs or RNs, or if you're talking to doctors, what it is is a systemic attack on these workers. It's a systemic attack on not just the workers but the entire system. It's an attempt to Americanize our health care right here in Alberta. It's an attempt to try and bring in failed policies that are risky and ideologically and will only cause harm to Albertans.

The workers in the gallery know that, and that's why they're here at 10:30 at night on a Wednesday night. They could be at home with their families, but they know how important this is. They know how important it is that we stand up for the rights of workers, that we stand up for the services that need to be provided to every single Albertan. Whether they're a correctional officer, Mr. Speaker, whether you work in correctional services, whether you work in a school, whether you work in a hospital or a medicentre or whatever it is, it is essential that we support these workers, and we owe them our gratitude. It is essential that we work with these workers in good faith.

This is the type of value that this government is not showing when they bring forward things like Bill 21 or when they bring forward things like Bill 9, Mr. Speaker. We've been seeing a very large amount of mobilization of labour in terms of the concerns around what this government is bringing forward, and I think, again, that speaks to the values. It says that this government has not shown and is not showing that they have the interests of workers in mind, that they do not have the interests of Alberta families in mind, because they are willing to give $4.7 billion away to the wealthiest corporations and then Americanize health care, all while leaving our workers behind, legislating away their rights, taking away their rights, saying that they can be replaced during negotiations, and that's what speaks to values.

It's a government that is showing workers, it is showing Albertans, it is showing families, it is showing communities that they are not standing up for them. In fact, they are standing up for those wealthy corporations that just received $4.7 billion, corporations like Husky, who took hundreds of millions of dollars in profits, Mr. Speaker, and then laid off hundreds of people right here in Calgary – right here in Calgary – in Alberta.

These are the types of values we're talking about. We're talking about a government that is showing Albertans that they are standing up for the richest few and leaving workers behind. They're trying to make life more expensive, Mr. Speaker, while also trying to bring in wage rollbacks for the people that keep this province running. We just saw in the last few days that this government is going to be requesting wage rollbacks of 2 to 5 per cent, contrary to what they actually said in their own budget speech – that's what was shocking – contrary to what workers were told and what our public service, the people who keep this province running, were told. They're now going to be going and asking for 2 to 5 per cent, and that's shocking because it's unfair. It's unfair because you should not be negotiating in the media; you should not be negotiating in the public. What you should be doing is moving in good faith.

Now, if the government had the values to understand what that meant, if the government understood how bargaining actually works and perhaps took the time to do the research and did not just try to legislate away those rights, Mr. Speaker, perhaps they would have gone to the bargaining table and tried to negotiate some of those concessions. Perhaps they would have been able to go to the bargaining table and talk about what needed to happen for their fiscal plan. It's not the fiscal plan I would have proposed and indeed is not the one that we proposed, but it is the one that they are proposing. They could have gone with it, but instead they chose to disrespect our public service.

They chose to disrespect those workers and make bold statements in the media that show they fundamentally do not understand how families and how workers and how our public service should be treated. It shows they fundamentally do not understand who they are supposed to be fighting for. Instead of fighting for those workers, instead of fighting for our public services, instead of fighting to ensure we have strong communities and families, Mr. Speaker, they gave $4.7 billion away to the wealthiest corporations, watched 27,000 jobs disappear right here in this province, and then asked the people that provide us with health care, with security, with education for 2 to 5 per cent rollbacks, and they didn't even do it at a bargaining table. They did it in the media. That's the shocking thing. It's shocking how much this government does not understand. It's shocking how they don't understand how that could be offensive to the workers that keep this province running.

10:30

Mr. Speaker, we can see that because they simply will not recognize even that repealing the ban on replacement workers – they don't understand why that would be offensive. They say: well, if we lock them out, then we should have the right to hire other people. That's what this government is going to say, I believe. That's what's so shocking, that they don't understand how that devalues the people that keep this province running, our public servants, the people that run our province, that provide us with our health care, provide us with our education. That is what's so fundamentally shocking and broken about this government's process, that their values do not align with what they were put here for.

Instead of trying to make life more affordable, instead of trying to protect our services, instead of trying to actually give Albertans a better province, Mr. Speaker, what we see is $4.7 billion away to the wealthiest corporations, Americanization of our health care. We see drastic cuts across all fields. We see a tax on our workers, the very workers that are in the gallery right now, the very workers that work for, indeed, actually all of these ministers, likely, that are here today. The ministers themselves are likely responsible for some of these workers, and instead of respecting the work they do, this government has decided to attack them, has decided to negotiate in the media instead of in good faith. I think that is absolutely shocking and shameful.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available if anyone wants to add a brief question or comment.

Seeing none, is there anyone else that would like to join in the debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Ms Sigurdson: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and it's my pleasure to rise and speak to Bill 21, Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019. Again, similar to Bill 20, this is an omnibus bill. It's kind of a little bit hard to know why exactly all of the elements have been brought together in this constellation of Bill 21, but the question I asked earlier when I was talking about Bill 20 was that whenever you look at legislation, it's good to ask that question: who benefits and who doesn't? I would say that this bill, similar to Bill 20, means that the average Albertan doesn't benefit from this bill. Perhaps that's why they put them all together. I can't really see any logic in other reasons.

I'd like to begin by just, you know, thanking the folks in the gallery for staying here at this late hour. I wanted to share that certainly early in my career as a social worker I was a proud member of the Alberta Union of Provincial Employees, and then later I was a mental health therapist and was a part of the Health Sciences Association of Alberta. I know very first-hand about the important work that the public service does in our province and what they do to support all Albertans.

Some of the disturbing facts in our province are that we do have the lowest unionization rates in the country, and we did, when we were government, implement policies that did support workers to join unions with the legislation that we brought. But today, you know, we're really seeing an attack on workers, and I have no doubt they feel under attack. I'm concerned about that, and certainly the whole New Democrat caucus will stand with the union workers because we know that this is unfair and is creating greater inequality in our province.

One of the things about unions: any province, say, in Canada that has high unionization, it not only benefits those workers, it benefits all workers. It's kind of known as the lighthouse effect. When you have robust union involvement, then all employers actually must be vigilant and make sure that they have good policies and supports because if they don't, people will leave their employment because they know that in a unionized position those kinds of benefits and supports and wages are available to workers. That's called the lighthouse effect, and unfortunately in Alberta we don't really have that because, you know, for the 44 years before our government was elected, certainly the Conservatives were not in support of the average worker, union workers. That's always been an issue in Alberta.

Another issue that I've spoken about before is income inequality, where Alberta has the greatest income inequality of any province in Canada. Again, in areas where there's greater unionization, there's more equality. We know a healthy society has a very robust middle class, and usually in a province with high unionization rates that is true. Alberta doesn't have that.

Just to bring this point home a little bit more, many of you may be aware of that study that looks at the top CEOs in Canada and how much money they make. It's laughable, if it wasn't so disturbing, but by 11:30 a.m. on sort of the first day of work of any new year – in this year, 2019, it was 11:30 – the top CEOs had made the average worker's annual salary. Even though, you know, we're not in the turn of the century, in the late 1800s, early 1900s, the Industrial Revolution, apparently we had unionization and much fairer labour employment laws, we still have this kind of phenomenon happening in our society, where somehow it's ridiculous that some people can make extraordinary wages and many are just scraping to get by.

I just want to bring that out, and I just want to thank my friends in the union movement for their diligence and hard work really standing up for regular Albertans. It's beyond their own workers. They have a vision for the province. They care about social justice. They do many things to support women to be in leadership, to support families, to support the vulnerable. They have many activities and ways that they contribute to the communities. Having a robust union environment is a benefit to all citizens. I just really want to thank my colleagues for all that they do.

As I said earlier, you know, I don't blame them for feeling under siege because since this UCP government has come in, they've done a lot of things to directly attack these workers who are providing public services to Albertans. We know that the UCP plans to cut at least 8 per cent from public services, probably more. The UCP says that service workers, correctional peace officers, policy analysts, physicians, nurses, and teachers are all overpaid. They get way too much money. They're overpaid. I mean, if I was one of those workers, I'd feel like: oh, they're gunning for me. We know that the scope of practice has just changed for licensed practical nurses, so that means the government intends to get the same work at a lower cost while risking their registered nurses' jobs. Also, there's a move just in general to privatize public services. We know that. They call it nice words like "alternative service delivery" or "outsourcing." We know that's privatization.

Yesterday the Minister of Finance had the audacity to talk about what he expects from the public service workers. They should be taking a 2 to 5 per cent cut. He's negotiating in the media. That's just completely inappropriate, so I just can appreciate how the public servants must feel under siege. Certainly, there is the evidence of that.

In this bill specifically it does talk about doing things, changing things to make it more difficult. One of them is formalizing bargaining oversight. What does that mean? It means the minister can issue confidential directives to employers before, during, and after collective bargaining respecting the mandate, for example, the fiscal limits that they're willing to do – I guess he's already doing that in the public forum, in the media, so okay – and requesting info from employers about employees and things. I mean, things seems like, again, the deck is stacked against the workers, and that's a concern. That's part of this Bill 21.

I know that some of my colleagues have talked about, you know, just the regressive policy of banning replacement workers. Of course, now the UCP wants to bring that back in with this Bill 21. Certainly, it's well known that this kind of action prolongs disputes, could harm the trust and confidence of people in the workplace, and it could even stoke a lot of anger and, potentially, violence on the picket lines because of allowing these workers to go in and take the jobs of these people who are standing up for their rights. They have the right to do this. That's a significant attack. I can appreciate that union workers are feeling under attack in Alberta. Again, I just want to say that, certainly, our NPD caucus will stand up and speak against these really backward changes to create more fairness and justice in society.

In a totally unrelated area – it's still the same bill but it's not to do with union workers anymore – now we're going to talk about people on AISH, people on assured income for the severely handicapped. Those are people who oftentimes cannot work at a full-time job. They may work a bit, but they have some developmental challenges that don't make it possible sometimes to provide for themselves. Of course, in a just society we do have programs that support people that have these challenges. We have the AISH program in Alberta.

Unfortunately, this UCP government has decided now to not index the AISH benefits. These are not benefits that are – I think the MacKinnon report said something like: they're generous benefits. That just kind of, you know, made me shake my head because I wonder if she understands or has spoken to someone on AISH. Would they say that their benefits are generous? I think they'd say that they're just scraping by, hardly making it.

Our government, when we were in power, actually indexed those benefits to the rate of inflation, so in a small way but an important way, you know, each year, because we do have increases in the cost of living, giving them that little bit more so that they could maintain their lifestyle and not struggle so much. But this government thinks that that's not important. Again, it's just an attack on regular Albertans, Albertans who are more vulnerable even than many others.

Albertans really have to qualify for the AISH program. You know, you have to go through medical tests. It depends on what kind of developmental disability or whatever it is, I mean, not something that can just go away. It's not something that is even easy to get. I think probably every MLA will know that they have people calling their constituency office to help them because they feel like they should qualify for AISH benefits but have been denied. There's an extensive appeal process. Sometimes even the people who should be getting those benefits don't because of a very strict gatekeeping function of that program. If people qualify, they have demonstrated that there is a significant issue. The word "severely" is in the name, so they can't do what perhaps I could do because of this impediment.

To take away the funding, that is fairly minimal – you know, most of us would expect our salaries to go up each year – is cruel. It is cruel, Mr. Speaker. If it wasn't so disturbing, it would be funny. Some of you may have seen the Edmonton Journal political cartoon that showed the Premier throwing a rock and hitting the head of a man in a wheelchair, and it said: an AISH recipient. So he's attacking the most vulnerable. As we've said loud and clear in this House: on the backs of AISH recipients, on the backs of the vulnerable the UCP is preferencing wealthy corporations with their $4.7 billion tax break. And guess who's paying for it? That just seems inhumane. It seems so unfair.

Besides the AISH recipients who are being deindexed, there are seniors who are being deindexed also. There are a few pieces to it. The Alberta seniors' benefit is an income support program. It's not a lot of money. It's sort of a top-up to the old age security and the guaranteed income supplement for seniors. Those are all federal programs. Some seniors have such small incomes that they're still significantly below the poverty line, so Alberta has an Alberta seniors' benefit and it just sort of tops them up. I think the most is, like, $285 or something that someone can receive on a monthly basis. That program had also been indexed by our government, again to make sure that people had the money they needed. It was not that they kept getting poorer and poorer, but they actually maintained their lifestyle.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. Is there anybody wishing to make a brief question or comment?

Seeing no one, we are back on the main bill. I see the hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika and deputy government whip rising.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you for recognizing me. I move that we adjourn debate on this bill this evening.

The Speaker: I appreciate your motion; however, you have actually already spoken to second reading.

Is there anyone else that might be willing to move to adjourn debate? The hon. Member for Lacombe-Ponoka has risen.

Mr. Orr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I move that we adjourn debate for the evening.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Just to provide some clarity for the House, the hon. member is pleased to move the adjournment of debate on Bill 21, and then we'll move the House in just a minute. Is that what you've moved?

Mr. Orr: Yes. Thank you.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think we've had a lot of progress tonight, and I move that we adjourn the Assembly until tomorrow, Thursday, October 31, Halloween, at 1:30 p.m.

The Speaker: I hope you'll all be dressed like politicians tomorrow.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 10:49 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Thursday, October 31, 2019

Prayers

The Speaker: Hon. members, the prayer. Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and to her government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideas but, laying aside all private interests and prejudices, keep in mind their responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all. Amen.

Please be seated.

Hon. members, before we proceed to Introduction of Guests, I just thought I would make a special note. I see you have all chosen the same costume for Halloween this year. It's a large group of politicians that we have here.

Some Hon. Members: Boo.

The Speaker: If you can't be good, be punny. That's my motto.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Hon. members, we have three school groups this afternoon. As I read the name of your school group, please rise: from Edmonton-Strathcona, grades 5 and 6 students from the Garneau school; from Edmonton-Riverview, grade 9 students from Parkview school; and from Edmonton-City Centre, intermediate 1 English language learners from Solomon College.

Welcome, all.

Members' Statements

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning would like to make a statement.

Budget 2019

Ms Sweet: Well, Happy Halloween, Mr. Speaker, and thank you for recognizing me. This is one of the scariest Halloweens Albertans have seen in years. The witches and warlocks are out trying to cast their spells with the poison of this new budget. While the UCP hands out $4.7 billion treats to their friends and insiders, children go door to door asking their neighbours to protect their education. Zombies are appearing on the streets after this government's trick of implementing American-style health care as the staff bob for apples to keep their wages. As Albertans watch, ghosts slowly steal away the pumpkins' jobs, hiding their future harvest.

In the haunted house the trolls are quick at work trying to convince Albertans that foreign-funded goblins hide under their bed as the fog rolls over the $30 million hidden in the dungeon with all the secret details. All the while past demons dressed in their kamikaze costumes haunt the Premier and his ministers by lifting every tombstone to find the bodies buried below, investigating every squeaky locked door and rattling chains, seeking the eerie truth.

But Albertans are resilient, and this opposition has no fear. They don their capes and stand for justice, fighting the horrors of this nightmare budget and policies. The dawn is coming, and the NDP will lead the way.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Drumheller-Stettler.

Energy Industry Competitiveness

Mr. Horner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We'll talk about jobs and the economy now. I'm afraid it's another sad day for the Canadian oil and gas industry. You see, the most recent gut punch to this sector is the decision by EnCana Corp. to move its headquarters to the United States and drop the reference to Canada from its name. This is not some rinky-dink player; this is EnCana, now Ovintiv Inc.

In 2002 Alberta Energy and PanCanadian became one through a merger of equals, and the result was at the time the world's largest publicly traded oil and gas producer. The merger happened because of founding CEO Gwyn Morgan and others' belief in Canadian-controlled companies. They proudly named this new company EnCana from the words "energy" and "Canada."

In the last three years EnCana has shifted its multibillion-dollar capital program to the States, the CEO has moved from Calgary to Denver, and they've purchased Newfield Exploration, an American producer, for $7.7 billion. Now it has 60 per cent of production, almost all of its capital plan, and half of its board based in the United States. To summarize the words of Gwyn Morgan: who would have thought that in a few short years the Canadian flagship, the marquee Canadian energy company, would export itself? Thinking back a few short months, TransCanada felt inclined to remove "Canada" from their name and settle on the more innocuous, less offensive TC Energy.

These stories are sad, Mr. Speaker. They speak to the real-world outcomes of poor policy and damaging, fact-free rhetoric. These stories show how capital will flee, taking jobs and prosperity with it, how emissions aren't avoided, only shifted to other jurisdictions. I'm sick of seeing friends and neighbours pack up and leave for better prospects in Saskatchewan or Texas.

It's Halloween today, and it has me thinking about costumes. It feels like Halloween most days in this House: dressed up to fit in. I sincerely hope, Mr. Speaker, that when the members opposite take off their Halloween masks, underneath they aren't a bunch of pipeline protesters playing dress-up and working secretly to keep Canadian oil in the ground. [A cellphone rang]

The Speaker: Hon. members, it sounded distinctly like a cellphone perhaps went off during that. I'm sure that it couldn't have been given that it would be wildly inappropriate to have that here in the Chamber and certainly turned on.

The hon. Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat.

Political and Public Discourse and Women's Political Participation

Ms Glasgo: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Bullying: it's a topic that's been discussed in this Chamber and affects the lives of many Albertans, young and old. The Canadian Mental Health Association reports that being a victim of bullying increases risks of depression, low self-esteem, and trauma. Sadly, 85 per cent of bullying takes place in front of others. Such is the case with cyberbullying.

Now, opposition and critique are expected. The opposition's job is to oppose. We expect members opposite to continue their campaign against us, both inside and outside of these walls. That's politics. But throughout all of that, I hope that we can agree on the need for basic human decency despite our political disagreements.

We see character assassinations being levelled at competent and thoughtful members of cabinet. We see staff being dragged through the trenches of fear, smear, and defamation just for doing their jobs.

We see private citizens being told that they are less than, uneducated, or subservient because they dare to hold a view outside of what is acceptable to the members opposite. We see survivors of sexual assault lambasted and shamed.

What do all of these people have in common, Mr. Speaker? They're all Conservative women. We know that women are under-represented in politics at every level, and I would assume that every single person in this House would like to see a more representative Legislature. But when malediction and derogatory attacks become the norm, this discourages intelligent, capable, talented women from running or even being involved. It paints a sad picture to the public and future generations about what politics is and ought to be. These attacks, all around, are despicable and indefensible.

We all have our own views and perspectives, Mr. Speaker. That's our right. At the same time, I hope that the members opposite will join with us in denouncing these heinous attacks on Conservative women. Will the NDP join this side of the House in condemning these attacks? Will they stand up and repudiate the disgusting campaign of defamation targeting Alberta women, including survivors? I hope that they can find it in their hearts to stand with brave Alberta women, but I guess I'll find out.

Chile

Member Loyola: Mr. Speaker, on October 18, 2019, a protest was initiated by Chilean students regarding rising public transit fares in Santiago, Chile. This act of defiance generated broad support from young people as well as broad support from the rest of the population. On October 19 millions of Chileans took to the streets all across the country in support of the students but also adamantly tired of the many problems due to the continuous austerity budgets of the current right-wing government, including low pensions, precarious health care, low wages, and a lack of a quality and affordable education.

The ongoing economic policy being implemented in the country has made Chile one of the most expensive countries to live in in Latin America according to the OECD. Since October 19 the mobilizations and protests of Chileans has not stopped but, in fact, has increased, reaching the most remote corners of the country. All this has led to a declaration of a state of emergency, with curfews in most of the country's major cities. Chile, again, is an example of constant human rights violations and the criminalization of peaceful protest.

Until yesterday the situation of violation of human rights according to the Institute of Human Rights is as follows: 3,535 detainees, 120 legal actions against the government, 1,132 wounded, and, most horrible of all, 25 deaths as a result of military and police aggression on peaceful protesters. Not since the military regime that gave rise to the horrible events of September 11, 1973, have the Chilean people seen such repression.

I stand in this House along with all members of the Alberta NDP caucus to call on the Chilean government to stop this repression, and I also call on Albertans to support the Chilean people in denouncing the human rights violations taking place in Chile. I also call on this Premier, his cabinet, and his party to do the same and to stand in solidarity with the Chilean people and the many Chilean-Canadians that now call Alberta their home.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Red Deer-South would like to make a statement.

NDP Climate Leadership Plan

Mr. Stephan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As Alberta seeks to make Ottawa more accountable, our government must lead by example. Government is not accountable when it imposes a billion-dollar tax on its citizens prior to first having a plan for the tax, internal controls, and feedback mechanisms for the tax. Unfortunately, the NDP climate leadership plan and its carbon tax is such an example.

Last week the Ministry of Environment and Parks attended the Public Accounts Committee. In February 2018, more than a year after the NDP imposed its billion-dollar carbon tax on Alberta businesses and families, the Auditor General looked at the NDP climate leadership plan and found the following three foundational deficiencies. First, the NDP had failed to have implementation plans for the plan and its programs. This is ironic. The plan had no plan. Second, the NDP failed to have adequate processes to protect against inaccurate or incomplete data. Without internal controls, bad data leads to bad conclusions. Lastly, the plan did not provide proper reporting on costs.

Stewardship of taxpayer dollars was not a priority of the NDP government and its plan. This is alarming. Notwithstanding that the NDP climate leadership plan and tax was more than a year old, had already taken over a billion dollars from Alberta businesses and families, it still lacked plans, internal controls, and fiscal accountability. This is a poor example. Let's do better.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The Member for Edmonton-South.

Municipal Affairs Budget 2019-2020

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. When the Member for Edmonton-South West was appointed as the Minister of Municipal Affairs, this government and the hon. member promised that he would be a, quote, strong voice in cabinet, advocating for what is best for Edmonton, unquote. Well, let's look at what this so-called strong voice has done for Edmonton: $150 million in funding reductions for the city and tearing up the city charters in his ministry; cancellations and delays for upgrades to Terwillegar Drive, the Stadium LRT rehabilitation, and the west valley LRT; delaying the badly needed south Edmonton hospital until 2030; pushing back the mental health facility for children and youth at the Royal Alexandra hospital; no word on a much-needed high school in south Edmonton.

Mr. Speaker, what is even the worst part? These cuts and delays will most severely affect residents that are right in his own constituency of Edmonton-South West, the riding that he represents directly, all to pay for a $4.7 billion corporate handout that just this morning we learned is financing the exit of companies right to the United States.

And individual benefits for Edmontonians? Budget 2019 hikes income taxes, eliminates tax credits for entrepreneurs, and nickels and dimes Edmontonians by hiking fees for vehicle registration, land titles, and even museum entry. Just yesterday we learned that cuts to education funding are going to result in increased school fees.

Mr. Speaker, every single day we learn more about the attacks on families and the attacks on Edmontonians in this budget, and this so-called voice is silent. He owes his constituents an explanation, an explanation for why he isn't standing up for them, an explanation for why his constituents are not a priority for him or his government, and an explanation for just how much more punishment this city can expect under his leadership. The constituents of Edmonton-South West deserve better.

The Speaker: I recognize the hon. Member for Banff-Kananaskis.

Travel Alberta Awards

Ms Rosin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'll take every opportunity I can to stand in this House and talk about how proud I am of our tourism sector and all the entrepreneurs and businesspeople who support it. The tourism sector is massively important to our province, putting us on the map both nationally and globally for our world-renowned sites, attractions, and industries, and Banff-Kananaskis is leading the way. A quick Google image search of Canada turns up nearly unanimous results of my beautiful constituency. To some communities tourism is difficult to sustain, but for Canmore, Banff, and Kananaskis, thanks to the sheer magnificence of our surroundings, tourism comes naturally. Over 4 million visitors travel to Banff national park every year, and tourism accounts for 89 per cent of their GDP.

But this success does not come without the hard work and dedication of many. That's why I was honoured to attend the 2019 Travel Alberta Alto awards on Monday, appropriately held right in Banff. The Alto awards recognize the unsung heroes of the tourism industry, whose work and investment are enjoyed by millions around the world and who make Alberta a world-renowned destination but who often don't get so much as a thank you from those they entertain. These people are experienced inventors, memory creators, and goosebump providers. I am proud to say that businesspeople from Banff-Kananaskis were nominated as finalists for awards in eight out of 10 categories at this year's Alto awards. I'm extra proud to say that Parks Canada's bison reintroduction webinar series and Sunshine Village's annual Slush Cup both took home first place in their categories and that Bob Williams, the general manager of Calaway Park in Springbank, was named the 2019 Alto ambassador.

Banff-Kananaskis is tourism, and I'm so lucky to represent these people in the Legislature. The work of the individuals in Banff-Kananaskis is invaluable to the success of Alberta's tourism industry and our economy as a whole, and I look forward to continue working alongside these incredible people as our government endeavours to double Alberta's tourism spending by 2030.

Rural Crime

Mr. Orr: Mr. Speaker, this past weekend I attended a Red Deer-Lacombe rural crime watch meeting. RCMP, municipal officials, peace officers, and Crime Watch directors attended. The mood of the meeting was not good. When municipal officials are virtually in tears and warn, with desperation, that things are out of control and that someone is going to die, when one detachment appears to be in a state of crisis, it's not good.

A local crime watch e-mail says:

No More Mister Nice Guy

The days of welcoming strangers onto our property are long gone. When the ladies in our families are being beaten up and having their lives threatened, it is way past time to change what we are doing. Prepare to defend your loved ones; it is just a matter of time. You will end up going to jail at minimum until you can prove yourself innocent. You will have to deal with the guilt and the PTSD and retribution from the gang or offender. You will have to spend huge amounts of money on lawyers. You will have to deal with lost time on your job. You and your family will be exposed to the media. Right now we are all playing a game of Russian roulette, hoping that it is the next guy or neighbor who is going to have to handle the issue. Well, it could be you.

Another lady writes:

My friends were recently attacked at their home by Eckville, the women assaulted October 23 and vehicles stolen. She is just like me, with children and a newborn at home. She didn't see a cop till an hour and a quarter later from the time she called. If I try to defend my home and my children, am I going to be in more trouble than the people trespassing? So I ask you: what can I do?

I cannot sugar-coat this. Rural crime is the most serious issue facing residents in central Alberta. Individuals don't feel safe because they are not safe in their homes or on their property. I, too, live in a rural county. I and our government also struggle with the anxiety and the trauma. We are working to change the system and find solutions to these complex issues and failures of civil security.

Thank you.

Budget 2019

Mr. Loewen: With the recent budget being brought forward and today being Halloween, it is a perfect time to bring them together with Macbeth's witches' poem.

Thrice and once the NDP budget.
Thrice and once it fails to please.
Albertans cry 'tis time, 'tis time.

Round about the election would go.
Poisoned speeches they would throw.
And when the platforms turned to stone,
Albertans were convinced to the bone.
At the end the votes were sought.
A Conservative government they got.

Double, double toil and trouble;
Tables turn, and budget bubble.

And as the Premier ponders,
Who shall he add, he wonders.
To his cabinet list he goes.
First budget adds minister's Toews.
The opposition adds the fears
And continue their awful smears.

As the facts they do come out,
People see there is little pout.

Double, double toil and trouble;
We learn there's little budget trouble.

Health care, there is no cut,
And classes are left in no rut.
Monies that are to be spent
Will go exactly where they're meant.
To protect our front-line service,
Our budget's mark it did not miss.
Mental health and addictions served,
All the while debt trajectory curved.

Increases to Children's Services
And also Community and Social Services.
Increases in seniors' housing: you can bet
Those community builders we won't forget.

As we focus to remove red tape,
Our associate minister he wears a cape.
Job-creation tax cut will do its work
Though opposition continues to smirk.

They fail to remember the enormous cost:
Their tax increases equalled $6 billion lost.

Balanced budget, we will not rest,
As the MacKinnon panel did suggest.

O well done! I commend your pains,
And every one shall share the gains.
And now about the budget sing
Workers and families in a ring,
Supporting all that you put in.

And this tale, though sounding scary,
In the end the fear is nary.
This government is committed to
How our future it will do.

For as we get people back to work,
Making life better we will not shirk.
Pushing forward a full cup,
For Alberta proud, we stand up.

1:50

The Speaker: I might provide two cautionary tales to the statements today.

One, the hon. member has been around for a very long time, and he'll know that the use of names, even if he blends them to not really sound like a name, might not actually be appropriate.

The other hon. members will know that any member's statement is to be done free of any form of interjection, and I did have the opportunity to hear one this afternoon.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, earlier this week the Premier told business leaders that the province was broke and that he had to make tough choices. He forgot to mention that his first priority was a $4.7 billion no-jobs corporate handout. Today we hear the devastating news that EnCana announced that they pocketed $55 million from the Premier's handout, and now they're leaving us for the United States. Why did the Premier throw money at a company that isn't creating a single job for Albertans?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, we're sad to see the news from EnCana today, and I want to be clear. The job-creation tax cut is designed to create work, create jobs inside our province. It's one component of a multicomponent plan. But if the hon. member wants to know why EnCana has left this province and who to blame, she should look in the mirror. That hon. member even just recently stood on the steps of this Legislature with protesters against our energy industry, with communist flags flying, has never apologized to the people of Alberta, was part of a government that helped push EnCana out of this province.

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, that's a heck of a way to talk about the people who are facing unemployment today because of this government.

Every single Alberta taxpayer is being asked to pay the price for this Premier's wrong priorities. They'll be paying more in income tax and, soon, property tax. Parents will be paying more in school fees, too. In Calgary this Premier has cut money for 130 police officers. Police officers, parents: everyone is paying more in taxes. That's whose money is going towards lining the pockets of shareholders instead of supporting jobs here in Alberta. Why is the Premier forcing Albertans to pay for his $4.7 billion no-jobs corporate handout?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, that $4.7 billion number the NDP keeps making up has already been proven to be wrong many times. But back to what point matters. Losing EnCana and losing any investment inside this province is troubling, and we feel for anybody who has lost their job, certainly. But what it comes down to, at the end of the day, is that that hon. member was part of a government that chased away billions of dollars in investment, stomped on Alberta's largest industry while it was down, and, even while she was in opposition with her colleagues, stood on the steps of the Legislature with communist flags flying and protested against our energy industry. When is she going to apologize for that?

Ms Hoffman: The Premier blames us. The Premier blames Ottawa. The Premier blames schoolchildren for fighting against climate change, Mr. Speaker. The Premier even tries to deny his own corporate handout exists, and so does his House here. It's on page 144 of the budget they wrote. If anything in Alberta is broke, it's this Premier's moral compass. Why won't the Premier admit that he didn't make a tough choice – he made the wrong choice – and give us back our $4.7 billion?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member wants to talk about a moral compass. I'll stand with our Premier, who's working hard to get people back to work, who's standing beside our largest industry and is helping fight for our province. That hon. member sided with Justin Trudeau, possibly the worst Prime Minister in the history of this country, somebody who has attacked Albertans on a daily basis, and made him their close ally while she was in government. Then their leader and their party admitted that they then voted for their federal leader, the NDP leader, who is against pipelines. That's ridiculous. That hon. member should apologize to Albertans.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Education Budget 2019-2020

Ms Hoffman: Paying out hundreds of dollars in school fees is a major financial stress for families, and that's why our government decided to invest $60 million in reducing that fee burden. The Premier cancelled that support for families to pay for his $4.7 billion no-jobs corporate handout, and yesterday we learned that school fees will likely go up again: one bill in September and another one maybe at Christmas. Why does the Premier choose to rob from families to give billions of dollars to corporations who aren't even creating jobs here in Alberta?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker: rob from families? That hon. member was the Deputy Premier of a government that brought in the largest tax increase in the history of this province. I'm proud that this government got rid of it. That hon. member: while I sat in opposition, I had to unfortunately watch her go after my constituents on a daily basis not only with the carbon tax but kicking our energy industry while it was down, watch the people that I represent go through a heck of a hard time because they kept making it worse. Again to her: apologize to Albertans. You don't even have a right, in my mind, to stand up in this House and even ask a question like that.

The Speaker: Of course, the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora has a right to stand and ask questions here in the House, and she has another right right now to do so.

Ms Hoffman: Back to school in September is often a hard time financially for families, but at least it was only once a year. Families used to be able to be protected from mid-year increases by law, but now this Premier is changing the law so that families can be hit by school fees more than once a year. On top of that, families are paying more in income tax, more in property tax, more in insurance, more in vehicle registration fees. Why does this Premier think it's okay to pick the pockets of everyday families to pad the profit margins for shareholders?

Mr. Jason Nixon: The NDP acting leader continues the habit of her party; their party in this House continues to misrepresent the facts. That is not an accurate statement, but what is accurate is that she was the Deputy Premier of a government that brought in a carbon tax, the largest tax in the history of our province, that hurt my constituents and your constituents, Mr. Speaker. She was part of a government that you know told my constituents at the West Country seniors' centre to fund raise to pay for her carbon tax. She has no credibility on this issue. Her party has no credibility on this issue. We will stand up for Albertans.

Ms Hoffman: Is that why they're kicking 46,000 people off the seniors' drug plan, Mr. Speaker?

Yesterday I met with parents who are already pushed to the brink by government hiking up their school fees. Some educational assistants received layoff notices on budget day. I met with a student who understands better than the Education minister or anyone in the government the damage that's being done by defunding the school system. Why is the Premier stealing from children and educational assistants, who . . .

Mr. Jason Nixon: Point of order.

Ms Hoffman: . . . on average make $32,000 a year, to give $4.7 billion to profitable corporations?

The Speaker: The hon. member knows that saying that the Premier is stealing from children would be wildly unparliamentary. She can apologize at the next opportunity.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, the acting leader of the NDP wants to talk about tax policy. It's ridiculous. She was part of a government, again, that brought in a carbon tax that reached into every Albertan's pocket, taking money out of hard-working Albertans' pockets, and then put it into her slush fund, that never even had an impact on the environment. It was all economic pain and no environmental gain. That's what they did at the very time that Albertans needed their government to stand up for them. They came in and knocked them down again while they were already down. That's their legacy.

The Speaker: Hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora, if you'd like to talk about it at the end of question period, I'm happy to do that if you'd prefer.

For now, then, the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Public and Catholic schools in Red Deer are reeling after finding out that the government misled them about their budget. Red Deer public says that they're getting $3.7 million less than the minister led them to believe, and Red Deer Catholic says that they're getting $2 million less than they were promised. To the Premier: why did your Education minister fail to tell the truth to the people of Red Deer?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. As promised during the election, we have maintained education funding for our K to 12 system. We have also accounted for enrolment growth. Every single student who walks through that door in one of our schools will be funded at the exact same base rate they were funded at last year.

Ms Hoffman: Red Deer public: $3.7 million less than they were led to believe. Red Deer Catholic: $2 million less than they were promised. The superintendent of Red Deer public, Stu Henry, says that this budget, quote, will have a significant impact on staff and ultimately on students. He went on to say that it will mean looking at school fees to offset costs due to the shortfall in provincial funding. Why is this Premier taking money away from families in Red Deer to pay for his $4.7 billion no-jobs corporate handout while EnCana is moving south of the border?

Member LaGrange: Well, as we've said many times, our government is absolutely committed to quality education for our students. The Education Act restricts school authorities from charging fees for instructional supplies and materials. We do respect the autonomy of local boards to make decisions for their local jurisdictions.

Ms Hoffman: The reality of this budget is far from the fantasy that the UCP government tried to peddle during the election and the government still tries to peddle in this House, but the truth is in black and white, Mr. Speaker. Last week the budget was tabled: hundreds of millions of dollars less for schools, fewer teachers, more kids in classrooms, fewer educational assistants, more time on buses, less individual support for kids with special needs, and more fees for parents. Why does the government choose to assault education just to give $4.7 billion in a no-jobs corporate handout to companies that are moving away from Alberta?

Member LaGrange: Let's talk about school fees, Mr. Speaker. Under her leadership in 2011-2012 Edmonton public collected $28 million in fees; in 2012-13, $29 million; in 2013-14, $31 million; in 2014-15, over $37 million. If the acting leader truly objected to school fees, she would have demonstrated that as chair of Edmonton public. Instead, she is using the issue to try and score points for her NDP leadership campaign.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Postsecondary Education Budget 2019-2020

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Advanced Education says that he wants universities to cut overhead costs. Now we know that he meant that quite literally. There's no more money to fix the roof. The University of Alberta lost its entire infrastructure maintenance grant in this current budget. That's $35 million worth of roofs, plumbing, and mechanical systems maintenance not completed. Why is this minister allowing valuable provincial assets like university buildings to deteriorate so that he can pay for his $4.7 billion corporate handout?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaides: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The capital maintenance and renewal budget and program is an important part, of course, of funding to our institutions, but, regrettably, because of the very challenging and difficult financial situation that we're in, we've had to make some very difficult decisions, including that. However, we have told our institutions that we will simply be pausing the capital maintenance and renewal program, and we'll be in a position to have it back online in future years.

