Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It just broke that the Member for Calgary-East is under investigation for fraud, forgery, and bribery. It's clear that there is something seriously wrong with this. We've been calling on the Premier to remove this member from caucus for weeks now. Will the Premier do so today?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, we respect the RCMP and independent investigation agencies. I understand that the member is asking questions about a situation that just broke. I have not actually had an opportunity to review what she is referring to. But the reality is – again, we stress it to the House – that we respect that. Again, we're focused on government policy here and doing the work that we've been sent here to do by Albertans, and we'll let the RCMP investigators do their job.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you. The RCMP certainly have an important job to do. So does the Alberta Election Commissioner, who has launched an investigation into allegations of the United Conservative MLA being part of fraud, forgery, and bribery. Mr. Speaker, is this acceptable behaviour for this party? If not, why won't the Premier stand in this House and remove this member from caucus?

The Speaker: Hon. members, all members will know that it is important that the questions that are asked during question period refer specifically to government business and not party business. I hear the member refer directly to party business.

Having said that, the Government House Leader, should he like to rise and answer the question.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Again, Mr. Speaker, we respect the independence of the RCMP and all investigative services inside our province. The hon. member, as you mentioned, is not asking about government policy right now and is rising on something I have not had a chance to review. But, as such, I just want to establish very clearly to the House that we respect that, and we'll continue in this House to focus on Albertans and let the RCMP focus on what they focus on.

Ms Hoffman: The RCMP, the Election Commissioner, and, I imagine, Albertans are deeply concerned about allegations and investigations related to fraud, forgery, and bribery. Why is the government not concerned? This is a government caucus member. Why is the government not concerned with fraud, forgery, and bribery? If this is acceptable by the government in their own caucus, what else is acceptable, Mr. Speaker? Fraud, forgery, and bribery should be clear lines that qualify somebody to be disqualified from the caucus. Why won't the Government House Leader or the Premier stand in this House today and remove this member from caucus until this is done?

The Speaker: The hon. member will know that the use of preambles after Question 4 is traditionally not used in the House.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Again, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is raising an issue that I have not seen; I've been in question period today. We respect the independence of the RCMP. To be very clear, we let them do their role, and we, again, will be focused on Albertans.

The Speaker: The Member for Spruce Grove-Stony Plain.

School Construction Concerns

Mr. Turton: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Under the previous government Copperhaven school in Spruce Grove opened its doors in 2018 to accept its first batch of young and eager students. Unfortunately, as a result of poor planning and missed completion timelines by the previous government, this elementary school has operated a full year without a gymnasium, and now it looks more and more likely that this gymnasium will not even be completed in time for the next school year. To the Minister of Infrastructure: what is the status of this project, and when will it finally be completed?

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, let me thank the member for his advocacy on behalf of his constituents. While Copperhaven school achieved occupancy in September last year, Infrastructure noted some unevenness and cracking to the gym floor. Over the past four months my department has been working with the contractor to rectify the situation. Work is expected to be completed over this summer, making the gym available for the next school year.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Stony Plain.

Mr. Turton: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the same minister: what steps is this government taking to ensure that issues like this don't continue, moving forward, for future school projects here in Alberta?

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, I want Albertans to know that their government will continue to be vigilant and conduct regular site inspections to ensure that contractors deliver quality projects as per the specifications and timelines agreed to in the contracts.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Turton: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the same minister: what steps has the government taken to create realistic timelines for parents whose children are attending new schools where construction may be unfinished?

The Speaker: The Minister of Infrastructure.

Mr. Panda: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, I have asked my department and the staff to work with all school boards to ensure that school projects are built to a high-quality standard within the approved budgets and that the projects meet the completion schedules.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Lac La Biche has the call.

Support for Wildfire-affected Students

Ms Goodridge: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. With the onset of warm, dry conditions, many northern Albertans are once again forced to evacuate their homes and escape forest fires. This creates a major disruption to the everyday lives of Albertans, especially children who are attending school. Students are an important resource for our province, and their education is absolutely paramount to the continued success of Alberta. However, these evacuations have forced students to be removed from their school for their own safety. To the Minister of Education: can you inform this House how many schools . . .

Member LaGrange: Thank you for the question. I believe the question would be: what are we doing for our students that are impacted by the fire? Our first priority is to ensure that our students and their families are safe and out of harm's way. Of course, we are accommodating high school students in the High Level area. My department has worked with the local school divisions to develop exemptions for students affected by the fire. My department has communicated to the grade 6 and grade 9 students that they can be excused from writing their provincial achievement tests and that they can write them at another time or in another school.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Lac La Biche.

Ms Goodridge: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister for that answer. Given that the safety of our students is the utmost priority to all members of this Assembly and given that as a result of these evacuations, many schools have been closed and given that the need to evacuate your community and the possible threat of losing your home can be an incredibly stressful ordeal, as many of the constituents in my riding of Fort McMurray-Lac La Biche can attest to, and considering that these evacuation orders have come while students are still attending classes, is there a plan to provide students with the mental health care and supports they need?

The Speaker: The Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the hon. member for the question. As my colleague would know from the fires in Fort McMurray, we take the mental health of evacuees and our students very, very seriously, and while the length of the evacuation remains unknown, I will be working with my colleague the Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions to ensure that the appropriate supports are in place for our students. We want to make sure that every single one of them has what they need to get through this very dangerous situation.

The Speaker: The member.

Ms Goodridge: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that evacuations such as these do disrupt the academic calendar for many students and given that students in grades 6 and 9 are scheduled to write their provincial achievement exams shortly and given that the students in grade 12 are soon to write their diploma exams as well and given that these exams are such important tools for our students' academic records, to the Minister of Education: how is the government ensuring that students who have evacuated their homes are given an opportunity to complete this very important testing here in Alberta?

Member LaGrange: Thank you for the question. Our government recognizes that diploma examinations are an important part of the students' educational journey. We have communicated that grade 12 students will be eligible for an exemption from their diploma exam. When a student is exempt from their diploma exam, their classroom mark will become their final mark. These students could also write their exams at another school or defer their examinations until August. Again, we want to do whatever will help the student in this situation.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for St. Albert has a question.

PDD Program Review

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In 2018 our NDP government appointed a diverse group of advocates to review key issues facing the PDD program, issues like IQ requirement, waitlists, and workers' wages. After consulting in communities all over Alberta, the panel has been working on the report and subsequent recommendations. Many in the community are concerned that this report is purposely being buried and that the new government will not let it see the light of day. To the Minister of Community and Social Services: when will you publicly release the committee's full report to the community?

Mrs. Sawhney: Thank you for the question. Mr. Speaker, our government wants to make life better for all Albertans. We are committed to supporting persons with developmental disabilities to ensure they live a life of dignity and have equal opportunities. This is why we have great respect for the work of the PDD panel. I'm currently reviewing the report and assessing the recommendations. It's important to be thoughtful and deliberative before moving forward on any decision.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We actually asked you to release it, not talk about it or evaluate it.

Given that we've seen shocking cuts to PDD under successive Conservative governments in this province, to the minister, through you, Mr. Speaker: can you commit to keeping our government's promise that no cuts will be made to people's services or the PDD program as a result of this review?

Mrs. Sawhney: Mr. Speaker, the PDD review panel undertook extensive stakeholder engagement. We owe it to the panel, to their work, to the stakeholders, and to Albertans to ensure that we are thorough. I am reviewing this report, and I will provide an update very soon.

The Speaker: The member.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. A report is great, but we want the whole report. We want to see it. The community wants to see it.

To the same minister: given that many members of the community have been waiting decades for a review of the issues facing the PDD program – they are complex – and given that a key issue that needs to be addressed is the PDD IQ requirement, which we know is not a credible tool to assess whether someone needs support or not, will you commit to removing IQ as a requirement entirely?

Mrs. Sawhney: Mr. Speaker, in our platform we committed to working with the disability community to improve the PDD program, and we will honour that commitment by continuing to engage with stakeholders and the PDD review panel. As I said before, our government is committed to helping Albertans with disabilities to live a full life with dignity and opportunity.

The Speaker: Hon. members, in 30 seconds or less we will proceed to Members' Statements. I ask that if you are leaving the House, you would do so in an expeditious manner.

Members' Statements

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-South East.

Calgary-South East Constituency Update

Mr. Jones: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Calgary-South East includes four great communities: Auburn Bay, Cranston, Mahogany, and Seton. This constituency is one of the fastest growing areas in Calgary and is populated by young families. Like most Albertans, they want to provide what's best for their children. In following with that goal, my constituents communicated to me at the doors that there are three areas they would like our government to focus on for them: the economy, education, and public transportation.

On the economy, our government already has a robust and ambitious plan to renew our economy and to bring jobs to Alberta. Through initiatives like the job-creation tax cut, the open for business act, and the Red Tape Reduction Act, we are already working to ensure that Albertans have the jobs necessary to provide for their families.

In terms of education Calgary-South East is in need of additional schools. While we are grateful that the Calgary board of education's Cranston second elementary school and the Calgary Catholic school district's Auburn Bay elementary school are both due to open in the fall of 2020, more are needed. Currently the Mahogany elementary school is in the early stages of the design process while the funding received for the much-needed Auburn Bay middle school is for design only.

Lastly, at this time the first stage of the green line is expected to be completed by 2026 and is planned to extend 20 kilometres, from 16 Avenue N to 126 Avenue S.E. Unfortunately, this will not reach the 40,000 people in my constituency. As a riding on the southernmost part of Calgary, my constituents are hoping that funding and planning can be extended to include their communities as well.

I'm looking forward to exploring these important projects with the hon. ministers of Education, Infrastructure, and Transportation. Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View would like to make a statement.

Rural Crime Strategy

Ms Ganley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and deliver my first member's statement in this House. There has been a lot of talk in this House about civility and working together, and in that spirit I would like to commend the government. It isn't easy to admit that you were wrong and take a page from the opposition, but the UCP government has done exactly that, twice now. Today we just saw the appointment of a special prosecutor. I think this will be to the benefit of all Albertans.

In 2017 rural crime rates were rising significantly, and my colleagues and I were hearing very valid concerns. In response our NDP government moved quickly to consult with the RCMP, with rural communities, and with rural crime watch groups to ensure that we developed a proactive strategy to target those prolific offenders that we know are responsible for the majority of this crime.

At the time, Mr. Speaker, the UCP wanted me to waste time studying the issue and lobby the federal government. On multiple occasions they voted against 59 RCMP officers and 40 civilian staff. They called my colleagues and I every name in the book, saying that we were spending like fools and not considering the future of the province and that new judges, 55 court clerks, and over 70 prosecutors over the course of four years were administrative waste. They voted against them at every turn. The UCP Premier even went so far as to cut ALERT while he was in Ottawa.

But, as with all things, results are what counts. After the introduction of the strategy rural crime dropped by an average of 10 per cent. This meant 480 fewer homes broken into, 3,500 fewer thefts, and 1,200 fewer vehicles stolen. I'm proud of this work.

Our strategy is working, but there's much more to do, Mr. Speaker. That's why I'm so glad that the UCP is not only keeping the additional police and prosecutors that they previously voted against but following our lead and adding more. They've even managed to convince the Premier of the value of ALERT.

At the end of the day, Mr. Speaker, in this place we have a duty to get it right, and I'm so glad to see that the UCP government has decided to follow our lead.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Livingstone-Macleod.

Rowan House Society in High River

Mr. Reid: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and congratulations on your election. Today I'm honoured to rise in this House to recognize the important work that the Rowan House Society, a charity based in High River, does for some of the most vulnerable residents of my riding of Livingstone-Macleod. Rowan House has been serving families affected by domestic violence for almost 20 years. It is a vital organization focused on school-based programs designed to prevent gender-based violence through education and to providing tangible and practical support and protection to women and children whose lives have been shaken by the horrors of domestic violence.

Historically Rowan House has focused on providing secure, temporary accommodations for the women and children in rural Alberta who are escaping domestic violence. I'm happy to tell all of my colleagues here today that starting this year Rowan House is expanding their services in an innovative way. While still seeking to guarantee safety and stability for women and children who have been harmed by domestic violence, they're launching their brand new stay at home program in Claresholm.

The goal of the project is to have the abusive partner in the relationship move to temporary housing for their treatment and their counselling with the goal of not taking away the stability provided to victims by living in their own homes. This serves not only to help break the cycle of violence that many families are caught in, but also to expand Rowan House's operations further into rural Alberta, with their main facility being located over an hour away from Claresholm.

Mr. Speaker, this is truly a fantastic program being launched in rural Alberta to help these families that are struggling to escape this systemic evil. Many rural families in southern Alberta do not have access to violence prevention services such as this, and I am forever grateful to Rowan House for providing such a service.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Banff-Kananaskis.

Tourism Week

Ms Rosin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my honour to rise in the House today to commemorate national Tourism Week. Alberta is blessed to encompass some of the most beautiful lands on Planet Earth. Many places support tourism industries, but there are few places where it comes so naturally. While most locations pride their tourism industry on infrastructure, skyscrapers, shopping malls, amusement parks, museums, or other man-made attractions, here in Alberta our tourism industry is founded upon the mere existence of our natural, God-given beauty.

[The Speaker in the chair]

Being the MLA for the riding of Banff-Kananaskis, I know this full well. Between Canmore, Banff, Lake Louise, and Kananaskis Country my riding welcomes millions of tourists every year. In fact, these towns welcome more tourists every day of the year than they have permanent residents living within. Individuals, families, and dogs of every breed travel from near and far to witness first-hand the breathtaking scenery of the Rockies. Looking at the numbers, tourism injected $8.5 billion in visitor expenditures to our economy in 2015 and contributed 127,000 jobs from over 19,000 local tourism businesses.

Tourism is an industry we should be proud of. During national Tourism Week I am proud to support our government's goal of doubling this industry by facilitating private-public funding of destination marketing, working with airport authorities to expand air transport agreements, and moving the industry into the ministry of economic development so that it can be treated as the true economic driver it is and not a niche industry.

So whether you celebrate from the mountaintops of Banff or the valleys of Waterton, upside down from the Calaway Park roller coaster or sitting right side up from a West Edmonton Mall waterslide, gazing up with the northern lights above in Fort McMurray or gazing down at the fish below in Lake Minnewanka, from inside the Royal Tyrrell Museum in Drumheller or outside in the Willmore wilderness park, I hope that all members of this Assembly can join me today in honouring Alberta's vibrant tourism industry and the thousands of workers, employers, small-business owners, and entrepreneurs who support it.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Government Policy Implementation Time Frame

Mr. Shepherd: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, Albertans have a lot of questions for their new government. After all, the Premier said that he was doing his homework in advance and he'd move quickly once in office and, in fact, wouldn't even have time to consult. So Albertans rightly have some questions about what it is this government is going to do, and it's interesting to see what they're willing to talk about and what they're not.

For example, when will profitable corporate friends of the Premier see their generous tax break? Right away. But when will hard-working nurses, teachers, and paramedics get the government back to the table to bargain in good faith? Well, in due course.

When will young people see a 23 per cent cut in the pay that they work hard to earn to help their families and save for university? Right now. But when will they find out if their tuition will remain affordable, if their campuses will be free of hateful speech? In due course.

When will this government adopt the years-old Education Act? Immediately. But when will they let school boards know if there will be a single new dollar to support 15,000 new students in our classrooms? Well, in due course.

When will this government, so devoted to ceremony and tradition, cease to consistently acknowledge treaty land? Already done. But when will they let indigenous Albertans know if they'll accept the principles of UNDRIP and the TRC? Well, in due course.

Now, when did this Premier scold LGBTQ students for doing politics on school hours? Well, that was after two weeks in office. But when will those students find out just how far he intends to roll back protections for their GSAs? In due course.

When did their Minister of Health decide that conversion therapy in Alberta isn't a thing? Apparently, just last week. But when will he let LGBTQ Albertans know if he's willing to admit he was wrong and has the courage to help end its destructive practice now? All together now.

Some Hon. Members: In due course.

Mr. Shepherd: In the meantime it's our job to keep asking the questions government doesn't want to answer and that of Albertans to decide if they like what they hear. I'm sure they will make their voices heard in due course.

The Speaker: They say that teamwork does make the dream work. I'm not always sure that that's the case here in the Assembly during Members' Statements, but I digress.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Fish Creek.

30th Legislature Opening Reflections

Mr. Gotfried: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's always an honour to rise in this House representing the people of Calgary-Fish Creek, which now includes the great communities of Midnapore and Sundance, where my family and I have lived for 27 years. I continue to be proud of being a born-and-raised Calgarian and Albertan. In addition to the privilege of public service, I have been honoured to serve the communities in which I've lived, worked, and played.

With deep involvement in Alberta's Asian community since the early '80s, I am blessed with many lifelong friends and am humbled to be considered honorary Chinese. I paddled hard and beat the drums as one of the cofounders of dragon boat racing in Alberta and have been deeply involved in celebrating cultural diversity through such organizations and events as the Chinatown Street Festival, Hong Kong-Canada Business Association, Hong Kong days, and GlobalFest.

I've also been privileged by deep engagement with community groups, educational institutions, and the nonprofit sector, including the Kids Cancer Care Foundation, Trico Centre, Trico Charitable Foundation, Bow Valley College and many more too numerous to mention. These opportunities continue to deeply influence who I am and the values I uphold and defend every day. I have a deep passion around the importance of housing affordability for all Albertans and was blessed to have driven innovative partnerships with Habitat for Humanity at all three levels of government.

Mr. Speaker, it is clear that public, private, and nonprofit collaboration is key to better meeting societal challenges now and into the future. I am also steadfast in my commitment to the highest standards of integrity, principles, and values in public service and will continue to be fiercely outspoken in this regard.

Lastly, let's all remember what has and what will continue to build this province: our entrepreneurial spirit, our prairie work ethic, our shared commitment to building a welcoming, compassionate, and inclusive society. Mr. Speaker, it is these qualities that will drive us forward to a sustainable future while ensuring that each and every Albertan can and will reach their full potential as we work diligently across party lines to return to the Alberta advantage.

The Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I wish to advise the Assembly that pursuant to Standing Order 7(8) the daily Routine may continue beyond 3 o'clock p.m.

Introduction of Bills

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

Bill 201

Protection of Students with Life-threatening Allergies Act

Ms Armstrong-Homeniuk: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm honoured today to rise and request leave to introduce Bill 201, the Protection of Students with Life-threatening Allergies Act.

The bill proposes that all publicly funded school boards have policies and plans for students with life-threatening allergies in addition to it requiring every publicly funded school to have an EpiPen on school grounds.

[Motion carried; Bill 201 read a first time]

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Child, Youth and Family Enhancement (Protecting Alberta's Children) Amendment Act, 2019

Mr. Ellis: Well, wonderful. Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I request leave to introduce Bill 202, the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement (Protecting Alberta's Children) Amendment Act, 2019.

Mr. Speaker, I promise I will be very brief. A few years back I made a promise to a young mother whose daughter was brutally abused and murdered while in kinship care. Her other children were also severely abused. Today is the day I fulfill this promise and I introduce the bill dubbed Serenity's Law, this time backed by a caring and compassionate government. This bill seeks to make it clear that everyone knows that if a child requires intervention, they can contact the director of Children's Services or a police officer.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I look forward to helping the children of Alberta. A promise made, and a promise kept.

[Motion carried; Bill 202 read a first time]

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders

Second Reading

Red Tape Reduction Act

The Speaker: I see the hon. Associate Minister for Red Tape Reduction rising.

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, I'm pleased to rise today to move second reading of Bill 4, the Red Tape Reduction Act.

Bill 4 will enable us to take deliberate steps to eliminate dead-weight regulations and unnecessary processes, while at the same time protecting the environment, upholding fiscal accountability, and ensuring the health and safety of all Albertans. Albertans have been struggling because of the prolonged economic downturn, and the unnecessary costs of doing business in Alberta have not been helping. An efficient regulatory environment will speed up approvals, boost Alberta's competitiveness, and spur economic growth and innovation. This bill would set the stage for government to introduce tools to create an inventory of regulations that are currently in place and assess whether or not they are effective.

It would also direct government to adopt a regulatory approach that focuses on outcomes instead of processes. An outcome-based approach will set a standard of regulatory excellence in Alberta where all regulations are necessary, effective, efficient, and proportional to the outcome they are trying to achieve, providing value for all Albertans.

Simply put, this bill would enable us to eliminate and prevent unnecessary regulations. We've heard from entrepreneurs, businesses, nonprofits, and the public that red tape is adding to the burden of doing business here in Alberta. These extra costs include time, money, and other resources, and they're driving away jobs and investment. With Alberta businesses and families struggling, we need to take action right away. To enable government to act quickly, the legislation will allow government to consolidate red tape reduction efforts in omnibus regulations. This made-in-Alberta, innovative approach will allow us to address red tape more quickly and efficiently than anywhere else in Canada. While we anticipate that most if not all of our red tape reduction efforts will be addressed through policy, this legislation will also allow government to create regulations to administer the Red Tape Reduction Act if necessary.

One of the immediate actions that would be enabled through this legislation is putting red tape under the leadership of one associate minister, myself, and also one division. This will help guarantee that all of the different areas and departments of government are working together and will ensure less confusion about who's directing the work. I'll have clear accountability to get the work done, and my dedicated team, albeit small, will have clear direction and clear expectations from the get-go.

To make sure that our actions and priorities are aligned with the needs of Albertans, I will also consult with Albertans by setting up a series of industry panels. These panels will be created in a phased-in approach and will represent Alberta's businesses and industry experts from key sectors, spanning from oil and gas, tourism and hospitality, and agriculture and forestry to manufacturing, construction, small businesses, and nonprofits. We know that Albertans have creative solutions to offer. They're the ones on the front lines dealing every day with unnecessary and burdensome red tape that serves no purpose other than to confuse and obstruct. We want to hear how we can do better, cut more, and get our economy back to being the freest, fastest moving economy in the country if not North America.

A key cornerstone of this legislation is a commitment to listening to Albertans, and that includes being accountable and transparent to them. That's why this legislation will require me to report on the government's red tape reduction strategies and initiatives. A copy of the report would be tabled in the Legislature and made available to the public beginning in 2020. I will have the flexibility to determine the content, timing, and frequency of the report based on the priorities that are identified and the actions that are put in place to address them. These actions, Mr. Speaker, are being introduced at a time when Alberta businesses and Alberta's economy need it most.

Mr. Speaker, we are introducing measures to reduce deadweight red tape by one-third over four years and prevent new red tape from creeping back. We are making Alberta more competitive. It will help our province to attract and retain investments, and it will reduce barriers for Alberta's job creators so that they can do what they do best, create jobs.

I now wish to adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Government Motions

Amendments to Standing Orders

11. Mr. Jason Nixon moved:

A. Be it resolved that the standing orders of the Legislative Assembly of Alberta effective December 4, 2018, be amended as follows:

1. Standing Order 3 is amended

- (a) in suborder (1) by striking out "Subject to suborder (1.1)" and substituting "Subject to suborder (1.1) and (1.2),";
- (b) by adding the following after suborder (1.1):

(1.2) The Assembly shall not meet in the morning from 10 a.m. to noon on Tuesday, or 9:00 a.m. to noon on Wednesday or Thursday, if the Government House Leader, or a member of the Executive Council acting on the Government House Leader's behalf, notifies the Assembly that there shall be no morning sitting, notice having been given no later than the time of adjournment on the sitting day preceding the day on which the morning sitting will be cancelled.

(c) by adding the following after suborder (5):

(5.1) In the period prior to, or following the commencement of, the first session of a Legislature, the Government House Leader may file a revised calendar with the Clerk, notwithstanding the deadline in suborder (5), following consultation with the Opposition House Leaders.

(d) in suborder (6) by adding "or (5.1)" after "unless varied by the calendar provided for under suborder (5)";

(e) by striking out suborder (7) and substituting the following:

(7) As soon as possible after January 15 each year, and following receipt of a calendar submitted under suborder (5.1), the Clerk shall publish the calendar provided for under suborder (5) or (5.1).

2. Standing Order 7 is amended

(a) in suborder (1) by striking out "Introduction of Guests" and substituting "Introduction of School Groups";

(b) by striking out suborder (3) and substituting the following:

(3) When Introduction of School Groups is called, brief introductions may be made by the Speaker of groups of schoolchildren in the galleries.

(c) by adding the following after suborder (5):

(5.1) If any Member other than the mover rises to speak to a debatable motion to concur in a report of a committee on a Bill under Presenting Reports by Standing and Special Committees, debate on that motion shall be called under Orders of the Day

(a) when the Government thinks fit, in the case of a report on a Government Bill,

(b) on the next sitting day other than a Monday, in the case of a report on a private Bill, or

(c) on Monday afternoon under Motions for Concurrence in Committee Reports on Public Bills other than Government Bills, in the case of a report on a public Bill other than a Government Bill.

3. Standing Order 8 is amended

(a) by striking out suborder (1) and substituting the following:

8(1) On Monday afternoon, after the daily routine, the order of business for consideration of the Assembly shall be as follows:

Motions for Concurrence in Committee Reports on Public Bills Other than Government Bills
Written Questions
Motions for Return
Public Bills and Orders other than Government Bills and Orders
At 5 p.m.: Motions other than Government Motions

(1.1) Notwithstanding suborder (1), if on a Monday afternoon prior to 5 p.m. no items of business other than Motions other than Government Motions remain on the Order Paper for consideration by the Assembly, Motions other than Government Motions shall be called and after the Assembly has decided all questions necessary to conclude debate on the motion, the Assembly shall proceed to consideration of any items of Government business provided for in suborder (2) unless unanimous consent is given to proceed to an additional Motion other than a Government Motion.

- (b) by adding the following after suborder (7)(a):
  - (a.1) Debate on a motion to concur in a report of a committee on a public Bill other than a Government Bill will conclude after 55 minutes of debate on the motion and 5 minutes for the mover to close debate, unless the motion is voted on sooner.
4. Standing Order 13 is amended by adding the following after suborder (5):
  - (5.1) No Member shall disrupt the orderly conduct of the proceedings of the Assembly by loudly or repeatedly banging on a desk.
5. Standing Order 19(1) is amended
  - (a) in clause (a) and (b) by striking out “at 5:15 p.m., the Speaker shall interrupt the proceedings” and substituting “the Speaker shall interrupt the proceedings 15 minutes prior to the time of adjournment for the afternoon sitting”, and
  - (b) in clause (c) by striking out “at 5:15 p.m., unless the debate is previously concluded, the Speaker shall put every question necessary to dispose of the motion” and substituting “unless the debate is previously concluded, the Speaker shall interrupt the proceedings 15 minutes prior to the time of adjournment for the afternoon sitting and immediately put every question necessary to dispose of the motion”.
6. Standing Order 29(3) is amended by striking out “and motions for returns” and substituting “, motions for returns and motions for concurrence in committee reports on public Bills other than Government Bills”.
7. The following is added after Standing Order 31:

Confidence in the Assembly in the Government

31.1 The confidence of the Assembly in the Government may be raised by means of a vote on

  - (a) a motion explicitly worded to declare that the Assembly has, or has not, confidence in the Government,
  - (b) a motion by the President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance, “That the Assembly approve in general the business plans and fiscal policies of the Government”;

- (c) a motion for the passage of an Appropriation Bill as defined in Standing Order 64,
  - (d) a motion for an address in reply to the Lieutenant Governor’s speech, or
  - (e) any other motion that the Government has expressly declared a question of confidence.
8. Standing Order 32 is struck out and the following is substituted:

Division

32(1) A division may be called for by 3 Members rising.

    - (2) When a division is called, the division bells shall be sounded at the beginning and for the last minute of a 15-minute interval.
    - (3) After the first division is called during any meeting of the Committee of the Whole or Committee of Supply, the interval between division bells on all subsequent divisions during that meeting shall be reduced to one minute, except in the case of the first division called during an evening sitting that commences in Committee of the Whole or Committee of Supply pursuant to Standing Order 4(4).
    - (4) When Members have been called in for a division, there shall be no further debate.
    - (5) Members are not compelled to vote and those who wish to abstain should remain in their seats when asked to rise and record their vote.
    - (6) The Clerk shall record the ayes and the noes and announce to the Speaker the number of votes cast for and against the motion.
    - (7) The ayes and noes shall be entered in the Votes and Proceedings.
    - (8) Abstentions shall not be entered in the Votes and Proceedings.
  9. Standing Order 37 is amended
    - (a) by striking out suborders (1) and (2) and substituting the following:
      - (1) Five copies, and any additional copies required by suborder (2), must be tabled of a document presented by a Member to the Assembly for
        - (a) placement of one copy in the records of the Assembly, and
        - (b) distribution of
          - (i) 2 copies to the Legislature Library,
          - (ii) one copy to Hansard,
          - (iii) one copy to the Government, in the case of a document tabled by the Speaker, the Official Opposition, any other party or group in opposition or an independent Member, and
          - (iv) one copy to the Official Opposition, in the case of a document tabled by the Speaker, a Member of the Government caucus, any other party or group in opposition or an independent Member.

- (2) In addition to the copies required under suborder (1), one additional copy must be tabled of
- (a) responses to written questions and returns ordered by the Assembly for distribution to the Member who asked the question or moved the motion for return, and
  - (b) any document presented by a Member who is neither a Member of the Government caucus nor the Official Opposition, to allow for distribution to both the Government and the Official Opposition under suborder (1).
- (b) by striking out suborder (3).
10. The following is added after Standing Order 46:
Debate interrupted by adjournment of the Assembly
46.1 When a motion to adjourn the Assembly is carried or the Assembly is adjourned for want of quorum, the matter under consideration prior to the adjournment shall be deemed to be adjourned to a future sitting day.
11. Standing Order 52(1)(c) is struck out and the following is substituted:
(c) Private Bills and Private Members' Public Bills, consisting of 11 Members,
12. Standing Order 52.01(1) is amended by striking out clauses (a), (b) and (c) and substituting the following:
(a) Standing Committee on Families and Communities – mandate related to the areas of Children's Services, Community and Social Services, Education, Health, Justice and Solicitor General, Seniors and Housing and Service Alberta;
(b) Standing Committee on Alberta's Economic Future – mandate related to the areas of Advanced Education, Culture, Multiculturalism and Status of Women, Economic Development, Trade and Tourism, Labour and Immigration and Infrastructure;
(c) Standing Committee on Resource Stewardship – mandate related to the areas of Agriculture and Forestry, Energy, Environment and Parks, Indigenous Relations, Municipal Affairs, Transportation and Treasury Board and Finance.
13. The following is added after Standing Order 52.01:
Subcommittees
52.011(1) Unless otherwise ordered, a standing or special committee shall have the power to appoint one or more subcommittees, which shall report from time to time to the committee.
(2) Every subcommittee shall be appointed by motion of the committee specifying the terms of reference and the membership of the subcommittee.
(3) At its first meeting of a new Legislature, every Legislative Policy Committee and the Standing Committee on Public Accounts shall appoint a Subcommittee on Committee Business to meet from time to time at the call of the Chair and to report to the committee on the business of the committee.
14. Standing Order 52.04 is amended by renumbering Standing Order 52.04 as Standing Order 52.04(1) and by adding the following after suborder (1):
(2) Subject to Standing Order 59.01(11), suborder (1) does not prevent a Legislative Policy Committee from undertaking a hearing or inquiry during the same period of time that a matter stands referred to the committee by the Assembly if the hearing or inquiry does not interfere with the work of the committee on the matter referred to it.
15. Standing Order 59.01 is amended by adding the following after suborder (11):
(12) Suborder (11) does not apply to the Standing Committee on Private Bills and Private Members' Public Bills.
16. Standing Order 59.02(3) is struck out and the following is substituted:
(3) During consideration of interim, supplementary or main estimates, the following individuals may be seated at a committee or in the Assembly:
(a) officials of the Government, to assist the Minister whose estimates are under consideration;
(b) staff of the opposition, to assist Members who are participating in estimates consideration.
(4) During main estimates consideration, officials of the Government may respond to questions from a committee at the request of the Minister.
17. Standing Order 64(1)(a) is amended by striking out subclause (ii).
18. Standing Order 74.1 is amended
(a) by striking out the heading and substituting "Referral of Government Bill to a committee after first reading", and
(b) by striking out suborder (1)(b).
19. The following is added after Standing Order 74.1:
Referral of public Bill other than Government Bill after first reading
74.11(1) After a public Bill other than a Government Bill has been read a first time, the Bill stands referred to the Private Bills and Private Members' Public Bills Committee.
(2) The Private Bills and Private Members' Public Bills Committee shall report back to the Assembly within 8 sitting days of the day on which the Bill was referred to the Committee.
20. Standing Order 74.2(2) is struck out and the following is substituted:
(2) Upon the concurrence of a committee report that a Bill be proceeded with, the Bill shall be placed on the Order Paper for second reading and, in the case of a public Bill other than a Government Bill, the Bill shall, subject to the precedence assigned to Bills standing on the Order Paper, be taken up on the next available Monday following the day on which the Assembly concurred in the report.
21. Standing Order 89 is amended by striking out "Standing Order 3" and substituting "Standing Order 3(5)".
22. The following Standing Orders are amended by striking out "Private Bills Committee" and substituting "Private Bills and Private Members' Public Bills Committee" wherever it occurs:
Standing Order 91(4)
Standing Order 96(2)
Standing Order 98(1) and (3)
Standing Order 100(1)

Standing Order 101
 Standing Order 102
 Standing Order 103
 Standing Order 104
 Standing Order 105(1)
 Standing Order 106

23. The headings preceding Standing Orders 98, 100 and 105 are amended by striking out “Private Bills Committee” and substituting “Private Bills and Private Members’ Public Bills Committee”.
- B. And be it further resolved that upon passage of this motion any public bills other than government bills that stand on the Order Paper for second reading are deemed referred to the Standing Committee on Private Bills and Private Members’ Public Bills in accordance with Standing Order 74.11(1) and notwithstanding Standing Order 74.11(2) the committee shall report back to the Assembly on these bills within 12 sitting days of the day this motion is passed.
- C. And be it further resolved that the amendments in this motion shall come into force on passage.

[Debate adjourned May 30: Member Ceci speaking]

The Speaker: I see the Member for Edmonton-South rising to debate.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Now, it’s really my pleasure today to rise and speak to Government Motion 11. I think it’s a really important motion here in the Assembly. It’s something that affects every single member here in the House, government and opposition alike. In fact, I think it perhaps affects government backbenchers the most out of anything we’ll do today, this change.

Really, I think, if we look at Government Motion 11, we can start from the top and look at some of the big, overarching changes that the front bench here is trying to introduce. What the government is trying to do is that they’re trying to take away a long-standing tradition in this Assembly. Not only is it a long-standing tradition in this Assembly, Mr. Speaker; it’s something that I know, as a member for the last four years and moving forward into the 30th Legislature, I was looking forward to doing and had enjoyed doing in the past. It’s something I already observed government members, not just government backbenchers but government front-benchers and cabinet ministers as well, doing in this House, and that’s the practice that we’ve had for over a century here of introducing guests.

Introducing guests is something where I’ve invited many important people in my life, whether that’s my family that I’ve invited here or my friends or, indeed, stakeholders and constituents who travelled quite a way and arranged to take time off their work because they came to see the work we do here on their behalf. They came to see what we do as legislators, as people who were sent here by our constituents for them. We’re members for constituencies, Mr. Speaker. They are the ones that want to see what we do for them. They came here, and one of the best things for them was to be introduced. I certainly remember that before I was elected, in fact, when I was quite a bit younger, I was sitting in the gallery, and my MLA introduced me in this House. That was a very high point for my year because being introduced means something for Albertans.

This is the people’s House. Mr. Speaker, you as the Speaker know very well that this is the people’s House. We let Albertans in our front doors. We let Albertans walk through this building and learn of our history and learn of what we do here in the Assembly. It is important that they have the ability to see this and to learn this because our work here matters, and Albertans deserve to see that work. What the government is trying to do here is restrict that work.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I think, really clearly here we’ve seen government members, whether it’s in the front or backbenches, taking advantage of the opportunity to introduce guests already. Like many of the changes that are coming in Government Motion 11, like many of the things that are being introduced in Government Motion 11, it’s really clear that it’s to control private members. The government wants to control what private members can do. Maybe they’re concerned about who the backbench might bring as guests. Maybe they’re concerned that some of their members will bring guests that the front bench doesn’t agree with. Maybe they’re concerned that they’ll bring antiabortionists, maybe they’re concerned that they’ll bring pro-lifers, or maybe they’re concerned they’re going to bring gay rights activists.

Mr. Speaker, I can understand why that may be a concern for the government front bench here. I can understand why that may be a concern for some of the cabinet ministers, and I can understand why some of the cabinet ministers may actually enjoy having pro-lifers brought into this Chamber. Really, I think that very clearly Government Motion 11 is an attempt to restrict the rights of private members. It really doesn’t matter whether you would prefer to have or not have those people in this Chamber. They should have the opportunity to be introduced in our Assembly. They should have the opportunity to have their names read into Hansard by their MLA. We are the ones as private members that represent them in this House and represent their voice in this House. You introduced so many of your guests in the 29th Legislature and indeed some here in the 30th. You know very well how important it is that we can provide a voice for our constituents.

I think when we talk about trying to control private members and what the government front bench is doing, it plays really well into looking at one of the other changes they’re trying to bring in here. I mean, we can see pretty clearly that when they try to bring in changes around allowing abstentions in the Chamber – when there’s a division, you don’t have to leave the Chamber. Perhaps you no longer have to barge your way out of the Chamber and run and hide in your office so that you don’t have to vote. Well, now you can sit in your chair and do nothing.

Mr. Speaker, let’s be honest. If those votes won’t be recorded in the official votes and records of the Assembly, it makes no difference. It makes no difference. I know that members of the conservative party in the 29th Legislature were embarrassed that they were caught running away from their jobs. I know they were embarrassed that journalists and the public saw them not doing their job and refusing to work, and I know that can be embarrassing for many people. If you’re caught with your hand in the cookie jar and it turns out you weren’t working for your pay, I know for conservatives that can be a very difficult thing.

Mr. Speaker, the reality is that if this is passed – sitting down during a division and not voting are exactly the same thing. You still won’t be recorded in the official Votes and Proceedings of the Assembly. It still will show that you refused to do your job, and it still will show that you weren’t representing your constituents, what we were elected here to do, what we were sent here by our constituents to do.

I think these two things were – it shows so clearly the front bench of this government trusts their backbench so little. It shows that they trust them so little not to bring in somebody embarrassing. It shows that it trusts them so little not to know whether to stand or sit or to sit in their office rather than in the Chamber, Mr. Speaker. I think very clearly we need to look at the suite of sweeping changes trying to be brought in by the government here and say: it really is aimed at a specific thing. It's aimed at the people sitting in the backbenches. I think that's a real shame for democracy in this House. I think it's a shame for what we're trying to accomplish here as a collaborative government and in opposition. I think that as an opposition our job is to try to oppose and propose policy changes, and I think it's a shame that we see a government that doesn't even want that from their own caucus, let alone another caucus. I mean, that's something that disappoints me in looking at Government Motion 11 here.

I think another thing that disappoints me is looking at their ban on desk thumping here. It's going to erase a long-held legislative tradition. Now, Mr. Speaker, I know you yourself in the 29th Legislature enjoyed a good desk thump once in a while, and I know many members on the government side did as well. I mean, I know a lot of members here are new, perhaps here for the first time. But there are some members here who have taken a break and returned, and those members will remember, I'm sure, that desk thumping is something that has been practised for a very long time in this Assembly. It's something that's quite enjoyable. I think it's something that allows members to show support for members across the aisle.

You'll recall, Mr. Speaker, of course, that in the 29th Legislature there was a colleague of ours who discussed how they were sexually assaulted in their home, and one of the things that members across both sides of the aisle did is that they thumped their desks to show support. It's something that made sure that that member knew they weren't alone. I'm worried that if we get rid of this ability to support our members, it's going to cause disruptive behaviours. It's going to mean that we're not able to support our members and support each other in the same meaningful way.

It really is a shame that the government front bench here wants to control members so tightly. They can't loosen their grip even a little bit because they're concerned that if they let their backbench applaud how they like, well, then they're going to get other ideas. We really can't let them choose how they want to express their applause in this Assembly. If that's the direction the government wants to take, then, I mean, that is the government front bench's prerogative. Of course, I would hope the government backbenchers may see it differently and understand how they are perhaps being restricted or understand perhaps how they are having the ability to express themselves restricted.

Indeed, it seems like these government backbenchers, these people who were decidedly not appointed to cabinet, Mr. Speaker, are okay with that. They're okay with the front bench telling them what to do, and I think that's a real shame. I think if you run a government like that, it shows pretty clearly that you're not okay with any difference in opinions. I think having a difference in opinions makes us better legislators. It makes us legislators that allow better information to come to us at any given time. It makes us legislators that allow us to have better policy at any given time. I think that's really special. A collaborative government that is trying to improve Alberta is really important. It's really important for all governments.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we can see that that simply isn't the case, and we can see with Government Motion 11 that they're signalling what they want to be doing for the next four years. For the next four years what the government is trying to signal is that if you weren't appointed to cabinet or you don't sit in the caucus and you're not appointed to cabinet, well, then, your voice doesn't matter. We're not going to let you introduce your guests. We're not going to let you thump your desk. We're not going to let you vote how we don't want you to vote. We're not going to let you go hide in your office anymore. We're going to tell you exactly what to do every single time.

Mr. Speaker, if the members of the government backbench are okay with that, then I suppose that's what we'll see in a vote coming up here. But I think that we can see very clearly that these members are having their rights restricted, myself included as a private member. We are having our rights restricted. The government seems to want to push forward very rapidly with restricting rights in an omnibus manner. They want to do it all in one big motion.

We talk about how this ties the hands of the backbenchers. Really, it ties the hands of democracy, Mr. Speaker, because democracy depends on all of us here in the Assembly having that voice. It depends on all of us here being willing to stand up to our cabinet ministers and say: we believe there are better ways to do things. That's why we were elected here.

But if I can't even introduce the president of the school council at my school to let them know that I'm fighting for them when I'm making sure that they get their funding for enrolment, if I can't introduce the community league playground president because I'm trying to make sure they can secure some funding to build a spray park in their community, if they're trying to restrict us from doing all these things, Mr. Speaker, it becomes pretty clear that the government isn't interested in what these Albertans have to say. It becomes pretty clear that the government isn't interested in the community league presidents, the government isn't interested in the school council presidents. It becomes pretty clear that the government isn't interested in even the school groups that come here. I think that's a shame as well because those introductions that private members were allowed to make and those introductions that private members enjoyed making were a way for us to show Albertans that we were doing our jobs.

When the front bench tries to restrict their backbench and, perhaps as collateral damage, I guess, the opposition as well from doing their jobs, it really shows that the government is trying to keep everything close, and they really don't want their private members to be able to do anything at all. It's pretty clear. You can't introduce people. You can't vote, or if you do vote, you have to vote exactly how they want. They tell you when to sit in your chair and not say a word. You can't thump on your desks. You can't do any of the things that we've done here for decades, Mr. Speaker. This is my second term now, but I know many members here have had more terms than me. They will recall that in the past all these things that are now being banned were happening because they are long-held traditions here in this Assembly.

If the Premier really does feel so strongly that he can't trust his backbench to not bring in somebody embarrassing, I mean, that's the Premier's prerogative. If the Premier really does feel so strongly that he's scared of a little noise that a table makes, that's the Premier's prerogative, Mr. Speaker. If the Premier really feels so strongly that he has to sit in his chair to not work and he can't go not work from his office, that's the Premier's prerogative as well.

But I think it's really a shame that we've come to this. I think it's a shame that we've come to the situation where the government needs to use these really heavy-handed measures to control their members. I think it's a shame that the government has to use these heavy-handed members to reduce the transparency of this Legislature and reduce the democracy of this Legislature, because this Chamber, as the foundation of Alberta's democracy, as the core of where we work and where we show Alberta what we do for them – I think we should be proud to show them what we do. We should be proud to have our names on the votes and the Order Paper. We should be proud to be able to introduce them and show them the bills we are passing in here. We should be proud to be able to make some noise and tell them that we're fighting for them, Mr. Speaker.

But if government backbenchers are okay with hiding that away and perhaps closing the doors and sealing the Chamber off from the outside and if they're okay with not introducing their guests and if they're okay with not having their constituents know what they do here in Edmonton, then that's their prerogative. But really I think that we as MLAs and we as legislators should do better. Albertans deserve better, and I know that we will continue to fight for better.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available for questions and comments.

I see none.

I see the Government House Leader rising.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I actually am rising to move a motion on behalf of, I hope, all private members of the Legislature. It is the following: to move to one-minute bells in Committee of the Whole. My understanding is that we have to move it now. Is that correct? Can I do it this way and just move one-minute bells for all stages for the rest of the afternoon?

The Speaker: Government House Leader, I think that is the most acceptable way for the motion to proceed. We would need to be in committee for you to move a motion in committee, so if we do this now . . .

Mr. Jason Nixon: Understood, sir.

The Speaker: Now, having said that, we're not moving a motion. We're requesting unanimous consent.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Yes.

The Speaker: Okay.

Mr. Jason Nixon: I was about to say that. Now that I understand where you would like to go with this, Mr. Speaker, or what your advice is, thank you very much.

I will move for unanimous consent for one-minute bells for the duration of the afternoon.

The Speaker: Are there other members who would like to speak to Government Motion 11? I see the Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Ms Goehring: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise this afternoon to discuss Government Motion 11 and to discuss some of the sweeping changes that are being suggested for the standing orders. I know as a private member that being able to stand up in this House is a privilege, and I know that being able to introduce guests is something that I've found to be very important to myself and to my constituents and, I'm sure, to all of the members in this House. Having that taken away is very, very upsetting.

It comes to mind in speaking about the importance of organ donation and having my best friend and her family come to the Legislature, where I got to introduce her son Austin Post, who at eight years old received a heart transplant. I have a deep connection with this family. She's been my best friend since I was 15 years old, I was there when Austin was born, and I'm now his MLA. To be able to have the privilege to stand here in his House and talk about his bravery and give him an introduction and then to be able to have that celebrated in Hansard is something that I just simply am so upset is being taken away. I know Austin pays attention to what's happening in this Legislature. I know he's watching today. He knows the importance of democracy and the ability for Albertans in this province to have a voice through the ability to make introductions. That's one of the ways that we can acknowledge some of our amazing Albertans and our amazingly brave young constituents like Austin Post.

Some other pieces of this sweeping motion are also concerning. When I think about banging on our desks and the tradition that stands to us in this House, I can recall several moments in this House when we've had members in this very place stand up and share heartbreaking stories like the one from Maria Fitzpatrick, the former MLA for Lethbridge-East, when she shared with us the devastating impact of domestic violence on her and her child and the trauma that she had received because of the domestic violence and then the bravery that she showed in not only leaving domestic violence but being able to share it in this House. A way that we were able to show her support – because we're not able to move freely in the Legislature. We couldn't just walk over and give her a hug when she so desperately needed one. We were able to bang on our desks to show her that we are here with her, we support her, and we have complete respect and utmost appreciation for her ability to be able to express herself in such a vulnerable way in this House.

Thumping on our desks was the least we could do in that moment to give her courage to continue to go on sharing her story. For me, that's important. I'm a social worker, Mr. Speaker, and being able to express support in a place of such intensity is so important. I'm very upset that this is something that's being considered to be taken away.

I know also as a private member in this Legislature, Mr. Speaker, that we don't have a lot of opportunities to be able to get private members' bills. I was very fortunate to be able to have one of my private members' bills supported and passed in this Legislature. It was presented in the spring, and it was about PTSD Awareness Day – that's Post-traumatic Stress Disorder Awareness Day – and the date that I had proposed was June 27. Now, if this matter had been referred to committee, it likely would not have seen its very first PTSD Awareness Day the same spring that it had been introduced in this House. We were able to get through first, second, third reading, Committee of the Whole with unanimous support in this Legislature. That's almost unheard of.

Because of the work of my office in consulting with Albertans to talk about this important issue and because of the importance that the other members of this Legislature knew it had, we were able to pass it without delay, without having to refer it to a committee to talk about some of the information that we already knew was important. We needed to raise awareness about PTSD in this province and to be able to continue to provide support and reduce stigma of this disorder. I'm pleased to say that this was very successful because we didn't have an unneeded delay of sending it to committee.

These are all things that as private members I think we should all embrace. It's tradition in this House to be able to express ourselves, to be able to introduce Albertans into their Legislature, to be able to go back and look at them in Hansard or watch Assembly Online and see their faces and hear their stories through the member that serves them. I mean, today we're joined in the gallery by members, and it's unfortunate that they might never get introduced in this Legislature by their member, that was elected for them. That, to me, is deeply upsetting, Mr. Speaker.

I would implore all members, private members throughout the House, to really consider not supporting this government motion, because it takes away our rights and it takes away the rights and experiences of Albertans in the province. I think that's all I have to say on this, Mr. Speaker, but I really implore everyone in the House to really consider that we not support this government motion.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Under 29(2)(a), are there any members with questions or comments? The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to thank the Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs for just reminding us about the really important legislation around PTSD Awareness Day that she so expertly crafted and delivered here. We all together supported it in this place. That was a great day, actually, when it passed.

Also, the member was previously the government liaison for the military. I'm not entirely sure of the title, but I know that during her time in that role she did an incredible job of introducing people, bringing them here and recognizing their unique contributions to life in Alberta. I'm just wondering if the member could tell us maybe about some of those other introductions, that will cease to happen in our own words if we're not allowed to introduce the people and the stakeholders that mean so much to us that we write those introductions using our words, highlighting what we know to be true, and then have those words spoken by somebody else. I'd like the member to maybe expand on why those particular introductions were so important.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you so much to the hon. member for highlighting that. As the previous government of Alberta's liaison to the Canadian Armed Forces and as the current Official Opposition liaison to the Canadian Armed Forces it's been such an honour to be able to serve and acknowledge the amazing highlights and sacrifice and contributions that our members of the Canadian Armed Forces have provided not only to this province but to this country.

Over the four years when I was in the official role, I was able to bring so many members of the military, veterans, and their families to this very House to highlight and introduce them, to let Albertans know who is serving for our country. It was such a privilege to be able to show them their Legislature and to introduce them here myself in the Legislature, knowing that so many that had come to visit had never actually been in the Legislature itself. To be able to sit up in the Speaker's gallery and, for me, to be able to express my sincerest appreciation on behalf of all Albertans in that role was an incredible privilege and honour. Unfortunately, it's something that might not continue if this proceeds the way it is. There are so many things that we need to celebrate within our Canadian Armed Forces, and in being able to highlight them just with a simple introduction and a thank you, I think that as Albertans it's the least we can do. Just knowing that that's going to be taken away is just – it feels very undemocratic and just wrong.

Thank you so much, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Are there any other members who wish to speak? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise to speak to Government Motion 11 and some of the sweeping changes to the standing orders that have been proposed here. As I gathered my thoughts around all of these standing order changes, I really want to start off my comments by talking about private members' business. Through you to all members in this Assembly but particularly all the private members in this Assembly, I really want to make sure that, particularly, new private members understand how rare it is to get a private member's bill. I know that's been discussed by other respondents under this Government Motion 11.

In winning the draw, 1 out of 60-some, depending on how many people are in Executive Council, you have to be pretty lucky. I am number 45 right now, so very unlikely that I will get to introduce a private member's bill with that current draw, but I'll live with some hope there, Mr. Speaker. Maybe we'll be very effective and efficient. But even if you win the draw, even if you are number 1, like the Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville is, we know that private members' business is very time restricted, and there's absolutely no guarantee that those bills will pass. But they can achieve very significant policy objectives.

As the Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs was just talking about, we have seen a handful of private members' bills pass in this Assembly, and each of them, the ones that make it through, is significant and has made a real difference in our province. From PTSD Awareness Day to the Long Term Care Information Act, helping to make sure that there's good information for families in long-term care facilities – the Residential Tenancies (Safer Spaces for Victims of Domestic Violence) Amendment Act is the one that really stands out for me – each of these private members' bills has made a significant difference in Alberta, but the fact that they were even passed is remarkable.

When people have looked at different Legislatures – and I do not have the data for our Legislature, Mr. Speaker – the percentage of private members' bills that typically pass in a Legislature is about 10 per cent. Even if you win the draw, even if you are number 1, even if you are number 2, the chance that your private member's bill will become law is very, very low, and it's because of that time restriction. Knowing that as a private member you have limited opportunities to make your voice heard, we need to make the most of each of them. When it comes to private members' bills, so many of them die on the Order Paper. Adding to an already difficult-to-succeed-at process and introducing a new two-week step of sending things to committee, it's actually going to mean fewer private members' bills succeed in this place. That's really unfortunate for the elected representatives who inhabit this Chamber but also for Albertans who are hoping through their MLA to have their views and desires expressed in this place.

Making sure that we have adequate private members' time is critical. Whenever there is a threat to private members' time, you will see great uproar and debate in this place, because it can only be done on Monday afternoons but also because we know that it's vital that we have these tools to be able to represent our constituents. In this case a lot of the changes in Government Motion 11 have been presented as preserving decorum, but I would suggest that this particular change is detrimental to our democracy. We're actually making it harder for private members' bills to be passed, and it's so disappointing.

I'm very pleased that the Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville and the Member for Calgary-West were able to introduce their private members' bills today. I hope that this means that even if Government Motion 11 is passed, these two bills will be able to come forward and be debated on Monday next week, when we all come back to work again. I'm not a hundred per cent certain that that's the case, but that's certainly my hope.

I think we need to talk about protecting students with life-threatening allergies and protecting Alberta's children. These are both very, very worthy subjects. And the idea that by not stopping at committee first, these are lesser pieces of legislation: I don't agree with that. It's not as if we're only going to get a single afternoon to talk about the new Bill 201. At most, the fastest this bill can pass without unanimous consent is maybe four weeks, all stages. Maybe. We know that the PTSD Awareness Day did pass very quickly with unanimous consent.

We know there's adequate time for private members' bills to be debated, and when there needs to be more time, more discussion happens. The process we have works. Even with the process we have working, so few private members' bills get through. So to add an extra barrier inhibits everything. I certainly hope that all the private members, particularly the new private members in this Chamber, are hearing what I am saying. Your private member's bill is less likely to happen even if you get drawn in the first 10 because of this change. It's unfortunate for you. It's unfortunate for your constituents.

But, of course, that is not the only change within this set of changes that have been put forward in Government Motion 11. I feel very, very strongly about MLAs being able to introduce guests. Earlier this week, Mr. Speaker, I believe you were here when I introduced my husband in this place. That was very meaningful for me because later in the summer, on July 16, it will be my 15th wedding anniversary. He's been such an amazing support/partner through this journey in politics. We both got involved in politics together, and, interestingly enough, when I was first starting to get interested in politics, I was introduced in this Assembly by Brian Mason, our former Government House Leader. That was in 2006. I can now search Hansard for my own name and find that introduction by that very honourable member, whom I miss, although I hope he's having a wonderful retirement.

Mr. Speaker, I was introduced in 2006. In 2007 I became a candidate for the first time. That introduction had a profound impact on me but was certainly not the only factor. Walking into this place for the first time to see debate and seeing the work that happens here on behalf of all Albertans was inspiring to me and was an important part of my political journey that brought me here to represent the great constituents of Edmonton-Mill Woods for the second term. That introduction mattered to me. The introductions I've been able to do for constituents have mattered to them.

One stands out for me, and it was a volunteer at one of my community leagues, a dedicated community member who is always there organizing events, is always there at the community league meetings, works to better what is happening in Mill Woods. I invited community league presidents and members to come and be introduced. This particular individual told me afterwards that he'd agreed and been kind of, like, "I'll get introduced; no big," didn't think too much of it, and then he got here into this Legislature. This is a building a lot of people don't make it into. It's not that accessible. It's not that often that people come through. I love the work that we do on Canada Day. I love the work that various Speakers have done to try to bring more and more people in. I think introductions are an important part of that, and I think that being introduced by your MLA is an important part of that.

After that gentleman came in and was introduced in this place, he said afterwards that it touched him in a way he really wasn't expecting. This was a simple acknowledgement of a dedicated community volunteer, and he said that that was a moment that will last with him. That was a moment that touched my heart, too, knowing that it had had that impact. I really appreciated him telling me that afterwards.

I've had the opportunity to introduce some family but not all of them. I was happy to have my husband here. I would have preferred to have done my introduction closer to the anniversary – we were getting ahead of ourselves a little bit – but I wanted to make sure we got it done, and I appreciated him being able to make a change in his time.

I genuinely appreciated being introduced by the hon. Brian Mason. That's something that I now have a printed transcript of, that introduction. Then in 2007 Raj Pannu introduced me again, and I have that printed as well, with photos of those political leaders, people who inspired me to begin my life in politics. It really was meaningful.

I appreciate that the government introduced an amendment and that now, instead of no introductions, which was their first proposal, the Speaker will do introductions. But it is not the same thing. The relationship that I have with constituents, with family members, with those people who make a real difference can be expressed when you're doing that introduction. I think that putting on other limits would have been another fine way to address the concerns that sometimes introductions can go too long.

I really disagree and will be voting against these sweeping changes because although they did adjust it so that there will still be introductions done by the Speaker, it certainly didn't go far enough. I have to echo what my colleague from Edmonton-Castle Downs said about the change that section 4 will undergo through these changes to ban desk thumping and for a few reasons: the tradition of it; for what my colleague from St. Albert talked about, the fact that there may be members in the future unable to clap – we need to be keeping these things in mind – and for the reason that it is a powerful tool for supporting colleagues.

I have now seen a number of my new colleagues in this place, in the government caucus, who have stood to give their first statement, to ask their first question, and who have done that, stood up into a silent room. "Okay. Go. Talk for the first time." I'm really grateful because the first time I stood up to talk, my entire caucus showed their support for me by banging on their desks. That strengthened me, gave me that extra boost to be able to do that.

In these first few days of this Legislature, being able to have that support of colleagues before asking questions is appreciated. In being able to show that support to my colleagues, like when my colleague from Edmonton-City Centre delivers another brilliantly delivered, witty, funny, clever but also pointed member's statement, it's almost a release to be able to say: "Yes. That was wonderful." And it's the tradition – I've got to go back to that – being able to support colleagues.

So I disagree with that change, and I feel a little bit of regret for the private members in this House who, in their very first member's statement or their very first question, have stood up to a room of silence. I think that's unfortunate, and I'm sorry that they didn't get the opportunity to feel that support from their caucus. I think that's wrong headed.

I've talked so far about private members' bills and how these changes are going to make it harder for private members' bills to succeed; about the importance of introducing our guests ourselves and the power of those introductions; about the difference it makes to the accessibility of this place, to people coming in and feeling welcome, like this is their House; as well as about the banning of desk thumping.

I also, of course, have to speak to the change that will allow members to not do their jobs: to abstain from votes. It's just so obvious to everyone who pays attention to this place where this started from. It started from a party being embarrassed when they had to run out of the room repeatedly. Now that same party is in government and doesn't want to be embarrassed again. That is not an issue of decorum, Mr. Speaker; that is an issue of undermining our democracy. People elect us to this Chamber to participate in debate, to make tough choices, and to help lead this province, and particularly the government caucus should take those things seriously. Abstaining, not doing your job, and doing it in a way that is the least embarrassing is not a change to be proud of.

I know, having represented my constituents for four years, that they care deeply about where their representatives, where we, stand on an issue. I know because constituents will come to talk to me, to ask these things.

For these reasons, I will be supporting Motion 11.

The Acting Speaker: Under 29(2)(a) questions or comments?

Seeing none, are there any members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadows.

Mr. Deol: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm rising in the House to provide my input on the omnibus amendments to the standing orders. I've been in the House only for six days, and it's not only me; I see many members on the other side of the House. You know, we're just trying to adjust ourselves to the new rules given to us by our constituents last month, a while ago.

It's really saddening for me to see this motion. If this motion is passed, not only me but many members on the other side will lose the right or the privilege they have to introduce members of their ridings or members of their families. We call this House the Legislature of Alberta, not the House of one or the other party. This very place belongs to Albertans, and I think they deserve to be recognized for their work and recorded in Hansard. This is a great privilege for me to be here and for everyone, I will say. We are not here because of us; I'm here because of, you know, the help and the support I have from my family, from my wife. And I can let you know that a house of seven people – I have three aging parents and my special-needs son and a busy place. Those people still encouraged me to do this job, to step up and go forward for this job.

This place, like, this society, the province of Alberta, I will say, is a great place because not only a few of us but thousands and thousands and thousands of people who come out, work hard, go to work 9 to 5 – they volunteer their time in their communities so that we can have such a place, a great place, like Alberta. And not only this; then they work hard to send us to this House so that we can voice their concerns and we can voice their issues. It's very sad to see that we will not be able to recognize this community.

I'm privileged to live in this community for the past 26 years, and during those 26 years I was lucky to have worked with a number of organizations: media organizations, community organizations, and sports organizations, people working hard in the community, people not belonging to one or the other party. People belong to all political stripes. I'm saddened to see that we will not be able to recognize those people. It will totally be sending a very, very wrong signal to the community. I see this as kind of going in a very, very wrong direction.

Also, I was amazed or appalled or surprised to see this motion mentioning something like that, you know, desk thumping is something bad to be done in this House. This House, when I was looking at the information, has a long – like maybe a hundred years of tradition. If this didn't offend anyone else in all those years, then I don't know what the problem is right now. If this motion passes, this is also something that will send a very, very wrong signal and a very, very wrong message to the community at large, to this society at large.

Mr. Speaker, I had the privilege to run my business for the last 18 years. I ran a very small insurance brokerage, where I had six to eight people working together. You know, if this was the kind of behaviour I had towards them, I don't know how I was going to be interpreted, discriminated. So I'm surprised in this House, when people really expect from us to be role models and set a higher standard – then people in society can follow it and, you know, contribute to this society to make this society better for all.

We are kind of discussing these kinds of issues. This is not being allowed going forward because one side of the House really doesn't feel comfortable with this. Rather, you know, than updating themselves or learning about this tradition, they want us to be mumming, suppressing our voices to do this thing this way and not the other way because they don't feel comfortable with this. It's not because of something related to the standing order. It's not because of something just related to the House. So think outside, like: how are the people going to interpret what signal this is sending to the general public, the people at large?

I felt quite, you know, obliged to stand up and rise and record my actual feelings and views on this. It's just very, very appalling, and I say that it's an attack on democracy.

I'm strongly opposed, so I appeal to the members to please not vote for this motion. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Under 29(2)(a) any questions or comments?

I believe that the hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods would like to speak.

Ms Gray: Thank you. Just very quickly to my colleague from Edmonton-Meadows, congratulations on your victory. I'm very pleased to be working with you in Edmonton's southeast. I just wanted to very quickly ask you: do you not think that it feels better when you stand up and your colleagues are all welcoming you to speak and supporting you as you begin?

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadows.

Mr. Deol: Yes. This is my privilege. I'm so humbled, actually honoured to be here with my colleagues, my members. My friends requested me to come up and, you know, give my feedback on this, and I think I could not do more on behalf of my constituents, the people in my riding. I could stand up and give my feedback and present their voices in the House.

Thank you for giving me the opportunity. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Any other members looking to continue under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, I believe the hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview has a comment.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's a great honour to rise and speak to Government Motion 11, which is sweeping changes to the standing orders. I have a number of points that I need to make, but again, I think my colleagues have adequately or rightly pointed out the fact that these standing order changes affect and impact every single member in this House, more so private members than members of Executive Council but nonetheless every single member and their rights in this place. That's why it is such a big deal and why our caucus has spoken. These are significant changes that are permanent and that will forever change this Assembly and this Chamber.

You know, one of my colleagues had said that this was the will of the government being imposed on this Assembly. I dare say that it's the will of one person that is being imposed on this Assembly, Mr. Speaker. There is only one person who is a former MP, a person who, again, loves Ottawa so much, who wants to superimpose it or, quite frankly, ram it down the throats of Albertans. We've seen that on a number of things, but I can tell you that this place has a rich history and tradition, and for me what's extremely frustrating is one person who's able to hold an office in order to impose their will on an Assembly, upsetting the table on the history of this place. I mean, desk thumping is just one of them. The fact that we're making sweeping changes to how private members' bills are going to be debated in this House – again, following the House of Commons federally, where it goes from first reading into a committee.

Now, there are some practices in Ottawa that aren't necessarily bad, but I can tell you that, you know, from an Alberta point of view, I personally like the way we do it here in Alberta, and Ottawa can stay in Ottawa. In fact, if members are itching to bring Ottawa here, maybe they've come to the wrong place. Maybe they should have stayed in Ottawa.

I do want to point out the fact that these are historic, sweeping changes to the standing orders. I encourage all members to check the history of this place, but I believe that these changes are the most significant changes that have been made without being sent to a committee. Now, there's irony in this, Mr. Speaker, because the members opposite want to pass this all in this place and not send it to a committee, yet they're very eager to send other things to committee. In fact, when they were in opposition, many of their referrals, hoists, and reasoned amendments were trying to send our bills to committee. Now that the shoe's on the other foot, it's kind of an inconvenient thing to do, so let's just ram them through in this place.

What's interesting, Mr. Speaker, is that we actually have a committee, an all-party committee, on Privileges and Elections, Standing Orders and Printing. I think that after today's standing orders maybe the government wants to rename this committee because to have a committee that's supposed to review standing orders, which hasn't been used – we did bring forward a couple of amendments over the last 48 hours to break apart some of these standing orders and to send some of them to this very committee to be debated by all members of the Assembly. I'm sure that there are government private members that would love to be able to speak on these. You know, I didn't ask my colleagues on the other side if the Premier is planning to allow his caucus to free vote on these standing orders. That would be interesting. I mean, that's supposed to be one of his tenets, yet maybe only when it's convenient.

But, you know, in these sweeping standing order changes, Mr. Speaker, there are some – I'll be the first to admit that there's a handful we have no issues with, recognizing that some of these are housekeeping issues that need to be cleaned up for clarity for the table as well as clarity for members. I'll give you one example. It's the standing order – well, under Government Motion 11 it's 10 on the paper, and it's about "Debate interrupted by adjournment of the Assembly." Now, I can tell you that the table has been very, very helpful to all parties in this House when a House leader stands up and forgets to adjourn debate on a bill and just tries to adjourn the Assembly. If that should happen, whatever was being debated would die on the Order Paper. We have all benefited from advice from the table on that, so I appreciate that number 10 here aims to clarify that.

What I dislike is that the government is trying to slip in the fact that for want of quorum, so if the government fails to have an adequate number of members in this Chamber, whatever bill is being debated, if quorum is called and the bells go and there aren't enough members in this House, that bill would die on the Order Paper. Now, with these standing order changes it'll just get brought back. Now, that's a minor thing. I think, quite frankly, it's a great little consequence hanging over the fact that if the government doesn't have its act together or enough members in this Chamber when the Chamber is sitting, that could very well happen. That's more of a minor one, Mr. Speaker.

I know that a number of my colleagues have talked about Introduction of Guests. I've had the honour and privilege of being a member in this House since 2012 and can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that it is an extremely special experience for constituents to be introduced by their own MLA. Now, as great a speaker and orator as you are, it does not fulfill the same purpose to have someone else speaking and reading the names of constituents that come in. You know, to the members, and especially the government caucus, many of whom are from outside the city, bringing their constituents all the way to Edmonton to sit in the Assembly to be introduced is one of those historical life experiences, to have your name read into Hansard by your MLA. Again, that's meant as no disrespect to you reading it in, Mr. Speaker, but it's not the same experience as a constituent that has a direct relationship with the member.

I do appreciate that the government did amend the standing orders so that all introductions are not omitted. It'll now be up to you, Mr. Speaker, to do those. I appreciate that they moved a little bit on this, but I can tell you that it's still not quite far enough.

I'm going to jump, just because I'm worried about my own time here, to a couple of the standing order changes that I think are the most problematic, to put it one way, Mr. Speaker. One of them is the fact that – you know, it's 8, again under Government Motion 11. I'll read it into Hansard: (5) "Members are not compelled to vote and those who wish to abstain should remain in their seats when asked to rise and record their vote."

If you ask me, that is a very cowardly change to the standing order, and I'm using my words very carefully. The reason that it's cowardly, Mr. Speaker, is that every single member in this House should have the courage to stand behind their convictions whether they are popular or unpopular. If you believe it, you should be willing to stand up on the record and vote for it. To have the option of sitting on your hands and sitting in this place not having to vote is cowardly. We've seen it. I appreciate they still had another option, which was running out of the Chamber, which we saw with very important yet controversial legislation we were bringing in around bubble-zone protection because we believe that a woman's choice is her choice and her body is her body.

The fact that you had the whole opposition file out of here – I think there was even a jam at the door, quite frankly. They couldn't get out fast enough when these votes happened. It was a way that members could flee from this place without voting. But I think allowing members to sit in the Chamber and abstain from voting does not enhance democracy. It does not enhance accountability that members have, because constituents should be able to ask members: how did you vote on X? Or, more efficiently, they should be able to pull up the Assembly Online and see how their MLA voted. I mean, I have constituents that talk to me all the time about how I voted. They pay attention. They look at it, and they may not agree all the time with my votes, but they appreciate that they can see which way I voted.

The other part of this that just makes a bad situation worse is that (8) says, "Abstentions shall not be entered in the Votes and Proceedings." So not only can a member hide from voting; it doesn't get recorded that you just hid from voting.

Ms Renaud: That's shameful.

Mr. Bilous: I agree. That is shameful.

That's one of the larger issues I have with these sweeping standing order changes, Mr. Speaker. As far as eliminating desk thumping, again, you know, there's a difference between Ottawa and Alberta. Ottawa has 338 MPs. We have 87, so part of the reason that they banned desk thumping in Ottawa was because of the sheer volume. I can tell you that clapping is pretty loud, although maybe that's next on the chopping block. Soon this place might be silent minus the person speaking. Maybe heckling will be the next thing on the chopping block. I don't know. I look at this as a creeping implication of freedom of expression.

The other thing is, quite frankly – you know, I mean this in all seriousness – desk thumping only requires one hand; clapping requires two hands. If your one hand has something in it or for members – and there have been members in this place in the history of Alberta who only have one hand, so now they can't participate. I'm not saying that to be funny. I'm being dead serious, Mr. Speaker. The option to bang on your desk: I think to change that is a shame. I think we're throwing out a hundred years of history in this place. It's unfortunate. That's another one that I think should have been sent to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, Standing Orders and Printing.

As well, Mr. Speaker – I'm trying to find some of my other issues. I guess I will soon wrap up my comments. But, again, for me the frustration in these changes is that these are significant changes. In fact, I think this is the broadest set of changes to standing orders that have happened in many, many years if not in the history of this place, and the fact that they were shoehorned through in this Chamber as opposed to using the very committees that the government chooses to send bills to when it's convenient. So in these very standing orders we are sending private members' bills to committees after first reading, yet we can't send the very standing orders to the committee that's responsible for standing orders. I hope the irony is not lost on anyone in here.

It's unfortunate, these changes. I think Alberta is very unique. I myself am very proud of the fact that Albertans are different and unique from the rest of Canada. We pride ourselves on that. Replicating what's done in Ottawa because that is the will of one member I think is a shame that all of us are going to have to live with. Again I would call on all members of the Assembly to vote according to their conscience and would implore the Premier and Executive Council to allow members to have a free vote on this very, very important matter. You know, they tend to talk about how important free votes are, but once again it seems to be when they're convenient. This would be a great test of whether private members feel that some of their rights are being significantly changed through these standing orders, Mr. Speaker.

With that, I think I made it fairly clear where I stand on these standing order changes. We are about to see, I'm sure, the majority of the Assembly determine the fate of all members of this Assembly.

On a last point, it is not only your responsibility, Mr. Speaker, but the responsibility of the Assembly to ensure that the rights of the minority are not stepped on by the majority. This would be one of those great times to see members vote freely.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I will encourage all members to vote against these sweeping standing order changes. Let's send them to the committee that was designed to review standing order changes, their implications. Let's study this issue. Let's study this issue from a point of view of what is done in other jurisdictions across the country. Let's not just adopt a practice in Ottawa because it is from the House of Commons. Let's look at what's done in Saskatchewan, Manitoba, British Columbia, the Maritime provinces before making such sweeping and drastic changes to the very culture of this place.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Thank you to the hon. member.

Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available.

Statement by the Speaker

Conditions in the Chamber

The Speaker: I would just like to mention that we've closed the vents here in the Chamber. Over the last little while it has become significantly smokier outside. Unfortunately, there was a period of time this afternoon where we were providing fresh air into the Chamber here, which, as it turns out, is not very fresh at all. As such, you may have noticed that it is significantly smoky in here. Agreed. I would never want to dissuade anyone from speaking to any motion or bill, but I would encourage the House to consider the current conditions of the air quality inside the Chamber when deciding whether or not it is of necessity to speak to Government Motion 11.

Debate Continued

The Speaker: Having said that, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available for questions and comments to the hon. member.

Seeing none, are there any others who wish to speak to Government Motion 11?

Hon. Members: Question.

The Speaker: Hon. members, as per the request of May 28 and my subsequent statement on May 28 to the motion that has been before the House for a number of days, the vote this afternoon will be split into two groups as per the request of the Official Opposition. Section 2, section 4, section 8, section 10 will all be voted on first.

[The voice vote indicated that Government Motion 11, part A, section 2 as amended, sections 4, 8, 10 carried]

[Several members rose calling for a division. The division bell was rung at 4:12 p.m.]

[One minute having elapsed, the Assembly divided]

[The Speaker in the chair]

For the motion:

Armstrong-Homeniuk	Loewen	Reid
Ellis	Long	Schow
Fir	Lovely	Schweitzer
Getson	Luan	Stephan
Glubish	Milliken	Toews
Goodridge	Nally	Toor
Gotfried	Nicolaides	Turton
Guthrie	Nixon, Jeremy	van Dijken
Hunter	Panda	Yao
Issik	Pon	Yaseen
LaGrange

Against the motion:

Bilous	Eggen	Irwin
Dach	Feehan	Loyola
Dang	Goehring	Renaud
Deol	Gray	Shepherd
Totals:	For – 31	Against – 12

[Government Motion 11, part A, section 2 as amended, sections 4, 8, 10 carried]

[Government Motion 11, part A, sections 1, 3, 5, 6, 7, 9, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, part B, and part C carried]

The Speaker: The hon. government whip is rising.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Obviously, a lot of progress was made this week, outstanding work by everybody in this Chamber, but given, as you mentioned, the smoke outside, some of the health risks that are being faced possibly inside this Chamber, I move to adjourn.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Prior to the vote on the motion, I would just like to remind members of the memo from the Sergeant-at-Arms dated May 30, that you all received, that over this upcoming Saturday the Order of St. John will be in the Chamber for a ceremony. I remind all members to clear the tops and the bottoms of their desks. Your desks will be locked, so you don't need to remove all of your items, but anything that is below or above, if you could please remove that.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 4:18 p.m.]

Bill Status Report for the 30th Legislature - 1st Session (2019)

Activity to Thursday, May 30, 2019

The Bill sponsor's name is in brackets following the Bill title. If it is a money Bill, ($) will appear between the title and the sponsor's name. Numbers following each Reading refer to Hansard pages where the text of debates is found; dates for each Reading are in brackets following the page numbers. Bills numbered 1 to 200 are Government Bills. Bills numbered 201 or higher are Private Members' Public Bills. Bills numbered with a "Pr" prefix are Private Bills.

* An asterisk beside a Bill number indicates an amendment was passed to that Bill; the Committee line shows the precise date of the amendment.

The date a Bill comes into force is indicated in square brackets after the date of Royal Assent. If a Bill comes into force "on proclamation," "with exceptions," or "on various dates," please contact Legislative Counsel, Alberta Justice, for details at 780.427.2217. The chapter number assigned to the Bill is entered immediately following the date the Bill comes into force. SA indicates Statutes of Alberta; this is followed by the year in which it is included in the statutes, and its chapter number. Please note, Private Bills are not assigned chapter number until the conclusion of the Fall Sitzings.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Monday, June 3, 2019

Prayers

The Speaker: Hon. members, the prayer. Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and her government, Members of the Legislative Assembly, and all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead our province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideas but, laying aside all private interests and prejudice, keep in mind their responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all. Amen.

Hon. members, as is our custom, we pay tribute to members who have passed since we last met. Today I'd like to welcome members of the Dickie families who are present in the Speaker's gallery.

Mr. William D. Dickie

August 13, 1925, to May 23, 2019

The Speaker: William Daniel Dickie served three terms as the Member for Calgary-Glenmore from 1963 to 1979. In 1969 Mr. Dickie moved from the Liberal caucus to the Progressive Conservative caucus. He served as minister of mines and minerals from 1971 to '75. Prior to being elected to the Legislative Assembly, Mr. Dickie served as an alderman for the city of Calgary. A lawyer by profession, he was appointed Queen's Counsel in 1969. On March 8, 1972, Mr. Dickie introduced the government motion to create and publish Hansard, the official verbatim record of the Legislative Assembly debates and proceedings. He also played a leading role in the formation of the Canadian Energy Resource Institute. Mr. Dickie passed away on May 23, 2019, at the age of 93.

In a moment of silent prayer, I ask you to remember Mr. Dickie as you may have known him. Rest eternal grant unto him, O Lord, and let light perpetually shine upon him. Amen.

Hon. members, ladies and gentlemen, we will now be led in the singing of our national anthem by R.J. Chambers. I would invite you all to participate in the language of your choice.

Hon. Members:

O Canada, our home and native land!
True patriot love in all of us command.
Car ton bras sait porter l'épée,
Il sait porter la croix!
Ton histoire est une épopée
Des plus brillants exploits.
God keep our land glorious and free!
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.

The Speaker: Please be seated.

Statement by the Speaker

Standing Order Amendments

The Speaker: Members, before we begin the Routine today, I'd like to point out to all members that copies of the amendments to standing orders that were approved by the Assembly last week have been printed on green paper and placed on members' desks for ease of reference. I'm sure you reviewed them all over the weekend.

As I outlined in my memo to members last Friday regarding the new procedure for introduction of guests, any member wishing to have guests introduced in the Assembly must provide my office with the full name and phonetic pronunciation of each guest by 11 a.m. that sitting day so I can have a small period of time to practise.

Introduction of Visitors

The Speaker: Hon. members, with our admiration and respect to them, gratitude to members of their family, who share the burden of public office and public service, today I would like to welcome members of the Dickie family who are present in the Speaker's gallery. Please rise as I call your name and remain standing until you've been introduced: Barb Dickie, daughter of former member Mr. Dickie; son Bill Dickie Jr.; and his wife, Joanne. Welcome.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Members, there are a number of school groups with us this afternoon.

From the constituency of Edmonton-City Centre please welcome to the Legislative Assembly a group of students from Grandin school.

From the constituency of Edmonton-Mill Woods please welcome the grade 6 class from . . .

An Hon. Member: Ekota.

The Speaker: . . . Ekota. That was exactly what I was going to say. Thank you so much.

Members, there are a number of guests from the constituency of Lethbridge-West. I ask each individual to rise as I call your name: Barb Phillips, Mike McCuaig, Pirate Jen Takahashi, and Hayden Takahashi. Welcome.

From the constituency of Calgary-Shaw, Dan McLean.

Finally, from the constituency of Edmonton-South West: Maria, Alex, Jonathan, and Julietta Pinchukov.

Ministerial Statements

The Speaker: The hon. the Premier.

Northern Alberta Wildfire Update

Mr. Kenney: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to provide the Assembly with a current update on the very challenging situation in northern Alberta with respect to forest fires occurring in many locations. I had the opportunity yesterday with the hon. the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry to visit some of the affected communities, both on the ground and to see the situation from the air.

Let me begin by offering on behalf of all members a word of profound gratitude to our remarkably professional firefighters, who have been joined and supplemented by crews from all across Canada, who have been doing, in many instances, heroic work to keep communities safe and, thankfully, to avoid any loss of life or, to this point, serious injury, Mr. Speaker.

I toured the area ravaged by the Chuckegg Creek fire around High Level yesterday and have been keeping in close contact with officials at the Provincial Operations Centre of the Alberta Emergency Management Agency. Having spent much of Friday afternoon there, shortly after they moved the alert level from 3 to 4, I can report, Mr. Speaker, that all of our first responders, including hundreds of front-line firefighters, are working extremely hard to protect communities at risk. Their efforts are being expertly directed by experienced managers at regional incident locations as well as the Provincial Operations Centre, and local government officials are actively engaged in the effort to protect their communities.

I know I speak for all members in expressing our regrets to the members of the Paddle Prairie Métis settlement in the Blue Hills area who lost homes to the Chuckegg Creek fire. We believe about 15 structures were lost. Approximately nine were residential, two of which were not inhabited. While we mourn the difficulty faced by the members of that settlement, Mr. Speaker, we are grateful for the alertness of the community leadership and the provincial wildfire service, who through rapid action helped to save the vast majority of structures in that community.

The good news today, Mr. Speaker, is that the mandatory evacuation order for High Level, the surrounding areas in Mackenzie county, and the Dene Tha' First Nation communities of Bushe River, Meander River, and Chateh was lifted this morning at 10 o'clock. I want to thank and compliment Mayor Crystal McAteer, Reeve Josh Knelsen, and Chief James Ahnassay and the residents of their communities for their calm and remarkably competent handling of this extremely challenging situation.

However, several out-of-control fires continue to burn across a wide swath of northwest and north-central Alberta, from High Level to Slave Lake. Mandatory evacuation orders remain in place for several communities, and thousands of people in the towns of Slave Lake and Manning are currently on evacuation alert. Mr. Speaker, as of last night, of the 29 fires currently burning in the forest protection area, seven are rated as being under control, seven are being held, four have been turned over, and 11 remain out of control. The risk of wildfire remains high to extreme in many parts of the province. The three largest wildfires are Chuckegg Creek, south of High Level; the Battle Complex fire near Manning in the Peace River region; and the Macmillan Complex fire north of Slave Lake.

Mr. Speaker, provincial resources deployed on the ground currently include more than 2,300 wildfire and structural firefighters and staff; approximately 231 helicopters, most of which are engaged in tactical water drops; 28 air tankers, which are laying down either fire retardant or water; and 261 pieces of heavy equipment. Those forces have been strengthened with crews airlifted into northern Alberta from across Canada.

I'm pleased to announce that the federal government has accepted our request for assistance from the Canadian Armed Forces. In fact, I just came from a visit to the Canadian Army 3rd Division, which is certainly prepared to co-ordinate additional support as necessary. I can also report that I received a thoughtful call from the Rt. Hon. the Prime Minister this weekend expressing his concern and that of the federal government and reassuring us that the federal government is prepared to provide whatever assistance is required by Alberta.

Although shifting winds have provided intermittent relief from the smoke in many areas, air quality, as we know, remains a serious concern over much of the province, and Albertans are urged to take precautions to limit their exposure, especially seniors and those who have pulmonary conditions. Evacuees in need of financial assistance may be eligible to apply for an emergency payment to help with accommodations, clothing, and other urgent needs. Of course, that was initially extended to High Level and area evacuees and, as of yesterday, to the residents of three First Nations, including the Bigstone Cree First Nation at Wabasca. Evacuees should check alberta.ca/emergency for updates on evacuation payment eligibility.

Mr. Speaker, the total number of fires in northern Alberta is of great concern, and the firefighters are dealing with, in many instances, boreal forest that has not been affected by fire for up to nine decades. Very dry conditions exacerbate that circumstance. At a time such as this, I want to thank the staff of the Department of Agriculture and Forestry, particularly the wildfire service, the staff of the Alberta Emergency Management Agency, all officials engaged, and particularly the volunteers in communities like Slave Lake and so many others who have provided tremendous hospitality to the some 10,000 evacuees. That number will hopefully be cut in half today as roughly 5,000 return home to High Level.

Mr. Speaker, in the last 48 hours there have been some hopeful developments, with additional precipitation in north-central and northwest Alberta which has helped to diminish some of the fires, but we're a long way from an end to the fire season. As members will recall, the Fort McMurray fire continued burning throughout the year even under snowcap in the wintertime. The government of Alberta and, I know, all members of this Legislature will continue to be there to support the communities affected, the evacuees, and, most especially, our firefighting personnel, who are doing heroic work on behalf of all Albertans. We thank them profoundly.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung to respond.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The last number of days and weeks have been stressful and very frightening for thousands of Albertans in the communities of High Level, Peace River, Slave Lake, Mackenzie county, the Paddle Prairie Métis settlement, Blue Hills, and the Dene Tha' First Nation communities of Bushe River, Meander River, and Chateh.

Due to extreme fire conditions, over 10,000 Albertans have been forced to uproot their lives and flee their homes. Residents have had to pack their bags without knowing when they will be able to return and if they will see their homes, property, and businesses again. Many have had to find refuge in emergency centres, stay with neighbours, and watch as the fires continue to rage. Tragically, in the course of these fires families in the Paddle Prairie Métis settlement and the Blue Hills area have lost their homes, and we have heard many heartbreaking stories as communities have changed forever.

George Wanuch was one of those residents impacted. As the flames engulfed his property – and I heard him say this this morning on CBC Radio – it is said that he pulled out his guitar and sang some gospel songs. It was a moving and sad image. The strength of people like George and the many other families impacted is inspiring and heroic, but there is no question that this is a painful moment in our province's history. People are wondering if this is going to become the new normal. About 15 families have lost their home. Many others are in danger, with over 10,000 people evacuated. This is a situation that no family should have to go through, especially alone. And I want those impacted to know that you are not alone, that we are all here with you, on both sides of the House, and will be with you every step of the way as we rebuild.

Thousands of Albertans are helping across our province through their donations, by opening their homes, and I know many more will continue to support you in the face of this tragedy. There is a long journey ahead, but we will walk it with you every step of the way. We'll also continue to share our thoughts and prayers with those who remain evacuated in Slave Lake and Manning. We are pleased to see evacuation orders ending for High Level, Mackenzie county, and the Dene Tha' First Nation communities of Bushe River, Meander River, and Chateh. But we know that the journey is not over for those families either. The terror of having to flee your home amidst natural disaster can have a lasting impact even after you are able to return home. We must stand with all of those impacted to ensure they have the support they need in the days, weeks, and months ahead.

I also want to speak to the brave first responders, firefighters, and emergency management staff who have and will continue to work around the clock. On behalf of the people of our province thank you for your continued efforts, dedication, and hard work. You have been absolutely heroic in the face of devastation and challenging conditions. Just as we have the backs of the many residents and families impacted by these fires, we will have yours. Our thoughts and prayers are with all of you as you continue your fight against these fires and as we move forward to rebuild what has been lost.

Finally, thank you to the Premier, his colleagues, and all the incredible government staff, particularly those in Ag and Forestry and the Alberta Emergency Management Agency, for their hard work during these very, very dark days for our province.

Energy Industry Jobs

Mr. Yao: Our first week back, last week, I couldn't help but notice that some of our friends on the opposition benches simply don't understand what has occurred in the last four years, Mr. Speaker. I wonder myself: are they so ideological that they're insulated from reality, or are they just legislatively challenged? So, sir, I am here to educate.

Our oil and gas sector was hit hard. A report funded by the government of Canada, released in April, forecasts that we will have lost a total of 13,000 as a net loss of direct jobs between 2016 and this year. You know why the Americans support this sector? The U.S. Bureau of Economic Analysis calculates that the oil and gas industry has a multiplier of 6.9 indirect jobs for every direct job. Eh, numbers.

Let's look at it from another side. Mr. Speaker, one of my best friends builds things, from well pads to 16-storey vessels. He builds big, expensive projects, and he got transferred this past January. You see, the company he works for has no use for that particular skill set here because there's nothing left for them to build. They have operations in the U.S., the U.K., Malaysia, China, Brazil, Russia, Qatar. And my good friend: he got a transfer to Iraq. "Iraq?" I asked. "How much are they investing there?" He said, "Well, about 1.5, give or take a hundred million or so." I said, "Well, what were they investing here?" He said, "Well, in Saskatchewan, Alberta, and B.C. annually in capital spending we were spending about 1.2 to 1.4." That's billion.

It's not that I solely blame them for all this. After all, they had the help of their best friend, Justin Trudeau. Quel imbécile. Oh, pardonnez mon français, Président de la Chambre.* But the previous government and their best friend in Ottawa – their best friend in Ottawa – not only killed thousands of jobs, but they chased away billions of dollars of investment, destroyed the confidence of an entire sector, and pushed away some of our best and brightest, including my best friend. So thanks for nothing.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member. You'll know that anyone speaking in a language other than English here in the Chamber will provide the translation for us.*

Missing and Murdered Indigenous Women

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, according to the RCMP, 1,200 indigenous women went missing or were murdered in Canada between 1980 and 2012. Other accounts put the number at upwards of 4,000 over the last five decades. For years indigenous people and advocates had been asking for an inquiry into this disturbing trend, yet the former Harper government, of which our Premier was a senior cabinet minister, refused these calls. Does the Premier regret refusing multiple requests for an inquiry into missing and murdered indigenous women and girls?

The Speaker: The Premier.

Mr. Kenney: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the hon. Leader of the Opposition: all Albertans are deeply concerned about the record of violence that has been suffered by far too many indigenous women, particularly those who have disappeared and whose whereabouts are still unknown. We look forward to taking the opportunity to review this 1,200-page report, that was just released hours ago, to appointing an interministerial task force to assist us in reviewing it and any implications it may have for provincial policy to ensure that all Albertans and, particularly, vulnerable women are kept safe.

The Speaker: The Leader of the Official Opposition.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you. I didn't entirely get an answer to that question.

In justifying his refusal to initiate an inquiry into murdered and missing indigenous women, the former PM had this to say, quote: it's not really high on my radar. That was the position of him and, through him, the members of his cabinet, which included this Premier. Premier, in light of the final report submitted by the inquiry on missing and murdered indigenous women, do you now acknowledge that the inquiry was indeed an important step in addressing this national tragedy?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, we certainly acknowledge that one victim of crime is too many and that the high incidence of violent crime targeting indigenous women is particularly terrible given their often uniquely high levels of vulnerability. That is why we look forward to reviewing the some 1,200 pages of the commission report, that was issued just hours ago. I would invite the opposition to share its views about that in a nonpartisan way. This should not be a matter subject to partisan contention.

The Speaker: The Leader of the Official Opposition.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Unfortunately, it was a partisan decision to go ahead or not go ahead, so this is why it's important to ensure that things remain accountable.

I appreciate the current government's plan to strike what their release said was a crossgovernment committee to examine the recommendations, but in light of previous resistance to the inquiry by the Conservative federal government, of which this Premier was a part, indigenous women and girls need a timeline on which they can hold this government accountable and the right to participate in this review. To the Premier: will he today commit that his review committee or task force, as he just called it, which is already better, will consist of indigenous women and . . .

The Speaker: The hon. the Premier.

Mr. Kenney: Of course, Mr. Speaker, in all matters affecting First Nations people, indigenous people, the government of Alberta's starting point will be consultations and listening. We need to listen to the voices of those who have lost family members and loved ones. We need to understand how we can do a better job of preventing the kind of criminal behaviour that has claimed far too many lives.

The Speaker: The Leader of the Official Opposition.

Ms Notley: Okay. Well, we'll hopefully get them on that task force and get the date, which we haven't heard yet.

Supervised Drug Consumption Sites

Ms Notley: On Friday this UCP government put the brakes on funding three new safe consumption sites across Alberta and pledged to conduct a review of existing sites. These sites are literally saving lives every day. More sites will save more lives. A delay in sites will mean more lives lost. A closure of sites will mean even more lives lost. The expert medical studies proving the effectiveness of these sites are conclusive. To the Premier: why are you turning your back on these vulnerable Albertans?

Mr. Kenney: I reject the premise of the question, Mr. Speaker. This government was elected with an explicit commitment to Albertans to only endorse new supervised consumption sites if there have been extensive consultations with affected communities, including residents and business owners, and if there is a robust, evidence-based analysis of the socioeconomic impact of a potential drug consumption site, and that's exactly what we're going to do. That's our commitment to Albertans, and we will follow through on it.

Ms Notley: You know, Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the need to accommodate the needs of communities and to step up policing around those sites, but that is very different from actually saying no to the sites or cutting the funding of ones that have previously been approved. These sites are estimated to have already prevented 2,400 overdoses across the province. Will the Premier commit today that while reviewing strategies to mitigate community disruption, the goal of expanding the number of people helped through safe consumption sites will be absolutely protected?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, the leader of the NDP just said that she was very concerned about accommodating local residents. Tell that to the local residents of the Beltline region of Calgary, where there has been a massive increase in crime and the harassment of people, who can no longer live safely in their own community. We committed to listen to those Albertans as well as those here in Edmonton's Chinatown, whose lives have been changed as a result. Looking at the socioeconomic evidence and consulting local communities was a commitment of this government, on which we will follow through.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, as this government dithers on action proven to save the lives of vulnerable Albertans, more people will die from overdoses. Once again it appears this government is putting misinformed ideology over science. Indeed, the Premier himself has said that he thinks these sites exist only to allow people to inject poison into their bodies. Can the Premier at least assure this House that his misinformed opinion will not interfere with the best interests of vulnerable Albertans requiring these services?

Mr. Kenney: Again, Mr. Speaker, unlike the previous government, our commitment to Albertans is to engage in robust, evidence-based analysis of the socioeconomic impact of potential drug consumption sites. [interjections] In addition to that, as they heckle and shout, having learned nothing from the last election, I can tell members of this Chamber that this government will make unprecedented investments in treatment and recovery to offer a way out of the downward spiral of addiction, that is claiming too many lives in this province, with an investment of over $100 million in addiction recovery and treatment services.

The Speaker: The Leader of the Official Opposition. Your third set of questions.

Ms Notley: They need to be alive to get into recovery services, Mr. Premier.

Education Act

Ms Notley: Now, as we speak, school trustees in Red Deer are debating a motion to ask that this UCP government delay proclamation of the Education Act by a year. This government has said that one of the reasons it's bringing in the act is to increase school board autonomy, yet more than half the current trustees in the province have never even seen the legislation, let alone been consulted on it. To the Premier: if trustees vote to ask for the delay, will he delay it, and if not, why not?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, I would invite the hon. the Leader of the Opposition to wait for the introduction of amendments to the Education Act in the days to come which will address some of those concerns. I can't understand how anybody would not have seen legislation adopted by this Assembly a few years ago that was subject to massive public consultations, including on draft regulations, legislation that the NDP committed to proclaiming when they first came to office. We're simply following through on their broken promise.

Ms Notley: Fifty per cent of the trustees have been elected since that legislation was consulted on. The Premier should know that.

Now, the act creates massive cost pressures at a time when schools are managing huge uncertainty because the Premier and his minister won't tell them how much money they've got coming. To the Premier: why won't you admit that your plan to proclaim the act is more complicated than you first thought and put the needs of Alberta's students over your need to save face and delay it?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, once again I invite the hon. the Leader of the Opposition to await the introduction of a bill that is on the Order Paper, the Education Amendment Act, 2019. In fact, our government is moving very quickly to keep our electoral commitment to proclaim into law the Education Act adopted by this Assembly, which was subject to massive public input and indeed since we came into office additional public input with the key stakeholders in the field of education.

The Speaker: The Leader of the Official Opposition.

Ms Notley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. One would think that perhaps the vote of the school boards might be the kind of public consultation the Premier would commit to listening to, but that's not what we're getting.

In April 28 Alberta private schools had refused to introduce policies that would protect LGBTQ kids and their right to participate in GSAs without fear of being outed, yet this government seems intent on putting those kids at risk by removing that very protection as a result of their plans. They were to have lost their funding. To the Premier: have those schools submitted those policies, and if not, why should Albertans continue funding them?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, as we've been clear, our government will maintain the strongest legal protections for gay-straight alliances of any province in Canada, and we will also maintain and strengthen our long-standing and successful tradition of school choice. Unlike the NDP, we believe in real diversity and real pluralism. We don't think the education system should be guided by one party's ideology, but it should be based on pluralism and diversity. That's what we will protect and promote.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Funding for Fourth Year of High School

Ms Hoffman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As the Education minister rams through her ideologically driven agenda and looks to increase the age that students can continue to attend high school, she isn't even providing support for the students who currently can attend high school. A letter from the Calgary Catholic school district that we've obtained outright rejects an 18-year-old student looking to attend a proper school for her fourth year of high school from doing so. Will the minister stop with the messaging, start doing her job, and fund education so students with special needs aren't left in the cold?

Member LaGrange: Thank you for the question. While I'm not familiar with that particular case, I would encourage the family to reach out to my office so that I can learn more about their situation. However, it does seem to be a board procedural issue, and our government respects the autonomy of local school boards to make those local decisions on policies and procedures which are in line with provincial legislation.

Thank you.

Ms Hoffman: Well, I've released the letters publicly and will be happy to table them in this House, Mr. Speaker.

The letter specifically says that the primary reason for not allowing the student to access the fourth year of ES II programming is that the district does not have the sufficient resources and facilities to accommodate her. That's on the minister, that's on this Premier, and that's on their government, Mr. Speaker. I have to say that I find it completely inappropriate for the minister to deflect and to say that this is a district decision and that it's in line with the legislation because the legislation clearly says that this girl is entitled to education till she's 19. Enough excuses. Why won't the minister do the right thing?

Member LaGrange: Thank you for the question. The hon. member, being a former trustee, would know that there are actually procedures in place for these situations, and in the event of parents or a student wishing to appeal the decision, they should be going to their school board and following the processes in place to be done.

Thank you.

Ms Hoffman: It's clearly about money, Mr. Speaker. The letter says so. And, yes, asking the parents to go to an appeal in June, at the end of the school year, and having a student walk across the stage and then spend thousands of dollars on lawyers to fight for her right to education is shameful. Why won't the government step up, do the right thing, and fund students with special needs and all students in this province so that parents aren't left in a lurch as students consider whether or not they have a future in education? Do the right thing. Fund this student and all students needing that fourth year.

Member LaGrange: Thank you for the question. Again, I would draw to the attention of the hon. member that there are procedures in place, and we do respect the local autonomy of school boards to make these decisions. They are in the best position to make the decision. They are on the ground. They deal with the situations on a day-to-day basis. Therefore, should this student or their parents wish to appeal the decision, they can absolutely do so. And I do welcome further information from those parents and students to my office.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein has a question.

Flood Plain Mapping

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. For many Albertans the 2013 flood feels like just yesterday. I personally remember racing to the youth shelter I was managing to assist in the evacuation and the significant damage to the shelter afterwards. My constituents have been asking about the current status of flood mitigation. However, we know that we need the best possible information to plan for this. As we head into the June flood season, can the minister shed some light on flood mapping progress?

The Speaker: The second-tallest Member of the Legislative Assembly and the hon. Minister of Environment and Parks.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, I just want to start off by reminding everybody that that hon. member has been following me around since 1982, when my mom brought him home, and now he's followed me all the way here to Edmonton, but I will answer his question.

The Speaker: I would just remind the member that comments should be directed through the Speaker.

Mr. Jason Nixon: We understand that our communities want the best possible information on flood hazards to guide future development and to help inform municipal emergency response plans. We recognize that it's important to have the latest information and are working to update and expand flood mitigation coverage across Alberta. In the short term technical work has been done on five new flood studies that we are ready to release and be able to share with municipalities, including Calgary.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think that the hon. minister is just a little jealous because I was always the favourite.

The Speaker: I might just remind members that there are no preambles after question four.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Sorry.

Given that the risks of flooding create a lot of stress for Albertans and given that flooding can cause damage to property, hardship to people, and in extreme circumstances loss of life, given these facts what is the government doing to improve flood mapping procedures in this province?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Flood studies are critical tools that provide information that support emergency responses and safer communities across Alberta. Twenty-one new flood studies have been commissioned since 2015, including eight studies this upcoming spring. These new studies will create 1,500 kilometres of new flood mapping through more than 60 municipalities and First Nation communities across Alberta, with a total budget of $15.4 million, which includes approximately $5.2 million of federal funding.

And, Mr. Speaker, I assure you that I am my mother's favourite.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Minister, for the answer. Mr. Speaker, given that we have seen no status update on flood mapping from the previous government and given the significance of flood mapping for future planning, when the constituents of Calgary-Klein ask about timelines around flood mapping projects, what can I tell them?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, depending on the complexity and the length of the river system, it can take upwards of five years to complete the technical work of a flood study and another year to fully implement the recommendations made by the study. As I've previously stated, we've completed technical work on five new flood studies that we are in a position to share immediately with communities and our First Nation partners, including the hon. member's hometown of Calgary.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that in closing I should say on behalf of the hon. member's five brothers that it's always great to hear from the shortest Nixon.

The Speaker: I would just remind all members that the use of names, no matter what the context, would be wildly inappropriate in the Chamber.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Paddle Prairie Métis Settlement Wildfire Recovery

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was relieved to hear that the evacuation order has been lifted for High Level and that people will soon be returning home. I also would like to recognize the incredible work of the wildfire fighting crews that have been battling this wildfire day in and day out. Members of the Paddle Prairie Métis settlement were also under mandatory evacuation, and tragically, this community has lost 15 homes in the fire. Can the Minister of Municipal Affairs please tell this House where the people of Paddle Prairie are currently staying and what other supports are being provided to them?

The Speaker: The Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. The wildfire hit Paddle Prairie very quickly, and first responders did an amazing job protecting human life, which is the number one priority in these situations. When the fire hit, 30 brave firefighters immediately jumped into action and protected 90 per cent of the settlement. I commend these firefighters for their brave service in the face of danger, I commend the local officials who are working with our government to keep their people safe, and I commend the evacuees who are putting on a brave face in the face of these difficult times.

The Speaker: The Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that as a result of the wildfires members of the Paddle Prairie Métis settlement lost valuable traplines and harvesting sites in addition to their homes and given that members of the community stayed back to assist in fighting the fires and given that the community has three vehicles available to help clear unburned areas and prevent further loss to forested areas surrounding the community, can the minister please tell this House and the members of Paddle Prairie Métis settlement if their offer to assist will be accepted, and if not, why not?

The Speaker: The Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. I recently visited Paddle Prairie to see the situation on the ground for myself. Overall, the feedback I heard was extremely positive. That said, this is still a difficult situation, and an evacuation order remains in place for safety reasons. We will monitor the situation until the evacuees are back in their homes and communities.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that 15 homes in the Paddle Prairie Métis settlement were destroyed and given that many of the families that were forced to evacuate have small children and given that reception centres and temporary housing is adequate only in the short term, can the minister please provide an exact timeline for the people of Paddle Prairie as to when longer term housing will be available to families who lost their homes?

Mr. Madu: Mr. Speaker, the first responders on the ground and our government have been there for the Paddle Prairie wildfire evacuees. My office is in communication with local officials from that settlement, and I am happy with feedback that we are receiving. Our government is working to ensure the safety and security of all evacuees from the settlement and other parts of Alberta, and we won't be distracted by divisive tactics on this particular issue. Our first responsibility is the safety of the settlement folks.

Wildfires and Climate Change

Mr. Schmidt: Mr. Speaker, first of all, I want to thank all of the brave men and women who are fighting fires in northern Alberta, and I'm happy to learn that the residents of High Level are returning home today.

Now, I agree with the Premier that the cause of these wildfires is complex, but the evidence suggests that climate change is contributing to the severity of wildfires in our province. To the Premier: does he agree with the evidence that climate change is increasing the severity of wildfires in our province?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, this government has been clear. We are concerned with climate change, and we're working towards addressing it. The difference between us and the previous government is that we're focused on actually working on technology and dealing with our largest emitters to actually make change. The former government's approach was to tax Albertans, which was all economic pain and no environmental gain. This side of the House has a different approach.

Mr. Schmidt: Their approach is to do nothing, Mr. Speaker.

Given that when he was questioned by reporters on Friday, the Premier said that carbon taxing didn't stop wildfires in British Columbia and given that studies from Environment Canada scientists "concluded that human influences on climate change leading to extreme forest fires is a trend that is likely to intensify in the future," to the Premier: who's right? His minister or climate science experts?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, the argument that forest fires have just automatically started now is not realistic. It also ignores the fact that we're dealing with an old growth forest in northern Alberta. The point is this, though. We do agree that climate change is an issue that has to be addressed in this province. Our government will be focused on that through the TIER program, which we will have more to say about in the coming months, focused on working on technology, ways to innovate our way through this problem, a completely different process than what the former government did, which was to tax Albertans with no successful work on emissions. That's all economic pain and no environmental gain. It's a different approach. I'm happy for it, and Albertans voted for it, clearly, on April 16.

Mr. Schmidt: Mr. Speaker, it's an approach that the previous PC government took that failed, and this approach they're proposing will fail again.

Given that the Premier has claimed that the number of wildfires in the province is average but what he has avoided saying is that the size of the area being burned is way larger than average, to the Premier: are you intentionally trying to mislead Albertans so that you can dodge questions about the impacts of climate change, or do you just not want to deal with it?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, the Premier has been clear that we are dealing with a big fire situation happening in northern Alberta, and yes, the size is very significant. This is an old forest that has not seen fires in close to a century or so. That is part of the situation that's happening up in northern Alberta. When it comes to climate change, this government takes it serious. That's why it's a major part of our platform. We're going to focus on technology. That's a contrast to what the NDP did. Under the NDP's watch they brought in a carbon tax, and they did nothing on emissions. They did nothing to protect the environment. All they did was tax Albertans, tax hockey moms and hockey dads. Our approach is different. We're actually going to try to tackle the problem.

The Speaker: The Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat.

HALO Medical Rescue Helicopter Funding

Mr. Barnes: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. HALO provides the only dedicated medevac helicopter service for southern Alberta. They have been dispatched to over 550 missions since their inception and serve an area of over 55,000 square kilometres. These hard-working men and women save the lives of our family members, and I would like to thank them. I was pleased to see that in March of this year the previous government of Alberta provided HALO with a one-time grant. This was much-needed funding whereas the organization relies almost completely on donations and fundraising. To the minister: will you support an annual funding commitment to HALO and all of southeastern Alberta?

The Speaker: The Minister of Health.

Mr. Shandro: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I should clarify that STARS does cover southeastern Alberta, but HALO has done a great job in supplementing that coverage since its inception in 2007. First, helicopter services are funded primarily by operators through their fundraising. AHS provided a one-time grant of $1 million last year to offset the cost of transitioning to a new twin-engine helicopter. The funding was not an annual operating grant. It paralleled one-time funding also provided to STARS to offset the cost of transitioning to a new helicopter.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Barnes: Mr. Speaker, given that STARS receives annual guaranteed funding from this provincial government, ultimately creating certainty for the organization and for Albertans, and given that HALO runs off donations as well as fundraising, which is impacted by the state of the economy, and given that HALO performs an absolutely crucial service as well, what will the minister do to ensure long-term certainty for HALO and how will you ensure that these services will be available to all southeastern Albertans?

The Speaker: The Minister of Health.

Mr. Shandro: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. HALO was created on the initiative of people in Medicine Hat. It has developed into a valued partner for AHS, and I expect that partnership will continue and grow in the future. AHS does provide some annual funding to HALO on a per-flight basis. The funding of HALO and STARS is different because they operate on a different scale with different mandates, different service levels, and different cost structures, so AHS is planning to review helicopter medical transport across the province to address the concerns the member is raising to ensure equity.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Barnes: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. HALO has an annual operating budget of approximately $2.6 million, which they've relied on donors for. Given that southern Albertans need the services that HALO provides and given that HALO could do more for the safety of southern Albertans if they were funded at the same per capita level as STARS and given that the people of southeastern Alberta contribute greatly to the prosperity of Alberta, will the minister commit to aligning the per capita support of HALO with STARS?

Mr. Shandro: Well, Mr. Speaker, I share the member's commitment to HALO and other partnerships like it. The support it has attracted from people in southeast Alberta shows the best spirit of this province, including the support of the people from the city of Medicine Hat. Funding methodologies are complex, and per capita funding may or may not be the best approach for a given service or a given provider. HALO supplements the coverage already provided by STARS with its own specific level of service. AHS is committed to maintaining a strong role for HALO, and they'll look at funding options based on the distinct role of each of the providers.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Medical Laboratory Services

Mr. Shepherd: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Now, mere days after the recent election the incoming government halted construction on the long-needed Edmonton clinical lab hub. To be clear, at the time of this decision the Premier did not have a Health minister. There is no evidence he even bothered to consult with the Deputy Minister of Health, Alberta's public laboratories, or Alberta Health Services. To the Premier: who, in fact, advised you that you should cancel this fundamental project?

Mr. Shandro: Mr. Speaker, this is a project that was committed to by the previous government. The decisions were not based on decisions that were patient focused. In fact, when you look at the two Health Quality Council of Alberta reports that were prepared in 2016, 2017, there's nothing in those reports – when the previous government wants to hang its hat on those reports and say that that report provided for that, those reports do not provide that guidance.

The Speaker: The Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. What those reports do show is that the current lab services that are available are insufficient and need upgrading. Given that this Premier has inexplicably claimed that the lab hub for northern Alberta and Edmonton is sufficient and given that none of the research dating back a decade substantiates that claim – even the previous PC government knew a new lab was needed – and given that the Health Quality Council of Alberta published a report moving ahead on transformation of laboratory services in Alberta, did this Premier even bother to read this report and consider the ramifications of his short-sighted proposal?

Mr. Shandro: The answer is yes, Mr. Speaker. Yes, Mr. Speaker, we did read those reports. Yes, Mr. Speaker, we did talk to Dr. Ballem. Yes, Mr. Speaker, we did talk to patients. We did speak to pathologists, Mr. Speaker. First of all, let's think about when those reports were first published, 2016, 2017, and dithering from that previous government – dithering while patients needed those infrastructure investments. Dithering.

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, in that time we moved forward with the creation of Alberta public laboratories and consolidating lab services in the province as the council recommended.

Now, given that with a dated and insufficient lab for Edmonton and northern Alberta the only beneficiaries of this decision are the owners of DynaLife, who the Premier said that he would allow to continue to provide services without even considering alternative models or a public bid process, my question is this: did the owners, executives, or aligned beneficiaries from DynaLife medical labs donate to this Premier's leadership bid, the bid of his kamikaze puppet candidate, or any of the many PACs . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Mr. Shandro: Mr. Speaker, while the previous government wanted to make decisions on infrastructure, while they wanted to make decisions on laboratory infrastructure, laboratory services in this province, to nationalize laboratory services in this province, all those decisions were ideological. None of them were patient focused. None of them were going to help any patient in this province. Let's remember that every patient care decision is going to require either lab work or is going to require an X-ray. The simpler sends that require lab work – all of those decisions or the quality and the timeliness of those decisions for those patient care decisions were affected by their ideological decisions on laboratory services.

Gay-straight Alliances in Schools

Member Irwin: Mr. Speaker, happy Pride Month. Just over a year ago, at the UCP's founding AGM, the Minister of Transportation warned fellow delegates that a motion to require mandatory parental notification if a child joins a gay-straight alliance was, quote, about outing gay kids. The motion passed anyway, and now this Premier and the Minister of Education look poised to do just that and roll back the protections enshrined in Bill 24. To the Minister of Transportation: have you talked with the Premier or the Minister of Education and tried to convince them that outing gay kids is wrong and dangerous?

Member LaGrange: Thank you for the question. The Education Act, when it will be proclaimed here shortly, will have the strongest legal protections in Canada for inclusion groups, including GSAs and QSAs. We've been very clear on that. We continue to be clear on that. Thank you.

Member Irwin: Given that since taking office a month ago this Minister of Education has not offered any words of comfort to our LGBTQ youth who fear that this government will remove their right to confidentiality and given that she has a history of fighting against gay-straight alliances and aligning with known anti-LGBTQ organizations, will this minister commit here and now to further consultations with gender and sexually diverse youth, who weren't able to vote in the last election, before she goes ahead with a law that puts them in a very dangerous situation?

Member LaGrange: Thank you for the question. In fact, I disagree wholeheartedly with what was just said. I have been meeting with my minister's youth council. I've heard from numerous LGBTQ youth who have actually put forward that they want to work with me in implementing the Education Act. As early as last Friday I spoke with a particular young lady who shared with me that she found Bill 24 to not support what she needs. She wanted to have more of a balance. Thank you.

Member Irwin: Given that actions often speak louder than words and given that it is now Pride Month and given that in addition to taking meaningful steps to improve the lives of queer and trans Albertans our government has always made a point to celebrate Pride with the LGBTQ community, could the minister inform this House what she plans to do to celebrate and to support Pride and does she find it concerning that she'll be rolling back LGBTQ rights during this very important month?

Member LaGrange: Thank you for the question. All Albertans deserve the freedom to be true to themselves regardless of race, religion, sexual orientation, or gender identity. All Albertans means all Albertans. I really put that forward to you that we will be looking after all students and all Albertans. Thank you. [interjections]

The Speaker: Members, I appreciate hearing the questions; I'd also like to hear the answers.

The hon. Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland.

Fire Retardant Gels

Mr. Getson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The impacts of the forest fires that hit Slave Lake, Fort McMurray, and now that are taking place up in High Level affect us all. It's common practice in other countries to make use of certain fire suppression polymer gels, using aerial application to contain fires, which can be applied to the forests as well as free-standing structures. These gels save homes and greatly reduce the risk of property loss, forest loss, and reduce the amount of smoke in the air. Is the minister aware of these gels, which are more cost-effective, require less support infrastructure, and offer better protection than conventional chemical retardants currently in use?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Agriculture and Forestry is rising.

Mr. Dreesen: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. First, I would just like to say thanks to the Premier and the Member for Edmonton-McClung for their recognition of all the hard work that's being done by Alberta Wildfire and all the men and women that have been bravely fighting these forest fires for the last couple of weeks.

To the member's question: yes. Our department is aware of these gels, and we are constantly looking at new technologies to be at the forefront of fighting fires.

Mr. Getson: Given that my constituent brought this forward to his former MLA who was also the previous Agriculture and Forestry minister at the time and in my constituent's words he only received the runaround from his former MLA, is the minister aware that there was a contract that was issued for the use of combatting gels that was rescinded by the previous government essentially because of bureaucratic red tape?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Dreesen: Well, thank you very much for the question, Mr. Speaker. When it comes to the previous government, I won't go too much into it, but there are always lessons learned from any major events like forest fires. We do have a red tape reduction commitment that we are looking at ways within the Department of Agriculture and Forestry to try to find new technologies and new ways of combatting fires.

Mr. Getson: Will the minister reinstate the previous contract or, at a minimum, allow this product and its applicators the chance to be put here and work in Alberta, just as it has in Australia, British Columbia, and the U.S.A. and give our brave forest-fighting folks better tools to perform their jobs?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Dreesen: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, for the question. I can assure the member that we will do an assessment within the department to make sure that this type of technology would work with all the different types of methods that we use to fight fires because it is a very complicated procedure when you have water bombers and people on the ground to make sure that they coincide with each other. But, again, I'll trust the experts within our department that have been doing this for the last 34 years. It is an incredible procedure to watch. Thank you very much for the question.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

2017 UCP Leadership Contest Investigation

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Last week the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General told reporters that he takes preserving the integrity of our justice system very, very seriously, yet the minister said that he informed the Premier's office when he was questioned by the RCMP. The current Premier was the victor in the very leadership contest under investigation. Since witnesses are normally cautioned not to speak to others involved, to the minister: what exactly did you tell the Premier about the investigation, and what steps did you take to ensure that it didn't interfere with an active investigation?

The Speaker: I might remind members, as I have done from time to time, that questions should be focused on government business, not necessarily party business. Having said that, I'm happy to hear a response from the hon. Minister of Justice.

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, of course, I talked to the Premier's staff about this matter. There was an article in the news that morning regarding the fact that I met with the RCMP that weekend. I came and informed this Assembly at the earliest opportunity regarding that matter. Again, I'm not going to comment on an ongoing investigation by the RCMP. One thing that I'd just like to identify for this Assembly, though, is that I've been interviewed by the media extensively on this matter going back to 2017. All relevant information I have regarding this matter has been a matter of public record going back to 2017. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Ms Ganley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think our concern is that the minister spoke to the Premier's office.

Given that the Premier has maintained that he has not had any contact from the RCMP and given that it should be the RCMP that chooses what information, if any, is provided to the Premier, to the same minister: did you obtain permission from the questioning officers or legal advice before discussing an active investigation with the Premier?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, I have not talked about this matter with the Premier, as I've already answered and provided this Assembly with transparency. This matter is before the RCMP. I'd refer their questions, if they have further matters that they want addressed, to the RCMP for their comment.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Ms Ganley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that now that a special prosecutor has been appointed after nearly a month of the Official Opposition calling for it and given that despite the minister and this government's desire to see this issue go away, it seems to continue to expand, will the government commit to informing this House and the public of any other individuals interviewed in relation to this active investigation and seek legal advice before discussing it amongst themselves?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, again I would refer this hon. member, if they have questions regarding the RCMP's independent investigation, to the RCMP. Again, as we've said many times in the Assembly regarding this matter, we respect the independence of the RCMP to conduct their investigations, and we respect the independence of the prosecution service to conduct their work in an independent way. The system worked. It worked how it was supposed to, free from elected officials being involved.

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

Overweight and Overdimensional Vehicle Permits

Member Ceci: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Roadata, the permitting agent for two-thirds of Alberta's municipalities and counties, recently warned that the UCP platform proposed replacing the rural roads permitting program in favour of an annual provincial permit. Sounds harmless, maybe even a good idea, but local leaders point to many potential problems, including significant road degradation, downloaded costs, and overlooked local knowledge and planning. My question is to the Minister of Transportation. By all accounts the current rural roads permitting system is working. Why are you killing it?

The Speaker: The Minister of Transportation.

Mr. McIver: Well, Mr. Speaker, thank you, and I would actually thank the hon. member for a pertinent question. I'll start by educating the hon. member. Part of what he said is correct. The permitting system that we use – the acronym is TRAVIS – is an automated system where the municipalities maintain control of the weights and measures of the vehicles that travel over their roads, and the hon. member will be glad to know that rather than killing it, we're actually expanding it.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

Member Ceci: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that overweight and overdimensional vehicle permitting is intended to provide municipalities with tools to ensure that the roads they manage are used by service rigs and others with minimal impact to roadway infrastructure and public safety, to the Minister of Municipal Affairs: have you consulted with the representatives of local governments, or are you defending your government's roughshod treatment of these representatives with what we hear in here all the time, from the Premier on down, quote: it's in our platform, and we won the election? Is that what you call consultation?

Mr. McIver: Well, Mr. Speaker, I would let the hon. member know that I've kept in touch with the Minister of Municipal Affairs on this, and we've been in direct touch with the leaders of the Alberta Urban Municipalities Association and the rural municipalities association as well as the mayor's office in Edmonton. They are aware of what we're doing, and while I wouldn't say that there's a hundred per cent support, because that would be a stretch, there is broad and widespread support across Alberta's municipalities for what we're doing. It should keep them in control and actually save them some money.

Member Ceci: Roadata doesn't support it.

Given that classifying service rigs as off-road equipment, as is the case with farm machinery, will surely result in unintended consequences that will cost ratepayers, local governments, and the province precious capital dollars and that the Transportation minister is effectively downloading responsibility onto Municipal Affairs and the costs onto local taxpayers, will the Minister of Municipal Affairs do the right thing and halt any changes to the Roadata permitting process and first consult with local mayors and reeves?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Transportation.

Mr. McIver: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I guess I'm going to ask the hon. member to take yes for an answer. Before we put the actual final regulations in place, we're actually doing just what the member said, as we've been taking our time, talking to the local municipalities, making sure that they know that they're just as in control of the weights and measures of the loads that go across their roads after what we do as they were before what we do. What we're doing, in fact, is automating the process, so they actually get to set the standards at which the answer is yes or no. The fees they get charged are no more or less. All we're doing is automating it and saving some . . .

The Speaker: The Member for Drumheller-Stettler.

Trans Mountain Pipeline Expansion Project Federal Bills C-48 and C-69

Mr. Horner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. For the Minister of Energy. This government campaigned on getting serious about the Trans Mountain pipeline expansion approval and that we need the right economic conditions for the energy sector. This pipeline is not only in the best interests of Alberta's economic prosperity but Canada's, too. On June 18 the federal government is making a decision on the expansion of the Trans Mountain pipeline. In my constituency of Drumheller-Stettler Albertans are asking me what you are doing to get this pipeline approved. To the minister. Good jobs with proud workers are at stake. Can you tell us what this government is doing to ensure that the federal government makes the right decision on the Trans Mountain expansion?

The Speaker: The Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We are a hundred per cent committed to standing up for Alberta, protecting the value of our natural resources, and getting pipelines built. That's why last week in Ottawa we launched the Yes to TMX campaign, a multimedia campaign focused on the need for the federal government to say yes to TMX. We need that positive decision on June 18, not a month later, not a week later, not a day later. We need it on June 18. This project has suffered endless delays already, and we need to get to a yes. We need the country to come . . .

The Speaker: The Member for Drumheller-Stettler.

Mr. Horner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the same minister: given that any delays will jeopardize an entire construction season and that the government in British Columbia also needs to get onboard to get Trans Mountain expansion built – and most British Columbians agree that the Trans Mountain expansion should be built – what is this government going to do to ensure that Premier Horgan gets this message?

The Speaker: The Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The day after we announced Yes to TMX in Ottawa, we announced Yes to TMX in Vancouver. It's a campaign directed at the Lower Mainland. It's a campaign to talk about the benefits of the Trans Mountain pipeline and a campaign to highlight that British Columbians are paying a buck 70 at the pump and to make the connection between that and the Trans Mountain pipeline. So British Columbians are saying yes to TMX, Canadians are, Albertans are. It's time for the Premier of B.C. to say yes.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Horner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the same minister: given that bills C-48 and C-69, also known as the no-more-pipelines bill and the tanker ban bill, will have a detrimental effect on Albertans and Canadians, can the minister tell us what she is also doing to ensure that these devastating pieces of federal government legislation will not hurt our economy or resource future here in Alberta?

Mrs. Savage: I was in Ottawa last week meeting with Senators. It seems like I was all over the country last week. Both of these bills, C-69 and C-48, are devastating, and I can tell you that the Senators are taking their role of reviewing legislation while respecting regional representation very seriously. We've asked the Senators to accept the recommendations of both committees to effectively kill Bill C-48 and to accept 187 amendments to C-69. We can tell you that if they don't accept those amendments, we will be launching an immediate constitutional challenge.

The Speaker: The Member for Livingstone-Macleod.

School Construction and Modernization

Mr. Reid: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My question is for the Minister of Education. Schools across this province are seeking clarity on how the government decides which schools receive funding for modernization. For example, J.T. Foster in Nanton has been in desperate need of renovations for multiple years, and the Livingstone Range school division has made securing funds for this high school their number one priority. Can the minister please explain to this House how the Ministry of Education prioritizes funding for school modernization?

The Speaker: The Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and the hon. member for the question. As part of the annual budget process my department works alongside Infrastructure to prepare a list of projects that represent the highest priority needs as identified by school boards in their capital plan submissions. Priorities identified by school boards in their three-year capital plans are considered and prioritized based on factors such as health and safety of students and staff, enrolment projections, current utilization, facility conditions, and, of course, capacity for program delivery.

Thank you.

Mr. Reid: Thank you, Minister, for explaining the process.

Mr. Speaker, in addition to modernizing schools which are in need of repairs and renovations, our government was elected on a mandate to build schools across the province, and given that there are many schools that are over capacity and given that many rural communities are lacking easy access to schools, can the minister explain how she intends to honour this platform commitment?

The Speaker: The Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you again, Mr. Speaker and the hon. member for that question. We were elected with a mandate to continue to build schools. I'm looking forward to working with my colleagues, my colleague the Minister of Infrastructure, as we work to accomplish this commitment. More details will be coming when we table the budget in the fall. This is very much on my heart, that we are going to look after this, so thank you for the question.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Reid: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Back to the minister. Given that J.T. Foster is only one example of a school in desperate need of renovations and there are school districts across the province seeking confirmation of their capital projects, that they've been approved, can the minister please elaborate on how the government decides which schools receive modernization funding or are approved for new builds?

The Speaker: The Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you for the question, Mr. Speaker. Priorities identified by school boards in their three-year capital plans are considered and prioritized based on the factors I have already described. The projects represent the highest priority needs as identified by those school boards in their capital plan submissions. We will continue to look at the priorities of school jurisdictions and work with them to address current and future school infrastructure needs.

Thank you for the question.

Statement by the Speaker

Translation of Remarks in French

The Speaker: Members, I would just like to provide a clarification. Earlier during the daily Routine, I interjected when the Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo spoke French.* Of course, pursuant to section 5(1) of the Languages Act, French in the Assembly may in fact be spoken without translation. However, from time to time members may like to provide a translation as a courtesy to members who may not speak French. But all other languages do require the translation.

Hon. members, in 30 seconds or approximately there, we will proceed to Members' Statements.

Missing and Murdered Indigenous Women

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The history of indigenous women and girls in Alberta has been one of historical and multigenerational oppression. The final report of the missing and murdered indigenous women and girls commission, of which Alberta was a full participant, states, "As the evidence demonstrates, human rights and Indigenous rights abuses and violations committed and condoned by the Canadian state represent genocide against Indigenous women, girls, and 2SLGBTQIA people."

Genocide is a difficult word, as truth often is. The report arrived at this determination through an examination of facts that many Albertans might find difficult to comprehend: a history of oppression, of systematic violence, of residential schools, forced sterilization, the '60s scoop, and widespread racism; a history of systematic underfunding, denial of human and treaty rights, and neglect by the institutions which were built on revenues from stolen lands.

For many, the use of the word "genocide" is uncomfortable, too much, over the top. But for indigenous people in Alberta the word is appropriate. It names the experience and allows them to claim their truth. It reflects not only the experience of their mothers and fathers but the experience that their children live today. Literally today a group of conservative Senators in Ottawa are working to block the passage of Bill C-262, which requires the government to determine whether federal laws are consistent with the UNDRIP.

I know that some people have said that while much has gone wrong, there was no underlying intent to commit genocide. To that end, I would like to leave you with two quotations, the first from Reverend Kevin Annett, who published Hidden from History: The Canadian Holocaust, in 2001, "As early as November, 1907, the Canadian press was acknowledging that the death rate within Indian residential schools exceeded 50%," and a response to this issue from Duncan Scott, the department of Indian affairs superintendent in 1910 ...

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-Cross.

Ramadan and Eid

Mr. Amery: Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege for me to rise before you in this Assembly to speak about the valuable contributions of Muslim Albertans as the holy month of Ramadan draws to an end. Alberta is a province of rich and diverse religious beliefs and practices, and many individuals of the Islamic faith call Alberta and indeed the constituency of Calgary-Cross home. For Muslims this is an important and exciting time of the year, with the holy month of Ramadan drawing to an end and the celebration of Eid expected to begin tomorrow. As you may know, Muslims fast throughout the month of Ramadan, where they abstain from food and drink from sunrise to sunset, in part to experience the struggles of those less fortunate but also to reflect on their beliefs, offer charity, spend time with loved ones, and give back to their communities.

Muslims have made great contributions to this province. Many currently serve in law enforcement agencies, the Armed Forces, private enterprise, and, yes, as members of this historic Legislature. I am honoured to be part of a government that has been given a clear mandate to represent individuals of all faiths and backgrounds. As a proud Muslim myself, Mr. Speaker, during this month I have learned the value and importance of caring for our neighbours, tackling problems in our community, remaining humble, and lending a helping hand. Although these values are a key tenet for all Muslims, they undoubtedly reflect a bigger message of inclusivity, tolerance, and the cultural mosaic that makes up this great province.

As our government works to energize our economy, I invite the hon. members of this House to recognize the contributions made by Albertans of the Islamic faith by joining me and wishing all Muslims a Ramadan Mubarak and a joyous celebration of Eid in . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Airdrie-East.

Provincial Fiscal Policies

Mrs. Pitt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Oscar Wilde once said that a man who pays his bills on time is soon forgotten. Because of the former NDP government's inability to pay this province's bills and unique ability to take on new debt at an alarming rate, they will most certainly not be forgotten. Our province's debt load sits at more than $60 billion. That's $60 billion imposed on the next generation of Albertans.

You know, Mr. Speaker, as a proud mom of two I have a real insight into what running this kind of debt really means. It means my kids are going to have to pick up the tab. This type of irresponsible debt is the real legacy of the now Official Opposition. They oversaw the largest deficits in Alberta's history and added record amounts of debt that future generations, including my children, will have to pay off. What's worse is that because it was clear that they had no plan to pay down their debt and deal with their spending addiction, they watched as it got even more expensive for Alberta to borrow, with six credit downgrades.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to be a member of the United Conservative Party, with a real plan to get Alberta's finances back on track. We will bring forward a responsible plan to deal with the mess left by the previous government, and with new, exciting policies like the job creation tax cut, An Act to Make Alberta Open for Business, and, one I'm really excited about, An Act to Repeal the Carbon Tax, we will not only get Alberta back to balance, but we will return our province to the engine of job creation it once was.

Once again Alberta will be the best place in Canada to live, work, and raise a family. With our plan to spend responsibly, create jobs, and get Alberta back on track, we will deal with the mess left to us by the previous government, and we will ensure Alberta . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday.

2:50 Consumer Protection for Motor Vehicle Owners

Mr. Carson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am proud of the actions that our government took to protect consumers over the last four years, including common-sense policies and regulations that make sure Albertans can feel confident when buying or repairing a vehicle. After multiple concerns were raised about AMVIC's ability to independently advocate for consumers, we took the important step of making AMVIC a public body to ensure that it has the oversight and powers it needs to stand up for Albertans.

However, the UCP's refusal to commit to these protections should be worrying for all Albertans. Last week in question period I raised serious concerns about this government's connection with a lobbyist who promised to raise over a million dollars to help the UCP get elected in exchange for weakened consumer protections. I asked this question to get assurance that this government would follow our lead in defending these protections. Instead, what Albertans got was spin. Instead of standing up for consumers, the Minister of Service Alberta chose to defend the Premier's PAC, saying that it was "independent from political parties." Instead of pledging to operate in the way Albertans should expect from their government, the Minister of Transportation said that my advocacy for consumer protections was, quote, embarrassing.

Mr. Speaker, the UCP owes an explanation to the people of Alberta. Why don't they think that informing consumers about the prior history of a vehicle is a policy worth protecting? Why don't they think that Albertans deserve a comprehensive bill of sale when buying a vehicle? Why won't they commit to keeping AMVIC a public body, ensuring the independence of this critical organization? While the UCP waffles and spins, Albertans know that their rights and protections should not be for sale.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Leduc-Beaumont would like to make a statement.

Canadian Armed Forces Liaison

Mr. Rutherford: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I stand in this Assembly to express my honour and gratitude at being designated the caucus military liaison for the government of Alberta. I look forward in my new role to developing, promoting, supporting, and sustaining the Alberta government's relationship with the Canadian Armed Forces. This is particularly meaningful for me as just yesterday we marked Canadian Armed Forces Day.

As Albertans know, the men and women of the Canadian Armed Forces serve a vital role in the defence of peace and human rights around the globe. They protect our way of life here at home, and as we have seen many times, including the last few days, they play a life-saving role here in times of natural disaster. Albertans and their government are grateful to the men and women of our Canadian Forces and their contribution to our country. We are equally grateful to their families for their perseverance and sacrifice as their loved ones respond to the needs of a nation.

One of my first priorities as caucus military liaison will be assisting in the creation of a new postsecondary scholarship program to be named after Alex Decoteau, named for Canada's first indigenous police officer who served, as I was proud to, in the Edmonton Police Service. This scholarship will help veterans and their families integrate into Alberta's workforce following their term of military service. As caucus military liaison I will do my utmost to strengthen our province's relationship with these brave and selfless Canadians.

Thank you.

Tabling Returns and Reports

Ms Sweet: I have three tablings with the appropriate copies. The first is entitled Supervised Injection Facilities in Canada: Past, Present, and Future.

Second, from 2019, What is Known About the Impacts of Supervised Injection Sites on Community Safety and Wellbeing: A Systematic Review.

Then, Decrease in Crime in Red Deer, Including Near Safe Consumption Site: RCMP.

The Speaker: The Member for Edmonton-Glenora is rising to table a document.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I, too, have three documents, that I will submit the requisite number of copies for as one package. The first is a letter to one family, residents of the Calgary Catholic school district, saying that their student won't be allowed to return because: "The primary reason for not allowing [your student] to access a fourth-year . . . is that the District does not have sufficient resources and facilities to accommodate her." Again, this is a student with severe special needs. Then, virtually the same sentence is in a letter to another family. Also, a letter from one of those families in pursuit of their appeal. All telling information about the damage that reduced education funding causes to parents, particularly for children with special needs.

Thank you.

Orders of the Day

Motions Other than Government Motions

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Athabasca-Barrhead-Westlock.

Relocation of Government Facilities

502. Mr. van Dijken moved:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to require a local economic impact assessment and take the results of that assessment into consideration when planning the centralization or relocation of provincially funded government service centres, offices, and branches.

Mr. van Dijken: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today in the Legislature to move and to speak in favour of my private member's motion.

But, first, I'd like to introduce to you and through you to all members of this Assembly my eldest daughter, Jessica, and three of her children: Will, Vera, and Lewis. If you would please rise to receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Mr. Speaker, I was first elected in 2015 and now again in 2019 partly on a promise of looking out for the best interests of my constituents and the communities within my constituency. The intent of Motion 502 is to protect the jobs, social well-being, and sustainability of communities not only in my constituency but communities throughout all of rural Alberta.

Early in my first term, in October 2016, the Trudeau government announced that they would be closing the federal immigration processing centre in Vegreville, Alberta, and moving 228 employee positions to Edmonton. The announcement blindsided the town. They were not notified or consulted with about the potential effects this decision would have on their community, and it appeared that the federal government had put no thought into how significant that impact would be on this small Alberta town of less than 6,000 people.

The people of Vegreville knew that the closure of the immigration processing centre, impacting 8 per cent of the town's workforce, would deliver a serious economic blow to their small town, so the town hired Torque Communications to help lobby the federal government to reconsider their decision. I remember the day I received a Respect Vegreville button and letter asking for my support of their campaign.

The Alberta Association of Municipal Districts and Counties passed a resolution, brought forward by the county of Minburn, urging the federal department to reconsider their decision to close the immigration case processing centre in Vegreville. The town also hired Nichols Applied Management Inc. to do a socioeconomic analysis of the expected consequences of the centre's closure. The Nichols report estimated that approximately 420 people could move out of the town, municipal revenues could decline by $1.2 million, housing values could drop by 25 to 30 per cent, and enrolment in local schools could decrease by 130 students, and that service clubs such as Little Warriors, the Vegreville breakfast club, the Vegreville Food Bank, Vegreville KidSport, and the Vegreville Association for Living in Dignity, that received thousands of dollars in charity support from activities carried out by the employees of the immigration case processing centre, would have shortfalls in funding.

Mr. Speaker, these impacts would be devastating to any small town, but the fact that an indifferent federal government made this decision without any prior consultation or consideration of the people and the community affected is an insult and, I believe, should never happen again. That is why I am putting forth Motion 502.

I believe it is incumbent upon our government to ensure they take into consideration, before a decision is made, the results of a local economic impact assessment when planning the potential centralization or relocation of provincially funded government service centres, offices, and branches. No community should be blindsided the same way Vegreville was. Mr. Speaker, I think of some of the government-funded services in my constituency, whether it be the Athabasca University in Athabasca, the Alberta Distance Learning Centre located in Barrhead, the Alberta Health Services north zone offices in Westlock, or any of the other provincially funded service centres in my constituency. These offices and by extension these jobs have become an integral part of the local economy and the social well-being of the communities they are located in.

I also think of the potential devastation to these communities if an indifferent government decided to move any of these facilities. Mr. Speaker, whether it is agriculture, energy, or forestry, our resource industries, primarily located in rural Alberta, will have downturns. This creates challenges for the communities who are on the front lines of these industries. We have seen during this latest downturn in the energy industry how provincially funded service centres, offices, and branches provided steady employment and income, serving as a shock absorber for the local economy in these rural Alberta towns.

Families also benefit from this shock-absorber effect. Government-funded jobs are often held by spouses or family members of the workers employed by our resource sectors. Having a government job allows these families to manage through some of the challenges they are faced with during a downturn. When one member of the family is faced with reduced hours or even the loss of their resource sector job, at least their family is better able to manage through the downturn.

Mr. Speaker, I believe it is important for government, going forward, to recognize how important these stable government jobs are for the sustainability of these small towns and the health of the families within. I believe a fair process is required before any government decision is made to centralize or relocate government services, offices, or branches. I believe no community should be blindsided the way Vegreville was by an indifferent government that put no consideration into the effects on the town of the decision to move the immigration case processing centre.

Mr. Speaker, we can do better, and I must say that we must do better. Good decisions are well-informed decisions. The need for proper consultation before a decision is made is important and respects the communities and families that will be directly impacted by these types of decisions. That is why I am asking this Assembly to urge the government to require a local economic impact assessment and take the results of that assessment into consideration when planning the potential centralization or relocation of provincially funded government service centres, offices, and branches.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I urge all members to support private member's Motion 502.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thanks very much to the hon. Member for Athabasca-Barrhead-Westlock for bringing forward this I think timely and well-conceived motion. I think it's important for all of us to look at the importance of public services, not just for the services that they provide across the province and in rural areas and smaller centres but for the employment that they provide as well.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

I know that the hon. member and I were together in Neerlandia a couple of years ago building and opening a new school. Again, it's self-evident that that school is not just a place of learning and a place of pride and a community centre but also a place where, you know, people are employed, quite frankly. When I look across the province, in the vast majority of municipal districts across the province, for example, the leading employer is the education system and all of the jobs associated, not just teachers but secretaries and custodians and bus drivers and so forth.

I couldn't have said it better. This acts as an economic shock absorber, especially during an economic downturn, you know, Madam Speaker, where we see otherwise that the price of energy had caused a lot of jobs to be lost. But we as the previous government chose not to exacerbate that situation by laying off teachers and nurses and other public service employees, who provide an essential public service and provide jobs in those communities.

I can think further to the hon. member's Athabasca-Barrhead-Westlock riding, where you have, of course, not just schools providing education services but also other services. I know there's specialty work done in the clinic in Westlock around knee and hip replacements. You know, it's a good way to utilize those services that are built and to help to reduce wait times in the larger urban centres, again providing an essential service for Albertans but also providing employment in Westlock. Again, by having these places in smaller communities, you help to plant a seed for further economic growth and all of the ancillary services that the doctors and nurses at the knee and hip replacement place might need and so on and so forth.

Travelling a bit further down the road – the hon. member must know that I have a very good memory for driving down highways and so forth – we find Barrhead and the Alberta distance learning facilities that are there, again providing online and correspondence services for students around the province. Having that centre at least partially situated in Barrhead has had, I think, some positive economic benefits for that town. Again, you know, once those services are entrenched – I believe the ADLC has probably been there for 30, 40 years at least, right? – you've created an economic, essential part of the Barrhead and area community with those things.

As we look across the province, there are other places, and quite frankly we should be innovative in looking for ways by which we can expand public services into smaller communities to help to share that diversity, right? Economic diversity is absolutely essential. If we learned anything from the last four years, it's that when you have too many eggs in one basket, the boom-and-bust cycle comes back to bite you. We saw it in spades here in the last number of years, where the economic downturn, energy prices globally falling through the bottom – you know, we were in a very vulnerable situation. I think it's incumbent upon us to learn from those things and help to diversify the economy in the broadest possible way and help to diversify each individual community as well, if we possibly can, through the spreading of public services to different places.

This motion, Madam Speaker, I think, serves a practical purpose, right? We all know what happened in Vegreville, and it was unconscionable. You could physically see things closing down as the announcement became reality in regard to the immigration services being lost in the town of Vegreville, and we certainly fought hard to counter that. I know that our member at that time tried to move heaven and earth to rally people to have the federal government reconsider that decision, and it was for naught, unfortunately. But we can learn from our mistakes or we can learn from bad situations so that they don't happen again. I would suggest that this motion is in keeping with learning from the past to make something better for the future.

But I would also suggest that the decisions around public services, not treating them like they're just red ink on the ledger paper but actually understanding that the essential services that schools and hospitals and other public services provide are helping kids – they're helping families, but they're also helping the economy, quite frankly. You know, to just suggest that the school budget or the health budget is just a liability that you must shed for the sake of a certain political agenda I think is short sighted and is a misrepresentation of the reality that we see in a place like Westlock or Barrhead or Neerlandia or Vegreville and hundreds of other places across the province.

You know, always, I think, cooler heads must prevail, right? We shouldn't make, Madam Speaker, sweeping statements suggesting that every single thing that ever happens that's bad in the province happened because of the previous government. I always endeavoured to not do that when I was a government member. I made a point of not dwelling on the past to suggest that the politics of the Conservatives were the fountain of all negative and evil things in the province. I would strongly suggest that this government should also endeavour to do so. I mean, politics being what they are, these things do happen, but don't let it dominate and overcome rational, sensible decision-making.

For me, to see the hon. Member for Athabasca-Barrhead-Westlock have his motion surface like a ship of rational, reasonable thoughts, perhaps, on the stormy seas of political rhetoric is refreshing, and I certainly support this motion in the broadest possible way.

I must say that your family must be proud of you. Somehow they came all the way here to watch you with this. I'm wondering if the kids go to Neerlandia. I bet you they do. No? Not quite? Okay. There you go. Anyway, it was good. I enjoyed my visit up there a couple of years ago, and I hope that the spring agricultural season shines and smiles on you.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Lacombe-Ponoka.

Mr. Orr: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I jump with honour to rise in support today of Motion 502. I think this is an extremely important motion which will provide not only stability but, I think, survivability to many of the communities of rural Alberta. It's a motion that urges our government to require a local economic impact assessment and actually take into account the results of that assessment in the consideration of planning either centralization or relocation of provincially funded services, offices, and branches. This is a motion that we really do need to encourage our government to engage in a transition of methodology and maybe even driving philosophy. It absolutely is not a partisan issue; it's something that has been in need of review for about 15 years or more. It definitely is a motion that I rise to support.

Of course, we all watched what happened in Vegreville, and that's been spoken to by both of the two members before me, so I will not rehash that or redo it except to say that the degree of impact that occurred from that was actually even greater, more devastating than people ever anticipated it would be. The population of the town shrunk by almost 10 per cent. Home values fell by 30 per cent. It didn't just mean that people had to find new jobs with that kind of an economic transition; it meant that every citizen in Vegreville, in one way or another, as the ripples of that impact spread out, was impacted. Local businesses lost. Everything was impacted. An economic impact study should have been conducted by the federal government prior to engaging on that change.

That's why, Madam Speaker, I believe that it is important that we do our best to make sure that that kind of thing does not happen again and particularly that it doesn't happen in the areas where we have provincial authority and control, because the impacts of government being centralized in our two large cities from all of our small rural towns can actually, literally cripple and even kill some of those small towns.

Our government's platform has been that we have put forward some bold ideas related to the revitalization of rural communities with the rural entrepreneur immigration plan, the rural renewal immigration plan. These programs really will help revitalize our rural communities. They have incredible potential upside for those seeking to live in rural Alberta, and I think we need to be aware of that.

I can't imagine the effects that some sort of centralization or removal of services would have on the local businesses and community life in the town of Lacombe, for instance. AFSC is one of the larger employers in my constituency. We do not need to have that removed from our community through some sort of centralization process. On top of that, they provide tremendous community work as well and support in the community. Everyone from working individuals to schoolchildren would feel the effects of some sort of centralization to the two big urban areas of that government service.

Worse would be the fate of Ponoka if centennial centre, the brain injury centre at our hospital, were to be removed. It's been there for – I'm not even sure – 80, 90 years. If that were suddenly to be centralized out of Ponoka, the hundreds of employees that would be impacted, the community would truly suffer from that. The issue, Madam Speaker, is that none of us would choose to create a small business in an environment that can't promise stability. Too often the instability is created by a government policy or decision that removes the major employer from a region.

With more and more centralization of government offices, many of which are massive employers in our rural communities, more protection from government for entrepreneurs and citizens is worth considering and, as has already been said, quite frankly, more protection for the schools and the hospitals in those regions as well, who also then become less viable, who then are often considered for closing. The communities one step at a time literally die when these kinds of centralization efforts take place. It means we lose opportunities of every kind, economic, social, community, in every way. The reality is that this effect takes place not by some natural means; it takes place because of policies and decisions of government.

I find it extremely challenging that in a time where over the last 15 years, for the most part, except for the last couple of years, the population of Alberta has been overall growing significantly by immigration yet at the same time we have small rural communities that are declining. Why is that? Because of government policy and decisions that hamper them, that make it impossible for them to function. So, Madam Speaker, government needs to create the kind of situation which actually supports and reinforces our smaller communities and towns, which makes them enticing, viable places for business and for the communities to continue to survive.

What people fear is losing their jobs and the opportunities that are leaving these communities. That's the situation that we saw most poignantly in Vegreville, and we don't need to see it in any more communities in our province. In fact, I would suggest that we need to begin to pursue a policy that's somewhat the opposite of that if we want to revitalize rural Alberta at a time when the province isn't growing. Rather than depopulating rural Alberta, with the right policies we could see rural Alberta growing as well as the province overall.

This is an extremely important issue. As I said, I think centralization, I don't know 10, 15 years ago, sort of became the philosophical default of government. The argument was that through economies of scale everything would get better, but the reality is that in that experience we've had, the efficiency of service has significantly declined and the impact on rural communities has been seriously felt.

As an example, I would like to use central Alberta in a very specific case. Decentralization of services, particularly health care in central Alberta, has had a huge impact on central Alberta. It has left central Alberta really stripped of opportunity that should have been left there. I refer to a couple of FOIP documents, well, one FOIP document in particular, from Alberta Health Services on capital spending in the central region on health care. I cite this in relation to this motion because of the massive impact it has had on the capital expenditure in the central region with regard to health care and hospitals. It has cost us hundreds of millions of dollars. It has cost us many hundreds of jobs that should have been there that got centralized and relocated out of our area, and the impact on all of our central region communities has been huge.

Let me give you a few quick numbers from AHS documents, capital spending, 2014, and then I'll refer a little bit to 2016. Per capita spending: this is per capita, per individual. Capital project spending in Calgary, for instance, in 2014 was $1,632. In Edmonton it was $1,117. For northern Alberta it was over $2,000. In southern Alberta it was $1,500. In central Alberta it did not make $1,000. No, it didn't even make half of that. No, it didn't even make a quarter of that. It's $227, Madam Speaker. This is a massive drain on the economy and the vitality of central Alberta to the two urban regions at the expense and the cost of everything that happens in central Alberta: jobs, businesses, housing, construction, all of these things.

In more recent numbers, 2016, the spending in Calgary was $1,400 per person. In Edmonton the projected at that point in time was $4,000. For central Alberta, the entire central region: $286. Over a decade it averages out to $104 per capita in central Alberta. This has been going on for years, this policy of centralization that bleeds away from the smaller areas, subsidizes the two major urban areas, and impacts our communities. The taxes are collected from our communities, but they're not spent in our communities. We subsidize other regions. This impacts the economy of central Alberta. The taxes collected from us are not represented in the services delivered. It's the reason why we have to have Motion 502.

In reality – let me just wrap it up, then – the government has . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Sorry, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo.

Mr. Yao: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. The good Member for Athabasca-Barrhead-Westlock brought together a very good proposal. This is a strong consideration that we have to do because government jobs are government investments. These are taxpayer investments and there for the communities, and it can be detrimental to a smaller community when these jobs get moved.

I mean, if we take Vegreville, for example: 236 jobs, and the total population of Vegreville was only 5,436 approximately in 2016. Those 236 jobs equals 420 residents, which is substantial when you think about the local schools and things that are impacted but also the indirect jobs. In my member's statement I talked about the indirect jobs in the oil and gas industry as measured by the Americans there. There are a lot of indirect jobs that also come from these. Again, it's not just the government jobs that are affected. It's the impacts of having the people that shop in those grocery stores and by things like the Canadian Tire and Home Hardware locally there investing in their community and participating in their community. That's enough kids to have filled a classroom at the very least.

Certainly, when governments are making these decisions, it does need to be well thought out. They do have to consider the economic implications of their decision-making, much like something that our previous government did not do when they were evaluating so many things, including in my community of Fort McMurray. Thousands of jobs were lost, and it was very detrimental to our community because it wasn't just oil sands jobs that were lost, Madam Speaker. We've had businesses, contractors that were providing these services to these oil companies lost out. We've had grocery stores slow down and lose a lot of business. Many of our retail outlets currently – oh, shoot; I forgot the name of the store. They sell camping gear, outdoor stuff, a big franchise in every community, and they just recently closed down. Again, these are the impacts of what happens when you remove a lot of people from a population, people with paying jobs that were able to contribute to the economy.

My good friend from Athabasca-Barrhead-Westlock is coming out with a very sensible motion that I concur with. We should consider this at all levels of government.

Thank you very much, Madam Speaker, for all of this fine work. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other members wishing to speak to the motion? The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to speak to this motion from the Member for Athabasca-Barrhead-Westlock and talk a little bit about the value of the public sector here in the province of Alberta.

Indeed, it's a quite refreshing to have the opportunity to have that discussion and acknowledge the value that public-sector workers in Alberta bring to their communities, and it's been wonderful to hear from so many members in this House today about the folks that work in the public sector, whether that's folks who are working in health care as nurses, as paramedics, as health care aides, or whether it's the local teacher, whether it's the folks that are working in other government services that are located around the province, the value that brings.

Indeed, I had the opportunity, you know, when I took on the role of health care critic for the Official Opposition, to have some really good conversations with the former Minister of Health, the Member for Edmonton-Glenora, about the rural health care system here in the province of Alberta. She noted to me that one of our commitments had been to maintain investment in these rural hospitals and in our public health care system precisely for that reason, recognizing that in many cases individuals who had lost work in the resource industry due to that worldwide drop in the price of oil, the challenges that we face due to the court ruling against TMX, and the many other factors that were involved, many of them had partners who worked within the public health care system, who worked in continuing care, who worked in our rural hospitals. The fact that we maintained that funding, that support, that we did not look to make cuts, as has been the wont of previous Conservative governments when the price of oil would fall, helped to ensure that those families had at least one good income coming in.

Indeed, last weekend, when I had the opportunity to attend the Health Sciences Association of Alberta conference here in Edmonton, I had a chance to talk with many folks who work in different aspects and some who work in lab services in some different parts of the province. I had the chance to talk with some who work as rural paramedics. They shared with me the importance of them being able to be there in their communities and provide those services. As so many members have noted today, that then also comes with economic benefit to those communities that helps support other local businesses, that helps support other people to live in that community, and that helps keep our rural population going. I recognize that as the roots of our province. That is where we come from, and it's an important way of life that I agree we want to see preserved.

As I said, it's refreshing to be able to have this conversation because too often I hear, you know, Conservatives or conservative commentators who speak very negatively of the public sector and the money that we invest as government in the province of Alberta to support those workers and the work that they do here in the province of Alberta. Indeed, recently there was an editorial by Danielle Smith, a former member of this House and a great supporter of the current government. She was quite concerned about some actions that public-sector workers, through their duly elected and democratic unions, were taking on climate change. One of her complaints was that these were, and I quote, the biggest and most powerful public-sector unions in our province, those who never saw job losses during the most recent downturn in the economy, those who never faced a wage cut.

I find that sort of framing and that sort of demonization of folks who work in the public service, Madam Speaker, to be troubling, especially with the discussion that we're having here in this House today, where we recognize that investment in providing fair remuneration for those who work in the public service is something that supports communities across this province. I recognize that at times there can be, much as there is the rivalry between Edmonton and Calgary or perhaps the west and the east, some of that rivalry that exists between urban and rural Alberta.

Certainly, it's challenging as government looks to find efficiencies and looks to find ways to offer services most effectively. Indeed, that is something this government has indicated they are very concerned about doing. I recognize it can be challenging in that, then, to find the right balance and ensuring that we support our important rural communities that provide so much in this province, whether it's in agriculture, whether it's the individuals that work in the resource industries and many of the folks are out fighting those fires right now. It is challenging trying to find the ways that we most effectively deliver our public services, but we recognize that the public service is an important employer and an important source of economic activity here in the province.

Indeed, I recognize that because I had many conversations over the last four years with individuals in the business community in and around Edmonton's downtown. We had some extensive conversations about what their experience was during the years under Premier Ralph Klein, when he made severe and drastic cuts to the public service here in Alberta, and about the effect it had on Edmonton's downtown core. More than once I heard the term "ghost town" used. It devastated businesses. It devastated the economy here, something from which it took some time for this community to begin to recover.

Now, I recognize that there is a difference between the downtown in the heart of a larger city and indeed an individual small town, though certainly the Minister of Health has taken the time to ask, I guess in regard to the clinical lab hub, which we had some more discussion about today, about why I was not concerned about jobs being moved out of my constituency for that. I recognize, again, that there are times when we have to weigh the decisions, we have to look at what's involved, and we have to make the right choice in terms of how we are going to provide the best services for Albertans.

Certainly, again, I think what the member has brought forward here is a reasonable proposal that, in doing so, government do, as our government in fact did, a weighing of the balance and the benefit that will be provided in making that decision versus the cost it will have to the local community. While our downtown is to some extent resilient and indeed on an upswing in many respects, which accommodates, I think, a shift like moving the clinical lab hub a little better, I recognize that for a small rural community the loss of a significant service hub, where we have, again, those public-sector workers who indeed – again, I'm glad we are talking about how much we value them and how much they contribute to the economy here today, how important that is, in a much grander sense, to small rural communities.

It is my hope that as we go forward – and indeed we will see a budget coming this fall after the blue-ribbon panel, which is looking for efficiencies and will only be able to find ways to reduce spending, so we recognize that we are going to be having these conversations in this House and that the public sector is indeed going to come up in terms of discussion, in terms of what they are paid and what they earn and what value they add – we will remember this conversation today, in which we all agreed on the value that the public sector brings to our province and recognize that if we launch attacks on the public sector, that will not just affect people here in my constituency of Edmonton-City Centre or just in Edmonton or in Calgary. It will affect workers across this province, who provide great benefit and value to their communities and who indeed clearly voted for members from both parties in this House and are expecting all of us to give due consideration to the value they provide to this province. It is my hope that our conversation at that time will continue in this positive tone.

With that, Madam Speaker, I'll just say thank you again to the Member for Athabasca-Barrhead-Westlock. I was just telling the member that it's in alphabetical order, so it should be easier to remember. I thank him for bringing this motion forward and giving us the opportunity for this discussion today. I look forward to voting in favour.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika.

Mr. Schow: Why, thank you, Madam Speaker, for this opportunity to rise and speak in favour of Motion 502, put forward by my friend and colleague from Athabasca-Barrhead-Westlock. It's also great to see many members in this House rise today in what appears to be bipartisan support of this motion.

I think this motion speaks to unintended consequences. I think that's the point of this: unintended consequences and how we can go about avoiding them. We've heard a lot of comments today about the refugee and citizenship case processing centre out in the Vegreville area and the lack of consultation that was carried out on behalf of the federal government when that office was closed and the drastic effects it had on the community.

I support doing an economic impact study before government offices are closed because, like the member opposite from Edmonton-City Centre said, Alberta's public sector does tremendous work, and their interests must be considered. But so, too, must the interests of rural Alberta be considered. It is the place where I live. I have lived in and visited many places across this province, across this country, and in my completely unbiased opinion rural is where it's at. But I digress.