Mr. Eggen: Well, given that the real victims of this terrible budget and their $4.7 billion no-jobs corporate handout are the people of Alberta and given that the University of Alberta president, David Turpin, said yesterday that staff cuts are definitely on the table, how many postsecondary educators need to lose their jobs to pay for the no-jobs handout to companies like EnCana and Husky?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaides: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I've been indeed talking with the University of Alberta and, of course, all of our institutions. We want to make sure that as our institutions look to find savings, they do so in a way that minimizes any impact to students. I've requested from all of our institutions that they submit to my department a budget implementation plan by December 2 so we can have a closer understanding of how they seek to operate over the next few months and ensure that front-line services and high-quality education continues to be delivered.

Mr. Eggen: Well, Mr. Speaker, President Turpin, who I think knows what he's doing, believes that the corporate handout will cost his university about $2,000 per full-time student and given that each of these students is also likely facing a 21 per cent tuition hike, can the minister explain why Alberta students are paying more to get less for their education while companies like EnCana and Husky get a nice handout to lay off Albertans and then subsequently leave town?

Mr. Nicolaides: Mr. Speaker, our ultimate objective and goal is to ensure a financially sustainable postsecondary system that delivers high-quality results and that ensures we are training a modern and diverse workforce. Under the former government our postsecondary system was left rudderless, without direction, and all they did was continue to throw money at the problem, as we've seen from them time and time again. With every problem they encounter, I guess the solution is just to throw money at it. We will find a much better approach to deliver high-quality postsecondary to the province of Alberta.

Skilled Trades Training

Mr. Loewen: Mr. Speaker, my riding of Central Peace-Notley does not have big cities full of people. Rather, the towns and hamlets spread out across its boundaries serve as meeting points and service providers for a largely rural population. Among these services provided is advanced education, specifically the trades colleges, like in Fairview. The skills taught at schools are necessary to keep Albertans up to speed on the latest developments in industry and agriculture, enhancing farms and businesses across my constituency. Can the minister explain how this government seeks to continue its partnership with local trade schools and deliver top-quality education to rural Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaides: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. Partnering with our rural local trade schools is an important priority. We'll be continuing to partner with them in a number of ways. First and foremost, as many people here know, of course, we've made an important and significant investment in trade programming across the province, which a lot of our rural colleges will benefit from. As well, as we work to roll out a new funding formula, we'll be working with each individual institution to find a way forward that is best suited.

Mr. Loewen: Mr. Speaker, given that the previous NDP administration racked up unsustainable debt levels and given that the budget delivered last week is set on balancing the efficient delivery of services with paying off the massive debt load the NDP saddled Albertans with and given that this government seeks to deliver top-quality education efficiently to all Albertans and given that the trades are an essential component of Alberta's economy and our campaign commitments, will the minister explain to the House how this government will support the trades and, by extension, fulfill its promise to get Albertans back to work?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaides: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, getting Albertans back to work is our top priority, which is reflected in our investment in the skilled trades. Just the other day I had the fortune of being with the Premier to make an announcement with Careers: the Next Generation, which at the moment allows 1,500 high school students to participate in apprenticeship learning. Our goal is to quadruple that number to 6,000 to help more students find pathways in apprenticeship learning. I want to thank the member. I've had the opportunity of visiting Fairview and, in particular, visiting the Fairview campus and having a great opportunity to find out more about the excellent trade programming that is occurring there in his own constituency.

Mr. Loewen: Given that this government was elected to return Alberta's finances to order and given that this most recent budget calls for tightening of belts, particularly in Advanced Education, and given that larger institutions like Mount Royal, the University of Calgary, or the University of Alberta are able to weather financial storms due to their size and assets and given that the trade schools across my riding are small but essential to growth of trades and agriculture, can the minister explain how this government will veer from the unrestrained spending of the previous administration while at the same time ensuring smaller schools are not lost in the shuffle?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaides: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This is an important question and a very important challenge. Of course, as we know, the MacKinnon panel had some very clear details around postsecondary spending. To address this problem, we will be transforming the way in which we fund our postsecondary institutions to ensure the financial viability of the system and to ensure that our postsecondary system is meeting current labour demands and addressing the future labour challenges within the province.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-McCall has the call.

Calgary Police Service Funding

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Just a few days ago in this House the Member for Calgary-Cross described the "devastating crime wave" that our constituents have experienced. But on Monday Calgary police chief, Mark Neufeld, told city council that the province is removing $13 million from the Calgary police budget. Can the Justice minister confirm he's raiding the Calgary police budget during a devastating crime wave, or is he going to call Chief Neufeld a liar?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, we have fully funded the two grants that are provided to the city of Calgary for policing. We have dedicated additional resources for policing across Alberta, including the Alberta law enforcement response teams. Earlier this week I sent a clear signal to the mayor of Calgary that they need to get their fiscal house in order and start funding the priorities of Calgarians. I'm a Calgarian. I'm tired of my taxes going up. I'm tired of his pet projects. It's time to fund policing. It's time for the mayor of Calgary to get his house in order.

Mr. Sabir: Given that Chief Neufeld said, and I quote, you start talking about numbers like $13 million; that's about 130 positions is what that equates to, end quote, does the minister want the city of Calgary to hike property taxes to backfill his raiding of the police budget, or is he okay with having 130 fewer officers patrolling the streets of Calgary during a crime wave?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, I've talked to Chief Neufeld, and I've encouraged him to talk to his mayor to get Calgary's fiscal house in order. We have a former government on the other side that loved raising taxes. We also have a mayor in Calgary that loves to raise taxes. They have a joint connection here. They love Justin Trudeau. Our mayor of Calgary loves Justin Trudeau. That was a failed alliance for Alberta. We're standing up for Alberta. We all want to see Calgary get its fiscal house in order. I'm tired of paying more taxes in Calgary.

Mr. Sabir: Given that the minister told this House in June, "We're going to be making sure that our law enforcement officials have the resources that they need to get the job done," and given that now he is actually taking $13 million away from law enforcement in Calgary, can the Justice minister explain, without having another public meltdown, why he's abandoning public safety in Calgary to pay for the Premier's $4.7 billion corporate handout?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, I'm not going to be lectured about justice and policing by the members opposite. Remember that earlier last month I invited all members opposite to come hear about their legacy on crime. We had a bus with "NDP legacy tour." They won't come and hear about their record. They won't come and hear about their record on crime. We have been clear in our budget. We are funding policing, more money for policing. It's time for the city of Calgary to get its fiscal house in order.

Budget 2019 Impact on Women

Member Irwin: Mr. Speaker, this government's budget attacks a lot of Albertans: postsecondary students, workers, AISH recipients. The list goes on. But today I'd like to talk about the impacts on women. The impacts are significant: on professions that are predominantly women such as nurses and teachers to cuts to affordable housing to deindexing the Alberta seniors' benefit, which impacts thousands of senior women. To the minister responsible for status of women: given all of these terrible changes, how have you been advocating for women with your cabinet colleagues? And, please, be specific.

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Culture, Multiculturalism and Status of Women.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm very proud to work with a government that understands the fiscal situation that we're in right now. I would suggest that the member needs to actually ask internally, in the opposition, about the hundreds of thousands of jobs that were lost while they were in government. In fact, if you look at the energy industry alone, 24 per cent of the workers that are in the energy industry are women, many of whom have lost their jobs as a result of very bad policy on that side.

Member Irwin: Mr. Speaker, given that on Tuesday we debated the Culture, Multiculturalism and Status of Women estimates and given that while the answers left something to be desired, my colleagues and I were happy to share the concerns of Albertans and given that there was only one question on issues faced by women or gender-diverse folks from the government caucus, can the minister please explain how, moving forward, she's going to be prioritizing supports for women when most of her colleagues don't seem to care about 50 per cent of the population?

The Speaker: The hon. the minister of status of women.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you. Well, I can honestly say that on this side we deeply, deeply care about every single person in this province, especially women and LGBTQ2S-plus. One of the things I'm most proud of – actually, there are a couple of things. The Minister of Advanced Education has actively been working with Women Building Futures to make sure – when we were looking at some of the issues of gaps within working sectors for women, one of the big things that we found out was that there was not enough investment and whatnot going into women in STEM programs.

Member Irwin: Given that this government is reducing funding for Culture, Multiculturalism and Status of Women by a whopping 33 per cent, a funny way of showing your support, and given that this is just to make up for their $4.7 billion no-jobs giveaway and given that when asked about a significant number of women health care workers who were fired, this minister suggested they go back to school or get a job in the trades, to the minister: can you please assure this House that despite your government's disinterest in women, we won't see any further cuts in the future?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you. Well, actually, I would suggest that the member again take a look at her own government, which brought in the largest tax ever in Alberta, which absolutely impacted women far more than anybody else in this province. If you want to talk about the impacts on women in this province, you only need to look at the previous government and the absolutely insulting tax that was put upon this province day after day. It impacted their ability to run their households, their ability to feed their families, go to work, and multiple other things.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Livingstone-Macleod is rising with a question.

Landowner Property Rights

Mr. Reid: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Albertans have demanded that our government stand up for property rights. Previous abuses of these rights include false premises for expropriation, low compensation offers, devalued property, and the government freezing part or all of a private property with regulation but offering no compensation. During the campaign our party promised to fix these issues and restore the trust of Albertans in their government that we would protect property rights. Can the Minister of Justice inform us on what actions our government is taking to uphold Albertans' property rights?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, let me clear. This government respects property rights. When the Jumbo Valley trespass happened, the invasion of that property, we came out with a clear message, that trespassing on rural residences is not going to be accepted and that there are going to be real consequences to that. Our government will also be bringing forward a new Alberta property rights act that will further entrench the right to not be deprived of enjoyment or use of property without due process of the law.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Livingstone-Macleod has the call.

Mr. Reid: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Minister. Given that Alberta is the only province that allows squatters to make legal claims to someone else's private property and given that one of our government's promises was to amend the Land Titles Act and bar adverse possession claims and given that this would be an important step not only for property rights but for rural safety and given that this is a valuable initiative for many of my constituents in Livingstone-Macleod, can the minister please provide a timeline of when Albertans will see these changes take place?

The Speaker: I see the hon. Minister of Service Alberta has risen to answer.

Mr. Glubish: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As the Member for Livingstone-Macleod has said, this was one of the promises that we made in our platform. We are reviewing the recommendations from the Alberta Law Reform Institute about abolishing adverse possession, and we're reviewing our options to help address this issue. The Minister of Justice and Solicitor General has been leading the legislative work on this, but Service Alberta supports the minister. We'll work collaboratively with him and his department as they work to deliver on this platform commitment on adverse possession. We do recognize the hardships that landowners have faced on this file.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Reid: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the minister for his answer.

Given that landowners have no explicit right to private property in our Constitution and given that Albertans have not always been fairly compensated for their private property by the government and given that property owners often lack options to take action against governments that are abusing power, how will this government protect private property owners from government overreach and their abuse of power?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Justice.

Mr. Schweitzer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you for the question. Albertans will never be deprived of their right to own and enjoy their property without due process of the law. Our proposed Alberta property rights act, when we bring it forward, will propose an amendment to the Constitution to enshrine property rights in Alberta. We will also treat government regulation of real property the same as government expropriation for the purposes of compensation. This party is proud to stand with landowners, proud to stand up for property rights. It's a foundation of our party, and we're proud to stand as a government for property rights.

Energy Efficiency Programs

Mr. Schmidt: Prior to 2017 Alberta was the only jurisdiction in all of North America that didn't have an energy efficiency agency. Our government changed that by creating Energy Efficiency Alberta, that saved Albertans $330 million in energy costs. Now those programs are all gone so that this government can pay for its $4.7 billion corporate handout. To the minister of the environment. Your government is increasing taxes and fees on almost everything. How do you expect families to continue to invest in energy efficiency?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, I see the NDP still don't understand why they were fired in April. Part of the big reason why they were fired in April is a result of the carbon tax that paid for the things that the hon. member is talking about. He seems to think that was free. What happened is that they reached in and taxed hockey moms and hockey dads, took that money out of their pockets, and then went and spent it on a slush fund that the NDP had for their own special projects, many of which had no impact on the environment, some of which were spent on Ontario companies to install light bulbs and shower heads. We've been clear. We were clear with Albertans in April. We will have a different approach when it comes to emissions. We're excited about it. It'll be focused on technology and innovation, but it won't be from taking money away from hockey moms and hockey dads.

Mr. Schmidt: Given, Mr. Speaker, that those hockey moms and hockey dads are now paying more in property taxes, more in car insurance, more in home heating and electricity bills and getting nothing in return and given that the energy agency itself was creating 2,300 jobs and now this government has killed 27,000 jobs, what does this minister have to say to the thousands more who will lose their jobs in what was a booming green industry?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, it's ridiculous to watch the NDP continue to misrepresent facts over and over. Here's what I would have to say to Albertans. They fired the NDP in April. That was the start of getting us back on track. We've inherited a mess. That member was part of the cabinet that gave us that mess. We will be working diligently side-by-side with our industry, side-by-side with Albertans to get this province back on track. They can rest assured that Alberta now has a government, unlike the former government, who will not stand and protest with communist flags flying over the Legislature against our largest industries.

Mr. Schmidt: Given that I suspect the minister prefers Confederate flags to communist flags and given that the EEA contributed to $475 million ...

Mr. Ellis: Point of order.

Mr. Schmidt: ... in economic growth and given that some business owners in the solar industry are saying that with the cancellation of these programs they will, quote, go broke, what does the minister have to say to businesses who will be crippled by his decision to cancel energy efficiency programs to pay off the $4.7 billion hole that he's given to big corporations?

The Speaker: The point of order from Calgary-West is noted at 2:23.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, I prefer the Alberta flag, which flies proudly on my farm. I'm proud to be part of a government that will stand up for this province. That hon. member has been part of a government that has worked against this province, that sold out Albertans to Justin Trudeau and to their federal NDP leader. I'm proud of this province. I'm proud of the men and women who built this province. I'm proud of the energy industry in this province. I'm proud of Albertans north to south, east to west, and I will assure you this government will stand with them every day. Thank goodness the NDP is gone because all they do is sell them out.

Red Tape Reduction Funding

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, the government has claimed to be tackling red tape. They appointed an associate minister to lead their efforts, and they promised this initiative would create jobs. Well, 27,000 jobs have been lost since this government has taken over. Instead of reducing red tape, the associate minister is actually tripling it according to the budget tabled on Thursday. Can the associate minister explain to this House why he is tripling the size of his ministry while Albertans are being told to sacrifice to pay for a no-jobs, $4.7 billion corporate giveaway?

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, nothing could be further from the truth on what he just said there. Let's just talk about what their record is.

The truth is that they drove businesses away from this province. They drove the businesses away, and we lost jobs because of that. Over 170,000 jobs were lost because that government would not stand up with our job creators and our innovators. This government will do what we need to do, which is stand up for those job creators and those innovators.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, given that the red tape minister's budget will cost Albertans $10 million by 2022 and given that the government is heartlessly taking away an estimated $7 million this year alone from Albertans living with disabilities, can the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction please tell this House why he deserves a constantly growing budget while AISH recipients are being told the cost of living is too much to ask for?

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, what I will tell this House is that what we're doing for Alberta is that we're trying to get Albertans back to work. We promised Albertans that we were going to jump-start the economy and get Albertans back to work, and that's what we will deliver. One of the ways to be able to do that is that we looked at other jurisdictions that did it well, reduced the amount of taxes that they have to pay, get a sustainable government working, and make sure that we reduce the regulatory burden. When the government did this in the past, we saw over 150 corporate head offices move here. Unfortunately, we've seen EnCana leave because of what this government did in the past. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Mr. Nielsen: Given the minister of red tape was tasked with creating an environment to encourage job creation and the only real job he's managed to create is his own at a cost of $10 million and given that he's asking Alberta families to pay higher tuition, higher income taxes, higher insurance costs, and much, much more to subsidize the government's $4.7 billion corporate giveaway, to the minister: given the huge costs of his department and zero return he's providing the people of Alberta, will he agree it's time to eliminate the red tape that is his ministry, or does he support red tape only when his name is on the letterhead?

Mr. Hunter: You know, Mr. Speaker, let's talk about real history rather than the revisionist history that these members continue to do. The truth is that I brought forward a private member's bill about three and a half years ago that talked about red tape reduction. You know, Mr. Speaker, if that government had acted upon that, perhaps we would not have seen EnCana leave and not lost all those jobs because of that. They need to look in the mirror when they look at the job crisis that this province is in.

Technology Innovation and Emissions Reduction

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, Albertans are generous people. We pride ourselves on helping our fellow Canadians, especially when times are tough elsewhere, regardless of what the NDP might say. All we ask in return is for a fair deal: the right to develop our resources and the self-determination to manage them. Albertans are practical, realistic people, and we have been clear that we should be focused on being champions of our energy industry and environmental record rather than villainizing them. To the Minister of Environment and Parks: what is our government doing to ensure that Alberta remains innovative in deploying emissions reduction technology?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Environment and Parks.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for the question. I was excited yesterday to announce the winners of Emissions Reduction Alberta grand challenge to companies, who will split $10 million to fund cutting edge technology when it comes to emissions reductions: Carboncure, who will save 530,000 tonnes of carbon dioxide by 2030 in the province of Alberta and a staggering 554 million litres of water annually; and Mangrove technologies, who will reduce 1.4 million tonnes of carbon dioxide a year by 2030, Mr. Speaker, all because they make new products.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, given that Albertans voted overwhelmingly against the carbon tax on April 16 and given that Justin Trudeau has said that he will institute a carbon tax on any province that does not do so of its own volition and given that our government has a plan to ensure that emissions are reduced through our TIER program and given that the federal government has been working in other ways such as C-48 and C-69 to cripple our energy industry, Minister, will the TIER system help to avert this gross federal overreach?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, our industry partners were clear with us that they wanted to be regulated here in Alberta. They were crystal clear that they did not want to be sold out by this government like they were sold out by the last government. We've worked hard over the last six months to come up with a system that will keep our regulations on our industry right here in this province, not in Ottawa, and help us to continue to defend our largest industry inside this province and other industries going forward. We're excited about it. It's a refreshing change from the NDP's approach, which was to sell them out to their ally Justin Trudeau.

Mr. Milliken: Given that Justin Trudeau's environment minister, Catherine McKenna, has gone on record saying, "I don't have time for politicians that play cynical games about climate change, and I don't have time for politicians who pretend that climate change isn't real" and given that we say that climate change is real, to the same minister: what is our government doing to convince the Trudeau Liberals that their carbon tax on everyone and everything does nothing to reduce emissions and that our TIER plan, the technology innovation and emissions reduction system is a plan that can actually work? [interjections] Regardless of what they're saying on the other side against me.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is right. We're focused on technology and innovation that could actually reduce emissions. We're excited about that. Further to that, our message to Ottawa is that if they really want to have an impact on global GHG emissions, the solution is right here in Alberta with our clean natural gas. We will continue to call on Ottawa to help get our clean energy to places like Asia and India, which will have the biggest impact on GHG emissions while at the same time helping people out of poverty. It's time for the federal government to recognize the solution to this is Alberta.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Edmonton-Meadows.

Head Coverings Worn in Schools

Mr. Deol: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's been more than two weeks since I asked the Minister of Education about the racial profiling incident at Christ the King elementary school, where an 11-year-old boy was told to remove his do-rag. When his mother protested, she was banned from the school property. The minister promised to investigate and report back to this House, but we are still waiting.

This minister is already enabling homophobic and transphobic bullying. Why is she also enabling racial profiling?

Mr. McIver: Point of order.

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I totally, categorically disagree with the statements that have been said by the hon. member. I am awaiting the report to come from Edmonton Catholic, and once I have that report I will share it.

Mr. Deol: Mr. Speaker, given that while this minister has done nothing for weeks, this boy has been forced to change schools and given that his mother has received no apology from this school or the district and remains banned from the school, will the minister direct Edmonton Catholic school to apologize to this family and lift the ban today?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. Again, I have been very clear that I support school board autonomy. They are looking into the matter. They are in the best position to look into and do the investigation. I will leave it in their capable hands.

Mr. Deol: Mr. Speaker, given that this incident has been deeply painful for Emmell, his family, and their community and given that this family has been ignored by the school, by the district, and by this minister's own office, will the Minister of Education commit to meeting in person with this family?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. I'm always happy to meet with anyone. I'm very accessible. My doors are always open. People are phoning all the time. I have not received a request to meet from this individual.

Transportation and Community Grant Program Funding

Ms Pancholi: Mr. Speaker, this week I stood with several of my Edmonton-Whitemud constituents to talk about how this government's budget breaks promises. They promised and campaigned that they would keep the previous government's capital plan, but now thanks to their budget the Terwilliger Drive expansion that south Edmonton has been waiting years for is on the chopping block. Can the Minister of Transportation explain why my constituents will be sitting longer in traffic because he is prioritizing a $4.7 billion no-jobs corporate giveaway over the needs of the people of Edmonton?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Transportation is rising.

Mr. McIver: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It surprises me to agree with the member that this project is important – not that the project is important; that's obvious – but usually there's not much to agree with.

I will say to the hon. member and the rest of the House that there are a lot of worthwhile projects across Alberta, and when we set our capital plan, it is a very tough job to decide what gets funded and what does not. But I can assure the hon. member that this project remains in our consideration for future years because it is important.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that my constituency of Edmonton-Whitemud is home to many active and successful community leagues and given that the government callously cut community facility enhancement program funding by 35 per cent, a program that the community leagues that I represent rely on, and given that the Minister of Finance told people concerned with cuts to CFEP and CIP that they would be required to do more with less, can the Minister of Culture explain why profitable corporations are being given more, but community leagues are being given less?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, firstly, I need to correct the record again. Our job-creation tax cut will result in an exponentially lower reduction in government revenues than what the members opposite are suggesting. In fact, this year alone the reduction in corporate tax revenue will be one hundred million dollars, far from the numbers they're putting out. More importantly, it will attract investment, create jobs and opportunities, the very opposite effect of what the previous government did.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that on page 144 of the minister's own fiscal plan it states that the corporate tax will give away $4.7 billion and given that the people of Edmonton-Whitemud are known for their generosity – I know many of my constituents give their time volunteering and giving to charities and nonprofits like their local school councils – and given that this government has spurred tons of confusion by eliminating the lottery fund, which supported volunteer organizations and nonprofits, and moving those funds into general revenue, can the Minister of Finance please explain why charities in my constituency get nothing but confusion from this government while corporations get gigantic handouts?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, we are dissolving the lottery fund. The function of that fund will continue as it has in the past. Charities and nonprofit groups will benefit at the same level as they have in the past. But something I don't expect the members opposite to understand is that we're doing this to streamline government, to reduce our capital required to operate, and save taxpayers $13 million a year. We will deliver effectively but will do that in a much more cost-effective manner. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. Member for Calgary-North has risen with a question.

Drug Treatment Courts

Mr. Yaseen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This morning it was announced that this government will be increasing funding to drug treatment courts to the tune of $20 million over four years. These courts are an avenue for people who are facing serious charges to get access to treatment and recovery resources to turn their lives around. To the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General: how will this funding benefit those seeking treatment through drug courts?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Schweitzer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you for the question. It was with great pride that I was there this morning to announce the expansion of drug treatment courts. We will be doubling the size of the drug treatment courts in the cities of Calgary and Edmonton. We're also looking to expand now as well into midsize centres across Alberta. That's the start. This program works. It's powerful. I was involved as a volunteer on the Calgary drug treatment court board before I got into politics. It has resounding results. It also changes lives. It allows people to reconnect with family and get their lives back on track.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-North.

Mr. Yaseen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Minister. Given that many Albertans have turned their lives around through the drug treatment courts and also given that the program is intended to break the cycle of criminal behaviour driven by addiction, to the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General: how successful is this program in reducing repeat offences?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, this program is based on accountability. Seventy per cent of the graduates don't reoffend again. They're held accountable through a court process, where they have to go and look the judge in the eye on a weekly or biweekly basis as to the progress that they're having in this. They have to admit their guilt up front, and sentencing is deferred until they can graduate. It holds people accountable. It's compassionate, but it's also firm. We believe in giving addicts a chance to recover. That's what this program will do.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Yaseen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the government has also committed to improving the overall mental health and addiction care system and also given that the many people who are in the cycle of addiction are also in the criminal justice system, to the Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions: how does this expansion of drug treatment courts align with the government's addiction strategy?

The Speaker: The hon. Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions.

Mr. Luan: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our government's approach to addiction is fair, firm, and compassionate, fair to the communities that are dealing with addiction and crime, firm in tackling the disease of addiction, and compassionate in understanding that this is a health care issue. People need treatment and recovery. Drug treatment courts are an important part of our approach that will give people the opportunity to recover and to live a positive, engaged citizenship.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Leduc-Beaumont.

2:40 Postsecondary Education Funding

Mr. Rutherford: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. One week ago today our provincial budget was tabled. It is clear that we have set a path to balancing the budget in our province as we understand the need to live within our means while also taking steps to ensure sustainability going forward. One area that Albertans spend far more on than any other province is in Advanced Education. The budget notes that we will be moving towards a performance-based funding model. To the minister: how and when do you plan on implementing this new funding model, and have postsecondary institutions been consulted on the changes?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Advanced Education has the call.

Mr. Nicolaides: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, I have a bold and ambitious vision for our postsecondary system, one that is foundationally based in transformative change. I believe that we truly have an opportunity to create a stronger postsecondary system, one that is both financially viable and that is producing a modern and diverse workforce.

The member is correct. We are in the process of transforming the way in which we fund our postsecondary institutions. Of course, we will be consulting and working with all of our postsecondary stakeholders as we develop this new, transformative model.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Leduc-Beaumont.

Mr. Rutherford: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, an overwhelming majority of Albertans voted for a government that takes real leadership and does not shy away from hard decisions. I have still heard concerns in regard to the reduction of operating grants for our postsecondary institutions. Given that grants have been reduced and given that the tuition freeze has been lifted, to the minister: what tools or alternative revenue sources are available to postsecondary institutions to help absorb this reduction in grant funding?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaides: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The member is correct. Of course, our institutions have a number of vehicles and mechanisms available to them in terms of revenue generation. Regrettably, under the former government there were a lot of handcuffs placed on our institutions and more onerous red tape that prevented them from engaging in other commercial activities to generate revenue from other sources. We are actively looking at ways of relaxing and loosening those restrictions with the right level of oversight and risk management so that our institutions can continue to generate revenue from other sources.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Rutherford: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have also heard concerns about how the government allocated the grant reduction differently for institutions. Given that some postsecondary institutions will have to find a way to absorb this reduction in funding while others will not and given that this could directly affect the ability of the institution to attract students, can the minister explain to Albertans why 21 institutions in Alberta saw a reduction in grant funding while another five had their funding held?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaides: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. We've been looking at the best mechanism in which to work with our institutions to find savings. At the end of the day, we recognize that a blind and uninformed savings reduction target across the system, a 5 per cent reduction across the system, would not be the most efficient and effective way. What we did is that we looked at the historical surpluses that our institutions have had going back the past five years. We applied savings targets to those institutions based on their historical surpluses. It's important to note that when we took a look at those surpluses, we saw that on average the postsecondary system has been generating over $250 million in surpluses. We used that decision-making to decide how best to allocate those reductions within the first year.

The Speaker: Hon. members, in 30 seconds or less we will be proceeding to the rest of the daily Routine. Those of you who are travelling home for Halloween today, please drive safely and remember that it's better to drive to arrive alive.

Presenting Reports by Standing and Special Committees

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul.

Mr. Hanson: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. On July 2, 2019, the Standing Committee on Resource Stewardship was deemed by the Assembly to be the special committee for the purpose of conducting a comprehensive review of the Public Sector Compensation Transparency Act pursuant to section 14 of that act. As chair of the committee it is my honour to table the requisite number of copies of the committee's report on the review of the Public Sector Compensation Transparency Act. Copies of the report are also available through the committee office and online.

Notices of Motions

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, after consulting with my colleague the Official Opposition House Leader, I wish to table a revision to the 2019-20 main estimates schedule. This revision is to change the time for the Municipal Affairs estimates by one hour in order to allow members the opportunity to participate in Remembrance Day ceremony events at the Legislature that morning.

The Speaker: Before I call on the hon. Minister of Transportation, I might just mention, Government House Leader: the same goal has been accomplished, but that's a tabling of a document. We don't have to move a motion in order for the estimates to be heard, just for future reference. But I appreciate it.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Thanks, Mr. Speaker.

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Transportation was rising for a tabling.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have five copies of the Canada-Alberta Integrated Bilateral Agreement for the Investing in Canada Infrastructure Program. In section 22 it has a remedy whereby the Canadian government may decide after the fact to withdraw from the program and not pay, fairly similar to the provincial remedy that has been discussed.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Red Deer-South has a tabling.

Mr. Stephan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have two tablings today. I rise to table the five requisite copies of an article by Moodys tax law, the first titled New Alberta Investment Tax Credits – Great for Business or Bureaucrats?

I also would like to table the requisite copies of a second article by Moodys tax law titled Alberta Investor Tax Credit Program – Even More Bad News.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to table five copies of an article entitled Taxing the Rich to Fund Welfare Is the Nobel Winner's Growth Mantra. The Nobel prize winner in economics suggests that reducing taxes to boost investment is a myth. "You are giving incentives to the rich who are already sitting on tons of cash."

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland.

Mr. Getson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have two tablings, the five requisite copies. The first one is from a constituent in regard to the stress that construction companies were under during the time – it was earlier in first session; I never had an opportunity to do that – when the NDP and Trudeau governments were causing undue pressures.

The second one I'd like to table is a clinical hearing evaluation for myself in regard to the left ear, that I have issues with, and I also have included a colour photocopy of the earplug I used in my left ear. I promised earlier in the week that I would table that to hopefully end that dialogue once and for all.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I have the requisite number of copies of two pieces of correspondence today from folks who are deeply concerned about education. One is somebody at the Buffalo Trail school division who talks about the $800,000 in cuts that they anticipate as well as $600,000 in growth pressures and the inability to serve students effectively.

The second one is from a teacher in Morinville who talks about having 35 students in a bio 30 class and the pressures that puts on and a sense of significant disappointment in this budget.

The Speaker: The Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. My first tabling is from the Green European Journal, and it's written by Dr. Katharine Hayhoe and Tine Hens. It's entitled Rational Hope: Connecting Hard Truth with Climate Solutions.

The second one is for the Member for Edmonton-Whitemud. It is just for clarity. People seem to be confused. It's page 144 of the government's fiscal plan for 2019-2023.

The Speaker: Are there other tablings? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to table the appropriate number of copies of communications from Susan Morrison from Tundra Petroleum Services, who talks about the fact that the Alberta export expansion program helped them access new markets and how disappointed she was to learn that this current government is no longer interested in supporting Alberta companies seeking new markets.

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Transportation has another tabling.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have five copies of a guide, if you will, to places on the Alberta government website where templates of standard government contracts can be found, all of which include text that allows the government to withdraw from those funding agreements pretty much at any time they want, which also was the subject of some discussion this week.

Point of Order Parliamentary Language

The Speaker: Hon. members, we are at points of order. At approximately 2:21 I called the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora to order. To provide some context, obviously, points of order are typically heard after question period. However, if the Speaker deems for any reason to call a member to order, they are able to do so.

I believe the member is prepared to apologize unless you want to discuss the reasons why I might have called you to order.

Ms Hoffman: I'm happy to do so, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, I understand that your ruling is very clear, that saying "why is the Premier stealing" is unparliamentary. For that, I apologize and instead will use language more becoming of the House, even when I'm feeling so frustrated. I'm apologizing for the language that I used.

The Speaker: Apology accepted. That issue is dealt with and concluded.

At approximately 2:33 the hon. Minister of Transportation called a point of order.

Point of Order Allegations against a Member

Mr. McIver: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. At that time the hon. member from across made comments about the hon. Minister of Education. While I don't have the Blues, they said something to the effect or pretty close to: the minister is enabling transphobic and racist behaviours. Now, as unpleasant as that is, I don't believe anybody in this House would be guilty of those things, but under 23(h), (i), and (j) it makes it clear that you can't make allegations against another member nor impute false or unavowed motives to another member.

My understanding of the way that you've ruled in this House on these matters, Mr. Speaker, is that as unpleasant as that may be, people can kind of get away with saying that the party opposite or something to that effect has done these things. But to actually pin that on an individual member, impugning their reputation, I think is generally considered unparliamentary, and I would ask you to ask that that be withdrawn.

The Speaker: The hon. Official Opposition House Leader.

Mr. Bilous: Yes. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Without getting into details nor arguing this point, I will on behalf of the Member for Edmonton-Meadows withdraw the comment.

The Speaker: I consider the matter to be dealt with and accepted.

Members, the point of order which was called by the hon. Member for Calgary-West has been withdrawn.

Hon. members, we are at Ordres du jour.

Orders of the Day Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 19 Technology Innovation and Emissions Reduction Implementation Act, 2019

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Environment and Parks.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to introduce for second reading the Technology Innovation and Emissions Reduction Implementation Act, 2019.

Mr. Speaker, it's a privilege to rise and speak about this important piece of legislation. I do hope that it will gain the support of all members of the Assembly as it works its way through the debate in this Chamber.

I think it's important, before we talk about Bill 19, that we take a step back and look at the very first bill that made it through the 30th Legislature inside this Assembly, which was the bill to repeal the job-killing carbon tax, Mr. Speaker. We made a promise to Albertans when we campaigned to earn the privilege to come to this place that we would get rid of the job-killing carbon tax, which was a tax on everyday Albertans, that reached into everyday Albertans' pockets and took their money and put it into NDP slush funds. We promised that, and right away we were able to keep that promise. I think it's very important that we remember that and we continue to celebrate that. The removal of the largest tax increase in the history of this province by the NDP is certainly something to celebrate.

[Mr. Hanson in the chair]

With that said, Mr. Speaker, Alberta has had a long history of managing emissions, of managing our environment, of taking the lead when it comes to our industrial activities. We're a proud, energy-producing province. We've been a leader on that file for a long time, not pursuing taxes on everyday citizens but working with the entrepreneurs in our industry, working with the innovators that have created the oil sands and other energy miracles right here in this province, that have been able to provide the economic engine not only of the province of Alberta but of the country of Canada.

Alberta was the first jurisdiction to manage its emissions. You don't hear that often, Mr. Speaker, when you're looking at the conversation when it comes around our energy industry, which is the best in the world. But the reality is that we have led the way in this province on this file for a very long time. At no time have we ever submitted in any arguments that we would not work with our industries to manage emissions, to manage pollution, to make sure that we can continue to have the best energy products and other products in this province to be able to sell to the world. We've been committed to that for decades. This government was clear in our platform that we will remain committed to that for decades to come.

But it's important to understand the contrast. Our vision when it comes to this important file is to continue to embrace that entrepreneurial spirit, to continue to stand with innovators inside our province, to make sure that we have a path forward to lower emissions and lower pollution inside our province, Mr. Speaker. The NDP and their allies like Justin Trudeau and their federal leader have a different vision, which is to tax everyday Albertans – hockey moms and hockey dads, seniors, people on fixed incomes – to tax our municipalities, to tax our schools, to tax legions, to tax on and on and on. We reject that approach. We will continue to reject that approach going forward.

So today I'm bringing forward second reading of a piece of legislation that allows us to continue the great tradition in this province of being able to continue to develop our products in the most environmentally friendly way so that we can sell them to the world, Mr. Speaker, by again being hand in hand with technology and innovation.

You know, yesterday I had the privilege of speaking at an Emission Reductions Alberta event here in Edmonton. We announced two important projects that I think really illustrate what we're talking about. We announced $10 million in funding for two different organizations. One is CarbonCure, who's bringing in a way to use carbon dioxide to turn it into valuable chemicals, to take the by-product of some of the other products that we're already building inside this province and then go and make it valuable and turn it into chemicals that they can sell. All the while, we're reducing emissions. In their case, they anticipate saving 530 tonnes of emissions by the year 2030 in this province and are expected to save – and I think this is very impressive – a staggering 554 million litres of water a year.

That's innovation. That's technology. That's a positive result, Mr. Speaker, that benefits this province, that not only benefits the environment but creates industrial activity, creates jobs for people, and creates an opportunity where we can then, in turn, sell that product to the world to benefit others across the globe.

That's a big difference from what the former government did, bringing in a tax on places – I often liked to talk about, Mr. Speaker, as you know, when I was in opposition, the impact that the carbon tax that the NDP brought in had on my constituents. One of the stories I often liked to tell was what happened to the West Country seniors' centre right inside my constituency. I know that you know the story, but it's worth repeating quickly. This is a seniors' centre that was completely self-funded by the seniors that used it, created a recreation opportunity for the people in my community. The now Premier and I visited it a couple of times in opposition. You know, they almost shut down because the NDP's carbon tax on their heat caused them not to be able to afford to pay the bills, and they were going to lose the opportunity.

That's a contrast: a tax that you can put on seniors that cost them losing the place where they could recreate, a thing that has social value to the communities that we live in, or something like CarbonCure, who can actually invest in technologies that create jobs, that reduce emissions but create value as we go forward.

The second part of that announcement was for an organization called Mangrove Water Technologies. They have some technology which has the potential to reduce 1.4 million tonnes of emissions by 2030 in the province of Alberta alone and to open well over a hundred concrete plants, Mr. Speaker, here in Alberta and well over a thousand across the globe, working with technology that would take carbon dioxide and put it into concrete, one of the most used if not the most used construction products inside the province.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will submit to you: does it make more sense to go the new Alberta government's way, to partner with people that have innovative ability like that and technology like that, that can create such value, even beyond environmental value? Environmental value is obviously the key part of what we're trying to accomplish here, but with projects like this we're going beyond that. We're creating jobs. We're creating industrial activity. We're creating economic growth right here inside this province.

That's why the Premier and our party put inside our platform the TIER program. We recognized that Alberta wanted to continue to be a leader when it came to emission reduction inside our province. We wanted to continue to be a leader so that we were able to sell our products to global markets but, second, because we wanted to protect our environment in this province. That's why we've been a leader from day one on this. Nobody can do it better than Alberta, Mr. Speaker. We have it right here. We have the answers to these questions right here, and with TIER we're creating an environment where our industrial activity, our energy partners, and other industries can partner with the Alberta government to actually make meaningful change when it comes to this.

Now, in the coming days you will hear from the opposition, who will continue to tout their job-killing carbon tax as the way forward on this, Mr. Speaker. We will continue to reject it. They will continue to stand and say that their process reduced more emissions, but interestingly enough, the process that I have submitted to this Chamber and, if the Chamber supports it, that will become the law in this province ends up almost with the exact same emission reductions when it comes to the program. When you take the technology investment that will come with the fund outside of TIER, we surpass the NDP's projections, pointing upwards of 57 megatonnes of reduction all the while without nickeling and diming Albertans. Fifty-seven megatonnes by 2030 is not something to shake your head at. It's a significant accomplishment for our province, but again when you look at it hand in hand with inventing technologies that we can sell to the world and creating economic growth inside our province, it's a win-win. I certainly do hope that the hon. members take the time to support it.

One of the other components of TIER that I think is worth mentioning to the hon. members as I ask for their support of Bill 19 is this. When we started the consultation process about our platform promise around TIER, the Minister of Energy joined me as well as the minister of agriculture. Both of them have people within their scopes that fit within the 127 large emitters inside the province of Alberta. We had long consultations with the industry, one-on-ones as well as group meetings where we had conversations, and the one thing I heard consistently from every industry and everyone in it was that they wanted to be regulated in the province of Alberta. They wanted Alberta to decide our future.

They did not trust Justin Trudeau to decide the future, Mr. Speaker. Who could blame them? If you've seen the results and the rhetoric that have come from the Prime Minister and the people around him during this campaign, if you've seen the comments from the federal leader of the opposition party who is anti-oil and gas – he's not ashamed to say it. I know they try to not acknowledge what he's been saying, but he's not ashamed to say it. He wants to block our pipelines, wants to block our energy industry from doing it. Can you really blame our industry for saying to us, "We want to regulate here; we want to stand with you, be a partner in being able to tackle this problem in a made-in-Alberta way"? So we worked hard to make sure that we can accomplish that for our industry, to provide them the stability that they need to start to bring investment back to this province, investment that was forced out by the NDP government, to create a stable situation for that investment activity to take place.

We also have 34,000 conventional oil and gas facilities in this province that did not fall into the large emitter program for the 127 people that has existed in this province for a very long time, who are now in a spot that on January 1 they could have been brought in underneath the federal backstop on the industrial side. Those organizations were loud and clear saying that they want to work in an Alberta regulatory regime. We've worked hard, Mr. Speaker, to make sure that we can protect our industry, because we're proud of it, from Justin Trudeau and his friends in Ottawa, who we know have sworn in some cases to completely destroy that industry.

Mr. Speaker, one of the shocking things that I found when I took over the portfolio as minister of the environment – and I know that many of my colleagues in this Chamber probably found the same – was that when you begin to work through your budget numbers and understand what the NDP had done, of course, as you know, we began to find out that the projections that the NDP had presented to the province were misrepresented, certainly, in the campaign. We had an economic situation in this province that was significantly worse than the former Premier and her party had presented to Albertans, so we began to sit down to try to figure out how we were going to work through that process.

I can tell you that the biggest thing – and I think that every minister will agree with this – is that the NDP's climate leadership plan, their carbon tax, has nothing to do with the environment. We've often stood in this place and talked about it being all economic pain and no environmental gain. It was weaved all though the budget, be it spent on projects – and some of those projects may have had value for the people who were involved with them – that certainly were not reducing emissions, that certainly were not going to help people with the environment, Mr. Speaker. [interjections] I hear them heckle about that. That's what they did. That's what they did.

I once watched you, Mr. Speaker, give a speech about that very thing when you sat inside the opposition benches, pointing out what I think we used to affectionately, or nonaffectionately, refer to as the orange slush fund. We confirmed it when we became government. One of the first things we had to do was unravel that situation, and that stayed with me. It stayed with me that no matter what solution we bring forward, we have to make sure that it's dedicated to solving the problem. We have to be transparent with Albertans. We campaigned on saying that we would use some of this resource to be able to reduce the deficit that the NDP created, to reduce the debt problems that the NDP created.

With this piece of legislation, we make it clear. We make it clear which part, very transparently, will be invested in technology that will help us reduce emissions, and we make it clear which part will help reduce the deficit, which will ultimately, Mr. Speaker, help the very industries that are helping to pay into this fund.

I want to assure Albertans through you that we will not do what the NDP did. We will not create slush funds and pretend that we are dealing with the environment like they did, Mr. Speaker. We will not create that to go to special interest projects that they had. We will be transparent with Albertans, and that's what ultimately the legislation that is in front of this Chamber does. It renames certain funds to make it clear what the program is for, and it allows funds to be used for the reasons that we stated.

Ultimately, TIER itself will be primarily handled through a regulation, and we are releasing that at the same time as this legislation because they have to work hand in hand together, Mr. Speaker, but at the end of the day, the legislation that I'm asking the Chamber to pass, at its core, is to be transparent with Albertans and show them how we're going to utilize this resource going forward.

Mr. Speaker, I'm not going to spend too much more time on this today except to talk about what I think is one of the most important issues when it comes to this file. The reality is, as we all know, that the GHG emissions and the environmental impact of our industry inside this province are not significant on a global scale. That is a reality. That doesn't mean – and I've been clear in my opening remarks – that we should not be working to clean up our environment or to make sure that we're producing products in an environmentally friendly way. Alberta has a long and successful history of leading the way on this file, but the reality is that if people want to have the biggest impact when it comes to global emissions, the solution is right here in this province. The solution is our clean natural gas. That is the conversation that we must have when it comes to our energy industry. The problem that people are identifying that they want fixed when it comes to emissions: Alberta can solve that world problem. The biggest impact that Alberta can have when it comes to reducing emissions is to get our clean natural gas to Asia and other markets.

Meanwhile, we have Ottawa, who continues to block pipelines, who continues to block us from being able to get our production to other parts of the world, and then we end up, as you know, Mr. Speaker, with a carbon leakage problem, which means that that energy demand is just being filled by other places in the world that don't have the same social standards as us, certainly, and also don't have the same environmental standards as us.

It's important that the rest of this country takes notice, takes notice of the resource that we have here, Mr. Speaker, that can solve the problem. If Prime Minister Trudeau and his federal Liberal government are truly committed to reducing worldwide emissions, they will answer our call to build our pipelines. They will stand beside us as we get our energy to other markets because not only will it help reduce those global emissions, it will help people in some cases who are facing poverty.

It is a benefit to the world that we hold right here, and as we take TIER resources and we continue to invest in technology as it progresses, we'll be able to create even more benefit to the world. So truly – truly – I say to other governments inside this country: if they truly want to tackle global emissions, take notice of what's happening in Alberta, put your money where your mouth is, and let us get our product to market so we can help you tackle emissions on a global scale, and stop blaming the province of Alberta for what is a global problem. It's not acceptable. We have so many opportunities here when we focus on actually trying to solve a problem with means that will solve problems. We can benefit our province compared to the way the NDP processed their carbon tax.

Just a couple of days ago I also celebrated the opening of G4 technologies, a natural gas program, something that Alberta Environment and Parks and my colleague the hon. minister of economic development and trade's department and others have been involved in. They're taking forestry by-products and turning them into clean natural gas and putting it into our existing system so that people can heat their homes. Those are the things that we can accomplish with TIER, Mr. Speaker.

The choice that was before Albertans in April was to continue with the NDP's carbon tax on hockey moms and hockey dads, Mr. Speaker. I know that the opposition often laughs about this, but where I come from, we still have to drive. Their leader once told us to take a bus. There's no bus for my family back home in Sundre to take them to places. We drive. We have to. That's where we live. We have to drive to get to work, we have to drive to bring our kids to school, we have to drive for social events, and we have to drive to get groceries. That's the place that we live. That's the reality.

Taxing people inside my communities on fuel was not having an impact on emissions. We still had to drive. When my wife drives my youngest kids, Austin and Chyanne, and their 4-H calves to the 4-H show, Mr. Speaker, we're not doing that in a Smart car. We have to do it in a truck that tows a trailer. When my neighbour goes out to check on the cows or brings bales to his cows, he's got to do that in a truck. When tradespeople across this province have to drive and go to work, they have to bring their tools. The idea that you can solve this problem this way is ridiculous.

That was a choice that was before Albertans in April, and Albertans – I just want to back up – knew what the NDP's options were. The NDP made it clear. They passed legislation. They implemented the tax inside this province, a tax they promised would go to rebates and different things, but most of our households never received a rebate. They promised it wouldn't go to general revenue. They did put it in general revenue, and on and on. Everybody knows that portion of what the NDP did. But it's important to also know that they know what the current Alberta government promised. The TIER package, that I bring forward in this House today and in the regulation, is exactly what we promised Albertans that we would do, Mr. Speaker. Albertans knew the choice. They had the choice. It was very important to our Premier that he presented those options, and they spoke loud and clear in April, when they fired the NDP and they sent us here to do this job.

Yesterday, when we tabled TIER, Mr. Speaker, was a fulfillment of another campaign promise, at the end of the day, another promise made and another promise kept by this current Alberta government. We will continue to go forward doing the same thing. We will continue to go forward being proud of our industry. We will continue to go forward helping people that want to innovate. We will continue going forward with our technologies that are here, and we will continue to fight to get our clean energy products to the world so we can finally have a significant impact on global pollution, but we can also help people on a global stage with poverty.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you very much, Minister.

On Bill 19 second reading are there any other members wishing to speak? The Member for Calgary . . .

Mr. Schow: Cardston-Siksika. God's country, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: I didn't recognize you with the pork chops there, sir. Go ahead, sir.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I move that we adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

The Acting Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Again, I just want to quickly thank all members of the Assembly and all sides of the aisle for another hard week up here in Edmonton, and as always I wish them safe travels back to their constituencies. I'm just checking the calendar. Sorry, Mr. Speaker; they have October still up. I move to adjourn the House until Monday, November 4, at 1:30 p.m.

[Motion carried. The Assembly adjourned at 3:15 p.m.]

Bill Status Report for the 30th Legislature - 1st Session (2019)

Activity to Thursday, October 31, 2019

The Bill sponsor's name is in brackets following the Bill title. If it is a money Bill, ($) will appear between the title and the sponsor's name. Numbers following each Reading refer to Hansard pages where the text of debates is found; dates for each Reading are in brackets following the page numbers. Bills numbered 1 to 200 are Government Bills. Bills numbered 201 or higher are Private Members' Public Bills. Bills numbered with a "Pr" prefix are Private Bills.

* An asterisk beside a Bill number indicates an amendment was passed to that Bill; the Committee line shows the precise date of the amendment.

The date a Bill comes into force is indicated in square brackets after the date of Royal Assent. If a Bill comes into force "on proclamation," "with exceptions," or "on various dates," please contact Legislative Counsel, Alberta Justice, for details at 780.427.2217. The chapter number assigned to the Bill is entered immediately following the date the Bill comes into force. SA indicates Statutes of Alberta; this is followed by the year in which it is included in the statutes, and its chapter number. Please note, Private Bills are not assigned chapter number until the conclusion of the Fall Sitzings.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Monday, November 4, 2019

Prayers

The Speaker: Hon. members, the prayer. Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and her government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideas but, laying aside all private interest and prejudice, keep in mind the responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all. Amen.

Hon. members, ladies and gentlemen, we will now be led in the singing of our national anthem by Mr. Peter Matthew Neil McMillan. I would invite you all to join us in the language of your choice.

Hon. Members:

O Canada, our home and native land!
True patriot love in all of us command.
With glowing hearts we see thee rise,
The True North strong and free!
From far and wide, O Canada,
We stand on guard for thee.
God keep our land glorious and free!
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.

The Speaker: Please be seated.

Introduction of Visitors

The Speaker: Hon. members, it is my absolute honour and pleasure today to welcome a number of visitors to the Legislative Assembly. A familiar face to this Assembly is the former Member for Calgary-Elbow Mr. Greg Clark.

Also in the gallery this afternoon is the Minister of Agriculture and Resource Development from our good friends just to the east, the province of Manitoba, the Hon. Blaine Pedersen.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Hon. members, we have a number of folks joining us in the galleries this afternoon. If you are in the gallery and you hear the name of your group called, I invite you to rise and receive the welcome of the Assembly.

From Edmonton-Whitemud, please welcome the School at the Leg. group, Earl Buxton elementary.

From Edmonton-Strathcona: St. Martin Catholic school.

Also joining us in the gallery today is a group of 20 hard-working public service employees from the Ministry of Finance and Treasury Board. Thank you so much for joining us and for all you do.

Lastly for this group of introductions, hon. members, I am very pleased to introduce to you 32 teachers from across the province who are forming the first-ever Teachers Institute on parliamentary democracy. I invite you all to rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Hon. members, our anthem singer this afternoon is a constituent of the Member for Calgary-Buffalo, Mr. Matthew McMillan. He applied to lead the Assembly in O Canada because of the work that he does with Canada's Cadet Organizations. As a naval lieutenant and cadet instructor Matthew works with the royal Canadian sea corps Undaunted, where youth 12 to 18 learn healthy living, Canada's military traditions, and citizenship. He notes that every Tuesday his corps sings O Canada before their training, something that has been done by Undaunted for over a decade. It was a natural extension for him to lead us today. While not predating the province, Undaunted is one of the country's oldest sea cadet corps, and it is celebrating its 100th anniversary this year. Great job, Matthew.

Also in the galleries this afternoon are guests of the Minister of Health, here for the annual rural residents in the Legislature event. There are 12 members and four staff of the PARA, the Professional Association of Resident Physicians of Alberta.

Joining the Minister of Advanced Education are members of the University of Calgary Students Union.

Lastly, welcome Todd Banks, a guest of the Member for Sherwood Park.

Hon. members, ladies and gentlemen: your guests.

Ministerial Statements

Family Violence Prevention Month

Mrs. Sawhney: Mr. Speaker, I rise today to say thank you to the hon. members of this House for their support of Family Violence Prevention Month this November. The purple ribbons you are wearing signify what we as a government and we as a province are doing to put an end to family violence and prevent abuse. Many vulnerable Albertans out there need help, but they're unsure of where to turn, and we must do what we can to protect them from harm, to help them feel safe in their homes and to feel safe in their relationships.

Family Violence Prevention Month is an opportunity to raise awareness of what help is available and where to find it, but support does not end when this month ends. We want Albertans to know that help is available all year long. Those experiencing or at risk of family violence can find resources, helplines, online chat, and more at alberta.ca/endafamilyviolence. Our family violence info line is also available 24 hours a day in more than 170 languages. Albertans just need to dial 310.1818 to speak with someone about how to get help in their area.

This government has prioritized putting an end to family violence. Not only have we been working to raise awareness of supports; we have passed legislation to protect people from violence and abuse. Once the Disclosure to Protect Against Domestic Violence (Clare's Law) Act is implemented, people at risk of domestic violence will be able to apply to obtain information about a romantic partner's history of domestic violence. This will empower those at risk to make an informed decision while helping to prevent abuse and potentially saving lives.

These are important issues, which is why I'm thankful for your support this month as we raise awareness of family violence prevention. I hope you will get involved where you can and wear purple to recognize Family Violence Prevention Month. You can also show support on social media with posts and pictures using the hashtag #wheretoturn and #gopurpleab.

Thank you again for keeping Albertans safe. I'm proud to work together with all members of this House to help make life better for our province's most vulnerable people.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for St. Albert to respond on behalf of the Official Opposition.

Ms Renaud: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. I'm thankful for the opportunity to raise the issue of family violence prevention here in this Legislature. Family violence is an immense challenge in Alberta and in Canada. Family violence has devastated many lives. According to the Canadian Women's Foundation 74 per cent of Albertans know of women who have experienced sexual and physical violence and abuse, an obscene number showing how far spread this problem is, particularly because it's still underreported. Elder abuse is a real and growing threat in all of our communities. Disabled Albertans have always faced incredibly high rates of domestic violence, often resulting in death: lest we forget, Betty Anne Gagnon.

Family Violence Prevention Month is important; however, an awareness month and lapel ribbons are meaningless if we as decision-makers do not do the essential work necessary to prevent family violence. That work includes poverty reduction, fair wages, family support, adequate funding for social services. This month we can all spread awareness of how the many tragedies can be prevented and make sure that everyone knows about the supports for survivors of family violence. I hope that all Albertans can have an open conversation about what the root causes are and what we can do to prevent family violence and to support survivors. You don't support survivors by kicking them off supports, like this government is doing, in order to save money.

The statistics are staggering. In 2016 1,984 children and youth were victims of police-reported family violence; 13,896 Albertans were victims of police-reported intimate partner violence. The current supports and prevention programs in our province are not sufficient. In 2017-18 16,722 women, children, and seniors were turned away from shelters due to lack of capacity. We must continue to invest in prevention of family violence and support survivors.

I was very proud that our government invested significant resources in community-based safety programs, prevention services, and supports for people fleeing family violence and in action to address poverty through minimum wage increases and indexing of AISH benefits.

I hope this awareness month will shine a light on the crisis of family violence in Alberta. I want to give the province the promise on behalf of this NDP caucus: we will always stand with survivors, always; we will do everything in our capacity to make life better for all Albertans.

Thank you.

Members' Statements

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Airdrie-East would like to make a statement.

Women Parliamentarians' She Should Run Initiative

Mrs. Pitt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My colleagues and I have a few core beliefs that we all agree on. We believe in helping a neighbour when they need it. We know the importance of teamwork, but we also know the importance of individuality and staying true to oneself. What's common in these beliefs is the belief that nobody should be restricted in the pursuit of their own goals. I know I believe that no one should be held back from opportunities because of who they are or where they came from. When someone decides to run for public office, who they are should be a strength rather than a hesitation when deciding if they should put their name on the ballot.

I am proud today to introduce the She Should Run campaign schools initiative to every member in this House. This publication is an initiative of the Commonwealth Women Parliamentarians, which I serve as Alberta's chair. CWP works as part of the larger Commonwealth Parliamentary Association towards better representation of women in Legislatures across Canada and throughout the Commonwealth. The publication outlines a framework for regional, provincial, and national nonpartisan campaign schools for women. CWP shares a vision of women as equal partners in the Canadian Parliament and in provincial and territorial Legislatures while aiming to increase women's representation in government at every level.

While serving in this House, I have met so many women who should run, but they hesitate or doubt themselves when it comes time to run in a nomination or get involved in the political process. These women are capable and have experiences that would benefit this House and every level of government across the country. Mr. Speaker, she should run, not in spite of who she is but because of it. She should run because she is capable, qualified, and ready to lead.

I urge every member of this House to consider this initiative and share this publication with your constituents.

The Speaker: I recognize the Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Budget 2019

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The following are from the UCP platform; they are promises they ran on, categorized into three pillars: getting Albertans back to work, standing up for Alberta, and making life better for Albertans. Sadly, so far we've lost 27,000 jobs. Not sure which Albertans are getting back to work.

Even before the budget was released, the UCP demonstrated who they were standing up for. Profitable corporations received a $4.7 billion handout. Yes, Mr. Speaker, every government has choices, and this government is clearly making ones that support an elite group.

Now, how about making life better for Albertans? We know Albertans are still hurting. Due to the price shock and continued challenges in the oil and gas sector, many Albertans are still out of work. This is precisely the time when they need support. Significant cuts to affordable housing, education, and infrastructure mean Albertans of today and tomorrow will not have the services they need, quality education for their children, or jobs created through the government's investment in infrastructure. Seniors, members of the disability community, older children in care, and university students will suffer the most under this budget.

This austerity budget, like others around the world, hurts regular people and helps the elite few. When citizens are supported through public programs, they're able to live with dignity, support their families, and contribute to the larger society. Taking away these supports at a time when they are needed the most only makes things worse, Mr. Speaker. Far from making life better, the UCP government is making things worse.

Lynn Davies

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to the late Lynn Davies, who was a community leader in Strathcona county. Community leaders are critical to ensuring Albertan communities are vibrant, lively, and thriving. Lynn Davies' enormous contributions to Strathcona county had such a positive influence.

Lynn had a love for rugby, a passion he brought with him from his home nation of Wales when he arrived in Canada at the age of 22. He made a major impact on the sport in Strathcona county. He was an original team member of the Druids rugby club of Edmonton, founded in 1960, and a founder of the Sherwood Park

Outlaws rugby club, founded in 1990. Due to the leadership of Lynn and fellow Sherwood Park resident Larry Wall, these two teams would merge in 1996, permanently basing the Strathcona Druids Rugby Football Club in Sherwood Park.

Lynn was a tireless advocate for rugby and was instrumental in 1993 in securing rugby facilities in Sherwood Park, which are the Strathcona Druids' facilities today. In 2010 the clubhouse was renamed Lynn Davies rugby park.

Mr. Speaker, over five decades of community service through sport Lynn created a rugby park, established rugby teams, mentored countless players, and founded major Alberta-based rugby tournaments. Most importantly, Lynn left an indelible, warm imprint in the hearts and minds of Strathcona county residents and the Alberta rugby community at large.

Mr. Speaker, Lynn Davies exemplified community leadership. My thoughts and prayers go out to his immediate family: his wife, Lorna, and three children, Jason, Caroline, and Rhys. We will forever miss and always fondly remember Lynn.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West has the call.

Postsecondary Education Budget 2019-2020

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. If you wanted to design a plan to sabotage Alberta's long-term prosperity, it would be tough to do any better than this UCP budget. Its centerpiece is a $4.7 billion corporate giveaway, and we know that money has already been handed over to shareholders and banks and has not created a single job. In fact, more than 27,000 jobs have been lost under this Premier's watch.

That handout was paid in part by cutting funding to our postsecondary institutions and jacking up the tuition that students have to pay to go to school. Our universities are already openly discussing the possibility of staff layoffs and not fixing decaying buildings. For some students a 21 per cent tuition hike means they'll have to leave school carrying a far greater debt load. For others it will mean even dropping out before their degree is completed. For some Albertans, tragically, this wrong-headed move will mean that they'll never be able to go to postsecondary education. That is a loss for all of us because they are innovators, inventors, and talented workers that would have led to our prosperity in decades to come. In the memorable words of Professor Sale of the University of Alberta, this is the kneecapping of a generation.

On top of it all, the Minister of Advanced Education has been telling this House that kneecapping was something that some students even asked for. This is not true, Mr. Speaker. What Alberta's young adults want is an opportunity to reach their full potential and a government that is focused on helping them do that. This government, unfortunately, is throwing those opportunities away and endangering our long-term economic prosperity simply to hand out a failed $4.7 billion no-jobs corporate handout.

The Speaker: Hon. members, prior to proceeding to Oral Question Period, I just might like to note that, as you may have noticed, your Speaker is fully engaged in November this year. Any fines that are levied during the next month will be submittable to a men's mental health charity of your choice.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The Leader of Her Majesty's Official Opposition.

Support for Youth Transitioning out of Care

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, this Premier's $4.7 billion corporate handout is hurting the most vulnerable. Last week we learned that the Premier will claw back financial support for former children in care from the age of 24 to 22. No explanation, a complete reversal of his caucus's position, an absolute betrayal. To the Premier. These young people have suffered more than we can imagine. We promised to care for them. Why is a corporate handout more important to you than the young adults for whom we are all responsible?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services is rising.

Ms Schulz: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our government is prioritizing funding for children and families who are most vulnerable, which is why Children's Services saw an increase of 8.5 per cent in this budget year. Often the most important supports for these young people transitioning out of care are social and emotional. That's why we've maintained the mentorship program, increased the advancing futures program by $1 million. I have to say that it's unfortunate that this is coming from the members opposite, who seriously underfunded basic supports for children and families in care.

Ms Notley: What this government is prioritizing is $4.7 billion to wealthy corporations. We are talking about 500 young people, many living with trauma, addiction, and mental health issues. The Child and Youth Advocate says that this change will hurt young people who need more support, not less. Premier, these traumatized youth live most of their lives in the foster system, taken from their parents, separated from their siblings, and growing up in a revolving door of homes. At the same time that you are giving billions of dollars to corporations, you are putting these kids on the street. What is wrong with you?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The last few months were provided to us as a ministry to look at how we deliver services across the province. What we saw in this particular program was a natural drop-off in support and financial assistance agreements once recipients turn 22. That's for a number of reasons. As the member opposite referenced, these cases are often extremely complex. It's also clear that many of these young adults should be transitioned to begin lifelong support services and mentoring relationships rather than continuing in the child intervention space. My ministry will continue to support young adults as they transition from children in protection into adulthood.

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, this cruel and heartless decision is traumatizing an already traumatized group of people, and you should be ashamed. This weekend I heard directly from tearful and scared child support workers and the young adults for whom they care. They say that this is going to lead to homelessness and even suicide. This is an emergency. Will the Premier support our call for an emergency debate so that he can explain to this House why we can afford $4.7 billion in a corporate handout but not $10 million to protect these young people?

The Speaker: The Minister of Children's Services has the call.

Ms Schulz: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I've said time and time again, we will continue to support the most vulnerable children and families in our province. Given the importance of transitioning young adults out of care and into the adult system, the plan was for caseworkers who have strong relationships with these vulnerable young people to work through the changes over the next number of months as they move from child intervention into adulthood. However, once again the members opposite chose to take to Twitter to play politics and increase fear and uncertainty amongst Albertans while sharing only a small portion of the facts. We will continue to focus on supporting the most . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. the Leader of the Official Opposition.

Police Funding

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, this government has also been in full, cold, heartless spin mode when it comes to police funding, but a reality check is in order: $5 million to $9 million cut from Edmonton police; $13 million cut from Calgary police. This Premier is making police foot the bill for forensic testing, the very tests that solve murders and solve rapes. To the Premier: will he admit here and now that his corporate handout comes at a cost of the very safety of Albertans, that this means fewer officers in our community? Can he be honest just once?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, we are proud of the budget that we put forward. Albertans elected us to get our fiscal house in order, and that is what we are doing right now. In addition to that, we made police funding a priority. Not only are we increasing funding, but we're increasing funding to police to combat organized crime. We said last week that municipalities need to get their fiscal house in order and stop playing games with policing. Albertans want them to fund policing. We'd encourage municipalities to do the same.

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, they are cutting more than $80 million from police over four years in the two big cities alone. The folks over there are intentionally, in a calculated way misleading Albertans. The Premier needs to listen to the Calgary police chief. He says that this budget means, quote, a collective diminishment of capacity. He says that there's nothing left to cut but boots on the ground. Is the Premier calling Calgary's police chief a liar? If not, will he start telling the truth and reverse this minister's devastating cuts to police?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, I've talked to Chief Neufeld, and I also made sure, when I talked to him, that I said clearly that he should talk to his mayor, ask his mayor to fund policing. The municipalities are the ones that set the funding levels for policing. In this budget we made tough decisions, but one of those decisions that we made was to make sure that we continued funding the two police grants that we have. They are fully funded. In addition to that, we found additional money to go after organized crime with additional funding for ALERT. It's time for municipalities to tighten their belts but to fund policing and end the pet projects.

Ms Notley: Well, the people over there are generating fake news. When faced with the truth of his cuts to police in Calgary, the Premier's spokesperson said it was, quote, LOLZ, and denied the funding relationship between the government and the city of Calgary, one that appears in the budget in black and white. LOLZ, Mr. Speaker. Are the Premier and his staff literally laughing out loud as they cut police funding to Calgary during a spike in gun violence?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, to go after illegals guns: that's why we found additional money for ALERT, to make sure we crack down on organized crime.

Mr. Speaker, we've invited all the members opposite to come hear about their legacy on crime. This week we're going to be in Rocky Mountain House to hear about the NDP legacy on rural crime. Will they or will they not come to hear about their record on rural crime? I think that the answer is going to be no, but I want to invite them one last time to come and hear about their record on rural crime.

The Speaker: The Leader of the Official Opposition.

Education Budget 2019-2020

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, this Premier promised to, quote, maintain or increase education funding, yet every single school board is grappling with deep cuts. No funding for 60,000 kids but $4.7 billion for big corporations. Boards are forced to choose between firing teachers or jacking up fees on parents or both. Rocky View school district said that they got $10 million less than what this Premier promised and now, quote, service levels will decrease, and class sizes will be impacted. To the Premier: why did he break yet another promise to Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education is rising.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. As promised during the election, we said that we were going to maintain education funding, and we are maintaining education funding. Every single student that crosses through our doors will be funded, as we said we would do. Promise made, promise kept. [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. members, I have no problem hearing the question; however, I'm having significant difficulty hearing the answer.

Ms Notley: Well, you know what, Mr. Speaker? The member opposite should look up the term "shell game" because she is the queen of it. Elk Island public school district says that the cuts total more than $9 million. Elk Island Catholic schools say that their cut is $2.4 million. With increased enrolment and evolving student needs, Elk Island public says that it will have to make, quote, difficult choices, which means that they may have to fire teachers. This is the exact opposite of what this Premier promised in the last election. Premier, tell the truth. Why are you cutting funding to kids in school just so you can pay for a $4.7 billion corporate handout?

Member LaGrange: Well, Mr. Speaker, over 98 per cent of the Education budget flows directly to the school authorities, who deliver the services to our students. By reallocating restrictive grant funding and eliminating reporting requirements, we have reduced red tape and provided school boards with the additional flexibility to meet their local priorities. Education remains a top priority. It will always remain a top priority for this government.

Ms Notley: I urge the minister to speak to school boards. St. Albert public says that they will have $4.6 million less next year alone, all while more kids walk through the door. How can the minister not understand it? They say, quote: a funding cut of this size cannot be managed without adjusting staffing levels and classroom sizes. They will have to fire teachers and EAs. There is no choice. Mr. Speaker, the Premier can't pretend he wasn't briefed on this. Come clean: how many Alberta teachers are going to be fired because of this government's broken-promise budget?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education has risen.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. We continue to invest $8.223 billion in education every year. We invested that much last year. We're investing this much this year as well. Budget 2019 clearly highlights that. The NDP continue to smear and fear when, in fact, they were wrong on the nutrition program funding, they were wrong on enrolment growth funding, and they were wrong on the overall budget. We are maintaining . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order. The hon. Minister of Education was nearly finished her answer. I'm not sure if she has anything to respond with, but I certainly couldn't hear the end of it.

Go ahead if you would like.

Member LaGrange: Sure. I would just continue along to say that we are continuing to invest in education. It is a huge priority for us. Our boards have said continually that they want sustainable, predictable funding, and that's . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud has the call.

Support for Youth Transitioning out of Care (continued)

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This morning I had the pleasure of meeting an incredible young woman named Shyannah Sinclair. Shyannah grew up in government care and has overcome many, many obstacles. She has a four-year-old daughter and a plan she made years ago to finish school and pursue her career passions by the time she's 24. Now her future is in jeopardy because of this government's heartless cuts to the support and financial assistance agreement program. To the Premier: explain to Shyannah and 500 other young adults about to lose this critical support why you don't seem to care about their future.

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services has risen.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As I said in my previous response, we are committed to supporting those most vulnerable in our province instead of creating fear and uncertainty on social media, on Twitter, allowing these young people to work with their caseworkers to transition. Examples like this are exactly why we increased funding to the advancing futures program, which provides supports not only for postsecondary but also for living expenses while former children in care are accessing postsecondary education. We will continue to support these young people transitioning into adulthood.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Minister, you need to listen to the young people who are talking to you. Their lives are at stake. This government willingly gave over $4.7 billion to big corporations and boasted about it. I'm not sure why given that it hasn't created a single job. Then they snuck in the cuts to SFAA, and it was only after being grilled in estimates this week that the minister admitted she'd made this terrible, cruel cut. To the Premier: did you hide this cut because you knew just how awful it was?

Ms Schulz: In typical fashion of the member opposite, the over-the-top rhetoric is completely false. Mr. Speaker, this plan is certainly under way in advance of the next budget year. That's why caseworkers will be reaching out to these young adults who are transitioning out of the child intervention system and into adult programs. We also know that many of these young people in this group will better receive supports in the adult programs that best meet their unique needs.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, again. We're hearing from outreach workers and young people themselves that their lives are at stake. That is not fearmongering. That is fact. Thank you. Joining Shyannah and me this morning was long-time outreach worker Wallis Kendal. Wallis knows what he's talking about. He's a long-time outreach worker and said that one of his clients is putting off addictions treatment while figuring out how to deal with these cuts. Wallis said, and this is a quote: the only thing that changes a youth's future is knowing that they have a future. To the Premier: last chance; will you give these young adults a future and reverse these cruel cuts immediately?

The Speaker: The Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. We will continue to empower our front-line caseworkers to work to support young adults who are transitioning out of child intervention . . .

Ms Notley: There's no money for that. You gave it to Husky.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Point of order.

Ms Schulz: . . . and into adult services that better meet their needs.

Mr. Speaker, we're also working with community partners to identify how we can better support these young adults as they transition out of the system. I won't take lessons from the members opposite, who didn't even fully fund child intervention services. But I can tell you that we're doing the right thing. We are funding the encumbrance from last year to support vulnerable kids and families, and funding increases will remain for Children's Services over the next four years.

Rural Health Care

Mr. Long: Mr. Speaker, in the constituency of West Yellowhead we have several communities with fully functional hospitals, but due to the distance between communities these hospitals need to be able to service a population often much larger than the town itself. In 1966 the Whitecourt health centre opened, with the ability to service the then population of 2,200. Since that time the health centre is serving more than 10 times that initial population. To the Minister of Health: why has the town of Whitecourt not received an upgrade to the health centre or additional facilities since 1966?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Health.

Mr. Shandro: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I understand the capacity challenges in Whitecourt and across the province as well. We're dealing with those challenges as best we can as a government given the fiscal mess we were left with after four years of the NDP. We've had to make some tough decisions on capital projects to slow the growth of debt which we leave to the next generation. There has been some investment and some upgrades to the Whitecourt health centre, including a new renal dialysis unit. Alberta Infrastructure's facility condition assessment report does rate the facility as being in good condition.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for West Yellowhead.

Mr. Long: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you, Minister. Given that the current lab system in the Whitecourt hospital is only on an interim accreditation status and given the incredible lack of storage, meeting, and work space and given that we are all aware that our government must show fiscal restraint after 12 of the past 13 years of government not balancing the budget, how is the minister going to ensure that rural communities and their health needs are a priority for this government?

The Speaker: The Minister of Health is rising.

Mr. Shandro: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. AHS has identified the lab as a priority in Whitecourt, and planning is under way for upgrades. As the member points out, there are unique challenges in delivering rural health care. We're increasing access to primary care by funding 30 new nurse practitioners, almost all of them outside of Edmonton and Calgary. We're also working with AHS to increase telehealth and other solutions for remote areas, including the most advanced model in Canada for on-scene treatment of heart attacks by paramedics.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Long: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that Whitecourt was promised a new health centre as early as 1993 and again in 2012 and given that as I talk to many rural MLAs, I'm hearing similar stories of inadequate health service delivery and given that rural communities do contribute immensely to our provincial GDP and just want to have the services they require, what is the Minister of Health doing to ensure that rural communities receive comparable quality and access to health care as Albertans in Edmonton and Calgary?

The Speaker: The Minister of Health.

Mr. Shandro: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The basic challenges in health care are the same across the province, primary care and system capacity. We're going to keep investing in primary care through the nurse practitioners, that I mentioned, and other initiatives as well like increasing access to midwifery, and we're going to increase system capacity by adding new continuing care beds through the successful ASLI partnership with our continuing care providers. The AHS review as well is going to help find savings to reinvest in increasing capacity. A great example of the kind of change we need is our recent decision to expand the scope of practice for LPNs.

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-Buffalo has a question.

Municipal Funding

Member Ceci: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. A little over an hour ago the mayors of Calgary and Edmonton and the presidents of the Alberta Urban Municipalities Association and the Rural Municipalities of Alberta issued a statement expressing deep concern with changes to their funding under the UCP government's budget. I'll table that statement shortly. They state that their "funding will grow at only half the rate of provincial revenue each year." Bluntly, they say that municipalities will be left behind. To the minister: why are you leaving municipalities in the dust while racing ahead with your – wait for it – $4.7 billion giveaway to big corporations?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. Madu: Thank you so much, Mr. Speaker. Let me be clear. We have been working very closely with our municipal partners to come forward with a framework that they have been asking for years. We will not at any point in time take instruction from these members opposite. They left us – I think the question they should be asking themselves is: why is it that after four years we are now dealing with more than $60 billion in debt? I know that the members opposite have no idea how to make money, but they know how to spend money.