I want to tell you a little bit about some unintended consequences that I have seen in the past. In the small town of Magrath, a town of about 2,600 constituents in Cardston-Siksika, there was a hospital or, rather, what was once a hospital with an active emergency room, and about a decade or so ago it was closed down. As a result, it has taken a bit of a hit because of the attractiveness of living in a town with an active hospital. Not far to the northeast is Raymond. It has a hospital. The town where I live, Cardston, also has a hospital. The populations of both of those towns are larger, not necessarily directly as a result of the hospital. But, certainly, when the hospital was closed, I was told that there were about 20 nurses who were no longer working in town. As a result, they were not buying local products, and they weren't even using the local golf course.

Further to the south is the town of Del Bonita. Several decades ago there was a school in Del Bonita, and that school was closed. One member in Magrath said that when he graduated, there were about 43 students in his graduating class. Today there is no longer a school there. No one is graduating. They go to Magrath, and the town now has a population of about 651 people.

While I'm talking about education, I just wanted to take a moment to tell you how important it is and what it's done for my life and the importance of great teachers and the effect they've had on me. When I moved to Alberta in my teenage years, I had some of the greatest teachers that a young student could ever ask for: in my English class Mrs. Pilling, in my math class Mr. Noad. Both of those teachers were more than just instructors. Living in a small town, they were friends, they became mentors, and they encouraged me that I could do better in both of those subjects, and they helped me along the path. I am certain that without their help I would not be where I am today, so to them I do want to say thank you.

Unintended consequences are what we are trying to avoid. This government ran on a platform with five major commitments. Repealing the carbon tax: we've gone ahead and we've made serious moves towards that. Hopefully, by the end of the day that is complete.

Standing up for Albertans, which means standing up for this province against what we believe to be a federal government that is not taking our concerns as seriously as we think they should, including getting our products to tidewater.

Getting our fiscal house in order, which means balancing the budget. I would be a terrible legislator if I left this House without making a concerted effort to leave this province better for my kids than I found it, and that means reducing the debt load of this province so that my children are not paying for the mistakes of my predecessors.

Protecting the quality of health care and education. I did address education and its importance in my life. We made a commitment to maintain or increase spending in both of those sectors.

And, of course, job creation. Some unintended consequences of the previous government we have seen are declining investment – 7 per cent in agriculture, 10 per cent in manufacturing, 27 per cent in finance, and 65 per cent in retail and trade – putting us cascading towards a debt of close to $60 billion.

Now, I do not believe in my heart of hearts – and I mean this sincerely – that the members opposite intended to have these negative consequences on our province. I believe they are good-intending legislators and people who want to see what's best for the province. On this side of the House we simply see how to get there as drastically different. But those decisions made by the members across the aisle have put us where we are. Unintended consequences are things that we should be avoiding, which is why I speak in favour of this motion.

Another unintended consequence, if you'd allow me, Madam Speaker, is something that happened to me a couple of years ago. What was introduced was the SodaStream. Some people might know this. It carbonates water. I was giddy – I was absolutely giddy – about the SodaStream. I'll tell you why: because I am addicted to pop. I am. I'm happy to admit it. I'm trying to get off it, but what can I say? The SodaStream, to me, was a great opportunity to cut out the sugar and have the water.

One day I got a little bit gutsy and thought: what if you put juice into the SodaStream, not just water? The fact is that you have to put the syrup in after you've added the carbonation. I got a little gutsy and thought: we'll put some juice in there. My family wasn't around, and I thought that, well, I could get away with this in case the worst-case scenario happens, and the worst-case scenario did in fact happen. The SodaStream blew up, with juice all over myself, all over the floor, and I was left with a sticky mess to clean up, including trying to save the SodaStream.

Madam Speaker, all I wanted was some fizzy grape juice – that's all I wanted – but the reality is that the unintended consequences were a mess all over the floor. I relate that, in fact, to this province. If we do not consider all of the outcomes, all of the factors involved when we are making decisions, be they small, medium, or large, we could end up with a colossal mess. I do believe that we are heading towards that mess, and it is our job as this government to right the ship. But it starts with doing the proper consultation.

With consultation comes transparency. [interjections] I hear whispers across the aisle. They don't like the word "transparency."

Ms Renaud: It's laughter.

Mr. Schow: Well, okay. It was a funny story.

In any event, transparency is something that governments should also adopt and, in doing so, communicate with the local communities what they intend to do. This is something that I don't believe the federal government considered when closing the refugee and citizenship case processing centre, and it's something that is incumbent upon us to do if we're going to make decisions that will affect entire communities.

Now, with regard to Vegreville 280 jobs may not seem like a lot to some, but to the town of Vegreville it is a massive part of the population, jobs that we must protect. These employees who were let go were given an option to take a new position of employment within the city of Edmonton. However, that was an hour and a half away, and many, including single parents, were unable to make that transition in living and bringing their kids to the larger city. They wanted to stay in Vegreville, or they were unable to make that transition.

As we develop policy and as we make decisions that are going to affect both urban and rural parts of the province, we must consider all factors involved, and if we do not, we will find ourselves in a big, sticky mess and we will be deviating from the promise that this government made only months ago, through the campaign, to right the fiscal ship and to protect jobs and the economy in this province.

With that, Madam Speaker, I'll conclude my remarks by saying thank you for this opportunity to speak, and I hope that all members in this Legislature will vote in favour of Motion 502.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I am pleased this afternoon to rise and speak to Motion 502, brought forward by the MLA for Athabasca-Barrhead-Westlock. I do so partly in my role as the critic for Agriculture and Forestry and also partly as a result of my experience growing up, in part, in a small village myself.

I come from Thorhild. Thorhild I've brought up a few times in this House because it was a very formative experience for me living there and spending my summers there. Thorhild is a case in point to provide an example to this House as to what happens when a small rural Alberta population centre loses the threshold population that allows it to be viable. It demonstrates the risk at which many Alberta communities are at and the fear that many people who live in rural Alberta communities have over losing any possible government jobs that they might still be able to have in their community to centralization or for other reasons by decisions made by a provincial government that might in future decide to relocate those jobs and those departments' offices to another location.

Thorhild ended up becoming dissolved. It ended up now being administered by the county of Thorhild, and it lost its independence. It ceased to exist because that threshold population was lost. There were a number of different extenuating circumstances there, but that's what fate many rural municipalities wish to avoid by maintaining the provincial public services that they currently have in their communities.

Now, there's an intense rivalry for public investment in Alberta's small rural communities, and I've witnessed this very, very personally as a young person while my grandmother, Winnifred LaBelle, was a deputy mayor in Thorhild. I know there was an intense rivalry between two communities that were pretty close together, that being Thorhild and Redwater, just a few kilometres to the south. Ultimately, they battled to see who would get the lodge or the hospital. It turned out that Thorhild ended up getting the seniors' lodge and Redwater the hospital, but there was an intense fight between the two communities because they knew the value of having those public servants as employees bringing home stable paycheques to their particular communities. Those two facilities still operate in both those centres right now and are still valued centres of employment in those two smaller communities.

The importance of the public service jobs that the province may provide by having services decentralized in a smaller rural Alberta community is just as important today as they were 50 years ago, when my grandmother was fighting to have the Thorhild lodge or the hospital located in their community.

Historically rural communities have struggled to survive as they end up depopulating and going to larger centres, and it's these public service jobs that allow many of them to hang on and survive and, hopefully, maybe even thrive while they try to attract other investments maybe from the private sector to grow their community and establish more people in that community. But if they don't have these public-sector jobs there to maintain that threshold as there's a transition from one economic activity to another, they may end up suffering the same fate as Thorhild has suffered and end up having to dissolve and become administered by the county.

These provincially funded service centres must have an economic impact assessment done prior to closure if indeed that's being contemplated by the province, so I support the private member's Motion 502, brought forward by the MLA for Athabasca-Barrhead-Westlock, wholeheartedly, in the knowledge that our rural communities fight every day to maintain services for their population, not only by having the public services that are there maintained but also to attract other professionals to the community such as doctors and other health care professionals.

I know, once again, in Thorhild – you're going to hear a lot about Thorhild from me – my grandparents were involved in making sure that a doctor actually stayed in the community because they had one, and the doctor left. Indeed, if they didn't have that doctor there, the community would be losing people because they would choose to move away. I remember going to Clyde just down the road, not too far from Westlock, perhaps even in the MLA for Athabasca-Barrhead-Westlock's constituency, and there was an X-ray machine in Clyde that was available for sale. My grandparents felt that if indeed they could have an X-ray machine in Thorhild, they might be able to attract a doctor, so we actually went and picked it up from a veterinary clinic, an old X-ray machine, that we broke the dolly on getting it moved, and moved it into Thorhild. That actually did help attract a doctor.

People in these communities will do anything they can to maintain their communities and help them survive. One thing we can do to help as a provincial government is make sure the economic impact assessment is done before a decision is made to strip these communities of the public service jobs they so dearly rely on. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: The Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I'll try to keep my comments fairly concise. I know there are other members that wish to speak to this.

I am rising to speak in favour of this motion, as is what sounds like most of, or much of, the Assembly. I just want to point out a couple of different things, Madam Speaker. I do appreciate the member who put this forward as far as taking an economic assessment . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Sorry, hon. member. I hesitate to interrupt after only allowing a short period of time, but under Standing Order 8(3), which provides for up to five minutes for the sponsor of the motion other than a government motion to close debate, I would invite the hon. Member for Athabasca-Barrhead-Westlock to close debate on Motion 502.

Mr. van Dijken: Okay. Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you for the opportunity to speak to private member Motion 502. It has truly been an honour to bring this forward to this Legislative Assembly.

I think what is being recognized here is the importance of these government-funded facilities and the jobs that they provide in small communities and how important it is to recognize and respect – it really is truly all about respecting those communities in any decision-making process going forward. I believe that Motion 502 is about recognizing the need for a fair process before a decision is made. I can't stress that enough. In the case of the immigration processing centre in Vegreville, the community was completely caught off guard and blind-sided by the decision because they had never been notified or even consulted with before the decision was made, so their efforts to try and get the decision reversed were futile at the end of the day.

Having gone through that experience as an MLA and watching as that whole process went through, it spoke a lot to me about the importance of our role here to ensure that our communities are respected and that the proper consultation is done before any decisions to centralize or relocate government-funded service centres, offices, branches are made. We truly need to respect the communities that they're located in and let their voices be heard in a transparent manner.

I appreciate the input from all members, and I also encourage all members to vote in favour of Motion 502. Thank you.

[Motion Other than Government Motion 502 carried]

Consideration of Her Honour the Lieutenant Governor's Speech

Ms Glasgow moved, seconded by Ms Rosin, that an humble address be presented to Her Honour the Honourable the Lieutenant Governor as follows.

To Her Honour the Honourable Lois Mitchell, CM, AOE, LLD, the Lieutenant Governor of the province of Alberta:

We, Her Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Legislative Assembly, now assembled, beg leave to thank Your Honour for the gracious speech Your Honour has been pleased to address to us at the opening of the present session.

[Adjourned debate May 29: Mr. Rutherford]

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster-Wainwright

Mr. Rowswell: Wainwright, yes. Thank you, Madam Speaker. I have the privilege to be elected to this Assembly by the constituents of the newly configured riding of Vermilion-Lloydminster-Wainwright, an amalgam of portions of the former Vermilion-Lloydminster and Battle River-Wainwright ridings. I rise to give my maiden speech, a tradition for a newly elected MLA.

I'm an advocate for tradition. "Tradition is," to quote G.K. Chesterton, "the democracy of the dead." Conservatives believe in the principle of prescription, that is, of things established by immemorial usage. Prescription is the legacy of the dead. Edmund Burke called the principle of prescription the wisdom of our ancestors. He further opined that prescriptive wisdom is something far greater than any man's petty, private rationality. We would do well to reflect on this over the next four years. To those in this Chamber or without who might balk at this sentiment, I would point out that the Assembly is, for very good reason, a bastion of tradition. A consequence of the Assembly observing prescriptive wisdom is that our province is provided with a measure of stability and repose.

Tradition is not convention. It is convention that affords me this opportunity to introduce to the House commentary regarding the riding of Vermilion-Lloydminster-Wainwright, its people, geography, challenges, and opportunities. Vermilion-Lloydminster-Wainwright has a population in excess of 46,000 and covers an area of 10,090 square kilometres. Its three most populated areas are reflected in the riding's title.

The biprovincial city of Lloydminster has the riding's largest population, approximately 31,400. Of that number just over 20,000 live on the Alberta side. Lloydminster is, given the right economic conditions, a thriving city. It has forward-looking, energetic school boards and is home to the Lloydminster Oilfield Technical Society. They host the biannual Lloydminster Heavy Oil Show, the last volunteer-run oil and gas show of its kind in Canada. Its 20th show will take place in 2020. It also has an active Concerned Citizens for Seniors Care Society, which watches out for changes to levels of care for seniors in Lloydminster and de facto the province.

Vermilion and Wainwright have populations of 4,150 and 6,270 respectively. Wainwright is home to a large Canadian Forces training base. The base hosts many multinational military exercises, adding colour to an already vibrant town. The Wainwright stampede is an annual four-day event held in June each year, a tradition since 1953. Vermilion is home to Lakeland College. Lakeland started life as an agricultural college in 1913. A second campus opened in Lloydminster in 1990. The courses now on offer are dazzling and numerous. Lakeland is home to energy, crop, and environmental applied research. It also boasts an energy centre which trains students as power engineers. Demonstrating versatility, it offers courses in interior design and manual trades, plus nursing, early learning and child care, not to mention a firefighter training school. With over 2,000 students, graduation convocations require three separate events conducted over two days.

The remaining one-third of the riding's population live, love, and work predominantly in and around the small rural communities of Edgerton, Kitscoty, Islay, Irma, Dewberry, Clandonald, Marwayne, Paradise Valley, Chauvin, Tulliby Lake, and a small portion of the First Nation reserve at Onion Lake. Each of these have their share of colourful characters and interesting traditions.

As mentioned, Vermilion-Lloydminster-Wainwright was created from portions of two former ridings. Before moving on, I would like to acknowledge the sterling contributions of the two MLAs who represented those former ridings. Both Wes Taylor and Dr. Richard Starke were popular, effective, and energetic MLAs. I now face the unenviable task of trying to fill not just one but two big pairs of boots. These men battled hard to resolve issues for their constituents. Dr. Starke was frequently engaged in matters arising from the biprovincial jurisdiction operating in Lloydminster. In Vermilion the lack of SL 4 places, producing the unhappy situation where elderly married couples can find themselves being separated, was something Richard worked long and hard to resolve. To use a football phrase, he definitely moved the ball down the field. I hope to drive it into the end zone. Through my initial investigation, that may be many plays from now.

Wes Taylor assisted Irma school to obtain a significant new build, which included a gymnasium and kitchen facility. Together these can combine to provide a much-needed community hall facility for use by the school and the wider community. By contrast, his efforts to secure replacement of the existing Wainwright hospital, like the SL 4 accommodation problem in Vermilion, continues with me.

Although earlier I described the challenges set by these two men as unenviable, I truly welcome it. I am grateful to those who have put me in this position I am in today.

Accordingly, I would like to thank everyone who voted in the recent election. I'm an MLA for all constituents, not just those that voted UCP. I welcome feedback from all constituents. I truly believe we make better policy by discussing issues widely.

Having dealt with convention, I would like to return to the theme of tradition. On April 16 25,161 Vermilion-Lloydminster-Wainwright constituents exercised their vote. My party received 79 per cent of that vote. The turnout was 76.2 per cent. It was the second-highest percentage in the province. This number reflects the desire of a rural population for change, a population whose chief economic drivers are the agriculture and energy sectors and whose cultural bedrock is their family, their community, and often their place of worship. My party offered that change, and we are steadfast in our desire to deliver it, not only economically but politically and culturally.

However, "change" is not the term I would choose to use to describe what Albertans are seeking. In the throne speech the word used was "renewal." I cheerfully adopt renewal in support of my theme. My constituents yearn for renewal of traditional values. They are tired of shifting, zeitgeist-generated, relative values that Edmund Burke long ago recognized as "floating fancies or fashions." Having campaigned and consulted in the riding for two years, I am confident that the majority of constituents agree with me that conservative values are traditional values. Conservative values are simply common sense. They are derived from common experiences. They're longitudinally evidence based.

So what are the attitudes and behaviours I've encountered that reflect these values? Let's begin with the belief in the rule of law and the scourge of rural crime. For Nathan Saunders, owner of Saunders Repair Service in Marwayne, having your house entered illegally, your workshop broken into twice, four private trucks and five customer trucks stolen, plus untold vandalism, this scourge is a ghastly reality. Yet despite being let down by the system, Nathan continues to believe in the rule of law and operates his business to the best of his ability. He has confidence that once the economy improves and the forces of law and order are once again given the tools to do the job, order will be restored.

Talking of economy and free trade, let me tell you about Leonard Lage, who owns a gas station in Kitscoty. Kitscoty is 23 kilometres west of Lloydminster. As Saskatchewan did not impose a carbon tax, gas station owners in the biprovincial city of Lloydminster received an exemption from it to protect them. Mr. Lage, 10 minutes away, received no exemption. This unequal playing field has all but put him out of business. Is Mr. Lage defeated? No. He battles on for now, this dreadful experience only cementing his conservative belief in free trade. He currently keeps his business afloat using his savings, and he himself is buoyed by the moral and emotional support of his extended family. Luckily for Mr. Lage, he has a strong, united family.

We conservatives promote the functioning of strong families. Families come in many sizes and shapes. Some families have children with special needs and often find their children barred from the natural pathways of education and work. This exclusion can undermine a family unit. In Lloydminster the group Inclusion Alberta exists to achieve as natural a pathway as possible into education and employment for young people.

One successful example of this is that of Shauna Clennin and her daughters Courtney and Kelsey. I initially connected Shauna with Inclusion Alberta when Shauna told me that her girls were being taught outside the mainstream in modified classrooms. With the help of Inclusion staff and the co-operation of school staff, Shauna continues to ensure Courtney and Kelsey are included in the mainstream classes and afforded real employment opportunities. Both Courtney and Kelsey have blossomed under this approach. Courtney now has a driver's licence and part-time work, and Kelsey is applying for her licence and is also employed. This demonstrates that a positive approach helps potentially disadvantaged people become confident, accepted, and self-reliant.

Self-reliance and keeping the fruits of one's labour is another conservative value alive and well in this riding. In 2008 the county of Vermilion River won the Alberta emerald award for developing an environmentally friendly and profitable use for well methane gas emissions. Reeve Dale Swyripa explained to me that methane emissions released when oil is extracted are restricted. This causes reduced oil production. But by designing a method of capturing the emissions, not only is the oil production increased, but the captured methane is now available to supply county of Vermilion River homes, businesses, and maintenance vehicles. Conserving the environment, reducing taxpayer burden, and helping the energy industry is a trio of triumphs.

Finally, I turn to my own areas of interest and concern. I have a natural conservative antipathy toward statism and its stultifying offspring, red tape and bureaucracy. For the immediate I want to help constituents who find navigating existing systems difficult. My constituency door will always be open wide to assist you. Long term we need to reform Byzantine bureaucracy and, additionally, should actively seek to reduce it. I'm delighted that this aim is the raison d'être of the UCP's Bill 2, the open for business act.

Fiscal prudence is my watchword. As a retired financial adviser I'm imbued with the desire to get value from every investment made and to guard zealously my clients' and now my constituents' money. Further, I believe that all proposed state activity must undergo a cost-benefit analysis and be subject to a priority review.

Finally, with regard to what was couched as climate change leadership, I am pleased that the carbon tax has been scrapped. In addition, I very much appreciate that there is to be an energy war room aimed at countering Canadian environmental groups. These groups take money from overseas foundations, with a covert aim of economically sabotaging Alberta. I expect Galileo would have appreciated the aid of a heliocentric war room back in the 17th century, when the consensus was against him.

Although I have spoken at length about tradition and conservative values, let me be clear on one point. Conservatism is not a force for resistance to change. I heard a quote recently which aptly describes the modern conservative view: conservatives are progressives who drive the speed limit. For my constituents and, I dare say, the vast majority of Albertans, nonconservative progressives drive too fast. They often careen off the road and take down fences.

I began my address with a quote from G.K. Chesterton; I would like to end with another. Chesterton advised, "Don't ever take a fence down until you know the reason... it was put up." We sit here in the summer-of-repeal session, attempting to replace a number of taken-down fences. Overwhelmingly, that is what my constituents voted for me to do. In addition, they'd like to see many fences refurbished and all fences properly maintained. I am grateful to them for giving me the opportunity to restore fences and mend many others. I am grateful my party exists as fence makers and promoters of the wisdom of our ancestors.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Comments or questions under 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'd like to thank the Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster-Wainwright for his remarks in response to the throne speech. I'm hoping that the member would be able to comment a little bit on the responses he got from constituents at the doors during the campaign regarding some of the pledges that we made in our robust policy document. Further to that, if he could maybe comment on some of the responses he's getting now that we have begun to take action as a government and now that we are making promises and we are keeping promises. So if the member could elaborate a little more on what he heard at the doors during the campaign, and if he could tell us a little more about what he's hearing now that we are keeping our promises.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster-Wainwright.

Mr. Rowswell: Yeah. The three main things that I ran on were working toward a balanced budget, deregulating as much as possible, and fighting back against the war on fossil fuels. The main thing that I heard was – Lloydminster is mostly an oil town, and a lot of the rural towns are impacted by carbon taxes. Carbon taxes were a big deal. People wanted to get rid of the carbon tax. I heard it everywhere I went.

Regulations were interesting. I mentioned the Lloydminster Heavy Oil Show. They had it during the nomination process. I went booth to booth at the trade show and asked them if they felt that they were overregulated. To my surprise, they said: not really. The ones that really liked it were the ones that sold safety equipment. They thought it was really good. I told the organizer that that's what I had heard, and he said: I'll find you lots of people that don't like the regulations that we have to deal with.

Then I went to the Oilfield Technical Society's meeting – they have one the first Monday of every month – and what I discovered was that it's not that they thought that they weren't overregulated; it's just that they were resigned. They felt there was no way that you can reduce regulation: "Once it's there, it'll never go away. It will just always be with us, so we've just got to learn to live with it." But then I asked: "Well, then, doesn't that cost you a lot of money? Doesn't that make you noncompetitive?" He said, "Yeah, and I have friends that have left and gone to Texas because of the carbon taxes, the regulation." They just found other jurisdictions that were easier to deal with, and they were waiting to see what happened in the election because that was going to be a decision that they were going to have to make.

After the election I've had comments. People in my constituency on average are very happy that the carbon tax is gone. They were happy for the open-for-business thing. I mentioned that I was out grocery shopping on Saturday, and the manager of the local Co-op store commented that he's really happy with the direction that we're going. You know, we ran on things, we got voted in, we're implementing them, and they're happy that we're doing it. That's what I've run into. So it's been a real positive experience, in my mind.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: A minute left under 29(2)(a). The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. You know, the hon. member has a lot of great things to say. My understanding is that he is in a new constituency, with new boundaries. Of course, with that comes new challenges. Vermilion-Lloydminster-Wainwright certainly is a very large area within Alberta, and I was wondering if maybe he can touch on some of the challenges that he faces as an MLA, especially a new MLA, in ensuring that he is responsive to all his constituents and, in talking about the diversity within that constituency, ensuring that he is providing the adequate amount of service as an MLA for the people in that area.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster-Wainwright.

Mr. Rowswell: Thank you, and thank you for the question. What I've been trying to do is identify the different industry groups. For example . . . [A timer sounded] Do I quit?

The Deputy Speaker: Sorry, hon. member. You're out of time.

Are there any members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Calgary-Cross.

Mr. Amery: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. Let me continue the ongoing tradition, albeit a little later than some, of congratulating you on being elected to the position of Deputy Speaker. Let me also take this opportunity, through you, to congratulate all of the members of this honourable Assembly on their recent election success. I truly look forward to having many positive debates about the issues that Albertans face in the coming years with each and every member in this House.

Madam Speaker, today is the first opportunity for me to rise before this Assembly and second the Speech from the Throne. It is a real honour to stand before you this afternoon because I join a government that has the vision, the plan, and the clearest mandate in recent history to take Alberta to unprecedented levels in the coming years.

First and foremost, it is with the sincerest gratitude that I thank the residents of Calgary-Cross for placing their faith in this government and for electing me to my first term as a Member of the Legislative Assembly for the 30th session. As I mentioned during my campaign many times, this seat belongs only to those residents, and I am committed and devoted to bringing their concerns to this government over the next four years. I'd like to take this opportunity as well to thank my extended family, my parents, my wife, my children, and the many supporters who worked tirelessly and who exhibited an incredible level of patience with me during this past campaign.

Madam Speaker, let me begin by telling you a little bit about the Calgary-Cross constituency. Calgary-Cross consists of the communities of Marlborough, Marlborough Park, Rundle, Pineridge, and Monterey Park, and it is located in the northeast quadrant of Calgary, that more than 50,000 people call home. It is, without a doubt in my mind, one of the most diverse constituencies in the province both religiously and ethnically and has one of the largest immigrant populations of any riding in the province.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, more than half of the Calgary-Cross constituency identifies with a visible minority group. I am tremendously proud to be the elected representative of this constituency, and I would encourage every member to visit Calgary-Cross, where the food is as unique as it is phenomenal and the people are warm, hard working, and generous.

Mr. Speaker, it is truly hard to imagine what my parents envisioned when they immigrated to Canada from Lebanon, a very small country in the Middle East, in the 1970s. Along with millions of other newcomers, my parents mustered up the courage to pick up and leave the only country that they ever knew, the only language they knew, the only political system they knew, the only society they knew to move to a country which seemed to be worlds away. They did it for one simple reason. They knew they wanted to seek a better life for themselves and for their children.

As clichéd as the story goes, Mr. Speaker, with almost no money and no idea of what to expect, they embarked upon a move to Canada and settled first in Edmonton, Alberta, where they worked hard. They ultimately moved to Calgary, where they raised five children in east Calgary, that we called home. It is no secret to most people in this Assembly as to where this story goes from here. Like all newcomers, through hard work and perseverance my parents made Alberta their home. As many of you know, I am very, very proud to tell you and the rest of the members of this Assembly, through you, that my father sat in this very Chamber for more than 22 years, where he was part of a team that helped Alberta become the economic envy of North America and, in fact, the entire world.

Calgary-Cross is by geographical accounts a small constituency, but it is a great constituency. We have had the honour and the privilege of being represented by many great MLAs. I am both honoured and privileged to be the MLA for the communities which were once served by my father, MLA Amery Sr., and the late Minister Bhullar, whose memory and legacy remains strong and whose tragic and untimely death was a terrible loss for our province. The late Minister Bhullar was a dear friend to me. We travelled together, we went to university together, and we worked on various political campaigns together. He is dearly missed by all of us. I have no doubt in my mind that I have tremendous shoes to fill, but I also have no doubt in my mind that I have the best political adviser in this province.

Mr. Speaker, because of the hard work of my parents and the advantages that this province gave to us, I was able to attend university, where after many years I graduated with a law degree in 2010, and I opened up a small law office in east Calgary. It is also because of my upbringing, my work in the community, and my involvement that I became motivated to run in the Calgary-Cross constituency.

In recent years, Mr. Speaker, I saw the economic prosperity of this province declining. Our small office started to see fewer real estate transactions, fewer new business start-ups, and fewer commercial transactions and, instead, more family issues, more foreclosures, more bankruptcies, and more disputes between neighbours. We began to see less of the work that signalled economic prosperity and more of the types of work that indicated a troubling decline in productivity. It is also because of these remarkable changes that I observed in my own work that I started to look for answers. I found those answers in the policies of this current government. During the election this government made a promise to Alberta to get them back to work, and I am proud to report that within a few weeks this government has introduced four bills which are designed to energize our economy and simply get Albertans back to work.

The first of those, the carbon tax repeal act, was a core promise during the campaign and the first bill introduced before this Assembly. If passed, it will remove a debilitating consumption tax which has targeted families and businesses alike indiscriminately without addressing the very environmental concerns that it was purported to do. It was, in my view, the single greatest concern for Albertans as I campaigned from door to door.

The next bill, the open for business act, Mr. Speaker, is one that I am truly proud to support and advocate for because this bill will alleviate some of the greatest challenges that the job creators of this province have been struggling with since changes were made by the previous government. I campaigned on the promise that our government would foster and support economic initiatives, and I am fully in support of this bill and the changes it will provide if it is enacted into law. The vast majority of Albertans either operate a business or work for one, and as a government it is simply incumbent upon us to do everything within our power to ensure their success.

Next, Bill 3, the job-creation tax cut. Again, Mr. Speaker, we campaigned on one simple philosophy, that our role as government would be to support and promote those who employed Albertans. Recently the hon. Minister of Culture, Multiculturalism and Status of Women said that Alberta was once the gold standard of economic development in this country, and I genuinely believe that with this bill it will once again make Alberta the gold standard for investment, both foreign and domestic.

Finally, the Red Tape Reduction Act, Bill 4, was our government's promise to encourage Albertans to invest in this province, to take risks, and to make choices for economic success without worrying about bureaucratic barriers, delays, and costs. With this bill we will send a message to all Albertans that this government is ready to embrace and encourage their ideas without burdening them with unnecessary challenges.

Many of the stories that you've heard from my colleagues in their own maiden speeches are not unique. Albertans across the province were universally concerned about the previous government's policies. It was obvious that Albertans were struggling. They were concerned about the reports of unprecedented job losses and the unemployment rates that we were all witnessing, they were concerned about uncontrollable spending and the ballooning provincial debt, they were concerned about the assault on our natural resource industry, and they were concerned about the former policies which were designed to create barriers, not support, for Albertans looking to raise a family or start a business.

And so I say to the business owner in Marlborough who told me at his door that he was struggling to keep his small trucking business afloat: help is on the way. And to the woman in Monterey Park, who took my wife and I in during the storm that we had during the campaign and told us how she had lost her job more than a year and a half ago in the oil industry: help is on the way. And to the thousands of Calgary-Cross residents and the millions of Albertans who have struggled to find work to pay their bills, to keep a roof over their heads, and to keep their businesses afloat: help is on the way.

On April 16, 2019, Mr. Speaker, Albertans spoke loud and clear. They gave us an unprecedented mandate for the next four years, and in less than one month in this Assembly we have introduced four bills that were designed to do exactly what we said we would do. Promises made, promises kept.

Thank you very much.

The Acting Speaker: Under section 29(2)(a), I see the hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Mr. Ellis: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. You know, there are a lot of firsts in this Assembly, and we've talked previously about having two brothers that are a part of this Assembly for the first time, I believe, in Alberta's history. One thing is very unique not only just for myself but for also the hon. Member for Calgary-Hays, that both he and I sat in the same caucus as the previous member's father. I will say that I'm very honoured to have sat with the Member for Calgary-Cross's father. He is correct that this is a man who has had 22 years of experience. He is very wise. I saw him only a few days ago, and he's still wheeling and dealing as if he's a current member of this Legislature. I can tell you that right now.

You know, it's really an honour to be in this Assembly, to be a part of, in his case, a family tradition, one that I'm sure we can only hope goes on for years and years to come. I know that every time I see his father, his father is very proud, beaming with smiles across his face with what his son has accomplished. In my short time of getting to know the hon. Member for Calgary-Cross, I have certainly been impressed with what he has done and what he hopes to do for the people of Calgary-Cross.

I myself, as many of you know, policed in the city of Calgary. Please, hon. Member for Calgary-Cross, I believe you have an area which is called 17th Avenue S.E. in your constituency or close by? Real close by, right? That 17th Avenue, which I know many people from Calgary-Cross would attend on a regular basis, is quite commonly known as International Avenue in Calgary. It speaks to the diversity of not only the area but the area within Calgary-Cross which the member has touched upon, just the cultural diversity, people that are new immigrants, people that are like his father, who came 20-, 30-plus years ago, second-, third-generation folks that are from the area, that live in the area.

I think it's important, and I'd like to ask this member if he could just continue to talk about the diversity within his riding and, in fact, within that whole area of Calgary, because I think it is not unique to Alberta in a sense that we are all very diverse. But that area in particular: they were hit very hard with the downturn in the economy, with some of the unexpected challenges that the people were facing in that area. Maybe he can expand upon the cultural diversity and the challenges that those people have experienced and talk a little bit about the hope that he being elected in the Legislature will bring.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Cross.

Mr. Amery: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the Member for Calgary-West for that summarization and the question. I think that the Calgary-Cross constituency does in fact represent one of the most diverse constituencies in the province. Certainly, the challenges that we face are not unlike those that are faced by other constituencies in Calgary. We have a primary concern with making sure that our economy improves. We have a primary concern with ensuring that people maintain their businesses. We have a concern that people keep their jobs. That's very, very important to all residents of Calgary-Cross.

I think that one of the strengths of our riding is that cultural diversity. Calgary-Cross presents an incredible mixture of different religions, different ethnicities, different languages, and certainly I am tremendously proud to be able to find, you know, every type of cuisine in the area, every type of cultural event. It's an incredibly diverse area, and I couldn't be prouder to represent that constituency. Certainly, that is not a weakness but our strength. Calgary-Cross has the unique . . . [The time limit for questions and comments expired]

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

4:30

The Acting Speaker: Thank you.

Any other members looking to speak? I believe I see the hon. Member for Grande Prairie standing.

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my pleasure to rise in this Assembly today as the Member for Grande Prairie. It was an honour to attend the reading of the Speech from the Throne on May 22 by Her Honour the Lieutenant Governor.

I would like to extend my congratulations to you, Deputy Chair of Committees, to the Speaker, and the Deputy Speaker and Chair of Committees on being elected by your peers to preside over this, the 30th Legislature of Alberta.

Mr. Speaker, as a new MLA I have found these last few weeks to be both exciting and challenging, and I have greatly appreciated all of the Legislative Assembly Office staff for being so patient, professional, and helpful in my orientation to this new role.

I would also like to congratulate the new Clerk on her appointment as the ninth Clerk of the Legislative Assembly of Alberta.

It is a great honour for me to stand here today and represent the constituents of Grande Prairie, and I would like to take this opportunity to thank them sincerely for trusting me with this role. In my many months of knocking on the doors of my constituents, I was privileged to hear their concerns. I heard over and over again the need for jobs, the concern over Alberta's future, about health care wait times, pipelines and the lack thereof, increasing costs of living, and the worry about our province's economic uncertainty.

I was humbled to hear stories from people at their doors and often surprised by the willingness of people to share from the heart in deeply personal ways. Stories of the recent death of a loved one, the challenges of an abusive relationship, concern about completing a trade certification, concern about having a job in the future, the suicide of a child just the night prior, the concern over rising housing costs, and the defeat experienced within the cycle of addiction, to name a few of the more emotional disclosures I witnessed. I was humbled to be entrusted with these deeply personal and often painful stories, and it shifted my perspective on the task of door-knocking from a campaign job to an honour and a privilege. I quickly realized that my role was to listen more and talk less, and I was happy to do so. I found that people were incredibly moved to know that I was doing just that.

There are two local issues that were voiced repeatedly in Grande Prairie. The first is the Grande Prairie regional hospital build, which has been fraught with delays and cost overruns for years. The second is the twinning of highway 40. Highway 40 is a major route of transportation and development for our energy sector. These two projects are important not only to my constituency but also to the province as they provide opportunity for economic development, expansion of service to Albertans, improved safety on our highways, restoration of confidence in Alberta's economy, and critical learning as we endeavour to reduce regulatory burden and red tape by at least one-third over the next four years.

We have a responsibility to Albertans to manage the finances prudently while continuing to make critical investment decisions to renew the Alberta advantage and to restore our province to economic stability once again. I am confident in this government to lead well, and I would like to congratulate the members of Executive Council on the critical work you have commenced in the last few weeks. I am excited to work in support of Premier Kenney and cabinet to truly make life better for all Albertans.

Some Hon. Members: Name.

Mrs. Allard: Oh. Sorry about that. The Premier.

As I stand here today, I want to thank my family, without whom this privilege of representing Grande Prairie would not have been gained. My husband, Serge, and our three children, Nicolas, Alexander, and Isabelle, have been behind my efforts from the beginning, and I'm so grateful to them for their patience, love, and support throughout this process.

I am tremendously blessed and humbled to have had so many wonderful people who worked tirelessly to assist me in becoming their voice in the Alberta Legislature, and I would like to express my sincere gratitude to each one who helped me get here. I stand before you today as the first woman to represent Grande Prairie in the Legislative Assembly in our province's history, and I am humbled by this distinction.

Grande Prairie is known as the Swan City because of the beautiful trumpeter swans that migrate and nest there. It is a young and vibrant city with a diversified economy, which provides many opportunities for investment and employment. The city has established industry in forestry, oil and gas, agriculture, construction, and all of the service industry supports for these key pillars of our economy.

As a young entrepreneur and job creator I came to Grande Prairie in 1997, and I count myself fortunate to have made the city my home. I have never looked back. What I experienced was, I believe, representative of Alberta, a city at work with a can-do spirit and a welcoming environment that celebrated my family's investment and rewarded our hard work.

Until 2015 I had never aspired to hold public office, but I became deeply concerned about our province and the future opportunities for Albertans if we didn't address the slumping economy, ballooning debt, and regulatory burden that further hampered economic growth. My hope for our province is to renew Alberta as the economic engine for Canada and a land of opportunity for our future generations. I believe we have a responsibility to steward our province's resources and to leave this land in a better position than when we found it. I want the opportunities that I enjoyed as a young entrepreneur to be available for future generations of Albertans, including my own children.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to stand in this Assembly today as a member of this government caucus with the confidence that this dedicated team, under the leadership of our Premier, will renew the Alberta advantage and work tirelessly on behalf of all Albertans to restore the province to a land of opportunity for our future. I am committed to working with my colleagues to further this vision and support Alberta's energy sector and the building of new pipelines. I believe that Albertans are some of the hardest working, most innovative and creative people in the world, and when we unleash our collective potential is when we will return to long-term prosperity.

The city of Grande Prairie was one of Canada's fastest growing cities between 2001 and 2006. The city population is currently projected to double over the next 20 years. When I moved there in 1997, there were approximately 25,000, and today we have almost 75,000, so the city continues to grow rapidly. This growth creates tremendous opportunity for the city. One exciting development at present is the transition of the Grande Prairie Regional College to become a university. I am very supportive of this change and support increased local postsecondary opportunities from university programs to trades and technical training to allow our city's students to pursue a variety of higher education options at home.

With rapid growth also comes challenge. Sadly, Grande Prairie was named Canada's most dangerous city in both 2015 and 2016. While I am grateful for the strides made since 2016, I am concerned about this phenomenon, and I'm committed to work to further improve and to hopefully make Grande Prairie one of Canada's safest cities in the future. To quote a hero of mine, Anne Frank, "how wonderful it is that nobody need wait a single moment before starting to improve the world." It is because of my concern over this issue, shared by my constituents, and fuelled by the inspiration of Ms Frank that I have agreed to serve as vice-chair on a rural committee under the leadership of the hon. Minister of Justice as the chair and in co-operation with the Member for Highwood as the co vice-chair.

Grande Prairie leads Alberta in entrepreneurial upstarts per capita and contributes a great deal to Alberta's overall wealth. I believe that entrepreneurs are the economic engine of our local economy, and I'm very proud of my city's leadership position in entrepreneurialism. The city is a tremendous community that offers a high quality of life and many opportunities for citizens to get involved.

One characteristic that has always stood out to me in Grande Prairie is the generosity of the people there. I have watched with a great sense of pride repeatedly as our community has rallied behind important causes such as Big Hearts for Big Kids. This initiative, under the vision and leadership of Grande Prairie's very own Tenille Townes, has raised over $1.5 million over the last nine years in support of Sunrise House, which is the northernmost youth emergency shelter in the province. I am so proud to call Tenille a friend and to have supported her vision for the care and support of vulnerable youth in the city of Grande Prairie.

I would also like to congratulate this daughter of our city on her dedication and tireless work as a singer-songwriter and on her recent accomplishments internationally as an artist in being named on the verge by iHeartCountry and for being nominated by CMT for the breakthrough video of the year for her song Somebody's Daughter, which, true to Tenille's passion, illuminates the reality that everyone has a story, and even the person on the corner holding a cardboard sign is, in fact, somebody's daughter.

The city of Grande Prairie is fortunate also to be home to the largest all-boys choir in North America. Under the exceptional instruction of conductor Jeannie Vanwynsberghe Pernal the choir has been awarded first place multiple times provincially and twice nationally. Conductor and founder Ms Pernal has a vision to provide exceptional choral training for boys and young men while also teaching them to live with three core values: camaraderie, mentorship, and service. Grande Prairie has been incredibly fortunate over the last 18 years to watch the Grande Prairie Boys' Choir form, grow, and excel to the national and international level. I would like to thank Ms Pernal and her family for their dedication to our community and the significant contribution to the arts and the development of fine young citizens in the city of Grande Prairie.

At this time I would like to thank those who have gone before me from my area as representatives in this House. Even though my riding is new, my predecessors represented it well, most recently Mr. Wayne Drysdale, who served from 2008 to 2019, and the hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley, who serves in this present caucus also. Their contributions and the contributions of those members before them have had a tremendous influence on the quality of life in the region, and I hope to continue building on their legacy.

I will take a moment now to mention a new friend and mentor, Mr. Marvin Moore from DeBolt, Alberta. DeBolt, Alberta, is just 45 minutes from my door. Mr. Moore was first elected under Premier Lougheed, and he served in this Assembly from 1971 to 1989. Mr. Moore then returned years later to support Ralph Klein in his bid for the party leadership and continued to serve as an adviser and campaign manager for four provincial campaigns for Premier Klein. Mr. Moore, along with his wife Fran, has served the people of Alberta faithfully, and I would like to recognize them in this Assembly for their tremendous contribution to our province and thank them for the time they have invested in the greater good of Alberta and in me personally as a newly elected member. I can't express my gratitude adequately for the kindness and support they have shown me these last months.

I suspect I may be the member who has written the most drafts of my maiden speech, and I've certainly thought and overthought about what to include. I believe this task has deepened my sense of purpose and responsibility to serve as a member in this House and underscore the honour of being included in such a select and distinguished group of so few Albertans to join this Assembly.

When I first decided, with much contemplation and trepidation, to take the leap in to this unfamiliar world of politics, I really had no idea the extent to which my life would change, and my grit and determination would be challenged. My utopian ideals of democracy were challenged repeatedly, and I took great comfort in the words of Winston Churchill. "Indeed it has been said that democracy is the worst form of Government except for all those other forms that have been tried from time to time."

I will close with this. In the words of Theodore Roosevelt, from 1910:

It is not the critic who counts; not the man who points out how the strong man stumbles, or where the doer of deeds could have done them better. The credit belongs to the man who is actually in the arena, whose face is marred by dust and sweat and blood; who strives valiantly; who errs, and comes [up] short again and again, because there is no effort without error and shortcoming; but who does actually strive to do the deeds; who knows the great enthusiasms, the great devotions; who spends himself in a worthy cause; who at the best knows in the end the triumph of high achievement, and who at the worst, if he fails, at least [he] fails while daring greatly, so that his place shall never be with those cold and timid souls who know neither victory nor defeat.

I want to congratulate all members of this House for daring greatly to step forward and put themselves in this arena. I wish each one success in their role and hope that the 30th Legislature will be historic in improving life for all Albertans. I understand the tradition of my predecessors was to be brief, and it seems I have continued in that tradition.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Under 29(2)(a), I see the hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley standing.

Mr. Loewen: Yes. Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure to listen to the Member for Grande Prairie give her maiden speech today as she's now representing part of the area that I previously represented. I'm actually quite honoured that she has the position she does, and I know that she's going to do such a fantastic job representing those constituents.

As I think about Grande Prairie now, of course, we had the economic slowdown, and fortunately Grande Prairie didn't have quite as bad a slowdown as other parts of Alberta. I just want to see if the member would maybe talk a little bit about some of the companies that have helped Grande Prairie through these hard times, like maybe G Seven Generations and some of those companies, maybe just take a few minutes to talk about that. I know there's presently a fair amount of construction going on in Grande Prairie, and I know some of the businesses there – I think, probably, that entrepreneurial spirit from the Peace Country is there, where people are willing to take risks and take chances even when things are a little bit slow.

I know there's a big Canadian Tire that's, I think, just finished and opened just recently there, and I think the largest Ford dealership in all of Canada has just been built there, too. So there are a lot of different things going on there. When things have been slow, I think the people of Grande Prairie have really come together and really done a great job as far as trying to keep the economy going there and keep the people working and that sort of thing. I'm just wondering if the member would just maybe continue a little bit along those lines.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie.

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yeah, it's my pleasure to talk about those things. The Ford dealership – I believe you're correct – is the largest in Canada, and the Canadian Tire is the largest single floor in Canada. There's a larger one in Edmonton, but it's on two floors.

I guess the broader question is really about the entrepreneurial spirit in our riding and in our city, and I would say that that's one of the things that not only drew us to Grande Prairie but has kept us there, the drive and the can-do attitude of the people. There's a visionary perspective that looks past today or the challenges and finds ways around it. I really appreciate that, both as a private citizen and as an investor in the community there as well. I've been very blessed to live there. The community has been very good to us, and I really appreciate companies like G Seven Generations, that was mentioned, that see past an economic downturn to the future of our province and the future economic activity that we will one day experience, hopefully one day very soon.

I'm also very proud to talk about other companies that are looking right now. I won't name names, but there's other significant investment coming to the region. It's my personal belief that Grande Prairie and area lead the province in economic upstarts, and as an engine for the province in terms of future investment and economic development, I think we'll be the place to watch.

Thank you so much for the question. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Any others? I see the hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Mr. Ellis: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. First of all, I want to take a moment to congratulate the Member for Grande Prairie. I can tell that she put a lot of heart and effort into that speech, and certainly it paid off. I'm very proud of what she has said and proud to get to know her over the last, you know, short period of time.

During her speech she touched on the fact, you know, of course, that she is from Grande Prairie. I was fortunate, not unlike a few colleagues of mine who were able to work with a former Member for Grande Prairie-Wapiti, Mr. Wayne Drysdale – it's interesting that I'm able to say his name now in this Chamber as he's no longer a member of this Legislature. He was a wonderful representative of that region. He was somebody who many of us in our caucus, whether the UCP caucus or when I was part of the PC caucus along with my colleague from Calgary-Hays, certainly considered a friend. I learned a lot from him as to some of the challenges that Grande Prairie was facing over the last several years.

The member had indicated and only touched briefly on rural crime, and rural crime is a problem, not just in other parts of Alberta but especially in places like Grande Prairie. As somebody who sat in on that meeting, the initial inaugural meeting of this rural crime committee, which was started by my friend from Calgary-Elbow, the hon. Justice minister, I could tell how passionate she was, how excited she was to be a part of this, looking at actual actionable items that she can bring to the table in order to help solve this crisis which is facing people in Alberta.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you.

Do I see any other members wishing to speak?

Mrs. Sawhney: Mr. Speaker, it's a pleasure today to rise in this House to speak and to deliver my maiden speech. I would like to start with a quote: dreams take time, patience, sustained effort, a willingness to fail if they are ever to be anything more than dreams. I found this quote on a tiny little card in a Hallmark shop many years ago, decades ago. It deeply resonated with me as I reflected on the qualities required to effect change and achieve important milestones. I kept this little card on my desk at work, right by my computer, even as I changed jobs over the years, and it was a daily reminder of the things that I wanted to accomplish. This quote was a confirmation that I'm indeed a dreamer, and to be a dreamer is not to be whimsical or fanciful; it's to chase after the outcomes that you believe in, the positive outcomes that create positive experiences for others.

Like many Albertans, I'm a daughter of immigrants. My parents came to Canada in the late '60s and ultimately settled in Calgary in the northeast community of Rundle. My father, Harpal Singh, is an educated man, a teacher. But with only $8 in his pocket when he arrived in Canada with a young family, he was too overwhelmed trying to earn a living to think of upgrading, his dream of being a teacher lost to the harsh, practical realities of life. My mother, Harcharan Kaur, came equipped with the equivalent of a grade 10 education and a whole lot of attitude. This combination of parents created a household that was strong in expectations and aspirations. In order to provide for my brothers and I, my dad worked at CPR, and my mom worked in various low-paying jobs until she decided that enough was enough. She enrolled in a maintenance course, completed it with flying colours, and landed her dream job, a solid, good-paying job with benefits in public works with the government of Alberta.

Now, since I've been elected, a number of people have asked me if I've ever been to the McDougall Centre in Calgary, and I tell them: many, many, many times over the years. You see, the solid, good-paying job that my mom landed was as a worker in the housekeeping department at the McDougall Centre. She kept that place spic and span for 18 years, and I'm so very proud of her service. She worked the noon to 9 p.m. shift in the evening. It's a tough shift for a working mom with three kids. I was in university during some of that time, and occasionally on my way back from evening classes, taking the C-Train, I would drop by and go see her so that we could take the train home together.

During those times she would often introduce me to visiting dignitaries, staff, politicians, MLAs, ministers, and she would say with great pride that her daughter was a student at the university. Then she would ask them to keep me in mind for a job because I was graduating soon. She would say to me: if you're lucky and if you work hard, you can get a job at the land titles office. Well, Mom, I never did get that job at the land titles office, but how do you like my job now? Dreams can take you places you never thought that you would go.

My mother's story is compelling. I always tell my children that it's important to understand where you come from in order to understand where you want to go. The unknown path laid before you is always better navigated by reflecting on the travelled trails behind you because, ultimately, opportunities are hard earned by others before you, such as my opportunity to go to university, one that my mother never had. Opportunities that are squandered are a tragedy of immeasurable magnitude.

Mr. Speaker, I'm from the Sikh faith, and my parents and I often speak in Punjabi. Like so many Calgarians of all walks of life, I say with great pride that I'm a northeast Calgary girl. It's where I spent 40 years of my life, first in the constituency of Calgary-Cross and then in Calgary-McCall. As a high school student I took the bus to James Fowler, a long bus ride that many students are still experiencing today. I made lifelong friendships on that bus ride. Some of those individuals were key strategists in my campaign because they know what these communities need.

I then went to the University of Calgary, met my wonderful husband, Gurpreet, and together we started our careers in the oil and gas industry. We bought our first home in the community of Whitehorn. As our family expanded over the years, all four of my children – Raman, Saiva, Nishan, and Avani – were born in the Peter Lougheed hospital. We immersed ourselves in family, work, and volunteerism. One of the highlights of our time living in Castleridge was when Gurpreet and I coached basketball. We are still very proud of our PSA bantam girls basketball team, who astounded their competitors with their tough play in winning cities and provincials in basketball over a decade ago.

I have the extraordinary privilege of representing the constituents from Calgary-North East, and my gratitude for their support knows no bounds. Being their MLA is an honour I take seriously every day.

Calgary-North East is a new electoral district. On the eastern end we have the communities of Cityscape, Redstone, Skyview, and Cornerstone, and to the north we have Livingston. These are all new communities that are experiencing rapid growth but still waiting for much-needed infrastructure to catch up. Now that the weather is getting warmer, you'll start seeing more and more seniors' groups meeting in the parks, outdoor festivals, and dancing get-togethers by women's groups in these communities. The busy boys will be planning their barbecue schedule while giving a helping hand to their neighbours. Dazzling, colourful, with the tempting smells of a variety of ethnic cuisines everywhere: it's a delightful experience to be in the community of Skyview, for example, when the outdoor festivals are under way. I would invite everyone in this Chamber to join me sometime this summer to attend one of these events.

But, alas, Mr. Speaker, it's not all festivals and fragrant foods; with the arrival of so many newcomers in the area also comes a real problem of underemployment. There are many, many highly qualified and educated individuals who are working in jobs that are not commensurate with their skills and potential, exactly the same situation that my father faced when he came to Canada many years ago. This is why I'm immeasurably proud of our Alberta advantage immigration strategy, particularly the fairness for newcomers program, which my colleague the Member for Calgary-North, the parliamentary secretary of immigration, is helping design. This program will help newcomers achieve their dreams of actually working in the fields that they studied and trained in.

On the west side of Calgary-North East we have Coventry Hills and Harvest Hills, the heart of the Northern Hills community, which is now divided amongst several electoral districts. While the heart of the Northern Hills community still resides within my riding, so does the steely spine of the community, as demonstrated by the passionate advocacy positions held by community members. These advocates have created strong and stirring dialogue on much-needed infrastructure in the area: the north Calgary high school, the green line, a health centre, and more. This is an area of strong community pride, beautifully exemplified by the creation of the Northern Hills mural, the longest outdoor mural in Canada, reflecting the values of community, for community.

My job as an elected public servant is to speak for all of the constituents, to make their collective dreams for Calgary-North East come true, and the dreams are simple wishes indeed: schools and school buses, access to public transportation, fairness to newcomers, and, most of all – most of all – a revitalized economy that provides employment opportunities now and for future generations.

As an oil and gas worker for over 23 years I would be remiss not to speak of the industry that I love and that has given me and my family and indeed our province and our nation so much. I have seen times of great prosperity in the sector and, in more recent times, the severe lows. I know what it's like to lay off staff. It's a terrible experience, and it stays with you for a long time because you never stop worrying about those families. I was by my daughter's side when she lost her job as a reservoir engineer due to the closure of her head office. I can tell you that it's another tragedy that we are not seeing enough young, bright faces of new graduates in downtown Calgary or Edmonton. We're just seeing a sea of vacant office spaces.

Let's talk about some facts. As a country we are blessed to have the extraordinary gift of plentiful natural resources, including hydrocarbons. We have the third-largest oil reserves in the world, and we are the world leaders in producing and exporting our products. The vast majority are from Alberta. What is not spoken of often enough is the diversity of our products. We have dry natural gas; light, medium, and heavy oil; oil sands; condensates; and more. I only mention this because diversity in product is going to become more important to meet changing demands as time goes by in our economy.

We also know that world oil demand is going to increase, some credible numbers suggest, by 30 per cent beyond 2040, and Alberta must be the leader in meeting this demand. Our government is committed to putting our province on a trajectory to make sure this happens, as am I.

I'd like to talk a bit about the people I've worked with over the years: engineers, accountants, geophysicists, geologists, petrophysicists, support staff, economists, HR specialists. These are people who care about economic prosperity and the environment. They are parents and grandparents who provide for their families and understand that these goals are not mutually exclusive but are, in fact, complementary.

Alberta also plays a prominent role in innovation and the creation of new technology designed to curb carbon and methane emissions. We need to create the conditions to further unleash this innovation so that our oil and gas sector can export these new technologies internationally to help curb global GHG emissions.

I've also had the opportunity to travel and see the operations of oil and gas fields in other international jurisdictions, including eastern Europe. In this province I've been to Taber, High Level, Steen River, and other areas, and I can tell you that Canada, Alberta are, head and shoulders, a leader in the ethical production of oil and gas. There really is no other comparison to any other jurisdiction in the world. I've seen it with my own eyes.

As we move forward to heal and advance Alberta's interests in our energy sector and economy, I'm also deeply cognizant of the vulnerable members in our province. As the new Minister of Community and Social Services the numbers of Albertans who rely on us to help improve their lives are significant. We have over 60,000 AISH recipients. These are not just unknown faces or unknown names. A few of them are family members with disabilities who go to work every day with smiles on their faces. We have thousands of families who rely on the PDD program and the FSCD program. We have unknown numbers of Albertans experiencing homelessness, domestic and/or sexual violence, and we have folks dealing with tough times who just need a helping hand.

I want nothing more than to see prosperity return to this province so that as a government we can do more to provide vital social services to the most needy, the most vulnerable in our communities. There's a whole lot of work ahead of us, and this work is not going to be easy – it's going to be back-breaking at times – but we have a talented, experienced, and motivated team that is focused on the task at hand.

I know that I speak for all of my colleagues, Madam Speaker, when I repeat the words that I said at the outset. It will take time, patience, sustained effort, and a willingness to take risks to realize the dreams and goals for our province. As for myself, I know that I have a very specific job as a team member of this government to do my part and, as always, to go above and beyond to fulfill my duties. I will fulfill my duties by working with everyone in this Chamber, and I would like to offer a heartfelt and sincere thank you to each and every one in this House for their commitment and service to the province of Alberta.

My final statement is one of hope and optimism; as we say in the Sikh tradition, to be in a state of chardi kala. This term, chardi kala, embodies the notion that even in times of adversity and times that challenge us emotionally and physically we must always aspire to maintain our optimism and joy because that is what will determine a positive path forward for all of us to fulfill our dreams.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: I will recognize the Member for Calgary-West.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you very much, and thank you to the minister for those comments. It was an excellent speech. You know, I've been trying to make sure that all members in the House, of course, get their maiden speeches done. I think it's very, very important. I remember five years ago myself, when I did my first maiden speech, putting in the thought and recognizing my constituents, recognizing the people that came before me, recognizing family. Minister, I think you hit the nail on the head there. So very proud of that.

The minister touched a little bit about her constituency of Calgary-North East. I had an opportunity one time many, many years ago to be the incident commander, the sergeant, in charge of that particular area. It is an extremely ethnically diverse riding. She is of Sikh origin. And I can tell you that there are certain communities there – and when I say communities, I mean entire neighbourhoods – that are of one specific cultural group, which is great.

But, you know, from a policing perspective it also provides us challenges in the policing world.

I can tell you that, you know, this minister is the right person for that area. The way she's able to articulate, respond to the needs of the community members, especially in her position that she currently holds, ensuring that the needs of that community that she represents are also reflected in government and in this Chamber: for that, I am certainly proud to know her and proud to call her a friend.

You know, another thing with Calgary-North East. We touched on the diverse population there. But I'd like the minister to maybe expand a little bit, especially in her short time here not just as a minister but, I mean, as the MLA for Calgary-North East, on some of the we'll call it demands on your time – right? – to be a part of groups or to be a part of events that occur almost virtually every weekend, sometimes Friday, Saturday, Sunday, sometimes in the mornings and the evenings, and kind of finding that balance between representing the people in that neighbourhood as well as making sure that you have time for your kids and your husband and the family that you're a part of. Maybe you can touch a little bit about the excitement and challenges and the way you're able to find that work-life balance.

Thank you.

Mrs. Sawhney: Thank you for the question. It sounds like this is a question about work-life balance, which is something that a lot of people struggle with on a daily basis. But, certainly, I feel very privileged that I'm in the position that I'm in now. There are a lot of demands on time, and the constituency of Calgary-North East, as was mentioned by the member, is very diverse. It's not only ethnically diverse, but it's also diverse in the sense that we have communities that are only a decade old on one side of a major highway, and then on the other side of the major highway we have communities that have been there for over 35 to 40 years. Sometimes you're looking at different kinds of community events that you have to be present at on either side of the highway.

I do have four children – I did mention that – and one of the ways that I balance my time is that with any event that I go to, any one of the four kids actually attends with me. Not only is it a great educational opportunity for my children, but it's also a way for me to be present for my constituents at some of these very important cultural events that are ongoing. Certainly, this upcoming weekend is filled with all kinds of events. There is going to be some celebration of Eid events, and there's also going to be some community association events. Luckily, my family is very flexible in this regard, and my children are happy to accompany me.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the speech. I remember actually that it's a little bit difficult sometimes to stand up and do it for the first time, so good job. I had a question for you. I certainly understand that it's important to be able to walk and chew gum at the same time, so to be able to work on creating employment...

The Deputy Speaker: Sorry, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Minister of Economic Development, Trade and Tourism.

Ms Fir: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today to respond to the Speech from the Throne, and I would also like to congratulate you on your election as Deputy Speaker. It is also my first speech in this esteemed Chamber. I stand here today thanks to the trust and hopes of the voters of Calgary-Peigan. They endorsed me and selected me to represent them here in this Chamber, and I am honoured to stand here on their behalf.

Before I begin, I would like to thank some people: my incredible family and friends. But for them, I would not be here today. Their tireless volunteering and hours that they donated in helping support me throughout my election campaign I will forever be grateful for.

As many of my other colleagues have mentioned, I too come from a hard-working immigrant home. My parents immigrated to Canada from what was then Yugoslavia and is now Slovenia, seeking a better life for themselves and their future children. They came here with the desire to work hard, and they did that from the very beginning. My father was a carpenter, and my mother initially worked many years as a waitress before working very hard in the meat department at a grocery store, which she still works at today.

The greatest character trait they taught my two sisters and I through example was that there is no substitute for hard work.

While I was born in Cranbrook, B.C., we moved to Calgary when my sisters and I were very young because there was not enough work for my father to be employed full-time as a carpenter. Rather than sit back and do nothing, they went to where the work was, and that was in Calgary. I'm so glad we did land in Calgary. I worked hard to earn my bachelor of commerce degree at the University of Calgary and proudly spent my career in the oil and gas industry, an industry that I'm so proud of for having the highest standards in the world for clean, safe, ethical operations, reclamation standards, and human rights standards. I'm so proud to work in that industry.

As the Premier said on the day our caucus was sworn in, we must not forget that it is a deep privilege to govern and serve on behalf of all Albertans.

My riding is a new riding in southeast Calgary called Calgary-Peigan, and it is made up of four other ridings. A large part of it was part of Calgary-Hays, Calgary-South East, Calgary-Acadia, and the former Calgary-Fort. I'm honoured to have, as I mentioned, a large part of my riding formerly be in the Calgary-Hays riding, which my fellow member and the Minister of Transportation was the MLA for. It encompasses the communities of McKenzie, Douglasdale, DouglasGlen, Quarry Park, Riverbend, Millican, Lynnwood, Ogdén, and Dover. I've gotten to know the amazing and diverse constituents of this riding through knocking on thousands of doors and listening to their issues and their concerns.

To stand in this Chamber is to stand in the legacy of those who have gone before us, to stand in the same room where Alexander Rutherford stood to establish the University of Alberta or where Arthur Sifton fought for control over our province's natural resources, a fight that continues to this day. This is the Chamber where Ernest Manning served as our province's Premier for 25 years and where Peter Lougheed formed a government that lasted longer than any other in Canadian history. It is a huge responsibility and a near-unique privilege.

Our government received the largest voter endorsement in our province's history. We received more votes than any successfully elected political party in the 114 years that Alberta has been part of Confederation. Albertans overwhelmingly voted for positive change from the previous government. With record voter turnout, 55 per cent of the vote, and the most votes cast for a single party in Alberta history, we have a historic mandate to get Alberta back on track. We will grow jobs, grow the economy, and stand up for a fair deal for Alberta.

We've already seen signs of hope in that regard. With the Senate transport committee rejecting Bill C-48 and the Senate making hundreds of amendments to federal Bill C-69, Albertans are once again being heard in Ottawa. This is a tremendous honour. It is also a tremendous responsibility as we face the adversity present in Alberta's economy and the task of undoing the damage to our fiscal and economic situation perpetrated by the previous government.

A story that often comes to mind for me is that when I was door-knocking – and I had been door-knocking for over a year and a half – I remember coming across a home in one of the communities and speaking to the homeowner, who was very emotional and wasn't sure how much longer he and his family would be able to hang on. He had been unemployed for a while, and he was hoping he could just hang on until the election and see the outcome. Well, months later, when I came across that home again to knock on the door, there was a for-sale sign on the front lawn and a lockbox on the front door. While that initially caused me to be very upset, it strengthened me and steeled me to continue door-knocking and continue to work hard so that we could eliminate others that were going to face that uncertain future.

With the election of our government, help is on the way, and hope is on the horizon. This throne speech marks a spring session of renewal. I am proud to be part of a team that will be obsessed with job creation, driving investment, and showing the world that Alberta is open for business. This is part of my mandate as Minister of Economic Development, Trade and Tourism. My mandate is to return our province to the proud tradition of a free-enterprise economy, with opportunity for all.

Our government will develop a smarter approach to innovation. Under our mandate Alberta will become a global hub for cutting-edge technology. We are creating the best business environment in Canada. Alberta is open for business, and we are working to ensure that businesses across Canada and around the world know that Alberta is the most attractive place in North America for creating jobs and investing. In doing so, we are sending a new message across Canada and around the world with our election that Alberta is open for business.

Our tourism sector is going to be a key part of that mandate. Our government knows that a strong tourism industry creates jobs and economic growth in Alberta. That's why we're going to build a 10-year tourism strategy to help grow the sector and bring in more investment. We'll be looking for innovative ways like private-sector partnerships to promote and market tourism, with the goal to double tourism investment in our province, to $20 billion, by 2030. We're going to cut red tape and streamline the rules and regulations that impede tourism investment and development, and we're going to work hard to show that Alberta is open for business.

We will attract more flights to Alberta. These flights will bring more tourists and investors to our province and support Alberta businesses who want to explore new opportunities in key markets around the world. We will work every day to make Alberta the best place in North America to live, work, start a business, and raise a family.

We have a positive, common-sense plan to get our economy back on track and renew the Alberta advantage. We will be sending a clear message to our partners across Canada and around the world: invest here; innovate here; we are open for business. Over our four-year mandate we will cut red tape on job creators by one-third.

Our very first piece of legislation removes the disastrous carbon tax, the largest tax cut in Alberta's history, and this repeal will create at least 6,000 new jobs and put money back into the pockets of families and job creators.

Our second piece of legislation will restore the secret ballot and balance to Alberta's labour laws. Restoring workplace democracy and bringing balance to labour laws is just one of many initiatives to help workers and get job creators investing in Alberta again.

As our third piece of business we are lowering the tax on employers to the lowest in the country, creating at least 55,000 jobs and growing the economy by almost $13 billion, a marked difference from the previous government, which raised taxes on job creators by 20 per cent on day one. This is a marked difference from the previous government. In the last few months of the former government's term nearly 200,000 Albertans were out of work, office vacancies in Calgary and Edmonton continued to climb, and Alberta was headed towards $100 billion in debt.

Our GDP growth continues to lag behind many other provinces. Wage growth was lower than the national average under the previous government, and many forecasters expect Alberta's GDP to be among the slowest growing in 2019. Our efforts won't reverse the trends overnight, but we will take bold, decisive steps to improve Alberta's competitiveness and reduce the burden on our job creators. We are going to turn that around. We are going to renew Alberta's economy and restore our status as the economic engine of Canada, we are going to get a fair deal for our resources, and we are going to get Albertans back to work.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Comments and questions under 29(2)(a)? The hon. Minister of Transportation.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member for her speech. I think it's a message of hope and renewal and a message of looking towards the future. I can tell you that the hon. member worked very hard to get herself elected and put her heart and soul into this. I know that in several ways.

The hon. member came and talked to me early on in the process, even before her nomination. Thereafter we actually shared a campaign office along with the hon. Member for Calgary-South East. The three of us kind of coexisted in a campaign office, and to this day we're coexisting. She's in the midst now of evicting me from my constituency office, which will become her constituency office, but between now and the time that I'm fully evicted, she's been generous enough to let me camp out there while I'm looking for a new location.

Madam Speaker, in hearing the hon. member's speech, I know how proud she is of her parents and her family and how hard they have worked along the way for her. Also, this hon. member has experience in the energy sector. With all of that, how do you see, you know, your experience growing up in that immigrant family and your experience working in the energy sector? What are you going to take from that that's going to make the biggest difference not only as an MLA but also in your role as the minister of economic development and tourism? Where do you see the strengths that are going to help you the most, and if you want to comment, what do you need to learn?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. minister of economic development and tourism.

Ms Fir: Thank you, and thank you for the question. Madam Speaker, as I mentioned, the greatest thing I learned from my parents was that there is no substitute for hard work. They were able to provide a comfortable – not lavish or extravagant but comfortable – safe upbringing for myself and my two sisters just through their hard work. They were so grateful to be able to come to this country, and from the day they landed, their two goals were to immediately learn the language – proudly maintain their current cultural heritage but learn the new language – and immediately get to work at jobs where they could contribute and be self-sufficient for themselves until they could master the English language and then, in my father's case, go on to carpentry school and, in my mother's case, do progressively more challenging service-level jobs as she mastered English.

What they taught through their example was that through hard work, not necessarily through luck or gifts or help but through hard work, you could provide for yourself and your family. My sisters and I, from the day we were old enough to have jobs, whether it was babysitting or cutting lawns or gardening for neighbours, paid our own way throughout high school and university. It's that type of hard-work ethic that I hope to bring to the role of Member of the Legislative Assembly for the constituents of Calgary-Peigan.

It is such an unbelievable honour to be able to sit in this Chamber and be a voice for my constituents and to have the incredible honour and privilege to be selected as Minister of Economic Development, Trade and Tourism, where I have the amazing opportunity and honour to be able to represent and sell Alberta to the world: to the rest of Alberta, to the rest of Canada, and globally to the world. I am so proud of this province and the hard work that Albertans exemplify, the quiet confidence that Albertans have, the generosity that we have to our neighbours both within our cities, our towns, and across the country.

With respect to my career in the private sector, having spent my career as a human resources adviser in the private sector for almost 20 years, I hope to be able to bring the skills of collaboration and problem solving and working with others and respect and kindness for others but also be willing to make those fair, tough decisions when need be. I hope to be able to bring that to the role of MLA.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Stony Plain.

Mr. Turton: Yes. Thank you, Madam Speaker. Thank you, all, for the opportunity and the privilege to stand in response to the Speech from the Throne. With gratitude I recognize the delivery of a plan for Alberta by the Honourable Lieutenant Governor, Lois Mitchell. I'm honoured to represent the people of both Spruce Grove and Stony Plain in this capacity under the leadership of the hon. Premier, Jason Kenney.

First, I wish to acknowledge the vibrant history and culture of indigenous nations here in Canada. I also wish to recognize that the land upon which my constituency resides is home to our closest neighbours, the Cree and the Nakota. This area of Treaty 6 territory is also home to the Métis nation and many other indigenous groups. I wish to acknowledge the unique story of this land by continuing to work towards strengthening relations with neighbouring indigenous communities, which include the Enoch First Nation to the east of my riding and the Paul band/First Nation to the west.

I would like to congratulate all the new and re-elected MLAs. It's clear that democracy in our province continues to prevail, and I'm confident that the people of Alberta will be served by our new government in a manner that is representative of the values of Albertans. I'd be remiss if I didn't thank the people of Spruce Grove and Stony Plain, who elected me to this seat, entrusting me with their voice in this Chamber, and I hope that my words and actions here might represent them well.

The constituency I serve has seen shifts in its physical boundaries, but one thing that has remained constant since 1905, when we were first created, is our values of hard work, entrepreneurship, and dedication to family, and these traits have defined this riding since the two communities came into existence over a hundred years ago. The constituency of Spruce Grove-Stony Plain is rich with history and tradition. While our constituency is only a couple of minutes west of Edmonton, we have a unique history derived from the strong agricultural roots of the families that settled this area well over a hundred years ago. This deep agricultural heritage continues to show itself with our vibrant agricultural societies in Spruce Grove, which hosts one of the few standing wooden grain elevators west of Edmonton, along with cultural destinations like the Pioneer Museum and the multicultural centre located in Stony Plain.

Stony Plain, one of the communities in my riding, prides itself on being a town with a painted past, and this is shown by the proliferation of murals gracing our downtown core, showcasing local artists and our strong historical connections. The rich, vibrant character that Stony Plain is based upon is a result of the hard-working original families that settled this area, many of which still reside in Stony Plain.

While Stony Plain has deep agricultural roots, it continues to look outwards as well by partnering with the town of Shikaoi, Japan, as one of the dozens of communities around Alberta participating in the community twinning program. This initiative provides the residents of both Shikaoi and Stony Plain with the opportunity to experience and learn about different cultures, to the betterment of all of our residents. This has continued to grow and strengthen throughout the years, providing a unique and innovative way to build community. Our Shikaoi park in Stony Plain continues to be a community gathering place for residents throughout the area and truly is a gem to our town. It exhibits the belief in communal co-operation that the municipalities in my riding exemplify and showcase so well.

The city of Spruce Grove, which forms two-thirds of my riding, continues to be one of the fastest growing communities in Canada, with one of the youngest average ages in the province. This community prides itself as a vibrant commercial centre, and its excellent recreational facilities are the envy of many communities throughout the province. Facilities like the Border Paving Athletic Centre, the Fuhr Sports Park, and the TransAlta Tri Leisure Centre continue to offer enhanced recreational opportunities that are not found in many other mid-sized communities.

Mr. Speaker, you'd find it interesting that, outside of Edmonton and Calgary, there's nowhere else in the province that has two separate communities of this size that are as interconnected as the communities of Spruce Grove and Stony Plain. Our riding is a strong example of the municipal co-operation displayed throughout Alberta and continues to showcase our strong ties with our regional neighbour, Parkland county. The two communities of Spruce Grove and Stony Plain partner repeatedly with Parkland county on our joint initiatives such as the TransAlta Tri Leisure Centre, which receives over a million visitors every year, and the Stony Plain heritage pavilion, which seats over 500 people and hosts numerous community events every single year. These two great initiatives are perfect examples of how our region understands that we are stronger when we work together, and I look forward to strengthening those bonds with our community groups for the betterment of everyone in Spruce Grove and Stony Plain.

5:30

Not only do we work to enhance our cultural and recreational options as a region, but the two communities continue to work together on new projects such as the new integrated RCMP facility, which will open soon, as well as enhanced transportation connections which bring our residents to the core of Edmonton. These projects enhance the quality of life for everyone in my riding.

Mr. Speaker, it's not only among our local municipalities that there have been strong levels of co-operation. One area where I see an opportunity for relationship building is with our First Nations neighbours, particularly the Enoch Cree nation to the east and Paul band nation to the west. We made positive strides in the past to build trust and strengthen this relationship, and I welcome the opportunity to continue dialogue about how all of our residents can prosper. I am pleased to say that every year Stony Plain holds an event called Aboriginal Day, which is a growing celebration showcasing First Nations culture, with visitors from all over northern Alberta attending.

The relationship between my riding of Spruce Grove-Stony Plain and the proud Enoch Cree nation will be strengthened with infrastructure projects such as an enhanced highway 628, which is a major need for the residents west of Edmonton. I look forward to continuing to promote projects like this moving forward, which will reap rewards for all of our residents. This government has made it a priority to enhance the opportunity for shared prosperity with our First Nations. Improvements to infrastructure, that will allow our neighbours in Enoch Cree nation and Paul band First Nation access to jobs and markets, are a major step towards realizing their economic potential.

Spruce Grove and Stony Plain is an area that I know very, very well. My parents and family came to this area over 20 years ago, and I graduated from a local high school in Spruce Grove called St. Thomas Aquinas. Because it's such an amazing community, I've chosen to raise my own family in this incredible area that has given so much to me. Over the last eight years I've had the privilege of serving as a city councillor for the city of Spruce Grove, and I understand the challenges that face my riding.

You know, representing two young communities means that education is always top of mind with parents and families, and I'm proud to say that my riding is a showcase of educational choice. On top of our two local school boards we have a vibrant home-school program and two dynamic and growing private Christian schools to provide parents in my riding with ample opportunities to have their choice of school, which I am thankful our government will continue to support.

Our riding will have to deal with the after-effects of the previous government and their accelerated coal phase-out. There have been real, negative effects to hundreds of families in my riding who relied on work at the coal-fired power plants west of my riding, at Genesee, Keephills, and Sundance sites, to pay their bills and to pay their mortgages. As a dual-ticketed tradesman that worked at those individual sites for many, many years, I understand the negative impact that the accelerated coal phase-out by the previous government has had on families in my riding.

Diversity is a major factor, both culturally and economically, and it's vital we maintain this awareness when looking to the future. How we approach serving the needs of my constituents will be greatly impacted by this ever-increasing complexity and will require innovative, thoughtful decisions that will provide for long-lasting and sustainable solutions. We must allow ourselves the creativity and imagination to think beyond the next four years. This is how our community and all Albertans will flourish, no matter what challenges we face moving forward.

That is why, Madam Speaker, I am proud of the decision by NAIT to have one of its satellite campuses locate to Spruce Grove to provide enhanced educational opportunities for Albertans who want to learn blue-collar trades. I would also like to commend the councils of Spruce Grove and Stony Plain for looking at options such as enhanced library services and fibre-optic cable for high-speed Internet to ensure that the youth in my riding continue to have access to digital roadways to help them in the future.

Madam Speaker, our riding of Spruce Grove-Stony Plain is a diverse riding that has a rich history of hard work, entrepreneurship, and working with our neighbours. It is a privilege to serve this incredible riding, and I would like to thank this Chamber for allowing me to tell a little bit about the area that I am proud to call home.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any comments or questions under Standing Order 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Drumheller-Stettler.

Mr. Horner: Yes. Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'd like to commend the Member for Spruce Grove-Stony Plain for a great maiden speech, response to the throne speech. It resonated with me when he was speaking to the effects of the accelerated coal phase-out – in my riding of Drumheller-Stettler we have two coal-fired power plants – and the issues and struggles associated with the people working there, that continue to work there, attempting to become retrained and repositioned to maybe working in a different field. It puts a lot of pressure on the entire town and community. I'd appreciate hearing more about that and hearing about his experience working in those great plants. I know that when I toured those facilities, I was blown away by the pride and what a great career and workplace that can be, so I'd love to hear more about that.

I'd also like to hear a little more about the trades background. I know that within our platform we have a lot of direction and priority towards the trades. I think we lose 3,000 skilled tradespeople every year till 2025 that we can't replace. Maybe the Member for Spruce Grove-Stony Plain could speak to that and that direction and priority from this new government.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Stony Plain.

Mr. Turton: Yes. Thank you, Madam Speaker. Thank you to the Member for Drumheller-Stettler for asking the question. I know this may surprise many of the members here given my calm, shy attitude, but coming out of high school I wanted to be an actor. I remember discussing it with my parents at the time. I put forward on the table that I wanted to go to Montreal for acting school, and my parents put on the table that, you know, they wanted me to take up a trade and work the oil patch. We took a vote about it, and then I went and got a trade and worked in the oil patch because you got to listen to mom and dad or else you're going to pay rent.

I'm proud to say that I have a long history of working in the trades. I'm a dual-ticketed tradesman – a journeyman carpenter, a journeyman scaffolder – and I have worked at every industrial site as a member of the carpenters' union, from Shell Scotford in the Industrial Heartland all the way out to Genesee power plant. So I've a lot of experience working in the trades, Madam Speaker.

I'm also proud to say that in 1999 my very first industrial construction job was actually at the Genesee power plant. I remember going there as a second-year scaffolder, all excited to begin this new path in my working career, and stepping out on the 14th floor in the boiler house and looking down between the catwalks and all you see is space, 14 storeys of air, and being so scared, thinking that somehow I was going to, you know, fall through the grating that was holding up all this large equipment.

You know, the trades have provided for my family for so many years. When I would go through those plants at Genesee, Sundance, and Keephills, all I talked about with people from Edmonton was wanting to pay their mortgage for their family. At the 2007 expansion, K3, which was the purest example of the best technology that power plants had, there were over 30 or 40 busloads of workers from all over the Edmonton area going to work at that site. You know, it's had a major impact.

When I was door-knocking even this last election, I'd come across people in their homes, and they'd say: "You know what, Searle? We knew that the coal phase-out was going to happen. We knew that the federal government had put in place 2029, 2030. We knew the end of coal was going to happen. What we didn't expect was the accelerated coal phase-out to happen." That was the part that caught families in my riding off guard. They thought they had 12, 13, 14 years to be able to plan for this. It was a pragmatic phase-out from coal to natural gas. Private enterprise was going to pay for that investment. The workers knew this was going to happen. The larger companies, TransAlta and Capital Power, knew the long transition that was going to be happening. Everyone was on the same page. But when the previous government was first elected in 2015, what workers didn't know was that within 24 months they would have to deal with the reality that hundreds and hundreds of layoffs were going to have to happen in those areas. It caught families off guard.

I remember, Madam Speaker, coming across one house, and there was a young mom. She said: you know what, Searle? I guess I just said my name. I don't know if that's allowed. Anyways, she said: you know, Searle, I'm a broken household. I guess I did it again.

An Hon. Member: Twice, hon. member.

Mr. Turton: Yes, I know. I'll pay the price afterwards. She said: I'm a broken home now because . . .

5:40

The Deputy Speaker: The clock has saved you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak? The hon. minister from West Yellowhead.

Mr. Getson: Just member, but thank you for giving me a quick promotion on the spot.

The Deputy Speaker: Pardon me. The hon. Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland.

Mr. Getson: Thank you, Madam Speaker, for the chance to rise here and also for your help and guidance for myself and the other green hand MLAs that are here. I'd also like to thank our Premier for his vision and determination in merging these two strong-willed political parties and, might I add, pulling together some of the highest qualified and hardest working Albertans that this Assembly has seen in some time. I'd like to thank fellow MLAs for setting aside your personal lives, too, and serving all Albertans regardless of the political party that you belong to.

Most of all, I'd like to thank the folks in Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland for giving me that job interview, for telling me what matters to you, and hiring me to be your voice in this great place for the next four years. Thanks to all the volunteers that stepped forward out of the woodwork to prop up this farm kid from out west and get me to this place. My wife, Lara, and our four amazing kids – I better read their names right – Leif, Roen, Faith, and Cora: thanks for giving me your permission to step forward and help out our friends and family at this time.

As you can tell, I'm about as nervous as a long-tailed cat in a room full of rocking chairs. It's not normally because of speaking in front of people; it's just the reverence for this place, for what it kind of sets out, the importance that we have here and the impacts that we can make on everyone's lives.

I'd like to talk about my constituency, if I may, and tell you a little about the people there and what we have and why I'm honoured to represent them. We're located on the borders of everything with the redraws here. We're located on the border of Morinville, St. Albert, Edmonton. Highway 2 is our border to the east, and highway 16 is our border to the south, with the exception of Lake Wabamun, where we duck a little bit south, and we go as far as highway 22 out towards Entwistle and Evansburg, and we pick up all of Mayerthorpe and Green Court.

We're proud to call the three First Nations reservations there – the Paul, the Alexander, and the Alexis – fellow Albertans, friends, neighbours, and partners in building a better Alberta together.

We have two airports; one located in Villeneuve, which is home to the Edmonton Airshow – if anyone wants to partake in that and you're in my area, come on out and I'll buy you a beverage – and a smaller one located up in Mayerthorpe, a smaller strip there. In our constituency we have the honour of holding the most summer villages, 17 in total. Our constituency includes Lake Wabamun, Lake Isle, Lake Nakamun, Lac Ste. Anne, which is sacred to the local folks and has been a national historic site for a number of years, along with the Sturgeon, Paddle, and Pembina rivers. We have two distinct, notable historic bridges. The Pembina train trestle crosses the Pembina River between Entwistle and highway 16, and up in Sangudo there's another large, free-standing structure that's quite notable.

We also have two Hutterite communities that call our area home, and that's the Rocfort colony as well as the Morinville colony. There are also a number of seniors' lodges in our area that provide really good homes. We're going to have to talk about the needs of our aging population because these folks are the glue that holds our families in a lot of our small towns together. We have a lot of long-standing families that can trace their heritage back to the founding fathers of these communities and, in fact, the province of Alberta itself.

There's a vast array of people that live out in Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland. They've got lake-lot living, summer villages, small towns, villages, acreages, estates, modular home parks, rural retreats, farming. The topography – and I'm going to tell you, a little part of God's country out here – varies. You've got rolling topography, grassy hills, lakes, rivers. You've got access to larger major urban centres. There are fertile, flat lands in the east, which are used for grain production, seed, potatoes, hay production, especially crops. Of course, we talked about the agriculture as far as the cattle, and, I might add, some of the best families are producing some of the best breeding stock you can find right from that area.

I've seen first-hand the community spirit of folks stepping in to help out other communities or other members who are failing and have done everything to bring attention to try to raise funds to keep what they have. I can't tell you how many local community groups and ag societies do their part to keep these places and functions in service. They are the glue for their areas, great organizations such as the air cadets, the dance groups, lots of sports leagues, the 4-H clubs. They keep all the parents and the kids busy. There are rodeos, hockey tournaments, festivals, and other community events. There's a bit of a unique event as well. Every year the town of Evansburg nominates the town grouch. When you get a badge put on your chest for being the most cantankerous in the area, make no mistake, Madam Speaker, folks in my constituency are not afraid of speaking their mind.

The industries and the pillars in the economy in the great Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland are diverse. We have agriculture, manufacturing, construction, forestry, mining, coal power generation, a new frac sand wash plant for industry, technology, and even aerospace out of the Villeneuve airport, of course registries, insurance agents, medical services, grocers, and all the other service industries. I'd like to highlight the importance that the small restaurants still play. There are not a bunch of food chains out in our area. They're still the family owned-operated businesses. There are still the coffee shops where farmers and locals will gather together at 6 a.m. to hold senate in their own committees to share what matters to them, and this is where I met probably most of the people in the area, with genuine stories.

You know, I found it interesting that when I grew up, I was always told a bunch of things. You're always told to do things: work hard, be honest, treat others with respect, judge a person by his character, live and let live. Also, don't bother people at their homes, at their work. Don't bug them on the phone or in person. Never bug someone when they're trying to enjoy a meal, don't ask for money, don't brag, be self-reliant, and stand up for yourself, your family, and your friends. Most of this room realizes that when that goes into a campaign, it kind of contradicts most of those lessons that were taught to you, so you're knocking on peoples' doors, you're phoning them, you're bothering them at work, you're bothering them when they're having a meal, and you're showing up to shake hands and take pictures and show yourself off.

I realize now that there was a wisdom in that process. I never would have been able to meet as many people as I did or connect with them in that personal way unless I broke down those boundaries, that comfort zone. I was even convinced to put a truck rack on my truck so I could be seen by everybody driving down the highways.

The everyday people of Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland have concerns, and here are some of them that I heard throughout the campaign. Too many people are out of work for some time or face a large reduction in hours. Owner-operators can't hit their margins. They're dealing with higher operating costs, input costs, and just trying to keep alive. Annual rent cost increases for the folks out in Parkland Village, $50 a year, may not seem like much, but right now it means an awful lot. The premature phase-out of coal-fired power generation. This is a quote from one of the truck drivers I met early in the morning. People in my area: they don't want handouts, just for a government that lets me get to work and stops picking my pockets while simultaneously choking out the industries that I work for.

I met seniors on fixed incomes that turned their heat down as low as possible during the cold snap back in February. They were no longer able to buy what they called "good groceries" and decided how cold they could get the house down to. I saw kids crying and upset in school, wondering where mom and dad were going to be and if they had a job or a home to go back to.

I heard from small-business owners. Their returns were diminished. They were just trying to keep things alive and not taking an income for themselves for a couple years and managing to keep the two or three employees they have.

I heard that too many people were heading out of the province or out of the country, where our industries are respected and still wanted and our service is still required, as we've heard here earlier in the day.

I've heard lots about the education, the fact that we need high-speed Internet access, the fact that we need to get back to basics, and that transportation costs for moving our kids around the rural areas are pretty tough. Like many other members I've heard about rural crime: response times and severity of the incidents are increasing, the acreage-owners' rights, the farmers' rights, and what they can do to protect their friends and families and their neighbours when they're an hour or more away from the nearest police station.

You know, I reviewed several other members that came before me in their maiden speeches, and it was pretty interesting to hear that some of those folks, too, had that same reverence for this place and were also tongue-tied and nervous the first time they were saying it. There were some common themes that also rippled through here from our area. They still had concerns over the economy, the roads, the education, the agriculture sector. A lot of these things have improved since their time, so I know for sure that their voices were heard here and that our area was valued as part of the fabric that makes up Alberta.

We still need, however, more help. Not a handout; we need help to help drive the economic engine of our province. A large majority of the folks in my area are true patriots, captains of their industries. They are the types that hold so many of these communities together. These are the men and women that are contributors to this economy but also the social fabric and overall well-being of our province.

I'm proud to note that our region has also produced some notable figures here. Again, 13 ministers came from our areas, notable ones Peter Trynchy, Frederick Lindsay, George VanderBurg, and most recently Oneil Carlier; two Deputy Premiers – they happen to be Horners, so there is a Horner in every corner – one Speaker of the House, Mr. Ken Kowalski; and three Deputy Speakers and chairs. I'd like to particularly mention Mr. Kowalski and Mr. Lindsay and also Mr. Purdy, who had offered me support and advice during the campaign.

I'm told by my constituents that they can relate to me because of the journey I've taken to get to this point in my life. I grew up on a farm, worked in the forestry sector, worked with a small road paving company, went to college, got a job with a larger contractor, worked across Canada, helped to build mines and fibre-optic networks. I worked on industrial projects in the energy sector, wind farms, tankage, transshipment facilities, and yes, pipelines from here all the way down to Chicago.

I've also started a small consulting firm and taken the knowledge that I learned from the construction side of things and worked for companies such as Encana, Cenovus, TransCanada, and at Enbridge. While I may have gone to NAIT and become a civil engineering technologist, I can tell you first-hand that I went to the university of Enbridge. That's where I got very involved in those projects and how to run and manage people. I'm also a private pilot, a farm kid at heart, and a family man who's immensely proud and protective of his wife and children. I will never forget where I came from or the value of a dollar.

When I was travelling the U.S. and explaining to folks where I was from, I'd tell them it was Alberta, and when they needed a point of reference, I'd tell them it was Texas north. Everyone knows you don't mess with Texas. I think we Albertans had that same persona, and we need to reclaim it again. Our provincial motto is strong and free for a reason. Our forefathers nailed it. That is who we are, and that's the blood that runs through our veins.

During my travels over the years I read many books, trying to get even more knowledge from history and those other great leaders and conflicts that have gone before us and how they resolved those and how they took care of it. One that jumped off the shelf in an airport in Minneapolis was Engineers of Victory, and it was written by a man by the name of Paul Kennedy. It was his analysis of how the Allies won power over the Axis, and he did this great synopsis at the end. If I may, Madam Speaker, this is something that I posted on the walls of my office over the years and would like to share with the hall.

In sum, the winning of great wars always requires superior organization, and that in turn requires people who can run those organizations, not in a blinkered way but most competently and in a fashion that will allow outsiders to feed in fresh ideas into the pursuit of victory. None of this can be done by the chiefs alone, however great their genius, however [great] their energy. There has to be a support system, a culture of encouragement, efficient feedback loops, a capacity to learn from setbacks, [and the] ability to get things done. All of this must be done in a fashion that is better than the enemy's. That is how wars are won.

The second item I'd like to share with you is a famous poem that probably a lot of you have heard. It was in those times of solace where you needed to get back to reality and not see the hurdles for what they are but step away from them and see them as the opportunities that they could present. God grant me the serenity to accept the things that I cannot change, courage to change the things I can, and the wisdom to know the difference. During my campaign I had a simple slogan that seemed to really resonate with the folks in my community. It was simple: Let's Take Our Province Back. We must now get to work on the commitments that we made to our Albertans.

Both of my grandfathers served in World War II and my great-grandfather before them in World War I. My grandpa Ophus was from North Dakota originally, and he chose Alberta as a place to settle. He received a call from a recruiter in the U.S., and it kind of went something like this, if I may digress. He never talked about the war very much, but this one kind of stuck out. Essentially, the recruiter was asking him to serve for the U.S. He was being recruited. He tried to stop and say that he couldn't. Well, the recruiter went off on him, and the dialogue got more and more forceful and finally to the point where he was going to put him in jail, et cetera, et cetera. My grandfather said: well, I can't. Finally, when the recruiter ran out of steam, he said: I can't because I already signed up for the Canadian military, and I'm deploying to Europe in two weeks. That's my family. That's where I come from. That is an Alberta story that resonates in our area.

My grandfathers volunteered to take bullets to defend our freedoms, to keep their loved ones safe, and to make sure that our way of life would never be taken from us. They laid down the groundwork of the foundations of our province with their sacrifice and hard work. At this moment in our province's history I heard the call to serve, not in quite the same way as my grandfathers did; I didn't have to face down bullets. But if I have to face the occasional jibe or joust in this room, I think that's okay, and that's fair game.

This province, my family, and my neighbours desperately needed a change after the years that we've been going through in the last four years and allow this province to live up to its full potential. I'm very proud to serve this government in the UCP caucus with these noble Albertans that feel the same way about our province and who have committed to making a better future for their children and their families. I promise to do all I can for the people who believed in me and trusted me to represent them. I'll try to be their voice. The slow dance to socialism is over. I'll do my part to ensure that Alberta stays strong and free forever.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any comments or questions under Standing Order 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Mr. Ellis: Well, thank you very much, Madam Speaker, and thank you to the member for those comments. I believe that, you know, from what I've seen, he's certainly been a great representative for the people in his community, and I think he will continue to be a great representative for the people in his community.

You know, having been able to get to know the member over the last several weeks, especially in my role, of course, as the chief whip, I've already seen the passion to try and make the community a better place. I've seen the passion, as we're facing these challenging forest fires in northern Alberta right now, of him trying to come up with solutions that are going to help people to try to prevent forest fires from happening in the future. I think he touched on that with one of his questions he asked earlier today in question period.

You know, with that passion, of course, I know that this member spent a lot of time door-knocking and talking to constituents, really getting a pulse for that community which he represents, and I'd like for him to maybe just touch a little bit on some of the stories. I know that with all of us who door-knock always have those stories that really stick in our minds with that one person or multiple people that really kind of set us straight, that let us know the challenges that they're facing, whether it be the economy or some adverse policies that may have affected their livelihood, as an example.

Could the member please just let this House know about some of those wonderful, challenging stories that he's experienced? Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland.

Mr. Getson: Yes, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the question and the chance to speak freely and with candour on this.

There were a number of stories that jumped off the page. There are three that I'll share with you right offhand. Literally at 6 a.m. at the Onoway UFA I'm filling up my truck and another gentleman was filling up his rig, and again with that darn bubble wrap. People wouldn't have known who I was, traditionally, in this community, being as big as it is, and with the projects that I worked on in Canada and the U.S., I was always one of those folks that was gone and away from home.

This young gentleman comes over and says, "You're running for the UCP." I said, "Yup." He said, "What are your chances?" I said: "That's up to you. I'm just here trying to do what I can. It's up to you, and every vote counts in this one. Make no question, there's an ideological difference between capitalism and socialism, so I'm looking at you." He says: "Well, my dad and I have four different tractor-trailer units. We're a small group, and he's built it up over a couple of years. I'm running it." And he says, "You know, with this damn carbon tax we're running a margin so low that we would have put that money into maintenance on our trucks." He says: "We're down so low keeping two trucks running because the jobs are drying up. We can only run so much. We can only charge so much because of our running rates." He's the gentleman that said that comment about someone choking him while they're picking his pocket. Quote, unquote: I don't want a damn handout; I just want to do my job. Those are the types of things happening in our area.

A senior citizen on a fixed income out in Alberta Beach – a proud man, a strong man, worked his whole life – comes up and talks about the impacts of the economy on his fixed income, the fact that he had to pick how cold he could take his house down to, the fact that he was too proud to go ask for handouts, never would in his life and wouldn't start now. The running joke that he said was: they give seniors a $3 increase while they take another couple hundred dollars out of my bank every month. Those are the impacts that some of these potentially well-intentioned ideas about transference of tax going save the environment that have caused real people in these areas.

The premature phase-out of these coal plants. A number of mine workers, highly skilled people, very proficient in what they do, considering the technology that they had in place that members like Mr. Lindsay had brought forward before, where you could actually run these plants and have less NOx and SOx than you would if you ran them full on gas: prematurely phased out. These are real people moving and leaving our area or trying to find something else. It really impacts us. We might have the best intentions, but unless we do some analysis and make a business decision and base it on efficiencies and practicality . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. member, I hesitate to interrupt, but seeing the time, this House stands adjourned until 7:30 tonight.

Government Bills and Orders Third Reading

Bill 1 An Act to Repeal the Carbon Tax

[Adjourned debate May 30: Mr. Ellis]

The Speaker: Hon. members, good evening. Are any wishing to speak to Bill 1?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Question.

The Speaker: I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar rising.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have no doubt that the Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre doesn't want to spend any time here talking about this because I'm certain that he, as have a number of our colleagues, has gotten an earful from his constituents over the last three or four days about their decision to implement the federal carbon tax, the Trudeau carbon tax. But we know the Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre, when asked about environmental concerns, is actually more interested in doing a hackneyed Smothers Brothers routine with the Member for Calgary-Klein than in actually talking about serious environmental policy that affects the lives of millions of people in this province. If he had any measure of shame, he would feel it, but I don't think he has the capacity to do so.

The Speaker: I might just interject only briefly to the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar. Making a statement like, "I'm not sure he has the capacity to do so," may in fact be considered to be a personal attack of which, of course, all members of the Assembly steer very clear of. You might just keep that in mind as we proceed through the rest of the evening.

Mr. Schmidt: Absolutely, Mr. Speaker, and far be it for me to launch incendiary attacks, especially with the dry conditions that persist across the province. We don't need any more forest fires starting.

Mr. Speaker, it is with great shame, I guess, that I stand up and speak to this bill, a bill to implement the Trudeau carbon tax on the people of Alberta, because just this past weekend, yesterday, in fact, I went to celebrate the Cloverdale Community League's inauguration of their recently renovated community league hall. Cloverdale is one of the many picturesque communities in the riding of Edmonton-Gold Bar, probably one of the most picturesque communities in the entire province, but we don't like to say that much about it because, of course, in Edmonton-Gold Bar we are the most humble constituency in the entire province.

But, Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity to take a look at what the good citizens of Cloverdale Community League did with their community league hall. Over the last two years the citizens of Cloverdale have invested in a number of energy efficiency and renewable energy upgrades. Specifically, they hired Carbon Busters to do an energy assessment and green-visioning project. This is an energy audit firm that looks at the energy usage of a particular building and recommends improvements that they could make.

They did some draft-proofing so that the windows and doors didn't leak so much. They replaced old light fixtures with modern LED light fixtures. They replaced their old exterior doors with new exterior doors. They insulated their hot water pipes. They replaced their old windows. They upgraded the insulation. They installed two new high-efficiency furnaces. They installed a new heat-recovery ventilator. They installed concessionary ventilation, which was previously not ventilated. They installed an electric hot water heater and recirculation system. They invested in an upgrade to their monitoring system. All these new energy efficiency upgrades that they installed, of course, require some monitoring, so they invested in the equipment to do that. They installed PV solar panels, forty-eight 400-watt panels, to generate 22,400 kilowatt hours of real electricity a year. I know the Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre thinks that solar panels are ridiculous, but the good citizens of Cloverdale would beg to differ. They upgraded their air-conditioning system. They reroofed with metal-clad roofing, and they did a number of other minor upgrades as well. The total amount for all of those upgrades, Mr. Speaker, was $371,970.

Now, where did that money come from, Mr. Speaker? Well, I was pleased to provide the Cloverdale Community League with a cheque from the community facility enhancement program in the order of $125,000. They did get a grant from the city of Edmonton for $43,280, and the rest of the money came from a variety of programs that were funded from the carbon tax, climate leadership initiative programs, the Municipal Climate Change Action Centre. In the order of $200,000 or so came from programs that were funded by the carbon tax.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it's very interesting to see. The Cloverdale Community League is very proud of their new hall. The members opposite are fond of stating erroneously that the carbon tax and the associated programs were all economic pain with no environmental gain. Of course, nothing could be further from the truth. The combination of the energy efficiency upgrades and the renewable energy system that the Cloverdale Community League put on their new hall resulted in a net generation of 1,500 kilowatt hours of electricity in the month of April. That means that the Cloverdale Community League hall is generating 1,500 kilowatt hours more than it consumed in the month of April, and all of that electricity is sent back into the grid for you and I to use without having to rely on fossil fuels for generation of that. To put that into some equivalence, of course, that saved just in the month of April alone 4,300 kilograms of carbon dioxide emissions. It's the equivalent of planting 14 trees, or it's the equivalent of a car not driving 5,900 kilometres. That saved the Cloverdale Community League $140 in electricity bills in the month of April alone.

You know, when the members opposite get up and speak about all economic pain and no environmental gain from the carbon tax and the associated programs that the carbon tax funded, of course nothing could be further from the truth. The information that the Cloverdale Community League provided quite clearly demonstrates the economic and environmental benefits that the people of Cloverdale now see coming from the Cloverdale community hall, that is the centre of their community.

Mr. Speaker, it's important to note that a $371,000 bill is a steep bill for any community league to come up with. Cloverdale happens to be the home of some people who are pretty fortunate. They've worked hard, they've done well for themselves, and I would say that a lot of them earn above-average incomes. But the Cloverdale community itself is quite small. For the community to come together and raise $371,000 from bake sales and lotteries and bingos and those kinds of traditional fundraising mechanisms would have taken the community league probably a decade. I know that there are community leagues in my riding who have undertaken similar fundraising projects, similar in scope at least, and for a community league to raise $371,000 just from donations and community volunteer efforts takes at least a decade. The good citizens of Cloverdale were able to raise this money from the carbon tax programs, the CFEP program, and the city of Edmonton in the matter of two years, so it's important to remember the speed with which these programs could be undertaken and implemented.

Now the Cloverdale Community League is in the position of being a leader in renewable energy and energy efficiency. It was part of the Eco-Solar Home Tour that was conducted this weekend across many sites in Edmonton, sites that had been featured because of their innovative use of technology and energy efficiency upgrades to reduce their economic and environmental footprint.

You know, I want to speak a little bit about the jobs that were created through this program. Of course, it wasn't volunteer efforts that allowed the citizens of Cloverdale to upgrade their community league hall and install the renewable energy system. They had to hire people who were experts in this field. They bought a significant amount of equipment. And all of that was done by local Edmonton contractors, Mr. Speaker, who were there at the open house, and I got a chance to talk to them. They're afraid for their jobs. Of course, with the members' opposite intent on taking away the funding for the programs that the carbon tax funded, they're not sure if they're going to have work to do in the next month or so. Not only is it important to understand that there are real economic benefits, real environmental benefits to these programs; it created real jobs in my community.

Everybody was quite upset that the government decided to scrap the carbon tax and scrap the associated programs that were funded by the carbon tax, all for the purposes of implementing a federal carbon tax for which they will see no benefit. It's important to remind everybody in this House that these programs that were funded by the carbon tax, the climate leadership programs, the Municipal Climate Change Action Centre, didn't come out of thin air, Mr. Speaker. Those were programs that were created when our government engaged in consultation with Albertans from all parts of the province to decide how best to achieve energy efficiency and renewable energy development in this province. The people of Alberta told us quite clearly that it was these kinds of programs that would benefit Albertans the most, so that's why we adopted them and that's why we funded them.

Apparently, the members opposite see fit – they think that Justin Trudeau can do a better job of spending carbon tax dollars in Alberta, so they've decided to scrap our made-in-Alberta carbon tax plan that was developed in consultation with the people of Alberta and implement something from Ottawa and turn over all of our dollars to Ottawa. You know, the people in my riding were quite upset. They don't understand why the members opposite rail against transfers to Ottawa, and in their first act as government create a giant transfer to Ottawa by implementing the federal carbon tax.

Mr. Speaker, you know, I have to stand up and defend the interests of the good citizens of Edmonton-Gold Bar whose jobs are on the line, whose community league's efficiency is on the line, and they're not alone. Of course, there are many Albertans who are in the same position, who wanted to engage in these kinds of activities to enhance the energy efficiency of their homes or other buildings that are significant to them and whose jobs were relied upon because of these programs that were funded by the carbon tax.

I think it's also important to recognize that the Cloverdale Community League is a public space. It's a building that's owned by the community league and benefited significantly from the energy efficiency upgrades and renewable energy installation that they made. So the money that they used to spend on heating and powering that building can now be turned over to providing additional programs to the citizens of Cloverdale. They can operate youth programs, yoga – I know the Member for Grande Prairie-Wapiti thinks that that's witchcraft, of course. Many citizens in my riding actually like yoga and see benefits from it and enjoy the fact that their community leagues can provide them with those kinds of activities.

The Cloverdale Community League is not alone, Mr. Speaker. There are thousands and thousands of public buildings that have no other option for upgrading their energy efficiency or installing renewable energy. I'm not just thinking of community leagues, I'm thinking of everything in the public sector: hospitals, schools, government buildings. All of those kinds of programs, they're not going to have the access to the dollars that private individuals can have to install these kinds of things in their homes and businesses. So we're taking away significant opportunity for the public sector and those community groups that are providing public goods to provide better services to the people of this province. Of course, that fits very well with the ideology of the members opposite. They don't believe in the public interest. They think that everything should be done privately. Of course, it makes sense that in their first act in the Legislature they would shred one of these significant programs that provides a significant public benefit. It should come as no surprise although we will continue to be disappointed, I think, by the members opposite if we tend to give them the benefit of the doubt.

Anyway, Mr. Speaker, I thank you for your indulgence, and I look forward to continuing the debate on this important subject.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Standing Order 29(2)(a) for questions or comments to the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar is available.

Are there others that wish to speak to the main bill? I see the hon. the Leader of the Official Opposition.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It is a privilege for me to be able to get up and speak to this matter in third reading. Now, I understand that I get quite a long time to speak, somewhere close to 90 minutes, which is kind of scary. I am going to try to get through my comments in a less Castro-esque way than the Premier did when he spoke to this issue in third reading. In no way, shape, or form – people need to just stay chill over there – am I suggesting that, of course, he's like Castro other than in the length of his speeches periodically. Nonetheless, I will unfortunately have to take a little bit more time than I'd planned because the Premier's comments to the third reading of Bill 1 were filled with a number of inaccuracies, so I am compelled, unfortunately, to begin my comments by correcting the record on a number of fronts.

Now, I suppose this is not so much a correction of the record as it is an observation in profound irony. I believe the Premier began his comments saying that Bill 1 represented what he referred to as a renewal of the spirit of democracy. Now, I have to say, coming from a Premier who is the first of six successful leadership candidates for a political party in this province over the last six or seven years to not disclose the donors to his leadership campaign after committing to in the course of the democratic process, that he is so keen to renew, it is a little bit ironic. But it is much more ironic, of course, when you look to the most recent leadership race, where, of course, as we all know, there was a little bit of a problem with respect to several different investigations by the RCMP with respect to kamikaze candidates and all that kind of stuff and then fines being levied by the Election Commissioner over inappropriate donations and investigations into political action committees, who overtly stated that their plan was to simply give money to Jason Kenney through the PAC and work closely with him to do what he could not otherwise do because of the corporate ban and all those kinds of things.

Mr. Speaker, really, seriously, this is the person to whom we shall look for a renewal of the spirit of democracy in Alberta? Methinks that we're in trouble if that's where we're going for that particular inspiration.

Nonetheless, let me move on more to the spirit of the bill and the debate of the bill as it relates, at the outset, to the inaccuracies that were contained in the Premier's comments at third reading on Bill 1. He began by talking about how a widow on a fixed income was having money taken from her and getting much less and was really being hurt by the carbon tax that our government brought in. I think that the Premier should know full well that that's absolutely not true.

In fact, a widow on a fixed income, unless it was a fixed trust fund income of, you know, hundreds of thousands of dollars – and I'm pretty sure that that wasn't what he was trying to describe; I'm sure he was describing somebody on maybe social security or the seniors' benefit or something like that – would in fact end up with more money in her pocket at the end of the day. Why? Because low-income people burn less carbon or use less carbon, yet they got the maximum amount of the rebate.

Economist after economist after economist and the number crunchers inside the government of Alberta confirmed over and over and over again that, in fact, low-income people actually walked away from our process with more money in their pockets. So as a result of cutting Bill 1, we are in fact taking money away from that widow on a fixed income. But if that widow happens to have some really well-to-do kids, who are making $200,000 a year and have two or three vehicles and, you know, a vacation property and a 2,500-square-foot house and a couple of ATVs, well, that group is, for sure, getting more money. But mom or grandma is getting less money as a result of Bill 1 and its outcome. So that's the first thing. I think the Premier is wise enough to actually know that, so he shouldn't have been saying something that, I have to believe, he knew was untrue.

He also went on to say – and he said it several times through his remarks – that there was actually no offset that was ever offered to small business. Now, that's strange because I could swear that a 33 per cent cut in taxes is what many people would argue was an offset, and in fact that's exactly what happened as a result of the climate leadership plan. That was announced as part of the climate leadership plan as a means of offsetting some of the cost to small business.

Now, obviously, there were other mechanisms for offsetting the cost depending on the nature of the small business, whether or not they were trade exposed or whether they fell into a number of the categories that would have made them eligible for a variety of programs that either would have protected them from trade exposure or, conversely, supported them in finding technological ways in terms of research or practical ways in terms of changing the way they did business to burn less carbon. They would have actually gotten offset through that program as well, but in fact they did absolutely get a 33 per cent tax cut. So, again, I'm pretty sure the Premier should have known that. I kind of wonder if he did. I'm not quite sure why he kept saying that in his speech.

The next thing that he chose to talk about was something that is quite well debated on the record in this House around the allegations of what someone in my office did or didn't say to someone who talked to someone who talked to somebody about how to respond to concerns in a particular seniors' community centre in a particular riding. I think it is fair to say, as you are fond of saying, Mr. Speaker, that you can have two entire sets of facts, and at the very best that's what this is here.

Certainly, the notion that I or anybody acting on my behalf or on behalf of anyone in our government ever said, "Oh, seniors should just raise their membership fees as a means of dealing with additional costs associated with the carbon tax" – let me just say that we've been very clear that the folks that were allegedly on the other end of the phone do not recall ever saying that. They do recall having it presented to them as an option by the person on the phone and saying: no, that's not the plan; the plan is that we have these other programs you can reach out for. But whatever. I think it's fair to say that there is disagreement, and I suspect that the Premier knows that that's actually already reflected on the record.

Now, more troubling, of course, is that the Premier also then went on to say that the Calgary board of education had to cancel school bus routes and that kids couldn't go to the schools they wanted anymore because the carbon tax cost them at least a million dollars a year in the Calgary board of education. Interestingly, the actual number that they put forward was $300,000 a year. Yeah, that's maybe a bit more than the Calgary board of education could possibly accommodate. Did it involve hundreds of people suddenly not being able to go to schools they wanted to? No.

When you take into account, Mr. Speaker, the fact that under the leadership of our government the Calgary board of education actually received an incremental bump in funding from our government of $100 million, I kind of think this idea that a $300,000 board-wide carbon tax cost for buses suddenly shutting down busing capacity in a whole section of the city is a bit hard to buy. Again, I think the Premier should have been just a teeny bit more precise with the facts because, frankly, that's what people deserve from somebody in that position.

Now, interestingly, though, what did happen with the Calgary board of education more recently was that they voted to carry on with an effort to get solar panels on some of their schools, and they did so because they concluded that they would be able to save about $127,000 a year in heating costs. If you actually balance that against your $300,000, well, now we've gone from a million down to about $163,000. But, you know, who's counting? Oh, wait. Me.

Anyway, interestingly, at the time that they said that, the other key thing that they said was: yeah, we stand to save $127,000 a year on heating costs thanks to the solar programs, but we do also have this little problem with the $40 million deficit we're going to have this year because the folks, the new government, won't tell us whether or not they're going to fund enrolment.

So, you know, it's just a little rich to have the Premier over there suggesting that as a result of a $163,000 cost on busing as a result of the carbon tax, whole swaths of the city were not able to get kids from point A to point B in order to get to the alternative schools of their choice and that somehow that's what's causing that problem, but the $40 million deficit that they are creating in this year alone is no problem at all. Again, folks: facts. Facts, context. Do your homework. If you want people to listen to the kinds of arguments that you're making, do better. That was not better.

Now, the other thing that he suggested was that we came out publicly and said that we had no intention of increasing the rebate to low- and middle-income Albertans if – if – the price of carbon went from $30 to $40 or $50 a tonne. Again, that is not true, and the reason I know that is not true is because I was the Premier and I was at the table where we would have made that decision in the course of budgeting, and in fact we never made that decision. The reason we never made that decision was because the whole $40, $50 thing was still hypothetical. Why? Because we said that we're not going to even consider what to do with that until we get the pipeline built. That was always a very clear position of our government, that we were not going to endorse or in any way partner or work with the federal government on the $40 or the $50 price until the pipeline was built.

So we did not ever consider whether or not the rebate to low- and middle-income families would increase along with the carbon price under the additional pricing possibilities that would have occurred had there been the approval and construction of the Kinder Morgan pipeline. Again, that was not an accurate statement by the Premier. In fact, to the whole point, it was and continues to be a progressive tax that supports lower and middle-income families, very much in contrast to the assertions that the Premier offered.

In addition, there were some flaws in the Premier's argument. I wouldn't go so far as to say that they were absolutely misstatements of the facts that he should have known were not true and that it was irresponsible for him to say them, but I will say that the logic itself was a little rough. One that I thought was interesting was basically: "Canada is small. Other people are producing more emissions than us. We could eliminate all our emissions altogether, and it wouldn't matter, so we shouldn't do anything." That argument: wow. You know, if every single person thought that on so many different levels, wow.

How about this one? "You know what? There are over 4 million Albertans here. I'm just one of 4 million. Maybe they should all pay their taxes. If I don't pay my taxes, it won't matter. Schools won't close." Well, in the Premier's world probably, you know, 25 buses at the Calgary board of education will be cancelled. Notwithstanding that sort of twisted math, you know, the idea that, "No; it's okay; I'm just one of 4 million Albertans, so why should I pay my taxes; why should I do my bit?" I guess that's an interesting theory. I wonder how many other times the Premier will use that theory?

Mr. Schmidt: Corporate taxes.

Ms Notley: Well, yes. In fact, what's going on there – the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar talks about corporate taxes, but that is actually the theory that they are apparently operating on. But that's a whole different issue.

Anyway, when you have a world-wide global problem that impacts everybody, it's not actually rocket science to suggest that everybody should do their part. So that reasoning is just troubling, and it is flawed, I would suggest, on a moral basis as well as on an economic and a logical basis, and I'll get into the issue of economics in a moment.

At another point the Premier tried to argue that because in one interview I couldn't remember the exact number of megatonnes reduced, somehow that meant that no megatonnes of emissions had been reduced under our plan. Again, multiple times that information was provided. Multiple times the Premier was corrected. He knows the answer now. Yet he insists on coming into this House and putting on the record things which he knows are not true. To be clear, since the time that we brought in the climate leadership plan we have reduced emissions in Alberta by about one-third of the total emissions of the whole province of Manitoba, Mr. Speaker. We have said that. We have repeated that over and over and over. The Premier knows it. Yet he came in here on Thursday and said something that was simply not correct, and he should have known better.

He then tried to argue that our plan would not actually contribute to any kind of reduction in emissions, and he referred to a fairly esteemed economist from B.C. by the last name of Jaccard. I think his first name is Mark; I can't remember it offhand. He suggested that this economist was arguing that, basically, the pricing system that we have right now of $30 a tonne would only account for about 5 per cent of the proposed emission reductions that our plan had in place and that, therefore, the carbon levy was not relevant. What he failed to note, though, was that the same economist that the Premier was so keen on quoting did identify many other elements of our plan that were absolutely going to reduce emissions along the lines of what we had projected. The reduction of coal-fired plants, the reduction of methane emissions, the emissions cap: all these things are things that Professor Jaccard identified.

But here's the thing. Many of those achievements come into effect because of the programs that we can fund through the carbon tax. For instance, when we accelerated the end of coal-fired emissions, which has a huge impact on Alberta's greenhouse gas emissions, we used and committed some of the funds in the climate leadership plan. Actually, going forward, that's a whole other bill that you guys are going to have to pay to one of your big donors, but that's a whole other issue at some point down the road.

In addition, unlike Conservatives when they did their sort of much more modest attempt to reduce coal-fired plants burning, what we also funded was what we referred to as a just transition. We set aside about $40 million or $50 million for workers who were negatively impacted and who would see their jobs lost as a result of the accelerated shutdown of coal-fired plants, again something that was paid for through the revenue from the carbon tax. Of course, by doing that, we then reduced emissions. So there's that thing.

Now, the other thing, of course, that we put in place was the emissions cap from the oil sands. We didn't just sort of arbitrarily make up the emissions cap and say, "Oh, that's it," that we just kind of went to sleep one night and this was the magic number that appeared in our head. No. I mean, we came to that conclusion as a result of a great deal of consultation with industry but also as a result of looking at what could be achieved if the necessary investments were made in the technological innovation that would actually keep the carbon out of the barrel so that production could increase but emissions at the same time would level out and never get above the cap. That's a thing that happens as a result of the climate leadership plan because we're able to invest in these kinds of technological efforts and initiatives.

That is what we were funding through the climate leadership plan, all of those things taken together. Same thing with methane: working together with industry on a number of different mechanisms to reduce their methane reductions, all of that coming together through the programs that were put in place through the climate leadership plan. Of course, you've heard people talk about other ones, you know, incenting a revolutionary jump in renewable energy investment here in the province, that wouldn't have happened without the resources that were made available to the government through the climate leadership plan.

Investing in the green line, investing in the west LRT here in Edmonton: those will take thousands and thousands and thousands of cars off the road and will ultimately allow us to reduce emissions, yet still help people get from point A to point B with something like LRT in a way that's often much more enjoyable than sitting in traffic for hours and hours on end. Those were just some of the things.

Of course, there was the establishment of an energy efficiency agency. Here we were, a province in Canada, the only province in the country that didn't have any kind of an energy efficiency agency at all, no work to support Albertans in reducing their emissions, no work to invest in other market mechanisms to reduce emissions on a residential or consumer basis. Shocking. I mean, here we are, a province that's allegedly an energy capital of the country, and we didn't ever have any thought or effort dedicated towards energy efficiency. Just pure negligence, Mr. Speaker.

All those things come together, and that's how we reduce emissions. So that's what the plan was doing. It was partially a result of the market signals sent by carbon pricing but also as a result of the long-overdue plans that were helping our province slowly bend the curve on emissions.

Now, one of the other things that the Premier tried to argue, of course, was this idea that because of the climate leadership plan all business was racing out of the province and all investment was happening south of the province, and it was all because of carbon pricing. You know, again, one would expect better from the Premier. We know that in the places that he described what we were actually dealing with is a completely different geography in terms of the oil and gas plays that are in the U.S. that are attracting investment right now – we know that that is true – and that in Alberta we are suffering from a long-standing, chronic bottleneck in terms of our ability to get our product to market.

Investors more and more were looking at the fact that we cannot get our product to market, and particularly small producers were, for instance in the fall, being forced to sell their product for, like, $8 or $9 a barrel, and we were all losing out. So many, many producers were just saying: “We need to go to a place where we can actually sell this to somebody for a reasonable price. We can't do it in Canada because we have a broken system and we can't move our product to market.”

8:10

I hate to remind the folks here, but I'm going to do it anyway because, you know, some folks who have been here have heard me say it before but maybe not all the new ones. You know what? We had 44 years of a Conservative government here in Alberta and 10 years of a Conservative government in Ottawa and 10 years of an essentially Conservative government in B.C., and let's count all the pipelines to tidewater we got then. Let's see. People, help me. Let's all join in. How many did we get?

An Hon. Member: Zero.

Ms Notley: Hmm. Yeah. Right there: zero.

The problem with that is that's why our energy industry is struggling right now, because why would you invest in a market where you're only getting $8 a barrel, whereas down in the U.S. you can get close to the full price? So the Premier was confounding these issues intentionally, and I just don't think it was a terribly intellectually honest argument. I think that he could have done better.

Speaking of intellectually honest, though, one of the reasons that I wanted to take the opportunity today to get up and speak against this bill was because even though I have already outlined my overall sort of higher level positions that I have taken on this and that my colleagues have taken on it over some time, I wanted to take this time tonight to take the opportunity to speak in a little bit more detail about one particular person who contributed tremendously to what is one of the most innovative and ambitious efforts to reduce emissions in an energy producing jurisdiction like ours in the world. I wanted to be able to talk about him just a little bit because he is someone that provided tremendous service to this province and to the people of Alberta. As many people who may follow him on social media would know, he's now very, very ill, struggling with a very, very, very serious illness. I wanted him to be able to see this and know that his contribution to the climate leadership plan is being recognized in this Legislature.

Eric Denhoff was a deputy minister for this government in charge of Alberta's climate change office. He came to us from B.C. after about 30 years of working in senior government positions under governments of both political stripes in B.C. He was someone that came to the job with a fierce intellect and also a fiercely determined personality to take issues and move them along to create real change with vision.

I will tell you that you don't run across people in any setting, private or public sector, very often who are that dedicated and that talented and that visionary, who are able to get as much done as Eric Denhoff did for the people of Alberta in the time that he was here. He was able to run from meeting to meeting to meeting and sit down and engage in highly complex policy discussions with CEOs in a broad, diverse range of industries and dig in and learn about their industries and learn about extremely complex matters and then find an evidence-based way to come up with a resolution that both met the objectives of the program but also accommodated as much as possible the legitimate issues that were raised by these CEOs of these various and sundry companies.

Of course, that's one of the reasons why we talk about the made-in-Alberta plan that we have, because we were very responsive to industry as they came to us and said, “Well, this is who we trade with; this is the process that we have to use in this jurisdiction in order to produce this product; that's why we have this particular GHG emission, and that is why we are, you know, at a disadvantage with this product but not with that product, or this product not that product, in this market but not that market,” and all those kinds of things, and then come up with a resolution that was pragmatic yet still achieved the objectives we were working on achieving. Of course, all that work is going to be thrown out when we replace Alberta's climate leadership plan with the made-in-Ottawa carbon tax that the Premier is so excited and enthusiastic about welcoming into Alberta, along with all the other elements of Ottawa that he's clearly a much bigger fan of than most people in the province realize.

Anyhow, all that being said, Eric did an amazing job. He also has been writing a little bit about the climate leadership plan and making some really compelling arguments about the plan and why it should be maintained. I won't get into all the details of it, but suffice to say that he talks about meeting with investors from New York who are there to find out about what's going on in Alberta's oil and gas sector. These investment groups are managing hundreds of billions of dollars of capital, and more and more of their clients are not interested in investing in Alberta's oil and gas industry because they perceive it as not having a very long life ahead of it. Under the previous government there had been such reluctance to work with them, to support them in incenting the reduction of carbon in the barrel.

He describes these meetings with them, and then he says, “Well, let me just walk you through what we're doing now,” and he talks about what's going on in the climate leadership plan. I've already talked about most of it already, but what he talked about in sort of a conceptual way was this idea of working with industry to create what was referred to as the best barrel, to basically incent technological change and to set a signal to the market as a whole in order to create a best barrel and to do that under the emissions cap and to do that while working on the methane reduction and improving energy efficiency and incenting renewable energy, to do all these things and to do so in a way that would last over a long period of time so as to provide predictability and certainty for investors. He talked about how in these rooms you saw the mood change and you saw the investors go: “Okay. This is good. I can go back to my major, major funds and talk about how there's actually a long-term strategy for this industry in Alberta. They get this problem. They are moving at breakneck speeds to take the carbon out of the barrel." That is paired, of course, with it coming from a jurisdiction which is preferable on a number of other fronts – you know, socio, political, economic fronts – in order to therefore maintain the attractiveness of investing in Alberta.

Of course, he then, after describing this, goes on to talk about the uncertainty that he has heard about from some of these folks since the new government has come in and they have embarked upon this plan to rip up the climate leadership plan with no significant or serious or substantive plan to replace it in any kind of meaningful way. You know, many of these investors say: "Yeah. Well, you know what? We know where this is going, and one day we're going to have the Wild West of environmental consideration under the current government, and then presumably at some point the pendulum will swing back and another government will come in and try to do the right thing." Without holding to a thoughtful plan that investors and industry can work within but instead embarking upon this sort of very short-term approach that's being embraced by this government through Bill 1, what we are doing is creating uncertainty for investors who ultimately want to find a long-term destination for their investment funds that they believe can withstand what is coming in terms of the world expectations and demands around best-barrel economics.

I probably have not done justice to the argument that Eric Denhoff makes in my brief summary there, but I would urge members here to read all of the things that he has to say about the climate leadership plan because he probably knows it better than anybody. He served as a tremendous leader in this province, and he worked diligently and tirelessly to lead the country in thoughtful, creative, evidence-based, science-based efforts to tackle what is, without question, the biggest problem in our generation and facing our generation and probably generations to come.

You know, I speak on behalf of our whole caucus when I say – and I think on behalf of many, many Albertans, too – that we owe a tremendous debt of gratitude to Eric Denhoff.

Anyway, unfortunately, we are not always privileged to have people with that level of intellect and foresight and stature with us as long as we would like or as consistently as we would like when looking for leadership in our government. We are, as a result, dealing now with this bill, which, for the reasons that Eric Denhoff outlined as well as the reasons that I outlined in speaking to it at second reading, should be rejected. It is going to lead to the termination of many, many programs that were designed to finally get Alberta on the right track to reducing our emissions.

Was every program perfect? Absolutely not. Could they have been improved? Absolutely. Did we need to continue working with Albertans and with industry to make sure that we took this program and this plan and this initiative and got it better and better? Absolutely. Are we going backwards 25 years by cancelling this program? You betcha, Mr. Speaker, we sure are.

You know, I've been going to a lot of graduations the last little while, and I have to tell you that there are a lot of kids out there who are profoundly disappointed with the absolute absence of leadership in the majority of seats in this House. As I've said before, we do have an obligation to do what we can, even if we are a smaller country. I'm going to continue to pay my taxes. I think everybody here in this caucus is going to continue to pay theirs, and sooner or later folks over there are going to have to realize that they have an obligation to do the same.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available for questions and comments. Are there any?

Seeing none, anyone wishing to speak to Bill 1? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise this evening to speak to Bill 1, as my colleague refers to it: a bill to implement the Trudeau carbon tax. I will not be supporting Bill 1 because I believe that climate change is a very serious problem that we need to tackle as a province, as a country, as a globe and work towards making strong progress because this is such an urgent issue not only for our society but also our economy, to all facets of life. We keep hearing – at least I do – on the news, through discussions with colleagues the very real impacts that it's having, not even just locally but economically – insurance companies having to adjust how they provide insurance because of climate change – and its impact in so many facets of our lives.

I know, Mr. Speaker, from the work that I've done representing the people of Edmonton-Mill Woods, talking to the constituents in Edmonton-Mill Woods, that Albertans do want to tackle these tough problems. They do want to talk about solutions and ways to address it. That is what is missing in Bill 1. It does not introduce a plan to address climate change. What it does do is bring us a step closer to having the Trudeau carbon tax as opposed to the made-in-Alberta solution that was the climate leadership plan, that included everything from significant rebates to help support the majority, 60 per cent, of Albertans as well as investments in major projects that benefit our local communities.

For myself as the MLA for Edmonton-Mill Woods the valley line LRT will be taking citizens in Alberta from Edmonton-City Centre, my colleague from Edmonton-City Centre, to Mill Woods on a new LRT line, which anyone who is living and travelling in Mill Woods is well aware of because the commute has really been made a lot more unpleasant with all the construction at the moment, but once it is constructed, we are looking forward to that LRT line helping to potentially change how people commute to downtown, maybe fewer cars on the road. It's going to help our community by helping our friends and family members in the community who need that way to travel and get to work and give us all more options.

We know that government shouldn't be ignoring the signs of a changing climate, and our government chose to show leadership, to take strong action, and to do that by engaging, first, in a province-wide consultation with Albertans. We struck a panel that had industry and environmental representatives on it. We learned as we went out to consult with Albertans that a lot of these really important conversations were already happening, particularly between our major oil and gas players as well as environmental activists. Conversations had already been under way to start to tackle the issues of climate change. It was some very large oil and gas companies as well as environmental representatives that advocated for a carbon tax, considered to be one of the most efficient, most effective ways to address climate change, to put a price on carbon, and to do that in a way that makes sure that it's protecting those who aren't able to make those changes as easily. So lower income Albertan seniors on fixed income: getting that rebate was a really big part of that plan.

We listened to Albertans, to a number of stakeholders in putting together the climate leadership plan and the many components within that plan, taking action for the future of our province and making sure that we had cleaner air for our kids, new jobs in renewable energy, massive investment in clean energy technology, green infrastructure, and oil sands innovation.

Being able to be a part of that through being a member of the government caucus and working with Executive Council on some of the implementation details, working with people like Eric Denhoff, that was just mentioned by the Leader of the Official Opposition, who – I have to echo all of her very, very positive comments because he was a brilliant person to work with, very, very capable, amazingly intelligent, and I know I always trusted him for the solid advice that he provided to me in my capacity in working on the climate leadership plan. Being able to take all of those pieces and take Alberta that step further forward through policies was incredibly important.

I talked about the valley line LRT in Mill Woods.

Something similar to the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar: one of the community leagues in my neighbourhood, the Ridgewood community league, has installed solar panels and done a number of energy efficiency upgrades. I know from talking to the community league executive members how excited they were to be able to take advantage of programs – and I know they used some funding through the city; I believe they did use some climate leadership funding – to be able to help the local community group. This weekend they were having a community event, and I know they take every opportunity to talk about the solar panels and the energy efficiency upgrades that they did and to share that information with other community leagues in Mill Woods but also across the city and encourage other community leagues to take advantage of that.

Other positive things that I had the chance to learn about in my time talking to people in Alberta as the MLA for Edmonton-Mill Woods include some of the very cool projects that were funded through Emissions Reduction Alberta. Because, of course, we have some interesting projects and companies throughout our province, Emissions Reduction Alberta has funded 164 projects to date on all sorts of different portfolios of technology that do greenhouse gas emissions, everything from low-emitting electricity supply and demand to cleaner oil and gas, food, fibre, and bioindustries. When I was able to go and help announce some of these ERA-funded projects, one that caught my eye from my background in technology was one that was going to use software to make the heating and cooling of buildings more efficient, a very interesting project that would not only impact the greenhouse gas emissions for a particular building but was something that, if successful, could then be expanded and that technology used in other places.

Those types of investments were a big part of the overall climate leadership plan, the funding that helped to pay for those types of investments through ERA, other smaller types of investments through Energy Efficiency Alberta. I think it's really important to note that until Energy Efficiency Alberta was created as part of the climate leadership plan, Alberta was the only province or jurisdiction in all of North America – every single U.S. state and every Canadian province except us had an energy efficiency agency. We were definitely behind the eight ball.

Part of the reason that we saw such huge uptake for some of the programs, waiting lists of people was because there was really a demand for this. Albertans wanted to make those upgrades to help improve their energy efficiency, and the various projects and programs, for every dollar invested, returned $3.30 to Albertans' pockets. I know that a lot of the work Energy Efficiency Alberta did as well as other programs helped to create that solar industry boom that we've been seeing in our province, with the solar industry growing by nearly 500 per cent and our installed solar capacity going from 6 megawatts in 2015 to 35 in 2018. Making sure that people had the opportunity to participate through programs like Energy Efficiency Alberta was a big part of the climate leadership plan and something that a lot of Albertans were really excited to be part of.

Now, as my colleague from St. Albert mentioned during one of her responses to Bill 1, there were different tools you could use to find out what kinds of investments had been made in your particular area of the province. When I looked at Edmonton-Mill Woods, I saw that over $1.5 million had been reinvested in the communities. I can tell you that being in a neighbourhood that was built kind of between the late '70s, mostly in the '80s – and most homes completed construction in the '90s. A lot of those energy efficiency upgrades were appreciated. I know I talked to homeowners who had the opportunity, through the climate leadership plan, to make upgrades in their own homes that made a real difference.

But I also talked to a number of constituents in Mill Woods where the rebates made a significant difference in their lives and made their lives more affordable as well as offsetting the carbon levy costs. With Bill 1, the bill to implement the Trudeau carbon tax, those rebates will no longer be available for lower income Albertans and will leave them worse off, with no alternate support.

We also worked, through the climate leadership plan, to support not only individuals, not only major projects, but also small businesses, through the small-business tax cut, cutting small-business tax by a third, reinvesting $220 million to help save business owners more than a half a billion dollars over three years. Those types of initiatives were ones that we were able to do through having that made-in-Alberta climate leadership plan versus the implementation of a federal carbon tax, where we won't have that same flexibility.

Making sure that we are treating climate change as a serious and critical issue is really important. Madam Speaker, one of the main reasons that I will not be supporting Bill 1, although I am very pleased to be able to rise to speak to it, is because it doesn't offer that alternative path forward. It removes the carbon levy without replacing it or coming up with kind of next steps or what we can do going forward to be leaders and to take action on what is a very serious problem. I mean, talk to any high school students graduating. I know that in the graduating classes I've had the chance to interact with, it's been brought up to me proactively a number of times. I think our youth are really attuned to the need to make sure that we continue to take action on this very important issue.

Right now this bill is going to eliminate an important revenue stream that has been supporting renewable, energy efficiency, rebate programs, ERA, and very interesting technology. It's going to threaten critical transit and infrastructure projects, and it's going to cancel a lot of construction and climate leadership plan related jobs as well as put our new solar industry at risk. Making sure that we are approaching this in a knowledgeable way, that we are thinking about all of the jobs that had been created as part of the climate leadership plan, over 7,000 of them in the first two years, with thousands more potentially to come, and having an alternative, having supports for those new industries, for those jobs is really important.

Of course, finally, I think it's really important to note that we were on track to cut more than 50 megatonnes of emissions over the next 10 years and doing that in a collaborative way with industry. The Leader of the Official Opposition mentioned Eric Denhoff, and one of the ways that I had the opportunity to work with Deputy Minister Denhoff, when he was in that role, was working on and refining the carbon competitiveness incentive regulation. That's work that doesn't get talked about a lot but was really important because it looked at the impacts on different industries and different operators in wildly different technology sectors. It had to be very, very detailed work, with thousands of different pieces of information going into that, and working with . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Any comments or questions under 29(2)(a)? Seeing none, are there any other speakers? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. Through you to all the members of the Assembly, I want to wish you all a very good evening. It's always a pleasure to get up and speak in the House. As you all know, I love to speak. I know that our Speaker, Mr. Cooper, always had a big smile on his face . . .

Member Loyola: Oh, pardon me.

Our Speaker, when he was in the benches, used to love it when I got up to speak. He'd listen very intently – right? – with a big smile on his face, because, of course, he always knew I had something to say of interest.

With that being said, I stand to speak against Bill 1 this evening. Of course, one of the major reasons why I cannot possibly support this bill is that it has no alternative.

I want to take a step back because for 44 years we had a Conservative government in this province, and they had more than ample opportunity to not only address the issue – not only address the issue – but to actually bring people together, because governing should be about bringing all people together, not sowing seeds of division and placing one group's interests against another. But, of course, that's what we're seeing. We're seeing it again now that we have our good friends in the UCP caucus governing here.

I don't doubt that they represent a good number of Albertans, that they were able to convince Albertans that the carbon levy was a bad thing. One of the things that I learned really early on when I started learning about politics, leadership, and governance was that in politics it's really easy to misinform people and miseducate people. I believe that's what has happened here, Madam Speaker. I think that our leader of the Alberta NDP here and Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition highlighted very well some of the pieces of misinformation that were just being handed out to people in the community as if they were facts and truths. You know, it's sad. It's very sad because that is the way that you sow division amongst people. When you hijack the truth, when you purposefully misinform people for your own political gain, that to me is suspect.

But if you could honestly stand on the other side of this House and have your facts straight and you could convince me with numbers, with facts, with research and you're telling me that this is the truth, that this is what the statistics demonstrate, I would be one of the first ones to say: okay; let's take a look at this. If I can believe the statistics and the research that you're presenting to me and you can convince me that this would be better for all Albertans, heck, I'd even vote for it.

But, Madam Speaker, I cannot vote for Bill 1 because, you see, the whole premise upon which it lies, to me, is a mistruth. There was so much misinformation out there, and no matter how hard we tried as a government to actually get the facts out there in front of people, people unfortunately were buying the myth. They were buying the lies. Not only that, they were going out and repeating these lies, and it's sad for me, because . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. member, I'd just caution you with some of the words involving "lies" and "lying." Those are most certainly words we don't use in this House. Please continue.

Member Loyola: We do believe that people do tell lies, though, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. member, it was so pleasant in here when I arrived, and I was so much looking forward to the words and the thoughts that you were going to share with all members in this House, as you have done with Mr. Speaker. I would maybe hope that you could entertain us in such a fashion as you would for Mr. Speaker.

Member Loyola: To me it doesn't matter who's sitting in the Speaker's chair, Madam Speaker. I would continue to use the same language that I always do. But at the pleasure of Madam Speaker I will not use that four-letter word for the remainder of my time here in the House at this moment.

Where was I?

An Hon. Member: Telling lies.

Member Loyola: Oh, yeah. Spreading misinformation. This is one of the biggest problems that we have in our political system right now, that for the sake of ideology we turn statistics and we manipulate or we use only certain numbers that will support our ideological arguments. But are we here to work towards a particular ideology, or are we here to make the best decisions for all Albertans?

I remember so many times when I used to sit on the other side of the House and the opposition at that time would accuse us of being ideological. The funny thing, though, was that the opposition didn't see that they were also being totally and completely entrenched in their own ideology when they were getting up to say their arguments. You know what, Madam Speaker? I'm not going to just say that it was the opposition at that time. We all need to do better. I'm sure that many people in this House know that I'm probably as ideological as they come. The reason why is because I don't stop being a dreamer, being an idealist, believing that we can create a better world for all people. I'm never going to stop being an idealist because at the end of the day what's driving me is wanting to make sure that we build a better society, a better place to live not only for my own children but for everybody's children.

You know, the good Member for Edmonton-Rutherford spoke previously on other readings of the bill about indigenous culture and indigenous cosmology and understanding. One of the things that I love that our government did was that we brought all people to the table to discuss how we were going to deal with climate change as the principle problem of our generation and those that follow. Let me tell you, Madam Speaker, that we have a lot to learn from indigenous people. We have so much to learn from indigenous people here in this province and in this country and across the world because, as I'm sure that you've heard and may even well know, a part of indigenous governance and indigenous decision-making is understanding very well how the decisions you're going to make today are going to affect the people seven generations down the road. I think that we need to do a lot more reflecting on exactly that.

If you're going to get up in this House and you're going to present a bill that's saying: "Look, we don't want this carbon tax. We know that. We don't want the carbon tax, but we are going to do nothing to address climate change right now, when it's the principal problem of our generation" – you don't want to deal with the problem? How can that be? This is serious, members. You're seriously going to sit on the other side of that House, present this in here, and then say: "We have no alternative to address climate change here in the province of Alberta”? That’s one of the principal reasons why I cannot vote for this bill, Madam Speaker.

There is also the matter of the fact that the federal government was going to implement its own carbon levy or carbon tax, as the members from across the way love to call it, on us regardless. At least what we came up with in the climate leadership plan when we were in government was an Alberta-based solution. Yes, people had to pay their share, but it was a progressive tax that was going to help those who had lower incomes through the rebate, and we well know that 60 per cent of Albertans were getting that full rebate. Where did this fact fall off? How come that wasn’t something that people were talking about? Now Albertans are still going to have to pay their carbon tax, but now there’s no rebate for them. There’s no rebate for them.

These individuals that you say that you care so much about and that you’re trying to save them from the carbon tax, well – guess what? – they’re still going to have to pay the carbon tax, but now the middle- and lower income ones aren’t going to get the rebate that they were previously getting under the climate leadership plan that the Alberta NDP government had implemented back in November of 2015. Tell me how they are better off. I’m looking at the members across the way. Tell me how they’re better off now. I see nothing. I see blank faces. Oh, I got one face over here with a big smile.

Eliminating that revenue stream which not only was going as a rebate to actually help middle- and lower income Albertans, which now they’re not going to get whatsoever, was also going to support renewable energy and the energy efficiency and rebate programs. We were actually making inroads and taking steps to do it exactly the way our indigenous brothers and sisters and two-spirited people were actually engaging us to think about.

Not only that, Madam Speaker, because it’s really important that we were able to bring indigenous voices to the table – not only were we bringing indigenous voices to the table; we were also bringing environmentalists, activists, and organizations to the table as well. And then not only that; we were bringing in people from the petroleum sector. We had everybody sitting at the same table trying to determine what was the best way that we can move forward here in the province of Alberta so that at the end of the day we were going to be doing best for future generations of Albertans.

The Deputy Speaker: Any comments or questions under (29)(2)(a)?

Any members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Madam Speaker. This is third reading – correct? – not 29(2)(a)?

The Deputy Speaker: Yup.

Mr. Bilous: Excellent. Okay. Well, I’ll rise to make a few comments about this bill because I think there have been comments made by the government, by the Premier, by others that I think have omitted some of the facts around the price on carbon, whatever you want to call it. Whether you want to call it a carbon tax, a carbon levy, regardless, you know, one of the things that we committed to when we introduced the carbon pricing in addition to a broader climate leadership plan was the fact that every penny that was collected from it would be reinvested. So it’s interesting how members of the government will talk about these poor, low-income seniors that the carbon tax ended up making unable to pay their bills. Well, the reality, Madam Speaker, is that two-thirds of Albertans received a carbon rebate, and in fact they got the full rebate, whether or not they only needed 10 per cent of it or 20 per cent of it. I mean, that was just one of the issues.

The other one that I find interesting is that the government seems to think it came up with some novel, new idea to create a fund to help some of the biggest emitters innovate. Well, we did that. We did that, and in fact I stood with the former Minister of Environment and Parks to announce a $1.4 billion innovation fund. I would love to see the current government top that because we know that through innovation, companies, especially the largest emitters, are able to reduce their footprint, reduce their GHGs, become more competitive. Therefore, their balance sheet looks better at the same time as reducing their GHGs and doing their part globally to reduce our carbon footprint.

Really, it was a win-win solution, and in fact it was industry that had said: we agree to a price on carbon, but there needs to be an investment through what’s collected to help us drive innovation and invest in that because developing new processes is not a cheap thing to do. There needs to be an incentive. There needs to be a reward at the end. We saw that.

In fact, you know, I was singing the praises of Alberta Innovates, which has done a remarkable job in many different areas, from medical biosciences to energy, to environment, to health innovations, that they really have helped drive solutions. In fact, it’s Imperial Oil at Emerald Lake that is using a technology that was co-developed with Alberta Innovates many, many years ago that actually reduces their water consumption by 25 per cent. Now, Madam Speaker, that’s a significant amount of water consumption reduction for a brand new project. That’s an incredible step in the right direction. We want to encourage and incentivize more of that around the province to then be exported internationally.

I would argue that Alberta is a world leader, but it takes investment. It takes a government to act with courage to recognize that, you know, climate change is real and that meaningful action needs to take place, not promises of “one day we’ll bring in something,” not leaving the door open for Ottawa to impose its solution on Alberta. I mean, I know the Premier is a big fan of Ottawa. I think he’s itching to get back there, quite frankly, if I read between the lines, and wants to impose the practices of Ottawa on Alberta.

Well, I think Alberta has its own proud history of traditions. I’m proud of it. In fact, I can tell you that some of the sweeping changes that the government made to the standing orders I find quite frustrating to the spirit and the history of this place, considering, you know, that the hon. Premier has only been in this place for a short period of time compared with many other members.

There is a history of a hundred years in this place with a number of different traditions. Honestly, Madam Speaker, I haven’t been here that long. I’ve only been here since 2012, but I’ve come to appreciate the uniqueness that the Alberta Legislature has even in comparison with other provinces. There are things we do here that I wouldn’t want to change, that I wouldn’t want to bring in from Saskatchewan or any other province, quite frankly.

It’s a little disappointing that the government is eliminating this without a plan B. The plan B: we’ll have to wait for it. Again, what does that mean for our heavier emitters who have been investing hundreds of millions of dollars to be more energy efficient? Now suddenly it’s not just the Wild West; it’s pollute as much as you want because there’s no incentive otherwise. I think we have seen in the last couple of years a significant number of emissions reductions. We were on track over the course of the next 11 years to make significant strides.

You know, China, until they do things we shouldn't – I mean, I think what members miss is that China is investing hundreds of billions, with a "b," of dollars in innovation, in reducing their GHGs, reducing their footprint. They've cancelled hundreds of coal-fired electricity plants. The difference between China and Alberta is that, yes, right now, today, they are emitting and polluting much more than we are as a province. Obviously, population has something to do with it and land size as well. But I can tell you that when they decide to turn the corner and take meaningful action to address the issues and concerns of climate change, they will move very, very quickly. Quite frankly, they are about to blow by many, many countries who will say: "Wow. We didn't see that coming. Who was that that just passed us?" They're making historic investments in solar, wind, and in geothermal.

You know, for me, I think that part of this was an opportunity that we have. Part of it as well is helping to tell the Alberta story about our energy sector, giving them some additional tools when we talk about how responsible our producers are here and that we need markets to sell our products to. Part of it as well, Madam Speaker, was the number of jobs that were created by these investments, right? I mean, again, it's one thing to hear government members talk about how jobs are their number one priority. Well, here was an opportunity and a way that there were jobs, thousands of jobs, being created through the investment in renewables, our auctions, et cetera. Those are now going to be jobs lost. I can't wait for tomorrow for the government to take credit for all of the lost jobs that are now fleeing the province. Again, Alberta was the number one destination for renewables. We were the province to invest in. Now people are scratching their heads going: I don't know if there's anywhere in Canada that is really interested in aggressively pursuing these new jobs in green technology and in green opportunities.

For me, Madam Speaker, again, I recognize and appreciate that not everyone was a fan of the carbon tax. There were those that were frustrated by it. I completely understand. I recognize that there were additional costs put on small businesses by that. But I can tell you that where the Premier was wrong in his speech at, I believe, the opening of Bill 2 was in saying that there was nothing for businesses. Well, we actually reduced the small-business tax rate by 33 per cent – I think that that's quite significant to help offset some of those costs – in addition to having programs for businesses to make meaningful investments that would save them money over the course of the lifetime of their buildings and assets. I get that people may want to see the savings today – they want an immediate reward – but the reality of these types of energy savings and energy investments is that they do pay off over the lifetime of a facility, and a lot of people recognize that.

The other thing that's interesting is that, you know, you look at some of the global leaders as far as international energy players and the fact that they are seriously lobbying governments in North America to keep a price on carbon because of, again, the significant investments that they've made, investments that they recognize will not only give them a leg up when we look at other companies who are also looking to Alberta companies as far as how to emulate their processes.

Again, you look at the innovation that exists in Alberta, and sometimes there needs to be a bit of an incentive to innovate. I can tell you that when you look at SAGD technology, that was developed here in Alberta. That is used around the world. It was developed in Alberta because companies had to innovate and find less expensive ways to get our crude out of the ground. We know that we have the wherewithal to do it, but it takes leadership. It takes leadership by government. What we are seeing today is not leadership. We are seeing a government taking the province backwards in an effort to – sure, it will save some Albertans some money in the short term, but it has long-term consequences, Madam Speaker.

You know, I think we would have liked to have seen a proposal from the government of: what do you plan to replace this with? Right now all we're getting is promises that one day there'll be some kind of new plan, hopefully before the Prime Minister rams his plan down our throats. But that is the reality. In the meantime we're probably going to waste millions of dollars in court challenges that will end up, well, losing us money, again, money that could be invested in meaningful things. But as we've seen even in Saskatchewan's appeal, I think they're in a losing battle. We would rather have seen: let's look at creative ways to address climate change. If our method wasn't accepted by this government, fair enough, but then propose something, counterpropose.

With that, Madam Speaker, I will not be supporting this bill in its current state and will urge all members to do the same.

The Deputy Speaker: Any comments or questions under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, any more speakers to the bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday.

Mr. Carson: Thank you very much. Once again, it's an honour to have the ability to rise today, and I would thank the constituents of the community of Edmonton-West Henday for giving me this opportunity to do so. It's with great frustration that I have to stand before my constituents and tell them that once again the will of this Assembly was not to work in their best interests.

Now, the fact is that we've spent a week and a half, two weeks, roughly, discussing this piece of legislation. Well, the opposition has. The government has sat there doing God knows what. I would love to find out what that is because it's surely not working in the best interests of my constituents. When I go back to them, they're going to have several questions for me. How could a government get rid of a real plan and implement absolutely nothing in place of it? It's a question that we've brought up several times on the opposition side.

Now, if this government is so proud of the legislation that they have before us, then why, through the readings that we've been through and through Committee of the Whole, where we put forward reasoned amendments to move this to committee to have real discussions about the implications not only to the social fabric of our communities but also to the economic fabric – even then, I don't know. Maybe one person stood up and spewed some rhetoric about why we didn't have the time to move forward on discussing this in committee. But I would argue that we don't have the time to repeal this legislation and try and come up with something else, whenever that might be: in the fall, in a few years, maybe never.

Now, I want to share a quote with this House. It's from Helen Keller, and I find it quite relevant in this moment. The quote is: "Science may have found a cure for most evils; but it has found no remedy for the worst of them all – the apathy of human beings." I find that quite relevant because ahead of us we have the greatest threat to humankind, and we're going to sit in this Legislature and once again say: "We'll put it off. We'll give you back your $200 a year, and we'll worry about this later."

It is completely shameful, and really I'm not surprised based on the legislation we've seen come forward before this House. We have the Minister of Labour and Immigration, that wants to attack the youth of our province, knowing full well, I suppose, that there are no repercussions to doing that, that as far as we can tell, the laws do not protect against age discrimination against those who are under the age of 18, something I'm sure he's quite proud of, finding that loophole.

We have a government that is not going to take action, so I thought it very important to one more time stand before this House and say that I tried. I tried, and the government did absolutely nothing. They said that they have a mandate to do nothing, which is not true. The people who voted for you expect more. They expect you to bring forward solutions. You can repeal the price on carbon, as detrimental to our communities as that will be, but you should have real solutions to put in place of it, of which you have absolutely none.

It's unbelievable that we have a minister of environment who's proud of this. He's proud to repeal environmental protections. You have more than enough people on your front bench to protect the will of businesses. We've seen it. We've seen it.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. member, through the chair.

Mr. Carson: Excuse me, Madam Speaker.

We've seen, through your legislation that you've put forward so far, that you have no problem representing businesses, and it's, I suppose, a thing that government should do. You know, red tape reduction, creating regulations that allow businesses to thrive in our province: of course, that's important. But when we have a minister of environment who's actively working against the environment, it's completely disappointing.

I will not be supporting Bill 1. I am, frankly, ashamed that I have to sit in this Legislature and vote against what is and may be the most important piece of legislation in terms of environmental protections that we'll see for years to come. I doubt it, but I hope that this government has something to put in its place in the very near future.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Any comments or questions under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, any members wishing to speak? The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. Great to have an opportunity to rise. What an exciting evening, an exciting evening for Albertans. Hopefully, they're going to be able to see the carbon tax repeal act finally pass third reading in this Legislature. A promise made, a promise kept, something that the largest number of Albertans in the history of this province came out and cast a vote for, that was clearly campaigned on. I was listening to the hon. member's comments previously, and I notice that he kind of glossed over that fact, that the vast majority of Albertans spoke loud and clear on April 16, when they sent the NDP to that side of the House, to opposition, because of many things but largely, for sure, because of the carbon tax.

Now, it's disappointing to also see the hon. member spend time articulating and saying that this side of the House does not care about the environment and that this side of the House has not presented any alternatives when it comes to climate change and to dealing with emissions inside our province. Nothing could be further from the truth, Madam Speaker. I won't raise it up because I'm sure you'd call it a prop, but the United Conservative Party ran on a clear platform. It made clear what we would do when it came to emissions. It made clear that we did have a plan that was a different approach than the hon. members'.

While I understand that the hon. members in the NDP continue to want to hang on, to desperately hang on to the carbon tax, the reality is that that was all economic pain, no environmental gain. They know that. That was troubling, hurting people in Alberta. They only want to talk tonight about the direct emission costs, the direct costs on fuel and stuff to Albertans. That was bad enough. They keep glossing over the fact that it ended up being a tax on everything. It increased the costs of everything inside our society because everything here comes by train or truck – it needs fuel to be able to get it there – and it ended up increasing the costs of everything.

I was interested to listen to the Leader of the Opposition's comments earlier this evening as she spent a considerable amount of time attempting to attack the Premier on his speech at third reading of Bill 1 earlier. I guess it would be last week, Madam Speaker. I'm not going to be able to spend too much time rebutting everything that she said, but the one thing that she did spend a considerable amount of time on was attacking the Premier on a situation that took place in the constituency of Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre, particularly in my hometown of Sundre, where the Premier spoke about the West Country seniors' centre. I want to be clear to the House that the Premier did in fact go to the West Country seniors' centre. I was there with him. Thank you for coming, through you, Madam Speaker, to him. Thank you for coming to Sundre and seeing what was taking place there. The Premier took exception to the fact that we would bring up how they treated seniors inside my community as an example of how seniors and fixed-income seniors were treated across this province when it came to the NDP's carbon tax. The reality is that the NDP put that seniors' centre – that's just one example. Those examples are throughout the entire province, but that's one example of the NDP putting that seniors' centre in a situation where they may have had to shut their doors, fixed-income seniors who are just trying to have a place to be able to recreate inside our communities. Madam Speaker, I know that you would have similar stories inside your constituency.

When those seniors came and said, "Look at what your carbon tax is doing to us; it's a regressive tax that's hurting us," this government responded, at least their staff did, by telling those seniors to have a fundraiser to pay for the carbon tax. It's just shameful. It's absolutely shameful. It's shameful that the Premier, who I asked many times to – or, sorry, the Leader of the Opposition. Muscle memory.

Mr. Kenney: The then Premier.

Mr. Jason Nixon: . . . the then Premier, who I asked many times to apologize inside this House for the way she treated my constituents, never would apologize for that. But tonight, Madam Speaker, I'm excited to say that at least they're finally going to have some justice when it comes to the carbon tax because the United Conservative Party is going to keep their promise. We're going to repeal the carbon tax and we're going to go on and we're going to focus on what Albertans have sent us to focus on, which is actually tackling climate change and emissions not taxing fixed-income seniors and punishing them, and I think that's great news.

The Deputy Speaker: Any comments or questions under 29(2)(a)?
Would the hon. Premier like to close debate?

Mr. Kenney: Yes, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: My apologies, hon. Premier.

Is there anybody else who would like to speak?

Seeing none, now would the hon. Premier like to close debate?
Be patient with the new Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Kenney: Yes, Madam Deputy Speaker, I most assuredly would. After three years of working towards this day, a great day for Albertans, a promise made, a promise kept, I am honoured to rise in debate on third reading, to close debate on Bill 1, An Act to Repeal the Carbon Tax. I do so holding in my hands the most detailed electoral platform ever offered to Albertans in this most recent election, in which, at page 17, the party, which I have the honour of leading, committed to the following:

The NDP introduced the largest tax increase in Alberta history without campaigning on it. The job-killing carbon tax takes in $1.4 billion each year, making it more expensive to hire employees, move goods around the province, and heat homes.

And the current carbon tax is just the start – the NDP plans to increase their cash grab by at least 67% to $2.5 billion, in step with Prime Minister Trudeau.

[But] a United Conservative government will scrap the carbon tax, leaving that money in the pockets of families, businesses, and non-profits while creating [at least] 6,000 new jobs by 2024.

A United Conservative government will [therefore]:

- Introduce Bill 1, The Carbon Tax Repeal Act.

That was our commitment to Albertans, Madam Speaker, which tonight we make good on in this vote. While we do so, we say that we place the good, common-sense judgment of ordinary Albertans ahead of the central management and the meddling of nanny state politicians who want to dictate to ordinary people how they should live their lives.

This failed experiment, the NDP carbon tax, was all about punishing Albertans for living normal lives in this cold, northern, often challenging environment. This was the NDP telling widows that they had to turn the heat down at home when it was 25 below outside. This was about the NDP telling working men that they shouldn't drive their pickups with their tools and their equipment to work anymore. This was the NDP telling soccer moms and hockey dads that they should be punished for filling up the minivan to take the kids to practice. This was the NDP saying that they were going to squeeze Albertans in the midst of a job-killing recession to generate more government revenue in order to waste it on low-flow shower heads and, quotes, free light bulbs installed by a company hired from Ontario. At one level, Madam Speaker, this was an act of gross political arrogance from a socialist government informed by the failed philosophy of central planning and the politics of resentment seeking to punish people simply for living ordinary lives.

Madam Speaker, what I find so remarkable is that even after the massive, unprecedented electoral repudiation of the NDP, at the centre of which was a complete public rejection of their carbon tax, it appears that they will stand in this place tonight to defend the carbon tax that they hid from voters, which they imposed on Albertans, and for which they refuse to apologize.

But there are still minutes left, Madam Speaker. There are moments, precious moments left, during which I would appeal to my friends from the NDP opposite to reconsider. Now is a moment for the NDP to show Albertans something that has been wholly absent from that party since their massive repudiation on election day. Do you know what that something is? Humility. The ability to admit that you were wrong.

You know, one of the great Premiers that we had in this place was the late Ralph Klein. He wasn't perfect, Lord knows, but when he made big mistakes, he admitted to them. It wasn't too much for him to stand up and say when he was wrong. Well, Madam Speaker, now is the moment for the NDP to stand up and admit that they were wrong.

You know, Madam Speaker, in my speech at the beginning of this third reading debate I mentioned how the NDP's sister party through the international consortium of a group – the party is called Socialist International. Their sister party in Australia, the Labor Party, imposed, much like the NDP here, a job-killing, intrusive, punitive carbon tax on Australians in one of our sister Commonwealth democracies. Guess what? Much like Albertans a few weeks ago, the Australian voters completely repudiated that seven years ago. Is it not instructive that the Australian Labor Party, the socialist sister party of the NDP, has since abandoned any pretense of imposing a carbon tax in the most recent election, that the French Socialist Party has done the same thing? You have sister parties of the NDP who have learned their lesson, who have listened to the voters, who have acted with humility, who have recognized that punishing people for heating their homes is not an environmental policy. The NDP is increasingly an outlier, an aberration, an exception to the rule. The Alberta NDP in its stubbornness refuses to acknowledge how wrong they were to mislead voters so profoundly in 2015 by failing to disclose to them their intention to impose the largest tax increase in Alberta history.

Madam Deputy Speaker, tonight is a night of reckoning. This is when democracy happens. This is when the hundreds of thousands of Albertans who signed petitions, who sent e-mails, who spoke to their MLAs, but who were so obviously ignored by the previous government, this is when they find their voice, the quiet Albertans, the hard-working Albertans who are not animated by the politics of resentment, who do not think that "profit" is a dirty word, who do not think that heating your home is a crime to be punished by the government, who do not think filling up your gas tank is something to be penalized by a punitive carbon tax. This is the moment for them, all of those Albertans, quiet Albertans who have waited so patiently for an opportunity to speak through this recent election. Tonight is the night when their collective democratic will will be reflected in a vote on the floor of this Assembly.

I say to all of those Albertans: we have kept faith. We as a government in our first commitment said that by May 30 there would be no carbon tax, and with the adoption of this bill, this act tonight, Madam Speaker – and I hope it gets proclamation into law by Her Honour the Honourable the Lieutenant Governor tomorrow – this bill will be effective retroactive to May 30, 2019. With it we will deliver to Albertans the single largest tax cut in Alberta history. We will repeal the single largest act of political dishonesty and cynicism, I submit, in Alberta political history. We will say that Albertans will focus in concrete and practical ways on the environmental challenges that we face, but in ways that do not punish ordinary people struggling to live ordinary lives.

Madam Speaker, with this we move Alberta from the isolation in which the NDP put us where we were aligned with only one province, their socialist friends in Victoria. And now we join the growing number of provincial governments in Canada, who constitute now a majority of provincial governments, defending taxpayers, defending prosperity, defending our energy sector in opposing punitive carbon taxes. Tonight Alberta joins our friends in Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, New Brunswick, and other provinces that have also opposed the carbon tax as well as the Northwest Territories.

Madam Speaker, today we move from the marginalization of the NDP back into the Canadian mainstream. We move from a policy that imposed pain on people in a recession to one that relieves the tax burden on Albertans. We move to a policy that will relieve average families of up to $1,200 a year from a tax grab just to pad government coffers. Tonight we move to relieving small businesses of a cost of on average $4,500 a year. Tonight we move against the Trudeau government's efforts to, with the co-operation of socialist parties like the NDP, increase these punitive taxes again and again.

Mr. Speaker, tonight we move to make history. Tonight we move to stand up for democracy, for taxpayers, for jobs, for growth, for prosperity, for the integrity of a promise made and a promise kept.

[The voice vote indicated that the motion for third reading carried]

[Several members rose calling for a division. The division bell was rung at 9:28 p.m.]

The Speaker: I see the hon. Government House Leader rising.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. What a great and historical night. I'm so happy to see the carbon tax repeal act pass in this place tonight. I think there's been a lot of progress made. I thank all members of the House for their co-operation. As such, I move to adjourn until tomorrow at 10 a.m.

The Speaker: Just seeking some clarification from the hon. Government House Leader. Is he confident in the adjournment time until tomorrow at 10 a.m.?

Mr. Jason Nixon: It is Tuesday? [interjections] Yeah, I am confident that it's 10 a.m.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 9:46 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

10 a.m.

Tuesday, June 4, 2019

[The Speaker in the chair]

Prayers

The Speaker: Good morning.

Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and her government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideas but, laying aside all private interests and prejudices, keep in mind their responsibilities to seek to improve the condition of all. Amen.

You may be seated.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders

Bill 3

Job Creation Tax Cut (Alberta Corporate Tax Amendment) Act

[Adjourned debate May 29: Mr. Toews]

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there any wishing to speak? I see the Member for Calgary-Mountain View rising.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise today and speak to Bill 3. Interestingly, this sort of politics was one of the things that ultimately drove me into politics. I think probably my biggest problem with this bill is that it won't work. That alone doesn't necessarily mean that it's damaging, but I think there's an enormous amount of good evidence that it won't work. I think the thing that makes it damaging is the fact that it blows a gigantic hole in the budget at precisely a time when Alberta doesn't need – I mean, no one ever needs a gigantic hole blown in the budget, but I think it's precisely right now, when we're trying to recover from an unprecedented drop in oil prices, when we're trying to recover from an incredibly difficult time, that blowing a hole in the budget to achieve nothing is the worst possible plan we could have.

One of the other things about this bill is the title. It's one of these things that used to irritate me before I went into politics and actually continues to irritate me to this day. It's all flash and no substance. The title says that it will create jobs, but there's no evidence that it will. Even on the government's own numbers, which are rose-coloured glasses, as I think Mr. Jean put it, it's not going to have the impact they say that it's going to have. Basically, it's a political game. It plays on the fears that people are quite justifiably and reasonably experiencing, and rather than trying to have a difficult conversation and do a difficult thing and transition the economy and make us more resilient to these changes in the price of oil, the government has decided to introduce a bill that sort of waves its hands and pretends to do something but doesn't actually achieve anything.

Trickle-down economics: I mean, I think it's become pretty clear by this point that it doesn't work. I think most folks know it doesn't work. You know, it was an interesting theory. If you look back at textbooks where it was taught in the '70s, there are some interesting examples whereby philanthropists in certain countries who were running companies donated money to put a fountain in the town square. Well, that's fine, but it's not a working theory. It's a story.

It's a thing that happened once. So I think, Mr. Speaker, it's become increasingly clear that it hasn't worked and it won't work.

Interesting backstory on this. One of the first times I remember having a sort of genuinely political thought was actually in the 8th grade. We were doing projects on different countries in the world, and my project mates and I happened to have Brazil. We were working on a project about Brazil, and we were talking about, you know, a situation within South America and the sort of history of how things came to be the way they were. The impacts of the exporting of these sort of artificial, "Give all of the money to the rich and that will solve all of your problems," ideals that had come from the U.S. were pretty clear already at that time.

I think the fact that still today we're having these conversations and these debates and there's this idea that it might work is just wishful thinking, really. These sorts of problems are complex. The economy, especially on a world-wide scale now, is incredibly complex. People want to believe that there's a simple solution, that you just give all the money to the rich and magically that will solve all your problems, but it doesn't, and it hasn't, and I think there's no evidence that it ever will.

What there is a lot of evidence of is that people on the lower end of the income spectrum, people at the median income and below, are far more likely to spend their money in the local economy. People who make median or below, people who are spending the majority of their income in order to meet their basic needs, are going to spend it on groceries. They might buy a car a little bit earlier. They might rent a bigger apartment or even buy a house. Those individuals are going to spend their money in the local economy in a way that increases the local economy. You know, they get an extra $5 or $10 a day, and maybe they'll stop at a coffee shop on their way to work and buy a coffee.

That has a tendency to have a very beneficial impact on the economy, but this, of course, is quite the opposite. This is a move to ensure that we're putting that money not in the hands of middle-income earners, not in the hands of low-income earners, but in the hands of the highest income earners. This essentially allows corporations to give larger returns to their already fairly wealthy shareholders, who will likely not spend that money in the local economy. So it doesn't have a beneficial impact.

It also has, in my view, serious negative impacts on social mobility. If you look throughout the world, there's actually a study – I wish I could remember the name of it – that came out recently that talks about social mobility in different countries. One of the interesting things is that the U.S. has one of the lowest social mobilities in the world, and it's precisely because of policies like this, where we cut taxes on the wealthy and we cut taxes on corporations. We give away giveaways to people who have capital to input as opposed to labour to input, people who were born with money as opposed to people who are working hard. That has huge negative impacts.

Scandinavian countries, on the other hand, countries that have strong social programs, tend to have a much higher social mobility – that means that your destiny is much more determined by yourself and what you're willing to do than it is by the situation into which you were born – as opposed to the U.S. and, I guess, the place that we're trying to go to right now in Alberta.

I think the other thing is that, I mean, you can cite studies and statistics until you're blue in the face. People don't always listen to that. But I think what's interesting is that it's not particularly intuitive, this idea – the business exists to do a certain thing, say, to run a coffee shop, right? – that somehow they're managing with fewer employees than they need or that they have the right number of employees, but if they get more money, they're going to hire people to do nothing, apparently. You know, businesses will expand based on conditions, and in that case, they may hire more individuals, but just ensuring that their taxes are lower I don't think is going to have that impact.

So those are a long litany of the reasons that I don't think it will work and I don't think it's good for the economy, but the reason that I think it's genuinely bad for our society and the negative impact I think it will have is the hole it creates in the provincial finances. I definitely don't think that this is a time where we can do with $4.5 billion less.

Provincial revenues dropped significantly in 2015 as a result of the drop in the price of oil. Many of you may remember that when we had our election in 2015, everyone was very concerned because oil had dropped to $60 a barrel. Well, we didn't know what we had coming. You know, it dropped all the way to $26 a barrel. And that has – I'm sure the members on the government side are discovering this right now – a massive impact on the finances in Alberta. We had a choice at that time. We had a choice to make. Do we protect the citizens of this province, those who had paid into and rely on public health care and education and other social programs, or do we throw them under the bus? We chose to protect them, and I stand by that choice.

You know, I think we're just in a position where the economy is starting to recover. We're just in a position where we can start to head back to balance in terms of our provincial finances and do it without balancing the books on the backs of those who are most vulnerable. Instead, you've decided to create this huge hole. We already see coming from the government side the usual rhetoric that the right wing uses, "Oh, we've been misled; we were told a story; the finances are much worse than we were told they were," which, of course, isn't true.

There are accounting standards that require the government to publish budgets, and in fact Alberta has one of the most transparent budgeting processes in the entire country. The Auditor General was generally happy with our budgeting process. Across the country we're considered the gold standard in terms of the budgeting process. Now, in some cases I don't a hundred per cent agree with that because while it's very transparent to accountants, I'm not sure it's super transparent to everyone else. But that aside, I think there's no question that the budget was what it was, that there was no misleading, no wool pulling, nothing like that.

That isn't to say that the situation isn't incredibly challenging. It is incredibly challenging. I know it's challenging. I'm sure members on the government benches know it's challenging. They've certainly learned it now. When we were in government, we certainly knew it was challenging.

It requires a series of incredibly difficult decisions, balancing one thing off against another, determining what is most valuable and what must be protected, making choices like – there are 15,000 new students coming into school. What's easier to pay back? Is it easier to pay back some money that you had to pay to make sure that those students had teachers, or is it easier to recover from the fact that one of those or some of those students went in and they had challenges learning to read and they needed a teacher's aide? You know, if those children don't get that help at exactly that moment, there's nothing you can do to pay it back. They'll never necessarily recover from that. So I think it's clear, at least to me, that it's easier to pay back some money you borrowed to ensure that that student had a teacher than it is to deal with the fact that that student may have challenges reading for the rest of their lives.

I think it's the same in the health care system. I think that if you get the health care that you need, if you get the medicine or the treatment or the surgery that you need, at the end of the day, that's something that can't wait. It's something that you can't deal with later whereas, again, paying back money: maybe you can deal with that later.

Infrastructure is another thing like this. You know, for decades we had a huge infrastructure deficit in this province. We were behind on schools, we were behind on hospitals, and we were behind on roads throughout the entire province, just about everything we needed. I'm very proud that we started to make progress on that, but there's certainly more to do.

I think it's incredibly sad that we're putting that at risk, that we're putting those very students coming into school, those very people who have spent their whole lives paying into a public health care system and deserve to have it there for them when they get sick at risk. We're putting the future of our infrastructure at risk for this, which is just an ideological piece of propaganda that won't have the beneficial impacts.

I mean, even on the most charitable reading, even if we're sort of straying almost into the land of the Fraser Institute and the ilk of how to lie with statistics, you know, it still doesn't have as beneficial an impact as it's claimed to have. Even on the best read, what we're putting at risk, at the end of the day, in terms of our children, in terms of our elderly, in terms of the most vulnerable in our society, and in terms of society as a whole – there are a lot of different projects that are funded through the government that can have long-term benefits. I think it's really sad.

So those are my comments, rather lengthy, I suppose, on Bill 3. But I think, at the end of the day, the thing to note about it is that it isn't going to have, even on the best reading, anywhere near the beneficial impact it needs to for the cost, and that cost will be in terms of teachers, nurses, people who are ill, children who want to learn. I think that's really sad.

I know there's been a lot of talk from the government about not cutting those programs, and I'd love for that to be the case, but I think, given the rhetoric we're seeing already, this sort of ramp-up rhetoric, like, "Oh, it's much worse than we thought" and "Oh, blah, blah, blah . . ."

Ms Hoffman: Tough decisions.

Ms Ganley: Yeah, tough decisions, and they will be tough decisions. They're always tough decisions, but I think we need to say "tough decisions" when we're talking about an actual difficulty balancing off different interests, not when we're talking about: well, we just want a justification for the damage that we're going to do to this province.

With that, I will say that I am quite clearly going to vote against this bill, and I would urge all members of the House to do the same.

The Speaker: Questions and comments under 29(2)(a)? My apologies. We are just at the second speaker, and as such, 29(2)(a) isn't available. I thought we had proceeded further in the debate. However, we look forward to other questions and comments later this morning.

If I could indulge the House just for a brief moment, I would like to recognize a member in connection to comments made yesterday in the House. The hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo.

Member's Apology

Mr. Yao: Mr. Speaker, in regard to comments I made in my member's statement yesterday, I may have used some unparliamentary language. I wish to withdraw such unparliamentary language.*

Thank you.

*See page 293, left column, paragraph 10

The Speaker: Thank you. Consider the matter dealt with and withdrawn.

Any others wishing to speak to the bill? I see the Member for Edmonton-Glenora rising.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and I appreciate the potential retraction of the comments. I wonder if that's the entire member's statement or any specific sections. Nonetheless, it's always good for people to stand up and say when they were wrong or, in some cases, when they may have been wrong.

Debate Continued

Ms Hoffman: That being said, I want to thank the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View for the comments that she just made with regard to this bill. Certainly, making a decision today to roll back corporate tax rates by a third is, indeed, a situation that people are exercising before they have thought through, I believe, the potential ramifications of such a decision.

For example, I really appreciated hearing so many members, mostly private members but other government caucus members within cabinet as well, talking to I believe it was a government motion yesterday about how much they appreciate their local infrastructure that provides important services in their local communities: local hospitals, local schools, local government programs that help make our communities from all parts of this province strong and vibrant.

When you make a decision in isolation, like the decision to cut the revenue we receive from corporate taxes by a third without having the full budget and without having all of the other potential implications, I worry that members who paid lovely homage to these local services in their community yesterday are potentially making a decision today to kneecap those services in their own communities and in all parts of our province, quite frankly.

When I visit school groups, I often say, as I've mentioned previously, "You're my boss," and the other thing I say is, "You pay for the services that we all enjoy, all of us." So whether it be through us having government bring forward a tax regime so that all of us have an opportunity to benefit from good public education and health care and a strong policing sector, I would argue – the hon. member previous is our critic for that – that those are choices that we make together.

I also say, "You own the resources of this province," so when we make a choice as a government to set royalty rates, that's all of us collectively paying for our education. One of the reasons I say that is because I fundamentally believe it. The other reason why I say it is because I know – not myself, of course, hon. members – that sometimes students have a hard time getting out to school in the morning and thinking, like, "I don't want to go." But when you think about the fact that you're paying – all of us are paying – and that you yourselves as students are making this choice financially through your contributions through corporate taxes, through royalties to deliver a quality education system, I think it changes the mindset slightly about whether or not you should be there when you think about how we're all investing in this together because we want to make sure that every student in the province, every patient in the province has an opportunity to benefit from the wealth that we share together.

Today we are making a decision in this reading to collectively cut our wealth in terms of corporate tax revenues by a third. That's a big decision. Some of the reasons that have been given by government caucus members are around us needing to be more competitive. Well, Mr. Speaker, the B.C. corporate tax rate is 12 per cent, the same as Alberta; Saskatchewan, 12 per cent, same as Alberta; Manitoba, 12 per cent, same as Alberta; Ontario, the lowest in Canada right now, .5 per cent lower, not significant; Quebec, .4 per cent lower, again, statistically insignificant; New Brunswick, 2 per cent higher; Nova Scotia, 4 per cent higher; P.E.I., 4 per cent higher; Newfoundland, 3 per cent higher. So I would argue that when people say, "Well, we need to be more competitive," we are right in the thick of competitiveness right now. In fact, we're either tied with or lower than most jurisdictions. Only two are slightly lower than us, but it's less than 1 per cent.

So for us to be debating a bill that will roll it back by 4 per cent has us in a race to the bottom. What that means for me and for the people I represent and for the people that all of us represent is that we're making a choice to put ourselves in a frame where we can't afford the things that, when I talk to students, I say that they are making a choice to invest in. By making a choice to cut your corporate tax rate by a third, or 4 per cent, you are making a choice to have less resources available for these kids in the gallery and kids right across our province.

There are sometimes ideological reasons why people enter into that frame. Some people talk about trickle-down economics. Again, I would argue, to spill some tea on that, it's only the bottom that gets soaked. It's not the rest that get the opportunity to benefit from those reductions.

There was a really beautiful video made recently out of the U.K. where somebody is talking about tax rates and bringing in big tax cuts for the incredibly wealthy and for profitable corporations. Again, just to remind ourselves, these are only profits in excess of $500,000 a year. They were talking about how when you make those choices to put that money – all of us have collectively as a province a certain fixed pot of money, so when we're making a choice to cut a third of that pot of money and give it to profitable corporations, we're making the choice to move it out of things that are those public services that we're providing. We're also making a choice that the educational assistants who won't have positions next year or the teachers who may have reduced FTEs next year or other implications will have less money in their own pockets to invest back in that local economy.

This video out of the U.K. has a really poignant story, where they show that if you have $5 and you give it to every person in the local market, they're probably going to spend it in the local market. Or instead of giving $5 to 20 people in the local market, you can give $100 to somebody in their office, and they can choose to spend it abroad, save it, or potentially spend some of it in the local market, typically not so much.

You're making choices not just about what resources are available to those folks, but you're also making decisions about where that money goes down the road because it goes on to show that when you give it to the 20 people to spend in the local market, those local people in the local market have an extra $5 in their pockets, those vendors, and they continue to spend it in the local market as well. So it's also making a decision about ongoing, cascading implications for where that fixed amount, originally that $100, will be down the road.

I have to say that I'm concerned that we are making this decision in isolation from the budget because naturally, when you create a budget, you should be putting all of the money on the table and dividing it up. Some people put in the jar system for – I know members opposite often like to talk about a household budget. I think it's reasonable to set up your fixed costs and say, "Okay; for food to feed my family, I'm going to need X number of dollars, for transportation I'm going to need X number of dollars, and for this I'm going to need this, this, this, this" instead of starting by saying,

"Okay; I'm going to cut my revenue by a third, and then I'm going to figure out where to put the rest of it." I think it's important to start with what our needs are, then figure out if there is additional surplus revenue to be able to cut. I think that that would be a reasonable thing.

I also think that when we look at some of the philosophy that's driving this decision and we look at some of the decisions that have been made in other jurisdictions that follow it – President Trump campaigned on reducing the corporate tax rate from 35 per cent to 21 per cent. He said that there would be more jobs. But, as a result, what's happened so far: 84 per cent of businesses have not changed their investment plans at all, and the deficit is actually up 17 per cent to about $779 billion in the United States.

Another example: AT&T promised that they would create 7,000 jobs if Trump brought in his tax cut. Instead, what they did was cut 23,000 jobs, so a big gap, a net difference there of 30,000 jobs. That's a lot of households and a lot of potential workers. The thing is that he did deliver on what he said he was going to do. He did absolutely cut those taxes. Again, I just want to reiterate, from 35 to 21 per cent, and what we're proposing here is 8 per cent. That's a big jump from where even the United States is with their proposals. Those are a few of the initial points that I wanted to raise.

The other one I wanted to touch on is that many, many moons ago I worked for and then volunteered for the Alberta Community Crime Prevention Association, and one of the things that was clear in working with police officers and others in the community that were interested in reducing crime rates is that when you have crime prevention through social development, not only is it good for those individuals that you're investing in socially, but it's good for the broader community, and it's also good for the fiscal purse. I believe that the projections at that time were that if you invest $5 now, you save at least threefold down the road if you do it in ways that are proactive and that are focused on getting good outcomes in, particularly, the early years.

I know that when I've visited facilities, the remand centre for example, one of the biggest things, when I was talking to some of the staff there and to some of the folks who were serving time there, was that a lot of the folks who were there hadn't completed high school. What a difference it makes, as the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View said, to have the right supports there in the early years to help people get on a track where they feel that successful completion of high school creates more opportunities for open doors and for other ways to earn income as well. Again, you take people who are on a balance sheet, costing the province money – of course, it isn't free to put somebody in remand – and instead have them find ways to open their own doors, create opportunities for their own economic benefit, and, in turn, pay taxes back into the system that supports us all and creates good forward mechanisms.

I think the big point I wanted to say is that making this decision in isolation of the budget is irresponsible. I think that it is setting up government caucus and all members of this Assembly to be in a position where there will indeed be – and we've seen the foreshadowing – very, very tough decisions made, very, very tough decisions that will impact health care, education, and jobs in our own ridings. I think that that is not something that probably most of us campaigned on, wanting to close vital services in our own ridings. I don't think it's something that most members of this Assembly probably believe in, but putting yourself and all of us in this situation today, where we're making a decision to curtail our own resources, our own opportunity for investment by a third, I think is highly problematic.

The thing is that we don't need to do this. One of the things that I think of is the definition of insanity: doing the same thing over and over again, hoping for different outcomes. This has been done over and over again, and the outcomes are bad. Like, the outcomes aren't the message box, the message box around job creation or whatever the title of this bill is. That is not what any of the case studies show to be the case.

For example, in Kansas, 2011, long-time Senator Brownback was elected governor of Kansas with a large majority in the House, and in 2012 he passed into law one of the largest tax cuts in state history. It was meant to, quote, create jobs and stimulate growth. Sounds familiar. I think that's actually the title of this bill, job creation. What it did, though, was that it was absolutely an experiment because the governor said that it would be a real live experiment, and through this tax cut, certainly, business income would go up significantly. What happened instead was the absolute opposite. The governor moved these tax cuts forward, and he said that there would be 23,000 new jobs, that it would ultimately be revenue neutral. Instead, what happened between 2013 and '16: the economy grew at a far smaller rate than those jurisdictions that didn't do this. So the economy in Kansas did grow 3.8 per cent. The national economy grew 7 per cent.

So, actually, through this race to the bottom by cutting corporate taxes, it actually hurt economic growth compared to other jurisdictions in the United States. Employment did grow 2.6 per cent. National rate: 6.5 per cent. Not only were they taking revenue out of those important services that could benefit all so that down the road they'd have more opportunities for all Kansas residents; they actually hindered their own growth rate.

One of the tiny examples I want to give is that when I was with Edmonton public, for example, I worked with executive search firms who were recruiting talent to this city. They said: "You know, when we hire one person, they don't come in isolation; they bring their family with them. And that family wants to know what kind of good schools we have in this city and what kind of opportunities they have. Oh, and PS, we're recruiting people from the United States who are used to paying private school tuition, and instead we can hire them and pay potentially the same or maybe even less because here they have public health care and public education that is second to none."

It actually helped recruit the best, the brightest, and the most talented to these corporations and to these other important sectors in our province because we were able to say: "We have all of these awesome opportunities here in Edmonton, or here in Alberta, for you and your family, and you'll be saving money because you won't be paying out of pocket for all of these other things that you have to in your current place of employment."

I worry that by making this decision today that we will not only hinder our ability to take that revenue and invest in all children but that we'll actually hinder our ability to attract the best and the brightest. Study after study shows that it is only a race to the bottom when you undercut your own wealth. When you undercut your own opportunities for economic stability and for investing in those important sectors. I think that's the main thrust of what I wanted to say, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Thank you.

Standing order 29(2)(a) is available now if anyone has questions or comments for the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora. The Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you to the Member for Edmonton-Glenora for making a very tight and concise analysis of the problems and challenges associated with making adjustments to the tax structure as proposed by this UCP government. One area that I think you just sort of started to touch on, but I think bears further explanation, perhaps. I know from when I was the Minister of Education that, as you said, attracting superintendents and senior management to the province: it was a good benefit that wasn't lost on potential candidates that our health care system and our education system are second to none and, really, helped to attract and entice talent to move to our province.

But, I mean, if you expand that out, Mr. Speaker, I'm just wondering if that same principle doesn't apply to choices around making investments or to move business and to help to diversify the economy of Alberta as well, in fact: corporations, tech businesses, renewable energy businesses, and so forth, attracting people to our postsecondary institutions to set up research and innovation. I'm wondering if that same principle of quality of life is a factor in attracting those businesses here to the province of Alberta.

I'm just wondering if perhaps the hon. member could, you know, extrapolate on that same idea. I know for a fact that it is a factor and something that we use to help to attract professionals here, but wouldn't that same system apply to quality of life for attracting business here as well?

The Speaker: The Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. The member couldn't be more correct in his analysis. Absolutely, I would argue that's the case. When we're making decisions about things like this in isolation, we're making decisions about our investments in postsecondary. We're also making a decision about Alberta Innovates and whether or not we're going to have the money to invest in things that drive innovation, that work in partnership with business to be able to spur further developments, further technology.

There are often a lot of partnerships between the private sector, through the universities, through the investment of Alberta Innovates to push the envelope and to make sure that we're taking technology from here to the next step. That absolutely attracts people from around the world to look at Alberta as a place of opportunity. When I would tour hospitals, I would always be amazed by how successful we were in attracting and retaining folks from all across the country. We had many U of A graduates who were fantastic. We also had many graduates from other jurisdictions who came to do post-doc work or graduate work or to be faculty members because there was an important public investment in making sure we would drive research and innovation in our own province.

Again, I think that innovation is probably something that all of us think is a good thing. No matter what our political leanings are, we think it's important that we continue to drive to find new cures for cancer, that we find ways to make an organ transplant last longer, that we find ways to make sure that we're doing renewables in a more sustainable way or extraction of our own oil and gas. These are all things that Alberta Innovates invests in in our province, and these are all things that I assert will be hindered by reducing our own revenues so substantially.

Again, there is no need. When we look at other jurisdictions, we are in line with the majority. We are .4 and .5 per cent ahead of one other jurisdiction, and we're lower than many others as well.

So I think that this is something that has been set up as a false argument. While I appreciate the artistry of coming up with convincing titles for a bill, I couldn't disagree with the title of this bill more based on evidence, based on other case studies around the world, and based on the fact that they have been proven not to work. Obviously, I would love to be wrong, but I think that the most important thing for us to do when we're making decisions is look at evidence and research and how that will meet the outcomes that we're aspiring for. If we're aspiring for job creation, I assert that cutting resources from health and education will not do that.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The Member for Lethbridge-West is rising to debate.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you for the opportunity to speak to Bill 3. One of the things that we may want to look at first as to whether Bill 3 will in fact be a successful economic experiment is to look to the experts. Canada's economic experts are forecasting central agencies – and associated think tanks and banks have in fact released their 2019 growth forecasts. For example, the ATB a couple of weeks ago revised their growth forecast downward for Alberta, cut their growth forecast in half after the election of this government. The Conference Board of Canada is now saying – I believe they reported last week – that we are close to another recession. The Bank of Canada is forecasting sluggish growth.

I know that the UCP used an Ontario forecasting firm for their election platform forecast, but since that time a number of private-sector forecasts have released their forecasts and are not seeing, whatever, the 55,000 jobs, et cetera and so on, that have been privately forecasted by the partisan forecasting exercise. In fact, the professionals who do this for a living such as the Bank of Canada and others are telling quite a different story. For example, the Bank of Canada reported in April 2019:

There have been several fiscal announcements since our last Report.

Here's what's interesting: this was before we moved forward with this Bill 3 exercise. The Bank of Canada said:

Initiatives taken at the federal level and in Quebec and [B.C.] will add to Canada's GDP growth. However . . .

the Bank of Canada writes,

. . . the lowering of projected government spending in Ontario is sufficient to more than offset all of these, so that fiscal policy now represents a net downward revision to our growth outlook for 2020.

This is what happens, Mr. Speaker, when you undertake massive cuts to the revenue side and then undertake a massive restructuring to the fiscal picture in a province such as Ontario. The central bank of the country then can trace a straight line to more sluggish economic growth as a result.

Now, one of the ways that we could judge the effectiveness of this policy, Mr. Speaker, is to look at its implementation in other jurisdictions. My hon. colleague from Edmonton-Glenora has touched on this in terms of an interjurisdictional analysis at the state level of Kansas. I don't know if people have been to Kansas, but their level of health care investment and infrastructure certainly does not keep pace with ours.

But we all have a massive example. About a year ago Mr. Trump signed a massive new package of tax cuts into law. Here is what's happened since. The results of a survey published in late October by the National Association for Business Economics showed that 81 per cent of American firms of the 116 companies surveyed say that they had not changed plans for investment or hiring because of that tax bill. Instead, what has happened is that there's been a bit of a stock buyback binge. Certainly, cheerleaders for this law have argued that companies would have incentives to invest more, hire more workers, and pay higher wages. This is the claim that was in the United States to support Mr. Trump's massive tax cuts. The evidence has shown – JPMorgan Chase estimates that in the first half of 2018 about $270 billion in corporate profits previously held overseas were repatriated and roughly about half of that, JPMorgan reports, was spent on $124 billion in stock buybacks, Mr. Speaker.

Indeed, we see corporations moving money around to their advantage, but we do not see any evidence for the claims that have underlined Mr. Trump's tax cuts or indeed the exact same claims that have been made by the governing party opposite. They are emulating him, Mr. Speaker, but the evidence does not show that the positive effects will in fact occur. Perhaps the positive economic effects aren't really the point. Perhaps the point is to undermine the case for public investment in things like health care and education instead. And perhaps the point is just simply to emulate Mr. Trump.

Now, supporters of the tax cuts do claim that the economic growth that is created by this loss in revenue will offset their decline in tax receipts. Senator Mitch McConnell, for example, from Kentucky has claimed – and I will not attempt the Kentucky accent, Mr. Speaker.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you.

Ms Phillips: You're welcome.

Mitch McConnell says that he is totally convinced that this is a revenue-neutral bill, for example, when the bill first went to Senate in 2017. But not so much. I follow global trends in the United States in terms of a reasonable amount of strength, Mr. Speaker. The fiscal health of the United States balance sheet is, according to the New York Times, deteriorating fast. Revenues have declined sharply. The federal budget deficit rose to $779 billion in the 2018 fiscal year, which ended September 30. That was a 17 per cent increase from the prior year.

Certainly, we know that the leader of the governing party, the Premier, does not mind too terribly running very large budget deficits, Mr. Speaker, given that during the Harper government some $150 billion was added to the public debt, and in one year alone a $50 billion budget deficit was run, roughly equivalent to the entire operating budget on the operating side for the estimates that are passed by this House. That's the staggering amount of budget deficit that the Premier of this province was happy to support during his time in government.

Certainly, we know that federal revenues now in the United States ran $200 billion behind the Congressional Budget Office's forecast for 2018 even though economic growth did mirror economic growth in the rest of the world. The nonpartisan Committee for a Responsible Federal Budget also reports that nominal federal revenues are down by at least 3.6 per cent since the tax cuts took effect.

Now, one of the things, when large economies undertake these science experiments – and that's all this is, Mr. Speaker – is that they can have a destabilizing effect on the global economy. Indeed, we see that when Ontario had undertaken a policy of retrenchment and austerity, it had a downward effect on the growth performance of the entire Canadian economy. Two, do we see the United States – the evidence is showing us that Trump's tax reforms have in fact contributed to global instability according to the International Monetary Fund, especially given the boom in stock markets in the past year.

There are serious risks according to the head of the IMF, Christine Lagarde. She has indicated, quote, that it has an impact on the financial vulnerability, particularly given the high asset prices that we see around the world. The financial destabilization: the IMF has indicated, has said that they are worried about a bigger U.S. budget deficit. The extra borrowing by the U.S. Treasury will force up long-term American interest rates. That also makes the stock market vulnerable to a sudden downward lurch. The fiscal deficit also contributes to financial instability and inequality. That was the main concern of the IMF last October, when they released a paper arguing that inequality was the thing that was undermining global economic growth and thus, quote, contrary to supply-side dogma, developed nations did not need to choose between progressive tax policies and growth-enhancing ones.

Again, Mr. Speaker, we refer to the global economic experts, the central agencies, the pillars of the Bretton Woods international financial institutions, the IMF, whose job is financial stability through currency stabilization, and others. The biggest issue that they are flagging for the global financial system is, in fact, inequality. What they have found is that the United States could raise taxes on its wealthiest and accelerate the growth of its GDP simultaneously. On the other hand, were advanced economies to cut taxes on the rich and consequently shift the burden of taxation to ordinary citizens or – here's the key – cut public investment, they would risk reducing global growth.

Mr. Speaker, in the context of Alberta, when we are talking about reducing revenues and therefore increasing inequality, we are talking about the retrenchment of public investment in things like reducing child poverty. We are talking about the nutrition program. We are talking about the classroom improvement fund that we know on the ground has a direct impact on more vulnerable children's lives. We know this. We know that it means an extra educational assistant in the classroom for a child who is at risk. We know that that nutrition program helps so many children and families on an annual basis. We know that investment in things like the child benefit program has halved child poverty in this province, and it did so during the context of a generation-defining recession due to a drop in the price of oil.

Mr. Speaker, we also see that the reduction in expenditure as a result of the reduction in revenue and the corresponding inequalities that result from that have very specific effects on vulnerable people's lives. I will give you an example, one that I think lives in the heart of many Calgarians. If we reduce our expenditures in the amount of four and a half billion, we will have less money on both the capital and the operating side for flood adaptation and mitigation. We know that the 2013 flood event affected so many people's lives, not just their livelihoods but their mental health, their family relationships, their future plans. It dislocated many people's lives, often irreparably.

When we do that, we need to be mindful of the disproportionate effects of more frequent and severe weather events on people's lives. It's not just through the provision of transitional funds. It is not just through the ability to help people in some cases relocate their homes, as this province had to do. It is not just in terms of fixing water infrastructure and moving intake valves and all of the things that happen through the Alberta community resilience program, which is through the operational budget, not capital investments of this province. It's not just those things. It's also about mental health supports in the long term. I know that those mental health supports are still ongoing for people who were displaced from the 2011 Slave Lake fire, they are still ongoing for people who were displaced from the 2013 southern Alberta floods, and they are certainly still ongoing from the 2016 Fort McMurray fire. Mr. Speaker, that was indeed the largest evacuation in Canadian history.

Now, Mr. Speaker, also when we reduce our revenues and therefore our expenditures, we are less able to respond and actually help communities that need the help the most. I am thinking here of people such as the good people of the Paddle Prairie Métis settlement, who just lost their homes and their stability and their place to go home to, their belongings, and their social connections through the recent tragedy that happened to their community just a few short days ago.

It is those pieces of inequality that we put most at risk, and it should be what animates our public service, that reduction of inequality, Mr. Speaker. Government has a productive role to play in that, and you cannot pay for these things with magic. There is no magic in a budget. You must have revenue, and then you must have expenditures. We can disagree on where those appropriate expenditures may go, but I think we do all agree that it is the highest noble cause of the people in this Assembly that we seek to reduce inequality. When the global experts tell us that the path to a $4.5 billion tax cut is paved by inequality, by individual families having less to be able to build their lives, that should give us pause as legislators.

It should make us ask: what is the evidence to back this reckless scheme to reduce corporate tax revenues by four and a half billion? Who are the beneficiaries of this massive giveaway? Are they already wealthy? Do they need more, or do we need to make sure that we stabilize our revenues in this province such that we can make sure that we are building the kind of province that we can all be proud of and where children have that good start in life? That good start in life starts with a good breakfast at 8 o'clock in the morning.

Thank you very much for the opportunity to speak to Bill 3.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. I see the Member for Edmonton-City Centre on 29(2)(a).

Mr. Shepherd: Absolutely. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure to have the opportunity to rise and speak this morning to the comments from my hon. colleague. I certainly appreciate the perspectives that she brings to this bill. I know her as someone who does a lot of research. Indeed, that's been something that she's been known for for many years, very thoughtful in how she approaches public policy and certainly is one that brings the receipts.

I know also that she is one that knows about bringing investment to the province of Alberta. In her time as the Minister of Environment and Parks she was responsible for, I think, one of the largest increases we've ever seen in terms of investment in green and renewable energy here in the province of Alberta and bringing the many jobs and that that have come with that and have brought benefit across the province and in the region of her own constituency in Lethbridge. Along those lines, I also know that she was part of the group that sort of worked to bring in one of the more significant agricultural investments we've seen in this province, that being the investment for the new food processing centre and other industry that came in with Cavendish Farms.

I was wondering if the member would be able to give us a bit of a thought and explain a little bit about what was it that attracted that significant investment by Cavendish Farms here in the province of Alberta. Was it about the tax rate, or were there other factors that were involved?

The Speaker: The Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to my hon. colleague for the query. Certainly, through the renewable energy auctions, a competitive auction, we saw a number of international companies of some large size and consequence compete for those contracts, resulting in the first two rounds of a little over $2 billion in private-sector investment into the province to avail themselves of the competitive, market-based structure that we brought in for renewable energy. That $2 billion of new investment has already resulted in a number of different construction jobs, new training opportunities for local people, and, in fact, an equity participation component for the Kainai First Nation.

On to the matter of Cavendish Farms, Mr. Speaker. Yes, that investment opportunity was circulating around Alberta for some time. However, the final investment decisions by the Irvings were made by balancing an offer, essentially, that was coming from South Dakota with an offer that was coming from Alberta, with South Dakota having far lower corporate tax rates. I don't even know if they have one. That might be a bit of an exaggeration, but certainly states like that, their revenue picture is reflected in the infrastructure that you see when you go to some of these states. That is to say, it is not the same kind of public infrastructure, whether we're talking about roads, highways, or water infrastructure that one sees prevailing in Canadian jurisdictions.

Certainly, some of the questions from the investors at that time were around the health care system, the schools, as my hon. colleague from Edmonton-Glenora alluded to. They wanted to know about quality of life in terms of attracting a workforce. They noted that the health care costs for the company would be significantly reduced given that there was no need to have a provision of private health care insurance as part of the overall compensation package for employees. Certainly, that was something that they talked about, and the ability to attract and retain people in a place that is quite desirable to live due to the provision of public services, in particular health care, education, and child care, was key for them. In addition, the province did make some contributions through water and waste-water infrastructure, Mr. Speaker, in order to support our municipalities. Those were the special investments that the province brought forward, and that was the successful package of those different elements that actually attracted that investment.

Now, the Irvings did have a couple of questions at that time over the years about the specified gas emitters regulation and its application to this particular facility and then the transition to the carbon competitiveness investment regulation. Once that was explained to them, they understood what their output-based allocation for this particular facility might be, what their compliance flexibility options were with respect to the carbon offset system, and those matters were not of concern to them, resulting in a positive investment, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, any others wishing to join the debate this morning? I see the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford on his feet.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm very happy to rise today to address our conversations around Bill 3, the bill to increase inequality in the province of Alberta.

An Hon. Member: Is that what it's called?

Mr. Feehan: I'm sure that's what was said.

I'm very happy to have had an opportunity to hear a number of the other speakers on this side of the House because it's always very interesting to hear the depth of facts that are being brought forward with regard to a bill of this nature and the evidence that has been accumulated through multiple countries that supply-side economics is, in fact, not an effective governmental tool for the intended outcomes that are often purported. I, of course, will take some of my time to repeat some of those arguments although the facts tend to fall on deaf ears, I know, because they have a hard time piercing through rigid ideological stances that are part of the nature of the conservative mindset and world view in which change in and of itself is not viewed as a positive thing to be pursued. In fact, I want for you to know that I do understand that the nature of conservatism is indeed to conserve; that is, to maintain what we know. Therefore, there's an intrinsic resistance to change and, of course, information that may provoke or lead to that change because of the fact that it might cause some dissonance in the individual.

I thought I would at least pursue this conversation with a little bit of information that might be considered a reasonable source for members of the Conservative Party so that we can, you know, demonstrate that on this side of the House we don't come from an ideological place but, rather, a fact-based place. We'll use those facts to make decisions about progress, just as has happened in many years as we defeat conservative ideologies, going back for literally centuries in Westminster democracies.

We go back and look at the very nature of democracy itself, the idea that the leader was not a Sun King and didn't rule by divine right somehow and that somehow we could have everyday, average citizens actually vote on something in order to make a decision. I can tell you that the conservatives of that time – that is, the people that wished to conserve – were aghast and kind of declared that the notion was ridiculous and that only people who were ordained by God would have the right to rule. Yet we know how ridiculous that is now. We know that democracy is, in fact, the strongest, the best form of government although it has been defined as the worst form of government except for all the others. I think we can cut through all that and say that it is the best form of government.

We also know, for example, that progress has been made in areas such as public education. When it was first introduced in England through social reformers, many of whom the social workers that I work with view as the grandmothers and grandfathers of their profession, they came forward and said that we would actually be able to improve our society by having everyone educated across the board so that they could contribute to the best of their ability to the well-being of everyone. The conservatives of the time indicated that this was something that was ridiculous and that poor people couldn't be educated and that it was a waste of money to educate those poor people and that we should conserve the notion that education was a good for the elite and that the elite were somehow different than everyone else in society. Again, conservatives worked not to protect something but to prevent growth and movement forward, and we've seen that they were wrong in that case as well.

I can go on and talk a little bit about that, but I want to get more onto Bill 3. I think it's important that we understand that the evidence is there, that the progress that has been made in society has demonstrated consistently that having faith in the people and supporting individuals is of great benefit to society, and that taking money and pooling it to just a few people and expecting everyone to benefit is foolhardy, just the same as taking education and pooling it only to a reserved class was foolhardy, just as taking governance and confining it to an elite social class was foolhardy. In the same way, this bill is foolhardy because it makes an attempt to take money out of the hands of everyday people who primarily derive their dollars from and spend their dollars in the local area and pool it in the hands of people who are not confined to and are not in the habit of earning and spending in the same locality.

Now, just to make sure that my sources for my facts were ones that would be acceptable, I spent a little bit of time reading the report from the Congressional Budget Office in the United States, which did a comprehensive study which was published in April 2019, just a few short months ago. Essentially, to summarize briefly, although I do encourage people to go and actually look at this information because it's something that maybe will help you to reconsider the foolishness which you have brought to this House, their conclusion was that across-the-board tax cuts like the Conservatives are now proposing are not as effective as other programs such as extending unemployment benefits. So government intervention had a higher record of creating more jobs than did tax cuts.

Further, they go on to state in their conclusion that the best mechanism for increasing the number of jobs in an economy is to increase consumer spending, which drives approximately 68 per cent of all economic growth. As the consumers spend, of course, businesses begin to ramp up production to meet that higher demand, therefore creating higher employment. In other words, it's not supply-side economics that actually drives an economy; it is demand-side economics that drives an economy. That means that consumers going out and spending in the local economy are what fundamentally makes an economy grow.

Now, I think it's really important to remember that when a business gets more money, they don't simply create jobs because, "Hey, I've got more money; let's hire a bunch more people" if, in fact, they don't think they can sell the product that they would produce with those more people. They only want to produce just enough product to meet the demand that's available. If the demand is not there, you'd be a foolish businessperson to actually create more product. You'd lose money. So why would you use money that became available to you in a tax break to create more jobs unless the demand was already pre-existing; that is, if you were a sensible businessman, businesswoman.

What the Congressional Budget Office is telling us, then, is that if indeed you do want businesses to grow and you do want them to create more jobs, you need to increase demand, you need to give money to people to spend, and they have indicated in their analysis that that indeed creates significantly more jobs, that – wait for it – government spending works better than tax breaks, given to you by the Congressional Budget Office of the United States of America.

Some specifics from their study that may be helpful in this time here suggest that the across-the-board cuts do have some effect in creating jobs. Of course, sometimes businesses are looking for money, and when they do have money, they are trying to reach more demand, but that effect comes out to approximately 4 jobs for every $1 million lost in tax revenue. Essentially, in that case, the government is spending $250,000 per job. I think most people in the province of Alberta would just love to get that money. I'd like to have a job for $250,000, and I think most of the people here would. Instead, they are suggesting that providing money directly to lower and middle-income individuals tends to create more jobs, bumping that 4 up to 7 jobs per $1 million.

Of course, they do go on to explain a little bit about why that would be, and that is essentially the notion of capital flight. Now, I want to speak about the notion of capital flight because it's one that's used inconsistently, of course, by the opposite side of the House. They stand here – and they did for the last four years – daily complaining that somehow there was capital flight out of the oil and gas business in this province and that it had gone somewhere else and that that was the fault of the government of the day. So they seem to have some sense of that notion even though they, of course, demonstrate their inability to understand the difference in causality and correlation, as usual. But I can see that underlying the chaotic argument that they present is this notion that they understand that capital is mobile in our modern world. Yet when they come into government, they immediately act as if capital is no longer mobile, that if you give money to these corporations, if you give money to the elite, if you give money to the wealthy, somehow they will create jobs here.

Yet the evidence is that they don't. Their own evidence, that they present in the House consistently, is that corporations do not do that. They tell us on a regular basis that corporations will go and spend their money somewhere else if they don't like what you're doing here, and then they go and give them money to do that. There seems to be some inherent chaos in that thinking. I'm very concerned that the whole nature of this bill betrays the fact that there's not very strong business acumen on the other side of the House.

The problem here is that they only understand the benefit to their particular political party if they provide services to a group in society who will return that money at the time of election. But we know that what happens when we actually do provide the money here is that the only people that benefit are the political parties that receive donations from those corporations. That does not happen in terms of the larger economy itself. As has been previously mentioned here in the House, when a person of moderate income receives money, the vast majority, up to 99 per cent, of that money is spent in the local economy. That means that not only are they getting the benefits of the money that they have, but they are increasing the benefits for everyone around them.

The nature of gross domestic product is not how much money you have but how that money changes hands within an economy. Therefore, the more often that it changes hands within the economy, the better the economy is and the more that the gross domestic product goes up. What you want to do, of course, is encourage people not to hang onto their money but to spread their money around.

We know, on the other hand, though, that corporations tend not to spread that money around the local economy. They tend to take it into other places. And when they do spend it locally, they often spend it not on jobs, not on creating the local economy but on – what does the American Congressional Budget Office say? – buying stock back. That's what they do. They spend money on accumulating wealth and increasing pots of money for themselves and their shareholders. I remember that the governor of the Bank of Canada used to call that dead money. In fact, that's what this whole bill is. It's increasing dead money.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Questions or comments for the member under Standing Order 29(2)(a)? I see the Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. One of the things that we see in the natural world's functioning ecosystem is that connections and diversity are what underlie a functioning ecosystem in any given natural space. Same goes, too, for economies. The hon. member talked a lot about money circulating within an economy. I think the point he was driving at was that when money circulates more often, then it can be used for productive purpose in terms of reducing inequality and giving economic opportunities to everyone in a society.

Mr. Speaker, I know that the hon. member has direct experience with this with respect to investments in indigenous climate leadership. I'm wondering if he could share with the House: when we aggressively and without sufficient evidence reduce our revenues, how can we incent private-sector growth and, more to the point, social development in indigenous communities in this province and elsewhere?

Mr. Feehan: Thank you very much for the question. I appreciate the opportunity to speak about working with the indigenous community, as I have for the last number of years in my role previously as Minister of Indigenous Relations. As many people would know, the community is very close to my heart. I had an opportunity to speak in this House before about many of the significant programs that were created by the indigenous climate leadership program, that was run in this House prior to the destruction of the carbon levy, and all of the benefits that flow out of that into the community.

One of the things, I think, that was very important about the comments that I made earlier was the fact that it had a very far-reaching effect around this province. We can say that all 48 First Nations in this province benefited from the carbon levy and that distributing those dollars around the province had the direct effect of increasing employment in indigenous communities in places where, very often, jobs are not easily available.

In fact, just yesterday members of the Conservative side of the House stood up and argued for a motion with the argument that we need to pay attention to local employment whenever we make decisions in the government, and they all supported, unanimously, I believe, on that side of the House, a motion that, in fact, economic evaluation should be done in a community before government makes a decision to remove jobs from the rural areas. So we know that they understand that government intervention and programs of that nature have a specific and direct effect on increasing employment in areas of the province where employment is hard to come by, and that includes, of course, First Nations and Métis communities.

On Monday they argue that fact, and then on Tuesday they bring in a bill that seeks to do exactly the opposite kind of thing, to take money out of the community and to pool it in the hands of a few who are no longer bound to spend that money in the local economy. I call tell you that studies that have been done around First Nations communities indicate that as a First Nations community rises economically and does well, the benefits to the local surrounding towns and villages also go up, and if we really want the small towns of Alberta, the rural areas of Alberta to do well, we should be supporting the indigenous communities from an economic point of view. How do you do that? You do that by ensuring that they have the resources in the local indigenous community to create jobs in that place, not jobs in Edmonton or Calgary or major centres but jobs where they live, and that will be money well spent for not only that community but all of Alberta.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, the Member for St. Albert is rising.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and speak to this bill. You know, oddly enough, the roots of the phrase "trickle-down economics" – as we know, President Reagan's economic policies were dubbed Reaganomics, and they included a large tax cut that we in turn call trickle-down economics. But the actual term "trickle-down" originated as a joke by humorist Will Rogers, and the joke about trickle-down is that it is a decision to favour the wealthy and privileged while being framed as good for the average citizens. So, yeah, it's a bit of a joke.

I would suggest that when we first get elected to represent the people that sent us here, it's a little bit overwhelming at first. I think the bills, legislation come at you fast and furious. You learn all about the message boxes. You learn about your roles on committees, speaking to bills, members' statements, all of those things. Sometimes it's tough to find the hours in the day to do the research that you're required to do in order to make informed decisions on the legislation before you. I would put to my colleagues on the other side and beside me over here – you know, I would ask them: how much time did you spend researching this to understand what it is that you're voting on? By giving this massive tax cut to already very profitable corporations, what you are doing is blowing a hole in our revenues. It's pretty straightforward. It's pretty simple.

Sometimes I hear people sort of comparing our province's budget to a household budget, which doesn't make sense to me on a lot of levels, but let's just go with that. If your revenue is reduced somehow, you know that you have to make some changes on where you spend your money. Same thing here. When you're voting on this, I get that you're being told what you need to support and what you need to do, but I want you to think about what it means for the people in your constituencies. Mr. Speaker, some of the things that you really need to think about – and I think that we've heard from numerous members that it is going to hurt, that these are going to be tough decisions, and of course they are. You cannot blow this kind of hole in your revenues and not expect there to be repercussions.

Let's look at it on a very small scale, and let's look at what that means for individual people. I think we're starting to hear rumblings from different places in the province already. If you look at schools, for example, there's some uncertainty right now as to how this trickle-down is going to impact schools and the decisions that school boards are tasked with making. Let's say that it results in even a small reduction, and that reduction may simply be as a result of not funding the growth for that school district. Let's say that they have 1,000 new students coming in, and there are no additional dollars, right? Same old adage: well, you make due, you do more with less, tighten up your purse strings, pull up your bootstraps, whatever it is that you want to say. But the reality is that you're doing more with less, so you are diluting those services.

Now, of course, I've heard people say: "Well, you know, put a few more students into a classroom. We have highly trained, highly skilled teachers, educators. They can probably manage." Okay. I'll give you that, but what happens when you have students that have unique learning needs in those classrooms? Perhaps you have a student that has a diagnosis that puts him on the autism spectrum, or perhaps you have a student with a learning disability or a developmental disability or a behavioural concern that is really, really difficult in a classroom setting for just a teacher and maybe one EA to manage so that all the students can learn in the best way possible.

The cuts that you voted on and supported in order to give very wealthy, profitable corporations a massive tax cut – now, keep in mind that we were already very competitive, but your voting to give this massive tax cut will cause difficulties at a very local level, and you will hear about that. I'm sure you'd agree that, you know, your constituents will find you. They will get in touch with you, and they will let you know what this means for them, whether it's parents of students that are in crowded classrooms or that they used to have access to one educational assistant and now you've got three students relying on one educational assistant. That is a reality when you start to cut funding to education.

Persons with developmental disabilities is sort of a department within a larger ministry, Community and Social Services, and it supports people with developmental disabilities to create lives that allow them to live in their communities, work in their communities, establish lives in their communities. There are thousands and thousands of people that rely on these supports, and these supports pay for the staff to support those people. Now there's going to be a great big hole in the revenue, so efficiencies are going to come from somewhere. Typically these are the places they tend to come from.

We've seen it over and over again every time. Cutting supports for people with developmental disabilities in Alberta often doesn't look like your traditional cut. It looks like a finding of efficiencies story, or it looks like doing more with less, and very often what that means is a dilution.

Earlier this week I was able to ask a question to the Minister of Community and Social Services about releasing a report that was created by a group tasked with looking at this PDD system and recommending ways to make it more inclusive for Albertans. One of the questions obviously facing this group is looking at the eligibility criteria of this and deciding: is IQ an appropriate determining factor for people to receive this support? I think we can all agree that the answer will probably be: no, it's not appropriate, not appropriate at all. Really, it never has been, but – so be it – there it was.

By removing that, that will open the doors to so many Albertans that have been denied these supports: people with brain injuries that perhaps didn't quite score where they needed to on an IQ test or perhaps people on the autism spectrum that were difficult to test or, again, their scores were just questionable. You have all kinds of people, people with FASD – and there are thousands of them – that require supports, but they are not being supported right now because of old eligibility. If you make those changes and you open those gates to all of the people that really do need these supports, without new dollars you have created a scenario where there will be massive cuts. Massive.

A cut like that puts people's lives in danger. Not only does it impact their quality of life, their ability to be employed, to have friends, to live in their community, to have the lives that they dream that they could have, but it puts people in harm's way, in very real harm's way. I have no doubt that the people in this Chamber will see that in very short order if this is allowed to happen.

Another one of the things that I actually thought was one of the biggest jokes of all – and it's not a joke, and I don't actually think it's funny – is that we were on a different path before the election. I get it. I hear it every day, over and over again: you won the election, that was your mandate, no need to consult, you're good to go. I hear that loud and clear. However, what the big joke is to me is that we were on a different path. Our path to balance, of course, was about a year longer. But our vision was to go forward in a progressive way without cutting, without cutting essential services like education, like health care, like supports for people that need them, and growing our economy not on the backs of people that need these supports but by diversification, by reducing our reliance on one single sector, by making those investments in greener energy, in that energy transition that needs to happen. The world is changing, and we were ready to accept that and move forward, and we had a plan.

That came to a screeching halt, and now we're going backwards. We are now looking at a decision that will be made that will impact people now and well into the future. I've seen it far too many times to ignore it. You know, I get that members opposite likely don't like to hear this from us or whatever, but perhaps they'll listen to other experts or other groups like the International Monetary Fund. I don't know if that's in your list of acceptable sources, but what they've essentially told us is that this doesn't work. The member earlier referred to the Bank of Canada. They seem like quality experts to me; so does the IMF.

One of the things that they point to that's really quite telling – and what they say is that one of the biggest dangers or challenges facing us is the growing gap between the very wealthy and the poor. I can tell you that this move to once again give a massive tax cut to already wealthy, profitable corporations – I'm not talking about small businesses here; I'm talking about already profitable and wealthy corporations. We are increasing that gap. We are squeezing and pushing out a middle class that has been squeezed and pushed out for years and years and years. This is what this will do.

I can't predict what this massive tax cut will do on the front lines of services. I can only share my experiences of what I've seen before. I've seen first-hand what it does. I've seen what the removal of a few hours of support for someone with a disability does, what it does to their lives, what it does to their families, what it does to their ability to work, what it does for their ability to support themselves, what it does for their future. I've seen what that looks like. I have a feeling that the members opposite will also start to hear what that looks like because your constituents will let you know. I believe that. They have seen another way.

We had four years after over four decades of one party. We had four years where we were well on our way to showing that there is a different way, and I think Albertans are very smart and will compare very quickly and see that we were on a different path. We had a different way of approaching things – that is, a realistic way to approach things – and not on the backs of people, small people, people without deep pockets, deep connections, and deep access, Albertans, because we believe that all Albertans should decide how this province goes forward, not just the wealthy and connected.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I am going to end my comments. I am sure that the members have heard enough from me right now. I will thank you for the opportunity, and I look forward to any questions if there are any.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Under Standing Order 29(2)(a)? I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I was very interested to listen to what the Member for St. Albert was saying and all of my colleagues. There have been some very articulate statements on the impact that this is going to have not only in terms of its lack of impact on job creation but in terms of its impact on the budget.

The member was speaking about potential changes to the PDD program and supports for FASD, and, you know, that triggered me to think of some of the things. We talk about a $4.5 billion tax giveaway – right? – the sort of huge giving away of money, and I think we don't always know, necessarily, what that means. I certainly know that decisions around budget when we were in government were some of the most difficult decisions I ever made. There were incredible programs that, if expanded, could have had fundamental impacts on the lives of individuals in the community. I think of the community court program, that we were starting up, the drug treatment court program, that I had hoped to expand across the province one day. There were an incredible number of these programs, and most of what was the underlying premise of most of these programs is that, actually – and the problem is that it takes years, right? You input sort of upstream money, and that changes the course of lives, and 15 or 20 years later you see a massive impact in terms of decreasing provincial budgets on things like jails.

What I was going to ask the member about is just if she could expand a little on – you know, I certainly know that individuals with FASD have a tendency to come into conflict with the justice system a lot, and they have a tendency to be underdiagnosed because of what the diagnostic criteria are. I just thought that maybe you could speak a little about what you thought those supports might do if we were to spend the money on those supports instead of a tax giveaway.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you. I'm happy to answer that question.

First of all, I would like to thank the member for the incredible work that she did when she was the minister. Actually, she had quite a vision for where things were to go, and I'm grateful for her work.

Absolutely, we might not see the impacts of these changes right away, but we absolutely will see these impacts. A really good example of this is – sorry; I'm just going to go back to my notes.

Let me just say something first. I watch what's happening in Ontario, not because I'm particularly interested about what's happening in Ontario, but I do look to Ontario because of the similarities of things that are happening. It's a little bit, at first, maybe coincidental that the Premier of Ontario would say and do things that would then show up here, and the Premier here, before he was Premier, was saying and doing things very similar to Ontario. I have seen the moves that are being made in Ontario to groups that don't have access and influence.

Of course, we know that that government has decided to embark on another failed experiment about investing or giving massive tax cuts to wealthy and profitable corporations on the backs of people that need supports and services every single day. What we're seeing are sort of just cuts across the board, cuts to essential services.

Let me give you one example. You've probably heard in the news about cuts being made to supports for children with autism. Now, these were not presented as cuts. I think that initially it was called a way to reduce wait times or a wait-list. What it was was a very odd means test for families, and then it was a lump sum of money that was given, whether it was to the service provider or the families, to arrange for supports for the child, intervention or supports for the child with autism. Now, of course, the government was framing it as: "Look at this windfall. We are giving, for example, $50,000 to this particular family to go out and find the best supports for their child." Okay. Now, when we look at all of the years that this child will require intensive supports to get through the school years, to get through those really formative years where they are learning how to navigate life, it was nothing.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Any other members? I see the Member for Red Deer-South standing.

Mr. Stephan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am really excited to stand and speak in favour of Bill 3, the Job Creation Tax Cut (Alberta Corporate Tax Amendment) Act, to restore Alberta's place as the most attractive place to start and grow a business in Canada. I am a tax lawyer and a chartered professional accountant. I have lectured on tax matters to the Canadian Tax Foundation, the Legal Education Society of Alberta, and CPA Alberta, the organization governing chartered professional accountants. I work with private businesses, their owners, and professional advisers. These are Albertans that work in the real world.

I've listened to the members opposite speak in favour of mediocrity, comparing Alberta to Quebec, citing and recognizing that their corporate tax rates are lower than ours and that that is okay. That is not how Alberta has competed and excelled. I've also heard them compare us to the Trump federal tax changes. They are comparing a federal jurisdiction to a provincial jurisdiction. That is not comparing apples and apples. That is not precise thinking. Taxation requires precision.

My impression of the former NDP government was a government that did not focus on details that impact taxpayers. I remember when the carbon tax was first introduced by the former NDP government. They told Albertans that that tax was revenue neutral. Mr. Speaker, the government of Alberta is a very complex, sophisticated organization. It is very disturbing to think that a new multibillion-dollar tax was introduced by a government which did not even have a basic understanding of what the term “revenue neutral” means and, further, did not do the proper due diligence to inform themselves prior to incorrectly telling Albertans initially that it was.

Mr. Speaker, when the NDP decided to cancel complex power contracts, they did not even bother reading the contract fine print and ended up having to pay damages in the hundreds of millions of taxpayer dollars to power suppliers for breaches of contract. This was a government that did not do its due diligence. In the real world failing to do so would result in one getting fired or sued.

Mr. Speaker, let's talk about the impacts of the 20 per cent increase to corporate tax rates. Alberta, as they should have known, competes with other jurisdictions for vital oil and gas investment dollars for our economic prosperity. What this 20 per cent corporate tax increase did, along with other NDP and Liberal actions, was to make Alberta a less competitive jurisdiction for investment.

So what has happened under this NDP government? Businesses and investors do not stage protests. They vote with their feet, and they leave for more competitive jurisdictions. I personally saw this. This old NDP government governed under capital flight of tens of billions of dollars. Are they proud of that? Mr. Speaker, the very constitution of the NDP states that its purpose was to “establish and maintain a democratic socialist government in Alberta.” Socialism does not work in the real world. During the election campaign I remember participating in a candidate forum at a high school in Red Deer with the former NDP Member for Red Deer-South, whom I replaced, and sharing with students how their parents and our city were experiencing first-hand how uncompetitive socialist governments operate in the real world and not just out of textbooks. I was able to share evidence, just like the members opposite are purportedly doing.

Let's look at some facts. I was able to share with them how Alberta's private-sector workforce actually shrank by about 25,000 individuals during the four years they were in power. That is abject failure. I was able to share how, because of a weak economy, with the NDP, a government that does not know how to compete in the real world, Alberta's debt increased by more than $45 billion and how in only four years their debts and deficits would buy every single house in Red Deer, Alberta's third-largest city, more than two times over.

Mr. Speaker, the NDP likes to think they are the champion of government services; they are not. While the NDP wishes it wasn't true, government services only exist if there are taxes from private-sector businesses and those who work in them to pay for them. How – how? – can a government be a champion of anything that they have no idea how to pay for? Irresponsible, undisciplined, uncompetitive NDP governments will by and by lead to the collapse of unsustainable government services.

Mr. Speaker, I have sat and listened to the NDP criticize the job-creation tax cut as an attack on workers. The NDP views business success as a zero-sum game. In their heart they think that if businesses exceed and do well, then workers do not. Businesses and investors have sensed this underlying hostility from a socialist government and have acted accordingly. Corporations are not natural persons. Corporate profits are used to reinvest and grow businesses and hire workers.

The NDP conflates corporations to wealthy individuals. That is sloppy thinking. The facts speak for themselves. As a matter of historical fact, the NDP way lost tens of thousands of private-sector jobs in the four years of doing things their way. I cannot honestly ever recall, not once, meeting either a business owner or professional adviser working in the real world who believed the NDP were good stewards of the economy. Not once. Mr. Speaker, the numbers speak for themselves. This NDP was a dismal failure, and Albertans knew it. That's why they were overwhelmingly fired on April 16.

The socialist NDP government has a philosophy that is in direct opposition to what is required for economic prosperity from a government. It does not understand or know how to compete in the real world. Unlike the NDP losing tens of thousands of private-sector jobs, the job creation tax cut will create tens of thousands of private-sector jobs. According to analysis by leading economist Dr. Jack Mintz, the job creation tax cut will lead to the creation of at least 55,000 full-time private-sector jobs. Contrast that against the NDP's failed record of losing tens of thousands of private-sector jobs.

University of Calgary political scientist Dr. Bev Dalby estimates that the job creation tax cut will generate a $12.7 billion increase in nominal GDP, a 6 and a half per cent increase in per capita real GDP, and $1.2 billion in additional government revenue by 2023-24. It is time to renew and restore Alberta as the most competitive and attractive jurisdiction in Canada to start and grow a business. Enacting the job creation tax cut is an important step on that path.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker. With that, I move to adjourn debate.

The Acting Speaker: Under 29(2)(a), questions and comments? I see the hon. Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you. I was very interested to hear the comments by the hon. member about the constitution for the NDP. I have had the opportunity to read that riveting document a couple of times. At the end of the document it goes through a few of the principles and aims of the Alberta New Democratic Party, and I just wanted to read to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the members of the House here their version of how to jump-start economies. They say:

Socialism is essentially the application of democracy to the economy. Economic democracy, i.e. democratic socialism, assures production to supply the needs of all people.

It gets better.

Decisions about what shall be produced, when and where, and decisions about where we shall make our living and under what conditions, are now left largely in the hands of private interests. The market economy produces transnational corporations, who give private profit priority over public interest, social justice and workplace democracy. Through the efforts of many, we have achieved a degree of social and political democracy.

And here is the kicker.

If you need to know anything about the intent of the NDP or any socialist party, for that matter, you just have to read that last sentence. They would like to take away free markets. They do not believe in free markets. They believe in a co-operative rather than a competitive system, and because of that belief system that they have, they continue to push away businesses that function in a free-market economy. This is the reason why over the last four years we had some of the highest unemployment rates in a generation. This is why we had some of the highest deficits on record that this province has ever seen.

You know, the member is an expert when it comes to tax law; he is an expert when it comes to accounting practices. I'd like to ask him: what is the outcome, in his opinion, of applying this kind of economic model?

Mr. Stephan: Well, one of the things that I had been very excited about doing as I met with both businesses and professional advisors who advise private-sector businesses throughout Alberta – prior to the NDP I really liked talking about how Alberta was, in fact, the most competitive jurisdiction to start and grow a business. I would see businesses in other areas of Canada seek to come and be subject to tax in Alberta. It's interesting from a corporate tax perspective that having the lowest corporate rate in Canada actually incents and grows the corporate tax base in our province.

It was interesting that, actually, when the NDP increased corporate tax rates by 20 per cent, which, by the way, is a gigantic tax rate increase, and took us away from being the most competitive jurisdiction in Canada to start and grow a business, government corporate tax revenues actually decreased. The interesting thing is that prior to that, corporations that were successful and profitable, because we were the most attractive jurisdiction, would seek to centralize and grow their businesses in Alberta, and that, actually, overall – and the facts again speak for themselves – supported the government surpluses that we enjoyed, that actually helped us fund all of the important government services that not only do the members opposite support but the members on this side and the government support in terms of providing those essential government services in a sustainable, economic manner. When the NDP increased – you know, using the common saying, they killed the goose that laid the golden eggs.

The Acting Speaker: I see the hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika standing.

Ms Sweet: A point of order.

The Acting Speaker: A point of order.

Ms Sweet: Sorry, Mr. Speaker. I just need a point of clarification for the House. My understanding is that the hon. member moved to adjourn debate. We didn't vote on the adjournment. If we could just get a point of clarity from the table through you around whether or not we should have actually adjourned the debate before 29(2)(a).

The Acting Speaker: At the time that the hon. Member for Red Deer-South was concluding his remarks, there were individuals standing to be recognized under 29(2)(a), so it looked to be an opportunity for people to take advantage of 29(2)(a) at the time.

Going forward, I believe that I saw the hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika standing to make a motion.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to adjourn debate on second reading of Bill 3.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Bill 4 Red Tape Reduction Act

[Adjourned debate May 30: Mr. Hunter]

The Acting Speaker: Are there any members wishing to debate on second reading of Bill 4? I see the hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you very much, sir. As you can see, we're very close to 12 o'clock. I think we've made some remarkable progress, and I certainly move that we adjourn until we reconvene at 1:30 p.m.

Thank you.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Tuesday, June 4, 2019

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Please be seated.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Members, I would like to draw your attention to a small change to introduction of visitors or guests. It will be my intention to read the entirety of the list and save the applause till the end.

We have a number of guests joining us in the galleries this afternoon. Guests of the Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs, I encourage you to rise as I call your name: Glynnis Lieb, Gary Simpson, Christopher Pappas, Junaid Jahangir. I also see former Member for Calgary-Hawkwood Michael Connolly joining us. Please rise. And – I'm sorry. I had the chance to meet you earlier. I've totally forgotten, and it's not on my list. I'm sorry, but if you would please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Members' Statements

Connect Charter School in Calgary

Ms Issik: Mr. Speaker, this past week I had another opportunity to meet with a part of the school community in Calgary-Glenmore. It was a great pleasure to visit Connect Charter School at Clem Gardner in the district of Lakeview. What I saw as I visited this grade 4 to 9 setting was leading edge, inclusive in every way, and an incredible example of what can be achieved in the education of our young people.

Mr. Speaker, in this school the Alberta curriculum is taught in each grade with, at its base, direct instruction to scaffold their learning. In addition, each student is provided with a tablet or a laptop, which they use in every part of their daily classes.

I travelled from class to class, where I saw the video that the grade 4 class produced of their dino museum as part of the history of Alberta curriculum. I saw the grade 6 class producing multimedia presentations of the travels of a water molecule through the life cycle of water. I visited the art room, where students were creating prints, and they told me how they were moving on to silkscreening. And I saw the various projects that the students had produced as part of partners in place, an initiative undertaken by Connect Charter School and Tsuut'ina Education. Next I was shown the work that students have done with robotics and 3-D printing, robots that they have built and 3-D printing that they have designed and coded. That's right, Mr. Speaker. In this school students begin learning coding in grade 4.

These students are being taught the Alberta curriculum, the critical thinking, and the collaborative skills to prepare them for a future that we have not yet even imagined. With the meaningful integration of technology, the end goal at this school is developing extraordinary citizens.

Mr. Speaker, the student body at this school is one hundred per cent inclusive. All learners are admitted, diversity is celebrated, and inclusive practices are promoted and supported. Connect Charter School is an excellent example of the success of charter schooling in Alberta and one of the reasons that I support school choice.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Incitement to Hate

Ms Renaud: Thank you. In 2017 online hate speech in Canada grew 600 per cent, and over that same period the number of police-reported hate crimes reached an all-time high. On May 28 the federal justice committee held hearings to investigate the topic of online hate. During the meeting the MP for St. Albert-Edmonton berated one of the witnesses, Faisal Khan Suri, for suggesting a link between conservative commentators and the rise of hate crimes. Shockingly, the MP for St. Albert-Edmonton chose to quote the manifesto drafted by the person accused of mass killings at two mosques in Christchurch, New Zealand. Both he and his Conservative leader still refuse to acknowledge that the witness was in fact correct.

There's a link between online conservative commentators and the incitement of hate. Rebel media stars have been praised by various vile racists and white supremacists like Richard Spencer and David Duke.

Our Premier has deep connections to online sites like Rebel. In 2018 we learned that one of the Premier's senior campaign staff was behind Fireforce Ventures, a business that sold white supremacist memorabilia. Just a few months ago our Premier refused to expel a UCP member who compared a rainbow pride flag to the Nazi swastika at a Rebel live event. This is the same UCP member that the Premier gushed over, comparing his advocacy work to black civil rights icon Rosa Parks.

The Premier vowed to purge extremist elements from the UCP, even promising he'd create a database to track UCP members with extreme views. Perhaps our Premier has trouble recognizing extreme views. Real leaders condemn hate whenever and wherever they see it, no matter the political cost. That takes courage. It is my sincere hope that our Premier will find that courage and do the right thing.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Airdrie-Cochrane.

Transportation Infrastructure in Airdrie-Cochrane

Mr. Guthrie: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The constituency of Airdrie-Cochrane has over 51,000 residents, and both Airdrie and Cochrane are two of the fastest growing communities in Canada. Transportation infrastructure is being pushed to its limits. Airdrie, located on a major trade route, has 70,000 people, with very little infrastructure investment in the last decade. The 40th Avenue overpass is a major priority, but it sat on the previous government's unfunded list.

Cochrane is in a similar position, having no major interchange in a town approaching 30,000 people. Cochrane is separated north and south by the Bow River, including a single-lane bridge and a train that runs through the centre of town 30 times a day. When one combines all of this with single-lane traffic on both highways 1A and 22, it creates traffic congestion that is a safety risk.

I will credit the previous government with recognizing the importance of this project and beginning work on a design. However, it was repeatedly claimed that this project was in the budget and on the capital plan, but of course we know that a budget was not released for this fiscal year, so it could not have been funded. And since projects in the design phase still require approval, this interchange could not have been listed as a line item on the capital plan.

This mismanagement of Alberta's infrastructure needs is a microcosm of the NDP's overall mismanagement of the province's finances. Alberta's debt now exceeds $60 billion, and one of the last long-term debt financings by their government in February was at a rate of 8 per cent.

Our government will manage this province responsibly, stimulate the economy, and clean up our balance sheet, placing us in a stronger fiscal position to fund our infrastructure needs.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. Assembly, if I could just beg your indulgence, with apologies to Ms Stephanie Shostak, who is the guest that I had previously missed.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Eid al-Fitr

Member Loyola: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today Muslims all around Alberta, Canada, and the world are celebrating Eid al-Fitr, the first day of Shawwal in the Islamic calendar. It marks the end of the month-long fast of Ramadan and the start of a feast that lasts up to three days in some countries.

Eid al-Fitr is an important Islamic holiday for the Muslim community. This event involves many Muslims waking up early and praying either at an outdoor prayer ground or a mosque. People dress in their finest clothes and adorn their homes with lights and other decorations. Old wrongs are forgiven, and money is given to the poor. Special foods are prepared, and friends or relatives are invited to share in the feast. Gifts and greeting cards are exchanged, and children receive presents. Eid al-Fitr is a joyous occasion, but its underlying purpose is to pray and give thanks. [Remarks in Arabic]

Mr. Speaker, over 113,000 Muslims call Alberta their home, and of them, approximately 2,000 live in Edmonton-Ellerslie. Today, after a month of fasting and reflection, Eid is a time for Muslims to come together to feast, celebrate, and share their good fortune with others.

Muslim communities continue to make Canada stronger, more open, and more prosperous. Today let's celebrate their major contributions to our province. On behalf of the Alberta NDP caucus, to all my Muslim brothers and sisters I am proud to extend our warmest wishes to all those celebrating Eid al-Fitr. Eid Mubarak.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Falconridge.

Sikh Community in Alberta

Mr. Toor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would like to congratulate Alberta Sikhs on the recent Vaisakhi parades held in Calgary and Edmonton. These annual religious celebrations highlight the birth of Khalsa and the spreading of the message of peace and harmony. I want to thank the Premier and also the hon. members of this House who participated in these important annual events.

The Alberta Sikh community was established over 100 years ago. We have grown to over 100,000 members, many of whom have made significant contributions to the Alberta economy, the richness of Alberta's culture, and the ongoing improvement in the lives of many of our fellow citizens. The first Sikh was elected to this Assembly over 25 years ago.

As most hon. members know, this is a very active community, contributing to many charitable causes. As well, the community's strong connections with its heritages in India foster tremendous potential for two-way trade and future business opportunities. I know that the community is justifiably proud of its addition to the great Alberta family.

Perhaps one of Canada's best-known Sikhs right now is Nav Bhatia, who has been cheering on the Toronto Raptors as they pursue their first-ever NBA championship.

I also want to draw to this Assembly's attention to some dark clouds that are forming over the community. The recent deadly events of four young Indo-Canadians in Calgary due to gang violence and drug wars have created real fear in the community. This House should be aware of the terrible spread of gang violence spilling over from B.C. to Alberta.

Just this weekend I attended a demonstration with hundreds of concerned children, seniors, and youth in northeast Calgary calling on the government to fight drugs and violence in schools. I urge the government to heed their call.

Postsecondary Education Funding

Mr. Eggen: Well, Mr. Speaker, it's graduation season in Alberta, and thousands of 12th grade students are writing exams, attending graduation ceremonies, and making plans to attend postsecondary institutions. Attending postsecondary is expensive, but it's an investment that pays great dividends for the individual, for families, and for our society as a whole.

So when this provincial government interferes with the affordability, accessibility, and equality of postsecondary education, all Albertans should be concerned. Should this government get rid of some of the red tape by throwing out the guarantee that tuition increases must not exceed the increases in the consumer price index, for example, postsecondary education will simply become unaffordable for many students.

Alberta's New Democrats recognized the importance of making postsecondary education more affordable, and our reforms would save an Alberta student at least $2,000 over the course of a four-year degree. Now, with this new UCP government these savings are in peril.

Also, the graduation gift that this UCP government is foisting on the class of 2019 is a big cut to the minimum wage for young people. As we speak, students are lining up for summer jobs to help pay for postsecondary education in the fall, and woe on the unlucky grade 12s who were born in September, October, November, and December and thus can be paid 15 per cent less than their classmates who were born earlier in the year. Over the course of the summer this will amount to hundreds of dollars less for these unfortunate students. Shame on this UCP government for being so unjust and mean spirited to the class of 2019. This is the last, bitter lesson delivered to the students by the UCP before they graduate, and I'm sure it's a lesson these thousands of students will never forget.

Introduction of Bills

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Municipal Government (Property Tax Incentives) Amendment Act, 2019

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my distinct honour to rise today to seek leave to introduce Bill 7, the Municipal Government (Property Tax Incentives) Amendment Act, 2019.

This bill introduces changes to the Municipal Government Act that will enable municipalities across Alberta a wide latitude to establish property tax exemption programs to attract investment and get Albertans back to work. This is one part of our government's comprehensive plan to restore prosperity and let the world know that Alberta is once again open for business. Other jurisdictions in North America have given local governments similar flexibility, but this bill goes a step further in the freedom it gives to municipalities. We know that municipalities are a vital partner in bringing long-term prosperity back to Alberta, and I am very pleased to introduce this bill, that will give them another tool to help Albertans back to work.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[Motion carried; Bill 7 read a first time]

Tabling Returns and Reports

Mr. Deol: Mr. Speaker, I rise today with the required number of copies of a document entitled Leitch Is Mostly Wrong – But Also Right – About Immigration, which I referenced during Oral Question Period yesterday. Thank you.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

St. Albert, please, is rising with a tabling.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have five copies of an article by Mr. Keith Gerein, Scheer's Kid Glove Treatment of St. Albert MP Sends All the Wrong Messages.

Tablings to the Clerk

The Clerk: I wish to advise the Assembly that the following documents were deposited with the office of the Clerk: on behalf of the hon. Mr. Madu, Minister of Municipal Affairs, pursuant to the Municipal Government Act the Calgary Metropolitan Region Board annual report 2018; pursuant to the Special Areas Act the special areas trust account financial statements, December 31, 2018.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The Leader of the Official Opposition.

Oil Transportation

Ms Notley: Thank you. Mr. Speaker. A Minnesota court has thrown another potential wrench into the line 3 expansion, further delaying the point at which Alberta can expand its takeaway capacity to meet our growing production. The timing of pipelines coming online is a critical consideration in the matter of how long Alberta has to continue under curtailment. Can the Premier please advise this House of the exact information he is receiving from officials about what Albertans can expect to be the new operation date for line 3 as a result of this decision?

Mr. Kenney: I thank the Leader of the Opposition for the question.

First, allow me to inform the House that, very happily, Mr. Speaker, approximately two hours ago Her Honour the Lieutenant Governor gave royal assent to Bill 1, the carbon tax repeal act.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the information I received from officials is the same that one sees through public commentary by experts in the energy industry, that due to the regrettable delays in the line 3 replacement project it likely will not be completed until some time in the next calendar year. I don't have a closer date than that, but obviously this is a very troublesome development for the Alberta energy industry.

The Speaker: The Leader of the Official Opposition.

Ms Notley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I certainly hope that the Premier can get more detailed information than that. I do know that he should likely be receiving it.

Now, the reason for crude by rail was to provide more takeaway capacity to all players in the market during a period where our production overshot our ability to move our resources, driving down prices to below $10 per barrel. Now, the crude-by-rail deal would have moved 120,000 barrels per day, costing roughly $3.7 billion and earning $5.9 billion in return. To the Premier: with further line 3 delays, why won't you reverse course and keep the oil-by-rail strategy on track?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, the opposition leader and I agree, as do, I believe, all members of the House, that we need to see an increase in crude-by-rail shipments, to increase egress right now and in the foreseeable future. Having said that, where we disagree is that we believe the burden to do that should lie with the private sector and not with taxpayers. We disagree fundamentally with the NDP government's decision to make the single largest expenditure of tax dollars in Alberta history do something that the private sector was perfectly capable and willing to do.

Ms Notley: In fact, Mr. Speaker, the private sector wasn't doing it, and what our numbers show is that this is a benefit to taxpayers, not a cost.

Now, in the reality where line 3 is delayed, crude by rail serves as the incremental release valve for a market that has been consistently plagued by bottlenecks. Now, that's not me talking, Mr. Speaker, but, rather, RBC capital markets analyst Michael Tran. He understood that our government was providing medium-term relief while pipelines were being built. The Premier now wants to shut off this valve permanently and replace it with nothing. To the Premier: are you so blinded by your ideology that you will risk further job losses by cancelling the crude by rail?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, let's be clear. This government has had a chance to review the terrible deal signed at the last minute, during the formal campaign period, in desperation by the NDP, where they committed taxpayers to paying billions of dollars for something the private sector was prepared to do, at much higher than the market costs, with nothing like normal commercial contractual provisions. They got taken, but this government will stand up for Alberta taxpayers. We will say to the private sector: please let market forces ensure additional shipment of oil by rail.

The Speaker: The Leader of the Official Opposition has the call.

Ms Notley: Well, I've got to say, Mr. Speaker, that if getting $2.2 billion extra is being taken, I can't imagine what the member opposite would call a windfall.

Education Funding

Ms Notley: Anyway, on to a different topic. Yesterday we revealed that at least two students with disabilities are being denied their right to a fourth year of high school because of financial uncertainty created by this UCP government. The Minister of Education claimed that it was a board procedural issue. That is not true. The provincial government holds all the funding cards. When they don't show them, boards are forced into bad decisions, just like that one, and Albertans know this. Why will the Premier not tell his Education minister . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, as I've said, the Minister of Education will provide information to school boards about transfers in the near future.

An Hon. Member: They don't want information; they want funding.

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, they do have funding. In fact, they have the highest level of funding in Alberta history and the highest per-pupil and per capita funding in Canada, in fact, I suspect, in real terms the highest per-pupil funding of any provincial government in Canadian history. What we expect is for school boards to properly manage the resources that are made available to them. There will be more information forthcoming.

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, last week parents were being surveyed on whether to cut the music program or increase class sizes. This week students with learning disabilities can't even enrol in school. All of this is just the beginning as this government negligently keeps boards guessing about funding levels for next September. To the Premier: how many more of these so-called board procedural issues can we expect as they try to balance the budget on the backs of Alberta students?

Mr. Kenney: As we committed to Albertans in the last campaign, this government will maintain or increase funding levels for education. Information will be forthcoming shortly to school boards about the next school year. Having said that, what the NDP did was to dig this province into a $60 billion debt hole, headed to $100 billion in debt. [interjections] Do you know what that meant, Mr. Speaker? That meant billions of dollars going to bankers and bondholders instead of schools and hospitals. [interjections] We will not allow fiscal irresponsibility to jeopardize the future of public education.

The Speaker: Hon. members, I might just add that a well-placed heckle makes the Chamber a great place to work; a whole bunch of loud heckles at the same time makes it very difficult to hear the answer.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, yesterday 82 per cent of Alberta school trustees voted to call on this minister to delay proclamation of the decade-old education bill. This act will create huge uncertainty in our schools while this government hasn't even figured out whether to support the students we already have. To the minister. You were a trustee until last October. Will you listen to your former peers and delay the legislation, or do you really trust that this Premier knows more about our schools than they do?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, let's be clear. The Education Act isn't a decade old. It was passed seven years ago. The NDP said they would bring it into law. They didn't: promise broken. The School Act, which it replaces, is a century old. Unlike the NDP, we are going to modernize the Education Act, which was subject to massive consultations with school boards and all relevant stakeholders. The minister will be making an announcement on a bill that is on the Order Paper that flows from more recent consultations on the modernization of our education law.

The Speaker: The Leader of the Official Opposition for your third question.

Ms Notley: Consulting with John Carpay is not the same as listening to 82 per cent of Alberta school trustees, Mr. Premier.

Ambulance Services in Calgary

Ms Notley: Now, the uncertainty created by UCP fiscal stonewalling is also affecting health services. Today it was revealed that officials in charge of ambulance services in Calgary are holding off hiring up to 60 new paramedics in anticipation of orders to roll back health spending. This means ambulances are being kept off the road in Calgary. To the Premier. It took you less than a month to start doling out big tax breaks to profitable corporations, but you can't even take the time to give interim certainty to health care workers so they can protect Albertans. Why not?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, AHS is operating on the budget and funding levels of the NDP. Now, officials have contacted AHS and reported back that there was no gap in service as a result of current vacancies. The vacancies discussed in the documents released by the NDP are normal turnover. They're budgeted positions that are in the process of being filled, and all of them should be filled within a few weeks.

I thank the member for the question.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, that's not what the documents that we released today actually said.

Now, our government announced in December that Calgary would be getting 10 new ambulances and 30 additional EMS staff as part of a $29 million commitment province-wide to boost emergency services. But now we're seeing a delay in hiring up to 60 EMS staff because of fear about UCP cuts. To the Premier: will you direct your Minister of Health to commit to the $29 million investment, or are you content to literally keep ambulances off Calgary streets?

The Speaker: I see that the Minister of Health is rising to answer.

Mr. Shandro: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As the Premier said, this is just normal turnover. This is the NDP's budget that they're now complaining about. Quite frankly, we campaigned on fixing the system after four years of the NDP. Costs are up, and results are down. If the NDP are looking for someone to blame, they need to look at themselves.

Ms Notley: The documents released say that there is uncertainty due to UCP budget uncertainty.

It gets worse. We are also hearing directly from front-line staff that where managers would historically address staffing shortages by giving paramedics overtime, they're now worried about driving up costs because the UCP government is not going to fund them. We've been told that as many as five current ambulances are being kept off Alberta streets. To the Premier. You know enough about the budget to spend $4.5 billion on tax cuts. Why don't you know enough to protect ambulances in Calgary?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, something that the NDP seems incapable of understanding is the urgency of re-creating economic growth and new jobs in Alberta, which is the most effective way of reducing the deficit and eventually balancing the budget. Through economic growth we generate additional revenues. What the NDP was doing was strangling our economy: four years of economic decline, four years of digging us deeper into a debt hole, four years of jeopardizing the future of public services. This government is going to get first things first by growing the economy. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Ambulance Services

Mr. Shepherd: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Now, as the Leader of the Opposition noted, the concerns being raised by front-line paramedics are real and very concerning. I've talked directly with these emergency responders. They're telling me that they simply can't keep up. In fact, the prevalence of code reds in Calgary is becoming almost a routine occurrence. A code red means that there's literally not a single ambulance available to respond to an emergency. To the Minister of Health: will you commit to taking action today to properly staff Calgary EMS, or is this just another matter you'll handle in due course?

The Speaker: The Minister of Health.

Mr. Shandro: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. First of all, I think what the member meant was actually a red alert. Or, no. Is it code red? But they're a part of the system. They come and go. They're for, thankfully, a short period of time. I'm not aware of any disproportionate number of red alerts, but I would expect to be briefed by AHS if there were. I look forward to working with AHS and making sure that the numbers do decrease.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our government took action to address the rising need for emergency medical services in Calgary, an increase of $29 million in the budget last year. This minister owes it to his city to see through the funding commitments that we made. Will the minister commit to ensuring that every position we funded for emergency response in Calgary is filled as soon as possible, and will he commit to a further review of the strain being placed on ambulances in that city?

Mr. Shandro: Mr. Speaker, I'm going to echo the comments of the Premier that when we asked AHS after the member's press conference, the vacancies discussed in the documents released by the NDP are normal turnover. They're budgeted positions that are in the process of being filled, and all of them should be filled within a couple of weeks.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Shepherd: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's clear that the need for improved emergency services is not just something specific to Calgary. That's why our government also funded additional ambulance services in Grande Prairie, Medicine Hat, Sylvan Lake, Vilna, St. Paul, and right here in Edmonton. Will the minister also commit to seeing through those commitments in conducting further assessment of ambulance services province-wide, or is his only priority that of his Premier's tax cut for wealthy corporations?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Mr. Shandro: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. First of all, it's a little bit difficult to hear the NDP asking us questions about EMS when for four years the Government House Leader and his caucus asked questions of the previous minister about EMS and about paramedics and for four years they did nothing. That's why we were elected. Albertans got sick of that previous government not listening to Albertans to be able to make any changes and improve EMS services for Albertans.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon has a question.

Natural Gas Industry

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Alberta is blessed to have an abundance of natural gas as the fourth-largest gas producer in the world. In fact, approximately two-thirds of Canada's production comes from Alberta, yet we still face challenges, including price volatility, market access, insolvencies, and new competitors. These challenges hurt Alberta's ability to capitalize on the potential of our natural gas industry. To the minister: My constituents want to know: what will you do to bring much-needed stability to this critical industry?

The Speaker: The Associate Minister of Natural Gas is rising.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon is absolutely correct. We have tremendous natural gas resources in this province. Unfortunately, we are forced to sell our natural gas at fire-sale prices because we can't get our product to market. My office is currently reviewing the Natural Gas Advisory Panel's recommendations to see what actions we can bring forward not just for the benefit of the natural gas community but for all Albertans.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The Member for Drayton Valley-Devon, please.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the United Conservative government has said that we will work with other governments, regulators, and industry in order to navigate many of the challenges Alberta's natural gas industry is facing and given that appointing Alberta's first-ever Associate Minister of Natural Gas was promised as a solution for the industry in the United Conservative platform and given that my constituents depend on the success of Alberta's natural gas industry, to the minister: what has been the reception thus far from market participants on your appointment?

The Speaker: The Associate Minister of Natural Gas.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. After four years of apathy instead of action on the part of the previous administration, I can tell you that natural gas producers are absolutely thrilled that this government has delivered on one of our election promises, which was to appoint an Associate Minister of Natural Gas. I guess you could say that it's one more example of promise made, promise kept.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that our United Conservative platform states that we will focus on revitalizing Alberta's natural gas sector through a robust energy strategy to unblock natural gas shipments and given that Albertans and especially my constituents who work in the energy industry understand the importance of getting this part of our economic puzzle right and given that our province has been experiencing incredibly volatile gas prices, to the minister: when can Alberta begin to see a fair price for its natural gas?

The Speaker: The hon. Associate Minister of Natural Gas.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon I can say that I'm not in the business of predicting natural gas prices. I can say, however, that my office is diligently planning our work. We're going to work our plan, and we're going to do that by engaging with stakeholders and coming up with meaningful actions that we can implement within this industry.

Thank you.

Premier's Principal Secretary

Member Irwin: Mr. Speaker, the right mix is how the Premier described how he would staff his office. Some Premiers look for a mix of public and private experience or perhaps people with strong legal or business experience. The thing is that the right mix usually doesn't include people who oppose human rights protections. My question is to the Premier. Are you willing to enlighten everyone here on why the right mix needs to include a principal secretary, Howard Anglin, who has a long history of anti-LGBTQ positions and even defended a ban on same-sex relationships?

The Speaker: Members, I hope that this question is a direct question about government policy with respect to this issue. It certainly didn't sound like that to me, but I'll call upon the Premier to answer.

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, we can hear that the NDP's campaign of fear and smear and defamation of character continues unabated . . .

Mr. Carson: Stop hiring bigots.

Mr. Kenney: . . . by their trouncing at the polls.

The Speaker: Hon. members, I very clearly heard from the backbench, what I believe to be the hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday, the phrase "Stop hiring idiots." I think that would be wildly inappropriate if that's what I did hear. I would caution members of the opposition when making statements about individuals who are not in the Assembly.

The hon. Premier has the call.

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, the NDP's campaign of fear and smear and defamation and attacking people continues unabated after their trouncing in the campaign recently. I'm proud to have Mr. Anglin on my staff. Mr. Anglin is the former deputy chief of staff to the Prime Minister of Canada, a lawyer called to the bar in New York, has acted as a solicitor in England, and is a brilliant man who's run a think tank. I'm delighted to have him on our side.

Member Irwin: It's not fear and smear when you're talking about our community.

Given that last year the Supreme Court ruled that Trinity Western University's community covenant that banned any intimacy outside of heterosexual marriage is discriminatory and put LGBTQ students at risk of significant harm and given that the same day as this ruling the same principal secretary took to Twitter to describe the Supreme Court decision as "one of the worst . . . decisions in recent memory," my question is to the Premier. Do you agree with your top adviser's description, and would you allow universities in Alberta to discriminate against LGBTQ students?

Mr. Kenney: Now the NDP's penchant for character assassination extends to attacking lawyers who comment on judicial decisions, Mr. Speaker. I would remind the hon. member that the British Columbia Court of Appeal ruled differently than the Supreme Court on the same matter. Will that member now stand up and engage in defamation against the members of the British Columbia Court of Appeal? I for one respect the decisions of our judges and respect the opinions that lawyers may have on judicial precedents.

Member Irwin: I'd like respect for members of our community.

Given his principal secretary's clear disregard for the rights of LGBTQ students, can the Premier tell the students just how much influence Howard Anglin has had over ideological moves like dismantling the conversion therapy working group and rolling back protections for queer and trans students so they can be outed?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, all of that is ridiculous, but the good news is that Albertans in their great common sense understand how to filter out the politics of fear and smear that emanate daily from the NDP. That is why that party was so convincingly repudiated by Albertans just a few weeks ago. This government and the United Conservative Party stand for the human dignity of all people regardless of . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: We will have order.

Mr. Kenney: You hear the anger machine. They just don't know how to stop, Mr. Speaker.

We will continue to defend dignity for all Albertans, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deol: Mr. Speaker, it gets worse with this Premier's principal secretary. When Conservative leadership candidate Kellie Leitch was criticized for campaigning on the radical, hate-driven idea to screen immigrants for, quote, anti-Canadian values, the Premier's principal secretary said not to criticize her and that the backlash was, quote, overblown. To the minister of immigration: will you condemn the comments from Mr. Anglin and promise this House that he will have no say over immigration policies adopted by your government?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, what the NDP has engaged in here is nothing less than character assassination against a distinguished Canadian lawyer, a former deputy chief of staff to the Prime Minister of Canada, who, I can assure you, was my chief of staff as minister of citizenship and immigration when I welcomed 1.3 million permanent residents to Canada, more than any immigration minister in Canadian history. I'm proud of that record and how Mr. Anglin helped us to welcome so many newcomers to this country.

Mr. Deol: Mr. Speaker, given that Howard Anglin also wrote that letting people's grandparents immigrate would "impose a higher burden on the Canadian healthcare and welfare systems," my question is again to the minister of immigration. Are you also against letting grandparents immigrate to Canada?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, apparently the NDP's approach to character assassination now comes to mischaracterizing and attacking political staff. The members of this Legislature, the members of this cabinet are the ones who are . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Members, we heard the question; we'll hear the answer. You may not agree with the answer, but I will hear it.

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, apparently their humiliation in the last election did not cause the NDP to reflect for one moment on how their politics of fear and smear and personal destruction are so profoundly distasteful to Albertans. If the member wants to talk about federal immigration policy, I'm happy to do that with him any time. I'm proud of my record in that respect.

Mr. Deol: Mr. Speaker, given that it just keeps getting worse with Howard Anglin's record of perpetuating white nationalist sentiments, similar to the things that resulted in the resignation of candidates during the recent election, does the minister think these comments are acceptable, or will he request that the Premier fire his new top adviser?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, that question was absolutely vile. If the member were to repeat that outside, I believe it would constitute a prima facie case of defamation. Members cannot abuse the privilege of this place to drag into the mud the names of reputable people who are serving the Alberta public. I repeat, Mr. Anglin served as my chief . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Members, I think this will be my third or fourth interjection with respect to hearing the answer to a question.

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Anglin worked as my chief of staff, and we welcomed over 1.3 million permanent residents to this country. Mr. Speaker, if what we are going to see from the NDP for the next four years is more of this kind of politics of character assassination, I'll tell you that their repudiation in the next election is even going to be more serious.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie has a question.

Ms Notley: What you will see is us standing up for human rights, always.

The Speaker: Hon. member, the Leader of the Official Opposition, the Member for Grande Prairie has the call.

Highway 40 Twinning

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the hon. Minister of Transportation. The twinning of highway 40 is critical in providing safe passage for workers to the many job sites south of the city. Job creation and economic development are key priorities of this government. Given that significant investment and subsequent job creation are proposed for the area south of Grande Prairie, further congesting this highway, will the minister confirm the commitment of this government to the project?

The Speaker: The Minister of Transportation is rising to answer.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I thank the hon. member for the question. I recognize that highway 40 is a valuable contributor to Alberta's economic success and that the area south of Grande Prairie is an important driver in the region and for the province. The proposed project is currently identified as unfunded on the capital list and is being considered alongside the rest of the transportation projects. While the capital plan hasn't been set, we can confirm that highway 40 is under careful consideration.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie.

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the same minister: given the financial situation Alberta now faces as a result of the former government's mismanagement, which you just mentioned, and given the potential impact of those financial constraints on key projects throughout the province, affecting both the Infrastructure and Transportation budgets, can the minister confirm that the highway 40 twinning, including the bridge, is a priority and will go ahead this year, and can the minister assure the people of Grande Prairie that this project will not be further delayed?

The Speaker: The Minister of Transportation.

Mr. McIver: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the hon. member, a second bridge over the Wapiti River is included in the proposed twinning project for highway 40 south of Grande Prairie. Engineering, design work started in 2017. The next steps are land acquisition, environmental approvals, and moving utilities. We expect construction, when the project does go ahead, to take three or four years because it's a fairly big project. It's being considered alongside the rest of our important transportation projects. The capital plan has not been set, but I will again assure the hon. member we will take this very seriously.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie.

Mrs. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the same minister: given that proposed projects like those by Nauticol Energy and the tri-municipal development site, once initiated, will both increase the traffic and congestion currently experienced on highway 40 and given that the section approved for twinning is less than 20 kilometres in length, can the minister outline or expand on what other measures and improvements are being considered to improve the safety for workers, tourists, and all Albertans on this highway?

The Speaker: The Minister of Transportation.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member's advocacy is to be commended. I can confirm to the member that work is under way to pave 56 kilometres of highway 40 right now south of Grande Prairie between the Kakwa River and the Canfor intersection. The work includes nine passing lanes, over 26 kilometres in length, two safety rest areas, seven intersection improvements. When completed in 2020, it will significantly improve safety for all highway users, including tourists and business operators. As far as that goes, we encourage all Albertans to drive safely and follow the signs.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs is rising.

Conversion Therapy Working Group

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's been nearly a week since I met with the Minister of Health in hopes of getting answers on why he cancelled the Conversion Therapy Working Group. Now, I understand why the minister may not want to keep me on the working group, but his stonewalling of the other members makes no sense. All they have heard is that the minister will get back to them in due course. To the minister: plain and simple, what is the status of the working group?

The Speaker: The Minister of Health is rising.

Mr. Shandro: Mr. Speaker, usually when I repeat things, it gets reported by our friends in the gallery above. As a government we oppose conversion therapy, and I want all Albertans, especially those in the gender and sexual diversity community, to understand this, that if anybody has any information about this abusive practice occurring in our province, my office wants to be able to work with them to make sure that that is reported to the correct authorities.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that I am joined today in the House by members of the Conversion Therapy Working Group and given that these people have volunteered their time to work on a strategy to ban this harmful practice, is the minister really trying to suggest that their concerns are unwarranted and that they have wasted their time?

Mr. Shandro: Mr. Speaker, as I said, I'm looking forward to working with anybody who has any information about this abusive practice occurring in our province and making sure that it's reported to the correct authorities, as I've said at the meeting with the hon. member as well as Dr. Lieb, and this extends to all members of that committee. For anyone who wants to meet with me and be able to discuss any conversations that have occurred, any recommendations people have about future legislation, anything related to conversion therapy, my door is always open. It continues to be open for those members.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs is rising.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that this minister likes to dole out talking point after talking point while no real action is taking place and given that getting back to members of the Conversion Therapy Working Group in due course just won't cut it, will the minister agree to take another meeting this afternoon with the members of the working group that have joined us here today in the Legislature?

Mr. Shandro: Mr. Speaker, I think it's really important for us to remember that for four years we had the NDP telling us that this was not an issue, that this practice does not occur in the province of Alberta, that for four years they did nothing on this issue until weeks before the campaign. Really, the group only met twice. Their third meeting was cancelled because they called the campaign, and that's why they weren't able to continue their work. I think Albertans see through what was happening with the calling of that working group, and they see that that previous government really didn't take this issue seriously.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Postsecondary Tuition and Noninstructional Fees

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our government worked very hard to reduce costs with the tuition freeze and then a legislated cap on increases at the rate of the consumer price index. This would save an Alberta student an average of $2,000 over a four-year degree. Now, we know that the Conservatives have a history of making cuts to postsecondary institutions and then passing the bill on to students through tuition increases. I ask the Minister of Advanced Education: will you commit to keeping the tuition cap in place for the sake of Alberta students?

The Speaker: The Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaides: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As it relates to tuition, as all members of this House will know, over the last four years there has been a tuition freeze in place. We're continuing to work with different stakeholder groups. In fact, later this afternoon I'm having a meeting with the executive of the Council of Alberta University Students to get a better understanding from their perspective to make sure that we can create a sustainable postsecondary education model for now and into the future.

The Speaker: The Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, given that the word "tuition" was not even mentioned a single time in the UCP platform and given that the tuition policy we developed involved a substantial consultation with students, including an increase but just to the consumer price index, I ask the minister now: will you commit today that students will be fully informed about the plans to increase tuition fees and make programming cuts in the province of Alberta?

The Speaker: The Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaides: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our student groups, of course, will always be involved and informed in all aspects of decision-making as we look to move forward to renew postsecondary education in the province of Alberta. We've heard loud and clear from our students that one of the things that they need the most, one of the things that they are looking for is a good, high-paying job at the end of their degree, and we're going to work hard to make sure that that happens.

Mr. Eggen: Well, you know, given that we know that in the past institutions have circumvented tuition rules by increasing mandatory noninstructional fees and given that the legislation grants to students at this time meaningful input on fees, including a veto, to the same minister: will you maintain the student veto on noninstructional fees here in the province of Alberta?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Nicolaides: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, as we look towards renewing postsecondary education, one of our top priorities is going to be to ensure that our graduates have incredibly high-paying jobs, the best quality jobs possible within the province of Alberta. We're going to work hard to make sure that that happens. We want to get a better understanding of the labour market impacts of degree programs, and we want to ensure that when a new degree program is created or offered, our institutions are giving due consideration to the labour market demands for those programs. We need to make sure that there are jobs now and well into the future for these programs.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie is rising with a question.

Foreign Qualifications and Credentials

Mr. Milliken: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Alberta is a land of opportunity. People come here from all over the world to live, work, and raise a family. My constituency of Calgary-Currie is a diverse community, many of whom are new Albertans that came here seeking a better life. Many of these newcomers also came to Alberta highly qualified across different professional fields. Minister, can you please tell my constituents what our government's plan is to help these skilled workers get their credentials recognized and work in their rightful professional fields?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I'd like to thank the Member for Calgary-Currie for the question. This is a very important topic and one that I'm glad to address in this House. Recognizing foreign credentials in a speedy fashion will allow foreign-trained professionals to work at the levels they are capable of. That is why our government will introduce the fair access to regulated professions and trades act to help speed up certification and allow newcomers to fully contribute to the economy. With this support we believe that more talented newcomers will have the opportunity to contribute fully to our province.

The Speaker: Calgary-Currie.

Mr. Milliken: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the process for getting foreign credentials is often arbitrary, where workers could be left waiting for years for a decision, and given that these new Albertans are often forced to find alternative employment or lower paying jobs to feed and clothe their families while regulatory bodies can take years to make a decision, Minister, my constituents want to know: what is the timeline for getting these foreign credentials recognized and getting newcomers back to work in their rightful professions?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We will be introducing the fair access to regulated professions and trades act very soon. This legislation will ensure fairness in the registration process of foreign-trained individuals who wish to work in a regulated profession or designated trade while maintaining Alberta's professional standards. This act will specify a quick timeline for getting an interim decision and indicate whether the applicant requires upgrading, bridging, additional examinations, or work-experience hours under supervision.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Milliken: Thank you, Minister, and thank you, Speaker. Given that this province has wasted a tremendous amount of human capital while skilled new Alberta workers wait to have their credentials recognized and given that in the past these decisions have not always been fair and transparent, with some workers being denied without even knowing why, Minister, can you please tell my constituents how our government plans to work with different professional licensing groups to ensure that this process is fair and transparent?

Mr. Copping: Mr. Speaker, our plan is to work collaboratively with regulators to streamline, simplify, and accelerate their processes wherever possible. We need to make sure that there are efficient ways for new Albertans to earn the qualifications that they need so that they can work in their chosen field and that these processes are fair, objective, impartial, and transparent. To help achieve this, we will establish a fairness for newcomers office to lead this work. As I said at the outset, our first approach is to work collaboratively with the regulatory organizations to achieve our goal of full economic integration of newcomers.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The Member for Edmonton-Manning has a question.

Supervised Drug Consumption Sites

Ms Sweet: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Kym Porter, a Medicine Hat mother who lost her son to an overdose three years ago, has launched a petition to stop the funding freeze on supervised consumption sites being pushed by this UCP government without any consultation. Ms Porter said that this Premier is making, quote, an ethical and morally wrong decision. To the Premier: will you rise in this House and attempt to explain to a family survivor of addictions how exactly it is that you know better than her?

The Speaker: The Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions.

Mr. Luan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our government committed full support for continuum of care for Albertans that ranges from harm reduction to recovery. Let me make that point again. We not only continue to support that; we are committed for another $100 million for a comprehensive mental health and addictions strategy.

Ms Sweet: The strategy is safe consumption sites.

Given that I've seen countless survivors of addictions come out in favour of these supervised consumption sites, will the Premier and the Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions commit to sitting down with a group of these survivors immediately, given that their funding freeze has come without any credible input from these advocates? I'll be happy to arrange it for you.

The Speaker: The Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions.

Mr. Luan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This hon. member I think is a social worker, too. I would draw to her attention that as a social worker you understand that people's needs differ, their readiness differs. When we want to help people, we want to create a continuum of care. That includes supervised consumption sites. If one is going to be so passionately talking only about one service, one intervention, that's not what we need to do.

Ms Sweet: You're right. I am a social worker, and I know that you have to meet people where they're at, which means that these people will die without these sites.

Given that the Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions has said that he expects the review he's ordered of supervised consumption sites to result in a review for him to read, given that all this sounds like another secretive health care decision from this UCP government that they will make in due course, will the associate minister commit that the survivors of addictions will have direct input to his report? Will he tell us who he's picked to be on this review and, frankly, tell us anything about this review?

The Speaker: The Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions.

Mr. Luan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. When the opposition had a chance to be government, they picked and chose what to do. But this government is committed to the full continuum of care for Albertans. We're going to provide a comprehensive strategy that will address the broader needs of people who need access to treatment and who need to get help for recovery.

The Speaker: The Leader of the Official Opposition has a question.

Ms Notley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last week the Health minister met with the chair of the former conversion therapy working group and created more questions than answers. When he was asked about them, he repeated standard talking points that were, quite frankly, embarrassing. Today he said that his door is always open, but he hasn't answered the question. They're all up there listening to this conversation. Will you commit to meeting them today, and if not, why not?

Mr. Shandro: Yes, I actually just already sent a note to the hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs. You know, if that works for their group, then after question period I look forward to being able to make that work, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The Leader of the Official Opposition.

Ms Notley: I'm very pleased to hear that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Ms Notley: Now, given that this group has been working diligently on the very, very serious issue of conversion therapy and the fact that it creates many, many victims across this province and, quite frankly, across the country, will the Health minister stand up and commit to moving forward with the work of this conversion therapy group?

The Speaker: We'll note the point of order at 2:34.
The Minister of Health, please.

Mr. Shandro: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, the Leader of the Opposition said that I was repeating talking points. Unfortunately, the most important things I said before and after what was clipped by our friends in the media were, first of all, that we oppose conversion therapy and, second of all, that my door is open. I want to work with people who do have concerns with conversion therapy happening in the province and with making sure that's reported to the correct authorities. They want to ignore that, though. They want to ignore everything that we are saying about that issue. As I said, I'm happy to meet with the remaining members of the committee that I haven't met with who are here today.

The Speaker: The Leader of the Official Opposition for your final supplemental.

Ms Notley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As I said before, given that conversion therapy is such a hurtful, assaultive practice on those poor young people, primarily, who are subjected to it, will the minister commit to maintaining the status of this conversion therapy working group and implementing the recommendations that they make within the next six months? Yes or no?

Mr. Shandro: Mr. Speaker, for four years the previous government did nothing on this issue. They kept on telling us that it doesn't occur in this province, and I think Albertans see through what the previous government did in the weeks before the previous campaign in starting a working group.

Mr. Speaker, this is not a group that was appointed by ministerial order. This is not a group that was appointed by order in council. This was a group that was informally, on an ad hoc basis, formed on a time-limited basis for five months. I think Albertans see through what the previous government did on this issue.

Wildfire Prevention and Mountain Pine Beetle Control

Mr. Long: Mr. Speaker, right now there are forest fires across the province, some of which are in my constituency of West Yellowhead. It appears that this is a common occurrence in the month of May. My constituents are asking how our government plans to protect their communities going forward. To the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry: will your department consider establishing and maintaining a fire ban or restrictions until after the Victoria Day long weekend, when dry conditions in the province generally improve?

The Speaker: The Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Dreeshen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I would like to thank the Member for West Yellowhead for the question. Our firefighters are doing everything possible to fight the fires in your area and across Alberta. Right now there are 29 firefighters and two pieces of heavy equipment fighting the fires in Edson. When it comes to fire bans, they are re-evaluated weekly, sometimes on a daily basis. They are a very important tool to engage with people. We want Albertans to go out into these public areas, use our forests to go quadding, to go dirt biking. We need that engagement between them.

Thanks.

Mr. Long: Thank you, Minister. Mr. Speaker, given that the forestry industry is a significant employer in my constituency and given that there are mounting concerns regarding the pine beetle and its contribution to the forest fire issues and given that the previous government left much to be desired with the pine beetle strategy, can the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry tell me how our government will make changes and improvements to the existing pine beetle strategy?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Dreeshen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, the mountain pine beetle is a very serious issue, as the member pointed out. Last year we did see a terrible increase near Calgary, Rocky Mountain House, Whitecourt, and Edson, but this government is committed to working to slow the spread of the mountain pine beetle. That's why in our platform we committed $5 million extra, up to $30 million, to help fight with this initiative.

Mr. Long: Thank you, Minister. Mr. Speaker, given that in my constituency of West Yellowhead we have Jasper national park, which has been decimated by the lack of a pine beetle strategy, and given that a lack of action in the park has left other parts of my constituency vulnerable and given that the pine beetle is a pan-Canadian issue, how will the provincial government work with its federal counterparts on minimizing the effects of the pine beetle infestation going forward?

The Speaker: The Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Dreeshen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and again thank you to the member for that very important question. Since 2006 the province of Alberta has spent nearly half a billion dollars combatting the mountain pine beetle. To date since 2006 the federal government has only invested $18 million, and so far this year there has been zero funding from the federal government. This is not just an Alberta issue, as the member stated. This is a pan-Canadian issue, across the country, and we will work with the federal government to make sure that they can help, partner with us.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, I understand that the points of order have been settled in the usual ways and means. As such, they've been withdrawn.

2:40

Orders of the Day

The Speaker: Hon. members, in approximately 30 seconds I think we will begin debate on Bill 4.

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 4 Red Tape Reduction Act

[Debate adjourned June 4]

The Speaker: Hon. members, I believe the Member for Edmonton-Decore is rising to debate.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's always a pleasure to rise in this Chamber and bring forward the voices of Edmonton-Decore and talk about the bill that's in front of us today, Bill 4, the Red Tape Reduction Act, a bill that, quite frankly, contains no targets, contains no timelines, and doesn't even define what the government considers to be red tape.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

This bill does, however, give the associate minister the ability to create new regulations and amend existing ones. Quite frankly, Madam Speaker, I think that that in itself is just red tape. I think it's probably a little bit important to look at some of the work that has gone on around red tape. We have seen British Columbia do some work on this. We've seen Manitoba do some work on this. We've also seen the Ontario government do some work around red tape. I'm sure everybody's always very open-minded in terms of reducing a burden. Certainly, when we have the chance to reduce those things in a way that's responsible, in a way that doesn't put people in jeopardy or in harm's way, and it certainly doesn't affect things like our environment, then absolutely we will need to look at those very closely. But I always have to bring about that little bit of caution.

When we look at 2011, Harper announced the launch of a Red Tape Reduction Commission. The commission called on the government to take action on reducing burden on business, making it easier to do business with regulators and improving service and predictability. In 2015 legislation was brought forward to establish a 20 per cent red tape cut and a one-for-one – meaning, of course, that every new regulation burden proposed must be matched with an equivalent burden somewhere else. Now, when we get a little bit into, “Well, we have to trade one for one,” again, that's where my concern starts to come in: why are we in such a rush? “Well, we have to bring this in. It's really important. You know, we were elected on this.” Do we start to put on blinders or maybe our vision gets a little tunneled just so we can say: “Boom. Yes, we've managed to reduce once.” We have to be very, very careful about what we're doing.

Some of the failures I would just like to highlight here. When Harper gutted the regulatory framework that protects lakes, rivers, and groundwater by allowing a loophole in the metal mining effluent regulations of the Fisheries Act, this allowed mining companies to dump toxic waste into lakes and reclassified healthy lakes as tailings impoundment areas, which means that they were no longer protected. Again, when I was talking about if we're going to be removing regulations that maybe puts the environment at risk, this would certainly be one of them. Sandy Pond in Newfoundland has been destroyed under this loophole, and Environment Canada has released the names of 29 natural bodies that mining companies have applied to use as toxic waste dumps.

One other piece that I would like to highlight is around food inspections. There was a cut of $56 million to the Canadian Food Inspection Agency resulting in 100 fewer inspectors, a reverse staffing measure put into place as a response to deadly listeriosis outbreaks in 2008, in which Canadians died. Again, here's what I'm talking about. The decisions we make, sort of this, “We've just got to get it done; we've brought something in, so we have to remove one,” ended up putting people at risk, Madam Speaker. We absolutely cannot do these kinds of things.

If we look to B.C., one of the failures around money laundering, reports indicate that $7 billion in dirty money has flowed through the British Columbia economy, $5 billion of which is in real estate, which inflated prices and hurt consumers. Again, here we are going to that thing, what was, you know, a noble effort, to begin with, around reducing red tape. Some of the members who were in the last Legislature used to love to absolutely just pound on the unintended consequences, Madam Speaker.

Here's a really good one on child labour. In 2003 the B.C. Liberal government lowered the working age to 12 and removed the permit system, effectively deregulating child labour in the province. This put the health and safety of children at risk. There was a dramatic increase in annual payments for accepted disability claims related to children ages 12 to 14 injured on the job, and since 2009 nine young people were designated long-term disabled, or LTD, as a result of work-related injuries sustained when they were under the age of 15. In total, WorkSafeBC has paid out over $1.1 million in disability claims for 179 children injured on the job between 2003 and 2013.

We can talk about environmental deregulation. We can talk about out in Ontario where Restoring Ontario's Competitiveness Act sets targets of 25 per cent reduction in regulation over four years. One of the failures, just to quickly go through those, was to loosen the ratios for children in daycare. There were restrictions put in place after a number of tragic deaths of children. Now we're putting children at risk again.

So as we move forward on this quest, I guess we could almost say, to reduce red tape, we need to be very, very conscious about what it is we are removing and the effects that it may have past that point. I would feel a lot better if we maybe had some clarity around what the government might be looking at in terms of what red tape looks like, what kinds of timelines they are looking to do.

I would like to draw attention around the reporting of this. I think simply to report once a year on something that you've already done might not necessarily be a good idea. I think that by posting some of the things that you're looking at, Albertans can see in real time what the government is considering. One of the things that we've heard is that they want to hear from Albertans, they want to hear from businesses, they want to hear from industries. This gives them an opportunity to make their input known as to whether this really would be a good idea.

When we look at things in the bill around lowering the wage of persons under 18 years of age, I'm not too sure if somebody considered the red tape around tracking when they're in school, when their birthday is. If they turn 18, do they start getting $15 an hour at that point in time? You know, are they tracking whether people are quitting school? This sounds like a big ball of red tape that's starting to build here.

I'm looking forward to maybe getting into Committee of the Whole on this bill, talking a little bit more about some of the things that we might be able to do in terms of amending this bill a little bit. I do remember members opposite sometimes talking about the size of bills in the last Legislature. Some, of course, were extremely large, and they thought it was very, very cumbersome. Of course, I also remember them making fun of some of the bills that were a lot smaller. When I look at this bill, it's two pages long, with one page simply being a preamble, so I'm a little bit worried that this is a little bit hasty in terms of legislation that's been brought forward. But I do look forward to the debate on this, how we might be able to strengthen it, how we might be able to add some timelines, maybe increase some of the reporting a little bit, and around the disclosure that Albertans get to see as the regulations come forward.

At this point I'm happy to take my seat and listen to the debate a little more. Again, I look forward to Committee of the Whole on this.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Ms Ganley: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I am pleased to rise today and speak to Bill 4, what there is of it. I will be voting against and urging members to vote against this bill.

I think just for those watching, if there are any, it's probably worth just running through the bill really quickly. The bill begins with a definition section, as most bills do, defining minister. Section 2 forces the minister to generate a report every year. Section 3 says that the Lieutenant Governor in Council is able to amend regulations even if they're a ministerial order. Section 4 enables the minister to make regulations. So, in fact, this bill doesn't cut anything, and it doesn't say anything about what it intends to cut. In fact, I might call this bill itself red tape.

I think that one of the first things to note about the bill is that most bills, most legislation in this House tend to begin with a definition section in order to define what it is the bill is planning to do or what the Legislature wants to do with the bill. I think it's interesting that in the Red Tape Reduction Act one doesn't find a definition of red tape, so it remains, I think, unclear what exactly is meant by red tape.

Now, perhaps just for those less familiar with regulations – I've spent the last several years reading them extensively – we have regulations in Alberta on many different subjects. For instance, there are regulations dictating the safety standards that you must have for your elevator in your building. Some might define these as red tape, but I would say that ensuring that an elevator is properly functioning is actually a fairly important function of government. We have regulations certainly around environmental standards, for instance – you can't, for instance, dump mercury directly into a river – again I would say fairly important regulations.

We have health and safety regulations which govern not just different government facilities but things like restaurants at which we eat. Those regulations tell companies the standards to which they must keep their kitchens if they're going to feed members of the public. As someone who frequents food establishments I think that that's a fairly important regulation.

The depth and breadth of these things, the number of areas that they touch on is very, very extensive, so when we talk about red tape, it's not really clear what we're talking about. I had hoped that at a minimum a bill dealing with the reduction of red tape would take some step to define what it is we mean by that. You know, we want to reduce regulation by a third, so does that mean that if we get rid of all of the health and safety regulations, all of the other ones will be left untouched? It's just not really clear.

Really, in sum, I think all that this bill is intended to do is create the ability to make more regulations and a report, although we don't really know what exactly will be in the report or what the report will talk about or whether the report will at long last define what we mean by red tape. I think Albertans, who will be governed by this bill, deserve to know what it is that's occurring in this place, what it is that we're talking about, which third of the regulations they intend to cut.

You know, there's another thing. Like, I think if we're going to go forward, and particularly when we're talking in numbers, one of the most important things we can do in government – and you can use examples from any ministry – in order to determine whether something has achieved its objective, is if it's something that can be counted and measured. Given that the promise was one-third, I assume that they think it can be counted and measured. One of the ways is: "Well, how are we going to count it? Let's all come together and get on the same page and talk about what it is that we're trying to achieve, how we're going to measure it, and put some definition in place around those measurements so that we're all having the same conversation."

Frequently there's a problem, I think, in this House where folks are talking past each other, and that results from the fact that people are often using the same words to talk about different things. This is, I think, common practice in a lot of academic work. I think that in most scientific work it's common practice to create an operational definition of the terms that you're talking about. Some sort of indication as to, you know, what we are talking about and how we plan to measure whether it's achieving its effect, I think, would be useful additions to this bill.

I find it interesting, certainly, that there's this talk of amending multiple regulations at the same time and that it gives the Lieutenant Governor in Council the ability to amend regulations notwithstanding that they're made by a minister. There are various sorts of regulations. Some of them are ministerial regulations, so those are orders made by the individual minister, and some of them are orders in council, which are made by cabinet in its entirety. Usually there's a difference in granularity, so when it's a more granular thing you're dealing with or when it's sort of more nitpicky, the legislation tends to be the broadest, and then cabinet regulations, and then a ministerial regulation.

Now, there are admittedly instances in which historically, from years and years and years back – I mean, we'll have regulations come forward that have been in place for a long time – a ministerial regulation and an order in council sort of speak to the same subject matter. That can be confusing, so perhaps in those instances it would be best to streamline that. But I think it's interesting at least to suggest that orders in council and orders made by different ministers in different departments potentially about different things can all be amended simultaneously. I think that when we're talking about these things, they have a huge impact on people out there living their lives, and my concern is that, you know, in this rush to go through and to change things, people will miss things, important details will get missed, and that will have impacts on the lives of people out there.

I guess my closing comment on this bill is that it feels like the absurdity one would expect from Alice in Wonderland. It is a bill which doesn't define red tape, which doesn't indicate how it's going to reduce red tape, which doesn't indicate how it will measure whether red tape has in fact been reduced or, again, what red tape is even. Presumably, it deals with regulations. But what it creates is the power to amend and create more regulations, and in fact it creates the impetus to create an additional report.

There's a British comedy called Yes Minister, and I feel like there was an episode of Yes Minister about exactly this. The main character in that case is, obviously, a government minister. He was trying to create an area to reduce bureaucracy, and what winds up happening is that actually they hire, you know, several thousand people to work in this ministry in order to determine what bureaucracy can be reduced. I feel like the Red Tape Reduction Act is pretty much that. We're going to hire a bunch of people to generate a report about we know not what in order to reduce the size of government.

So those are my comments. I would urge members to vote against this bill, mostly because I think it's a bit silly. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) is now available. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you. Now that I'm figuring that out, I appreciate that, Madam Speaker.

I just wanted to comment on the comments from my colleague for Calgary-Mountain View. I wanted to thank her for her breakdown of what is essentially a very, very small and limited piece of legislation which, to me, somewhat begs the question: why do we even need legislation? Really, if we're talking about eliminating red tape and regulation, why do we need to introduce legislation to do that? Why not just do the reductions? Why not just do the reviews? Why create the authority to establish more regulations if the goal is actually to reduce them?

Be that as it may, I think that one of the things that is very interesting is how, obviously, this was brought forward as part of a plan, I think, part of the mandate, perhaps, of the governing party to reduce regulations, reduce red tape. Of course, that comes from this idea that smaller government is better. I think we can all agree, actually, on efficiency, and nobody would disagree with that. However, I find it a bit unusual for a party that did seem to put forward a mandate of having smaller government that they've actually created a larger government, a government of more ministries and associate ministers than the previous NDP government, which is ironic for a government that claims to be about small governance.

I'm wondering if the Member for Calgary-Mountain View has any comments about how increasing the size of government actually goes counter to their objective of reducing red tape and might be creating red tape.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, and thank you very much to my colleague for Edmonton-Whitemud for her comments. Yeah, I do think it's interesting, actually, that in addition to the bill, which creates a report, we've also created an entire ministry for the reduction of red tape, which does seem like creating larger government.

I think that when we talk about administration, we need to distinguish between different things. Often a lot of things get lumped together, and it's difficult to have a reasoned conversation, I think, if we don't know what it is we're talking about. For instance, when I used to volunteer at the Foothills hospital in Calgary, they had a unit clerk on every unit, ostensibly administration. However, that was administration that was absolutely integral to the running of the unit. The unit clerk did everything from worrying about patients who were supposed to arrive on transfers who maybe hadn't made it to making sure, you know, that if there was a conflict in terms of different appointments between, say, an occupational therapist and a physical therapist, that got sorted out. If people didn't get their meal tray because it hadn't followed them when they moved units – all of that work was done by this incredibly hard-working individual who was fairly consistently run off her feet. I think that that work was incredibly important work.

Now, that being said, I think that perhaps in this instance it's not the same kind of administration. We're literally creating work in the sense that we're generating a report and – well, hope springs eternal. Who knows? Maybe the report will be useful. I don't hold out a lot of hope for it, but maybe I'll be optimistic today and I'll say that perhaps the report will have some use. I think my concern is that we're saying, "Oh, let's create a bunch of work in generating this report," but we don't know whether it will be useful. In fact, we don't even know how we're going to define "useful." We haven't decided what's red tape and what we're cutting. I think that that continues to be a huge concern.

I think that, in my view, this is a completely nonpartisan issue, right? The idea that if one is trying to achieve the good, however defined – and sometimes it's different on different sides of the House – one ought to define what the objective is. So here's the objective, and then one ought to determine: how am I going to measure whether I've reached the objective? In light of that, what are the steps I'm going to take in order to get to that objective? I think, again, that that is what's lacking in this bill. What's lacking is, you know, some thought as to what it is we're trying to achieve.

I've heard it said before and found it very much to be true in my life: when everything is a priority, nothing is a priority.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm pleased to rise to speak against the so-called Red Tape Reduction Act. It's interesting. In my comments today I want to touch on the absurdity of this legislation that we are discussing today, the fact that it's unnecessary given some of the other processes that the government has to regularly review and reduce so-called red tape, and, third of all and most importantly, I think, to discuss how this is really a gift to the corporate donors of the members opposite.

Madam Speaker, of course, to start out with the absurdity of it all, here we have a minister with no ministry, and his first piece of legislation is to actually create the thing that his boss has told him to cut. It is astounding, and I want to underline the comments from my colleagues from Calgary-Mountain View and Edmonton-Decore. You know, if this were a comedy on television, people would say, "How can they make this stuff up? It's so absurd," but here we have in actual practice, like I said, a minister with no ministry and legislation provided to him to actually create the red tape that his boss has told him to cut.

It's especially ironic given the history of the members opposite, who, I recall, a few years ago derided the establishment of the economic development and trade ministry. That was Bill 1 in one of our sessions of the Legislature. Of course, for the remainder of that session of the Legislature the members opposite would deride the minister and say that it created only one job. Calgary-Hays is confirming that he actually made those accusations. Obviously, they didn't take them seriously enough to disestablish the ministry of economic development and trade. It turns out that it was a good idea. You're welcome, Calgary-Hays and other members opposite, for actually implementing something useful. It's ironic that they would make fun of the economic development and trade ministry, something that actually provided value to the people of Alberta and contributed significantly to economic diversification and job creation in this province, yet are deadly serious when it comes to this highly comedic act of appointing a minister without a ministry and giving him the job to actually create more red tape when, in fact, he is supposed to be reducing it.

Secondly, Madam Speaker, I think it's probably well known now to at least some members of Executive Council that there are already significant measures in place to examine and reduce the so-called red tape, the number of regulations, important protections that the Alberta government has in place. I was privileged in the last session of the Legislature and in my term on Executive Council to sit on the Legislative Review Committee, and I'm sure that the members opposite who are a part of that committee are thankful every day that they get to go to work on that committee. The thing that I remember most about that committee is the number of regulation expiry dates that we had to deal with. It was the decision of a previous government – and I don't even know which government made this decision. They implemented expiry dates on every regulation that was created either by ministerial order or through order in council.

The bulk of the work that we engaged in on the Legislative Review Committee was actually going through each and every regulation whose expiry date was coming up for renewal. Now, the Member for Calgary-Mountain View can refresh my memory. I think she was much more engaged in the work, I suppose, than I was. But I can't recall a single time where we said: you know, this regulation isn't serving a purpose anymore and provides no useful purpose to the people of Alberta, so we should get rid of it entirely. One or two. But the bulk of the regulations that are in place provide valuable protections for the people of Alberta who need it, Madam Speaker, and when they are no longer needed, the expiry dates already exist.

So I don't understand why the members opposite are actually duplicating the work. They have the Legislative Review Committee in place to look at the regulations one by one as those expiry dates come up and make the decision as to whether or not they're still serving a purpose and decide whether to keep those regulations or not. And if they can't make that decision on the spot, Madam Speaker, they always have the option of at least extending the regulation expiry date so that they can conduct a thorough review of that particular regulation, to engage stakeholders, people who deal with the regulation on a regular basis to inform government about whether or not those things are valuable. I would suggest that that's probably a better way to approach looking at and reviewing the regulations that are on the books here in the province of Alberta rather than taking a scattershot approach and arbitrarily picking this number of one-third to eliminate red tape and just, you know, trying to give the member – I'm sorry; I forget his constituency – a position to keep him happy.

Madam Speaker, of course, I think the third and most important point that I want to make in opposing this bill is that it's another example of a giant corporate gift to the donors of the members opposite. We've seen it in Bill 1. That's a massive tax giveaway to the wealthiest Albertans. We've seen it in Bill 2, of course. We've decided to cut the pay of young people, the pay of people working overtime so that money goes instead into their employers' pockets. Of course, we see it nakedly laid out in Bill 3, which will cut corporate taxes and enrich the shareholder class in this province. And now we have Bill 4, which is designed to eliminate regulations that impede corporate profitability.

Of course, we know that the members opposite have been, shall we say, swayed by the financial donations of the people who are demanding these things. I want to refer to a letter submitted by the Motor Dealers' Association of Alberta documenting a meeting that they had with the United Conservative Party leader in September. In that particular letter, Madam Speaker, the Motor Dealers' Association promised to raise millions of dollars if, when elected, the UCP would scrap the carbon tax, reduce corporate and personal income taxes, reduce minimum wages. All of those things are promises that have already been delivered.

What else is on the chopping block? Of course, we've got the labour code, occupational health and safety, and WCB changes yet to come. We see some of those in Bill 2. Consumer Protection Act changes, Madam Speaker: we don't yet know what protections are on the chopping block, but we do know that the members opposite have been influenced by significant dollars into PACs to look at those. Issues requiring government action, banning of imported right-hand drive Asian vehicles: I expect that that's probably another one of the so-called red tape reduction actions that the minister will take to make sure that his corporate donors are well looked after.

That's not the only example. The Motor Dealers' Association was probably the most overt example, but we know, of course, that Restaurants Canada lobbied heavily, spent significant dollars advertising to elect the members opposite in return for reducing the minimum wage for young people and taking away overtime banking for people who work hard in the restaurant industry, Madam Speaker.

You know, one of the things that I would like to see in the report that is required is actually outlining who has lobbied the minister and the members of Executive Council to reduce the regulations that are reported on and being recommended as being removed and correlating those things with meetings that they've had with paid lobbyists and the corporate donors that continue to fill the coffers of political action committees that are associated with the UCP, Madam Speaker. I think that that would be in the interest of all Albertans, to know who is paying the minister to actually do his job. It's not just the people of Alberta; it is, of course, the corporate shareholders who have a financial interest in making sure that regulations that protect the people of Alberta go by the wayside.

Mr. Loewen: Point of order.

The Deputy Speaker: A point of order has been called. The Member for Central Peace-Notley.

Point of Order Allegations against Members

Mr. Loewen: Yes. Under 23(h), (i), and (j). The Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar just accused us on this side of the House of taking in corporate donations, and he knows it's against the law for corporations to donate money to political parties, so I ask him to apologize and withdraw his comments.

The Deputy Speaker: The Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar, a response?

Mr. Schmidt: Yes, thank you, Madam Speaker. Of course, if the Member for Central Peace-Notley had actually been paying attention to what I was saying, he would know that I was talking about corporate donations made to political action committees that are affiliated with the UCP and not actually referring to corporate donations made to that party. I know full well the law. In fact, I was part of the government that made those donations illegal. So we don't have a point of order here. We have a difference of opinion.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, I have been paying close attention to the words that have been spoken in this House, and I think, perhaps, this is a good time to remind members not to incite and use words to make accusations that would anger various sides of this House. I don't see a point of order.

Member, please carry on and just be cautious.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Madam Speaker, for your ruling.

Mr. Hunter: Point of order.

The Deputy Speaker: A point of order has been called.

Mr. Hunter: Madam Speaker, I would like to cite 23(h), (i), and (j). Actually, the one I'd like to cite is, "Imputes false or unavowed motives to another Member," specifically . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. member, a point of order has already been called on that matter, and I have ruled on it.

Mr. Hunter: Madam Speaker, actually, what he did say, which we haven't actually ruled on, is: "Where is this minister receiving his income? Where is he receiving his income? Who is it from?" That is actually a point of order in terms of imputing false motives, and I would ask him to withdraw.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. member, we've already moved on from this matter.

Please proceed, hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Debate Continued

Mr. Schmidt: Well, Madam Speaker, thank you very much for your very wise ruling on that point.

I would like to continue, of course, with a discussion of some of the important consumer protection regulations that we made, that if scrapped, would actually increase profits while decreasing protections for the people of Alberta.

One of the examples, of course, is payday lending. That was one of the first moves that we made in the First Session of the Legislature. We put an end to the 600 per cent interest rates on payday loans to help prevent people from becoming trapped in a cycle of debt. Today payday loan borrowers pay lower fees, have more time to pay off their loans, and are paying them off in smaller installments, Madam Speaker.

Of course, I can recall members of one of the predecessor parties of the current UCP speaking out against those very consumer protections from payday loans that we implemented. Madam Speaker, the payday lending industry is one that has a lot of lobbying dollars to throw around, so it would be very interesting to me if included in the report we saw a list of all of the lobbyists that the ministers met with over the course of the year and correlated those lobbyist meetings with PAC donations, so that we understand . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. member, we're getting into that territory that is not productive for proper debate in this House. Can you please be cautious?

Mr. Schmidt: Well, Madam Speaker, I would remind all of the members that my constituents in Edmonton-Gold Bar definitely want to know whose side the government is on. Are they on the side of everyday Albertans who rely on these protections for their financial and social well-being, or are they on the side of the people who would have these protections removed so that they can exploit the very everyday Albertans that we want to protect?

Payday lending, I think, is a classic example of a consumer protection that we implemented that powerful interests have a significant financial stake in seeing removed. Another one, of course, is door-to-door sales. We were very successful in ending the practice of misleading, aggressive sales tactics by banning door-to-door sales of energy products and services. That ban, to remind everybody, included furnaces, hot water tanks, air conditioners, windows, energy audits, and electricity and natural gas contracts. Madam Speaker, you know, the utility companies made a lot of money off those aggressive door-to-door sales, spreading misinformation, misrepresenting themselves, pressuring people who didn't know any better to sign contracts that weren't very good for them financially, and of course I am sure that the companies that profited mightily from that practice are just rubbing their hands, eager for, let's say, sympathetic ears to take their side on scrapping those protections. That's why I think it's very important that the members opposite be incredibly transparent with the people of Alberta when they're bringing forward recommendations on which regulations to cut.

Another protection that we brought in place was the new-home buyer protection. This introduced a builder licensing framework to protect consumers as well as the reputation . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Any comments or questions under 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Just a quick question. I know that the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar was bringing up some more specific examples around some of my concerns about when we're pushing headlong to try to remove some things all in the quest for red tape removal. I was wondering if I might be able to tap into the member's, you know, former position, before he was elected, and the group that he was a part of and some of the professional standards that he was held to and maybe comment a little bit around some of the implications that inadvertently may be removing some of those things, which may look on the outside as reducing red tape and allowing things to move more efficiently but could put other things at risk. I was hoping the member might be able to comment a little bit on that.

The Deputy Speaker: The Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: Yeah. Thank you, Madam Speaker, and I want to thank the Member for Edmonton-Decore for that question. You know, certainly, in my life prior to being elected I was a civil servant in the department of environment, and it was my job to oversee industrial facility applications to make sure that they complied with the Environmental Protection and Enhancement Act as well as all of the regulations that were associated with that act. Of course, the Environmental Protection and Enhancement Act has some very well-thought-out protections for soil, for air quality, for groundwater quality, for protecting the environment that sustains us and future generations in this province.

I had many meetings with many industry stakeholders, who, you know, came to the department expecting special exemptions for their particular industry. The meetings all had a similar pattern: oh, well, we're not like everybody else; we don't create problems in the soil or the air or the water, so we deserve a special exemption. And then, of course, when we indicated that we can't exempt one particular person when we've applied these regulations to everybody else who's working in that industry, they would of course rail on about how government is crushing industry and preventing job creation. I guess if we were so intent on creating jobs at the expense of poisoning our skies and poisoning the very water we drink, that would have made those industry stakeholders happy, but it wasn't in the best interests of Albertans.

So I think it's important for people to understand the purpose that the regulations provide in protecting everyday Albertans from unscrupulous actions from bad actors in various industries and that they need to be preserved in order to protect the people who rely on the clean air that we breathe, the clean water that we drink, the clean soil that we farm and let our kids play on and so forth. You know, it's important for Albertans to understand that there are powerful forces who are lobbying for removing of these protections, and I think it's incumbent, then, for the members opposite to be transparent with the people of Alberta about the discussions that they're having with industry stakeholders and how that's influencing the decisions about the regulations that they are recommending for removal.

Of course, in my past life I was also a professional geologist, and we were held to high standards of professional practice and ethical practice. Those things come at a cost, Madam Speaker, but we as professional engineers and geologists have a responsibility to conduct our work not just in the interest of our clients but in the interest of the public, and often that means creating additional expenses for the very clients that we represent. Most of the clients that I worked for when I was in the private sector were more than happy to pay for those additional costs because they shared our value of acting in the public interest and not just in their own interests. Unfortunately, that isn't the case with a hundred per cent of industry actors, and they would like nothing more than all of these so-called red tape regulations to be removed so that they can do their work.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I just want to thank my colleagues the members for Calgary-Mountain View, Edmonton-Decore, and Edmonton-Gold Bar for their fine comments on the bill. I think perhaps the amount of time that we've spent discussing it and reading it may have been more time than was actually spent in drafting this bill, because there's very little content to it. So kudos to us for being able to speak about this for this long already, and I will continue the trend.

I think the hon. members for Edmonton-Decore, Edmonton-Gold Bar, and Calgary-Mountain View did an excellent job talking about what's in the act and what's not in the act. In particular, we've talked about the lack of definitions about what red tape is. Really, the primary bulk of the act seems to be focused on actually creating the ability for the establishment of more regulations, the irony of which is not lost on any of us here. However, I think that both the members for Edmonton-Decore and Edmonton-Gold Bar gave a great discussion about the kinds of regulations that are necessary for health and safety. They gave significant examples of various areas environmentally, you know, health. My background is actually in education, and I dealt very significantly with the legislation and regulations involved in the education world. So we know that those regulations can be very important – they exist for a reason – and I'd like to thank them for their comments on that.

What I'd like to talk about a little bit today is from my perspective again, going back to my experience. I think it's important to talk about what the role of regulation is because we know that regulation in and of itself carries a connotation of waste and at times mismanagement and that it just slows down things, and it maybe creates work for bureaucrats. But regulations do exist for a reason. There is a distinct difference between legislation in statute and legislation created by regulation, and there's a reason why there are certain things that are put in regulations.

In my background in education I can tell you about how it's very important to have legislation that covers the principles, the goals, the values, the objectives of the system and how you want it to work, but there are some details that don't necessarily fit properly within statutes and should be rightfully within regulations. The reason for that is, as we know in this House, with the exception of the bills that have been introduced in this session, that generally it takes a little while to pass legislation. It takes a little while to bring it forward. If done properly, it involves consulting with stakeholders. It involves working with legal teams, with drafters.

You go through several iterations of it, and then, of course, it has to come to the House, where it should get significant consideration and debate by the members of this Assembly.

So legislation doesn't change easily. It doesn't change quickly, and that's for good reason. It's the laws. There should be some predictability. When drafting laws, you should be looking forward as a government or a body passing legislation. You should be looking forward to making sure that what you're creating lasts and is worth while and provides clear direction to the systems which it's meant to direct. Legislation should be a thoughtful process, and it should be long lasting. We have some examples of legislation that has been around for a long time.

Of course, there should be a healthy review period for all legislation to make sure that it's still current and up to date, but you don't want to be trying to amend it every legislative session. There's a reason why certain things go into regulation.

3:30

In particular, in the education world – and I see the Minister of Education probably has some familiarity with this – in terms of what goes in regulation, there are certain details that are part of that regulatory structure which properly fall within regulation. An example of that, actually, from the education world is that for the longest time the School Act had a provision talking about how far the distance between a student and their school had to be before they'd be eligible for transportation. Because that was in education legislation and statute, that couldn't be changed, and even though that didn't seem to really reflect the reality of what we were doing anymore, we were stuck with it because it was too hard to change the legislation.

[The Speaker in the chair]

Things like that, details like that should be put in regulation because regulation, as the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar mentioned, is regularly reviewed. It has expiration dates. The job of the Legislative Review Committee is to look at those regulations. The job of bureaucrats is to regularly look at those regulations and to make sure that they are pertinent and applicable and should be kept. We properly need some details to be in regulation.

This is my sort of minidefence of regulation. It does exist for a reason. We wouldn't want to be bogged down by doing all of those things in statute, but we also wouldn't want to be leaving such important health and safety measures without any regulation. We would not want that to be held to the discretion purely of any bureaucrat who is administering it or to the system to sort out amongst itself. Regulation is there for a reason.

I also wanted to bring up that I actually have some experience. I worked in the provincial government, the government of Alberta. I was a civil servant for eight years prior to moving into private practice, and in that time I actually began my illustrious public service career working in the now defunct – but it seems to be revived – ministry that was fondly known as restructuring and government efficiency. Some of you may recall that. I can't remember which Premier brought that in. It was before Premier Stelmach.

Anyway, that was a ministry that was created for, quite honestly, a very similar purpose, which was to restructure and create government efficiency. Now, of course, many of you might remember that that ministry was fondly known by an acronym, RAGE, which was kind of appropriate for restructuring and government efficiency because I think all it ever did was create rage and not just for the people who actually were subject to it. I don't know that it actually did much of anything, but I think it probably created quite a bit of rage on behalf of the minister who was responsible for that ministry because he really had a ministry that had no use, no function, and was actually created and bloated and became red tape ridden even though it was the very ministry tasked with government efficiency.

So I kind of smile, frankly, when I see this come up again because, to me, this is the difference between political campaigning and what happens when you actually try to govern. It's really simple and it's a very catchy thing to say to people: we need less red tape, we need less regulation, and we need things to be more efficient. Nobody would disagree with that. I think nobody wants to waste money for the sake of wasting money. We all pay taxes. We all care about that money being spent efficiently. We all want our systems to work properly, but properly doesn't always mean quickly. So, okay; it's a catchy election campaign promise to say: let's just get rid of red tape, the scary red tape that exists out there, and let's remove that. But then when you actually have to put that in practice, to create a ministry to do that: to me, the irony is quite astounding, really.

Again, we've heard the ministers in this House, when asked about what they're going to do about this and what they're going to do about that, repeatedly stand up and say: "We're reviewing it. We're reviewing it. Alberta Health Services is being reviewed. Whether or not there should be a conversion therapy working group is being reviewed. Everything is being reviewed." My question is: why would you create a ministry and a piece of legislation and the ability to create more regulations to review regulations? If this is really about efficiency and administrative streamlining, there is absolutely no reason to create a ministry and to pass and create legislation to do it.

Nothing, by the way, is stopping this government from reducing red tape right now. They could do that. They don't need a piece of empowering legislation to do that. You have the tools at your disposal. The reason why it's being established is because that's campaigning. That's the difference between campaigning and promise made, promise kept even though it's a waste of public dollars. I find the irony, coming from a government who has apparently campaigned and platformed on being the stewards of public funds and on no more wastage, is actually putting forward and establishing an associate minister and a ministry and a piece of legislation and more regulations which will waste public funds – we know that there will be staffing involved with that – yet they claim to be the stewards of public funds.

To me, I'd simply come across and say that I've seen this before. I'm not even that old. I'm 41 years old. I began my practice and working in government 13 years ago, and I've already seen this go through one cycle already. Quite honestly, by all means, if this, you know, is going to get your tip of the hat to the people you said that you would – I don't know how it's going to actually achieve it because I've seen this cycle go through before, where they will try to calculate how many regulations we have and which ones are good and which ones are bad, and it's an impossible process to quantify. It's impossible to evaluate. In the end, all we'll have is a lot of public dollars spent on doing an exercise that has already been done by previous Conservative governments and to no end other than to cause a lot of rage. By all means, I think this is pure politics and this is not good governance, but I think that this government is going to find out the distinction between those two very quickly if they haven't already.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available to any members wishing to have a question or comment. I see the Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was very excited listening to the Member for Edmonton-Whitemud's comments. One of the things that I noticed during the press conference announcing this bill – and I'll tap into the member's experience from her past with this question. One of the things that was said was: there were 17 regulations already eliminated, and we've only been in government for 21 days. Now, the problem was that those weren't posted anywhere when asked. With your experience in the education world and whatnot, are there any concerns around potential changes maybe to things within education? Should they not be posted? Is that a concern? Do you think that there are people that would like to know about these things coming forward so that they could ask their input?

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the Member for Edmonton-Decore. I appreciate that question. You know, one of the funny things that I find in my experience, not only having worked in government but also having been part of a legislative review reviewing a large piece of legislation and regularly being involved in regulation reviews, is that it's quite amusing how governments seem to pick and choose when they want something to be transparent and when they don't.

The experience that I certainly had is that regulatory review processes exist. It's probably changed since my time in government. It's been about six years since I've been in government. There was always a very healthy process, but we knew that when difficult decisions were sometimes being put forward to government, particularly on things related to education, at least in my experience, there was actually a feeling of: we don't want to have to deal with those difficult decisions in legislation and in statute, so let's just leave it to regulation because that's where nobody will be paying attention. I've seen previous Conservative governments use that as a tool, as a way to sort of hide the messy details of sometimes having to deal with some things by saying: well, we'll just deal with that in regulation.

Look, there has to be a healthy balance between statutes and regulations containing the guiding principles and the objects for the system it's governing. There are certain details that do need to be properly in regulation, but it shouldn't be used as a political tool. My experience is that that's how it has been used by previous Conservative governments, always as a tool. When it suited them to not be transparent about something, they would put it in a regulation. I think we're already off on the same foot with respect to that. Yeah, I'm interested in knowing, too, what those 17 regulations are. I think that the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction has been asked that question in the House, "Can you name one of those regulations?" and was unable to provide the name of one.

I don't know if once again regulations are being used as a tool to keep things hidden. I would be very interested in knowing. Certainly, that shouldn't be a secret, right? Regulations should be accessible to the public. They are accessible to the public, and most people should be able to pull them up with a quick search. If they're removed, I would certainly think and I would hope that the associate minister would put on their website which regulations were removed and why they were deemed to be no longer necessary. You know what? If that's true, I'm willing to say: hey, if those were unnecessary regulations, by all means remove them. We would like to have some efficiency as well.

But doing it in secret, doing it when people don't know why those regulations were removed and which ones they were speaks to me again about a secrecy and that statutes and regulations are being used in different ways to hide different objectives. I would certainly welcome greater transparency on that. I think all Albertans have an obligation and have a right to know what regulations are in place and why they're being removed. We expect them to abide by them. Regulations have the force of law.

The other piece I want to mention, again going back to this idea of "Really, if there are inefficiencies in government, go ahead and fix them; you don't have to have an associate minister or legislation to do it," is that we know that regulations get the focus because they have the "r" name, the "r" word: regulations. That's what we're all afraid of, but really we know that there are a lot of things that actually slow down administrative processes, and it's not just regulations. We know that there are policies, there are handbooks, there are directives. The question really is: is this just about show, or is this to really make more efficiencies?

I look forward to the opportunity to see some efficiencies. I just think that we're off to a bad start if this government believes that in order to create efficiencies, they have to create more inefficient legislation and more regulations to do so. That speaks to me that the intent behind this is not actually about efficiencies; it's about political grandstanding.

Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Thank you.

Are there any other comments in the time remaining?

Seeing none, any other members wishing to speak to Bill 4? The hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's really my pleasure today to rise and speak to Bill 4, the Red Tape Reduction Act. Now, you'll know, Mr. Speaker, that I think perhaps the Red Tape Reduction Act could have had a bit more red tape in front of it. You'll see it's only two pages. It's quite the short document. It speaks to how hastily the Premier and his government put this bill together. It speaks to how hastily and without much forethought or foresight they gave to this bill – I mean, the bill contains basically nothing. It has no targets. It has no timelines. It does not define what the government considers red tape. It gives the associate minister blanket ability to create regulations and amend existing ones although the minister already had the ability to do this, so perhaps these two pages just make one extra layer of red tape and then do nothing else.

But, Mr. Speaker, it's very clear, when we look at this legislation that the minister has put forward before us, that the government is deciding to shoot first and ask questions later. They've decided to do no consultation, to do no research, and to not do the work that is required of a government, to not do the work that is required and the research, to go into a bill to make sure that it's a bill that Albertans need and will help improve the lives of Albertans.

This vague shell of a bill: we really don't know what it's going to do. I mean, I think that we should have some concerns about the bill. When they speak about what the Red Tape Reduction Act will do, Mr. Speaker, when members of the government speak about this, they don't talk about what they are removing. Are they removing things like environmental protections? Are they removing things like labour laws or labour protections? Are they removing the requirement to wear PPE on job sites? I mean, that's technically red tape if we go with this nondefinition that the government has presented to us. If we look at this bill, we don't even know if they mean that food service workers shouldn't have to wash their hands after leaving the washrooms. Those are all the types of regulations that are covered under the blanket nondefinition of this bill. That's what the government is proposing when they bring this forward.

It would be hilarious if it wasn't a real piece of legislation that we are debating today and will likely have to vote for in the very near future. It would be something that would be laughable if it wasn't something that put the protections and safety of Albertans in jeopardy because the government didn't do their homework. It's something that we saw time and time again when the Premier said that he wouldn't consult with Albertans because his legislation was so important it had to be done quickly. His legislation was so important that Albertans did not deserve and could not be trusted, in fact, to be consulted. I think that's a shame. I think it's a shame that we now see bills like this which are rushed through the House with no consultation, no development. Frankly I don't even know if they spent any time writing it at all, Mr. Speaker. I've seen notes on napkins that were longer than this legislation. I think that's really a shame here.

Really, I think the question for this House today has to be: what is the point of creating a piece of legislation, a binding piece of red tape that must be followed in perpetuity, that only creates more red tape? I can't imagine how many hours have been put into deciding how many staff members the minister should have, how much those staff members in the minister's office should be paid, whether the minister should have a blue placard on his desk or a green placard on his desk. Mr. Speaker, this is something that we really need to look at and say: is this the best use of Alberta taxpayers' money and time?

Now, when we talk about what is going on in this bill – the ability, the power that it grants the minister to strike regulations, create regulations, remove regulations, all the things that ministers are expected to do in the due diligence of their jobs – what this bill actually says is that the minister should do his job. Now, I think the minister should be expected to do his job without this House having to legislate him to do his job. I think the minister should be perhaps – I hope the minister is capable of doing his job without the House legislating that. Perhaps I am wrong; I hope I am not, Mr. Speaker. I hope the minister would be able to do his job without members of the opposition and government benches having to force the minister to do his job.

But I hope that when the minister does his job, he doesn't go after the types of protections that his Premier did under the Harper government in Ottawa. I hope he doesn't go after and consider red tape to be things like whether we should allow toxic waste to be dumped in our waterways. I hope the minister doesn't consider that red tape. Without the definition in this bill, Mr. Speaker, it is impossible for us to know. It's impossible for us to know whether the minister considers waterway protection and toxic waste dumps to be red tape. I mean, we can see really clearly that while the Premier was in Ottawa under the Harper government, in Newfoundland the Sandy Pond area was destroyed under some reductions in what we could consider red tape by having 29 natural water bodies being used as toxic waste dumps, basically. We see that in Ottawa the Harper government and the Conservatives and the government the Premier was a part of cut millions of dollars from the Canadian Food Inspection Agency, which resulted in fewer inspectors. In fact, we saw things like deadly outbreaks of diseases that actually killed Canadians.

When we're talking about red tape reduction without a clear definition, without actual research or any homework done in this bill, we simply see that we don't know what the minister will do. We don't know whether the minister will protect Albertans or go after the things that protect them. We don't know whether the minister will then decide that as a part of his job he needs to decide to support those corporations which donated so heavily to their PACs, donated so heavily to making sure they were elected. We don't know who the minister will side with, ordinary Albertans or the wealthiest corporations.

Mr. Speaker, we simply don't know, and this legislation doesn't tell us. This legislation doesn't tell us much of anything. It doesn't tell us whether Albertans should be the ones that benefit from reductions in red tape or whether corporations should be the ones that benefit from reductions in red tape or, in fact, whether it's government members who are the ones that should benefit from reductions in red tape. If the legislation was maybe longer than a napkin, maybe we would be able to know that, and maybe then we could have a fulsome debate on the merits of the legislation. Unfortunately, it looks like, without the foresight and thought being put into this legislation, we won't be able to debate the benefits of reducing some regulations that may be burdensome to Albertans.