Member Ceci: Given that we'll get to the framework in a second and given that we already know that this government snuck a clause into their omnibus legislation, Bill 20, that could very well kill the green line LRT in Calgary and the valley line LRT in Edmonton and given that the Premier had previously committed to both of these projects but now seems to be backing away from that commitment, to the Premier or the minister: commit here and now that both LRT lines will be built and opened on time. If you won't commit, what are you hiding?

Mr. McIver: Well, Mr. Speaker, part of our election campaign was to commit to the funding committed for the Calgary and Edmonton LRTs. That's $1.53 billion for Calgary, $1.47 billion for Edmonton. If the hon. member simply checks a clause of the legislation that's before the House right now, he will realize that that's a promise made and a promise kept.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo will know he has another question, so I'm sure he's happy to ask it now.

Member Ceci: Thank you kindly, Mr. Speaker. Given that Barry Morishita, the AUMA president, said that his organization is "extremely disappointed" that a UCP election promise was broken with the repeal of the City Charters Fiscal Framework Act and given that Edmonton's mayor, Don Iveson, says that the role of municipalities has been lessened by this government as a result of the fiscal framework changes, to the minister. You continue to disrespect our municipal leaders and countless other Alberta organizations. Is it true that you have to be a really big, profitable organization to get any time with this government?

Mr. Madu: Mr. Speaker, I am going to read a quote from the AUMA president: our members have already been doing a lot to help the province meet its goals, and this budget is the impetus for the next stage of that particular work. A second quote from the AUMA president: the government of Alberta's announcement of a new local government fiscal framework represents continued support and collaboration between the province and the municipalities. I think what is hard for the members opposite to understand is that we are not going to continue to fund the infrastructure of tomorrow if we embark on the multibillion-dollar ...

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Edmonton-North West.

Postsecondary Education Budget 2019-2020

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The president of MacEwan University said last week about this UCP's terrible postsecondary budget, and I quote: it's certainly the largest in-year reduction to the budget I've ever seen; with these levels of reduction to our funding, we will have to reduce our staff levels. Some reports indicate that a hundred or more positions will be lost at MacEwan alone. Can the Minister of Advanced Education please explain to students at MacEwan why there's no money for professors but there are billions available for big corporations?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaides: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. We're just in the beginning of working with our students and postsecondary leaders to fundamentally transform postsecondary funding in the province of Alberta. The current model that we have is, quite frankly, quite antiquated and outdated. Our institutions deserve much more clarity and predictability in terms of funding from government. It's something that I know our institutions have been asking for and that our students have been asking for as well, and I believe we have the opportunity now to correct that problem.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you. Well, you know, given that funding postsecondary education is neither antiquated nor inappropriate and given that in addition to hiking tuition and slashing funding, this minister is also removing 100 per cent of MacEwan's infrastructure maintenance, can the minister please explain to students at MacEwan why there's no money to replace aging buildings on campus but billions available for big corporations?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaides: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think, as I already stated in this House, the capital maintenance and renewal budget is suspended for this year and this year alone. That budget will come back online in subsequent years so that our institutions have the funding that they need in order to continue on with capital maintenance and renewal programs, that are important for their individual institutions.

You know, Mr. Speaker, the member opposite just wants to gloss over the problem. Over the last 15 years we have had a 106 per cent increase in funding to our institutions while enrolment has only increased at 21 per cent. It's not sustainable. We need a better way.

Mr. Eggen: Mr. Speaker, I mean, given that funding postsecondary education is not glossing over postsecondary education and given that the minister sat in cabinet while it was agreed to dole out billions for a no-jobs corporate handout but couldn't even bother to speak up for something as petty as adding interest to student loans or fixing buildings in our universities, to the minister: why did you not speak up for our postsecondary students? Or did the Premier simply not listen to you?

Mr. Nicolaides: Mr. Speaker, the member opposite is mistaken. I didn't say that funding is glossing over; I said that he and the members opposite were glossing over the problems. They avoided dealing with the problem. They didn't want to address it at all, which is why we have to address the problem now. Under their leadership we saw a postsecondary system that is rudderless, that is driving costs through the roof. It costs us $36,000 per student compared to B.C., which is $31,000, and $21,000 in Ontario. He wants to quote the president of Grant MacEwan. I'll quote the former president of Grant MacEwan, who said that the ongoing tuition freeze is like being stoned to death with popcorn.

Public Safety and Justice Administration

Mr. Toor: Mr. Speaker, my constituents have been concerned about the increase in violence in northeast Calgary for some time. At the same time, we have seen the city of Calgary cut back on funding to the police, and residents of my community are concerned there will be fewer police officers on the street. Can the Justice minister tell this House what steps are being taken to address any budgetary constraints while ensuring that my constituents have a justice system that protects victims and prosecutes criminals?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, we were shocked at the neglect in the justice system when we came to office. Programs like MS-DOS are being used in the justice system, a program developed in 1981, when I was two years old. We still use fax machines as one of the most efficient ways – let me say that again; one of the most efficient ways – to file documents in the justice system. It is simply shocking. We're making a historic investment to update our courts. Also, the 25 prosecutors that the NDP promised weren't there. We have to hire that backlog and then hire 50 more prosecutors.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Falconridge.

Mr. Toor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister. Given that I have heard from my responsible and legal firearms owners that they are worried about comments made by a member of city council, who has expressed his desire to ban handguns in the city of Calgary, and given that the vast majority of crimes are committed with illegal guns, many of which are smuggled from the United States, can the minister tell the Assembly what steps our government is taking to protect legal firearms owners while prosecuting criminals?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, we need to crack down on illegal guns in Alberta. That's why we've increased funding to the Alberta law enforcement response teams. They've done amazing work getting guns and drugs off the street and cracking down on crime. They work in collaboration with our local law enforcement officials. I'm proud of the work the Alberta law enforcement response teams do. That's why even in these tough times we found additional money for policing, to go after organized crime, and to get those illegal guns off our streets.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Toor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that Calgary has seen property crime increase, especially around the new drug consumption sites, and given that these kinds of crimes erode people's trust in society and in the government, can the Justice minister tell the Assembly what this government is doing to ensure that every Albertan feels safe and secure?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, public safety is the foundation of our democracy. While I have the honour to serve in this role, I will not relent in speaking up for law-abiding Albertans. Also, we continue to go out and talk to Albertans across this province about their frustrations with the justice system. I will continue to be their voice to make sure that we bring reasonable steps forward. Their voice is resulting in new policies here that will keep Albertans safe.

Film and Television Industry Support

Mr. Bilous: Mr. Speaker, Alberta's film industry is speaking out against this UCP government's budget. Local producers are warning that cuts to the screen-based production grants will force productions to leave our province. Last week HGTV productions announced that they will be moving to British Columbia, after operating in Alberta for over 37 years, because this UCP government misled Albertans about diversifying the economy. Can the minister of economic development and trade clarify why she's turning her back on the film industry just to pursue a no-jobs corporate handout?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Economic Development, Trade and Tourism.

Ms Fir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our government committed to implementing a filming tax credit in our election platform. We committed to that. A tax credit provides long-term stability and will help to attract large-scale productions. Converting the screen production grant into a tax credit brings us more in line with the incentives offered by other provinces.

Mr. Bilous: You're screwing up both.

Given that one film producer recently went as far as to say that this UCP budget will kill the film industry in Alberta and given that, unlike here in Alberta, the provincial governments of Manitoba and B.C. are actually working to grow and support their film industries, can the minister please tell this House when she will start working to grow Alberta's film industry and stop handing Alberta jobs to Manitoba and B.C.?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Economic Development, Trade and Tourism.

Ms Fir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We are maintaining $45 million in funding while transitioning from the screen production grant to the film and television tax credit. The proposed film and television tax credit will be part of our commitment to grow Alberta's cultural industries by 25 per cent over the next decade.

Mr. Bilous: Given that the Alberta film industry generates returns of $4.50 for every dollar invested and given that in 2017 film and TV productions created 5,350 direct and spinoff full-time jobs, Mr. Speaker, through you to the minister: I would have thought supporting a diversified economy would be your job, but if you won't do that, would you please stop destroying the industries that we already have here in Alberta?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Economic Development, Trade and Tourism.

Ms Fir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The previous $45 million screen-based production grant program was severely mismanaged by the NDP. In fact, former NDP MLA Craig Coolahan said that the NDP screwed it up. After evaluating the program, we learned that $92 million had already been committed in screen-based grants by the NDP, $21 million of which was committed to mere days before the election call.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Lethbridge-West.

Public Service Pension Fund Administration

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Can the Minister of Finance confirm whether he is abolishing joint governance for the special forces pension plan that covers police officers?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, we are working to strengthen our pension plans in this province. We are taking concrete moves to eliminate redundancies and improve efficiencies. This move will strengthen pensions. It will strengthen and reduce risk for pension holders, and it will return value for both pension holders and Albertans.

Ms Phillips: Sounds like a yes.

Given that the Alberta teachers' retirement fund has been jointly governed since 1939 and given that this minister gave his word in estimates that he would produce the business case prepared by Treasury Board and the business case prepared by AIMCo that support his decision to move the ATRF into AIMCo, will the minister confirm that he will provide these documents to this House and to the boards of ATRF, LAPP, special forces plan, and PSPP?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, we will provide the business case that we've used to make these decisions, but what's really important here is that we are taking, again, concrete moves that will improve and strengthen pensions, that will reduce risk for pension holders, that will reduce costs for Albertans. The previous government did not pay attention to finding efficiencies, reducing risk. They were a government that brought additional risk onto Albertans with virtually every move they made. We will not make that mistake.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, given that the minister just now didn't commit to sharing a Treasury Board and Finance business case, only from AIMCo, and given that this government has made a number of partisan and ideological moves under the guise of professional public service, will the Minister of Finance also produce to this House the written professional advice he has received from Treasury Board and Finance officials regarding repealing joint governance for the various pension funds paid into by teachers, firefighters, police, nurses, municipal workers, corrections officers, and many, many more; in all, a quarter of a million Albertans?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, again, we are making moves that will improve the returns for pension holders in this province. We are making moves that will reduce the risk for Albertans and pension holders. We are making moves that will bring fiscal responsibility to this province. Albertans elected this government to bring this province to balance, to manage its resources responsibly. That is what we're doing. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Fish Creek has the call.

Community Grant Programs

Mr. Gotfried: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. School parent councils, community groups, and other local nonprofits benefit greatly from access to various grants under the community facility enhancement program and community initiatives program. These programs, funded primarily from lottery and gaming proceeds, ensure that these all-important organizations can complement community grassroots fundraising to ensure their ability to undertake meaningful and impactful projects in their communities. To the minister: will CFEP and CIP continue to be funded by lottery funds, and will such funds continue to be segregated from general revenues?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Culture, Multiculturalism and Status of Women.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. The lottery fund is being moved into the general revenue, and lottery dollars will actually continue to flow through CIP and CFEP funds. We're continuing to invest as always into the arts and culture and into communities, and the process that you actually apply with will continue to be the same. Organizations that are conducting charitable casino events will still receive 15 per cent of the proceeds generated from slot machines in charitable casinos.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Calgary-Fish Creek.

Mr. Gotfried: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that Albertans rejected the overspending ways of a one-term NDP government and given that Albertans embraced this government's compassionate but responsible leadership and given that this government recognizes that the entrepreneurial and volunteer spirit of Albertans flows freely into the nonprofit sector, can the minister inform Albertans on how this government will continue to strengthen and expand those partnerships with lean, mean, and passionate community and nonprofit groups in building community capacity and an enviable civil society? [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Hon. members, I know that I usually have a hard time hearing the answer, but in this case I actually had a hard time hearing the question, if you can believe it.

The hon. minister for culture has the call.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Me too.

I was going to say that the ministry continues. What we want to do is be able to elevate nonprofits by strengthening their management and operational capacities. We have this amazing department. They support facilitation and training and leadership and skill development. In fact, we were really honoured this last week to be able to put some dollars towards a really, really great group of people. It's called Free Footie. You might know who they are. This funding actually goes towards helping especially new Canadians and refugee children.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Gotfried: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the community facility enhancement program and community initiative program are effective, impactful, and generally well leveraged against private donor funding, which the members opposite tried to send out of this province, and given that the recent budget focuses on balancing fiscal prudence with compassionate investment and given that funding stability and predictability are essential in building community capacity, expertise, and impact, can the minister further share her long-range vision for these partnerships and the future of these granting programs so that I may share this with my constituents in Calgary-Fish Creek?

2:30

The Speaker: The hon. the minister of culture and multiculturalism.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, and thank you for the opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to be able to dispel some of the fear and the concerns that are going on. As per usual, people will be able to apply for these funds as they have been before. A lot of the not-for-profits were caught up in a lot of bureaucratic red tape, so we've been really, really fortunate to be able to change that to e-transfer. It's a difference of sometimes six months in getting dollars into particular funds and making sure that we're building capacity right away.

Again, in the summer we were able to work with Ken Goosen – he's the producer of GlobalFest – who works with vulnerable children. Our community is really happy and honoured to work with these folks.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Indigenous Relations Budget 2019-2020

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This budget is deeply unfair to the indigenous people of Alberta. The Ministry of Indigenous Relations will oversee a 36 per cent cut to supports and services, and this government has undertaken this cut while touting a $4.5 billion corporate giveaway that hasn't created a single job. Can the Minister of Indigenous Relations please explain why Alberta's indigenous people are being asked to do more with less and to pay for a jobless corporate giveaway?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, I'm proud to be part of a government who's working so hard to build a relationship with indigenous communities all across this province. I was proud to sit with the Premier when he brought leaders from every indigenous community across the province to Government House at the beginning of his mandate to have what was really a historical meeting, that unfortunately the NDP had stopped. I assure you that our government will continue to work hard to build our partnerships with indigenous communities all across this province to make sure that they can share in our joint prosperity.

Mr. Feehan: Given that in black and white on page 144 the fiscal plan shows the $4.7 billion giveaway and given that this government eliminated the indigenous climate leadership program, which has been accessed by all 48 First Nations and all eight Métis settlements, can the Minister of Indigenous Relations explain why he's eliminating this program, which provided a clear reflection of indigenous values on the environment? Is it just so that you can pay for the jobless corporate tax giveaway that you're championing?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, we heard clearly from indigenous communities all across the province that they want to be partners with us in prosperity. That's why we started the indigenous opportunities corporation. We're proud of that. In fact, what I've heard from indigenous leadership is that they're happy that the NDP government is gone now and that there is a government currently in power inside Alberta that is working toward shared prosperity, standing up for our energy industry. One thing I heard clearly from many chiefs is how disappointed they were in the former government, who did not stand up for our energy industry and did not stand up for joint prosperity, in fact even voted against pipelines.

Mr. Feehan: Mr. Speaker, given that we also know that the indigenous housing capital program has been eliminated and given that, as my colleagues have pointed out, supports for indigenous children in care are also being cut off earlier and given that while the minister continues to offer buzzwords and platitudes with no real action, funding cuts have eliminated programs and reduced supports in areas where we need the most support, can you please explain why it seems that indigenous people are among those paying for your failed corporate giveaway experiment?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, I'm proud to be part of a government that has an indigenous affairs minister like we do, one who is completely dedicated to working with indigenous communities across the province. He's done an excellent job. Our government is proud of him. He's travelled north to south, east to west to meet with indigenous communities from all across this province, working towards joint prosperity.

I see the hon. member has not bothered to answer for why he stopped having those joint meetings with the indigenous communities across the province, and our government had to restart them. The reality is this. We're proud of our indigenous affairs minister. We'll continue to work towards building our relationship with indigenous communities all across this province.

Marshall House Emergency Shelter in Fort McMurray

Ms Renaud: The Marshall House emergency shelter in Fort McMurray has been closed by the Minister of Community and Social Services. This comes on top of the government's cancellation of rent supplements, which will mean a cold winter for many Wood Buffalo residents. Marshall House is the only shelter in the area that will take people who are intoxicated, and now those struggling individuals have nowhere to go. To the minister: why would a government claiming to care about the opioid epidemic push addicts into the streets while giving corporations a $4.7 billion gift?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions.

Mr. Luan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our government takes helping Albertans seriously, and we are rolling out a comprehensive mental health and addiction strategy that includes people who are suffering from homelessness. As of this morning we announced that we're appointing a new advisory committee. We're rolling out our $140 million commitment. That will include helping people who are struggling in homeless shelters and other places. We are taking a comprehensive approach in attacking this issue.

Ms Renaud: The gymnastics to not answer a question are unreal.

Given that there was not enough capacity at the Salvation Army facility in Fort McMurray to house all those in need and given that the Salvation Army will only accept residents after they sober up, to the Minister of Community and Social Services: why are you pushing addicts onto the street in Fort McMurray at the coldest point in the winter? Is your solution to the opioid crisis to simply hope that addicts freeze to death?

The Speaker: The Member for St. Albert will know that we are well past question 4, so preambles are not allowed.

Mrs. Sawhney: Mr. Speaker, first of all, I just want to say that this government is committed to helping and serving the most vulnerable in our province, and that includes those who are experiencing homelessness. In regard to the Marshall House, it had been operating significantly under capacity, and the savings that we're going to achieve from closing that down are going to be consolidated with the Salvation Army. We are going to be increasing funding for the Salvation Army.

Ms Renaud: Given that the government doesn't seem to hear the question – Marshall House has capacity for a hundred beds; the Salvation Army does not accept people until they're sober; the two are different – why are you closing capacity in Fort McMurray and tossing people out in the winter?

Mrs. Sawhney: Mr. Speaker, let me be very clear in my answer. We are expanding capacity with the Salvation Army. The Marshall House was operating quite a bit, significantly, under capacity, which is why we made the fiscally responsible decision to shut that down, consolidate services, and expand capacity with the Salvation Army.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

Infrastructure Project Management

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We owe it to the hard-working people of this province to ensure that their tax dollars are spent in an effective and transparent way, especially when it comes to investing in infrastructure projects that better our province for everyone. To the Minister of Infrastructure: what is your ministry doing to ensure that dollars are invested and projects are completed in the most effective way possible?

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, having worked on major projects in my previous life, I know that projects can easily slip sideways unless they are properly planned and executed. That's why I'm proactively monitoring the construction of various projects across the province to ensure that contractors deliver on their contractual commitments to complete projects on time, on budget, safely, and with a high degree of quality. For new projects, I will ensure that the scope is sufficiently completed before we invite bids.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Minister. Given that finding the right people for the right project is a critical part of the procurement process and further given that infrastructural investment must be built to last and that these projects should employ Alberta businesses first and help get Albertans back to work, how is this ministry balancing quality and cost-efficiency throughout the procurement process for publicly funded projects?

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, we will take the ideological lens out of the decision-making process and focus on what is best and how best we can deliver value for Albertans. As promised in our campaign platform, we are looking at alternative procurement and alternative financing for various projects, and we will carefully review each project on its own merit. We will look at public-private partnerships to deliver high-quality projects built fast, on time, and on budget and also include innovation in the upfront design.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Minister. Given that we know public projects can cost the taxpayer more than initially invested when they are poorly planned and poorly executed and given that we must find ways to cut red tape in order to invest public funds directly into projects rather than into feeding bureaucracy, how is this same ministry cutting red tape and ensuring proper stewardship of public investment in these projects?

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, during the spring election Albertans elected our government to restore fiscal balance and get Albertans back to work, so red tape reduction is very important for our government and my department. Recently, for example, we updated the policy to remove a requirement for a new appraisal on properties to be sold that are within 15 per cent of the last external appraisal. That itself will save thousands of dollars for Albertans. A lot more work is being done in the background, and I hope to share that in the near future.

The Speaker: Hon. members, in 30 seconds or less we will move to the rest of the daily Routine.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Calgary-North would like to make a statement.

Junior Achievement

Mr. Yaseen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. November is Financial Literacy Month. Throughout November organizations and individuals from across the country are encouraged to host and participate in events and share resources aimed at helping Canadians learn how to manage their personal finances successfully. Junior Achievement is an essential program which supports entrepreneur education and promotes skills and business leadership in our young people. We are lucky enough to have a delegation from Junior Achievement here today to assist MLAs in expanding their programs to their respective ridings.

Entrepreneurship and business acumen are difficult to teach in the classroom setting, and this program has amazing success. Generally speaking, these are skills that are best developed through mentorship arrangements. Junior Achievement is committed to inspire and prepare youth to succeed in a global economy. Financial literacy, work readiness, and entrepreneurship give students the skills and the confidence they need to become the leaders of tomorrow. Junior Achievement programs produce more financially literate young people who grow up to save more and borrow less than the average Canadian.

I used to be a volunteer with Junior Achievement during my time at Imperial Oil. As a volunteer I saw students learning the value of self-confidence and of self-investment in building a successful future. Junior Achievement does a great job of utilizing the particular skill set of their volunteers to teach youth about real-world business opportunities.

Junior Achievement contributes to all Albertans when it inspires young people to become future business leaders. Mr. Speaker, our province prides itself on being a hot spot for innovation and entrepreneurship, and Junior Achievement exemplifies these values.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadows has a statement.

New High School in Southeast Edmonton

Mr. Deol: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today, through this House, I would like to mention that during the Education committee estimates held on October 29, 2019, there was not much hope when I asked the Education minister a question about a much-needed high school in my constituency of Edmonton-Meadows. Three days later an announcement was made, on November 1, 2019, by the current UCP government to fund 15 new schools across the province, out of which there are four new future schools in Edmonton.

First of all, I would like to thank the Minister of Education and the government for this announcement and for considering the urgent need for a high school in the Edmonton-Meadows riding, which has more than the average population in any other riding across the city and is growing at a very fast pace.

Currently the design funding has been allocated for the development of this high school. But the need for a high school in the Meadows area was identified as a top priority by EPSB in its three-year capital plan 2020-2023 and with legitimate concerns that the public division will be out of high school space if the new school is not built by 2022. The cost of building was estimated at $79 million by EPSB and would allow 1,800 students to attend high school near their homes.

As every school board struggles to deal with provincial cuts to pay for this government's $4.7 billion handout, my constituents need to know the detailed plan of how and when this school will be built and how they plan to fill this school with teachers and guarantee that every student has the resources they need to succeed.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: I recognize the Member for Airdrie-Cochrane.

Federal Policies and East-west Relations

Mr. Guthrie: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On October 21 the people of Canada spoke in a result that had Liberals winning a minority government while losing the popular vote. In Alberta and Saskatchewan the Liberals were completely shut out, not winning a single riding, with Conservatives obtaining a huge majority of those votes.

But in order to win this election, Justin Trudeau pitted east against west. He created an inaccurate narrative to cloud opinions on Canada's resource sectors, becoming the first Prime Minister to run on a platform to purposely divide the country. Since the election, Mr. Trudeau has made comments about mending fences with the west and has indicated that TMX will be a priority for his government, but he still holds to bills C-69 and C-48, that restrict Alberta's access to global markets and severely limit our ability to attract investment.

In the midst of a smokescreen that was created by the Liberals during the election, many tax changes were being contemplated such as increasing the carbon tax, increasing capital gains taxes, introducing inheritance taxes, and taxing homeowners with the sale of their primary residences. These proposed changes will punish Canadians and harm the economy at a time when some economists are warning of recessionary pressures. As Alberta's economy suffers, so does our ability to contribute to Confederation.

If this federal government is serious about repairing the fragile relationship with the west, they should start by slowing down and listening to the west. There is no need to appoint a liaison to advise the Prime Minister on our issue. Alberta already has a very capable person who spent hundreds of hours in a blue pickup truck criss-crossing the province listening to everyday Albertans. I suggest the Prime Minister listen to him.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday.

Budget 2019 and Government Accountability

Mr. Carson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. There used to be a time when prairie conservatives believed in personal responsibility. It is a sad spectacle to see this government abandon that philosophy. Every day we are seeing people's lives made worse by this government's $4.7 billion no-jobs corporate handout. But for every problem this government has caused, they've got someone else to blame.

This government is lying about education funding. Now classrooms are getting crowded, bus rides getting longer, and kids with complex needs are losing their EAs. The Education minister says: blame your school district.

This government is lying about police funding even as rural and urban communities struggle with crime. The chiefs of police in Edmonton and Calgary both say that the province raided their budgets. The Justice minister: well, he says to blame your mayor.

Then there's this Premier. He recently gathered up his entire communications team to help him go take credit for the opening of a new McDonald's that was being built even before the election. That's got to be a first for an Alberta Premier. Earlier this year the Premier was standing in EnCana place in Calgary when he unveiled his $4.7 billion no-jobs corporate handout. How's that for irony, Mr. Speaker? EnCana was happy to take hundreds of millions of dollars from Alberta taxpayers before moving their operations to another country. Husky was just as happy to receive tens of millions from our province before laying off their workers. Once again, this Premier is trying to shift the blame. Earlier in his career this Premier used to denounce bracket creep as an insidious tax grab. Now, well, he writes them into his own budgets.

It's a pitiful sight, Mr. Speaker, to see a Premier and his cabinet so quick to blame others and so unwilling to take responsibility for their own actions, and it's a sad time for Alberta to see our province led by a cabinet who is unmoved by the cries of the most vulnerable in our society.

Speaker's Ruling Parliamentary Language

The Speaker: Hon. member, while I appreciate that you are speaking about the government and not an individual, last week this Speaker provided caution with respect to the use of the word "lying." We've had significant discussion about using the word around “misled,” but I provided very, very clear caution with respect to “lying.” You can rise, apologize, and withdraw your comments.

Mr. Carson: My apologies, Mr. Speaker. I withdraw my comments.

2:50 Family Violence Prevention Month

Mr. Sigurdson: November 1 was the beginning of Family Violence Prevention Month, and on Friday, to start the month, I attended the second annual Breakfast with the Guys fundraiser put on by the Rowan House Society. The Rowan House is a family shelter located in the foothills that works to provide families leading – edge care in domestic violence services. Currently there are over 350,000 cases of domestic violence in Canada per year. Breakfast with the Guys started last year as an educational seminar to help recognize the things we can do to bring awareness and help change the tide on domestic violence.

During the breakfast we heard from Mike Cameron, a Canadian writer, speaker, and philanthropist. Mike shared with a sold-out room the story of how his girlfriend was murdered by her ex-boyfriend in 2015. It was a courageous glimpse into a journey none of us would choose yet, in a sense, we’re all on. It provided an opportunity to reflect on a subject we desperately need to talk about, a reflection that we need to close the gap between who we wish to be and how we actually are behaving.

We need to constantly be aware that we all have a part to play when it comes to preventing domestic violence and abuse. Violence, bullying, and abuse are issues that should not stay behind closed doors. They are the responsibility of the whole community. The victims are people you know in your workplace, on your daughter’s sports team, around you when you are out with your friends. Together, through education and awareness, we can create a safer future for those who live with violence every day.

Today as a symbol of this important month of reflection I wear a purple ribbon and wear purple shoelaces in support of Rowan House’s shoelace initiative, a small symbol to help raise awareness. I hope we can all come together and show our support in their stand against bullying and abuse. We need to continue to raise the volume on this critical issue that affects so many families across all of our communities.

Notices of Motions

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Sweet: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. At the appropriate time I intend to move the following motion:

Pursuant to Standing Order 30 be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to immediately halt the policy decision to lower the age of eligibility for support and financial assistance agreements from 24 to 22 as this decision hurts young people transitioning out of care.

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have the requisite number of copies of a piece of correspondence I received from a rural educational assistant who tells me that she makes $40,000 a year, and while she isn’t advocating for her pay to go up, she is advocating for significant increases to education funding to ensure that the kids who are doing without the educational support that they deserve get to have educational assistance in her rural riding.

Member Ceci: Mr. Speaker, I have a news release from today from the mayors of Calgary and Edmonton, AUMA president, and RMA president with regard to: Municipalities Need to Be Full Partners – A Statement on Bill 20. I have the requisite number of copies.

The Speaker: I noticed the Member for St. Albert trying to get my attention.

Ms Renaud: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. I have five copies of the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change’s Special Report: Global Warming of 1.5 °C, Summary for Policymakers.

Tablings to the Clerk

The Clerk: I wish to advise the Assembly that the following document was deposited with the office of the Clerk: on behalf of hon. Minister LaGrange, Minister of Education, document undated, entitled Student Demographic Factors.

The Speaker: Hon. members, we are points of order. The point of order raised by the Government House Leader at 2:06 has been withdrawn.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning on her notice of motion.

Ms Sweet: We withdrew both. Sorry, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Sorry. There was just one point of order, at 2:06, which has now been withdrawn.

Request for Emergency Debate

The Speaker: We are at the notice of motion under SO 30 for those following along at home.

Support for Youth Transitioning out of Care

Ms Sweet: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today under Standing Order 30 on this urgent matter, being that this is the first opportunity for the Assembly to address the budget and policy decisions by this government. Members of this Assembly first became aware of the decision on Thursday, when during estimates the minister revealed that the age of eligibility for support and financial assistance agreements will be lowered from 24 to 22. In the days that followed, we heard from the community about the negative impacts that this would have on youth transitioning from care. We heard from youth, caseworkers, the office of the Child and Youth Advocate.

Mr. Speaker, this decision will remove access to these supports to the tune of approximately 25 per cent of the youth currently eligible; 500 young adults will be cut off, 500 of our most vulnerable. This is urgent for many of them. This will put them into crisis mode, a mode that they spent their whole young lives in and out of, working to overcome. This is urgent because on Friday caseworkers, who had not been told in advance of this decision, began the heart-wrenching work of notifying their clients of this change. Also on Friday we heard from the office of the Child and Youth Advocate about their concerns with this plan, stating, “This will have long-term impacts.”

This is an urgent matter because once we start this ball rolling down the hill, we will not be able to stop it. It will simply be too late. Earlier we heard from the Minister of Community and Social Services about the importance of preventing family violence. Well, Mr. Speaker, these supports are part of that prevention. These youth have no natural supports, which is why they are in care. These supports help them to break that cycle that leads to family violence, to make better choices, and to make life better for their children.

This government has a responsibility to these children, who they were the legal guardians for until they were 18, and this Assembly has a responsibility to hold this government to account. This decision was made without consultation with the very individuals who use this program and the population: these are youth themselves, their caseworkers, the office of the Child and Youth Advocate. Where is the accountability? How can the people of this province trust this government? This government needs to immediately halt this decision before it's too late.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, I implore you to rule that this is an urgent matter and is worthy of debate in this Assembly today. Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. the Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. First of all, I just want to be clear that this is an important issue to the government. I have a couple of brief points to make on the general topic which, I believe, speak to why there isn't an urgency to the debate.

First, Children's Services is prioritizing funding for vulnerable children and families. Second, what they saw was a natural drop-off in support and financial assistance agreements once recipients turned 22 as they progressed to adulthood and entered postsecondary and the workforce. As of April 1 around 480 adults with existing support and financial assistance agreements will be transitioned off payments and onto other government services as required. The program will continue to provide four years of assistance after adulthood is reached.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, I would refer you to the sixth edition of Beauchesne's, page 113, point 387, which says:

The Standing Order is clear that the question [must] be specific and must require urgent consideration. It must deal with a matter within the administrative competence of the Government, and there must be no . . . reasonable opportunity for debate.

Page 113 of Beauchesne's, point 390, also states:

"Urgency" within this rule does not apply to the matter itself, but means "urgency of debate", when the ordinary opportunities provided by the rules of the House do not permit the subject to be brought on [an earlier] enough [timeline] and the public interest demands that discussion take place immediately.

In fact, our own standing order refers to this when it states, in Standing Order 30(7)(a), "The matter proposed for discussion must relate to a genuine emergency, calling for immediate and urgent consideration."

In a ruling on November 6, 2018, Speaker Wanner noted the importance of this when he stated, "Furthermore, I must consider whether there are other avenues for debate in the Assembly on this subject matter." I note for you, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Children's Services appeared before the Standing Committee on Families and Communities for three hours Thursday last week, and the members opposite only asked two questions on this very topic in three hours. Perhaps they might be regretting now all their fruitless points of order, but that's not relevant to the moment.

In conclusion, at this time I fail to see how the opposition has met the requirement as set out in the parliamentary authorities.

The Speaker: Hon. members, the chair is prepared to rule on whether the request for leave for this motion to proceed on Standing Order 30(2) is merited. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning has met the requirement of providing at least two hours' notice to the Speaker's office by providing the required notice, just barely, at 11:28 this morning.

The proposed motion reads as follows:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to immediately halt the policy decision to lower the age of eligibility for support and financial assistance agreements from 24 to 22 as this decision hurts young people transitioning out of care.

The relevant parliamentary authorities on the subject have been stated but are page 695 to 704 of House of Commons Procedure and Practice, third edition, and Beauchesne's paragraphs 387 and 390.

I would like to start by noting that the request made by the member under Standing Order 30 should be in the form of a request to leave to adjourn the ordinary business of the Assembly to discuss a matter of urgent importance. It should be in the form of a substantive motion since emergency debate does not entail a decision of the Assembly as set out in Standing Order 36. While I am often a stickler for the rules, this does not preclude our ability to continue in an emergency debate.

As stated by many Speakers in the past, including myself, the question of urgency under Standing Order 30 refers to whether there is urgency of debate, not whether an issue itself is important or urgent. My ruling referencing this point can be found on page 60 of Alberta Hansard from May 27, 2019. I would like to state that I, too, believe this matter is an important matter. Whether or not it is urgent for debate is still yet to be determined.

I would also refer members' attention to pages 698 and 699 of House of Commons Procedure and Practice, third edition, which states that one of the criteria for determining whether a matter is truly an emergency is if it can be raised before the Assembly "within a reasonable time by other means." I think that today's question period was a perfect example, where this very issue was raised at question 1 and question 4 by the Official Opposition.

While there is no question that the issue raised by the Member for Edmonton-Manning is important, I also understand that it has been discussed as recently as last week at estimates for the Ministry of Children's Services on October 31. The issue could also be raised during the consideration of estimates that are forthcoming throughout the rest of this week or, additionally, at the upcoming debate on the appropriation bill that will in fact take place in the Legislative Assembly. I would also note that members have other opportunities to raise important issues such as during Oral Question Period or during Members' Statements.

I want to emphasize that the issue of funding for young people in care is certainly important, but I cannot find it to be a genuine emergency requiring immediate consideration as required by Standing Order 30(7). For this reason, leave is not granted, and the question shall not be put.

Hon. members, prior to proceeding to Orders of the Day, I did hear two electronic devices go off earlier during question period, certainly one in the neighbourhood of Calgary-East. Perhaps he would like to pay a fine to the Movember fund of the Speaker. Perhaps it wasn't him, but certainly it was in that general direction.

With that said, we are at Ordres du jour.

Orders of the Day

Motions Other than Government Motions

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley.

Oil Sands and Fossil Fuels

508. Mr. Loewen moved on behalf of Ms Goodridge:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to immediately demand the federal government recognize the benefits Alberta's oil sands and other fossil fuels provide to the people of Canada in terms of economic growth, prosperity, and support for communities across Canada.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to bring forward Motion 508, a private member's motion, on behalf of the Member for Fort McMurray-Lac La Biche.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Madam Speaker, I rise today in support of Motion 508. I think this is an important motion because while we've seen a lot more advocacy from our province, from grassroots campaigns to CEOs of the biggest integrated oil companies around, we still face a huge problem in this province.

Now, very recently Canada's 20th Prime Minister, Jean Chrétien, visited Calgary and had a discussion at the U of C with Canada's 22nd Prime Minister, Stephen Harper. Mr. Chrétien referred to, quote, so-called western alienation and a so-called crisis on energy. End quote. How tone deaf, Madam Speaker. There are profound feelings of western alienation. There is an enormous crisis in our energy sector. But the former Prime Minister went on to say that Alberta is in its current predicament because of the, quote, tar sands.

Now, when the member was drafting this motion, Madam Speaker, there was some question about what the wording should be. They discussed changing the words "oil sands" for "energy sector" or "oil and gas" and a couple other iterations. I wanted to speak to the oil sands specifically because they represent not only 64 per cent of Canada's oil production, but they also seem to garner about a hundred per cent of the environmentalist scorn. For decades now incredibly aggressive campaigns from Greenpeace and other environmentalist organizations have slandered the oil sands. They have aggressively pursued an agenda of shutting down this employer of thousands that has created so much prosperity from coast to coast. They have unfairly maligned the great people of this province and the Member for Fort McMurray-Lac La Biche and her constituents in particular for developing the resources God blessed us with.

There's some truth to it when Chrétien says that the tar sands are the problem. The current opposition to getting a single pipeline built does stem from the ridiculous propaganda that the oil sands have been relentlessly subjected to over many years. That's why we need all the measures we've introduced, why we need our fight-back strategy and our energy war room, why we need our Energy minister to show up in Ottawa and testify against legislation they have brought in that has already de facto begun phasing out our oil sands, as our current Prime Minister put it, and why I think this motion is important. Ottawa needs to hear us loud and clear. We aren't going away quietly. We aren't going to let the Liberals from eastern Canada take away our livelihoods.

The other aspect that this motion addresses is the wealth and prosperity that the oil sands and fossil fuels generate for the country at large. We all know the stories of people across Canada who had lost their jobs and found hope and work in the oil patch. One of my favourite writers, Rex Murphy, tells it this way:

You will never read about it and you will never see it on the television set because it is a benign outcome of the fiendish oil industry. It was one of the great moments of Confederation that all people from all over Canada were summoned to the western provinces. People from provinces who had never intermingled before were working on the same project or allied projects. A renovation of Confederation at the citizen level takes place when a major project invites the brains and muscle of Canadians together at a common task and brings them in contact with each other from people from all parts of the country. They learn by contact and common effort that this is what we share and that is what we have in common. Despite what you've heard, it is unity first and it is shared experience and it is common endeavour that constitutes the actual cement of a national feeling.

That's what the oil sands represent, Madam Speaker: the collaboration and the ingenuity of Canadians from all parts of the country building something great and developing the energy that the entire world relies on.

There are also tremendous revenues generated through taxation and royalties that flow into every region of this country from the oil sands. I think Mr. Murphy is correct to point out the dignity of work and the countless families that have been saved by finding work in the patch. Many Canadians know this to be true already, but sadly our federal government and our Prime Minister do not. We've seen the decline of our oil and gas sector hastened along by the terrible policy of the Trudeau Liberals. The Premier has pointed out that during the campaign Justin Trudeau went to Quebec and talked about fighting les grands pétroliers Albertains, the big oil companies in Alberta. Well, be it Syncrude, Suncor, CNRL, Husky, Imperial, or Nexen, I can tell you that they put food on the tables of thousands of Alberta families. They employ some of the brightest engineers, geologists, traders, and IT professionals around. They also employ pipefitters, welders, power engineers, and electricians. They live up to the highest labour and environmental standards anywhere on the planet.

This issue has come up many times in this House for debate, and we have seen other motions passed in support of our oil industry. But for the Member for Fort McMurray-Lac La Biche this is important to her, not only because it's personal for her and her constituents but because it is important that we do not relent in this fight against Ottawa. We must continue to stand up and speak strongly about the oil sands and what they actually represent to this country.

Cleaner energy sources cannot replace fossil fuels today, and they cannot replace fossil fuels tomorrow. It's a fact that there will be a demand for oil and gas products for decades to come. That's something environmentalists and Liberal politicians might want to ignore, but it doesn't make it any less true. So let's be clear. Inexpensive, abundant energy is what gives us the quality of life we take for granted, and the oil sands play an important role in ensuring the world has the energy it needs.

There's a sentiment that rings true to so many Albertans: why is Canada importing oil when we have the third-largest oil reserves on the planet, but we have no political will to get them to the market? Our oil trades at heavy discounts because of a political class in Ottawa that can't see past their short-term electoral interests. It's unthinkable that we continue to have to curtail our oil production because the infrastructure to get these products to market simply can't be built in the current political climate. Thousands of miles of pipelines safely criss-cross North America, transporting millions of barrels of oil, but as a result of a zealous campaign by environmental radicals, bad policy from government, and judicial activism, the capacity to move product from Alberta falls far short of what's needed.

Instead, companies are forced to ship oil much more dangerously by rail. The current situation is untenable for oil companies, who are pulling out in droves, for thousands of laid-off workers, and for everyday Albertans, who are sick and tired of transferring tremendous sums of money to Ottawa only to have Liberal politicians spit in their faces.

Let me be clear. This motion is about calling on Ottawa to recognize a simple fact and one on which I think every member of this House can agree: Canada is better off for having the oil sands.

I hope all hon. members will join me in supporting this motion. Let's send a strong message to Ottawa. Let's send a strong message to the Prime Minister. Let's send a strong message to Quebec and British Columbia. It is not just Alberta who is hurt by an absence of pipeline infrastructure. It is not by killing oil sands development that you will leave a greener planet for future generations. It is not by condemning Alberta's big oil companies that you will foster national unity. It's by acknowledging that this great achievement, some say a miracle, of extracting oil from what First Nations people once used to waterproof their canoes, has benefited every Canadian and must continue doing so.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other members wishing to speak to Motion 508? The hon. Member for Calgary-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise to speak to Motion 508. Let me begin by saying that we do recognize, we do know that Alberta's resource sector has been key to economic growth in this province, has been a key to economic growth in this country, has been a key for prosperity, for jobs right across this province and right across this country.

We can understand why the Member for Fort McMurray-Lac La Biche might need to bring this motion forward because I think she represents the constituency which is home to this industry, the biggest industry of our province. As the representative of that constituency I think she will need some assurance at times when we have lost almost 27,000 full-time jobs, that include 14,900 jobs from the resource sector, and we have not seen so far any progress on pipelines or on anything else that would get our industry back to work. We have not seen any supports from this government to this industry. So that's why, I guess, as the member from that constituency she will be concerned, and rightfully so. We are all concerned that since this government took power, we haven't seen any progress. We haven't seen any policies that will help our industry. If I talk about their rhetoric and political gamesmanship, they're really good at it, but they haven't done anything else.

We all hear about C-48, C-69. They talk about them here, they talk about them on Twitter, but the fact remains that on those two bills, it was our government, it was the then Premier and now Leader of the Opposition who made submissions, and those submissions were adopted by this government. They didn't make their own submission. They may have done it on Twitter, somewhere else, but actual submissions were put forward by the previous government and adopted by this government, which is a good thing because those submissions were well thought out and were submitted in consultation with the public service, industry, stakeholders. They were submitted with a view to making sure that our industry gets what they need. But they didn't do any submissions on those bills.

Similarly, when we were in government, the then Premier went coast to coast to build a case for our resource sector, for our Trans Mountain pipeline. When she started, it was only 4 in 10 Canadians who were supportive of TMX. With that campaign and with her leadership, with her advocacy, there were 7 in 10 Canadians who were supportive of that project. We have not seen anything from this government that they have done so far that would move support for that project. Instead, what they are doing: they are starting an energy war room with $30 million of public money given to a failed UCP candidate to essentially troll people, to have a Twitter account and whatnot, which has not landed us access to new markets, which has not landed us any jobs, which has not created capacity in pipelines. It's just a complete waste of public money.

The second thing. I think what this resource sector needs to acknowledge and what we need to acknowledge here is that we do have production capacity in our resource sector. We can produce more with even existing investments. I think the proof for that is that we had to curtail our production so that whatever we produce, we have the takeaway capacity to take that to the market. That clearly shows that we still have room to produce more with existing investment. The issue our industry is facing is takeaway capacity. We don't have access to new markets. We don't have capacity in our existing pipelines.

Seeing that as an issue, we worked with industry, we worked with the public service, and we came up with oil-by-rail contracts that would have moved 120,000 barrels per day more and would have kept economic activity going, kept production going. But they cancelled that. And not only didn't we get any benefit out of those contracts, but now Albertans are on the hook to pay $1.5 billion as a penalty to cancel those oil-by-rail contracts, which was completely an ideological decision on the part of this government, because we entered into those contracts after a thorough consultation with industry.

Now they're saying that if some producer can arrange for their own oil by rail, they can produce more. They have left industry on their own. Instead of providing leadership, instead of providing some solutions, instead of taking steps to create more capacity, what we are seeing is the same bottleneck, and that's why we're losing jobs and we're losing investment in our resource sector.

Certainly, we need to acknowledge that this sector is important for jobs, for the well-being of all Albertans and Canadians, and we need to do things that will help us address the issues that are facing this sector. I think that earlier we heard about how the federal government needs to recognize that. We certainly believe that the federal government should recognize it's important and should retain the authority to build nation-building projects and be free of any provincial vetoes in doing so and for the supplies to pipelines running across provinces.

But I think the focus of the discussion this afternoon should be on the crisis that this province is facing. It concerns getting people back to work, and I think we haven't heard much from this government about that. Instead, with their policies, for instance, they said – and they told Albertans – that they will hand out a $4.7 billion corporate gift to corporations and that somehow that will address the issues facing our resource sector. I think a couple of examples should be enough to make the case that this corporate handout is a complete failure. It's a complete disaster. It has not created the outcomes, it has not yielded the outcomes that Albertans were promised. Albertans were promised that by handing out this gift, there will be jobs and there will be new investments.

Let's talk about the resource sector. Two weeks ago we heard that Husky was laying off Albertans from its offices in Calgary, from its fields at a time when they have received $233 million as a share of that $4.7 billion handout. That's not fear and smear. It was reported all over. These are the facts. These numbers were included in their financials, that they got $233 million from that handout, but we didn't see jobs coming back because of that.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other members wishing to speak to Motion 508? The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It is an honour to rise and speak to this motion and support Alberta's essential oil and gas industry, that has led this province in economic growth and prosperity for decades and made us the envy of the world for our environmental standards, our human rights, our ethics and technology as well as our economy. Our UCP government has taken steps to restore investor confidence and bring back oil and gas jobs to Alberta. The oil and gas sector still provides jobs numbering in the tens of thousands when healthy and contributes millions of dollars to research and development as well as to diversify the economy through cutting-edge technology.

That is why this caucus, under the mandate of over a million Albertans, stood with our Premier to repeal the carbon tax as Bill 1. The carbon tax did nothing to reduce emissions and damaged Alberta's hydrocarbon job market. Increases to corporate taxes, burdensome regulations, and a failure to stand up for Alberta saw the level of uncertainty in the market reach such high levels that capital fled this province at an unprecedented rate, to the tune of billions of dollars. Today's activists fail to realize that the very bridges they stand on, the vehicles they drive, the houses they live in, and the very food they eat are only possible because of contributions from the oil and gas industry and the technology they provide, technology that provides energy in support of resource production, heating, and food.

Alberta is part of the global solution, not part of the problem. Where we succeed, we lead, and where we lead, others will follow. Not only do we produce our products to the highest environmental standards; we also reclaim lands through reforestation, carbon emission reduction, and technological advancement.

Wealthy climate activists utilize the benefits of our oil and gas ever more and every day as they use their private jets and yachts, eat and drink sumptuous meals fed, grown, irrigated, produced, and prepared with vehicles, tools, implements, and utensils made possible by this sector. They do this to an even greater degree than us average people, who drive to work and heat our homes just to earn a living and provide a home and opportunities for our children. Madam Speaker, how loud would their outcry be if these luxuries were taken away from them, or are these restrictions only meant for the rest of us? The hypocrisy of these activists is plain to see when they partake in the extreme usefulness of petroleum products as they drive gasoline-consuming vehicles or any vehicle with rubber tires to their protests, use cellphones, plastic and ink for their signs, their sunglasses, fabrics for their clothing, and on and on.

Alberta's oil and gas industry and its workers should be proud of our environmental standards. This province produces less than 1 per cent of global CO<sub>2</sub> emissions, with more reductions being invested in every day. Other countries have no such standards, plans, or limits. China is building coal power plants at an alarming rate, with huge environmental impact. Alberta could help them and truly make a global difference by leading them to the highest levels of environmental technology and providing them with liquid natural gas and the technology for its power generation. Alberta can and should lead the world in its ethical generation of power through its oil and gas sector. This UCP government will not stand idly by while it is threatened by lies and exaggerations that slander one of the key economic engines in Canada. I will support this motion as we need to stand up and stand proud and tall for our oil and gas sector.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other members wishing to speak to Motion 508? The hon. Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat.

Ms Glasgo: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I grew up with a deep respect for our oil and gas workers. My dad has built and maintained pipelines all across western Canada, including in Alberta and Saskatchewan. He would go away for trips for weeks on end working on these projects. These projects are the veins that keep the lifeblood of the Canadian economy flowing. My dad has never complained. He has never asked for much. He understands and values the importance of hard work, and he passed those values on to my sister and I. These are values that I promised my constituents I would uphold and endeavour to demonstrate in my time as the MLA for Brooks-Medicine Hat.

Madam Speaker, politics is becoming increasingly more polarized, and part of that is because of the inflammatory language used on social media that is then distributed to the masses in grand fashion. Now, I know we're not supposed to take what is said on Twitter seriously – and I try not to myself – but the fact of the matter is that social media and politics as we know it are inextricably linked. There is just so much misinformation out there. A few weeks ago I stumbled upon this tweet, and it, quite frankly, made my blood boil. Understanding my family's deep connection to the oil and gas sector, I think you and the members of this Assembly will probably understand why. The person who wrote this tweet is a vocal Alberta blogger and a supporter of the members opposite. She decided to weigh in on the federal election and tweeted out: "The reason Alberta is so Conservative is because it's full of a lot of dumb money. From a demographic perspective, this is largely a province of overpaid undereducated white guys. They vote accordingly."

Madam Speaker, political differences aside, this has to be one of the most disrespectful, offensive things that I've seen on Twitter, and given just how ugly Twitter can get, that's really saying something. This type of attitude, this slander of Alberta workers, particularly those in the energy sector: it's personal for me because I have a family who has worked hard to build the infrastructure and move the oil and gas that this blogger takes for granted. Those people are not "overpaid undereducated white guys." In fact, many of them are women. They're smart. They're hard-working. They do jobs that are demanding of their time, energy, and bodies in order to put food on the table. They spend weeks and months away from their families. They miss hockey games and dance recitals and spend birthdays in work camps, all to make our country's economy stronger and their families' lives a little easier.

With that said, Alberta is not "full of . . . dumb money." As a province, many Albertans have most certainly enjoyed sufficient prosperity over the years because of our bountiful natural resources, resources that are produced at the highest environmental standards, prosperity that we have willingly shared with the rest of Canada. Communities that rely on these resources and the activity created have benefited as well. The money that workers do take home to support their families absolutely is not frivolous. It's earned by hard work and intense labour, labour that most people don't even consider when they fill up their cars or turn on the heat.

3:30

The same blogger also struck a nerve with me when they made the outrageous assertion that women are disadvantaged by our energy sector because, quote, there are not a lot of young fathers that would stay home with their kids, especially in the conservative oil industry. Madam Speaker, I know many young fathers who make this incredibly hard decision to leave their families for weeks and months at a time to work to support their families. My uncle makes this choice, my dad has made this choice, and many young men will make this choice every day to keep a roof over their heads and put food on the table and even give their kids the best shot at life that they know how.

That's the true story of our energy workers, Madam Speaker, not this vilification that I see splattered all over social media and in op-eds written by those who live multiple provinces away who think, I'm assuming, that their cars run on fairy dust, who, we can reasonably assume, have never seen the hardship of a recession or waved goodbye to a loved one as they leave for weeks on end.

For heaven's sake, I saw an article in the Star today that referred to the oil sands as the tar sands. It's amazing to me that this still happens. The version of reality, I guess, that these people spout, the version that leftist political parties have painted of our energy workers: that's not the version I know. I grew up understanding just how vital our energy sector was not only to my family but to our province as a whole. The most frightening thing about this attitude is its incessant and relentless focus on undermining Albertans and our contributions to Confederation due largely, in part, to our energy sector. It fuels the efforts being made by those not only within this country but around the world to land-lock our natural resources and to put an end to Alberta's industry as we know it.

I was sad to realize that not a single candidate outside of the Conservative Party of Canada had made an effort in the federal election to stand with our energy workers, people like those who are in my family. They had no plans for our economy or the Albertans that were struggling to hold down a steady job. Some of them expressed some sympathy for those experiencing hardship, but this fleeting, tone-deaf, lackadaisical response was the extent of their concern. In fact, many of these party leaders endorsed the idea of shutting down the oil sands entirely. That's a move that will leave hundreds of thousands of Albertans as well as workers across Canada jobless.

Madam Speaker, these contentious platitudes are discouraging. They frustrate me in ways that I cannot even begin to tell you in 10 minutes, but they also motivate me to keep fighting for what I know and what my government colleagues know is the right thing to do, to stand up for our energy sector, which is the most environmentally responsible and ethical energy sector of all major oil-producing countries. The world has been blessed with Canadian energy, and I am proud of it. I'm proud of our government for standing up for Canadian energy, and I'm proud of our government for standing with those workers. I'm proud of the hundreds of thousands of workers like members of my own family for being the driving force that gets our resources out of the ground and into pipelines so they can power the homes and cars of people around the nation.

I am proud of Canadian energy, and we should all be proud, Madam Speaker. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other members wishing to speak to Motion 508? The hon. Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat.

Mr. Barnes: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It is my pleasure today to rise and speak in support of Motion 508:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to immediately demand the federal government recognize the benefits Alberta's oil sands and other fossil fuels provide to the people of Canada in terms of economic growth, prosperity, and support for communities across Canada.

Madam Speaker, oil and gas, working together with our two other pillars, ag and forestry, have built this province for over 100 years. Currently our vital industry of oil and gas needs support more than ever given the leadership in Ottawa. The continual, endless undermining by our own Prime Minister needs to stop. It's illogical. It's foolish at a time the world demand for oil is growing, I understand, somewhere between 90 and 100 million barrels per day and growing. In the last few years we've seen America become self-sufficient, a leading exporter. We've seen many, many oil jurisdictions prosper, further human rights, further social programs, further their society. At the same time, the best producers in the world, Alberta oil and gas, have a federal government in their way.

Madam Speaker, you see, those of us on this side of the aisle understand the importance of a healthy economy and all the long-term benefits – economic, family, community, and social – that come when a province can compete on an equal footing in the international market. We understand the important role that our oil sands and other natural resources play in our economy, and we are going to ensure that those who depend on resource production and extraction continue to be able to feed their families.

Madam Speaker, it's only about six months ago since our campaign. I'm fortunate that it was my third one, but there are some parts of it I'll never forget: the two grown men who answered their doors in tears because of foreclosure and that kind of thing; the tens and tens of young men and women with the same story, who used to make $100,000, $120,000 working hard in an oil and gas or a construction business or a related business and now barely making ends meet at $30,000 or $40,000, just wanting to work hard and care for their families; 20 to 30 people on their way to North Dakota, Oklahoma, Texas – even Argentina made that list; how sad, not working in Alberta – strong, trained, capable, important young Albertans that we may lose.

Madam Speaker, that's what's important to me. That's what's important to Cypress-Medicine Hat, way more than what we've seen over the last several years, when we've borne the burden of international celebrities who fly around the world, fly home for supper, and who seek to further their own careers by taking a dramatic, ill-informed stance against our industry while refusing to see the hypocrisy and the errors of their ways. We've endured social media campaigns aimed to demonize and demoralize our hard-working energy sector, that have stood by our provincial government and refused to defend our best interests at the federal level. As fair questions for all have clearly highlighted, a clear and American environmental oil and gas initiative spending tens and tens of millions of dollars to deliberately – deliberately – land-lock our oil and gas while they further their exports and their production: our federal leaders have fallen for it.

Madam Speaker, despite declining standards of living in our province and increased job losses, we watched as the previous government made no move to secure fleeing investment or secure pipeline proposals. It goes on and on, the companies that have pulled out of the oil sands: the Tridents; the Canadian company called Houston Oil & Gas, that just walked away from countless wells; the other companies in hardship; and of course, as a historian, as a Canadian, EnCana, a company that came from the roots of when the Canadian Pacific railroad was built across Canada. To take this huge risk, to do this huge thing in the nation building of Canada, they were given mineral rights, oil and gas rights. To see that legacy company move to Colorado at a time when world demand for oil and gas is growing is unfathomable. It's incomprehensible, and it shows how far offline our federal government is: fleeing investment, no pipelines built, money wasted and thrown away, and ensuring that shovels would never hit soil to provide that safe pipeline, efficient capacity that we need.

Madam Speaker, Albertans need to know that their voices are valued, yet we've continued to see legislation aimed at restricting and limiting our province's capacity to produce and market resources. Yeah, we can put it in a pipe and get it to the Lower Mainland; we just can't get it in a tanker. Maybe that pipeline will never be built.

Other provinces and our federal government worked against us at a time that we've been so willing to share prosperity, paying over $600 billion in transfer and equalization payments, providing so many jobs and wealth to make Canada strong: unfathomable, Madam Speaker, incomprehensible, again when you consider how environmentally friendly we are, how safe we are, and the fact that we all know that we're the best jurisdiction. We're scratching our heads, wondering why our leaders in Ottawa would seek to limit our ability to produce wealth and make the world a better place for all people and Canadians especially.

How can Albertans not feel excluded from our country's federation when we are governed by a group of individuals who would seek to physically block pipeline access for Alberta while continuing to allow foreign industry competitors to sail right up the St. Lawrence River, oil from Venezuela, Saudi Arabia, from our competitors, Russia as well, countries well known for human rights violations, antiwomen sentiment, histories of violence and severe discrimination towards minority groups? Madam Speaker, I think I saw today that the Saudi Arabia oil company is going to go public and become the most valuable company ever – ever – at a time young men and young women in Cypress-Medicine Hat can't get out the door to work. It's stupid.

It's hypocritical – hypocritical – of the federal government to attempt to stand on a moral platform of equality while allowing dictators to supply us with our basic resources. It's astounding and naive. There is literally human cost when you purchase products from totalitarian regimes throughout the globe. How can you champion freedom and humanity while financing and endorsing the persecution of minorities and women in these countries? You cannot have it both ways, Madam Speaker, and I think that that will become truly apparent in the next little while.

The development and growth of natural resource extraction in Alberta has brought new levels of prosperity to northern communities, who would otherwise have limited employment options. Madam Speaker, I'm not sure why I put "northern communities" in here because that is very, very true for Medicine Hat. We owe so much to the oil and gas industry.

Also, the indigenous people of this province have been left out of land and resource negotiations for decades, but it's through the development of infrastructure and pipelines that First Nations people will truly be able to profit, and so many of our good partners, fellow Albertans, and Canadians are showing their ability and their willingness to do exactly that. We have a moral obligation to work together as a province and empower First Nation communities and allow them to become equal partners in this potential success story.

Many organizations and resource extraction critics have long held the belief that indigenous peoples are inherently against industrial mining or oil sands projects, but of course we have seen time and time again First Nation people themselves and their leaders come forward to say that this is clearly not the case. They see our natural resources as gifts to be used for the care, for the growth of their communities and their people, for financial benefits of investment and jobs.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the motion? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate your recognizing me and allowing me to express some thoughts here today on Motion 508. I've been listening very intently to all of the different speakers, and I've managed to make a few notes here and there, so hopefully I can get my thoughts in here in a brief amount of time. As you know, sometimes I can be a bit long-winded. Thankfully, I guess, there's only 10 minutes to speak here, and you can get me back down in my chair, right?

The overarching thing that I've been hearing here today is about how we can support our oil and gas workers. Of course, as you know, my background is in labour, and I'm all for good, high-paying jobs with benefits, being treated with dignity and respect, making sure that work sites are as safe as they can possibly be. You know, as somebody who has spent some time on various different health and safety committees, I know that sometimes health and safety cannot be convenient and sometimes it's even not cheap, but it's necessary to make sure that we all get to come home to our loved ones each and every day. Again, just kind of keying in on some of the things we were talking about in supporting our workers.

I wholeheartedly agree with the Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat about how our workers are not overpaid. You're absolutely correct; they're not overpaid. I don't believe they're overpaid. As a matter of fact, I think they're underpaid. So when I happen to see things like messing around with their overtime pay, I kind of struggle with that a little bit, how we're potentially setting up a possibility where these workers can then not get paid what they deserve. I do agree with you there.

I also heard the Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat, who was talking about some workers that, you know, were trying to make it in around the $30,000 to $40,000 a year, and I do think that they should be paid more, so why did we do things like take away a statutory holiday? I don't think it's these kinds of things that help our case when we're trying to talk to the federal government about how they need to step up and back our industry.

I also did cue in on one other comment you made about hearing that word, "tar sands." You know, in my time that I spent on the Council of State Governments at the national level on behalf of the former economic development and trade minister, that was one of the biggest things I spent time on, trying to change that narrative. I would hear legislators down in the U.S. comment: oh, yeah, Alberta, yeah, that's where the tar sands are. It's like: whoa, whoa, whoa. We need to change that. I spent a considerable amount of time. I was actually starting to gain some ground there. There's certainly a lot more work. I know that just because something kind of looks like tar, it doesn't necessarily mean it's a bad thing.

I did notice a couple of comments from the Member for Central Peace-Notley around, you know: why are we importing oil? I agree. Why are we? Why aren't we refining our product right here in the province of Alberta, giving Alberta jobs and high-paying jobs, good benefits, and things like that? But then when I look back – I think the last refinery was built sometime in the late '80s. Why weren't decisions made from back then to be building refineries? We know those things aren't built in a couple of years. Our Redwater plant was a decade or more in the making. We're trying to drive this narrative, yet we've seen decisions in the past that are working against us in terms of how serious we are to support our workers.

I noticed that the Member for Lethbridge-East talked about how the government is very serious about trying to create jobs, yet we've seen almost 15,000 jobs lost within our energy sector. I start, again, talking about decisions that we've already made of giving a $4.7 billion handout that hasn't created a job. We've changed labour laws. That is not creating jobs. I mean, we're down more than 27,000 in this province, so it makes it very, very difficult for us, Madam Speaker, to try to drive home this narrative about how important our industry is when we're kind of, you know, weakening our case, I guess, with some of these other decisions that we're making.

You know, it's not enough. I mean, we have to look at refineries, absolutely, but we can do other things. We can drive diversification like petrochemicals, things like that, which will create very, very good jobs here in the province. I've got a lot of friends that have spent a lot of time up in the mover of the motion's riding building those infrastructures, from scaffolders to electricians. I want to see them working, but I want them, again, to be well paid, benefits, treated with dignity and respect, working on safe worksites so that we can get this infrastructure built.

You know, I guess I have to be very, very clear about one thing because I think there have been some sentiments that have been pointed in this direction that perhaps members in the opposition caucus support certain lines of thinking, I guess, shall we say, around provincial vetoes. Madam Speaker, that is quite frankly – I'll be honest – one of the silliest ideas I've ever heard. When we're talking about national infrastructure, that is left up to the federal government to decide. That's what they're there for. If we're not going to let them make those decisions, what's the point of having a federal government? I think it's very obvious that a decision like that is not supported at all by the Official Opposition, so hopefully we can maybe put that one to bed a little bit.

I guess, in the end, you know, we have to do what we can here in this province to support this industry. We need to get the product moving. We're certainly constrained by pipelines. We seem to have lots going south. We don't have any going in the other direction. But until then, we should be doing everything we can to get the product moving, and I think we had an opportunity to move some extra volume through rail, but, again, decisions that we've made in the past have been counterproductive in terms of trying to support that industry.

I'm maybe hoping that, going forward, if we're really true to where we're trying to go with this motion, advocating to the federal government about how important this industry is not only to Alberta but to Canada as a driver, we can't be making decisions which are counterproductive to driving that narrative. Hopefully, as we move forward, we might see some of those things change so that we absolutely come at it with a solid case, not only to the federal government but to the world. We have the best product here in Alberta. I think it should be desired by all, but that includes things like building refineries here, making sure that we're supporting our workers, not taking away their benefits, not taking away their pay, and certainly not – as we know, with a lot of workers in the energy sector, spouses tend to work in the public sector, so we don't want to be rolling wages back like that.

I'm happy to move forward in supporting this motion. I hope my other colleagues in the House will also support this moving forward.

The Deputy Speaker: I will invite the Member for Central Peace-Notley to close debate.

Mr. Loewen: Okay. Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. In closing on this debate, I guess, obviously, this motion, Motion 508, is an important motion to really send a message to Ottawa and to our Prime Minister about how important the . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. member, I apologize for interrupting you. There's been some confusion. There are three minutes left in debate before we close debate, so the hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I will try to keep it short. I had a lot to say about the importance of Alberta's oil and gas and the benefit that it brings to this country and to this nation and to this province and to the world, but it's been drawn to my attention that not everybody in this province, not everybody in this Legislature necessarily agrees that this oil and gas industry is an important oil and gas industry. It's been drawn to my attention that there is at least one member in this Legislative Assembly, from St. Albert, that seems to be able to tweet, and I quote, "So, who is responsible for putting up special interest group advertising in the [legislative] windows?" Since when is defending Alberta oil and gas a special-interest group? Since when is defending the jobs of my constituents a special-interest group?

Madam Speaker, my constituents are hurting. Businesses are going bankrupt. My next-door neighbours moved this past weekend back to the east because they no longer had jobs in what was once a thriving community. It's not up to special-interest groups to defend; it's the people of Alberta that are rising to defend this province and its oil and its gas industry. It would be a great thing if the members of this Legislature all understood that it is part of our responsibility in this Legislature to defend the interests of all Albertans, especially in the oil and gas industry.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, there are two minutes left in this debate. Are there any members wishing to speak? The hon. Minister of Transportation.

Mr. McIver: Well, thank you. I'm very proud to stand up in support of this motion from the hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Lac La Biche, moved by the hon. Member for Grande Prairie, to support our key industry. You know what? Every other part of Canada has a key industry that they support. I think of the auto industry in Ontario. I think of the dairy industry or aerospace in Quebec. I think of forestry in B.C. although Alberta is strong in that area, too. I think they're pretty unanimous in supporting their industries, and Alberta ought to be unanimous in supporting our key industry; not only that, we should support other provinces' key industry, and frankly, they should support ours because we are in it together, Madam Speaker.

This motion actually speaks to the heart of what makes Alberta great and, by extension, what makes Canada great. It is working together, making the most out of the gifts that we were given in this land. Nobody from Alberta put the oil and gas, other minerals, and resources here, but our job is to responsibly extract them, making the world a better place. In fact, we've come to the place where we actually lower emissions when the world uses more Alberta natural gas and oil as compared to other nations. We actually raise the world's average rate of responsibility, of human rights as compared to other oil-producing nations. We should be proud of this. We should be working together on it.

This motion really speaks to showing some pride in how it's responsibly extracting our resources by having high levels of human rights, high levels of safety and worker rights, that in Alberta we're showing the world how to do it properly. We invite everyone from across Canada and, really, around the world to support us on this because our responsible energy industry truly is raising the bar. I hope in this Legislature we all support that.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, pursuant to Standing Order to 8(3) the mover of the motion has five minutes to close debate. The hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. Again, I think this is such an important motion to send a message to Ottawa and to our Prime Minister on the importance of the oil and gas sector and the oil sands not only just to Alberta but to all of Canada and all of Canadians. We know how much of an economic driver it is to our country, and obviously the importance is – one thing, I think, that struck me. Maybe I mentioned it before in the House. When Fort McMurray had suffered that horrible fire, they shut down the oil sands for, I think, two and a half weeks because of the fire. It actually made a noticeable difference in our GDP, the Canadian GDP. To think that two and a half weeks made a noticeable difference to the Canadian GDP, and we have people running around suggesting we shut this down, that it should be phased out or something.

I think that, obviously, you know, it's insulting to our intelligence to think that somebody could think that that's good for Canada, to shut down this and to cause our oil and gas industry harm by slowing down pipelines and causing all Canadians to suffer from a lack of revenue by selling our products at reduced prices, a product that benefits all Canadians.

Now, we heard the members opposite talk about some things that were I guess I'll just say bizarre. I mean, we had the Member for Calgary-McCall spreading all sorts of misinformation and suggesting that we haven't done anything on this side of the House on bills C-48 and C-69. We know what happened during that time period when those ones were hitting Ottawa and Parliament. The NDP waited till it was too late to react, and they only reacted after pressure from us when we were in opposition. Now they're suggesting that we didn't do anything.

Just before the last election they came up with this oil-by-rail scheme that they had that was going to cost Albertans billions of dollars, billions of dollars to do something that was obviously a last-minute ploy to try to win an election.

We also know that many of the members on the other side of the House, the NDP members, have actively protested the oil and gas sector and pipelines in the past. We know what happened when Northern Gateway was cancelled; they did nothing. They celebrated, if they did anything. We know what happened when Energy East was cancelled; they did nothing. We know that when Obama vetoed Keystone XL, they did nothing. Now, of course, they're sitting there trying to talk like they're champions of the oil and gas sector and pipelines, and we know that we lost three pipelines during their tenure in government.

The Member for Edmonton-Decore talked about: why aren't we refining products here? Well, we still need pipelines once we refine the products to get them anywhere, and we need industry to come in and invest in Alberta. But based on their policies of higher taxes and crazy amounts of regulations and protesting pipelines, these industries haven't come into Alberta to do more refining here because they created a business environment that was unfriendly.

We know that we see the NDP in British Columbia trying to block a pipeline. We see the NDP all across Canada, in fact, their leader in this last federal election, actively campaigning against our oil and gas sector, and that's the same party. So, Madam Speaker, that's the problem we have in this House, these anti oil and gas activists, some of which sit across the aisle from us here right now. That's what's causing the trouble in our oil and gas sector.

We need to realize and we need to stand together and we need to respect each other's, I guess, opinions as we go forward. We need to go forward together and go to Ottawa and make sure that we support our oil and gas sector, not just for the benefit of Alberta but for all Canadians. We celebrate when other parts of the country do well with their products, right from coast to coast, and they need to celebrate with us, too. We need to stand together in this Legislature. We need to support our oil and gas industry. We need to support the oil sands.

We know that there's a world-wide need for our oil and gas products, which are produced under the most environmentally friendly conditions, labour friendly. We know it's the best oil and gas in the world, and we need to be producing more of it here if we want to do something for the environment and for the world. Of course, we need to stand together. We need to push back on Ottawa on this situation, where they're trying to restrict our rights to move our product to market.

Thank you very much, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, on the motion as moved by the Member for Central Peace-Notley on behalf of the Member for Fort McMurray-Lac La Biche.

[The voice vote indicated that Motion Other than Government Motion 508 carried]

[Several members rose calling for a division. The division bell was rung at 4:04 p.m.]

[Fifteen minutes having elapsed, the Assembly divided]

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 19

Technology Innovation and Emissions Reduction Implementation Act, 2019

[Adjourned debate October 31: Mr. Schow]

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I'm pleased to rise to respond to Bill 19, the Technology Innovation and Emissions Reduction Implementation Act, 2019, TIER legislation, introduced in this House to deal with the very serious and pressing issues of climate change in our environment and here in the province. I'm going to give my initial responses to Bill 19 here at second reading, and I look forward to having the opportunity to speak in more depth through the process that this bill will undertake in Committee of the Whole and so forth. For initial reactions to Bill 19, it's my view that this bill makes it clear that the UCP is not taking climate change seriously and that there are a number of areas within Bill 19 where we are taking serious steps backwards when it comes to efficiency, when it comes to making sure we're taking seriously the very real challenge that climate change presents to us and to our Earth.

We do want to be the most environmentally friendly producer of natural resources, and to do that, we need to do better. What the UCP has presented within Bill 19 is a plan that reduces emissions less than the plan put forward under our government. As I respond to Bill 19, Madam Speaker, I will be speaking at points about the climate leadership plan that this plan replaces because with the climate leadership plan, Alberta was on track to cut more than 50 megatonnes of emissions over the next 10 years and reduce methane emissions from industry by 45 per cent by 2025. This new plan, although in places there are similar pieces – and I will speak to that – does not reduce emissions to the same level that the climate leadership plan would have.

My first critique of this plan is that it is taking a step backwards and not moving as far as we would like to see because this plan is entirely focused on innovation. Innovation is a very important piece. A point I would like to make, Madam Speaker, is that under our climate leadership plan funds were being reinvested into innovation to the same extent that we see here in the TIER plan. Support for innovation, we agree, is very important. But as well as that support for innovation, we also had so many other initiatives and spending in other areas on top of just innovation. Instead, what we're seeing is an environment that is less friendly to innovation through the implementation of Bill 19 and then through Budget 2019 and some of the many, many cuts that we've seen.

From the beginning, Madam Speaker, when we were in government and even now in opposition, we have been incredibly clear that we do not believe as an Official Opposition that the environment and the economy should be pitted against one another. We need to work to support both the economy and the environment, and there are very clear ways that we can do that through engaging with stakeholders and working with them. I was very proud to be part of the climate leadership plan process, where we moved the industrial carbon emission policy that was in place already when we first came to government, a carbon tax, I might mention to you, Madam Speaker, and the carbon competitiveness incentive regulation, where a great deal of very detailed work went into place to make sure that we could really move the dial and reduce emissions in our province and do so in partnership with industry.

As I mentioned, Alberta has had that price on carbon since 2007, and since that time all the revenues collected have been dedicated to innovation and green initiatives. I think that has been incredibly positive for this province, both in 2007 under the industrial carbon emission policies and after we made the changes in 2015 and created the carbon competitiveness incentive regulation.

What happens with Bill 19, though, Madam Speaker, is that the funds collected are no longer going to be dedicated to innovation and green initiatives. Instead, they will become part of general revenue: a plan that does not invest more in innovation and, instead, reduces the spending in some of those green initiatives, reduces supports for jobs in our renewable sectors. One of the things I was incredibly proud of with our climate leadership plan was that it supported more than 7,300 jobs in just the first two years with thousands of jobs still to come on the construction for various CLP projects and innovation initiatives. That is a big part of what this plan in Bill 19 is missing.