Mr. Speaker, we know very clearly that we've seen failures in other jurisdictions, not just federally, that I've already mentioned, but in other jurisdictions like British Columbia. I mean, when Conservative governments and Premiers in British Columbia brought in action on reducing red tape, as they would say, we saw suddenly $7 billion in dirty money being laundered through to British Columbia, which really inflated prices and hurt consumers. Really, we know that we don't want money laundering and illegal activity happening here in Alberta, but unless we can actually get some definitions and some ideas of what the minister is supposed to do with this legislation, we simply don't know. With his blanket empowerment in the legislation to do what he's already empowered to do and is indeed obligated to do, maybe the minister will decide that money laundering is one of those red tape things that we don't need to worry about. I think that is just something that the legislation doesn't make clear for us. That is something that I think members of the government should be concerned about.

I think members of the government should be concerned that the legislation is so short. In fact, Mr. Speaker, I know that you yourself as well as other members of the Conservative bench, when you were in opposition, spoke at length about how bills – and I believe it was our Bill 1 – were too short, that it should be a lengthier bill and that there should be research put into the bill. Now we see the government bench doing exactly what you spoke against and members of that exact government spoke against. In fact, I think the minister himself spoke against that. The minister himself spoke against bills that were too short, and now we see the minister bringing forward a bill that has nothing and empowers him to do nothing he's not already empowered to do.

I think there is something that is certainly to be said, Mr. Speaker, about how there is hypocrisy going on here in the government. Really, this hypocrisy is something that we can poke jest at here in the Assembly, but again it's something that Albertans will have to live with. It's something that our constituents, regardless of which political stripe you have, will have to live with. It's something that we will have to live with for the next four years.

I know, as my colleagues in the opposition have already mentioned, that the Red Tape Reduction Act, Mr. Speaker, is a very sexy, if you will, name. It's something that people are very excited about, that gets people excited during campaigns. But I will remind the government members that the campaign is over. The time to govern is now, and the time to move forward with making regulations and legislation that improve the lives of Albertans is now.

When we look at this bill, we can see very clearly that in its nondrafted form, the form that's being presented to the Assembly, Mr. Speaker, it does none of those things. It perhaps tells the minister what he is supposed to do, which could have been done through a mandate letter, could have been done by perhaps just looking at the title of his ministry. Maybe the minister needs a bit more guidance than just the title of his ministry. I think that the legislation is definitely unnecessary.

But when we look at what is supposed to be brought to this Assembly, it's bills that make lives better. Perhaps the minister will be able to take this bill – well, he would have been able to do it anyways – and make the lives of the wealthiest 1 per cent better. Perhaps he'll take this bill and make the lives of corporate donors to groups that support the Conservatives better, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps that is the intention of what the minister wishes to do. I wouldn't know, and I wouldn't presume to speculate on that. But what I will say is that I think it's very clear that Albertans expect a government to bring legislation that improves their livelihood, and it's very clear that this bill does not do any of those things. It's very clear that if you don't spend the time that's needed to draft legislation and if you decide to not consult, to not research, to not do the work that is required to be a responsible government, a responsible and transparent government, then it's very clear that you end up with legislation that is too small to blow my nose on.

Mr. Speaker, I think that is something that is really a shame for us to see here in the Assembly. Something that is a shame for us to see is that members of the government, I believe, will likely vote this through without consulting at all around the issues, will likely vote this through and not have spent the time to actually maybe even read the two pages. I know that sometimes two pages can seem like a lot to read, but I can assure you that almost the entirety of page 1 of the bill is just preambles. You can probably skip that part. So, really, there are only four clauses in the whole bill. If members would spend the time to read the four clauses, they'll see that it's something that perhaps we don't need to spend all of this red tape on, creating legislation that directs the minister to do what he should already do.

Really, when we look at that, I think it's something where members of the government bench, self-proclaimed Conservatives and fiscal conservatives, self-proclaimed ones who are against red tape, can see pretty clearly that this bill does nothing. When they talk about how important it is to reduce the scope of government and reduce the size of government and reduce the burden of government, I think they can see pretty clearly that the four clauses put out in this bill, most of which fit on one page – I mean, the rest is just preambles, Mr. Speaker. We can see very clearly that either the Conservative members don't care that we're creating red tape or only care when it's not their own.

Mr. Speaker, when it's something that helps their wealthy friends and when it helps their wealthy allies, then perhaps that is okay, and maybe the government members are okay with that. If that's the case, then they have the prerogative to vote that way. I guess we will see very shortly when we do see that vote.

But I think, Mr. Speaker, that Albertans are watching when we pass legislation in this House. Albertans see the bills that we pass in this House, and they see who votes on those bills when we pass them in this House. They can see and they can read for themselves whether four lines that tell the minister to do his job is something that is worthy of this House. I think Albertans will make that decision for themselves.

Now, what we won't see, Mr. Speaker, though, is Conservative members making that decision for themselves, because we know that they really do think that creating more red tape through this bill will eliminate red tape, and maybe the minister does need that direction.

Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'll leave it open for maybe someone to ask some questions or comments.

The Speaker: Anyone wishing to ask questions or make a comment under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, are there any others that wish to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. A pleasure to have the opportunity this afternoon to participate in what has been a robust and, I'm sure, incredibly engaging discussion for all members of the Assembly today on what cannot really be called a robust piece of legislation but certainly one which has prompted some, I think, good discussion.

I think that, in all honesty, we recognize that what we have in front of us today is a piece of legislation that is more about show than it is about actual substance, and fair enough. I recognize that for a new government coming into office, it makes sense that you want to follow through on campaign promises, that you want to follow through on things you said, and that you want to do some of those. Some of those promises may not themselves have had a lot of substance to them. They may have been something that sounded good and certainly appeal to, I guess, the sentiments of certain aspects of the folks that you're reaching out to and where, once in government, then you need to do something to demonstrate that you are taking action on that even if there wasn't really significant action that needed to be taken. But fair enough. It is within the prerogative of government, within the prerogative of this minister to bring forward this legislation for this purpose and to bring it in for us to debate, so I will stand here in this House today and I will have a discussion about it.

Now, one of the things about this bill, Mr. Speaker, that many others have raised and which I also sort of share a concern about is that there is so little here and that indeed there is so little defining what actually falls within the parameters of what the government wishes to do. I don't think you would find any member of this House that would disagree with the idea that we want to reduce regulation, that we want to reduce red tape. By all means. I know, for myself, that when I stepped into this office and had the opportunity, I worked to try to set up robust systems within my constituency office, within how I interacted with my caucus, how I worked with government ministers at the time. I think that's a reasonable thing to do when you start out in any process. You try to set up good and proper systems to organize and make sure that you're not dropping balls or missing e-mails and making sure that everything is set up well.

I think we all recognize that over time, for any system that is set up by people, as it grows increasingly complex, as you add more layers and elements to it, as you add more stakeholders, as you add new duties, the system that you use, then, to organize and control things also gets more complex. It makes sense that over time you need to sit down every once in a while and take a look at that system and say: "Hey, is this still serving the purpose that I set it up to serve? Is this still accomplishing the goals that I, in fact, wanted to accomplish?" So I have no issue with the government saying that they want to make that a priority during their mandate, to sit down and thoughtfully and carefully look at systems. Frankly, Mr. Speaker, you will probably find few systems so complex as those that are used to run a province, and that's for good reason.

We recognize that when government began, it was of a smaller scope. It had fewer things that it had to manage. Indeed, human government, when it began – and I won't go into a full history lesson here, recognizing that, of course, we started out with very local government. That made it easier to manage because you're very close to ground. But as we progressed as a society, it got broader. We took on more responsibilities for larger numbers of people. It requires increasingly complex systems to handle that. It makes sense, then, that, yeah, when we get to the level of a provincial government, we're going to have some pretty complicated stuff going on.

There are probably some places where we could do much better in how we approach things, but the other thing to keep in mind, Mr. Speaker, is that when we are dealing with these complex systems that have grown up over time, that are connected with so many different things, when we begin to make changes within those systems, they can have impacts that ripple out in ways that we may not have recognized. There's a phrase that comes to mind that perhaps you've heard in this House: unintended consequences. I'm sure it is something that has never before been uttered within these walls. But we recognize that when we are dealing with complex systems and we are wanting to make them simpler, we have to be very careful that the adjustments we make within those system don't have consequences that we didn't anticipate and don't cause further damage.

Again, I have no issue with the commitment of this government to make changes to systems. It's my hope that they will do so very thoughtfully and carefully and with careful consultation. The concern is, when they feel the need to put this into a piece of legislation, that they provide so little detail and very little for us to be able to understand precisely what it is that they intend to do and what they precisely consider to be red tape. The reason, Mr. Speaker, that is of concern to me is because of previous, I guess, rhetoric I have seen, sometimes from conservative politicians, sometimes from individuals in the community. We fall back to ideas and terms like common sense.

I think back, Mr. Speaker, to July 2017, when there was an article that came up on the Internet, came up on Twitter – it was being bandied about quite a bit – about a gentleman in Etobicoke, Ontario. There was a community garden, and going down to that community garden was a slope. That slope was difficult for some people to navigate, indeed, particularly for seniors in the community, so they had been petitioning the city council in Etobicoke to build a set of stairs. Now, I recognize that city council, a provincial government are not always the speediest to act, that there can be a lot of competing priorities and things that can slow things down. But at one point, apparently there were some estimates that were done that estimated that a flight of stairs for this short section of slope, which was leading down from a parking lot and had a few other factors involved, came to as much as $65,000.

There was a huge hue and outcry about this ridiculous thing because one gentleman in the community went and just simply built his own set of stairs. He took the initiative himself. He spent $550 on supplies and hiring a local homeless man to help him build those stairs, and there they were. They were available to the community. There was much discussion online about red tape, talking about: "See? How much easier could this have been? Government just had to complicate it, make it so expensive, make this problematic. Obviously it's better if we just do things the simple way."

The fact is that the city of Etobicoke later had to go back and remove those stairs. Now, the reason for that was because those stairs actually were unsafe. We have to recognize that there is a difference between what I choose to do in my home and what I choose to set up for myself and what I choose to set up for public use and the issues of liability and all the other pieces that come into that. In the end, those stairs had to be removed, and there were many who decried that and said that that's government red tape, government bureaucracy, that sort of thing. In the end, city hall was able to build another set of stairs. I understand the cost ended up being about $10,000 to build a proper set of stairs that ensured that the legal liabilities and health and safety standards and everything were met.

I certainly commend that individual for coming forward and, I guess, pressing city hall on that, but we recognize that there are reasons why some regulations and bureaucracy exist. My concern, Mr. Speaker, is that at times I hear people talking about red tape and bureaucracy without the recognition that it, in fact, does have a place. If we are not defining in this legislation what it is that we are talking about and how we are going to thoughtfully approach this and guarantee that, in fact, the minister will exercise due diligence, then we could be getting into areas where we begin to perhaps make mistakes.

I recognize that in many ways people look at red tape and bureaucracy, and they consider it simply to be a Gordian knot; the Gordian knot, of course, being a part of, I think, ancient Greek or Roman mythology, I forget which, but basically an extremely tangled knot, very hard. It was a task that they set for a hero, to try to untie it. I forget who the Greek hero was or the Roman hero, but – you know what? – the clever guy that solved the Gordian knot pulled out his sword, and he cut it in half.

An Hon. Member: Alexander.

Mr. Shepherd: Alexander. Thank you.

I recognize that maybe that was the solution there, but in some cases we're not simply dealing with a knot which is just hanging there and not really attached to anything important. Sometimes we're dealing with the very lifelines which are protecting our communities, which are protecting people's health, which are supporting very important processes within the province, and to simply come through and try to cleave them down the middle is to invite chaos, disorder, and possibly injury to the public.

It makes sense to me that in discussing these issues, we be perhaps a bit more thoughtful than the level of rhetoric, for lack of a better term – and "rhetoric" in itself is not a terrible word but is often used in that way – that we've heard from government on this. Again, I can understand that this is a flagship issue for them and one on which they want to feel good, but really I would prefer to see that government proceed in a more thoughtful way, perhaps with fewer slogans, more detail, and a better understanding.

One of the other reasons for that, Mr. Speaker, is that, you know, at times I have seen that there can be a bent amongst some conservatives to vilify red tape on things that they personally like or that they want to see happen but then turn and want to apply it on anything that they dislike. Perhaps that's why some folks who have more rightward leanings look at regulations so negatively, because they themselves only apply it to things which they are trying to eliminate.

I think back, Mr. Speaker, to when we were having federal discussions around supervised consumption sites, the original site, Insite in Vancouver, and we saw the federal government under Prime Minister Stephen Harper try to take every possible step it could to eliminate that site. I don't know why. For some reason they felt that that offended their morals, offended their ideology. I'm not sure. They took every possible step, and it took a court ruling to actually stop them in their tracks. They could not actually defund or stop that site from operating; instead, they tried to regulate it to death and indeed make it far more difficult for any other jurisdiction in this country to set up a similar life-saving medical service.

Now, Mr. Speaker, again, I am in agreement with reasonable regulation, and there are reasonable regulations in place. Thankfully, the federal government which we currently have, whether I agree with them on all things, which I don't – certainly, I did agree with and appreciate the fact that they simplified, they reduced red tape around jurisdictions being able to set up supervised consumption sites. Now, to be clear, the rules, the regulations in place are still robust. Indeed, when the business association here in Edmonton, you know, took the providers of the current supervised consumption sites to court, the court took a look at it, and they dismissed that case. They said that, in fact, they had met all of those criteria and that it had been a robust process of regulation and consultation that put those sites in place.

But, again, we have seen from some individuals who identify themselves as conservatives that they view regulation as a weapon, as a way to eliminate things which they dislike. I think back, Mr. Speaker, to when we were having discussions in this House about regulations that were being brought into place to support the legalization of cannabis. Indeed, there were members who were at that time on this side of the House and now sit on the other side of the House who were very concerned that perhaps there was not enough regulation being put in place around when and where individuals could consume cannabis. I think those are, again, appropriate questions to discuss, and I think we're here for the very purpose of discussing regulation and how that went forward. But it became clear to me that for some members of this House it was not so much about the public good, it was not so much about reasonable regulation or smooth operation as it was about their personal discomfort with the use of cannabis.

Again, Mr. Speaker, that brings me back around to the legislation and the fact that what we have here is a fairly vague and ill-defined bill, very aspirational in its content but potentially significant in its impact. Given the enormous responsibility that is entrusted to us as legislators in this province to ensure the safety and the protection of the Alberta public, to make sure that the rules and the regulations that we are putting in place are there for the benefit of the public . . .

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available if there's anyone who has a question or comment for the member.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, I was listening with rapt attention to the Member for Edmonton-City Centre. I regret deeply that he was cut off in the middle of his comment, and I'm wondering if he is able to complete his thought.

The Speaker: Thank you to the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre, if you'd like to continue.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I believe I've made my thoughts clear. Thank you.

The Speaker: Are there any other questions or comments for the member?

Seeing none, are there any others who wish to speak to Bill 4? The Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Sweet: Thank you, hon. Speaker. I would request unanimous consent to adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Bill 2

An Act to Make Alberta Open for Business

[Adjourned debate May 29: Ms Renaud]

The Speaker: Hon. members, Bill 2 is available for debate. Are there any wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar is rising.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure today to rise and speak to Bill 2, which is, in effect, an act to pick the pockets of the workers, of the people of Alberta. I want to touch on three provisions that I find particularly troublesome in the legislation and associated regulations.

[Mr. Hanson in the chair]

First of all, I of course want to express my deep, deep reservations about the government's move to create a youth minimum wage for students who are under the age of 18. I know that this is a move that will not be very popular with young people in the province of Alberta. In fact, the other day I had the opportunity to conduct an impromptu focus group with some youth here in the province of Alberta, specifically my children, who are the ages of 11 and 8, on the drive to school. We were talking about finding work and getting summer employment, and I told them that the members opposite had decided that students under the age of 18 should have their wages cut by $2 an hour. Instantly they both cried out that that was not fair, that just because you were a student and under the age of 18 shouldn't mean that you make $2 an hour less than somebody who is doing the same job but is over the age of 18.

It's curious to me, of course, that these young, engaged Albertans who I was driving to school would immediately see the unfairness in this proposal, yet the members opposite don't. The only thing I could use to explain it, Mr. Speaker, is that, you know, my children aren't really engaged in political matters in the province. In fact, they spend most of their time on the Internet looking at pictures of cats. So they come to this issue of minimum wage with fresh eyes, and they don't have their minds clouded with hundreds of thousands of dollars in donations to associated political action committees made by organizations like Restaurants Canada and the Motor Dealers' Association of Alberta, who are, of course, clouding the minds of the members and making it seem to them like it's a good idea to reduce the minimum wage.

You know, Mr. Speaker, when they asked me why they decided to reduce the minimum wage, I used the words that the Member for Calgary-Lougheed used to justify this when he spoke to I believe it was the Calgary Chamber of commerce. I can't remember. I told them that as students who were under the age of 18, they have less human capital than somebody who's not a student and is 18. Of course, as you can imagine, that wasn't a satisfactory answer to my children, and I don't think it's a satisfactory answer to any student who is under the age of 18. This argument that you are a person of lesser worth goes against the very dignity that is inherent in all work, and I think that anybody who proposes that line of thinking should maybe give some reconsideration and certainly not stand in this legislative Chamber and talk about how compassionate they are when they give their responses to the Speech from the Throne.

Mr. Speaker, you know, as troubled as I am by this move by the members opposite to cut youth wages, I do see some good coming from it in that at least nobody under the age of 18 now will ever, ever vote for the UCP. I'm looking forward to the massive influx of young people who are motivated to throw the members opposite out of office at the earliest opportunity so that they can get a fair wage back. I thank the members opposite for creating an entire generation of NDP supporters, that I think will benefit all of the people of Alberta in the next election and going forward from there.

[The Speaker in the chair]

Mr. Speaker, the other aspect that I wanted to touch on that troubled me about this bill was, of course, the move to pick workers' pockets by eliminating some specific general holiday pay. You know, under our government we made anybody who was hired at any time eligible for general holidays regardless of how many days that they worked. Even if those general holidays fell on a day upon which the employees wouldn't normally work, a Saturday or a Sunday, they would still be eligible for that holiday pay.

Now, Mr. Speaker, of course, you know, as many members of this Chamber know, that the people of Alberta haven't had a real wage increase in a number of years. In fact, if you look at the data, the average worker in Alberta has seen an overall decline in their earning power over the last decade or so because real wages haven't increased. The people of Alberta are upset by this because it's not pain that's equally shared. The data shows that people in the highest income brackets in this province continue to receive more and more of the wealth that's created in the province while the other 90 per cent of the province are left behind. They continually are losing faith that the system that we've created will work to their benefit.

You know, the members opposite were elected on this rising tide of anger at the system. The members opposite told them that they would get jobs and prosperity, but what they're really getting is another cut to their wages in the form of having holiday pay reduced. Mr. Speaker, it makes no sense, at a time when workers in Alberta haven't seen their real wages increase in a number of years, to actually be lowering them. To take away general holiday pay on a day on which it normally falls – normally I would use the word “Scrooge” to describe that, but at least Scrooge gave his employee an extra lump of coal on Christmas Day. In fact, this legislation takes away even that, so employees who are not normally employed on Christmas Day when Christmas falls on a Saturday or Sunday will get nothing. Under our government they were entitled to a day's worth of pay, and now the members opposite are taking that away from them.

I think that that's the opposite of compassion, Mr. Speaker. The people of Alberta work hard all year. They look forward to celebrating Christmas with their families, and to know that they're now getting a pay cut because they're taking that day off or, you know, the government has decided that it's too expensive to pay them a Christmas holiday will create a lot of unhappiness and anger amongst the people of Alberta, and rightly so.

The final point that I want to make, Mr. Speaker, is of course on taking away overtime banking. Now, this is an area that I have a lot of personal experience in. Prior to moving to the civil service, I was an environmental consultant for a couple of different consulting companies here in the city of Edmonton, and it was standard practice for professional engineers and geologists working for these firms to work overtime hours but only to bank those hours at a 1 to 1 rate. Now, the members opposite, when they rolled out this legislation, of course, trumpeted the so-called flexibility that it would give workers to negotiate more overtime with their employers, and nothing could be further from the truth. When I was employed in the private sector, it was never offered to me as an option to work overtime. It was an unstated expectation. Of course, that was not just me; everybody was expected to work overtime and expected to bank that overtime at a 1 to 1 rate.

Now, you know, the principle around paying people overtime comes from this really old-fashioned idea that the day should be evenly divided up into three separate segments: eight hours for work, eight hours for personal time, and eight hours for sleep. The reason that we pay people overtime when they work more than eight hours a day is because it's cutting into the valuable personal time and rest time that people need to be able to live good lives. That's why we pay them more for overtime hours, Mr. Speaker. And if we are going to pay them overtime hours in cash, it seems only fair to me that we should also pay them in time in lieu at a 1 to 1.5 rate.

Mr. Speaker, you know, working as an environmental consultant, of course, you can see for yourself the exploitation, I guess, that employers put their employees through. Certainly, I know that I was charged out at approximately $150 an hour when I was employed. I got less than a third of that. The rest, of course, went to my employer.

This was not easy work. The overtime hours that I put into the job were not overtime hours that I spent in the comfort of an office but were, in fact, overtime hours that I spent in the furthest corners of the province in incredibly challenging working conditions. I spent many months away from my family and my home, working in places like Zama City, Fort Chipewyan, places where it's either 40 below and freezing or 40 above and mosquitos so thick that you can't see the people standing next to you. To know that I was enriching my employer at the expense of myself and my family was difficult to swallow, so I was quite happy when our government brought forward legislation that at least compensated my former colleagues who continued to work in this field at a 1.5 overtime banking rate because at least they were able to get a little bit ahead working those expected overtime hours under incredibly trying conditions.

It seems to me to be grossly unfair to my colleagues who continue to work in that field to take that away from them and to say: "You know what? We think that your employers need a raise and that you need to cut your wages, so we're going to remove this banking scheme that was implemented only a couple of years ago."

I don't understand the necessity of any of these changes, Mr. Speaker. Nobody here will dispute the fact that Alberta is going through a period of higher than usual unemployment. Certainly, we in this Chamber all have a common desire to get Albertans back to work, but of course we differ significantly in our views on what would be successful measures to get Albertans back to work.

I think it's important to notice that none of the changes that are presented in this bill and the associated regulations are in place in any other jurisdiction in the country. If you go to B.C. or Saskatchewan or Ontario, you know, you will have the same sort of general holiday pay that the members opposite are taking away here, and you will have the same overtime banking arrangements that the members opposite are taking away here. It's funny that those kinds of arrangements have been in place in places like B.C., Saskatchewan, and Ontario, with no seeming effect on unemployment in those provinces. In fact, with those very same worker protections in place, the unemployment in those provinces is lower than it is in Alberta.

I wonder why it is that if those measures have no impact on unemployment levels in other provinces, it wouldn't work here. What is it that's magical about Alberta that means that we need to pay workers less, take away their hard-earned holiday and overtime, and give their employers a raise just so they can create jobs? I would like the members opposite to actually stand up and tell us why Alberta is exceptional in that fact and why Alberta workers don't deserve the same kinds of protections that their fellow Canadian workers in every other jurisdiction in the country deserve.

So, Mr. Speaker, I encourage all of my colleagues to vote against this bill.

The Speaker: Members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. Questions or comments? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was listening very, very intently to the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar about his concerns with this bill. Of course, my history is very much rooted in labour. I can almost already hear the teeth-gnashing going on from members opposite when I say the word "union." I'm very thankful that I was part of a workplace that had a union because at least there was some degree of protections that were afforded.

One of the things that I used to always advise my members when I was a shop steward over at my workplace and, of course, when I was relieving through my union was to never build your life around overtime. I will concede that there's no mandate that an employer has to provide you with overtime, okay? Overtime is meant to help the company out when they find that they're short-staffed, be it in various forms. It could be that somebody is away, that somebody is sick, that somebody is on maternity leave, whatever the case may be. All right? It is a voluntary act by that person to step up and say: I'll work those hours to help you out. The exchange is, as the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar mentioned, to take time from away your family, your friends, your other commitments, your sleep, whatever the case may be. That was the reward for doing that.

So when I hear things about taking away people's overtime pay – I mean, at the end of the day, overtime is overtime. You don't define it in any other way, so if you're going to pay it out to them in overtime pay, you would pay it out to them in overtime hours as well.

What I was hoping that the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar might be able to do is talk a little bit – he had also mentioned around the different wages. Maybe the member might talk a little bit around the proposed liquor service differential wage. I know very, very clearly that a lot of workers in that industry are women. My experience, again, through the labour movement was of women being exploited through a wage differential. In order to be able to make those tips, some businesses – and I even remember protesting one just close by here, by the Legislature, Mr. Speaker. They wanted them to wear revealing outfits so that it would help them to generate more tips because of the wage differential. I was hoping that maybe the member might be able to comment on that a little bit as well as on some of the other things that I've mentioned.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, I made an offer to my constituents that I would also wear revealing clothing for their tips, but I have to say that citizens of Edmonton-Gold Bar rejected that offer resoundingly. So I will look for other ways to supplement my income, I guess.

The Member for Edmonton-Decore is correct that tipping is not a stable form of income. In fact, it's not fair. There are a number of people who work in retail and the fast-food industry who don't get tips. I'm thinking of people who, you know, work at chain restaurants, fast-food restaurants, those kinds of places, who do work that's very similar to people who work in other restaurants, but they don't get tips, Mr. Speaker. Of course, we all know that tipping is not a fair way to compensate people for the work that they're doing.

Mr. Speaker, I lived for a number of years in Germany, where tipping is not part of the culture, and the reason it's not part of the culture is because Germans pay their food servers a fair wage. To tip a worker is actually insulting to them because it's implied that they are not getting paid enough or are not being recognized for the value of what they're doing. I think that we need to move to a similar system here in Alberta.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Are there any others wishing to add some additional comments to the debate? I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View rising.

Ms Ganley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have a number of comments to make on Bill 2, this, of course, having been an area in which I worked in my previous life. I will make those comments, but I would like to begin by moving an amendment. I'm moving it on behalf of the MLA for Edmonton-Manning, and I would like to seek your indulgence to have it amended at the table.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member. If you can pass the documents through to the pages, we'll just review it at the table and distribute it as such, and then I'll let you know to proceed when necessary.

For the benefit of all members in the Chamber the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View will be moving this amendment on behalf of the hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning. On the original document, that's kept at the table, we will make the amendment to the document to reflect that change. If you are so inclined and you'd like to make the change on your document for your records – I'm sure you're all keeping extensive personal records of amendments and otherwise – you would be welcome to do so. Having said that, obviously it's not required as the table will keep track of that.

Having said all those things, the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View on behalf of the Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Ganley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On behalf of the Member for Edmonton-Manning I move an amendment which says something similar to: that An Act to Make Alberta Open for Business be amended by deleting all the words after "that" and substituting the following:

Bill 2, An Act to Make Alberta Open for Business, be not now read a second time but that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Alberta's Economic Future in accordance with Standing Order 74.2.

Mr. Speaker, I think that referring this bill to a committee for further consideration is certainly a worthwhile aim. Certainly, amendments that were brought forward to these bills, to labour and to employment bills in the previous session, were heavily considered and discussed. I feel that we shouldn't rush to be making these changes in this particular case. I think it's worth discussing some of the changes that the government has been making in terms of labour and employment act changes generally. Certainly, one of those changes has to do with amendments to the minimum wage, and another one has to do with changes to how overtime is paid. Obviously, the minimum wage tends to be a regulation under this act, but I think that all of these things move together.

I continue to be of the belief, as stated earlier today when we were discussing corporate tax cuts, that the best way to stimulate the economy is to put money into the hands of those who are middle and lower income earners because they do tend to return a larger portion of that money to the local economy, and that tends to create jobs for other individuals.

I think it's worth noting that in talking about how youth workers, workers under the age of 18, don't need the same minimum wage, well, I think it takes a very specific perspective. It takes a perspective that, admittedly, I myself grew up in, the perspective of middle-class or above children whose parents have already saved for their university education and who may be working jobs but not necessarily supporting themselves in the same way. But that isn't the case for everyone.

Certainly, I spent a number of years working at a chain restaurant, and I actually had the dubious honour of working in pretty much every position in that particular restaurant. One of the individuals I worked with, who worked washing dishes, was in fact in high school – so it wouldn't be the case that he had left high school and that the changes didn't apply to him. He was still studying, which was actually impressive in light of his circumstances. He was 16 years old. He lived with his 12-year-old brother. He paid the rent in order to support both of them because they were not safe at home. To suggest that somehow that individual wasn't worthy of the same income or didn't need the same income I think would be a little absurd. Even beyond that, whether a young person is saving for school or whatever they're doing with their money, I think, generally – I'm surprised that it's this side speaking in favour of market economies – it's not really the government's job to pass judgment on what you do with your money.

I think that certainly it's possible that people end up in these tragic situations, where they aren't safe with their parents, and they are still going through school, and they need income to support themselves and to support siblings or possibly even to support their own parents. These are definitely situations that exist, but it's also the case that many young people are saving for university. I think that's a laudable goal, but regardless of the goals, if we're going to say that you're old enough to work, you're old enough to earn your income, you're old enough to decide how you spend it, and the government shouldn't be peeking into your pocketbook and trying to determine whether or not you're worthy of the same wage as everyone else. I disagree strongly with that.

There are a number of other changes in labour and employment law that frustrate me. I think of one of them, you know, when we talk about: oh, well, employers and employees will sort of negotiate for whether or not people take lieu time or whether or not it's paid out. Well, they don't really negotiate. Certainly, I spent a number of years also working at a bank – it kind of sounds like I've had every job in the book here – but there was no negotiation. The employer required that you take your time as time in lieu. There was no getting paid out, and the reason was because they didn't want to pay extra. That's certainly a thing that occurs.

You know, in my case I was free to leave that job, but there were a number of people that were working in the same role that I was, that were working as bank tellers, that were single mothers, because it's a job that you can get fairly easily. It's a job you work during the daytime, when child care is open. A lot of those people needed that job, so they were in a position where they couldn't argue with their employer. I think that's the challenge when people sort of talk about this, "Oh, well, you'll just negotiate, or you'll just work it out," because it's a myth that there's equal power. It's a myth that somehow the employee has equal bargaining power.

Certainly, some employees do have equal bargaining power, maybe not equal but more bargaining power. For instance, obviously, my previous career was as a lawyer. I was exempted from the Employment Standards Code in that profession. You'll frequently hear from articling students that they've sort of worked 100-hour weeks, and if you worked out what they made, it's significantly below minimum wage, but there's a difference there, right? There's a difference in terms of their sort of access to information and to bargaining power, and there's a reason that those professions are sometimes exempted from the Employment Standards Code. Yeah, it's debatable. Let's just say that it's debatable. But this idea that employees, particularly employees in something like a restaurant, have equal bargaining power and that the employer is going to negotiate with them: I just think it's wrong-headed.

I think another thing we ought to take the time to consider, which could be done at this committee, is the role of unions. You know, members in this House seem to, without having a really good understanding of the impact that unions have, talk at length about them in very negative ways, which I think is very unfair. In fact, if you look – and one of the areas I practised in was human rights – there's actually quite a lot of overlap between human rights law and labour and employment law. The reason for that is that most employees don't necessarily have the funds or ability to hire a private lawyer and pursue their rights in the context of a workplace.

The result of that is that in order for employees to be able to pursue those rights, they have to band together, they have to work together and pool their common resources, which are considerably lesser than the employers', in order to make that headway, and how they do that is unions. That's pretty much precisely what unions do. In fact, many of the major human rights cases that are cited actually have the name of the union on them because it was the union that pursued those cases, because they had the ability to do that.

In any democracy, I guess, there are going to be those who disagree with the will of the majority. That's always going to happen, and actually one of the beauties of democracy is that the majority rules but that some people will disagree. The idea is that, you know, we get a majority opinion from workers. They want to pool their combined resources, they want to be able to effect change in their workplace, they want to affect the safety of their fellow workers, they want to affect the income of their fellow workers, they want to affect the working conditions of their fellow workers, or maybe they just want to all band together and stand up and change a rule. Maybe they think that there should be greater parental leave, or maybe they think that greater accommodation should be made for employees who have disabilities, or maybe they think any number of things.

To say, "While the majority of workers have ruled in its favour, we can find one person who's unhappy, who for whatever reason doesn't particularly like the way the union is going, so that proves that workers' rights are being trampled" – well, Mr. Speaker, I can certainly find one person who is unhappy with this current government. I am such a person. It doesn't necessarily mean that the people's rights are being trampled. That may or may not be the case, but it isn't a necessary outcome of the fact that some people disagree with the will of the majority.

I think it's worth taking the time to consider the value of things like unions. You know, over the years they fought for a lot of the things that we enjoy today. They fought for worker safety. They fought for reasonable working hours. They fought for reasonable notice of things like shift changes. Some people say, I think wrongly, that they're not necessary anymore. I don't think that's true. I think, given how our understanding of workplace injury is evolving, that that's definitely not true. There are posttraumatic stress injuries that first responders suffer that we've only come to understand recently, and it's the job of their unions or their associations to fight to ensure that those new types of injuries, those new types of on-the-job injuries that we've only just recognized, are protected in the same way that previous things were.

Certainly, groups of employees come together in unions, and they've lobbied the past government for changes that were made with respect to the acknowledgement that certain types of cancer are caused by occupations. I think there are a lot of changes that still need to be made going forward. We always say that when we know better, we do better. I think that as the world evolves and as more and more people recognize new types of injuries or we have new types of employment, unions are still going to have a role to play. I think that allowing the majority of workers to come together and form a union and decide on their common destiny and work together – I mean, I think there's nothing more innately human, innately community based than to say, you know: "All of us have a common interest. Let us work together in order to achieve that."

I think this amendment will allow us to take the time to consider these and other changes. There were a lot of changes that were made to the labour and employment codes. There were a lot of protected leaves that were brought in, and I think many of those had beneficial impacts. I remember at the time the now government, the then opposition members speaking at length about how these weren't real things that existed, that they weren't real problems. But they were real problems. They were real problems that I frequently got phone calls about every day from people in those actual situations, people calling to say: I had to take time off because my child was ill and ultimately passed away, and my employer is trying to terminate me. Those were real phone calls from real people.

I think that ensuring we have modern workplace legislation is critical. I actually think that it's beneficial for the employer as well. I think that healthy, well-taken-care-of employees who are happy help move their company forward.

With that, I will say thank you and sit down.

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, 29(2)(a) is available for questions and comments.

Seeing none, are there any others who wish to speak to referral amendment 1? I see the hon. Minister of Labour and Immigration standing.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would like to speak to the amendment proposed by the hon. member, basically suggesting that we actually move Bill 2 to the Standing Committee on Alberta's Economic Future. I recognize the concerns raised by the hon. member. She had concerns about the complications associated with the items in Bill 2. Quite frankly, none of this is complicated. Now, we were pretty clear in our platform about the changes that we actually wanted to make. The changes, the vast majority of the changes, are simply going back to what we had before. This is not new. This is not special. What this is doing is actually going back to the law that we had prior to the previous government making changes – right? – so that we can create jobs and restore workplace balance and workers' rights.

The member opposite also spoke at great length concerning the youth minimum wage, you know, stating that it's unfair to youth. But what's unfair to youth was the previous government increasing the minimum wage to $15 an hour, the highest in the country, and reducing the job opportunities for youth. Again, our change in terms of the youth minimum wage is to create jobs for Alberta's youth, to get them working so they can actually save up for school and assist their families or for whatever they want. Quite frankly, $13 an hour is far better than zero dollars an hour if the youth don't have jobs. That said, I'd also like to point out that Bill 2 doesn't deal with the youth minimum wage.

Again, Mr. Speaker, we were very clear in our platform that these are the changes that we wanted to make, that are included in Bill 2. Albertans voted on it, and we want to deliver on our promises. This is not complicated.

With that, I do not support this amendment, Mr. Speaker, and I would like to adjourn debate on this issue.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Consideration of Her Honour the Lieutenant Governor's Speech

Ms Glasgo moved, seconded by Ms Rosin, that an humble address be presented to Her Honour the Honourable the Lieutenant Governor as follows.

To Her Honour the Honourable Lois Mitchell, CM, AOE, LLD, the Lieutenant Governor of the province of Alberta:

We, Her Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Legislative Assembly, now assembled, beg leave to thank Your Honour for the gracious speech Your Honour has been pleased to address to us at the opening of the present session.

[Debate adjourned June 3]

The Acting Speaker: Are there any members wishing to speak? I believe I see the hon. Member for Peace River standing.

Mr. Williams: Mr. Speaker, thank you. I rise today to give my speech in response to the Speech from the Throne, and I begin with a word of thank you. A great statesman once said that gratitude is not only the greatest of all virtues but also the parent of all others. Indeed, gratitude is the greatest of all virtues because it is the plainest. Anything a man has, be it food or clothing, knowledge or wealth, he must receive from another. I've received much, and therefore I've much to be grateful for. I'll begin with four thank yous: first, to the voters of the Peace River constituency; second, to my country, our Queen, her Lieutenant Governor, and this Chamber; third, to my family; and fourth, to my God.

To the constituents of Peace River: thank you. Thank you for electing me to represent you here in Alberta's Legislature. Alberta is, of course, God's own province, but I must inform this House that God does play favourites, and Peace River is God's own constituency in God's own province, the most beautiful corner of the province and, might I add, the largest corner at that.

The history of my riding begins with the First Nation peoples – the Dene Tha', the Tallcree, the Beaver, among other nations – our first inhabitants and the first entrepreneurs living on the bountiful land and travelling up and down the mighty Peace River. Among the first Europeans in my constituency was Alexander Mackenzie, from 1789 through to 1793, on his first voyages across North America, a decade before Lewis and Clark, I might remind our American brothers. After his first trip through the constituency of the hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo, he was so disappointed with his experience that he named the now Mackenzie River "Disappointment River." Mr. Speaker, I feel compelled to inform the House that Mackenzie, being a man of refined taste and high intelligence, made no such comment after passing through my constituency only a few short years later.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, after crossing the continent, Sir Alexander Mackenzie entered into a career of politics, like many of us. In June 1804 he was elected to the House of Assembly of Lower Canada. During his tenure in the House, to the certain disappointment of his government whip, he attended only one session out of the four years, and he explained later that he was heartily tired of legislation. It was a different age.

I also wish to report to this House that in the far reaches of my constituency even today farmers are still breaking new farmland, not unlike our Dominion and its creation some many years ago. Canada's first nationalist, D'Arcy McGee, who might be familiar to some members of this House as he was quoted by our Premier at the swearing-in of many of us as MLAs, said in the early days of Canada:

Here, every man is the first settler of the land, or removed from the first settler one or two generations at the farthest – here, we have no architectural monuments calling up old associations – here, we have none of those old popular legends and stories which in other countries have exercised a powerful share in the Government – here, every man is the son of his own works.

Likely he spoke of the Laurentian Hills or perhaps of the plains next to Lake Ontario, but it could easily be said again today of the frontier that is north Peace Country in my constituency. The pioneering spirit of the people and the get 'er done attitude, as we're all familiar with, would have made Mackenzie, David Thompson, and the rest feel quite at home in today's north Peace Country. Mr. Speaker, I know this House and all of my predecessors would agree that the north in Alberta truly is the new west.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I'll be remiss if I do not also note for the benefit of my hon. colleagues the sheer enormity of my constituency. At over 109,222 square kilometres, that's 16.5 per cent of the land mass of Alberta. It is 1.5 times the size of New Brunswick, the same size as the island of Newfoundland, more than three times the size of Belgium, and it is over 227,272 times larger than the smallest state, Vatican City.

My home is closer, as the crow flies, to Yellowknife, the capital of the Northwest Territories, than to this capital building in this tropical city right now, and of course I try not to draw any parallels between my geography in the province and the geography of my current seat in relation to the front bench.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, to my constituents: I thank you. For your confidence and your commitment to both myself and to the conservative values I ran to represent, I thank you.

Secondly, Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my country, Canada, Her Majesty the Queen, her representative the Lieutenant Governor, to whose speech I'm supposed to be responding, and, finally, this Assembly and its members, both past and present. These institutions of tradition in our society did not appear overnight. No, they arose, as the common law has, from time immemorial. Generations of statesmen have risen and fallen, washing over these institutions, refining them, defining them, dignifying them, just as waves wash over harsh rocks, making them into jewels. And that is our heritage here. It is a jewel that has been preserved and polished for us.

Tradition has lent this 30th Legislature her strong arm and has pulled us up to great heights. In our present age, which values progress above all else, the role of tradition can be easily forgotten, but we must remember, Mr. Speaker, as Chesterton wrote:

[Tradition] is the democracy of the dead. [It] means giving a vote to [the] most obscure of all classes, our ancestors. . . . Tradition refuses to submit to the small and arrogant oligarchy of those who merely happen to be walking about [today]. All democrats object to men being disqualified by the accident of [their] birth; tradition objects to their being disqualified by the accident of [their] death. Democracy tells us not to neglect a good man's opinion, even if he is our groom; tradition asks us not to neglect a good man's opinion, even if he is our father.

Our Legislature and cabinet are institutional manifestations of this tradition by making present the will of the people, the rule of law for all Albertans, and the Crown, our sovereign authority to govern in this Chamber. This Legislature is the continuity of the political patrimony of all of our western civilization. We members are the stewards of that and nearly a millennium of tradition and history that allows me to speak freely in this Chamber on behalf of my constituents today.

The seed that was planted nearly 1,000 years ago at Runnymede in 1215, when King John signed the Magna Carta, has blossomed into a tree, and that tree has borne good fruit for us. But trees must be tended; our institutions must be guarded, both within and without. Tradition is a living being. Like all living beings, it must be pruned and cultivated. Culture is the means whereby we cultivate our traditions and guard our institutions. These traditions, however, are not playthings to be manipulated or corpses to mutilate.

When cultivating and pruning our traditions, we must always keep the words of William Wordsworth in our mind when he said that we must not murder to dissect. The tree, once felled, lies dead, and no fruit will be borne from her boughs. So it is true with our traditions. Any attempt at a clean break from tradition is akin to hewing off our own legs, and as soon as you cut them off, Mr. Speaker, we are not going anywhere anytime soon. Therefore, we owe all our predecessors and our ancestors gratitude, and I thank them now for all the service that they have done for future generations, our current generation.

Third, Mr. Speaker, I thank my family. Every one of us in this House has a family to whom we owe thanks. The family is the first and fundamental of all institutions that populate our society. It is in the family that our children first learn to speak, to know right from wrong, selfless service to siblings, and it is in the family that our children are taught fundamental truths and the most deeply held convictions that we hold. John Paul II believed that: “the history of mankind, the history of salvation, passes by way of the family.” It is true not only in the theological context quoted but also in a very earthy and practical sense. We are formed and informed by the love and support of our families. All of us pass by way of a family, and I am no different.

So, Mr. Speaker, allow me to share with the House just one short story from my own family history, recorded in a humble rural newspaper. My grandfather and great-uncle were immigrants from Poland to what at the turn of the 20th century was the edge of the wild, a quarter section just north of Barrhead. Here I’ll quote from the Barrhead Leader. Uncle Frank and my father bought 160 acres of homestead north of Barrhead, paying $10, and then, after the government opened up more land for homesteading, bought additional land in Vega, this time for $12. My Uncle Frank said that the land was nothing but bush, and it all had to be cleared by hand. I’m told that he later had a tractor to help him. He continued on, finishing by saying: time flies; I remember being on the boat from Poland like it was yesterday, and here’s 100 years creeping on me; I’ve had a good life and 92 years of happiness; what more could one ask for?

Uncle Frank finished his life with gratitude, as did my grandfather and all of my ancestors before me. I’m grateful to them today, and I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for allowing me to indulge the House. I offer thanks to my mother, my father, my three brothers, my dear wife, who is here in the Legislature, and every family member that came before us. The weight of our generation, now carried on our shoulders, is made light and the water we carry is made easy when we pick up the yoke of our ancestors and draw from their wells.

Fourth, Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank my God, the Holy Trinity: Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. For how could I not thank my God? He has given me all: my constituency, my country, and my family. These are all gifts, and I would be greatly remiss if I were to be grateful for the gifts but not to the gifter. I would be such a fool if I were to be thankful for the creation but not to the creator.

For many current political commentators the role of religion and faith in society is often misunderstood and, for them, relegated to history books. I propose, however, that religion is a contemporary act in our society, as unfamiliar a manifestation as it may be to those authors of those history books. Religion is often conflated with culture or deeply held personal opinions. While religion certainly shapes culture and personal beliefs, it definitely transcends them.

Most importantly for my speech today, it is said that religion fully reveals man to himself. Religion fully reveals man to himself.

I believe humanity can be best understood in its mission and purpose through the exercise of religion. Therefore, free expression of religion via public faith is necessary for full and true participation in any free society. In antiquity civil and religious powers were one. Happily, that is no longer the case – a lesson in history from Ambrose and Thomas Becket and Thomas More is for another speech – but the separation of church and state is one of the jewels of our western civilization. However, this separation is often misunderstood.

The separation of church from state does not mean that religion is relegated exclusively to private life. From a religious perspective such a position is untenable. How can a citizen believe that God is the ultimate meaning to existence, believe that God reveals man to himself, but be expected to leave his religion at home when stepping into the public square? The separation of church and state means that religion and government both have legitimate spheres in which they operate. They are both free, not one greater than the other, no one able to dominate the other. In other words, the separation of church and state means that religion and government are respectful peers, neither bedfellows nor strangers, neither master nor servant.

Why do I say all of this? I say this to make the simple point that human dignity is contingent on the free exercise of religion. If we truly wish for a humane society, where humanity can truly flourish, we cannot cut off the river from the spring any more than we can separate humanity from God. The great link that ensures that humanity is not cut off from its source is liberty. Through liberty, then, humanity’s divine calling can come to fulfillment, in my belief. As such, conscience and freedom of religion is paramount for a free society. To strip a man of his public faith is to strip a man of his own self. I suggest that to want to make a public square with our religion checked at the cloakroom is just as desirable as a public square devoid of moral obligation or any earnest conviction.

We are a province built in part by public faith and its expression. Many of our great prairie heroes, from Lacombe to Manning, from Douglas to Blakey, have been motivated by religion and their great works informed by faith.

In closing, Mr. Speaker and hon. colleagues, these four thank yous stand as something of a road map for my hopes as a politician. I hope to serve my constituents as they deserve, and although legislating can be tiring, as Sir Alexander Mackenzie found, I will be tireless in promoting the common good. Second, I hope to uphold the dignity and grace of this Chamber that we inhabit, always trusting in the traditions of our province and our country, that are not things to be scorned but treasures and jewels to be cherished. I hope to promote the good of all families, always acknowledging that the state, though properly ordered for a good society, is a poor nanny and should never replace and substitute the family. Finally, I hope, as the highest law of the land, our Charter states, to acknowledge the supremacy of God, to uphold the dignity of conscience, and to fight for the freedom of religion.

These four points, these four hopes and thank yous – my constituency, my country, my family, and my God – are the things for which I am most grateful for today, and these are the things which I dedicate my life to in public service. So help me God.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Under Standing Order 29(2)(a), I believe, I see the hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I’d like to thank the Member for Peace River for his wonderful remarks in response to the throne speech. I have known the Member for Peace River for a long time.

He's been a dear friend. He's a tremendous campaigner. I'm certain he's a wonderful husband and son and even a pain. But I can tell you that in this Chamber it will be hard to find a man of greater character.

I know he has worked diligently to get here, as we all have, and I'd like to know if he can maybe comment a little bit further about his road getting here, where it started, what really motivated him to be part of this great change that we are involved in, you know, the movement, as we call it, and maybe what he hopes to accomplish in this Chamber and in his tenure as a Member of the Legislative Assembly. So if I could ask the Member for Peace River to maybe respond to that.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Peace River.

Mr. Williams: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and through you I'd like to thank my hon. friend and colleague the Member for Cardston-Siksika for his comments and questions. We have had a long friendship, the member and myself, and it's been fruitful, and I'm grateful for it, but it is not just that member alone. Many of the members on this side of the House have become dear friends of mine. The story of how I made my decision to enter into politics, to strive for the common good in public service, would be lacking without acknowledging every one of them along the way, particularly the Premier of Alberta, who has become a dear friend of mine and a mentor in many ways, along with many other members of the front bench today, men and women that I look up to, and I'm grateful for their friendship.

The decision itself was difficult. I'm very grateful that my wife is here today in the gallery to watch. It's been a longer road for her than me, perhaps. I believe that anyone who wants to thank me for any service must go and thank her first. The decision was not taken lightly, but I believe that she also is grateful that we have this opportunity together, husband and wife, as a family, to continue to advocate for what we believe is the truth and speak on behalf of the constituents in the beautiful constituency of Peace River.

I'll leave my comments there and thank you, Mr. Speaker, and all my hon. colleagues for putting up with me and my speech for the last 15 minutes.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you.

Under (29)(2)(a), are there any other members who wish to continue for the last couple of minutes?

Seeing none, are there any other members who wish to speak? The hon. President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is a distinct honour to speak in this Assembly today as the representative for the Grande Prairie-Wapiti constituency. First of all, I would like to congratulate you on your election by our peers to this position. Your attention to upholding the great traditions, privileges, and burdens of this House, which are foundational to our democracy, and your commitment to ensure an orderly and dignified process to our collective deliberations are of great service to Albertans.

I would also like to thank Her Honour the Lieutenant Governor for her delivery of the throne speech on May 22. The throne speech was a true message of hope to all Albertans and a notice to the rest of Canada that we are taking back our voice in this Confederation.

I would also like to acknowledge the strong elected leaders who have represented my region in the past and to whom I look for inspiration and example. Wayne Drysdale, our most recent MLA, serving our community and this Chamber for the past 11 years, has set a high bar in representing the constituents of Grande Prairie-Wapiti. His availability to constituents was exceptional and nonpartisan and distinguished him as a true public servant. He has been, on a personal level, a generous mentor. Past cabinet ministers such as Walter Paszkowski, Everett McDonald, and Marvin Moore also hailed from my area, and I'm keenly aware of the legacy of the strong, principled leaders to whose names I now humbly add my own.

The newly drawn boundaries of the Grande Prairie-Wapiti riding extend west of Grande Prairie to the British Columbia border, south into the Kakwa-Willmore wilderness, and encompass the communities of Hythe, Beaverlodge, Wembley, La Glace, the Horse Lake First Nation, Bezanson, Clairmont, Sexsmith as well as an eastern portion of the city of Grande Prairie. The south part of the constituency runs deep into the Rocky Mountains. In its centre it includes rich agricultural land in the Sexsmith, Hythe, Wembley, and Beaverlodge areas and rolling grazing land in the Rio Grande and Teepee Creek regions. The region is rich in resources and includes part of both the Montney and Duvernay shale basins, the most prolific and accessible liquids-rich zones in western Canada. Accordingly, the region contributes significantly to the provincial economy with a sophisticated and competitive energy industry.

Agriculture continues to contribute in a major way to the economy, with the region home to many long-time farming and ranching families. To add to the economic diversity, our forestry industry includes local, national, and international firms that sustainably produce wood products for use by consumers in Canada and around the world. The great geographical and economic diversity of my constituency make it a microcosm not only of Alberta's industries and challenges but also of the beauty and opportunity that Albertans experience every day.

The stories of survival, challenge, and innovation have been part of the Grande Prairie-Wapiti region for many years. In the 18th century the predominant culture of the Peace Country was the Beaver First Nation. There was an abundance to the land, with bison, moose, caribou, and bear providing much of their food as well as the serviceberry or, as we now call it, the saskatoon berry. The Beaver and, later on, the Cree would travel long distances for berry gathering in the Grande Prairie, and after having secured and dried a sufficient quantity of fruit, scatter again in small bands into the more remote parts of the country for the autumn hunt.

While the land was generous, it could also be harsh, with long, cold winters bringing with them the threat of starvation. By 1793 bands of Beaver and Cree were making regular excursions to fur-trading posts to exchange furs for European items that would help them survive and continue to hunt and trap. The fur trade grew to include the Métis coming from the east, which led to a number of Métis settlements such as Lake Saskatoon and Flyingshot Lake.

Favourable reports by surveyors and fur traders began to create interest for European settlers by the early 1900s. A.M. Bezanson was particularly enthusiastic about the agriculture opportunities that he saw in the Grande Prairie-Wapiti region. His reports, among others, helped fuel the land rush of 1910. Getting up to this rich, new land was a challenge, not for the weak of mind or heart. Homesteaders came from the east, through the Peace River and Slave Lake route or up through the Edson Trail. The bull outfit that came up with six new teams of oxen made their way into the region in 1910 and settled in the Beaverlodge area, with names that are still part of our community to this day such as Gaudin, Sherk, and Lossing among them.

In another timeless struggle, getting our rich resources out of the Peace Country to ocean ports to the west was a topic of much discussion in the early 1900s. In 1936, concerned about the high freight costs for shipping grain, a Métis settler named Alex Monkman led an incredible effort to cut a road southwest of Beaverlodge through a mountain pass that he found while trapping one winter, to connect to the road system near Prince George in the British Columbia interior. Initial volunteer progress on the trail led to a vigorous solicitation of funds for the cause, and as government funds were not available, residents raised funds from the community in a variety of ways and at great sacrifice. Local crews worked by hand with rudimentary equipment and made remarkable progress cutting a primitive road in the wilderness.

At one point in the effort, in an attempt to prove the viability of the route to governments, an adventurous few toiled ahead on a pack trail to get a Model T through the entire pass. While the car made it to the Pacific side of the Great Divide, the effort failed as winter set in early, leaving the group fighting for survival as they made their way out on foot. The project came to an end when in the fall of 1939 war broke out in Europe, and the young men of the Grande Prairie flocked to join the Canadian Forces, as they had done in World War I. With that, the dream of the Monkman pass died. The effort to build the road through the Rockies against all odds and without government support became a thing of legend in the area and is a testament to the vision, resourcefulness, and resiliency of early residents.

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Peace Country became home to my parents in 1962, when they purchased 480 acres of land southwest of Beaverlodge, starting out in a two-room cabin with three small children and 50 head of cattle. They were able to provide for their growing family because of the strong and diverse economy, starting in agriculture, supplementing through the forest industry, and in later years expanding into the oil and gas sector.

Mr. Speaker, that is why Bill 1, the carbon tax repeal act, has been so welcome in my constituency. All of our industries, from agriculture and forestry to tourism and resource development, as well as the countless other small businesses that spring up to support the community in turn need relief from that tax burden.

Bill 2, the open for business act, and Bill 3, the job-creation tax cut act, are also significant in my region, where the entrepreneurial spirit runs strong. The city of Grande Prairie has ranked among the top six entrepreneurial cities in Canada for the last 10 years, and in 2018 it was the only mid-sized city in Alberta to make the national list. In the long history of the Peace region we have not looked for handouts but simply an environment where hard work and a bit of risk is commensurate with the reward at the end of the day.

My parents' story of tenacity and hard work coupled with the willingness to take risks is a familiar story to many in the Peace Country. From the Beaver, Cree, and Métis people, that at times struggled to survive but were able to persevere through their resilience and connection with the land; to the first surveyors that remarked on the Grande Prairie, that was, in the words of surveyor George Dawson in 1879, quote, parklike with groves of poplar and exceedingly fertile, unquote; to the European settlers, that came to escape persecution and starvation in search of opportunity, the Peace Country has always required a strong spirit and outside-the-box thinking. In return it offers endless possibilities for prosperity, for family, for strong community, for natural beauty. Opportunity abounds.

I believe it is for that reason that the message of the United Conservative Party, Alberta Strong and Free, resonates so deeply with the people in the Grande Prairie-Wapiti riding. The level of engagement was high from the nomination process right through to election night, when, I am proud to report, our riding had the highest voter turnout in the province, at 80.2 per cent. We are strong, and we value the freedom to grow, create, work, innovate, prosper, and persevere.

Mr. Speaker, like most that serve in this Chamber, on both sides of the aisle, I am here today because of the unwavering support of the most important people in my life. This starts with the partnership of my wife, Kim; the blessing of our children and their families; and encouragement and support of my parents, extended family, close friends, and, of course, the voters in the Grande Prairie-Wapiti riding. Alberta has given its best to me, and I commit each day in office to give my best back to constituents and the people of this great province.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any questions or comments for the member? The hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I just want to congratulate the Member for Grande Prairie-Wapiti on his election. Of course, I know that he'll do a stellar job at representing the constituents there. His calling as the Minister of Finance is, obviously, a good position for him that I know he'll excel at, too.

Previously part of the area that he represents was the area that I represented with Grande Prairie-Smoky, which doesn't exist anymore. Two communities that kind of come to mind there – I guess there are three. There's Sexsmith, that's just had Chautauqua Day, a celebration where they open up the main street for families to enjoy the community and also have a nice parade. There are lots of old cars in that parade. It's a great time there. I had a chance this year to stop by just for a minute to take in Chautauqua Day because I couldn't resist, when I was driving by, to stop in and check out Sexsmith.

Also, the community of Teepee Creek, which, of course, has an enormous stampede, Teepee Creek Stampede, which is world renowned. It's a community of tens of people that turns into thousands of people for the Teepee Creek Stampede, 4 Days in the Wild, I think it's called.

Then, of course, there's the community of Bezanson. I think fondly of these small communities and the success that they've had. Now, Bezanson just built a big facility for their community hall. It was such a huge endeavour for such a small community, but they worked so hard in the community and gathered funds and really developed something that's actually pretty spectacular.

I just wanted the member to maybe comment on some of these communities that I used to represent and take a little time, and we'll talk about that. Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Wapiti, the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the Member for Central Peace-Notley for that question. Let me say that it's an incredible honour to follow in the member's footsteps from Central Peace-Notley. In that half of the constituency, certainly, as I've reached out to constituents, they have spoken highly of the representation that he has provided.

Small communities in rural Alberta contribute in a very impressive way to the fabric of this great province. In fact, I sincerely believe that the spirit of those that reside in those small communities exemplifies, I think, in a lot of cases really what it's taken to move Alberta to where it is today and, in fact, embodies so much of what is good about this province. Very often in those small communities such as Sexsmith and Teepee Creek and Bezanson, as the member has alluded to, you will find individuals who, perhaps partly out of necessity and perhaps partly because of the values that were instilled in them by their parents and families, so often tend to be particularly resilient in times of hardship. They tend to be willing to take risks when there is opportunity, and they tend to be accountable for their decisions. They also, I think, perhaps most importantly, tend to be very compassionate and help out their friends and neighbours in times of need.

Again, just to probably go back to a point in my maiden speech, I truly believe that residents, constituents in these small communities appreciate maybe in a disproportionate sense the platform, the plan, that this United Conservative Party government has. That is a plan to ensure that we as a province have the most competitive business environment possible so that residents can follow their dream, so that residents can take full advantage of opportunities in front of them, so that investment again can come back into this province and jobs can be created, opportunities can be created. Not only our small communities but every community and every people group in this great province can benefit.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there others wishing to speak to the throne speech? I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Varsity, the Minister of Labour and Immigration.

Mr. Copping: Thank you. It is truly a privilege to be here. I am awed and humbled by this place, its storied history, the ability to positively impact the lives of so many Albertans, its conventions and traditions although I have to admit, Mr. Speaker, that even though I agree with it, I'm still trying to find the reference to the $100 donation to your charity of choice for violating the cellphone rules in the standing orders.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure that I echo the sentiments of many of my colleagues. It is such a gift to be able to serve but also a tremendous responsibility. I feel this each time I walk into this building. I am thankful that this place, with its marbled columns, stained glass windows, and ornate details – all of this serves as a constant reminder of how fortunate we are to be here and the responsibility we bear in the days to come.

With that in mind, I would like to thank the residents of Calgary-Varsity for having faith in me to represent them in this Chamber, and I would also like to thank the Premier for giving me the opportunity to serve all Albertans as a member of government. I recognize what an honour and responsibility this is, and I will serve to the best of my ability.

Mr. Speaker, in my remarks this afternoon in responding to the Speech from the Throne, I would like to thank some of the people who brought me to this place, talk about the issues and dreams of the people who live in Calgary-Varsity, and share my excitement in working with my colleagues in this Chamber to improve the lives of Albertans.

First, I would like to thank my parents. I was born in Toronto. Wait. That said, I was saved at an early age. My family moved to Alberta when my twin sister and I were four years old. My parents, John and Penny, like so many, wanted to move to Alberta to see greater opportunities for themselves and their children. They sought out the vast prairie sky and the Rocky Mountains, the entrepreneurial spirit that lives here, and the freedom to live life on their own terms.

I was fortunate to grow up in Calgary and on a small ranch near Water Valley, Alberta. From my father, an industrial electrician, rancher, and entrepreneur, I learned about hard work, planning, and, above all, safety. I have been doing prework safety briefings since I was eight years old, even before they called them safety briefings. From my mother, a schoolteacher, guidance counsellor, and lifelong learner, I learned compassion, dedication, and the love of ideas. It was they who sparked for me an interest in politics. Growing up, we would often have conversations around the kitchen table concerning issues of the day. My parents both played a huge part in how I view the world and the values I hold.

From my father, and I quote: you can't take more out of a pot than you put into it. As you can probably tell, he has a very strong aversion to deficit financing, and he is a tremendous fan of King Ralph. From my mother, and I am paraphrasing: politics is about people. As a society we have decided to pool our resources to ensure that all children can get a good education, anyone who is sick can see a doctor, and those who need help can find it. Government is our government. It is us. We need to take responsibility for it. Thank you to both of my parents for their love and guidance.

Second, I would like to thank the many mentors and colleagues who helped me on my journey throughout my education and career. This interest in politics instilled by my parents prompted me to do my first degree in political science. One might ask: what do you do with a poli-sci degree once you graduate? That's a very good question. Well, one answer is that you move to Ottawa and apply theory to practice, and one of my first jobs after graduating was working for the hon. Harvie André, Member of Parliament for Calgary-Centre and Government House Leader. For those that may have known him, Harvie was a tremendous leader and extraordinarily hard working. Although I learned a great deal concerning the political process, there were three main lessons that I took away from my time in Ottawa. First, you can make a difference. By working with others and working hard, you can make positive change in politics. Second, although sometimes difficult, it is possible to maintain your values. Always act with integrity, and remember that you are there to serve. Harvie demonstrated this over nearly 20 years in Ottawa. Finally, if you wish to represent your fellow citizens, you should understand what they are thinking and have experience, skills, and ideas to offer.

With these lessons in mind I left the world of politics. I completed a master's degree in industrial relations at Queen's and started a career in the business world in labour relations and human resources. I had the tremendous opportunity to work with one of Canada's great companies, Canadian Pacific Railway, for just under 20 years, and then I started my own business consulting. I also had the privilege to teach at two of our great schools in our province, the schools of business at the University of Calgary and the University of Lethbridge.

Over this time I worked with and taught a number of truly remarkable people. There are too many to recognize, Mr. Speaker. Suffice to say that they included business colleagues and partners, union leaders, university professors, a number of my students, government officials, and community leaders. Although this group of individuals had very differing views, they shared common traits. They were dedicated to something greater than themselves, they were thoughtful, and they strived to make this world a better place. Working with each of them, they showed me that through hard work and dialogue you can find greater solutions, and I thank them all.

Third, I would like to thank my wife and children. While working with CP, I met my wife, Marian, who worked here at the Legislature for one of her first jobs following graduation from her first degree. A second-generation Ukrainian, I soon joined through marriage the vast Alberta-Ukrainian community. Where once holubtsi, pirohy, and nalysnyky were simply foreign words, they are now common household dishes and sometimes not common enough. We have been blessed with three girls: Katyanna, Genovia, and Natalia. As many in this Chamber know better than I, this role truly is a family affair. We cannot do it alone, and I would like to thank my wife and children for their love and support.

Finally, I would like to thank the constituents of Calgary-Varsity and, in particular, two former Calgary-Varsity MLAs, Donna Kennedy-Glans and Murray Smith. Nearly 10 years ago my wife and I moved to Varsity, in our humble opinion and according to Avenue Magazine for over a decade, one of the top neighbourhoods in Calgary. Calgary-Varsity is a riding like no other. The beautiful trees that create vast canopies over the streets are as multigenerational as the people who like to walk down the sidewalks underneath them. It's rare and amazing to find a community where you can go for an evening stroll, as we often do, and be greeted by seniors, students, children, parents, and pets. It is truly an area that reflects the vast diversity of the province we live in.

Varsity, once considered an outlying suburb, is now inner city, a hub for ideas, community, and vibrancy. This is in no small part due to its namesake, the University of Calgary, this institution that has made its mark not only here in Alberta but nationally and internationally. It is a blessing to have access to such high-calibre education, that attracts the best and brightest right into the heart of our constituency. I would imagine that there are a few U of C Dinos in this very Chamber. In addition to the university, Calgary-Varsity is also home to the Alberta Children's hospital, Foothills campus, numerous primary schools, and strong and resilient community associations.

Whether you live in Varsity, Silver Springs, Brentwood, Banff Trail, University Heights, St. Andrews Heights, Parkdale, or Charleswood, you are part of a larger community that celebrates family, belonging, teamwork, and community. Whether it be picnicking by the river, playing Frisbee in Bowmont Park, or sharing ideas with old and new friends at the local coffee shops, a sense of belonging and friendship is reflected in our constituency.

Over the years Calgary-Varsity has been ably represented by praiseworthy MLAs who still live in the riding today. Murray Smith represented Calgary-Varsity between 1993 and 2004. Murray served as a cabinet minister in a number of portfolios, including labour, economic development and tourism, and energy. As part of the Klein government he helped to restore balance to our budget while at the same time rebuilding our economy and was re-elected in his final term with a significant majority.

Donna Kennedy-Glans represented Calgary-Varsity between 2012 and 2015. Donna chaired the all-party Standing Committee on Resource Stewardship and was the associate minister of energy and electricity and renewable resources. I recall that one evening during her nomination Donna showed up at my door in Varsity. Her passion, dedication, and thoughtfulness reignited my love for politics, and not only did I become her supporter, but I became extremely active in local politics again.

Although both Murray and Donna are very different people, they share a number of common traits and views. They are both thoughtful and resourceful, willing to engage in conversation about ideas, and were focused on representing the interests of the constituents of Calgary-Varsity. I would like to thank them both for their dedication, service, and especially their advice.

Lastly, I would like to thank the residents of Calgary-Varsity. Over the last 10 months I was honoured to meet literally thousands of Calgary-Varsity residents that opened their doors for me – it was particularly helpful when it was minus 29 – and each shared what they loved about our neighbourhood, their concerns, hopes, and ideas for the future. Although I am not certain why, and perhaps it is the influence of the University of Calgary, the residents of Calgary-Varsity are incredibly engaged in politics and care deeply about the issues confronting them and their families. Many have participated in policy conversations on the economy, health care, and education, and want to seek solutions. At the doors, in coffee shops, and in community halls Calgary-Varsity residents engaged in conversations and presented ideas facing our province today.

What did I hear? I heard a deep concern about jobs and the economy. I met unemployed and underemployed geologists who had lost their jobs in 2016 and had yet to find full-time work. I met university students on the cusp of graduating who are having difficulty finding jobs here in Alberta and were having to leave the province to find work or go back to school to do another degree. I met tradespeople who had lost their jobs in the oil patch. One individual in particular had started his own business after losing his job and, unable to make a go of it, was on the brink of bankruptcy. With tears in his eyes he shared with me that he did everything right. He went to school. He got his certificate. He worked hard and paid off his loan. When he lost his job in the patch, he started his own company, but there was not enough work. He was losing his business and his house, and he did not know what to do to support his family. His message was that we as government needed to fix the economy and bring jobs back to Alberta.

I heard concerns about growing debt and taxes. Young families and seniors alike commented on the increased cost of living caused by growing taxes and the burdens that we were shifting to future generations given that we were living beyond our means. I heard about our health care and education systems. As I already mentioned, Calgary-Varsity includes a number of great institutions, including the U of C, Alberta Children's hospital, Foothills medical centre, and a number of public and private schools. We have a large number of people who work in education and health care, and they care deeply about the services they provide and want to see them improved.

Although there is a recognition that we need to get spending under control, there is a desire that we do this in a way that maintains and even improves front-line services. We need innovative thinking and new approaches in solving this. How can we do this? One approach is that we engage front-line workers in finding ways to improve services, manage costs, and make these jobs good jobs so we can continue to attract good people to provide these services.

I heard about our need to protect the most vulnerable in our society. The role of government is to ensure that those who need assistance can find it. All Albertans, regardless of who they love, to whom they pray, or their ethnic origins, must be respected and included. What counts is the character of the person.

Finally, I heard a desire to move away from the politics of division and the politics of personal attacks. Instead, we as elected representatives and community leaders should focus on ideas and solutions and, above all, represent the views of all our constituents.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, the constituents of Calgary-Varsity are looking for a policy agenda that will create jobs and rebuild the economy, reduce taxes, improve our health care and education systems while at the same time managing our budget, protect the most vulnerable in our society, and do this in a way that is respectful and represents the views of all of our constituents. I believe our government is well on its way to addressing the issues put forth by my constituents. With bills 1, 2, 3, and 4 already introduced and Bill 1 already passed, we have shown that we are ready to create jobs and rebuild the economy. More legislation to create opportunity for Albertans is yet to come.

I will have the pleasure of introducing the fair access to regulated professions and trades act, making it easier and fairer for newcomers to be credentialed in their professions, work at their skill level, and contribute to our shared prosperity. To help those most vulnerable, we will introduce the saving the girl next door act and table legislation to give effect to Claire's law, which will protect victims of human trafficking and domestic violence. Finally, we have already improved decorum and respect in this Chamber by making changes to the standing orders.

Lastly, we will focus tirelessly on balancing the budget over the course of the next four years. In doing this, we will protect front-line resources. In making this commitment, I must reiterate that this is not just about saving money. This is about ensuring that we as a province have the ability to fund those items that are important to us – health care, education, social services – over the long term and not spending millions or billions on debt-servicing costs.

These are just a few examples I will probably provide to my constituents when I am asked how we are responding to their concerns. There is much more to come.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank you again for the opportunity to speak to the Chamber. I commit to working with my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to find the best solutions for Albertans. Although we may not always agree on the best path forward . . .

The Speaker: I'm sure someone will be happy to provide you with an opportunity to conclude your remarks.

While it's confession hour, I might just add that I didn't realize that the hon. member and I had so much in common. I, too, was born in that place you mentioned and came to Alberta when I was four and lived in Water Valley. So we're basically soulmates.

I see the hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Lac La Biche rising to perhaps see if you might like to conclude your remarks.

Ms Goodridge: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the Member for Calgary-Varsity and Minister of Labour and Immigration for his wonderful remarks, similar to the Speaker and lots in common. It was really interesting to hear your remarks. I, too, had safety briefings at the age of about two, and they continued on, including on our campaign's sign team, which had a daily safety briefing before installing any campaign signs, including lawn signs. I was just wondering if the hon. member could perhaps continue sharing some of these remarks with the Chamber.

Mr. Copping: Thank you very much to the hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Lac La Biche for the question. I'd be pleased to finish my remarks. Yes, safety briefing: as the Minister of Labour and Immigration I'm responsible for occupational health and safety. I can honestly say that it's in the blood, from my father.

As I was indicating previously, Mr. Speaker, I would just simply like to thank you again for the opportunity to speak to the Chamber. I will commit to working with my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to find the best solutions for Albertans. Although we may not always agree on the best path forward, through respectful dialogue we will at least understand each other's views and, hopefully, identify and address unintended consequences. I commit to working on behalf of all Albertans as a member of this government. Finally, I commit to working hard every day for the constituents of Calgary-Varsity and to keeping my eyes, ears, and heart open to them and be worthy of their trust.

Thank you very much.

The Speaker: Thank you.

Are there others wishing to add questions or comments to the hon. member? The Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland, please.

Mr. Getson: Yes. I really appreciate the comments in your maiden speech. Again, there's no question why you were chosen for your position. It's an honour to have you there, sir.

A couple of things. We share some fellow things as well: nalysnyky, pirohy, everything else. I learned it before I got married but have the same affliction.

I wonder if you could share some personal stories, though, about some of the constituents that you came across other than the one gentleman you spoke about, something that really struck another chord, some of the impacts and the reasons why you're stepping forward to help out your constituents.

Mr. Copping: Thank you very much to the hon. member for the question. Again, out door-knocking, I spoke with thousands of constituents in Calgary-Varsity, and a large number of them were particularly concerned about their ability to find jobs. With this one particular individual that I actually spoke to, what actually struck me and the colleagues with whom I was door-knocking was that he had no idea where to turn to and didn't know what to do at that point in time. That truly struck home for me. You know, why I chose to run and represent our constituents is that we need to actually change our policy direction to create jobs for Albertans and because of how harmful it was for a number of Albertans who got left behind.

That was the most dramatic story that I talked to, but there were lots of others; you know, a geologist, as I pointed out. But often numbers of individuals who wanted to start up a new oil-servicing company or start up a new oil well company, because they had been laid off, but couldn't find the financial capital to do that and were simply unable – you know, even though they had saved up sufficient funds and they were living off their savings, they knew that if something didn't change soon, they would not be able to retire, and they'd have to go someplace else. And then stories of neighbours whose children had graduated from the University of Calgary in engineering and had found work, but the work was actually in Texas, and they couldn't have the opportunities here.

I'm sure, like many of the other members in this Chamber, we've heard lots of stories, and that's why I'm so excited about our government and our mandate to move forward and create jobs for Albertans, diversify and grow the economy, and help these individuals in my constituency and all of our constituencies.

Thank you.

The Speaker: There are just a few seconds left for questions and comments.

I would not want to prevent anyone from speaking. Having said that, if there are none, I'd be happy to hear from the hon. Member for Morinville-St. Albert and Associate Minister of Natural Gas.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am honoured and humbled to be here in front of you. I would like to thank the wonderful people from Morinville-St. Albert, who saw to it to elect me to represent them in this Legislature.

I'd also like to give a shout out to some of the people that, of course, have been behind me, starting with my parents, who moulded me into the person that I am. If you don't like that, you can speak to them. I'd also like to mention my wife, Randa, who inspires me every day to want to be a better person. One of the things that she taught me was to always recognize those people that are the hardest working people.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a second just to recognize some of the hardest working people in this Legislature, and that's the pages. I am so incredibly impressed by them because on day one they knew 87 names and 87 ridings. I'm quite impressed by that. So my goal is that before the end of this session I'm going to try and learn all of their names, and I'm also going to challenge myself to try to learn at least one thing about them. I've got a couple now that I'm just going to quickly share with you. This is for anybody, by the way, who wants to take up skiing. I would suggest you go and see Amber because she was a competitive alpine skier. You might want to chat with Lily, whose favourite colour is grey. Or you could talk to Maria, who absolutely loves Indian dancing. Now, I would suggest that if our Prime Minister could find Alberta on a map, I would ask him to come here, and perhaps Maria could teach him a move or two. The last one I'll sort of mention is Summer, who is not only a valedictorian this year, but she's also graduating. In grade 10 and grade 11 she got 100 per cent in math two years in a row, and she's now going for 100 per cent in grade 12 as well. That'll make it 3 for 3. So when you see Summer out in the lounge, please give her a high-five and tell her we want 3 for 3 of that 100 per cent in math.

I'd also like to give a shout out to my daughter, who is a successful business owner and who has taught me and constantly reminds me about the benefits of being a compassionate Conservative. My son Jadd, who's 15, is also, by the way, the best Minecraft player in the world. You don't get good at Minecraft and be the best in the world without playing a lot of Minecraft. I'd like to give a shout out to him because he taught me, if nothing else, that persistence overcomes resistance. And then, lastly, my youngest son, Shadi, who taught me to never take my eye off him because he's a bit of a troublemaker and reminds me quite a bit of myself. He's also a great hockey player as well and plays at quite a competitive level.

Those are certainly the people that have inspired me and motivate me to come in here and to be the best that I can be.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I'm going to ask all the hon. members through you, of course: put your smart phones down, close your Standing Orders, and get comfortable in your seats because we're going to take a ride. You might want to buckle up as well for this one. Now, we are going to start in the most southern portion of my riding, my hometown, St. Albert. St. Albert is the city of botanical arts. If your preference is wave petunias or purple flame grass, it doesn't matter because we've got a little bit of something for everyone in St. Albert. In fact, from June 8 to August 24 you can actually hop on the botanical bus. It starts at the Enjoy Centre, and then it takes you to our world-famous farmers' market, and from there it'll take you to our botanical centre, which, of course, is world-class and definitely worth the trip.

But that's not all that St. Albert is known for. Mr. Speaker, St. Albert has an affliction. I suffer from that same affliction. It's known as hockey. I can tell you that the people in St. Albert love hockey. They're either playing hockey, they're practising hockey, and when they're not doing that, they're thinking about when they can next play hockey. I'm going to give everyone a little tip here, for anyone who does any fantasy hockey leagues, and I know there are lots of you: you might want to write down the name of Matt Savoie. He's native to St. Albert. He lives a block from me. I never see him unless it's on the ice, because he's another one of these 14-year-olds that lives and breathes hockey. He was recently drafted number one overall to play in the WHL, and they are using his name in the same sentence as other child phenoms such as Sidney Crosby and Connor McDavid. So, like I said, remember Matt Savoie for your hockey drafts.

Now, on this journey we're going to drive northward, and we're going to go through Sturgeon county. As you're driving through Sturgeon county, you're going to notice the canola fields on your left, and you're going to notice the Sturgeon River on your right. Mr. Speaker, you would be forgiven for thinking that you were in God's country, because there is no doubt that this is one of the most beautiful ridings if not the most beautiful riding in the province if not the country.

Drive a little further north, Mr. Speaker, and of course you've got the Industrial Heartland, which is responsible for half the GDP in this province. If you haven't toured the Industrial Heartland, I would encourage you to do so because it's definitely worth the trip.

But on this trip we keep heading north, and we're going to hit Morinville. Now, Morinville was founded in 1907. The St. Jean Baptiste church was named a historical site in 1975, and Morinville just finished construction of a world-class recreational centre. It's a $30 million leisure centre, and I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that people from Morinville, if they've proven anything, it's that they can punch above their weight class. I encourage you while you're on this journey: don't be afraid to check out the recreational centre in Morinville.

Now, on this trip we're going to keep going north, and we're going to go to Legal. Legal is a wonderful French community. For myself, I will always think of it as the smallest town with the biggest church, and if you want to know what I mean, just go check it out. It does have the largest church in town, but that's actually not what they're known for. They are known as the national capital for French murals. Most people don't know this, Mr. Speaker, but there are actually 28 murals in the town of Legal. On some Sunday afternoon when you're looking for something to do, I encourage you to drive to Legal and check out those 28 murals. It's quite impressive.

Now, on this drive, of course, we're going to now head into Bon Accord, which is the first community in Canada and the 11th in the world to be designated as an international dark-sky community. So if you're interested in astronomy and you want to take your telescope out one Sunday evening, Bon Accord is a great place to go just because they don't have a ton of visual pollution or light pollution in the sky.

Now, after you leave Bon Accord, you're going to head into Gibbons. Gibbons was originally two separate towns, Astleyville and Battenberg, but they merged together, and they named the town after the founding land settler, William R. Gibbons. For me Gibbons will always be known for something else. It will be known for their world-famous meat draw. Now, prior to this campaign, Mr. Speaker, I didn't know what a meat draw was. If you're looking at me wondering what it is, well, it's a great opportunity to raise money for the local town. I would encourage you to go to the Gibbons Hotel. You can order a cold beverage. I recommend the nachos; they're excellent. Then you can participate in the meat draw. It's actually a lot of fun, and it's a great way to bring the whole town together.

Now we're going to be going a little further north. We're going to be hitting Redwater. Redwater gets its name from the nearby river, which actually turns red from the spring runoff, and that's how the town got its name. Redwater has a 45-metre tall discovery well derrick, and it's one of their historic landmarks.

But there's something else kind of cool about Redwater, Mr. Speaker. There's a gentleman there by the name of Dave. He works on town council. He's a retired RCMP officer. He purchased the old RCMP detachment, and he renovated it into his home. It's actually quite impressive. He renovated the entire detachment except for the jail cell. He left the jail cell intact. So it's got the bars, it's got the stainless steel sink, and it's actually quite neat. If you go there, if you knock on his door, tell him Dale sent you. He'll be more than happy to give you a tour. It's quite a neat little project that he has going there.

I am very fortunate to represent this incredible riding, but I'd like to back up just a little further now and tell you how I got into politics. My interest in politics started in grade 5. That was when my grade 5 class, under the guidance of Mr. Penner, taught us about government. We actually had an election, and I ran to be Prime Minister of the class. My slogan for that campaign was Nally's His Name, Improvement's His Game. Now, I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that my political prowess has improved somewhat since then, so you won't be seeing that slogan on any of my buttons any time soon. It certainly got me interested in politics at an early age.

I never had the opportunity to get involved, though, because I was a single parent at a young age. I went to university full-time, I worked part-time, and I raised this little girl on my own. And you can imagine how difficult that was. I didn't have any family supports close by, so I was on my own. It was at this time that I developed my own ideology, what I call compassionate conservatism. I realized, Mr. Speaker, that the best way you can help someone out who needs a hand is by having a strong economy. I learned at this opportunity that if an industrious, hard-working person can apply themselves, they can get ahead and they can get a mortgage-paying job. That was what I learned at this crucial juncture in my life.

I also, shortly after that, found myself as a general manager of a Home Depot. This was during one of the largest labour shortages our province has ever seen. At that time if you went into any big box retailer, whether it was Home Depot or Walmart, they were all grossly understaffed. They just couldn't hire people. Well, Mr. Speaker, I had the only big box retail store that was fully staffed. The reason it was fully staffed is because I reached out to the Mennonite centre, and the Mennonite centre's job is to find jobs for newcomers. They did a great job of helping us get staffed up. In addition to that, I started looking for other partnerships, and I formed a partnership with a company called EmployAbilities, and their job is to find employment for people with disabilities. From there they introduced me to a few other organizations that found work for people with disabilities. The end result was that I had the only fully staffed Home Depot in the hottest economy in North America. The best part was that our profit was so high, because we had such great staffing levels, that the president of Home Depot actually sent my wife and I to the Beijing Olympics as a thank you.

It was at that time when I learned about what I call the business reason for hiring people with disabilities. Mr. Speaker, everybody has value, and the challenge is to find that value that they can bring to the workforce and harness that for the company and also for themselves as well.

It was shortly after that time when I bumped into a gentleman who worked for the chamber of commerce. He found out about the work that I was doing with companies, promoting the hiring of people with disabilities, and he asked me to be the co-chair for diversity Edmonton. It was a consortium of businesses that worked with other businesses to promote the hiring of people with disabilities. It was at that time that I got to do more work on what I call the business case for hiring people with disabilities, but it was also an opportunity for me to learn about the importance of taking care of the most vulnerable in our society.

Mr. Speaker, those are some of the ideals that I hold dear to my heart. Four years ago when we saw the electoral map change, I had some concerns. Those concerns were realized when we got on track to be $100 billion in debt, when we had 200,000 unemployed Albertans. We were in a job crisis. We had the third-highest unemployment in the country.

The Speaker: Hon. member, I hesitate to interrupt; however, I see that the clock has struck the hour of 6 o'clock, and as such the House is adjourned until 7:30 this evening.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

7:30 p.m.

Tuesday, June 4, 2019

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Hon. members, good evening and welcome. Please be seated.

Consideration of Her Honour the Lieutenant Governor's Speech

Ms Glasgow moved, seconded by Ms Rosin, that an humble address be presented to Her Honour the Honourable the Lieutenant Governor as follows.

To Her Honour the Honourable Lois Mitchell, CM, AOE, LLD, the Lieutenant Governor of the province of Alberta:

We, Her Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Legislative Assembly, now assembled, beg leave to thank Your Honour for the gracious speech Your Honour has been pleased to address to us at the opening of the present session.

[Debate adjourned June 4: Mr. Nally speaking]

The Speaker: Do I see the Member for Edmonton-Whitemud rising?

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's been a bit of a long day. Okay. Well, I'm pleased to rise in response to the Speech from the Throne. As I know there is a little leeway on these speeches, I hope you will all indulge me while I tell you a little bit about myself.

I am a child of immigrants to this country from Tanzania and India who came to Canada and Alberta because of the open arms of this country and the wide-open opportunities of this province. My father was a small-business owner. My mother was a former teacher and a provincial civil servant. I grew up in southwest Edmonton, lucky to enjoy the privilege of a great public education system and world-class universities. I'm the daughter of two parents who both had significant health issues in their 40s but who never had to question whether or not they would have access to high-quality and exceptional health care.

I am a lawyer who worked for 13 years in public service and in private practice and who understands the role and significance of strong and effective government on the lives of the people it serves. I'm the partner and wife of a public school teacher and assistant principal, who has been a mentor and an advocate for his students. I'm a mother of two young children, who look around and don't question seeing people of all races, religions, abilities, sexual orientations, and values as part of their community. They certainly don't see anything unusual about a strong, progressive woman as a politician or as their Premier.

I am a feminist, a social justice advocate, a volunteer, and a woman of colour who believes that government should reflect the people that it serves, and I now stand before this Assembly as the elected representative for the fantastic riding of Edmonton-Whitemud. I'm the first woman to hold this seat and the first person of colour, and I'm very proud.

Edmonton-Whitemud is a beautiful riding established in 1971. It draws its name from Whitemud Creek, a tributary of the North Saskatchewan River that runs through the riding. The name Whitemud comes from the white mud from the hill used by Hudson's Bay Company men as a whitewash on their posts.

Edmonton-Whitemud is a constituency made up of people from a multitude of ethnic, religious, language, and socio-economic backgrounds. From the grand homes on Whitemud Road to the character homes in the closely knit community of Terwillegar Towne to the vibrant diversity of Brander Gardens, it is filled with young families working hard to provide the best life for their children now but also wanting a secure future for them, families that are growing and need sufficient school space and teachers to ensure that every child has every opportunity to succeed.

There is a thriving community of newcomers to Canada in the heart of the riding thanks to the great work of local community groups like Brander Gardens ROCKS, a local community group which provides ways for these families to connect and find support from each other.

There is a long and proud history of volunteerism in this riding. Community leagues such as Riverbend, Brookview, Oak Hills, the Ridge, Hodgson, Terwillegar, and Ogilvie Ridge are active and strong in Edmonton-Whitemud. These community leagues have come together under the Terwillegar Riverbend Advisory Council, or TRAC, one of the first of its kind in the city of Edmonton, which just hosted its 14th annual community run to support the great work that it does in the riding.

The riding is busy with events all year-round, from the Southwest Edmonton Farmers' Market to the SouthWest Edmonton Seniors Association's live active expo to community carnivals to the family and kid sporting activities at the Terwillegar rec centre.

It is a riding that also has a lot of natural beauty, including the well-loved and well-used Terwillegar off-leash park, that connects to the other natural areas in our river valley park system. It's no wonder that the Terwillegar off-leash park is so popular as Edmonton-Whitemud has the highest level of dog ownership in the city. This brought me no end of joy as I was door-knocking, since I am a very big dog lover, although it might have put off a few of my volunteers who had allergies since I insisted on giving every single dog that I met an ear rub or a pat on the head if they'd let me.

The political history of the riding is also fascinating. Three of Alberta's Premiers have represented this area: Alexander Rutherford, Don Getty, and Dave Hancock. Nellie McClung, part of Alberta's and Canada's Famous Five, who brought the Persons Case, represented part of the geographic area that is now in Edmonton-Whitemud.

Since the establishment of Edmonton-Whitemud as a riding in 1971 it has been held at times by three different political parties, for multiple terms each: the Progressive Conservatives, the Alberta Liberals, and, of course, the NDP. The former MLA, Dr. Bob Turner, paved the way for the NDP in the riding, and for that I am forever grateful. Mr. Speaker, this very political history means that the voters of Edmonton-Whitemud cannot and should not be taken for granted by any political party. These are electors who pay close attention to what candidates and politicians say that they're going to do, and they hold them accountable. They are reasonable and pragmatic voters who are not swayed by highly ideological or partisan positions.

The people of Edmonton-Whitemud care about supporting their own families but also care a great deal about how other families are treated. There are people who told me that they could not abide any political party that would make LGBTQ students, who are already vulnerable, more vulnerable or would accept or brush off intolerant or hateful views by anybody. They are voters who lived through the Klein years and 44 years of Conservative governments and watched them fail to diversify and invest during the boom of high oil prices and then slash and burn public services during the bust of oil prices.

The people of Edmonton-Whitemud told me that they were grateful to see a different approach from the NDP to the precipitous drop in oil prices that took place late in 2014. They appreciate that instead of hurting Albertans more, which is what Conservative governments always did and indeed will continue to do, the NDP invested in Alberta workers by refusing to cut Alberta public-sector jobs and by creating jobs by putting Albertans to work on desperately needed infrastructure projects. They recognized the commitment and pragmatism of former Premier Notley on advocating for and moving Canadians in support of building pipelines so that we could get value for our resources. But they also saw, for the first time in decades, that the NDP government demonstrated a commitment to diversification, which was a commitment to a more stable and secure future for all Albertans.

Like all of us in this Assembly, I chose to run for many reasons. I ran because after working hard to encourage gender parity in politics as a board member of ParityYEG, I knew that when I was asked to run, it was time for me to walk the walk. I ran because I wanted my children to see how important it is to be an engaged citizen and to stand up for the values that you believe in. I ran because I watched the NDP government over the previous four years, and I saw a government and a leader that, for the first time in 40 years, actually planned ahead for our future by diversifying our economy, investing in people and services when times are difficult, and standing up for the vulnerable and the disenfranchised. I ran because I saw the alternative that was proposed and how regressive and backwards it was, and I knew that I was not going to sit idly by and let it happen without doing something about it. I needed to fight for a more just and secure world for my children.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to be a member of a strong Official Opposition. I'm not afraid of being a minority voice in this Assembly. I grew up in Alberta as a woman of colour. I've spent my life as a minority. I've immersed myself in the experiences of marginalized people. I've learned from the stories of those voices who are ignored. I do not feel powerless in the opposition. In fact, I feel empowered. I feel the awesome privilege and responsibility of speaking for those who may be in the minority, and I'm proud to do it. So while the members on the opposite side may gleefully drag this province backwards again, just know that I am not afraid to be a voice to challenge that, and I will challenge that because that is what my constituents elected me to do and that is what a strong opposition voice must do.

The people of Edmonton-Whitemud have put their trust in me and elected me to be their voice in the Legislature. I commit to ensuring that their voices, priorities, and needs are strongly represented in the House, and I look forward to working as a member of the NDP caucus to ensure a better life for all Albertans.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Thank you to the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available if anyone has questions or comments with respect to the hon. member's speech. I see that the Member for Edmonton-Glenora has a question or a comment.

Ms Hoffman: Yeah. I just want to say how inspiring I found the speech that the Member for Edmonton-Whitemud just gave. I got to know the hon. member because she was a mom at one of the nonprofit daycares that ended up being a $25-a-day child care site. I thought maybe she would indulge us and talk a little bit about some of the policies that came into play over the last four years and what it is about them that she thinks should continue on. I would appreciate hearing that.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you for the question from the Member for Edmonton-Glenora. You know, the reason I'm here is actually because of the Member for Edmonton-

Glenora. She was the one who took my passions, my interests, my values and helped me funnel them into political action. I believe strongly in women asking other women to run, and this was a perfect example of why it's important. I was very honoured to be approached by the Member for Edmonton-Glenora, who obviously saw something in me, and I appreciated her seeing that. She believed in me and supported me. That is a very important role of all members of the Assembly, to support each other. But I strongly believe particularly in women supporting other women to make their voices heard in political office. So thank you to the Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

You know, the $25-a-day child care program was one of the things where I realized this is the first time – I've grown up in this province. I've lived here for a long time. It was the first time I'd heard a government actually take active measures to support women's entrance and full participation in the workforce. It had been something that had been ignored for so long. I was so thrilled to see a government actually take action. If you look at any civilized and developed country in this world where they have really got full participation of women in the workforce, it's because they have affordable and accessible child care.

I'll actually never forget the night that the NDP government was elected in 2015. I was not a member. I was not a candidate. I was a mom who was eight months and three weeks pregnant, very emotional, watching on the couch. I'll never forget when I saw our former Premier stand up on election night and in her victory speech mention things that I never thought I'd hear an Alberta Premier talk about. She thanked women. She thanked First Nations. She thanked the public service. As somebody who has worked in government, in public service as a woman, worked with First Nations, I could not believe it. I had never heard an Alberta politician or Premier, in particular, stand up and say those things.

I could not believe it. I actually wrote it down. I couldn't believe that I'd ever heard a Premier not just talk about those things but then I watched for four years as this government walked that walk as well. There was a true commitment to reconciliation with our indigenous people, again something I had never seen before in this province. There was a true commitment to supporting women. The actions they took to support the LGBTQ children and community in this province was just inspirational to me.

But more than that, I'm also a practical person who wants to look forward to my children's future, and I want to know that there will be a future. I have watched and been on this roller coaster, just like we all have who've grown up in this province, and watched our services and the things that we depend on, like health and education, just roller coaster with the prices of oil. You know, the members on the other side might be comfortable in saying, "Oh, you know, it's the economic situation that the NDP government left this province in," but they're forgetting the 44 years of history behind that, which is that previous Conservative governments have let us ride a roller coaster for so long. This was the first government that actually committed to investing in people and investing in public service and investing in infrastructure at a time when times were tough because that's an investment in the future.

So when I saw the vision laid out by this party, by this leader, I knew I had to be part of it because it was actually a vision for a progressive future. When I was at the doors in Edmonton-Whitemud, that's what I talked about. We can talk about, "Oh, yeah, it's a tough time; it's a tough economic time," and we can get right back on that roller coaster, which is exactly where I think this government is going to take us. There is no plan to invest in our future, to diversify. There's no plan for climate change. We're just going right back to what we did for 40 years. I'm happy to stand up here and say that I don't believe that, and I won't believe that. I'm going to continue to advocate for those voters in Edmonton-Whitemud who felt the same way that I did, which is that, no, we don't want to move backwards, we want to move forward.

We'll bide our time. I'm happy to talk. I'm happy to stand up and say the things that I believe in and that I know the voters in my constituency believe in, and we'll see what happens in four years.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there any others wishing to briefly bring comments or questions to the hon. member?

Seeing none, the hon. Member for Red Deer-North and Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is both a great pleasure and a true honour to rise in this House today and express my deep appreciation to the people of Red Deer-North for the trust and faith they have placed in me to represent them during the 30th Legislature. Further, it is humbling to present my maiden speech today, which I have entitled as my model for life: The Lord Leads Me Where He Needs Me.

As articulated in the throne speech, what the good people of Red Deer-North and Alberta verified through their election choice was a strong mandate for our government to reignite the economy, to get people back to work, and to build pipelines to tidewater. Equally strong was their desire for a government who is concerned about the health and welfare of its people, especially the poor, the vulnerable, the disenfranchised, and the marginalized among us. As my dear friend Lorna stated, and I quote: we want a Conservative government with a social conscience. Unquote. Being an idealist, it is this element of social justice in politics that I was most drawn to when considering whether to run for provincial politics.

My desire to be a voice for the voiceless and the forgotten began when I was quite young. I am blessed to have been born into a very close-knit, faith-filled Italian family. My parents were both from the same poor farming community in northern Italy, not far from Venice. While I remember many stories of the joy of surviving World War II and then the struggles of the postwar time with the scarcity of food and money, I also recall how they said that their family and friends were able to depend on each other. They took care of each other and supported one another's needs with love and charity for all. They even found reasons to sing as they worked long hours in the fields.

Due to my paternal grandfather having a stroke, my father's family was hit especially hard, with my father, Luigi Dametto, age 11, having to drop out of the Italian version of grade 3 to go to work to help financially support his parents and siblings. I can't even imagine how difficult it must have been for an 11-year-old boy to be shouldering such a heavy burden. While my father never begrudged the childhood he missed, he did impress upon me the value of an education and the blessing of putting service above self. My father's resiliency and ingenuity served him well as he went on to become a respected finishing carpenter and construction worker who could figure out how to build just about anything, in fact, building our family home in Guelph from scratch. He did this after marrying my mother, Rina Perin, in Italy in the late '50s. Shortly thereafter they immigrated to Canada. They came in search of a better life.

Leaving most of their friends and family behind and with little actual money in hand, my parents took a huge risk moving to a foreign land so different than their beloved native land and culture. There were many obstacles to overcome, not least of which were the language barrier, the much colder climate, the diversity of cultures blending as other nationalities were also immigrating in large numbers, and, yes, even racial prejudice.

As a young child who, I might add, was born in Canada, I never truly understood until much later in life that when someone would shout out a racial slur at me as I walked down the street, they only displayed their own ignorance through their lack of respect and intolerance. While these occurrences were uncomfortable, the way my younger brother Louis, born with Down syndrome, was sometimes treated in public hurt me much more deeply. While the majority of people were kind and could see beyond the disability label, others were quite cruel: jeering, making fun at his expense, ridiculing, and, yes, even physically abusive at times for no other reason than that he was born different.

As his older sister by two years I became one of his defenders. After all, if they only knew him, they'd know that Lou knew two languages, had a great sense of humour, worked a steady job, enjoyed bowling and the company of his girlfriend, a relationship that lasted over 25 years until his death at the age of 49 of Down syndrome Alzheimer's. It was gratifying to see at his funeral that while there are those who would have discounted his life as being less valuable and yet others who would have advocated that he should never have been born at all, our church was full to overflowing with approximately a thousand people in attendance. There was not a dry eye to be found as they paid their respect to a life well lived.

Inspired by my daily interactions with my brother while growing up, this contributed immensely to my decision to become a rehabilitative practitioner working with the developmentally and physically challenged and ultimately led to my move to my forever home in Red Deer in 1981. I've always found Red Deer to be a welcoming and caring place filled with generosity of spirit and a keen desire to help the less fortunate. Fast forward 38 years, and I am now married to the love of my life and soulmate, Darren. I have seven amazing children, Chantelle, Jason, Neil, Brandon, Aaron, Vanessa, and Yvette; four beautiful grandchildren, Ava, William, Charlotte, and Benjamin; a family farm; a trucking business; and an active personal and professional life. I have been truly blessed, and I have enjoyed every minute of this journey. It has been extremely rewarding.

I still very much appreciate the community of Red Deer and the willingness they show to honour and respect all, whether it is the immigrant, the mentally or physically challenged, the single mom, someone of a different faith or culture, the addicted, the homeless, and I could go on and on. Everyone, no matter who they are, can find a caring heart and an open hand of assistance in Red Deer. This is why I truly love the people in the city of Red Deer, and I am most humbled and honoured to be their provincial representative and also to be only the second female Minister of Education in 114 years of Alberta's history.

As MLA for Red Deer-North and Minister of Education I am committed to ensuring that every human being is valued and cared for. I was recently asked what my definition of inclusion is. My definition of true inclusion is when we as a human society can remove all labels and barriers, when we can look across the room at each other and no longer see the colour of skin, the gender, the sexual orientation, the religion, the disability, the nationality, immigrant or refugee, born or unborn, the very young to the very old, and so on. Rather, let us see that we are all brothers and sisters united in humanity and then treat each other with genuine love, care, and compassion.

In closing, I would like to quote one of my favourite Disney movie song lyrics from The Hunchback of Notre Dame:

God help the outcasts
Hungry from birth
Show them the mercy
They don't find on earth
God help my people
We look to You, still
God help the outcasts
Or nobody will . . .
I ask for nothing
I can get by
But I know so many Less lucky than I
Please help my people
The poor and downtrod
I thought we all were
The children of God
God help the outcasts
[The] children of God

I truly believe that we are all outcasts in one way or another, and I look forward to serving the people of north Red Deer with honesty and integrity and especially with great care and compassion for all. Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, before we head to 29(2)(a), I'd just like to acknowledge the presence of Mr. Darren LaGrange in the gallery this evening. I believe that he is the husband of the hon. minister. If you'll welcome him to the Legislative Assembly.

Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available for questions and comments if anyone would like to bring some. I see the Member for Cardston-Siksika rising.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I want to thank the Minister of Education for her moving remarks. Clearly, family has played a massive role in your life, and I listened with great interest as you discussed your brother. I was hoping that maybe you could elaborate on your experience with family and how you intend on helping families in your ministry and as an MLA moving forward and how your experience will influence you in your role.

Member LaGrange: Well, thank you for the question. I've always been very blessed to have wonderful family support, and I really feel in my new role as Minister of Education that I can extend that love and care to all children. I look at the 700,000-plus children that are in education from K to 12, and I just look at them as if they were my children. What can we do to support those families? There are so many disadvantaged young people out there that need our support, our love, our care, and our attention. Anything that we can do as a society and as an education system to give them the leg up that, as I said, my own father didn't have – my mother went to a grade 6 education. I was the first female in the family to have even gone into postsecondary, so I just want to see that for all children and to really remove those barriers of labels. If we can remove those labels and really help each child to develop to their full potential, then we will be doing a great service to our community and to our families.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Are there other members with questions or comments with respect to 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, are there other members wishing to speak to the throne speech? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my pleasure to rise this evening for my maiden speech. Before I begin, I'd like to acknowledge that we are here on Treaty 6 territory. This land acknowledgement is something that means a lot to me. My riding of Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood is home to a diverse First Nations and Métis population, in fact, the largest urban indigenous community in this province.

I want to thank my family, my friends, and my supporters for everything they did to help get me here.

I want to thank Brian Mason. Brian has had an absolutely incredible political career spanning 30 years. I always tell people that he's a legend, and, trust me, after years of knocking on doors in Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood, I've lost count of how many people share their love of Brian. It never failed that when I was out knocking on doors, someone would say: "I love Brian. He was a bus driver, you know." He's left a lasting legacy and a very high bar to meet.

With Brian, I must also point out Pam Barrett and Ray Martin, two incredible representatives in the Highlands and Norwood neighbourhoods, who were principled, passionate leaders for our communities.

I'd also like to thank our leader, the Member for Edmonton-Strathcona. She's been a true fighter, and I'm so proud to be a part of her team, surrounded by incredible colleagues.

Most importantly, I want to thank the voters of Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood for electing me to serve them here in the Legislature. It's a great honour that they put their trust in me to represent them. I ran for office because I wanted to better serve my community, and I wanted to make life better for my neighbours and their families. Strong communities are exactly what makes Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood a great place to live. Our riding is home to so many amazing schools, strong neighbourhood community leagues, local businesses, service organizations, and cultural groups.

It's an area made up of vibrant neighbourhoods that I'm so privileged to represent. There's Highlands and Bellevue, both neighbourhoods that are committed to preserving their history and building a sense of belonging through community events. There's the central neighbourhoods of Boyle Street and McCauley, with some of the most committed local citizens and home to many service and community organizations. There's Newton and Montrose, a mix of long-time homeowners and new families, and a few neat hidden gems in the form of businesses tucked away. There's Alberta Avenue, formerly known as the Norwood neighbourhood, with its main area of 118 Avenue, where you'll find local businesses with a vibrant cultural food and art scene. It's a community that's been really focused on revitalization thanks to the efforts of community members, and they're seeing the rewards of their hard work.

There's Eastwood, Delton, and Elmwood Park, just south of the Yellowhead, communities with a growing sense of neighbourliness as they see new residents moving in. In the south of the riding you'll find Riverdale, a beautiful river valley neighbourhood located just east of downtown with a deep commitment to the environment, progressive values, and one of the strongest networks of local community and co-operation that you'll find in Edmonton. Not to be outdone for beautiful views, there's Virginia Park in Cromdale, the Viewpoint neighbourhood, just north along our river valley, historical neighbourhoods with strong community connections. There's my home community of Parkdale, where my friends and neighbours are committed to democracy and community involvement. When election time came around, they were the only neighbourhood that stepped up to host a community forum and to encourage civic participation.

Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood is a diverse riding, one of the most diverse in our province. I'm proud to say that we're a welcoming constituency made up of many cultures and communities living together as friends and neighbours. It's comprised of young families and of many seniors as well. We're home to a vibrant indigenous population. We've got incredible organizations doing such important work here: Bent Arrow, Ambrose Place, the Métis seniors' lodge, Renaissance place, the Native Friendship Centre, Ben Calf Robe Society, and many more. I've met many community members who are committed to addressing systemic issues within the community, and I've joined marches and rallies with hundreds of others in support of addressing the issue of missing and murdered indigenous community members. I know that we've got a lot of work to do to address this issue, particularly with the 231 calls for justice that were just released, and to continue in our journey of reconciliation. It's going to take commitment, and it's going to take real action.

Over a quarter of the folks in our riding are new Canadians who were born outside of Canada, and I'm so proud to have met a lot of friends from Somalia, Eritrea, Portugal, Brazil, Vietnam, and the list goes on. I think of the many folks I've met in our neighbourhoods from various cultural communities, including the Muslim community, and I wish them Eid Mubarak as we mark the end of Ramadan. I've shared with community members that I'm committed to continuing to fight racism and Islamophobia because we cannot allow hatred and intolerance to grow in this province. The province that I know and I love is kind, is open, is accepting, and we must ensure it remains that way.

Many in the LGBTQ community live in Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood, and I'm a proud community member. Twice during the campaign I received messages from folks that I'd met at the doors, who reached out to me after I knocked on their door to say how proud they are to support someone who's a member of the community. One young woman shared that she never thought she'd see someone like her in politics. That means a lot to me, and it shows that representation truly does matter. But this is a community which, sadly, this government continues to disrespect and ignore in its actions.

While my riding is a fantastic place to live and to work, Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood is also an area with its share of challenges. As I said, working to address these challenges is why I ran for office, challenges like tackling poverty. We are a riding with some of the highest child poverty rates in the country. I was so proud to see child poverty rates reduced by half under our government, but this government's throne speech does nothing to continue that important work of reducing child poverty.

During the campaign I met many families who shared with me just how life changing the $25-a-day child care program has been for them and for their children. One woman shared with me that she's been able to go back to work, which has made a world of difference. Her story of how beneficial affordable child care has been to her family is a story of countless other families. We know that when families have access to affordable, quality child care, the statistics show that women are able to re-enter the workforce and that family incomes are boosted, and we also know that child poverty rates are reduced. Offering affordable child care to families is, of course, just one way to decrease child poverty, but it's a crucial one.

Many of my constituents rely on public transit, affordable housing, disability supports, and many other services and programs to make ends meet. I heard first-hand from constituents about their struggles as I knocked on doors in the riding. I met one young mother who shared with me how important our government's minimum wage increase was to her. I knew that the evidence showed that a $15 minimum wage is good for the economy, has a positive impact on women, single parents, people who are working more than two full-time jobs but struggling to put food on the table and pay their rent. This woman shared with me her story, and that really made it hit home. She makes minimum wage. She's raising a daughter. She shared that that minimum wage hike meant that she could afford a bus pass on a regular basis and that most of her prescription medications would be covered so that she wouldn't have to do without. She's of course just one person, but her story, again, is that of many. I'm committed to fighting for her and for all those who deserve a right to a fair wage that affords them the dignity they deserve. But I worry about my constituents like her because I see nothing in the throne speech that will improve her life or that of her neighbours.

We also see challenges like improving public health care and education. As a former teacher the education of our young people is obviously something that's really important to me. Growing up in the town of Barrhead, Alberta, I was lucky to have great teachers who inspired me to be a teacher myself. It's so critical that we invest in education and ensure that the funding goes to where it's needed most: mental health supports, proper resources for teachers and educational assistants. I know what it was like as a teacher to feel like there were never enough resources to meet my students' needs. We must prioritize our province's young people so that they get the best start in life, and we need to protect our students to ensure that no child feels unsafe in our schools.

My constituents enjoy fantastic local schools and health care services, yet again I see nothing in this throne speech to improve on those. All I see is the same Conservative rhetoric about efficiencies, cuts, red tape, and privatization, which history has shown will do nothing to support the public education and health care that my constituents need. With this reckless approach this government is not just putting our health care and education at risk but our environment as well. So many of my constituents, young and old, shared with me just how important protecting our environment is. They recognize that we have a climate crisis, and they know that it's on us to take action. If not us, who?

This government's throne speech and legislative agenda does very little or nothing to meet the needs of the many people and communities that make up Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood. It does nothing to create good, clean jobs or help those who are struggling now. It does nothing to help them prepare for the future that lies ahead. It does nothing to preserve our Earth for future generations. My constituents deserve better than this. All Albertans deserve better than this.

My constituents elected me to represent Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood in this Assembly. They elected me to work to make life better for them, and I'm committed to doing just that, which is why I will continue to fight for this government to do better. That's why I can't in good conscience support this government's throne speech.

While I spoke about the challenges that I'm ready to take on in my riding, there's so much to be proud about. Each day, even when it's tough, I'll remind myself how lucky I am to be here in this building representing the incredible people of Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Thank you, colleagues, and thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: I see the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West rising with a question or comment under Standing Order 29(2)(a).

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's wonderful to hear from the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood. It was one of my first campaigns, too, in 2000, 19 years ago, when I worked on the by-election for Brian Mason. At that time I was also his STEP student. So that gives us an idea of how long I've been doing this. I say this not to share how old I am but to discuss the deep roots that the New Democrats, the social democratic movement, in particular the labour movement, has in the Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood area.

People in that area have for a long time struggled for a better life for people, Mr. Speaker, and that is one of the reasons why, having been around that struggle for some time, I myself am so proud to see that tradition of representation continued through this member's service to her constituents in Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood. I wonder if the member might want to talk a little bit about some of the folks that we know who have been around for a long time, for years and years, contributing to that community and to the progressive vibrancy that we see in that particular area of Edmonton and how some of those constituents inform her work and inspire her work.

Thank you.

Member Irwin: Great question. Thank you for that. Honestly, you're putting me on the spot here. I'm afraid to name folks independently because I know I'll miss some. The member is right. I mean, as I said, I'm just so honoured and humbled to be able to represent an area where folks are fighters. Right? People have been around the party for a very long time and have been just around the movement, even if they're not affiliated with the NDP. There are so many people who are just fighting for a better life every day and so many people – this is where I hate to name names – who do it without credit. That's something I notice day in, day out – right? – without recognition.

I was just at my community league AGM, Parkdale-Cromdale. We recognized somebody who'd been volunteering, doing incredible work for 30 years. She was mad at us because she didn't want an award. Her name is Josefine.

Ms Hoffman: Now it's in Hansard.

Member Irwin: Yeah. That's right, Josefine, if you're watching.

For every Josefine there are so many others throughout Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood. Like I said, it's just an absolute honour. I also feel – I mentioned Brian Mason – a burden, for sure, you know, having to try to carry on that legacy, but having the support of such incredible colleagues really helps me to know that I can hopefully do the community a service.

Thank you for the question.

The Speaker: Are there others who have questions or comments for the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood?

Seeing none, the hon. Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

Ms Armstrong-Homeniuk: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Hon. colleagues, it's truly an honour to stand here today at the Legislative Assembly of Alberta as a representative of Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville. I want to express my sincerest gratitude to my constituents for placing their trust in me as their government begins enacting a plan to reignite our economy and get Albertans back to work.

I would like to take a moment to express gratitude for those that represented the constituents of Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville before me: former Premier Ed Stelmach, a man whose leadership earned him respect and whose kindness and warmth were ever-endearing qualities; former MLA Fenske, who worked hard to represent the riding; and former MLA Littlewood, who passed the baton on to me as our UCP government embarks on a new era of Conservative leadership in this province, an era which will also be etched into the proud history of our Legislature. Indeed, the corridors of this building, steeped in the history of our province, are an inspiring reminder of the leadership that shaped Alberta. It's deeply humbling, standing in the presence of such history, and it's an inspiring reminder of what a great honour and responsibility it is to be elected to this body.

The history that lives within these walls is inextricably bound to the lives and stories of all Albertans. The paths that brought people to this province and the stories accompanying them are all diverse, but the unifying thread that connects us all, whether we're new to the province or our roots stretch back to Alberta's earliest days, is the sense of community, hard work, and opportunity that forged and continues to shape our collective identity. Diversity truly is our strength, especially when we strive towards common goals, galvanized by a shared sense of values.

My own family traces our roots to the early Ukrainian settlers. In 1911 at the age of 17 my grandfather, Mike Huley, left Bukovina, a country predominantly populated by ethnic Ukrainians despite being ruled by Austria's autocratic Hapsburg monarchy. Like so many others, my grandfather sought freedom and opportunity in Canada, emigrating on the word of abundant land and hope for a better future. His timing was fortunate. Just a few years earlier Europe plunged into the dark misery of war. Invading Russian armies were driven out of Bukovina in 1917 as Russia itself was gripped by a revolution, but this turned out to be a temporary reprieve from Russian ambition. By the 1940s my grandfather's homeland was swept into the tyranny and bloodshed of the Stalinist rule. The options for his countrymen were profound and limited: join the Soviet army or languish in a Siberian gulag. Either way the outcome for many was death.

My grandfather settled in Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan, and took a job with the railway. The arc of the story here in Alberta began with an invitation to a wedding in Chipman in 1915. He came, he saw, and he never left. Imagine that, Mr. Speaker, following a wedding invitation west to Alberta and deciding to never leave. Even then he saw that the Alberta advantage was a potent one. In 1929 my grandfather met my grandmother Anna, a descendant of Ivan Pylypiw, one of the first Ukrainian settlers in Canada. Ivan Pylypiw's early passage across the prairies formed the vanguard of Ukrainian settlement in Alberta. My grandparents had nine children, one of whom was my mother, who taught me that there is good in everyone and that everyone has something to contribute.

My paternal grandfather, Walter St. George Armstrong, was born in Milk River, and he settled in Westlock, where he was a postmaster and a justice. He and my grandmother Clara had four children, one of whom was my father, Jack. My dad left school in grade 8 and took a job to pay his sister's way through nursing school. When he came of age, he was inspired to join the RCMP but found out he was an inch too short. Fortunately, the height of a man's character is not measured in inches. He was always working hard and made sure we were brought up right. My father's mantra was the importance of self-reliance. Like the great American intellectual Ralph Waldo Emerson, my father believed that self-sufficiency gives one the freedom to discover one's true self and attain true independence. It was the example he set for me growing up and reinforced as parting advice when I left home to forge my own path.

I've lived in Vegreville since the 1970s. It's where I raised my family, built my business, which I've owned for over 30 years. Self-reliance got me there, but growth and continued success was possible because of the support of my siblings, family, friends, and community.

I'm grateful to my wonderful husband, Joe, my two amazing children, Joseph and Jacklyn. Their support through my journey here, throughout the campaign and now as a member of this House, has been an honour.

When I entered the political fray, the part I loved most was visiting small communities in my riding because time and time again I saw the examples of the familiar spirit of Albertans supporting one another, each fiercely proud of the communities they believed in. Over the past few years their optimism has been tested by the stress of one of the deepest recessions ever faced by this province. Communities like the village of Andrew, the town of Bruderheim have uncertain futures. As economic woes deepen, people are moving away, and as the resources deplete, many towns and villages are one infrastructure disaster away from insolvency. It's not just these communities at risk, Mr. Speaker; it's a way of rural life that is the core of our identities as Albertans, an identity we must fight to protect.

Central to rural life is a strong agricultural sector. With the rising cost of everything thanks to the carbon taxes designed in the halls of academia without common-sense input from folks on the family farm, our farmers are having an even harder time making ends meet. Add this to the challenges of looming trade wars and geopolitical disputes beyond the scope of provincial politics, and the situation is serious. I'm honoured, Mr. Speaker, to be the voice for these people, channelling their concerns into the Legislative Assembly, ensuring that they're heard and understood.

For years now it has been a common refrain, not just in my riding but across the province, that with the collapse of oil and gas, job losses have been legion. The future of building a pipeline coupled with unhelpful federal policy has only exacerbated the challenges we face. People are desperate, and they desperately need government focused on fighting for their interests. I committed long ago to never stop fighting for our oil and gas and agricultural industries and these people whose livelihoods depend on it, a commitment I reaffirm today as the MLA for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

My riding is also home to Alberta's Industrial Heartland, one of the most attractive locations for chemical, petrochemical, oil and gas investment and one of Canada's largest hydrocarbon processing regions. The companies invested in our Industrial Heartland operate on a global scale, providing fuels, fertilizers, power, petrochemicals, and more to consumers world-wide. The importance of the Industrial Heartland and its contribution to Canada's economic engine can't be overstated, and it is my great privilege to represent this industry and constituents whose wealth and prosperity rely on it.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would like to leave my colleagues, on both sides of the aisle, with a few thoughts on the importance of our democratic traditions, which we are now tasked with upholding. Any given news source on any given day reminds us that democracy everywhere is at risk. The traditions and norms and the checks and balances designed to protect them are facing unprecedented challenges.

Much of the problem traces to the tone of our political discourse. Too often people view their political opponents as enemies and their perspectives as illegitimate. This approach cannot sustain healthy democracy for it undermines what Harvard historian James Kloppenber identifies as three foundational pillars that make such democracy possible.

First, deliberation. Achieving a conclusion, even a provisional one, is the result of stating positions, arguing the nuance of agreed-upon facts, and reaching compromise as opposed to proclamations from on high. It must emerge through interaction by people with different points of view.

The second is pluralism. Unless we see diversity as strength instead of weakness, we are unlikely to value freedom or equality because a lack of pluralism drives us to exclude ones from the body politic who are not like us.

Finally, the ethic of reciprocity. This is the ability to see things from the point of view of the person who disagrees with you. To try on a way of looking at the world and to do it imaginatively, enter the ways of thinking and being embraced by those who oppose us on political, cultural, or social issues. The ethic of reciprocity allows us to understand our opposition, who we need not always agree with, but in understanding their thoughts and motivations, we can locate common ground. We should be confident to trust them to do the right thing, especially when it comes in the form of difficult compromise. The ethic of reciprocity is the very foundation of democracy, and without democracy it cannot exist.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member. I feel like you may have missed an opportunity to invite members to the world's largest sausage, the world's largest perogy, or the world's largest pysanka, but I'm sure you'll make up for that in the future.

Any members under Standing Order 29(2)(a) that would like to ask a question or comment of the member? The hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Lac La Biche.

Ms Goodridge: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for your fantastic statement. It was wonderful to hear about some of your family's earlier times.

To elaborate on what the Speaker has previously said, could you share with this Assembly some of the other large items that the Speaker might have forgotten that exist within your riding?

Ms Armstrong-Homeniuk: Thank you, hon. member. In my riding I'm very blessed to have the largest kubasa and the largest pysanka. The largest pysanka was actually built in 1974 in recognition of the visit of the Musical Ride to Vegreville. I'm also proud to have the largest mallard duck in my riding. That's in Andrew.

You've put me on the spot here.

Ms Goodridge: Mushrooms in Vilna.

Ms Armstrong-Homeniuk: No. That's not in mine.

An Hon. Member: It's just around the corner.

Ms Armstrong-Homeniuk: It's just around the corner from me.

In every particular town around my area there are many, many great travel areas. There are great places to go. For example, in Mundare, if you go to check out the sausage, they have a great grotto there. There are wonderful places in my riding, all the way from Bruderheim to Mannville.

The Speaker: Any other questions or comments for the hon. member?

Seeing none, the hon. Member for Calgary-Bow and Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaides: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a great privilege for me to stand here today and deliver my maiden speech in this Assembly. I am truly honoured that the residents of Calgary-Bow put their trust in me and in our party. They did so with hope in their hearts. Fundamentally, they chose to reject the politics of fear. Rather, they decided to embrace the politics of hope.

Before I begin, I wanted to take a moment to recognize and thank those who made my journey to this place possible. First and foremost, I want to acknowledge and thank my incredible wife. I am forever grateful that God brought her into my life and filled my heart with love and happiness. Her unwavering love and constant encouragement drove me to keep fighting when times were tough, and I am forever grateful.

I also want to acknowledge my dedicated and hard-working campaign team, who gave their time and efforts in pursuit of a better Alberta. Thank you, all, for believing in me and for believing in a stronger province.

Lastly, I also want to thank the residents of Calgary-Bow who put their trust in me. I wanted to let them know, all residents of Calgary-Bow, whether you voted for me or not, that I will be a strong representative for all of you. Earning your support is truly an honour, and I commit to being a transparent and accountable representative to you all.

As I stand here, I also want to acknowledge two very important and specific individuals who've allowed me to be here. Those two individuals, of course, are my parents. My father, Mr. Speaker, is a carpenter by trade. He was born and raised in a small village on the Mediterranean island of Cyprus. He grew up in a very small and cramped house with very few modern amenities. At a young age he travelled around the region finding whatever work he could. But he wanted more, and filled with courage and optimism, he made his way to a place of opportunity. That place was Canada.

While working here, my father met my mother. She was also born in Cyprus and was raised in a growing but small seaside town. In her household, Mr. Speaker, they didn't have very much, and singing Christmas carols in the bitter cold was how she got her spending money. After losing her mother at a young age, her father decided it was time for a change, and the entire family relocated here to Canada. To deal with this change, my mother was unable to complete her schooling, and she waited tables to bring in a few extra dollars for the family. It was during one of her evening shifts when she met my father.

After marrying, they moved to Calgary to start their new life together. Like many other Greek immigrants, they opened a restaurant and got straight to work. They did so by emptying the college savings fund and remortgaging their home. They put everything on the line and opened a small restaurant in Calgary on Elbow Drive and began their new future. They were guided, Mr. Speaker, by a belief that hard work and perseverance were enough to shatter any barrier to success, and they were right.

Forty-five years later they are still in the restaurant industry, and while a lot has changed, some things have not. They continue to open and close their restaurant, Mr. Speaker, every single day, but now they can reflect back on a lifetime of accomplishment. They built their dream home, they travelled the world, and most important to them they gave their three children educational opportunities that they did not have. My sister found success in the energy sector, my brother became a pilot, and I pursued public service. As you can see, their determination gave my siblings and I new opportunities. It allowed me to open new doors. Their foundational success has allowed me to stand in this Assembly today.

Mr. Speaker, this story is not unique. It's one that we've heard before. That's because it's the story of Alberta. The story of Alberta has always been one of hope and opportunity, where anyone can find success and prosperity, just as Alberta's First Peoples did over 8,000 years ago when the ancestors of today's First Nations communities arrived in the area. As the first inhabitants they found a world rich in natural resources, which provided abundant food, clothing, and shelter. Pioneers and new immigrants persevered through harsh environments to build towns, cities, and the foundations of a vibrant national economy. The Fathers of Confederation established a new nation across this great land, which, in my opinion, is the greatest country on earth.

As I took my seat in this Assembly, my parents and wife watched from the gallery. So, too, did my two beautiful daughters. As I looked up, I was reminded of why I fought to come to this place. I did so, Mr. Speaker, because I wanted to ensure that my two girls and all future generations inherit a better province. I am a passionate Albertan and a proud Calgarian, and this place is worth fighting for.

Mr. Speaker, I've had the fortune of travelling around the world and visiting places like Cambodia, Japan, South Africa, London, Austria, Thailand, and more, and I can say, without reservation, that Alberta is the best place on earth. I consider myself a son of the Alberta advantage, and I was concerned that the province that rewarded hard work and entrepreneurship was being lost. I never planned on running for office. I was preoccupied with advancing my career, being a good dad and a loving husband. But like many Albertans, I began to see my neighbours lose their jobs, and I started to see friends and family struggling to pay their bills, and I started to see businesses closing down. I knew it was time to take action, and that's when I decided to run.

While on the campaign trail my resolve to improve my province strengthened as I heard more stories of Albertans who were suffering, like Denise in Coach Hill, who choked back tears because she was unsure if she was going to be able to make next month's mortgage payment; like Andy in Bowness, whose business was being crushed by the weight of the NDP's carbon tax; and like Theresa in Wildwood, who sold her car and her furniture just to keep a roof over her head. These stories are always on my mind, and as I was sworn in, I felt the weight of responsibility settle on my shoulders. Denise, Andy, Theresa, and hundreds of thousands of other Albertans are counting on us, Mr. Speaker, and we can't let them down.

What inspired me, though, is that none of the people I spoke to looked for a handout. They are proud Albertans, after all. All they want, Mr. Speaker, is the opportunity to work. That is why on April 16 we witnessed a historic election, where a record number of people voted. They sought a solution that would once again open the doors of opportunity. On April 16 they put their trust in our United Conservative Party, and I am incredibly humbled by the trust that has been given to my colleagues and I. They also chose a bold and ambitious man to open the doors of opportunity again, and that man is Jason Kenney. I am proud to stand with him in creating a better province.

A better province is one without a carbon tax. A single mom should not be punished for driving her kids to school, pensioners should not be forced to buy less groceries, and hard-working Alberta families should not pay more to heat their homes in the dead of winter.

8:30

A better province is one where a strong economy helps get Albertans back to work. Unemployment is not just a statistical figure; it's about human beings, their families, and their futures. That is why our government will be obsessed with job creation. We will fight to give Albertans the dignity of meaningful work, and with that bring hope, prosperity, and happiness to the hundreds of thousands of unemployed Albertans.

A better province, Mr. Speaker, is one where a better health care system is possible. Too many Albertans are suffering in pain as their condition deteriorates while they wait for treatment, and that is simply unacceptable.

Colleagues, as we begin our work to create a better province, we must do so with humility. We must reject the politics of fear and embrace the politics of hope. As United Conservatives we don't care who you love or what god you worship; we care about how hard you will work and how you will help contribute to a stronger Alberta. Together we can renew Alberta as a place of hope and opportunity. We will build a better Alberta for the next generation, and together we will reignite the spirit of Alberta, a spirit that drew my parents here and gave them success and opportunity, where young, new Canadians with limited opportunities can open a restaurant and 47 years later their son can be elected to the Alberta Legislature.

Mr. Speaker, Albertans deserve the opportunity to create a better future for themselves, and I will dedicate my efforts in this Assembly to ensure all Albertans have the same opportunities that my parents had. Thank you very much.

The Speaker: I'd just like to thank the hon. member for his comments. I would just like to remind him that no matter what the circumstances are, it would be wildly inappropriate to use the name of a Member of the Legislative Assembly. There are a number of ways that you could refer to the Premier or the Member for Calgary-Lougheed. I think you catch my drift.

I might just add, though, that I've had the pleasure of meeting your parents, and they do have a very firm grasp on enjoyable Greek food. So I hope that they will be happy to share with everyone.

I see the Member for Edmonton-Glenora is very, very keen to ask a question or make a comment.

Ms Hoffman: Yeah. And I'll keep my question very short. I believe at the beginning of the statement there was a reference to indigenous people arriving here, and I was just wondering if the hon. member could elaborate on what exactly he's saying about the history of First Nations in this territory.

The Speaker: Would the hon. member like to comment?

Mr. Nicolaides: Sure. My comment is recognizing that Alberta has always been a place of hope and opportunity and that recognizing all different peoples who have made Alberta home and have chosen Alberta as their place of residence and all those who have come before, including the first inhabitants and the first peoples of this land – that they were successful in finding hope and prosperity in a variety of different ways. My comment is just recognizing that going back 8,000 years and recognizing the long history of this province, all people have enjoyed opportunities for prosperity and success in one way or another.

The Speaker: Thank you to the hon. member.

I believe the Member for Calgary-Currie has a question. No. My apologies.

The minister for status of women and multiculturalism.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Through you, I just wanted to mention to the member how much the words that he spoke about the people that he met, about what was happening with our economy, the impacts on them – as having been elected to the Official Opposition in the past and having had the privilege of having an office and meeting with people consistently, the things that we heard in our offices were heartbreaking. Many, many people walking into our offices telling of hardship and the difficulties of how it was that they were going to be able to continue to take care of their families, to choose sometimes between feeding their families and heat, to choose between whether to keep the family farm or to sell it off in order to be able to downsize because they're not able to keep things going because of policy decisions.

I was wondering if the member could elaborate on some of the discussions that he had with respect to the incredible Albertans he met out on the doorsteps and maybe just elaborate a little bit more on some of those stories because I think it impacts all of us very deeply here.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Bow and Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaides: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. There were, you know, apart from the three individuals that I made specific reference to, countless stories of individuals who were struggling to pay their bills and struggling to make ends meet. As I mentioned, it gave me continued resolve because there's the strong realization that what we do here has significant impacts on people's lives. As I mentioned, the thing that really stood out the most for me was the fact that nobody was really asking for a handout. Nobody was looking for something to be provided to them. The only thing that they were looking for was an opportunity to put their skill set to work.

I didn't mention them in my statement, but my immediate neighbour has been out of work for about four years and is unsure what the future will hold for him. He put his house on the market as a last-ditch effort and, after 90 days, didn't get a single offer, had to take it off the market. He's really unsure of what the future is going to hold for him. My other neighbours had to move back to Nova Scotia and leave the province entirely. It's truly been a challenging time.

I, again, recognize and keep those thoughts and keep those stories at the forefront as much as possible. We have an opportunity to improve the situation for hundreds of thousands of Albertans, and we have to always remember that, and we have to always be guided that recollection, that the decisions that we make here can have a very meaningful impact on the future of people's lives.

The Speaker: Well, thank you to the hon. member.

I see the Member for Edmonton-Meadows is rising.

Mr. Deol: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my deepest honour and privilege to rise and deliver my maiden speech in the 30th Legislative Assembly of Alberta. Before I start, I would like to congratulate all the elected members of this House, who were chosen to represent the people of their respective constituencies. I would also like to acknowledge that we are all here today on the traditional territory of Treaty 6, and I want to recognize the Métis people, who also share a deep connection with this land. Let me also offer my warmest wishes to all my Muslim brothers and sisters, who have been fasting for the holy one month of Ramadan and are celebrating Eid al-Fitr, and to the Filipino community, who are celebrating this June as Filipino Heritage Month. This month allows us to celebrate with and learn more about the Filipino community in Canada and recognize the valuable role they play in creating an open and diverse society.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to start sharing a little bit about my family and my journey to this House. I was born in a village named Haripur in the beautiful state of Punjab in India. I inherited an interest in political activism from my family. Our grandfather, a great pioneer, became one of the first priests at a Sikh temple in Stockholm, U.S.A. in 1908. I grew up watching my uncle who was vigorously active in politics as a key leader during the panchayat movement in 1959. My mother was elected as a member of the village's panchayat, a village council, and she became one of the first female members of the panchayat in our village in the '70s.

During my college years I was a part of numerous student associations and was actively involved in defending students' rights regarding affordable education and political activism. I also worked closely with youth organizations, which, after years of advocacy and struggle, helped change the voting age from 25 to 18 years in India, an important step forward for the rights of young people. Following this work as a young person I came to Canada in 1993. Postarrival I got the opportunity to join the NDP and got a chance to be a part of the election campaign as a young worker the very same year.

Mr. Speaker, I've had the honour to live with my wife, two sons, and three aging parents and run a small insurance business in this community for 26 years. During these past years I've had the privilege to work with a number of community organizations. I am proud to be a part of organizations to promote multiculturalism, literature, art, ethnic media platforms, volunteerism, leadership in our youth, theatre, sports games, and tournament activities. I was also able to serve on the board of the Edmonton Taxi Drivers Association. My core values are defending the rights of workers, better care for seniors, strong public health care, affordable child care, and affordable and quality education for all.

Prior to getting elected and during the last one and a half months, I have had the honour to meet many people from all walks of life. These people either work or live in Edmonton-Meadows. I am blessed to be able to live and be part of such a great and diverse community. My riding of Edmonton-Meadows was created in 2017, after the recommended renaming from Edmonton-Mill Creek. With a population of over 50,000 and nearly 30,000 electors in it, it is a vibrant and strong community. Edmonton-Meadows is one of the ridings in the south side of Edmonton where a large number of permanent residents and new immigrants are moving in to start their new lives, build their families and loved ones, and call Edmonton-Meadows their home. Edmonton-Meadows is a riding which is truly an example of multiculturalism in Canada as immigrants from different ethnicities around the globe, predominantly from south Asia, the Philippines, Somalia, Latin America, and many more, continue to build a strong sense of community. As the representative for this community I look forward to being a strong voice for them in this Legislature.

Mr. Speaker, parents have raised concerns about the need for a new high school in our community. There is a need for funding our education system so that we can hire new teachers for the increasing number of new students coming to schools this fall. Due to the shortage of funding, courses are already being transferred from our schools, and people are worried and angry.

People have also expressed concerns in regard to their future and, as a whole, Alberta's future. My constituents want to know if there will be enough resources for the children with special needs and affordable daycare for all the hard-working parents under the policies laid down by the new government.

Mr. Speaker, the Grey Nuns hospital was built more than three decades ago in southeast Edmonton. Since then the community has grown substantially. We still have only one hospital in southeast Edmonton to handle the growing pressure in the south side. We need a new hospital in the south side to release the pressure from the Grey Nuns so that patients have better access to health services in south Edmonton.

My riding has a new recreation centre where people from all walks of life come by the thousands to take in its benefits. This facility is already falling short due to the growing population in the area.

Mr. Speaker, my community of Edmonton-Meadows needs sustainable funding for multiculturalism-related activities. It would help the major community organizations establish various multiculturalism activities that help build bridges between communities and be part of the larger Canadian mosaic.

Mr. Speaker, for me, this journey from playing in the dirt roads and streets of my village back in India as a young child to a member of the Alberta Legislature has been a great honour. On this very day I remember my uncle and aunts who were always proud of me for my social and political activism but are not with us today. I'm also grateful for our elders, seniors who are still with us today and those who have gone before us, that have laid out a great platform for us with their contributions to our society and gave us an identity, who we are and what we can do to make this place better for all. I remember my role model, my mentor, my cousin, who passed away at the age of 64 last year, who helped establish student organizations in colleges and universities, youth organizations, and teachers' unions and who defended workers' rights and inspired political involvement in me and many more.

I thank my parents, my wife, my sons, my brothers, my sisters-in-law, my nieces, nephews, cousins, who encouraged me to step up for the common cause and to choose public service. I want to thank my core team, my friends with whom I had a chance to work together. From them I have learned a lot in those 26 years in Edmonton, which has helped shaped me into the kind of man that I am today. I am thankful to my volunteers, my donors, and my community, who helped me build a strong team in this election. All the hard work put in by my team during my campaign kept me motivated. I want to thank Dr. Raj Pannu for his political mentorship and our leader, the hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona, for her inspiring leadership, inspiring me and many more to stand up to protect our health care, strengthen our education system, and focus on making sure that those without a voice, those people that are left behind have real representation.

Finally, again I want to thank my constituents for putting their trust in me and giving me the new role and the great privilege to represent their voices in the Legislature. I am here to represent each and every constituent of Edmonton-Meadows, irrespective of their race, gender, religion, sexual orientation, or beliefs. It is an honour to represent the voice of the constituents of Edmonton-Meadows, and I look forward to being a strong voice in this Legislature to make life better for all Albertans. Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you.

Under 29(2)(a), are there any questions or comments? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member for his lovely remarks. I was hoping he could maybe elaborate a little bit on the mentor that he mentioned, who passed away last year, as well as Dr. Pannu, who, I think, was the first person to ever say to me: get involved in politics. I know he inspired many of us in our party to engage more democratically. I thought that maybe he could talk about those two influences on his journey. Of course, if he wants to talk about his mom some more, I have no issue with that either.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadows.

Mr. Deol: Yeah. My cousin back home: first off, I hate to say that my cousin lost his mom when he was just two years old. He was raised and grew without having a mom. During his college life, you know, he emerged as a young role model to the students and the youth of his time. He was elected as the provincial leader to the student organizations back there. His organization actually subscribed him a duty in the district, where he showed an example by winning 12 college elections out of 13 colleges in that region.

From there, like, from student activism, he aspired to transition, as he completed his degrees in science and M.Ed, to being a teacher. It was not actually very easy to find a job in those days in India, and he kind of, you know, developed the idea to organize all those people, educated people. The organization was called the unemployed teachers' association. He put together that association, launched a struggle, and in years of struggle that association was able to help find, I think, 21,000 people a job. From those kinds of activities he emerged, as a very young person, as a role model to youth back home.

My mom's road to getting elected as a panchayat back in the '70s: I would say that she was young at that time, especially for our feudal society and feudal culture. We were still emerging and growing. For women to come, to step up for public service still was a stigma. I think a lot, you know, of the kind of privilege and – how would I say? – the views of not only my father and my family, who encouraged her to step up to that job. I'm so honoured and humbled to see that my mother was able to get that job.

This is the kind of the environment I got to grow up in and that helped me actually become an engaged citizen as I was growing up and be more involved politically and think, you know, further than my individual problems and look, as a broad vision, like, at the society as a whole. You can't do much if your society doesn't move forward as individuals. This was the kind of thinking I was able to develop due to all the circumstances I got back home.

Dr. Raj Pannu: I think everybody loved him. So you're talking not only this; you know, this is on the record. The former Premier of our province Ralph Klein once said to me, mentioned: "I may not have always agreed with what Dr. Raj Pannu says, but every time he stands up to say something, I just listen. I want to listen. It's amazing to listen to him." After retiring from active politics, it was our privilege – we had discussion forums in our community, and a number of organizations involved in that – to get the advantage of Dr. Raj Pannu. On a monthly basis we would have discussions.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you.

Are there any other members wishing to speak? I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Acadia and the Minister of Health stand.

Mr. Shandro: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Congratulations to you on your election. While I have this opportunity, congratulations as well to the Member for Airdrie-East on her election and to the Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills for his election as Speaker.

I'm very pleased to be able to rise today as the Member for Calgary-Acadia in this maiden speech. First, let me take a moment, Mr. Speaker, to thank the previous Member for Calgary-Acadia for her service in the previous four years, Ms Brandy Payne. I should note as well that Calgary-Acadia is a name which has existed only since 2012, but the constituency itself has a history dating back to 1971 under a different name, Calgary-Egmont. Unfortunately, the close similarity to the Calgary community of Edgemont was too confusing, and the constituency was renamed, which means that the history of being named after Egmont house or Fred Perceval, the 11th Earl of Egmont, is lost.

Calgary-Egmont and Calgary-Acadia have been represented since 1971, starting with Merv Leitch, a former Attorney General and minister of energy, who many credit as being the architect of section 33 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the notwithstanding clause. It was also represented by a former occupant of your chair, Speaker David Carter, as well as the former Minister of Advanced Education Denis Herard and Jonathan Denis, another former Attorney General. I'm proud, Mr. Speaker, to be included in the same company as these former members.

Mr. Speaker, I first became involved in politics in 1992. I was 16, and I bought a membership in a political party because, although I was only 16, I could vote. I could vote in the leadership of a party and, as a result, was one of 46,000 Albertans to put an X beside the name of Ralph Klein. Now I get to sit in this Assembly and sit at a desk which in its drawer has the signature of Premier Klein. It is very humbling.

I note as well that I'm not the first member of this Assembly with my last name. There was another, the first Ukrainian-Canadian to serve as an MLA in Alberta, Geedo's oldest brother.

Alberta is fortunate to have some 350,000 Albertans who officially count ourselves as people of Ukrainian descent. We were given the toughest land. When Sir Clifford Sifton opened the prairies to homesteaders at the turn of the last century, he chose to focus on what he called the men in sheepskin cloaks, including my great-grandfather, who came from the steppes of what was then known as Bukovina. The first wave came by the tens of thousands to the tough parkland area north of Battle River, where they had to clear trees and plow tough soil over those first years. My baba told me stories of surviving those first winters and that it was only possible through immense perseverance. That's the frontier spirit, which we need to renew as a province if we are once again to see a renewal of the Alberta advantage.

Geedo, Mr. Speaker, lived a tough life. When his mother passed and his father remarried, Geedo was invited to leave the home. That is to say, he was kicked out of the home at eight years of age. He was homeless and never again able to continue with his education, but he toiled for the rest of his life, as did my baba, to provide for my dad and my two uncles. Geedo ran a grain elevator and drove a school bus while my baba ran a school cafeteria.

Their hard work meant that although my dad grew up with little, he was given opportunity. He ended up being the first of his family to go to university, where he went on to become an otolaryngologist, described by some who knew him when he practised as a legend. When they got married at a young age, my mom worked to support my dad during med school. She was a flight attendant for Wardair. It was only through the grace and the hard work of my mom and dad, Mr. Speaker, that I'm able to stand here today.

My mother's family homesteaded in the Carstairs area, originally from Pennsylvania. I've been to the Pennsylvania monument in Gettysburg, and I've seen my grandfather's family listed with those who fought for Lincoln's Union during the Battle of Gettysburg. My grandfather's family from Indiana county in Pennsylvania were a last stop in the Underground Railroad. Early settlement of Scottish Presbyterians with their own history of persecution laid the grounds for vibrant antislavery sentiment in Pennsylvania, Mr. Speaker, in the decades before the Civil War. It's not possible to overstate the influence of my grandma and my baba and my mom. I was blessed with having such strong, loving, and supportive women in my life.

When I was campaigning, I was asked why I'm a conservative. My answer is that conservatism is the politics of gratitude, a respect and an admiration for the generations that came before us. With every vote I make in this Assembly, I will remember my parents and my grandparents. I'll remember and respect all their hard work, that gave me this unique opportunity.

I was also asked on the campaign trail why I'm running, and that answer, Mr. Speaker, is my children, Phineas and Archer. I met my wife at the age of 15, and when people hear that, they ask what it's like to marry a high school sweetheart, but I have to correct them very quickly. I met her when I was 15, but it took me 16 years to convince her to go on a date with me. I'm blessed to be the husband of the fiercest, strongest, most capable person I know, the most competitive air hockey player I've ever met, my sushi-making, dogsledding, axe-throwing, karaoke-singing, bathroom-renovating wife. To her and to my two boys: I thank them for letting me be able to serve here in this Assembly. Those two boys are the reason I decided to run, to make sure that they have the same opportunities which my wife, Andrea, and I had when we grew up in this province.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I find myself in the position of being a minister of the Crown, and I enter upon those arduous duties assigned to me with the deepest sense of the responsibilities they involve. I've been on the job now for one month, and I'll admit to being overwhelmed when I get to meet all the amazing men and women in our health care system who want to serve their fellow Albertans.

Mr. Speaker, thank you for this opportunity, and through you thank you to the fellow members here. I look forward to an opportunity, a productive four years over the next term in working with all these colleagues.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

9:00

The Acting Speaker: Under Standing Order 29(2)(a), are there any members with questions or comments?

Seeing none, are there any other members wishing to speak? I believe I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Shaw and the Minister of Children's Services standing.

Ms Schulz: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is an honour to rise in the House this evening and stand before you and my colleagues as a new member of this Assembly in this 30th Legislature of Alberta and to have the opportunity to respond to this government's plan as outlined by Her Honour the Lieutenant Governor in the Speech from the Throne.

Mr. Speaker, the last seven weeks since the election on April 16 have been nothing short of extraordinary. Stepping into this building and into this Chamber for the first time was absolutely incredible. Being sworn in alongside my colleagues, officially taking my seat in this Assembly on behalf of the people of Calgary-Shaw, and the next day hearing Her Honour deliver the Speech from the Throne: there was something about that moment where the promises we made during the campaign became more than a platform. It was our commitment being shared through the Queen's representative in our province that we as a government are here to do what we said we would do. Having been given the opportunity to come to work every day in this truly beautiful and storied building, experiencing the grandeur and the ceremony of the opening of a new Legislative Assembly: well, I am grateful for this privilege.

It's also surreal because while I had dreams and a passion for public service, I really didn't expect them to lead me here. Most importantly, Mr. Speaker – and I think you and all other members here today can relate – I am where I am today in part of because of where I've come from. Growing up in small-town Saskatchewan taught me many of the lessons that led me to this place: hard work, humility, honesty, good humour, and service, service to your neighbours and to your community, service to something larger than yourself. These are the values I learned growing up, these are the values that led me to seek elected office, and they are the values that will continue to guide me for as long as I have the honour to sit as a Member of the Legislative Assembly. Like any good prairie kid, I know that springtime is the most important season, when the snow finally melts and seeding and calving are under way, when hope and optimism abound and we can see the promise of renewal unfolding around us.

That was the theme of this throne speech, and in many ways it was the theme of our spring election: renewal. Albertans clearly wanted change. Albertans wanted a government that would stand up and advocate for the things that matter to them, for economic growth, for job creation, for real support for our energy sector, and they wanted a government that would take Alberta back to its rightful place as a leader in Confederation. Albertans made their choice very clear. They chose renewal. They chose a positive vision set out in a platform of thoughtful and fully costed policies, policies that will benefit families, that will maintain and enhance public services, policies that will jump-start our economy.

Mr. Speaker, after four years of punishing tax increases on families and job creators, reckless overspending, and deficit budgets from an NDP government that increased our provincial debt, Albertans chose a new government that will return to fiscal management, get our financial House in order, and ensure that Alberta will be an appealing place, the best place to invest, to start a business, to raise a family, to build a life. That is the Alberta advantage. It's a recognition that the incredible natural resources we are blessed with, coupled with the ingenuity and entrepreneurial spirit of her people, make Alberta a truly special place, a place where everyone has the opportunity to succeed.

It's the reason my husband and I chose to move here. Like so many people from across Canada and around the world, we made a conscious choice to become Calgarians and to become Albertans, to raise our family in a place with amazing opportunity and potential. But here's the unfortunate thing, Mr. Speaker. There is a sad reality that those of us who grew up in Saskatchewan are all too familiar with, and it was a sad reality that Albertans experienced these past four years. Poor government policy has the ability to hamper opportunity and potential, dampen that entrepreneurial spirit, stunt economic growth, job loss, and people leaving this province. Then a vicious cycle sets in where governments, usually NDP governments, increase taxes, run deficits in order to maintain public services. Worst of all, Mr. Speaker, we began to lose hope and that optimism for the future.

But it doesn't have to be that way. My experience working for a pro-growth, pro-free enterprise government in another province showed me just that. Under a conservative government, Saskatchewan went from the place to be from to the place to be. When I saw that a new united, compassionate conservative movement in Alberta was coming together under strong and experienced leadership, I chose to get involved. Then, a little over a year ago, Mr. Speaker, when I saw that this United Conservative Party could present an alternative vision for our province, a vision for renewal, one that would get Alberta back on track, I chose to run to represent the people of Calgary-Shaw.

Every day since then has been a new adventure: not always easy, Mr. Speaker, but always rewarding. I am honoured to represent the people and the families of Calgary-Shaw in this Chamber, no matter how they voted. It is on their behalf that I will carry out my work in the months and years ahead. I want to mention that the boundaries have changed quite a bit since Calgary-Shaw was first created. Since this is my maiden speech in this Assembly, I do want to honour some of the members who came before me, those such as Jim Dinning and Cindy Ady, who advocated tirelessly for their constituents and who certainly know the importance of fiscal responsibility and the difficult decisions needed to get there.

Calgary-Shaw includes Shawnessy, Somerset, Silverado, Chaparral, Walden, Legacy as well as the new developments of Yorkville and Belmont. I want to thank two very special constituents, Tasha Schindel and Karin Henderson, for leading a campaign that allowed me to meet with and hear from people in each of these south Calgary communities. It is a diverse riding with seniors, professionals, many young families, working families, families who rely on the energy industry to make their living, many from all over the world with different backgrounds, cultures, and faiths, and many of whom are Albertans by choice. Every single day I heard it over and over that we need to get the economy growing, we need jobs, we need to provide opportunities for people to provide for their families, and we need a government that will support our oil and gas sector and a government that will unequivocally and relentlessly fight to get pipelines built in this country.

But, Mr. Speaker, the constituents of Calgary-Shaw were not just concerned about the economy. They shared with me their concerns about the need for strong public services and infrastructure, that despite all the rhetoric many did not believe that the former government made things better for students or patients or front-line workers. Again and again I would hear concerns about the ideological approach to education, and I heard genuine concerns at the doors about why health care spending was increasing but that it was making no difference for patients. In fact, spending was going up and so too was the time it took to access important services. Those are challenging questions, and I know that the solutions are not simple. They require innovation, new perspectives, and frankly, in some cases, just some common sense. Hearing these questions and concerns every day drove home for me the gravity, the weight, and the responsibility of this role. It is a great honour to serve my constituents in this Assembly but also a solemn obligation and one that I do not take lightly.

As I said at the beginning, Mr. Speaker, I will draw on the lessons I learned growing up to guide me. I draw both strength and inspiration from my family. I was fortunate to have parents who encouraged my brother, sister, and I to be independent, to ask questions, to pursue knowledge in all of its forms, to do better, to be better, and to help those who need it most, to seek the truth wherever it might lead, and that taking responsibility for my actions matters. My grandparents on all sides believed in community involvement, but my grandma specifically would often remind me of how hard women fought to have a voice at the table and that we owe it to those who came before us to not just use that voice but use that voice for positive change and to make things better for those who will come after we're gone.

Mr. Speaker, in acknowledging those who have helped me get here today, I have to save my greatest thanks for my husband, Cole. I am so fortunate to have a partner in this life who shares a passion for politics, is one of the smartest people I know, and who is so incredibly supportive. Sometimes his support comes in a pretty straightforward manner. When I was wrestling with the decision about whether or not to pursue this path, I'd gone over it and over it and over it. Finally, he said that I either needed to run or just stop talking about it. I am very thankful for his encouragement, and in many ways his service and sacrifice is far greater than my own.

Mr. Speaker, that brings me to my children, William and Lauren. My son has been telling people that since his mom won the collection, she now works at the castle in Edmonton. While they don't yet know the sacrifice they are making for this province, they are absolutely the reason that I am here today. People certainly have asked: how will I do it? How will I be an MLA, a minister in cabinet, and have two young children? But here's the plain truth, Mr. Speaker. I'm a working mom. I've always been a working mom, and like hundreds of thousands of other working parents in Alberta, it requires a lot of effort, a lot of help, and is not always an easy balance. In that I thank my colleagues for their ongoing support and confidence in me.

Ultimately, I didn't decide to seek elected office in spite of having two young children; I did it for my children. I do this work for my children. I hope to instill in them the importance of serving others, that if you see an opportunity and a need and you have something to offer, you ought to contribute. I know that nothing worth while comes without hard work and sacrifice, and I know my colleagues on both sides of this House will agree that there is absolutely no more important work we will do here than we do in an effort to leave things better for our children and all future generations.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I want to briefly thank and recognize a few of the leaders who I've had the privilege to know and to work with and who are true examples of servant leadership; first and foremost, our current Premier. The leader of our party and the person whose unwavering vision for a United Conservative movement is a key reason I chose to run for office. His work ethic is well known and unmatched. His efforts to reach out to diverse communities, grow our party, and unite our province are unrivalled. He is someone who has offered me and all members of our team guidance and encouragement as we embark on this journey as a new government. He has shown true leadership in staying the course, listening to Albertans, offering a positive approach and hope for the future of our province. I know he has Alberta's best interests at heart. I admire his example, and I appreciate his candour, his humour, and his friendship.

I'm thankful for the encouragement of other strong Conservative leaders like Rona Ambrose, an outstanding Albertan and a truly inspiring woman. I think often of the words she spoke just over a year ago about the ways that we as women all too often tell ourselves we aren't experienced enough or educated enough or accomplished enough to seek office. She had much to offer in the political process. At the time I was the mom of a four-month-old, and those words resonated with me. I then knew I had a choice. I could sit back and be a spectator of the process, or I could put in the work to ensure that people like me, young women, young parents from everyday working families, were reflected in this Assembly and had a voice at this table.

Finally, I've made reference to my Saskatchewan roots. During my time in Saskatchewan I was proud to have the opportunity to work for a fiscally responsible government who encouraged investment and created jobs but also listened to people, made critical investments in public services and infrastructure, and supported those most vulnerable in our communities. I was fortunate enough to work for another Premier who went to bat every single day on the national and international stage to promote and advocate for his province, a regular person who chose to take the front steps up the front of the Legislature to remind him of the responsibility entrusted to those of us who serve.

But beyond the economic or political lessons I learned working for former Premier Brad Wall, the most important was what integrity looks like, that while politics can be a rough sport sometimes, if you stay close to the people you serve and remember where you came from, you can be successful in this work and you can do a lot of good in the process.

Mr. Speaker, to close, in tribute to my own rural roots, in deep gratitude to my family, in service to my constituents with the steadfast leadership and commitment of our Premier alongside an incredible team of MLAs, very cognizant of the challenges that lie ahead but also hopeful in the spirit of renewal that comes with springtime in Alberta, I offer these words from scripture from Galatians, chapter 6, verse 9: "Let us not become weary in doing good. For at the proper time we will reap a harvest if we do not give up." I look forward to the work ahead.

The Acting Speaker: Under 29(2)(a), I believe I see the hon. Member for Brooks-Medicine Hat.

Ms Glasgo: Yes. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you to the hon. Member for Calgary-Shaw, of course, through you, Mr. Speaker, for that moving speech. You know, I really was touched by the way that she was speaking about the strength of Conservative women and exactly what motivated her to run. For me, I know that part of the process that made me so happy to be involved was that our Premier was taking a merit-based approach to appointing women to cabinet positions, to higher up positions. That has been a goal of his to have more women involved in our movement on the basis of our own merit, not some lockstep identity category that the left claims to own. I was just wondering if the minister could give her thoughts on that and how she feels being a part of such a strong government.

The Acting Speaker: The Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. You know, when I decided to put my name forward, it was really important to me that in all things I would be genuine and true to myself and honest with people who asked about the process of seeking elected office because I so much valued people who shared that very, maybe, candid feedback with me.

You know, I see also in this House the Minister of Culture, Multiculturalism and Status of Women. That very same weekend hearing Rona Ambrose speak about how we are sometimes our own worst critics and tend to second-guess, she was one of the first people who said: if you're thinking about running, you need to do this; we could use you at the table. But also nobody cleared the path, and I certainly wouldn't ask for that.

Our nominations were extremely, in many cases, hard-fought battles, and I think that when it comes to integrity, that's the key piece. You know, be yourself, show how you can work hard regardless of if you're female or male. I ran against three gentlemen in my nomination, one of whom was in the House yesterday and still incredibly supportive. I also want to note that members, certainly, across the province, again, female, male, are all incredibly supportive of the strong women that we have in our caucus, and I am incredibly proud to be part of this group.

The Acting Speaker: With a couple of minutes left, any other members under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, I believe I see the hon. Member for West Yellowhead standing.

Mr. Long: Mr. Speaker, I am thrilled to have the opportunity today to stand before you to respond to the Speech from the Throne with my maiden speech.

For a fellow like myself who cares deeply about people, this past couple of years have proven difficult, travelling across my constituency, hearing stories of struggle, uncertainty, and hardship. With the Speech from the Throne, however, I'm excited, as are many Albertans, to hear of a path to recovery, certainty, and prosperity. Indeed, hope is on the horizon.

Mr. Speaker, I was born and raised in Nova Scotia to a mom who was a schoolteacher and a dad who was a handyman. My parents themselves were actually both born and raised on farms, so they instilled in my siblings and myself many things that I attribute to their upbringing. I would not be here today without the values that I learned from my parents, with two of the main values being to remain humble and work hard, very hard. Oddly enough, all these years later the message to stay humble, work hard, and earn every vote, that we heard repeatedly during the election campaign, incorporated two of those values. My parents also instilled in me the value of loving and respecting others, without which I also believe I would not be here today.

I will always remember a life lesson that I learned from my dad when I was seven years old. While I was helping my dad shovel the heavy, wet eastern snow from our driveway, he noticed that an elderly lady at the bottom of our street was out shovelling her own driveway. My dad told me to go and help her shovel her driveway but also told me to not accept any money for helping, so I listened. A few days later, after yet another snowfall, my dad told me to go shovel the same driveway and again told me not to accept any money, and again I obeyed.

Still another snowfall later I was given the same instructions, but unfortunately the lady's husband was home, and he told me that although he knew my dad told me not to accept money, he was going to pay me for shovelling their driveway. When he saw the hesitation on my young, innocent face, he said that he knew my dad taught me to respect my elders, so I would need to take the money in order to respect him. As a young boy placed in this impossible predicament, I accepted the money, and then, terrified, I went home to tell my dad. Thankfully, my dad let me know that it was okay for me to take the money that Mr. Wyer had given me. He then told me to never expect money and certainly never ask for it but to just do the job to help them out because it was the right thing to do.

This recent election has produced a number of people sitting here today, myself included, that are not here for a paycheck. We're here to do a job that needs to be done because it is the right thing to do.

The other person that I absolutely could not be here without is my beautiful wife. I must acknowledge her here today, as I do as often as possible, because she is simply amazing; so amazing, in fact, that she gave birth to a little boy and a little girl just 17 weeks ago in the middle of this election campaign, and still made sure that I went to work to ensure that the people of West Yellowhead had the right person representing them.

My wife, when I asked, was also kind enough to postpone her 40th birthday, which happened to fall a week before the election. She postponed that until after the campaign was over. Now, if Hansard could insert a facepalm emoji, I'm sure it would at this point. Needless to say, I am extremely fortunate to have support at home that understands the sacrifice it takes to serve others.

My wife, who happens to be a public high school teacher, is usually a very patient person when it comes to teaching me. Generally she is teaching me something to do with technology or how to include an attachment on an e-mail, but something she taught me a couple of years ago will stay with me for a long time. I came home one evening from a political meeting with the intention of having my wife sign up for a party membership to support me on the journey to become the candidate. My wife told me to show her that I am the best candidate, and that she would support me. My response was: "Of course I'm the best candidate. I'm your husband." Vanessa, leaning forward in the chair, looked me right in the eye and said: "You were the right candidate for that job. You show me that you're the right candidate for this job, and I will support you."

Something that I've learned about my wife is that once she has her mind made up it is next to impossible to change. Some say stubborn; I prefer the much safer term "determined." Later on, after seeing the time and effort and dedication I was committing to move ahead on this path, my wife chose to come alongside on the journey. As members in this Assembly can attest, it is impossible to do this job without backing at home; however, it is empowering when we have that support. Mr. Speaker, it is an extreme honour and privilege for me to be the inaugural member serving the West Yellowhead constituency with its new expanded boundaries.

You know, Mr. Speaker, while many of my colleagues here today are representing very nice constituencies, I will be unabashed in stating that I get to represent not only the most beautiful constituency in Alberta but likely the most picturesque area in our country. Woodlands county, Yellowhead county, the municipality of Jasper, and the regional district of Greenview all make up the immense West Yellowhead constituency, which is comprised of vast forests, sprawling prairie landscape, and stunning rivers and lakes. Millions of people, including the people sitting in this very Chamber do not require invitation to be drawn to the picturesque mountain ranges in Jasper, and I will stand here today and share in the confines of this room of the breathtaking beauty of the hidden gems of Cadomin, Brûle, and Grande Cache, which I am fortunate enough to witness in my travels.

All of these aspects make my constituency the place of destination for those outdoorsy people who recognize the need to escape the business of the urban sprawl. They retreat to find themselves immersed in our rural version of yoga, which has activities like trail riding, quadding, fishing, trapping, hunting, skiing, hiking, and camping.

The communities of West Yellowhead have a history of drawing people in from all over Canada and around the world. As I mentioned, its sheer beauty attracts people, but many people opt to move to our communities for the same reason that I moved here, to work. When I left the east coast, I kind of got lost on the west coast for a few years until I found a place to call home in Alberta. For me, like so many others, I came here in the pursuit of a better life through the Alberta oil field. The ups and downs of the patch convinced me to move on to the Alberta forest industry, where I've spent the last nine years and have had the opportunity to become a power engineer.

Being at home these last few years instead of chasing rigs all over the province has afforded me the opportunity to do something that I'm very passionate about, volunteer. Whether serving on a board at a soup kitchen, volunteering with a youth group, or helping assess kids for minor hockey, there is seemingly nothing more fulfilling than helping others. I guess, Mr. Speaker, one could say, with the path that I have trod, that I am just an everyday guy who has worked everyday jobs and somehow has ended up here in the Legislature with the task of representing the everyday people who are fortunate enough to call West Yellowhead their home.

Mr. Speaker, as easy as it is to be drawn in and even distracted by the beauty of the West Yellowhead constituency, I am tasked with not getting distracted. You see, I believe it will be very easy to get focused on legislation, committee assignments, stakeholders, different causes, and everything under the umbrella of this political world. But what I am determined to do is what the people of West Yellowhead expect of me, which is to stay focused on what matters, the people. I hope something we can all remember is that this unique world that we have the opportunity to be a part of here in this Chamber is not actually about politics; it's about people. I will, before every decision I make, before every nay or yea, always question: how does this decision affect the people of West Yellowhead?

Mr. Speaker, the people in the communities of West Yellowhead are great people. We are hard-working, generous, kind, and caring; the sort of people who don't ask for much, maybe a bit of respect and an occasional helping hand up, but certainly never a handout.

The communities that I am fortunate enough to represent are proudly involved in various industries which are essential to the survival of our communities. Things like agriculture, farming, forestry, mining, transportation, oil and gas, tourism, and electrical generation are prevalent in the communities of West Yellowhead. We have a history of contributing a great deal to the economic success of our province, yet people have been frustrated with a lack of progress in our resource sectors the last number of years and the uncertainty that that has provided for their families.

That, for me, is why the throne speech had myself and many of our constituents on the edge of our seats. The throne speech is one which is focused on making life better for Albertans. It focuses on using our abundance of resources as a way to provide for our families now but doing so responsibly so that we can provide for the future as well. Because I have spent so much of my life in industry, I have personally witnessed the pride that is taken to improve environmental performance in our province. I have seen the finances that companies invest to ensure that they are better tomorrow than they are today. So I am honoured to serve my constituents as part of a government which is committed to not only defend against the lies being spread about our province in order to land-lock our resources but will also boast of our world-leading innovation and technologies and our successes.

You know, I will always remember the time I spent walking through the halls of the Northern Alberta Institute of Technology and seeing the contributions wall of fame, seeing names like Repsol, Husky, Shell, Talisman, Millar Western, Weyerhaeuser, and the list goes on and on. I can only assume that other postsecondary institutions across Alberta are similar in the acknowledgement of industry's financial commitments, industry which has invested billions of dollars in our technology and innovation to improve our performance, especially our environmental performance, for our future and the future of our children. Knowing this creates a sense a pride across my constituency of West Yellowhead. It instills in us the determination for our industries to succeed for the benefit of our environmental contributions here and across our country and, indeed, around the world. We know that when Alberta succeeds and when Alberta creates, others benefit.

I've been fortunate during my campaigning to travel all around my constituency, and I cannot say enough about the resiliency that the people of West Yellowhead possess. Speaking of resiliency, I eagerly anticipate joining the people of Grande Cache to celebrate the 50th anniversary of their community this summer. This hamlet has had its ups and downs over the years but is full of amazing people who take pride in their community and are determined to see it succeed. I have had the pleasure of attending Peers Gold Dust Daze, the Wildwood fair and parade, Blue Ridge Logging Days, and numerous parades, trade shows, and events in other parts of West Yellowhead. I have personally knocked on thousands of doors all across my constituency, and I have met so many people, quality everyday people, who have eagerly anticipated the direction provided in the Speech from the Throne.

9:30

So, Mr. Speaker, I will spend the time I am given in this room and throughout my constituency focused on the people of West Yellowhead in ensuring that their voices are heard, their concerns are raised, and their future is better. Thank you for allowing me to address this Chamber.

The Acting Speaker: Under Standing Order 29(2)(a) are there any members with questions or comments?

Seeing none, are there any other members wishing to speak? I believe I see the hon. Member for Calgary-East standing.

Mr. Singh: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and congratulations on your election to Deputy Chair of Committees. My name is Peter Singh, and today I rise with great honour to speak to the Assembly as the representative for Calgary-East. I'm incredibly proud to have been entrusted with the opportunity to sit in the Assembly by the people of my constituency. I am humbled to have been entrusted with representing the people of such a diverse, hard-working, and unique population.

I'm honoured to follow in the footsteps of three great MLAs before me, who are as unique and diverse as my constituency. Calgary-East has retained three previous members to this Chamber, and their backgrounds are truly remarkable, from Mr. Ludwig in the 1960s, who was a lawyer and Second World War veteran; Mr. Amery, who served for many years, with his son now my colleague in this government; and Ms Luff, who was a teacher before entering public life.

My constituents are just as unique, with thousands of my constituents working in trades, manufacturing, sales and service, health care, agriculture, even the arts. Calgary-East paints a diverse portrait of the roles and responsibilities Albertans carry with them every day, and of that I'm proud. I hope that I will be able to live up to the expectations of my colleagues in the government caucus, every other member of this Assembly – past, present, and future – and, most importantly, the expectations set by my constituents.

My experience while door-knocking made me aware of the important issues the communities in the Calgary-East constituency are facing. Many of the concerns the community had voiced were around financial insecurity. During recent years Albertans in my community have been faced with a tremendous number of job losses that have greatly impacted their families. As the cost of food, gas, and housing are increasing, the job opportunities for Albertans are declining. As people become unemployed, crime rates and the use of illegal drugs have increased, where communities are frequently faced with issues of theft and break-ins.

Education was also an important topic brought forward among the community members, where questions were asked around the increased class sizes and programs.

Seniors of the community also raised issues regarding the lack of facilities and programs that can help support the lifestyle of the senior population in Calgary-East. As the number of seniors is increasing, and Alberta has the highest rate of early-onset dementia in Canada, more attention is needed on programs provided for seniors.

Calgary-East consists of small businesses that are facing difficulty due to the downturn in the economy, which makes it very tough for business owners to operate financially. The building of new pipelines will open many job opportunities for many Albertans. The elimination of the carbon tax will support the financial stability of Albertans. The reduction in corporate taxes will help job creators to reinvest in Alberta as the corporate tax will be the lowest in the country, lowering from 12 per cent to 8 per cent by 2022.

Of course, as with many of my colleagues on both sides of the aisle, my constituency has changed over the years, most recently with the past election. Having been in existence for 26 years now, Calgary-East sits on the eastern edge of the city, stretching from the Bow River to the city limits at 116th Street. Running from north to south, Calgary-East runs from the Trans-Canada highway to the Peigan Trail.

Calgary-East is home to fantastic communities such as Southview, Erin Woods, Applewood Park, Abbeydale, Forest Heights, Fonda, Forest Lawn, east Dover, Penbrooke Meadows, and mobile homes. My constituency is home to businesses both large and small, residential areas and industrial areas, and newly constructed neighbourhoods. Calgary-East truly is a microcosm of all that makes Calgary great, and I am so proud to have the privilege to represent my neighbours, friends, and families in this Legislature.

Seventeenth Avenue S.E. underwent a transformation as the bus rapid transit, the BRT, project was completed and Calgary's new rapid transit system, called Max, launched in November 2018. The transit route known as Max Purple begins at the east side shopping centre and connects to downtown, allowing individuals to commute throughout the city with ease.

While I was not born in Calgary-East, I have come to call it home and have come to love it. Like many of my constituents I am extremely blessed to be a Canadian by choice, not by chance. Since moving to Calgary, I have become familiar with and interested in the culture and heart of my city, my province, and my country. Mr. Speaker, I immigrated to Canada from the Fiji islands in 1987 and settled in Ontario for a few years with my lovely wife, Reena, who I met while she was vacationing in Fiji. I got married that year in Ontario. I worked part-time and attended Centennial College and later graduated and worked proudly as a licensed automotive journeyman. My wife also did the same while working on her nursing program.

I was in Calgary in 1992 for a wedding with my wife and baby boy. There were so many opportunities at that time that we moved and settled here in 1993. It was the right direction, so we opened our small business in Calgary-East, worked hard to build our business, which also helped me to connect with the constituents of Calgary-East. I am very proud to have chosen to settle in Calgary. I am a proud father to my son, Kishen, and daughter, Komal. Like many other Canadians who own and operate their businesses, I as well as thousands of others across my constituency and our great province have become crushed by pointless regulations, increased taxes that have hampered my business.

I am deeply humbled and would like to acknowledge the community members and the hundreds of volunteers that took time out to take part in the election. I would like to give a warm thank you to my constituents in Calgary-East for entrusting me to represent you. Now I am here standing in this Chamber for my constituents. I have heard from them time and time again about the need to get our province back on track, and I along with my colleagues in the government caucus are ready to do just that.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you.

Under 29(2)(a) are there any members with questions or comments?

Seeing none, are there any other members wishing to speak? I believe I see the hon. Member for Lesser Slave Lake standing.

9:40

Mr. Rehn: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for giving me the opportunity to rise and respond to the Lieutenant Governor's Speech from the Throne and to deliver my time-honoured maiden speech as the Member for Lesser Slave Lake. I want to start by congratulating all the members of this House on their recent election victories. I would like to thank my sons, Noah and Landan, along with all my sisters and brothers and the rest of my family and friends for the love and support they have given me on this journey. This Legislature is truly facing an enormous challenge in getting Alberta's economy back on track, but Albertans need us to succeed and we will.

I've had the opportunity to do a lot of jobs over the years. I've been a lumber piler; handsaw tree faller; roughneck on the drilling rigs; trucker; high school teacher; a logger operating button tops, feller-bunchers, delimbers, and grapple skidders; a sawyer and sawmiller; a tree planter; a farmer; a crane operator and owner. I feel that my present job will undoubtedly be one of the most challenging and rewarding experiences of my life.

My riding is one of the greatest places to live, work, and raise a family in the entire world, rich with history, industry, and natural beauty. In the west of the riding you'll find High Prairie, a gateway to the Peace Country, with some significant farmland. It's a beautiful town that attracts leisure seekers for its many wonderful offerings, including the golden walleye classic fishing competition and the High Prairie rodeo.

As you head east on the south side of the lake you'll pass Enilda, Joussard, Faust, and Kinuso, which has a great rodeo each year; Canyon Creek; and end up at the east end of the lake in my town of Slave Lake, which hosts Riverboat Daze and the Icebreaker hockey game yearly. Travelling to the east you come to Smith and Hondo, who hold a great fall fair and rodeo. Continue east and you'll end up in Calling Lake. Head north to Sandy Lake and then a place that is close to my heart, Wabasca, located west of the Wabasca oil fields. As you head back west, you would pass through Red Earth Creek and end up at Cadotte Lake.

As you may know, Slave Lake fell victim to a devastating wildfire in 2011. Since then we've rebuilt, and the people are now opening their hearts and their homes to wildfire victims from across the province. I would like to commend all the firefighters, police, and ambulance personnel who have to work so tirelessly in keeping all of my constituents safe and protected. I have the utmost respect for all of these first responders as well as all the fine women and men who serve in our army, navy, and air force, putting it all on the line for us.

Lesser Slave Lake is also home to 11 First Nation bands: Bigstone Cree Nation, Driftpile First Nation, Kapawe'no First Nation, Loon River First Nation, Lubicon Lake First Nation, Peerless Trout First Nation, Sawridge First Nation, Sucker Creek First Nation, Swan River First Nation, Whitefish Lake First Nation, and Woodland Cree First Nation.

The riding was proudly represented by Pearl Calahasen for more than a quarter century. Ms Calahasen was a trailblazer as the first Métis woman to hold public office in Alberta, and her contributions to our riding and province are tremendous.

There are three Métis settlements in my riding: Gift Lake, East Prairie, and the Peavine Métis settlement, whose chairman Ken Noskey has already had positive discussions with me. I look forward to using my time in office to build strong relationships with First Nations people in our riding, like Chief Silas Yellowknee of Bigstone and Grand Chief of Treaty 8 Arthur Noskey, who I'm proud to call friends.

The truth is, I owe a great deal to Lesser Slave Lake as my relationship with the riding goes back decades. My grandfather Lennart Rehn immigrated to this great province in 1910 and started sawmilling shortly thereafter. He homesteaded a quarter section about an hour west of Edmonton by Wildwood. He and his wife, Helenna, had 10 children, seven girls and three boys. My grandparents' three sons – Harold, Jim, and my father, Pat – all became sawmillers like their father. Three of my aunts – Helen,

Karin, and Winnie – started a band called the Rehn Sister Trio, and they played for years at many country dances all over northern Alberta. Mr. Speaker, at this point I think it's only fair to warn you that music and singing does run in my family, so you could have some serious competition at this year's yodelling/karaoke-singing extravaganza.

Ms Hoffman: Prove it.

Mr. Rehn: Later. Later.

My father and mother, Pat and Helen Rehn, raised seven children in Wildwood, Alberta. I should clarify that because we really had a gypsy type of lifestyle, being in the sawmill business back then. Alberta forest service would auction off stands of timber, sawmillers would bid on them, and if successful, they would move their sawmill close to that stand of timber and saw it and then move on to the next stand of timber. We moved our sawmill all over, sawing timber: Wildwood, Edson, Cynthia, Whitecourt, Grouard, Chickadee Creek, Simonette Road off highway 43, Fort Assiniboine, and many other places.

Right after I was born in Edmonton, my mom whisked me off with her to our sawmill bush camp up by Fox Creek, right by the Little Smoky River. And, yes, when I needed some water, they filled my baby bottle right from the Little Smoky River. I'm not sure that Alberta Health Services would approve of that today, but I was a bush baby, and I survived to tell the story.

After finishing high school, I received a volleyball scholarship and attended Red Deer College and then the University of Alberta. I achieved an education degree, specializing in business and physical education. I come from a very humble background. When I graduated, all that I had was a big student loan and a desire to work hard and to try my very best.

I taught at a Catholic high school for a couple of years. While I love teaching, eventually I decided to go back sawmilling and to the forest, where my heart yearned to be, so I put every penny I had together, and I purchased a timber quota in the Edson area. Twenty-one years ago I purchased a sawmill in Wabasca called Wabasca Lakes Sawmill. Shortly thereafter I purchased another sawmill and timber quota in the Grande Cache area, where I sawed for nearly 20 years.

Sixteen years ago I started purchasing quarter sections of timberland in the Lesser Slave Lake riding, close to High Prairie, Sunset House, Triangle, and Joussard. I still own some of this land today along with four timber quotas.

Eleven years ago I started my own crane company, which experienced amazing growth until the NDP came to power in Alberta in 2015. Many of my competitors tried to hang on, but the economic catastrophe was too great, and many companies went bankrupt or had to auction off everything, great companies like Adam Crane, who had been in business for over 40 years. I was faced with some very tough decisions, and I decided that I needed to expand to the United States in order to survive.

I did expand into the U.S.A. in 2017. Today I own one of the largest single-person-owned fleets of cranes in North America, with cranes in operation across Canada and the United States. I would like to thank our great neighbours, the United States of America, for allowing companies such as mine to compete in their great free-market system.

For the better part of my life I have been working to create jobs and make life better for others. I've employed hundreds of Albertans, helping them find meaningful work and start their own families and companies. Some people would call me an overachiever. I say that I'm a very blessed individual who has an incredible work ethic and was fortunate enough to be born in the greatest province in the greatest country in the world. Honestly, where else but in Alberta would my amazing life have been possible? I know the Alberta advantage because I've lived it. Now I want to ensure that it's alive and well for generations to come. I want to ensure that if a young person wants to start a company, they can right in Lesser Slave Lake if they wish to do so, just like what was done by the Buchannans, Vanderwells, Augers, Badgers, Willisrofts, Lukans, and many, many others in our great constituency.

[The Speaker in the chair]

Mr. Speaker, I didn't pursue this job out of self-interest. I don't need a job. I don't want the cushy perks, and I'm not interested in any fancy parties. I pursued this job because I know what it's going to take to make life better for families and businesses in our riding, province, and country, and I'm ready to get to work.

The people of my riding are some of the kindest, friendliest, and most optimistic people you will ever meet, but the past four years have been very difficult for them. We saw the introduction of the NDP carbon tax, the largest tax increase in Alberta's history, in the middle of an economic recession. We saw mass layoffs, business closures, and investment flight. We saw four major pipelines get cancelled or delayed indefinitely.

I've sat in this Legislature and heard members of the opposition trying to legitimize their horrific deficit accumulation while in government, often blaming it on the oil price collapse for the entire four-year period that they were in power. Mr. Speaker, I have a news flash. The oil price recovered years ago; it's the price differential that is killing us. This price differential is caused by lack of pipelines, which was caused by terrible decisions by the NDP not standing up for Albertans and Canadians to get pipelines built.

The policies of the past four years haven't worked, and I stand here strongly aware that Albertans elected our government to deliver bold Conservative change. The UCP has a strong plan to get Albertans working again, and it's already been put into action. We've passed several policies that will make life better for families and businesses, including repealing the carbon tax, implementing job creation tax cuts, and cutting red tape to give entrepreneurs the freedom they need to invest, grow, and hire right here in Alberta. We will be bringing in the groundbreaking aboriginal opportunities corporation, which will facilitate First Nations' financial participation in major resource projects, including pipelines. We will stand up to Ottawa any time they try to pass legislation that hurts our province, like Bill C-48, the west coast tanker ban, and Bill C-69, the no-more-pipelines bill. I'm fiercely proud and I'm glad to be part of the governing party of Alberta, and we will never apologize for that. We aren't anyone's embarrassing cousin.

Three years ago I listened as our Premier laid out a clear vision to get Alberta back on track, and I decided to get involved. I took time away from my crane company to help us campaign to unite Conservatives. Our Premier and our government represent a fresh start for Lesser Slave Lake and Alberta, and I couldn't be happier to be here with him today. We're going to deliver on our commitments and make Alberta once again a beacon of hope and opportunity for people from all over Canada and the world.

In summary I'd like to quote Dean Alfange.

I do not choose to be a common man. It is my right to be uncommon – if I can. I seek opportunity – not security. I do not wish to be a kept citizen, humbled and dulled by having the state look after me. I want to take the calculated risk; to dream and to build, to fail and to succeed. I refuse to barter incentive for a dole. I prefer the challenges of life to the guaranteed existence; the thrill of fulfillment to the stale calm of utopia. I will not trade freedom for beneficence nor my dignity for a handout. I will never cower before any master nor bend to any threat. It is my [duty] to stand erect, proud and unafraid; to think and act for myself, enjoy the benefit of my creations, and to face the world boldly and say, this I have done.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Thank you to the Member for Lesser Slave Lake for your remarks.

Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available to anyone who might like to ask a question or comment to the Member for Lesser Slave Lake.

Seeing none, I will call upon the hon. Member for Strathcona-Sherwood Park and Minister of Service Alberta.

Mr. Glubish: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's an honour to rise and deliver my maiden speech in this House. Before I begin, I just want to say thank you to the voters of Strathcona-Sherwood Park for their support during the recent election. You have placed an enormous amount of trust in me and in this government, and I want you to know that I am here to fight for you, and our government is here to fight for all Albertans.

I also want to thank my family and friends who supported me on this journey to the Legislature. Thank you also to the many volunteers who worked so hard and sacrificed so much to help make this dream a reality. I won't let you down.

I would also like to say thank you to the previous representative of Strathcona-Sherwood Park, former member Estefania Cortes-Vargas. Thank you for your service over the past four years.

And thank you to all of the candidates who put their names forward in the last election: Albert Aris, Larry MacIse, Don Melanson, Dave Quest, Richard Scinta, and Moira Váně. I respect their courage to participate in the democratic process. Running for public office is challenging, demanding, and requires great sacrifice. I commend them for their dedication and for their well-run campaigns.

Speaking of congratulations, every member elected to this Legislature deserves strong congratulations. We will disagree at times, but I do look forward to our debates. At the end of the day, I think we can all agree that we are here because we want to create a better Alberta for all Albertans; we just have some different ideas on how to get there. Mr. Speaker, it would be remiss of me if I didn't offer you my congratulations on your election earlier in May.

Mr. Speaker, I have to admit that my journey to becoming an MLA almost didn't happen. You see, when I first approached my wife, Allison, back in the summer of 2015 to suggest that I was thinking of putting my name forward to run in this past election, I believe her first words were something to the effect of: that's a hard pass. I'm not even joking. My wife and I will celebrate our 11th anniversary this July, and we have been together for almost 13 years. In that time I have learned that you can't make any big life decisions without the full support and buy-in of your partner. As far as big decisions go, running for office in Alberta has to be near the top of the list.

Despite my wife's initial reservations, thankfully, over time she warmed to the idea and eventually gave me the green light. I would like to take this opportunity, through you, Mr. Speaker, to say thank you to my beautiful wife, Allison. She has been by my side through many ups and downs. I also know that she has my back and that she'll be there for me in good times and bad. She is by every measure my better half, which is why I'm also excited to share with you, Mr. Speaker, and with everyone in this Chamber, a little good news. My wife and I are expecting our first child this September, just a few short months away. [some applause] Thank you.

We are having a boy, and I can't wait to meet my son this fall. We have nicknamed him T.H., which is short for tiny human, but he's definitely big enough now that I can feel when he kicks, and that's really something special. You see, Mr. Speaker, I've wanted to be a dad for a very long time. My wife and I have been trying for quite some time to start a family, but sometimes life throws you a curveball along the way. Did you know that 1 in 4 pregnancies ends in a loss? I didn't until recently. I learned that statistic when my wife and I lost her first pregnancy a little over a year ago. We were the 1 in 4. I share that with you because I know that many Albertans have experienced this pain, and my message to them is: you are not alone.

Mr. Speaker, I can't talk about my family without also talking about my parents and my in-laws. I'd like to thank Allison's parents, Kevin and Gail Stone, for welcoming me into their lives. I'm so grateful for their support in this new role and for the support they provide to my wife when I'm working long hours in the Legislature. I also want to thank my parents, Brian and Terry Glubish, for their unconditional love and support. They have taught me so much and have set a great example that I can only hope to live up to with my son.

Mr. Speaker, talking about my parents reminds me of a story about my dad when I was studying at the University of Saskatchewan. As I was working through my third- and fourth-year finance courses, I often had to work long hours. My dad shared with me one of his favourite quotes. It was from Henry Wadsworth Longfellow.

The heights by great men reached and kept
Were not attained by sudden flight,
But they, while their companions slept,
Were toiling upward in the night.

This quote was an inspiration to my dad for many years throughout his career, and it has been an inspiration to me ever since those university days, over 15 years ago.

Mr. Speaker, I could go on and tell you about my grandparents on both sides of my family, but perhaps that will have to wait for another day. Suffice to say that I've learned from them and their examples the value of hard work, the joy of a generous spirit, and the importance of a strong family.

Mr. Speaker, I know I've spent quite some time talking about family today, and I wanted to do that for a few reasons. One, family reminds you of where you come from. Two, family keeps you grounded. Three, probably most importantly, family reminds you of what is most important in life. So I just wanted to say that my family is the most important part of my life, and I just really wanted to share that with my colleagues on both sides of this House and also with my constituents back home.

Speaking of family, I'd like to talk a little bit about my community in Strathcona county, which in my opinion is one of the best places in the world to live, to work, and especially to raise a family.

Mr. Walker: Hear, hear.

Mr. Glubish: Thank you to the Member for Sherwood Park for those remarks.

My wife and I moved to the Sherwood Park area nine years ago, and we can't imagine living anywhere else. This community has so much to offer, especially to young families. The recreation centres are outstanding. We have access to the best of both urban and rural community offerings. We have a vibrant collection of active community leagues that provide programming for residents of all ages, from Sherwood Park to the far corners of rural Strathcona county.

In addition to the rich, family-oriented programming and services, Strathcona county offers proximity to an exciting economic engine called the Alberta Industrial Heartland, which a number of members, I believe, in the last couple of weeks have spoken to. The heartland comprises of land shared by Strathcona county, Fort Saskatchewan, Sturgeon county, Lamont county, and the city of Edmonton, and it represents Canada's largest hydrocarbon processing region with over 40 companies and covering over 533 square kilometres.

Some advantages enjoyed by the businesses in the region include a cost-effective, secure supply of oil and gas and petrochemical feedstocks; excellent road, rail, and air infrastructure; access to a skilled and motivated workforce; and access to the freshwater supply of the North Saskatchewan River. Mr. Speaker, the heartland represents over $40 billion of investment to date, and there are tens of billions of dollars of future opportunities in the region. I'm very excited to be able to work with Strathcona county council and Strathcona county Mayor Rod Frank to create the conditions for long-term economic success.

Mr. Speaker, despite all of this opportunity Alberta does continue to feel some pain and hardship that has plagued our province over the last number of years. We do face an escalating debt that is at frightening levels. We see high unemployment rates, especially among our youth. We see increasing rates of bankruptcies. We see rising vacancies in the downtown cores of our major cities, and we see rural Alberta communities struggling to survive.

Mr. Speaker, I can relate to what the great Canadian singer-songwriter Bruce Cockburn says in his song Lovers in a Dangerous Time. He says:

But nothing worth having comes without some kind of fight
Got to kick at the darkness 'til it bleeds daylight.

Those inspirational words push me to move forward in the face of adversity and maybe to paraphrase in my own words along the lines of Henry Longfellow's quote that I referenced earlier: "I know there's a price, so I will toil in the night. The cost is no concern. I need the world to see that my dream is not fantasy."

Mr. Speaker, I want the constituents of Strathcona-Sherwood Park to know that they can count on me to give this job my all because I dream of an Alberta with endless opportunity. I dream of an Alberta that leads the country in economic growth. I dream of an Alberta that is once again debt free. I dream of an Alberta that is strong and free. These dreams are not fantasy. They can be a reality because over the next four years our government will be laser focused on creating jobs, attracting investment to Alberta, and standing up for our energy industry.

I may not be a poet like Longfellow nor a songwriter like Cockburn, but I do dabble from time to time as a hobby musician, so let me close with a quote from a work in progress from my own repertoire.

I know the way to greatness is hard-fought and not for the faint of heart.
Still I say: let's go.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I move to close debate.

Mr. Jason Nixon: No. Adjourn debate.

Mr. Glubish: Adjourn debate. Sorry.

Mr. Jason Nixon: He definitely doesn't want to close debate.

The Speaker: Thank you to the hon. Member for Strathcona-Sherwood Park, and let me be the first to congratulate you on the arrival of your little T.H. I was doing some preliminary mathematics, and I understand that you will have the 76th or 75th school-aged child, or from 18 under, of the United Conservative Party caucus. And I understand that as an Assembly we have nearly 100 under-18 or school-aged children amongst all members. So we are a very prolific group when it comes to the young people. Congratulations.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Government Bills and Orders

Second Reading

Bill 3

Job Creation Tax Cut (Alberta Corporate Tax Amendment) Act

[Adjourned debate June 4: Mr. Schow]

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there any wishing to speak? The Official Opposition House Leader has the call.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Thank you. You know what? At the start of this I do want to give a shout-out to the Minister of Service Alberta for his maiden speech, his response to the Speech from the Throne. I wish congratulations to him and his family.

Honestly, Mr. Speaker, again, I've only been in this House since 2012, but I really appreciate hearing members deliver their maiden speeches because you get to learn a lot about the other members of the Assembly, their families, their ridings, their priorities. So, you know, I do appreciate all members this evening sharing their maiden speeches, for many, their responses to the speech.

Now, moving on, Mr. Speaker, to Bill 3, the job creation tax cut. As is probably no surprise to anyone in this House, I have a number of comments that I want to make on this bill. I'll start off by saying that I personally don't necessarily oppose a corporate tax reduction; however, I believe there needs to be caveats placed around it to ensure that it actually delivers what it's intended to.

I can tell you that there are numerous examples, especially within North America, where the corporate tax rate has been cut, but it has actually not led to job growth, it has not led to a stimulus for the economy, increased GDP, et cetera, and the reason is quite simple, Mr. Speaker. If there aren't provisions within a tax cut for companies to invest or reinvest what they're saving in job creation or growth, investing back into the company or in new machinery and equipment, there are a large number of companies that will take that savings, or tax cut, and pocket it or distribute it as a profit to shareholders. You know, I'm not criticizing companies for doing that, but what I'm saying is that if that is the only play or throw the government has to help the economy recover, Lord help us.

What I can tell you is that I will be grilling the Minister of Economic Development, Trade and Tourism on a number of initiatives that our government brought forward that have resulted in job creation, have resulted in growth in GDP, and have helped Alberta's economy start the recovery process.

Mr. Speaker, you know, over the last few years our government introduced three different tax credit programs that, I will say, came from the private sector, so I'm sure that there are members of the government caucus who are thinking – well, I'm not sure what they're thinking, quite frankly, but who may be critical of the tax credit programs. But I can assure this House that myself and our caucus engaged entrepreneurs, whether they were sole proprietors, mid-sized companies or multinationals. We engaged with chambers of commerce, with economic development agencies throughout the province on what some of the best tools are that a government can possibly use to help the economy get back on track.

I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that over and over again two different tax credits came up in every conversation. These are tax credits that are enjoyed by other provinces. In fact, the province of British Columbia has had an investor tax credit since 1985. That has helped the economy diversify.

Really, how it works, Mr. Speaker, is that it gives the people of the province – our tax credit here in Alberta gives Albertans the opportunity to invest in companies in their own backyard. They get a 30 per cent tax credit. It helps companies, obviously, to raise equity, to grow and expand much quicker through this access to capital. It derisks Albertans' investments, and it's a win-win. I can tell you that initially our government wanted to limit which sectors this would be applicable to, but we heard, loud and clear, from the private sector that this needs to be sector-wide, so we listened to their advice. That tax credit has leveraged over – well, a $30 million tax credit leverages over $100 million worth of investment. We've seen that a couple of times over.

The second one is the capital investment tax credit, which, Mr. Speaker, is a 10 per cent nonrefundable credit. This one is critical in the sense that we are trying to encourage companies to deploy capital now to help the economy get back on track and not leave that money off to the sidelines. That capital investment tax credit – under our tenure we conditionally approved about $100 million, which has leveraged over $2.2 billion of new investment, creating thousands of jobs. These are tangible outcomes to government policy that we can point to. No one in this House or anywhere else can dispute the numbers as far as the impact it has had on the Alberta economy.

Now, we recognize that there is no silver bullet, Mr. Speaker, but there is a role for government to play in creating the right conditions. I know that the government will advocate that simply a corporate tax rate reduction will create the right conditions.

I need to remind the members opposite that Alberta has been and continues to be the lowest – lowest – taxed jurisdiction in Canada, under our government and under previous governments. Despite what the members opposite will say – I think hyperbole is an understatement when they talk about the effects of the carbon tax for the majority of Albertans. I'm not saying that for some businesses that did not place an additional burden on them. But the whole "companies are going out of business because of the carbon tax" – I'm sorry; if paying a few thousand dollars extra a month means you went out of business, maybe you need to look at your business plan or at least the management of your company. [interjections] No, no. For the majority of companies a tiny increase in the carbon tax – because here's the thing, members. Albertans pay $11 billion less in taxes than the second-lowest taxed jurisdiction in Canada even with the carbon tax. Do the math on this. We have no PST. We have no payroll tax. We have no health care premiums. Albertans continue to pay the lowest taxes in the country.

I'm not arguing that some companies have been placed under a certain burden with a price on carbon, but the majority of Albertans received a rebate. There were programs for companies to help them through this. What we're left with now – and I appreciate that this bill has passed – is that we're open season for Ottawa, quite frankly.

My point is this, Mr. Speaker. Alberta already was the lowest taxed jurisdiction in Canada. So when members of the government say, "This is all we need to do to diversify our economy," well, guess what, folks? We had the lowest taxes in the country for decades, and it didn't help diversify the economy, which is why

Alberta suffered so greatly under the last drop in the price of oil. If that's all it takes, we'd have the most diversified economy in the country. But guess what? We don't. So going back to that, to say, "This is the silver bullet," quite frankly, naive is the first adjective that comes to mind. What we need are tools that will help ensure that companies are investing in this province. You know, again, within the corporate tax rate I'm not sure why the government didn't consider tying a decrease in the corporate tax rate to job creation.

For companies that are going to take the savings of the 1 per cent and then 2, all the way down to 8 per cent, or the 4 per cent savings, for companies that are investing in growth, in job creation, and reinvesting back into their companies, give them that corporate tax reduction. Don't just open it up to any company, because the majority of them – and surprise, surprise; believe me, I'll be the first one on my feet in this House when companies say: "Thank you. We're going to pocket that." I've spoken to companies already province-wide. I said: "Are you going to reinvest? Are you going to hire more? Are you going to upgrade your technology and your processes?" They said: "No. We're going to take the savings and issue it in profits to our shareholders." We've seen this in states like Kansas, where they did a massive corporate tax cut, and it did little to stimulate the economy, to stimulate growth, and to encourage job creation. You know, for me, my concern is that with the way the bill is currently, there is no guarantee that there will be significant job growth.

Now, I found it interesting when I looked at some of the economists who commented on this, who said: you know, frankly, if we've hit bottom through this recession, then the only place is up. So if there are some jobs created, the government will jump on their feet – I'm sure that especially the Government House Leader and the Premier will be on their feet – trumpeting how successful this was, but it doesn't necessarily correlate to the reduction in the corporate taxes. If you've hit rock bottom, the only place to go is up. So for the few jobs that may be created, they may say: "Look at us here. We'll pat ourselves on the back." However, it's not attributed necessarily to the corporate tax reduction.

What I'd like to see or what we'd like to see are concrete measures or tools to be used that will help stimulate the economy like the three tax credit programs that our government introduced.

We want to talk about trade, one of my favourite topics, Mr. Speaker. Something that I'm very, very proud of is the fact that in three years, from 2016 to 2019, the work that our government did with the private sector – I want to be really clear. I'm not taking credit for this stat that I'm about to give but very proud to be part of a province that increased its trade with China alone, one country. We increased trade over the last three years by 25 per cent. That is a massive amount. Trade increased by over a billion dollars because of, in part, the work that our government did, the number of trade missions that we did, the number of companies we brought to China. I was very proud to lead the largest trade delegation that the government of Alberta has ever led in the history of this province. Eighty-six different businesses and business associations accompanied me in November 2016 to China. This is significant. These are concrete actions that have helped increase trade, which has resulted in more jobs back here at home. It's helped our companies diversify the markets that they sell to.

I think one of the challenges that we all know that exist in Alberta and across this country is that the majority of businesses only do business within our own country, and of those that do go outside of Canada, the majority are in the U.S. Well, when we experience tariffs and, you know, challenges with trade deals within North America, it points to the fact that we need to do much more to open markets and help our businesses open markets internationally.

These are the types of initiatives that have a track record to create jobs and improve the economy, Mr. Speaker.

With that and with this corporate tax amendment, my concern, quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, is that what this government is doing is taking $4.5 billion, betting it on number 16 on the roulette table, letting it ride, and hoping that this will result in job creation. Now, I'll be the first to say that some companies will in fact take this corporate tax reduction and invest it back into their companies, so, yes, there will be some job growth. I'm not about to say that this is not going to do anything for the economy. My concern is that without any type of collar or linkage between a corporate tax rate reduction and ensuring that companies are reinvesting it, it will actually not have the effect that the government thinks. I appreciate that there are economists who have forecasted 55,000 jobs. Great. I can name just as many economists who have said that it's going to do little to nothing to help stimulate the economy.

Mr. Speaker, I have concerns with the bill as it is and look forward to bringing forward amendments.

The Speaker: I see the hon. Government House Leader has risen under 29(2)(a). If he has a brief question or comment, I might encourage him to do so.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, great that we have an opportunity. I appreciate that we have Standing Order 29(2)(a). It was built exactly for this moment.

I was interested in listening to the hon. Opposition House Leader's comments. There's so much to be unpacked there and not enough time under 29(2)(a), as you know, Mr. Speaker, to even begin to be able to go through the enormous, ridiculous statements that have repeatedly been said by the Opposition House Leader in his speech before this place today.

I'd like to focus on one issue in particular, the fact that the Opposition House Leader, who, you know, I have the utmost respect for and get along with well, Mr. Speaker, as I know you do as well – I appreciate the hard role that he has. I had to be an Opposition House Leader before, as have you. But the reality is that he accidentally showed exactly what the NDP think when it comes to job creators and businesses inside our province. He accidentally went and showed exactly why the NDP now sit on the opposition benches inside this Assembly after being decimated by the largest wipeout, probably, in the history of this province as far as votes cast against them for another party, the only time in history to be a one-term government because of the attitude that our Opposition House Leader just showed that his party has: talking about job creators and businesses inside our province, job creators and businesses inside your hometown of Olds, just to the east of me in Sundre, talking about them and the fact that if the carbon tax was causing trouble for their businesses, then they should go and re-examine their business plan.

To then try and say that somehow the ridiculous tax that they put on these people and these organizations that created jobs inside our province was their fault, that it was business's fault: no wonder this party is the only one-term government in the history of this province, if that's how you're going to treat the job creators inside our province. One-term government. Why? Because they think that and they have the nerve to say that. This is because they don't have the decency to go to places like Drayton Valley, who have been decimated by the policies of this government.

Mr. Bilous: I have been.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, it turns out, I guess, that the Opposition House Leader has been to Drayton Valley. That's great. I certainly hope that when he was there, he didn't tell them that they had problems with their business plans and that that's why they were in this spot.

You know why they were in this spot, Mr. Speaker? You know why? I know. I spend lots of time in your home constituency because I have to travel through there quite often to be able to get to my home. In fact, it's the closest Walmart, so if we want to go shopping at Walmart, we've got to go there. And if I'm in the Walmart in Olds, what would I hear over and over from your constituents on why they have found themselves inside this problem? You know what I would hear, because I know you hear the same thing. They have found themselves in this situation because of the ridiculous policies of this opposition when they were in government. You heard it here tonight.

They tell a job creator that if they're struggling as a result of the tax that the NDP brought in, it's because they had a bad job plan. No. What happened was that a bad government got elected, brought in ridiculous policies that continued to punish the people of this province. And this opposition party has the nerve to continue to come to this House, sit there and insult the people of this province, insult the job creators that have struggled to keep their businesses open.

I know business owners inside my constituency that have taken things at a loss for multiple years just to keep their employees being able to go to work. I know that you have some in your constituency as well. Now, the job creators inside my constituency and your constituency are not watching the Legislature at this time of night, but if they were and they saw this, they would be extremely disappointed.

You know, Mr. Speaker, I don't care about the reputation of the opposition members in this place – they've already destroyed their reputation; the results of April 16 show that – but I do care about the reputation of Her Majesty. This is Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition inside this Chamber, and she would be ashamed to hear a comment like that. They should treat this role that they have as the opposition, the Official Opposition in this Chamber, to defend Albertans, not to attack Albertans and tell them that this ridiculous tax that they brought in when they were in government that hurt these companies is now their fault, that they somehow had bad business plans.

Mr. Speaker, is this the NDP's new political strategy? They tried fear and smear and to make things up about people and attack people and do all that stuff that resulted in them being decimated. This strategy would be ridiculous.

The Speaker: I might just remind the Government House Leader, you know, that he would know that Standing Order 23(k) speaks very clearly to speaking "disrespectfully of Her Majesty or of any other member of the Royal Family." To impute what Her Majesty may or may not think may border on a point of order. I would just urge some caution to the Government House Leader.

Are there any others that would like to speak to the bill? I see the Member for Edmonton-North West rising.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise with some interest in speaking to Bill 3, the Job Creation Tax Cut (Alberta Corporate Tax Amendment) Act. You know, this morning I was driving from the Islamic Academy on the occasion of Eid. It almost seems like another day. It seems like we have two days built into one sometimes when we have these night sittings. On the radio, when I was driving back, there was an interesting CBC broadcast that was featuring the Gates foundation and I think her name is Melinda Gates, the wife of Bill Gates and one of the people that runs the Gates foundation. She was going on quite at length about the dysfunctional state of American taxation and how it was distorting the economies of individual states and the nation as well.

Of course, the Gates foundation and that family is one of the richest families in the world, and together with billionaires and multimillionaires they are joining forces to say that they need tax reform in the United States of America because there is a huge distortion that is taking place by massive tax cuts, both corporate and personal, in the United States of America. There is a tremendous distortion that is having a number of very serious negative effects on the economies of individual states and on the nation as well.

I listened with quite a lot of interest. You know, they brought up a number of examples, and the one that stuck in my mind is this notion of so much cash being moved as a result of massive tax cuts to corporations and so forth that this cash literally gets stranded and is taken out of the economy. Let's not forget, members of this Legislature, through the Speaker, that money is used and printed based on value, and if that value is somehow stranded – right? – by a distorted taxation system that allows so much cash to be accumulated in one place or another, it literally has a negative effect on an economy.

This is just one small aspect of what I was thinking and reflecting on when I would speak on Bill 3 here today. What this government is proposing is a very significant tax change, almost like a sea change, for the province of Alberta and a distortion of the tax policies that might function and feature across the country. I must say that amongst the many things we learned in government is that you have to be very careful, to be reminded that you are part of a country, Canada, here in the province of Alberta, and you must make sure that your policies are not so far out of step with the rest of the nation that you're literally impeding or causing some distortion that can have a negative effect not just on Alberta but on the entire country. These are just a couple of things that I was thinking about this morning when I was thinking of my comments on Bill 3, the Job Creation Tax Cut (Alberta Corporate Tax Amendment Act).

Then, of course, the responsible thing to do as well is to look at expertise and analysis of such a thing both from economists looking at the potential effects on the economy of Alberta but also looking for some correlation to other jurisdictions across the country and/or in other countries that might have gone down this path. What were the effects, right? I mean, this is a responsible, scientific way by which you can approach these things. While you can always find different economists saying different things, certainly I think the consensus is that Bill 3, with such a massive tax cut to corporations, is risky, it is unproven, and it is certainly not necessarily the wisest choice.

It's bold, and I think that the new government was looking for ways by which to grab headlines and demonstrate, you know, boldness as much as they were at sound, sober economic analysis. You know, you can't make decisions like that, Mr. Speaker, for the sake of grabbing a headline or being the very lowest or the biggest thing of all time. I mean, this is sort of that showy, stacy politics that works okay for some times and some places but not when you're dealing with the entirety of the provincial economy. You can't just showboat off literally billions of dollars, in this case more than $4.5 billion, that would be taken out of the economy and blow a massive hole in the capacity for this government to then make good on their promise to balance the budget, right? Those are all factors that we need to look at.

We have been working very hard to make sure that – we had a policy in the previous government to balance the budget as well by 2023-24. I think that's around the same time that this government wants to achieve that as well. How could they possibly do that by taking out this magnitude of money and revenue from the provincial budget?

The provincial budget is responsible for health care; it's responsible for education, for social services, for infrastructure, for essential services that Albertans need to function. I believe Bill 3 is a signal that this government is not only not taking those responsibilities seriously but is projecting their plans for significant cuts to essential services that Albertans need and the economy needs to function and to survive here in the province. We know that Alberta's businesses are the best in the country and perhaps in the entire world, right? But this government wants at the same time to attack schools and hospitals to pay for such a risky experiment as what we're seeing here with Bill 3.

Certainly, you talk about the carbon tax and all of those things, but this corporate tax is exponentially riskier and potentially destabilizing. You know, in so many jurisdictions we see that borne out. People talk about the so-called Kansas experiment, which was an unmitigated disaster, but there are other jurisdictions that did exactly the same thing. We know that, you know, states like Louisiana, for example, went down a path similar to this, and as an oil-producing jurisdiction as well you end up with very poor education outcomes, privatized health care, lower life expectancies and so forth, and an extreme division between the haves and the have-nots of jurisdictions that have gone down the path of substantial tax cuts like what this government is suggesting.

I mean, I'm concerned, right? I think that that's why we do debate these things in the Legislature. I always take the opinion that this is a place, especially at 10:35 in the evening, where you don't just have to beat each other over the heads but rather expose each other to ideas and to amendments and perhaps sober second thought that would allow us to make sure we're making the right decision for Albertans, to make the right decision for businesses and for our public services in general.

We know that our population continues to grow. We have the youngest population in Canada, and this is borne out by a young, youthful population of school-aged children. I think the Speaker pointed out how prolific this House is in regard to school-aged children, and that is a microcosm of what we see across the province. Fifteen thousand new kids showing up in schools here in the fall: that's a conservative prediction or calculation. I can have full disclosure here now. We usually run those numbers a little bit down in the Ministry of Education, and then, lo and behold, there will probably be even more kids showing up in the fall, dollars to doughnuts.

That's a positive thing. I think it demonstrates hope and optimism. People are having children, like the Member for Strathcona-Sherwood Park. That's a good investment to the future, feeling like there are some positive things happening in the potential for the economy and for just creating your family, but you need to make sure that you are paying for the services that those young families need, right?

You cannot suggest that you compromise the integrity of an entire new cohort of kindergarten, grade 1, and grade 2 kids with a compromised education for those kids at that crucial time, when they're, say, seven years old, just learning language, just learning their basic math skills, just picking up those basic building blocks, those cognitive building blocks that they will carry with them for the rest of their lives, and compromise that for the sake of making a $4.5 billion hole in the budget, which would necessitate – I mean, everybody can figure it out. It means not hiring the teachers that you need, not hiring the nurses you need to provide the health care for that growing population, not building that infrastructure that everybody likes to salt their questions in during question period, asking about that school or that bridge or the twinning of that highway that your constituents need.

I mean, yeah, I think that's great to ask for those things. I think it's important to advocate for your constituents, but the cognitive dissonance – right? – the lack of logic that follows when you also vote so enthusiastically for a $4.5 billion corporate tax cut that you know, if you think about it for a minute, ultimately will undermine the ability of your same government to twin that highway, to build that bridge, to make sure that school is populated by teachers and support staff, and that the nurses are there to provide the health care for your family when you need it.

So think about all of those things. You know, it's a modest proposal to put two and two together like that. I'm not suggesting that anyone is less than capable of making those connections. It's just really, I think, useful to point them out. Again, looking at ways by which we can learn from other jurisdictions: we know that other countries have gone down the path of zero or low or no taxes, and if you don't have something to offer a corporation besides, you know, just a race to the bottom in terms of tax rates; if you're not offering a place by which you can have the diversification of an economy built in and the services that a corporation might look for if they're to move into a jurisdiction, which include good schools, health care, a cultural community – right? – affordable places, a clean environment in which to live, then you're not looking at the whole picture, Mr. Speaker.

I would suggest that Bill 3 – I know that this government wants to go big, wants to go bold, but, you know, let's take a sober second look and see other ways by which we can stimulate the economy besides just having all of our eggs in one basket, dropping it with a big, corporate tax cut, which is what Bill 3 would suggest.

So with those comments, Mr. Speaker, I thank you and look forward to debate. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Under Standing Order 29(2)(a) are there any members with questions and/or comments?

Seeing none, the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise and speak against this bill. It's interesting. Of course, we've managed to sit through a number of members' responses to the Speech from the Throne, and there are a couple of themes that I'd like to comment on in relation to this bill that I find highly ironic.

The first is that, of course, one of the things that a number of the members have said is that nobody believes in a handout but rather a hand up. Yet here we are considering a bill that gives one of the biggest corporate handouts in the history of the country of Canada, Mr. Speaker. It's funny that the members opposite seem to think that, you know, individuals don't deserve a handout, don't need a handout, but when it comes to the most profitable corporations in the province, of course, absolutely they need a handout right away. That's the third order of business that we're going to undertake here in the Legislature.

Of course, the second comment I heard in a number of the speeches is the deep religious faith, the Christian faith, that a number of members ascribe to, and I certainly do as well, Mr. Speaker. But my version of the Bible must be different from the ones that the members opposite read, because nowhere did I read in the New Testament that blessed are the shareholders. Yet that seems to be the mantra here of the members opposite. I don't know when Republican Jesus moved to Alberta, but it certainly wasn't taught in the churches that I've gone to in my life.

So here we are, of course, talking about enriching the shareholder class in this province; a failed strategy that we're going to try again because having seen it fail in the United States and various subnational jurisdictions in the United States as well as federally isn't good enough. We need to try it again here to see if it'll fail here. Of course the members opposite won't heed the warnings that we're providing them. But, you know, I guess they want to see it in action and actually inflict their plan on the people of Alberta just to convince themselves that it in fact won't work, Mr. Speaker.

One of the things that I want to raise that hasn't been mentioned by my colleagues here on this side is the issue of what corporations are likely to do when they receive this massive, multibillion dollar handout that the members opposite are proposing. That, in fact, is the – there's no other way to describe it – evil practice of stock buybacks, Mr. Speaker. Of course, there are a number of articles that have appeared in the Canadian media over the past few months. I'm looking at one that ran by the CBC, dated November 25, 2018, that said that Canadian oil and gas companies are “driving a rise in share buybacks that's already reached a record high [in 2018]. Some 627 million shares had been repurchased in 2018 for cancellation by 209 issuer companies as of mid-October.” Of course, that's about 135 million more shares than in all of 2017 and well ahead of the previous record high of 557 million shares, in 2007, according to statistics going back to 1989.

Now, before Ronald Reagan became President, the technique of stock buybacks was actually illegal in the United States because that was stock market manipulation, Mr. Speaker, and it was an unfair way, in the view of many people, of manipulating share prices to enrich shareholders without providing any actual concrete value to the people who are affected by the activities of the corporations that are being undertaken.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, this primacy of the shareholder class is reinforced by the analysts on Wall Street and Bay Street. There's a recent example, American Airlines. They had a record profit a few quarters ago, and they announced, much to the delight of their employees, that they were finally going to give their employees a long overdue raise so that their pilots and their flight attendants were actually making salaries that were on par with American Airlines' competitors in that business. What did the analysts at Citibank do? They complained in the pages of the Wall Street Journal that labour was getting too much and that shareholders had to be stuck with the leftovers. In fact, Morgan Stanley downgraded the value of the stock because of the company's plans to actually invest in its workers rather than giving money to the millionaires and billionaires who own the shares of that company. So we can expect nothing different if we go ahead with this reckless plan to cut corporate taxes.

Of course, I referenced a CBC article from November 25, 2018. There was a much more recent article that ran in the Financial Post that was dated May 15, 2019, saying that Canada's oil patch has the most cash in five years and nothing to spend it on, Mr. Speaker. In that article, of course, it outlined the oil patch's plan to buy back shares, and in fact it stated Canadian Natural Resources as one particular company that has allocated half of its cash profits to buying back its own shares.

The reason that this plan is detrimental to the welfare of the people of Alberta is because, you know, the Albertans who work hard and contribute to the prosperity of those companies, I think, deserve a share of those companies' profits, Mr. Speaker, and certainly when a company purchases the shares, it only serves to enrich the shareholders, many of whom aren't Albertans. We have to remember that the shares of many of the companies that are operating in Canada, in Alberta are held by people who don't live in this province. Of course it enriches the CEOs of many of these companies because a significant portion of their pay packages is derived from stock options rather than cash. Of course, by manipulating stock prices through the practice of stock buybacks, the CEOs will see a significant bonus in their annual pay while workers receive nothing. Of course, that's not fair.

Mr. Speaker, you know, the evidence is quite clear that 90 per cent of working Albertans, 9 out of every 10, haven't seen a raise in their income for a significant number of years. In fact, even as the economy of Alberta has become more productive, it's only the top 10 per cent of income earners who are seeing any appreciable gains in their incomes. Everybody else is being left behind. So we have this situation where millionaires and billionaires are continuing to make more money, corporations have more money in their bank accounts than they've had for the past five years, and we're just going to give them more that they can use to enrich themselves again through this process of stock buybacks. I think that just shows where the priorities of the government are. They are clearly on the side of the millionaires and billionaires of this province, not interested in the welfare of working people even though they profess they are.

You know, the people of Alberta will be gravely disappointed when the jobs that the members opposite are promising won't appear and, in fact, the giant corporate tax cut that the members opposite are proposing is used to enrich the shareholders of the companies and the CEOs of the companies and Albertans are left with nothing. They won't see a raise in their wages, there won't be an increase in jobs, and of course the province of Alberta will struggle to pay its own bills because we'll be 4 and a half billion dollars short at the end of all of this, which will come directly out of the health care and the education services that keep people healthy and educated and actually able to go to work for the employers that the members opposite so strongly favour.

Mr. Speaker, what I'd like to see is, you know – and of course, we can't get into this at this stage – perhaps some conditions attached to this massive corporate handout, that it shouldn't be just given to corporations without consideration for what they intend to spend it on. My hon. colleague from Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview quite rightly articulated that there need to be conditions attached to these massive corporate giveaways in order for the people of Alberta to see some kind of benefit from it. Of course, we have seen nothing yet from the members opposite to suggest that the money that they're so intent on giving to profitable corporations in this province will actually be invested in the things that create jobs and spur growth in our economy.

Mr. Speaker, for all of those reasons, I think that it's incumbent upon us to vote against this measure. I would highly suggest that the members opposite go back to the drawing board and come up with some different ways to spur economic growth and job creation in this province because we quite clearly know from past experience that massive corporate tax giveaways are not going to create jobs and prosperity for the middle-class Albertans that we're here to serve. It will only enrich shareholders and CEOs, people who, you know, are probably not at the top of our priority list when it comes to listing the people who need the help of the people here in this place.

Mr. Speaker, with that, I would encourage all of my colleagues here in the Legislature to vote against this bill, and of course I would advise everyone to carefully consider some other ways to create economic prosperity and good jobs for the people of Alberta.

The Acting Speaker: I will take this opportunity to first remind the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar to table a copy of the article or articles that you referred to during debate.

Under 29(2)(a), I believe, the hon. Opposition House Leader, Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'll thank the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar for his comments, and I do want to ask him to share – you know, I appreciate his comments as far as this bill and what it's proposing – or maybe hear some thoughts, from the member's comments or from the member, on other ways that we can support economic growth and job creation.

But before I get to that, Mr. Speaker, I want to take a moment to clarify comments that I made earlier. Quite frankly, I think many businesses in Alberta know – but I want all businesses to know – that I stand with them. As minister of economic development and trade I fought very hard daily to advance the interests of businesses throughout the province and, quite frankly, around the world. Now, I do want to apologize for the way that I characterized my remarks. Quite frankly, there's no question that the carbon levy did add burdens to businesses, some more than others. I think, unfortunately, I probably chose a poor choice of words in how I framed it.

But I think that, you know, the opposition is simplifying the last four years, the challenges that businesses have faced predominantly because of the global drop in the price of oil. That is to say, Mr. Speaker, that there is a recognition that the carbon levy that we introduced was a cost to businesses. We did try to offset that cost by reducing the small-business tax rate by a third. Again, with that I by no way or means meant to try to blame or lay the burden on businesses for the fact that the carbon levy was for many a very real challenge and did increase costs. We tried to mitigate that.

I'm proud of Alberta businesses. We have led the country in economic growth, even in the downturn, the last couple of years. We know that Albertans are resilient entrepreneurs, and Alberta really is the economic engine of the country and the lifeblood of this country, Mr. Speaker. I'm proud of the fact that within our province, Alberta businesses continue to pay the lowest taxes in the country. Again, you know, there is a significant tax advantage here because we have no PST or other forms of taxes.

[The Speaker in the chair]

Again, Mr. Speaker, I think I wanted to take this opportunity to apologize for my remarks, to clarify them to all Alberta businesses, recognizing that the price on carbon has posed a challenge for some, has resulted unfortunately, for some businesses, in pushing them over the edge.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I will ask the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar to offer some thoughts on other ways, other than just reducing the corporate tax rate, to potential supports for Alberta businesses.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar. There's approximately a minute and 30 seconds left in 29(2)(a).

Mr. Schmidt: Oh, well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I always appreciate your guidance in these matters. I want to thank the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview for his question. I also want to congratulate him on his apology. As someone who is no stranger to making apologies, I have to say that he did – you know, I'd give him maybe a C-plus or a B-minus. I'm sure that with practice he'll get a little bit better.

Mr. Speaker, I think my colleague from Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview, in his initial comments on this, highlighted some of the good ways that we could actually spur investment, the successful ways that we could spur investment in the Alberta economy. Of course, he mentioned the Alberta investor tax credit and the capital investment tax credit. Those had demonstrable proof of spurring investment and creating jobs here in Alberta. I can't recall if the member also mentioned the interactive digital media tax credit which our government created, which, of course, is helping many businesses in the interactive digital media world locate and be successful here in Alberta.

The Speaker: Thank you to the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

If I could just encourage everyone that getting good at apologies is not a wonderful thing to aim for, certainly from the Speaker's perspective.

Is there anyone else that would like to speak to the bill? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

Mr. Dang: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I really am pleased to be able to rise today and speak to Bill 3, the corporate tax giveaway act. I think it's something that, really, all members of this Assembly should be excited to debate, and we should be proud to be able to be here at this hour and speak about this important work.

I mean, it's something that is really interesting. We have a government that talked about making sure they take care of vulnerable Albertans, especially in their maiden speeches that they made earlier this evening. We had government members who talked at great length about how they wanted to make sure they were protecting families and communities. Then we see a bill, Mr. Speaker, that comes forward, and really all it does is that it gives a big giveaway to their wealthy friends and donors and leaves many, many Albertans behind.

Mr. Speaker, I know that the Premier, when he comes up with these bills and ideas for bills, has a fondness for Ottawa. I know that the Premier comes from Ottawa and has been in Ottawa for decades, but he doesn't need to replicate everything in Ottawa. We can see that when the corporate tax cuts were implemented under the Harper government, that the Premier was a member of – I mean, over four years they decreased corporate tax rates from 22.1 per cent to 15 per cent, so very similar to what's being proposed here – they actually collected $13 billion less than they would have if the Harper government hadn't made that change. I know that the Premier is very fond of what happened in Ottawa, what happens in Ottawa, and I know that the Premier may wish to return to Ottawa one day, but perhaps bringing losses in government revenue from Ottawa to Alberta isn't the move that we'd like to see here.

I mean, we can look at what happened. We can look at how businesses accumulated billions in cash reserves as a result of the cuts, but the Bank of Canada governor, Mark Carney at the time, said that it was mostly dead money and that there was no significant impact on investment. In fact, if we actually look at some other organizations like the Canadian Centre for Policy Alternatives, they even suggested that not only did this result in no new investment in Canada but that it actually resulted in a reduced growth rate to the Canadian economy.

We've seen this happen right here in Canada at the national level. We've seen it happen, as members in the opposition have already spoken to tonight, at the subnational levels and national levels in other governments as well. I think it's pretty clear that when you do big, risky, ideological tax cuts like this, it doesn't result in the investment that the government would like. It doesn't result in the investment that the government pretends it will.

Mr. Speaker, I think that's not a shame for anybody other than Albertans. When you give away 4 and a half billion dollars out of the provincial budget, nearly 10 per cent of the provincial budget, who suffers is Albertans. It means that you don't get to do the things like hire teachers and nurses, it means that you don't get to do the things like build support services and fund social services across the province, it means you don't get to invest in communities, and it means you don't get to build the services that Albertans rely on.

When we talk about these big, wealthy corporate tax giveaways and how they're so important for spurring investment, I think we really need to look at the evidence. The evidence, whether we look at the United States under the Bush administration and their large tax cuts or in Kansas under their large tax cuts as well, that both the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar and the Member for Edmonton-North West spoke about quite a bit, at length, tonight – I think it becomes abundantly clear that these tax cuts hurt ordinary people. They help large corporations, they bolster the bank accounts of wealthy businesspeople, but, Mr. Speaker, ordinary Albertans like you and me get nothing. We get left out to dry. Really, what it means is that our families and our communities and our neighbours are the ones that have to suffer.

I mean, I think that's actually the real shame here. We can see time and time again that perhaps there were some wealthy donors and wealthy corporations that contributed quite heavily to the government's PACs, political action committees, and so forth, Mr. Speaker, and perhaps they do want these big tax breaks. Perhaps they do want 4 and a half billion dollars in handouts. But I think that 4 and a half billion dollars could go a lot further if we invested it in families, if we invested it in communities.

Mr. Speaker, we've seen through these cases at the national and subnational levels and right here in Canada that these massive giveaways to the wealthiest 1 per cent produce no new jobs, they produce no new investment, and they produce no new sources of income for families. I think that's something that when we look at these so-called responsible conservatives and fiscal conservatives, when we look at these so-called people who are convinced that they need to do everything they can to support the economy, the evidence shows that it shrinks in some cases or does nothing for economies.

I think that when we see these types of numbers, it becomes abundantly clear that the Conservatives in the government aren't necessarily trying to grow the economy, but they're wanting to make sure that their friends are taken care of. Now, I wouldn't presume that motive on anybody, but I would definitely say that legislation like this doesn't back up the evidence, Mr. Speaker. I think that that is something we should all be concerned about in this Chamber, especially if we're trying to make sure our communities get the services they so deeply need.

We've seen this government do this time and time again. We've seen the government go into employees' pockets with the pick-your-pockets bill just a few days ago, Mr. Speaker, and we see, as they move forward with legislation like that, that now they're willing to take the money out of employees' pockets with one hand and give it back to corporations with the other. I think that's a shame. I think that is something that we really need to take a look at and say: "Is this fair to ordinary workers? Is this fair to people that depend on working every day to feed their families and to pay their mortgages?" I think that we need to take a serious look and say: "We understand there absolutely was a massive collapse in oil prices in the last four to five years. We understand that there are definitely fiscal targets and economic indicators that we need to meet targets on." This is something that's very important for us, but we need to make sure that we can balance a budget without putting at risk our services.

The government has now been revising their projection to balance: 2022, 2023, maybe 2024. I don't know. The number seems to change any time it's asked. Despite that, what we do know is that if you take away 4 and a half billion dollars from the coffers with one hand, like this bill proposes, it certainly does not mean you would be able to protect the rest of the services and not have to have significant cuts. Mr. Speaker, 4 and a half billion dollars: that's a lot of dough. I mean, if you shook me upside down, 4 and a half billion dollars would not fall out. But 4 and a half billion dollars pays for a lot of schools, a lot of highways, a lot of hospitals – well, one hospital – and that's the type of money that would make a difference in the lives of Albertans. Instead, the government wants to make a difference in the lives of the wealthiest 1 per cent.

I think that's something that the members of the opposition will fight against every single day because we know that that 4 and a half billion dollars should be used to ensure that Albertans get the services they deserve. It should be used to ensure that they have health care when they need it. It should be used to ensure that they have teachers in every classroom and that classes will not have 40, 50, 60 students, that they will not have to be taking courses, like in Ontario, online.

I think that it becomes clear that this type of government giveaway – really, it's an expenditure, Mr. Speaker. It's really a reduction in revenues, an expenditure. In the balance books it will look the same. It will look like a 4 and a half billion dollar hole. And if they're going to create a 4 and a half billion dollar hole, why don't we invest it in families? Why would they prefer to give it to wealthy corporations? Why would the government prefer, in this case, to give it to people who really don't need it? As we saw when this was introduced in Ottawa – I know the Premier saw it happen in Ottawa and perhaps was involved and voted on it in Ottawa as well – why does the Premier want to pad the pockets of the wealthiest 1 per cent while letting families suffer?

That is something that I am very concerned about. It's something that I think we should not stand for in this Assembly, it's something that I think we should not vote for in this Assembly, and I really urge members here to really consider the implications of blowing a giant hole in the provincial budget. I understand that the Conservatives here were elected on making sure there was a meaningful path to balance. I really believe that that is something important as well. I believe that we do need to make sure that we have a handle on our books.

But, Mr. Speaker, it becomes very clear that if you took 10 per cent of the revenue in your household away – I assure you that that is not the way to balance your books. If you are spending money and you decide, "Well, I'm going to keep spending money because these services are essential to me, things like health care and education, but I'm also looking to take away 10 per cent of my revenues to give to my friend," that's not responsible bookkeeping, and I think the government should recognize that. If they don't, I think that's something we should be very concerned about as the opposition and as Albertans.

I mean, we saw this happen also in British Columbia, at the subnational level. In British Columbia they cut corporate taxes from 16.5 per cent to 10 per cent. Politicians in British Columbia, just like here in Alberta, just like the Premier here in Alberta, said that this would pay for itself because the province's economy would grow X per cent, Mr. Speaker. We can see that it grew a little bit, but actually in the same time period as that cut what happened was that the province's debt load doubled. It actually doubled. We can see pretty clearly that when we talk about these types of tax cuts, they don't create those jobs. They don't improve the provincial government's books. In fact, in most cases it actually increased the debt load of the government, which should be fairly self-evident. If you decrease your income, your debt load will go up if you're spending. If the self-proclaimed fiscal conservatives don't understand the simple concept that if you take away a significant amount of your income and give it to the wealthiest 1 per cent, it's going to hurt the province's books and that if we do that, it's going to have to come from somewhere – we've already heard members of the Conservative Party here talk about how these cuts are going to hurt.

Mr. Speaker, I did not come here to this Assembly and I was not sent here by the electorate in Edmonton-South to hurt Albertans. I was sent here to make sure that we could support them in whatever way we can. I was sent here to make sure that we did good fiscal policy and invested in good services. When we look at what is being proposed today in this bill, I think it's something that members should take a very hard look at and consider whether it's what they were sent here to do, whether they were sent here to give a giant giveaway to the richest 1 per cent or whether they were sent here to represent their community and try to find opportunities to invest in their communities.

Mr. Speaker, we can look at the corporate tax cuts and say, "Absolutely, we believe we do need to find a way to create jobs and investment in Alberta; we absolutely do need to do that work," but the evidence shows that this doesn't work every single time. It is a risky, ideological approach that will not work, and it will end up hurting Albertans, and it will end up hurting the government. I think that's something that we as an opposition have an obligation, a duty, really, to oppose and to let the members of the government know that this will not work.

We presented the evidence. I know that a number of my colleagues will be tabling documents to that effect in the near future here. Really, we can look at it, and we can look at economists from a number of reputable institutions such as a survey conducted in 2012 by the University of Chicago; a leading economist from MIT; Harvard; Yale; the University of California, Berkeley; the University of Chicago; Stanford; Princeton; and Northwestern. They found that not a single economy believed that cutting federal taxes would raise enough taxable income so that there would be a five-year return without the tax cut.

Mr. Speaker, when you look at these leading economists, people who fiscal conservatives proclaim they believe in – fiscal conservatives proclaim they understand the economics – and we look at this and see that they really haven't done anything at all around the research, that's very concerning to me. It's very concerning to me that the Premier is willing to go forward with these risky, ideological cuts that will hurt. Four and a half billion dollars and risky, ideological cuts that then come back and hit families right where they need it most: right in their health care, right in their education. That's something the opposition will never stand for. That's something that the opposition will always fight against. We will always fight to make sure that fiscal policy brought to this Chamber is responsible, is researched, and is something that works for Albertans, not something that works for the wealthiest 1 per cent.

I'm very proud to be able to stand up here and say that. I'm very proud to say that my colleagues here in the Official Opposition believe that as well. We want fiscal policy that actually makes sense, not ideologies, not dogma, not anything that the government wants to ram down the throats of Albertans without consultation. Really, Mr. Speaker, I think it is our responsibility as legislators here today to say: we are not standing for ideology; we want responsible governance. So we should vote against this.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Thank you to the hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

The ordinary Speaker recognizes the Minister of Service Alberta and Member for Strathmore-Brooks, Chestermere-Strathmore . . .

Mrs. Aheer: Something like that – thank you, Mr. Speaker – and Minister of Service Alberta, too. Woo-hoo. I'm all over the place tonight. Thank you so much, and thank you for the enthusiasm of the member across the way.

We had this wonderful thing called an election recently, and the most fabulous part about that was the immense consultation. I have to speak, based on the fact of having been in this incredible House for four years prior to actually being in government, to be able to discuss the importance of consultation, the importance of actually reaching out to people. We are here based on a mandate of consultation, in fact, a 28-day, very impactful consultation, where Albertans actually voted in favour of the very piece of legislation that the member is criticizing at this point in time. I have to believe that of the thousands of doors that all of us knocked on – the people that we spoke to, the understanding that they had about how it is that we bring back an advantage to this province, the importance of actually honouring business in this province, the thousands of jobs that are created by this sector in various places.

To be truthful, Mr. Speaker, the previous government and the impact that their policy had on big business and small business and our resource sector and the attacks on the resource sector and the attacks on our resource development, our responsible resource development, the inability to actually stand up and speak on behalf of this sector, especially when outside of this country, the inability to be able to stand up and say that we are the best in the world, that we bring people together – hundreds of thousands of people came to this province because of what this province offers. The information that we got at the doors every single day, day in and day out, was the need to have a government that understands business, that understands the mechanism of the fabric that built this province, whether that's small business or large business.

The fact that the opposition continues to attack business on a regular basis is absolutely astonishing to me, especially given the impact of how it was that Albertans voted in the last election. This isn't a surprise to anybody, especially not in this House, especially to the opposition. It was a platform commitment that we took out to the public, completely transparent, everything there in order for them to make a savvy decision based on information, nuanced information, I might add, that was given to them on a regular basis.

Mr. Speaker, the question that I have is: if Albertans, who knew what they were seeing, who understood the platform, who were absolutely able to make their own decisions based on what was given to them in a very strong platform, in a very, very strong mechanism, by 87 people, whichever side you were on, going out door to door, plus all of their volunteers who knew the background and knew the policy and were able to talk about it – in fact, I'm sure that the opposition can concur that these weren't small conversations at the door. These were long, 20-minute, in-depth conversations around fiscal policy and how to build the province. Where do you think this policy comes from? It comes from the very people of this province who know how to run business, who understand how it is that we make this province be the very best place it can be.

We have a former government here that aligned themselves with a federal government that attacked an industry that funds the entire country's prosperity. That actually attacks the very reason that we function in this province. You want to talk about schools? You want to talk about class size? You want to talk about all those things? Well, you know what? It was the previous government's policies that actually waylaid the opportunities to be able to do any of that because of their attacks on an industry that actually pays for all of those services in this province. Do you want to talk about bad policy? Why are we in a situation right now where we cannot figure out how it is that a previous government that said that they care so much about people were not able to reduce class sizes, were not able to do all of the things that they're saying that we can't do based on the inability to have any policy that actually came forward to build this province up?

Thank you.

The Speaker: We are on Bill 3. Are there any other members wishing to bring some debate? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to discuss Bill 3, the Job Creation Tax Cut (Alberta Corporate Tax Amendment) Act, and to express my concern with this plan that the government has proposed.

We put a plan forward that was responsible to balance the budget. Our plan balanced the budget by 2023-24 while making life more affordable. We wanted to invest in schools and hospitals and strengthen our economy.

I was just recently at my daughter's grad on the weekend last week. She graduated grade 12, and, Mr. Speaker, a lot of the conversations that were happening with the students, with the staff, with parents was about concern over what was happening with our economy and what the government was proposing to do to it. They didn't see this as a solution. They're worried about what this means to our province and what it means to our children and what it means to everyday Albertans that want to be able to access hospitals that aren't in disrepair and want to be able to send their children to school to learn in environments that are productive for learning, environments where they aren't at 45-50 students in a classroom.

Just this week the Member for Edmonton-Glenora and I went to one of the schools in my riding to talk to the teachers and to talk to the support staff there about what their concerns were with education. They told us that they were going to be reducing their staffing by 1.6. What did that mean? That means that some of the students come to school without an aide. There was a teacher that requires an aide in her classroom for one of her students who has severe autism, and that might not happen next year with their budget.

They're worried, Mr. Speaker. They know that the kids that we have in our school systems need support. They need smaller classrooms. They need the reliability on funding. They need to know that when they send their children to school, there are proper supports in the classroom for them. Looking at what this is proposing, I don't see that. I see some major cuts that are going to happen to our schools and hospitals, and it's concerning. They are conversations that people are having at dinner tables all across the province. I know that they're having them in Edmonton-Castle Downs.

People reach out to me expressing grave concern for the future of our classrooms and our hospitals to pay for this massive tax cut for corporations. I know that our loved ones are going to suffer and that no one can see the benefit from this tax cut. I know that people are talking about this plan from the UCP, and I've heard comments about it having an economic whiplash. It's very concerning. It's a plan that seems to be ill conceived, and frankly we heard this evening that this plan has failed in every jurisdiction that it has been tried. It's just concerning. We're opposed to any plan that guts classrooms and shuts hospitals in order to pay for a massive tax cut to corporations.

What's more is that the corporate tax reduction doesn't generate a dollar of economic return for two years, Mr. Speaker. Premier Kenney's own election platform made that clear.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Point of order.

Ms Goehring: Oh, I apologize.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Thank you. It keeps happening, though, guys.

Ms Goehring: Names. I'm sorry. It's late.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Yeah. Fair enough. I accept the apology.

Ms Goehring: Ultimately, Mr. Speaker, we know that this plan that they've put forward is not the right plan for Alberta and for families because we know that they're going to suffer as a result of this. [interjections]

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: House leaders, if you would like to continue your discussion, please feel free to do so in the peace lounge.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs, would you like to proceed?

Ms Goehring: I'm good. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Are there any others wishing to add questions or comments on 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, we are on the bill. Is there anyone who would like to add additional comments or debate? The President of Treasury Board is not here to close debate.

Mr. Jason Nixon: He declines to close debate.

The Speaker: Wonderful.

Seeing none, I would like to call the question.

[Motion carried; Bill 3 read a second time]

Bill 2

An Act to Make Alberta Open for Business

Ms Ganley moved that the motion for second reading of Bill 2, An Act to Make Alberta Open for Business, be amended by deleting all of the words after "that" and substituting the following:

Bill 2, An Act to Make Alberta Open for Business, be not now read a second time but that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Alberta's Economic Future in accordance with Standing Order 74.2.

[Adjourned debate on the amendment June 4: Mr. Copping]

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, I rise on 13(2). I hesitated to do it during the vote, but I would like you to explain why you referred to the Minister of Finance's absence.

The Speaker: I just would respectfully ask that the Government House Leader wait to be addressed by the Speaker. While he might like to call a point of order and, of course, that would always be the Government House Leader's prerogative, it is a requirement that the House leader would be addressed by the Speaker. Having said that, I would be more than pleased to withdraw my comments with respect to whether or not the President of Treasury Board is, in fact, here or not here.

We are on Bill 2, the amendment REF1. Is there anyone wishing to speak to the amendment?

[Motion on amendment REF1 lost]

The Speaker: We are now back on the bill. Any members wishing to speak to Bill 2?

Member Irwin: I move to adjourn debate on Bill 2.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

The Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader is rising.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Yes. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'll start with this one. Pursuant to Standing Order 3(1.2) I wish to advise the Assembly that there shall be no morning sitting, Wednesday, June 5. I think I don't have to vote on that if I recall.

I will move to adjourn the Assembly, then, until tomorrow, June 5, at 1:30 p.m.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 11:29 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Wednesday, June 5, 2019

Prayers

The Speaker: The prayer. Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and her government, to Members of the Legislative Assembly, and to all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideas but lay aside all private interests and prejudice and keep in mind their responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all. Amen.

Please be seated.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Hon. members, in my gallery, the Speaker's gallery, this afternoon it's an absolute pleasure to introduce some of the family members of two of our hard-working pages. Kiki Reed's parents, Tracey and Kelly Neufeld; her sister and former page, Jordyn Reed; and her grandparents, Susan and Rudy Neufeld, are proudly looking on this afternoon. They will no doubt be watching her quick attentiveness to members' desires. I hope that you will put her through her tests this afternoon.

Also with us today to see their daughter in action is Rebecca Hicks' father, Scott Hicks. Please join me in welcoming the pages' families to our Assembly.

Hon. members, I have some additional guests that I will now introduce to the House. I'd just ask that you keep your applause all the way until the conclusion of the introductions. Guests of the hon. Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions: all the way from British Columbia, Giuseppe Ganci and Jared Nilsson. Guests of the hon. Minister of Education: Dr. Vivian Abboud, Lorrie Jess, John Jagersma, Simon Williams, Barry Litun, Bevan Daverne, Ryan Stierman, and Susan Lang.

Members' Statements

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

Education and Health Care Funding

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Now, it's been just over a month since this UCP government was sworn in, and the impact of their actions is already being felt across the province. From Peace River to Taber, school boards are bracing for massive cuts. The silence of the Education minister on funding education has resulted in school boards forcing parents in Calgary to decide whether their children's class sizes will grow or if they'll have a music program. When asked, the UCP say that information is coming soon.

Now, because the Education minister seems only willing to provide messaging rather than the essential funding school boards need to serve students, schools in Calgary are forced to preemptively deny special-needs students their right to enrol in school. When asked, the UCP called it a board procedural issue.

School boards across this province are warning parents that the school nutrition program, that provided meals to 33,000 kids in 200 schools, might vanish. In Westlock school boards are warning parents that the school fees our government eliminated will be coming back because of the UCP.

Because of the Health minister's in-due-course attitude when it comes to funding our essential services, ambulances are being kept off the roads in Calgary because of staff vacancies. The Health minister also chose to put a healthy dose of ideology in front of Alberta's best interests when he and the UCP stopped construction on the critical Edmonton superlab.

My constituents are worried about the UCP's track record of imposing these cuts without a hint of consultation. They can see the impact of the UCP policies on health care, education, and the services that they desperately rely on. They are worried about what the UCP has planned for Edmonton.

It's only been a month, Mr. Speaker, but the UCP are living up to the promises made by the Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul. It is going to hurt.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lesser Slave Lake would like to make a statement.

Lesser Slave Lake Area Wildfires

Mr. Rehn: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm honoured to rise and speak to you today about the heroic efforts currently being undertaken to contain the wildfires spreading in and around Lesser Slave Lake and to aid those people affected. The vast boreal forests that cover my riding have provided our communities with so much, but they can also make us vulnerable to the whims of Mother Nature. Since the start of the wildfire season there have been 95 wildfires and more than 216,000 hectares destroyed in the Slave Lake forest area. The fires have forced thousands from their homes, some carrying little more than the clothes on their backs, while yet thousands more remain under evacuation alerts, uncertain of what the coming weeks will bring.

Amongst this chaos the one constant has been the brave and selfless individuals that step up in our communities in order to help their fellow Albertans in times of need. The heroism and bravery displayed by the first responders, municipal governments, and all those helping throughout the province are truly inspiring. A particular thanks goes to Tyler Warman, mayor of Slave Lake; the chief of the Bigstone Cree Nation, Silas Yellowknee; Marcel Auger, reeve of the MD of Opportunity; as well as Gladys Okemow, chief of the Peerless Trout First Nation, for their exceptional leadership in these trying times for their communities.

As of Sunday there were 24 helicopters, 60 pieces of equipment, 346 firefighters and support staff fighting these wildfires. People across Alberta have joined in to help us battle the fires and save our communities.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to say thank you to all those helping to keep Lesser Slave Lake and the entire province safe, and I encourage everyone to do what they can to help support their efforts. These heroes embody the Alberta spirit and spread the message throughout the north that when tragedy strikes, you are not alone. You are courageous and resilient. You are Alberta.

Lethbridge Concerns

Ms Phillips: Mr. Speaker, Lethbridge does not have a voice in this cabinet, so residents are relying on me to advocate for our city. Southern Alberta has one of the worst opioid crises in Canada, but the scale of the problem is something that we've known for some time. In 2015 downtown business, fire, EMS, city officials, health care providers and the police services asked our government to act. We responded to their request for a safe consumption site. We committed to new funds for an intoxic facility, new detox beds, and new supportive housing. The safe consumption site in Lethbridge prevented 855 overdoses in one year alone. Those are lives saved. Those are people who lived to get help.

When downtown Lethbridge was struggling with crime and drug activity, the city and the province worked collaboratively with front-line health workers and law enforcement. We now have a well-run needle debris program and a new neighbourhood watch program. I know that this has made downtown more livable, walkable, and has renewed optimism among downtown business owners. I know this because my children and I walk, shop, and live in downtown Lethbridge.

I am not sure that the next steps that Lethbridge asked for and that we delivered will be continued by this Premier. Lethbridge's pleas for supportive housing and expansion of intox and detox are now being heard by a Premier who has twice travelled to Lethbridge and insulted our police chief over this issue. It is my role to advocate for my city to a Premier that didn't see the need for a voice from Lethbridge in his cabinet. I will fight to make sure Lethbridge has the supportive housing it needs. I will stand up to defend our public services, law enforcement, downtown small business, and represent all the women and men who work so hard in our local public health care system.

I hope this Premier eventually learns how important the city of Lethbridge is to our province and learns to treat us with respect.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster-Wainwright.

Irma School Expansion

Mr. Rowsell: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today I'm privileged to rise and tell you and my colleagues the fantastic story of the upgrades and expansion of Irma school. Between its opening in 1950 and now, the only capital spending was for modernization in 1984. In the 2015-16 capital plan the Buffalo Trail public school board of trustees designated Irma school to be their primary capital project. In combination with support from the community of Irma, which at the time was seeking to build a new community hall, the board proposed to construct enhanced space to be used jointly for education and community usage.

1:40

In April 2017 the board approved a proposal to expand the school facility by 556 square metres. This expansion was estimated to cost nearly $1.7 million. The village of Irma pledged $350,000 for the expansion, and the MD of Wainwright pledged $750,000. Unfortunately, this wasn't quite enough, so they turned towards fundraising. Both personal and corporate donations were accepted, ranging anywhere from $100 to $100,000, with two large community events serving to bolster the donations. The first event, held on April 1, 2018, raised over $200,000 for the expansion. The second event, held on April 6, 2019, raised over $240,000. To date the enhancement society has raised $2 million, exceeding the original goal by $300,000. Mr. Speaker, this is all from a town of around 400 people. The additional funds have been dedicated to other upgrades in the building.

Mr. Speaker, this is a fantastic and inspiring story of a community banding together in order to improve their local school, and I am incredibly proud of the people of Irma and the MD of Wainwright for accomplishing such a wonderful feat.

The Speaker: The Member for Sherwood Park is rising to make a statement.

Strathcona Christian Academy in Sherwood Park

Mr. Walker: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Alberta's children deserve a world-class education. In order to ensure that our new government's commitment to world-class education is realized, promoting and protecting school choice is critical and is a key component of our agenda. School choice ensures educational quality, diversity of programs, and that every individual child and their parents are able to find a school model that works best for them.

In that vein, Mr. Speaker, it is my honour to highlight a family of schools in Sherwood Park that are a great example of how school choice strengthens Alberta's education system. These schools are members of the Strathcona Christian Academy, or SCA, group, which has an elementary school and a secondary school. Founded in 1980 as private schools, SCA Elementary and Secondary follow the Alberta learning curriculum for kindergarten to grade 6 and grades 7 to 12, respectively, and deliver instruction with a Christian perspective. Mr. Francis Poole is the principal of SCA Elementary, and Mr. Jon Elzinga is the principal of SCA Secondary.

SCA joined the Elk Island public schools in 1998 and now operates as an alternative Christian program under its umbrella. Both schools serve over 575 students each year. The schools' teachers are government certified and are committed Christians who support the academy's mission. SCA students perform well academically and athletically, and both schools contribute greatly to the prosperity of Strathcona county.

Mr. Speaker, SCA Elementary and Secondary schools are excellent examples of how school choice ensures excellence in education. I am proud to be part of a new government that respects, is firmly committed to, and values school choice in our education system.

May God bless SCA. Go, Eagles, go. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Support for Business

Mr. Loewen: Yesterday the NDP House leader rose in this place not to offer amendments or to represent his constituents; instead, he rose in this place to stay true to his party's left-wing, antibusiness ideology. He attacked Alberta's job creators, those very people who offer gainful employment to the folks looking for work, those job creators who put their lives and livelihoods on the line to create the prosperity that people come to Alberta to enjoy.

That former minister, whose government was soundly rejected by a record number of Alberta voters, said that if a business is facing hardships, if a business is struggling with thousands of dollars in additional costs foisted on them by the NDP carbon tax, if that business is facing the prospect of closing its doors, too bad, so sad. He said that they should have had a better business plan. While the now Official Opposition was imposing the carbon tax that they didn't even tell Albertans about in their election platform, a record number of Alberta businesses closed their doors for the last time. The suggestion that businesses should just somehow be able to absorb "paying a few thousand dollars extra a month" speaks to how totally out of touch that opposition party truly is.

The NDP oversaw billions in investment leaving Alberta, thousands upon thousands of job losses, more than 170,000 unemployed Albertans, and a record number of business closures, and their House leader has the audacity to say that those people should have just had a better business plan or found new management.

I am proud to say that Albertans heard that message loud and clear and put this province under new management. On this side of the House we are proud to scrap the NDP carbon tax. We are proud to make this province the best place in the country to invest in, to create jobs, and to start a family. What's sad is that this opposition is still trying to attack the very people who make Alberta prosper.

Introduction of Bills

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education has a bill to introduce.

Bill 8

Education Amendment Act, 2019

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today with great privilege to introduce for first reading Bill 8, the Education Amendment Act, 2019.

This legislation, through a series of amendments to the Education Act, will strengthen and modernize Alberta's education system. I believe that amending the previously passed Education Act, which was first introduced in this House in 2012 and continued to be consulted on until 2018, will allow it to serve as a blueprint for the education system for years to come. The amendments we are introducing today will bring stability and help the province's transition to the Education Act occur more smoothly.

I look forward to discussing and debating the important amendments included in this bill with the House in the very near future. I am both proud and honoured to move first reading of Bill 8.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[Motion carried; Bill 8 read a first time]

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last night in my speech on Bill 3 I made comments that corporate tax cuts don't actually result in more jobs or increased wages for workers but, instead, enrich the shareholder class by allowing share buybacks. In that speech I referenced two articles. One was titled Oilpatch Share Buybacks Drive Record High Totals on Toronto Stock Exchange, from the Canadian Press, dated November 25, 2018. I have the appropriate number of copies of that document.

I also have another document here, dated May 14, 2019, entitled Cash-rich Canadian Oil Firms Favor Buybacks as Other Options Narrow.

The Speaker: Are there other tablings of returns or reports? The hon. Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaides: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have a backgrounder report entitled Hate Speech and Freedom of Expression: Legal Boundaries in Canada, that was produced by the Library of Parliament. The report highlights the robust legal mechanisms that Canada has in place to prevent the use of hate speech and discrimination towards individuals and other groups. As we move forward with our mandate to implement the Chicago principles on free speech on campus, I thought it prudent to inform this Assembly and all Albertans that implementing the Chicago principles will enhance, not erode, our commitment to the safety and well-being of all Albertans.

The Speaker: I'd just caution the hon. minister that Tabling Returns and Reports isn't an opportunity to make a statement that you would not otherwise be able to make but often just a brief description of the document that you're actually tabling.

Are there other tablings today? I see the hon. Member for Calgary-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to table a copy of a letter that was provided to Calgary police by the members of the South Asian community over their concerns with rising gang violence and illegal drugs in our communities. I have the requisite number of copies of that.

Thank you.

1:50

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The Leader of the Official Opposition.

Gay-straight Alliances in Schools

Ms Notley: It was like a slap to the face; it was like everybody in the world hates you: those are the words of Jane MacNeil describing efforts to set up a GSA at a Calgary Catholic school in 2016. The school tried to change the name, they sent Jane to counselling, and they never established the GSA. All of this occurred under Bill 10, exactly the law this Minister of Education wants to restore. To the minister: why are you putting your ideology over Jane's education, her feeling of safety, and her mental health?

The Speaker: The Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. Under the new Education Act we will have the most comprehensive GSA, QSA, inclusive legislation in Canada. I've been in contact with students recently from the LGBTQ-plus community, and they have told me that they are really looking towards the balanced approach that we are putting forward.

Thank you.

Ms Notley: The minister's characterization is absolutely untrue.

I have a very political battle to fight right now; I was hoping I wouldn't have to fight it, but it's a battle nonetheless: that, Mr. Speaker, was Calgary grade 12 student Sean Ruhland reacting to the election of this UCP government. He's involved in a GSA, and he vowed to stand up against this minister's plan to roll back protections for LGBTQ students in their schools. To the minister: shouldn't Sean be studying for his diplomas instead of having to fight to protect himself from you?

The Speaker: The Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. Proclaiming the Education Act will make Alberta schools the most diverse, excellent classrooms that all Albertans desire and deserve. It modernizes our education system by replacing a piece of legislation which originally was introduced in '88. We will have the most comprehensive GSA, QSA pieces of legislation in all of Canada.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The Leader of the Official Opposition has the call.

Ms Notley: Once again the minister has repeated something that is not true.

This is saving lives; this is everything that my life and my friends' lives and so many strangers' lives depend on when they're at this age: this was Amelia Troughton, a student at Victoria school. Now, while that school here in Edmonton will probably continue to protect LGBTQ students through strong policies, supported GSAs, and strict privacy rights, we know that at least half the schools in this province will abandon this job with the permission and tacit encouragement of this minister, Mr. Speaker. To the minister. GSAs save lives. Why are you going to literally put those lives in danger?

The Speaker: The Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. I categorically disagree with what has just been said. We will have the opportunity for students to form a GSA, a QSA, or any other inclusion group that so meets their needs. This will be the strongest legislation in all of Canada, and I'm very proud to put forward the Education Act that will support it.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. the Leader of the Official Opposition.

Ms Notley: Allow me to explain to the minister, Mr. Speaker. Reversion to Bill 10 removes the obligation to have an LGBTQ-supportive policy, thereby allowing schools to discourage kids from asking for GSAs. It removes protection from being outed, thereby scaring kids away from GSAs. It removes government enforcement provisions, thereby allowing schools to block GSAs. Minister, be honest. You know that as many as half of boards will abandon GSAs, and you're okay with it because your values are more important than the safety of those kids. Why not just admit it?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. I again disagree with what has just been said. Under section 35.1(1) of the Education Act it specifically guarantees student entitlement to create inclusion groups, including GSAs and QSA alliances. Students cannot disclose a student's membership in any inclusion group as a matter of routine as there are student privacy considerations that trump other legislation. What I heard from students that are in these organizations is that they want balance.

Thank you.

Ms Notley: Your vested interests want balance. Those are the only people that want balance.

It is clear from what we heard from the minister that she's not listening to these students, not at all, and she has a duty to protect them. Cathy Hogg, president of the Public School Boards' Association of Alberta, said: our association a hundred per cent supports the protection of this vulnerable population, and safe and caring schools are extremely important to us. To the minister. The PSBAA advocates for 24 schools boards and hundreds of thousands of students. Why won't you listen to them at least?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. I will enlighten the other parties as to what happens when a student would like to participate in a GSA inclusion group. Under section 35.1(1) of the Education Act it identifies the steps for establishing a GSA. Those steps are very plain language. Students can ask to be part of it, the principal permits the GSA, the principal designates a staff liaison, and so on and so on. It is very well spelled out. There will be protections. There will be strong antibullying policies and a strong safe and caring schools policy.

Thank you.

Ms Notley: The bill won't work, it didn't work before, everyone over there knows it, and she's not being straightforward. Now, when the UCP's John Carpay, you know, the guy who equated the . . .

Speaker's Ruling

Addressing Questions through the Chair

The Speaker: Sorry. Hon. Leader of the Official Opposition, I'm very apologetic. I've let it slide a number of times. You might just send your comments through the Speaker, not refer to the minister as "she" or otherwise. It would be appropriate for you to send your questions through the Speaker.

Ms Notley: So I should refer to the minister as "they," Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Point of order.

Mr. Bilous: Point of order.

Gay-straight Alliances in Schools

Ms Notley: When the UCP's John Carpay, you know, the guy who equated the swastika to the rainbow flag, challenged GSA protections, the court said that GSAs in no way restrict the rights of parents or schools to continue to impart their religious and moral values to their children. To the minister: why are you so driven to roll back protections for LGBTQ students that you're ignoring them, elected school trustees, and the courts?

The Speaker: I just might note two points of order at approximately 1:56 and 1:57.

I see the Government House Leader rising to answer.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to answer this question. It's disappointing to continue to watch the opposition go forward with these tactics. The hon. Minister of Education has done a very good job this afternoon of answering the questions that have been asked, making it clear the protections for GSAs will remain in place even under this legislation. She went so far as to even read the legislation to confirm that. I will be clear. Bill 10, which was supported by all the legacy parties who represent this current party and the opposition party at the time, remains in place. GSAs will be protected, and it doesn't matter how much the opposition wants to yell and scream; those are the facts.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Two days ago I asked this Education minister . . .

Mr. Jason Nixon: Point of order.

Member Irwin: . . . why she hasn't done a thing to support LGBTQ youth. She keeps saying that she's looking for balance. As a former teacher and administrator let me paint a realistic picture for this minister. An LGBTQ student is walking down the hallway through a gauntlet of homophobic and transphobic insults. The student's school tells them that they can't have a support club because they find the words "gay" or "queer" uncomfortable. They quit school. Mr. Speaker, this actually happens. This is what Bill 10 allowed. Is that the minister's version of balance?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, we have in our schools very strong safe and caring schools policies. We also have very strong antibullying policies.

As far as trying to get a GSA established in your school, that will absolutely still be able to happen. That is very clear in the Education Act, and it will continue.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In 2016 this Education minister told a right-wing online news site that it was not necessary to, quote: create additional policies for one group. She was referring to the work of our government to fix that mess that was Bill 10. In my last question I gave the minister a crash course on just how hard things were for LGBTQ youth without solid legal protections for GSAs. Does the minister understand now why one group, LGBTQ youth, needs additional protections, and if she doesn't, should she really be the minister?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, again, it's so disappointing to watch these tactics. This is a very important issue and a conversation that's certainly worthy of this Chamber. The Education minister has been taking her time answering those questions today, making it clear that GSAs will be protected, something that all sides of this House supported. In fact, all sides of this House supported Bill 10, to make that clear that GSAs need to be protected going forward and are an important process within our schools. It is shameful to watch this continued attack, personally, on the Education minister, who is doing an excellent job of answering those issues. I suggest the opposition takes some time and listens to what she has to say.

Member Irwin: What's shameful is putting our kids at risk.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This minister says that Alberta will have the strongest protections for GSAs in the country once she's through, but it's not true. We called our Bill 24 An Act to Support Gay-straight Alliances.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Point of order.

Member Irwin: By reverting to Bill 10, we will be enshrining a toothless law that doesn't support students. To the minister. I guess we should call your bill An Act to Destroy Gay-Straight Alliances.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. Again, I would have to categorically disagree with the hon. member. We will have the strongest legislation on GSA, QSA, and inclusion groups. Oftentimes they forget the rest of it, the inclusion groups piece. What is in the privacy legislation that will govern this is FOIP and PIPA, and that actually supersedes, so there will be privacy legislation that will ensure that the private information of a student is safeguarded.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora has a question.

School Nutrition Programs

Ms Hoffman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. School boards are bracing hard for the cuts this Education minister is planning. At Pembina Hills, trustees anticipate the school nutrition program will be cut, a program that feeds 33,000 students across our province. Research shows better academic performance when kids are fed. To the Education minister: is feeding hungry students so they can learn a priority for your government?

The Speaker: The Government House Leader is rising.

Ms Notley: How hard a question is that?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, it's always great to hear from the Leader of the Official Opposition heckling away. This is the ridiculous behaviour that continues to come from the NDP, but I digress.

Instead, about the question. The Minister of Education and this government and the Premier have been clear about the importance of funding education. We'll be working through the budget process as we go through it and making sure that that is dealt with one hundred per cent. It's a priority of this government. We made that clear inside our platform as we campaigned to come to this place. Again, Mr. Speaker, through you to them . . .

An Hon. Member: Point of order.

Mr. Jason Nixon: . . . I encourage the hon. members to bring some decorum back to this place. I suspect that's why they sit on that side of the House, because they continue to act that way.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

The point of order is noted.

Ms Hoffman: Let's try this for decorum. To the Government House Leader: will the 33,000 kids that go to school getting lunches be fed next year . . .

Mr. Jason Nixon: Point of order.

Ms Hoffman: . . . or will they be hungry, in need of school lunches, Mr. Speaker?

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. We've been very clear, I've been very clear that we are committed to funding education. We will be building schools. As to the specifics of this, boards are in the best position to decide where they're going with things, but as far as – you know, what I have to say is that instead of playing politics and speculating on education funding, which we've been very clear about, I encourage my colleagues to wait for further information.

Thank you.

Ms Hoffman: Students throughout Alberta arrive at school hungry. That is a fact, and key messaging from the minister doesn't fill empty stomachs.

Given that 150 students at St. Gregory the Great school, one that the minister was a school board member for and screamed the praises of this program, will the minister let those 150 students go to school hungry next year, or will they and the other 33,000 students actually get a school lunch? Yes or no? Are you feeding hungry kids . . .

Mr. Jason Nixon: Point of order.

Ms Hoffman: . . . or are you going to let them starve in their classrooms?

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. As a former trustee I totally understand the pressures that school boards are under to make these decisions, but we have said that we will be continuing to fund education. It is a priority for us. Students are looked after every single day. We care about these kids, and we will do the right things for them.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Calgary Construction Environmental Concerns

Mr. Ellis: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. The Calgary ring road borders several communities on the edge of my riding, Calgary-West. This significant transportation infrastructure project has raised some concerns for my constituents, especially when it comes to the power poles being placed by Enmax. In particular, they are concerned about the impact that these poles may have on their health and quality of life. Can the Minister of Transportation please share what our government is doing to address these concerns for my constituents?

The Speaker: The Minister of Transportation.

Mr. McIver: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think the hon. member is right in having empathy for his constituents. Construction leads to temporary diminishment in quality of life just by the nature of the noise and the other disruptions. The location for the infrastructure is decided through a process that requires Enmax to file an application with the Alberta Utilities Commission for approval of the proposed transmission lines. I will commit to following up with the member. He has expressed interest in finding a time to meet with his constituents on this issue, and I will try to make that happen.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Now, given that the ring road is subject to provincial jurisdiction – I understand that, once completed, it will fall within the provincial noise level average of about 65 decibels over a 24-hour period. However, there are several urban residential communities in my riding that directly parallel this new construction, and given the uniqueness of the situation, will the minister consider adhering to the city of Calgary's lower noise level guidelines of 60 decibels to ensure that residents are not negatively impacted by the noise?

The Speaker: The Minister of Transportation.

Mr. McIver: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Most Albertans love roads, and most Albertans dislike the noise from them. It's a fact of life. Noise attenuation measures are planned for the community of Signal Hill together with construction on the ring road. Lots in Discovery Ridge bordering the ring road were within 20 to 30 metres, and the road was moved 30 metres away to try to accommodate that. I invite the hon. member to continue to work with my office on this issue and discuss the noise attenuation issues for Springbank Hill, Discovery Ridge, and Signal Hill.

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-West.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. These are serious concerns. Given, again, that the ring road will closely border several residential communities in my riding, which will include communities such as Discovery Ridge, Signal Hill, and Springbank Hill, will the minister commit to narrowing the lanes of traffic and implementing sound attenuation measures such as berms and walls to further minimize the impact that the noise is having on these communities?

Thank you.

Mr. McIver: Well, Mr. Speaker, I'll reiterate to the member that noise is a real issue. I understand that. Noise studies are carried out on an ongoing basis once the road is in operation. Noise attenuation measures are planned, and I will assure the hon. member that once the road is complete, more noise levels will be studied to see if additional measures are needed to be put in place. I will review with the member based on that factual information once the road is up and operating.

Speaker's Ruling Addressing Questions through the Chair

The Speaker: If we can just pause the question period clock for a brief moment while I – obviously, all members will know that points of order are dealt with at the end of question period, but just to try to create a sense of a go-forward path here this afternoon, as I've heard a number of points of order, I'd like to provide some clarity around my comments with respect to the interjection that I made to the Leader of the Official Opposition. Questions and answers should be directed through the chair. Of course, everyone knows that that's page 610 of House of Commons Procedure and Practice. Members may refer to members or ministers in the third person, as we saw earlier with reference to "she." However, earlier today we also heard members refer to people as "you," in the second person. This was the heart of the interjection.

I'm happy to provide more comment after question period once I have the benefit of the Blues, but I would encourage members to make sure that they are directing questions through the chair and defer "you" or direct lines of communication as we are a little bit excitable here this afternoon.

With that said, if the clock can resume, I'd like to hear from the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

2:10 Education Funding

Ms Phillips: Mr. Speaker, 30,000 kids get a nutritious meal every day from the school nutrition program, and in Lethbridge the school board tells us that they not only feed kids during the week, but for some of the lowest income parents, they actually send weekend food parcels home with kids. The public board is preparing for cuts to these programs. It's the kind of help lowest income children need, and it's what's at stake with this Minister of Finance's cruel and heartless dithering on education funding in September. Will the Finance minister confirm with this House that he will direct the necessary funds towards the school nutrition program to properly fund it in September?

The Speaker: The Minister of Education is rising.

Member LaGrange: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. Again, I want to reiterate that our priority is to look after every single child under our care. We have over 700,000 students.

Before I go any further, I just wanted to share with the House that there was an accident this morning. A contracted bus carrying Grande Prairie Catholic grade 8 and grade 9 students from the Celtic Sports Academy to Bear Lake pulled out onto the highway and was struck by a semi. Twenty-five students were on the bus, but we hear that they've been assessed by first responders. It appears the students suffered only bumps and bruises. We're sending our thoughts with those families. I just wanted to make sure that we knew that.

Ms Phillips: Mr. Speaker, given that the minister did not campaign on cuts to inclusive education in the Peace-Wapiti region and given that the classroom improvement fund supported a number of services for children with disabilities in his own constituency, what is the minister's understanding of the future of these programs if he does not fund them?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We were clear during the campaign period, we were clear with Albertans that we will continue to maintain education funding and, at the same time, look for every opportunity to deliver a world-class education system in a more efficient and intentional manner. I've got great faith in our excellent Education minister to do just that.

Ms Phillips: Mr. Speaker, given that the classroom improvement fund supports speech-language assistance, literacy, and math interventions in Peace-Wapiti and given that one student in Peace-Wapiti reported that the programs gave them "the only adult in my life that cares about me," how will the Minister of Finance go home and explain to his constituents that he cruelly waved his wand and made those programs disappear?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, the member opposite has talked about some excellent educators and some good programs that are meeting the needs of Albertans. As I mentioned earlier, we're committed to maintain funding for education. We believe that we can be fiscally responsible with taxpayers' dollars and deliver world-class programs.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-McCall.

Drug- and Gang-related Violence in Northeast Calgary

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Residents in northeast Calgary are terrified over the rise in drug trafficking and gang violence. The Calgary police have confirmed that four members of the community have been killed in three different attacks since the beginning of the year. To the Solicitor General: are you aware of this situation, and what specific actions have you taken to address it so far?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, I'm aware of the matter, and we're reaching out to these parties and co-ordinating with my colleagues here to meet with them to talk about the concerns that they addressed. Obviously, we take matters of policing very seriously. Also, we want to make sure that all Albertans know that we want to make sure that all Albertans feel safe in their communities, and we'll make sure that we reach out to stakeholders to make sure that they are heard on this matter.

Mr. Sabir: Given that hundreds gathered at Nelson Mandela high school and marched to Saddle Ridge police station over the weekend to raise their concerns and given that a representative with Progressive Cultural Association Calgary said, and I quote, "We can save our kids before they have to kill each other," again to the Solicitor General: what other supports is your ministry providing to protect our children and warn them about the dangers of associating with gangs?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, again, our party is committed to making sure that Albertans feel safe in their communities. As our campaign promised, throughout Alberta we want to make sure that our police and front-line services have the resources they deserve. We're going to be making sure that we fund programs like ALERT to deal with drugs and gangs and human trafficking, and make sure that our front-line services have the resources they need to do their jobs. We've had increasing crime across Alberta. We're going to make sure that we address this head-on.

Mr. Sabir: Given that my constituents and those in other northeast ridings need to see a police presence in their communities and given that we are already seeing evidence of cuts to sports for students in our schools, will the Solicitor General agree that funding our classrooms and social programs for our youth is more important than a risky corporate tax?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned earlier on, I'm looking forward to meeting with the stakeholders referenced in the northeast of Calgary to talk further about their concerns regarding this matter. Our government is committed to making sure that our front-line police officers have the resources that they need to do their jobs and make sure that Albertans feel safe in their homes. That's a commitment our government has made. I want to make sure that all Albertans know that we take that seriously.

Support for Business

Mr. Guthrie: Mr. Speaker, the NDP oversaw a record number of business closures as they imposed their job-killing carbon tax. Can the Minister of Finance please inform this place of what steps the United Conservative government is taking to undo the damage caused by the NDP?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, yesterday in this Chamber the former economic development minister said, "Companies are going out of business because of the carbon tax" – I'm sorry; if paying a few thousand dollars extra a month means you went out of business, maybe you need to take a look at your business plan." It should be obvious to everyone that the NDP have absolutely no idea of what it takes to run a business and create jobs, and that is what has led us into this economic mess that we now find ourselves in. We're extremely proud of having just lowered the cost of doing business through the elimination of the carbon tax.

Mr. Guthrie: Mr. Speaker, given that the NDP House leader rose yesterday to attack Alberta's job creators by suggesting that they should be able to absorb "paying a few thousand dollars extra a month" caused by their carbon tax and given that Albertans rejected the NDP in record numbers and given that the United Conservative Party has a clear mandate to implement a new plan to make it easier to invest in Alberta, can the minister please inform the House on progress being introduced to make Alberta the best place to invest in Canada and to create jobs?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, in addition to lowering the cost for business by limiting the carbon tax, we're introducing other pro-business – that's right; I said it: pro-business – measures. Our job creation tax cut will create 55,000 jobs, grow the economy by $12.7 billion. Unlike the NDP, we do not hate businesses and understand that wealth is created not by taxing job creators to death but by allowing them to grow and thrive in our province.

Mr. Guthrie: Mr. Speaker, given that the NDP House leader's callous remarks in this place indicated that the opposition party does not understand that "paying a few thousand dollars extra a month" is a real hardship for Alberta job creators and given that the NDP oversaw record job losses, more than 170,000 unemployed Albertans, and record business closures, can the minister please inform this House on how businesses are reacting to the NDP war on job creators?

The Speaker: I just caution the hon. member. I sometimes struggle to grasp how it might be possible to use a quote without using a preamble. As such, I would just remind members that all questions after question 4 should be phrased without preambles.

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, our office has received many calls from businesses who are excited and eager to bring jobs back to Alberta. The past month we've done more to renew that advantage than the NDP did in four years of government. By scrapping the carbon tax, reducing red tape, and making our corporate tax rate more competitive, we will bring back those jobs and families that fled our province.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

2:20 Public-private Partnerships for Capital Projects

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We know there are important infrastructure projects all across this province. From high schools to hospitals and dams to ring roads, we need public infrastructure that works for Albertans. Given that because of the Conservatives' risky ideological experiment in P3s in 2015, schools in Edmonton were left with bright orange fencing where fields were supposed to be and principals weren't even allowed to heat their schools based on contractual issues, will the Minister of Infrastructure commit to not repeating this failed ideological experiment?

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, it's really rich coming from that member, who was part of the government for four years. They had four years to build public infrastructure efficiently. They failed. Albertans decided on April 16. They gave us a mandate to build public infrastructure that will build prosperity for Albertans, and we're going to do that.

Mr. Dang: Sounds like kids will just have to play in the mud, Mr. Speaker.

Now, given that the city of Edmonton tried this risky experiment in P3s for the valley line LRT and given that this risky experiment has now resulted in indefinite delay and given that the mayor of Edmonton has called on you to not force P3s down the throats of municipalities, will the minister commit to not forcing municipalities to pursue your ideological agenda?

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, on April 16 Albertans elected this government, which campaigned on our platform. We clearly said that we will aggressively pursue P3s to build public infrastructure faster, within budget, and safely, and that's what we're going to do.

Mr. Dang: Sounds like we're just going to be hearing about more delays, Mr. Speaker.

Now, given that P3 projects are not only failing in Alberta but we can see that in Scott Moe's Saskatchewan, the North Battleford hospital, which has only been open for two months, already needs its entire roof replaced, will the minister commit to not repeating the mistakes that we're seeing elsewhere and not build our health care with this dangerous P3 model?

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, the public-private partnership approach was adopted all over the world before this member was even born, okay? [interjections] There are merits in doing – our government will take a case-by-case approach, and if there is a business case for a P3, we'll likely pursue it, but there are different procurement methods. We apply those based on an individual project's business case.

The Speaker: I might just mention to the hon. minister that, as you saw, that type of language moves in the direction of a personal attack on the Member for Edmonton-South. I would encourage you to choose your words wisely.

Transportation Projects

Member Loyola: Mr. Speaker, it's critical for public transportation that the city of Calgary get the long-overdue green line, and I'm proud that our government worked to ensure that this project would move forward to keep Calgarians moving. Will the Minister of Transportation commit that this NDP priority will continue as originally designed, with the original timelines as well, or will he just rely on the Premier, once again declaring that he was the first supporter of the green line but offering no real plan to build this important project?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Transportation.

Mr. McIver: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I, first of all, would like to thank the hon. member for reminding Albertans that the Premier in his time in Ottawa actually put forward one of the first large chunks of money – I think about a billion and a half dollars – towards the green line. Further – wait for this – I would thank the previous government for about matching that.

Yes. As we promised in our campaign, we will go ahead with the LRT projects in Calgary and Edmonton as we committed as part of our platform.

Member Loyola: Given that the UCP has said that nonpriority projects may be cancelled or delayed, will the minister tell us if the Fort Saskatchewan bridge, which is necessary to support proper flow of traffic in the Industrial Heartland, will continue on time, budget, and with the original scope?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Transportation.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would say to the hon. member that the bridge in Fort Saskatchewan is a very important project, and as we go forward with our capital planning and budgeting process, it will be considered in a very serious way. We will make those announcements when the time comes. We understand just how important that project is, and we'll consider it with great seriousness.

Member Loyola: Given that the folks in Medicine Hat and Lethbridge deserve to be connected, will the minister commit to making the rural transportation pilot in this region permanent? Why or why not?

Mr. McIver: Well, Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the question. The question is extra interesting. The fact that it's a pilot means that the previous government didn't see fit to make it permanent. We will evaluate the pilot as the pilot continues and make decisions based on how we best meet the needs of Albertans and how it fits in our capital and budget planning process.

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-South East has a question.

Provincial Fiscal Deficit and Credit Rating

Mr. Jones: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The NDP government's reckless accumulation of debt gets a lot of attention, and rightly so. Alberta's credit was also impacted, seeing six downgrades in only a few years. Credit downgrades increase our cost to borrow and result in higher interest payments on the debt we have, potentially taking money away from essential services like health care and education. For the Minister of Treasury Board and Finance: can you comment on the difficult task ahead, not just in paying down Alberta's debt but in repairing Alberta's credit?

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, I'd like to thank the member for the question. Credit ratings do matter as they directly affect the cost of borrowing to the provincial treasury. Credit-rating agencies did not like the NDP government. In fact, in the four years that the NDP held office, Alberta's credit rating was downgraded six times. They managed to drive us so far into debt that the interest payments alone are now higher than the budgets of 17 out of 21 government departments. I can confidently say that we will be doing things differently.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Jones: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Minister. While Alberta's credit was deteriorating, one of the primary rating agencies stated that they were hoping to see a more deliberate effort to address the deficit by the former NDP government. Can the minister comment on the deliberate efforts his ministry and our government are taking to address the deficit and repair our credit?

The Speaker: The Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The member is absolutely correct. The state of the province's books is unacceptable. Under the NDP Alberta's debt-servicing costs tripled: $1.9 billion dollars now go to bankers and bondholders, not to health care or education. That's socialist economics for you. What do socialists do when they hit the debt wall? They tax even more. The NDP raised taxes and fees 97 times. Once again I say: we're doing it differently. We've already repealed the carbon tax. We're bringing back 55,000 jobs to Albertans.

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-South East.

Mr. Jones: Thank you again, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Minister. Given that, like many Albertans living under the previous government, these rating agencies consider Alberta's fiscal outlook negative or unstable due to the previous government's financial decisions and given that we have made a commitment to Albertans to clean up our credit and our finances, does the minister see a path to improving the outlook of our credit rating, and can he comment on what the rating agencies will be looking for from us in that regard?

The Speaker: The Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We are reducing taxes and creating economic capacity in the province. There's a path forward here, and it begins with fiscal stability, responsibility, and predictability. The credit agencies will be looking for us to reduce our spending and get to a balanced budget, and, unlike the NDP, the credit-rating agencies will see that we are serious. Like I've said, our government's approach will be different. We're bringing back prudence and vigour to the budget process. Albertans expect us to balance the budget, and that's what we'll do.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Postsecondary Tuition Fees

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday I asked the Minister of Advanced Education if he would keep the tuition and instructional fee protections in place, and he did not provide anything that resembled a clear answer. Now I think I know why. Last November this minister posted the following on social media, and I quote, reducing tuition has no impact on increasing enrolment. To the minister: were you really claiming that keeping tuition rates affordable does not allow more people to actually access postsecondary education?

The Speaker: The Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaides: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, as I had addressed yesterday, the tuition freeze has been going on for about four years, and it's still in place for the 2019-2020 academic year. Subsequent to that, current legislation already exists tying tuition increases to the rate of inflation. I had an opportunity to meet with representatives from CAUS, that's, of course, the Council of Alberta University Students, and we were able to sit down and discuss some of their immediate priorities. I look forward to continuing to work with them and other student groups from across the province.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, there's nothing that resembles answering a question with that first one. Let me try again.

Given that the minister also posted, and I quote, "Sadly, freezing tuition will not make Alberta postsecondary education more accessible," and given that the tuition cap introduced by our government has saved students, on average, over $2,000 over the course of a degree, to the Minister of Advanced Education: given that you clearly oppose a tuition freeze, just how high will you raise the price of postsecondary education for students while your government doles out billions to . . .

The Speaker: The Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaides: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Accessibility is incredibly important, and that's why we have committed to providing various investments with organizations such as Careers: the Next Generation and Women Building Futures, so that we can help encourage more people to pursue entry into the skilled trades and other vocational opportunities. We want to expand the registered apprenticeship program as well, doubling the number of high schools that that organization works with. That's all tied to accessibility, so we have clear action there.

Mr. Eggen: Well, Mr. Speaker, given that this minister's views on downloading costs to postsecondary students are on display for everyone to see on social media and given that his comments will certainly spur a great deal of anxiety amongst students, parents, and teachers, I'm going to ask the minister one more time: will you reject your past views on tuition controls and pledge to this House now to keeping the tuition freeze intact for the duration of the term?

Mr. Nicolaides: Mr. Speaker, I have to say that I agree with the member opposite. Students have a lot of anxiety because they don't know if they're going to have jobs at the end of their degrees. Regrettably, the entire economic climate – because of their high tax and debt policies, the economy is on its knees. We're taking action to make sure we get our economy back on its feet so that our students and our graduates can have good jobs at the end of their programs.

Environmental Programs

Mr. Schmidt: Well, Mr. Speaker, it's quite clear that when the members opposite speak about jobs, they're not talking about green jobs. Energy Efficiency Alberta delivers a host of programs that help Albertans save energy and money. Before our government established this agency, we were the only jurisdiction in North America that didn't have one. But in March the Premier told reporters that after they won the election, those programs would be gone. Is the Minister of Environment and Parks still planning to cancel those programs?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, the Premier and I have been very, very clear. We will not be going forward with the direction the NDP did, which was taking hard-working taxpayer dollars and investing them in buying light bulbs and shower heads for Albertans. It was fundamentally rejected on April 16 by the people of Alberta. We have a different approach. We're going to be focused on climate change working through our TIER program, working with our largest emitters, which is the bulk of the emissions that happen inside our province, bringing forward and working on innovation, and actually trying to tackle the problem. Again, it just comes down to a fundamental difference between the UCP and NDP. We're focused on actually accomplishing something; they were focused on taxing people.

Mr. Schmidt: Mr. Speaker, we are focused on tackling climate change, the single most important . . .

Some Hon. Members: Preamble.

An Hon. Member: Point of order.

Mr. Schmidt: . . . emergency facing humanity. Given that we are now hearing that the UCP is backpedalling on its promise to roll back these savings to Albertans and given that the UCP has also opted for Justin Trudeau's carbon tax, can the minister please explain how he will now fund EEA programs given that the only source of revenue that supports them is gone?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, I'm glad the hon. member brought up Justin Trudeau's carbon tax. The fact is that this opposition, when they were in government, spent their time trying to shore up and be an ally with Justin Trudeau. We have a different focus. We have been able to stop the NDP carbon tax now. Our next focus, as has been presented by our Premier and our party, will be to fight Justin Trudeau on his carbon tax. We fundamentally reject any carbon tax. We'll continue to support Saskatchewan and Ontario and other provinces that are fighting it. We'll continue to stand up for Albertans when it comes to the carbon tax. Again, just a different approach between these two parties.

Mr. Schmidt: Mr. Speaker, their approach involves hiring lawyers while firing people who are working in energy efficiency.

Given that Energy Efficiency Alberta created 4,000 jobs and given that these programs generated almost a billion dollars in economic activity and saved Albertans half a billion dollars a year and given that the UCP government is intent on giving $4 billion to billionaires, can the same minister explain why helping homes and businesses to save on their energy costs and reduce pollution is less important than writing cheques to their donors?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, I will tell you that the single biggest thing that we could do to help Albertans with their energy bills was to terminate and kill the carbon tax once we got inside this place. I'm proud of that. As for the hon. member referring to lawyers, this is the difference between Alberta's new government and Alberta's old government. Alberta's old government was focused on working with Justin Trudeau to cause pain for Albertans. That's what they were focused on. This government will be focused on defending them, and we will use every means possible, including legal challenges, to be able to defend Albertans. That's our approach; again, very, very different. The biggest approach we'll have is that we'll be working to get Andrew Scheer elected as the next Prime Minister of this country.

Emerald Foundation Environmental Awards

Mr. Orr: Mr. Speaker, for the minister of environment. I was pleased to see that a rural constituent of Lacombe-Ponoka, Mr. Lloyd Dahl, was the recipient of a lifetime achievement award at last evening's Emerald Foundation awards, that recognize environmental leadership in the province. Can the minister tell me a bit more about Mr. Dahl's background and how passionate many rural Albertans are about their environment?

The Speaker: The Minister of Environment and Parks.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. First of all, Mr. Dahl was born in 1929 in central Alberta, where both the hon. member and I are from. His childhood was spent farming land, mainly by hand, and helping others in the area where they farmed. While working for the village of Alix, he developed many parks and playgrounds around the community. He also developed the Alix Lake campground and the Haunted Lakes campground north of Alix. Mr. Dahl is exactly the person that the United Conservative government wants to partner with when it comes to conservation. It was exciting to see him receive his lifetime award, and I congratulate him on that.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lacombe-Ponoka.

Mr. Orr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that Mr. Dahl is a truly fine example to all Albertans when it comes to quiet, self-motivated, and principled leadership on the environment – he just rolls up his sleeves, goes to work, and gets things done – can the minister tell me about some of the specific work around Alix Lake and Haunted Lakes that he was honoured for last night?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, in 1997 Mr. Dahl retired and began to dedicate his volunteer life to Alix Lake and the Alix Nature Trail Society, formed in 1999. He helped to develop the beautiful nature trail around Alix Lake, including birdwatching facilities and points of interest signage. He's been an advocate for Alix Lake for more than 40 years, raising awareness for lake health issues and ways in which the community can get involved in caring for the lake resources. At 90 years young he still tries to walk a portion of the trail every day to check on its well-being. Again, those are who we want to work with on conservation in our province.

Mr. Orr: Given that the made-in-Alberta Emerald Foundation awards are in their 28th year and Alberta is the only province in Canada that honours environmental stewardship in this way, can the minister speak a bit more about the foundation itself and how Alberta has and will continue to lead the world in environmental stewardship?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, thank you to the hon. member for the question. The foundation connects the province's environmental leaders and provides year-round programming that engages, informs, and emboldens environmental stewardship in our province. The Emerald awards have recognized and celebrated the outstanding environmental achievements of large and small businesses, individuals, not-for-profit associations, community groups, youth, and government groups for nearly 30 years. And, again, they're exactly the kind of people that the United Conservative Party and Alberta's new government want to partner with to work on conservation.

2:40 Rural Crime Prevention and Law Enforcement

Mr. Sigurdson: Mr. Speaker, crime continues to be an ongoing issue for my constituents within Highwood as well as all over rural Alberta. After numerous town halls and conversations with residents, rural Albertans want the government to address skyrocketing crime rates in rural communities. There is mounting frustration all over Alberta but especially in rural communities that crimes are being committed by repeat offenders. To the Minister of Justice: what do you intend to do to stop the current revolving door of our justice system?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, this is the number one issue that I hear about from rural Albertans. I also want to thank the hon. member for his leadership on this matter and continued thoughtful advocacy on this. Over the last four years, we've seen crime rates skyrocket across so many of our rural communities. We are committed to ensuring that our law enforcement officials have the tools necessary to do their jobs. We're going to create police/Crown high-risk and repeat offender units in each judicial district to provide recommendations for early release for repeat and high-risk offenders. We're also going to be putting forward our public's right to know act.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Highwood.

Mr. Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the strain on policing is increasing as the scope of their duties continues to expand, including the requirements of policing cannabis, to the Minister of Justice: what are your plans to ensure adequate funding for rural police enforcement?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, unlike previous governments that wanted to hand out free light bulbs, we're going to be making sure that our police officers have the resources they need to do their jobs. We're going to be making sure that ALERT has funding of $50 million to tackle drugs but also making sure that we tackle gang activities across Alberta. We're going to make sure that our police and prosecutors have the tools they need to do their jobs.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Highwood has the call.

Mr. Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As rural areas are geographically vast, there's a growing frustration about long response times to 911 calls to help rural Albertans protect themselves, their loved ones, and their property. To the Minister of Justice: what steps are you willing to take to deal with the long response times in rural areas so residents finally feel safe?

The Speaker: The Minister . . .

Mr. Schmidt: Yeah. It takes two years to investigate a leadership race.

The Speaker: The Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar will see that the Speaker is on his feet, and as such he will keep his comments to himself.

The hon. Minister of Justice.

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that we'll be implementing the United Conservative Party's Alberta crime strategy. We're going to be expanding the use of electronic monitoring technology to ensure that law enforcement is able to respond more quickly. We're also going to be reviewing the Crown policy manual to ensure that we take into consideration the challenges faced in rural Alberta.

The Speaker: Hon. members, we are at points of order. I'm not sure if we would like 30 seconds to head to the lounges or if everyone would like to stay and observe the points of order. Perhaps I'll give those who would like to head out just a couple of brief seconds to do so. [interjections]

Hon. members, please take your conversations to the lobbies. I believe that the Government House Leader rose first.

Point of Order Language Creating Disorder

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. We do have several points of order today. Some of them we may be able to roll into one, but the first point of order that I rise on will not be able to be rolled into some of the other ones that happened afterwards.

I rise first today under 23(h), (i), and (j) in regard to the Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition in this place today. I believe that her actions create disorder when she does this, and I will describe what I'm talking about momentarily, Mr. Speaker, but I wanted to refer you to the standing order.

Unfortunately, we've seen the Leader of the Opposition do this outside of this Chamber to you. The reality is that you have been elected as the Speaker of this Chamber. When you rise and take control of the House, we must respect that even when I disagree with you and the same for the Leader of the Opposition. She again, in that moment that I called that point of order, challenged your authority. I would submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that that creates disorder in this place. I was shocked to see her do that on Twitter or in press releases in the past, but that's not relevant to this Chamber. I'll grant you that.

That behaviour needs to stop. It's unbecoming of a Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, it's inappropriate, and it is causing trouble inside this Chamber. I would ask that you correct members to make sure that they respect your authority, particularly when you're standing up.

There's a standing order to question your decisions. The hon. Leader of the Opposition is welcome to use that. I used it last night, 13(2), in case she's unaware of it. That is the appropriate process to deal with that.

We must respect the chair, or we will have the things that we've seen take place in this House today.

The Speaker: Thank you for your interjections. I'm not sure that I need your assistance on this particular interjection, Opposition House Leader. I think the Speaker is very well equipped to decide when a point of order is indeed necessary with respect to challenging the chair. I think we've seen on a number of occasions the Speaker perhaps more than willing to do so with respect to interjecting when people have made comments that may or may not have been directed towards the chair. As such, this is not a point of order.

The Official Opposition House Leader.

Point of Order Oral Question Period Practices Addressing Questions through the Chair

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, it's interesting. I rise on a point order under 23(h), (i), (j), and I think what we saw today is the Government House Leader jumping up on countless points of order which weren't, in fact, points of order. I mean, it appears to me that the Government House Leader actually thinks he has your job, which is to ensure that there is decorum in the place. That is not the role of any other member, to be telling members or scolding them on what they do. Quite frankly, what the Government House Leader is doing is infringing on members' rights to express themselves in this place. If they do cross a line, then you will call them to order or such.

Mr. Speaker, we're going to be arguing a number of different things because the Government House Leader popped up about 15 times, and I think, quite frankly, many of those were because he didn't like the fact that the opposition is holding the government to account and asking tough questions. That is our job, as the Government House Leader knows very, very well, and I will argue in subsequent points of order that how our opposition is acting is no different than the Government House Leader's caucus when they were in opposition. Yet somehow now the shoe is on the other foot, and we shouldn't be asking pointed questions to the government. I think the Government House Leader needs to review the point of question period and how this place works.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Are you handling this, or do you want me to respond to it?

The Speaker: Yeah. I will organize how we do points of orders around here.

I might just add, you know, that I didn't require an intervention from the Official Opposition House Leader on the first point of order. I'm not convinced that I need an intervention from the Government House Leader on this particular point of order.

The Opposition House Leader will be very well aware that any member can call a point of order at any point in time should they feel as though one is warranted. In addition, the Speaker may also interject and call a member or the House to order whenever he or she sees fit as well. As such, there was no language that created disorder with respect to calling points of order. While you may disagree with the Government House Leader's tactics with respect to calling points of order, certainly that in itself is not a point of order.

What I will say, though, to what I believe were points of order 1 and 2 and some of the confusion that the chair may have created, as I referenced during question period – and, of course, by now you've all double-checked to see what page 610 in House of Commons Procedure and Practice says – on a number of occasions, including in the first question, the Leader of the Official Opposition asked the question to the minister: "why are you putting your ideology . . ." Then, additionally, in the following question she said: "instead of having to fight to protect himself from you." Then, additionally, she said: "Why are you . . . literally [putting] lives in danger?"

It is not the practice to direct a question directly to a minister or member inside the Chamber, as I noted in my ruling in the middle of question period. If the Leader of the Official Opposition had chosen different words such as "Why is she," or otherwise, "putting individuals at risk," or perhaps the most appropriate path forward would be to say: why is the minister doing this? That was my interjection at the time. It did create confusion because I also used the word "she," which was inappropriate. I hope that this can rectify a number of the points of order that the Government House Leader did call, but I am happy to hear additional points of order.

I believe that that deals with points of order 1 and 2, and I'm happy to proceed to point of order 3.

Mr. Jason Nixon: I believe point of order 3 is mine, Mr. Speaker. Several of the points of order that were called today revolve around page 610 of the House of Commons Procedure and Practice, which I think you've done a good job of addressing. I appreciate that. Again, I think it's a worthy caution that you've given the Official Opposition during question period today, and I would encourage them to adjust the way they're doing that. I could have called even more. In this place we need to work through the chair, otherwise we will continue to create discourse. As such, I will withdraw point of order 3 because I believe you have addressed it.

The Speaker: Point of order 4.

Point of Order Gestures

Mr. Jason Nixon: That's me as well. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I do rise under 23(h), (i), and (j) for point of order 4, again in regard to the Leader of the Official Opposition. Despite what the Official Opposition House Leader may think or may be attempting to present, we on this side of the House do respect the role of the opposition. We had it not too long ago. I understand the responsibility that the opposition has inside this place, but they also have a responsibility to do that in line with the rules of this Assembly.

I'm sure she'll deny it – and that will be disappointing because I think the right way to do it is to apologize and withdraw – but the Leader of the Opposition, while again not talking through the chair, which you've just addressed, took to waving fists today at members. Now, I don't think that she was doing that in an attempt to threaten anybody or anything along those lines. I'll give her the benefit of the doubt on that. But the problem is, Mr. Speaker, again, when you go around working through you, the emotions get high, and that's what starts to happen here. It's inappropriate to do in this House, and I would ask that you ask members not to do that in the future.

Mr. Bilous: Mr. Speaker, this is absurd and not a point of order. The Leader of the Official Opposition did not shake her fist. If the Government House Leader has his way, no member will open their eyes, move their hands, do anything with their hands, or anything outside of only talking when they're allowed to talk. It is ridiculous. This is not a point of order.

The Leader of the Official Opposition, like myself, talks with her hands and moves her hands around a lot. If hand waving is offensive to the hon. member, then I'm not sure how to satisfy him, other than maybe – I will refrain from what I was about to say. But Mr. Speaker, this is not a point of order. This is quite silly, quite frankly. The Leader of the Official Opposition was not waving her hands to cause disorder. Again, someone who talks with their hands: this is what they do. It's not a point of order. I don't know why the Government House Leader is so sensitive today to everything.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. members. I, too, in this case agree that this isn't a point of order. I would say that – and I didn't see any gestures that were made – of course, gestures inside the Chamber can cause a point of order. Just as a cautionary tale, for example, if you were maybe making stabbing signals with your hands or something like that, that obviously would be a point of order and wildly inappropriate, but no member of the Chamber would ever do such a thing. As such, this is not a point of order.

I believe we are at point of order 5.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, point of order 5 would be the same as the page 610 issue that has just been dealt with, so we will withdraw it.

The Speaker: Thank you very much.

I believe points of order 5 and 6 were the same.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Yes. Point of order 6 would be the same.

The Speaker: We are at point of order 7.

Point of Order Preambles to Supplementary Questions

Mr. Jason Nixon: I rise and for expediency of time will just refer you to House of Commons Procedure and Practice, page 510, Mr. Speaker. We could have been calling this point of order for a while – we have not, but it became particularly overboard today, so I feel obligated to call it – and that’s in regard to preambles.

Clearly, if you look at the Blues, you will see that the hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona, I believe, was asking the question at that time, though it was taking place throughout today. I heard you caution a few of our members on that as well, and I would agree with that caution. Preambles are not to happen outside of the leader’s role.

The Speaker: The hon. Official Opposition House Leader is rising, if he would like to.

Mr. Bilous: Well, you know what? I just would like one point of clarification. I’m not sure. I missed when the Government House Leader said which standing order this is in reference to as far as how a preamble is a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think there have been examples. If the Leader of the Official Opposition failed to use the word “given,” then, you know, I’m sure that that was an oversight, similar to other members in this House on all sides who have done so in this place.

Now, we know that it is up to your discretion, Mr. Speaker, to remind members if they fail to use the word “given” in supplementals. I mean, you know, I’m happy to stand and argue on a daily basis that this is not a point of order because I have a feeling that the Government House Leader will want to talk about failures to use “given” on a daily basis. I do not think that this is a point of order, but I will remind all members of the House to use the word “given” in their supplementals.

The Speaker: Thank you for your interjections. The Official Opposition House Leader is correct that there is no standing order on preambles. However, there are a wide, wide, wide range of Speaker’s rulings on preambles. I think, as we continue the cut and thrust of debate, your Speaker will review the previous rulings around preambles, and then, hopefully, arrive at a place where we agree.

What I might add – and perhaps the Government House Leader was referring to this – is that, you know, members of the Official Opposition did provide some level of editorial comments prior to getting to their “given,” and I think this may be a small case of the pot calling the kettle black, if I might, with respect to the Government House Leader rising on this point of order, as we’ve seen a fair amount of preambles all around the table.

So once again I would find that this is not a preamble, but I do caution all members with respect to editorial comments prior to getting to their “given.”

Number 8.

Mr. Jason Nixon: I’ve lost track. I don’t have a number 8. It was probably another page 610.

The Speaker: I’ll consider it withdrawn.

Are there any other points of order to be raised?

Mr. Bilous: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Oh, thank goodness.

Mr. Bilous: Sorry, Mr. Speaker. I thought we got into the double digits there. I apologize for that.

Point of Order Restrictions on Oral Questions

Mr. Bilous: I rise on a point of order under 23(h), (i), (j). The Member for Lacombe-Ponoka’s questions were, first of all, a member’s statement turned into a set of questions, even admitted by the member himself to one of our members, which I found interesting. Quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, question period should be used to be asking questions about government policy, not speaking about a reverent old constituent in their riding.

The fact that this gentleman received an award – I congratulate him – has nothing to do with government policy, quite frankly. Really, the crux of it, Mr. Speaker, is that question period is a very important tool that private members have to ask Executive Council questions. It is coveted time, especially by the opposition. This is one of our only ways to derive information and hold the government to account. When members use questions frivolously and members’ statements are turned into a question that has nothing to do with holding the government to account, I think, quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, it is disrespectful to this place as it is wasting the time of our members.

Thank you.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, I fail to see where 23(h), (i), and (j) has any connection to what the Official Opposition House Leader just referred to. I think that was a bit of a stretch today. For somebody who spent a considerable amount of time, the last few minutes, accusing us of stretching, he almost became six foot eight like me. He just stretched so far with that one.

The reality is that if you look at the Blues, you’ll see that there are some clear answers referring to government policy and the intention of this government to work with people like Mr. Dahl. This government also supports many of the programs that were involved in that award ceremony. There are lots of connections to the government. I know that the hon. member may be disappointed that the other hon. member wanted to ask a question about his constituent related to government policy, but the reality is that this is not a point of order. Certainly, the references that the Opposition House Leader just referred to have absolutely nothing to do with what he talked about.

The Speaker: Thank you, House leadership. I would suggest that both House leaders in this case brought forward some relatively important points. I would just like to highlight that, you know, the Government House Leader is correct that perhaps this isn’t language that creates disorder given the jovial nature of the lovely gentleman in the constituency of Lacombe-Ponoka. Perhaps he would have liked to refer to Beauchesne’s 409(11), where it speaks specifically about government policy.

A question which seeks an opinion about government policy is probably out of order in that it asks for an opinion and not information. A question asking for a general statement of government policy may be out of order in that it requires a long answer.

It goes on to say:

Other questions inevitably deal with government policy and the general restrictions regarding such questions have [not yet] been applied.

There are some significant references with respect to government policy. I am sympathetic to the Official Opposition House Leader in this case as I would say that the connection to government policy was loose at best.

Having said that, private members will make a determination about what is important when it comes to holding the government to account. I would encourage all private members to do their best with respect to holding the government to account and ensuring that it is, in fact, about government policy.

Having said that, Orders of the Day.

Government Bills and Orders

Second Reading

Bill 4 Red Tape Reduction Act

[Adjourned debate June 4: Ms Sweet]

The Speaker: Are there any wishing to speak to the bill? I see the Official Opposition House Leader rising in debate.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my privilege to rise today and speak to Bill 4, the Red Tape Reduction Act. Now, the idea, I guess, behind reviewing regulations from a business lens to see if there are regs that are unnecessarily placing a barrier on business I think is important. I can tell you that our government did that with every single regulation. We didn't need to create a whole new ministry and then staff it, actually creating more red tape to review red tape, which is what I'm hearing from Albertans when they heard about the creation of this ministry but also of this bill.

I find it interesting that, you know, the government during the election said one thing, and this bill actually says something different. During the election they had promised to reduce regulations by a third. Now, I don't support a sweeping elimination of tens of thousands of regulations. Quite frankly, I think, Mr. Speaker, that the associate minister got a little bit better of an understanding when he became an associate minister of how many regulations there are in existence. Broadly eliminating a third could impact the health, the well-being, the safety of Albertans, whether it's food handling or usage or around equipment and safety within our health space, protecting our environment. You know, regulations aren't all bad. In this bill we now have a promise to create, I believe, a committee, but the questions that I have for the minister – the bill talks about red tape reduction yet doesn't define red tape.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Now, something I'm very proud to have done when I was the minister of economic development and trade, Madam Speaker, was to travel the province and speak with chambers of commerce, speak with economic developers and other business owners and business groups, small and large. One of my first questions for them when the term "red tape" would be brought up – I would say: "Great. You know what? I'm all ears. I'm happy to look at any regulation that you bring to my attention. What is being so burdensome and cumbersome to businesses? What is being cost prohibitive; what is slowing down the process?" And you know what? It was on a rare occasion that a stakeholder was able to articulate which regulation was causing such burden.

Now, I can tell you that when it was raised, I happily brought it back to the cabinet table, and we had a thorough discussion, just like we did with every regulation that came across the cabinet table. We viewed it as the role of the whole Executive Council to be reviewing every regulation to see if it's continuing to serve its purpose, if it's no longer relevant, what implications and impacts it's having be it on our job creators or Albertans, and: could it be either amended or discarded? We did that on an ongoing basis, Madam Speaker. You know, we didn't believe that we should just keep regulations because that's how we always used to do it.

What I found interesting, especially going in front of chambers of commerce, is that they would often reference red tape. I would ask them to present to me the specific regulations that we could work on. The challenge, Madam Speaker, is that to say that there's just a whole bunch of red tape, that doesn't identify the problem, so it makes it very difficult for one to address it or fix it. If a specific regulation is outlined, then working toward that would be useful.

I'll give you a great example, Madam Speaker, something that I was working on with the Canadian free trade agreement that was renegotiated under our government. I'm very proud to be the minister that renegotiated the new Canadian free trade agreement, which replaced the agreement on internal trade. A number of tables were struck, and one of them was regulatory harmonization. I can tell you that we worked on a number of different regulations, some that really made no sense. A great example is that across the country little dairy creamers come in different shapes and sizes. Different provinces have different regulations on what those shapes and sizes are. So imagine that you or your family owns a dairy farm. You produce this cream, and you want to sell it to customers across Canada. You have to have different packaging depending on which province you're selling to. If you're wondering why the heck that was, we asked the same question. It seems a little ridiculous. Now, that is a cost burden on the producer; it is unnecessary red tape, I would argue, and we worked with provinces across the country.

That's a specific example, but when it isn't defined, what might be red tape to one person might be an environmental protection or assurance that there are protections to another. In this bill there is no specificity, so we don't have targets, we don't have timelines, and we don't have procedures to ensure both transparency and accountability, which I think is really, really important.

The other thing that I would have loved to see is a process or a mechanism by which Albertans, including the opposition, can weigh in and evaluate which potential regulations the government is looking at either amending or omitting. I think it's important to have a sober second thought. That's one of the roles of the Official Opposition, Madam Speaker. That's something that I hope the associate minister will be able to respond to when we get into Committee of the Whole. What is the oversight on which regulations are being debated or are on the chopping block, and is there an opportunity for Albertans to weigh in or for different organizations to weigh in on that? These are some of the questions that I have.

So far from what I've seen, this bill and the talking points of the minister are, of course, something that's very popular and populist. I mean, businesses obviously want to cut costs where they can, and if there are unnecessary costs, they're happy to look at ways to eliminate them, which isn't necessarily a bad thing, but I think it's incumbent upon the government to ensure that they're having a conversation with Albertans as far as what the specific regulations are, what their purpose is or was, and what the impact is of either changing or eliminating certain regulations not only to that sector but, even more broadly, to all Albertans, Madam Speaker.

I can tell you that one of the other things that I worked on with the former Minister of Energy was working with the Alberta Energy Regulator to look at how they can try to process applications in a much more expedient manner. I recognized and our government recognized that there were some projects that were waiting years for an answer. You know what? That's not right, and that bothered our government as well. We recognized that capital moves much quicker than governments do, and companies that are looking at making significant investments need answers and need answers quickly. I can tell you, Madam Speaker, that this is exactly why I worked very closely with the Member for Lethbridge-West, the former Minister of Environment and Parks, and with the former Energy minister – I guess I can say her name now – Marg McCuaig-Boyd to work with municipalities in areas in the province that wanted to create industrial zones or industrial parks. It took a little time. It took maybe a little longer than what we had hoped.

I can tell you of a great example, Madam Speaker. In the Grande Prairie region you have the trimunicipal partnership between the county of Grande Prairie, the city of Grande Prairie, and the MD of Greenview. They worked diligently for a period of time and struck an agreement on cost sharing and revenue sharing, which was something that I was a big advocate of even four years ago when I was first Minister of Municipal Affairs: getting municipalities to collaborate with each other in order to compete on the international stage. The reality is that Alberta is trying to attract investment and companies, like every other jurisdiction around this globe.

We know that we have significant competitive advantages over many different jurisdictions, but something that I heard from companies often was that if there was a way to shorten the time for them to go from inquiring about making an investment to actually having that final investment decision and shovels in the ground, that would make a huge difference. So we worked with the trimunicipal partnership and were successful in initiating a model that, I can tell you, other municipal leaders in other regions of the province have asked for and wanted to emulate, getting as close as possible to a plug and play model.

Now, again, recognizing that there are certain regulations, certain processes that need to be met depending on what type of industry it is, that there are environmental approvals that need to be given, we discovered that there definitely is a way to do some streamlining and to improve efficiency and shorten the times of this, which will and did make Alberta more competitive as far as attracting investment. I can tell you, Madam Speaker, that that is something that was concrete that we were very proud of, but I can tell you that we didn't need to create a whole new ministry in order to do it, nor did we need to bring in legislation to do it. We had the tools and means at our disposal. Those are the types of concrete actions that we took.

You know, I look forward to the associate minister responding to some specific examples, which I think all members of the House would be very interested to sink their teeth into as far as let's look at what stakeholders, what businesses and associations have been coming to the minister to say: these are some of our concerns; help us address them. Again, I think there is and always is room for improvement and ways to help our industry and our business community be even more competitive. Absolutely. What we're looking for here is more details, where this bill is very, very thin. I'm tempted to poke fun at myself in one of the bills that I brought forward early on in my term. Members that were in this place during that time will know what I'm talking to. But the importance is – it's important, Madam Speaker.

You know, I guess, some of the concern that my colleagues have, quite frankly, is what could be on the chopping block. We have some examples, Madam Speaker. You know what? The former Prime Minister of Canada back in 2011 announced a red tape reduction commission. They called on the government to take action to reduce burdens on business, making it easier to do business with regulators, improving service and predictability.

Now, in 2015 legislation was brought forward to establish a 20 per cent red tape cut and a one-to-one rule, meaning every new reg that was proposed must be matched with an equivalent burden somewhere else. Now, what's sad, Madam Speaker, is that there were a number of areas where there were significant changes made which had a detrimental effect.

On food inspections, Madam Speaker, the former Harper government cut $56 million from the Canadian Food Inspection Agency. Of course, CFIA is the federal body that inspects all food across this country to ensure that it's safe. They had to lay off a hundred inspectors. Now, this reverse staffing measure was put in place in response to the deadly listeriosis . . .

Ms Phillips: Listeria.

Mr. Bilous: . . . listeria outbreak in 2008 in which 22 Canadians died. There are examples, Madam Speaker, where when there are cutbacks made to the very agencies and bodies that are meant to oversee and protect Canadians, it backfires and there have been more causes of challenges.

You know, Madam Speaker, there are a number of examples of other governments across this country that have attempted such things. Here's an example. The Premier . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. Are there any members? The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I was interested in some of the other jurisdictions that the hon. member was discussing, and I'm wondering if he can provide the House with more information and more context so that we can all understand the potential outcomes, negative consequences, unintended consequences of this bill.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and I'll thank the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West for that question. I mean, that's really what I think the crux of some of the concerns is: what are the potential unintended consequences? Again, the bill doesn't have a lot of detail, has some sweeping, vague outcomes but doesn't really share with Albertans and with this House how it's going to get there.

The example I wanted to use – there are a number of them, but I'll just use this one example. Premier Ford over in Ontario in December of last year – so this is very recent – introduced the Restoring Ontario's Competitiveness Act.

It set a target of 25 per cent reduction in regs over four years and requires provincial approvals for job-creating projects to occur. Part of the challenge, Madam Speaker: the government of Ontario is loosening the ratios of children in daycare. These were restrictions put in place after a number of tragic deaths occurred. This is the staffing ratio of what is appropriate for the number of kids in a daycare to the staff, and they loosened that significantly because that was seen as a burden to daycares. I'll tell you this much. If my nephews and nieces are in a daycare with a growing number of other students and pupils with fewer staff, I have grave concerns over that. This is about the safety and well-being of children. Here's an example of a bill that had great intentions, but this is one of the consequences or unintended consequences of a bill of this nature without detail to be debated in this place and in front of Albertans.

Madam Speaker, I can tell you that there are economists and advocates and researchers that have argued that deregulation under the guise of reducing red tape often has hurt workers and doesn't actually lead to job creation and improved wages. Now, again, I'll put a caveat on that comment because that is also a broad, sweeping comment. I think, really, the crux of my questions for the minister really are around, again, the targets, the timelines, when it will be implemented, the procedures, more clarity around what regulations. What is the process upon reviewing, publishing, and amending or omitting those regulations? How can Albertans, including members of the opposition and other private members, have an opportunity to be part of these conversations?

With that, Madam Speaker, I will take my seat but wanted to comment on not just the spirit and intention of this – I do appreciate where the minister is coming from – but my concerns with the bill in its current form. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any more comments or questions under Standing Order 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, are there any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I rise today to speak to this bill and to offer some reflections around the regulatory role of government in respect to the environment, keeping people safe, keeping the environment safe. It would seem to me that this bill provides another layer of work for people in the public service. It provides another seat around the cabinet table, perhaps for reasons of geographic representation, provides another person with a fleet car to drive around Alberta in. It doesn't actually provide for a real assessment of regulatory reduction. This is, in fact, a shell of a bill that contains within it no targets, timelines. It doesn't even define what government considers to be red tape.

Madam Speaker, you know, it's kind of funny that it's actually duplicative. Calling upon the minister to prepare a report on an annual basis is something that can and is done within ministry annual reports and ministry business plans. Setting out performance metrics for individual departments that they must adhere to and must report publicly on is within ministry business plans. This is well known to the members of the current government and members of Executive Council given that they served in opposition and queried those very annual reports and business plans during the course of estimates debate and committee debate. Having to prepare yet another report: well, that sounds like excessive bureaucracy to me. What we have done is that we've laid out an empty shell of a bill so that we can provide another well-paid position to someone around the cabinet table with no specific job to do.

Now, certainly, there have been cases in the environment area where we had work to do around regulatory backlog. When we came into government in 2015, there was a tremendous backlog of Water Act approvals, Madam Speaker. They were considerable, and they were causing angst, certainly among municipalities who had concerns about lengthy timelines and the ability to get projects done. Sometimes Water Act approvals were taking just an excessively long time for people to do simple things like replace a culvert. That was absolutely true, so we got down to work and we rolled up our sleeves. We brought in some new technology to deal with some of these Water Act approvals, particularly those that were more routine in nature. We made sure that we had a Water Act approvals blitz during the seasons when municipalities would not miss their construction window while they were waiting for approvals, typically in sort of the early year, early spring. We reduced that Water Act approval backlog, Madam Speaker. It took a couple of years.

But here's the thing. You didn't need an extra minister to do it. You didn't need an extra piece of legislation to do it. You didn't need an extra report to do it. You didn't need an extra team of bureaucrats to do it. What you needed was people to listen to stakeholders and then direct departments and for ministers to show up and do their job. It also helped, I think, Madam Speaker, that we didn't have a revolving door of environment ministers anymore given the palace intrigue that defined 44 years of PC rule, at least the tail end of it, in this province. What it required was people to be serious about the governance of this place. We cleared up that backlog. We'll see, if there are big layoffs to the civil service, whether that backlog will re-emerge because part of it was about that.

Now, there are a number of areas in which I have concerns that this bill and this minister in particular will take a run at public safety and environmental protection in this province, Madam Speaker. I worry about the Water Act, the Water Act that protects Water Act licence holders to the first-in-time, first-in-right system, that protects investments in irrigation, that protects farmers. I worry about any wholesale deregulation of the Water Act. The Water Act is a careful balance. It is not a creature of the previous NDP government. It wasn't even a creature of, necessarily, the previous PC government. It was actually a creature of the Klein government. Lorne Taylor brought in the Water Act. It was very difficult work, very difficult balancing work. Going at those regulations in a way that is not thoughtful, that doesn't understand the knock-on effects on the environment or the business climate can be very, very damaging to southern Alberta, and I will be the first person watching for that and holding this government to account.

I'll be watching for the role of watershed councils, who play an important role, Madam Speaker. They're enabled within the Water Act, but they also must be funded in order to be able to do their multistakeholder work. I'll be watching for that because they are an important check on how the Water Act is actually being administered and how public safety is actually moving along.

I'll be watching for air quality, Madam Speaker, both in the funding of the airshed councils, absolutely, but also on Alberta's performance relative to the Canadian ambient air quality standards. Why does this matter? Well, our government took action on Canadian ambient air quality standards to reduce pollution and ensure public health. We did this in consultation with industry via the airshed councils, but, again, this is very delicate work and cannot be achieved through a vague bill or a misunderstanding of environmental law.

I cast my mind back to estimates debates, where I was asked by members who now sit on the government caucus side what things like PM 2.5 were, particulate matter. On the record I told the member to google it in an estimates debate because the question was ridiculous and revealed a fundamental misunderstanding of the world around him, Madam Speaker. Those are the folks who are now going to be taking a pass at our air quality standards, so I worry about that.

I worry about public land transfers, Madam Speaker. We have already seen sweeping statements by the Premier about public land transfers, which deeply worried rural municipalities in southern Alberta who are home in their public land to some of our last tracts of native grasslands, and they want to protect those. I'm speaking here in particular of the MD of Taber, that has a public land transfer before the minister of environment right now. We want to make sure that those are done with the highest degree of environmental protection.

Madam Speaker, I worry about oil sands monitoring. One of the first acts – it was the first act – that I brought in as environment minister was to ensure that oil sands monitoring had integrity to it. The Chief Scientist had the role of reporting to the public, not to the minister. He has a role that protects his scientific independence, and I worry that this bill will be used as an excuse to undermine the good work that we have all done as industry and as government to rehabilitate Alberta's environmental monitoring reputation in the oil sands and restore scientific integrity and scientific independence. This is a difficult thing for a government to do that is home to a number of people who have questioned the science of climate change. Certainly, I'll be watching for that.

I'll be watching, Madam Speaker, for regulations that change overland flows, wetlands replacement – I'll be watching for those as well – for regulations governing drinking water because that is what keeps people safe. When we went through this in the province of Ontario – and we watched this all go down in the 1990s, everybody who went and embraced the concept of deregulation with such enthusiasm – we saw people die in the Walkerton tragedy. So I worry about that, especially seeing as I do recall having to answer a set of questions from people sitting now on the government side about AHS drinking water standards and facilities having to adhere to them and why they had to do that. That is of concern.

Finally, I will speak to the question of dam safety. After the Obed mine disaster, Madam Speaker – and I will just refresh the House's memory. After there was a dam spill, about 670 million litres of waste went into the Athabasca River in 2013. It was the second-biggest coal spill in Canada, seriously contaminated the Athabasca River, forced a number of major communities to stop drawing from it. In the wake of that, we found that there was no regularized dam safety regulation for inspections and enforcement, so we brought in new dam safety standards to ensure oversight and monitoring of tailings dams, public reporting on this information. We did this in consultation with industry. It took two years. What I worry about is that any wholesale and ill-advised and ill-informed run at regulations like these will not protect the public, will not protect the investments that companies have made, and will go backwards because Alberta is now a world leader in dam safety. We need to ensure that those kinds of standards remain in place.