Now, within Bill 19 there are essentially two different implementations. For the electricity sector, which is the largest source of emissions in our province, Bill 19 will move forward the management of the electricity sector in a very similar way to how our government implemented it through the carbon competitiveness incentive regulation. For that I'm very supportive, because I think we got things right when it came to electricity and greenhouse gas emissions and how we can make sure that we are appropriately pricing while not driving business out of the province and appropriately accounting for the cost of greenhouse gas emissions and incenting good behaviour.

Again, I will repeat that the TIER plan is a carbon tax, a continuation of that price on carbon that Alberta has had since 2007, and in the case of the electricity sector it continues the implementation of the carbon competitiveness incentive regulation that was put into place under our government.

On the other side, though, Madam Speaker, oil sands and other sources, the environmental standards have been significantly weakened compared to the climate leadership plan. Wanting to make sure that we are putting our best foot forward, making sure that we are reducing emissions wherever possible, I have to compare and contrast that under the climate leadership plan there were going to be 50 megatonnes of CO<sub>2</sub> reductions over 10 years. Under this Bill 19 plan, I understand through the technical briefings and what I've read in the media so far, there's a suggestion that it'll be 32 megatonnes. There's a big difference, a lot of space between those two numbers, and that's one of the concerns that I have for Bill 19 and this implementation.

Again, on the electricity side things are looking positive. It kept a lot of the important work that was done under the preceding CCIR system. But on the oil sands and other sources, the large emissions, we're seeing a real change in direction here and the assumption that perhaps this government does not take climate change as seriously as it should be taken.

Those are some of my initial thoughts of the Bill 19 implementation. But I do want to really remark again on the fact that money raised through the work in Bill 19 will be placed into general revenue rather than used to support green initiatives, used to support other items that can be used to reduce greenhouse gas emissions throughout the province. We're still charging this new carbon tax. TIER is what we're calling it now. We're undoing a lot of the good work that was done under the climate leadership plan, that really led to the jobs and the greenhouse gas reductions. The new, replacement carbon tax is going to put the money into general revenue, where it will be absorbed to pay for the $4.7 billion handout to large, profitable corporations and spent on items like the energy war room, to plan attacks on Twitter perhaps but not as a dedicated pool of resources to help green the economy, to help support jobs in renewable industries, to help support the amazing programming that was done with indigenous communities.

As my colleague the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford has mentioned, all 48 First Nations and all Métis settlements were able to take advantage, through the climate leadership plan, of supports for their communities to do local projects to help not only their financial viability but to help reduce greenhouse gas emissions of these different communities. We're missing that from this plan, that sharing of the benefits, sharing of that opportunity to reduce greenhouse gas emissions throughout Alberta.

Making sure that we continue to make progress on climate change and to implement good policies is so important. Whereas there are some positive aspects to Bill 19, on the whole I believe it misses the mark because although there's innovation funding within the bill, roughly the same amount that there would have been through the climate leadership plan, we've also just seen a number of cuts to innovation, to science, to universities, to support for innovative businesses with the cuts, that we will be discussing when we discuss Bill 20, to the innovation tax credits that had been set up. We really do need to look at Bill 19 in the context of all of the larger changes as well.

Now, during the federal election the federal Conservative Party did put forward a very TIER-like plan, and it received a great deal of criticism for not being strong enough on the measures that we need to take forward. I think that's certainly an interesting comment going forward.

I appreciate, in the electricity sector, the work that was done with the climate leadership plan, very, very detailed work, working with individual companies, working with the entire industry and a lot of very complicated data and modelling. I can assure you, Madam Speaker, as a member who was involved in that process, that the work that the public servants did supporting the changes was phenomenal, and I want to say thank you to everyone who worked on that file and helped to move that forward. Going forward, making sure that electricity facilities still have to meet that good-as-best-gas benchmark is a really key piece, so I certainly support that aspect of Bill 19.

However, again I will say that on the oil sands and other large sectors side we've seen a real step backwards, and that's where that difference between the climate leadership plan, at 50 megatonnes of reduction, and this current plan, which is estimated to be more at 32 megatonnes, comes in, because the electricity side has been left essentially the same. According to the fiscal plan 2019, TIER will cover about 48 per cent of all emissions in Alberta. Implementing TIER will be that positive step forward: that is kind of how the press release went. But it's a reduction in emissions removal, from the 50 that was in the climate leadership plan to this new plan that we see in front of us.

I think we need to continue to hold the government to account when they say that they are serious in taking climate change as a challenge that they're willing to tackle. This plan does not go far enough, and although there are some positives, overall my concerns around how this plan will be implemented, my concerns around how the funds will be spent and absorbed into the general revenue of this government – the removal of so many of the climate leadership plan initiatives, that led to the creation of over 7,000 jobs, has me quite concerned. As I've said – but I will emphasize – the reduction in emissions does not go far enough, in my opinion, in this TIER plan.

Making sure that all Albertans are aware of what's happening when it comes to this plan, I think, is really important because these decisions, this policy framework that's set out are incredibly complicated. During the course of this debate, from second reading into Committee of the Whole, I certainly am looking forward to being able to talk about some of the more nuanced differences within this plan and frame the debate around what we are trying to achieve and the measures that we are taking to achieve that. In reading the coverage initially from reporters, it's clear that this complicated policy, when it is boiled down, when I talk to people . . .

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. The hon. Minister of Transportation.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to rise under 29(2)(a) on Bill 19. I was interested in the hon. member's comments, but I think the hon. member and, unfortunately, the whole NDP need to think bigger. They are talking about a perceived or real difference between the number of megatonnes locally reduced – and I'm not saying that that doesn't matter, because it's an important issue. But you know what? I think the hon. members across there might even agree that when you're talking about emissions, the air that we're protecting is world-wide; it's not just Alberta air.

Innovation is actually the key to success. For example, using the climate change leadership plan which the NDP had in place, their goal was to drive Alberta emissions to zero. Let's even say that they were going to drive Canadian emissions to zero. Well, statistically that would reduce the world-wide emissions by 1.6 per cent. The wildest, greatest thing that they could possibly accomplish with the NDP's plan is to reduce the world-wide emissions by 1.6 per cent. We're focused on innovation. It's not going to take much innovation on a world-wide basis to reduce emissions by more than 1.6 per cent world-wide. Unfortunately, the NDP are too insular. They're thinking too small. They're thinking in their province instead of world-wide.

You know, people didn't switch from horses because horses don't work anymore. They moved from horses to cars because the innovation that created cars, that could go farther, go faster, and meet people's needs, was better. If somebody had focused on, "Well, how can we make horses faster?" and all the effort went into making horses faster, no one would have invented the car. Beyond that, it's through the innovation after that that cars went from five miles per gallon to 10 miles per gallon to 20 miles per gallon to 40 miles per gallon. You see, Madam Speaker, how innovation, if you think bigger and if you actually plant the seeds to create the better future of the world – a plan that is about innovation does that.

Even the former plan, the SGER, which was really focused on innovation, too, created things like carbon capture and storage, which a lot of people questioned, but today it actually helps the wells that are in the ground to produce more energy while using less water, to be more efficient and multiply those efforts over and over and over again.

But the NDP's drive to the bottom, to essentially sacrifice the Canadian economy so that we can virtue signal to the rest of the world that we're better people than them, wasn't really going to get us where we need to go. We actually need an innovation plan where Alberta can be part of leading the world, where we as part of the TIER program can innovate and create new technologies that will make the world more efficient and do the things that we need to do: keep people warm in the winter, motivate people from point A to point B in a car or whatever the next vehicle that people ride in is called. It might be a car for a long time; maybe somebody that's 15 years old now will invent something called something other than a car. The point is that innovation is the key. That's why this is an important step forward.

Again, I was a little amused by the hon. member talking about some of the money going into general revenue when the NDP's plan, when they went from $30 to $50, was to put 100 per cent of that into general revenue and nothing into innovation. Heck, they weren't even going to buy any more light bulbs, which will burn out, or any more shower heads. It was all going to go into general revenue while with our plan we will be focusing on making industry more innovative, creating technologies that could spread across the world. A very small percentage of emissions out of the United States, out of Europe, out of China, out of India using Alberta-made innovation in the future will make a much bigger, world-wide difference on emissions, potentially, than 1.6 per cent. We're actually giving a chance for that to happen. Buying light bulbs won't get that done. Buying shower heads won't get that done.

The previous government's plan actually punished Albertans for staying warm in the winter. They punished municipalities. They punished charities. They punished seniors. They punished schools. They punished families for buying groceries, for goodness' sake. This is something that actually looks wider in recognizing that the airshed and the emissions that we're trying to protect have to be thought of as bigger than Alberta and bigger than Canada if we're actually going to make a difference in the world. Consequently . . . [Mr. McIver's speaking time expired] Oh, I'm out of time.

The Deputy Speaker: Well, are there any other speakers to the bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday.

Mr. Carson: Well, thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It's an honour to rise and speak to Bill 19, the emissions management and climate resilience act, otherwise known as TIER legislation, as this UCP campaigned on in their platform. I appreciate that we're seeing the context of this legislation now and some of the information provided, and I'm very concerned. I mean, notwithstanding what we just heard from the Minister of Transportation, which I'm very concerned about – I mean, we heard things like, “Well, it doesn't make a difference if we don't do anything because it's more about the world context,” which is very concerning for me because it's essentially signalling that, one, he doesn't necessarily believe that we need to take strong action against climate change, which is very concerning, and two, that he doesn't believe that Alberta necessarily has a part in the world context, which is also very concerning.

I'm worried to hear this kind of virtue signalling from the government. I think that we owe it to the next generation of people in our province and across the world to take action, recognizing that, of course, climate change is going to affect us here in the province of Alberta, but it is going to have massive impacts on third-world countries, even more so. That's very concerning, that we stand here in this House and look at how it's going to affect our population but often not recognizing or not speaking to the fact that, you know, droughts are going to expand and flooding is going to expand. It's going to be harder to insure not only our province but other regions around the world, and what that is going to do to less fortunate populations than our own – I'm very concerned to hear that.

Once again, what we see in this TIER legislation is that the UCP is not taking climate change seriously. It is disappointing, really, to see that the UCP is presenting a plan that reduces emissions less than the previous plan under the NDP government. There were signals from the environment minister that somehow this would reduce as much as or more even than what we proposed, which is, as we can see from these details, not true at all.

It really is unfortunate that the government will use TIER to finance the $4.7 billion no-jobs corporate handout. The minister once again spoke about the fact that they think it's okay to put this into general revenue with no strings attached, but the fact is, you know, that the minister wants to point out that we took that money, but we invested it. We have cold, hard numbers and facts to show where that money was going. Unfortunately, under this UCP government we are not going to see that.

The minister spoke at length about innovations. Once again, not through this legislation, not through the TIER legislation, nor throughout the entirety of the platform or the platform that this government has brought forward are we seeing any dollars – or very few, if any – attached to innovation.

For one, we're seeing cuts to advanced education, which is very concerning. We want to talk about innovation for the next generation. Well, if you start making it harder for students to go to school and start increasing their taxes on the loans that they're taking out, well, there's not going to be as much innovation and not as many people going to postsecondary, getting postsecondary education. That's very concerning.

Also very concerning is the fact that this government has not provided any dollars to local communities, whether it's community leagues or municipalities, to actually reduce emissions through government buildings or through community league buildings, which is something that we took great pride in being able to move forward. The fact is that communities want to be a part of the solution, and unfortunately this government is not letting that happen.

Now, as the Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods pointed out, there are two pieces to this: the electric side, which largely mimics what our NDP government put forward through our plan – and I can appreciate that once in a blue moon this government gets things right, so thank you for that – but unfortunately, on the other side of the conversation, the emissions reductions that are seen in this TIER legislation are not what they need to be. The fact is that this government is actually incentivizing bigger polluters or is actually going to give bigger polluters more money than the companies that are looking to actually reduce their emissions, which is very concerning to me.

The fact is that we need to incentivize new operations to reduce their emissions, and that is not what we are seeing under this TIER legislation. It's a concern that was brought forward by Andrew Leach, a respected environmental economist and professor at the U of A, which has not been addressed by this legislation. From U of A? U of C? Now I'm confusing myself. Either way, of course, Andrew Leach worked very hard to help us with our climate leadership plan, work that we greatly appreciated, alongside industry, nonprofit organizations. Unfortunately, his work is falling on deaf ears under this government, so that's very concerning.

Now, once again, Alberta has paid a price on carbon since 2007, and since that time all revenues collected have been dedicated to innovation and green initiatives, which, once again, we are seeing disappear under this UCP government. As we saw in the budget, the government does not actually support innovation, as I talked about with cuts to Advanced Education, in terms of cuts to tax credits that were spurring innovation, the capital investor tax credit being one of them. It is very concerning that there is little to no signal from this government that they believe in innovation at all.

Once again, $20 million from the revenue that's coming from the TIER program is also going to the Canadian Energy Centre, $80 million over four years. Now, that's money that could have been invested in reducing emissions, whether it be for these large emitters or whether it be for households. I mean, this government goes on at length about the fact that our NDP government took action to reduce household emissions. We provided incentives for people to reduce emissions, and it's quite frustrating that this government doesn't recognize the importance of programs like that. One of the most important ways to reduce emissions across our province is to promote personal opportunities or opportunities for individuals to reduce their emissions. We saw something like $500 million, $600 million in reduced costs to Albertans, so it was no small reduction in costs. It's frustrating that this government is not going to move forward with any kind of plan to reduce individual household emissions.

Now, once again, the government cut significantly from innovation in other parts of the budget. AI funding was cut by $100 million to $40 million: the AITC program, the digital media tax credit program, and funding to science in various departments. Once again this government is talking out of one side of their mouth and saying that they believe in the innovations and future innovations of this province, but on the other hand they're removing any incentive to actually be innovative as an organization or as a person. So that's very concerning.

Now, the minister also made the point that we were looking to reduce emissions to zero per cent and, once again, that we're only 1.9 per cent of the world emissions, which really just goes to show that the minister doesn't really believe that we need to take any action, which is very frustrating for myself and my constituents. I have people coming to me often very concerned about the implications of the future of climate change. We've heard discussions in this House and throughout the world that if we don't take action within the next decade, there are going to be catastrophic implications. That's very concerning for me, and it's concerning that we aren't having real conversations in this House about what that means. So when we talk about not moving forward on innovation, that's very frustrating for me.

We do have great opportunities in places like automation to reduce our emissions, but unfortunately this government has not provided any signal that we are going to be moving forward in that direction.

Once again, I just want to say that I do not support what we're seeing here. I think that the legislation that came before this was overall just better legislation in terms of taking action against climate change, reducing emissions, providing incentives to our communities and large emitters to take action to reduce those emissions, so I will most definitely not be supporting this legislation. I think that this UCP government should really go back to the drawing board.

One of my other main concerns is the fact that there is no price on carbon for regular Albertans, which is fine in itself, of course. This government ran on a platform to get rid of the personal carbon tax for households. My concern is what signal this is going to send to the federal government. Whether you support a price on carbon for individuals or not, the fact is that the federal government is looking to take action on this. The fact that there is no plan provided by the UCP shows that, well, we will be going to court, more than likely in the very near future. My concern is what that is going to cost Albertans. Once again, that's fine. You know, this UCP government will stand up and say that they won their mandate on removing that, but the fact is that Albertans and Canadians are going to be pitted against each other at a cost of millions of dollars. At the end of the day, the federal government does, as far as I know, have the jurisdiction to impose a price on carbon on us. When that inevitably happens, the UCP is not going to have a plan for that, which is also very concerning to myself and to many of my constituents.

Once again, I don't think that the right balance has been struck here in Bill 19. There are small portions, like the electricity side, that largely mimic what we had put forward in our climate leadership action plan. Unfortunately, it just does not strike the right balance for environment and industry.

So, once again, I will not be supporting Bill 19. I appreciate the time to speak to that today.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. Are there any members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

Mr. Neudorf: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm just very concerned about the member opposite totally misconstruing our Minister of Transportation's comments. The Minister of Transportation was pointing out that technology innovation is what is actually going to help the whole globe, not just what we're doing here in Alberta. This TIER fund and Bill 19 speak to reducing emissions by 10 per cent by the year 2020 and by 1 per cent for the years following that. If we could see that around the world, that 10 per cent target, if just the U.S.A. took some of the innovation and technology that we've developed here in Alberta and applied it to their emissions, that alone would be almost the same amount as all of Canada emits, just a 10 per cent reduction in American emissions. If we were to take the top five emitters around the world and reduce their emissions by 10 per cent, that would be three and a half times the entire output of Canada. Three and a half times.

I think they missed the point that the leadership that Alberta can show with our technology, with our innovations, by reducing our emissions by 10 per cent, by being world leaders and applying that research and technology around the globe, will have multiple times the effect of what we would just do by punishing every household here in Alberta.

The other point that I would just like to raise, Madam Speaker, is that he raised a worry about the federal carbon tax that is going to be coming in in Alberta. At least we're fighting against that. But that federal carbon tax is not as onerous or as painful as the one that they themselves put in place. I find it very ironic that they speak to those worries and concerns as they're speaking against the very plan that they had put in place four years ago.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday.

Mr. Carson: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I simply was pointing out the fact that the Minister of Transportation was talking about moving forward on innovation, but unfortunately we have seen zero commitment to innovation through this provincial UCP government. That is a concern for me. I think it's a concern that I share with many Albertans. I'm sorry that the member did not necessarily agree with that.

Now, once again, this member went on to talk about the fact that other jurisdictions can do more than we can. He's trying to take away from the fact that we need to take action, which is very concerning for me. We're hearing this from many members of this government, and it's really the wrong direction to take. So it's unfortunate that he believes that.

Now, once again, the fact is that this member now sounds like he supports the federal Liberal price on carbon more than a made-in-Alberta one. That's something that he will have to take up with his own members. But the fact is that under our plan two-thirds of low-income Albertans actually received a rebate. It covered more than what they were paying into it. The fact is that we had a made-in-Alberta approach. It sounds like the UCP supports a made-in-Ottawa approach, which is very frustrating. Hopefully, he can clarify those comments in the future.

Once again, I will not be supporting Bill 19 as far as I can tell. I wish that there was more action taken on emissions reduction. I mean, it's in the title, but it's not in the details. Once again, I hope that this government will reconsider their commitment to technology innovation and emissions reduction, as in the title of this legislation, and go back to the drawing board.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thanks, Madam Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and speak to Bill 19, Technology Innovation and Emissions Reduction Implementation Act, 2019. Before I begin just some of my comments on this piece of legislation, I just wanted to note that I think it's sort of sad that we've arrived at a place where it seems like we have to take a loyalty pledge about oil and gas.

Let me just be crystal clear about what I believe. I do believe that the oil and gas sector essentially built Alberta. I think we can't drive by a school or a hospital or any major infrastructure project and not understand that the benefits that we all received as Albertans are because of the oil and gas sector. That's really important. Our oil and gas sector workers are vitally important as they have essentially built this province. So let me just be clear on that. I do think it's possible to support this sector and to want to get the absolute best price for our product while recognizing that climate change is very real and that, in fact, it's a crisis and that we can do both things: address the immediacy of the problem but also the opportunities that it presents while supporting this sector. I just wanted to put that out there.

Just on a personal note, I think that this building, steeped in tradition, is really the people's House. I think that advertising of any kind for any sector – and there are many valuable sectors in this province – is not a democratic thing to do. This is the people's House.

All that aside, I just want to speak to this legislation. You know, Alberta has had a price on carbon since 2007 – I think we all know that – and since that time all revenues collected have been dedicated to innovation and green initiatives until now. While we, the NDP government, used the Nobel prize winning strategy of carbon pricing, or putting a price on pollution, we also distributed rebates to up to 60 per cent of Alberta families while deliberately funding an energy transition, realizing that we were capable of doing a couple of different things at once.

I just would like to say something about the rebates. Now, I understand, you know, that in putting all of the revenues into general revenue and with less transparency about investment in rebates, it does have an impact on people. One of the things that the rebate did was to take the cost of energy and calculate sort of what people could afford in terms of their incomes and what they were using. It sort of redistributed, in a way, to lower income families. Let me give you an example of somebody on AISH, let's say. They don't live on a lot. They live on just over $1,600 a month. For them, in getting that rebate – they were being rebated because they were using less and their incomes were low – they actually started to rely on that a little bit, the little bit of extra money that they received. So there is an impact to the changes that we made.

More than anything, a smart energy transition means that we have to address climate change, and when I say "address climate change," I don't just mean we have to immediately address the realities of climate change but that we have to take advantage of the amazing opportunities that are presenting themselves, because they're everywhere. But, like I said earlier, while we do these things, we continue to push and advocate to ensure that we get the best price for our product while there is a demand.

It's important to remember the federal campaign – you all like to talk about the federal campaign in here a lot – where their TIER policy was also introduced. I think the general consensus was that that particular plan was taking climate change not seriously at all. I would agree with that comment. Government has said that this plan will reduce emissions by five megatonnes less in 2024 under their TIER plan than under the preceding plan, the carbon competitiveness incentive regulation. Well, we were on track to reduce 50 megatonnes over the next 10 years, and the UCP plans to reduce emissions by 32 megatonnes. That's almost a 50 per cent drop. Government department staff have suggested 32 additional megatonnes will be reduced without innovation, and our plan was 50. Government is betting on innovation being able to reduce emissions by 57 megatonnes, and using that same assumption, our plan was forecast to reduce by 76 megatonnes.

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

This act gives the minister the power to change the price per tonne by ministerial order. Now, I mean, we can debate this, whether or not that's a good idea. Given the fact that you do have an enormous mandate – we hear that a lot – and that you have a majority, you can pass legislation. But I do think it's important to democratically talk about the decisions that we're making about our energy sector and about Albertans. You know, putting it away in a cabinet room and making decisions by ministerial order I would suggest is not the best way to go. Previously it was through legislation that we made. You may not have agreed with us at the time, but we debated in the light of day for a very long time.

According to this government's fiscal plan their TIER plan will only cover 48 per cent of emissions. Implementing TIER will lead to $0.7 billion in lost revenue to the government coffers by 2022-23, and $20 million of TIER will go to the Premier's seemingly pet project, the Canadian Energy Centre, also affectionately known as the war room or snitch line.

As I said earlier, I don't believe that this can be all or nothing: climate change or supporting the oil and gas sector. I believe that we have to do both well at the same time. I think we hear it all the time. We hear it from scientists. We hear it from leaders in this sector as well. If we fail to do that and if we go along this path that seems to be carved for us, it's this partisan debate of us versus them when it's about all of us. It's about Albertans. It's about our future. It's our collective future. It's not about what kind of party membership you hold. The reality is that, like it or not, climate change and the opportunities it presents but also the dangers it presents will impact all of us and all of our families.

I actually think there's a problem with funds not being dedicated specifically to an energy transition. Again, when I talk about transition, these are long-term transitions with goals that extend likely well beyond the time that we will be in this House, but it's about taking advantage of it right now. It's investment in other sectors, and that means job creation. We know that we're shedding jobs. I'm not pointing fingers, but the reality is that there are enormous pressures on every sector right now, and we know that with clean energy, green energy, whatever you want to call it, different energy, there are so many opportunities in terms of job creation, and our failure to act on that, to act responsibly on that, will be our peril, all of our peril, all Albertans.

There is job security in these jobs. We know this. Who doesn't know an oil and gas sector worker? I certainly know many, and I've seen the toll that the incredibly long hours take, the stress of not knowing sometimes if they're going to go back or if there's going to be another bust cycle that is going to devastate the reality of their work. It's difficult. They're away from their families for long periods of time, and I'm incredibly grateful to these men and women for the work that they do, but it takes a toll, and there are other opportunities. Albertans have the skill and the desire to build a sustainable energy system.

I get that change is difficult. I get that. I see it every day. But the reality of climate change, which, I would suggest, is a crisis and which I believe is a crisis, is that it requires us to look at the facts and to look at the science. I am not a scientist, but I do believe in science, that emissions impact our well-being and our health. We know this. This is fact. Emissions impact our health, the health of our communities, the health of our children, and the health of our future.

Climate change doesn't start forest fires. It doesn't start floods. It doesn't create hurricanes or anything like that, but scientists have told us for decades that they make these very challenging weather events more difficult. They last longer. They're more severe. They're more frequent. This is based on science, actual science. Our failure to listen to these scientists: history will not look kindly on us. We should be investing in innovation. We should be investing in science and research.

You know, sadly I look at the government's budget and, again, climate change impacts every single sector, from agriculture to environment to postsecondary. This is the time of a lot of challenges and opportunities, when we need to be investing in research and in science, and sadly I think that these sweeping cuts in so many of these sectors, so many of these ministries are going to create long-term risk.

I spoke a little bit earlier about a just transition for workers and seizing the opportunities to create different jobs, additional jobs, but economic transitions are very difficult. They need to be guided by a government focused on the end goal and not the political, personal agenda. You know, I was reading an article, I think it was yesterday or today, about some of the coal workers in the United States. Some of the really poor communities in the southern part of the United States were completely reliant on the coal industry. In fact, the community was likely built up as a result of this initial investment in coal, and people started working and all of those things. What has happened – and it's happening all over the world – is that coal is being phased out slowly. Ultimately, it harms workers the most initially. It harms the workers, it harms their families, and it harms communities. It does. We see the devastation.

I was reading about this devastation, these hundreds of workers now left without employment in a community that was really solely relying on this industry. They don't have health care. They don't have pensions. They don't have work. They don't know where to go. It's happening in states all over. I mean, we will see it happen in more and more places. So I think it's incumbent on all of us to recognize this and to start investing in these workers because they deserve our support and investment. These are the workers, as I said earlier, that built this province. They have so many transferable skills that we can work with them to ensure that they are not left behind, because they're important.

Emissions in Alberta. I think I heard earlier somebody making fun of light bulbs, which – I get it – has been a long-standing UCP joke about: "Oh, my God. NDPs like paying for light bulbs." Sure, it sounds a little bit silly, but I think you have to look at the larger move to energy efficiency. That was something to stimulate something. But let's talk about the little LED light bulb, shall we? I mean, they're not that expensive, but it's a way of saying to people: you can do this one little thing, and look what happens. Actually, when you use an LED light, you are reducing the energy needed for that light by 85 per cent, and only 5 per cent of that light bulb is lost or wasted to heat. That seems pretty innovative to me.

I know that there were a number of nonprofit organizations – I know people like to talk about, "Oh, it devastated nonprofits." Certainly, did people feel cost pressures? Yes. That was a reality. Absolutely, it was a reality. I appreciate that. What it also did was allow people to look at their nonprofit to say: "What can I do to make this better? How can I reduce the energy that I use in order to save more money to invest in the front-line supports that I need to deliver?"

For example, a homeless shelter. Let's say a homeless shelter takes on this project to look at: what are the things we can do to invest in this structure, in this place, in the way that we do business so that we save more money so we can spend more money on the purpose, and that is housing people that don't have places to sleep. That's just an example. I do know of a number of nonprofits that took advantage of energy audits and actually did some work, some of the really simple things that they were able to do, and reported back that it was a cost saving. For me, a nonprofit saving money on energy bills is a great idea because those funds get put right back into the purpose of their organization.

Like the federal TIER plan, I don't believe that this legislation goes far enough. I think it needs to address all emission emitters. Certainly, large emitters are a focus, but residential emissions, emissions from our vehicles, our SUVs, all of those things need to be included, and that includes investment, energy efficiency, and taking real steps.

You know, I do talk about climate change a lot because I think it's important and I think that there are enormous opportunities in front of us. One of the things that I've always been amazed by Albertans from every sector is their ingenuity, their ability to work hard, and their ability to get things done. I believe given the opportunity to do a few things at the same time is to look at: let's do everything we can to support this sector, get the best price for our product, and move forward.

The Acting Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. I believe the individual who caught my attention is the hon. Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat.

Ms Glasgo: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I do appreciate this opportunity to rise under 29(2)(a). I know how important it is that we support our oil and gas sector and also our environment at the same time. I'm an avid outdoorswoman, and my family, we spend a lot of time in the outdoors, so I definitely know how important it is to make sure that we're preserving our lands and everything else.

What really bothers me is that this conversation has been centred around balance. Well, this is exactly what balance is, Mr. Speaker. This is a targeted plan that will actually reduce emissions. We know that when the former Premier was on TV, she couldn't even point to how her carbon tax did that. At the end of the day, we all know that she actually didn't have a plan to reduce emissions at all. We have more needless grandstanding on this issue, when, really, I think the economy and the environment should be something that we are, you know, not really that too far different on at the end of the day. It does impact all Albertans.

You know, the carbon tax was a cash grab, whereas this is actually getting put toward something that will actually meaningfully reduce emissions, which is what I think people want. They want to know that the economy and the environment are not pitted against each other, that they're working hand in hand.

I heard a comment about this made-in-Alberta solution and how fantastic and fabulous it is that the NDP brought in their carbon tax, but at the end of the day we had a carbon plan in 2007. We were actually the first jurisdiction to have one, so Alberta has been leading for a long time. So for the NDP to get up and claim that their plan is sacrosanct, it's ridiculous and it's false. I just would encourage them to look back at previous legislation brought forward and how that actually supported that as well.

We need to reassure investors in this province. We've seen investment flee under the previous government, and I believe that we have an obligation to stand up for Alberta workers and Alberta jobs and the jobs in the oil and gas industry. We heard about this from the member before me, and it just is really interesting to me that she would get up and claim to stand for oil and gas workers and claim to know their pain or know what's going on when she considers them to be a special-interest group. I don't believe them to be a special-interest group. I know nobody on the United Conservative government believes them to be a special-interest group. I'm glad that she walked back her statement. I'm glad that she is repenting for that and that she recognizes that her comments were out of touch. I can only hope that her constituents will see that in the next election as well.

You know, when we're talking about this, it's important that we look at this through a larger lens and we look at this through something that is going to be affecting the next generation, which, I mean, many of us have a vested interest in. I want my kids and grandkids to have the beautiful Alberta that I grew up in as well, but I also want them to be able to have economic activity and jobs and a future, and they're not going to have that if we continue to tax people to death. It's ridiculous.

Putting in something like TIER, having something that helps us to be able to lower emissions, to be able to provide a better future for the next generation, that's what's important, Mr. Speaker, certainly not getting up and grandstanding on whose job or whose plan is better. That's not going to get us any further ahead. The NDP have an opportunity right now to actually stand up for the environment and do something meaningful to address climate change. Instead of that, they're choosing to engage in partisan bantering. I guess we just have to get up and respond to that because that's our job.

You know, I'm really interested in hearing more about – I'm sure that we'll continue to hear different sides of this debate and more comments from the NDP, and I'm sure that they'll follow the same talking points of, "The UCP does nothing for the environment," that we're climate change deniers, that we're blah, blah, blah. But, at the end of the day, there is a plan here put forward, and they can choose to support that, or they can choose to sit on that side of the House and ultimately go against the will of Albertans, who voted for this in the general election.

We're taking meaningful action on climate change, Mr. Speaker, and I'm proud of that because I think that we need to preserve, like I said, the land for the next generation. We need to preserve our lands and everything else. Once again, I just can't believe that we are hearing this and that we're being lectured by a member of the opposition caucus who actually stood outside on the steps of the Legislature and accused our fantastic workers of being special-interest groups.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to join debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore has risen.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate you recognizing me here. Well, maybe I'll just say that when we mention things like "grandstanding" – anyway, let's talk about Bill 19, the Technology Innovation and Emissions Reduction Implementation Act, 2019, or what is often being referred to now as TIER legislation. I'm looking at this plan, and, you know, I think that one of the things that we haven't kind of had the opportunity to bring into the conversation is around some of the financial implications of climate change. We've heard the insurance industry say very, very clearly that this is a very serious and major concern for them.

Some of the events that we're seeing take place: these events seem to be getting bigger in size. They're getting more intense in size. We're seeing things like hurricanes reaching some very, very devastating proportions. As we know, this past summer the Bahamas took a very, very major hit in such a way that nobody has ever really seen before. The flooding that occurred, not to mention the wind damage, in that area was absolutely significant. I don't know if we've actually seen a dollar value yet that's been placed on that, but it's something that has now come front and centre for the insurance industry around the implications of that and the costs that they're going to have to start paying out in terms of damages and whatnot.

When you look at Alberta and across Canada, I mean, the reality is that it's not anybody's fault or pointing fingers. It's just the way it is. Out of all of Canada's emissions, Alberta makes up approximately 40 to 45 per cent of those emissions across Canada, so I think that it's incumbent upon Alberta to lead the way and to be able to show everyone, basically, how it's done.

I think that when we were talking earlier around the motion and that whole description – you know, again, I don't understand why Alberta got this, Mr. Speaker, but they just kept calling it the tar sands, and it was so frustrating every time I heard that. What I noticed, again, over the course of time when I was visiting through the different Council of State Governments – Midwest, West, national – we were starting to change the dial, the channel on that narrative and getting them to realize that it's not the tar sands; it's our oil sands. It's our energy sector.

As a matter of fact, I remember being down in Santa Fe, New Mexico, and I actually had a chance to speak with some representatives out of Oregon. By the end of that lunch meeting they were very, very keen to somehow meet with a delegation from here in Alberta. They didn't care whether the delegation went down to Oregon or if they came up. They said: "We've heard about your climate leadership plan, the steps that you have taken. How do we go about duplicating that in our jurisdiction?" It started to lead the conversation about how we can take very meaningful steps towards climate change.

We are seeing events now that are starting to cost us a lot of money as taxpayers. If we're going to be true to that narrative that we're respecting taxpayers' money, we can't be throwing it away simply because, as I think some of the other members have said before, we're almost pitting two things against each other. It's either that we have to work on the economy at the expense of the environment or – you know what? – we've got to work on the environment but at the expense of the economy. Nothing is more inaccurate than that. We can actually do both, but we have to make those meaningful moves. We have to change the channel, change that narrative so it becomes absolutely undeniable that Alberta is the place to get energy needs met.

When I start delving into Bill 19 and I'm seeing some of the, shall we say, less ambitious language around emissions, this is clearly – again, I guess I have to refer back to when we were talking earlier around that motion. We're saying one thing, but then some of our actions over here are kind of counterproductive to that. We're saying, you know, "Absolutely, we are onboard with climate change; we are going to do something about it," yet when we had a plan that, as I said in my own travels, was starting to become the envy of other jurisdictions wanting to duplicate it, now we're coming in underneath it? What kind of message does that send? It sounds like conflicting signals to me, Mr. Speaker. If we want to be taken seriously, if we want to be that destination for our energy products, we have to take a position that is above absolutely all, making it completely undeniable.

I think some of the targets that we have around here, reducing emissions by 57 megatonnes when we could have been reducing them by 76 megatonnes under the language that we currently have – why we would choose to be counterproductive and bring in language that is less sends a signal to other areas that maybe we're just not that serious about it. Then, of course, if we're hoping that they're going to change their habits and their tune, they're going to look back and say: well, Alberta is not, so why should we? I know we don't like to hear that, but that is what tends to happen. It's almost kind of a bit of human nature. We look around us and we go: well, that person over there is not doing that, so maybe we don't need to. We just lead the way, and we will set the conditions for everyone else to follow. It was happening. Others were starting to follow. That simple example of Oregon was that example. Again, with my own eyes and ears, I was surprised.

I am happy, of course, that the government side has chosen to incorporate around some of the electricity that the previous NDP government had put in, but again, you know, instead of taking that high standard, we're choosing to be almost counterproductive to ourselves and going: well, we'll just go under it. Again, it's sending mixed messages.

I know that in communities across Edmonton-Decore there's a lot of – I'll use the example of my community halls. In the community that I live in, Evansdale, the Evansdale Community League, their community hall, now is net zero. It was achieved through the program that the previous government put in. They were able to access funds to be able to go install solar panels on their facility. They changed out their light bulbs. Of course, the Member for St. Albert talked about: yeah, you know, we can make all fun and games about light bulbs. But this made a significant difference in this community hall, and now the league is net zero. They had other leagues now starting to look at them. Here they set the bar, and everybody else started coming around: how can we duplicate what you're doing? They even wanted to try and duplicate it now as a group, maybe even get a better discount on things. It was things like the carbon levy that allowed those groups to be able to access funds, that made it possible for those projects to happen, and it would have made those projects possible for other groups as well. You know, I have yet to hear from the executive of Evansdale Community League regretting the decision, especially when their monthly electricity bill comes in. They were the ones to be able to set the standard.

I did want to quickly talk about the price on carbon Alberta has had since 2007. It's been mentioned by members on both sides, so this is not something new. When the NDP government came in, in 2015, we had a pretty good sneaking suspicion that something higher was going to be coming in at the federal level. What happened is that we chose to make decisions that would work for Alberta, a plan made here in Alberta and that we'd get to manage in Alberta. As a matter of fact, that plan worked so well that when that price on carbon was going to be going up higher at the levels of the federal government, we had complete control of that money.