Madam Speaker, I think I have sufficiently informed the House about potential unintended consequences of this bill. Of course, it's hard to say because the bill is such a shell. It doesn't actually lay out anything. It makes the minister write a report, so that means he has to hire some people to write a report. He has to make sure that there's a team of bureaucrats to come and brief him, people who could be briefing existing ministers. What we have here is a bit of a hood ornament of a bill, to quote Brian Mason, in terms of governments doing things that really have no practical use to them, but they are to satisfy some call for throwing red meat to the base and providing some window dressing. The issue here is that unintended consequences can and may happen given the ideological orientation and respect for science that prevails among some folks in this House.

I would urge the government to define what red tape actually is in their endeavours, and perhaps, Madam Speaker, we can query that and provide some more clarity for the people of Alberta around this loosely defined bill that appears to have no real practical effect or purpose for the people of Alberta, at least yet, in Committee of the Whole.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Any comments or questions under Standing Order 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I appreciate listening to my colleague the former Minister of Environment and Parks, who, of course, listed a couple of examples of very important regulations and how they are protecting not just Albertans, whether it's their health and safety, but also protecting our environment, our ecology, whether it's the wetlands, the mountains, and other important locations throughout the province. I wanted to ask the Member for Lethbridge-West: what are some other examples of critical regulations that could be on the chopping block because of this bill? We don't have any specificity in the bill or any specific examples for that.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. One of the issues that I do worry about is around the wetlands regulation, wetlands replacement. Now, world-wide we find that about 88 per cent, I believe, of wetlands have been lost. Wetlands are, of course, critical for biodiversity, and they are critical for, essentially, managing water on the landscape. They are the Earth's natural sponge, and they are critical for flood protection of communities as well.

In Alberta we find that about 90 per cent of our wetlands have been filled in in some way, shape, or form. That is why there was a wetland replacement regulation. It's a very complicated regulation, and it's just been changed. In and around 2013 it was changed, and there were a number of different processes that had to then follow that regulatory change that the previous, previous government made. Again, that was the product of a tremendous amount of consultation, in particular with municipalities but, of course, obviously, with property developers, proponents of various transportation projects, and others.

Of course, there is a wetlands replacement fund, Madam Speaker. That wetlands replacement fund is doled out in a specific manner within the regulation, and a number of different groups, in particular Ducks Unlimited, assist the government in our work in ensuring environmental integrity on the landscape.

Now, why is this so important? As we build out more, as our cities grow, one of the things that we find: as climate change changes, our weather patterns and water events become more frequent and severe – we saw this in 2013 in Calgary – and water moves faster. When we have more wetlands, we are holding it on the landscape rather than it flowing into your basement, Madam Speaker. That is one of the things that we regulate in this province, how we replace wetlands, how we make sure that the Earth can perform its functions as a natural sponge so that we can go around performing our functions of building the economy and building a good life for our families. Certainly, that is a regulatory environment that is the product of a lot of consultation with ENGOS like Ducks Unlimited, nonprofits, and others.

Now, another one is the proceeds of public land sales, Madam Speaker. Historically, those have gone to conservation organizations that are called land trusts, and they undertake certain initiatives to ensure that not public land but private land is appropriately conserved. The conservation notation is affixed to it, and that notation then follows the property. I am concerned that if there is a big kick at the Public Lands Act, land trusts will then be thrust into a more uncertain environment. Many of their undertakings are multiyear in process and sometimes involve multigenerations of ranchers and landowners.

I think that probably the biggest concern I have with this legislation is around the delicate balance, though, of the Water Act. I referenced this earlier. You know, the Water Act, really, in a time of water stress, which we now see – we now have closed basins, the South Saskatchewan, and we're seeing a number of . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Calgary-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise to speak to Bill 4. While I was listening to my colleagues as well, the concern that came to mind is that the bill, I guess, follows a promise during their campaign that they will reduce red tape. Also, I think that at that time nobody knew what that was. I guess we were hoping that there would be some discussion, some definition of what, actually, red tape means. If you look at the definition, the history of red tape, it takes you back to 16th-century Spain; it takes you back to the Cold War era. All those kinds of definitions could mean anything and everything. I think, first and foremost, that it's just a skeleton of a bill that fulfills their campaign promise so they can get up and say that they made a promise and somehow this bill fulfills it.

This bill is even more vague than what they were saying during their campaign. At least at that point they were saying that they will reduce it, cut it by one-third. Now I think it has no targets, how much they will cut. It has no timelines, when they will cut. It doesn't tell us anything about what this red tape means.

And it's not only us – that's my take – who don't understand what that means, because in question period the associate minister responsible for this was given an opportunity to talk about red tape and essentially share just one example of what he will cut and what that will look like, and the minister failed to provide even one example of what that will look like. That's how unclear this piece of legislation is. Not only this side of the House but the minister who is responsible for it wasn't able to name one piece of regulation that he sees as red tape and that would be cut. That's really unfortunate.

Instead, I guess, of cutting, what this bill does: it creates one job. That was their platform promise, that they will create more jobs. It already created one job, and it also provided the minister with the authority to create more red tape, like, I guess, a huge authority there to create regulations, essentially adding more to the red tape. That's what, on the face of it, this bill is doing. During that campaign I think that they made those promises, I guess, without thinking too much, considering too much about it, and this legislation clearly shows that they didn't think about what that means at that time. They were just making vague and empty promises, and clearly this bill shows that they didn't consider it then, and they don't know now what it will look like.

For instance, if we talk about improving efficiency, improving processes, there's an agreement in place called the New West Partnership trade agreement. What that agreement allows: it allows businesses, business corporations to register in one province, one jurisdiction like Alberta, B.C., Saskatchewan – now Manitoba is part of that agreement as well – and be able to, I guess, get your corporation registered in others, too, without essentially filling out all the forms again and again in all four jurisdictions.

I will say that that agreement certainly reduced red tape, cut down the process, and all those things. But here I think we have no indication whatsoever of how their red tape reduction will work although it acknowledges that "a consistent, transparent and efficient system of regulatory and administrative requirements is necessary to protect the public interest." If we are to protect the public interest, we acknowledge that there is need for a consistent and transparent manner, and regulations certainly help achieve those goals.

But their piece on regulation: it has no definition, which should have been there for members of this House to understand what that entails. There should have been some target. They at least could have added some timelines. Just creating more regulations, creating a report after a year, starting by 2020: I don't see how that saves us time, how that saves us money, how that saves us resources, and how it's encouraging investment or boosting Alberta's competitiveness and all those things that they were also promising during their campaign.

I think what it's doing is exactly the opposite. By creating this ministry, they are putting more work on the public service, that will now be reviewing it and creating a report. It's in no way saving us time. By blowing resources in creating these reports, which I guess any minister could have looked into – and many of our colleagues, when they were in government, did look into the processes and how they improve those processes – it's not saving us any money or resources.

For instance, in Community and Social Services we looked into the process for AISH, assured income for the severely handicapped. At that time I think the AISH form was somewhere around 23 pages. The public service looked into that application. They figured out what information was duplicated, and they took that out. They figured out that we don't need to have a two-step process; all the forms can be handed to clients for their eligibility for their medical at one time. They can be explained through the creation of guidelines to fill out those forms, so we did that. Eventually we came up with a form which may still be a bit long – it's 16 pages – but it's an improvement on the existing form, that then contained 23 pages.

Similarly, there were complaints about how Alberta Supports offices and Alberta Works offices are handling incoming Albertans, what those timelines. Essentially, there were no specific set timelines. So very brief standards were created, essentially four standards: that when you come in, you will be seen that day, and they will have to report on it; if you have booked an appointment, you will be given an appointment within a certain time; if you are approved, within a certain time you will get your funds or supports that you need. That's an improvement on the process. We didn't need to create an additional ministry to look at those things because as ministers, as government, that's part of your job. You are given a job; you are given a mandate. You are asked to do that as best you can, and you always try to improve on those things, try to find efficiencies.

I don't think that a separate ministry created to find efficiencies will be in a better position than the minister who is in charge of the file. Like, that's counterintuitive. I can't find the rationale that if I was responsible for a department for four years, an associate minister from outside will have a better look into my ministry, into my regulations, into my processes. I don't buy that argument, and I can say that for any of my colleagues; for instance, the Minister of Environment and Parks. Even while sitting at the cabinet table, I wouldn't know her files as well as that minister would know them. The Minister of Advanced Education: same thing. And I'm sure that applies, or should apply in theory, to all the ministers on the other side, too. They don't need to source out that part of the job. They don't need somebody with a bureaucracy, with a department, with a budget and all those perks to come and tell them: hey, this regulation doesn't work, and let me cut it for you.

I think it's also somewhat, I guess, subsidizing the responsibility of that minister. He or she is not looking into those processes. He or she is not doing his or her job properly if he doesn't know where to improve, what to cut, where they can bring in efficiencies, where they can find savings. From that standpoint, I think it's very strange to source out that job of the minister to another minister, who will certainly not have that kind of access into and that kind of information about some other minister's office and processes.

From that standpoint, it wastes money. It wastes resources. I think they use investment in everything, but I don't know how it encourages investment in Alberta without knowing what they are going to cut. Are they targeting certain ministries, where every minister is, I guess, responsible to report to that associate minister? Processes are not at all clear. What it does, I think, at best, is that it creates more red tape. Also, the bill uses certain terms that can be interpreted in many different ways. For instance, it is saying that we are moving from a process-based approach to an outcome-based approach.

My extended family are in small business: pizza shops, those things. For instance, when they build a store, there's a process. They will negotiate a lease in an area where you can have that kind of business, and once you construct that shop, there are certain processes that you will follow. You need to have a business licence. You need to have a health inspection. You need to have inspections from plumbers, all those things. Like, these are the things that guarantee that there are transparent procedures in place that are regulating things in a way that's taking into account the public interest, public health, and that all those things are accounted for and that there are some kinds of measures and safeguards in place that will ensure that. That's why we do it every year or every three years. Those kinds of processes are in place. But, again, this piece of legislation doesn't say if those things will be looked into.

With respect to approval of projects, those things that they talked about, not in this bill but in their campaign: again, I don't see any kind of targets, any kind of hint in this piece of legislation. Yes, it uses those buzzwords that they were using before, but I think that at this point we need to stop this rhetoric, these campaign-style things, and stop putting those things into all legislation. I think that at this point Albertans deserve better. Albertans deserve clarity. They need action. They need to see, if that was the promise that was made, how exactly they will cut red tape, what exactly they view as red tape, how long that will take, and tie them to some kind of outcomes for how it's helping us to attract investment, how it's helping us to encourage job creation.

The Deputy Speaker: Any comments or questions under Standing Order 29(2)(a)? I recognize the hon. Minister of Transportation.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate that. I heard some interesting comments from the last speaker. There are a few questions that come to mind. The hon. member was looking for examples of red tape. I suppose an example of red tape might be when you bring a company out from Ontario to change a light bulb and they've got to visit a house in Alberta twice to change one light bulb, and then they take the light bulb out that was already working, after they make two visits to take the one light bulb out. I would call that red tape. I would imagine the hon. member might even call that red tape though the hon. member supported it when they were government. In fact, not only did they support it, but they paid for it, and they made Albertans pay for it with the carbon tax. There's one example.

We heard commentary here. Actually, I found it interesting that the hon. member thought that keeping a promise that we made during the election was a bad thing. Madam Speaker, on this side of the House we're kind of of the opinion that keeping your promises is a good thing. It might have been out of fashion with the previous government. We kind of feel differently. We feel like Albertans have a right to expect that we will do or try to do the things that we said, yet the hon. member was talking about it as if it was a bad thing to keep our promises. So I would make that comment on what I heard.

I also heard comments here today about the knock-on effects of regulations. I wonder sometimes what the hon. member would think about that, about the knock-on effects, for example, of the previous government's radical minimum wage increase from $12 to $15 in a very short period of time during a bad economy, which led us to record unemployment amongst young people, absolute record unemployment among young Alberta males between 15 and 25, higher than it's ever been in the history of Alberta. I would call that a knock-on effect of a bad policy, and perhaps others might refer to it as red tape.

Madam Speaker, you know, I think it's important that we do think about the knock-on effects. We heard comments about that today. I think we need to think about the knock-on effects, for example, of the carbon tax. The knock-on effects make buying groceries more expensive for every Albertan no matter how poor they are or no matter how rich they are. There is a knock-on effect of a bad regulation that our government has already moved on in our efforts to reduce red tape, the fact that the carbon tax makes every business less competitive and more expensive in Alberta compared to all the surrounding provinces. I guess there's no way to put an exact number on the thousands of jobs that that has cost Alberta families as a knock-on effect of bad regulation and red tape. I wonder what the hon. member thinks about that part of red tape.

It takes me down the road to where one might wonder what the knock-on effect was with Bill 6, when it made farm families feel insecure on their farms, not knowing whether they were going to be able to exist, when they already had insurance in many cases for their employees and they were forced to take a second insurance policy out without the government bothering to find out how good their first insurance was. I think there are probably farm families in Alberta that would have referred to that as red tape. Madam Speaker, I wonder what the hon. member thinks about these things.

I wonder about the red tape in the form of a court order to stop construction in the Weaselhead as part of the ring road, something that the previous government ignored. I guess they thought that was red tape, that court order protecting the environment. Apparently, they considered it red tape, though they haven't bothered mentioning it in this debate here today.

They don't seem to have a lot of enthusiasm for removing red tape, but I guess I would ask the hon. member how he feels about all of these things, particularly – I heard a comment about Alberta's reputation. Well, I would say that the knock-on effect of the previous Premier of this province calling Alberta the embarrassing cousin might be inconvenient, and that might cause less business to be had here in Alberta although they didn't consider that to be red tape.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today to talk about the Red Tape Reduction Act. When this bill was introduced, I had constituents reach out to seek clarity around what this meant, and honestly I'm not able to provide clarity. The bill has no targets, no timelines, and what's worse is that it doesn't even offer a definition of what red tape is. What it does give is the associate minister the ability to create new regulations and amend existing ones, which, to me, seems to be red tape in itself. It seems that a process of setting up more bureaucracy to reduce bureaucracy is what's happening here with this Red Tape Reduction Act.

I agree with what my neighbour here had mentioned about each ministry currently having the ability to look within their own ministry to determine what is working and what isn't working. We rely heavily on our stakeholders and our community members and Albertans to come to us to identify what's working and what's not working. An entire ministry shouldn't be needed to do that, and without clarity of what that is, it's a little bit concerning. It seems that anything at this point is open to be targeted, and it's a little bit unsettling, I can say.

I know I'm proud of some of the efficiencies that we introduced over the last four years, some of them about consumer protections specifically. We were able to really strengthen areas in consumer protection, making sure that this was a priority. We wanted to be able to ensure that people who just want to go to a concert are able to do so. We banned the ticket-buying bots and improved consumer access to refunds from resellers. I know that being able to buy concert tickets should be something that's fun and exciting and not be a challenge, looking at all of these bots that were purchasing them up and then reselling them at a higher price. I know that that was something that was important to many of the people in my community. They were grateful that that was now being protected.

We did the legislation around payday lending. We put an end to the 600 per cent interest rates on payday loans, to help prevent people from becoming trapped in a cycle of debt. We know that that happens. When people need to look for other sources of income, they often turn to some of these payday lending places, and we were able to ensure that they had better protections. We know that now, today, the payday loan borrowers pay lower fees, they have more time to pay off their loans, and they are paying them off in smaller instalments, which makes it a little bit easier when you need to take out a loan.

We talked a lot about the door-to-door sales in my community, and I had a lot of people expressing a lot of gratitude for that. It was something that people came to us and expressed concern about, so we listened, and the Minister of Service Alberta did something about it. A separate Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction wasn't needed because that was something that was in her ministry at the time to directly have an impact on.

What we did was that when we heard concerns and ideas for putting in just some sort of strategies in reductions to help reduce some of the barriers, we were able to do them within that ministry itself. It's just a little confusing why they would want to add an associate minister to look at this when each minister across the floor has the ability to do that within their own ministry, and I would suggest that they should be quite capable to be able to look at their own ministry and know it well enough to be able to identify what some of the concerns are and where some of the strengths would be to enhance the reduction of some of these barriers.

Another thing that we did that I know the people in Castle Downs were very happy about was condominium living. We were able to introduce condo regulations to improve buying and living in a condo. It was something that we heard from the community that was a concern, and we were able to help with that.

It doesn't make sense to me, Madam Speaker, why this complete bill and the associate minister are needed. If government would be able to provide some sort of definition about what it would actually be reducing, some sort of timelines, targets – I think it's quite unsettling to members on this side of the House and Albertans across the province to really have no idea what this bill speaks to, what their intention is, and what they're going to be coming after. I know that it's concerning for me and I know it's concerning to constituents in Castle Downs to hear that this very vague bill is going forward without any real definition of what it is.

I think, with that, I'm going to end my comments, but I would just urge that clarity is definitely needed once again from this government. It's something that we haven't received a lot of. I'm afraid that this falls under "in due course," and that's a little bit concerning to me.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available.

Mr. Hunter: Madam Speaker, actually, there are a few points that were made by some of the members that I took copious notes on to make sure that I could understand their concerns. It's important that we try to get some buy-in from opposition members. I didn't feel when I was in opposition that we got that, so I think it's important.

Just to be clear, I'd like to tell the members opposite that I personally reached out to their critic of red tape reduction – I'm not sure what that makes them. Maybe that they want red tape? I personally reached out to them and asked to find out if they had any concerns, to be able to discuss the issues as clearly as we could get about this portfolio, and I did it twice. Not once did I hear any of the concerns until we got into second reading.

Now, what's interesting about that is that I question how genuine these concerns are or whether or not it is just grandstanding, whether or not it's just being able to stand up to say: we are in opposition to what you do no matter what you present. This is a concern that I have.

I remember very clearly. I introduced a private member's bill when we were in opposition to not just decrease the regulatory burden but actually just to stop it, be able to make it so that it doesn't keep on increasing. We heard many times from our job creators, our innovators, the people who actually do the heavy lifting in our society, the ones that they said that they were championing yet continued to add burden upon burden upon burden onto, these job creators and innovators. This is in large part the reason why they lost the last election, yet they still haven't learned this lesson. They still haven't learned that when you pile on to our job creators, they refuse to create jobs or they can't. They go out of business. We heard that a lot.

Now, it's interesting. We were very specific in the way we designed this bill. We wanted it to be a small bill so that we could walk the talk. We want to be able to get to the root of the problems. We've heard two arguments coming from, actually, the one member from Edmonton. I can't remember where he's from. He argued different points to this bill.

The one point is that it's not prescriptive enough and that we don't have enough information here, that we don't have enough regulations in here to be able to make a good decision. Then he said: "You know what? This associate minister is actually just creating red tape." You cannot say both of those arguments, yet he did. So I'm actually confused. I was really listening to try to find out what their concerns are, yet many of them have argued both of those concerns. You can't have both. You either have to have less red tape or more red tape, yet they've argued for both of those to happen.

If we're going to try to be able to help our job creators and our innovators to do what they do best, which is create jobs, then we have to have a plan to do that. Yet the plan that we heard from the old government in the past was: let's add a hundred pages to the Occupational Health and Safety Act. That'll do it. We can pile onto our job creators, and hopefully they will get the message that we want them to create jobs – by piling a hundred pages onto the Occupational Health and Safety Act.

Well, I can tell you that as soon as that came out – in fact, when that came out, it came about two weeks after I introduced Bill 207, my private member's bill to abate the increase in red tape – I remember speaking to the then economic development and trade minister and asking him whether or not they were going to support this. I thought it was a reasonable approach to getting our job creators back to work. He said: absolutely not.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadows.

Mr. Deol: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I just wanted to thank our minister, you know, rising up and trying to justify his job, but it still didn't really help. Just reading the name of the bill, the Red Tape Reduction Act, and flipping through the pages: it doesn't really help. Like, what is the real purpose of this bill? Again, as the hon. minister has said, the bill is just put on the table for the sake of the bill as they made an election promise, still missing the accountability – and I still can't find it – and the specific area and the specific regulation this bill is targeting and trying to address.

As my colleagues already have mentioned and, you know, said about it, it simply seems like for the sake of the bill it has actually been put on the table. When looking at this, what does the bill have to do with? Like, you know, there is a very vague introduction, I would say. So there is no introduction, really. To create more reports, panels, and regulations: looking at that is like creating more red tape for the sake of trying to eliminate the so-called red tape.

I have seen, Madam Speaker, you know, in my riding and on Edmonton's south side back in 2012 and 2013 the condominium construction and the construction of the buildings that lacked, actually, regulation due to the lack of the regulations. The consumers and the residents of the area were in big, huge trouble. They bought, they invested in those condominiums, and then they were not complying with the regulations. That led to huge chaos, with leaking windows, with I want to say the defective foundations of those buildings.

The consumers were fighting for years and years without getting any justice. It was very hard for the government to hold that builder accountable as I think at that time he was not traceable. He just decided not to, you know, face them.

I just wanted to share my recent experience. As I mentioned many times in this House, I had the privilege to run a small-scale business. I happened to apply for a business licence for the building where I had my business, and that process took almost a year, you know, for me to obtain the licence for that building. The reason was that the officials were saying that that particular building was built in the 1970s, and either there were not really legitimate regulations existing or the builder at the time did not really follow the rules. We went through a huge hurdle, again, hustling for almost a year because there were not proper regulations in place at that time.

As my colleagues, you know, already mentioned, I don't know what the need was of creating a specific ministry to address this issue without targeting specific areas that this wanted to address as the previous government had been in a position, the ministers had been in a position with the capacity to address the issues like payday loans and other related issues. There are a number of examples that have been tried in similar directions across Canada by our federal government. All it has done in the past was compromise consumer protections and the health and safety of the workers. Looking at this very, very vague bill without any specific definitions, right now it seems like it's threatening more of our consumer protections than it's going to do to address any of the hurdles, as our members on the other side are calling them, that the businesses are facing or the burdens that businesses are having.

I just wanted to record my comments. I will just summarize my comments by saying that this bill has failed to target specific areas of the regulations they're trying to address, Madam Speaker.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any comments or questions under Standing Order 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Calgary-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you, Member, for your comments on this bill. I think, as the member has noted, that there is no clarity in it. It's just a skeleton bill. A lot of things need to be filled in later on, and we didn't get much clarity when the minister was trying to address it.

Other members, when they spoke, were talking about light bulbs and companies from Ontario. Sure, those kinds of things certainly can be improved. Next time around we can have an Alberta company. But at the heart of that project was that Alberta was the only province that didn't have an energy efficiency program, and that was because of 44 years of a Conservative regime that never brought forward an energy efficiency program. We brought in that program. I guess if they see that as red tape, then I don't know.

Then they were talking about the carbon tax, how that's red tape. I think in my riding they didn't get that mandate. People view the environment, people view climate change as the most serious existential threat to our planet, to humanity, and they want their government to take strong action. I don't see that as red tape.

With respect to minimum wage I believe that a measure of a fair society is how the most vulnerable in that society are treated among us, where we have a wealth of resources. We have oil and gas, we have other resources, and we have agiculture. We have many things to be proud of, but at the same time we do have people among us who work and still are not able to put food on the table, to have shelter. That promise was made in 2015, and that promise was kept.

What they are doing, I think, is that they are reducing red tape by reducing youth wages. Those students are not always working for fun. They have responsibilities; they have families. They have expenses to meet. If that's the kind of red tape they are trying to reduce, I don't think that was the mandate or that Albertans understood that kind of reduction to be red tape.

Cutting, for instance, school fees. They are saying they will maintain it, but over four years under our watch $2 billion was added to the K to 12 school system. Now they are cutting it, and the Calgary board of education alone is predicting a $40 billion deficit. Cutting those funds is red tape reduction? I don't think so. That's not what we understood red tape reduction to mean. Similarly, cutting from the Health budget I don't think in any way amounts to red tape reduction.

Reversing the protections that were given to LGBTQ and the most vulnerable in this province, reversing those protections: is that red tape reduction? I don't think so. I don't think that Albertans or any of us understood that to be red tape reduction.

Again, I guess, the next time the minister gets up, we hope that he will put some parameters around red tape, what exactly their government means by red tape, put some definition on it, put some understanding on it so that we have a common understanding in this House of what we mean by red tape. Otherwise, we will be just coming up with our own definition. Otherwise, we might see their cuts to the Education budget as some kind of red tape reduction. They also need to explain, I guess, just come up with some example.

I mentioned earlier that in question period the minister was given that opportunity. Just name one process, name a couple of regulations that we see as red tape so that we have a better understanding, a kind of common understanding on both sides of the House, and we will be able to participate more meaningfully in this debate. Otherwise, again we are left to . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's an honour today to rise and speak to Bill 4. I haven't had a chance to speak to it yet. I'm going to echo a little bit of what the member just shared. We came from a question period earlier today where we asked a lot of questions about protections for LGBTQ youth. You may say that it's a bit of a stretch to connect that to red tape, but as the member just pointed out, without clarity around what these red tape reductions are, we're left here to speculate. I'm concerned. I'm concerned about what it means to eliminate red tape when we're talking about vulnerable Albertans.

I talked yesterday in my maiden speech about the fact that I represent Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood, which is a riding that has some of the highest rates of poverty, child poverty in particular. Many folks are struggling. Many folks rely on AISH. Many folks rely on other supports to survive, quite frankly. My concern here is what is going to happen to those vulnerable Albertans, with a lack of clarity around this bill. I just want to go on the record as saying that we said it here first. I want to chat a little bit as well about the educational impact. Again, I worry that without any definition of what red tape is, how will social services and how will education be affected?

One of the things that a few of the other members have talked about is some of the broad failings of this bill, Bill 4. Now, we know that they're creating – and the Member for Edmonton-Decore talked about this as well – a whole heck of a lot more red tape. New processes, new panels, new reports, new regulations, all in the name of red tape reduction. I mean, it's not only ironic; it's somewhat humorous, I must say. And there are no teeth. There are no timelines.

I come back to the issue of LGBTQ youth. We've just been told that when or, I guess, if – likely when – the Education Act comes into effect, there is now a lack of timelines and accountability. For instance, a principal can dilly-dally and can sort of take their sweet time in responding to a student's request for a GSA. I'm seeing a lot of parallels in the legislation that this government is putting forth when it comes to a lack of accountability, of targets, of timelines.

The fundamental protections that are being threatened under Bill 4 concern me a whole heck of a lot as well: consumer health and safety, environmental health and safety, which I'll talk a little bit more about in a minute, particularly the environmental piece. We know that the members opposite are getting a lot of their advice from the CFIB. One of their top validators even said that "in Alberta's case, new rules on health and safety have only made the burden on business owners worse." Again, I come back to vulnerable Albertans, vulnerable Albertans who are working at jobs that may be precarious, and what a lack of regulation is going to mean for those vulnerable Albertans.

Now, I said that I would chat a little bit about the environmental regulations in particular. I'm quite concerned given that this government, these members opposite, have just axed the carbon tax, effectively killing the climate leadership plan and the energy efficiency programs that some of the members talked about earlier.

I'm quite concerned about what red tape reduction is going to mean for our environment.

I'll come back to the fact that I spoke last evening in my maiden speech about what I heard at the doors. I heard from countless constituents that they're concerned about climate change. Actually, I just got an e-mail the other day about the extinction of species, the absolutely plummeting species diversity we're seeing around the world. I'm quite worried about what this means. We can look back – you might again say that I'm fearmongering – and history shows that when environmental regulations are gutted, there are tangible, scary impacts.

For instance, when former Prime Minister Harper gutted the regulatory framework that protected lakes and rivers and groundwater by allowing a loophole in one of the regulations of the Fisheries Act, mining companies were effectively able to dump toxic waste into lakes. It meant that they were no longer subject to any protections, and we know that there were countless water bodies that, in turn, were basically used as toxic waste dumps.

We saw something similar happen on the environment front in British Columbia. We know that former governments there reduced government oversight and basically relinquished any responsibility for environmental monitoring. What did that mean? Well, that meant that projects like dam construction, forestry management, hazardous waste disposal: they were all affected. In the mining industry in particular we saw one of the tailings dams that had absolutely huge, widespread environmental damage.

I get concerned that given so far – I mean, this government has only been in place for a couple of weeks here, and they've already shown that there's not a commitment to addressing climate change. There's not a commitment to strong environmental protections. I get concerned what this is going to mean for, you know, an already precarious environment here in Alberta.

Again, I come back to – and this is why I urge the members opposite to really heed our warnings – the lack of specificity in this bill. I urge them to really ask some of those questions around when it comes to environmental protection, when it comes to supports for vulnerable Albertans, "What red tape are we actually proposing to cut?" because it's not clear to me. I've read the proposed legislation. I know many of the members in this House have read it closely as well, and a lot of questions remain. A lot of questions remain. I caution about, you know, unintended consequences of red tape reduction. Again, if I didn't have a whole heck of a lot of evidence from jurisdictions not just here in Canada but internationally as well where they've cut red tape, I wouldn't be ringing the alarm bell quite as loudly as I am.

Now, one of the issues that's really top of mind right now, I know for at least the members on my side of the House here, again, is coming back to vulnerable Albertans. I'll talk a little bit about the impact on addicts, on mental health, and on drug addiction. Now, we know that in British Columbia some of the deregulation, some of the cutting of red tape, so to speak, that occurred was around the drug recovery houses. I know, again, in my own riding of Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood we have a number of organizations that are really working to offer safe spaces, evidence-based harm reduction practices for vulnerable neighbours. We've got an incredible institution called Ambrose Place, where there's basically harm reduction in the form of helping folks who are Edmonton's most vulnerable, people without limbs, people who've been living rough, homeless for very long periods of time . . .

An Hon. Member: Decades.

Member Irwin: Absolutely, decades.

They take those folks, they bring them into Ambrose Place, and they offer them an opportunity to address their addictions. I've toured Ambrose Place, and I've talked to some of the clients there. It is incredible just hearing their stories, just seeing these incredibly vulnerable Albertans having an opportunity to combat their addictions.

We saw in British Columbia similar recovery houses – in this case they were drug recovery houses – that were subject to deregulation, and what happened? These spaces became fully overcrowded, they were unsupervised, they were dirty, they were unsafe, and there were no rules. There were no regulations. What did that mean? Well, in that case vulnerable British Columbians were left even more vulnerable. Again, I urge you to think about some of these examples when there's, you know, a direct correlation between introducing deregulation and the impact on vulnerable Albertans.

I really want to hammer home, because I know a lot of folks have talked about the consumer side of things, the consumer protection. That's important as well. For me, again, I come back to my own experience. You know, I can argue that I am able to represent the voices of my constituents in Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood who are vulnerable because I've talked to them. I've entered the affordable housing, the subsidized housing spaces that we have in our riding. I've entered Ambrose Place. I've entered these places where our most vulnerable Albertans are living, and I'm listening.

Again, I want to close by just saying to the members opposite: please consider the most vulnerable Albertans as you review this bill and ask those questions to your colleagues about how vulnerable Albertans will be affected by deregulation and by cutting red tape.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Any comments, questions? We have not heard yet from the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I have sat here and listened to my colleagues on the opposite side talk about some of their quarrels with proposed legislation to cut red tape and question whether or not it was necessary to appoint an associate minister responsible for red tape reduction. My comment is: if this House recalls, this was one of the fundamental platform commitments that we made in the course of the just-concluded campaign. There is no better form for citizens to express their democratic will than through an election, and in dozens of events and speeches our Premier and many of my colleagues had the opportunity to speak about why it was necessary for a future Alberta government to ensure that they reduce the burden on the ability of the private sector to help us tackle, quite frankly, the economic disaster that the former NDP government have bestowed upon us.

We were losing jobs in the tens of thousands, and investment in Alberta was fleeing in the tens of billions of dollars. There was so much uncertainty within the investment community that they were not prepared to follow through to risk their hard-earned capital to invest in Alberta, this province that used to be the magnet for investment across this country, across the globe. It used to be the case, Madam Speaker, that investors around the world were looking forward to bringing their hard-earned capital to invest in Alberta, but under that NDP government that completely was no longer the case, so we are faced with this huge problem of a government that presided over the near decline of the wealthiest province on the face of this country.

We made a commitment to the people of Alberta that if we were fortunate to earn their mandate, we would pursue legislation that was clearly laid out in our platform, a specific platform commitment, 375 of them. We made a commitment that we would appoint a minister responsible for that. On April 16 the people of this province had the opportunity to weigh in on that particular platform commitment, and overwhelmingly, by hundreds of thousands, they supported that platform commitment.

My question to my friends on the opposite side is whether or not they learned any lesson from the outcome of that particular election, specifically on this particular issue. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: I mean, it is true that Albertans had their say on April 16, but it's also true that myself and members on my side were elected as representatives for their ridings, and I was with a pretty good majority, I must add.

For me, I'm here to represent my riding, my constituents of Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood. I'm not making it up when I say that all the time at the doors folks were concerned about their vulnerable neighbours. I'm not making it up when I say that I visited safe consumption sites, I visited drug addiction houses, and I visited, like I said, affordable, subsidized housing. I heard from those vulnerable Albertans first-hand, and they make up a large part of my constituency. So yes, while Albertans made their decision writ large, they also elected a whole lot of us to be their voices.

The Deputy Speaker: There's like 10 seconds.

Mr. Bilous: I wonder which regulations were the ones that drove businesses out. Which red tape specifically made businesses less competitive?

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Yeah. Thank you so much, Madam Speaker, and thank you, Members, for this opportunity to debate Bill 4. I will say that during the campaign period certainly the concept of reducing red tape was something that was discussed, and I think that a lot of people want efficiencies. I think a lot of people want efficiencies in all parts of their life. The creation of, specifically, an associate minister and bringing in a bill and a whole set of regulations that go with that: I don't think that that was something that I heard people say that they were voting for. I don't actually recall if an associate minister for red tape was one of the platform commitments; I know that reducing red tape was. I think that finding ways to increase efficiency is something that we all strive for and should strive for in government and also in our personal lives.

I also think that finding ways to be more efficient shouldn't be at the cost or opportunity for things like occupational health and safety or workers' compensation, things that keep us all safe in our daily lives. Having speed limits on highways, having rules around who can control what substances where: I think some of that some people might consider red tape. I think that we have a lot of these rules and regulations because we want to govern ourselves in a society in a way that's fair and reasonable.

I think the prior speaker, the Minister of Municipal Affairs, was referring to, you know: we were elected, and we said that we were going to appoint an associate minister. I will say, having spent time in this building, that creating more ministries is not efficient. Having ways for people to work together and work collaboratively is probably more efficient if that's your goal, to find more ways to be streamlined and efficient. Definitely I would say: creating new opportunities for MDMs, minister-deputy minister meetings, often very cumbersome, often a lot of reports go into preparing for those meetings and the time that it takes to sit down and have them.

That's a little bit about what I want to say about specifically creating a minister and specifically finding ways to make things more efficient. It doesn't actually seem like a head nod that that would make things more efficient.

That being said, the ministry has been created and the minister has a role to play, and I respect that. I want to say that this bill is, I think some people have probably said, a shoot first, aim later kind of piece of legislation, where it's set up that we're going to have a press conference, we're going to talk about what we're going to do to cut red tape, we're going to have scissors and a ribbon, and we'll figure out exactly what we're going to do after we've done all that. But this is going to be a really good photo op. We're going to be able to say that we're doing something in line with what we campaigned on. What it actually does, in my reading of it, is that it creates committees to examine things to come back and report on things.

The other thing I want to say, especially to the members of cabinet, is that cabinet time is precious. Period. I know that when I was sitting around the cabinet table, I already had about 40 per cent of the budget; I knew I couldn't take 40 per cent of the time that cabinet had as well. I didn't think that that would be fair to all of my colleagues. There were certainly times where we had to, where things would come up and we would have to focus a significant portion of cabinet time on things like, certainly, the opioid crisis or when the federal government decided they were going to legalize cannabis or when we had to find out ways that we were going to modernize professions, how we regulated a number of professions, including paramedics. That was not a regulated profession before we came in.

All of that needs to come to the cabinet table. This bill needed to come to the cabinet table. The regulations that will flow from it need to come to the cabinet table. Every time you put something to the cabinet table, it means that something else isn't going to be there because there just literally isn't enough time. If the full cabinet spent all their time sitting around the cabinet table, there would still be things that government members and private members within the government caucus wanted to achieve that there just isn't enough time for.

So the question I have is: is this bill priority? It must be because it's Bill 4 of the first term. It was given, you know, a big press conference. But it's going to take a lot of time – creating this bill took a lot of time – actually the development of the regulations, bringing the regulations back, passing the regulations. I don't want to call it red tape. It's an important process of consideration. It works its way through the process, but it means that you're spending your time on this instead of spending your time on other things that are important to your private members within your caucus as well as members within cabinet who have other items they'd like to bring forward.

I can tell you that there are about three more health professions that I wanted to be able to bring forward to the cabinet table for due consideration but there physically just isn't enough time. If you keep putting things on the cabinet's table – and that's what we're doing here. When we pass bills, we say: "Hey, cabinet. You're going to develop regulations. You're going to figure out how to implement this. This is going to be a new law. You're going to spend a lot of time on this." By doing this, you're taking things like the accreditation of massage therapists off the table for cabinet or the accreditation of other professions or things around water in your communities or things around other priorities where you'd like to make laws about other things.

I doubt a lot of people, when they were thinking about why they were going to run for government, thought: I want to run for government to make a bill that sets up a committee. I just don't think that's something that people – like, everyone in this room presumably spent a lot of time thinking about their decision, campaigning, talking to people in their communities to make sure that they can move forward on things that really matter to them and to one another.

That's my first question: why? Why are we doing this, and why is this the most important thing for cabinet? They actually have this area called the machinery of government. Is this the most important thing for the machinery of government to be focusing its efforts on for the next several weeks or months? Because it will. Once we pass legislation here, that becomes their mandate, and that's what these organizations within government have to focus their efforts on. That's number one.

Number two. We just saw a different bill tabled this afternoon that is looking at going back to a prior piece of legislation, a bill that was passed in 2012, an amendment act to that bill that will basically take out most of the things in the introduction of that bill, the Education Act, where it talked about age of access, when it talked about age of entry, all of these things that were the thrust of why that bill came in. There's a new amendment act coming in saying: "No, we're not going to do all those other things. What we will do is go back to the GSA rules we had before."

Again, by passing bills like this you're creating a whole new level of checks and balances and government need to develop regulations to implement something that I would argue is beyond unnecessary. I'd say that it's unnecessary, but the piece that it's specifically targeting, I would say, is an act to discourage or rather destroy GSAs in our province.

By passing this bill, we're saying on one hand that we think that things should be more efficient, maybe, by creating committees to report things back to us for us to consider at a later time, and on the other hand we're passing laws that are old and outdated, and the meat of those laws at the time in which they were passed is totally counter to what the actual bill is going to do now. Oh, PS: we're going to make sure that we take out the provision around immediate access to gay-straight alliances or around commitments to privacy and the fact that students won't be outed, which was in another set of laws that has another set of regulations that will, if that piece is passed, go out the window.

I do have to say that I find it a bit frustrating that we keep talking about: we need to find more efficiencies; we need to find ways to streamline things. We can't introduce our family members now. If a family member comes in, the Speaker will say their name, and at the end of everyone's name being said, we'll clap. It's too cumbersome on this House. It takes too much time. It costs too much money, but we will take time to pass legislation to say that we might make a committee that might report back on things.

It just smacks of, in my opinion, taking away the voice and the opportunity from private members. I think that private members play an important role in a government caucus and in our Assembly as a whole. I think that private members' voices are incredibly important to making sure that not just the folks who happen to be placed around that cabinet table but all members of both the government caucus and the entire Assembly have an opportunity to have their voices heard.

When I see things like this being brought forward, it says to me that other good ideas from around the caucus table – and especially having heard the maiden speeches from so many folks last night and in the days prior, I don't remember anyone running saying that they wanted to pass Bill 4 to create a committee to report back on something. I heard a lot of people talk about other reasons why they ran. I would say that, to me, it's problematic that this is becoming a priority.

I think a lot of the things that private members said in their speeches – some of them were definitely intended to be knives, to twist and turn, and, you know, political messaging, but a lot of things that were said are things that I think all of us in this Assembly or at least the vast, vast majority of us would agree on. A lot of things were said about wanting to make sure that our kids had opportunities to grow up in a province where they'd all have opportunities to be successful. A lot of things were said about wanting to make sure that the services in their community were protected and strengthened, that families had good jobs and good opportunities for employment.

I'll say that this bill becoming our priority doesn't reflect what I heard in those maiden speeches. That's the main thing I wanted to say. I think that this is not going to achieve what some people hope it will achieve. It's actually going to take a lot of time away from other important things that members care about. It was a beautiful photo op, but I don't think that this actually has the teeth or the ability to influence more efficiency, which I think is something that is valid, that all of us should be seeking on an ongoing basis, ways that we can be more efficient, do our work more effectively on behalf of all Albertans. This, I think, is the exact opposite of that.

I'll leave that, colleagues, for your consideration.

The Acting Speaker: Under 29(2)(a) I believe I see the hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much. I'd just like to rise on 29(2)(a) and point out a couple of things. You know, the opposition has asked us for reasons why this bill is so important. I'm going to give you a few examples that have come across my desk just in the last week. They're quite reasonable asks, and the people involved are very, very frustrated.

One of the cases involves an entrepreneurial family in my area that is in the gravel business. Now, they've been trying to get a disposition opened up on a gravel pit on Crown land for upwards of eight years. Eight years. Originally, they applied for it, and the application, for some reason, was rejected. They appealed and, over a two-year period, went through the process of the appeal, got to the point of a hearing. A hearing is very cumbersome. You know, it can take eight hours. It's very expensive for the government. It's very expensive for these people. They've spent over $100,000 just on this one pit, trying to get it open. They got to that stage where they met with the board, and – guess what? – they won their appeal.

The director then rejected their application again. They reappealed. Again, over a two-year period they got to the stage of the regulatory process and got to a hearing stage again, and they won again in front of a new set of people. A new set of eyes looked at the whole situation and said: you know, there's no reason to reject this. They overturned the director's decision.

Guess what happened? The director rejected it again. After over eight years and hundreds of thousands of dollars in investment, this entrepreneurial family is pushed almost to the point of bankruptcy by bureaucracy.

Another example. A family in the Bonnyville area has a quarter section of land with a farm building and road access to it. They butt up against a piece of Crown land that they lease for grazing. When they went to sell their property, it was discovered that the house and the road were too close to the property boundary, so the only course they had through the process was to purchase a section, about a six-metre-wide strip of land, off the Crown piece. That's been in the process for two years. It's been approved, paid for. They've paid all their fees. All the department has to do is send that request in to the land titles office. It's been over two years, and they've been told that it'll probably be another two years before they can get that process done. That's red tape.

Another case. A company that's working on the EPCOR waterline up in the area had to do a pipeline tie-in to the EPCOR waterline, that has water just like this, drinkable, potable water. When they went to do the tie-in, they had to dewater one section of the line. The government inspectors on the project said: well, you have to dechlorinate that water before you can dispose of it. Seriously. If it wasn't that funny – you could take the water out of the pipe and drink it, but you couldn't pour it on the ground to dispose of it or truck it away.

That's how ridiculous this is. That's what red tape is. That's why we need Bill 4. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much. If there was anything in this bill that would actually fix those concerns that were raised by the hon. member, I would probably be enthusiastic, too, but this bill is simply, "The Minister shall make the report available to the public."

Is this the minister's mandate? I know that there were no mandate letters. I get it: there's a mandate of an election. But this seems like a bill to create three jobs – an associate minister, a chief of staff, and a press secretary: three jobs – and a lot of ARs and a lot of reports and a lot of committee meetings, but I don't think what's going to happen, hon. members, through you, Mr. Speaker, is actually addressing the issues that hon. members, I think, have every right to raise, saying: this is an issue I want to address in the community. Bring that up with the relevant minister, find a way to get that on the cabinet agenda rather than getting a report of a committee meeting on a cabinet agenda.

I think that this is a very lovely exercise. I'm sure that that press secretary was very proud cutting the ribbon. Hello. Shout-out to whoever the press secretary is in the associate minister's office. That was a beautiful, beautiful photo shoot, but I don't think it addresses the issues that the hon. member just raised.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you.

Any other members? I believe I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung standing.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It gives me pleasure this afternoon to rise to speak to Bill 4, the so-called Red Tape Reduction Act. I wanted to commend the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora, who recently brought up an issue that I thought was germane to the topic of discussion today. She did mention in her discussion a moment ago that there were no mandate letters made public by the current government when it came to power, yet it seemed to me that simply a memo or a mandate letter to ministries regarding their goal of reducing regulations and administrative burdens would have been a sufficient way of dealing with any concerns that the current Premier had about an overburden of regulation in the province. But to go ahead and create a whole associate ministry to perform this function: it seems to me to be a total oxymoron to call a ministry into being to contribute to removing red tape.

The whole question that really confounded me is that the whole topic is not even defined in the legislation. Now, how in the world can you go ahead and attack a problem when you don't, by definition, understand what it is? I think that if you do a man-on-the-street interview and ask, "What the heck is red tape? What does it actually mean?" you would probably get a surprising number of different answers but perhaps a lot more dumbfounded looks, because they really couldn't come up with an answer as to exactly what one is talking about when you say "red tape." It's a term that's been bandied about for many years, yet an actual definition of it is something that is in question, and it's something that obviously should be embedded in an act proposing that they reduce red tape, and we're not even sure what it is.

Mr. Speaker, I've been a member of the Public Accounts Committee for four years. I was deputy chair, and I witnessed and participated in many debates on many different topics of reports of the Auditor General from almost all of the departments, and I can say that as a current member of the Public Accounts Committee, I look forward with relish to receiving a report through the Auditor General's office on the efficacy of this ministry somewhere down the road and having officials from this ministry appear before the Public Accounts Committee to answer questions about what they actually accomplished because, of course, Auditors General are interested in value for money and outcomes and consequences and performance measures. I don't know if any of those things are possibilities under this act.

I can think right now as to the contests that might be going on amongst auditors at the Auditor General's department to see who might get to take a crack at investigating this ministry, because it's going to be a fun one for them. I think there'd be probably a contest to see who the heck gets to do the audit on the Red Tape Reduction Act and this ministry that it's created.

I certainly look forward to those meetings as well because it'd be like a definition, to me, of what the Auditor General seeks to make an example of when he does a report on a government ministry. I can't think of a more fun meeting of the Public Accounts Committee to attend than the one that may be forthcoming should the Auditor General decide to do an audit on the performance of this particular ministry over time, starting with what I mentioned earlier, a total lack of a definition of what, actually, red tape is. How do you define an outcome or how do you manage to determine whether you actually reduce red tape when the bill itself doesn't even define what it is?

I'm really tickled to think about what type of an investigation and what type of an audit might be forthcoming from the Auditor General looking at performance measures and value for money and the worthwhileness of this whole ministry, that really could have been accomplished – the outcomes, I believe, could have been accomplished with a simple note, a memo from the Premier's office to each ministry saying: please do your best to make sure that we don't have any redundancies in our regulations and administrative orders, and keep tabs on it, and make a report to me as to what your success has been over the year. Certainly, it could have been a line item or a paragraph in that department's annual report but didn't require a whole ministry to accomplish that task.

I also want to caution the government as to what failures there can be when you go ahead and authorize a ministry to go in and make changes to regulations within a department that they may be totally unfamiliar with. When you get the red tape security police coming into your ministry to take a look at all your legislation and they take their hatchet to your regulations, you, I think, as a minister of a particular department and responsible for a ministry might be wanting to maybe protect your turf a little bit and have a pretty good argument to make when the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction comes in and starts hacking away at your particular regulations. You're saying: "You're really sort of coming in from afar. These regulations have certain roles to play, and they're really being effective. You don't really quite understand why they're in place, yet you're coming down to a determination and you're saying that I can't have these regulations, that they've got to go."

I'm just wondering: who, in fact, will be in charge of the hatchet? Now, is it really going to be something that the Premier himself is in charge of from afar in saying, "Look, you go on a hunting mission, and go ahead, and these are the targeted regulations that I want you to go after and claim thereafter that they happened to be made because we thought they were efficiencies that we're generating," when, in fact, there was some other, ulterior motive that the government might have to go ahead and slash some regulation in a particular department that they couldn't otherwise accomplish, sort of a backdoor way of accomplishing change in social legislation, for example, when going in the front door would cause them a great deal of consternation and public outcry? My suspicion is that this ministry really is a hunting mission that has been invoked at the Premier's behest so that he can go ahead and attack certain departments and ministries in a way that using the front door wouldn't allow him to do.

Just on a plain, common-sense part of it, though, I think the ministries themselves are the most able to determine the redundancies in the regulation structures, not the red tape security service. The creation of this red tape security service seems to me to have an ulterior motive, and I think it happens to be a political motive right out of the Premier's office. I think time will tell if indeed I'm right or not, and I think the Auditor General's reports may actually come to this conclusion when we finally see him or her reporting on this ministry down the road. I'm looking forward to participating in those meetings as a member of the Public Accounts Committee in the not-too-distant future once we see some of the efforts of the current associate minister put into place.

I wanted to talk a little bit more about some of the risks that are inherent in a bill like this, where other jurisdictions have gone ahead and tried to clean up red tape, as they say, or clean up regulations that seemed to be unnecessary or burdensome or redundant. For example, the Harper government, with its clean water protections: they gutted the regulatory framework that protected our lakes, rivers, and groundwater by allowing a loophole in the metal mining effluent regulation of the Fisheries Act and allowed mining companies to dump toxic waste into lakes and reclassified healthy lakes as tailing impoundment areas, which means they were no longer protected. Sandy Pond in Newfoundland had been destroyed under this loophole, and Environment Canada released the names of 29 natural water bodies that mining companies have applied to use as toxic waste dumps.

As I say, ulterior motives, Mr. Speaker, seem to be inherent in this legislation, giving ministries the opportunity to do things through the back door they otherwise wouldn't be able to accomplish through the front door because of the public outcry that would ensue if indeed they were up front about what they actually wanted to do within a particular ministry by removing certain regulations.

This search and destroy mission that the current associate minister has embarked upon by way of this bill, if it is passed, is something that I think all Albertans should have their red alert lights on. This Red Tape Reduction Act has a red alert notice to me because it doesn't seem on the face of it to have any real purpose unto itself, yet if you dig a little deeper and you think a little bit longer about what, in fact, the government is empowered to do by using this tool, it's a pretty dangerous act and has far-reaching consequences in every ministry.

It doesn't matter whether it's social services, doesn't matter whether it's in the Education ministry, could be environment, any ministry where the government feels it wants to adjust regulations quietly, more quietly than they might otherwise be affected had they gone headlong and changed directly a specific act that was embedded within a certain department. I think that they figure this tool is going to be a way of giving them a better political cover to do things more quietly than they otherwise would have had to do them without this piece of legislation. So I'm very, very fearful that we're going to see some pretty dire consequences, and it's going to be up to us as opposition members to make sure that the government doesn't quietly get away with things that they otherwise would have to loudly do in the face of the public. We intend to do that very, very diligently, Mr. Speaker, over the course of the next four years.

I also expect, Mr. Speaker, that the Auditor General will have his or her antennae up very high regarding this piece of legislation because there are a lot of smart people in the Auditor General's office, and they can see through a piece of legislation like this. They know that its intent is really something other than what it's purported to be. I think that their first report on this ministry is something that I anticipate quite highly, and I look forward to reading it and debating the findings of the Auditor General, who, as I said before, is probably drawing straws with all other auditors in the office to see who gets to tackle this particular topic. So I look forward to that report.

I know there are lots of other risks that are inherent in this piece of legislation. There are things that could be destroyed, simply by allowing regulations to be taken away without as much consultation as they otherwise might receive, by employing this act. As I said, it seems to me to be a special ministry for searching out and destroying regulations that have particularly political overtones.

I think the public should be very much warned and alarmed that this tool is going to be something that's going to be used by this government in a way that they have done other things: to limit, first of all, the role of the private members in this Legislature. Now also, I think, in furtherance of that same type of an attitude towards any type of resistance to this government, this government is looking at using this Red Tape Reduction Act to minimize the role of the public and the visibility that the public has of what this government is actually trying to accomplish in adjusting the way that the economy is run and also the way that we are able to monitor the environmental protections that we have come to expect in this province as well as the social protections and protections of the most vulnerable – as the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood mentioned in her remarks, the protection of the most vulnerable is also something that is really, I think, in the sights of this government as well – so that they can avoid public scrutiny.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Under 29(2)(a), I saw the hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley up.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I've been sitting here listening to the comments from the opposition there, and one of the most common comments I hear is: what do we mean by red tape? What red tape? Well, I just opened up my phone and looked up in Wikipedia what the definition of red tape is Red tape is an idiom that refers to excessive regulation or rigid conformity to formal rules that is considered redundant or bureaucratic and hinders or prevents action or decision-making. It is usually applied to governments, corporations, and other large organizations.

So there, the mystery is solved.

When we have a Red Tape Reduction Act, what we would like to reduce is excessive regulation or regulation that's considered redundant or hinders or prevents action or decision-making. That's exactly what it says. Now, if the members from the opposition could read Red Tape Reduction Act, they would actually understand what the bill is about. Now, it's actually also in here where it says, "initiatives to eliminate and prevent unnecessary regulatory and administrative requirements." Mr. Speaker, I think it's very clear.

It's actually bizarre that we're sitting in this Legislature right now and the opposition is arguing against removing things that hinder and prevent action or decision-making, things that are redundant. We're sitting here having this argument, and each one of the members opposite has stood up and argued against this.

If we look in Wikipedia, too, in red tape reduction: "The 'cutting of red tape' generally refers to a reduction of bureaucratic obstacles to action." We're talking about cutting red tape, reducing obstacles to action. Now, I would wonder what we're doing here in this Legislature if we're not trying to perform some sort of action. We're trying to influence things, we're trying to make things happen here, but obviously the members opposite don't want things to happen. They don't want any action. They want to continue to obstruct everything.

Now, it goes on to say: "Business representatives often claim red tape is a barrier to business, particularly small business. In Canada, the Canadian Federation of Independent Business has done extensive research into the impact of red tape on small businesses." It goes on to talk about the European Commission and their plans to reduce red tape and even have, like, an award for the best idea for red tape reduction.

Mr. Speaker, I'm just amazed that we're sitting here talking about this. Now, I've had to sit here and listen to the Member for Edmonton-South talk about: well, maybe we're going to remove the requirement to have PPE, personal protective equipment. Are you serious? Are we serious that we're sitting here . . .

The Acting Speaker: I will take this moment to re-remind everyone in the House to ensure that when referring to other members, do so in the third person.

Mr. Loewen: Okay.

Is he serious? I can't believe that he would get up and suggest that we would be removing personal protection equipment in the workplace.

Now, if they took the time to read the bill, in the number one paragraph in the preamble, it says:

The Government of Alberta recognizes that a consistent, transparent and efficient system of regulatory and administrative requirements is necessary to protect the public interest, including health, safety, the environment and fiscal accountability.

Mr. Speaker, the Member for Edmonton-South went on to say that maybe we'd be removing the requirement for handwashing in the workplace for restaurants and things like that. It's unbelievable, this discussion we're having here right now.

The Member for Edmonton-McClung just finished saying that there could be dire consequences. Is he serious that there could be dire consequences from removing redundant, bureaucratic, and hindering regulation? Dire? What could be dire about that? The absolute definition of red tape doesn't fit that description at all.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

We're sitting here talking about this day after day after day, and the members are getting up there and they're talking about red tape, and they're actually supporting red tape. They are supporting excessive regulation. They are supporting regulation that hinders or prevents action or decision-making.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I have to begin by speaking directly through you to the Member for Central Peace-Notley, who was just speaking, who was just emphatically making fun of possible dire consequences. He did that while quoting to us from the red tape Wikipedia page. Allow me to continue reading that page for him because it outlines that people died in the Grenfell Tower fire, and it has been tied directly to the red tape reduction efforts that were made because fire inspectors, instead of spending six hours, were only spending 45 minutes. That's from the page that he brought up. And then making fun of the dire consequences – people die.

I can see him smiling at me. He thinks it's funny. He thinks it's funny that sometimes when a government fails to do its job of protecting the health and safety of its citizens and those people die, that that can come from misguided government policy, to simply speak to some – let's use the words "red tape." Let's talk about that very unspecifically. The result, in a very real circumstance, referenced from the page he brought up in this debate, is the deaths of citizens who were not protected by their government. When we are talking about dire, perhaps this could be one good example, and I would thank the member for bringing it to my attention by bringing up that very important red tape Wikipedia page. It really shows that when you read something through to the end, you can find out about the positives and the negatives of something going forward.

Now, Madam Speaker, I've started on a very dramatic note. My reaction to this bill is one of concern. I know from my time as a minister working within a ministry that was responsible for health and safety protections for our citizens and enforcing minimum basic standards, like employment standards, or through our arm's-length agency, the Workers' Compensation Board, making sure that workers are protected when they are getting hurt and injured and that they get the fair compensation that they deserve, that all of these things touch on regulation, and to have regulation painted as a wholly bad thing that is red tape that needs to be removed leads to potential health risks.

There are a number of examples of this in jurisdictions that have adopted red tape reduction exercises. When I look at the very thin Bill 4, I am concerned that the bill doesn't have targets, doesn't have timelines, doesn't have definitions, and seems to be just wanting to have that great photo op that my colleague from Edmonton-Glenora rightfully complimented – beautiful – without doing the hard work.

The Member for Central Peace-Notley seems to imply that if a government isn't willing to sign on to a ridiculously titled production, that they aren't serious about making life better for Albertans or business. That couldn't be further from the truth because I know – and I will speak just to my very direct experience – that we were able to completely transform how long people were waiting for an Employment Standards Code complaint to be dealt with by going through a process called operational excellence.

This is one that has also been used widely throughout our Alberta Health Services, AHS, organizations. It involves talking directly to front-line workers and people who are interacting with government to find out where those pain points are and working to smooth them out. Sometimes that will become a regulation change up at that level, but oftentimes there are ways that we can improve the experience, improve the process, and remove that red tape, which isn't necessarily a regulation but perhaps it's a poorly designed form. I'm aware that our colleagues in Community and Social Services were able to radically adapt and improve some of the forms for people applying for services within Community and Social Services. That type of user experience change can significantly improve the delivery of government services.

I am a strong advocate of trying to use empathy when improving these things, thinking about the perspective of the person who's coming to use the service and how we can make sure we streamline that. Whether that's the business owner who is applying for a new business permit, whether that is the vulnerable Albertan who is about to lose their home and needs to fill out government forms in order to get assistance, I think using empathy and thinking about the experience can be an incredibly productive thing. In my time as a government caucus member and minister there were a number of initiatives to reduce those challenges that businesses and Albertans experience.

To say that the NDP doesn't believe in red tape reduction or doesn't believe in facilitating the services government provides to its citizens: that is completely incorrect. We are maybe just not ready to get behind a big red ribbon with some scissors and call it a job done because there's so much more to fall behind it. There's so much more that needs to be done because it's critical that we protect the health and the safety of our environment, of our citizens, of our communities, and very often regulations are part of that. To call them all bad or to suggest that there's unnecessary duplication – I'm at a loss for words a little bit, Madam Speaker.

Let me approach this from another perspective. I know from first-hand meetings with CFIB and other stakeholders, who are strong proponents of these red tape reductions, how difficult it can be to get them to tell you an example of a regulation. Now, members in this Chamber have stood and told examples of people who are frustrated with interacting with government, whether there was a regulation that was the bottleneck or maybe it was a form that was incomprehensible or another piece. I don't believe that Bill 4 is going to get to most of the pain points that are involved. I can tell you that regulations are not made equal. There are regulations that are huge, giant – the occupational health and safety code as an example – and there are regulations that are very small, that do a very specific thing. I question the idea that one in, one out is the best way to quantify this. Do we count the OHS code as one? Do we count a one-page regulation as one? The measuring of success – and I think it's really important for a government to be able to measure success – is really critical, and in this case we have an undefined report from the minister.

The minister, as I understand it, at his news conference and again in question period, could not give an example of the 17 regulations they've removed so far. I appreciate that, I understand, he's committed to making sure that they are publicly available on the website in the future. I think that transparency is really important, especially for a government that is doing a victory lap and saying: 17 gone already. Citizens deserve to know which 17. How will this impact their lives? What does this look like? That type of transparency is really, really important, and we haven't seen that yet, so making sure that Albertans are aware of what is being discussed is really important.

Now, the process to get to this list and to remove these regulations. Bill 4 is going to create a new minibureaucracy, not only the minister and his team – as my colleague referred to it, three jobs created already – but the crossministry working groups, the teams of people that are going to be sitting down to build the regulations to go with Bill 4. I assume that those regulations will then necessitate the repeal of other unrelated regulations in order to be introduced.

Also, within each ministry the process that that will be going through there, within each specific area, and then, as my colleague for Edmonton-Glenora was talking about, the machinery of government and this report to cabinet: all of this work is going to take a lot of people doing things. I can tell you that our Alberta public service, filled with amazing, talented, upstanding workers, has a lot of other things to do, especially with this government's current continued hiring freeze, and a lot of work supporting a brand new government happening. So I'm making sure that we are just really painting that picture for Albertans about how much work is going to be going on behind the scenes to achieve the goals of the Red Tape Reduction Act, Bill 4.

Now, I did begin, off the top, with that Wikipedia page, which I'll maybe clarify with the table: if the member opposite tables that tomorrow, does that mean I do not need to? We'll deal with that separately. I think it's good to have it on the record, now that we've identified some of the potential dire consequences that the member opposite was laughing about.

Making sure that we do not have any failures here in Alberta is really important because there have been failures in other jurisdictions that have implemented red tape reduction strategies. In some cases those failures were minor, and in some cases they were the deaths of citizens. What protections will the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction be putting in place to make sure that that doesn't happen here, that the attempt to reduce red tape and free up time so that instead of a six-hour inspection, it can be done in 45 minutes so it's not such a hassle doesn't end up with an out-of-control building fire? We don't know what protections the minister might put in because, of course, this bill doesn't really tell us what they're looking at, what their criteria will be, how they will be doing this, how they will be prioritizing.

There's so little information in this that we can only be left to wonder and, as I often like to do when considering decisions, look to other jurisdictions. Can we learn good things, bad things from other jurisdictions? Red tape reduction strategies have been used in many, many other jurisdictions. I know that my colleagues have discussed a few examples where we've seen issues with red tape reduction strategies in other places. In British Columbia both Gordon Campbell and Christy Clark were working for red tape reduction strategies, reducing oversight and provincial responsibility for environmental monitoring. This sounds like it might touch on what my hon. colleague was talking about when he was talking about a gravel pit approval. Potentially, it might be similar. It impacted a number of different projects in B.C., including a dam that caused widespread environmental damage, where the B.C. Auditor General went in and found that "almost every one of our expectations for a robust compliance and enforcement program within the [Ministry of Energy and Mines] and the [Ministry of Environment] were not met."

5:30

Under an administration that was actively looking to reduce red tape, to reduce the regulatory burden, to make things easier for companies, we have an unmitigated environmental disaster. I think it's really important, and my question to the minister as we move into later stages of debate would be: what work has he and his team done to look at other jurisdictions, and is he prepared to have a conversation about lessons learned where things have gone poorly? And how do we make sure that that doesn't happen here in Alberta? Is he prepared to consider any amendments that the opposition may suggest that might help to protect citizens, environment, or to put a framework around it to make sure that red tape reduction is not taking place in an unmitigated way?

It could be policies and process, perhaps not even necessarily an amendment, but I would certainly like to hear from the minister around how we can make sure that that doesn't happen here in our jurisdiction. As you well know, Madam Speaker, environmental damage, once done, is very difficult to undo, and obviously harm to our citizens or death of citizens is inexcusable when we're looking at these.

I have found, in my experience with . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Questions or comments under 29(2)(a)? The Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I've been greatly appreciating the comments from my colleague here, the Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods, and particularly in light of, I think, her deep experience having served as the minister of labour in this province and, I think, having done a very admirable job in that position. I appreciated the reflections that she brought to the table in terms of the dire consequences that can result, indeed the importance of thinking things fully through, reading, for example, a Wikipedia page from top to bottom and fully understanding everything that it contains.

What I was wondering, a question that I would have for my colleague. From her own experience, I guess, having brought in significant improvements to labour protections and occupational health and safety, some of which had been neglected by governments in Alberta for a number of years, I know that she'd spoken about doing crossjurisdictional analysis, talked about other research. I was hoping that perhaps she could enlighten the House as to the amount of work that goes into creating a regulation and the consideration that goes into determining what will be brought into law and how that reflects on what due consideration might need to be given when looking at removing the same.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, and thank you to my colleague for the question. My experience as a member of Executive Council is that a great deal of work does go into the creation of any new regulations or protective pieces, but my experience also tells me, particularly when it comes to occupational health and safety, that there's often a bit of a misunderstanding around things like the OH and S code.

A lot of the idea that this is red tape that needs to be removed: oftentimes it just needs to be clarified. Not everybody needs to have an oil and gas level health and safety program. That's not the minimum standard defined in our regulations. I know that when I was working with different industries on their health and safety programs, they would often look to oil and gas, for example, and say: we have to do the same thing they do, and they have binders and binders of documentation everywhere. That's not what occupational health and safety actually requires in a lot of situations.

It talks about doing reasonably practical things to protect the health and safety of your workers, something that universally employers agree with. Do reasonably practical things to keep people safe? Yes. Employers do not argue against that. The mechanism to get to that – I would say that our oil and gas industry is a top performer. They've got very rigorous systems. But that is not what the OHS code prescribes to a small-business owner. The reasonably practical application and their understanding of that and being able to work with business owners to help them fulfill those minimum requirements to keep people safe are what's needed, not exempting small-business owners from health and safety or repealing that regulation.

I would also just like to add, Madam Speaker, that the new youth wage differential is going to be additional red tape for employers. It's going to add enforcement and administration burden that is not there. It is going to add additional complications. We've seen in Ontario that a lot of employers don't fully understand the student wage. They apply it to nonstudents because they're under 18, or they continue to pay someone a student minimum wage after they turn 18 because it is additional red tape, more work on those business owners to try and manage.

I see that Bill 4 is about reducing red tape, yet Bill 2 is about adding red tape. The bill that was just introduced, the Education Act: adding more red tape. More bureaucracy is going to be inserted through that legislation. I would recommend to this minister on this particular bill that we need more clarity on exactly what's happening and how we're going to protect our citizens. And I would strongly recommend that he look into the work that our public servants are already doing to make things more efficient and more usable and accessible for our citizens through operational excellence, through different user experience practices because there's a lot of good work happening.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill?

Seeing none, would the hon. Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction like to close debate?

Mr. Hunter: I close debate.

[The voice vote indicated that the motion for second reading carried]

[Several members rose calling for a division. The division bell was rung at 5:38 p.m.]

[Fifteen minutes having elapsed, the Assembly divided]

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

For the motion:

Bill 2

An Act to Make Alberta Open for Business

[Adjourned debate June 4: Member Irwin]

The Deputy Speaker: The Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood is up to speak if you would like. No? Okay.

The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Mr. Ellis: Madam Speaker, obviously, we've had some great discussion over the last few hours. As I look at the clock, we are only just a few minutes away from our dinner break. I fully expect a robust conversation is about to take place from 7:30 p.m. onwards throughout the night, so in an effort to make sure that we're well nourished and ready to go for 7:30 p.m., I move that the House adjourn until 7:30.

Thank you.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 5:56 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

7:30 p.m.

Wednesday, June 5, 2019

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

The Deputy Speaker: Good evening. Please be seated.

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 2

An Act to Make Alberta Open for Business

[Debate adjourned June 5]

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any members wishing to speak?
The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Ms Sigurdson: Well, thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I'm certainly pleased to rise this evening to speak about the government's Bill 2, An Act to Make Alberta Open for Business. Of course, it's really not that at all, as we all know. It's more an act to pick the pockets of Alberta workers. It's actually quite concerning what the bill does propose. I'm just going to take a few minutes to go through that to let my colleagues know some of the perspectives on this.

With Bill 2 we know that youth minimum wage – the government says that by doing this bill, they're going to be “restoring fairness and balance to the workplace and getting ‘Help Wanted’ signs back in the windows of Alberta businesses.” The minister of labour himself asserts that these changes will reduce red tape and increase the employment of minors, saying:

We need to encourage employers to create opportunities for all workers. These changes [will] help Alberta's businesses to do just that. We're bringing back balance, cutting red tape and making it more affordable to hire teens for their first jobs.

That is certainly something that the minister of labour said.

Certainly, there are others in our community, most notably Dr. Barnetson, who is the professor of labour relations at Athabasca University, who actually has a different assessment of what this bill will do. He says:

An examination of Bill 2 suggests that it will, in fact, yield none of these claimed benefits [that the government suggests it will]. Instead, it will reduce workers' income, make payroll administration more complex, and impede workers seeking to join a union.

Despite the proclamations of the other side, the bill indeed is not going to be producing what they say it is.

I'll just go through it in a bit of detail to explain this argument. The youth minimum wage changes, I guess, are coming into effect June 26, 2019. Of course, reducing the youth minimum wage from $15 to $13 certainly will reduce wage costs for employers at the expense of young workers who are, you know, having their first jobs and doing equal work of other people. Of course, certainly, on this side of the House we believe that they should be paid equally with those 18 and over; thus, the $15 minimum wage should be continued.

I know this government really wants to support very much the reduction of red tape. They even have a bill that is called the Red Tape Reduction Act. But this particular part of Bill 2 legislation actually increases the red tape, really onerous work for the employers, small businesses oftentimes who may not have a lot of resources themselves. It's actually going to put an additional burden on them with this differential because sometimes it's $13, and then at other times it's $15. So there's quite a bit to wade through in the youth minimum wage because after so many hours of work in a week, then actually the employer needs to pay the higher wage, the $15 minimum wage, as opposed to $13.

How do they determine that? They have to know which employees are students – you know, some students may not be in school, and it's sort of determined on who is in school – know when each employee's school is in session or on a break because that also is something else that they have to take into account. They have to vary each employee's hourly wage depending on the hours worked, whether school is in session, and they have to change the worker's wages and payroll calculations when workers turn 18. So there are quite a few things.

I certainly hope that the employers will, you know, do their due diligence to make sure that they're paying the correct wage to these youth, but it might be just an overwhelming prospect for them. Certainly, if this is your first job and you see that there's a mistake on our pay stub, are you going to have the confidence as a young worker? I hope you do. I hope that they are supported by those around them and that they can question that. But I mean, also, you have some compassion for these small businesses. It's a lot of work to sort of understand this legislation and make sure that the students are paid the proper amount.

You know, even without this administrative red tape argument, moving to make it a lower youth rate is really just not fair. It's not fair to the workers, the youth, who work just as hard as someone who's 18 or older. We know it's actually been proven that it has stabilized employment oftentimes, which is a big benefit for employers.

For example, I know that when I was actually the minister of labour at the beginning of our mandate back in 2015, I met with employers, and there was one owner of a Dairy Queen who said that he already paid the minimum wage. He already paid $15 an hour, and he was happy to do that because – you know what that meant for him? – that meant that he had stable staff. Staff wanted to work for him. They were getting a fair wage, so that increased morale and stability for him. He said that some of his staff had been there for two years, and these were youth. So that made a big difference for him, because just the cost to train workers can be quite expensive for employers. He was very supportive of our government's move to increase minimum wage.

Another example that I can give you is that, certainly, we know that in the mountain parks that's been an ongoing issue for many, many years, making sure that we have workers in those areas. Increasing the minimum wage has created increased stability, again, for businesses. The workers are being paid fairly at a good rate, in some cases a living wage. In some parts of Alberta the living wage actually is $15. In the major centres like Edmonton and Calgary we're closer to $17, so it's not quite a living wage here. In the parks it's probably not either, but in some areas when you have a $15 minimum wage, that makes a big difference, and people can actually have a living wage, live with dignity.

We know that Alberta has the largest income gap of any province in Canada, and certainly in my 30 years as a social worker I worked with many vulnerable people and continue to support many folks. Lifting the floor – that's sort of what it's called. When you lift the minimum wage, you're lifting the floor, and you're supporting people who are quite vulnerable in our society so that they don't have to work a full-time job and then go to the food bank. You know, youth a lot of times live independently. They're supporting themselves. Certainly, we heard the story of the young woman from Fort Saskatchewan whose father had lost his job, and she was supporting her family, and there are other stories like this.

Paying this fair wage, you know, really is something that I think is so important. Certainly, we believe that people deserve equal pay for equal work. Besides that, of course, as I've already articulated, you know, it's kind of a very cumbersome piece of legislation for employers to understand all the ins and outs of it. I can't imagine that it's going to be easy for small businesses to implement, and I know that that's something that your government is certainly very concerned about, so I really ask you to look at this. I know that that's not what you want, and certainly we don't want that either on this side of the House. Please take some consideration of that.

Another aspect is the Employment Standards Code. This is again in Bill 2, the new changes to the legislation, the general holiday pay part. Right now, for example, to be eligible for holiday pay, you must work your regular scheduled shifts before and after that holiday as well as on the holiday if asked. If you don't work the holiday, you get your average daily rate regardless of when the holiday falls, and if you do work on the holiday, you get time and a half your hourly rate for the hours worked, so your regular rate plus another day off with pay. That's kind of how it works now.

But now this Bill 2 proposes some additional requirements. You must be employed by the employer for 30 days preceding the holiday. That's brand new. Of course, that means some people may not be eligible. If they've just been newly hired and there's a holiday, they won't get that; again, hence, pick your pockets. It's another way that we're taking money out of workers' pockets. Another requirement: if the holiday falls on a day that you do not normally work and you don't work that holiday, you are not entitled to general holiday pay. Certainly, the long and the short of this pick-your-pockets bill is that workers will have less take-home pay. Shift workers will be impacted much more significantly. For people who work shifts, I mean, that's another concern. They'll be more greatly impacted by these changes.

There's also a downside, and it's very similar to the downside for the reduction in youth minimum wage. For employers there is, again, increased administrative complexity in determining who is entitled to pay on a holiday and who isn't. Again, I'll just reiterate that even though your government has certainly made it very clear that they're a government that cares about red tape reduction, this is creating more administrative burden for small businesses, employers. I think this is something that's kind of strange, and I really encourage you to look at that. My understanding from what I'm hearing is that that's not something your government wants. I'm, you know, just wanting to support your congruence with your policies.

Another aspect of this Bill 2 is overtime premiums. Again, that's in the Employment Standards Code. Currently if you work more than 8 hours in a day or 44 hours in a week, you're entitled to time and a half of your normal rate for those overtime hours. An employee can bank this overtime and draw down that banked time. If an employee doesn't draw down this banked time, it is then paid at the overtime rate. That's kind of our current situation that we have in Alberta right now.

Of course, you know, we have a lot of seasonal workers here, say in the summer months. For the construction industry it's pretty miserable to work when it's minus 40, so a lot more building is done in the summer season, and people work longer hours. Of course, the sun doesn't set till super late at night, so it makes sense, and it's feasible for people. Maybe in those winter months when we're having minus 30, minus 40, snowy conditions, they can't work during that time. This allows them to work longer hours and bank them and then be able to have income when it's a slower season and it's not so busy for them. The employee can then draw down in the slower season.

Certainly, you know, myself, even though I'm a social worker and I don't work outside so much, maybe you think, "Oh; well, that doesn't sort of apply to my profession," but I was always in charge of the annual conference, when about a thousand social workers would come together. At those times we were working from dawn till dusk, let me tell you. We had to co-ordinate all the workshops and work hard. I oftentimes was working maybe 12 hours a day. I would just bank that time, and then after the conference or a little bit later on I was able to take that time off. So that was very helpful.

But the pick-your-pockets bill says that banked overtime has to be straight time. That's actually taking away – you know, time and a half – that half from workers; hence, the pick-your-pockets bill. It's counted as hour for hour instead of an hour and a half. This will put workers in a more vulnerable position. It will take away income that they currently would get.

If we look at an example of an average oil and gas worker and say that they're working overtime on a 12-week project – oftentimes there's project work that, you know, we have to do . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Comments or questions under Standing Order 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I was very interested to hear what the member was about to talk about regarding oil and gas workers. As we know, they have been hard hit with the drop in the price of oil, what our economy has been through, and I just wonder what the changes in Bill 2 would mean to them if the member wouldn't mind elaborating.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Ms Sigurdson: Well, thank you very much, Madam Speaker and, through you, to the member for letting me continue. I was just looking at sort of an average oil and gas worker. Say they're working, you know, longer hours, working overtime. They're on maybe a 12-week project. There's a deadline. They have to get it done by that time, so they may be working, let's say, approximately 10 hours of overtime a week. According to the bill – and there are some calculations, and certainly I'm happy to give details to the House after – it's over $2,500 they just give up.

Hence, you know, we have named this the pick-your-pockets bill. Obviously, the worker is worse off, and despite the government's claims that this is such a positive move forward, it's really not. It's taking a step backwards. Those workers who are doing that kind of shift work, that intensive work and seasonal work are not going to be making as much money as they can currently. It's really rolling back their wages, almost, by just denying them that time and a half.

You know, our opposition certainly feels very strongly that workers need to be supported. We need to diminish that gap between low- and high-income earners and have more equality. We know that a society that has greater equality actually is a healthier society, a society where everyone is supported. Sadly, this bill is not doing that. It's not supporting them.

The bill goes on, under the Labour Relations Code, and talks about unionization and how to become part of a union. Currently 40 per cent of the employees must support a union's application for certification to the Alberta Labour Relations Board. Currently if more than 65 per cent already say that they are in support of that, there's no need for that vote. That's called a card check certification. But this bill, again, proposes to roll back some of those advances. It proposes mandatory certification votes in all applications. So even though you have obviously a clear majority, over 65 per cent of employees would like to have their organization become a union, this bill proposes that there must be mandatory votes for all applications.

With no-vote-needed, card-check-certification legislation, employers can't interfere with the employees' choice. Sadly, that's what happens. Employers intervene with them. You know, they are threatened to lose their jobs, and of course then the opportunity for union certification goes down dramatically. Alberta already has the lowest unionization of any province in Canada. When we were government, of course, we modernized labour laws. That was shifting, and there was a growing trend, but here this bill will now take us back.

7:50 p.m.

Of course, we know that unionized workplaces have better working conditions for their employees. That's just a given fact. Not only do they support their employees specifically, but they have a lighthouse effect so that if other employees in other non-unionized settings work closely, you know, say, in the city of Edmonton – some are unionized; some aren't – the lighthouse effect means that employers have to consider the benefits, the salaries, and the support employees and unions get. It has a lighthouse effect, which means that employers who want to keep and retain employees must really match and make sure that they're giving them the benefits and the salaries of a unionized workplace. We know that . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The Leader of Her Majesty's Official Opposition.

Ms Notley: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's always a pleasure to get up and have an opportunity to speak to this Assembly. It's not necessarily a pleasure to get up to speak to this bill because it is so terribly misguided and cruel and mean-spirited and generally not likely to achieve the objects that they are seeking or at least not the stated objects that it is seeking. As many people have already talked about, this bill is inappropriately named the open for business act or some silliness like that, and many people in our opposition have chosen instead to refer to it as the pick-your-pocket bill.

But before we get to exactly how it proceeds to pick the pocket of regular working Albertans all over the place, let me just talk a little bit about, you know, this idea of opening Alberta for business and how we might best approach this common problem that we all face, which is the fact that our economy is sluggish, many people have lost their jobs, and many people are still looking for work. This is absolutely the front-of-mind consideration for all Albertans, with a tremendous level of urgency felt by those who are actually looking for work or looking for more work or looking for better paying work in order to help support their families the way they were able to do before the drop in the international price of oil.

Just to give a bit of context here and a bit of history, Madam Speaker, as you all know, Alberta is sitting on tremendously valuable resources, oil and gas resources, that have allowed us to punch above our weight internationally, have allowed us to punch above our weight nationally, and indeed have allowed us to punch above our weight locally or provincially in terms of the quality of life that Albertans have enjoyed, the overall wage levels that Albertans have enjoyed, the employment levels that Albertans have enjoyed. Indeed, on some occasions, not always – it's very inconsistent; it's been tremendously poorly managed; it's been very unstable – but periodically, we've also been able to enjoy strong public services. I don't just speak about the time when we were in government. I also, you know, look back to some of the tremendously innovative and nation-leading initiatives that were taken under the former Progressive Conservative government led by Peter Lougheed.

All these things were things that we were able to enjoy in Alberta because of these tremendous resources that we have in this province under the ground. I think I'm probably, with most of the people in this building, going to get consensus on the statement that nobody here actually put it there. No amount of tax cuts, no amount of investment in health care and, on the flip side, no amount of good education, no amount of cutting education had anything to do with whether those resources are there. They're there, and we have been able as a province to benefit from them. Now, obviously, there are other jurisdictions in the world that have benefited far more strategically, effectively, intelligently than we have in Alberta from similar levels of resources, but there's no question that we have benefited from them. That's lovely. As a result of that, we have had a strong economy, and business has come here, and we've had a lot of businesses.

Now, the one downside to that, though, just to give some context, is that we didn't do the work we needed to do to diversify our economy. We allowed ourselves to sit back and go: "Oh, that's a thing for the next day. We've got money coming in, and everyone has got jobs. In fact, we have too many jobs and not enough people, so what we have to do is now find a way to import cheap labour and all that kind of stuff." Things were coming up roses. It wasn't exactly the best plan. We weren't really thinking about down the road. We weren't thinking about the climate. We weren't doing the kinds of innovative things that could actually ensure protection of, you know, four or five generations to come like other jurisdictions have done with their investments. But things were good.

The only problem is that we didn't prepare for the inevitable, which, of course, is the drop in the price of oil, which is what began to happen, as many people here know, in late 2014 such that the predecessor to the UCP, the PC government, chose to call the election a year early because they got the kinds of briefings that the front bench here or some of the front bench here now get regularly, and they could tell that things were going to go from disturbing and concerning to really bad. They decided they wanted to try to slip that election under the nose of the people of Alberta before they realized how bad it was going to get. So we had an election a full year early. We broke the law to have the election early in the hopes of not having to face Albertans when the chickens came home to roost and the inevitable job losses and challenges that the Alberta economy is facing were presented to Albertans.

As it turned out, you know, it's interesting. At the time, when I saw them break the law and call the election early, I thought: oh, that's not going to work out too well for them. Certainly, at that particular time it didn't because – who knew? – history was made. A different government was elected, not one that people expected to see elected, but we were elected, and there you go.

I suppose, you know, through the lens of history one could say that maybe it wasn't that bad a move because suddenly what happened was, sure enough, the inevitable happened. We hadn't prepared. Forty-four years of the predecessor party to the current UCP government hadn't done the work to prepare our economy for a tremendous drop in the price of oil, one that I think everyone knows now is not going to recover in the next two months or three months like previously but that is going to really hurt us for some time. That happened, and then people lost their jobs. People became very frustrated and worried about their future and the future of their families. As a result, they started desperately looking for any answer – any answer – to change the situation because they weren't used to what was starting to look like chronic unemployment, and they were desperate to have somebody give them a magic solution.

Well, lucky them. In came the Premier, and he rustled up, pulled up, dusted off the cobwebs from some long-time historically discredited, hurtful, negative economic models, managed to get a couple of endorsers from the notoriously conservative public policy sector there at the U of C, and decided: no; the way to create jobs, our magic formula that we're going to sell to Albertans, is that we're going to give massive tax breaks to corporations without assuring or asking for or getting any kind of guarantee of anything in return.

But no, no, no, that's not enough. In order to make things even more attractive in our magical world of job creation, we are going to queue up to probably – and we don't know this yet, so hopefully I'm wrong. Hopefully, I'm apologizing to the Finance minister a year from now, and none of this is actually true. I suspect that what we're actually going to do is that we're going to cut education, we're going to cut health care, we're going to cut school lunches, we're going to cut special-needs programs in the schools, we're going to make postsecondary education much, much more expensive, and we're going to roll back infrastructure spending. We are going to make life harder for Albertans who struggle the most.

This somehow will be part of a magical job-creation formula that is part of this witches' brew of Reaganomics and other kinds of plans that folks dusted off when they were looking for something to offer the legitimately worried and frustrated Albertans who were struggling with the new reality of oil at $50 a barrel and no way to move it out of the province, which is also something that, to be clear, was a chronic problem that you could have seen coming 15 years ago but was not addressed by the Conservative government here in Alberta or the Conservative government in Ottawa. History is just a thing that apparently doesn't last past the most popular meme; nonetheless, it's kind of a thing that folks should think about every now and then.

The other, final element of this magical brew of pretend job-creation strategies that the current Premier offered up to a legitimately worried and frustrated province of people who needed to find some hope for job creation in the short term was this idea that the way to create jobs is on the backs of the most vulnerable people in the province and that you create jobs by keeping down workers, by suppressing their wages, by suppressing their rights, by figuratively putting your heel on the back of their neck and stepping down hard, that somehow the act of doing this will hang a neon sign to the world of investors out there, who will come and invest their money in Alberta because they, too, can do the things that will keep workers underpaid, undervalued, with fewer rights than they have in other parts of this fabulous country that we call Canada. It seems strange when I describe it, Madam Speaker. It really does. But that, in a nutshell, is the strange, magical formula of the – all the power to him – rather talented communications effort that the now Premier presented to Albertans in the last election. This is part of it.

I want to begin by saying that I fundamentally and completely disagree with this magical job-creation formula that is being put forward by the members opposite, in part, because I just think it's cruel and it's mean. I think the idea that you can create economic prosperity by growing inequality, by having a small group of exceptionally lucky and well-heeled haves at the expense of an ever-growing group of have-nots is fundamentally flawed.

This idea – the member opposite has actually talked about it. He said: oh, it's a meritocracy. It's a meritocracy. Of course, meritocracy is another word for saying: "Hey, I was born into a family where mom and dad both have lots and lots of money, so I got to be sent to a really well-heeled private school, and I got tutors when I had trouble getting through my classes. I never had to go hungry because we actually had a housekeeper who cooked lovely meals for me, and I was never late for class because I got my own car when I was 16," and all these things. Somehow that is evidence of a meritocracy. It's not, by the way. It's evidence of the kind of structured entitlement that goes from generation to generation and slowly makes a society more and more unhealthy.

Nonetheless, I disagree with the idea that is being put here. I don't believe that economic progress is achieved by cutting school lunch programs. I do not believe that jobs are created by firing special-needs educators. I do not believe that more jobs are created by paying people half as much money. If we do create jobs that way, they're not jobs we should be creating, Madam Speaker. Obviously, you know, the logical extension of that argument is: "Hey, why pay them anything? Just think how many jobs we'd have if everybody worked for free. Oh, my goodness, there would be so many jobs." Interestingly, the GDP would probably go up. It would actually go up. The only problem is that we'd have a little problem with 99 per cent of the population.

That is the logical extension of the kinds of things these folks are talking about and the overall vision for economic growth that they have: pull back government, pull back investment in postsecondary education, ensure that the only people who have access to it are those who have lots of money, make sure that we do not maintain any cap on tuition, for instance. I remember at one point having a conversation about tuition and actually hearing a member from the predecessor to this party talk about how if tuition was inexpensive or, heaven forbid, free, well, then – you know what? – it would be too easy to get in, and people wouldn't value it. I couldn't believe my ears when I heard that. I think that postsecondary education is absolutely fundamental to all of our futures. It also happens to be a fundamental component to a healthy, growing, diversified, modern, innovative economy that actually isn't entirely tied or unhealthily tied to one commodity and one price over which we have almost no control.

Ah, yes, going back to my point: the economy. Don't cut school lunches, don't cut teachers, don't close hospitals, don't pick on young workers, don't pick the pockets of workers, and for heaven's sake stop demonizing unions. The idea that all those things make the economy stronger is profoundly misguided.

Let's talk about this one subset of that profoundly misguided job-creation plan that the folks over there have managed to convince themselves will actually create jobs in this province, the pick-your-pockets act. There are so many elements of it which are deeply offensive, and the members opposite really are not selling it in a way that connects adequately, in my mind, to the reality of what it is they are doing. You know, I don't think that shows the highest level of intellectual integrity by selling – I get talking points; I do. I get talking points. I get political communications, but there is a point in that process where you kind of lose the plot and it becomes rather Orwellian. It just is absolutely the opposite of what the bill is actually doing. I will say that the members opposite have certainly reached that in terms of many of the talking points around this particular piece of legislation, because it does not do the things that they claim it will do or that they claim it needs to do.

Let me start with the overtime pieces and the changes in this bill around overtime. Now, I imagine that at some point I will get a chance to ask the Premier about this specifically, but I will comment about it today. I was quite disappointed in what I can only assume is the Premier's lack of knowledge about this legislation and his lack of knowledge and misunderstanding about what it means. I can only assume that he just happened to be misinformed when he made the comments that he did about this legislation – I think it was last week or two weeks ago – talking about: "Don't you worry. This reversion from time-and-a-half overtime to straight time will only happen if employees ask for it and if they agree to it." Now, that's simply not true, Madam Speaker. That's not true.

8:10 p.m.

Anybody who sits down and reads through this legislation with any care and attention – and I'm not suggesting that the Premier has time to sit down and read every bit of legislation that his cabinet passes, but presumably someone is advising him when he has his briefing book in front of him and his talking points. I get that he's got talking points, Madam Speaker, but presumably the people who write the talking points do the homework and check it against the facts so that the talking points don't end up actually contradicting the actual ink on the bill that's in front of us here in the Assembly, because that's awkward. Just, you know, from my own experience being Premier, I find it awkward when my speaking points are completely contradictory to what I'm putting forward to this Assembly and asking them to pass. I just think that as the Premier you should try to avoid those things.

The reality is that it is not something that is voluntary on the part of employees. The part of the act that has had overtime changed from one and a half times to straight time is the part that talks about banking overtime, and the part that talks about banking overtime outlines the circumstances under which you can have an agreement where you are banking overtime. The circumstances for that are where the employer and the employees agree, and then after that the agreement is in place.

Now, I know I'm not the only person to work in businesses that are, say, for instance, seasonal. The employer sits down with his three employees in January, who happen to be the only employees who are around at that time of the year, and they work out this agreement. Then they proceed to go hire the 100 employees who will be working with them through the remainder of the season. Those employees are told: hey, there's an agreement. They're not told, "Hey, you can opt out of the agreement," because – guess what? – they can't. They're told that there's an agreement. That's the way this legislation works.

How do we know it works that way? That's what we heard from people when we reviewed this legislation in the first place and made the changes to it that we did. We heard from people that this was being used as a means by employers in this province to get around paying overtime. We heard it from responsible business owners, who were worried about irresponsible business owners competing with them unfairly by using these rules to get around the obligation to pay overtime. We heard about it, of course, from workers themselves. We heard about it from unions. We heard about it from the staff within the ministry. We heard about it from academics who had written about the sorry, sorry state of Alberta's labour laws. We heard it from everyone, and it was true.

Then what we did was that we read the legislation, Madam Speaker. We looked at the legislation, and we went: "Hmm, yeah. If I was an employer who didn't want to pay overtime, this is exactly what I would do, and there is not a single, solitary thing in this piece of legislation that would stop me from doing it." So that's what people were doing.

What this means, then, is that in many, many cases, in many parts of the economy right now where people work overtime – I'm sure you're listening very carefully to everything that all of us over here say, so you will have heard it from other members of our caucus already. There are roughly 400,000 Albertans who earn overtime pay every year. In many of the sectors in which they work, it is seasonal, and there are, in many of these cases, these banked overtime agreements.

Now, it wasn't a problem with us because we just said: "Fine. Yeah. Bank your overtime. Have at 'er. Giddy up." I think it's great to bank your overtime because, you know – I'll be quite honest – lots of people would much prefer to bank their overtime, have the flexibility to take time off in lieu, all that kind of stuff. I mean, certainly, back in the day when I wasn't working here, the idea of being able to take time in lieu rather than getting paid out was something that I much preferred because when I was younger and was raising a family and my kids were younger and had greater demands, what I really wanted was time. The opportunity to choose time instead of money, once you're outside the parameters of having your regular, predictable rate of pay, that was an absolute privilege.

The ability to choose time and to choose to bank it is bold. But to have it imposed upon me at straight time rather than allowing me to take it at time and a half: well, no. That's an entirely different thing altogether. That's a very greedy hand reaching into my pocket and taking something out of it, and that is not a thing that is particularly advisable or appealing. "Appealing" really is the word. It's not appealing to workers to have someone reach into their pocket and pick their pocket, take their money.

This is a change that this act does. It is a lot of money for regular working folks. I think it's fair to say that in many, many cases people who work overtime in an unpredictable way and aren't on sort of a salary where, you know, overtime is not necessarily compensated are tending to be lower income folks. Now, not altogether, because of course you've probably also heard us say, which is true, that the sector that is most negatively impacted by this is, in fact, the construction and the oil and gas sector. Nonetheless, the rest of them tend to be wage-earning folks, and those folks don't tend to earn as much as salaried people.

Here what we are doing is finding a way to take a significant amount of money out of the pockets of people who probably are in the mid to lower end of the wage-earning scale in this province and doing so while not even being accurate about the fact that that's what you're doing by saying misinformed things like workers can choose this. You know, folks over there love to wax: "Wow. You know, they should just sit down, and they should negotiate it. That's what they should do. You betcha."

You know, I remember when I was working one summer picking strawberries at a market garden. I've got to tell you that I cannot tell you how much agency I felt I had to go and talk to the owner of that market garden, just march right up and say: "Sir, I just think we need to renegotiate this deal that you've got here between me and the other 30 or 40 employees and you. Let's just sit down because – you know what? – we're equal partners. We're equal partners, and I've decided that I'm going to renegotiate my wage."

Well, that's the most ridiculous thing on the planet, Madam Speaker, and anyone here who's ever worked, you know, a job like that, a hard-working, labouring, lower end of the wage scale job, knows that the idea that you just march up to your boss and sit down and have a nice little cup of coffee and tell him that you've decided to renegotiate your wage, that is fiction. It is fiction, and it's disrespectful. It is utterly disrespectful for members on the other side to talk about those pretend situations. It's disrespectful to the hard-working people who are finding that their wages are going down and who will find that under this bill they could lose up to $2,700 every 12 weeks. It is disrespectful to talk to that worker and tell them that they should just march into their CEO's office and have a little talk about how their wage needs to change. What utter nonsense.

Anyhow, I just hope that on this piece someone will take the time to go speak to whoever it is that is now working in the Premier's office writing up his talking points for his question period binder, take the time to pull that little piece out and have him acknowledge that he was incorrect when he said to this House that this is about providing flexibility for workers because they get to choose whether or not they are part of these banked overtime agreements. It was wrong, and he shouldn't have told us that. I would urge all of you to do him a favour and just help a Premier out and get his folks to fix his talking points so he stops making mistakes like this on the record. You know, again, it's awkward. It's just awkward.

What are some of the other parts of this bill that are in play? Well, one of the other ones, of course, is the decision to get rid of card check certification and go back to the two-step process that was previously in place. Now, this is another one of those decisions that is the product of many years of creative storytelling on the parts of folks who would prefer to see unions completely erased from the employment scenario or the employment environment here in this province and in every other jurisdiction around the world.

There's a long, proud history of employers union-busting, doing everything they can to fight against unions, I mean back in the really good old days, you know, if you go back to the coal mines in the northeast U.S. at that point. I'm sure history buffs here would be interested if you didn't already know the history of — Mackenzie King: was he first, second, third? I should know this — our Prime Minister and the relationship that he had with some of the union busters in the northeast U.S. over 100 years ago. There was violence associated with it. There was a lot of violence, a lot of injuries and deaths suffered by people who were struggling to set up unions and protect their rights and the safety of workers in the mines. At that time employers engaged in some hideous, hideous attacks on working people.

Now, obviously things have evolved tremendously since then, and we don't see that kind of thing anymore, but there is no question that there is a subset of employers — and I wouldn't say that it's a large group. I would say that, perhaps, the members opposite overrepresent that group a little bit right now. But there is definitely a subset of employers who think that unions are bad, no matter what.

Mackenzie King was the 10th Prime Minister. Thank you for that little piece of information there. That was very helpful. Thank you to the Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Anyway, they just think that unions are awful, and they would do whatever they could to avoid them. In doing that, there are some really interesting narratives that have been created as part of the more sophisticated and far less violent efforts to avoid unions. That is this idea that individual workers, if they could just choose, would choose to never have a union and that the union is represented by this great big, six-foot-eight, 300-pound, unshaven thug. That's what the union is. It's a thug. In fact, they use the word "thug" after the word "union" a lot. It's really quite something. There's this narrative that that's the union.

So the six-foot-eight, 300-pound thug marches onto the shop floor and intimidates all these poor, independently minded workers, who are quite happily sitting down and individually negotiating their pay raises with their boss when they're having lattes, whenever they want to, that this big thug is intimidating workers. The union boss, the union thug, is intimidating these individual workers and marching around the workplace like he owns it. Oh, it's just awful. The employer and the workers are cowering. It's just a horrible situation, and we need to do everything we can to avoid that. That's the narrative.

Of course, fundamental to this narrative is this other fiction, which is this idea that, again, in your average workplace, your factory floor or wherever, Joe or Jill Average Worker has the ability to just call up the boss, march upstairs to the manager's office, sit down, just sort of barge in and say: "Hey, I'm just going to use your latte maker there. I'm going to make myself one. We're going to sit down and you and I are going to have a talk and you're going to give me a raise." That's how it works every day, and it works out so well. That same fiction, of course, infuses this conversation about whether unions are a good thing or a bad thing.

Now, in fact, what we know is that unions are fundamentally responsible for the fact that we have weekends now, that workers have the right to refuse unsafe work without being fired, that women have the right to raise complaints about being harassed in the workplace without being fired, that human rights as a whole must be respected in the workplace, and that workers as a whole have the right to come together and negotiate reasonable working conditions with their employers. Oh, pensions, that's a good one. That's another one that came from unions: pensions. I wouldn't know; I don't have a pension. The whole world thinks I have a pension. As everyone in here knows, pretty much nobody in this room has a pension except the Premier. Pensions are a good thing, and the Premier owes his pension probably, ultimately, to unions, if you go back far enough.

Nonetheless, these are all good things that came from unions. They came from workers coming together to negotiate collectively with their employer because they found that those one-on-one latte events weren't working out for them quite as well as they had hoped. Anyway, because some employers are not keen on unions, they certainly want to make sure that they have every opportunity to discourage unions.

So then we have another version of this fictional narrative out there about these independent, latte-sipping, independently negotiating factory-floor workers and the imposing union thug. That is that when they sign a membership card to say they want to join a union, obviously they didn't mean it. I mean, it's just a pen and a paper and their signature. Clearly, they were intimidated by the union thug I described previously. These poor workers cannot be expected to know their minds when they sign these cards. It's ridiculous. What we need to do is protect them from themselves and also from our big six-foot-eight, 300-pound union thug. So what we do is that after they go through this process of signing the cards and putting pen to paper and putting their signature on it — that is apparently not good enough to demonstrate their desire for a union. No. What we now have to do is that we have to give the employer I think it's 90 days, but someone could correct me if I'm wrong. We have to give the employers the opportunity to protect them from themselves. We must also give the employer the opportunity to protect them from that 300-pound union thug who's marching around the factory floor with impunity and complete access to every worker and the ability to intimidate them into signing the card.

God bless the people that come up with these stories and the degree to which they are actually successful at making people believe them. You know, they certainly have a talent, but every now and then it's helpful, again, to look at facts, to look at history, to look at research.

We see, for instance, that when there was a two-stage approach to certification in B.C., 80 per cent of employers fought the certification, and when they went to a card check, the number of unions that were certified went up by something like 50 per cent. The number of times that workers or employers were able to sustain a claim of there being intimidation by the union of either the employer or the worker was almost nonexistent, but the frequency of documented and adjudicated unfair labour practices by the employer against the workers was very high. I can't remember the number, but it was – I don't know – 100 to 1 or something. I mean, the point is that that's the way it worked. We have articles out there that look at the fact that there's really no evidence of any allegation – or maybe one or two over the course of 15 years – of a union intimidating or engaging in an unfair labour practice to push a worker into signing a card, but there were copious – copious – pieces of evidence of employers using their influence to intimidate workers out of voting g for a union.

Let me talk a little bit about that, this spectre of employers intimidating workers out of voting for a union. Let me just say at the outset – again, I want to make it very clear. What I'm talking about is a small subset of employers. There are lots of great employers out there who are perfectly happy to have their employees be unionized. I can think of – well, I won't get into that; I don't know what's confidential and what's not confidential – really excellent major corporate players in Alberta and in Calgary that are wonderful corporate citizens who have been extremely sophisticated and mature and accommodating when their employees have selected a union or chosen to become unionized. There are many, many employers out there that are absolutely fine with it. They understand the positive outcomes of unionization. Let me just say that. I'm not by any means wanting to paint all employers with this brush because that's not the real thing. It's a subset that believe that their path to prosperity must be paved by shortchanging their workers and breaching their rights.

Anyway, when we talk about the employer's ability – I've talked about the narrative around the union thug's ability to march into the workplace and intimidate workers into signing cards. Now, just to be clear, unions don't have access to workplaces, so that's actually not a true thing. Unions don't even have access to workers, so that's not a true thing. Typically, when unions organize workers, what happens is that workers will go to unions and say: we're interested. Then those workers will organize themselves and bring their colleagues to meet with the union organizer, who will then give them the cards. The union organizer has no access to the workplace, and they have no access to the list of employees. They don't have that. That's just not a thing.

What the employer has is not only access to the workplace but complete control over the workplace and, of course, complete access to the list of employees. They also have the ability to control and manage the workplace. They can say things like: "Hey, there's a union drive going on. Huh, coincidentally, vacations are cancelled for the next four weeks." Or: "Hey, there's a union drive going on. Coincidentally, we're going to have you all come in and work more overtime. Oh, on that overtime agreement, y'all signed up for straight time, and you're going to have to bank it." Or: "Hey, Franco over there, who happens, in my mind, to maybe be the one that first reached out to the union, but I will never say this, doesn't have a job anymore, but it has nothing to do with that. Oh no, no. It has to do with the fact that I've been planning to fire Franco for a long time."

These are not things I'm making up. I urge you to go to the Labour Relations Board decisions of any province or of the country and read the decisions around unfair labour practices. These are exactly the circumstances that you will see described there. That is what it looks like. That is the kind of thing that creates a lot of disruption and, of course, undermines the right of workers to choose a union, which is now a constitutionally recognized right by the Supreme Court of Canada. Only in the past five or six years have the right to organize and the right to be part of a union been elevated and recognized as part of the freedom of association rights under the Charter. But it's really hard for workers to do that because they're in a scenario where, by virtue of agreeing to be an employee, they say to their boss: you are in control of me; that's what you're paying me for.

There are many, many mechanisms at the disposal of this particular subset of employers that wants to avoid unions if they can. That is why our government made the decision to move to the commonly used card check mechanism. But you know what? We also took a pretty pragmatic approach to it. We thought: yeah; you know, 51 per cent versus 49 per cent is pretty close, and to have a union come into a place automatically where only 51 per cent of people have expressed their desire to be part of a union, that's a bit much.

Quite frankly, I know myself, from friends and others whom I know who work in the labour movement, that good union organizers would not actually ever seek a certification with 51 per cent. I mean, I'm not saying that it doesn't happen. It does happen with not wise union organizers. But the good ones know that that's really not wise. If you actually certify a workplace with only 51 per cent support and then you sit down and try to negotiate an agreement, you know, the whole thing is going to fall apart because you're not going to have your union members onside with you to negotiate well. And if half your members are not in support of what needs to be done to negotiate a good deal, i.e. potentially threaten to strike, then you're never going to negotiate, and the whole thing is a wash anyway.

So why would you ever try to certify with 51 per cent? It's not wise anyway. To actually do that would create a lot of labour-employer strife, and it would create more fights than it was worth. So we just decided that it didn't make sense to do that. We're not here to create fights between working people and their employers around the province. So we said: no; we're going to pick a different number. We're not going to use 50 per cent plus one. We're going to use 65 per cent. If unions can get 65 per cent of people to take a pen and look at a card and read it and sign it on their own volition, then that's pretty good evidence that they made the decision that they want a union. That 65 per cent, you know, leaves a lot of room for movement. By doing that, you then are able to move quickly to the negotiating process.

Now, if it turns out that the union still doesn't have the support of people, well, then, the whole thing will end up being a wash ultimately anyway once they go to negotiate the agreement. But if you've got 65 per cent, that's not likely to be the case. You're not in this process where you are creating more divisiveness and lost productivity, quite honestly, in the workplace by having this two-step process, where suddenly we are compelling our workplaces to get into this kind of fighting scenario where the employer starts fighting against his or her own workers. That was why we did the 65 per cent card check, a very pragmatic decision.

But, no, these folks again have bought into that narrative. They've bought into the narrative of a 300-pound union thug intimidating these poor workers into signing these cards. They've bought into the fiction of the union having any capacity to actually campaign to workers or talk to workers in the workplace. They've bought into the fiction that employers don't somehow have a far accelerated ability to influence workers during the course of a union vote. They've bought into all of that, or maybe they wrote it themselves. I'm not even sure who's buying into a narrative or who's actually creating the narrative for their own interests or the interests of their donors. I'm not sure. In any event, they have completely bought into it.

The result, then, is that the frequency of unionization will be limited and will be reduced, and the benefits of unionization, which can be an organized means of managing the workplace, a respectful way to hear and navigate through the concerns of workers, a mechanism of giving working people a voice in their workplace, all those things will be less frequent. Wages will go down, more overtime agreements at straight time will be imposed on working people, and – guess what? – working people will end up with less money, and employers will end up with more. Hence, we move back into the magical thinking of the current government around how the way to create jobs is actually to grow inequality and to make the gap larger as much as you possibly can and to take rights away from those who already have the fewest rights. Somehow that is the magical path to creating jobs.

It's wrong. It's not, at least not the kinds of jobs that I believe Albertans want. I don't think Albertans want Alberta to become Mexico north. I'm pretty sure they don't want that to be our competitive advantage, but really that's the natural consequence, the logical consequence of the path that this UCP government is embarking upon.

Now, there are a few other things in Bill 2 as well which are basically other ways to go after workers' salaries and money. Apparently, that is how we create jobs. We just pay people less, and somehow there are going to be magical new jobs created. I think it's totally untrue, and there's more and more evidence to that end every day, but whatever.

In any event, there's this whole issue around holiday pay. I don't even know why you would do that. Honestly, it's like: I'm going to march into office, and my second bill is going to be about taking money away from working people on Christmas Day. Like, for the love of God. I just don't understand. Why be so petty? I just don't get it. And Christmas Day, of all things.

Our province will be . . .

Mr. Schmidt: It's part of their war on Christmas.

Ms Notley: It's war on Christmas, indeed. Yeah, yeah. War on fun, war on Christmas, war on working people, war on kids. Oh, my goodness. Kids.

I don't know what kids have done. In fact, you know what? Like, we've already got this theme of these guys not liking kids, you know, whether it's cutting their education, attacking their rights in school to be safe, taking away their school lunches, making them pay more to go to school, taking away their wages. But I hadn't really thought about that. It's actually a war on Christmas. Kids like Christmas, too. It's just that whatever kids like, these guys don't, right? I can't wait to see what's next.

Mr. Schmidt: It's going to be in the bill to make Santa Claus illegal.

Ms Notley: Well, maybe. Santa Claus, ironically, probably does work on holidays and is going to get paid a lot less. So kids are going to be sitting on an angry Santa's lap because Santa's making no overtime thanks to these folks. Thank you for that advice, Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar. That's actually what's happening here.

Every other part of the country, every other province has rules around holiday pay and premium pay for working on holidays that ensures that you get premium pay for holidays, but now Alberta will not do that. Now Alberta will pay less because of this bill. Every other province will pay more, and Alberta's employers will pay less. So people who are forced to work on these days get less. That's how it works, right?

Ms Gray: People who don't work.

Ms Notley: People who don't work on these days get less. That's right. Okay. They don't get paid because it's a stat holiday . . .

Ms Gray: Or a Saturday.

Ms Notley: But you don't get paid for it. That's right. So this is a change.

Just to be clear, a stat holiday: the idea is that people get paid for stat holidays, you know. That's what it means, that you get paid for them. That's why so often employers are typically unhappy with the idea of creating new holidays, because they don't want to pay for new holidays. I mean, holidays are bad things according to some.

So just even in '20-21 . . .

Ms Gray: In '21-22.

Ms Notley: In 2021-2022 both Christmas and New Year's are going to fall on a weekend, so that means that people are not going to get paid for that. Now, they did get paid, but now they don't get paid, so that's more money out of their pockets. That's a new thing. That's brought to you by the UCP: no stat holiday pay for Christmas. Jeez, I wonder how that's going to impact the number of presents under the tree, especially when added to the $2,500 every 12 weeks that someone else in the family is losing. It's going to be one heck of a Grinchy Christmas, I have to say.

I really don't have the slightest idea what possessed people over there to pick such a petty fight with the people of Alberta and to isolate Albertans from the rest of Canada by pulling back on these particular rights. It seems nitpicky, it seems petty, and it obviously is something that is directed, again, against working people, again, part of this overall idea that you create jobs by systematically attacking the rights of working people.

Then, of course, there are other things. We also know, of course, that these folks are very determined to discriminate against young people. You know, I have to say that I find it very interesting. There's this idea that somehow by dropping the youth wage by $2 an hour, there'll be a plethora of new jobs for people under 18. Of course, there's not one thought given to the people who turn 18 and lose their jobs. If anything, this will be a wash, and there'll be a neutral outcome there.

But, you know, honestly, we know that kids who choose to work before they are 18 typically do so because they need to, and they are contributing to parts of what they want to do, to their education, that kind of thing. I was very pleased. My son started working in grade 10, and he paid for a trip to Quebec to learn French one summer. He did that himself. He contributed to his tuition, and he paid for some of the costs for some of the sports programs, things like that. That's great. Not every kid who is working before they're 18 is using their money that way. Some of them are buying groceries, and some of them are helping pay rent, and some of them are saving to be able to get into university because mom and dad simply do not have the disposable income to pay for their tuition. So these kids are now earning less.

8:50 p.m.

But, more important even, when some of these kids turn 18, what happens is their jobs will just disappear, and they will be replaced by someone who is younger than 18. Because any employer who is going to actually engage in this discriminatory practice of paying young people $2 an hour less based on the year they were born in and not based on the way they work or the quality of their work is likely going to be the same kind of person that fires this person when they turn 18 and then goes and finds somebody else, you know, cheaper labour.

Of all the people to impose the obligation to drag this province into economic prosperity upon, let me say that to choose working people under the age of 18 and make them carry the burden is unfair. It's unfair. It's thoughtless. It's very thoughtless. It's going to backfire. It won't work. It's just mean spirited, too. I mean, these are people who can't vote. They didn't vote. They can't vote for this government. They can't cast a ballot. You take powerless people, and you make them the victims of your poorly, poorly thought-out plan to create jobs on the backs of people who earn the least and also need health care and education and school lunches and postsecondary and infrastructure and, you know, firefighters and people to build their roads, et cetera, et cetera, et cetera.

That is really an obnoxious choice to make, I have to say, Mr. Speaker, in terms of who it is that is going to carry the water of dealing with the fact that for 44 years this government sat on one of the biggest reserves of economic potential and failed to save or to diversify and create an economic model that would carry us more than six months beyond the drop in the price of oil. So for 44 years a bunch of people, many of whom are rather older now, didn't do the job, and now we're going to make people who are 16 pay for their failure. It just really doesn't sit well with me.

Now, another group of people that will be paying for this, of course, is people who serve liquor in restaurants. That's, I think, something that is not in this bill necessarily, but it is the subject of future conversations that have been discussed as part of this overall model of going after working people. I think what we do know is that liquor servers are primarily women and that by cutting their right to a minimum wage, we are disproportionately attacking women and that the majority of people that actually earn this wage, or a large number of them, are actually single parents with children who are women. Again, in an effort to convince their donors that they're going to give them a free ride in some fashion, we are picking people who earn the least and who already earn about 35 cents per dollar less, on average, than men in the province. By all means, let's make it 38 cents or 40 cents. Like, why stop at 35 cents, Mr. Speaker?

If there's a way to have women earn less, let's go at it, and that appears to be what the whole raising of the liquor server differentiation wage is about. That is, again, another decision by this government to make people who have the least carry the water for those who have the most as we struggle with the consequences of 44 years of Conservative failure to diversify our economy and prepare us for the inevitable drop in the price of oil and/or the failure to get our product to market, something that they presided over for 10 years both in Ottawa and Edmonton at the same time.

What else can I say about these things? We've already talked about how we're already out of line with the rest of the country and that somehow people think that by picking on our working people more, somehow this is going to attract investors. I'm wondering. I'm curious, you know. I'd like to ask the members opposite, Mr. Speaker. Are those the investors we want to attract? Do we really want the investors who come to Alberta because they get to pay less and they have to respect fewer rights and they can manipulate their employees more in the workplace? Are those the investors we want? Is that the model of economic growth that we want in this province? I'm just curious.

I had always thought that we could aim higher. It was certainly our view that that's exactly what we had the potential to do in Alberta. We have so many opportunities, so many resources, that we could aim higher, that we could have a vision for our economic future that included everybody doing well and that one of the goalposts to which we would hold ourselves accountable would be the idea that everybody does well, that every kid born into every family has the chance and the likelihood of going to university and has the chance and the likelihood of living a good life where they can spend time with their family and be safe in their workplaces and be innovative and thoughtful and enjoy the arts and culture and live a full life. That's what a good economy is, where everybody enjoys that, not one where we measure it by a profit made by a very small group of people on the backs of a much larger group of people who, quite frankly, struggle to pay the rent every month, who struggle to pay their grocery bills every month, who struggle to save for their kids' education in the future, if that's even a possible thing.

You know, I have to say, Mr. Speaker, that there's been a lot of hyperbole in this Chamber about the impact of the carbon tax on regular working people. There's been a tremendous amount of talk around how hard it was for families, low- and middle-income families, to deal with the consequences of the carbon tax even though we repeatedly provided evidence that the rebates we were offering meant that lower income families actually came out of it with more. For middle-income families, it was kind of a wash. But that was certainly part of the narrative. Oh my goodness. The chest-beating that we listened to over the $200 a month that it might cost a low-income person as a result of the carbon tax. I think that's actually a gross exaggeration. It's more like $200 over a longer period of time. In any event, that of course never took into account the rebates, which zeroed all that out.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

It's fine to raise those concerns, but to raise those concerns and then to turn around and take up to $2,700 every 12 weeks out of the pockets of those very same families that the members opposite claimed for the last four years to be so concerned about is the penultimate example of hypocrisy, Madam Speaker. If you were concerned about the well-being of those people, you wouldn't bring in Bill 2 and attack the well-being of those people. Really, I think the objection to the carbon tax wasn't about the people that these folks claim to be worried about. Well, I actually think it was about political tactics, if you must know. I really think it was about political tactics and not a lot more.

9:00 p.m.

Ms Hoffman: Successful.

Ms Notley: Yeah. Fair enough. It was successful political tactics, but it was actually still political tactics and not much more.

Nonetheless, this bill stands to have a much more significant financial effect on hard-working Albertans, the folks who are getting up in the morning in their older pickup truck and driving 45 minutes or an hour to a construction site and working for 13 hours and then coming home and repeating. These are the folks we heard about who were struggling because of the 6-cent-a-litre increase to the price of gas, but these are the folks who will now lose or could lose over $2,500 every 12 weeks. I see people shaking their heads over there, but I look forward to rolling out our research that shows that that is exactly the amount of money that people stand to lose by stealing their time and a half and replacing it with straight-time overtime. I guess the issue just comes down to this question. What exactly are you concerned about over there? You did a heck of a good job of convincing Albertans you were concerned about how hard that extra 6 cents a litre was for families, yet now you're doing this, and this is so much worse. I struggle to add it up, Madam Speaker, because it doesn't make sense. This is far more hurtful.

We've talked about overtime. We have talked about the Christmas holiday, that no longer gets paid to many people. We've talked about undermining unions because we believe the fiction that the average factory-floor employee has the capacity to talk to the owner of the business and individually negotiate their working conditions and how ridiculous that is.

I want to just talk a little bit about the fact that I am still concerned about where this is heading going forward. Originally in the platform of the UCP – and, of course, all of this is linked back to the platform – there was also talk about taking away the ability of unionized workers to participate in public discourse on matters that impacted their working conditions. I see that that's not in this bill, and that's good news. I do want to say that that's good news.

I also want to say, though, that if that is something that people are thinking about bringing back or reintroducing next fall, you know, I think you're going to have a heck of a fight on your hands. I've said quite openly in a speech not too long ago that this idea of cutting services, cutting education, cutting health care, cutting supports to people with disabilities, cutting people who support our seniors, cutting emergency services, cutting the amount of time that police can spend or the number of police, all those kinds of things that happen if you actually do the things that the math that has been presented thus far would suggest are going to be done – and maybe it won't be. Maybe they'll walk away from the math, Madam Speaker. Maybe they'll walk away from their balance date. Maybe they'll walk away from some of their commitments. But if you meet all the commitments that are currently being discussed, then what we will have are cuts to the tune of about 20 per cent over several years, and that will mean a significant attack on services that Albertans rely on.

Certainly, one of the ways we would know about the implications of those attacks is for the working people who provided those services to be able to stand up and tell Albertans what the funding cuts meant, but maybe folks over there think it'll be not as easy for them to tell Albertans about what the funding cuts mean if you take away their ability to speak publicly about these things, as was being mused about before this bill was introduced. I said that it was a bit akin to, you know, someone cutting the phone wires before you break into a house. That is a bit what that would be like if that particular action were taken by this government to limit the free speech rights of those who are parts of unions or members of unions.

I will say that since we don't see it now, I'm going to hope that enough lawyers came in to point out how many ways that would breach the Constitution, that maybe they actually got through to folks, and that particular piece of very ill-advised legislation or policy has been set aside. If it hasn't, then I think that there will be some difficult conversations not only in this Assembly but outside of it. That's all I will say on that at this point.

I think I'm getting close to wrapping up. I want to just finish with this idea that there are things that we agree on in this House, and I started with that. That is that we need to kick-start our economy, and we need to create jobs and we need to protect jobs. We need to protect the jobs that we still have, and we need to find ways to create more jobs. The way to do that in a long-term, sustainable way is to diversify our economy and to attract the kinds of investors who want and need an educated, articulate, enabled, young, innovative, entrepreneurial workforce. Those are the kinds of investors who will diversify our economy and create the economy of tomorrow, and that will help Alberta capitalize on what are our current assets.

Let me just say for a moment that above and beyond the oil and gas resources that we have, one of the assets that we have in Alberta that we sometimes overlook is that compared even to the rest of the country, we really do have the youngest, best educated, hardest working – and I say that in terms of, like, the number of hours a week that Albertans work – and most diverse workforce in the country. When you sit down and you talk to your colleagues in other parts of the country and you look at what their economic challenges are and you see that their population is literally 10, 15, 20 years older than ours and that the work rate, the productivity rate within their population is very, very low and that large swaths of people aren't working at all and all that kind of stuff, you realize that what we have in Alberta, our biggest asset, really, is our population.

So what we want to do is attract investors who are looking for that. We don't want to attract investors who are looking for the North American version of a developing country, where they can exploit their workforce. That is a dead end to economic development. Slashing our education is a dead end to economic development. Creating massive deficits by giving huge corporate tax giveaways when we already have the lowest taxes in the country is a dead end. Celebrating, raising up, and supporting what is the best workforce in the country: that is part of the path to a long-term, sustainable economic future in this province.

9:10 p.m.

So I would ultimately, as part of this larger picture, urge members opposite to move away from wanting to be the cheapest place to do business in the world model of economic development, because it will fail, because in a race to the bottom we can't compete. What we can compete with is a race to the top because that's who Albertans are. We should have a government that respects that about them, and we should have laws that respect that about Albertans when it comes to our workplaces.

This bill actually reads like a bill that is the opposite of that. This bill reads like a bill that wants to invite investors who will push us to a race for the bottom instead of working with us to win the race to the top, which we have the capacity to do but not if we write off large swaths of our population, create inequality, shut down opportunity, and push people to the side, which is what Bill 2, ultimately, is part of a larger plan to achieve. That is why we are very, very much opposed to it.

With that, although I think I might have another 10 minutes, I think I will bring this . . .

Ms Hoffman: Take nine and a half. Tell us more about union thugs.

Ms Notley: I feel that I've done a good job describing union thugs already, so I'm not going to do that anymore. To be clear, they're not actual, real union thugs.

Oh, I guess the last thing – this is the last thing I will say.

Ms Hoffman: There we go.

Ms Notley: There she goes. Okay.

The one thing I was going to say when I was talking about the hypothetical, fictional union thug, that was, you know, six foot eight and 300 pounds, is that, actually, I am the union thug because I worked for the union. I'm sure most people here will say that I'm not that intimidating, and it's very unlikely that I could march onto a factory floor and intimidate some fellow there into signing a union card that he didn't want to sign. Unions are actually working people, and they look like the working people who are their members. They are not thugs, and they're not intimidating; they're simply working people coming together to support each other.

Anyway, that's sort of a digression because I thought that I was actually getting very close to wrapping up with a nice conclusion. Thanks to the Member for Edmonton-Glenora, I have now broken that. Nonetheless, I guess I will just end with that little anecdote. My apologies for the lack of organization in the last hour of comments, but I do hope I've been able to reach and touch on most of the points that are relevant to why our caucus is absolutely and completely opposed to Bill 2. We think it represents a step towards the wrong future, the utterly wrong choice for how we grow this province. It is the opposite of what we should be doing, and it is something that in the long term will hurt the economy of the province, not help it, and in the short term it will hurt working people who are already struggling and don't need this government to pile on any more in the struggle that they have.

With that, Madam Speaker, I will take my seat and cede the floor to others who, I'm sure, have many things to say about Bill 2. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Comments or questions under Standing Order 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika.

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'd like to congratulate the Member for Edmonton-Strathcona for making it through 85 minutes of that diatribe. Unenlightening, at best. To be honest with you, I've heard a lot of things in my short time in this Legislature, but I have rarely heard the level of disrespect that I just heard over the last 85 minutes, particularly regarding the small-business owners who bust their hump every day to create wealth in this province and create jobs.

The members opposite have begun to show us their true colours. Last night the House leader said that if small businesses can't absorb a couple of thousand dollars, maybe they should revise their business model. Now, maybe there are a couple of companies, maybe there are lots of companies in this province that could absorb a couple of thousand dollars, but I can tell you that there are countless others for which that couple of thousand dollars makes a colossal difference between paying your employees, paying your debts, and maybe having a bit of money left over to pay yourself at the end of the month.

Then, all of a sudden we have the former Premier suggesting that success or relative success enjoyed by business leaders was luck – was luck. I cannot believe that came from that member's mouth. I'll tell you that luck does not get you up at 5 o'clock in the morning. Luck doesn't get you an excellent grade on your exam. Luck didn't help that member across graduate from law school. Luck doesn't pay off your line of credit, and it sure doesn't pay off your bank loan.

I implore the member opposite to take a trip down to my home constituency and walk the streets of Cardston and go from business to business to business and ask them how they got to where they are. Ask them where they are now, where they've been in the last four years, and what the projections were looking like if the members opposite were re-elected. I implore the member opposite to please go down to Cardston and visit those business owners and tell them to their faces that the success that they enjoy or what they may call success was luck.

An Hon. Member: We never said that.

Mr. Schow: Indeed, the member opposite did suggest that it was luck, by chance.

Well, I'll tell you what chance was. Chance is what happened four years ago on May 5, 2015. I'll tell you what. For the members opposite 604,000 voters cast a ballot for them, but a combined between the PC and Wildrose legacy parties was 774,000 and change. The luck: accidental government that became a colossal mistake, frankly, for this province. We're grateful it is over. But I will tell you that luck is not what got Alberta to where it is today. Luck doesn't break the ground. Luck doesn't get our products to market. Luck doesn't get you up in the morning, and it sure as heck doesn't pay your bills.

This idea, as the member opposite suggested, that these business owners are getting to where they are by suppressing the workers, suppressing their wages, and, as the member opposite said, putting their heels on the necks of the workers is nothing short of absurd. It's a terrible figure.

Madam Speaker, I make a request to the member opposite to apologize to Albertans for the insinuation that it is luck that got us here today, luck that has created Alberta. It is not luck. It is hard work. It is dedication. It is commitment to family. It is commitment to success. That is not luck. Albertans at home, if they're watching this – I pray they're watching the basketball game, not this, because that 85 minutes was certainly less entertaining than, I'm certain, the basketball game was. But I will tell you, she needs . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other speakers to the bill? The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

Member Ceci: Thank you very much. I'd like to begin by pointing out to the Member for Cardston-Siksika that the Leader of the Opposition did not say the things that you implied she said. You're not listening.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. member.

Member Ceci: Yes. I'll talk to you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. member, if I just may. Just please have a seat.

I think this is a really great time for everyone on all sides of the House to remember that we do speak through the chair. I understand that there's a lot of passion entering this room, which is fine, but let's maybe direct your anger this way instead of across the aisle.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

9:20 p.m.

Member Ceci: Thank you very much. The Leader of the Opposition, I know, did not say the things that the Member for Cardston-Siksika implied she said for five minutes. She didn't say them. He – that person; sorry . . .

Ms Hoffman: You can say "he."

Member Ceci: . . . heard something because he wanted to hear it. It wasn't said by this person.

I'll just begin by saying that I enjoyed the Leader of the Opposition's critique of the grand plan for job creation, which I believe, like this person, the leader, does, is wrong-headed and is bound to fail, not unlike the report today that talked about President Trump's $1 trillion tax giveaway, that is not returning what he said would be returned to Americans; namely, jobs and growth in the economy. It is folly in that case – the Americans bought it – and it's the same thing with Alberta today.

The Leader of the Opposition talked about the magical thinking that if you grow inequality and make it more difficult for people to get ahead who are at the lower end of the wage scale, if you take their rights away – I hope the Member for Cardston-Siksika is listening because I'm not saying anything other than what is happening in this province right now with this Bill 2, the pick-your-pockets bill – if you make it more difficult for them to unionize, if you make it more difficult for them to save money, then what you are really doing is creating an environment where the clock is being turned back in terms of rights of people, of employees in this province.

When Bill 17, the Fair and Family-friendly Workplaces Act, was created, in 2017, it was created by this side, the NDP of Alberta. It was created after previous governments in 2007 and 2014 reviewed the code on two different occasions, seven years apart, and did nothing. And did nothing. I can remember those times because what would often happen with those governments was that they would review, and then they would send up trial balloons. They would essentially take the temperature of Albertans, and the loudest Albertans in those cases were the ones who didn't want to see change in this province. It wasn't workers who had the loudest voices, Madam Speaker.

Alberta had some of the oldest workplace legislation in Canada. Prior to our government's changes, both the Employment Standards Code and the Labour Relations Code had not been significantly changed in 30 years. I can remember, time and time again, where the minister of labour and democratic renewal would stand up, stand over there, and say: we are doing these changes because 30 years ago what was popular was the movie Shaft.

Ms Gray: Die Hard.

Member Ceci: Die Hard. Sorry. It was the movie Die Hard. That was popular 30 years ago.

The minister of labour and democratic renewal would use that as a bit of a prop. She wouldn't say anything against employers. She wouldn't talk about small business at all. She would say: look, things haven't changed in this province since Die Hard was in the movie theatres.

Ms Gray: A Christmas classic.

Member Ceci: A Christmas classic. That's right.

The previous governments, in 2007 and 2014, essentially would lead people on by looking at changes and then not doing anything. We took a focused review on changes to the code and brought in the Fair and Family-friendly Workplaces Act. It focused the review on existing laws. Madam Speaker, over 7,300 submissions from businesses, industry, organized labour, academics, municipalities, nonprofits, and the general public were received. It was comprehensive, and there was a series of changes that were part of Bill 17.

Madam Speaker, I want to talk about one part of the current pick-your-pockets bill because one of the many things that we did was repeal the ability for employers to pay employees less than the minimum wage. We had a series of steps to get the minimum wage up to $15. I think it was October 1, 2018, when it went to $15. Also, there was an ability for employees to pay people with disabilities less than the minimum wage in the previous code. We eliminated that. I think everybody would agree that it's not appropriate to pay people with disabilities any less than the minimum wage, but that was entrenched in the previous code by the previous government. We got rid of that, and we made all wages the same for all people. Equal pay for work of equal value.

I just want to talk about my first experience with equal pay for work of equal value. I grew up in southern Ontario, Madam Speaker, and in southern Ontario there are a number of family farms. Farming is really big in southern Ontario. The cash crop, the one that I worked in, was tobacco. My parents grew up on tobacco farms. My mother got married off the farm. Her whole life before she got married and went to the city was as a worker on a farm. My father's family, similarly, had tobacco and other mixed crops. They went to the city before my mother's family, but, you know, we grew up as young kids in the family always going to the farm to work summers.

I can remember the time I went to be a primer. That's a tobacco picker in the fields. It's back-breaking work, Madam Speaker, from sun-up to sundown. Stompin' Tom Connors said, you know: my back hurts every time I hear the word Tillsonburg. He was an itinerant worker on tobacco farms as well for a portion of his time. He got out, and we all know what Stompin' Tom did for this country, but before he was famous, he worked tobacco.

Tobacco had one wage in the field, not one wage for young people and one wage for people over 18. When I was far younger than 18, I was in the fields, and we were paid $50 a day. Every worker in the fields was paid $50. It seemed like a tremendous amount of money, Madam Speaker, years ago, when I was 15, 16, 17, 18. I knew that the other workers were getting the same amount of money. There was no difference because we all did the same work.

The lesson I would have learned had I got less than the person right beside me, who was over 18, is: you can work as hard as them, but you're not going to get compensated. That would have been the wrong lesson to teach a young person, Madam Speaker, and that's what the pick-your-pockets bill does. Through no fault other than their age, they're going to get paid less. Like them, I back then used that money to save up for my future. Telling those young people today, with the pick-your-pockets bill, "You're worth less; you'll not have the ability to save as much as the person beside you who may be more than 18," it might influence their ability to want to work as hard as that person beside them. They're going to get paid less, but they're going to be asked to do the same work. It defies logic, Madam Speaker. If we have a minimum wage, that's what people should get paid minimally, not people with disabilities getting paid less though that was in the previous government's actions, not if you're less than 18, you should get paid less, because we all are working hard. Albertans work hard.

9:30 p.m.

The Leader of the Opposition talked at length about the workforce in this province. I agree wholeheartedly, and I think that side would agree as well. We're younger than the rest of the country, maybe not me but the rest of the workforce are younger on average. I think they're in the 40s, low 40s. The only people younger in this country are people in the territories. They're a younger group of people than Albertans, but their numbers are very small compared to the millions in this province that work.

[The Speaker in the chair]

We're more educated than the rest of the country, Mr. Speaker, and that's because of our quality education system. Right from primary all up to secondary school, postsecondary school, colleges, trade schools, we're more educated in this province. But, you know, with the bill . . .

Ms Hoffman: Pick-your-pockets bill.

Member Ceci: Pick-your-pockets bill is Bill 2, but Bill 3 is the give money away to corporations bill, with a $4.5 billion tax cut to corporations. Mr. Speaker, it won't be too long before our education system is going to suffer, and the people will suffer in this province. It won't be too long before we can't call ourselves one of the best educated workforces in the country.

The Leader of the Opposition talked about us being more entrepreneurial. Well, we know that to be true. The number of jobs in business start-ups in this province outweigh many, many, many other provinces. You know, we punch higher than our weight in that area as well. Hardest working. What we mean by that is the number of hours. Longer number of hours put in by Albertans than the rest of the country. More diverse. Our workforce is more diverse, Mr. Speaker. That's true, too, because we're getting more diverse. We're about 30, 40 per cent people of colour and diverse backgrounds in this province now, where we never were before. That's an advantage for employers in this province and who will be attracted here. We're more productive.

Those are the things that I know about Albertans. Those are the things that I think will suffer as a result of a pick-your-pockets bill like we're looking at today. Those are the things that won't encourage people to do more and to do better.

After coming out here, Mr. Speaker, I put about 20 years in as a social worker in a variety of places. I know there are some members of the Legislature here, both on this side and that side, who worked in that profession as well. This bill takes money out of the pockets of young people who are struggling to make their lives better. The east end of Calgary: I know the Member for Calgary-Cross comes from the east end. His father was the Member for Calgary-East for a long time. It's an area of the city that struggles, and the young people in that area of the city have to go to work at an earlier age to support families.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. I feel like we may need a game of paper, rock, scissors here to determine who was on their feet first, but I will cede to the hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to rise on 29(2)(a). Thank you to the hon. member for his comments. I'd like to focus on just one area of it because of the little time that we have to be able to speak on this important issue. I was interested in some of the comments where the hon. member, a former Finance minister not too long ago, spent his time focusing on the fact that, essentially, Albertans, over a million of them who voted for the United Conservative Party, who raised concerns during the mandate of his then government, were being loud and were yelling and were somehow not with the majority of Albertans. And just that the reason that they were able to articulate and ultimately influence – I guess his argument was that the United Conservative Party would go on to become government just because they were louder than everybody else.

Mr. Speaker, I would submit to you that it's actually completely different. I think most of those people were the silent majority that were extremely frustrated with the behaviour of the NDP when they were in government, particularly with that Finance minister, who oversaw – was it six credit downgrades under his mandate? At least five. He completely ignored the people. I feel obligated on behalf of my constituents, who were very frustrated with the former Finance minister and his party, to speak tonight, to say that it wasn't because they were yelling and being obnoxious; it's because they were expressing their concerns often calmly and, you know, sometimes passionately, certainly, but very respectfully.

I mean, it started off, of course, when the NDP came into power, with thousands of farmers and ranchers piling onto the stairs and around the fountains outside to protest what was pretty much abuse of the legislative process without consulting them. I know that the former Premier mocks them still. They were right there, Mr. Speaker, right in this House. It's not appropriate.

Maybe he's referring to the people who – this past year, just after Christmas, I believe December 29, in Rocky Mountain House I had some young people call me, and they wanted to organize a rally to protest and to stand up against how they felt the NDP were treating them. I thought that to do that between Christmas and New Year's, they would not have much of a turnout, but I was willing to do it. Much to my surprise when I arrived on the 29th, the parking lots were full, and well over a thousand people came out between Christmas and New Year's in small town Rocky Mountain House to say that that town was not going to put up anymore with what this government had done. Certainly, Mr. Speaker, I would say that Rocky Mountain House, which has been a town since 1799, one of the oldest communities in this country and certainly in western Canada, has every right to come out and say that they have a problem with how this former government was treating them.

But what you're seeing tonight, again, over and over, Mr. Speaker, is the NDP, particularly led by their leader, who can't accept the fact that Albertans cast judgment on her and her party's behaviour when they were on this side of the House. They continue to want to relive that election. Well, the election results are clear. The NDP's policies have been outright rejected by the people of Alberta. Their government was a failure, they failed Albertans, and all they can do now is sit inside this Assembly and spend time insulting job creators or insulting the people that spoke out against them, insulting farmers and ranchers who came and complained about legislation being forced on them without their consultation, insulting fixed-income seniors who complained that they were having trouble paying their heating bill when they brought in a carbon tax. That's all that they can do.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, they go as far as to basically question the results of our democracy that spoke loud and clear on April 16. When I sat in that same chair that the current Leader of the Official Opposition sits in, I warned them that this would happen. But they haven't learned their lesson. They have not learned their lesson. That's why we see – and I'm shocked. I thought that there would be a little bit of humbleness that would come from the NDP. I mean, being the only party that was able to form government in this province that would go on to lose after one term. One term: that's the legacy of the now Leader of the Official Opposition and her party. A one-term government because they didn't listen to the people of Alberta, because they sat on this side of the aisle and even insulted them, calling them names like sewer rats and Chicken Little and those types of things. It's a shame they have not learned their lesson.

The Speaker: There's approximately one second left in 29(2)(a). I see the Government House Leader has risen. Has he spoken to second reading?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Speaking on the bill, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: On the main bill.

9:40 p.m.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity now to speak on the main bill. I think that we're pretty close to moving on to a different topic for the night, but I just will close my thoughts on 29(2)(a), which is ... [interjection] Right there you are seeing tonight, Mr. Speaker, inside the Legislature the NDP government continuing not to accept the results – the NDP opposition. Sorry, Mr. Speaker. That muscle memory gets you.

That NDP opposition is continuing to refuse to accept the results of the election, which is fine. They can do that. But they should stop standing inside this House and questioning what Albertans decided on April 16. Albertans are the ones who decided that they should not be government anymore. Albertans are the ones who decided that their policies were not acceptable to them. Albertans fired them on April 16. That was the decision of this province. I certainly know, Mr. Speaker, that I was in a big hurry to come and vote to fire them as well. But, ultimately, that was a decision by Albertans.

With that said and with that thought on everybody's mind, I will now move that we adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mrs. Pitt in the chair]

The Chair: Members, I would like to call the committee to order.

Bill 3 Job Creation Tax Cut (Alberta Corporate Tax Amendment) Act

The Chair: Are there any comments, questions, or amendments to be offered with respect to this bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. Obviously, I guess we're going to discuss corporate tax cuts and the reason why the members opposite keep saying that it's going to do things that legislation clearly hasn't done at times where other jurisdictions have attempted this. We've seen case study after case study. I've mentioned some of them in second reading. In jurisdictions, primarily in the United States, where individuals attempted to campaign on these big corporate tax cuts magically leading to better jobs or more jobs, certainly that wasn't the evidence that has been contributed from these experiments in reducing corporate taxes and bringing about further opportunities for shareholders – I wouldn't even say shareholders. I'd say for profitable corporations to maximize their profits – that's what I would say – at the expense of things that the public purse would use that money for, like health care and education and jobs and bridges and communities.

I think we heard our critic for Transportation speak earlier today about the bridge in Fort Saskatchewan, a long-needed capital project for that community, and we heard the Minister of Transportation say not much. We heard the Minister of Transportation maybe say: "Yeah. It's an important project. But there's lots of pressure. So who knows? Time will tell. We'll make up our mind later."

Well, I'll you, though, that the folks that I talked to in Fort Saskatchewan and I imagine the Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville has talked to, they can't wait. They think that this is an important project for their safety and their well-being, the economic security of the region. There are certainly a lot of folks who take that bridge every day to and from work. There's a lot of heavy equipment that take that bridge on a regular basis, I believe, as well. And they say: "Stay tuned. Wait. We don't have time to make a decision about whether or not we're going to keep this bridge as a high priority and it'll be funded or whether or not we will cancel it altogether. But we do have time to say that we will cut corporate taxes by $4.5 billion. We'll blow a hole in the revenues of the province. That we will decide today."

We also asked questions earlier in the day during question period about school nutrition programs. Schools across this province are of course planning for the upcoming fall. They usually have done all their staffing determinations by this point in the school year or most of them at least. They're trying to decide if they will be hiring lunch men and woman, people to help support those school nutrition programs. They have had no inkling from this government whether or not that project will continue. They're assuming that it won't. When you hear nothing, it probably means that. So they are making the decisions to cut back on staff, cut back on things to feed hungry children. I asked the question in question period today: is feeding hungry children a priority for this government? Again we heard nothing. What we are hearing is that a $4.5 billion hole in the revenues of this province is a priority. It must move forward today because we don't have $33 million to feed hungry kids.

Well, Mr. Chair, when things like this are brought forward by the government, it really does speak to what some of their priorities are. They are creating an environment where they will say to their caucus: "You know, we made the decision to cut corporate taxes. We did that together. We made this decision together. We all decided we were going to do this. We voted on it. We're going to have not just the lowest because we have almost the lowest right now. We are only .5 per cent higher than the next lowest jurisdiction in the country. It's not that we're wanting to be the lowest. We are wanting to be by far, far, far the lowest. The next lowest would be Ontario at 11.5 per cent. We want to be 8 per cent. That's going to be the thing that gets us over the finish line." Well, you know what? I would say that if they wanted to tinker with them, if they wanted to be tied for the lowest in the country, that certainly would blow a much smaller hole in the finances for this province, a much smaller hole that would enable things like the Fort Saskatchewan bridge or things like the transit project right now that's under way between Medicine Hat and Lethbridge to move forward.

I know that those voices aren't sitting around the cabinet table when bills like this are drafted. But those voices are around the caucus table, and the people who live in those regions matter. They deserve to have an opportunity to have their projects funded as well, to make sure that many seniors who travel between Medicine Hat and Lethbridge have the opportunity to do that without putting themselves at risk or their families at risk or without having to spend hundreds of dollars to be able to go see the cardiac specialist who's in Lethbridge if you live in Medicine Hat.

These are the kinds of initiatives that you're being asked today to make a decision on. Rather than laying all of the money out on the table and involving the whole caucus in setting what the priorities are, our Premier, Mr. Chair, is putting forward a suite of legislation that sets out conditions that will inevitably lead to significant cuts to services, particularly in regional communities. For example, this $4.5 billion tax cut: another area where some folks who were in the opposition previously, who now sit among private members in the caucus, said regularly that they really wanted to see an investment – or not an investment. They wanted to make sure that the local laundry services that we have in rural communities become privatized and centralized into large urban centres.

9:50 p.m.

Well, these are the kinds of things that will inevitably happen when you blow this kind of a hole: "Of course, we can't afford to wash sheets. Of course, we can't afford to pay the local people who work in our community, in our hospital. We'll have to privatize that and send those jobs to Edmonton and Calgary. Well, most of our caucus represents those communities where those jobs will be moving to, so maybe we shouldn't be so outraged and upset."

But, Mr. Chair, many of us have ties to other parts of this province as well. When I think about the hard-working men and women in hospitals in High Prairie, for example, or in Hinton, for example, who deserve to have those jobs in their communities be supported in the long term and keep those jobs, those services, and that laundry close by – some people may think: laundry, it's not such a big deal. Well, you know what? My grandma spent a reasonable amount of time in the hospital towards the end of her life, and on more than one occasion she lost her hearing aid. It was usually in the sheets. If those sheets weren't in the hospital that she was in, how would we ever get that hearing aid back? We probably wouldn't.

So it definitely has an impact on patient care and families. I can tell you that those times that she lost the hearing aid were very stressful for all of us, even if it was for just a very short period of time, because we had to find a way to get it back and to communicate with her. If we still lived in Kinuso and we had to drive the three hours to get to Edmonton to find where the laundry facility was and to try to get back the hearing aid, that would have had a significant detrimental effect on my grandmother and certainly on our family as well, our nuclear family.

I have to say that when we're asked to make decisions here – is it the second or the third week of this sitting? It's not long into the job to be making significant financial decisions that will have major impacts on the projects that many members of this House are advocating for. I've heard many private members' questions about important projects in their own ridings. I have to say: good on you for fighting for your riding. But by making this decision today, Mr. Chair, a number of conditions will be put in place where you simply can't continue to advocate for these kinds of projects because there simply won't be the money that's needed to make these investments in your local communities.

I really hope that constituents don't end up sitting on the highway for hours trying to chase the laundry down the highway to go get the things that are needed to keep their family members safe. I really hope that the laundry workers in Medicine Hat, who I met with last summer, have their jobs in six months. I really do because I think that is important work, and I think that having those jobs in local communities helps our province be vibrant.

I think it was Premier Lougheed who I believe talked about – I'm going to paraphrase. If I get it wrong, I'm sure somebody can help me under 29(2)(a). Part of why he built so many hospitals in rural communities is that he wanted to create an Alberta where it wasn't just the two big cities that held all the opportunities for people to work and engage in the public sector and the services that come with that. He wanted to have lots of communities like Hinton and Stettler and Medicine Hat. Small and mid-size cities I think he thought were the model for the future. I know many members in this House, many members particularly in the caucus rather than in the cabinet, represent those communities. I think it's important that they have an opportunity to benefit from our shared wealth as a province.

Mr. Chair, we're being asked as a Chamber to make a decision that, I would say, is going to have far-reaching impacts, and the rationale that's given is that it's going to create jobs, but all the research shows that it will not create jobs. All the research shows that it will actually – in other jurisdictions where employment went up far greater, jurisdictions that took this strategy saw either flat growth or very modest growth compared to their neighbouring jurisdictions that maintained tax rates.

Again, AT&T promised to create 7,000 new jobs under a Trump tax cut. What did they do? They cut 23,000. That's a significant difference between what was promised and what was delivered. Kansas, of course, passed into law one of the world's biggest, the state's biggest for sure and probably among the world's biggest, single tax cuts. It was supposed to be a real live experiment. Well, it sure was an experiment, and it sure did fail, Mr. Chair.

It's important, I think, to think about what conditions are being set up through this bill. I've mentioned earlier in debate getting time on that cabinet agenda to bring something back because people will probably say: "Well, we're passing this today; it doesn't mean that it needs to be this forever. We can always bring it back." But I'll tell you that getting time on that cabinet agenda when all private members, all cabinet ministers have things they would like to get through – I'm sure that you've been lobbied by many members of your community to make sure that you push initiatives that are important to them. I wonder how many people, when they were door-knocking, had voters say to them: you know, it's really important to me that we cut $4.5 billion from the corporate tax rate. I didn't hear that.

I did hear people say: it's really important to me that we have good jobs, that we diversify our economy, that we make sure that we support and continue to advocate in all ways possible to get access to tidewater. It's been far too long since we've gotten a Canadian pipeline to Canadian tidewater. I think it's 60 years. Again, if I'm off by five or 10, somebody can correct me. I remember thinking that it was almost the length of time that our oldest caucus member had been alive since we got a Canadian pipeline to Canadian tidewater. It definitely wasn't the length of time in excess that the former, former government was in. The PC government didn't get a Canadian pipeline to Canadian tidewater. It certainly was in excess of 44 years plus four for us. That's what I'm trying to say.

I know that it's important for us to make sure that we continue to stimulate the economy, that we continue to support a diversified economy. I assert that the research shows that these kinds of short-sighted, ideological decisions that aren't grounded in evidence will do the opposite, and it will actually hurt everyone's ability to lobby for their individual communities and the projects that are important in their own ridings. I know that there are many communities that are nervous about the future of their local school or their local hospital. I have to say that decisions like this drive those kinds of nervous decisions down the road. I get it.

But the truth is that we don't need to make this decision today. We don't need to rush into making a decision to blow a $4.5 billion hole in our province's revenues. It's up to us when and how we proceed with these things and what information we use to help make these decisions. Whether it's the bridge in Peace River or the bridge in Fort Saskatchewan or the transit path between Medicine Hat and Lethbridge or the dialysis that we are expanding in many communities, particularly in the north, that have incredibly high rates of diabetes and needs for increased dialysis services, these are all decisions that will be influenced by the conditions that we set out for ourselves at the beginning of our term here.

This is what we are engaging in at this very moment, making these decisions about what kind of conditions, what assumptions we want down the road. If you take a symbolic logic course – you know, if A, then B. So if A is that we cut out $4.5 billion, then it limits some of our opportunities down the road because we've started making that initial decision about which path we want to go forward on. Maybe I'm wrong. Maybe members opposite will tell me that they heard that this was the number one issue at every single door they knocked. If they did, I would love to know that. This definitely wasn't the number one issue that I heard at every single door. I had many people talk to me about supporting a diversified economy and good jobs and good schools and good health care, and I imagine that many of those messages are probably the same.

Certainly, our pipeline access was a big one. If we're going to make decisions to have big Canada-wide campaigns – and I definitely know that this project is in the Canadian interest. That's one of the reasons why I supported the Keep Canada Working campaign, and I know there's a new iteration of that now under the new Premier. But if the actual goal is to spend money on things like a national ad campaign and to cut $4.5 billion from corporate taxes, that definitely blows a big hole in revenues that can be used in other ways to support projects that are important to all members and the constituents that we are charged to represent.

I think that this is something that we don't need to rush into. I think that the fact that we made the rushed decision to even change the order of debate tonight to get to this point and then tried to call the question before members had an opportunity to fully engage in this speaks to the fact that there are many people in the cabinet that probably want to get this done with. They want to pretend that this debate never happened. It was a quick and easy decision, and then the caucus can get on with doing the tough work about deciding which schools and hospitals in their own ridings will close. I don't think that's fair. I think it's important that all members of both caucuses have an opportunity to consider what the real ramifications are of things like blowing a $4.5 billion hole in revenues and what implications that would have to their local communities.

I also want to say that we are not alone in this opinion. In Canada there was a B.C. tax cut. They cut corporate taxes from 16.5 per cent in 2000 to 13.5 and then down to 10 per cent. The impact on the bottom line: while politicians said that the cut would pay for itself, between $8 billion and $10 billion, it certainly did no such thing. During the same period the province's debt doubled.

I do know that many people in this House care deeply about debt and deficit, and I do, too. I also care about making sure that we have a stable public service, particularly health care and education. If you care about those things, too, and you don't want to increase the debt, don't duplicate the decisions, Mr. Chair, that were made in B.C. that showed that it actually moved things backwards, not forwards, on that goal. B.C. politicians were claiming that the tax cuts would pay for themselves, but a decade of tax cuts has proven few savings for most families while out-of-pocket user fees for public services have risen significantly, fees for things like taking the ferries, the toll bridges in British Columbia – I know many of you have probably been on those toll bridges – or the toll highways.

These are things that I know the now Premier didn't rule out during the election campaign, but I hope that many of you have had a chance to think about how these things would impact the families that you represent and the workers and the employers, too. When I think about how busy that bridge in Fort Saskatchewan is, for example, with industrial traffic, if that was a toll bridge rather than a bridge built with part of this $4.5 billion, I think it would have a negative impact on that part of the Industrial Heartland and the work that happens in that part of our province.

If we increased tolls in places like the provincial parks and park user fees, I know that would have a negative impact on families. I know that when then Premier Prentice brought in his budget, there were a number of user fees that went up in a number of things. There was a proposed health care levy, a health care levy that hit every single family. These are the kinds of things that we can avoid if we are a little bit more thoughtful and take our time to make a decision about how we want to divide up the resources that we have as a province. Making these massive tax bill decisions without seeing a budget is setting that budget up for certain failure.

In dollar terms, in the past decade lower income households received an average tax cut of a couple of hundred dollars per year, the middle benefited from a tax cut of $1,200, and the top 10 per cent pocketed an average of $9,000 per year. That, again, was B.C. households. How did that create income opportunities for all? I would argue that it didn't. I would argue that a government that thinks about our most vulnerable, that thinks about those seniors living in our long-term care facilities or, even worse, the ones who are waiting for long-term care facilities or about the families that have children living in poverty and develops a strategy to help get them out of poverty – it's something that would benefit all of us in this House, to have conversations about those in the context of the overall budget.

Thank you, Mr. Chair.

The Deputy Chair: I see the hon. Minister of Transportation standing to speak.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Chair. Listen, I've listened to the debate that we just heard here, and I have to say that it left me with more notes than I actually have room for on my desk, almost. I heard comments about: don't duplicate the decisions of B.C. What we don't want to do is duplicate the decisions of the NDP government that just got removed from office after one term.

The honest answer won't be very nice for the opposition to hear. The number one issue I heard at the doors was: "Get rid of the NDP. I don't care what else you do. Make them go. My family is worse. All the people I know, lots of people I know haven't got a job, and they used to have a job. Our kids used to be planning on staying in Alberta; now they're planning on leaving. For goodness' sake, make these people go." That was the number one issue I heard at the doors. That's all they needed. That's all they told me. That was the number one thing. Mr. Chair, I don't think we're going to take a lot of economic advice from the folks across the aisle because, frankly, their policies failed miserably. They failed miserably.

Mr. Chair, actually, I've been waiting for a little while to talk about this. They always talk about the cuts for their rich corporate friends. Corporations: let's talk about corporations for a minute. I'll tell you who corporations are. Corporations are the place where you got your latte this morning. Corporations are the place where you got your ordinary coffee this morning. Corporations are flower shops, grocery stores, gas stations. They're the job creators. They're the people, in many cases, that make the least money of anybody. They've bought themselves, in many cases, a job, and they work that job for, in many cases, less than the minimum wage, whether it's $13 or $15 an hour, because they want to row their own boat. They want to be self-reliant.

Yes, they all have dreams of being multimillionaires. Of course they do. We all do. But the fact is that many of them slave away morning, noon, and night for very low wages, and while they're doing that, they probably, in many cases, put the only thing they own in the world that's worth anything, their home, at risk, where the bank has a line on their home if their business fails. These are the people that the NDP complains about with "giving tax breaks to the rich." These are the people that they're complaining about giving tax breaks to, the people that have put their house at risk to buy a coffee shop. These people across the aisle are complaining because we want them to succeed and create more jobs and to be able to retire decently.

That's what the NDP is complaining about when they complain about rich corporate friends. They're complaining about the person that served them coffee this morning. They are complaining about the person that took their money at the gas station. [interjections] They're talking about the person that answered the phone at the flower shop on Mother's Day, who took their order. Those are the rich corporate fat cats that the NDP loves to complain about in this House. They're people, Albertans. They're the heart and soul of this province, the heart and soul of Canada, and they're the ones that the NDP loves to make fun of, Mr. Chair. [interjections] Those are the ones that we want to help to succeed with this bill. They're the ones that we want less money going – I love it. The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo was talking, so thank you for that, hon. member.

You reminded me of something else I want to talk about. I heard him talking earlier tonight about working in the tobacco fields. It's something the hon. member and I have in common. He's proud of it; I'm proud of it. We don't agree on much, but I think we'd agree that that's honourable work and it's hard work. Where I disagree with the hon. member is that that is work that is based very much on performance. It's not minimum-wage work, Mr. Chair. I'll tell you what, when you fall behind in the tobacco fields, you're fired, because the machine goes at a pace. That's why Stompin' Tom Connors wrote that song. It wasn't a minimum wage job. It was a job where you get on a machine, it goes back by so many plants per hour, and if you don't get the leaves off those plants and put them in the basket between your legs, though your back hurts, then you're out of the chair and somebody else is in the chair. It's not a minimum wage job.

That's why we need a minimum wage job where they can actually train people. People typically don't start off at high speed, at top speed in that business and in a lot of businesses. We need a place for people to learn their trades, a place for people to actually get on the first rung of the economic ladder, which is the minimum wage, and work their way up. You know who they're working for in many cases? Corporations. When they're flipping burgers – it doesn't matter which burger chain you talk about or whether it's an independent – there's a very high probability that it's a corporation and a very high chance that the person that owns that corporation has a mortgage on their house or the bank has a line on their house to finance that corporation.

That's what the opposition, the NDP, calls greedy Albertans. That's what I call job creators. That's what our side of the House calls the heart and soul of Alberta. That's what our side of the House calls what is going to create the jobs and the opportunities and the future of this province, because people put themselves out there. [interjections] We don't talk them down; we talk them up because that's what Alberta is about. I know the Member for Calgary-Buffalo just can't stop chirping right now, because he's, or he should be, embarrassed by what he's hearing.

You know what? The corporate tax rates that you're complaining about: we saw Murphy Oil, Total, and a myriad of other oil companies leave this province, and what went with them? Eighty billion dollars of investment. What went with them? Tens and hundreds of thousands of jobs, families without a paycheque. That's what the NDP stands for. That's why when I knocked on the doors, people said, the number one reason: "I don't care. Just get rid of the NDP. I'd vote for anybody as long as I believe they can get rid of that government, that has hurt my family, that has hurt my neighbour's family, that has lowered the value on the biggest investment that I have, the home that you just knocked on the front door of. It's worth $100,000 or $200,000 less than it was on May 5, 2005, when Albertans elected the NDP government." That was the number one issue at the doors.