From a business point of view – and I talked to some of my businessowners within Edmonton-Decore. I asked: does it make smart business sense to give up control of the money; in other words, to let Ottawa make the decisions for us? Yeah, they were going to give us the money back. Absolutely, they were. But they were probably going to be pointing fingers, saying: “This is where the money is going to get spent here, and this is where the money is going to get spent here and over here as well. Oh, what was that? It doesn't quite work for you? I'm sorry to hear that.” We had the ability to make those decisions one hundred per cent, so we started to invest right here, back in Alberta, on things like innovation, something that I certainly heard the Transportation minister talk about going forward, how important innovation is. This is what will drive things. But with decisions we've made now, it seems a little bit counterproductive in terms of the budget, where we don't seem to be going gung-ho on this innovation that's going to change the game, that's going to change the dial on what people are saying and thinking about the jurisdiction of Alberta. Right or wrong, okay? And, yes, they're wrong.

Alberta is the place to come to get your energy needs met, but for some reason they still don't think that's the case. By taking control of that money, we were able to invest, including in our energy sector, to be able to help our biggest emitters bring down their emissions, making them more efficient, bringing down our emissions as Alberta, again, generating anywhere between 40 and 45 per cent of all of Canada's emissions, and making it absolutely undeniable the place that Alberta holds, should hold, and will hold as we move forward.

Some of the things that I think I have mentioned have me concerned enough, Mr. Speaker, that I'm just not able to support this plan. I think that we are choosing language that is inferior to what we have. I think that we're sending mixed signals to potential customers around the world, to jurisdictions that, you know, may be thinking of partnering with us. We're sending mixed signals there. We're saying one thing, but some of the decisions that we're making are saying something else. I don't think that helps to move Alberta's cause forward.

Unfortunately, I'm not in a position to be able to support Bill 19 right now, in its current form. Again, you know, kudos to where it is due. They did manage to take some language around electricity that was currently there. I kind of wish that you had taken all of it. Again, one minute we're saying that it's working for us, and then the next minute we're doing something else.

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, 29(2)(a) is available. I believe I saw the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. Madu: Thank you so much, Mr. Speaker. I'm very pleased to rise under 29(2)(a) to really lend my voice and support to this bill, the Technology Innovation and Emissions Reduction Implementation Act, 2019. You know, I have sat here in this Chamber and listened to members opposite on a wide range of reasons why they will not support this bill.

I'm going to address my remarks based on two themes. One, innovation is something that you would think would be a bipartisan aim of any bill that aims at seriously tackling the question of climate change. On that particular front I am a little bit disappointed that members opposite would not see it as fit, given their claim to really be climate change agents. Two, Mr. Speaker, is from the perspective of world emissions, in particular how we can put forward something that actually helps third-world countries, something that you often hear from the members opposite. In listening to some of their members today, they have referenced, you know, the impact of climate change on third-world countries. Again, I'm disappointed on that particular front.

Mr. Speaker, let me begin by saying that it is obvious, in listening to the members opposite, that nothing would satisfy them unless it's something – a proposal, a policy – like they had before, that nearly destroyed our economy. I think that it's obvious that unless you tax ordinary people and families and businesses and not-for-profit organizations with that, they will not be pleased. The type of bill they would want to see is a bill that targets families and businesses and ordinary people, like we saw, whereby they had no regard for moms and hockey moms and dads and families driving their children to school, to hockey games, to soccer games, or ordinary folks driving to work. Unless you impose a multibillion-dollar carbon tax on ordinary folks, the NDP will never be satisfied.

Mr. Speaker, that is why they have pursued with their federal allies policies that have devastated our oil and gas sector. You would think when you listen to them in this Chamber – you can easily fall into the temptation that these are folks who support our oil and gas sector. But carefully reading between the lines of their submissions in this particular House, you know, it's obvious that that informs their support for bills like C-48 and C-69. Otherwise, opposition to those two pieces of legislation should be something that is bipartisan, not just in this particular Chamber but outside. What we have seen is that you see them at virtually every rally that is protesting against our oil and gas sector. You have previous NDP cabinet ministers carrying placards protesting against the building of future pipelines. That's what we see.

They think that amnesia has suddenly set in to the people of this province, that they will not remember, that they will forget that it was one thing for you to talk about support for the oil and gas sector but then go out there and protest with people who seek the destruction of the same sector you're claiming in this particular Chamber to support. It doesn't make sense, Mr. Speaker. I hope that if they are serious about the need to combat climate change, they would work with us in making sure that we repeal C-48 and C-69.

Mr. Speaker, as someone that was born and raised in a third-world country where it is so hard to find electricity . . .

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you.

Hon. members, I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadows has risen to speak on this matter.

Mr. Deol: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my privilege, and it really is an honour to rise in the House to speak to Bill 19, Technology Innovation and Emissions Reduction Implementation Act, 2019, also known as TIER legislation. I just wanted to clearly say from the beginning that, you know, listening to members on both sides of the House, I'm definitely not going to support this bill. There are a number of reasons that have been outlined by my colleagues as the reasons that we are not supporting this bill. At the same time, every time the members of the government side rise on 29(2)(a), there's nothing new that could impress me so that I will have something to support in this bill. The biggest debate, argument that is coming from the government side is innovation, other than the election-style rhetoric that the government is the biggest supporter of the energy sector, but the opposition doesn't care about it much.

Looking at this bill, it does nothing more on innovation than the previous NDP government's Alberta climate leadership plan would have invested in innovations. Looking at both the bills, I don't see the biggest difference in how this is going to promote more than what the Alberta climate leadership plan was doing. On the contrary, I am seeing that this is probably just the government's philosophical, ideological approach. They just wanted to move that and wanted to give everything to private hands to take care of something that's very, very seriously related to the people of Alberta. It was not even long ago that we saw in the fields, on the grounds of the Alberta Legislature our next generation and other Albertans and how concerned they are about climate change, that climate change is here.

The plan we had, that basically the government took leadership of, was one where we would not have to, you know, work under the federal government's climate leadership plan. So the money goes to Ottawa, and then we wait for their, you know, conditions, limitations, terms to get all that funding back to us. In that way Alberta will be controlled. They wanted to invest the revenue that was coming from the Alberta climate leadership plan and spend it in the way that we think is more important, to support our local economy in Alberta. This is how the Alberta government was able to support thousands of jobs in the energy sector, and there were more jobs actually coming if this, you know, Alberta climate leadership plan was still in place. More projects would have started with the Alberta climate leadership plan. There were to be more jobs created until now. It's sad to see that has gone.

The biggest thing that I was part of that I really want to stress is this. It was not only something that economically the government was moving forward on to support Albertans in diversifying the economy, supporting future generations, investing into the economy. Also, to me, at a few events that I was personally involved in, I saw this, you know, as a culture-changing move. When I say culture-changing move, there have been a few of the community events where our Alberta energy efficiency plan was launched, where government members made fun of us many times, spending money on those light bulbs and stuff. [interjection] Yeah. That's your point of view. I respect that, but I wanted to share my experience on this.

As a community member I was not part of this government, you know, at those community events. I personally saw thousands and thousands of people coming to know what this Alberta energy efficiency program was and signing up on their cellphones to Alberta energy efficiency programs that they wanted to participate in, not only people discussing what it was. Many of those people did not qualify. They did not get in. They could not register on the spot. They did not even eventually get into the program, but that was something to learn about, what exactly it was, how this was helping our environment, how this was helping our future generations. I saw that for many, many of those people that I met, they could not get into the program, but they went to the stores. They decided to change their light bulbs and the way they were spending money, knowing how this would save future generations. This is something that on that day had a big impact on me. The government of any jurisdiction can make changes in the life of the province or the country.

Some of the other achievements I would really like to actually highlight that the previous government had focused on through our Alberta climate leadership plan: one of those was the first $100 million plus 50 per cent – I'm trying to get exactly where this information is coming from, actually.

The other climate leadership plan supported more than 7,300 jobs in just two years, and thousands of jobs were still to come with the construction starting on climate leadership plan projects and innovation initiatives as soon as they were to get off the ground. By moving to this plan, definitely the government is going to put those jobs in danger.

The previous government was also able to, you know, fund approximately $220 million to small businesses by introducing an almost 33 per cent small-business tax cut, and this reduction would save business owners more than half a billion dollars. You know that the small-scale industry is the backbone of any economy, not only our economy. I owned a small-scale business for the last good 15 years, and when I look around my very small plaza, I see, like, that small area within even a few blocks would have been employing thousands and thousands of people. The small-scale industry is actually the biggest engine of the economy. This is how our previous government – part of our Alberta climate leadership plan was able to boost and support small-scale industry and provide the benefit of approximately half a billion dollars over three years.

That plan also invested almost $3 billion that it was going to invest into transit over the next 10 years. That has supported Calgary and Edmonton: nearly $1.53 billion for the Calgary green line and approximately $4.7 billion to support Edmonton Transit, including the west valley. On top of this, it supported hospitals, universities, colleges, and $40 million has been invested in schools.

The biggest part is this. When government was controlling it, you know, government identified all those people for whom it was hard to afford the cost, would have been too much to afford the carbon pricing. The government in a way provided almost $700 million to the majority of Albertans to make their lives more affordable, to offset the carbon levy. They probably got more than what they have paid in the cost. More than 60 per cent of Albertans actually qualified for the rebate programs under the climate leadership plan that the previous government had.

Indigenous climate leadership. Actually, more than 65 indigenous communities in Alberta benefited from our climate leadership plan and 225 indigenous initiative projects since 2017.

Another big boom was to the solar industry. The solar industry has grown under the climate leadership plan approximately 500 per cent. That's where it says that there was almost a cultural change in some of the areas. Installed solar capacity has increased actually from six megawatts – that was in 2015 – to 35 megawatts in 2018. About 3,100 solar installations have been completed and more than 335 companies have installed. They were actually working in Alberta to install all those solar projects.

The biggest thing and something that I really wanted to highlight: Albertans have conserved enough energy to power a city the size of Leduc under that climate leadership plan. The climate leadership plan, especially the 100-megatonne oil sands emissions cap, was the biggest thing that government House members discussed many times. That was something integral, very important to the approval of the Trans Mountain pipeline by the federal government on top of the efforts the provincial government made to awareness or to the pipeline campaign across Canada, I would say, in Ontario, in B.C.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: The individual who caught my eye was the hon. Minister of Culture, Multiculturalism and Status of Women.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you so much, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for speaking to this bill. Actually, I just wanted to take your last point first. When we talk about the 100-megatonne cap on emissions, this was actually one of the largest pieces of legislation that impacted our industry at the biggest level. I was here when we debated those pieces of legislation. The impact that it had on the industry, along with the capacity market changes that were made at around the same time to our electricity market – many members on the other side have been talking about market signals. Market signals, especially in energy, are imperative in terms of how it is that investors are going to come to this province and look at those numbers to see whether or not they're going to stay here. Those policies, especially to the point of the 100-megatonne emissions cap on our oil sands, were absolutely devastating to the industry and especially to smaller companies – by smaller I mean billion-dollar companies versus multibillion-dollar companies – that were absolutely not able to fulfill their commitments in the oil sands based on purchases that they had made to actually be able to create products.

I mean, I think it has to be said, especially from all of us in here, that we are the most responsible, and Canadian oil and gas is the answer completely and unapologetically. I would suggest, too, that if you look at the TIER program, you're looking at – one of the other members mentioned this earlier. We have a 20-year record on the incredible work that has been done in this province. My dad is a chemical engineer. I remember when I was little and he was working, the particulates in the air in Alberta were significantly different. Now, just between I believe it's 2012 and 2017, there's been a change of 29 per cent in terms of efficiency and the ability to remove particulates and actually to have a cleaner product. This is something to be so proud of.

In fact, if the previous government had looked at it from that perspective instead of going to Paris and cheering on the tar sands campaigns and allowing that language to actually resonate with the world, they could have actually used the information that Canadian oil and gas is by far the best in the world, the most responsible. That language would have changed the way that we look at this beautiful country and what we produce here and the responsibility that a government has to uphold what we do in this country. What a lost opportunity. Right now we're talking about schools and roads and how we build infrastructure across this country. It is the responsibility of governments in this country to work together to make sure that that happens.

The previous government poked holes in this by creating just the capacity market alone, Mr. Speaker. The capacity market sent market signals to the industry to not invest here. The other thing I might like to add is that every single piece of solar or wind that comes online has to be double built with natural gas for the days that the wind doesn't blow and the sun doesn't shine in order to make sure that every family in this province stays warm in the winter. That is not ever spoken about. It is not just about wind and about the windmills or the fact that windmills – the environmental return on investment when you build a windmill is not even close to what you pay out at the end. There's no way to recycle them. There's absolutely no place.

I have 40 solar panels on my house, thermal and photovoltaics. There is no place to recycle them. They came from China. They were made with carbon in order to create the silicon that is on my house that gives me a very good return on my investment. By the way, when I pay into the grid, I get a very tiny return on my investment in terms of capital back, but I feel very, very good about being able to do that. I'll tell you that the 40 solar panels on my house: there's no place to recycle them. They're 10 years old already, so in 15 years when they're at their end of life, there will be no place to recycle those. They are going to be another addition into the dumps of Alberta, into some landfill somewhere. If we're going to talk about environmental returns on investment, let's talk about what we're really talking about here.

There are so many things that we can do, but let's talk about the realities of that. This TIER program takes into consideration the realities of that. I very much appreciate what the member brought forward. It's a very legitimate discussion, but let's talk about what's real here. Alberta responsibly produces resources better than anywhere else in the world. Fundamentally, that has to be the first thing that comes out of every single one of our mouths, and I will very happily every single day wear my T-shirts and put my signs up on my windows.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you.

Hon. members, are there any other members wishing to join debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud has risen to speak.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm cognizant of the time and aware that I probably won't get a chance to speak to too much today with respect to Bill 19, so I'll just make a couple of comments with respect to some of the things that we've been hearing today in the House. In particular, you know, we heard a number of government members speak to the issue of innovation and talk about how much they believe in innovation and that they believe that what is put forward today in Bill 19 supports innovation.

However, I do note that the investment that is set out in Bill 19 under the TIER program with respect to innovation is actually very comparable if not exactly the same as the investment in innovation that was put in under the climate leadership plan. So when they're speaking about their adherence to the value of innovation, they've really just matched exactly what the former NDP government did with respect to innovation except for the very big glaring error, which is that despite that they have a commitment under Bill 19 to innovation, they have cut supports for innovation in every way possible with respect to this budget that's been put forward by the government recently. For example, cutting supports for post-secondary institutions: we're going to see tuition increases across the board; we're going to see fewer people, young people, being able to access postsecondary education, to pay for that. They've cut away tuition credits, education tax credits. They've increased the cost of taking out loans.

So when they're talking about innovation, they certainly are not supporting the postsecondary institutions that are going to be promoting innovation, nor are they supporting the innovative businesses considering that they have done significant cuts to those tax credits and those investor tax credits that were critical to innovation. I just think it's really important that when we're talking about innovation, it's not just talk. It actually has to be committing to the institutions and the businesses that are innovating. What we're seeing from this government is a clear lack of commitment.

I also just want to make one more quick comment because it was interesting on my part to hear the Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat speak about this bill. I thought it was very interesting to hear her comments considering she doesn't actually have particularly a ton of credibility when it comes to speaking about the carbon tax, considering that she herself, well, was spreading quite a bit of misinformation about the carbon tax during the election, to the point that she actually had to issue a retraction of that.

I think we should be talking about facts, and when we're talking about facts, we should keep in mind that innovation under the TIER program is actually no better than what was under the climate leadership plan and, in fact, is worse because there is no commitment to the innovative technologies and the institutions that support that.

Overall – I think I'm going to run out of time – I just want to say that I think I'm not going to support a bill that is weaker than what was proposed . . .

The Acting Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member. I think we're all on same page. Seeing the time, the Assembly stands adjourned until 7:30 p.m. today.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

7:30 p.m.

Monday, November 4, 2019

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

The Deputy Speaker: Good evening, everybody. Please be seated.

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 21

Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019

[Adjourned debate October 30: Mr. Orr]

The Deputy Speaker: Are there members wishing to speak to second reading? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a privilege to rise today to speak in response to Bill 20, the Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, 2019. Not surprisingly, perhaps, I'm going to be speaking out against this particular bill for a number of reasons, particularly because I think it's very clear that this bill as well as Bill 21 and the estimates that were filed by the government last week are just intended to take money out of the pockets of Albertans. The goal behind that seems to be that the government has a debt to pay off, and that debt to pay off is actually the one that they've created themselves. It is the one created by the $4.7 billion no-jobs handout that they gave away to corporations. When I say no jobs, it's not just that no jobs were created, but actually – are we on Bill 21?

An Hon. Member: Yeah.

Ms Pancholi: So sorry. My apologies, Madam Speaker. I'm aware now that we are actually on Bill 21, which is the Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019. But my earlier comments still stand with respect to my concern. With respect to that bill the comments are the same, which are that I do not support Bill 21 because it is actually a package of changes that go along with Bill 20 as well as the budget tabled by the hon. Minister of Finance, and as well as with Bill 20 and the budget, Bill 21 is designed to take money out of the pockets of Albertans.

So let's talk a little bit about the concerns. In particular, I'd like to highlight my concern right off the top with the decision of this government to temporarily suspend, as they've called it, the indexation of benefits for the assured income for the severely handicapped, of course known as AISH, as well as removing the indexation for income support in the seniors' lodge program.

With respect to AISH, you know, I actually recall that when I first got involved in politics, it was 1999. I worked in the constituency office of an opposition MLA, and at that time Ralph Klein was Premier. It was closely around that time when, I believe, recipients of AISH, who are some of the most vulnerable Albertans – these are Albertans who have significant and severe medical disabilities which affect their ability to work either permanently or to work in a very meaningful way because of their disabilities. They are very dependent on AISH in order to survive. Let's be clear. AISH is by no means a generous benefit. It's very minimal.

Back in 1999 I remember that the Conservative government even then was attacking the people on AISH, and really that was because, I think, they count on the fact that they are the most vulnerable and that they'll be the least able to actually stand up and collectively be heard by a government that seems to prioritize and benefit those individuals who make donations and are generous to the governing party at the time. I think that they took advantage of that by attacking those vulnerable individuals on AISH, and we are seeing the same thing here.

What's remarkable, even more remarkable, about this is that the Premier repeatedly stated that he actually did not support the deindexation of AISH, and in fact a number of members on the government caucus side stood up in this House when – it was the NDP government that brought in the provisions to index AISH to the cost-of-living increase. Just as life gets more expensive and the cost of living goes up – the cost of food, transportation, housing: all of those things go up for all Albertans – individuals on AISH were being hamstrung by the fact that their benefits were not increasing with the cost of living.

It was the NDP government that came in and indexed AISH to the cost-of-living increase. That, quite frankly, is just common sense, honestly. As anybody who buys products, buys food, buys housing, you know that the costs go up, and if your income stays exactly the same, your buying power, your purchasing power, and your ability to survive if you're a vulnerable Albertan on AISH is significantly impacted. The NDP government brought in the indexation of AISH, and a number of the members on the UCP side, on the government side, at that time supported the indexation of AISH to the cost-of-living increase because they recognized that that is humane. It is the right thing to do, it is the moral thing to do, and it is the least, honestly, that we can do.

To see now, when this government is in power, them rolling back and going back, frankly, on their word and deindexing AISH, not only is it duplicitous in terms of their position when they were in opposition, but it is also duplicitous with respect to the position they took during the campaign and that the Premier took during the campaign, and it is an attack on the most vulnerable individuals.

I, frankly, find that to be repugnant, especially because we're talking about something like $1,600 a month. For the Premier to come out when he brought out this budget and say that he did not believe that this was an onerous impact on individuals just shows to me how out of touch this government is and the Premier is with respect to the most vulnerable and what they're living on. For somebody on $1,600 a month not having their benefits increase with the cost-of-living increase, that is actually the difference between more than one meal, probably, in a week. It's actually a difference between eating and not eating. It is onerous, and it's particularly onerous when you don't have the ability to change your circumstances because you have a significant medical disability.

To me, that is a shock, and frankly, because the language in Bill 21 is talking about temporarily suspending and given that this government has already demonstrated that it will not keep its promises to the most vulnerable Albertans, I certainly don't think that we can take any comfort from the fact that this is supposed to be a pausing, as the minister has said, because there's no indication that this government's word is good. That's my first comment with respect to Bill 21.

I also want to talk about ending the tuition freeze for the next three years, lifting the Bill 19 tuition freeze, that the NDP government had put in place, as well as increasing the student loan interest by 1 per cent. In my riding of Edmonton-Whitemud we're a great riding, and we're a lot of people who have a lot of young people who are in postsecondary, a lot of families that are continuing to support their children who are entering into postsecondary, but a lot of those kids are also working very hard to pay for their own tuition. I think this just goes to show where this government's priorities are, and it's not on postsecondary. That's been very clear.

In fact, even when I was meeting with my constituents prior to the budget being released, after seeing the government's blue-ribbon panel report, the MacKinnon panel report, one of the things that I consistently said to my constituents is to watch for the attack on postsecondary. I already had a pretty good feeling that this government's word was not good with respect to maintaining or increasing funding for education, and that was made painfully clear with the budget that was brought out because they have not funded enrolment growth at all despite their assurances.

In fact, we saw that writing on the wall with respect to education, but I thought it was particularly alarming to see the attack that the MacKinnon panel report made on postsecondary. What that means to me is that it's really a short-sighted vision for this province. In fact, when I go back to why I chose to run in this most recent election as part of the NDP under the leadership of the Leader of the Official Opposition, I knew it was because there was a vision there for a future for our province. It was a future of diversification. It was a future about investing in innovation and in tech and in the way our province should be going, and it was a real fulsome vision. What I was concerned about also was that I believed the vision that was laid out under the Premier's leadership and under the UCP platform was a regressive one, and this budget and this bill confirm that.

This is not a government that is actually committed to investing in postsecondary education, and by ending the tuition freeze for young students, what we're really seeing is that we're going to be seeing a lot of students drop out of the postsecondary system because they simply can't afford it. At a time when we are already talking about shortages in jobs, shortages in meaningful work for a lot of Albertans, to actually then cut out from under them our postsecondary system is to show that we actually don't have any plan. This government has no plan to fix that problem. They're not investing in our future. They're not investing in our young people, and I can say with absolute certainty that a number of the families in my constituency will be affected by that.

Not only is tuition – it's always, actually, a substantial expense for students, but predictability in planning their postsecondary education is also critical. It's critical that they have an idea of how much debt they'll take on, how much they need to save, how much they need to work, how much they are going to have to pay for postsecondary, because if they don't have that predictability, they can't plan for their education. What it means is that they're going to be the ones who are going to suffer, who are going to have to decide partway through their education that they can no longer afford to continue to do this. They may not qualify for loans. If they do qualify for loans, we now know that they're going to be paying a lot more in interest to pay that back.

I think it's a real short-term vision that this government continues to lay out for young people. I know that in particular I've already received a number of e-mails from constituents, a number of letters from constituents who are deeply concerned about that. You know, even just prior, earlier today, we were discussing Bill 19, the government's TIER program, which the government members were touting during that debate, how much that program is going to be investing in innovation, when actually that plan did not invest any more in innovation than the NDP's plan under the climate leadership plan was investing in innovation. Really, there's no further investment by this government in innovation, and then we see that they've actually gutted innovation by not just cutting the tuition cap but also failing to invest in various tax credits and incentives for innovation in this province.

I'm not sure what that's about with this government. I'm not sure if it's that there's a mistrust of postsecondary, a mistrust of intellectualism. I don't know what it is, why they seem to feel that postsecondary is not valuable, but in a province where we already have the lowest number of our young people participating in postsecondary, they seem to be pretty determined to lower that even further. That's not actually looking out for the future of Alberta, and it's certainly not looking out for Albertans. I know that there are a number of Albertans in my riding who are certainly going to be paying more for their tuition and more all around. If they have existing student loans, they're now going to be paying a significant amount more on that.

I also want to talk a little bit about the – well, actually, I'm going to defer this to one of my colleagues who I know is going to speak in detail about the reversal of the replacement worker ban in the public sector. Again, I feel like this government has demonstrated that it doesn't have a great deal of respect for decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada, particularly when it comes to labour decisions. They seem to be, again, thumbing their nose at our highest court in Canada. The decision to put in the replacement worker ban was the result of a Supreme Court of Canada decision, so to overturn that, I think this government seems to be inciting some more labour unrest but also litigation.

I don't know why the government thinks that it is a better use of public funds to invest in litigation than it is to index AISH to the cost-of-living increase. I don't know why they think it's a better use of public funds to give away $4.7 billion to corporations, who are fleeing the province, who are not investing in Alberta, and who are taking that money and increasing dividends to shareholders or paying off their own debt, but they're certainly not creating jobs. To me, it's quite remarkable that this government continues to platform or position itself as a government of fiscal responsibility, yet they are literally throwing money away on lawsuits and corporate handouts.

Meanwhile it is the average Albertan who is suffering because we don't have the services not only that we want but that we need and deserve. They are continuing to hamstring not only the services we receive but those employees, those public-sector workers, who rely on the delivery of those services. That's their livelihood, and they perform critical public services, yet this government seems to be devaluing their work and devaluing them as workers. I've continually said, even in the previous session – and I'm saying it again now – that this government seems to prioritize certain workers over others when, really, all Albertans deserve to be valued and employed and to be respected for the work that they deliver, whether it be in the private sector, whether it be in oil and gas, whether it be in our classrooms or in our hospitals. Those are critical services for all Albertans that we all benefit from, and it doesn't serve us well to cut those services simply on a gamble.

That's really what the $4.7 billion corporate handout is. It is a gamble. They have actually failed to provide any facts to support that it will create the jobs that they've promised. In fact, it's becoming increasingly evident that with this government's platform of jobs, the economy, and pipelines, they're failing to deliver on all three fronts. They're picking fights. They've created no jobs. Actually, 27,000 jobs have been lost. Therefore, when this government is tabling legislation around the budget, around taxation and their fiscal plan, what they're showing is that they actually are not being responsible with our dollars. They're not being responsible. They're not delivering the services that we require. They're simply gambling, and they're cutting on the people who are the most vulnerable, whether that be people on AISH or whether that be students who we are relying upon to build a strong future for our province.

I want to thank you again, Madam Speaker, for the opportunity to speak to this. It is very clear that I will not be supporting Bill 21.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any members wishing to speak under Standing Order 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Peace River.

Mr. Williams: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the comments from the hon. lady opposite, and I think any 29(2)(a) needs to begin with an appreciation for the message discipline of the member opposite. No matter what the bill is, they have the exact same attack lines and talking points, and if we have any deficit on our side of the House, it really is there, that we do not have the message discipline the members opposite have. No matter what we say, we will find the exact same attack lines coming from the opposite side of the aisle.

On the point of debt, Madam Speaker, I feel that while the hon. member brought up many prized NDP policies from the previous government, they forgot to bring up the policy of indebting future Albertans. We had debt growing at an unsustainable rate that was unparalleled to any point in Alberta history given we were debt free in 2004, and we find ourselves now barrelling towards $100 million inherited NDP debt. I believe it's an important policy because debt is taxation delayed. They not only had a carbon tax crippling Alberta's economy, but they effectively have implemented taxation on Albertans going forward because there is no way to pay that back short of taxation. We are government. Debt is worse than that because it's taxation compounded as well. It is the most punishing of all the taxes that could be presented.

For this reason I'd like to commend the member opposite for bringing up some of the former NDP policies but remind the members opposite that they had much more of a history than just that. They also had the carbon tax, and they had debt crippling our province.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you. I'd just like to respond and say that, yeah, it's really actually not that difficult to have discipline on messaging, Madam Speaker, when the two bills are pretty much doing the exact same thing, which is gambling away Albertans' money and not delivering on critical services that they need. Certainly, Bill 20 and Bill 21 are pretty indecipherable, so it's not difficult to not have different messaging.

With respect to that, I note that the government's budget that has been tabled actually increases the deficit by $2 billion beyond what the former government had, so I'm not actually seeing any demonstration from this government that they're making any headway with respect to reducing Alberta's debt while at the same time they've given away money to corporations, billions of dollars to corporations, and have also failed to deliver quality public services. They're gutting public services and also gutting Alberta workers.

That's just my response with respect to that hon. member's statement. It's true that debt is a problem, but they're making no progress in actually paying down our debt. But they are making progress in cutting the services and quality of services for Albertans and taking more money out of their pockets and making life less affordable for Albertans. They're certainly very successful on that.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members under Standing Order 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, any other speakers? The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm pleased to be able to rise to put on the record my multiple reasons for being very much opposed to Bill 21, the so-called Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019, which, let me tell you, is a very, very creative use of the English language. Nonetheless, this is a bill which has effectively been introduced to operationalize and implement and, I guess, execute some of the high-level plans of this UCP government.

Let me just sort of start where the last conversation ended. I will say, you know, that throughout my political career, when I have been engaged in conversations with folks on the right, they have been very, very intense and passionate about the need to eliminate the deficit and get rid of the debt. Now, I will say, quite honestly, Madam Speaker, that I, too, believe that one needs to be fiscally prudent and careful because, of course, we owe an obligation to the people of this province to be very careful with the money that we get from them through taxes and other sources of revenue.

But I always find it very interesting, Madam Speaker, when I hear about these things from the right because one of the things that they repeatedly do, just as a starting point with the matter of debt, is that they only look at debt as it relates to the numbers on the page, and they fail to acknowledge what happens with, say, something like infrastructure debt. For instance, when you're in a situation where you stop building schools for years and years and years on end, suddenly you are in a position like that of many of the members opposite, for instance, who live in Calgary, where they learn that, in fact, there will actually be a cap on the number of students who can attend high school in a building in the city of Calgary thanks to the decades-long failure to invest in important infrastructure. Soon we're going to have to be offering online courses to high school students because we literally will not be able to find room for them, because these folks here didn't see that as an investment.

I mean, that's one example. You, of course, have the other example of health care, where, for instance, the members opposite thought that having a modern, technologically up-to-date facility within which to treat the people of southern Alberta for cancer was akin to building a fancy box. That's how they talked about the Tom Baker cancer centre. They didn't see the failure to invest in that, oh, 15 years after the current Tom Baker centre had met capacity. They didn't see that as a form of debt. Yet it is, Madam Speaker, and indeed what it does is that it accelerates costs in a number of other ways.

Economists and people who look at balance sheets and at assets understand that letting something just fall to pieces is not good investment, it's not good management, and ultimately it can be more costly. Yet year after year after year in my somewhat long political career now I am subjected to this simplistic argument by those on the right, that somehow we should not be investing in important infrastructure upon which we then are able to grow our economy.

Anyway, that being said, what I find with this particular government, Madam Speaker, which is even more interesting, is that they wax poetically and passionately about the evils of debt – notwithstanding, of course, I must put this on the record, that Alberta does have the lowest debt-to-GDP ratio of any jurisdiction in the country by a long shot. And at the point, when the budget is balanced, or at least when it would have been balanced under our leadership, we still would have retained that position. Independent economists said that we had the healthiest balance sheet in the country.

But what I find so crazy about the passion with which the members opposite address this issue and the degree to which this Bill 21 hurts hundreds of thousands of Albertans in very cruel, short-sighted, mean-spirited, hard-hearted ways is that we're going through all this because we care so much about debt. And you know what, Madam Speaker? The debt will be reduced by $2 billion. We would have had it balanced at $95 billion; they will have it balanced at $93 billion. So all this song and dance, all these many attacks on Albertans are going ahead so that we can secure the difference between $95 billion and $93 billion.

The reason, then, of course, that we are having to embark upon all of these cruel, hard-hearted, mean-spirited attacks on the most vulnerable, not to mention the short-sighted, mean-spirited attacks on our youth and our future opportunities and our ability to diversify the economy, the reason we are engaging in this incredibly negative, not to mention somewhat misleading attack, if you were to compare it to what the members opposite told the people of Alberta a mere six months ago in the election, is so that we can, in theory, eliminate the debt. But you know what? They've made nary an impact on the accumulated debt. In addition, they've increased the deficit by $2 billion this year alone. So the members opposite, who wrap themselves in the tattered blanket of deficit slayers, really aren't very good at that either.

However, Madam Speaker, what they are good at, as evidenced by this bill, is undermining the future of hundreds of thousands, probably millions at this point, of young Albertans, whether they be in K to 12, whether they be people that are hoping to secure the benefit of some form of postsecondary education, whether they be people who hope to engage in the benefits of a truly diversified economy. They are going to be very good at undermining the future of those Albertans, they are going to be very good at attacking the most vulnerable, they are going to be very good at creating labour chaos, they are going to be very good at alienating our front-line health care professionals, and they are going to be very good at breaking the promises they made in this election to municipal leaders elected throughout this province. Let's see. I'm just flipping through here. Have we covered all the things that Bill 21 does in the most general of ways? I think that we have. Oh, yes. And they're going to be very good at making every Albertan pay more in the form of electricity costs. These are, for the most part, the things that are embedded in this Bill 21, a number of strategies that will successfully undermine the quality of life for Albertans.

Of course, I always find it interesting that members opposite still talk about making life better for Albertans. Just to be clear, one member opposite talked about message discipline, and I'm sure those across will know that we talked about making life better for Albertans all the time. I find it amusing that the members opposite continue to say that, too, even as they are literally throwing young Albertans onto the street and rendering them homeless. They have the unmitigated gall to talk about making life better for Albertans. Wow. Like, pick a lane, folks. If your plan is to attack Albertans to allegedly reduce the budget by $2 billion, by whatever that is – I don't know; 2 and a half per cent? – reduce the debt by about 2 per cent and to give away billions and billions and billions of dollars to wealthy corporations and then sit back, cross your fingers, close your eyes, and hope that five years later, when you wake up, somehow economic prosperity has arrived in its little magical form, if that's your plan, you know, you might want to pick some messaging that actually aligns with that plan. Let me tell you: making life better for Albertans? Not so much. That is really not what, in particular, is executed through this bill.

Let's talk a little bit about this bill. What are some of the things that we see in Bill 21? You know, I know they talk about ensuring fiscal sustainability. Let's call it an Act to Ensure that Life Gets a Whole Lot Worse for Albertans. That's the act that we're talking about today. One of the things that is being done with this piece of legislation is that they are changing the legislation that we had put in place, that had legislated a cap on tuition. Now, why would you want to do that? Well, first of all, when we first got elected, in 2015, Alberta had the uncelebrated position of being ultimately – when you took into account tuition, noninstructional fees, market modifiers, when you put all those things together in a pot, Alberta had the unfortunate distinction of being the most expensive place in the country to go to university. Everybody here was: why are so many Albertans not going to university? Well, I don't know. Maybe because it's more expensive to go to university, or that was one of the things.

So we said: "You know what? That doesn't make sense, because we see education as being one of the most fundamental tools you can use to share in opportunities with people who desire to seek them, who desire to put in the work and the effort and the discipline and the creativity to pursue those opportunities, and the way to do that, then, is through postsecondary education." What we cannot do, Madam Speaker, is close the doors of postsecondary education to those Albertans solely on the basis of how wealthy they are or how wealthy their parents are. That was the road that we had definitely begun to walk along, so we made a decision that we would cap tuition and also eliminate or extremely limit noninstructional fees and market modifiers.

Having done that, we went from the most expensive jurisdiction in the country to the third-least expensive, and we were on-track to become the least expensive. Just imagine if we had succeeded in that, Madam Speaker. Just imagine how many bright, young people from the rest of the country we could have attracted to Alberta. Now what's happening already is that families in this province are looking at whether they can find a place in another province where their kids can get into that educational institution and where they can afford for them to be. We're actually now going to start pushing our young people out of Alberta. I can't imagine a more short-sighted plan.

You know, we talk in Alberta about our natural resources. We talk, of course, about nonrenewable resources as it relates to the oil and gas industry. Those are, without question, incredible endowments that none of us did anything to earn but were given to us by Mother Nature, I guess, that have given us tremendous opportunity in this province.

Another tremendous asset that we have in this province is our young people. I remember as Premier getting ready for meetings with Premiers from across this country and looking at the position of our province in relation to other provinces in terms of taxation and debt and economic activity and GDP and population demographics and health care costs, all those kinds of things. I remember being blown away by what an incredible opportunity we have in Alberta because we really truly were the youngest province in the country, the best-educated province in the country, so we had this resource that was so fundamental to building a strong province for the future. I would look at some other provinces where their population was aging at an incredible rate, where their tax base was shrinking, where their health care costs were skyrocketing, and where they had very little economic activity and room for diversification. I thought: boy, we have a tremendous opportunity right here in Alberta, but that window will close if we are not careful.

If we continue to look backwards, we will be looking backwards as the window in front of us closes on the opportunity to truly diversify our economy so that we remain the economic leader of the country. That will disappear before our eyes. Of course, that's one of the things that is happening within this bill, within Bill 21. We are very intentionally looking backwards to a past that no longer exists as over our shoulder the window to our opportunity slowly closes at the hands of the members opposite, Madam Speaker. This bill does that.