10:10 p.m.

Member Ceci: In 2005?

Mr. McIver: In 2005.

Member Ceci: In 2015.

Mr. McIver: In 2015. Thank you. See, I do agree on some things with the Member for Calgary-Buffalo. It doesn't happen often, but that was one right there, and I'll give him full credit for that.

Mr. Chair, when I was growing up, my dad was a welder at Massey-Ferguson in Brantford, Ontario, and he used to refer to himself as a working stiff. He used to say: "With seven kids we can't go anywhere, but the corporation can. We really need them to stay." His career ended when the corporation left. He used to say: "You know what? They just need to call their lawyer, call their accountant, push a button on their computer, and the corporation can go. But not me; I'm a working stiff." That's why we need to make businesses welcome here, because they provide jobs and opportunity and they pay taxes.

Now, what's really interesting about that, too, Mr. Chair, along the same lines, which is why this bill is so important – they want to talk about logic. I'll tell you what logic is. Logic is: the NDP raised corporate taxes by 20 per cent and collected less money. Think about that. They raised their prices by 20 per cent and collected less money. In other words, by logic, the obvious logical thing to correct the damage that the NDP did would be to lower those corporate taxes to collect more money and attract more businesses. Not only did they collect less corporate money; the corporations left. That's part of the reason why they left and they collected less money. They collected less money because the corporations were making less money.

You know what you tax? You tax profits. The NDP doesn't like profits. They love the money that comes from profits, but they hate the profits. How weird is that? Talk about – what's the word that the hon. member used? – symbolic logic. The logic follows that if you want profits from corporations, you actually need to let the corporations make money so you can tax the profits, yet they don't seem to connect those dots. Mr. Chair, on this side of the House we connect those dots.

In fact, Mr. Chair, part of the reason why they collected less money is because corporations have other abilities that working stiff don't have, and I say that with the most respect about calling them working stiff because that's what my dad called himself. Corporations can choose where they pay taxes. If you have a corporation with an office in every province in Canada, you have a choice where you pay taxes. Many of them used to choose to pay their taxes in Alberta. They were, like, at least economically, probably the best citizens we had because they didn't use any health care. The ones that just had a desk and a phone and paid their taxes: they didn't use any health care, they didn't use the justice system, they didn't use the education system, yet they chose to pay their taxes here. You know what? They're not paying their taxes here anymore because the NDP made this place uncompetitive, and they're all paying their taxes somewhere else now.

We need to actually attract some of them back. We need to attract the taxes back that they pay. We need to attract the jobs that they provide for Albertans, the mortgage-paying jobs, Mr. Chair, and this government is standing on their feet flailing and arguing against the economic prosperity and success of Alberta, and I'm sick of it.

Fortunately for me, Albertans are sick of it. Fortunately for me and for all of us, Albertans made a decision on April 16, and they said: enough. They went with the number one issue that I heard at the doors: just get rid of the NDP because it's making everybody's life worse. And they said: "We're just hoping that you're different than them. We're hoping that you're great, but you only have to be average to do better than what we've had in the last four years." We're going to try to be great, Mr. Chair, but if we're only average, it'll be an improvement, which is why I support this bill.

The Deputy Chair: I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora would like to speak.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much. If average was what the member was hoping for, he's about a third of the way below that, because I'll reiterate that the corporate tax rates – again, these are for corporations that make more than $500,000 a year in net profits. This isn't about a small business that is paying out their own salary at a very small rate. This is about corporations that are making more than $500,000 a year in net profits, right? This is about that tax rate.

With regard to the small-business tax rate our government made the choice to reduce small-business taxes by a third. We cut them from 3 to 2 per cent. So I just want to clarify that when the Minister of Transportation is saying that this is about the small corner shop, the small corner store, if they're making more than $500,000 a year in net profits, then yes, this reduction will help them. If they are making less than that, this will do absolutely nothing for those small businesses and the corner stores. I just want everyone to have the same set of facts because I think facts are important when we're making decisions. I just wanted to lay that out there.

I'm not saying that large corporations shouldn't have an opportunity to be prosperous. I certainly want them all to be prosperous. I want them to be prosperous, and I want them to share that prosperity with the people of this province. That's why I think that if we had something that was average, say – actually, we'd probably have to go up to be average because right now we've got Newfoundland at 15; P.E.I., 16; Nova Scotia, 16; New Brunswick, 14; Quebec, 11.6; Ontario, 11.5; Manitoba, 12; Saskatchewan, 12; Alberta, 12; B.C., 12. We're actually already below average. That's one thing I wanted to say.

Another thing I want to say is that the Government House Leader often rises in this House and likes to bring up the fact that our government served for one term, and now there's a new government. I want to say that I understand that what the Minister of Transportation said was that he heard: get rid of the NDP; that's all I care about. But I will tell you that at many doors that I knocked on in 2015, I heard the same thing about the PCs. I heard about corruption and entitlement. [interjections] Certainly, it seems like those are starting to creep their way significantly back into, particularly, the front bench but, specifically, I'd say, the Government House Leader's attitudes and the way he's behaving in this place tonight. Certainly, I welcome him to correct the record when he has an opportunity to speak on this if he feels differently, Mr. Chair. I'm just going by some of the tones and some of the heckling that I'm hearing here tonight.

Feel free to heckle, hon. member. I certainly welcome that opportunity. I think it's part of the important culture of debate and has a long tradition in this place. I know that some people are keen on changing tradition swiftly, but I think that this is part of the context in which we work together to form laws to govern this place and not just this place, this whole province.

I want to reiterate that this is a significant departure from being average, as the member referenced the person saying, like: just be average. This is way, way, way below average. This is significantly below average.

Again, when you have a fixed pot of resources and you're making decisions about where to allocate those, making the choice to give $4.5 billion to corporations or making the choice about how you can use that $4.5 billion collectively all across this province to find ways to increase opportunities for economic diversification, for important public services – I know that the Government House Leader cares deeply about the hospital in Sundre. I think I toured it with him, and he had deep concerns not that long ago that some of the services might be reduced. Fortunately, he was able to work with a government that sat down, looked at the pot of resources, and found ways to actually improve conditions there, invest in a lab on-site, I believe, and make sure that we supported seniors aging in the community. Again, making choices to blow a $4.5 billion hole in the budget will make outcomes like that far less likely, I can only imagine, especially given the fact that there is this review happening right now and the former minister who's a big part of it has a history of closing a lot of rural hospitals.

Again, we don't need to rush into these decisions. We can take the time to engage in them in a way that enables research and evidence to be presented and good decisions to come forward. I feel like the way the Government House Leader unilaterally changed the order of debate for tonight and then tried to call a quick question: he simply doesn't want his caucus to have an opportunity to hear about the kinds of things that these decisions that I'm sure – well, I hope that the caucus got a presentation about what the bills were going to be and what their impacts were going to be, but I doubt that people talked about that when we have $4.5 billion less, it may create more economic stimulus. Research shows that it won't, and at the end of the day, we only have a certain number of dollars because we pledged that we were going to balance in I think they said 2021, but now maybe it's 2022. You know, you've got to decide which promises are going to be broken on which days, I guess. That seems to be what we're getting from the government opposite. These are some of the decisions that lead to those outcomes.

Mr. Chair, I want to say with all respect again, just to recorrect the record, that the last member, I would say, inaccurately at best and in extremely unparliamentary language at worst, mischaracterized who specifically will benefit most from these decisions. Again, the decision to reduce small-business taxes was something that we did because we knew that we had revenue. At that time it was revenue that was coming in from things like the price on carbon, and that was the time we made the decision. Because we had new revenue coming in, we made new decisions about where to cut other revenue in other areas.

Making a unilateral decision about where to cut revenue will lead to a unilateral decision about where to cut expenses or where to increase revenue in other areas. If you're going to reduce your pot of revenue, you're kind of squeezing that balloon, and it's going to pop, or you're going to have to find a way to release some of that pressure. Are you going to release that pressure by bringing in other types of taxes, bringing back the regressive health care premium, bringing in tolls, increasing fees in parks, parks that families use in the summer? Where is this revenue going to come from, Mr. Chair? Or is it that the expenses are going to go down? Or is it both? I would probably think that it might be both, that there might be increased user fees, increased taxes, increased levies, and reduced opportunities for investing in the projects that people have named in their own ridings.

If they haven't named them, I encourage them to look at the capital plan. We worked quite comprehensively and collaboratively to make sure that we were taking considerations from all across the province. For example, the city of Red Deer has certainly punched above its weight when it came to investing or providing services in the hospital. The city of Red Deer certainly has carried a lot, being the only regional hospital in central zone for people to go to. In south zone there are two, and in north zone there are two. In Edmonton and Calgary there are more, but in Red Deer and central Alberta there is one. These are some of the things that we had planned on investing in based on the revenues that were planning on coming into this province, but today this is a $4.5 billion hole that we are being asked to blow in the budget.

Those are the main things I wanted to offer in this regard, and I imagine there might be opportunities to offer more in the future. But I look forward to hearing thoughts from members opposite if this is indeed the comment they heard most on the doorsteps, that they needed to cut $4.5 billion in large business taxes, or if they heard about other initiatives in their communities that were important as well.

Thank you, Mr. Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Any others?

Ms Issik: We've heard the members opposite talk about tax rates. They quote them across the country when we talk about the competitiveness of Alberta versus other provinces in Canada, and that's awesome. I think everybody in this Chamber understands that capital is mobile and you need to compete to keep the capital where it is or where you want it. If you're not competitive, the capital will walk, and so, too, will the jobs. I think everybody in this Chamber understands that concept.

Well, we've heard about the tax rates in all the other provinces in Canada, and Alberta, you know, is only a half a per cent off. Well, let's look at some other tax rates: Idaho, 6.925 per cent; Iowa, 12 per cent; Kansas, 7 per cent. Has anybody ever heard of North Dakota, at 4.31 per cent, or Oklahoma at 6 per cent? I think I'm making a point here. We are competing in at least a North American market if not a global market to keep our capital here. When capital leaves, so too do our jobs. When capital leaves, so too does our corporate tax revenue. Revenue will go down when corporations leave the province of Alberta. It's that simple. We are not competitive with the states in the United States of America. It's pretty simple.

I did hear at the doors a lot that we needed to reduce our corporate tax rates. I got asked that at probably about every fourth door from people who were with large corporations and people who were with small corporations. I can tell you that lowering corporate taxes will create jobs, it will bring capital back to this province, and it will create the economic growth that we need to pay for all of the services that we value as Albertans.

The Deputy Chair: Looking across, I actually do believe that I saw the Member for Edmonton-Manning jumping up.

Ms Sweet: Thank you, Mr. Chair. It's an honour to be able to stand and speak to Bill 3 as I haven't had the opportunity to do so yet. Let me begin by saying the obvious. There are challenges in our economy, and many Albertans are hurting. We're not questioning that. Some of these challenges have been decades in the making, like our failure to effectively diversify the economy, particularly within the energy sector. Some of these challenges are more immediate; for example, the lack of takeaway capacity to get our product to market. While we are faced with these challenges, we know what Albertans want. They want good, mortgage-paying jobs, they want security for their families, they want good schools and high-quality health care, and, most of all, they want to see a future where they can work in a strong economy and provide for their loved ones.

Mr. Chair, this brings me to today's debate and the UCP government's solution, that they have labelled the job-creation tax cut. The key questions before this Assembly and before Albertans are incredibly straightforward. Is the old Conservative recipe of corporate tax cuts the solution to the challenges facing Alberta's economy? Is it worth cutting $4.5 billion in health care and education funding to finance these cuts? Well, let me address each of these in turn.

Mr. Chair, we have heard the same argument, the same recipe, the same Conservatives across the world for the past 40 years. Corporate tax cuts are free; they pay for themselves. Tax cuts fuel so much economic growth and create so many jobs that citizens need fewer government services. Most importantly, corporate tax cuts trickle down to the rest of us so that regular families will become wealthier, happier, and more economically secure. In fairness, there was perhaps a time some 30 or 40 years ago where elements of this core Conservative argument had some merit. There was a time when the tax structure didn't create the ideal conditions for capital investment and for job creation.

Clearly, we are not in those times. The economic challenge facing Alberta is not the corporate tax rate, and to suggest to Albertans that we can wave a magic wand, lower the corporate tax rate, and therefore create jobs and increase government revenue is a fairy tale. Let me say this in no uncertain terms: this bill is a solution in search of a problem. Alberta already has the most competitive tax regime in the country. We Albertans enjoy an $11 billion advantage over our next-closest province. We provide many other corporate advantages over our southern neighbours when it comes to investment decisions; for example, public health care, which dramatically lowers employers' labour costs and facilitates labour mobility.

In conversations with corporate leaders and with those in the industry I've honestly never heard them say that their primary concern is actually the corporate tax rate. In fact, as we've discussed in this Legislature, for many years the three main challenges facing our economy were self-evident: a lack of takeaway capacity for energy industries and the need for pipelines; an uncertain regulatory regime, with Bill C-69 and the need to speed up the processing time; and new technology and energy industries that have made new recoverable barrels profitable, particularly in the Permian basin, which has disrupted global energy markets.

The previous government understood these three main economic challenges, and we took action. We fought for pipelines and market access, and we brought in a crude-by-rail deal as an interim solution until sufficient pipeline takeaway capacity could be realized. We fought to amend Bill C-69 to ensure that it worked for the energy sector. We partnered with industry to invest and bring in new technologies to make our industry more economically efficient. And we helped lower the cost per barrel and helped take the carbon out of the barrel. Now, to be fair, did we as a government provide a solution to all of the three main economic challenges facing our economy in four short years? Of course, we didn't, but we made progress, and most importantly we were squarely focused on the real challenges facing our economy. To be clear, the main economic challenge was not the corporate tax rate.

As I said, Bill 3 is a solution in search of a problem. More than that, it represents a deficit of ideas from the members opposite. All members know well the challenges facing our economy, but they are turning to the old playbook of corporate tax cuts as a magical solution for everything, and they're selling Albertans a bill of goods. The problem is that these tax cuts won't stimulate investment. They won't create jobs. As economists have told us for decades, when you already have a competitive corporate tax rate, cutting it further is the least effective way to stimulate jobs and the economy.

Let me give you an example. Even the former Prime Minister from Calgary, the Rt. Hon. Stephen Harper, said as much. When he launched his economic strategy to get Canada back on track following the financial crisis, he went on the record in 2009 with his budget, stating that corporate tax cuts were the least effective way to create jobs. Let me say that again. The former Prime Minister, himself an economist, argued that corporate tax rates were the least effective mechanism to grow the economy and create jobs.

Ms Hoffman: Say it one more time.

Ms Sweet: Mr. Chair, in Budget 2009 Prime Minister Harper published his government's analysis of the effectiveness of tax expenditure options to drive economic growth. The Harper government, of which this Premier was a senior member, determined that for every dollar invested in infrastructure, the economy would grow by $1.60. For every dollar of tax cuts or income support to lower income households, the economy would grow $1.70. Unfortunately for this government, Prime Minister Harper determined that for every dollar expended in corporate tax cuts, the economy would only grow by 30 cents.

To be clear, what the Prime Minister was saying at the time was that cutting corporate taxes was a losing proposition. He was saying that a tax cut for low-income families would be five times more effective at creating jobs and growing the economy than cutting the corporate tax rate. Now, I presume the Prime Minister said this because he was facing reality and was acknowledging the challenges before him. The economic challenge was, as it is now, not the corporate tax rate.

That, of course, is the problem with Bill 3. Bill 3 is this government's principal offer to Albertans to grow the economy and create jobs, but it's not addressing the main challenges facing our economy. The main challenges to our economy – and I said it before – are structural: lack of pipeline infrastructure, uncertain regulatory regime, rapidly growing technology. So Bill 3, the solution to the jobs challenge offered by this government, is not a solution. As I said, it is a solution in search of a problem and detached from the challenges facing Albertans.

Mr. Chair, members opposite know that Bill 3 is highly unlikely to create jobs or stimulate investment in the near future. Their platform actually presented it to the voters as such. Their own projections stated clearly that they didn't expect any new jobs or investment as a result of this tax cut for at least two years, but in a fit of transparency their platform was clear that the tax cut would reduce government revenue. They were clear that the tax cut would not pay for itself. If the government was going to reduce revenue through this ineffective tax cut, then they were going to have to cut spending. We all know what that means: larger classrooms; longer wait times in health care; crumbling roads, bridges, maybe no bridge at all; and layoffs.

Now, there might be some disagreement in this Chamber on how much these tax cuts are going to cost. We've estimated it at $4.5 billion, the UCP platform estimated it at $2.36 billion, and others, well, are somewhere in between. All these features are estimates, but there is a consensus in these estimates that these corporate tax cuts are going to reduce revenue, and they won't create any jobs for two years. The real question before the Assembly is simple. Are we going to vote in favour of a corporate tax cut that won't create jobs or stimulate investment? Are we going to give billions in corporate tax cuts, at the same time gutting our health and education systems to pay for it?

Well, Mr. Chair, Bill 3 is a triumph of ideology over reality. Bill 3 is a textbook conservative solution to every economic problem. It appears to the government members opposite that no matter what the circumstance, corporate tax cuts are the solution. Changing technologies in global energy markets? The UCP government solution: cut corporate taxes. Lack of takeaway capacity? Don't worry. The solution is to cut corporate taxes. Regulatory uncertainty? Don't worry. The solution is to cut corporate taxes. Mr. Chair, our economy faces real challenges, and we need real solutions. We don't need a Bill 3, a solution to a problem that doesn't exist.

But if the government is committed to following through with this bill, then Albertans deserve some answers. Given the billions of forgone revenue to the Crown, what is the government planning to cut? How many teachers will be laid off? Will the government cut payments to AISH or PDD? Will they consider closing rural hospitals? Will they wind down the government's previous initiative to bring water to reserves? Mr. Chair, Albertans deserve answers to these questions before this Chamber votes on this bill.

I call upon the government to come clean and be honest with Albertans on their proposed cuts. Let us hear from the ministers, honestly and transparently, about what they're going to cut. Then and only then can Albertans fairly judge for themselves whether Bill 3 is worthy of their support or whether it is simply a solution in search of a problem that doesn't exist.

The Deputy Chair: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I'm sure that your mom would be proud of you right now for having made good choices. I'll be sure to share that with her if I ever get the opportunity. I want to thank the Member for Edmonton-Manning for making some interesting comments and, of course, the Member for Edmonton-Glenora, who spoke at length.

I just want to also offer some of my thoughts on this giant corporate tax giveaway that we're going to vote on here shortly. I want to address some of the things that the Member for Calgary-Hays said. First of all, I sure hope that he lives up to his ambition to be average. I know, having seen him in action for the last four years, that that'll be a bit of a stretch, Mr. Chair, but hope springs eternal. I hope that over the term we do see him reaching his goal of being average. I'm looking forward to that.

The Member for Calgary-Hays in his speech mentioned that corporate citizens were the best kind of citizens, which was reminiscent of recent presidential election nominee Mitt Romney, who famously in 2011 told people: corporations are people, my friend. That was one of the lines that really stuck to him and was a major reason that he lost that election to President Obama, a good choice that I think the people of the United States made in that election. He's false when he says that corporate citizens don't use health care or education or any of the public goods that are provided by the government of Alberta because the last time I checked, Mr. Chair, corporations need healthy people to work for them. Of course, the public health care sector provides those healthy people, keeps people healthy enough to go to work every day and carry out their duties as assigned to them by their employers.

Corporate citizens need educated people to go and work for them. Certainly, you would be hard-pressed to find a job these days that doesn't require you to at least know how to read and write, so some basic level of education is required. More and more, even a postsecondary education is required. That was certainly something that we heard, when we were government and I was Minister of Advanced Education, when Amazon decided not to shortlist Calgary as one of its locations for its second headquarters. I believe that if you check the location that Amazon did select, it has a higher combined state and federal tax rate than what Calgary would have had even under the current tax rates, much less the tax rates that the UCP is proposing.

Anyway, my point is that when Amazon decided not to shortlist Calgary as its second headquarters location, one of the reasons that they stated was because they couldn't find people with the skills and qualifications that they needed to go to work for that company. We undertook as government to invest significantly in the high-tech skills of the people of Alberta. We rolled out a $50 million plan to increase the number of seats in universities and colleges across this province in tech-related areas so that people could learn to become software engineers, web developers, the kinds of things that Amazon was looking to hire and couldn't find in Alberta because they weren't being educated in numbers great enough to justify Amazon establishing their second headquarters in Calgary.

Certainly, in consultations that we held with other members of the high-tech sector, we heard the same issue. We talked to Benevity, who is still seriously considering moving their headquarters from Calgary to Victoria, Mr. Chair, which is weird because the corporate tax rate in Victoria is much higher than what the members opposite are proposing. Yeah. It's weird because, of course, everybody in the UCP knows that the NDP chases away investment unless it's the B.C. NDP, of course, which is actually attracting investment to Victoria, a jurisdiction that's had – shock, gasp – a carbon tax for more than 10 years.

I need to remind everyone that it was a Premier of a rather conservative bent who implemented that policy, a Premier who was so unpopular in conservative circles for implementing the carbon tax that he was appointed by Prime Minister Stephen Harper to be the high commissioner to the United Kingdom after his stint as Premier was over. Boy, he sure learned his lesson, hey? Don't implement a carbon tax; otherwise, the federal Conservatives are really going to come down hard on you. I'm sure it was difficult for him to serve that stint in London.

The point is, Mr. Chair, that when the Member for Calgary-Hays says that corporate citizens don't rely on services, he's dead wrong. As I said, they rely on health care to keep their workers healthy and able to go to work. They rely on education to provide the education and the skills that people need so that they can hire people here. You know, most corporations that I know take advantage of roads and the other public services that we provide. Certainly, a growing number of corporations are concerned about the quality-of-life issues that their employees would face. As the Member for Calgary-Glenmore said, capital is mobile, and you can set up shop anywhere you like, so why not set up shop in a place that's a nice place to live? I'm not saying that, you know, North Dakota is a bad place to live, but I've been to North Dakota, and I have to say that a low corporate tax rate is probably the only attractive thing about that state.

You know, Mr. Chair, it's a cartoon sketch that they like to present about corporations, that they present to the people to justify cutting corporate taxes. Like I said, corporate citizens benefit significantly from the investments that they make in the public goods that are provided by the government of Alberta, and I think it's only fair that they pay their fair share. Certainly, most Albertans would agree with us. If you look at any polling that's been conducted recently in any North American jurisdiction, a vast majority of people believe that corporations should be paying at least their current rate of taxes if not slightly more.

In fact, the Member for Calgary-Hays will probably remember quite clearly when, in the run-up to the 2015 election, the people of Alberta made that demand for corporations to pay their fair share in taxes quite clearly known, because in the run-up to that election, of course, they undertook a number of budget consultations, the kinds of consultations that, of course, they accused us of doing, where they presupposed the answer before they actually undertook the consultation. But I remember quite clearly, Mr. Chair, that one of the things that they asked the people of Alberta in that consultation in the run-up to the 2015 budget was what we should do about revenue. One of the answers, though, that wasn't allowed to be given was whether or not we could raise corporate taxes. That wasn't an option even though thousands and thousands of Albertans continually wrote in to the online forums and phoned their MLAs and let people know that they wanted corporate taxes to be raised.

What did they choose to do instead, Mr. Chair? They left corporate taxes where they were, at 10 per cent, and they chose to implement a health care premium on the people of Alberta. That was an incredibly unpopular move.

In 2015, Mr. Chair, even though Alberta had gone through a period of extraordinary growth and prosperity, the average working stiff, like the Member for Calgary-Hays's dad, if he had been working at the time, was working more hours but not really seeing his real wages increase by any significant amount because the cost of living was rising much higher than wages were at that time. For the government to say, "You know what, working people of Alberta? We're not going to ask the corporations who are doing really well to pay their fair share, but we are going to ask people who are falling further and further behind to pay more for health care, that should be provided to them through the taxes that they already paid," seemed like a raw deal to the people of Alberta, and in fact they rejected it soundly.

You know, the Member for Calgary-Hays encourages us to learn the lessons from previous elections, so I would return the favour to him, Mr. Chair. I would encourage him to remember the lesson from the 2015 election and the budget consultations that they undertook in the run-up to that election. If you ask working people, the average Albertan, to pay for services and let corporations off the hook, the people will not stand for it. They understand what a fair deal is much better than the members opposite, and they won't have any part of it.

Mr. Chair, this is what all of our members here on this side of the House have been telling the members opposite all night. You know, we expect high-quality health care, we expect high-quality education, freely available to everyone in Alberta regardless of their financial circumstances, regardless of their geographic circumstances, regardless of their race, any kind of life circumstances that they happen to face. If they're asked to let wealthy corporations off the hook and pay more out of their pockets when they have less going into their pockets than they have in more than a decade, that's an unfair deal, and I don't think the people of Alberta will stand for it.

Certainly, we have a number of election histories. I know the members opposite are fond of talking about election histories. You know, this is modelled on the same Trump tax cuts that were implemented in the run-up to the 2018 mid-term election. The Republicans were annihilated in that mid-term election, Mr. Chair, largely because of the tax cut. That was the only significant legislative accomplishment that that President and that Republican-controlled Senate and House of Representatives was able to achieve in the two years in the run-up to that election. Based on that one, single legislative milestone, the people of the United States voted overwhelmingly in favour of Democrats, who were running on a platform of fair taxes for corporations and a better deal for the average American.

Certainly, at the state level where it's been tried, it's also been rejected soundly by voters. We've talked a lot about the Kansas experiment. You know, the Kansas experiment was such a colossal failure that after two terms of trying it, the citizens of Kansas elected a Democrat, which is the first time in – I don't know – modern history, I think, that the people of Kansas elected a Democrat.

You know, I am warning the members opposite to study the electoral history that they are so fond of reminding us of. When they implement these massive tax cuts on profitable corporations, it will be wildly unpopular with the people of Alberta, who are working more hours and seeing less take-home pay than they have for a decade, Mr. Chair. Not only that, they will be getting less services as a result of it. Nobody feels good about having their kids go to a class with 35 other kids and not being able to get the help they need if the Royal Bank is making windfall profits.

10:50 p.m.

It's remarkable to me, Mr. Chair, that, you know, the members opposite talk about the debt and how much money we pay in interest to bankers and bondholders every year as a result of the debt that we owe, and they chastise us for giving away so much money to bankers and bondholders, yet here in this bill they give even more money to the very bankers and bondholders that they want to deride and chastise us for paying interest payments to. That doesn't make sense, and I know that the Member for Edmonton-Strathcona in her comments earlier this evening was talking about why she can't figure it out. The only thing that I've come to is that you can't apply logic to the members opposite's thinking. It's right because they say it's right, and that's the only logic that they need.

If pressed, they'll say, "Well, we won the election, don't you know, so of course that it makes it right," which is interesting, Mr. Chair, because on the issue of running and winning elections on campaign platform pieces, I would remind the members opposite that we ran and won an election on implementing farm safety legislation. Of course, they never accepted that as an acceptable argument in favour of implementing farm safety legislation that finally gave farmers legislated protections that are enjoyed by farm labourers in every other jurisdiction in the country, but they want us to accept this argument that because they won the election, they have to do it, right?

Anyway, it's not hypocrisy because the members opposite don't understand it as hypocrisy. It's right simply because they say it's right, and they don't want to think about it anymore or expect anybody else to apply any further logic to it, Mr. Chair.

You know, the Member for Edmonton-Glenora, of course, talked about some of the things in her constituency that are at risk if we go ahead with this 4 and a half billion dollar tax giveaway.

Ms Hoffman: In their constituencies.

Mr. Schmidt: Yeah. Well, in their constituencies as well.

I think it's important for every member here in the House to understand what's at stake for my constituents. Right now we are in the middle of a giant construction project, extending the LRT from downtown through to Mill Woods, Mr. Chair, a project that's been incredibly disruptive, especially to the businesses and school kids who travel every day along 95th Avenue through the Strathearn neighbourhood. That has been shut down for an indeterminate length of time because of the construction of that LRT. So what happens if the money for that suddenly disappears? I'm not saying that the city won't be able to construct it, but, you know, I certainly wouldn't want my constituents to have gone through these years of significant inconvenience and disruption in their lives just to have the carpet pulled out from under them at the last minute so that we could give a 4 and a half billion dollar tax giveaway to the wealthiest corporations in the province. That seems grossly unfair.

Already we have schools that are closing in my constituency. The St. Gabriel school in the Capilano neighbourhood was decided to be closed one day after the UCP was elected because, of course, the Catholic school board knew what was coming in the budget, possibly because, you know, they had had previous interactions with the Member for Red Deer-North when she was a Catholic school trustee. I don't know. But, of course, they saw what was coming and decided to close the school, which is creating significant hardships for not just people in my riding, Mr. Chair, but people from Sherwood Park and other parts of the city who travel through Edmonton-Gold Bar on their way to work and use St. Gabriel school as a convenient place to drop off their kids in order to go to school and pick them up, of course, on the way back home from work.

That's one school that's already closed, and they hadn't even gotten to the point of making the corporate tax cuts or these other kinds of terrible decisions about the budget. I'm just wondering what other schools are set to close in my riding, Mr. Chair. Is it going to be, you know, Austin O'Brien high school? Is it going to be Vimy Ridge high school? Is it going to be McNally high school? Is it going to be one of the many elementary schools? Are the people of Gold Bar going to keep their community school?

The Deputy Chair: I believe that the individual who stood up quite quickly there was the hon. Member for Calgary-South East.

Mr. Jones: Thank you, Mr. Chair. The personal attacks continue from the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar, but if this is the small price that we must pay to protect Albertans from gross mismanagement, so be it. The hon. members of the opposition keep talking about a temporary reduction in corporate tax revenues, which will result in increased investment, jobs, and greater long-term corporate tax revenues, something he and his colleagues describe as the $4.5 billion hole. They say it over and over. Where was their protest when they were digging a $60 billion chasm in Alberta's finances?

In some ways I feel bad for the new Minister of Finance as he has been tasked with managing the financial disaster left by the previous government. But then I remember that all he has to do is do the opposite of the previous Finance minister, and he might just go down as the greatest Finance minister in Alberta's history. Now, unlike the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar and, certainly, his colleague the Opposition House Leader – I won't repeat his comments because I don't want to spread ignorance – we actually understand . . .

Mr. Schmidt: Point of order.

Mr. Jones: A few of us have actually worked . . .

The Deputy Chair: I'd like to hear from the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Point of Order Language Creating Disorder

Mr. Schmidt: Yeah. Mr. Chair, under 23(h), (i), and (j) the Member for Calgary-South East clearly referred to my comments as ignorant, and that's clearly designed to not only impute false motives but also to . . .

Ms Hoffman: Create disorder.

Mr. Schmidt: . . . create disorder. Thank you, Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Yeah. Anyway, you know, it's interesting that the Member for Calgary-South East started by complaining about personal attacks and then claimed that my comments were ignorant, Mr. Chair. [interjection] Yes. That is my point of order.

The Deputy Chair: The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Chair. Thank you for the interjection. It was an interesting interjection, but it's not a point of order. This is clearly a matter of debate. While the hon. member may feel that the comments were not ignorant, clearly the other member thought that the comments were ignorant. It's clearly a matter of debate, and I would like to hear the remainder of the speech.

The Deputy Chair: Having heard from both sides, I think that the most prudent way to go about this process would be to remind all members to, if they can, keep their language towards wording that would not tend to create disorder in the House in order for us to then, therefore, be able to continue to focus on Bill 3.

Please, the hon. Member for Calgary-South East.

Mr. Jones: Thank you, Mr. Chair. Let me discuss something that I personally would characterize as an uninformed view on small businesses and businesses across Alberta as I've actually worked with them for my entire career. As members may not be aware, it takes a lot to start and keep a business running. A large portion of businesses fail. The average small business in Canada basically makes no money. So for anyone to claim that a business could afford to not make a few thousand a month: I just think that it's ridiculous.

Continuing on, a few of us on this side have actually worked in business. We support businesses because we support Albertans – their entrepreneurial spirit, their ingenuity, their work ethic – because businesses create jobs for Albertans and businesses pay for the essential services that Albertans need. Right now they want both.

11:00 p.m.

The Deputy Chair: Any other members? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you. It's getting late. We're trying to keep the energy going here. I'm happy to participate in that.

You know, of course, I'm going to be taking the position that this bill is completely inappropriate. I would like to take some time to talk a little bit about the absence of logic behind the bill and talk a little bit about the direction that I think this government is trying to go in and spend a bit of time talking about the fact that other people who have looked at these kinds of issues in the past have all come to the same conclusion, and that is that this kind of bill is ineffective in achieving the outcomes.

The piece that I'm wanting to talk about is the connection between the intention and the outcome here in this bill, because that is where the major fault lies within the bill. If you ask us about the desire to have businesses in the province of Alberta, indeed in all of Canada do well, everyone on this side of the House would say: "We absolutely want to see businesses do well. We want them to be able to succeed. We want them to be able to have dollars so that they can create employment."

The problem is that that's just a theoretical model. We have this notion that if we provide resources to the businesses, they will create more jobs. We have to look beyond that general notion and go into the evidence where that notion has been applied and where there's actual, practical lived experience. I can tell you that the lived experience in the jurisdictions that made the decision to provide corporate tax deductions has been that they did not create jobs.

Now, the Member for Edmonton-Manning went through and talked very clearly about the fact that Prime Minister Harper had assessed this very question here in Canada and clearly came out against this type of bill. He said that the evidence is that it does not provide the outcome that's there, that's expected. That's the point that we need to get across to the members of the government.

[Mrs. Pitt in the chair]

We get your intent. We understand what you desire. What we're trying to tell you is that there is no correlation between what it is that you desire and what it is that you are doing to try to achieve that. It's faulty thinking. You can't engage in a behaviour over and over again, have it proved to be wrong and faulty, and then engage in it again and call it reasonable, intelligent, thoughtful behaviour. It isn't.

I want to talk a little bit about the fact that on the other side of the House they like to get up and make a number of statements about the previous government, of which I was a part, and the type of statements they make again demonstrate the lack of logic and the lack of ability to put a relationship between behaviour and outcome.

Now, fortunately for members of the other side of the House, before I got elected, I was a university professor, and I happened to teach courses on research. One of the things that we would spend a fair amount of time on, particularly in our first classes – people often refer to them as 101, economics 101 or research 101 – is the difference between correlation and causality. It's something that is continuously brought up in error in this House. For example, the Member for Calgary-Hays, the Minister of Transportation, said that we raised the taxes yet the government dollars that came in in subsequent years were less, not more, after we raised the taxes. Therefore, he says that our raising the taxes was the problem and resulted in the reduction of government income.

Now, we call that a first-year fallacy in a research class, and I'll show you why it's a fallacy by giving you another example: the vast majority of criminals in prisons in the province of Alberta have eaten cheese; therefore, eating cheese must cause criminality, because the two are very, very highly correlated; in fact, it's almost a hundred per cent. That's the kind of logic that is being used by the Transportation minister to explain why, when we raised the taxes, things go down.

Now, what you need to understand is that in a very small, theoretical model, where there are only two variables, then one might be able to make that prediction, but I want to inform the members of the government that running the province of Alberta is not as simplistic and black and white as you would like it to be, that there is a reality out there. There are multiple variables that will influence the things that happen.

So when you look at what's happened over the last number of years, you can say that we raised the taxes and that the amount of money that came in was less, but if you believe that there's a causal relationship between those two, it betrays a lack of logical understanding and a lack of ability to learn from lived experience. Now, we have a word for that, when one doesn't learn from their lived experience, but it's a little unparliamentary, so I'll just leave it to your imagination right now.

I think that what we have before us now is a bill that is essentially a race to the bottom, a bill that will exacerbate the very problem that economists around the world have been identifying since the 1970s, and that is the increase in inequality between people in society. That is a return to an earlier century, where some people had significant amounts of money but where the vast majority of people did not. What we've seen since the 1970s is that that inequality has been regularly increasing year over year and increasing at a higher rate such that we are at the place now where seven individuals in this world have more money than 50 per cent of the countries combined in this world. That's a problem. That's a return to the Sun King idea. That's a return to predemocracy ideas.

Now, I've often complained that the members of the government seem to derive their policies from the 1950s. I've often said that I don't know what year the Premier was born in. I don't know if he was born in the '50s, but he certainly likes to live his life there. Now what I'm finding is that the ideas that are being brought forward are not ideas from the 1950s. Indeed, they're ideas from the 1600s, and I'm very concerned about that.

Now, previously in this House we've had an opportunity to look at some of the evidence, but apparently the evidence doesn't really matter. We've looked at the fact that the American Congressional Budget Office has done a particular study on the very question we're talking about today and has identified that giving tax breaks is a poor method of increasing the number of jobs. Ironically, it's partly because of the issue that was raised by the Member for Calgary-Glenmore earlier, when she stood up and indicated to all of us that we all agreed – and I'll go along with it – that capital is mobile. I agree.

She went on then to list a number of jurisdictions that had lower tax rates, but again we have that first-year, 101 fallacy, that because there are people with lower tax rates, that is the reason why people left. Yet she failed to provide the evidence of the new bitumen mine in Kansas. So it was a bit confusing for me.

I can see, then, that we have a problem here in terms of trying to understand what it means when we say that capital is mobile. If you believe this to be true – apparently, it's been declared by the Member for Calgary-Glenmore that we all agree on that; she's already put that on the record, so I guess we all do – then giving them more money would seem to indicate that you yourselves have the belief that that money will leave Alberta, that it will go somewhere else, that it will go to Kansas, that it will go to other states.

Ms Hoffman: North Dakota.

Mr. Feehan: North Dakota. Of course. I've never been down there. I understand that there's an interesting mountain with things carved into it.

Ms Hoffman: That's South Dakota.

Mr. Feehan: Oh. That's South Dakota? Sorry.

Mr. Schmidt: North Dakota has nothing.

Mr. Feehan: It has nothing. Okay.

The point is that this type of bill has been tested in reality, and the people that have done the assessment on it, such as the Congressional Budget Office in the United States, say that that is precisely why it doesn't work, because capital is mobile, and that when they are given money, they do not create jobs. They instead – let me check my notes to make sure I get it right – buy shares back. That's what happens. And where does the money go when they buy shares back? To the very wealthy people that have the money to invest in those shares, who do not live in Alberta . . .

An Hon. Member: Or North Dakota.

Mr. Feehan: . . . or North Dakota. And when they get that extra money, they don't create more jobs in Alberta. They go on better vacations in Bahrain. They use marble for the floors instead of tile. All over the world they travel, and they visit their friends on their yachts. That's the kind of thing they do.

The Congressional Budget Office does have some suggestions for you, however. It says that, at best, when things go a hundred per cent well with deductions to corporations, you end up by maybe creating up to 4 jobs per million dollars. Pretty expensive jobs. They do go on to say that there are other ways to create jobs. Let me just find my page here for a moment because it's very interesting. The Congressional Budget Office has studied this and found – wait for it – that the thing that creates the most jobs is government spending, at 19 jobs for every million dollars. So we go from your choice of creating 4 jobs for every million dollars to 19 jobs for every million dollars if you instead engage in government spending, which I think is exactly what we should be doing here at this time.

You know, I find it very curious that we have members opposite who say that they understand business in a way that somehow I don't even though I ran my own business and I was a vice-president of Catholic Social Services, the largest multifunction public social service agency in the country. I had an opportunity to be engaged in lots of these kinds of things in the past. But they understand things. Yet they can't get to a very basic understanding of things that my first-year research students learned, and that is that you have to look at the evidence, and you have to look at it from the point of view of there being complex decisions to be made, not simple lines to be drawn, as was suggested by the hon. Member for Calgary-Hays, who says: we know how to draw the dotted line. That's the problem. You're drawing a dotted line. That's not what you're supposed to be doing. You're supposed to be reading the evidence and having the evidence suggest to you what it is that one should gather from that evidence. If you fill in the line, you fill it in with your value system, with your determination: this is what I want the outcome to be. That's not good research. That's not good government.

What we need to do instead is that we need to listen to people like Prime Minister Harper. [interjections] I've never said that before in my life, and I want it on record that I said it once. We need to listen to the congressional . . .

An Hon. Member: We need to stop the clock.

Ms Hoffman: Yeah; you're done.

Mr. Feehan: I'm done? When I get to agreeing with Harper, I'm out of here. Okay. [interjection] It's just water; I swear.

I think it's really important. You keep saying that you understand business better, yet the things you bring forward tell me that you haven't done your research or that you didn't understand your research. If it comes down to it, we actually agree with what you want. We want more jobs. We want more people to be employed. We know that the evidence is there, plainly in front of all of us, that the way that you do that is that you create the new big deal. You create jobs. You build bridges. You build roads. You create climate leadership plans that employ people on every reserve around the province of Alberta, in every corner of this province. You give them an opportunity to work where they live and live where they work. That's the kind of thing that you do. You don't take the money and give it to somebody who doesn't care whether you happen to live in Wandering River or whether you happen to live at the Blood Tribe or whether you happen to live in Hinton or Hanna, because they only want to make a profit. They can do that in a variety of other places, and they will take that money and go away.

We know that what really creates jobs is not the supply side. It's not by giving money to the corporations. They don't create jobs just because they have more money. They don't say: "I've got more money. Why don't I create some more jobs?" They fulfill a mandate for a demand. The people that create jobs are the everyday people of the province of Alberta, who spend their money in the province of Alberta. If you give that same amount of money to the people who live here, they will spend their money at the local store. They will spend their money at the local restaurant. That's what creates the jobs.

No business said: let's create jobs just to find out what happens. Real businesspeople say: there's a demand out there, and I am going to try to fill that demand. If the demand goes away, they stop producing it. If the number of chairs they're selling goes from a hundred a day to five a day, they don't produce a thousand chairs in hopes that somehow they'll sell more of them. They start producing five a day because that's what makes their budget balance work, and then they sell that. It's the demand that makes it go up and down, the demand that makes the jobs get created. It's a pretty basic concept, and it's one that I really wish you would apply, that you would look at: how do we influence the demand? That's what we've been doing on this side of the House. We've been looking not at where Alberta has been in the past but where Alberta needs to be and: how will we meet the demand of Albertans in the years to come?

Wayne Gretzky was famous for saying: I don't skate where the puck is; I skate to where the puck is going to be. That's what we want you to do in this House. We don't want you to go back to the same old jobs all the time because that's what you want, that you are hoping will happen. You can't create them to happen. Instead, you need to say: "What is needed in this province? What's going to happen in this province over the next 10 and 15 years?" We need you to start to have a vision of the future, to stop living your life in the 1950s, to stop living the dream of the 1970s, and to bring yourself into the 21st century, where you will know, from looking around the world, that we are moving to a carbonless economy, an economy that is built around new needs, new desires, and therefore new demands. Good businesspeople are looking for what those demands are going to be, and they're going to satisfy those demands. They're not going to just create jobs because they happen to have some extra dollars. That's not what they do with it.

So I'm very concerned. I'm very concerned that this whole idea of the difference between causality and correlation is lost on the government, that they draw simple dotted lines between their intent and the desired outcomes that are a betrayal of absence of fact, absence of logical reasoning. We need you to take a step back. What we're doing at this moment here is asking you to do that.

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Madam Chair. I don't have enough evening here to respond to everything that's been said. There are some things that simply have to be stated. Listening to the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford makes me understand why this province is in the fiscal condition it's in today. For the member to suggest that there is no correlation between a competitive business environment, of which your tax competitiveness is a major piece, is nonsensical. It's simply not factual. Business investments and, with that, jobs and opportunities attract and end up in jurisdictions where there's a competitive business environment. Tax structure is a big piece of that business environment. That is why we are going to ensure that Alberta has by far the most competitive tax jurisdiction in Canada and one of the most competitive jurisdictions, in fact, in all of North America.

I want to talk a little bit about corporations because, of course, this tax relates to corporations specifically. We've heard, I think, a fair bit of disparaging about corporations tonight by various members. I've heard some things I can agree with. I've certainly heard from the Member for Edmonton-Manning, who talked about the importance of jobs, about the importance of feeding our families, about the importance of having opportunities for the next generation. I absolutely agree with that. She talked about the fact that there are many factors at play in the economy of Alberta, and I appreciate that and recognize that. That's why this government has a very robust plan not to tackle one issue but to tackle a multitude of economic issues that will improve our competitiveness and will do it simultaneously to ensure that businesses are going to invest in Alberta and create jobs and opportunities. Corporations, which are really a structure for businesses, provide an awful lot of benefit. Businesses provide an awful lot of benefit to every community, to every region in this province and this country. They are massive job creators, Madam Chair, in our region and in my constituency.

During the election as I went door to door, the one thing that I heard repeatedly was that we absolutely needed to create not only additional jobs but better-paying jobs. I met individual after individual that was either unemployed or severely underemployed. Madam Chair, that is a result of a lack of investment in this province at this point in time. Corporations create jobs. Corporations create opportunities, and yes, corporations reinvest capital where there is additional opportunity that capital will be reinvested. That is what we're about. We're about actually creating a competitive environment where profits will be reinvested back into Alberta, which will create jobs and opportunities. Corporations contribute to our communities in many ways. They contribute to our infrastructure in our communities. In my constituency corporations have assisted with school projects. In my constituency corporations line up and buy 4-H calves and support rural kids who are working hard to raise their project. Corporations respond to community groups, to sports groups. They assist at a variety of levels within our communities.

There was some discussion on at what level our corporate tax cut will apply. There was discussion around the small-business deduction tonight, and I listened with interest at that discussion. It's true that the corporate tax cut that we're proposing today will in fact take effect when corporations earn $500,000. Madam Chair, there are many small corporations and medium-sized corporations as well as large corporations to whom this will apply. Let me characterize it this way. Successful corporations – and every business owner wants to be a successful businessperson regardless of what business they're in. Even small businesses that can become somewhat successful, small businesses that would be successful enough to, in fact, benefit from this tax reduction typically reinvest in their communities, and as the corporation size grows, they provide more opportunity not only in terms of job creation but in opportunities for other new business start-ups.

In my constituency there are a host of small businesses, businesses where it's often a couple or an individual that own the business. They work 14 hours a day. These are start-up businesses. Many of them don't make it, but the ones that do are made by blood, sweat, and tears. Typically those opportunities very often are provided by larger successful corporations that, again, provide opportunity in our communities for oil and gas service companies, for retail shops, for professional services, for grocery stores, for gas stations. In Alberta we desperately need investment to provide not only jobs but to provide opportunities for our businesses, whether they be large corporations or small corporations.

I want to also talk a little bit about the corporate tax revenue and the effect that our tax cut will have on government revenues. I think we heard one of the members opposite basically cite from our platform. We were up front with Albertans during the election campaign. We were transparent with Albertans. We recognized that our plans to decrease corporate tax revenue, create a very competitive business environment, attract investment, and create jobs would in fact result initially in a diminished corporate revenue for the government of Alberta. We've been transparent about that.

We also know – and, in fact, economists have backed us up – that as investment arrives in this province, as jobs and opportunity are created, there will be an opposite effect. In other words, there will be a buffering effect, where that additional investment, the additional economic activity, will create more tax revenue for this province. In fact, University of Calgary Professor Dr. Bev Dahlby has concluded that by 2023-24 this corporate tax cut will generate more provincial government revenue than what it has cost Albertans, and at the same time it's going to create 55,000 additional jobs and $12.7 billion of economic activity. Madam Chairman, this is exactly the initiative that this province needs.

We made a commitment to Albertans that we were going to create a business environment, that we were going to bring in policies that would again attract investment, create jobs and opportunities. Madam Chairman, that's what we're about, and that's what we're going to do on behalf of every Albertan and on behalf of every Alberta family.

Thank you.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. It's a pleasure to have the opportunity to return to the House tonight and take part in this debate. This is a bill that I haven't had the chance to speak to yet. It's one that I think is eliciting a lot of emotion, certainly some humour here in the House tonight, and I appreciate the opportunity to be here and take part in it. I'm not sure I'll have anything quite as colourful as some of my colleagues to add to the record tonight, but I think that it's important for me to speak to this bill.

You know, I've heard many members speak in this House on this bill and others that these bills need to move forward, that they are here to vote for these bills because they were sent here by their constituents and by the majority of votes that they received. To be completely honest, Madam Chair, I am here for the same reason, and I am standing to speak against this bill tonight for the same reason, because a significant majority of my constituents here in Edmonton-City Centre did not vote for this step. Indeed, when I went out and I knocked on doors – and I would put my record in speaking with my constituents up against any other member's in this House in terms of being present, visible, and listening to folks in my community – the majority of people that I spoke to were not in favour of this significant tax giveaway. Now, to be clear, I did speak with some members of my constituency, some residents here, who told me that they would not vote for me because they supported this policy, and I respect that view, but I am here tonight to speak to this bill because a majority of my constituents did not favour this bill and a number of other policies that were put forward by the now governing party.

I appreciate this opportunity to stand here tonight and represent the voice of my constituents. Now, I recognize that as we have this debate, as has been, I think, pretty amply demonstrated here in the House tonight, it's very unlikely that we are going to find any agreement on this bill between the two sides of the House. It's not going to happen. Indeed, I'm not under any illusion that there's anything that I can say here in this House tonight that is going to likely sway – I'll be completely honest; let's be humble here – probably a single member of the government caucus. But that's quite all right, Madam Chair. My intent tonight is to speak on behalf of my constituents.

You know, the reason that I truly believe, Madam Chair, that I am not going to sway any members of this government caucus is because their belief that this bill will bring jobs and investment back to Alberta, that it will add more revenue to the budget than it removes is for them essentially an article of faith. We've seen that pretty amply demonstrated here tonight. These members cannot show a single actual example where taking this step has had that result – we've talked about multiple jurisdictions that have taken this step and have not in fact seen more revenue come back than what they took out of their budget – or where it has led to a net creation of jobs or improvement for that local economy. In fact, in many cases we have seen the opposite.

You know, it was interesting, Madam Chair, that my colleague from Edmonton-Rutherford used a term that I appreciated hearing because it was something that I wanted to talk about, that being theoretical models. I often think sometimes, when I hear some of these arguments, about the concept of physics. I'll be clear. I am no physicist. Physics in high school was not my strongest subject. I did very well in math, but physics involved a lot more formulas and a lot more exceptions and things you had to consider before you decided which formula you were going to apply. Math is very straightforward, generally, most of the time. Physics is more complex.

But one thing I do understand about physics is that there are different ways to look at it. In the world of theoretical models, you can assume that things are going to operate in a very particular way. If I push a ball along a flat surface, in a theoretical model I can posit that that is a frictionless surface and that, therefore, that ball will roll forever. But we know the reality is that friction does exist. Therefore, if I push that ball, it will roll for a certain distance, and then it will stop. We also know that outside of that model I could push that ball, and I could set it rolling, and then someone could come and put their hand in the way and block it from moving. The reality is, Madam Chair, that I cannot simply say that in every single instance where I take that ball and I give it a push, it will reach the other side of the room. There are many factors which could get involved and cause that not to be the case.

Now, what I am hearing, again, from many members in this House when they stand up and they argue in favour of this bill is that they are operating in a world of theoretical models. They are making assumptions based on a belief that there is, in fact, no friction involved or that if there is friction involved, there's nobody who could put a thumb on the scale. They are living in a world of ideals. Indeed, Madam Chair, in an ideal world, if we cut the corporate tax by 4 per cent, then that 4 per cent would go back to companies, and those companies would say: "Thank you. You're wonderful people. Therefore, I will take this money, and I will put it directly back into your economy."

Now, I am not saying that that isn't going to happen to some extent. I don't think anyone in this House is necessarily disagreeing about some of the realities. We acknowledge that there is a certain point at which, if you tax too much, you will begin to see a losing prospect or that there is a point at which, if you tax too low, you're going to lower your revenues to the point where you're not able to function as a government. I think the bone of contention that we have today is: where is that balance? Where does that actually fall? What I would say, Madam Chair, is that what this government is proposing to do is to roll the dice and gamble with Albertans, with the public services that Albertans depend on, with the budget that is there to protect and support Albertans.

I'm not the only one that's said this. This is something that has come out in a few articles that have been published recently in the Edmonton Journal. Keith Gerein, a columnist whom I've quoted before in this House: I kind of like Keith. I've got respect for him. He doesn't always see things my way, I don't always see things his, but I feel like he's a fairly fair-minded guy. You know, he talks about the corporate tax cut that we're talking about here tonight. The headline for his article is UCP Gambles Alberta's Prosperity on Tax Cuts, but Is It a Smart Bet? He says that when we're talking about economic policy in a small jurisdiction like Alberta, it's "a bit like discussing strategies for winning at the casino." He says that you can calculate the odds as best you can. You can try to figure out what the trends are, which way things tend to go in the house, but whether you go home with more money than you came in with or whether you go home with significantly less is still going to be subject to a lot of factors that are simply outside your control.

We are not dealing here with the theoretical model; we are dealing here with an economy that is part of a larger global economy in which many factors that affect us have been shifted. Mr. Gerein suggested that this is a relevant analogy because he says that the Kenney government is "rolling the dice on [Alberta's] economic future."

An Hon. Member: Name.

Mr. Shepherd: Oh, pardon me. I apologize. I withdraw the name.

He refers to this particular government, that he says is "rolling the dice on the province's economic future . . . by going all-in on a massive tax cut." He refers to this as "aggressive and risky . . . a gamble on classic trickle-down economics." He goes on to note: "The risk of the plan backfiring is significant, but the government appears to have no timeline or threshold to pull the plug [on this risky idea] if [it] becomes clear the scheme isn't working." The government is not only gambling, Madam Chair; they are going all-in. They're putting all the chips on the table, and if the roll of the dice does not go their way, it is Albertans that are going to lose.

Now, we've heard members opposite quote two particular economists with whom they are somewhat friendly and whose opinion, therefore, they tend to prefer. But they are ignoring the fact that, as Mr. Gerein notes, there are skeptical economists who have also weighed in on this, and they've noted, again, that our economy is subject to a lot of complex and fluid things that are happening in the larger global economy, things that are going on across the world that affect us.

Indeed, as the Member for Calgary-Glenmore noted, if we take this step, if this is the be-all and end-all, if this is the ultimate step that needs to be taken to ignite Alberta's economy, what happens, then, when other provinces and states start to lower their own corporate taxes? Do we simply, then, continue to engage in that race to the bottom?

11:40 p.m.

Now, as has been noted, initially when they announced this policy as part of their platform, they said that the cut would pay for itself. No loss. But the fact is, as Mr. Gerein notes, Stokes

Economics suggested that "the tax cut would instead decrease provincial revenue by $3.4 billion over four years while getting back only $1 billion in revenue generated by new economic activity." One billion. Investing 3 to get 1 back: that's the analysis from Stokes Economics. As Mr. Gerein notes, "Alberta Finance projections suggest lost revenue from the tax cut could range anywhere from $1.7 billion to $4.7 billion over four years."

As was the habit of these members when they sat on this side of the House, we'll choose to go with the largest possible figure and talk about that $4.7 billion hole that they want to blow in the Alberta budget. As my colleagues have so aptly pointed out, Madam Chair, this government has already said that they are going to be making cuts, because they have set up their blue-ribbon panel with no other choice. All they can do is find ways to reduce spending and expenditures, and on top of that they will remove an additional up to $4.7 billion out of the budget and then turn to Albertans, download that onto the school boards, onto the municipalities, onto Alberta Health Services, and from there onto all of the front-line health care workers, and say: you figure it out. We've seen this before. That's been the approach of previous Conservative governments whenever the price of oil would drop.

As Mr. Gerein says, "In short, the UCP corporate tax cut is a big gamble that could jeopardize public services for little to no economic benefit." Also from the Edmonton Journal, an editorial. Now, I recognize that members of the government were very, very happy with the editorial page of the Edmonton Journal when it was corporate leaders of Postmedia in Ontario that provided an endorsement for their party. They may be less pleased to hear the thoughts of actual local individuals who serve on the editorial board, who live here in the province of Alberta, who contribute to the local economy and also depend on the local services. These people, journalists, Madam Chair, who I respect far more than some who simply choose to repeat and rewrite media releases from the government, in their editorial also note that these corporate tax cuts are a gamble.

Now, they give the Premier credit. They say that they give him credit for delivering on what he's pitched. Absolutely, it was in the campaign platform. They laid out what they were going to do. They've somewhat changed what they said about what the impacts of that would be, but let's give them credit. They told Albertans what they intended to do. But they go on to note that there is something that the Premier did not tell Albertans, that this plan is "a calculated gamble, with not insignificant risk."

They also go on to note that there are a number of complex and global factors that have impacted Alberta's economy. The realities of what we've experienced over the last four years, what we are facing now are not the simplistic narrative which the Premier and members of this government choose to continue to repeat. Again, Madam Chair, I recognize that for some of these members, they probably truly believe it. It is an article of faith. They honestly believe that it is what our government did that destroyed the economy and that by taking these steps, they are going to somehow restore it. As the editorial lays out:

Even if companies flock to Alberta, it's no sure bet that their outlays will offset billions in foregone tax income. If the gamble falls short, it's likely the money will be carved out of spending.

They conclude by stating:

Albertans desperate to revive the economy may be willing to try slashing corporate taxes but it's likely they don't want to subsidize business with drastic cuts to health care, education, infrastructure spending and other public services – of the kind Albertans saw during the time of Klein's "Alberta Advantage."

That is why, Madam Chair, I would like to bring forward an amendment. If we are going to take this risky gamble, if this government wants to put Albertans' public services on the table and hope that they're going to hit it big, then at least let's be a bit more measured about how big of a pot we put out there. Let's maybe hold a little something back to protect the people of Alberta. I have an amendment I would like to introduce that will do just that. We have the original and the copies, and I'll wait for the original copy to reach you. I'll give you the opportunity to view it, and then I'll go into a bit more on the specifics of how we can perhaps protect Albertans a little bit.

The Chair: Hold on, Member. Just wait till we have the amendment, and then we'll let you speak about it.

This will be known as amendment A1. Please proceed.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you. I recognize that my time is growing short, so I'll quickly read this into the record. I move that Bill 3, Job Creation Tax Cut (Alberta Corporate Tax Amendment) Act, be amended as follows. Section 2(b) is amended by striking out the proposed section 21(t) and substituting the following:

- (t) beginning after December 31, 2019 is 10% of the amount taxable in Alberta for the year and by striking out the proposed section 21(v) to (y).

Section 3 is amended in clause (b) in the proposed section 22(2.1297)(c) by striking out "and before January 1, 2021" and by striking out the proposed subsections (2.1298) and (2.1299); and in clause (c) by striking out " (2.1295), (2.1296), (2.1297), (2.1298) and (2.1299)" and substituting " (2.1295), (2.1296), and (2.1297)".

In other words, we would hold at the end of this year at 10 per cent. Let's not put all of Alberta's opportunity on the table. Let's be prudent gamblers. Let us put out half the pot and give this government the opportunity to demonstrate to us what a successful venture that is, to demonstrate to all Albertans indeed that they are putting forward an effective proposal. Indeed, perhaps we won't see the full 55,000 jobs they promise, but perhaps with a 2 per cent cut we will see half of that. They can at least then demonstrate to Albertans that the gamble they wish to take is a valid one that will deliver.

This government has nothing to be afraid of. They will have ample opportunity within the next three years, after they have demonstrated the success of this tax cut, to come back and lower it further. All we are asking is that they show their due diligence and take the opportunity to demonstrate to Albertans how successful this proposal will be, a simple test of that tenet of faith, Madam Chair. We have the opportunity to prove that this invisible hand of the market, in fact, exists and, if trained as well as they claim it is, will respond in kind and will not in fact bite the province that feeds it. As I said, this is a significant gamble for the people of Alberta.

Thank you.

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Culture, Multiculturalism and Status of Women.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you very much, and thank you for the opportunity to speak. I imagine we're speaking to the amendment right now. I couldn't quite hear you. Sorry, Madam Chair; are we on the amendment, then?

The Chair: Yeah.

11:50 p.m.

Mrs. Aheer: Okay. Thank you.

I just wanted to talk about a few things. My husband and my son just got home about 15 minutes ago from our small business that actually functions and is successful because of the multiple corporations that have multiple jobs that contribute to the economy in the area where I live and contribute to the success of our small business. We wouldn't have a successful business if it wasn't for the corporations that have created the jobs in the area that I live in, in Chestermere-Strathmore.

A big shout-out to these folks who have multiple small businesses in these areas. They're super philanthropic and incredibly, incredibly savvy small-business people. In fact, the growth in that area – we're seeing, because of the momentum and excitement and changes in government, that people are really excited about investing, and small business has a direct impact. How it does, how it functions, how it works is directly related to the economic well-being and health of your corporations. All of those things work together. If you consider where we are with building roads in this province and building schools and the infrastructure that is needed in order to live the way that we do in this province, the lifestyle and the way that we all expect to live, nobody in this House should be condemning any sort of business at any time, ever.

We are built in this province out of so many different things, so many bits and pieces. It's a huge fabric. It's a tapestry of a lot of different things. A lot of farms would be deemed corporations because of the number of people that they employ, the types of businesses that they do. Many farms, actually, have multiple sides to their businesses and are under that umbrella of corporation. I would love to understand how those farms, farming communities, stockyards, all of those places, would feel right now knowing that members in this House have basically said that corporations are no good and are greedy. I would really love to understand how they would feel. I'm excited, actually, to reach out to the larger farms and stockyards. Strathmore is full of stockyards and large areas that would be considered corporations by the definition that was given by the member from Meadowlark.

These are families that I know and people who are humongous contributors to their local economies, the local people who own a car wash like I own. Those people come and wash all their large vehicles and trucks and everything in my little car wash, which would not exist if those large corporations didn't exist around me to make my business successful. So I am actually very grateful, extremely so.

We were talking about the variations in tax cuts and what it is and why we want to go to 8 per cent. Well, folks, we're still in a recession. In fact, the Leader of the Opposition was just saying two days ago during question period that we could be heading to another recession. Those were her words. Then, on top of that, when you look at the numbers, this is exactly when you'd want to do a corporate tax cut, when you are in a recession. When there is an issue with the health of the economy, that's actually exactly when you'd want to do something like that because this is about actually attracting new business to our province. Unfortunately, what the opposition keeps forgetting is that everything that they did made corporations flee to other provinces.

Oh, and I feel, actually, like I need to give a small shout-out to the folks of North Dakota and stand up for them a little bit. I actually don't have any family or friends in North Dakota, but suddenly they became the beating stick of the opposition tonight. It was very interesting. I'm not sure what North Dakota ever did to you, Member. Anyway, I hope that they come and invest here because we're going to be open for business. So yea for North Dakota: come and see us. [interjection] It might offend the opposition a little bit, and I'm not quite sure what their problem is.

I actually feel that this province has so much to offer if you think about all of the incredible things that are here. Take, for example, the film tax credit that we're looking at. That film tax credit is going to employ a ton of people that actually are coming from larger corporations: construction workers, electricians, all sorts of people that are actually presently employed in large corporations that might be able to do a diversified type of job in a really, really interesting and growing business opportunity. But you can't attract those types of things here without having multiple styles of businesses. It is actually a really collaborative piece between large corporations, small business, and everything else that goes into this. It's a beautiful mix, actually.

What we're trying to do is stimulate the ability to bring more people into the province, and hopefully, with the ability of actually bringing those folks here, not only will we attract large corporations but all of those small businesses that want to open up, all those entrepreneurs, all of those little businesses that want to open up. In Chestermere every other house has a hair salon or a lawn mowing business or anything like that. These are all little businesses, but guess whose lawns they mow? They mow the lawns of people that have large corporations, that are hiring them to come and do their job. It's quite incredible. Honestly, with all my heart, this is about looking at where we're at right now and during this time when we have an economic downturn to stimulate folks coming back to this province to make sure that not just the large corporations but all these other little businesses can grow as well.

For those of us on this side of the House that sign the cheques all the time from our small, little businesses for the small number of people that we might employ every day, I am extremely grateful to the large corporations in this province that have brought all of the people into my area that support my small business, every one of those people that have been attracted to this province. When you look at oil and gas, for example, hundreds of thousands of people, Madam Chair, came from all over the country and all over the world, actually, diverse groups of people sitting across from each other having a meal together, learning about each other, growing the diversity of our province, becoming friends, bringing our incredible resources out of the ground.

Then we have a government that comes in and says: "No. You know, we don't like oil and gas. We don't care about the industry." They align themselves with the Trudeau government to actually attack the industry, and then when we try to do something to actually attract those folks back, suddenly that's a bad idea even though those were the businesses that brought all of these people here who started all of the small businesses that are the heartbeat of this province. These are all these secondary and tertiary businesses that exist as a result of the large corporations that employed hundreds of thousands of people in this province, things that we should be grateful for. Unbelievably blessed to be in this province. To feel again this attack on business when, really, all of us consulted for 28 days just before April 16, every one of us at the doors, constant consultation, transparent ideas, nuanced policy that didn't overblow the idea or overstate what we're trying to do or pretend that it's something that it's not – it's an actual document that says what the potential growth is. What a wonderful opportunity.

Quite often when you're trying to attract people, it's based on the notion of hope and based on the notion that you have people that understand that hope, who know how to facilitate that and bring people in. It's not a divisive mentality. It's the idea of something better and something greater because we have faith in the incredible people that actually want to come to this province and function here.

My dad came in 1963 from India. He's a chemical engineer. You know, he went through several businesses, up and down, some large corporations he worked for, some of his own small businesses that he worked for. He is in oil and gas still. Even at this age – he's a severe diabetic; he can't see anything – he still works on some projects because he's just a brilliant man, and people really appreciate his advice on some of the projects that he does.

It's amazing to me that when I talked to him about the various businesses that he's been through, whether it was a large corporation or whether it was a small business, the impact that all of those businesses had – in fact, the large corporations that he worked for in oil and gas were the reason that he went to a small, private business, a little one. He was inspired by what these large companies could do, but he knew he could take his knowledge and everything he had learned there and create something incredible in a smaller engineering firm. He went from a place that employed thousands of people to he himself employing maybe a hundred at most at any given time. He was able to do that because he started in a place where it was a mortgage-paying job, something that he could do to raise his family and take care of people. He is forever grateful to those large corporations that took a chance on a young foreigner who came here with big ideas, just like so many Canadians come to be able to put their stake in the ground and make a difference in this beautiful province.

Do you know how many of those large corporations hire new Canadians? Think about it. We all have them in every one of our ridings. They're the first people to scoop up this incredible talent and say: "Come and work with us, and bring your family. You know, we have benefits for you. We'll take care of you." We have great schools here because the large companies actually, probably, helped build a rec centre in your area. So the next time you decide to criticize those large corporations, go inside each one of your rec centres and see who were the major donors there. Go in there and find out who put the money in to your swimming pool or your race track or any of those wonderful facilities that are in our areas and you ask yourself if you maybe shouldn't be attacking those folks because they're the ones who contribute in such a beautiful way to all of our communities. Not only that; they stimulate all of these other people to start these small businesses because there is this desire for competition and this desire to do a better version and to maybe even make it to the grand part of being your own large corporation. We've seen that happen here with small, little companies that suddenly took off and became these huge corporations that employ thousands of people.

I have to say that, like, the rhetoric around the attack on Albertans just needs to stop. Policy is one thing. Have at 'er. We have the responsibility to look at each other's policy, for sure. It's a really fair comment, and it's fair to be able to look at that. But the personal attacks and saying things like that, being of average ability, is a stretch. That kind of nonsensical behaviour and talking: we are much better than that in here. We have a lot of people in here who are all here for what they believe to be the right reasons. That kind of language and behaviour is not acceptable. Albertans heard you. We heard you, and I'm repeating it. Please, consider that every single human being in here is here for the right reasons, whatever the reasons are, Madam Chair, but that kind of rhetoric does nothing to build capacity, jobs, to elevate people, to make people want to come here to make sure that their government understands who they are at the core, gets them, understands how to inspire and make sure that we are out of the way so that these businesses can flourish.

I would suggest that, potentially, we could consider the policy versus the personal attacks. I think that that might be a better way to go.

As for the Member for Calgary-Hays, I would suggest that you're far above average, sir, and more than that, your working-stiff dad makes all of us proud. We all have those dads. Thank you for your dad – my dad thanks you – and every other person who has a hard-working parent in here who probably helped get them to where they are right now, working in a job that may have been a small business or corporation, because we live in the best province in the world. I would suggest that we say thank you instead of attacking each other. Thank you.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Calgary-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Madam Chair. It was, I guess, interesting to hear. A lot of economists also kind of lecture about how we need to focus on policy.

A couple of things. I want to preface my remarks by saying that I'm not against any corporation – past, present, or future – so let's get that out of the way. Nothing against profit or North Dakota. I didn't go and live there, so that's out of the way as well. Also, when the Member for Calgary-Hays was speaking, it's the same election rhetoric: we are better at managing the economy; they are not. I think we need to move past that as well. We will not go on personal attacks or anything. Otherwise, I can say that the Member for Calgary-Hays said – and I paraphrase – that supports for persons with disabilities is just a giveaway. He said that those supports are giveaways, and he fails to see a $4.5 billion tax break, the biggest in the history of this province, as a giveaway. That's shameful.

But I will talk about policy. I will talk about economics. I will not go there. In the last couple of months, I think the only notable incident in our economy was that the UCP got elected. I respect their mandate. They got elected. Let's get that out of the way. I'm not relitigating the election whatsoever. But where our economy was before the election: it's pretty much at the same place. What we are facing in our economy is that we do have enough product. If we talk about the energy sector, we do have enough product. We do have enough corporations that can pump more resources from the ground and that can create more products. The real issue we are facing is that we do not have takeaway capacity in our pipelines, we do not have new markets, and that's the objective reality of our province.

On that side we only hear one theory, that for the most part is trickle-down economics. My background is in economics; my undergrad was economics and my master's was in economics, so I can tell you that I know what I'm talking about. In all those years I never heard or read any theory that says that cutting corporate taxes generates jobs. There is no such theory in economics. You can prove me wrong. You can prove otherwise. The second thing is that there is no theory in economics that is absolute. Every single theory in economics has assumptions, and it's subject to the ground realities, the objective realities of the economy where they are applied. I will challenge you on that, too. If anybody wants to prove me wrong on that, sure. I would love to hear their arguments.

The ground realities, the objective conditions in Alberta are that we are blessed with a lot of resources, the second-largest resources on the entire globe. Whatever policy we bring forward, I think we can all agree on both sides of the House that our aim is that our province should be prosperous. There should be good, mortgage-paying jobs for all Albertans. It should create opportunity for everyone. It should create revenues so that we can support education, we can support health care, and we can support social services. I don't think there is any disagreement on that among the members of this House. I think we disagree on how we do it.

12:10 a.m.

All we hear from that side, again in economic terms, is trickle-down economics and supply-side economics. Theories which have failed in practice universally, across the globe. Trickle-down economics has failed. Even the World Bank and IMF: like, they are revisiting those theories. Henry Kissinger, who it can be said is the father of this kind of trickle-down economics, Reaganomics, those kind of things: even he thinks that we need to revisit trickle-down economics or supply-side economics. What, essentially, supply-side economics does is it encourages you to increase goods and services and lower corporate taxes.

In no way, shape, or manner will this tax break encourage any increase in our goods, for instance energy products. As I said, we already have the capacity to produce more. We have that capacity in the system without any new investment coming in. We have that production capacity. The crisis we are facing has bled off our takeaway capacity. And I do not see any link between this tax break and a pipeline getting built. I do not see that link. That is the reason, when we were in government, that we curtailed supply, because there was too much supply and there was not enough takeaway capacity. We curtailed it so we could get the differential down and get a reasonable price for our products.

The other, biggest problem with supply-side economics, the one that that side, the government side, is proposing, is that it always, always results in long-term deficits for the future economy. There are many examples that I can share. Like, the biggest one is from the United States. The United States has somewhere close to $799 billion in debts, and after a huge tax break from this administration, the Trump administration, they saw a rise in their deficit. If the tax break was to work, they wouldn't see an increase in their deficit.

Deficit can come in many different forms. We had a 44-year regime here from the previous Conservative government. We saw deficits. They will say: we balanced the books. But the books were balanced by leaving deficits in our communities. The Member for Calgary-Hays would know that between 2008 and 2013 there was not a single school built in Calgary. Not one school built in Calgary between 2008 and 2013: that's a fact. From 2015 to 2019 we invested in 244 new or modernized schools. Those were the deficits that were left during the previous Conservative government, and that's what supply-side economics does.

On the other hand, I think there is another theory, called demand-side economics, that encourages that we increase consumer demand. How you do it is that you increase the wealth of those who would purchase goods and services from the economy. One example is that we promised in 2015 that we would increase the minimum wage, and that certainly increases the wealth for people who can purchase goods and services from the economy. The reason that demand side works better is that nobody who is making $15 will have an offshore account. Every single cent they get, they will spend into the economy. I can say that from a theoretical point of view, and I can also share that because I worked for minimum wage from 2004 till 2012, until I started practising law. Every time I got a 50-cent or a dollar increase – I never had an extra account somewhere else – that was going right back into the economy. Those kinds of investments from the demand side do encourage economic activity, do recycle that money into the economy, and that economic activity then generates, I guess, conditions for economic growth and development.

Sure, it has its own flaws. It may cause a little bit of inflation, but at the end of the day I think there is more economic evidence that demand-side economics in the long run is better for the society because it also encourages discretionary spending. It also encourages spending into infrastructure and all those things, which we have been doing. Anybody who created wealth in this province: they didn't do it on their own. I'm getting this from a U.S. Senator who said something to the effect that those who made money here made money because public money was invested in schools, public money was invested in infrastructure, and public money was invested in hospitals, in all those roads, bridges that everybody enjoys, that corporate citizens, individuals other than corporations, all use. So nobody became rich on their own. It's, I guess, a shared kind of effort that helps generate wealth, that helps generate profit. Nobody creates profits on their own.

If we look at this tax break in perspective now, it's not helping us with the objectives. It's not helping us with job creation. It is not helping us in any way, shape, or manner with the objective realities our economy is facing. I represent a constituency which has the lowest average income in the entirety of Calgary. In the city of Calgary profiles that can be looked up as well. Certainly, people are looking for jobs. The jobs they are looking for: they need those jobs now. Here, just a half-hour ago, the Finance minister got up and said – and I'm paraphrasing – that this $4.5 billion tax break will create jobs in '23-24.

I guess you talk about your mandate. People gave you a mandate because they thought we didn't create jobs and that you will create those jobs. Now, a month into your mandate, you're telling them that you will create jobs in 2023-24. So far, from other, I guess, proposals we have seen, bills we have seen, nothing is creating jobs. We didn't see it. Like, repealing the carbon tax: sure, that was the campaign promise. Albertans gave you that mandate. But, with that, there were 7,000-plus jobs. With that, there were many energy efficiency programs that were creating jobs across this province. What about those jobs? We have seen job loss, I think, because of these kinds of policies. Same thing with this corporate tax break. For any investment decision taxes are just one factor.

12:20 a.m.

There are many other factors that are at play. If somebody was to invest in Alberta at this point, in particular in oil and gas, I think that the first thing they will look at is: if they produce from Alberta, will they be able to sell it in Alberta? We are a small market. We will need other markets to sell those products. Do we have enough pipelines, enough means to get those products to markets? So far we are still waiting for TMX. We signed up a deal to transport 125,000 barrels a day while we are waiting for the TMX. What is the government doing? They cancelled that rail deal, that would have helped Alberta's economy by creating 125,000-barrel-per-day capacity.

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

What did they do? They did exactly the opposite. They created, I guess, more issues by cancelling that because now we are even more short of takeaway capacity than we otherwise would be if we had that 125,000 barrels. That would have helped. That would have certainly attracted some investment. People would know that while we are waiting for a pipeline, we have some other means, that we can transport the products and sell them somewhere in other markets. These decisions are also not helping us find other markets because investors will only come and invest when they know that they can transport it somewhere, they can sell it somewhere. This decision is not helping us transport it anywhere or sell this oil product anywhere.

Another example. My colleague from Edmonton-Gold Bar was talking about the Amazon bid, another business. One thing that was apparent from that bid was that we need to focus on tech infrastructure that can support tech companies, tech giants like Amazon. No amount of tax breaks would have convinced them to locate in Alberta, the reason being that they didn't have that needed tech infrastructure. The solution to that was not to cut taxes; the solution to that was to invest in tech infrastructure. That's why we created those positions, those spots across all postsecondary institutions across this province. That would help us become competitive should any opportunities arise down the road. For some company who wants to relocate to Alberta, they will have that tech infrastructure. They will have that labour force that they need to support their operations.

Again, I think that no economist will agree that this tax break, subject to Alberta's specific economic conditions, will help Alberta in any way, shape, or manner. The Minister of Finance clearly understands it. He knows that it won't create any jobs till '23-24 or bring any investment. All those estimates that he presented were down the road three or four years. Albertans were looking for action right now. If we leave the campaign rhetoric, I think we would have been better off having those rail deals in place so that we have more takeaway capacity, and we need to focus on getting TMX built. This side of the House has put a lot of work into that, and we certainly hope that we will get a favourable decision. That certainly will help us.

But giving a tax break in the hope that that money will be invested back into the economy: I think government has no control on corporate profits. It's a free market, and you are champions of free market.

The Deputy Chair: I saw the hon. Minister of Transportation jump up.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I'm pleased to rise on this amendment. There's a lot said here today that needs to be sorted out. What was interesting is that the hon. member just talked more about economics than the previous Finance minister did in four years. We asked economic questions of the former Finance minister, and the best we got was the answer that beer is good. Perhaps there is a misalignment in the previous cabinet because the minister there certainly made a mess of the children-in-care file to the point where he had to get fired and a new minister was appointed. [interjections] Mr. Chair, I can hardly hear myself. But here's what's also interesting.

The Deputy Chair: I would just quickly interject and mention that in these proceedings every member has the opportunity to speak; therefore, if members have interest in speaking, then it might be more productive to ensure that those who are speaking are heard by the House.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I didn't agree with much of what the previous member said, but I listened to it. I would hope for the same courtesy.

Now, Mr. Chair, what's interesting about this is that the previous speaker – he actually talked a little bit about economics which is, again, kind of interesting and quite a departure from what the previous Finance minister ever did over four years – spent the entire time on his feet arguing against a corporate tax decrease when, at the same time, the amendment by his teammate on the floor is for, wait for it, a corporate tax decrease. The folks on the other side won't even listen to their own members, let alone us on this side. There have been quite a few examples of them not listening to what's going on tonight, and I'd like to correct a couple of those things.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar mischaracterized my remarks. I don't know whether he did it on purpose or not, but he surely mischaracterized them. He took it upon himself to say that I claimed that corporations were the best citizens. No. I actually was quite clear I think, but I'll say it again in a little more detail to make sure, in case I wasn't clear enough the first time.

I was referring specifically to a small set of corporations that didn't operate in Alberta yet chose to pay their taxes here. Now they, of course, since they didn't have people working here, didn't depend upon the health care system or the education system and the social services. What's good about them, that makes them good economic citizens, is that they provide money for people who need those things. That was my point. Maybe I didn't say it well enough. I'll give the hon. member the benefit of the doubt. I thought I was clear. But my point was: corporations serve people when we let them pay taxes, we let them make profit and pay taxes and help pay for education and health care and social services and schools and roads and hospitals and things that matter to the people that we serve as Albertans. That's one point. That's, I would say, either a mischaracterization or a misstatement made by the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar that I'm just happy to correct.

The Member for Edmonton-Rutherford chose to take out of context something else that I said. He said that – I have it written down here. Where is it here? Oh, I know what it was: that one of the reasons that we might want to try lowering the corporate tax is because the previous government actually collected less money after raising the corporate tax. I don't remember saying that that was the only thing they did. The previous government did lots of other things that hurt business and caused them to regret it. The carbon tax hurt business. The minimum wage increase hurt business. The red tape that they added hurt business.

There were lots of other things, but of course, Mr. Chair, the bill that we're on is specifically about the corporate tax, so I surely did emphasize that because that was on topic, because that is what the bill is, what we're talking about now, the open-for-business, job-creation tax cut bill. I surely did emphasize that because that is the name of the bill, but I never said that that was the only thing the previous government did to mess up the success of corporations. They did a lot more things to harm corporations than just the one thing. So I would correct that thing, that remark that was made by some of the previous speakers.

Now, Mr. Chair, I also found it interesting that the previous speaker, the one with the economics degrees, was concerned about deficits, about creating deficits. He spoke as if deficits were bad, and I would say to that, "This just in," because for the previous four years the previous government didn't seem to be concerned about deficits. They seemed to be quite proud of spending as much as they could without paying down dollar one on the debt, yet today we hear a revelation from one of the members opposite that they're concerned about the deficit. We'll just be grateful that there is some learning going on. I think we could all take from that example and do some learning in this House because I would say that all of us can learn. All of us could learn yesterday, all of us could learn today, and all of us will surely be able to learn tomorrow. Tonight we saw a wonderful example of some learning that has taken place, with the concern about deficits.

Mr. Chair, speaking of learning, on the amendment that's here, the hon. member from the opposition that moved it is actually proposing taking the corporate tax rate from 12 per cent down to 10 per cent, which is what they thought was wrong four years ago, and they raised it up by 20 per cent, to 12 per cent. The fact that this amendment actually reverses the main piece of the government's platform in the previous four years perhaps is an indication that more learning is going on. Thank you, hon. members, although it was probably painful admitting that your policy was incorrect. I say that, and the evidence that I use is what I'm holding in my hand, which I don't think counts as a prop by the standing orders because it is the actual amendment, that we're all supposed to have, that we're debating right now.

There's some evidence of some learning and some evidence that the opposition is starting to acknowledge that they've made a mess of the economics of this province in the previous four years because the amendment today actually would take the province of Alberta back to where it was before the NDP got their hands on the economy and gave it a heck of a shake and made a real mess out of it, leading us to approximately a $60 billion debt, heading for $100 billion, with almost $2 billion in interest payments now due, just a real bad situation for Albertans, that we're trying to straighten out.

Now, Mr. Chair, the big difference between this amendment, as I understand it, and what is in the job-creation tax cut is that we want to take the corporate taxes down to 8 per cent. I think the hon. member making this amendment, while admitting that he and his previous government were wrong, wants to only go halfway. Well, here's the problem with that. There are 180,000 people out of work. Youth unemployment is at an all-time high. I guess the analogy I will give you is that if I give you four minutes, or four years in the case of the previous government, to tie knots in a shoelace, it will take me more than four minutes to untie those knots in the shoelace. I think that in general terms that is true. The previous government spent four years tying a knot in Alberta's economy, driving out jobs and investment and opportunity for young people and the bright future that young people used to look forward to.

I believe that with good policies it will take our government more than four years to undo the knots they put in Alberta's economy, which, I think, is why we need to go with where we're going with the job-creation tax cut, down to 8 per cent. This economy needs a big boost now to bring back some of the investments and jobs and opportunities that the previous government's policies ran out of here at such a horrendous rate in the last four years. I think we're going to have to try harder than just going back to what was a good policy. I think we're going to have to work real hard to bring that investment back.

That's the whole idea. The whole idea is to get Albertans back to work and provide them with jobs because that's what Albertans told us in the election that they wanted. They wanted to be self-reliant. They would prefer to make their own money and support their own family over being put out of work by the NDP government policies. They would actually prefer to pay their own way. To allow Albertans to do what they want to do, which is to work hard and pay their own way and make their own living, we're going to have to bring back some of those job opportunities. That starts with investment. That starts with corporations choosing to relocate to Alberta, and we have room for them, Mr. Chair.

The city of Calgary, I hope, will be happy. I haven't heard from them directly – I could even be wrong – but let me say this. I think they should be happy about this and probably the city of Edmonton, and the reason why is because 30 per cent of the offices in those towers downtown are empty. And who was in those 30 per cent of offices? Corporations driven out of Alberta by NDP policies in the last four years. Now the city of Calgary has got a big property tax problem because the property taxes paid by the 30 per cent of all of those office towers downtown are no longer being paid. The city is now looking at solutions, and I think they're finding out now that spreading that tax rate out on the other businesses is going to cause a knock-on effect that could cause potentially hundreds or thousands of other businesses not to be able to afford their taxes, and that could make the problem worse.

That's in direct contrast to what the Opposition House Leader said, that a few extra thousand dollars a month just means that maybe they need to manage their business better. I think that businesses in Calgary are finding out that it's a matter of survival. Frankly, that's kind of a crass way to look at it, to say that businesses could easily pay a few thousand extra dollars a month. It's easy, Mr. Chair, to talk about somebody else's few thousand dollars a month when you're not talking about your own few thousand dollars a month. I would suggest to the Opposition House Leader that if we were to cut any of our wages in here by a few thousand dollars a month or any Albertan's wages by a few thousand dollars a month, they would notice it. Many wouldn't be able to pay their rent or their mortgage and buy groceries for their families.

To take that kind of a crass attitude towards businesses, that they should just pay a few extra thousand dollars a month and they shouldn't notice it, is very negative indeed, which is why we need to create an atmosphere where businesses are welcome to come back, welcome to come back with investment, welcome to pay rent in those office towers in Calgary and Edmonton, welcome to bring back the oil rigs to put people in rural Alberta back to work servicing those rigs and then have people shop in the grocery stores and the flower shops and stay in the motels and keep the businesses going in rural and urban Alberta all across this province.

It's about bringing back the investment and the jobs. That's why we're doing this. That's our reason. That's what we told Albertans, and that's in our platform in black and white. I can understand that the NDP folks don't like it and want us to leave the knots in the shoelaces, through this amendment, longer than they should be there, but we actually have a mandate from Albertans to work faster than that, to get the economic knots out of Alberta's economic shoelaces faster than just going back to what was there. The previous government's policies did so much damage that we actually have to work harder to bring back those businesses, those corporations, those jobs, those opportunities, and that bright future for Alberta's young people, and that is what this is intended to do.

So, Mr. Chair, I don't think you will be surprised – I don't think anybody in this room will be surprised – that I will not be supporting this amendment. I will be very slow to take advice from the NDP on economics despite the fact that the previous speaker has degrees. I respect the fact that he has economic degrees, but the government he was part of botched the job on the economy, and they botched it badly.

But you know who we will take advice from? Experts, experts like Bev Dahlby, Jack Mintz, and others. When the other previous member from the other side, including the one that moved this amendment here, talked about, "There's no guarantee" – I appreciate that predicting the future is a tricky business. I've always said that if I could predict the future, I would be a lot more wealthy than I am today, and I think that might be true of all of us. So while we can't predict the future, what we can do is take good advice from people that have studied the matter and ought to be experts. That's what we have done, and we have been transparent enough to tell the public who those experts are that we took the advice from.

Mr. Chair, we did consult. We consulted with Albertans for a year or two before the election. We consulted by putting online and making public an approximately 117-page policy document, including the policy to bring in place the job-creation tax cut which is before us. It's our intention, our job, and, I would dare say, our responsibility to keep our promise to Albertans to pass the job-creation tax cut because that's what we promised Albertans in black and white. That's what we said we'd do. That's what they voted for, and, by golly, if we have anything to do with it, that's a promise made, and I believe, when this thing ends, that will be a promise kept.

12:40 a.m.

The Deputy Chair: The hon. Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland.

Mr. Getson: Thank you, Mr. Chair, and thank you, everyone else, for your comments. Being one of the newest members here, I'm actually really honoured to hear this debate go this long and this many points of view taking place and also some of the comments about our friends, neighbours, and largest trading partner across that 49th parallel. We're talking about corporations and business and how we got here and pontifications about the pros and cons and the approaches. If I may, since everyone seems to have digressed a little bit and given a bit of a journey or a story of how they got here and what the relevance is, maybe I can do the same.

I came from a small farm out west of Chip Lake. We didn't have much. We worked for it. The lessons of working on that farm, understanding what was in that area: we worked for it. Through small business and opportunity at the age of 16 I managed to come to the city of champions, worked for a small paving company due to a connection that I made on that family farm. That connection had a gravel truck that was working for small business, another one, that gave me a chance to be a labourer on a paving crew. I credit Mr. Rick Aubin and Mr. Al Brown for giving this farm kid, who didn't have any experience in his industry other than hard work: go do it. It wasn't long that I didn't work for minimum wage, that I actually gained experience. Those gentlemen invited me back every single year to come and work for them.

After that, I went on to college and ruined their plans because they wanted to make me a paving foreman. But I went to college, paid my way through that. Then – what do you know? – they gave me another advancement, another promotion, and again more experience. Then I went and worked for another corporation, another Alberta-owned company, called Ledcor Industrial. I ended up working for them on a diamond mine project in the middle of the territories, where more men and women took me under their wing, people like Brian Kienitz, Don Ellis, John Madsen, people that saw something in this farm kid who, again, wanted to work, learn more, get more experience.

In 2003 I ended up starting my own little company. I had an opportunity to work for companies such as EnCana. There are some names out there like Gwyn Morgan. Somebody may have heard of him. They had to take and move a lot of their business, being Cenovus, down to the States because – what do you know? – we didn't respect business enough. We poisoned the economy to where it was in that state, until a bunch of us had to step forward. I ended up moving from that company over to another small company in Edmonton called Enbridge. That company had a major footprint across North America.

And coming back to the comments to our good friends in Minot, North Dakota, some folks on this side, being to the left of me in the NDP group, asked what relevance North Dakota has. They have the Bakken oil field, which was a major play in that area. We had to build out a transshipment facility because their product was landlocked, which happened to be a major boom in the Bakken oil field play. We were transporting that oil across the line into Estevan, Saskatchewan, to get it to a pipeline system to move it down to Superior, Wisconsin. Because of this land lock situation we then had to go and build a transshipment facility down in Eddystone, Pennsylvania, to receive that oil.

When the members are talking about transshipment facilities, oil capacity, rail capacity, and everything else, I'm not sure that they're aware of the full scope and the full breadth of how this system works. I'm not sure that they understand that we're actually integrated with those partners across the States, that it isn't just us sitting on an island here. I find it very interesting that they're criticizing what we're presenting, what we brought in our platform, which we've seen as one of the key elements to help foster this economy, to bring that type of investment back, when they've actually protested against the same pipelines they were talking about building. I have heard lots of people in this room talk about building pipelines, but I have never seen one of these people out on a right-of-way across the footprint that I worked on proudly with those men and women, both in Canada and the U.S.

I'm going to drop another couple of names because these people are the ones that are actually in that industry, that support us and bring us along as Albertans across North America, working with our industries and with our partners. Leo Golden: there's a gentleman who has an economics degree. Tom Raptis: there's another gentleman with an economics degree. They happen to work for these major corporations. Al Monoco: he's the lead of that company. I met him down in Pennsylvania a few times talking about the efficacy of this project and how we were doing. Pat Daniels: there was another gentleman, with a very green thumb. He's the one that built most of the windmills and the power generation along that facility, including solar farms down in Ontario.

These corporations – we're talking about these alternate technologies – are the early adopters, before we even started talking about it. Again, their biggest output or biggest cost to running that system was electricity. They're the ones that manage those integrated systems. They're the ones that built the Montana tie line and also the 350 windmills sitting outside of Lethbridge.

Perhaps these other folks might start thinking a little broader before we start casting barbs. I do want to thank the members for Edmonton-City Centre and Calgary-McCall because these so far are the best dialogues and conversations that I've heard, that have had the most knowledge of the industry, and I find that those people are actually ones that I could potentially work with to do the right thing for Albertans, to bring across the attention to where it should be rather than wasting everyone's tax dollars talking about the consequences to business while we keep the lights on all night long. This is on camera, and I hope people are paying attention to it. This is how your tax dollars are being spent right now. And I am looking at you, sir. I am looking at you. This is what we're actually spending our dollars on, talking about the reasons and rationale of why we're here.

We're here to get business working. We're here to get the jobs going. We shouldn't be arguing about who's the best one for serving that, the person that works for the company or the person who started the company, because – guaranteed, folks – the Alberta advantage and the way that we do our business is that you start at that end, you build your own, and that's the dream. That keeps the things going. We all want the same outcome; we all want the same effect. We're arguing over the minutiae and the details.

So I support the bill, obviously, and unfortunately I don't support the amendment that was offered by the Member for Edmonton-City Centre although I do respect his speech on it, and I do respect your speech, sir. This is the type of stuff we should be spending our dollars on, and this is what the Alberta people expect of us, and I'm not going to waste a shot clock because, again, the way I look at it, being that farm kid that came up through business, I'm on the hour, and I want to make sure the people are getting their value.

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: The hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I think that was something really interesting here. Really, I have to say that it's my pleasure to be here with you and with all members tonight because we are here doing our jobs, that we were duly elected by Albertans for. If the hon. Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland feels that he doesn't need to do his job because he can just go home and enjoy the rest of his evening, then maybe he should. Maybe he should leave it to the rest of the legislators, who think it's important that we spend our time debating the bills and amendments that we've been asked to do and sent here to do by our constituents. Maybe he should leave that important work to us.

Mr. Chair, I think it's something that is really interesting to see, the amendment here tonight. The bill is something that I think is commendable in the sense that the intent of trying to create new jobs is very commendable. I do need to commend the government for that. I mean, it's something that, I think, when we were in government, we tried very hard to do. We tried to support our industry and tried to create new jobs.

But I think what the amendment here speaks to tonight is something equally important. It's making sure that we get it right, and it's making sure that we don't mess this up, because this is legislation. It's what is going to become the law of the land. We're taking a pretty big gamble, and we're taking a pretty big risk. I mean, honestly, we're taking a 4 and a half billion dollar risk. Mr. Chair, through you, a 4 and a half billion dollar risk is, honestly, going to pay for a lot of schools, hospitals, health care, roads, and services that are very important.

So I think that the amendment being brought forward here today is very reasonable. It's something that says: maybe we should hedge our bets. This Assembly meets twice a year for a few weeks every few months here, and, Mr. Chair, if we determine that the gamble pays off – and I do hope it does. I hope that the government accomplishes their goal of creating new jobs because that is what we were all sent here to do. We were all sent here to try and do our best for our constituents.

That's why we're up debating this at this hour, because we want to make sure that we get this right the first time. So if they can show that it works by first implementing it in part and if in part we can see that this amendment slows down the process, we as legislators can always come back, Mr. Chair, and make that change again. We can always come back and have that vote and have that debate through the fullness of this House, through the fullness of this Assembly, and move forward and have that debate.

I think that is something that we should expect of MLAs. We should expect our MLAs to want to come here and debate whether the policies that we have implemented have worked or not. If the government thinks that maybe that's not so important and they're going to get it right the first time every single time, well, Mr. Chair – I'm sorry to say that I don't have that much experience; we were only here for four years before – let me tell you that you don't definitely get it right every single time. You definitely don't get it right the first time every time. That's something that I'm afraid the government is going to learn sooner rather than later.

I'm afraid we're just trying to offer some really important advice here, and it's to take baby steps. Just make sure you go and you get it right. Go out and do some consultation. Don't rush into it. Let's talk about the issues and make sure we look at where it has been done in other jurisdictions.

We saw this done. I mean, right now in the United States, Mr. Chair, we see President Trump cutting corporate taxes from 35 per cent to 21 per cent. The President had stated that AT&T would create 7,000 new jobs. That's something very similar to what we're hearing from the government side. I mean, the cut that the government is proposing is quite a bit larger in taxes. Really, what we've seen, actually, is that AT&T didn't create those 7,000 new jobs after those cuts. What they did is that they cut 23,000 jobs. There were 23,000 jobs lost after the tax cut was implemented in the United States. That's very concerning to me, and that's one of the unintended consequences I think this bill may have.

That's why I think this amendment is really important. It's something that allows us to go forward and say: "Let's start and see if it works. If it does, then we'll keep moving with it, and if it doesn't, let's back off. Let's take our foot off the gas and decide how we want to change our minds and how we want to move differently." That's, I think, what legislators are sent here to do, to make sure we're making informed decisions and that when we do make those decisions, we move forward in responsible ways.

Mr. Chair, again, it's really my pleasure to be here at this hour because I think it's important that Albertans know that we are spending the time to get this right. It's important that they know that we are willing to be here, that we are willing to burn the midnight oil to ensure that we get this right. If members opposite think that it's not important to get it right and if they just want to vote this through in three days, well, I think that's actually a shame. I think it's something that is really disappointing because I thought that we were all sent here to do the same job, which is to make Alberta better.

I thought we were sent here to work hard and make sure we got good legislation through this House and that we were willing to come here and debate the legislation, hence us being parliamentarians, Mr. Chair. Being parliamentarians, I think it's very important that we do spend the time here in this Assembly. That's why the standing orders permit us to spend the time in this Assembly. That's why the standing orders permit us to go and have the fulsomeness of debate here in Committee of the Whole today and to bring forward amendments like this. I think that it's very important that amendments are brought forward and debated in this House. I think that if the government so chooses and decides that they want to do it at almost 1 o'clock in the morning because they don't want Albertans to be able to see it on their TVs, that's the government's prerogative, but it's very important that we are here. It's very important that we are debating this.

I know that members of the government, especially when they were in opposition, were definitely people who brought forward many amendments in Committee of the Whole. In Committee of the Whole this is the opportunity to make sure we get those nitty-gritty details right. Those nitty-gritty details today, Mr. Chair, are looking at whether we want to move so quickly and so recklessly with a 4 and a half billion dollar giveaway to friends and donors of the government bench. I think that's something we need to be very careful about, because if it works, that will be one of the best investments that this government has made in a generation. But if it doesn't work, if by chance we get it wrong, I have to see that the government bench will admit that there's a chance that we can get this wrong unless they have a crystal ball that they're hiding in the lounge that I haven't seen yet. I wish I'd had that crystal ball a few years ago. But if they do have that crystal ball, then I would suggest that they should table it so that all members could have the benefit of being able to have the foresight to make the best legislation possible.

Mr. Chair, what we really need to do today is slow down. We need to look at the legislation and say: what are the first steps we should take? The first step is an incremental implementation of their plan here. We should look at it and say: what parts are important, and what parts are going to work? Then we should come back and review if they have worked. We know that this Assembly will meet again in the fall. We know that there has to be a budget in the fall. We know that the Assembly will again meet in the spring of next year. We know that the Assembly at all of those times will certainly have the opportunity to bring back legislation like this again.

If members of the government really believe in being responsible, if they really believe in getting legislation right, and if they really believe that Albertans deserve to have the best possible legislation, then they would certainly give due consideration and indeed perhaps vote for this amendment. It's something that I think is very important, that we don't move recklessly. That's something that I think members of the government bench spoke to at quite great length while they were in opposition here. Something they spoke quite extensively about was that if you move too quickly on things, it is reckless and dangerous and can damage the economy in unexpected ways. This is one of those things where, if we move too quickly, it is reckless and dangerous and can damage the economy in unexpected ways.

When we move on risky ideologies like this that are untested and when they are tested, like in the Kansas experiment, and we actually see growth slowing down in jurisdictions that implemented policies like this, that's very concerning, Mr. Chair. It's very concerning that when we do test these things, it doesn't work. When we play with these risky, ideological experiments here in Alberta – and the government has the prerogative to do that. The government has the prerogative to implement their risky agenda. They have the prerogative to implement their ideology. That's what they want to do tonight, and that's totally fair for them. But if they want to implement their risky, ideological change, then we should at least test it out. Any good scientist would tell you that.

The Deputy Chair: Happy birthday to the Member for Morinville-St. Albert.

I will also take this as a quick opportunity to just mention that in the House the idea, for the most part, is for people to take a seat. In this situation you don't have to take your own seat. I should mention that I've seen this on both sides. If there are individuals that are looking to ensure that this kind of thing is enforced, just understand that it seems to be something that has been kind of in a bipartisan fashion.

Please continue, hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I thank the hon. Minister of Health for his interjection, because it becomes very clear that the hon. minister would rather make jokes than do his job here in the Assembly and focus on the legislation we are trying to move forward. It becomes clear that he really doesn't care about the implications of what we are trying to do here. It becomes clear that the minister really doesn't think the legislation or the amendment is important, and I think that's a shame. I think it's a shame that the minister would get up and try to make a mockery of the process of legislation here, a mockery of democracy. That's something that all members should be deeply concerned about, that a member of their front bench would take the legislative process as a joke.

Mr. Chair, when we look at this and we see these risky ideologies being implemented across the United States and in other jurisdictions, we see it not work. When we see that the evidence points to it not working anywhere else, then when we're going to try and implement this risky ideology here, well, let's take those baby steps. Let's do what any good scientist would do. I worked on a science degree at the University of Alberta here. In sciences they always teach you: make sure that when you do your tests and experiments, you don't take your beaker and just sniff the entire thing right away. Let me tell you that I've definitely watched some undergrads pass out from that. What you do is that you waft very lightly. You waft very lightly, and that's what you need to do when you take risky ideological experiments like this. You need to waft lightly. You need to take the steps, baby steps, and move in a slow, controlled manner so that we know that we won't be moving too quickly, in a way that could damage or make the hon. members across the way pass out. I think that would be something that would be a real shame here in the Chamber.

It's something that I think is very, very important that we get right the first time. It's important that we get it right the first time because it's the lives of so many Albertans that are going to be at stake. It's the jobs of so many Albertans that are going to be at stake. It is this Assembly that is empowered – indeed, we have a duty, Mr. Chair – to make sure we get it right.

When we see members of the government and indeed members of the government front bench making a mockery of this process, I think it's something that we should all be very concerned about. We should be taking the time to take those baby steps, do the scientific work, and make sure we get it right the first time. I mean, when this is implemented, by 2022 Alberta's combined federal and provincial business tax rate would be lower than that of 44 U.S. states, Mr. Chair. That is quite a significant amount. That is, by far, the vast majority of North America, and if we're going to be moving that radically and that quickly in this dangerous, unprecedented direction, this unprecedented, risky, ideological direction, we need to be very careful.

We need to make sure that we get it right the first time. We don't want to be coming back here in six months and deciding: "Wow. Shoot. We got it wrong. We've got to raise the tax rate again." I mean, the Finance minister, I'm sure, would be very embarrassed if he had to come back and discover that no new jobs were created as a result of his cut or if the economy did not grow as much as his cut was supposed to do.

We saw that happen in Kansas when Governor Brownback said that it would be a real, live experiment. They predicted all this big job creation, economic growth, higher revenues, all this exciting stuff that, honestly, I really hope we can bring here to Alberta, but what they got was the opposite. They got slower growth, revenue drops. They had to reduce school calendars, pull back on public services. I think that would be the shame, Mr. Chair. I don't want the Finance minister to be embarrassed, and I don't want the Finance minister to have to come back and admit that his tax cut, his giveaway to his friends and donors, wasn't going to work, isn't going to work.

I mean, we're trying to make sure that we can get this legislation right so that members of the government front bench – I know that perhaps they think that this is a joke and that legislation is a joke, but I want them to make sure they're not embarrassed. I want to make sure that they don't feel bad about this in a few months, Mr. Chair. It's something that I think is really important. Albertans are going to depend on us in this Chamber to get it right. They're going to depend on us in this Chamber to be debating this and to make sure we get it right.

That's why this amendment is so important. If we don't get it right, we can always take our foot off the gas. We can always take our foot off the gas and decide that we need to make changes in our direction. We will be back in this Assembly again, Mr. Chair, I assure you. Unless the members of the government have something they'd like to tell me that I don't know yet, I assure you that we will have more legislation in the fall. We will have more legislation next spring. If this works, then that would be the opportune time to come back and start debating this again and show the numbers and table the numbers and show that this worked.

If the members of the government are so confident and so sure that this will work one hundred per cent, then they should be proud to do that. They should be proud to come back to this Assembly and debate this again in the fullness of this House and in the fullness of committee and in the readings, Mr. Chair, to make sure that they can show that the tax cut created the tens of thousands of jobs that they were talking about.

If they're not so confident that it will and if they're worried about bringing it back to the Assembly and having another debate around it, then perhaps that's exactly the reason we need to slow down a bit, that we need to take our foot off the gas, that we need to be careful. And if they're not willing to be careful, I think that's something that Albertans should be concerned about, Mr. Chair. It's something that we need to be very careful around. They need to know that government policy affects the lives of every single person in this province. We know that when you move rashly and too quickly with these things, it is dangerous. It is something that we see not working across jurisdictions and around the world, and that's something that's very concerning.

I mean, when you look at the American tax cuts again – I'll go back to their federal cuts, Mr. Chair – we can look at the limited impacts on wages and hiring. For example, a Just Capital survey of publicly traded companies found that 6 per cent of companies were increasing their wages and that only 18 per cent were going to create more jobs. I mean, half of those were only through one-time bonuses for those wage increases. That's not anywhere near the projected growth of the tax cut. So when we talk about giving away 4 and a half billion dollars of Albertans' money, that's something we need to be very careful about.

I know that the members of the government have friends and donors who – and I don't want to presume anything, Mr. Chair – they may or may not have promised these types of cuts and who they may or may not have received big support from for these types of cuts, but that is something that we need to take a closer look at, get it under the microscope and say, "Well, if it works, that's perfect," because I believe every single member of this Assembly would vote to reduce it if it worked.

But that's what we'll decide when we see the results in a year. When it comes back to the Assembly, if this amendment were passed, we'd be able to have the discussion and see how it was doing. That's something that the government should be excited to be able to do. They should be excited to be able to say: "Look, our bill worked. We created tens of thousands of new jobs. Let's go out there and show the world." They should be excited to do that and have this debate again in a year and every year after that, Mr. Chair, because this Assembly indeed will continue to meet, as far as I know, in perpetuity and perhaps, hopefully, longer than I will be in existence here in this province, because we know this province will be great for a long time.

Mr. Chair, what I want to see is that as we move forward, we get this right. When you give away 4 and a half billion dollars to the wealthiest 1 per cent and to your friends and donors, I want to make sure we're not putting at risk things like classrooms and hospitals. I want to make sure we're not going to have to gut our communities. I mean, if that is going to be the case, if it is going to increase revenues in some way after giving away 4 and a half billion dollars – I'll point out that the government's own platform actually did not project that they would have net positive revenues for many years – indeed, then, we'd be very happy to support something like this. But I'm concerned that a 4 and a half billion dollar giveaway means thousands of teachers being cut, thousands of nurses being cut. It would mean that we would have simply not enough resources going to the facilities that need it, going to the services that need it, right here for families in our communities.

I think it's very important that we move forward and have these discussions right now. I think it's very important that before we rush through this legislation, we have those discussions. I hope that members of the government benches and perhaps the Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland would agree with me that it is very important that we do have these debates in the Assembly, that it is very important that we do get this right, and that it's very important, Mr. Chair, that we come here to do what we were elected to do. That's to debate legislation, and that's to make sure that the policy is right the first time.

Thank you very much. I encourage members to vote for this amendment.

The Deputy Chair: Are there any other members looking to speak on amendment A1 to Bill 3, Job Creation Tax Cut (Alberta Corporate Tax Amendment) Act? I do believe that I saw the hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday rise, so he has the call.

Mr. Carson: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. It is an honour to rise this morning, bright and early. Happy to be here with all of you. You all look wonderful considering what time it is and how long we've all been here.

Mr. Dang: You always look wonderful.

Mr. Carson: Oh, thank you.

Yes. I'm very happy to rise on this reasoned amendment, of course once again finding the soft spot in the middle. It probably surprises no one that I disagree with the premise of the original bill, which is why, I suppose, I can agree with, once again, finding a middle space that, hopefully, we can all agree on. I think that we were all sent here to be able to reason with each other, to be able to work with each other, and I would love to be able to do that. Of course, I've been reminded several times, or it's been spoken of . . .

The Deputy Chair: I hesitate to interject. I apologize. I just want to be clear that we are discussing an amendment to the clauses of the bill and not a reasoned amendment.

1:10 a.m.

Mr. Carson: Oh. Excuse me. To clarify: that amendment to the clauses of the bill. My apologies.

Let me go back one second here. We are reminded several times in this House every single day that your government has a large mandate, the biggest mandate in Alberta's history, but I don't think that should stop you from being able to find compromise where we can. Of course, when we were elected into government in 2015 under the leadership of Rachel Notley, we were elected on a platform that raised . . .

The Deputy Chair: Excuse me. I apologize for interrupting the hon. member yet again.

Mr. Carson: Oh. Excuse me. I'm off to a great start here, Mr. Chair.

The Deputy Chair: I believe that without even completing the sentence, you know that speaking about other members should probably be along the lines of "the hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona." I believe that was who you were talking about.

Mr. Carson: Yes. That's correct. The Leader of the Official Opposition. My apologies.

Anyway, back to the point here. We were elected on raising corporate income taxes. It was a time when people were very concerned about, I suppose, the value that they were getting, and they felt that corporations should pay a little bit more to cover what we saw as a recession coming. Of course, that was one of the main reasons why an election was called a year early at that point, and citizens were rightly concerned that they wanted to have a government that was going to protect public services. I believe that that was, if not the main reason, one of the main reasons that we were elected into government in 2015.

Now, we come to a point where, of course, an election in 2019 had very different results. People were concerned, rightfully so. Over the last four years the price of oil has crashed, and it has hurt many families, families in my communities and families across the province. They wanted a change of government, and that is fair. That is the will of the people. Of course, not everyone voted in that direction, but many people did. Hence, we are here today.

I think it is fair, this amendment, finding a way to compromise once again. Now, the reason I support this amendment – and I think it's been laid out quite well by many of the members here today – is that we shouldn't move too fast. I have many concerns about what this means, the $4.5 billion that we're going to take out of government coffers and hand over to corporations.

I think there are many other policies that I would prefer to see, one being the interactive digital media tax credit, that our government created over the last four years, another being the Alberta investor tax credit. All these credits give funds to corporations who, for one, can prove that they are creating jobs in Alberta, and I think that's a very important part. When we're talking about across-the-board cuts to corporate taxes, my main concern is: how are we going to prove that that money is staying here?

My other concern is: where is the money going to be spent? Is it going to be invested in the people, or is it going to be invested in things like automation and we'll actually see job losses in many instances? The discussion has been brought up several times this evening and over the course of the debate that stock buybacks were at an all-time high. The corporations in the United States: when President Trump decided to cut corporate taxes, many of those people did not invest those monies back into the people themselves but back into making more money for the stakeholders.

That's their right. I don't have a problem with businesses trying to make money. That is their role, just like the role of the government is, of course, to facilitate the ability for businesses to make money but also to facilitate regulations that protect people and also to make sure that businesses aren't taking advantage of people. I'm not assuming that that's happening in any instance. I have concerns when we talk about lowering the minimum wage, especially for youth, but when we talk about blowing a $4.5 billion hole in the budget, as has been discussed several times over the course of this debate, no one has any real proof that this is going to work.

We've seen studies thrown back and forth from both sides of the House. We saw under the Stephen Harper government that these tax cuts made massive deficits, the largest deficits in Canada's history, I believe, and we really got nothing from it. I would prefer to see some accountability in how we're going to hand over taxpayer dollars. The people of Alberta have given our government the responsibility of investing their money, preferably into public services and not into massive tax cuts for the largest corporations in our province. But that is the will of this government.

Now, I would love to see, as I said, a review of this program to actually prove that the money is staying in our province, that the money is being invested in people and not in automation.

Automation is coming and, really, I hope that we have a discussion. I hope that the government has some plans around automation. That is going to be, besides climate change, one of the biggest market disruptors that we have to get a hold of over the next decade because we are going to see massive job losses. We thought the price of oil differential hurt us. Just wait for automation, because it is going to literally destroy certain industries and certain sectors, or at least the workers that work in those industries are going to see massive job losses. So I would love to see the government with some focus on that as well.

Now, just moving back to the amendment, once again, I think that we can agree that we're not going to agree, but I think that we can disagree without being disagreeable. I think that this amendment, once again, is a way to find some compromise. It doesn't sound like the government will be supporting it, but I hope that they do.

I imagine I will have more time to speak to the main bill and my concerns with giving away large amounts of money to corporations without any kind of understanding of getting something in return. Of course, we've heard unsubstantiated evidence, but we'll wait and see with that. I prefer to see tax credits that are proven to create jobs in our province, that there's an expectation that these corporations have to show their work at the end of the day.

Really, another program that a piece of this money could be invested in is the STEP program, once again, ensuring that students are getting employment, ensuring that the money is being spent where it should be. I hope that the government will support this amendment, and thank you to the Member for Edmonton-City Centre for bringing it forward.

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: I believe I see the hon. Member for Lethbridge-West standing to speak.

Ms Phillips: Yes. Thank you, Mr. Chair. I am very pleased to be at work at this hour, standing up for ordinary people. Indeed, urging some caution on a corporate tax cut of this magnitude, as this amendment proposes, is exactly the right kind of approach that might give some pause for a piece of public policy that comes with very little evidence and, in fact, evidence to the contrary that it would be effective. In fact, it's exactly that that was animating the hon. member moving this amendment forward. I believe he prefaced his comments that there is no way that, certainly, the governing side is going to agree with our position entirely, but what the hon. member was trying to do was ensure some level of deliberation and evidence-based decision-making, which is always a virtue in public policy.

I was curious. I've been following some of the conversation that has gone on in this Chamber at this hour around this amendment. One of the interesting things that I heard the Minister of Transportation talk about was sort of memory lane: let's go back down memory lane to the previous government. Okay. We can do that. Let's go down memory lane. It was that minister who was taking several runs at our economic record on this side. Sure, we can talk about how certain ministers, that is to say him, were the ministers responsible for the sky palace, that he sat around the cabinet table at a time when oil was $100 a barrel, couldn't balance a budget, Mr. Chair, still ran deficits of some consequence, quite serious consequence. Oil was $100 a barrel, and still no balanced budget, nothing coming from that side. That was the government that he served in. That's his economic record and, of course, the sky palace. That's certainly something to brag about.

1:20 a.m.

Mr. Chair, I've also heard a little bit of befuddled commentary about small business. Of course, the small business rate has been lowered by some 30 per cent. That happened in the 2016 budget. That was certainly something I heard from small business and I continue to hear from small business: that was a piece of public policy that did come with quite a bit of evidence that backed that policy, coming as it did as part of the reinvestment and revenue reinvestments of the price on carbon, which was, of course, a piece of public policy that is now prevailing in some 76 international jurisdictions.

The other thing I heard some commentary about was this idea that people on this side of the House are somehow insulting companies, and I found that very interesting as someone who sits in a caucus led by someone who stood on a stage with Canada's largest oil producers to announce a new phase to our approach to being competitive in a carbon-constrained future, in a future where climate change is real. Canada's largest oil producers stood with our government. Then something very strange happened, Mr. Chair. It happened when it was the Wildrose caucus and then it also happened with the new leader, and that is attacks on those very oil companies, those very job creators began to come from the Conservative side, from Conservative quarters, and in particular on Suncor, who employs some 12,500 Albertans – that doesn't include their associated contractors or their ownership stake in Syncrude – and some 10,000 employees at CNRL, who also stood on that stage that day. It was to the point where, you know, the media started to take notice of these attacks, at times quite sharp, quite pointed, at indeed some of Canada's largest employers, that were coming from the now Premier.

It was to the point that during the campaign there was an article by the CBC that indicated that "Alberta's UCP leader . . . says he won't take lessons from 'billionaire' oil CEOs" and that he then took runs at them, saying, "I know that from the comfort of the 40th floor C-suite of an executive office." It's easy to talk about these things, but – you know, these are just companies that are trying to make sure that they retain their competitiveness and are able to actually have a real and substantive conversation with international investors, and in particular institutional investors, who are asking about climate risk. This sort of arrogant "I will call [them] into the Premier's office," he said in this article in April by the CBC. "I'm not going to take lessons from [them]," he also said.

One of the experts that was called on for commentary in this article indicated, quote: having this direct attack against what are major employers, industry leaders, economic drivers strikes me as being inexplicable. The quote goes on: I'm a bit surprised that the leader apparently thinks he doesn't need them or doesn't need to respect them. That's an interesting contrast, Mr. Chair, to some of the professed rhetoric coming from the other side on who's on whose side. You know, I heard the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore talk about how she's grateful for the oil and gas sector, and so am I. This is how we put food on the table in this province, but clearly she diverges from her leader in that regard.

I also heard about better paying jobs as one of the rationales for corporate tax cuts and against taking a more precautionary and measured approach to this particular piece of public policy, and I thought that was interesting, Mr. Chair, because at the same time we are looking at driving down wages through scooping people's overtime or actually, literally taking $2 an hour out of people's pockets.

Then I heard, certainly, people talk about economic growth. Certainly, again, just like my colleague from Edmonton-Rutherford talked about, no one on this side disagrees with that in terms of putting people to work and ensuring that we have a good investment climate in this province, that we are competitive, that we're diversified. Certainly, Alberta led the country in economic growth in 2017 and 2018, Mr. Chair. That's a sort of inconvenient fact, perhaps, for the folks on the other side.

But what's happening this year? Well, the Bank of Canada is forecasting pretty flat growth in Alberta and, in fact, is forecasting a drag on the entire Canadian economy due to the cuts to public services that are happening in the province of Ontario. The Conference Board of Canada isn't projecting a recession, contrary to one of the claims made earlier by the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore, the minister. That was incorrect. For the member's benefit and for the benefit of all members here, a recession is defined as two consecutive quarters of negative GDP growth. That's not where we're at yet. What the Conference Board of Canada actually reported on was that we are moving towards that negative growth because they had downgraded our growth forecast, as the Bank of Canada had.

[Mrs. Pitt in the chair]

The ATB, of course, cut our growth forecast in half recently, Madam Chair. That projection was also made at a time when some of the public policies that had been brought forward by the UCP could have been rolled into these forecasts. But they did not have the rosy view, certainly, of folks behind closed doors who generated the forecasts either for the platform or since. You know, the ATB flagged a number of risks, not the least of which is market access, which obviously is a key risk to the Alberta economy, which is why the line 3 delay again in Minnesota is so concerning.

ATB also put forward some fairly inconvenient facts, and I have to wonder if that was maybe too inconvenient for this government. I have to wonder about, perhaps, the fact that they have not projected robust economic growth in response to these tax cuts that have been proposed, that perhaps they'll take the Minister of Justice's advice, that he ran on, on privatizing 40 per cent of ATB, which I think would be quite a surprise to many members in this House's rural constituents, Madam Chair, and quite problematic for a number of rural communities where the ATB remains the only banking option or one of the only banking options and a very important one for rural development and growth.

So, you know, I hope that the government rejects the Minister of Justice's advice that we privatize ATB, just as the Minister of Justice rejected the now Premier's views on LGBT rights during the leadership race. They disagreed sharply.

Back to some of the evidence around these very Trump-style tax cuts that are being proposed. One of the reasons why the hon. member brought forward the amendment as he has, to urge some caution, is because the level of tax cuts is very similar to what we saw south of the border brought in by Mr. Trump. It certainly mirrors some of the sort of right-wing populist authoritarianism that is sweeping through western Europe and parts of the United States and, indeed, even parts of Asia at this point. We are seeing some of this sort of very radicalized, authoritarian politics take hold in the wake of Mr. Trump's victory, one that I know was celebrated by at least some of the members on the other side.

1:30 a.m.

You know, let's look at what happened after that very radical policy, brought forward by a very radical administration – this is an administration that certainly would make George W. Bush blush in terms of some of its extremely right-spectrum, authoritarian policies. The Congressional Research Service just put out a report very recently. This is one that we haven't talked about yet. Essentially, what they found was that annual growth was 2.9 per cent in the year since the Trump tax cuts, which was the same as 2015, which was below the Congressional Budget Office forecast, that there have been $1 trillion in stock buybacks. We've had this conversation about stock buybacks. Stock buybacks are a legitimate tool that many corporations, quite large ones, use. In this case, though, what it was used to do was to concentrate wealth in fewer and fewer hands.

Was there growth in wages? This was certainly the marketing technique at the time. This was how the policy was sold, and indeed it is how these economic growth forecasts and wage forecasts are the ways that the policy is being sold in this province, a very similar, Trump-like policy. Did that happen? Well, no. Wage growth was about 1.29 per cent, so essentially flat. The Congressional Research Service indicates that it is the same as it would have been otherwise.

Now, the policy itself generated 5 per cent or less, it is estimated, of the growth needed to offset the revenue loss. This is, again, one of the marketing techniques, one of the PR claims, one of the fact-free claims coming from the Trump administration, that has been peddled heavily by the government side as well. You know, it is up to them whether they want to copy the techniques and the use of truth and reason and facts and science that we see south of the border, if they want to replicate some of those attacks on our institutions, on our shared values, on what we know and what we know to be true. Certainly, they have not happened in the largest economy in the world, the claims around tax cuts that were made. What we have seen is a redistribution of wealth upwards, Madam Chair, and everyone else saw a pittance.

Now, I've heard as well a number of people cite the economist Bev Dahlby, which is interesting because Mr. Dahlby also authored a paper entitled 10 myths about carbon pricing, in support, a full-throated defence, if you will, Madam Chair, of carbon pricing, issued or authored by the same person who is now providing advice to the Minister of Finance and Executive Council and, I'm going to presume, all of government caucus on this matter of the overall fiscal picture. You know, some of the myths that Mr. Dahlby talks about are around jobs, wages, and that carbon pricing doesn't actually reduce emissions, all of these things I've heard from the other side. I think in this case perhaps they should listen to the expert that they are citing.

I've also heard them cite Jack Mintz. You know, I thought it was really interesting that Mr. Mintz was not on the blue-ribbon panel – I wonder if it has something to do with his full-throated endorsement of a PST – because Jack Mintz gets quoted all the time, but he didn't get to be on the blue-ribbon panel. I have to wonder if it's because he wanted to tie it up in a blue-ribbon PST, and that was a little bit too politically radioactive for the Premier's office.

Anyway, of course, Mr. Mintz is the source of the 55,000 jobs claim, which we don't see embedded in any other forecasts. Certainly, we don't see the evidence yet that any of that is happening. In fact, we've seen a number of indicators that things are getting worse, not better, since the election. We certainly don't see the levels of growth that we saw under our government in 2017 and 2018, when we led the country in economic growth, to review.

Now, it is true that the now Premier did campaign on a massive tax cut for the already wealthy. Absolutely. But where he wasn't as straight was on the consequences of that, and there was no quarter given to anyone who might suggest that health care, education, seniors' care, child care, any of these important services might be at risk. Oh, no, no, no. But we are already seeing that this is going to be the case, that there is no magic in a budget, and when one cuts revenue, then one must take action on the expenditures side as well.

What this means for communities is that if they do need new schools, they will not get them. If there are new students entering grade 1, they will not have a new teacher. Communities like mine, that need to replace a 60-year-old bridge, may be out of luck. I don't know. For communities like mine, where there's a $10 million new investment in a new assisted living facility over on the west side, the first one on the west side of Lethbridge, it may not happen. It may not. Increases to FCSS that are desperately needed by the city of Lethbridge may not happen. Any of the programs that support the arts: the arts is an incredibly important sector in Lethbridge. Lots of roots musicians, country musicians live there, even moved there in order to live there. Certainly, my riding is in need of new schools, Madam Chair.

That is why one might urge caution in order to find ways to pay . . .

The Chair: The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Madam Chair, for the opportunity to speak on this amendment to Bill 3, as brought forward by the Member for Edmonton-City Centre. I was quite encouraged, really, to see this amendment, you know, in the spirit of looking for a practical compromise in order to do its best for Albertans. It's standard operating procedure to look for amendments to government bills. I think that the Member for Edmonton-City Centre has captured the spirit of compromise quite effectively here with this amendment. I should be interested in considering to support it with some constructively critical analysis.

I think that what we do here in the Legislature is to look for ways by which we can help to backstop and support the economy and to provide regulation and stimulation for economic growth. Certainly, the tax rate is an important mechanism by which we can help to achieve that, but it's a very powerful, Madam Chair, mechanism as well, so you have to be very careful in how you use it. Certainly, adjustments, small adjustments up or down, in taxation rates are a normal course of action. What is not a normal course of action is to swing it around wildly, with massive changes either up or down in the tax rate, that can have serious consequences for planning and for the money supply, quite frankly, in an economy.

When we've seen other jurisdictions around the world make substantial and swift reductions to corporate income tax, it creates a very volatile situation, where quite literally, as in the United States, for example, you have billions of dollars that end up getting stranded or, you know, sort of taken out of the economy, quite frankly, because a corporation is not a person. A corporation is a system designed to maximize profits for shareholders. I mean, we don't fault that unto itself, but you have to make sure that you are providing reasonable limitations on that, especially when corporations are very large.

The proposal by the government in terms of Bill 3 and the very large tax reduction that they are suggesting, I would suggest, is irresponsible. It's getting a very mixed reaction from economists and, I dare say, not a particularly enthusiastic endorsement even from our largest corporations that function here in the province of Alberta. Of course, the backbone of our economy is the energy industry and energy corporations that are functioning here. You know, I must say that over the last four years, working closely with the largest corporations, they have demonstrated a high degree of responsibility and forward thinking, with an eye to responsible development of our hydrocarbon industry and looking for ways by which we can diversify that economy, too. When you're on the edge of the cusp of the need for diversification, it's very important to consult and interact with energy corporations – they're interested in diversifying as well, right? – but simply just dropping something like this Bill 3 onto the table demonstrates a singular lack of analysis and thought that I think Alberta needs at this point in time.

What we saw over the last number of years was that through careful incentives for diversifying, let's say, the renewable energy industry, we jumped ahead to become North American leaders in renewable energy. I mean, this wasn't done with a massive tax cut: drop it on the table, walk away, and say: here you go. It was done with careful consultation and interaction to nurture renewable energy. You know, it's almost like an action, sort of a direct opposite, when you look at the attempt to encourage economic stimulation with this bill compared to the way by which we managed to nurture and encourage renewable energy, right? The two things could not be further apart.

As well, I think that when we talk about job creation, we have to ensure that, you know, we are playing for the long game. It has to be sustainable over time. I can see or foresee in the way that this bill is written, without amendment, that it's very easy for the government to move backwards on the promises to make these massive cuts from year to year, such that the analysts in a given corporation will know, probably reading between the lines, that this bill is more for show than it is for substance. If the intention of the very substantial tax cuts for corporations here is to attract businesses from other jurisdictions to move here, then, I mean, again, Bill 3 does not provide the assurance that this is a long-term, substantial thing that can be counted on for a business to move here and stay here.

Madam Chair, I think that this amendment at least sort of tempers the magnitude of the tax cut, and I'm very interested to see how that might go. I'm interested to see how other members in the House might be responsive to it, thinking about it. We certainly have lots of time to think about it; we're not going anywhere. I guess what I would suggest is that we take a look at the full breadth of our economy, and part of that economy is the services for which the provincial government is responsible. You know, let's remind ourselves that, let's say, health care is not just an essential service. It is not just something that we count on for us and our families, that it's there when we need it; it is also a mechanism by which we can provide economic stimulus.

Education: same thing. In the vast majority of municipal districts outside of urban areas the education system is the number one employer. So it educates kids, provides an essential public service, provides surety and certainty and all of the other things that education does – order and so forth, a place for kids to go and learn – and it also is a big economic driver. In a place, let's say, like Parkland county, for sure the school system is the number one employer and was a very important backstop for families that might have had job losses due to the economic downturn and the downturn in the price of oil. So if you had someone that might have worked in the oil patch losing their job or getting reduced hours but another family member having a job in the school system, maybe a teacher or bus driver or custodian, then that provided the security for that family to see them through the tough times.

Why am I saying this, Madam Chair? Because if you take 4 and a half billion dollars out of this provincial budget, you have absolutely no recourse but to cut those essential public services. If anyone suggests otherwise, they are simply being dishonest or delusional or thinking in a muddled sort of way. There's no way on earth that you can take 4 and a half billion dollars out of the global budget for the province of Alberta and not expect to see substantial cuts to education, health care, social services, infrastructure; all of the things that this government is responsible for. Bill 3 talks about corporate tax cuts, but written between each and every line is this idea that we take from one place and give to another. We give to corporations 4 and a half billion dollars essentially, and we take that from the public interest.

I've heard some members this evening talking about: well, you know, corporations have shareholders and we're all shareholders and the money gets stimulated back into the economy. Well, it doesn't quite work that way, Madam Chair, because corporations are very fluid. One of the designs of a large corporation is that they have interests and shareholders all over the world. Often the participants in a corporation, the shareholders and so forth, you know, may not even reside in the province of Alberta. So you take, essentially, public money or the responsibility for that public money, which would have otherwise been spent on public services that benefit the province of Alberta and the people of Alberta – you take it and liquefy it and put it into a big tax cut for corporations, and off she goes to the four winds, right? You lose control over that asset.

You know, I think that when you boil down the essence of who we are as Members of the Legislative Assembly – right? – that is an abdication of the basic responsibility that we have to the people who elected us to these places, taking that public interest, taking the essence of our responsibility and giving it away and just hoping for the best; hoping for the best but, I would suggest, expecting something less than that.

1:50 a.m.

You know, as I said before, I believe that Bill 3 is more of a way by which to demonstrate, I guess, bold action – right? – as part of the campaign. But the campaign is over, Madam Chair. The campaign is over, and now we get down to the business of governing. When we get down to that business of governing, you toss away hyperbole, and you toss away, you know, perhaps the heat of the moment in an election that happens over a 28-day period. You know, it's moving fast and furious and so forth. Then the dust settles, and you start making responsible decisions, right?

I would suggest that one place to start is to take a long, hard look at Bill 3 in a realistic way and realize that it's too far, too much. It has built-in irresponsible elements to it, and like I say, it is like an abdication of the responsibility which we have assigned ourselves through running and serving and representing the people of Alberta.

Thanks to the Member for Edmonton-City Centre for putting in a reasonable amendment – right? – a modest proposal that I am feeling good about. I suggest that other members might join me in endorsing this amendment, perhaps speaking on it. Maybe we will get a few more, you know, sets of eyes and discussion about it, but I, for one, would suggest that I could support this amendment as brought forward.

Thank you.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'm pleased to rise to speak to the amendment to Bill 3, Job Creation Tax Cut (Alberta Corporate Tax Amendment) Act. I must say to the House that I've been watching with much interest the debate as it's progressed throughout the day today. I have to say that I've been encouraged by the fact that we're actually having this debate here in this Legislature. What we're having is something that I've hoped to hear in this province for most of my life. I've lived through various forms of conservative governments for practically 60 years, and I've heard various incantations or forms of supply-side economics being invoked by different governments, of course, by successive Social Credit governments and then in '71 by the Progressive Conservatives when they took over.

Basically we've had conservative governments for all of my life in this province except for the four years when we had that breath of fresh air with us and our NDP government, now the Official Opposition, but we're still fighting the good fight and bringing to bear this really interesting clash of ideas that I think will characterize this 30th Legislature for some time to come. It's a healthy clash of ideas, and I don't think we should suggest for a moment that this clash of ideas is something that we won't benefit from as a province and as a society because the healthy debate and real consideration of each other's views is something that can generate, hopefully, a better informed electorate and one that makes really good decisions. I don't know if, in fact, over the last 60 years of my life in this province, the electorate has had the benefit of the best information to make the decisions that they had to make when faced with each successive election.

I know that we've had successive conservative governments suggest that supply-side, or Austrian, economics, or Reaganomics, or trickle-down theory, or unregulated economics in one form or another were the antidote to anything that ailed us economically over the years regardless of what the circumstances might have been. In fact, they've all been discredited and continue to be discredited now as many speakers before me have so eloquently talked to in great detail.

I won't rehash that, but I will suggest that it reminds me a little bit of the advice that was given to my father – his name was Walter – who was a construction superintendent. He worked really hard, but he smoked like a chimney. He smoked three packs a day. He did finally have a heart attack at about age 62. It took him for a bit of a loop, but he hadn't quit smoking yet. When talking to his doctor – he wasn't a man who saw a doctor all that often, but after his heart attack he did. The thing that got him to quit smoking after he'd been convinced for so long that it wasn't an unhealthy thing to do was that the doctor said: Walter, giving you a pack of cigarettes at this point in your life would be like throwing a brick to a drowning man. That formal statement given to him by his cardiologist is what got him to quit smoking.

The reason I bring up that story is because it seems as though the continual resort to supply-side economics, or Reaganomics, trickle-down theories that successive conservative governments in Alberta continually come to as an answer to our economic ills, is tantamount to throwing a brick to a drowning man because, really, they are doing nothing to help the situation. The demand-side economic theories, which we espouse, characterized by a number of speakers on this side of the House, is something that is a different kettle of fish. I look forward to the debate over the next three, four years and the detail that we can get into in informing our public, the ones that we serve, as to the various, as we see them, benefits of either side of that economic coin.

So I don't disparage the debate we're having here today. I'm glad that we're doing it. It's something that this province should have had for many, many years in great detail, and we're going to be able to afford ourselves an opportunity to really involve a lot more people, particularly young people, I hope, as well as current economists who seem to be holding sway, to challenge each other's ideas and come up with something that Albertans can agree upon as a set of facts that show the way forward. I believe that demand-side economics, or Keynesian, if you would have it, is the way to go, where you do countercyclical spending, where you don't see taking on some debt in a downturn as a necessarily evil thing. Everything within reason.

We were very pragmatic in our application of demand-side economics over the four-year term that we had. We didn't accomplish all we wanted in that period of time, but I think that Albertans, many of them, felt we were on the right track. We're going to continue to let people know what our goals were and also let people know how we feel this government is on the wrong path by following the supply-side, or Austrian, economic theory.

What we're ending up with as a result of this austerity is a $4.5 billion hole in our budget, and it's going to be paid for by cuts to public services and public spending. I think there's a generation of people here in the province who really don't quite get it. I mean, if you lived through the Klein era, Madam Chair, and understood what the effects of this type of budget austerity really were, you might think twice about entering into phase 2 of the Klein era. I'm quite worried about what effects we're going to see.

In my own constituency I'm wondering about some of the expenditures that people were hoping to see. I know that the Misericordia emergency ward is slated to be rebuilt, renewed, a new one built. That was in the hopper, and people were anticipating the design and planning as well down the road. However, now people are wondering: is that going to happen? Is this government going to pull the rug out from underneath those constituents who are really going to be suffering if they don't have that upgrade to the emergency ward in a hospital that has even further need beyond the renewing of the emergency ward? So I'm certainly going to be monitoring that, and I can tell you for sure that the constituents of Edmonton-McClung are going to be up and seriously angry if that emergency ward is delayed or taken off the books.

2:00 a.m.

The same thing with the widening of the southwest leg of the Anthony Henday: there's a huge backlog of traffic every morning and every evening, both rush hours, on the Henday because there's congestion. The congestion is caused by a lack of capacity, and the extra lanes that have to be added in order to deal with that problem are something that I wonder if the Minister of Transportation is considering cutting from his budget to meet his 4 and a half billion dollar required offset.

Another thing: schools in my constituency, whether or not we may see a school built to serve the francophone school board le Conseil scolaire du Nord-Ouest. Il voudrait construire une école là pour servir la communauté francophone, qui voudrait étendre la capacité pour enseigner les étudiants francophones dans l'ouest d'Edmonton. I'm hoping that that school gets built in west Edmonton so that those students may actually continue to grade 12 and beyond in their French education without having to face the prospect of dropping out, losing all the education that they've had in French up to that grade 9 level because they can't conveniently go to a school that is in west Edmonton and follows the transportation routes that allow them to conveniently get to that school.

A lot of infrastructure spending, a lot of upgrades that are on the table right now that are in the planning stage are at risk, and it's an open question. It creates a lot of uncertainty in the minds of constituents who thought they had things finally coming that they've been hoping for a long time, that were needed for a long time, such as the Misericordia emergency department renewal, such as the widening of the Edmonton southwest Henday, such as the school for le Conseil scolaire du Nord-Ouest, which operates 19 francophone schools in Alberta. All these things in my constituency alone are compounded when you look at constituencies throughout the province who anticipated, under our government, finally seeing an unlocking of their wish list and having things actually constructed that they have been demanding and asking for for decades. That perhaps will go up in smoke.

Unlike the life of my father after he got warned by the doctor that throwing him a pack of cigarettes would be tantamount to throwing a brick to a drowning man, we should be doing more than throwing bricks in the boat of the Alberta economy and asking that they actually be given a real life preserver to ensure that the services and public infrastructure that are needed, that they've been starved of for so many decades, actually get built and serve the public in the way that they deserve to be served by a government who cares about them as people and cares, certainly, about the economic system but that doesn't see the economic system as the priority, that sees the outcome and how that system serves people as the real priority.

At this hour, I think that I will probably let that suffice for my remarks and let others who wish to continue say what they have to say because I know that it's all important for us to contribute to this debate. As I said, it's something that's going to be revisited, quite happily so, over the next four years. We look forward to contributing continuously to inform the Alberta public as to the very, very distinct arguments that we have on both sides of the House. The nice thing about this Legislature is that we have such a distinct duality here, where there's a real clash of ideas. We look to flesh that out very, very deeply over the next four years so that when the next election comes along, there's certainly going to be a much higher, detailed level of rhetoric and, I think, a really sound understanding.

Let's hope that we capture the interest of the younger people in the province, those who are first studying, in grade 6, the government and civics courses, who visit here and get their pictures taken with us in the Legislature, who used to be introduced by us in the Legislature, who used to have the opportunity to connect with their MLA . . .

Ms Hoffman: You're exactly right.

Mr. Dach: Yeah. Exactly.

You know, those kinds of things are being lost. I mean, those students and the ones who later on in high school start talking about, in their social studies classes, the more political and policy-oriented subjects: hopefully, those students' imaginations are captured by a real debate going on and we talk about the theories that we're actually delving into rather than basically throwing ideological time bombs at each other. Let's have an intelligent debate about the pros and cons of either side of this coin. I believe that we have the better argument. Over time we'll prove that, and certainly you'll make every effort to prove your side.

I certainly hope we don't delve into the mudslinging and talking about one person's — well, there were some names that were called this afternoon that were unfortunate, and that's the kind of thing that we don't need to get into. I mean, I've been around long enough to have heard all kinds of conservative arguments, for almost 60 years. It's a breath of fresh air, to me, to have the opportunity to stand in this House, after first running four times to be elected and then the fifth time finally serving as government, now in opposition, espousing these arguments that I've been screaming in my own brain against Conservative governments for successive decades and now they get to hear and see the light of day, and hopefully influence a generation of young people to really think about who they vote for.

I know that there are a lot of people, especially those, say, for example, who are 15 to 18 years of age, who are looking at having the diploma exams count as 50 per cent of their mark in grade 12.

Believe me, that's a touchstone issue. They are ticked. They think it's absolutely, totally unfair, and those people are going to be the type of people that I want to touch with arguments here today because they're thinking out loud. They're thinking to make sure that this government knows how they feel. I'll tell you what: they're not feeling too warm and fuzzy about you right now, not if you're in grade 12 and thinking about having your 50 per cent diploma exam cause you all kinds of stress rather than having it at 30 per cent, the way it was before. So there's that issue, and there are other issues – climate change, the environment – that they're very, very sensitive about.

The Chair: Hon. member.

Mr. Dach: Believe me, we're looking to cultivate that . . .

The Chair: Hon. member.

Mr. Dach: . . . Madam Chair, to engage those young people . . .

The Chair: Can you please speak to the amendment and not all of the other things that happened during the election?

Mr. Dach: The amendment, that's what you're talking about? The amendment serves no purpose, Madam Chair . . .

The Chair: It's your amendment.

Mr. Dach: . . . insofar as how younger people will react to this government.

But, certainly for today's debate this amendment is not something that I can support. I'll tell you what, as a final tribute I would suggest that this brick should be thrown to no drowning man.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Madam Chair. It is always a pleasure to be with you at this hour and to be able to see you here in this Chamber so that we may move forward and do the important business of governance and debate here. I mean, I think this is a really important amendment from the Member for Edmonton-City Centre. I've already spoken a little bit about it today or perhaps yesterday; it's a little bit hard to keep track at this hour. I think we need to accept the amendment so we can pump the brakes just a little bit on this bill.

I mean, the Member for Edmonton-McClung spoke a little bit about some of the projects that are going on across the province. One of the things that I'm very interested in, Madam Chair, is looking at the impact of what fully implementing this bill without really thinking about the consequences, without really looking at the full impact would do, because it's a 4 and a half billion dollar giveaway to their friends and donors. I mean, that's something that's very concerning because we saw, as I mentioned already tonight, that in other jurisdictions it hasn't created the jobs that were promised, and it hasn't done those things.

2:10 a.m.

When we look at the type of giveaway the government is talking about, when we look at 4 and a half billion dollars just being given as a gift to their friends and donors, Madam Chair, I think that's something that's very concerning because 4 and a half billion dollars, indeed, would actually pay for an entire new hospital, perhaps a new hospital in south Edmonton that already has been funded for design. I think that's something that Albertans and Edmontonians would be very interested in and may be a better use of funds than giving away frivolous gifts. I mean, if it does bring the jobs that the government proposes it will and has said that it shall, then I'd be very excited to see that money reinvested in building important infrastructure like hospitals and schools.

Unfortunately, we've seen, through things like the Kansas experiment, through things like how the United States currently is doing big corporate tax cuts, that when you give away billions and billions of dollars to your friends and donors, it doesn't result in more jobs. In fact, it can result and often results in a decrease in jobs, job cuts. We saw AT&T in the United States cut 23,000 jobs. That's something that we should be very concerned about because if 23,000 jobs were cut because of that here in Alberta, it would be something that I'd be very worried about and I know you would be very worried about, Madam Chair.

I mean, really, when we look at this tax cut, it's something that we need to be careful about. We need to pump the brakes and say: we should bring this back, we should do it incrementally, and we should be proud to be able to have the opportunity to debate it here in the Chamber, over and over again, every single year because taxes and bills and legislation are something that we were sent here to debate, that we as MLAs were sent here to have the opportunity to talk about. We are also privileged to be able to be here and have that opportunity to speak about how important this legislation is for all Albertans and how important it is that we get it right the very first time because if we get it wrong right now, this will have an impact for years to come, Madam Chair.

When you give away 4 and a half billion dollars, it has impacts that you couldn't even imagine. We can see what happened in British Columbia when, in 2011, they decreased corporate taxes by 6 and a half per cent. I mean, politicians, the conservatives over there, said that it would pay for itself, but in the end it ended up costing almost $8 billion to $10 billion. Madam Chair, I know you don't like to throw away money, and $8 billion to $10 billion is quite a bit.

During that same time frame, when they reduced those corporate taxes 6 and a half per cent, the province's debt load doubled. It actually doubled the debt of the province. I know that members of the Conservative government here, the front bench and the backbench, indeed have spoken at quite a bit of length about how important it is that we tackle the debt. So when we're seeing other jurisdictions, indeed our neighbours just to the west, trying the same risky ideological experiment, actually failing, and not just failing a little bit but failing quite substantially, I'm really concerned about why we'd move forward so quickly on this ideology, why we'd move forward so quickly on this risky ideology. It's something that I think members of the Conservatives should be very concerned about. They should be concerned about increasing the debt load through this risky experiment.

I mean, we saw that in British Columbia, when the same type of tax cut was introduced, it actually resulted in out-of-pocket user fees for public services rising substantially. It meant that residential care fees for seniors went up. It meant that fees for people with disabilities went up. It meant that university and college tuition went up. Park use permits went up. Madam Chair, those are all things that affect families in our communities, that affect our constituents. Our constituents shouldn't have to pay for a wealthy corporate giveaway to the government's friends and donors.

I think it's something that we should be very concerned about here in this Assembly. It's something that we should pump the brakes on and take a look and say: let's re-evaluate and see if it works, because if we just start with a little bit and we don't jump headfirst, we'll be able to decide if it's working in a year or so. That would allow us to say, “Oh, it’s created X number of jobs” or “Oh, it hasn’t created X number of jobs.” Either of those are realistic scenarios based on what we’ve seen in other jurisdictions, based on what we’ve seen across this country and in other countries.

Madam Chair, it’s become very clear that this risky ideological experiment the Conservatives are committed to moving forward with, this risky ideology that they want to push forward without any consultation, is something that could very well have unexpected economic impacts. It could have economic impacts that could very well damage our communities and could damage the lives of our families right here in Alberta, and I think that’s something that members should be very concerned about tonight. It is something where members should admit: “Let’s take this one step at a time. It doesn’t need to be all in one omnibus bill. It doesn’t need to be all at once. We can take this one step at a time, and we can come back and discuss how well it worked or how well it didn’t work.” That’s something that I think we should take the opportunity to do.

Again, Madam Chair, we are so privileged to be able to be in this Assembly, to have been sent here by our constituents. We should relish the opportunity to defend our values and defend our legislation at every single opportunity. But it looks like the government would rather rush it through all at once and not have that opportunity to re-evaluate their legislation. They don’t want to have that opportunity to go on and say: did it work? They just want to force it down the throats of Albertans, and I think that’s very concerning.

I think it’s very concerning that we’re not able to just take a look objectively and say: will this work for us? I mean, we can see and do the research and say: it hasn’t worked federally under the Harper government. I know the Premier is very fond of implementing things that didn’t work under the Harper government, Madam Chair, but that’s okay. We can see that it hasn’t worked under the Trump presidency. We can see that it didn’t work in the Kansas experiment. We can see that it didn’t work in so many of the scenarios.

If we’re going to move forward with this risky ideology right here at home, I want to make sure that we get it right, Madam Chair. I want to make sure that the members have the opportunity to re-evaluate this experiment, because you never jump headfirst without first testing the waters. It’s something that we want to make sure we get right. It’s something where we want to make sure that we don’t create situations where there’s dead money. I mean, it’s something that we need to understand before we move forward, before we push ahead and without any consultation, without any reviews, without any thought. Before we give this big 4 and a half billion dollar giveaway to friends and donors, we need to make sure that we get it right. We need to make sure that it’s working and having the impact that it’s supposed to have.

It’s something that I think is very important. When we talk about impacts, the job impacts that the government keeps saying that it’s going to have, the proposed jobs that it’ll create, I want to make sure that we get that. If we don’t have the opportunity to slow down a little bit, if we don’t have the opportunity to re-evaluate this, it’s going to mean that we don’t have the ability to make changes as we need to. When we’re playing with people’s lives – and, Madam Chair, that’s what the government is trying to do; they’re trying to play games with people’s lives here – it’s something that’s very concerning, that we’re not taking the time to get it right, that we’re not taking the time to re-evaluate things as they happen.

We know, Madam Chair, again, that this side of the House spent four years on that side. You need to be very dynamic when you’re in government. You need to be able to make changes. You need to be able to make updates to your ideas. That’s something that’s very important, because as you move forward, things don’t always work out the way you expected. I’ll be the first to admit that that happened many times while our caucus here was in government, that things didn’t quite work out the way we expected them to. But that’s okay because that’s a part of governing.

I mean, the election is over, Madam Chair. What we are trying to do now is that we are trying to make sure we have strong, good governance for all Albertans, and to do that, we just need to slow this bill down. We have to look at making sure that it works first and then move forward and say: “All right. So it’s worked. Do we want to keep pushing? Do we think we’ve pushed as hard as we can or as far as we can? Do we need to go further or not so much?” Those are all really important questions. Those are all really important questions that we should debate here in this Assembly after we’ve seen some preliminary results, after we’ve seen whether this big 4 and a half billion dollar giveaway to friends and donors of the Conservatives is going to work or not. I mean, it’s something where, if it does work, I will applaud the government.

But, Madam Chair, I’m very concerned that they want to give out this giveaway, that they want to give out this corporate subsidy, that they want to give out this corporate welfare without first evaluating the impacts. I think the amendment proposed by my hon. colleague from Edmonton-City Centre really does try to address this. It really does try to address how important it is that we slow down, that we look at the impact. Then, of course, it’s the government’s prerogative to bring a second bill again next year, once we’ve seen what happens, to be able to come back and say, “Oh, we can continue to make changes” or “We want to stop changes or reverse changes.” That would be the government’s prerogative. I think it’s very important that the government has that opportunity to bring it back to this House, because we were all sent here by our constituents to make sure we get the legislation right. We were all sent here to make sure that we do our jobs and debate our bills, and it’s something that I’m very concerned about.

I mean, again I want to go back to the Kansas experiment. The state budget office’s analysis suggested that that tax cut led to a budget shortfall of almost 2 and a half billion dollars. Madam Chair, I don’t know about you, but 2 and a half billion dollars sounds to me like a lot of schools, a lot of playgrounds, a lot of nurses and teachers. That’s what I’m worried about. I’m worried that if we move too quickly, we’re going to put essential public services at risk. We’re going to implement this risky ideology, this risky experiment, that has been shown in other jurisdictions to not work, without having some stops to make sure that we’re not going too far. When we go out and do these risky ideological experiments, when we go out and push forward with our ideology, we need to be prepared to understand that consequences are real, that there are going to be changes that we can’t control. That’s something that I’m very concerned about. I think we need to be very careful and make sure that that risky ideology does not hurt ordinary Albertans like you and me. We need to make sure that that risky ideology does not go out and harm families in our communities.

I know that I was sent here by those families to make sure we stood up for them, and that’s why we want to see the effects before we give a parade for this bill. It’s something that’s very important that we get right the first time. That’s why you have to be dynamic, that’s why you have to be willing to make changes, and that’s why we need to slow this down so that we implement it incrementally. We have one step now, and then we bring it back to the House. We debate that change again. It’s very important that we move forward and that we have that plan in place.

Of course, Madam Chair, you know as well as I do – and perhaps you know better than I do – that we'll be back here again in the fall. We'll be back here again, hopefully, next spring as well. Every single time we come back here, the government has the opportunity to bring legislation, and that legislation could very well move forward with these tax decreases that have been struck out by the amendment. If they did, it would be able to be considered after we saw the initial impacts of this tax decrease, the initial impact of this big 4 and a half billion dollar tax giveaway to the wealthiest corporations.

The initial impact: it's very, very important that we study it closely. When we look at the impacts in other jurisdictions, whether they're in Canada, whether they're in the United States, whether they're across the world, Madam Chair, we've seen that time and time again the risky Conservative ideology, the risky, ideological experiment has not worked. It doesn't get the results.

But it might here, Madam Chair, and of course the government has the prerogative to attempt that here, to play games with Alberta's economy and families' lives. They have the right as the government to implement their risky, ideological agenda on our families. That's the government's prerogative. If they wish to do that, I mean, of course they can, but we would like to say that we want to slow down and that we want to make sure we're evaluating what you're doing to families. We want to evaluate what the government is implementing. We want to evaluate how the government is performing.

I think that we as legislators, we as MLAs, sent here by our constituents, should be excited to be able to be evaluated by our communities. We should be excited to be able to take our legislation back and look at it and say: did it work? Now, the government, it seems, isn't going to be willing to do that. The government is not willing to have their legislation put under the microscope, and I think that's something that's very disappointing. I think it's something that's not conducive to the productive work of this House. It's not conducive to our democracy here in this House, Madam Chair, and that's too bad. I mean, it's something that I think we need to re-evaluate. We need to stop and say: is it fair that our Assembly won't have the opportunity to review the legislation again and again as we move forward with this risky, ideological experiment? If the government chooses not to, then, again, that's the government's prerogative.

But once again, Madam Chair, I want to make it very clear for every single member in this House: this risky, ideological experiment has failed time and time again. It has not succeeded, and I'm concerned that it won't succeed here in Alberta. If it does, I'd be happy to applaud the government on that, but we should have the opportunity to make sure that when risky ideologies are playing games with Albertans' families' lives, we have the opportunity to review that.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I just want to say to the Member for Edmonton-South: wow, you totally convinced me; I'm going to vote for this amendment now. Halfway through I was thinking I was going to change my mind, right?

Madam Chair, if you will indulge me, I'm going to do something that's a little bit unconventional, perhaps, for this House, not normally done. So I want to ask you to please bear with me for my time. I do promise you that I will bring it back to the amendment. I will bring it back to the amendment. I'm just asking you for a little bit of indulgence as I share something with the people of the House.

I just want to preamble this by saying that the way that we share with one another in the House is, of course, by talking about our values – talking about our values – sharing what we believe to be the way that we look at the world. Based on that, we support a particular ideology, and we support a particular way of helping people, working with people, doing things so that we decide on the policies that we want to move forward.

Some of you in this House may know that in my previous life I used to be a hip hop artist. Some puzzled looks looking my way. They're, like: "Oh, my goodness. Okay." One of the pieces that I wrote that really exemplifies the values that I hold as a human being was a piece that I wrote to my son when he was born, and I want to share that with all of you tonight. So please indulge me, Madam Chair.

This piece is called Daddy Loves You.

It seems like just yesterday your mama told me that you were on your way.

My eyes welled up, tongue-tied with nothing to say.

But mama knows that I was waiting for you every day.

I couldn't wait to be a father and bring you up in the culture of our people, teaching you about treating everyone as equals no matter what their orientation.

I thought about passing on my foundation that my father taught me, growing up in a foreign place as a refugee.

All these things began to cross my mind as I worked every day, slave to the grind, and I finally felt like I had hope.

The days passed, and I began to cope, looking forward to the future.

I didn't care if I was running upslope because now I had your mother and you to keep my heart from falling apart on the days that it was too hard.

The days passed, and soon you were on your way.

I kept praying to God that everything would be okay.

And it was the happiest day of my life to see you born 9:05 on April 20, and I knew that it was the beginning of a beautiful relationship.

I imagine you as a young boy now, brushing the sweat from your brow on a warm summer's day, coming home from school on a Monday, telling me everything that you learned from the library books that you returned because you know that education doesn't stop in the class and that every day you must surpass the level that you reached in the past

no matter what the subject, including respect and how to protect your mother, your baby cousins, and your brothers.

Because by this time you know that life isn't fair and that there are people that don't share when it comes to knowledge or wealth and that health isn't just about the body, but it's about the mind, too, and that you can control what you do, that you could do anything that you want to because we all have the power to respond positively or negatively to the things that we see and keep us from reaching our dreams no matter how far out they seem.

I may not make it to the day that you reach 20, so here are some words, contemplate them plenty like the words of Tommy Douglas or Daniel Viglietti.

Son, you and I are part of a history, and your people have worked strategically to make it to the place in time where we are.

Your life is more than just about you. It's about our culture and what's true, like that every single person needs to be free, live life in complete liberty, and that's the reason I struggle, we struggle. Put the pieces together like a puzzle, because we're almost there, and never despair, and keep educating your mind and be aware.

But, most importantly, raise a family because we need people to become soldiers for the army of life. It's just because a group of people who live without thought believe that freedom comes from the things that they bought.

It's not that they're evil; they just don't know no better. But it's up to you to save this world, because if not you, then who?

That's the message that was passed on to me, and now I pass it on to you so that you can see that every single living thing in this world is connected and needs to be respected.

Don't ask me what's to be expected because I'm still fighting the struggle, and I don't know how to win, but I know that it starts from within and that if we do this, you and I will be known men to the people in our lives that love us dearly.

And this is my letter to you.

Sincerely, your father.

2:30 a.m.

Thank you for indulging me, Madam Chair. The reason why I shared that is because it shares all the values that I believe in, the principles, the ideas. I'll be the first one to tell you that I continue to be an idealist. I mean, you've got to be an idealist when you support the kind of ideology that I do, but you see in the underlying part of that ideology – I think that this is where we all agree, and I'll tell you this. One thing I want to share with you guys, especially you guys from rural areas, because I imagine that some of you like listening to country music . . .

An Hon. Member: Heavy metal, bro.

Member Loyola: Heavy metal? Okay. We've got a heavy metal guy over there.

I know that some of you rural guys like your country music. The reason I bring that up is because about five years ago I started listening to country music. I never used to listen to country music before, but then I started listening to country music. There were a couple of songs that just really touched my heart.