It will hurt families as well. It will simply hurt families. Families save for years. I'm sure many folks over there are aware of the practice. You know, a baby is born, and you immediately start putting money aside in their RESP. You start planning for their education future. I don't know about you, but in our family we planned on the basis of certain assumptions. We planned that we would be living in a city with at least two postsecondary institutions. We planned that those postsecondary institutions would be sufficiently well funded, that kids could get in there if they wanted to get in there and that they wouldn't need to have a 99.999 per cent average in order to get in there. These folks over here had reduced the number of spaces to a point where nobody could actually get access anymore. That is the assumption that many, many people in this province made. They also made the assumption that tuition would be affordable, that they would not be trying to save to send their kids to the equivalent of an American Ivy League university.

What the folks over there want to do is jack up tuition because I think implicitly – I can only assume – that the folks over there actually think that postsecondary education is only for the wealthy and the privileged and that nobody else should get access to it. Certainly, that is the absolute, direct outcome of the plans that are embedded in Bill 21. It's exactly what is happening here. That is going to further increase inequality in this province and, ultimately, undermine economic growth and economic health. Quite frankly, I'm sure that folks over there spend a lot of time reading more than just Jack Mintz in terms of economists, and most economists will tell you that inequality breeds economic stagnation and is the enemy of economic diversification and growth. What we have here, as far as the plans with respect to postsecondary education go, is a fairly effective plan to enhance inequality across this province.

Another thing that is in this quite poorly-thought-out piece of legislation is the decision to eliminate the regulated rate cap for the cost of electricity. Now, the government is currently estimating that over, I believe, four years they will save about $400 million. Put another way, that means that consumers over the course of four years will pay about another $400 million. So there you go, $400 million being offered up for consumers in Alberta, regular families with homes. That's what we're talking about. We're not talking about industry here; we're not talking about the money that's being lost there. To be fair, $388 million the government will save by removing the regulated rate cap, and that is a direct transfer to the bills of regular families, regular homeowners, regular folks just trying to keep the lights on while they sit around the table helping their kids with their school work because, of course, they haven't seen a teacher for three days. Anyway, I digress. This is the plan that this government has in place. It's to transfer that cost, roughly $400 million, to regular families in terms of the cost of electricity.

But wait, Madam Speaker, it gets even better when it comes to electricity because this is to be added to the fact that just recently on Bill 18 the government also voted down our amendment that would have put in place rules against economic withholding and would have ensured the goal of a reliable supply of electricity available at a reasonable cost to consumers. Of course, the members opposite chose to vote down that amendment. Apparently, they are not big fans of doing things that might be done at a reasonable cost to consumers because, again, regular Alberta families are not, actually, who is number one with the bullet with the folks over there.

So what we're going to see is roughly $400 million downloaded onto family budgets in every part of this province, and at the same time they're not even going to have reliability and predictability with respect to that because, on top of it, these guys think it's a great idea to go back to an energy-only market, where we will see the price of electricity go up and down to the tune of about a thousand per cent at any given time without any kind of warning or predictability. That, too, is something that folks over there thought was a great idea. Why? Because one or two electricity producers told them that they might come here and build electricity infrastructure if they had the privilege of playing around with people's electricity prices to the tune of a thousand per cent from month to month. Folks over there, when offered up that proposition, went, "Well, that sounds just great to the average Alberta household; we think that people would like that kind of unpredictability with their electricity costs because, you know, it's not onerous," to use a well-repeated line, which, yes, you will hear a great deal more of because your leader's idea of onerous is clearly framed through a particularly unique version of privilege that the vast majority of Albertans do not enjoy.

8:10

Now, in addition to that little piece of cost that's been downloaded onto Alberta families here, we're also going to see some challenges experienced by families as it relates to their access to health care. In particular, this government has decided that what they're going to do is two things in order to really do everything they can to push doctors out of Alberta. The first is that they are going to attempt once again a strategy that has been ruled by the courts as unconstitutional at least once, may twice already, which is to tell doctors where they can practise and where they cannot practise. The courts have said that this is not a thing that you can do. It is illegal. It goes against principles within the Constitution. What do the members opposite do? They say: "Eh, let's do another illegal thing. You know, we haven't spent millions and millions of dollars on legal costs yet today, so let's do another thing that will generate millions and millions of dollars of legal costs," which, to be clear, you will lose.

So they initiated this attempt to limit where doctors can practise. Maybe it's nice talking points, to be able to write letters to the editor saying: we're going to do everything we can to force young doctors to practise only in your small town, no matter what. I know it sounds nice, and sometimes, you know, it is tempting to make public policy on the basis of what sounds good in a local paper's opinion piece, but I suggest that when you are in government, you actually have an obligation, Madam Speaker, to do the research and actually talk to people about what you can actually really do. This is a thing that is only going to result in creating a great deal of hostility, and undoubtedly after we've spent millions of dollars on lawyers, we will discover that we're not allowed to do it, and we will probably also owe a bunch of money as a result, too. Anyway, they've done that, and that's in this bill. It's unwise, it's silly, it's wasteful, and of course we can't support it for that reason.

Now, the other thing, though, when it comes to doctors, as though that's not good enough: we're also going to apparently give ourselves the authority to break contracts with the doctors. I don't know if there's been any negotiations with them, if there have been any attempts to actually sit down with them and talk about a strategy that might be more respectful. I know that our Member for Edmonton-Glenora, the former Minister of Health, spent a great deal of time talking with doctors in order to get them to come to the table to take reduced costs as we were working on bending the curve in terms of health care costs. You know what? It may well be the case that more needs to be done; I wouldn't suggest that that is not true. But to sort of walk in like a bull in a china shop – I cannot for the life of me believe that there's been any kind of substantive negotiations at this point with the doctors. What's happening here is that folks are just going in and giving themselves the legislative authority to break the contract with the doctors, which invariably is going to undermine the confidence of doctors as it relates to setting up a practice here in Alberta. Let me just say that if we find ourselves with an extreme problem with respect to access to family doctors, we will all know exactly where to look for the cause of that problem. It will be this UCP government and the decisions they made as are embedded in Bill 21.

Let's just talk a little bit more about other people who are providing important front-line services to Albertans. Now, the issue around the rollbacks are not specifically embedded in this bill, but there is no question that there are a series of provisions that are absolutely designed to create unrest with the almost 200,000 people in this province who (a) pay taxes, (b) provide important services to all Albertans, and (c) contribute mightily to the economic health of this province through the fact that they actually are mortgage-paying consumers in an economy that, you know, needs more of those, not less. This government has decided that no, 200,000 people: that's a good-sized group that we should pick a fight with and be profoundly disrespectful to. Interestingly, a majority of them are women. This is hardly surprising because that's a whole other pattern that we see reflected in pretty much everything that this government does.

Nonetheless, this bill repeals the ban on replacement workers, which is part and parcel of the essential services legislation. Now, as members opposite know, the essential services legislation was something that came into place as a result of a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada. Once again, it turns out that the government of Alberta was breaking the law left, right, and centre under the previous government and breaching the constitutional rights of roughly 200,000 Albertans. We had to bring in legislation that allowed for essential services legislation. Fine. Now, the way essential services legislation works is that various providers of services – let's take health care, for example – go before the Labour Relations Board. The employer and the union go in, and they talk about what services must be there in the event of a strike and what services the employer, i.e., the government, can do without for a period of time in the event of a strike. This negotiated work is done over a period of time. This is the system that exists in many other jurisdictions.

It is part and parcel of that system, then, that a ban on replacement workers is also put in place because otherwise, if you were not to do that, the negotiations themselves would be distorted and would likely not ever result in any kind of effective and useful outcome. In addition, anybody who knows anything about labour relations will tell you that by allowing for replacement workers, or scabs, as most people in the labour movement refer to them, what you do is you actually escalate and accelerate unrest and hostility and dysfunction within the bargaining relationship. That is why other jurisdictions, even very right-wing conservative jurisdictions, who inherit NDP bans on scabs ultimately maintain them, because they realize that, in fact, better labour relations and more productivity and better outcomes actually occur when you have a system that compels people to sit down and negotiate equally and respectfully and that if instead you invite scab labour into a labour dispute, what will happen is that hostility will occur and a great deal of dispute and conflict will occur. The number of days that are lost to a strike go up, and productivity goes down. That's clear stuff out there. It's actually clear.

Contrary to popular belief over on that side of the House, it's actually the case that with NDP governments we are typically more successful at getting more productivity out of both the public-sector and the private-sector workforce because we treat workers with respect. It shouldn't actually be a great epiphany to hear that because it comes down to this: you respect the rules and you treat people with respect, and ultimately you get folks back to work sooner. What this legislation does is it sets up the opposite. It sets up a plan to pick a fight, to draw a line in the sand, to create conflict, to create hostility, and to ultimately undermine the security of those services and to ultimately undermine and reduce the productivity that would otherwise exist were you able to get to a resolution with respect to the bargaining regime faster. That is happening.

Meanwhile, we have – but we're not quite sure what the legal consequences are – another piece in this legislation that in theory is merely formalizing the bargaining oversight of the government as it relates to AHS and postsecondary institutions and school boards and a whole host of other intermediaries. But we're not sure if it's also trying to give them cover for what is otherwise an open-and-shut case of bargaining in bad faith as triggered by the Finance minister's backing and forth between, on one hand, threatening rollbacks and, on the other hand, threatening people with being fired.

Just to be clear, this is a repeated theme. I guess I'm not doing as well as some of the members in my caucus, but this is all so we can pay for a $4.7 billion corporate handout that thus far has resulted in 27,000 jobs being lost and hundreds of millions of dollars being invested in other jurisdictions and companies like EnCana leaving Canada. It's not working out so far so well and also creating huge pressure for this government to do a number of really unwise things that make people's lives harder. It is being done for that reason.

At the same time, were the minister actually successful in getting a 4 or 5 per cent layoff – you know, I asked during the budget, and I've not yet got an answer, if he could provide to us the briefings he's received from his officials about what a 5 per cent rollback to 200,000 people would do to the economic activity of this province; it's not nothing. Or if that 5 per cent rollback was taken out by way of layoffs or firing, what would that do to the economic activity? That's separate and apart from looking at what the absence of those services would mean to the economy, which also, I suspect, would drag it down quite a bit. Anyway, these kinds of provisions are remarkably poorly thought out. They're bad for the economy. They're bad for the services Albertans rely on. They're bad for regular Alberta families. They're just bad, and they're very, very disrespectful.

I do not understand why it is this government literally gets up every Monday morning and says: hmm; we haven't broken a law yet when it comes to working people; let's see if we can do another one. You know, why there is so much hostility to the idea of working people coming together in order to secure more benefits for themselves and their families I do not know, but it's certainly alive and well with the folks over there.

Now, speaking of doing damage to other people and also doing things – and this was the second theme that I was going to mention, that this bill is just rife with broken promises. The folks over there misled Albertans. Pretty much every time their leader opened his mouth during the election campaign, something came out, and the exact opposite has happened ever since. If you look at the very verbose – and I'm pretty sure the leader must have had something to do with it – platform that came out in the last election, you can just go through and go check, check, check or highlight, highlight, depending, you know, on how you like to review things, maybe with stickies on the side, for every broken promise. It starts to look like quite pretty. It's like a little bit of an art project that your kids bring back from school with all the little stickies coming off it, all the promises that are throughout that document that show where the Premier spoke, promised one thing, and clearly is delivering the exact opposite.

One of those places relates, of course, to the relationship between this government and municipal leaders and municipalities across the province. Now, when we get to Bill 20, I'll talk about that in more detail, but it is in this bill that we see the ability of the government to take more money from municipalities as far as it relates to traffic fines. Just to be clear, you know, it seems like we've talked about this a lot in the Legislature during question period, but the Attorney General seems profoundly unable to understand what it is he's just done. I have to assume he doesn't understand because otherwise he would actually be saying things that he knew weren't true, and we all know what the word for that is. What's happened here is that by proposing to change the way they share the revenue from traffic fees, the minister is taking just from Calgary and Edmonton alone about $20 million a year. About $20 million times four years is $80 million. I know that the minister over there loves to talk about: oh, well, we're giving up to $40 million in increased funding in ALERT. But, you know, I know that math is tough. No one wants to see a New Democrat try to do math, but I will throw it out there anyway; $80 million minus $40 million is a difference of $40 million, which means $40 million less for police, and that's just in Edmonton and Calgary.

I really wish that maybe back in the Confederation Room there some of you could have a little chat with your Attorney General, walk him through the numbers so that he stops saying things which are so obviously untrue because it's embarrassing. Quite frankly, he's becoming a little embarrassing. If I were you, guys, I would just give him a little briefing on that one.

Either way, the fact is this. When we go back to this matter of the UCP platform and the commitments that were made to Albertans in the last election, the fact is that Albertans were not told that they were going to get fewer resources dedicated to policing, yet that's what they're getting now. Albertans were told that they were going to get a government that was really concerned with law and order. Between the many police resources that I'm sure are still being taken up dealing with the whole kamikaze investigation and then, on top of that, the amount of work that's going into breaking labour legislation and breaching the Constitution, you know, I would say that law and order is not a number one priority over there, Madam Speaker. Frankly, Albertans deserve better.

Mr. Schow: Point of order.

Ms Notley: Another thing that I would like to talk about as it relates to Bill 21 . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. member, a point of order has been called.

The hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika.

Point of Order Imputing Motives

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise on a point of order on 23(h), (i), and (j), particularly (i), "imputes false or unavowed motives to another Member." The Member for Edmonton-Strathcona clearly just suggested that law and order is not important to us on this side of the House. It's also language that could certainly cause disorder in this Chamber, and I ask her to be cautious but also to retract those comments. On this side of the House we do believe that law and order is paramount and a priority for us, and I'd ask her to be cautious with the things she says.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm pleased to take the opportunity to speak on this. It was clear that the Leader of the Official Opposition was speaking about the government. It's a matter of opinion. In no way, shape, or form is it suggesting anything that would cause either disorder, nor would it be anything that is outside the ordinary function of this Chamber in regard to speaking on perspectives on government policy, which is what we debate here in this Chamber.

The Deputy Speaker: Thank you, hon. members, for your opinions on this matter. I would argue that talking about matters outside of this House that don't have anything to do with government policy is probably not actually talking about government policy.

Furthermore, there have been a number of instances throughout this course of debate, particularly comments made by the Leader of the Official Opposition, that are most definitely pushing the limits on the ways in which we speak about members and about governments, particularly around misleading the public or, you know, fast and loose with the truth. Those types of comments are not very helpful through this debate. I know that the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition is a skilled orator and can certainly find better ways to discuss topics like these. I don't see a point of order; however, I would stress caution moving forward.

The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition to proceed.

Debate Continued

Ms Notley: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. The next area that I was going to go to and that I think I will end on with respect to this particular bill, of course, relates to the series of decisions around indexing AISH, employment and income support benefits, the seniors' benefit, and the seniors' lodge program. You know, this is a tough one because this one – well, all of these are very close to our hearts, and I actually kind of thought it was close to the hearts of the members opposite as well. I know I won't be the first one to mention this, but it bears repeating because it does go to the degree to which Albertans can trust the members opposite when they say and do things and promise things.

Before the last election our government brought forward a bill to ensure that indexation was legislatively provided for in this House, and the reason we did that was because we were tired, in a province like this, of having so many people living so far below the poverty line. It just seemed wrong. And every year that inflation continued – to be clear, it did every year – people lost more, Madam Speaker.

You know, I always say that one of the proudest elements that I had or the proudest accomplishments that I had as the leader of the government that we led over four years was that over the course of those four years, even in the midst of one of the deepest, darkest, hardest recessions, created by the dramatic drop in the price of oil internationally, over that time we pulled 40,000 children out of poverty. We cut child poverty in half. Some people go into their political career to achieve only that. Now we have members opposite who seem to be absolutely committed to undoing that work, and one of the first places they are going to go to undo that work is to the most vulnerable Albertans we have: disabled Albertans who receive AISH, Albertans who have barriers to full employment who receive income support, Albertans who have no barriers but their EI has disappeared and they have no other choice but to receive income support, and low-income seniors. These are the people that these folks over there have decided are the go-to payers for this $4.7 billion corporate tax handout, and it is shameful.

It is also shameful, of course, because before the last election, when we brought this legislation in, everybody voted for it. Everybody said that it was long overdue, and everybody said that they supported it. They went into the election and said to Albertans: "Look at us. You can count on us. We're not mean. We'll protect you. You can trust us. We voted for this thing." Then they came in here and undid it, and I honestly, for the love of God, don't know how many of you can look at yourself in the mirror after that. It is a profound betrayal of Albertans who need people in government to be on their side the most.

You know, another interesting statistic, which I discovered not too long ago, was that even in Calgary – and we know how hard Calgary has been struggling with the drop in the price of oil and with all the jobs that were lost in Calgary and continue to be lost under the leadership of this government – over that time I was quite surprised to discover that the number of people living in poverty, below the poverty line, actually went down. That was because government stood up and said: "Even when times are tough like this, we can have one of two choices. We can turn our backs on each other, we can create a divide and then spread it apart so that there are those who have and those who do not, we can sow division and make people angry at each other for the difficult situation we find ourselves in, or we can take a different approach. We can have each other's backs, we can support the people who need our support the most, and we can make sure that when we come out of this difficult time, we come out of it together, stronger, with more capacity than we had when the difficult time began."

That is the choice that our government made when we passed the legislation to begin indexing and to legislatively protect and to increase the rates of income for these groups. Members opposite say: oh, well, you didn't pass the legislation till, you know, the fall before the election. Well, what we did do was that we increased the rates to more than surpass what they would have been at had we begun indexation in 2015. So don't for one moment try to suggest that that wasn't a priority for us always and that we didn't in fact ensure that indexation was a feature of our whole term, because it was.

Now folks over there have decided that in order to pay for a $50 million handout to EnCana, in order to pay for a $230 million handout to Husky, in order to pay for a $25 million handout to another one of the oil companies, the name of which I cannot remember right now, we have to reach into the pockets of some person with a severe disability who may or may not have children, who is relying on that AISH income to help put food on the table, and we need to remove, as of January 1, roughly – was it $20 or $30? I guess it depends on what the rate of inflation is – between $20 and $30 a month.

And the leader of those folks over there says: that's not onerous. I hope to God that at least some of you cringed when you heard him say that, that somehow for somebody who makes less than $1,700 a month, trying to pay rent and put food on the table and pay the electricity bill and get from point A to point B on public transit and to do all the things that people do when they're living a life – to suggest that it is not onerous for that person to lose $20 or $30 a month and then another $20 or $30 the following year and another $20 or $30 the year after is cringeworthy. It reveals a profound level of entitlement that, you know, Albertans were promised they weren't going to see when they elected the UCP. They were told: "That's just a Conservative thing; that's not who we are. We're not entitled. We're a new brand of right wing." I think your leader stumbled a little bit there, and the curtain revealed a pretty old-school level of entitlement and tone-deafness to what it means to people to try to make ends meet on that small amount of money.

Seniors. I mean, we know, of course, that the seniors who rely on that benefit that will no longer be indexed are primarily women: your moms, your grandmothers, your aunts. Somehow they're okay to be the ones to fund your corporate handout. My goodness, it really is a difficult-to-process set of choices. You know, politics is about choices. There's no question; it is absolutely about choices. The majority members in this House, the government members, the UCP members, have clearly signalled to Albertans who they are and what their values are in the choices that are embedded in this budget and embedded in Bill 21. The choice to retain and preserve the ability to hand out $4.7 billion to wealthy corporations and their shareholders, probably the majority of whom do not even reside in the province, and to make your grandmother pay for it in a loss of between $20 and $30 a month, starting on January 1: like, wow. Seriously? Anyway, I just don't know how you make those kinds of choices.

I mean, I can see disagreeing with us on what is the best way to incent economic activity. I can see disagreeing with us on what the best strategies are for diversification. But to stand here and break a promise, to quietly sit while we read back your quotes to you from a mere eight or nine months ago, and to make eye contact as you vote to support this kind of mean-spirited, cruel cut in order to support $4.7 billion to well-established, profitable corporations, who appear to be using the money to subsidize their moves out of the province: that takes a lot of political will, I have to say. You've really got to believe in the need to pick on the most vulnerable really deep in your heart in order to make those kinds of choices.

What I will say is that in our caucus those are not our choices. We think that when you are confronted with hard times, you need to pull together, and those who can afford to pay a little bit more should. It doesn't matter if times are good or times are tough, your measure as a person comes down to how you respond to those who need your help the most when times are tough. It's easy to be generous when times are good. The question is: what kind of choices do you make when times are tough? I think that you must always be focused on supporting those who are struggling in poverty, whether it be your grandmother or the grandchildren who are living with that grandmother who are looking for three healthy meals a day. The choice should be to support them. That is the exact opposite of what we see revealed in Bill 21, an act to make life more difficult for Albertans. As you can imagine, we will be doing a great deal to resist the passage of this piece of legislation because it really goes against our fundamental values, and I would argue that it actually goes against the fundamental values of many, many Albertans.

We've had this conversation before, but just to be reminded, the Premier suggested that there was no need to have consultations with Albertans before the budget was released because, you know, they had this great consultation during the election. But I would argue that when the written version of your consultation with Albertans before the election now looks like a grade 3 kid's art project because there are so many colours and stickies beside all the different things that you've now broken promises on, the consultation is no longer a valid justification.

I would argue that even those Albertans who are struggling with what's been going on in our economy since the price of oil dropped – we've seen what's going on with the energy industry, and even as it recovers, we know that it's restructuring and that it will not even recover in exactly the same way, with as many jobs per barrel of oil. I would argue that the people who are very angry and very frustrated about that and, absolutely, angry at us, too – I'll be the first to admit it; there's no question about that – I don't think that those folks would choose to give $4.7 billion to wealthy corporations while we pull money away from vulnerable Albertans, severely disabled Albertans, low-income seniors, who are primarily women, and out-of-work construction workers. I don't think those people are the ones who should be paying for these $4.7 billion corporate handouts. No matter how angry those folks might be at me – fair enough – I also still think that those aren't their values. It's not the values of the vast majority of people to do what's being done here, and it's not something that's going to garner you a tremendous amount of support when you go home at Christmas and describe to people the choices that you are making here today.

I think at this point I'm getting close to my sort of high-level analysis of Bill 21. I haven't had the chance to go through it in more detail, but we've hit the key points within it that are troublesome to us. I certainly do reserve the right and the opportunity to point out additional difficulties as they are revealed. This is what we've got from having gone through it and having analyzed it thus far.

I am very much appreciative, Madam Speaker, that I've been given the opportunities to speak as long as I have been in order to outline our concerns with Bill 21. I certainly hope that members opposite will take some of these concerns to heart and will consider making some of the changes that I know we will be looking forward to proposing once we get to that stage in debate. Of course, because this is an omnibus, which of course is another thing, it is jamming way more into it than you would normally see in a regular piece of legislation, and it will probably be a rather extensive conversation because there is so much in here that we will be seeking the opportunity to amend and correct and make better. So I look forward to having more conversations in more detail about those elements of the bill that we think can be improved. Until that time, thank you very much, Madam Speaker, for the opportunity to speak today.

With that, I move that we adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Bill 20 Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, 2019

[Adjourned debate October 30: Mr. Schmidt]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Well, I'm pleased to rise for what, I guess, now seems like the second time to Bill 20, but really is officially the first time speaking to Bill 20, which is the Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, 2019. You know, I'm still actually processing the eloquent statements by the Leader of the Official Opposition with respect to Bill 21, which absolutely apply to Bill 20 as well, mostly because it speaks to the values. It speaks to the values of this government caucus, but also it speaks to the values of the opposition caucus. If I ever needed a reminder as to why I'm here today and why I chose to do this – we all make a choice when we run for politics to make sacrifices with respect to our families and our lives, but it's because we believe in what we're doing, and we believe that we hold certain values to be true, and we want to promote those values. I can just say that once again, as I often feel when I listen to the Leader of the Official Opposition speak, it reminds me of exactly why I'm here and why I'm so proud to stand as a member of this opposition caucus.

I want to speak to the provisions in particular of Bill 20 because, like Bill 21, they have the same effect, which is that they are making life less affordable for Albertans. They are a series of choices about hitting the most vulnerable people the hardest but also breaking promises to Albertans and also making choices, because the government made a choice to give away $4.7 billion to corporations, and here we are seeing the outcome of that choice. You know, they rushed to do that, and in fact it was one of their promises that they kept with respect to their platform, to cut the corporate tax rate, but what they were not forthcoming about were all the cuts that would be coming to all the services and all the Albertans as a result of that choice. What they also were not honest and upfront about was the fact that that decision to cut corporate taxes was just, really, a gamble. It was a wish and a hope on something that would happen, that has clearly not happened yet.

The details of Bill 20 also show not only, again, that this government is making choices to sacrifice the well-being, the day-to-day life of Albertans for corporations' bottom lines, but it also shows, again, a lack of vision for the future of this province. It shows short-sightedness when it comes to diversification, about investment in postsecondary, and about investment in our young people. It continues to show and demonstrate that this government wants to roll back the clock 50 years to where we were in a different time and in a different world. But the world has progressed, and this government has not.

Specifically I'll mention, for example, the decision in Bill 20 – I'm going to keep referring to them as decisions and choices because that's exactly what this government has done, made a series of choices. They've chosen, for example, to end the interactive digital media tax credit and the capital investment tax credit and the community and economic tax credit and the Alberta investor tax credit and the scientific research and experimental development tax credit. Now, all that speaks to is that they're continuing to put all of Albertans' eggs in one basket. They're continuing to demonstrate that they don't actually care about diversifying our economy. They don't care about the growth that has taken place over the last series of years, both under the NDP government but even leading up to that, where there was so much great innovative work that was happening in this province.

Again, one of the reasons why I chose to run was because I saw in the innovation that was coming out that there was a way to diversify, to continue to show that we are an innovative group of people, we are an innovative province. We did that with our oil and gas industry, we did that in so many other ways, and we can do it with other industries, too. Yet this government continues to cut out those supports in favour of putting all of our eggs continually in one basket.

I also want to talk about the broken promise that this government made with municipalities. You know, I think we've all at this point heard the outrage from the mayors of Edmonton and Calgary with respect to the decision by this government, the choice by this government to rip up the city charters framework. Really, that was a clear broken promise because not only was the commitment to the city charters in the UCP platform, but repeatedly this Premier stood up and said that he was not going to do that. Yet he did exactly that. Certainly, when you listen to the comments from the mayor from Edmonton and the mayor from Calgary, they said that even in their conversations with the Premier, pretty much up until the point that this legislation was tabled, he had continued to maintain that he was going to keep city charters. Well, that was completely – I mean, a broken promise is a nice way to put it. In fact, what he was doing was telling untruths to the faces of the mayors of Calgary and Edmonton because he was saying he was going to do it and he did not do it. He actually ripped that up.

All that means is that we, Albertans and the city of Edmonton, the city of Calgary, are going to continue to pay the price for that. Actually, the Premier has said it himself: there is only one taxpayer.

There's only one taxpayer, whether we're paying taxes to the municipal government, to our provincial government, to our federal government. The Premier has stood up and he has made the situation for the people who live in the major municipalities in this province much harder. All that is going to do is download the responsibilities of the provincial government on to the municipal governments. We as Albertans are still going to pay for that. We're still going to pay for that whether we pay for it with increased property taxes, which is somewhat inevitable, but we're also going to pay for it in the fact that we will continue to have, which we had for 44 years under the Progressive Conservatives, an infrastructure debt. We carried a huge debt with respect to that, and now that debt is being created again by this provincial government by refusing to maintain its commitments to municipalities.

You know, I also note, by the way, that even just as recently as today the mayors from Edmonton and Calgary urged this government to consider an amendment to Bill 20, an amendment that would tie municipal revenues to provincial revenues at a 1 to 1 ratio which would give municipalities more resources when more resources are available, but when they're not available, they would also get scaled back, tying, basically, the revenues to the provincial revenue stream. It's my understanding that without even considering a formal amendment, the Minister of Finance has already refused to accept that. It seems like the Minister of Finance and this government are determined to make it incredibly difficult for municipalities to follow through on the commitments that they've made as a result of promises from the provincial government but also to download those costs on to Albertans.

I also want to speak a little bit about another broken promise. There is a consistent theme that's coming out here because Bill 20 in particular, but Bill 20, Bill 21, and the budget all reflect a series of broken promises from this government. The next broken promise – actually, I found this one to be quite surprising in its irony – is that this government is no longer indexing income tax brackets or the personal income tax exemption. Why this is so ironic? Well, it's called bracket creep, and where did that term come from? Well, from the Premier himself when he was the head of the Canadian Taxpayers Federation. He used to lobby against this kind of deindexation because he basically said: “Well, you know what? It's just raising income taxes without being up front and transparent about it.” Guess what? He's right. That's exactly what he's going to do.

Speaking about broken promises, this Premier campaigned strongly against, you know, the ogre of the carbon tax but also saying that he would not increase taxes, yet that's exactly what he's done, and he's done that to every single person. Every single Albertan is now going to be affected by that. That is an increase in their income tax.

I'll tell you that I represent a riding that tends to be a little bit more affluent. There are a lot of people, not everybody – certainly, not everybody in my riding is doing well, but certainly a little bit more privilege in my riding. Yet I have had a number of people, who maybe even voted UCP – I don't know – reaching out to my office, and they're saying: “What? This is not what we were promised. We were not told by the Premier that our income taxes were going to go up.” In fact, they thought he was the champion against taxes, yet one of the first things this Premier does is that not only does he break his promise about no increase in taxes, but he's doing exactly what he used to lobby against when he was the head of the Canadian Taxpayers Federation. In fact, this might be the only time in history that the Official Opposition agrees with the Canadian Taxpayers Federation that this Premier is actually increasing taxes, and we're both shocked that he would do it. Now, I don't think there's ever going to be a time when we're going to be aligned again with the Canadian Taxpayers Federation, but with respect to that, all Albertans from all sides of the spectrum are shocked because this was a blatant broken promise. Yet that's what he did.

Let's also talk about amending the funding agreements for the LRT in Edmonton and Calgary. This was something that – again, when we're talking about transitioning and thinking about the future of our province, we really have to show a commitment to public transit such as the LRT. Again, this is a broken promise from the Premier to municipalities. He's basically deferred payment on those LRTs. And let's just say, once again, that when we're talking about a Premier who has a record, in only six months of being Premier, of breaking promise after promise, when he's saying that it's deferred until 2023, his word doesn't carry a whole lot of weight because he's also already demonstrated that when he says one thing, he can break that promise immediately and do something else. I don't think any of us are feeling any comfort when this government uses terms like “suspend” or “pausing” or “deferring” because really what we know is that their word is mud, frankly. It doesn't carry a lot of weight there. Certainly, I know that I'm concerned as somebody who lives in Edmonton and was relying on the idea that the LRT would be extended. I don't believe that this province is going to be funding that, and I'm not surprised that the mayors of Edmonton and Calgary would also not believe that anymore.

I also want to speak very quickly to the end of the lottery fund and moving that money into general revenue. Now, again, my constituency is comprised of a lot of very active volunteers. They actively volunteer within their community leagues, within their school councils. They're often very involved in nonprofit organizations. They do a lot of charity work in my constituency, and I'm very proud of that. People in Edmonton-Whitemud give back a significant amount. They put in a lot of their time and a lot of their energy into helping nonprofits, and they rely on things like casinos for lottery fund money.

Again, this government claims that they're just moving it into general revenue to save on administration costs, but we also know what happens when things get moved into general revenue. The amount of money that becomes available specifically for that allotted requirement disappears because all of a sudden you're competing with all the other draws on the general revenue fund. Actually, what the government caucus members used to rail about – although they were wrong, they'd say that the carbon tax was going into general revenue as a slush fund. They seemed to have a concern about that. Why? Because they thought it was just money that was going into the pool that could be distributed however government sees fit. But that's exactly what they're doing with the lottery fund. They're distributing that money into general revenue, so now all of those nonprofits, all of those school councils, all of those organizations that rely upon that money, that casino money, are now feeling like that money may not be there for them.

Can you blame them? I don't blame them. I don't blame them for feeling uncertain about that, particularly when, again, this government has shown its consistent track record of breaking their promises. They're using fudgy words like “deferring” and “pausing” and “suspending,” but really they're just simply – the trust is gone. The trust has completely been eliminated when it comes to how this government is dealing with their funds. Let's just talk about the other ways that – community leagues, for example, rely heavily on CFEP, rely heavily on CIP. Those have all been cut significantly.

So, of course, I have no words of comfort for my constituents when they say: “Is the money that we're raising, the money that we're working so hard for our nonprofits just going to be distributed? Are we going to ever see that money back?” I say:

"You know what? It's really hard to trust anything this government says right now and particularly this Premier because right now everything they say is a broken promise. What we're seeing in Bill 20, what we're seeing in Bill 21, what we're seeing in the budget: all broken promises." I really suspect that the Premier is going to need to get a little bit more communications advice. When he says, "Promise made, promise kept": I'm sorry; he's run out of opportunities to use that because now all we're seeing is promise made, promise broken. That has been consistently the case for particularly what we're seeing in these bills.

I am certainly very concerned. My constituents are very concerned, and I wish I could give them some comfort, Madam Speaker, but I certainly can't, not when the comfort is supposed to be coming from the mouth of our Premier, who has broken promise after promise.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

9:00

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I simply want to respond to a number of the comments that I've heard from across the aisle tonight on Bill 20. Firstly, in terms of our broad-based approach to incentivizing investment in this province and ensuring that we have an environment that will attract investment and encourage diversification, a broad-based approach, in fact, does encourage investment for sustainable diversification. It's the approach that doesn't have government manipulating capital flows, that may or may not be based on market realities or the sustainability of actual, real returns on investment, again without government interference. I'm confident that our broad-based approach will in fact lead to long-term, sustainable diversification.

In fact, our job-creation tax cut will disproportionately benefit nonenergy companies as resource companies support or contribute in a significant way through royalties, and thereby their corporate tax contributions through the corporate tax system tend to be somewhat lower than nonresource companies. Again, our job-creation tax cut will disproportionately encourage diversification in this province.

I do also want to just talk very briefly about debt. We've inherited a trajectory of $100 billion of debt from the previous government if we'd stayed on the track that we found ourselves on. Our fiscal plan very transparently puts us at $92 billion, but if we calculated the debt, in fact, if we used the same methodology as the NDP government did, we would in fact be at $86 billion of debt after the end of four years. Madam Speaker, $86 billion is a large amount of money, but it's significantly less than the $97 billion that the previous government put us on in terms of the trajectory.

Madam Speaker, when I campaigned during this last election, there was one common-denominator issue that virtually all Albertans agreed on, and that was that we could not continue to spend and leave large, massive amounts of debt for the next generation. This was an issue that crossed gender lines, that crossed socioeconomic lines – it was oil and gas workers, it was teachers and nurses, it was parents, it was single folks – but there was the common sentiment that we could not continue to spend recklessly at the rate we were spending. In fact, the previous government's operational spending increased by almost 4 per cent per year at a time when revenues were flat.

Our budget and fiscal plan turn that trajectory down that so that we, this generation, can live within our means and not pass burdensome debt on to our children and grandchildren. Madam Speaker, what this means is that not only will we be able to deliver programs today to Albertans, but we will be able to deliver high-quality programs to Albertans tomorrow and next year and for the next generation.

I'm pleased to support Bill 20 also because we are taking this time to clean up a number of funds that are simply no longer needed and, in fact, are costing Albertans, including the lottery fund, which we have evaluated. We've determined that if we dissolve the lottery fund, we can continue to support the great work that charities and nonprofits do in our communities at precisely the same levels of support that they received before. But, more importantly, Madam Speaker, by sound fiscal cash management, by dissolving these funds that no longer serve a purpose, we can save Albertans $13 million a year. We would be irresponsible not to make these key moves to provide Albertans sound fiscal management, the very type of management that they elected this government to provide.

With that, I will conclude my comments for now.

The Deputy Speaker: Are any members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I'm pleased to rise to speak to Bill 20, and I'm sure you'll be happy to know that I don't think I'll be going the full 90 minutes on this, so that's good news for everybody. That being said, it will take some time to outline why it is we are opposed to Bill 20 because there is no question that there are a number of features to it that are quite troubling.

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

I think, just sort of carrying on from where the Finance minister was just speaking, I'm certainly curious to hear the different calculation methods between the $86 billion and $92 billion, which I actually thought was $93 billion, but I'm happy to double-check. Again, in our case, as I said, the last time our debt was projected was when we were planning on bringing in an $8.9 billion deficit. At that time it was $97 billion, and then of course we brought in a $6.7 billion deficit. Of course, that would mean that our accumulated debt would actually be, well, below $95 billion but at the very maximum $95 billion.

Again, it's lovely to hear the minister talk about the evils of debt and the way in which that can impact on the ability to pay for things in the future, but I would suggest, then, that given that there's really no difference between their plan and ours, what we seem to be focusing on instead is the decisions of this government to give $4.7 billion to profitable corporations.

But that's not all they're doing. There are, in fact, other things that they are doing in the course of this budget as reflected in this bill, so I'd like to take a few moments to talk about them. I've essentially divided them into four categories.