I truly believe that at the end of the day members of this House all want what's best for the people that we love in our lives. We all want what's best. We have different ways of getting there, right? I want to appeal to you. Just know that we may not be wanting to get to the same place in the same way, but do know that as we're in this House, what our constituents have asked us to do in being here is to represent them.

Now, I completely acknowledge that the United Conservative Party got its majority. You guys are government. You all are government. You're doing your best. You're doing what you think is the right thing to do. But also know that we were elected by representatives to be in this House and be their voice. I know that it may seem like a joke that it's – what? – 2:33 in the morning right now. You know, people's eyes are starting to close, and we're debating and debating and debating, and we're talking and talking and talking. But we were elected to be here and represent those people. The good constituents of Edmonton-Ellerslie decided to put their faith and their trust in me, so it's my duty to get up in this House and talk and share with everybody what has been passed on to me by constituents.

The reality is that my constituents – I'll be the first one to tell you. You knock on the doors of Edmonton-Ellerslie, and you see young families. A lot of those young families care about affordable child care here in the province of Alberta. Let me tell you that I had so many families tell me: "Rod" – oh, sorry – "Member." They don't call me "Member"; they call me by my name, but I'm just going to, like, parentheses that. "Member, it costs me $1,200 to put one child in daycare." Twelve hundred dollars. I want you to imagine a family that has two children or even three children, right? Affordable child care is a top priority for the people of Edmonton-Ellerslie. I find it strange that nowhere in the throne speech was that even mentioned, affordable child care. I can bet – and I'm willing to put my life on it – that there are more ridings across this great province of Alberta where more families care about affordable child care. I'm willing to bet on it, bet my life on it.

Although I incredibly respect where the United Conservative Party is coming from – they're representing what they believe to be the right thing to do – let's agree that not only people that believe in the priorities and the ideology of the United Conservative Party live in this province. Our job – our job – is to govern together in this House, to make sure that all those people are represented, to take a balanced, measured approach towards moving this province forward. The amendment put forward by the Member for Edmonton-City Centre is attempting to do just that.

Madam Chair, thanks for indulging me. I'm now on the amendment fully. You liked that, didn't you? I knew you were going to like it. Nowhere else are you going to hear a spoken-word piece at this time of the night. Nowhere, nowhere, nowhere. Honestly, that was my gift to all of you. That was my gift to all of you, or else we're going to ask the Member for Edmonton-South to get up and speak again.

Members, I say it in jest, but humbly – humbly – in all honesty, this amendment is about trying to put forward a more measured, balanced approach. Now, I remember being on the government side. I remember being a private member on the government side. I can probably guess that the majority of you are going to end up voting this thing down. It's a guess. It's probably a good guess. But I'm trying to appeal to your good nature. I know that each and every one of you has the ability to listen to reason. My good friends and members of this House, this really is about trying to put forward a measured approach, as was shared repeatedly by the Member for Edmonton-South. I'm just bugging; I'm just bugging. Why couldn't we attempt to – let's go to 10 per cent, and then let's re-evaluate what happens from there. Let's re-evaluate what happens from there, right?

The amendment being put forward by the Member for Edmonton-City Centre is proposing to do exactly that. I remember that the Member for Calgary-Hays was saying: oh, well, it sounds like the opposition is listening. What we're trying to do is meet you halfway, to be measured, to humbly accept that, yes, we understand where you as a government, where you, ideologically speaking, as the United Conservative Party want to go. We respect that. We understand that. We understand. And we understand what your objectives are. By all means, I get it. We understand what your objectives are in terms of trying to create jobs in this province, trying to do, from your perspective, what you believe to be the right thing to do. I'm not questioning that.

2:40 a.m.

At the same time, it's imperative – it's imperative – that you look at research and you look at data and you see what's been happening in other jurisdictions where they put in a corporate tax cut of this nature. I just want to share with you an article by Hugh Mackenzie called Analysis Shows UCP Plan Will Not Create Jobs – I repeat: will not create jobs – or Increase GDP or Revenue. In this article Mr. Mackenzie states:

In general, corporate tax cuts are among the weakest forms of fiscal stimulus. That's because there's no direct impact – the tax savings don't go directly into the economy, they go into corporate income statements – and the indirect effects are widely dispersed throughout the Canadian economy and beyond.

He goes on to state:

In the context of a balanced budget, the UCP's $1.75 billion corporate tax cut would have a significant negative effect on Alberta's GDP and jobs. Because the cuts would inevitably be concentrated on public sector employment and transfers to people, there is essentially a 1:1 direct impact on GDP . . .

So the estimated net effect on the economy of the UCP's proposed tax cut in the context of its balanced budget commitment is a decline in GDP of $2.7 billion and a loss of nearly 12,000 jobs.

Now, granted, you may say: well, you know, we have our economists on our side that are saying that that's not true, that that's not how it's going to happen. All the more reason for us to accept this amendment. Let's accept this amendment. We're meeting you halfway. Let's go to 10 per cent, and then we can re-evaluate from there if the desired corporate tax cut that you're wanting to put forward will actually do what you think it will do. Once we go through a year, then we can re-evaluate it and see if it's actually accomplishing your desired outcome.

Members of the House, I want to thank you for indulging me. I want to thank you for giving me the opportunity to share with you a little bit about what my values are through that spoken-word piece. I'll finish off by saying: let's continue to respect each other. We don't necessarily believe in the same political ideology, but that doesn't mean that we can't show each other respect. What's most important is that we always stand up for the dignity of the human person, right? That's what true good governance is all about. So I ask us all, on both sides of the House: let's respect the fact that Albertans voted. Just because one party won government, it does not mean that all those others that did not vote for that party do not deserve to have their voice heard inside this House. That's the job that my colleagues and I on this side of the House, the members representing the Alberta New Democratic Party, are doing here. So let's respect each other, let's hear each other out, and let's keep doing our best to make sure that all Albertans are represented.

Thank you very much, Madam Chair.

The Chair: The Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie referenced an article. Just make sure you table it at your earliest convenience.

Member Loyola: Will do. Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Excellent.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Madam Chair. Good morning. Good evening. I'm not even sure what time it is or what day it is anymore. That is a tough act to follow from my colleague from Edmonton-Ellerslie, which I can tell you that I was listening to, thinking: oh, I'm so excited to go next and talk at 2:45 in the morning after that.

But I have to say that this is actually one of the joys, and there are lots of joys in the job that we have here. One of the joys is actually being here in the House at 2:45 in the morning because I think we can all say that we're doing our jobs very well.

But I actually have to say, and this is going to be related to what we're all here to talk about today, that I echo a lot of what my colleague from Edmonton-Ellerslie said. One of the joys I have found in being in this House tonight, especially in committee, where we know that the rules are a little bit looser and people have the opportunity to move around and to talk – and it's been quite remarkable to see members from both sides of the House sitting down with each other, chatting – and we've been bumping into each other as we're trying to find our next caffeine mix that will keep us awake but not keep us from sleeping in case we ever do get to sleep, and we talk about our children, and we talk about things. There's obviously an enjoyment on some of the very spirited debate we've heard here. We've heard some fantastic orators, some excellent points of view from both sides, and I think what's most important about that is exactly what the Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie was alluding to, which is that we are all human beings. We all do have a lot in common. It's a real pleasure to get to see that side of each other.

Particularly, we are fresh out of a campaign, and we know how that can be so divisive. In particular, it tends to do what we see happen a lot in politics, which is the us versus them. One of the messages I tried to convey when I was out at the doors speaking in Edmonton-Whitemud to what I hoped to be my constituents – and luckily they are – is that we are not as far apart as our politics or our hyper partisanship or our media might make us think we are. In fact, that was one of my key messages. I had an opportunity to meet the other candidates in my riding from all the parties, and that was the note that I ended on. We had a forum; we discussed various issues, and what we found was really that there is a lot more that we have in common than we have different. I think the Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie said it just beautifully, which is that we might have different ideas of how to get there, but we all have the same objective.

To that point, you know, I understand this is politics. I'm new at it. I'm learning. But we do tend to take very positional positions. We take very hard positions on things, and I think in our heart of hearts we know that those aren't true. We know it's not true, the way the media might characterize the differences in our parties and our platforms. Nobody on this side of the House is anticorporation. We understand that corporations are an important part of our economy, of our political system, of our fabric of our society. Nobody here would suggest that we could function without corporations, and nobody would suggest that we should do away with them.

Just like sometimes I think the members on the opposite side get characterized in a way that I think is not true. I certainly know that everybody there on the other side has families, have people they care about, so to say that they're not in support of health care or education is also not true. It just can't be true. We are Albertans. We function in this system. We all have our interests where we want to move forward and do the best for our families, and we know that all of those pieces that we're talking about – education, health care, corporations – they're not diametrically opposed. They just really aren't.

But we might disagree on the way to get there, so I would also like to stand up in support of the amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre, an amendment to Bill 3, the Job Creation Tax Cut (Alberta Corporate Tax Amendment) Act. I really believe that this is precisely that. It is a reasonable and measured approach.

We understand that we might disagree on the facts behind corporate tax cuts as ways to stimulate economic growth. I think my colleagues have done an excellent job of going through the various studies. I'm not an economist, so I'm not going to stand here and try to quote with some measure of certainty or authority about economics, but what I do know is that I'm a person who trusts those people who are experts in their fields. I don't think it's our responsibility to be the experts in all areas. That's just simply not possible.

2:50 a.m.

I do rely on the experts when they make their statements, and I see, just as the members opposite have a number of economists that will speak to the belief that corporate tax cuts will result in economic growth and the creation of jobs, there are also going to be economists who suggest otherwise. The Member for Edmonton-City Centre and many of my other colleagues pointed out a number of economists who have expressed differing views on the value of that. I hope that we can agree to disagree a little bit. There are mixed views on this. It's not a science. It is not necessarily a true statement to say that corporate tax cuts will automatically create jobs, will stimulate the economy the way we want, because as much as the members from the opposite side might have economists who believe that, we've pointed out several economists and situations where that has not occurred.

Is one true and one not? No. Just like in everything else, there are theories. I went to school. I was a political scientist. I went into political science to get my degree, and that's what we sat there and talked about. We talked about centuries of beliefs, of differing views about society, about economic growth, different value systems, and one is not right, and one is not wrong. The truth is that at certain times one might be more appropriate than others, and we all bring our own values. I always talk about the fact that, really, where we are historically in the moment shapes which value system might take more precedence. That doesn't mean that it's wrong.

We know the pendulum swings from one way to the other. We've seen that. We just have to look at our own political history but also look at the political history of many other countries to know that. So one is not right, one is not wrong. I think what we can agree on is that there is a value choice being made here. Again, I echo the statements from my colleagues, that we appreciate that the governing party, the UCP, did certainly win more seats in the House, but the last time I checked, they didn't win 87. We still have 24 opposition members here who represent constituencies who perhaps valued a different approach. I can tell you that that was very much my experience in my riding as I mentioned in my maiden speech, a term I'm not terribly fond of, my first speech in the House, which was also not my first speech.

Anyways, my constituents don't subscribe strongly to one political ideology or the other. They're not diehard Conservatives. They're not diehard progressives or New Democrats. They've been everything because my constituents want to see a reasonable and measured approach. They look at what's going on in the political environment at the time, and they say: what is the most appropriate approach and which value system, which ideology – or not even ideology – which values do they think will serve their families and the province best? I actually really appreciated that because, when I'm going door to door and when I was talking to constituents, I'm a reasonable, sort of measured person myself.

I don't have a long history of being strongly attached to one ideology versus the other. I'm a person who looked at the values of the party that I chose to run for and thought – you know what? – that matches my values. One of the reasons why I was drawn to run for this party was because I thought they demonstrated a great deal of pragmatism over the last four years. They demonstrated that they understood what was needed for this province and its economy to move it forward and move from positions of ideology, from positions of strong partisanship, to say what is actually required for governance. That's why I was attracted to run for this party, and when I went door to door, that's what I talked about, and my constituents agreed with me. They said: yeah, we like this, we don't like this; these are some things we think worked well, but we also don't think this worked well in the past.

They are careful watchers of political history. They lived through the Klein years, and they thought that, you know, in times when the oil prices drop, austerity measures did not serve us well. In Edmonton it took decades, and we're still recovering from that infrastructure deficit, that deficit to our public services. They care about that. They are actually quite centrist voters because they're also small-business owners. I have a significant number of small-business owners in my riding, people who said: yeah, things have been tough, but we appreciated that this government – the previous government, the NDP government – provided a 33 per cent tax cut to small businesses.

They appreciated, too, that there was an investment in new economies and new opportunities for growth because I think of main concern to them was that we need to get off the one-resource train that we've been on for too long in this province. They really valued the discussions that we had about diversification and the measures that were being taken to do that. That's what they were voting on. They were voting on: we wanted to have a path forward; we wanted to see a vision for this province that moves us forward and makes us less dependent.

One of the things that I struggle with when I'm in this Assembly – and I know we've all got our talking points on both sides, and we have our catchy phrases, and I will say that I know the government has done a very good job with catchy phrases and they really resonated with people – is the idea that the economic “mess”, and I'm using air quotes that won't show up in Hansard, that was created over the last four years was somehow created solely as a result of the actions by this NDP government. It just strikes me as completely surprising that those who might be knowledgeable of the political history and the economic history of this province would ignore the significant and repeated impact that the drop in international oil prices has on our economy. We've seen it hit Conservative governments. We saw it hit just before the NDP government took over. To say that somehow this mess was created by the NDP, to me, is just partisanship and ideology because we know that the reason why we are in the situation we are in is because there is too little that is in our control in our province. We've become an economy that is dependent on something that is too far out of our control.

To me, I think it's unreasonable and it's not measured to talk about one party's approach being the right way and one party's approach being the wrong way, particularly when we have tied ourselves to a system that is out of our control. What the voters in my riding wanted to see was Albertans take control of their economic destiny. That's what they wanted to see. That's what they saw the beginnings of, the investments of, under the NDP government. They saw that there was a true approach and a true investment in diversification, in new industry, and that's what they valued. I had a number of voters say to me at the doors, untriggered by me: we realize that this economic situation that we are in is because of measures outside of our control.

Now, what we can control as a government is how we respond to that. What I would say is, again prefacing this, I'm not an economist. This is just my sense of things, reading what I have read and talking to the people that I talked to at the doors. If we are going to tie ourselves to an industry that is so much out of our control, how can we then take what we do have control of, the revenue source that we do have control of, and decide to take such a huge gamble on it? Until we create some stability and security in our revenue sources of income in this province – and we are seeing that. We are seeing that we have a great natural resource in this province, but we are having incredible difficulties getting it to market.

Again, all of the reasons that we're having difficulties getting it to market are things that are outside of our control. We have been so frustrated as a province, rightly so, about that. We can't get pipelines built. I will repeat the statistic that has been said over and over: previous Conservative governments have failed to get a pipeline built. I think it's 60, almost 70 years since a pipeline has been built to tidewater. We can't get our resource to market because of other provinces, because of the federal government, and for a lot of other reasons.

We can't continue to just simply rely on something that we have very little control over. We really need to take control of our economic destiny. I don't see it being a wise decision for the first step to slash corporate taxes by so much. I'm not an expert on whether or not that's going to attract investment. I see the studies that say that it won't create the jobs that are promised. I know that the members on the other side will say that there are studies that will show that it will create the jobs. That may be true. I go back to the comments from my colleagues that – okay – you clearly had a mandate to lower corporate taxes. You didn't have a 100 per cent mandate from Albertans, but you had a strong mandate, so do that.

But this amendment is a very reasonable approach. It is a very big gamble on our revenue source, when we have already lost control over so much of our revenue control in this province.

3:00 a.m.

To me, I think it's a very reasonable approach to say: "Let's see. Let's see if it does produce the jobs and the investment that we need – that we desperately need – in this province." This amendment is a way to say: "Let's try that. Let's do that – fine – but let's not tie ourselves to a very extreme and large gamble so early on. Let's take the opportunity to see how it works, and let's be forthcoming about it." Again, we get into politics, we get into partisanship, and we take strong views and positions on everything when, really, what we need to do, our responsibility here, is to govern and to govern in the best interests of all Albertans. If we're going to gamble their revenue sources, we need to be as measured as possible so that we can at least be clear about whether or not it works.

Again, the things that we care about, the things that all of you care about are health care and education. You have children who go to school. You need access to health care. I heard the Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie speak about how affordable child care is so important in his riding. I'm very heartened to hear that as that's so important in my riding and to me as well. Those are things that, as we know, cost money.

The other thing that's important is that it's not just about providing those services, those health care and education services. The members from the other side talk a lot about jobs. Those are public-sector jobs. When we talk about, you know, perhaps doing away with $4.5 billion of our revenue source, we can't even keep up the facade that that's not going to result in cuts. We know it's going to. We're not just talking about cuts in services, but those are Albertans who hold those jobs as well.

One of the things that really resonated in my riding is that for a lot of families who had two income earners in the family, one might have been affected by the drop in oil prices, worked in oil and gas and been affected, but often the other income earner was a public-sector worker: a teacher, a nurse, an EA. I think the decision by the previous government to not slash those services and those jobs was a way to also protect Alberta jobs. Of course, private-sector jobs are so important – I know they're important to the voters in my riding – but so are the jobs of public-sector employees, and so are the jobs of teachers and nurses and EAs and all of our medical service providers. Those are Albertans as well, so we're gambling their jobs as well.

I would like to speak in favour of this amendment because I think it's the right balance to take. Again, I enjoy the ability at this time of night to have some free and open discussion and to find that common ground, and I suppose I'm standing here and hoping that there will be some agreement, that we can find some common ground. We're not trying with this amendment to argue to do away with the proposed bill. We're not arguing that there's no support for it. Clearly, there is. Clearly, there was from the election results. To me, there are a few examples of legislation that have come forward by this government in this session which are clearly part of the mandate of the government – some, quite frankly, are not; that's another story – and this one is.

I mean, everybody knew – it was front and centre – that that was the intention of this government, so I'm not here to try to say, "Don't do a corporate tax cut," because I know that that's a ridiculous statement. You have a commitment that you made to Albertans and to your voters that you need to keep. But we can certainly take a measured approach to it and make sure that before we make such a dramatic cut to the corporate tax rate, to our revenue income, we have given thought to whether or not it's working, that we do the proper evaluation to see whether or not it is working, and that the government be forthcoming and truthful with its voters as to whether or not to continue to go forward with cutting the corporate tax rate or whether to hold steady.

I look at this as an opportunity for co-operation, and I actually look at it as an opportunity for those on the other side who might be interested in perhaps trying to take back my riding in four years. As I said, my constituency is one that looks for a practical, reasonable, measured policy approach. I can tell you that if you want to win back the voters in Edmonton-Whitemud, show that you're reasonable, show that you're measured, show that you want to do what's best for Albertans, not just what's based on partisanship and ideology, and I think you've got a better shot in 2023 at my seat, not that I'm giving it away. I'll be fighting hard for it because I'm going to be the one standing up and saying: look what I convinced the government to do.

I'm just saying: look, that's what people want. That's what people want. They want a measured approach. They want their government – in campaigns they might want partisanship. I don't know if they wanted that or if that's just what they got. You know, when they see their government, they want to see somebody who's actually looking out for what's best for them.

So I encourage you to look at the idea of meeting us halfway, as the Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie said so eloquently. Actually, he said a lot of things very eloquently.

Thank you very much, Madam Chair.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Airdrie-Cochrane.

Mr. Guthrie: Yes. Now, bear with me.

Mr. Carson: Spoken word?

Mr. Guthrie: Spoken word.

Pack it up, pack it in
Let me begin.

[interjections] No, I'm not going to do that. I'm not going to do that.

Thank you, Madam Chair. The opposition claims that we are talking about a theoretical policy with the job-creation tax cut. I think the empirical proof lies in the last four years. The NDP government rewarded Alberta with a $5.5 billion increase in taxes that resulted in a decline in revenue of 8 and a half billion dollars. That's a difference of $3 billion. Additionally, over the course of the four years the province of Alberta had a 3 percentage point reduction in GDP, making us the only province in Canada with negative growth over that period. Let's look at B.C. They had approximately 10 per cent GDP growth in that same time period. Saskatchewan: they were under similar conditions to Alberta, yet they had a 3 per cent increase in GDP, for a difference of about 6 per cent between the two provinces.

So let's make it clear. This is not a thesis. This is not theoretical. The tax increases implemented by this previous government absolutely had a direct and negative impact on Alberta's economy. As a former small-business owner I can say that the job-creation tax cut alone will not do it. It won't because for companies that are losing money, well, they're not paying any income tax. They're just going broke. This is about an entire suite of policies that come together to create a positive environment for investment. It's the carbon tax repeal act, the open for business act, and the Red Tape Reduction Act in conjunction with the Job Creation Tax Cut (Alberta Corporate Tax Amendment ) Act that will make this a success. I can say this. It is economics 101. The marketplace can only bear tax increases to a point before it has diminishing returns. The former NDP proved this point beautifully.

Madam Chair, as Forrest Gump might say: I may not be a smart man, but I know what tax is, Jenny. I'm trying to add a little bit of levity here, but it's no joke to the business owners that I talk to. I spoke to a rancher friend of mine. We talked about overall tax changes. He told me that the carbon tax cost him about $4,000 a year. That's $4,000 to heat his barns, his shops, to heat the water for the cattle in the winter, and he has no way to pass that cost on to the buyer. He's selling a commodity, so he suffers the loss. Is that fair? I don't think so.

I have another friend in oil and gas, spinning his wheels and his money. He was so frustrated with doing business in Alberta that before the election he wanted to leave the country. It was so difficult for him to do business. Here we are. We have an entrepreneur – he was born and raised in this province – who wanted to leave, someone with skills, capital, a strong work ethic. These are the very people that we want to retain.

This is what the NDP government did for this province. When I was in business, we took hits from the carbon tax, local property taxes in Calgary, income taxes, increases to the minimum wage, regulatory changes. The cost of business continued to go up while the economy went down; hence, our revenues declined. The NDP government continued to push forward with their agenda, and, Madam Chair, it was that agenda that led me to this place today.

I wholeheartedly support the original proposal and will vote against the amendment. Thank you, Madam Chair.

3:10 a.m.

The Chair: Members, I think that 3 o'clock in the morning is our finest hour.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Madam Chair. I rise to speak in favour of this amendment that my hon. colleague put forward. I'm happy to address it and pleased that members of the government caucus are rising to engage in debate. I do appreciate an exchange of points of view. I will disagree with a number of comments by the previous speaker.

I think, you know, first and foremost, obviously, that there's a recognition that the last four years have been very challenging – in fact, it's the last four and a half, five years, when the international price of oil was starting to slide, which all members should recall. That's why the former Premier, Mr. Prentice, called the election a year early. It was called after three years because he saw what all economists were saying, which was that the economy and the price of oil was going to continue to slide, and he didn't want to call an election in the spring of 2016, when we would be at the depths of the recession. Again, he thought, I think, that things would have turned out a little differently. But that obviously had a significant impact on every single person in this province.

If you look at the number of businesses, Mr. Chair, that only do business within the province of Alberta, it's a vast majority of them. When you look at how many do business across Canada, it's not a large percentage, and when we look at within North America and then internationally, it drops down significantly. I think the number of Alberta companies that are actually global market players is less than 2 per cent. When you have so many businesses reliant on and only doing business within the province, when the driving industry of energy takes a big hit, absolutely every industry is affected. We've seen the impact that that's had on families absolutely everywhere.

Now, as far as, you know, the proposal to drop the corporate tax rate: my caucus mates and I are putting forward arguments that it won't necessarily translate into job creation. In fact, this has been tried in a number of jurisdictions around North America that have dropped the corporate tax rate significantly, and it hasn't led to significant job growth. Sure, there will be some job growth. I don't think anyone is going to stand up and say: there won't be a single job created. That would be silly.

But my concern is that the projections are being overly optimistic in the sense, Mr. Chair, that from a number of businesses that I've spoken to around the province about the corporate tax reduction, although some may be excited for that, when pressed on what they are going to do with the savings – are they going to reinvest it back into their company, are they going to hire more people, or are they going to invest in new machinery and equipment? – I've yet to find a company that has said yes to those questions. Every single company that I've spoken with has said: no; I'm going to pocket the savings. Now, again, not laying blame on them. Understandable. The last few years have been very, very challenging, so they want to make up for some of their losses. I understand that. But that is where what the bill proposes to do won't necessarily get us to that outcome.

Now, again, I appreciate that the members opposite are looking at a number of their bills and not just this one as the silver bullet. I think, quite frankly, there isn't necessarily a silver bullet. I think, you know, it's a combination of creating the right conditions. But I also think that when we're looking at trying to attract companies, which we have over the last four years, in fact, some significant global players from Amazon to Google DeepMind to RocketSpace and others, I can tell you that on the tech side the number one thing that companies are looking for is talent and a talent pipeline to ensure that they can fill the positions that they need and that students have the right skills and the workers that they need to hire have the right skills. This is where it's investing in our postsecondary, it's investing in our education system to ensure that we are graduating the right talent to be creating companies and, obviously, start-ups and entrepreneurs, for which we did a significant amount of funding, working with organizations to provide mentorship.

You know, the two things I heard most clearly when I travelled the province, Mr. Chair, was that companies were looking for access to capital and looking for mentorship to avoid the pitfalls and mistakes that many new entrepreneurs face because they don't know. So we tried to address both of those issues, increasing access to capital through ATB, increasing access to capital by working with the Business Development Bank of Canada, but then also working with existing organizations and those that have the expertise – again, ATB was a great partner; so was Business Link – to provide more mentorship and training opportunities for entrepreneurs. We do want them to be successful. I think it's a series of different ways to provide support.

We introduced three different tax credit programs that other provinces have enjoyed for decades, quite frankly, Mr. Chair, and were asking previous governments to introduce here in the province of Alberta. We've seen tremendous success from those programs. In fact, you know, in the coming weeks I will be asking the ministers if they intend to keep those programs. We've conditionally approved about $200 million in tax credits, which has leveraged $2.2 billion of investment. That's real investment being deployed right now, when it's needed, putting men and women back to work but also helping our companies expand.

We pushed the federal government on an accelerated capital investment – or accelerated capital cost allowance. Man, I can tell it's 3 in the morning; my brain is slowing down. I can tell you that we weren't completely pleased with the federal government because in the energy sector they didn't give a full hundred per cent of that whereas other sectors do enjoy that. I still think that there is a discrimination against our energy sector that continues to this day. I think, quite frankly, there's a misunderstanding in Ottawa about the Canadian and Alberta energy sector, how it's not just a driving force for our province but that, really, it's the economic engine of the country. So we will continue to try to educate our friends in Ottawa on the importance of this sector.

I mean, there are a number of other things that we did in the energy space for modernizing the royalty programs. Companies at first were a little hesitant when we said that we wanted to modernize the royalties. Their last recollection of this was under former Premier Stelmach in 2008 when they had started to move on modernizing royalties, to which industry panicked, and then the government backed down. But we wanted to award innovation and reward companies that are being innovative, recognizing that wells, depending on their lifeline, are going to have different production rates, and not penalize companies for not shutting in a well when that production level starts to drop. So we modernized it, and the energy sector was quite pleased. In hindsight we wish they would have made a little more noise and said, you know, "Way to go, government," that we got it right. We got it right because we engaged with energy leaders to say, you know: what do we need to do, and how do we get this right to ensure that they will continue to be profitable?

As well, you know, we lobbied the government on securing funds for orphan wells for reclamation. There still are a remarkable number of wells that need to be cleaned up in the province, recognizing that we need to get going on some of those. Again, at a time when we had a lot of men and women with significant training looking for work, it was a great solution to get them back to work.

You know, I think, Mr. Chair, the crux of the challenge that we have in supporting this bill is that, again, there is no guarantee that there will be significant job creation through cutting the corporate tax rate. I know that my colleagues have cited examples such as Kansas, where they significantly cut their corporate tax rate for a period of years, which had little impact on the economy but ended up tanking their government revenues, and they had to reverse course.

3:20 a.m.

I think, you know, the amendment slows down the reduction in corporate taxes – instead of 12 percent to 8 over a period of years, it's from 12 to 10 – basically providing the government with an opportunity to hit the pause button, to look at the program: okay; over the course of a couple of years let's see how many new jobs were created. Now, I appreciate, you know, that this isn't in isolation, so the job numbers won't directly correlate to this one program, but I think it does give government the opportunity to look at: is this the best tool?

I mean, the trade-off, quite frankly, Mr. Chair – and I think we used the government's numbers. We've estimated that it'll cost about 4 and a half billion dollars to do this. I don't know if anyone can stand in this House and say that this is the best tool to get us the results that we want. I appreciate that some economists will say yes, this is. I can show you a number of economists that will say no, actually, it's not.

This is part of the reason, quite frankly, that when we first introduced our investor tax credit and capital investment tax credit, they were introduced only for a period of a couple of years, and we did an ongoing assessment of the program to see: is it actually delivering the outcomes that we want? I'll even back up before then, Mr. Chair. We initially were going to introduce, some members may recall, the job-creation incentive program, or JCIP, which originally was going to reward employers with I think it was about $5,000 per new employee hired. You know, it may sound like a great idea in theory, but when we went out and talked to companies, they said: this is not going to get you the results that you're looking for.

That program was designed in conjunction with industry but obviously had some wrinkles. When we took it to the broader public, they said: this isn't going to get you what you want. I'm proud of the fact that we said: "Okay. Well, we're not just going to charge forward with it." This is, I think, sometimes for me the challenge in this place, when parties say, "It was in our platform; we're full steam ahead plowing through it." Well, you know, maybe some ideas in a platform weren't fully either costed out or thought through. You know, I think it's commendable for a government to say: let's double-check this, and let's do an ongoing evaluation of it to see if it's delivering the outcomes that we want; if it's not, then let's look at making some changes.

On that example of the job-creation incentive program, we pulled it. We pulled it before we implemented it, went back out, and did more consulting. That's where chambers of commerce, economic development associations, businesses from sole proprietors and entrepreneurs up to multinationals – well, multinationals wouldn't qualify for the investor tax credit, but for the capital investment tax credit they would – said that these are two much better tools that will help you get the results that you're looking for, which is job creation and economic stimulation. So we introduced those, and after a period of two years we decided to recapitalize those two programs because of how successful they were.

In listening to a number of our colleagues during their maiden speeches, one or two of the members talked about Seven Generations, which is a company that I have a great deal of respect for that operates facilities near Grande Prairie. I was very proud of the fact that they applied and qualified for the capital investment tax credit on their expansion of their facility. You know, there are a number of companies that have said that that program was the difference between pulling the trigger on investing dollars now versus those dollars sitting on the sidelines.

I think, Mr. Chair, that it would be prudent for this House to accept this amendment, which, again, taps the brakes on this program and allows the government to do an assessment of whether or not, you know, dropping the corporate tax rate is going to give the results that they're looking for or if these new-found tax savings are just going to go into the pockets of the folks that are receiving them and will not be reinvested back into the economy through job creation, through investment in machinery and equipment.

[Mrs. Pitt in the chair]

With that, Madam Chair, I will recommend and urge all members of the Assembly to vote in favour of this amendment.

[The voice vote indicated that the motion on amendment A1 lost]

[Several members rose calling for a division. The division bell was rung at 3:25 a.m.]

[Fifteen minutes having elapsed, the committee divided]

[Mrs. Pitt in the chair]

The Chair: Hon. members, just a friendly reminder to all in this House: you must be in your own seat for the vote to take place.

For the motion:

[Motion on amendment A1 lost]

The Chair: The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Madam Chair, I move that we rise and report progress.

[Motion carried]

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, the Committee of the Whole has had under consideration certain bills. The committee reports progress on the following bill: Bill 3. I wish to table copies of all amendments considered by Committee of the Whole on this date for the official records of the Assembly.

The Deputy Speaker: Does the Assembly concur in the report?

Some Hon. Members: Aye.

The Deputy Speaker: Any opposed? The motion is carried.

Government Bills and Orders

Second Reading

Bill 2

An Act to Make Alberta Open for Business

[Debate adjourned June 5]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to rise, not necessarily shine at this point in the morning but certainly to rise, and speak to Bill 2. Now, my colleagues have had the opportunity, I think, to lay out several of the concerns that our caucus has with this particular bill, the steps it takes to roll back, I think, the important things that we had moved forward for workers in this province.

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

I remember when we first came into this House to begin to look at changes to the labour code in the province of Alberta, Mr. Speaker. As has been noted by my colleagues, those were changes that were long, long overdue. Previous Conservative governments had, as they had on so many things, studied things and then stepped back and decided not to act and then studied them again and then decided not to act. We saw that with farm workers' safety: over a decade of consultation in this province, of talking with farmers, ranchers, individuals, and numerous reports that were all simply shelved and put away.

Now, we have talked a good deal in this House, Mr. Speaker, about balance. We heard today about the essential need to roll back protections that are in place for LGBTQ students and their right to form a GSA today because we needed to have balance. The minister has not been able to define what she means by balance, but in general the concept is that you have competing interests, that you have two different sides that you need to consider. So when we are talking about labour legislation, we are talking about balance. It's unfortunate, but for many, many, many years Conservative governments in this province were not concerned about balance; they were concerned about the next electoral cycle. They were concerned about their donations that would be coming in because that was, of course, before we brought in legislation, as our first act of government, ending corporate and union donations to political parties.

That was the first step, Mr. Speaker, towards trying to bring a bit more balance into how we approach labour legislation in this place. And I remember over the years the attacks that were made by government on labour in this province. As other colleagues have noted, we've heard the kind of language that gets used when we're talking about the labour movement in this province, talk about union thugs, other loaded terms. Certainly, if we go back to the annals of Hansard during the last four years and at some times like this, indeed, when we were here in the early hours of the morning, I can tell you that there is some colourful, colourful language from now members of the government, who were in opposition at the time, giving their thoughts on unions and the labour movement in this province.

We may not agree on all fronts with everything that unions would ask for or necessarily how they would go about asking for them. But, ultimately, we have to acknowledge that unions have served an important role in our labour movement in providing for workers' rights, and indeed we have to recognize that if they had not stepped forward, there would be many rights that workers enjoy today that they would not have because, to be frank, businesses were not just about to hand those over to them just out of the kindness of their hearts.

Now, that is not to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am antibusiness, as was suggested earlier this evening as we were debating Bill 3 by the Member for Chestermere-Strathmore. I certainly recognize that she took exception to some of the comments that some other members of this House had made. She interpreted them a particular way. I can tell you that, for my own part, Mr. Speaker, I have made no such comments.

3:50 a.m.

Indeed, I support business, and I appreciate the many businesses that contribute to the vibrant constituency of Edmonton-City Centre. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that we have seen incredible growth in the downtown core here in Edmonton over the last few years, and a lot of that has been because we've seen increased business investment but also because we have taken the time to work to build livable communities, to think about the people that live here as well as the businesses that operate here, and made investments in things like, yes, that Conservative bugaboo bike lanes, in creating more walkable neighbourhoods, and other things which contribute to the vitality and make it easier for people to access businesses and better opportunities to get around, because these things are all of a piece. Again, it's about balance.

Now, I think there is clearly some disagreement between our side of the House and the government side of the House as to where the proper balance should lie on a few particular pieces, which is why we have this bill in front of us here, where the government feels that we have put too much of a burden on businesses in order to give employees the same rights and opportunities that they have in every other province in Canada, so on things like holiday pay, which, again, is something that was a relic here in the province of Alberta, that previous governments simply chose not to address for years.

I can't tell you the number of times, Mr. Speaker, over the last four years that I had conversations with people, and they said, "Why is something this way?" and I said, "Well, you know, Alberta is the only province in Canada that..." — and generally these were not positive things. Our government worked hard over the last four years to try to help us catch up. We heard members of the government this evening defending the fact that they feel that we have to have the lowest corporate tax in Canada. It's not good enough to be equal to other provinces or a little bit below. It has to be well below. It has to be the best.

Yet for our workers, Mr. Speaker, the same government is saying that they should make do with second best. That, to me, is not balance. Workers in Alberta have every right to be able to enjoy a Christmas holiday, just like they would if they worked in Manitoba, if they worked in Saskatchewan or any other province in Canada. There is no reason to deny them that. The fact that previous governments failed to provide that and that they set a standard that was substandard is no excuse to now decide that we need to all of a sudden roll that back.

Workers in Alberta deserve to have it. I hate to think where we would be if we had had another Conservative government over the last four years. Would workers have actually gotten the bereavement leave that is now available to them on a level with other provinces? Would workers still be left in the position where, if they took sick leave to care for their family, they could be fired from their job? Conservative governments just let that one lie. That was not balance, Mr. Speaker.

To insist that the only way for business to succeed is for us to roll back opportunities and protections for workers, that the only way for businesses to succeed is for young people to be paid $2 less an hour — let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that here in my constituency I have organizations like Boyle Street Education Centre. They work to support youth who've been struggling, marginalized youth, high-risk youth. They provide a flexible schooling system. It is a charter school, an excellent use of the charter school model, to provide flexible education that allows those students to be able to access school in an environment where they feel comfortable. Do you know how many of those students also have to work to make a living, are struggling, and may not have the support of family? And this government wants to reduce the wage that they are able to earn to support themselves by $2 an hour.

That is a significant chunk of money for a young person who is struggling to get by, Mr. Speaker. That is a slap in the face. I think of the kids in the hall bistro over at city hall, again, a business that employs young people who have been struggling. It gives them the opportunity to get job experience. It gives them the opportunity to get on their feet. That has changed lives. Now those youth are being told that they are worth $2 less an hour. The support that they should be able to get from that to help their families, to help themselves, to raise themselves out of poverty: that is being taken away from them by this government.

I'm proud of the businesses here in my constituency, Mr. Speaker, who support their workers and are proud to do it. I think of Kunitz Shoes on Jasper Avenue. It's been around since the '80s. They're proud to pay their employees a living wage. Indeed, you know, we were talking earlier about the tax bill. There's a corporation that is contributing to the community who is not asking for a corporate tax break. In fact, they told me that they don't want it. They are proud to support and to give back to the community as part of that. I have many businesses like that here in my constituency, some younger entrepreneurs who are working to find new models of how they operate their business so that they can properly support and pay their employees.

It's not always easy, Mr. Speaker. I'll be honest about that. I've talked with them, and, yeah, they talk about the challenges they face and some of the increases that have happened, whether that's with CPP or other things that have made it a little bit tighter. But they have not been asking me to come into this House and vote a lower minimum wage for any of their employees.

Point of Order Quorum

Mr. Dang: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. Can you confirm a quorum?

Mr. Speaker, pursuant to page 402 of House of Commons Procedure and Practice, the bells must be rung immediately, as per Standing Order 5(2) as well.

The Acting Speaker: A question of quorum has been raised. In order to confirm quorum, we will ring the bells for one minute.

[Pursuant to Standing Order 5 the division bell was rung at 3:59 a.m. and the Acting Speaker confirmed that a quorum was present]

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Good morning, hon. members. It's a pleasure to see you this morning.

4:00 a.m.

I thank the hon. member for the request for confirmation of quorum. As you all know, in Standing Order 5 the presence of at least 20 Members of the Legislative Assembly is necessary to constitute a meeting of the Legislative Assembly for the exercise of its powers, and in counting the number of those present, the Speaker, if present, shall be included.

As we can all see, there are at least 20 members inside the Chamber. As such, there is a quorum that is present.

Mr. Shepherd: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm glad that we can certainly count on all our members. Humour pales at 4 a.m.

As I was saying, the question we have before us is one of balance. Are we striking the appropriate balance in respecting workers' rights, in treating Albertan workers as well as workers in any other province in Canada, in treating youth who do the same work as an adult in a balanced way when it comes to their wage? We seem to have a marked difference in opinion between one side of the House and the other on this, so that is why I'm bringing forward this amendment. I'll give the original the opportunity to reach you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member. If you'll just give me a moment here, hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre, we'll have it circulated to the table, and then I'll ask you to proceed.

Hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre, I see that you'd like to move the amendment to Bill 2. Now, as the amendment was presented in the name of the hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview – obviously, it would be inappropriate of me to refer to whether or not that member was present and/or not present – and given the current circumstances that are before us, it would be challenging for you to be able to move the amendment in the name of the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview. However, if the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview, if he was or was not present, wanted to rectify the situation, then it could be moved on behalf of the member, in which case that could happen.

Mr. Shepherd: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to take a moment to reflect on your words and consider what you've just said. It's something I want to make sure I give careful thought to before I proceed, with rendering a decision on that front. I think that at this point . . .

The Speaker: If I might just confirm, then. What I understand is that you are moving the amendment on behalf of the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Shepherd: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Perfect. Please proceed.

Mr. Shepherd: My apologies for having been less than clear on that point originally. There has been an interesting mixture of bells and rising and standing and many things, which confused the matter for a moment, but I'm glad that we've been able to achieve some clarity on this amendment, which I move on behalf of the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview, which reads . . . [Mr. Shepherd's speaking time expired]

The Speaker: Thank you for your comments.

I'm sure that all members of the Assembly now have a copy of the amendment. I'm sure that somebody will be more than happy to read it into the record although we all have a copy of it.

Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available if anyone has questions or comments for the Member for Edmonton-City Centre. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Member Loyola: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and may I say what a pleasure it is to see your bright and shiny face. I'd like to ask the Member for Edmonton-City Centre if he could be so kind as to actually read the amendment into the record for us.

Mr. Shepherd: Well, thank you to the Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie for a very pertinent and reasoned question. I move on behalf of the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview that the motion for second reading of Bill 2, An Act to Make Alberta Open for Business, be amended by deleting all of the words after "that" and substituting the following:

Bill 2, An Act to Make Alberta Open for Business, be not now read a second time . . .

How often I have heard that, Mr. Speaker; my first time to utter it.

. . . because the Assembly is of the view that the bill will not draw investment to Alberta or stimulate the economy and that further input from the public is necessary.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, as I read those words, it is your voice that rings in my head.

It is my pleasure to move this amendment, Mr. Speaker. As I've said, I think we have many questions we need to consider regarding the appropriate balance for this bill. Of course, I recognize that the intent of this bill, as has been noted by members in earlier debate this evening, is to be part of a suite of actions that this government wishes to take that they believe will increase investment in the province of Alberta. They have yet to identify how many jobs, precisely, they feel might have been saved over the last four years if these actions had been in place or an amount of investment that they feel, in any precise dollars, would have stayed within the province of Alberta if we had ensured that things had been tilted a little less towards the workers. Perhaps they'll have the opportunity to illuminate us with some of those estimates and those figures during debate.

4:10 a.m.

For the time being, we have the opportunity to bring this forward and choose to suggest that this bill not be read a second time because, frankly, it is our view that this bill is not going to accomplish what members of the government wish to accomplish but will instead simply pick the pockets of Alberta workers, restore an imbalance between workers and employers, and set us back from where we should be aiming to go in terms of the way we treat our workers and the way we approach the workplace here in the province of Alberta.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I will take my seat, and I look forward to debate on the amendment.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. The hon. Member for Calgary-McCall, if you desire, as the Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie has already spoken under 29(2)(a).

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's good to see you at this hour. I'm not sure how much time is left under 29(2)(a), but at the same time I was hoping to speak to the amendment as well. I think it's an important amendment in that this act makes significant changes, almost reverses all the progress that was made in changes to the Employment Standards Code, the Labour Relations Code. It's impacting workers' rights, their job-protected leaves, maternity leaves, compassionate care leaves, the minimum wage, holiday pay, overtime pay, all those things. It has consequences for labour relations for many Albertans, so I think it's important that we look into these issues in more detail.

Also, as noted in the amendment, we are of the view that this bill will not draw any investments or stimulate the economy, so I think that not reading it at . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the minister of multiculturalism and status of women is rising to speak to the amendment.

Mrs. Aheer: Good morning, Mr. Speaker, and good morning, House. The only thing I wanted to suggest – and I think you're calling it the pick-the-pockets bill – is that this side of the House just put the carbon tax back into the pockets of every single Albertan in Alberta. It is an incredible feeling to be able to give that back to the people of Alberta. I would just like to state that, as they try to say that we're picking pockets, we're actually giving it back and putting those dollars back into their pockets.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) if anyone has questions or comments to the hon. minister.

Seeing none, the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie is rising in debate.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. The year was 1974, February 28, actually. February 28 was the day that I was born in 1974.

An Hon. Member: A leap year.

Member Loyola: Actually, no. You know, I hear this all the time. People are, like: oh, you're so lucky you weren't born on the 29th. But 1974 was not a leap year, so if I would have been born the next day, it simply would have been March 1. Right? It wasn't a leap year. I was off by two years and a day.

The reason why I bring this up is because, of course, I've heard repeatedly in this House from members of the UCP that somehow members on this side of the House don't know what it's like to work hard. You know, I get it. It's rhetoric. I get it. Like, working on a farm, I'm sure, is really tough. It's really tough. I've never had the experience myself. I mean, I've visited a farm, right? I get to see the kind of work that's done, but I've never had to actually work on a farm or a ranch. You know, I've never had the experience of doing that. Now, I'm not saying that all the members in the UCP work on farms and ranches and things like that, but, you know, repeatedly some of the members get up and talk about their experience and how hard they worked in running their own business as if members on this side of the House haven't had that experience either.

So I thought I'd go a little bit through my curriculum vitae just to share with you a little bit about the kind of stuff that I've had the pleasure and honour of doing. Now, those members who were in the 29th Legislature know that my family came to Canada. We came fleeing the violence that was occurring in Chile, that occurred on September 11, 1973, the military coup that happened there. As a result of that military coup, it was instrumental for my family to get out of Chile, and we ended up coming here.

Actually, my father came first. He actually came in March of '74. He would often joke because – and Mr. Speaker, I'm sure that you may appreciate this – actually, when he came to Canada, he really wanted to go to Quebec because my father knew how to speak French, and he was really wanting to go to Quebec. But, of course, when you come fleeing violence and you come on refugee status – of course, my family was a community-sponsored refugee, not a government-sponsored refugee, and there is a difference. There are government-sponsored refugees, there are community-sponsored refugees, family-sponsored refugees. They're all a little bit different in how they're treated and the options that they get when they get here.

My father came sponsored by a community. It was actually a religious community. They were actually a group of farmers that would get together, Christians, and they saw it fit to support my father. I'm very thankful that we had that community here in Alberta, that took it upon themselves to say: "You know what? We want to help one of these families that are fleeing the violence in Chile." Because of that, my father was able to come. He came in March, and my mother, my older brother, and I ended up following soon after.

My dad actually worked it out so that we got here the early morning of July 1, of course, Canada Day. My father worked it out just so, because he wanted us to be here for Canada Day and take in the festivities because he was really proud of the fact that we're now living in Canada. We have certain privileges, rights, and freedoms here as well as duties and responsibilities. He wanted us to really make sure that Canada started to feel like home for us, at least if it was going to be temporary.

Of course, as I always like to remind people, coming to a country as a refugee is very different than coming as an immigrant because the immigrant packs up everything that they have, either sells it all off or whatever they have to do or they give it away, but their intention is very much leave to the country so that you can start another life somewhere else, whereas the refugee has to leave immediately, as soon as possible, fleeing the danger and the violence that they're experiencing, and it's usually an overnight thing. If you ever have the opportunity to talk to someone that had a refugee experience, no matter from which part of the world, you'll know that it's like that. There were many Chileans that fled Chile, ended up actually going to Argentina – and they were in refugee camps in Argentina before they actually came to Canada – or ended up going to Australia or Sweden or even other places here in Canada. That was very much their experience. They had to flee overnight because their lives were actually in danger. They were in danger of being killed.

4:20 a.m.

The reason why I bring this up is because, of course, the experience is different. I just want to make sure that people in this House know that, that it's not the same.

Speaker's Ruling Relevance

The Speaker: Hon. member, I just might add that I appreciate the importance of the information that you're sharing. In no way, shape, or form is my interjection a reflection of the importance of that. Having said that, I would imagine that you're just mere moments away from making this important discussion perhaps a bit more relevant to the topic at hand, which, of course, is the amendment that's before the Assembly.

I might just encourage – and I recognize that we've been here for some extended period of time – members to keep their comments relevant, as we know, to the issue at hand.

Debate Continued

Member Loyola: Indeed, Mr. Speaker, indeed. What I'm doing is simply setting the context for the material that I'm about to go into.

As I was saying, coming as a refugee is very distinct. The reality is that refugees, when they come, for example, don't have all their credentials. They don't have documents demonstrating that they have the knowledge that they have or the experience that they've had and often will end up working jobs where they are not just simply underemployed but severely underemployed.

Luckily, my father managed to wade through all of that chaos and actually ended up working a really great job here in Canada through a chemical plant that some of you may recall. It's no longer open, but it was called Celanese Canada. He ended up becoming a project engineer through Celanese Canada.

The reason why I bring this up is because even though my father had managed to wade through all of that, my mother did not have the same experience. My mother was just one semester shy of finishing her political science degree when the military coup happened and unfortunately could not finish the degree because at the time that the military coup happened, the military regime decided that, well, you either study or you work, but you can't do both. By this time, as you may have guessed, my older brother and I were already born, so my mom was not only doing her political science degree, but she was also working full-time. When the regime decided to do this, she had to choose. Of course, I think that any mother would choose to provide for her family rather than to continue studying.

The reason why I bring this up is because, of course, my parents then had to make ends meet here in Canada. For 17 years my parents had their day jobs – they worked a 9 to 5, which was more like a 7:30 to 4:30 – and then on top of that they would do janitorial service work. They'd come home from their 9 to 5, which, like I said, was more like a 7:30 to 4:30. They'd come home, they'd prepare food for us – by this time, you know, like, the family had started to grow, so it was my older brother, myself, and I have two younger brothers – and then at 5:30 were right back out the door working on their janitorial service contracts. They would not come home until 11:00, 11:30 at night. Could you imagine working from 7:30 in the morning to 11:30 at night, just to get up the next day and do the same thing over again and again and again and again? So when I hear members from the other side talk about how, "Oh, well, you guys don't know what a good, hard day's work is," it's not true.

When I finally became of age, when I was about 11 years old, I told my parents: "I feel so bad that you have to go out and do this work. Please let me go with you, even if I could just do simple things." I started off by just cleaning washrooms, scrubbing the toilets, and passing the vacuum, just so I could help my parents out so that they could finish those contracts just a little bit earlier and make it home just a little bit earlier. My older brother did the same. We helped our parents out as much as we possibly could.

By the time I was 12 years old I started delivering flyers in my neighbourhood. At 13, believe it or not, I was the Dickie Dee ice cream boy. I used to get up early every day. I had to be at the Dickie Dee storage thing, ice cream warehouse by 7:30 in the morning. I didn't have a bicycle. I remember that it would take me at least half an hour to walk there. So I'd get up early in the morning, I'd walk out to the warehouse, I'd get my cart, bells and all – ding, ding, ding, ding – and I'd go sell ice cream for the entire day.

When I got enough experience doing that, a friend of mine told me: "Well, Rod, you know what? Why don't you go and get a job at McDonald's?" I did that. I worked at the McDonald's on 91st Street and 34th Avenue, just outside of Mill Woods. I remember that when I first started, I got paid $4.25 an hour. I believe at that time I was making just a bit under because I wasn't 14 yet. I was still 13. For some reason – I can't remember specifically what the scenario was – if you weren't 14 yet, you couldn't get the full minimum wage. I think that's what the case was. They gave me some excuse for why I wasn't making $4.50 and I was only making $4.25, right?

Anyway, you can probably imagine where this is going. [laughter] Oh, my goodness. Oh, my goodness. At least I'm making the members laugh. You know, it's all about trying to be as jovial as possible, right?

Of course, the main reason why I'm bringing this up is because of the wage differential for youth in the province.

An Hon. Member: There's the connection.

Member Loyola: There we go. There's the connection. There's the connection.

Why discriminate on the basis of age? I don't know. I really don't know why this government wants to roll back the minimum wage for young people. I remember being that young person, being 13 years old and working at McDonald's next to another person that was making more than me simply because they were one year older than I was. But now let me tell you something. I worked just as hard or maybe even harder than that person because I knew what it was to put . . .

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

4:30 a.m.

Member Irwin: Perfect. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I want to thank the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie for his contribution. You made me laugh, and I'm still smiling a little bit, but I do also appreciate your sharing of your family's stories. I think the stories of your family are the stories of many families that I heard from in Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood as well, particularly the struggles you talked about, not just in your family's home country but when they settled in Edmonton as well.

I wanted to ask the hon. member to just talk a little bit more about why Bill 2 in particular resonates so much with folks in his constituency and to bring it back to the modern day here a little bit because, again, I heard a lot, as I shared in my maiden speech the other day, about just how impactful this province's $15-an-hour minimum wage has been for a lot of my constituents, a constituency where there are some of the highest levels of child poverty, a constituency where a lot of folks struggle to find affordable, safe housing. Just having that minimum wage has been life changing.

The rhetoric from some folks around the youth wage is saying that, oh, these are young people just living in their parents' basements and that they're just using that for accessories, that sort of thing. But the reality is that, no – again, I know this from speaking to my constituents in Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood – there are a lot of folks, especially new Canadians, young folks, who work to support their families. That small difference in minimum wage has a huge impact on their families. I worry about my constituents.

To the hon. member: if you could just elaborate a little more about what you heard from constituents, particularly when it comes to families trying to make ends meet. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie to respond.

Member Loyola: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood for that question. I think it's very pertinent because it is the reality of many new Canadians that are here, that went through a very similar experience to what my parents went through, that the young members of those families are working jobs and are contributing to the household income, that those dollars that they earn are making sure that with that family budget, they can make it to the end of the month.

For those constituents that are younger, I really don't understand this age discrimination. They work hard. They're contributing to their families. Yet this government wants to reduce the minimum wage for these individuals, that are working hard, contributing to their families, by $2. I think that it's really important that we re-evaluate, and that's why it's very important for me that we support this amendment.

Now, I understand that members on the other side are probably not going to vote for this amendment – I get it – but I think it's pertinent that I represent those people, especially refugees and new Canadians that have gone through a similar experience to what my family has gone through, where we were contributing to the household income through our work. Many of you have heard me talk or say in this House: the dignity of the human person. Why should an individual be discriminated against based on their age? Where's the dignity in that? I ask the members in this House . . .

Member Irwin: I rise on a point of quorum.

The Speaker: Hon. member, just have a seat. You might wait to be called on before you interrupt the member. You may call a point of order. Just in terms of process, if you just wait a moment, I'll just have a brief look at who was in the House prior to the Government House Leader rising.

There are very close to 20 members in the Chamber this morning. There certainly were, in fact, 20, so I would ask the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie to proceed.

Member Loyola: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I was saying, why should we discriminate against these individuals that are contributing to the household income and making sure that their families can actually make it to the end of the month? Why are they being discriminated against?

The Speaker: Hon. members, any further debate on the amendment that is before us? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-South rising in debate.

Mr. Dang: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's really my pleasure to see you this fine morning and to be able to debate this amendment with all members of the Assembly and to have the opportunity to do the important work of this Assembly so that we can move forward and have open discussion on how we can improve legislation that comes before this House. I really want to thank the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview for the amendment here. Pretty clearly, we've seen that Bill 2, the pick-your-pockets bill, really isn't something that supports Albertans. It's really something that doesn't support workers, and by extension we know that it's not something that's going to draw investment or stimulate our economy.

I mean, we can see that what's done with this bill is that it cuts overtime pay for employees, it cuts holiday pay for employees, and it moves forward to roll back protections that were really in line with the rest of Canada, Mr. Speaker. I think that's something that's very concerning. When you want to succeed in business and when you want to move forward and have a strong economy, what you need to have is strong workers that can go out and do the jobs that we need done. I'm very concerned that this bill doesn't accomplish that.

I'm very concerned that this bill will have some very damaging effects for our economy. I mean, we look at some of the things being done here. When we look at the difference between pay at time and a half versus straight time, for some employees that's going to be over $2,500. I mean, that's money that is being spent back in the local economy, that's being spent in local businesses, and that's money that's going to become dead money. If it becomes dead money, Mr. Speaker, I think that's something that should be concerning to all members of this Assembly because we don't need the money sitting in the pockets of bankers. We need the money being spent in Alberta businesses. We need the money being spent right here in our communities. That's something that I think all members of this Assembly should be happy to stand for, should be happy to fight for, and it's something that all members should be very excited about.

I think it's a change that we're seeing, that the government wants to make a change that really has no match in Canada. There is no other Canadian jurisdiction with similar rules. And they did no consultation. The government moved forward on this quickly, with no consultation, and I think that's something that can be very concerning. If they had stopped and done the work – this is a recurring theme, Mr. Speaker – and if they had stopped and simply done consultation and actually talked to Albertans, maybe they would see that there could be adverse effects from what happened here.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me be very clear. The election is over. Our job here today is to make sure we have the best possible legislation for all Albertans. It's to make sure that we move forward and have legislation that improves the lives of all of our constituents. Very clearly, Bill 2 doesn't do that. It won't draw investment to Alberta. It won't stimulate our economy. In fact, what it will do is that it will pick the pockets of vulnerable workers and the average working Albertan, and that is something that I think is actually shameful. I think it's something that we shouldn't stand for in this House and that we should all be proud to stand against.

We're talking about a bill that does things like having different compensation depending on what your human capital is, Mr. Speaker, and I think that's something that is very shameful. I think that we should consider every single Albertan to be equal. We should consider that every single Albertan deserves the same protections and the same pay for the same work, and I think that's something that Albertans will agree with. It's something where Albertans will say: we definitely believe that if we do the same job as you, then we should be paid the same. I think that's something that is common sense. It's fair, and it's common sense.

4:40 a.m.

It really is something that is not unusual from the government, to be moving forward with no consultation at all, and we heard that from the Premier when he said that he wants to move quickly, because his agenda is so important that he can't consult with Albertans, right? Mr. Speaker, that's something that I think is actually really bad for democracy here in this House. It's bad for our Assembly. It's bad for members, private members especially, of course, because we know that the government front bench can move as many bills as they'd like, but private members are subject to the draw and the lottery system. We know that when the government brings forward bills, we expect them to be well researched, we expect them to be well consulted, and the reality is that that didn't happen in this case.

Perhaps the Premier took a page from what they do often in Ottawa and consulted with the big donors and the big friends over there, Mr. Speaker, but I think, certainly, that that's not what Albertans expect of this government. That's not what Albertans want our government to be doing when we invest in our economy and we try to bring forward workplace protections. I mean, we're talking about workplace protections that the NDP government brought in that made workplaces more family friendly. This government, without any consultation, is trying to move in and just throw out the baby with the bathwater. I think that that's something that we should really spend a lot of time considering, whether there were good things in the legislation that we need to talk about.

Trying to ram through this legislation in the middle of the night is something that I'm concerned we'll see the government do again. I'm concerned that the government will continue to try to use the cover of darkness to try and move legislation through the House. I'm concerned that the government will try to move things, that perhaps have not been consulted on properly and perhaps have not been shared with Albertans properly, using the cover of darkness, Mr. Speaker. That is something that I think all Albertans should be very concerned about. It's something that I think Albertans need to keep an eye on. That's why we as Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition will be here making sure we hold this government to account. We hold them to account in making sure bills like this do what they're intended.

Pretty clearly, we can see that they've called it An Act to Make Alberta Open for Business. But that isn't true. It won't draw investment. It won't stimulate the economy. Really, I believe further public input is necessary because when the government wants to go in and pick the pockets of everyday Albertans, working-class Albertans like you and me, Mr. Speaker, when the government wants to go in and remove protections and remove banked overtime pay, I think that's something that Albertans will be concerned about and will want to be consulted about. I think that Albertans will want to have the opportunity to tell their government why this is concerning for them.

When we talk about things like wage differentials and whatnot, Mr. Speaker, these are things that Albertans deserve to have a say on, not just the wealthy donors and friends of the government front-benchers. I think, certainly, that all Albertans deserve to have a say in the legislation, and that's why we're sent here. We're sent here to make sure those protections exist for all Albertans. We're sent here to make sure that it's not just the wealthy donors that get a say in legislation.

I'm concerned that because this legislation was drafted so rapidly and without consultation, we're going to miss a lot of the really important things that we need to talk about. We're going to put Alberta out of step with the majority of provinces when we talk about a lot of these workplace protections. We're going to be behind, basically, British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, and Quebec, Mr. Speaker, and that's something that I think is really concerning to me. I mean, really, there are going to be over 400,000 Alberta workers – indeed, it's actually oil and gas workers that are going to be hit the hardest by these changes. It's going to be workers that depend on their jobs to pay their mortgages.

Really, instead of creating jobs – I know the Premier has spoken at length about how he's obsessed with creating jobs, Mr. Speaker – what he's actually doing is that he's cutting overtime pay for working people, and I think that's something that Albertans should be very concerned about. This is something that Albertans will need to take a look at, and it's something that we need to be able to bring in front of them and actually consult on. I think that this amendment makes a lot of sense when we talk about how there isn't enough public input. When we talk about how this government wants to, through the cover of darkness in the middle of the night or perhaps middle of the morning now, move forward with a bill that has really not seen the light of day, I think that's very concerning. I mean, the value of your work should depend on the effort and skill you put into it.

Really, what the government is doing is trying to set different standards for different people, and I really don't think that the segregation of labour is the way to go about this. Actually, what we should be doing is encouraging people to work their hardest no matter what their demographic is, and I think that's something that's very important. I think that when we talk about some of the changes that are really concerning, of course, youth minimum wage differentials are very concerning, several differentials are very concerning because these people are doing the same work as anybody else.

Certainly, I think that if you're doing the same work, then you should be paid the same. Perhaps members opposite think that a government backbencher should be paid differently than an opposition member, whatever it is. That's their prerogative. But I think that, certainly, Albertans expect that for the same work, you get the same pay. I mean, at the end of the day everybody has to put the same number of hours in, the same amount of effort in, and if they're capable of doing the job, Mr. Speaker, they have to do the job. I think that, pretty clearly, when you look at that, it actually is unfair to segregate workers based on demographics. It actually becomes something that I think Albertans will be very concerned about. I think it's something that the Premier will have to answer. Why does he think certain Albertans are worth less? What is it about their modest human capital that makes them worth less? What is it about people that they deserve over 13 per cent less pay? Thirteen per cent is not an insignificant amount. I mean, if we took 13 per cent out of the provincial budget, I can assure you that would be something quite concerning to all members of this Assembly.

Mr. Speaker, when we look at how drastic these changes are and without any consultation, I think that all members should be significantly concerned. I mean, it's something that we really need to look at and see how shocking some of these changes are. In fact, an economist with the national branch of CUPE called the UCP proposal shocking and said that it hurts tradespeople. Another political scientist from Saskatchewan said that the move would give employers a way to defer a wage cost. I think those are all very concerning things. I think those are all things that Albertans don't want to see. But, of course, we won't know that because the government chose to not consult. The government chose to ram this legislation through hastily without consultation. Really, this amendment speaks to how more public input is necessary. We really do need to go and have more discussions about this because this pick-your-pockets bill takes overtime, steals holiday pay, and it gives a big tax gift to corporations. That's something I'm very concerned about. That's something I think members should be very concerned about. I think that members should take a hard look and say: will working people in our ridings benefit from this?

Really, I think, pretty clearly, working people are going to lose out. I mean, some workers, like I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, are going to lose over $2,500, and that's a huge difference. If in a month your income is reduced by $2,500, for a lot of people that is more than their mortgage payment, perhaps more than their mortgage and child care payment. That is something that I think is very concerning. That is something that I think this government has not thought through. It's something that I think the government needs to spend more time on consulting with the public, and, really, if the government is willing to do that, we'd be happy to move forward and discuss ways to make the legislation better.

Mr. Speaker, we only have one chance to make this right. This legislation will affect the lives of over 400,000 Albertans, 400,000 workers predominantly in oil and gas, and it's something that I'm very concerned about because all workers deserve to have the same protections as they would in any other province, as they would in any other part of Canada. That is something that I think is very important, that Albertans will look at and say: is this what they wanted with a Conservative government? Did they expect a Conservative government to go into their pockets and take their hard-earned money away? That is something that I'm very concerned about, I think that my constituents and many Albertans are concerned about.

I know that the members of the opposition over here, we would love to see that the government would try to consult and perhaps try to engage with average Albertans and with their constituents, but instead we can see that, just like during the campaign, government members decided to flee the public spotlight. They didn't go to any forums, Mr. Speaker. They tried to avoid talking to anybody about their platform. In fact, they wouldn't return phone calls. We tried to reach the Conservative candidate that I ran against on election day. We called the front line at his office, and it was actually disconnected. There was no phone for me to call at all.

That was actually something that I think is indicative of what the government has done today and why the amendment is so necessary. It's that we do need further public input. You cannot run away from the spotlight when you are trying to govern effectively, Mr. Speaker. Governance is about engaging with all Albertans, engaging with all the people that we were sent here to represent, and ensuring that we have legislation that works for all Albertans. We don't see that here in Bill 2, the pick-your-pockets bill. We don't see that the government has done a good job. We don't see that they've actually given consideration to how it's going to hurt the economy, how pulling $2,500 out of workers' pockets is going to hurt the economy, how those workers are no longer going to be able to spend the money in their local economies and in small businesses around their homes. That is something that is very concerning. I mean, when you take money out of the pockets of Albertans and you take it away from their families – sending a worker to the food bank is not how you incite more economic activity.

I really urge all members to vote for this amendment. I think it's very important.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. I see the hon. Minister of Infrastructure is rising with a brief question or comment.

Mr. Panda: Very brief, Mr. Speaker. Good morning. Welcome back.

I really commend the Member for Edmonton-South for bringing in that energy, but if that energy is actually channelled in a positive manner, that would be helpful for the people that elected him in Edmonton-South. I followed him carefully when he talked about Bill 3 a few hours ago, probably three, four hours ago, and now about Bill 2. When he talked about Bill 3, he used the words “risky ideology” probably 30 times. Now when he talked about Bill 2, he talked about consultation, and I want to focus on that, Mr. Speaker. He also mentioned that the election is over, which is good. We are not campaigning anymore. We've finished that. But when the member is talking about consultation, for some of the incumbent members like you and me, just going back into the timeline . . .

Mr. Dang: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: A point of order has been called. The hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

Point of Order

Question-and-comment Period

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise pursuant to Standing Order 29(2)(a):

Subject to clause (b), following each speech on the items in debate referred to in suborder (1), a period not exceeding 5 minutes shall be made available, if required, to Members to ask questions and comment briefly on matters relevant to the speech and to allow responses to each Member's questions and comments.

Very clearly, he's referring to my comments that I made during Bill 3. He said so himself. I believe that we're currently debating Bill 2, and the member should hold his comments to that.

The Speaker: Thank you for the interjection. I will acknowledge that he referenced your comments that you'd made with respect to Bill 3. He also is currently in the middle of talking about your comments with respect to Bill 2. He's only made brief comments, and I think that he's well within his right to do so.

The hon. Minister of Infrastructure.

Mr. Panda: Yeah. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

I just want to set the record straight here. When the member is talking about risky ideology and he's talking about picking pockets, there's nothing further from the truth than these members opposite characterizing as picking pockets. So if putting more money into the pockets of Albertans is “risky ideology,” so be it, Mr. Speaker.

When they talk about consultations, this Bill 2 was on our campaign platform. It was our campaign commitment, and we told Albertans that that's what we'll do, unlike what the NDP did when they were in government. Remember when they brought in Bill 6, the so-called consultation – that should remind them. In our case we actually put it on our campaign platform. We said that that's what we will do. It's a promise made to Albertans, and we are trying to keep our promise, to pass this bill on time. When they talk about equality – the equality we're trying to do here is prosperity for all. It's equality in prosperity, not an equality in misery. That's what they want.

This amendment is moved by an Opposition House Leader who actually is saying that this won't draw investment to Alberta or stimulate the economy. That is not true, Mr. Speaker. The same member actually yesterday attacked the job creators. Yesterday he attacked the job creators, and he apologized. Now he is moving this amendment, which is actually mischaracterizing. Then these members opposite kept talking about picking pockets. The Member for Chestermere-Strathmore tried to correct that, but they keep repeating this, so they are doing a disservice to Albertans and the people that elected them.

Also, Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Calgary-Varsity is an expert on these matters. He has consulted enough, and we are debating here. There are certain aspects of this bill that we actually are going to bring back to the Legislature in the fall after more consultations. We only included here the ones that we had enough consultations on, but there are other aspects of this bill which belong to Bill 2. We're going to bring them to this House after further consultations in the fall.

That being said, Mr. Speaker, I'm not going to support this amendment because the person who moved this amendment, the Opposition House Leader, has no credibility on this.

The Speaker: Thank you to the Minister of Infrastructure.

Over a long period of time the questions and comments in the application of 29(2)(a) have taken a very broad approach. I know that members of the opposition also enjoy the same luxury with respect to how broad the rulings have been on the use of Standing Order 29(2)(a).

With that said, anyone wishing to speak to the amendment? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Merci, M. le Président. Bonjour, et j'espère que vous avez bien dormi un petit peu ce matin. Juste avant le lever du soleil, à cinq heures huit, je suis très heureux de participer dans ce débat au sujet de l'amendement du projet de loi no 2, un projet de loi que je préfère appeler la saison verte contre les travailleurs Albertains et Albertaines.

[Mr. Loewen in the chair]

For those who don't speak even the poor French that I try to, I of course welcomed Mr. Speaker to the morning as the sun rises at 5:08 officially, so it's just before sunrise. I hoped that he had a little bit of sleep, and I was very happy to rise and speak to this debate on the subject of the amendment to Bill 2, a bill that I prefer to call open season against workers in Alberta.

I also wanted to make a point that in this House we are able to speak in French at any time. We are not in any way required to provide a translation or an advance script of what we may wish to speak about in French. That example has been made numerous times by other members in this House, including the current Premier. So I think it's incumbent upon this House, as they do in Hansard, to continue translating after the fact and providing our constitutional rights to speak in French in this Legislature with the substance they deserve.

5:00 a.m.

With that said and speaking to the amendment at hand, I think it's very important that we support this amendment because, in fact, as it says very clearly, the bill will not actually draw investment to Alberta or stimulate the economy and further public input is necessary. Though I think we've shown ample evidence in our remarks although members of the government have suggested to the contrary – I think these efforts have been made time and time again to show that the measures of this bill will certainly not in any way, shape, or form draw investment to Alberta and, in fact, might do the opposite.

I think that any amendment or any bill that demonstrably doesn't accomplish what it purports to accomplish should receive a second dose of sober second thought, and that's what we're asking that the House choose to do by supporting the amendment to Bill 2, An Act to Make Alberta Open for Business, when it really, in fact, is an act that declares an open season on Alberta workers, or, as we otherwise call it, the pick-your-pockets act.

I know I've spoken to many young people who are very, very dissatisfied with the fact that they're going to be suffering the cut in the minimum wage simply because of their age. I have mentioned in this House already my experience with a similar type of a situation, where I was working at a job, in fact, as a DATS bus driver, under contract. The contractor paid us a wage that had been negotiated, and then the contractor changed from one to another. The new contractor felt no obligation to continue paying that wage, and overnight all the workers, all those bus drivers, had a $4-an-hour pay cut, from about $13 to nine bucks an hour.

So I know exactly what our young people in this province are feeling right now. They're feeling very bitter. They're feeling demoralized. They're feeling pretty angry, and they're feeling that the government is really treating them unfairly, and I think that will be reflected in the way they tend to vote when they become eligible to vote.

Also, they are also not alone in this. They have parents. They've got younger siblings and co-workers and friends. On the face of it and when you can hear business owners talk about their efforts to rationalize this cut in pay, saying that it will be, you know, an economic impact that will allow them to hire other workers, it rings pretty hollow on the individual workers who are suffering this loss as well as people who know them, the people who are close to them. It's inherent injustice is pretty blatant, and it's not lost on Albertans what this government is willing to do in the name of saving businesses what they believe is money that they would invest in other workers.

In my view, it's pretty pathetic to hear government members and even some of their validators of this bill and this measure say: "You know, it's good for you. Cutting your wages is good for you. It'll be better." It's more than paternalistic. I'm really shocked that that type of an argument could be made. I certainly didn't feel that way when I had my wages cut by four bucks an hour overnight. I felt terribly exploited, and I really have never forgotten it. I know that I took what actions I could take back then by calling in a reporter and having that reporter write a story. That story hit the newspaper, and the next morning, of course, I was hauled on the carpet in the office of the manager with that article on the desk of that manager and red circles all around the quotes that I made because – and this is a direct quote – I called it a screw job. That was quoted in the paper, and they didn't like it all that much. That's exactly the way I felt, though.

The next morning they concocted a plan and hired a stooge to go ahead and follow me. They did. They followed me all day long. I knew right off the bat, right out of the garage that somebody was following me to concoct a story about whether I'd, you know, put my signal light on or put the brake lights on or come to a full stop. After the shift they concocted a story about how I'd had infractions of driving rules, and they fired me, just like that. Boom. That's what Alberta labour laws have been like, and that's the type of thing I've experienced in my work experience. It was over somebody unjustifiably, in my view, cutting my wages by four bucks an hour, by 25 per cent, overnight.

We're doing the same thing to our young students, our working students, and it's a wholly heartless approach to labour law, just totally disrespectful of the human beings that we have working in our workforce, who are entering our workforce. The message that that sends to people who are working now and have been working at $15 an hour and are chopped to $13 is that they have no value, they're not worth while, and they're dispensable. That's how they actually feel.

I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I felt like that, and you can get a sense of the bitterness I still have and that I hold for the manager and the company that took that action and saw fit to go ahead and just simply cut my wage because they could, because the labour laws allowed them to get away with it. That was, like, 30 years ago, and here we're looking at a government and government members who are arguing that this is what we should go back to and that this is acceptable in 2019 in Alberta, labour legislation that allows a total disrespect of the human beings that are in the workforce by cutting their wages overnight simply to satisfy what they think is a way to stimulate further employment but in a way that's been totally discredited.

What they're doing is damaging young people as they enter the workforce and damaging their view of the whole economic system the government hopes they'll actually embrace. It doesn't make any sense at all to adopt a system that really diminishes the value that people have in themselves. It tells the world that we don't value our young people, yet this government seems intent on rationalizing it away so that businesses will support them, so that business owners will support them. There are business owners who don't support this, who have come clean and said: look, we're going to continue paying the current $15 an hour because we feel ashamed to follow along with this purported government change to reduce the minimum wage.

That's one of the elements of this legislation that I think will not help draw investment back to Alberta or allow or encourage companies to reinvest these so-called savings into Alberta or stimulate the economy because it does more damage to the working force, that they're supposedly helping out by creating more jobs, because it demoralizes working people at a young age. It also, if you do the math, takes about $4,000 a year out of their pockets. That's $4,000 for somebody who's 16 to 18 years of age, and these people are either saving for university or perhaps they're helping their family out.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that I left home after high school, when I was 17 years of age. Believe me, I worked just as hard as anybody else when I was working jobs at 17 years of age out of high school, and I was not happy to suffer another indignity that this government still wants to continue in Alberta, and that's paying a wage differential to younger people. I suffered being paid a lower wage because of my age, as I mentioned before, at the old Marshall Wells warehouse here in Edmonton, that stood on the land that the bus depot used to stand on, and now it's actually part of the Ice District redevelopment. When I was hired there – I think it was somewhere around $2 and a quarter an hour when I was 16 – the people who were 18 were making a differential that brought them somewhere closer to $2.75, $2.65, something like that. I was working shoulder to shoulder with those same workers.

5:10 a.m.

It was not something that I thought anybody should be proud of. I didn't understand it. I mean, that was the way it was. You couldn't do anything about it because that was the law in Alberta, and this is the law that this government wants to turn back to, to turn back the clock. It's something that is a theme of this whole government.

Of course, we know that is something that the current Premier is wont to do because of the article that I've actually tabled once already in this House, where in an Edmonton Sun Sunday edition people are asked 20 questions and interviewed about various things, including their likes in the cinema or what they might have for breakfast on a Sunday. One of the questions, of course, asked of our current Premier when he was interviewed for such a Sunday showcase article was: if you could have your own superpower, your favourite superpower, what in the world would your superpower choice be? Our current Premier said that he would choose "to be able to go back in time." Well, let me say, Mr. Speaker, that he's got his wish. He's moving backwards in time, and he's trying to take the rest of us with him.

I for one am going to resist it every step of the way. This is not what Albertans are looking to do. We're a very forward-looking province. We've got a vision for this province that goes well beyond 1955. In fact, I'd like to say that the 21st century is on the minds of most people who are of working age in this province. We intend to make this government know that the vision extends well beyond labour legislation and looks towards the future with eagerness and excitement and knowledge that we have a capacity in this province to know that beyond our borders are markets that are yet to be sought and yet to be grown, that we have the ingenuity in this province and the brainpower to grow our young minds so that those opportunities can be found and developed and not to accept, as we've been told during the time frame that I grew up and went to university in, that we have limitations on ourselves because we were a landlocked province and we couldn't get another pipeline to tidewater, that we didn't have the intelligentsia to determine the technology that would get the new products developed or value-added products in this province processed.

Whether it be in agriculture or whether it be in industry of other kinds, we have visions on this side of the House that the government lacks.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you very much, Member.

Anyone want to speak under 29(2)(a)? The Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I really appreciate the hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung's comments. In particular, I appreciated – j'apprecie que tu parles français aussi – what you spoke about in regard to the youth wages. I think the Member for Edmonton-South said this very well as well, just the fact that we know, you know, on our side of the House anyways, that all Albertans, young or old, deserve equal pay for equal work.

[The Speaker in the chair]

One of the things I'm quite concerned about as a former teacher myself is the fact that with this wage differential vulnerable teenagers could most definitely be encouraged to drop out to earn a higher wage. That's quite concerning. We still have one of the highest drop-out rates, actually, across Canada, and it's not a rate that has decreased at all in the last number of years. We've made a little bit of progress under your leadership, Member for Edmonton-North West, for sure, but I worry greatly that steps like this are going to roll back any progress that we've made.

So I would ask the hon. member to just speak a little bit more about perhaps his own experience and even that of what he's heard from his constituents around concerns about a differential and the fact that, again, we stand so much for the value that a worker is a worker.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung has the call.

Mr. Dach: Merci encore, M. le Président. Je peux continuer en anglais, mais je suis très heureux de pratiquer mon français et d'avoir l'occasion de temps en temps participer dans le discours dans cette Chambre en français. J'espère que les autres dans la Chambre qui parlent pas le français et même qui voudrait essayer ou pratiquer leur français, qui ont appris dans une école secondaire ou peut être dans un cours d'immersion français – je vous invite de participer avec moi, en parlant français dans cette Chambre. C'est quelque chose que j'aime très bien. Je sais bien que mon grandpère, M. Joseph Edouard Napoleon LaBelle, qui est mort depuis quelques ans maintenant, serait très, très heureux d'entendre nous parlons en français dans cette Chambre. A great pleasure to speak French in this Chamber, and my late grandfather, M. LaBelle, would be very proud to know that we are able to do that in this Legislature.

With respect to the hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood's question, though, the dropout rate – and this is something I'm going to have to learn to say in French; I couldn't look it up quick enough – is something that does simply concern everyone, I think, with justification, because a wage cut may cause somebody to decide that they're going to just drop out of school or claim or lie, saying that they are not a student. I think the depth of that problem has really not been fully analyzed yet. Certainly, the risk of it is there, and it's something that we should be aware of and really consider strongly when we're thinking about what the consequences of this minimum wage cut might be in terms of how many people might decide that they just won't continue their education.

And what's the cost of that? If an individual decides to not pursue their education, somehow is out of school for two or three years, and the next thing you know, they're 22, 23 years of age and they don't have a high school diploma. Their employment opportunities are diminished; their earning power is diminished. It changes their life and that of their families, that they may have already started. It's simply a direct result of a process that this government will have started, and it's unfortunate that this government hasn't really thought that through.

I'm happy to see that members opposite are, bright and early, counting numbers, and we're happy to have that happen.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there others wishing to speak to RA1? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadows.

Mr. Deol: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure – it's my very first time – to rise and speak in favour of this amendment as it clearly lays out that this bill will not draw investment to Alberta or stimulate the economy and that further input from the public is necessary. I think this is a very reasonable amendment, and this should be accepted.

Looking at this bill, you know, and listening to the members in this House, there's no way this bill actually shows that this is going to do any good with our economy. All it seems is that this is another attempt to fund the largest corporations on the backs of the most vulnerable people, the young people of this province. We should have actually encouraged them to get out, to find jobs, and shown them how valuable they are to us and to this society, instead of this. I see this as another part of the systematic attacks on the backs of the ordinary workers. In this case it's on the workers under the age of 18, the most vulnerable people, that did not even vote for this government. They did not even have their input, and they will pay for this decision if this bill gets passed. Mr. Speaker, to me it seems like this is, basically, even a violation of fundamental rights, human rights. It's discrimination based on somebody's age.

5:20 a.m.

I just wanted to go back and share a story with the House. In 2015, when we were going into the provincial election, I was part of the team that was able to arrange a small discussion forum for all the candidates running in south Edmonton. I hope that the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie would remember this incident. There was a question raised during the forum of why you wanted to run and why you think the people should vote for you. One of the candidates from the forum said something about one of the hon. members, our former Speaker and the MLA from my riding, my predecessor the late Gene Zwozdesky. The member said: "You know, I think the member has had the privilege to represent this riding for 22 years. He's over the age of 60 now, and he should not run." You know what happened? Mr. Zwozdesky reacted immediately. What happened after that intimidation: that member was not even able to participate, after that kind of remark, in that whole forum.

And guess what? What are we going to do here? Those innocent young people who are under the age of 18 will do the same amount of work, will have the same skills, will get up the same as us, maybe earlier, 5 o'clock, 6 o'clock, and will go work in gas stations or McDonald's, but they are not entitled to get the same wage because of their age. Those people: we should be encouraging them. When they step up and try to be independent and try to support their families, try to fill their needs – they might need to buy a computer; they might to save some money for their education – they keep this economy moving by participating in this economy. They are the ones that make a little money, and they go to the restaurants, they go to the stores, and they invest their money right there. They help the economy keep moving.

I don't know what benefit this government really sees by rolling back their wages. It's making it so difficult even for the employers. I know what would happen if the young worker is just about to turn 18. He will not find a job because the employer will think twice: given time, after a month or two, he will be entitled that we pay him $15 an hour, so let's not hire him. What would happen if somebody turns 18 just a month before Christmas? What would you do? Let him go? Find another worker?

It's not really helping anyone that I see, not only this bill but the other bills. My friends on the other side, the opposite side of the House, are so confused, and I think that by passing this amendment, it will give them some opportunity to dig deep into this, you know, really look at it and think twice. Maybe that will help them somehow modify the bill. I've seen that in a past bill when it was something to do with giving away a tax cut to the largest corporations. The members on the other side kept referencing the small businesses when, in fact, that bill had nothing to do with the small businesses; it was to fund the largest corporations in the province.

A $15 minimum wage. I just want to repeat that this is a minimum wage, not even a livable wage, that we want to attack. I remember that my colleague, a single parent, you know, earning about $20, was not even able to afford the ordinary living standard we have, the minimum living standard, given the rents, increasing rent – she has to pay about $1,500 – and the daycare expense and the groceries. The $20 will bring probably close to $2,500 home, but it's not really enough for her. And here we're trying to attack a minimum $15 wage, and we are dividing people to attack based on their age.

I think we should actually consider this amendment. I strongly encourage my friends in this House to vote for the amendment. That will really help them actually give us more time and help us address the real issue, the real challenge we are facing ahead in this province.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. I see the hon. Minister of Labour and Immigration was the first to rise.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to address some of the comments made by the hon. member on the other side. I guess the first comment is in regard to the amendment. I'd like to point out that the hon. member spoke a great deal – and I want to address some of his comments – about the youth job-creation wage. In fact, that does not form part of Bill 2, so actually using that as an argument to support the amendment that we need more time to discuss this – I don't understand the logic behind it because, in fact, we wouldn't be discussing it as part of that.

That said, I would like to address and clarify the purpose because the hon. member mentioned that, you know: why are you doing this? Really, the purpose of the youth job-creation wage is just that, to create employment for youth. The previous government, in their rush to move to a minimum wage of $15, almost a 50 per cent increase, in the face of one of the worst economic downturns in the province, left a lot of people behind. By moving the wages up by that amount, thousands of people, thousands of Albertans lost their jobs, and those who were hit the hardest were the youth, the young people in Alberta.

What we are trying to do with this act and what we will do with this act is get our young people back to work. By instituting a youth job-creation wage at $13 an hour, we will provide incentives for employers to actually train young people and get them on the job ladder. It's really important, Mr. Speaker, to point this out. The sooner you get on the job ladder, the more experience that you can get, and once you get more experience, then you can actually increase your wages and go from job to job.

Mr. Speaker, this minimum is exactly that, a minimum. Certain employers will actually decide to pay higher than that, particularly once someone actually gets on that job ladder and gets some experience. There will be employers out there – you know, some concern was raised by the hon. member, saying that there may be a reduction in their pay for people who are currently working, right? But this is a minimum, just that, a minimum.

5:30 a.m.

Employers, once they have trained someone and invested time, energy, and effort in that, they want to hold on to these people. To say that this is automatically going to result in a job cut: quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, this is not true, not true at all. In fact, the Calgary Stampede: we confirmed with them that they had hired a number of students working the summer at $15 an hour, and they confirmed they're going to continue to pay them at $15 an hour. It's a choice. It's a minimum, right? The important thing is the thousands of youth that we have right now who are not making any money, who can't save for school, who can't save for their new car or a trip to Europe or to help out with their family, because what do they earn? They earn nothing right now. By actually establishing a minimum wage at $13 an hour, it provides them an opportunity to get into the workforce, get experience, earn some money, and then get on that job ladder so they can actually increase their wages.

Now, turning to the amendment, the amendment reads that the Alberta open for business act not be read a second time “because the Assembly is of the view that the bill will not draw investment to Alberta or stimulate the economy.” That, quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, is not true. This bill is designed in its totality to actually, you know, reduce burdens on employers through the general holiday changes that we’re actually suggesting, which particularly hit the restaurant industry extremely hard, and to reduce losses of hours and jobs for Albertans, so to get them back to work and also to restore balance.

So I urge all members of the Chamber to not vote for this amendment. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadows, if you would like?

Standing Order 29(2)(a) is still available. The hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It’s always my pleasure to rise under 29(2)(a) and speak to some of the comments that were made here. I mean, I’m really concerned with some of the comments the minister made here. Of course, the Member for Edmonton-Meadows really spoke to some of the importance of why the opposition is trying to move this amendment. I’m concerned when the minister speaks about how the youth wage is supposed to help youth, but really clearly we’ve seen youth across this entire province speaking out. In fact, if you look on social media – I hope you’ll rule that this is a phrase that could be in order, Mr. Speaker – the minister has been ratioed twice yesterday alone.

The Speaker: Hon. members, we are on the amendment. I see the Member for Calgary-McCall rising to debate.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to speak to this amendment that this bill not be read a second time because we’re of the view that it “will not draw investment to Alberta or stimulate the economy and that further input from the public is necessary.” I guess I can start by saying that the government got the mandate. They may have mentioned some of these things in passing in their campaign, but in no way, shape, or manner was it a comprehensive consultation on the detailed amendments that are brought forward in this legislation.

I will briefly talk about the context that when we became government in 2015, I think there was a consensus around Albertans, labour folks that the Employment Standards Code, the Labour Relations Code, these pieces of legislation, had not been reviewed for decades and that essentially Albertans didn’t have the same rights that Canadians in other provinces were enjoying, hence the changes that were made to holiday pay, to compassionate care, those breaks and many other changes that were made essentially to give Albertans the same rights that in other provinces Canadians were enjoying.

Also, there was a promise made that we would increase the wage to $15, and hence we increased the minimum wage, but we heard from the minister in particular that they are cutting $2 from youth wages to create employment. Again, being a student of economics, I fail to see the logic that we will cut someone’s wage and somehow business will hire some more people. I think businesses will hire people only when they need it, and when they need it, they will hire them whatever that minimum wage is.

The U.S. brought in a minimum wage for the first time in 1938, and up until 2014-15 they raised the minimum wage 21 times. There are longitudinal studies about that increase in the minimum wage. Every time the argument that we heard from the other side was the same, that it will kill the economy, that it will kill businesses, that it’s not the right time, and all those arguments. However, the evidence is that the increase in the minimum wage didn’t result in unemployment, and in most cases employment grew, their GDP grew, and economic activity grew.

Essentially, if you want to create youth job opportunities, I think one example will be that in 2015 they discontinued the program called STEP, student temporary employment program. We invested back into that program, restored that program, added somewhere around $10 million to that program, essentially working with the employers to make sure that they are hiring youth on a priority basis and getting them the experience they need. That’s how you create opportunities. That’s how you create youth employment. I don’t think that cutting their wages magically creates employment by, I guess, any stretch.

Here I think they are saying that, again, they are helping businesses, but at the same time they are taking away the rights from Albertans that they fought for. There is a long history of how they got those rights in the first place. Secondly, they are attacking those rights that Canadians enjoy in other provinces.

If we talk about, for instance, overtime pay, there is a huge history of how we came to the eight-hour workday and how overtime was agreed to when you work more than eight hours of the day. Overtime means that you are working after those eight hours of the day, and before you were able to bank that at time and a half. Now they will not have that protection if that bill was to pass.

5:40 a.m.

The same thing with, like, their holiday pay: that’s getting cut. When we say that it’s pick-your-pocket legislation, then they say that, no, somehow that’s not appropriate. But if we look at the Albertans who earn overtime, I think, those who are working in the oil and gas industry, they may have shifts where they’re working in a certain period, like, on projects that are three weeks straight or sometimes more than that, and the legislation that was in place was giving them the opportunity to then bank that overtime at time and a half. There were workers in the construction industry who were able to do that. There were workers in skilled trades.

Essentially, all those workers will not have these protections because of this piece of legislation. That’s why it is important that we not now read this bill for the second time but take some time to get public input, look into these matters in a fulsome manner. It’s just the First Session and, I guess, the ninth day. Why rush it so much? We still have time, and we should take the time that’s needed and necessary to get these things right. I don’t think that mentioning it once or twice in a campaign amounts to fulsome consultation on such important protections, on such important rights that have consequences for the livelihoods of thousands and thousands of Albertans. In some cases, like, it’s $2,000 to $3,000 per 12 weeks, or two, three months. That’s a huge difference, especially for working people.

Similarly, I think I talked about youth jobs and those differentials. I think it’s a matter of fairness as well that people who do similar work, the same kind of work, be treated in the same manner and fairly and just, I guess. Having an arbitrary age limit put in there just to discriminate, just to find an excuse to pay somebody less: I think that’s not fair. If somebody is doing similar work and putting in time, putting in effort, they should be paid the same.

There are many other things. Like, if we talk about our minimum wage, even though there was an expressed campaign promise that would raise it to $15, we worked with industry, we worked with businesses, and we agreed that we will bring in that minimum wage in a phased manner. Then we brought it in in four different instalments and gave businesses opportunities to adjust. Similarly, I think that in this case, since these are sweeping changes, there is value to getting input from the public. That's why, again, this amendment is very important.

Then I talked a little bit about general holiday pay and that distinction, how that has been changed and how the eligibility has changed. I think those changes do put Alberta out of step with other provinces such as British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, and Quebec. The rest of Canada is doing something differently, and now this piece of legislation will put Alberta out of step. Again, that also necessitates that Albertans should have similar rights and that this government take the time necessary to consult with the public, consult with those who will be impacted by this legislation, consult with those whose livelihood will be impacted by this legislation.

With respect to banked overtime changes I think no other Canadian jurisdiction, as far as I can tell, has similar rules. Again, there were no consultations that were undertaken, and these changes are rushed through. This amendment creates that opportunity for the government to take the time that is needed and to consult with those who will be directly impacted by these changes.

At the same time, I think we also heard, as the name An Act to Make Alberta Open for Business at least tries to suggest, that somehow these changes will help businesses, that these changes will help stimulate the economy. I think that attacking workers, their rights, in no way, shape, or manner will ever help the economy or will ever help draw investment or stimulate the economy. I think there is evidence, actually, to the contrary. If you pay your workers well, you will see that you have a better retention rate. You will have better productivity. By attacking workers' wages, I think you're doing exactly the opposite of what you're trying to do if you're making it open for business, encouraging businesses to hire more, stimulating the economy, or attracting investments. These kinds of changes will not attract investment if workers are attacked like that. That's not helping the government achieve that as well.

These changes, coupled with other changes such as those huge tax breaks like the $4.5 billion in tax breaks, coupled with this bill and that kind of attack on workers' rights I think will not help us in any way, shape, or manner. Rather, on one hand, their rights are getting impacted, and on the other hand we do know that in the absence of new revenue sources, if other bills are passed, they will have an impact on their services, too.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood is rising with a brief question or comment.

Member Irwin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you to the member for his comments. I particularly appreciated his comments in regard to fairness. This fairness, or perhaps lack thereof, seems to be a theme. We were talking about fairness earlier today when we were discussing the $4.5 billion tax giveaway. This is a government that is choosing to give the wealthiest Albertans, corporations a large tax giveaway yet arguing about a fair wage for young people and denying them the opportunity to earn a fair wage. [interjection] Exactly.

I just wanted the member to maybe speak a little bit more about fairness in the context of this bill and this amendment in particular and to just perhaps share as well – I know we talked a little bit earlier about some of the individual stories; the Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie talked about that a little bit as well, just the individual impact, and I know the member has a pretty, you know, important story of his own – about just what an impact a fair wage would have on your family as well.

Thank you.

5:50 a.m.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Member, for the question. I think that when we talk about the minimum wage in the context of fairness, we do know that there are almost 350,000 to 400,000 Albertans who get impacted by the minimum wage.

[Ms Sweet in the chair]

If we further break that down, we do know that two-thirds of that number are women, oftentimes with responsibilities for family, child-bearing, child-rearing. I think the saying goes that the criteria for a just society is that you look at how they treat their most vulnerable. These students, those people who are working on minimum wage, struggling day in and day out to meet their basic needs, to put food on the table, to provide for shelter: they are struggling. For a government to pick winners and losers: that's not the government's job. The government's job is to treat everyone fairly, to be the government for everyone, and in making decisions, I think they have to balance competing interests.

Certainly, we want to see a thriving economy. We want our businesses to thrive. We want our businesses to create jobs, create opportunities, but at the same time we need to be mindful of what impact these changes will have on our society, what impact these changes will have on our youth, what impact these changes will have on women, who make up two-thirds of those who are earning the minimum wage. Those things also need to be considered.

In the way this legislation is drafted, I think it takes a lot away from workers in Alberta. It takes a lot away, and at the same time we do not see and we are of the view that it doesn't get the intended results of drawing investments or stimulating the economy. Rather, it's just picking winners and losers, and I think that in this case those who are working Albertans, those who are on the minimum wage, those who are young are at the losing end of the spectrum. I don't think that's fair in a modern society like ours. I think we can certainly do better, and there are many other ways that we can attract investment. There are many other ways that we can stimulate the economy. For instance, when we were in government, to attract investment, we came up with tax credits.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to the amendment? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Madam Speaker. How nice to see you in that chair. You look great there.

Good morning again, everyone. To those of you who may have been – I'm not speaking to the hon. members; I'm speaking to those maybe watching online the riveting discussions that we're having in this Legislative Assembly. I'm sure there were many of them who went to bed last night watching this feed online, and now they've probably woken up and, of course, turned it on again, and they're probably wondering: what is wrong with those members in that Assembly that they're still wearing the same outfits they were wearing last night? It's not a walk of shame; it's just that we are here working hard, all of us, for Albertans. So just a shout-out about our outfits, that have lasted quite some time.

I am pleased to rise today and speak to this amendment to Bill 2, named, of course, by the members on the opposite side as the open for business act, but as you may know, we have another name for it over on this side, and that would be the pick-your-pockets bill. You know, I spoke earlier this evening, morning – I’ve lost track of what it is – on the issue of how we have a lot more in common than we have different amongst our parties.

One of the things, I think, that leads to this perception that, you know, one party believes in one thing and one believes in another is that we hear a lot of the members opposite speaking a lot about jobs. Of course – I made the point earlier – we care about jobs over here on this side as well. One of the reasons why it’s sometimes hard to believe that the members opposite are committed to something beyond jobs is that they don’t seem to actually care so much about the people who are performing those jobs. They talk a lot about jobs and don’t seem to give as much or even decent consideration to the people who are actually performing that work.

I spoke earlier about how, you know, we care about private-sector jobs – and those have certainly been hurt in the last few years with the downturn in the oil prices – but we don’t talk about public-sector jobs. Those are jobs as well. The members opposite talk a lot about wanting to increase jobs – and we agree with that – but those jobs come with people attached to them. Those people are Albertans who are performing the work. I’m confused sometimes as to why there is so much interest in the job but not in the person behind it. That’s why it feels like there is an intent on the other side to perhaps only focus on who, I guess, creates the job, as the term is used over there, and not so much on who performs it. It seems like they’re picking the pockets of Alberta employees.

I watched the NDP government bring in the changes to the Employment Standards Code and the Labour Relations Code. I’m an employment and labour lawyer. That’s my practice. I did that for some time. What I knew was that the existing Employment Standards Code, prior to the NDP government, was incredibly outdated. I studied law in Ontario. I have a lot of friends that I went to law school with who still practise in Ontario. We would sometimes talk about questions and issues that came up, and they were constantly shocked about how far behind the Employment Standards Code was. We’d be talking about an issue, and they’re, like, “Well, of course, you have to do this because, you know, that’s the law.” I’d be, like: “No, no. That’s the law in Ontario. That’s not the law in Alberta.” We didn’t provide a lot of the same standard benefits that were provided across this country to workers.

It goes without saying that the Employment Standards Code and the Labour Relations Code were long overdue for a review and for an overhaul. I think it’s telling that the provisions that were brought forward in Bill 2 – actually, there were a lot of things that were kept in there that were brought in by the NDP government. I think that speaks to the fact that even the members opposite recognize that there was a need to bring our employment and labour standards up to code and up to a standard that at least met the minimums nationally.

What’s interesting, though, is that while they kept a lot of the great things about the changes to the Employment Standards Code such as the leave provisions, compassionate leave, you know, medical leave, providing the ability for workers to take unpaid leave when difficult circumstances struck them – they protected those – the things that they have decided that they want to roll back seem to be very targeted. These were not the issues that were a matter of public consultation.

You know, I’ve also stood up in this House and talked about understanding that there was a mandate that was brought forward, because the UCP laid it out very clearly in their platform. Arguably, there were a couple of issues that were, for sure, election issues, and we got a clear message from the voters on how they believed in that. As much as the members in my constituency might have felt differently, there were some issues which, I am willing to grant, were election issues. But I don’t agree that rolling back the minimum wage for young workers and that carving out and scaling back and clawing back the overtime from Albertans was part of their mandate. They may have laid it out – we talk a lot about how thick that UCP platform was – but I can tell you that even people that I spoke to at the doors in my riding who told me they were going to be voting for the UCP would mention that they don’t agree with scaling back overtime, that they don’t agree with a lower minimum wage for young workers. So I don’t actually believe that the members on the opposite side can stand up and say that they have a clear mandate to roll back wages for young workers, to claw back overtime pay in particular.

6:00 a.m.

That really strikes me because – I’ve already talked about this – the members on the other side seem to really place a higher benefit on private-sector jobs versus public-sector jobs. I don’t think that’s a secret. I don’t think that’s a surprise. But who is going to get hurt most by clawing back the overtime? A lot of private-sector employees, particularly private-sector employees in oil and gas. You know, we know the statistics. I’m sure my colleagues have already spoken to it numerous times. The average oil and gas worker who might be putting in 10 overtime hours in a week on a 12-week project: that’s 120 hours in paid time off that they would have earned. By clawing it back so that they only get that time at straight time, not at overtime pay, that’s a loss of $2,500. These are workers, these are jobs that the members on the other side claim to highly value, yet they’re looking to pick the pockets of those employees and those jobs. As I mentioned, I don’t believe that there’s a mandate to do that.

I want to speak specifically on the issue of lowering the minimum wage, which, again, I don’t believe was a matter of proper consultation. Certainly, that’s why I speak in support of this amendment, because I think there was a false premise behind the idea that youth workers somehow should be valued less. I heard talk – and I heard it even from some of the supporters and donors to the members on the other side who talk about the young workers – that somehow they’re privileged kids living in their basements who are, you know, just buying fancy iPhones with their wages and that therefore these kids don’t really need their money and that therefore it’s okay to pay them less.

A couple of comments on that point. First, I will say that I find it a very unusual argument from the members on the other side, that for some reason how you spend your money and whether or not you need it should determine how much you get paid, because that sounds very much like a socialist argument: each to earn what they need. And I don’t think that anybody, any of the donors on the other side, would suggest that very wealthy individuals in this province don’t need all that money, don’t need their luxury vehicles or whatever it is, and that therefore we shouldn’t pay them as much. I’m pretty sure there wouldn’t be support for that argument on the other side.

First of all, I really think that that’s a false argument, the idea that young workers don’t need their money as much, because I can tell you for a fact that there are many – and I know my colleagues from Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood and Edmonton-Ellerslie spoke a lot about their experiences and the people in their ridings, and I can echo that – young workers who are working because they need the money, because they’re supporting their families with their money. They are working the same jobs as people who are – there’s no difference between a worker who is 17 years and 364 days old and an 18-year-old. How can we argue that that person is worth less just because they're one day younger?

[The Speaker in the chair]

My husband is actually an assistant principal at a north Edmonton high school. A significant number of students at his high school are newcomers to Canada. They are recent immigrants; they are refugees. We know first-hand that a lot of those kids work part-time jobs and not because they're using that money for fancy gadgets although if they wanted to, by all means, it's their right to do so. But these kids are actually contributing directly to their family incomes.

In fact, my husband and I took in and welcomed into our family one of these young students, who just graduated – I shouldn't say "graduated." He finished high school. He was a recent refugee from Somalia. He was the eldest of a family of six kids. Because he was focusing on trying to finish his schooling – he was working, and he was getting some pressure from his family to actually focus more on working, so that he could contribute to the family income, rather than complete school. He became a member of our family. We welcomed him in, and he lived with us for some time. We really encouraged him to finish school, but he got a significant amount of pressure. It was not uncommon in that community, in that group for families to expect the children to work, to contribute to the family income. He was the eldest of six kids, and, yeah, he was expected to act like a contributing adult to the family. Certainly, his income was not going to frivolous luxury items. His income was going directly to support his younger siblings and his parents.

You know, we can talk about young workers as if they're somehow privileged kids, but I can tell you that that is a privileged position, to be able to think about young workers in that way, because, really, there are many, many, many young people who are working hard.

Of course, let's think about those young people who do not have families that they're living with and who are actually supporting themselves. Interestingly enough, not to diverge too much, we know that this government recently introduced an amended Education Act, which will lower the age of compulsory education, which makes it easier for children to drop out of school at age 16. So there could be a lot of kids who are 16 years of age who are no longer in school – this government seems to be encouraging some of them to do that – and a lot of them are supporting themselves. To suggest that they don't need that money as much because they're young is simply a false premise. I think it's very clear that they do require that income.

It goes back to the basic principle that I think the members on this side have repeatedly stated, which is: equal pay for equal work. I really sort of object to that idea that young people should be worth less. Frankly, let's get back to what we should be making and how we should be making our policy and government decisions, which is based on evidence. I don't know that there is – I have not seen any, and I've read a lot of the materials that have been put out by the members on the other side – clear evidence that actually shows that lowering the minimum wage for young workers will actually increase jobs. It seems to be maybe a bit of a tipoff to perhaps some very vocal groups that support it and third-party supporters of the UCP. That would be, like, Restaurants Canada. I'm sure they have an interest in making sure that younger people get paid less. We know they do, as a matter of fact.

I want to go back a little bit to the concept of minimum wage. Again, I actually heard the minister of labour speak out earlier and mention – I heard him referencing the minimum wage and saying, "You know, it's a minimum wage, and employers could always choose to pay their employees more," which is interesting because the idea of a minimum means that there should be nothing lower than it. Yet here we have something lower than a minimum wage for some workers. It seems to be blowing the concept of a minimum out of the water, really. It doesn't seem to exist anymore because now we have a minimum and a minimum-minimum. That just doesn't even seem to make sense.

Again, the arguments that they have made about how hurtful raising the minimum wage was for the economy: if it was so bad to raise the minimum wage to $15 per hour, I question why it wasn't part of their primary platform and why they're not rolling out a pick-your-pockets bill to lower the minimum wage. I'll tell you why they're not doing that. They're not doing that because they know that that's going to hurt Albertans. What they're doing is picking on vulnerable Albertans. They're picking on Albertans that – they're counting on it – will not be voting, that will not speak out. That would be young Albertans. Those will be young workers.

Mr. Eggen: They will vote.

Ms Pancholi: Well, in a couple of years they will.

In fact, I've been speaking with some. I actually got some feedback from young constituents in my riding who said that they can't wait until they can vote. I can't wait until they can vote as well.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Thank you to the hon. member for your comments.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-North West rising under 29(2)(a). You'd like to make a brief question or comment?

Mr. Eggen: Yes. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I really appreciated the analysis that the Member for Edmonton-Whitemud was bringing forward. I was particularly interested in your labour background – right? – and speaking with your friends or colleagues in other provinces and talking about protections or the lack thereof between jurisdictions. I know we've been talking about the minimum wage quite a lot, but I'm very interested in this banked overtime issue because there's been some conflicting information put out and, I think, some disinformation, you know, but without the government actually backing away from the essence of picking the pockets of workers on banked overtime.

6:10 a.m.

You know, it's very interesting. I was door-knocking, as we all were, last month. I have pretty good knowledge of my constituents, dating back more than a dozen years sometimes. I've known the same people from running at different times. One place that I went to – and I was so surprised because I know that they were dyed-in-the-wool PCers, right? They always had a PC sign. I can see it in my mind's eye right now. We respectfully disagreed. There wasn't, like, animosity or anything. But when I went to knock on the door there, just in sort of early April, the gentleman invited me in and proceeded to just be absolutely livid around this banked overtime thing because this gentleman works on projects in Fort McMurray and so has very intense sort of working periods for a number of months and then comes back to spend time with his family. He has built a budget for his family and himself over a long period of time based on the regular hours that he works but all of this banked overtime, too. It's not like he's bringing in untold riches and it's just gravy; rather, it's the sum total of his budget, which is actually fairly modest. It's a middle-class area. The people aren't super wealthy, and neither is this family.

So I'm curious to know – and perhaps you can help me with this and help everybody, really, maybe understand banked overtime – have you had any observations of it in other jurisdictions? Perhaps you could help me with that.

The other issue that I was curious to ask you about was in regard to the minimum wage. One observation that I'm making: we, coincidentally, have the bill to reduce red tape on the floor here now. How would you sort of see, with your legal background, the idiosyncrasies and the complications that are associated with having different minimum wages for different people, right? I've been a student of how things evolve over time in this Legislature. Once you get your foot in the door or there's a crack in something, then the wedge gets bigger. You start by discriminating against young people that are under the age of 18. You recall that a couple of days ago I did a member's statement talking about, you know, the gift that the UCP is giving to these grade 12 graduates. If they happen to be born in January, February, March, April, May, or June, or the other way around, I guess – if you were born at a certain time and in a certain month, then you're out of luck, SOL, getting paid 13 per cent less than the others. My point is: how would you see it in a legal or legislative framework of actually having increased red tape quite exponentially by trying to govern over a differential minimum wage for kids?

Then I would suggest that if this manages to sneak through, the next target will be restaurant workers who are waiters. We've heard all of this before. You know, it's a slippery slope. It's unfair, it's unjust, it's unequal and quite offensive, but it also reeks of great swaths of red tape in trying to regulate something like this. Perhaps you could help me with that a little bit, too.

The Speaker: Or perhaps not.

Hon. members, we are back on the amendment. Are there any wishing to speak? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday.

Mr. Carson: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise this morning on the amendment to Bill 2. Of course, once more, the amendment says that Bill 2 be not now read a second time because the Assembly is of the view that the bill will not draw investment to Alberta or stimulate the economy and that further input from the public is necessary.

I guess I would just start my comments with some concern about the premise of this Bill 2, this legislation, being considered something that would bring investment to this province. I can see it now, a commercial done by the Alberta government saying, "Come and invest your money in Alberta because we can pay our workers less," not necessarily something that I would be so proud of shouting from the mountaintops.

I do want to begin with the fact that this legislation is proposing that we allow employers to pay workers less when it comes to banked overtime. Of course, currently the legislation in this province says that we can pay time and a half. I believe that was a change that our government made, something that I support greatly, and it's something that many other provinces enjoy within their legislation as well. Of course, the Premier did make comments recently that said that this legislation would not affect or diminish overtime pay. Now, I do take great concern with that. I think it's been brought up several times that changing this legislation will affect, for one, 400,000 Albertans who work overtime on a regular basis, and it is going to take upwards of $2,500 away from them in a 12-week project.

Now, I think back to the work that I was doing before I was in this Chamber, a couple of jobs back, as an electrician working for a company that maintained and serviced and built dorm sleeping quarters for the Fort McMurray oil sands primarily. This company is bankrupt now, thankfully, judging by the way that they treated their employees. Of course, this is, hopefully, a unique situation, but it is a situation that happened in the province while I was working as an electrician. We would get into a situation where it was crunch time and we had to get these buildings, these dormitories out to Fort McMurray. My employer at the time would say: "Well, these need to be out tonight by 1 a.m. So, you know, you started at 6 a.m. this morning; you're going to work till 1 a.m., past the 40, 44 hours in a week." I'm now working into overtime, but am I going to get time and a half for my banked time? No. Am I going to complain about it? Well, if I complain, they say, "Do you like this job that you have?" Hard to argue with that, hard for me to come back to my employer and say, "You need to do something about this."

Of course, there are labour boards and bodies that we can go to as employees, and those are important parts of our system that should be utilized as much as possible. But I was younger then, and I did want to keep my job. Of course, there are concerns about new Canadians that sometimes don't understand the legislation and don't understand their rights as well as somebody else.

Now, I do want to discuss the fact that not within this bill, which is also a concern, is the fact that we're talking about paying youth under 18 years old less than everyone else in the province. The fact is that these changes didn't come before the Assembly. I have great concerns with that because really it shows that the government didn't feel that it was necessary to have this conversation in the Legislature. Thankfully, I appreciate that the Speaker is allowing us to have this conversation though it is not within Bill 2, but it was a policy announcement at the same time as this legislation, so I do appreciate that.

Now, of course, when we were elected – in 2015 the NDP was elected to government – we followed through on our platform commitment to gradually phase in a $15 minimum wage. Of course, before the rise in minimum wage, Alberta had the lowest minimum wage across Canada. That is a fact I imagine some Conservative politicians were quite proud of, and I'm sure that before the implementation of their order in council there were many conversations behind closed doors about whether or not they should return to being the lowest again because somehow that might be an advantage.

I have to wonder if the government members see the hypocrisy in their willingness to exploit youth for their labour, a group within our society that has very little ability to hold the members of this Assembly accountable. Thankfully, they will be able to do so in a few years from now, and I'm sure they will take great pleasure in voting whichever way they do. Maybe there are youth out there that support having their wages slashed. I find that hard to believe, but maybe.

Now, I've been watching the debate around this bill that has transpired even on social media, and many people have asked how this move to lower minimum wage for youth workers is even legal – and it's come up a few times in this House now – considering that age discrimination is prohibited under the Alberta Human Rights Act, but I'm sure the government members have spent some time making sure that it's, you know, totally legal to pay people less money. That's great. Of course, within the current human rights legislation in our province age discrimination itself for people under 18 years old, well, apparently it's not a problem. Now, Speaker, just because it's not illegal to discriminate against people that are under 18 doesn't make it right, and just because it might create a few extra jobs, which in itself I don't think I've heard any real evidence through this debate that that's the case, it doesn't mean that we should be proud of lowering the minimum wage for the next generation of workers in our province.

The role of government is to protect the interests of Albertans, but with the pieces of legislation that we've seen so far, I tend to wonder why we need this Assembly at all. The members opposite seem to think the only people they need to represent are large corporations. Now, there's no doubt that we need to consider the implications of legislative changes to all parties, but the government is doing a really poor job of showing that they have the workers' best interests at heart. We heard from the Member for Edmonton-Whitemud that we aren't hearing a lot of conversation about workers. We hear a lot about making sure that we protect the rights of employers and making sure that we protect their bottom lines, but we don't hear very much on confidence for the workers who support these businesses, big and small.

Of course, this is not a new phenomenon. The privilege that we as members have is something that very few have the opportunity to experience. Of course, the opportunity is even less likely if you are a woman or a person of colour, a person with a disability, a member of the LGBTQ community, or low income, and in the instance that you are a combination of any of these groups, your chances of being elected to this Legislature are even lower. It concerns me that we are coming into this Legislature with the privilege that we do have – and I can respect that there are members on both sides of this House that are in these categories of people who are less likely to be elected, and I do appreciate hearing their voices as much as we can because it's important to have them here. But for us with the privilege that we do have to be making decisions about vulnerable populations and to say that these people don't deserve as much money as these people, I have great concerns with that. Of course, it's not lost on me, Speaker, that I'm a white, straight, cisgender male, but in this instance it is not me ignoring the intersectionality of the issue of minimum wages for workers.

It is clear, though, that historically and to this day the lack of diversity and the lack of inclusion within this Assembly has led to a system that often works against a large segment of our population, a population that has been left voiceless for far too long.

Moving on to the labour side of things, when we look at the provisions within this legislation regarding removing the card check certification, it's important to recognize that this is an attack on all workers of this province. Workers who are looking to unionize are often doing so because they don't feel that they're being respected by their employer, and they feel that they need better representation, and it's their democratic right to form a union if they have the right amount of people willing to do so within their organization.

Now, it's probably no secret. I've brought it up a few times in this House that I support unions, and I'm a member of a union myself, IBEW 424. I mentioned that I'm an electrician. Really, anyone who enjoys weekends or paid leaves, among other important things, should support the right to organized labour and the right to form a union. When we talk about representing and protecting the rights of workers, especially those who are often left without a voice, I am proud of the work of unions in our province and across the world through history. I'm disappointed that through this government's first few bills, well, this bill specifically, they've chosen to attack those very workers who have worked so hard to get us the instances that I spoke of.

Now, to take it one step further, this government felt it necessary, above their attack on unions, above their corporate tax giveaways that we discussed earlier, I guess yesterday, to attack those workers who work hard enough to earn overtime. Now, you are telling workers that they don't deserve to be fairly compensated even though they are going above and beyond to support their employer, and it's simply not fair. I mentioned that all of the employees were more than happy to push past a 12-hour day, past a 14-hour day. We just wanted to be fairly compensated, and what you're telling employers is that they have the opportunity to not do so.

Speaker's Ruling Decorum Relevance

The Speaker: If I might interrupt the hon. member, I just may remind members that when entering or exiting the Chamber, they might do so in a sleuthy-type manner.

I'd also just like to provide a little bit of a cautionary tale to those who are having sidebar conversations. The hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday does have the call, and if you need to have additional conversations, perhaps those could take place in the lobbies.

While I'm on my feet providing cautionary tales, I know that the hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday was just going to tie his remarks into the fact that we're on the amendment and not on the main bill and provide perhaps a little bit more relevance as to why his arguments are in fact directed towards the amendment and not the main bill. I wasn't going to interrupt just for that, but since I was on my feet, I thought that perhaps I would just provide a little reminder to all members to keep their comments relevant to the topic at hand, and in this case we are on the amendment.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday.

Mr. Carson: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Really, the points that I've brought forward so far are once again just to clarify the fact that creating a system where we're profiting off taking away the ability, for one, or weakening the ability of employees to organize a union or taking away the ability of a youth, or somebody under 18, to get a fair wage based on the work that they're doing relates well back to this amendment.

Once again, I haven't heard any arguments from the government members that show that this will actually draw investment, that this is incentivizing more investment into the province. I think the case could be made for the corporate tax cut, which I have also argued against, of course. I don't see the connection so much with Bill 2.

Now, I do want to bring up the fact, just moving back to the youth wage, that my mother – and I've mentioned it once in this House before – was 14 years old when I was born. So, really, it's quite offensive to me, through the conversations that have happened in this House, to hear people saying – and I know it's been brought up a few times. One of the members opposite said that people under 18 years old, you know, don't have anything important to pay for. They're paying for candy. They're paying for video games and iPhones and things like that. My mother had me when she was 14 years old and raised me as a single mother. She continued to go to school. This current government is actually trying to stop people, it seems like, from going to school to get their full wages, $15 an hour. But she continued to go to school, and she had very little support, if any support, from other members of the family.

I just wonder how much thought you've put into the impact of your minimum wage changes on someone like her, who chooses against all odds to support a child by herself at such a young age. Now, the fact is that by the time she was 15, she had more responsibility and had more life experience than many people who are reaching the age of 18 or are in their early 20s, and you don't seem to account for that in your minimum wage changes.

Now, think of the family units that you are harming through these changes. Not every 16-year-old is looking for some spare change, as I mentioned, and even if that was true, as the Member for Edmonton-Whitemud made the point, it's their money to spend on whatever they want. Over the last four years I have met with a pay equity committee over at AUPE, and I think it's an important point that needs to be made: equal pay for equal work. It doesn't matter how old you are. If we decided to change it from not youth getting paid less but another segment of the population, say seniors, which would be horrible, just like these changes are horrible, I think that there would be an uprising and people would be very, very upset. But somehow since it's people under the age of 18, it's okay to do that.

The fact is that these changes are going to push more youth into poverty. What you're telling the LGBTQ youth that have been kicked out of their house, because we've weakened GSAs, and they've now been outed in their schools is that they're being forced to work full-time, and if they happen to make it into overtime, well, for one, they can't bank their overtime at one and a half, but also that if they choose to continue going to school, they're going to get paid less. They're trying to take care of themselves, but now we're making them even more vulnerable.

6:30 a.m.

You are telling the young single mothers in our province that their child care costs, their education costs, and simply their ability to stay out of poverty matters very little to you, and I have concerns with that. To make it worse, you're holding a carrot over their heads and saying: if you break 28 hours, we will give you $15 an hour.

The Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. The hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, it's always a pleasure to hear from my colleague from Edmonton-West Henday. If I was not convinced before to vote for this amendment, I certainly am now because in looking at it and hearing what the member had said, clearly the pick-your-pockets bill is not what Alberta needs right now. Clearly, the pick-your-pockets bill certainly needs more consultation. I mean, hearing the stories of what some of the member's background was and hearing about what went on in his life and in his family's life I think is something that all members should take a very hard listen to. If they missed it, perhaps they should catch it in the Blues or in Hansard because that is the reality that so many Albertans face every single day.

I think it's shameful that government members want to pick the pockets of ordinary working Albertans, Albertans that are trying to make ends meet, Albertans that are trying to have a successful life and pay their bills. But the government is only interested in picking their pockets. I think that's something that they absolutely should reconsider and, really, is something that they absolutely need to take back to the public and see if there is more consultation that could be done on a bill that is rammed through, I would say, in the cover of darkness, Mr. Speaker. But it appears the sun is beginning to shine, and perhaps Albertans can start to see what is really going on behind this bill. Perhaps they'll really see the attack on workers that is going on in this bill. Perhaps the 400,000 Albertans that will lose their banked overtime will begin to see what the government is trying to do here.

I think that is something that is really concerning to all Albertans. I think it's something that all Albertans should look at and say: do they want to give up as much as over $2,500? That's what the government is trying to do. They're trying to pick the pockets of ordinary Albertans. They're trying to reach in and take away what Albertans and ordinary workers deserve and have earned, Mr. Speaker. I think that's something that's very concerning to me.

I know the hon. member also spoke quite a bit about the wage differential and the minimum wage. I think that's also very concerning because, again, we've heard time and time again about vulnerable teenagers: the government is actually asking them, in fact, to drop out of school. That is the opposite of what any member in this Assembly should do. We should be encouraging them to try to pursue their educations while also being able to earn a living wage, but if the government members in the front and backbenches simply don't care, then that is what Albertans will see as we move forward with this bill, Mr. Speaker. I think it's something that certainly young people in this province will see, and I believe other Albertans as well will continue to watch and see what the government is trying to do here. I think it's something that we can see, that this continued, sustained attack on workers and young people in this province is something that the government is doing.

I really want to thank my colleague from Edmonton-West Henday for speaking so eloquently about some of these attacks on workers and, in particular, how much workers in the labour movement have done for Albertans and the world in general, Mr. Speaker, because if you're a fan, like my colleague said, of things like the eight-hour workday, then perhaps you should be thanking the labour movement.

I think it becomes really clear that without the consultation, this bill does not do what it sets out to do. It will not focus on jobs. In fact, it will take jobs. It will hurt the people that already have jobs, and in fact it is something that will not stimulate our economy. People will not be able to spend in their local communities, Mr. Speaker, and I think that is something that is, frankly, quite shameful. It's something that the government needs to reconsider. It's something that the government members need to take a deep look at and see if they're okay with picking the pockets of ordinary workers, if they're okay with reaching into families and taking their money away, in some cases over $2,500 per employee. That is something the government members really need to take a look at and say: yes; I don't think that the people working in my community deserve a fair wage, and I certainly don't think the people working in my community, if it's equal work, should get equal pay. That's what the government is saying when they move forward with stuff like this.

Mr. Speaker, it's really clear that they either don't know what they're voting on or they don't care. Both of those options are not something that I want to see legislators moving forward with. I wish the government would perhaps open their eyes, as again the sun is rising today. Perhaps they would be able to read the page a little bit better and finally see what it is they're voting on and finally see why this legislation is so damaging to individual workers, so damaging to families, and so damaging to communities. It's something that is really going to be harmful for people in their constituencies and in our constituencies.

Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the Member for St. Albert is rising to speak to the amendment.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure, actually, to be here today at almost 7 o'clock. I think breakfast might be served downstairs. It's probably like a stampede to get the tater tots. I smelled the waffles earlier.

It's my pleasure to be here, actually, to speak to the amendment, as I said, because I know that I was elected – we like to talk about elections a lot in this place, apparently, in the last couple of weeks – and sent here to represent the people that elected me and also to represent the people that did not vote for me. So it's my job to be here to represent all of them, actually. I do plan to do that, and that's why I don't have a problem with the hours, because I think it's our job as opposition, just like the members opposite who were here when they were in opposition, to propose amendments and alternate solutions, to critique the information, not to rush it through, and to think about it, actually. So I'm happy to help with that, and that's why I do support this amendment.

[Mr. Hanson in the chair]

But, you know, in just listening, a lot of hours of listening tonight and last week, this week, it's pretty rich, actually, Mr. Speaker, that all of us in here are debating removing $2 an hour from youth when all of us that are elected make at least $150,000 a year. It's kind of rich that we're talking about $2 an hour for people who are under 18 years of age. Now, our pages aren't here right now because they've gone home and they're probably not back to work yet, but those are some of the people that we're talking about. So we could have one page sitting on this side who's 17 and making $2 less an hour than their colleague on the other side who is 18, making $2 more an hour.

We're sitting here in this beautiful place, representing the people that sent us here, and we make about $150,000 a year, some of us more. Ministers do make more. I believe the hon. Premier and the opposition leader likely do make more, and I do believe our Premier has a fairly healthy pension that he earned while he was in Ottawa. So it's pretty rich that we're sitting here continuing to debate $2 an hour, why it's a good thing to provide more profit to business owners – and I'm not saying that profit is a bad thing. It's a great thing for businesses. But what are we debating? We're debating putting an open-for-business sign on the door on the backs of youth who make minimum wage.

I just did a quick calculation because it's actually been a long time since I earned minimum wage, and really, when I earned minimum wage, it was a heck of a lot lower. But, you know, if you're a young person, if you are a youth and you are working I don't know where – McDonald's, Tim Hortons, wherever you're working, likely in a fast-food place because a lot of people start there – they get some experience, they move on, and they do other things. But if they're working, say, two eight-hour shifts a week and earning $15, that's about $240 a week, or $12,480 a year. That's a year. If they're working two shifts at $13, the proposed lower rate, they're making $208 a week, for a total of over $10,000, almost $11,000 a year. The difference between that $2 an hour is $1,664. So think about that. We're talking about almost $1,700 a year to reduce that wage.

6:40 a.m.

Now, for a business owner it's something. Sure. It's money. Every dollar counts. But to a young person that's everything. So what do young people do with their wages? I don't imagine young people enjoy going to work at, say, McDonald's or KFC. No offence to these restaurants; my son has worked there, and I worked there as a young person. But I'm sure they would rather be hanging out with their friends or practising for whatever sport they participate in or going to a bake sale for their GSA. I'm pretty sure they would rather be doing something else than going to work.

But often youth are going to work because there is a need. Sometimes it's just for the extras, like we've heard from across the way. Sometimes it is maybe to upgrade your phone or to save for a school trip overseas somewhere. I don't know. That was not the story of my life. I worked because I had to. But there are more people that are working because they have to. That is the reality. We live in a society where we're polarized. We have very, very wealthy people, and we have very, very poor people. That middle class is getting more and more scarce. I think that, you know, although I am not speaking to that bill, introducing a massive tax break for corporations will only further exacerbate that spread. We know this because people have studied this and it's been done before. Sadly, we haven't learned those lessons, so we're going to have to learn them again, apparently.

Anyway, I'm going to go back to this amendment and talk about this. As I've been sort of watching the different things people are saying – and I always learn quite a bit when I watch videos or press conferences of ministers or other officials talking about the bills that they plan to bring forward. Anyway, there was a video posted. I think it was yesterday. I'm not a hundred per cent sure. It was the Minister of Labour and Immigration, and he was talking about the benefits of this move, of lowering youth wages, and one of the things he said was that over 30,000 young people are looking for work, and this bill will open it up for business. Okay. There's a correction here. It's easy for all of us to make errors because, you know, we're researching, we're going on the fly sometimes, trying to get information, so I get that it's possible to make errors. But I don't know; if I'm the minister of labour, I'm going to know these numbers, and if I'm going to take away $2 an hour from somebody, I'm going to know these numbers. But, apparently, he did not. He said that 30,000 young people are looking for work. Here's the correction; 31,400 young people are looking for work, but they're not all youth. That's what he didn't mention. That number that he quoted are people that are 15 to 24, not 15 to 17. So instantly we see that this is an incorrect picture that he's painting.

The other piece that I was surprised to even hear him say, because that's just kind of a weird Internet meme waiting to happen, was about red tape, Mr. Speaker. One of the things this minister said was that this open-for-business bill will actually reduce red tape. You know, we were sort of lectured earlier. I guess it was earlier today or last night; I can't remember. We were told that we don't know anything about business: "What do you know?" and "Just a bunch of socialists." At least, we've moved up. We used to get called communists, so this is better. [interjections] They talked about red tape reduction. I'm glad you find this entertaining at this hour because it is kind of funny. I get it.

They talked about reducing red tape with these changes. Well, the last job I had before this job: I managed a nonprofit organization. It's a business that aims to use their profits in other ways. That's it. There are the same requirements, a lot of requirements that go along with the nonprofit. I'm sure a lot of the members across the way and beside me will know that. They have some experience with it. But I can tell you that overseeing the payroll of 200 employees – 200 employees – shift workers, full-time, part-time, casual, at different rates, in different places, with different qualifications for things: it is not easy, although, you know, larger organizations certainly send their payroll to a professional payroll company, somebody like, say, Ceridian. But it's still a lot of data entry, and more than that, it's a lot of people power at the front end to decide who gets coded where and where the differences are, and it's a huge job. I mean, the amount of red tape is astronomical. To have the minister stand up and tell us that this is going to reduce red tape – okay. I don't know where he got that from, but I guess we'll wait to see. I'm really hopeful that the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction keeps an eye on that because that would be something to look at.

[The Speaker in the chair]

The other thing that I found kind of weird in his video – or maybe it was just a post – was that he was saying: "Yay. Alberta has the fourth-highest youth minimum wage." I'm sorry. That's just not good enough. We went from first to fourth. How is that okay? I mean, is that something to be proud of, that we've done this to youth? I don't know. I don't get it.

You know, the other thing, too, another reason why I think that this bill just needs to stop: you need to take your time and think about this and talk to actual people, not just the people you call up to come sit in a room and advise you of exactly what you want to do, but you need to talk to real people, real youth, because this will impact people, not just someone saving for an extra iPhone. This is about maybe saving for school. This is about helping your parents. This is about supporting yourself. This is like the Member for Edmonton-West Henday telling us that his mother gave birth to him when she was 14. She made a choice. She chose to keep that baby. She chose to have that baby, she chose to raise that baby, and she raised a fine young man. But she also had to work and support herself. These are the people. These aren't anomalies or, like, a weird example that we just pull out. This is what happens. This is what it looks like.

For young people today the cost of education is high. It's very high. Sadly, I have two adult children who are still in university. I don't know how many more years that's going to go on, but one never knows. It is high, and a lot of young people do not have the luxury of having parents or extended family that can pay for these things, particularly if they don't live near a university that they can attend. Students are working from a young age, putting money away so that they can get an education because they know that that's what they need in order to do well in this world. That's what you're cutting. You're making them work more hours.

Sadly, I think that – sure, I think I'm a bit cynical. I always understood that there were lobbyists and people that got the ear of government, whether it was because of their access or money, but I've never seen such a clear, quick, abrupt example of that as I did before the election when I saw the Premier at an event, I think, with Restaurants Canada, and very clearly he was endorsing their policies or their vision for Alberta, and that was to reduce minimum wage. Actually, they went a little further, Mr. Speaker. They wanted to also reduce minimum wage for people with disabilities. Thankfully – I will give the Premier that – he did not force that. I think there was enough push-back on that right out of the gates that he stopped, so good on him for that. But he endorsed the moves that Restaurants Canada was suggesting. This is how you pay to play. It's not really about, you know: "These are my values. This is what's best for Alberta. This is what's best for the future. This is what's best for our youth." This is about: who do I owe? This is about concentrating power in the hands of a few. Not good.

6:50 a.m.

I've talked a lot about a lot of things, actually. One of the other things that I want to just get off my chest a little bit, that happened also at this Restaurants Canada event, was the phrase "modest levels of human capital." It's been explained to me, oh, a lot of ways. People like to explain things: "No. You don't understand. It's a term economists use." Okay. The way that this term was used that day: we all know what that meant. Now, the Premier did go on to explain what modest levels of human capital means – you know, less education, less work experience, all of these things – but that applies to a lot more people than people who are under 18. I'm going to take this back to people with disabilities because this is a group that is chronically unemployed. Chronically. High schools that have true inclusive programs work really hard with their students to teach them the skills that they will need once they graduate to get out there and find work. This is a group that is learning now, is going to learn very quickly that you are worth less, and this is a group that regularly gets labelled as being people with modest levels of human capital, as defined by our Premier.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member, for your comments.

Just to provide a little bit of clarity, in light of comments from the Member for St. Albert – and in no way, shape, or form would the Speaker like to engage in any form of political debate. But for the benefit of all members our spectacular page team here in the Assembly will all remain at their current wage and all be paid at their current wage. So just for clarity's sake.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-South is rising.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's really encouraging to see that you don't think the pages have a modest level of human capital.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I really want to thank the Member for St. Albert for her comments this morning. I think they were very important because she talked about people who are going to be affected by these changes that are, frankly, designed to hurt Albertans. They're designed to attack working people. They're designed to be negative overall for families. I think that is something that all members of this Assembly should aim to avoid. I mean, I think it's pretty clear, when you look at the legislation, as the Member for St. Albert has done quite thoroughly, that the legislation being proposed here needs more review and needs more public input. When you look at it, it goes after banked overtime. When you look at it, it goes after young people. When you look at it, it goes after people of modest human capital. It becomes pretty clear . . .

Mr. Schow: Point of order.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika is rising on a point of order.

Point of Order Imputing Motives

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise on a point of order, section 23(h), (i), and (j); specifically (i), "imputes false or unavowed motives to another Member." I appreciate what the member opposite is trying to get at, but he's making comments to suggest that members on this side of the House are trying to attack families, that we're trying to attack them and their livelihoods. That couldn't be further from the truth. You know, our job in this Chamber is to debate policy, debate good policy. It's not to attack each others' motives but, rather, to maybe disagree or debate the policy and not to suggest that we have, you know, poor motives for the people of Alberta. So I ask the member to retract his comments and, frankly, to apologize to Albertans because that is certainly not our motive. I would hope that he'd recognize that through discussing the reasoned motion which we are on today.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning is rising on the point of order.

Ms Sweet: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think, given the fact that we've been here for a very long time, that this really is just a dispute of the facts. Both sides may not necessarily always agree on how we discuss these topics, but there is no intention behind it in that context. It's just a dispute of how we are continuing this conversation going forward. At this time I don't think there's a point of order, but I will wait for your ruling.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. members, for your interjections.

I see the Member for Calgary-West is rising to provide new and additional information on the point of order.

Mr. Ellis: Yeah. Mr. Speaker, I would like to counter the argument of my friend opposite. The time period that we have been here has no relevance on the comments that were made by the member.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The Member for Edmonton-North West is rising on what seemingly is a very complex point of order.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, it's important that we use the English language as it is defined in the dictionary and as it's defined through intent. I certainly think that using the word "attack" – right? – is to lay some sort of imposition on another individual. You know, there are different ways by which a person may be attacked. One of them is through their pocketbook, quite frankly. So the hon. member, I think, has used the English language very well in this case.

The Speaker: Thank you for your very thoughtful interjection.

While I concur with the Member for Calgary-West that no matter how long we have debated a particular issue, we all need to be cautious around the words that we choose to use or don't use; however, in this case, I believe that what we have is a matter of debate. While we may not always agree with the opinions of those who sit on the opposite side of the Chamber to us, certainly they have the ability to share that opinion. While I did not hear any direct personal attack, the member opposite did use some strong language. Given the fact that we have been here for quite some time, I would caution all members, but this, in particular, was a matter of debate and not a point of order.

Debate Continued

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I mean, I really do apologize if the members opposite don't realize what they're voting on and that what they're voting on is going to be picking the pockets of ordinary Albertans. I mean, that's something that – perhaps they should spend a bit more time reading the legislation they're voting on.

Very clearly here, as I was saying before, this legislation is bad for ordinary workers. It's legislation that attacks the people that my colleagues have been speaking about all night long. It's legislation that attacks ordinary Albertans and doesn't help spur the local economies because it takes money out of people's pocketbooks, Mr. Speaker, up to $2,500 in some cases. But in many cases, for people who the government has deemed to have less human capital, it could take quite a bit more out of their pocketbooks, and I think that's something that's shameful. I think that's something that nobody in this House should support. I think it's something that we should all vote against here in this Assembly.

That's why I'm so proud to support this amendment. I'm so proud to support my colleague here from St. Albert. I'm so proud to be able to stand next to her and say that her concerns are ones that this Assembly needs to hear, Mr. Speaker, because those are the types of people who will be affected by this bill; 400,000 Albertans will be affected by this bill. The government needs to understand how this will impact people's families and people's lives. It's something that we certainly need to have a longer conversation about, it's something that certainly needs further input from the public, and it's something that we certainly need to look at this amendment and say: this is a reasonable amendment. This is something that makes sense because it allows us to have that longer discussion. It allows us to look at whether we're going to be forcing families to go to food banks instead of letting them bank their overtime, as they deserve, whether we'll be forcing young people to go to food banks while they're trying to save up for their education.

Really, when the government proposes legislation that actively encourages students to drop out of school, I don't know how that isn't an attack on young people, Mr. Speaker. It's something that clearly is offensive to young people, and that's why young people have been speaking out so strongly against this. It's something that's clearly an attack on families, and that's why people are so taken aback by this bill, and it's why we've been so proud to be able to stand as the opposition and speak to this bill over and over again and talk about why it's important for Albertans.

The government clearly either has not read the bill, or they don't care what the bill says. Mr. Speaker, I think that's a shame. I think it's something that they need to review. [An electronic device sounded] Is that somebody else's alarm? Mr. Speaker, I thought there was a fine for something like that. My apologies.

Of course, certainly, I think it's something that we need to talk about, how after decades of inaction the NDP government finally brought in legislation that brought Alberta's labour laws up to par with the rest of Canada. If you were somebody who the Conservative government considered to have modest human capital anywhere else in Canada, you were able to have a good life as long as you didn't live here in Alberta. That's why it was fixed, and the labour laws were brought up to date.

Now, without any public input, in the cover of darkness the government tried to ram it down Alberta's throat, that they needed to roll back all these protections, that they needed to roll back families' wages, that they needed to roll back overtime, and that they needed to attack families. That's something that I think members should be ashamed to be voting on. I think it's something that members should be ashamed was even brought to this Assembly, Mr. Speaker, because we should strive to do better. We should strive to have legislation that helps families and doesn't pick their pockets, and we should strive to have legislation that improves the lives of all Albertans and not something that was asked for by our wealthy donors and sponsors.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Thank you to the hon. member.

With respect to fines and cellphones I think that a little grace may be able to be displayed. I would only imagine that it was someone's alarm to be encouraged to come to the Chamber on this wonderful day.

Speaker's Ruling Referring to Employees of the Legislature

The Speaker: I'd just like to provide a very brief comment further to my earlier interjection. Again, the Speaker has no desire to engage in political debate, and I would just encourage all members of the Assembly to perhaps not utilize employees that may be in the Chamber or not in the Chamber and bring them into political debate as well. I think that if we could use some caution and discretion there, that would be advisable.

Debate Continued

The Speaker: Any other members wishing to debate? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to speak on this amendment. Certainly, I believe that we have this tool in place, the substitution "not now read a second time," at this stage of debate for a very good reason, and I believe it applies very well to Bill 2, as described on the notice that we put forward suggesting that this bill "will not draw investment to Alberta or stimulate the economy and that further input from the public is necessary." I mean, I think that describes where this bill should be and where it should go quite accurately.

I believe that it should not be read a second time for other reasons as well. We know that this bill is to cut overtime for working people. As I had described earlier during this evening's session, this idea of rolling back or taking banked overtime and making it less valuable to workers is going against an agreed-upon arrangement between employees and employers, and when people have those arrangements for their wages, to have it legislated to be rolled back is a very, very poor use of this Legislature's time and power.

As I described before, people count on getting banked overtime not just as some sort of special bonus that you win for working but as part of the essential wage for people when they build their budgets for their families. For people that work on project-based work sites such as in Fort McMurray or thereabouts or are working, let's say, on a shutdown – right? – of a plant in Fort Saskatchewan and so forth, you are working for a very concentrated period of time, and then you're done. You know, people build their family budgets and so forth based on banked overtime, and to change that formula, I think, is not fair. I think it achieves quite the opposite effect of what this bill was purported to be named by this government, an act to be open for business, right? It sounds more like it's an act to call it open season on workers, as the Member for Edmonton-McClung very cleverly coined.

There are a number of issues, I guess, that we haven't heard about, again a reason to suggest that this is not a bill that we should be reading for a second time.

I would go back to the changes that have been proposed around holidays and holiday pay as well. We made these changes to put Alberta in line with other jurisdictions around the country. So often when we're making reforms in many areas, Alberta would be the ninth or 10th province to have reforms around leave eligibility: maternity and parental leave, rest periods, overtime, critical sickness of a child, death or disappearance of a child, long-term illness or injury leave, personal and family responsibility leave, bereavement, family violence leave, domestic violence leave, citizenship ceremony leave, vacation and vacation pay, you know, Christmas. All of these things are reasonable ways by which to ensure a certain level of protection and security for workers and to ensure that we're being fair – right? – every step of the way.

Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that that's part of the way that you can actually make something open for business and encourage business and prosperity and so forth, to make the rules around labour fair and reasonable, right? Making cuts to things such as leaves for the critical illness of a child or eligibility for vacation pay for Christmas and so forth: I mean, when I actually articulate these things here in this House now, it sounds very much like something out of a Charles Dickens novel – right? – moving, rolling back. I'm thinking of A Christmas Carol, where Scrooge is giving his workers, like, a couple of hours off for Christmas and then rolling back and Tiny Tim and all that kind of thing, critical illness of a child. These are all the sorts of things that you see from a Victorian period. Here we are slipping back, in 2019, rolling back to the 19th century, you know. That's not the way to open for business. I think that's a way to show mean-spiritedness and to show regression, to move backwards rather than forwards, to move from a more modern outlook, where we can demonstrate reasonable labour law, to something that is less so.

To not read this a second time is an eminently reasonable approach, and I think that we have exercised to the fullest this Legislature's capacity to shine a light on Bill 2.

I think that a lot of people are not happy about this at all. I mean, I know that when I was out door-knocking during this last campaign, I had quite a number of people that were really kind of almost disbelieving at first that this was an element of the UCP platform. Then they very quickly looked because banked overtime was an integral part of their family budget, and they said: "Oh, no. Well, that's not something that I would support because they're literally taking money from my family." They're picking the pockets of middle-class people who work in the trades, especially, and putting them in a compromised position.

Always you have to judge a person on their actions, and you have to judge a government on their intentions and actions, too. For this to be the second bill of this new government, I think, is a bit concerning. You know, I'm always one to give out free advice to those who will listen, and I would strongly suggest that you want to put a positive front on your new government. You want to make sure that people see who you are. You're sort of defining your intentions. You're defining the future of the term of the government, and my suggestion is that you perhaps lead with something that's positive and not so negative – right? – this idea of rolling back labour reform, taking money for banked overtime.

This whole minimum wage thing: I think we've exhausted that, quite clearly. Having different minimum wages for different people of different ages, I mean, is Byzantine and confusing, and it's going to take quite a lot of red tape to sort that one out, I can tell you that, because here you have – I think there was a provision in this Bill 2 that talks about having some exemption if some kids are not going to school or something like that, where you can have, like, officers going out to check this out. You'll have to have a whole division of, you know, red tape artists to follow people around to see if they're going to school or if they used to go to school or whatever, just because there's some rule in Bill 2 that a regulation, red tape, puts them in that position.

I mean, working as a teacher for 20 years, I know that lots of kids are working. They're not doing it, you know, for good times and frivolity. They're doing it to help to put money into the family budget. This idea that you might be born in this month or you're born in that month and that that will determine whether you receive a 13 per cent reduction in your salary is entirely unfair. It almost seems funny if it wasn't real. Here it is written in this bill. I really think that that doesn't need to see the light of day. Young people work at the same rate. They produce, side by side in a given situation, just the same as the person who is over the age of 18, right? There's no difference at all, and the expectations in a workplace, certainly, would suggest that the person that is maybe 17 must be working at the same level and the same rate and the same quality of work as the person that happens to be over the age of 18.

You know, as I said before, it's nonsensical. This whole argument that I heard from across the way that there are thousands of young people under the age of 18 that lost their jobs because of the minimum wage: I mean, that is patently absurd, right? It's untrue, and it's not defensible with either statistics or with logic as well. If one tries to move this forward in any way, the more ridiculous it actually becomes.

Honestly, it's one thing, people that are working under the age of 18 taking a 13 per cent cut – that's a practical problem – but again it signals direction, and it signals a bad intention. It sends a message to young people that is negative as well, that you're not as valuable somehow, your work in the same place, working side by side with others: sorry; you get paid less because of your age. It's discriminatory in that way, and it sends a message that somehow people are not equal – right? – for the things that they do and the way that they work and so forth.

Again, you know, when you get that message sent to you through law, it's something you carry with you in a broader way. You say, "Is the government here to protect me, or is it here to discriminate against me?" If it's the latter, then that is sending a message that we don't want our citizens to carry with them in their hearts for the rest of their lives. We teach in schools around the value of someone. We teach in schools about the value of caring and looking after each other and the value of a sense of justice, and I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that young people have a very strong and acute sense of what is fair and what is not fair, and when that line is crossed in any given circumstance, they will carry that emotion around with them, quite rightfully, for a long time.

You know, we can avoid all of these things. We can avoid the embarrassment of taking away people's overtime pay for Christmas – right? – thus avoiding that obvious comparison to Charles Dickens and Scrooge and all of that. We can make sure that we are looking after people with their maternity leave so that they do know that they have those protections in place, because we want to support people that are having children and make sure that they are not being compromised with their paycheque for the sake of having a child. We want to make sure that people have the security to know that they have bereavement leave and compassionate care leave, that it's appropriate and fair, and that they have some vacation pay that is codified and not subject to the discriminations or the choices of an employer. Often we see this amendment being used in second reading of bills, and I've seen the varying value of using this referral amendment, but this time it really does stand out as being a useful tool. It's not necessarily meaning that we walk away from this issue but that we can talk to the public and see what the public thinks. Anecdotally, like I said, I mean, I didn't run a big survey with, you know, proper consultation on this, but neither did the government, quite frankly. I think that that's not an unreasonable thing to do.

I think it would be interesting and illuminating to hear stories of individuals, let's say, a young person who is working at $2 less an hour because of their age, that they're not just doing it to buy a bicycle or concert tickets, but they're doing it because they're one of the main wage earners in their family. It's more common than you think, right? I know that when I taught high school, kids would often be struggling in school, and part of the reason was because they were working a lot of hours. There's an added sort of even more bizarre twist to this Bill 2. They said that if you're not in school and you're under 18 and you're working, then the law doesn't apply to you, right?

Again, you know, follow that thread, pull that thread, and where do you go? You end up setting up vulnerable kids that maybe are working and are in a vulnerable situation, and they will choose to drop out of school.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member, for your comments.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-South rising under Standing Order 29(2)(a) for a brief question or comment.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'll try to keep it brief, as you know I do. Now, I really want to thank the Member for Edmonton-North West for his comments. I think it was very enlightening to hear about some of the implications of this bill and some of the really, frankly, shameful things that are in this bill. I mean, it becomes very clear that this bill is designed not to help the families. It's designed to attack those young people that the member was speaking about.

Mr. Speaker, the discrimination that's happening in this bill: it's something that I think is really important that we talk about in this Assembly, because that goes to the core of why we are here, and it's to protect Albertans and protect their interests. Now, I think it's actually a real shame, after hearing such eloquent speeches from so many of my colleagues here tonight and over the last many hours, that very few, if any, of the government members have gotten up to protect and defend the discriminatory bill. I think it's something that's actually very telling. It's telling that the government is not interested in defending the bill that attacks working people, takes up to $2,500 away during Christmastime – it's very Scrooge-like, like my hon. colleague said – does so much, in fact, that it can actually encourage kids to drop out of school. Maybe the Education minister would like to speak to why she's encouraging kids to drop out of school. Maybe some of the backbenchers would like to speak to that as well.

Mr. Speaker, I think that it becomes very clear that when a government presents legislation like this, it is damaging to families, it is damaging to young people, and it's damaging to ordinary workers. Attacking overtime pay, attacking the minimum wage, attacking the youth differential: these are things that the government ought to be able to defend. We've heard quite at length, with quite a number of stories tonight, why this will be so damaging and so bad for families, up to 400,000 workers across Alberta. That's many more families than just workers.

Mr. Speaker, the government isn't even interested in getting up to say why that's important, why it's important that they are going to hurt 400,000 workers. They're not even interested in defending their own bill, and that is very telling because Albertans will be able to see in the Assembly records that the government doesn't even think Bill 2 is a good bill. They won't even get up to speak to it. They won't even do their work, their job, to get up and speak today in the Assembly. It is their duty to defend government bills, and it's private members in the government caucus's duty to defend the bills that their front bench brings forward. But, clearly, those private members don't think the bill is good, or else they would be speaking to it.

Clearly, the front bench doesn't think it's a good bill or else they would be speaking to it, Mr. Speaker. I think that's very concerning. I wouldn't mean to suppose what any members would wish to speak to in the future. Perhaps if they did get up and speak, then I would be corrected. But it is something that I find very concerning, that members aren't willing to stand up and defend this legislation. We have identified a number of very key and very significant flaws in the bill, and we've identified these flaws all night long. I'm sure the members by now will have the benefit of many of the Blues over many of the hours to be able to look in and see how they can find those fixes.

I know sometimes the members opposite – perhaps their staff weren't awake when they were or when we were in the Assembly, trying to do our jobs, but now I'm sure many of their staff are waking up and can do that research for them and help them perhaps figure out why they should be defending a bill that attacks workers. Maybe they can help them figure out why they would like to defend a bill that harms 400,000 families or attacks young people, encourages kids to drop out of schools. Perhaps the government would like to speak to that. Perhaps their private members would like to tell their constituents why they think students should be dropping out of school so they can get that $2 raise, an over 13 per cent difference, Mr. Speaker. For some households that will be very significant. I mean, I really hope we'll be able to hear from some private members on why they think it's okay to attack individuals and families and working Albertans.

I really hope we'll be able to hear from some of the government front bench as well about why it's okay to attack working Albertans and attack their families and take away their overtime at Christmastime, Mr. Speaker. I really hope to perhaps hear from Mr. Scrooge himself. I think that would be something that would be very exciting for me. I think we'd be able to finally understand what it is the government thinks is so valuable about picking the pockets of everyday working Albertans, picking the pockets of families right here in this province. I think it's something that all members of the opposition would look forward to hearing.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Thank you for your brief comments, Member for Edmonton-South. I'm not entirely sure. You made some reference to hearing from Mr. Scrooge himself. Certainly, you weren't referring to any member inside the Chamber because if you had been, that would have been wildly inappropriate and certainly a point of order.

During the next speech I would imagine that we will move through the 12th hour of the sitting today. I would just like members to perhaps extend their appreciation to our LASS staff and table officers. I would also remind all members, particularly those who have been with us through the last number of hours, to please ensure safe travels should you leave the Chamber today to return to either your residence or your temporary capital residence. Please make sure that you are governing yourselves accordingly.

Having said those things, we are back on the amendment. I see the Member for Edmonton-Manning rising to debate.

Ms Sweet: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's an honour to rise 12 hours later, from the beginning of this debate, to speak specifically to the amendment on Bill 2, which reads that ... An Act to Make Alberta Open for Business, be not now read a second time because the Assembly is of the view that the bill will not draw investment to Alberta or stimulate the economy and that further input from the public is necessary.

[Mr. Hanson in the chair]

I'm going to build a little bit on some of my comments that I was making earlier around Bill 3, around how we seem to have a habit or the Conservatives seem to have a habit of recycling ideas and using them over and over and over again, with little success and/or looking for a different outcome. Now, the reason why I say that is that we've seen this recently in Canada, this bill. It was referred to as something different, obviously: Bill 47 to be specific, which is the changes to the Ontario labour and employment legislation. That legislation was actually passed in November 2018. I'll just read a little bit of an overview of sort of what that bill spoke to. Bill 47 does the following. It cancels the legislated hike of the general minimum wage from $14 an hour to $15 effective January 1, 2019.

Instead of freezing the minimum wage at $14, on October 1, 2020, it will be adjusted annually. It removes the entitlement to personal emergency leave. It cancels a range of scheduling protections, eliminates the right to equal pay for part-time, contract, temporary, and temporary help agency workers vis-à-vis full-time workers. It repeals new public holiday pay, a cancellation introduced by Bill 148, scraps a provision introduced in Bill 148 that puts the burden on an employer to prove that a worker is an independent contractor rather than an employee. It maintains existing vacation entitlement, includes three weeks of vacation for employees with five or more years, and maintains domestic and sexual violence leave. That's good. It delays the planned repeal of the provision excluding from the scope of the ESA persons performing work in a job or work environment. And many, many, many other things.

Now, the intent, as we know from this bill in Ontario, was basically – I believe it actually has the exact same title as this current bill, except instead of An Act to Make Alberta Open for Business it was an act to make Ontario open for business. So we've seen this. We saw this in November 2018. We've seen the arguments. The arguments in Ontario were, "We're going to do this to help stimulate investment in Ontario, to bring new business into our province, to do all of these things," which is what Ontario said.

I've heard a lot over the last 12 hours about how this is about helping different sectors be successful, specifically looking at our hospitality industry. Well, let me tell you what's happened in Ontario over the last year since this Bill 47 came in. The hospitality industry has actually had a decrease of minus 3.7 per cent in economic growth. And I can table this later today in regard to this.

I think the struggle that I have when it comes to these pieces of legislation is that there is evidence across this country that these policies don't work. Although they may be great political tools, we are seeing in Ontario that the argument that the Conservatives are currently using in this province about developing the hospitality industry is actually not happening in Ontario, yet it's the same bill with a different name, a provincial name I guess.

I mean, we've heard the Premier even make jokes about the fact that the Premier from Ontario and him are such great friends, and in fact he thought he came up with "make Alberta open for business" first, yet the Premier in Ontario adopted it and used it. When we look at what is happening in Ontario and we're looking at the direction that these worker policies are moving towards, I think that there's validity to the questions and the concerns about what's going to be happening in our province in the future.

We've been here before. You know, some of the new members have been asking me, as we're trying to get to know each other over the last little bit, about: "Why did you run, Heather? Like, you're a social worker."

An Hon. Member: Name.

Ms Sweet: Oh, sorry. It's been a long day. Thank you, hon. member. You're right. I withdraw my name.

I mean, people have asked, like: why did you run? Well, I was a social worker, which we established, I think, this week as well. Part of that was that I represented a whole bunch of workers in the city that were government of Alberta workers, that worked in child protection, AISH, PDD, a variety of different areas. We, at the time that I had decided to run, were under the hon. Premier Redford. Some of our members have heard this before, that, you know, we didn't have a great go when it came to labour relations under Premier Redford.

Again I will speak to the amendment and the fact that this is about the fact that this not be read a second time, because the whole argument here is that this is going to stimulate growth in the economy and that it's going to bring investment into the province.

I will be clear that I think that's a great political tool and great language to use politically to actually start eroding the progress that was made around labour relations in this province in the last four years. The reason I say that is because what we're seeing in Ontario is that it's not effective and that it's not working. When it comes to the areas that these members in this House have specifically spoken to on the Conservative side, the job numbers don't match the argument. The bills are almost identical. So there's that component.

But the other piece is that prior to 2015 we had a huge fight on our hands when it came to labour relations, and we were starting to move backwards. The hon. members in this House remember those committee meetings that were around. They remember the rallies. They remember the conversations ...

Mr. McIver: Bill 6.

Ms Sweet: The Bill 6 back then, not the Bill 6 in 2015. But we could talk about Bill 46 or Bill 9 or Bill 10, hon. Member for Calgary-Hays.

I've got lots of bills that I remember from labour relations as well around what happened in 2013 and 2014. At that time Bill 46 was the Public Service Salary Restraint Act, and that was going to impose a two-year salary freeze, renegotiate collective bargaining processes, remove binding arbitration. There was also Bill 45, the Public Sector Services Continuation Act. This act significantly increased the penalties for illegal strikes by workers, to the point where they were going after individuals. They were going to go after individuals.

This all happened around when the Edmonton Remand Centre had their wildcat strike. At that time they legislated the workers back, and the government proposed to introduce harsh fines, up to $100,000 per day, because they said that it was illegal. Those bills never made royal assent, and the reason that they never made royal assent was because, as the Conservative government very, very quickly learned, working people matter in this province. Working people have a voice in this province, and they are smarter than political language when it comes to trying to say that Bill 2 is all about economic growth and all about recruiting business in this province.

It isn't working in Ontario. The labour changes have been made. You are redoing the exact same thing that is happening in Ontario and trying to rebrand it as a new, fresh idea, which is very similar to what Bill 3 is. I was very clear about how, you know, even your Prime Minister, the Rt. Hon. Stephen Harper, didn't agree with a corporate tax cut as being a way to stimulate the economy. I'll table that later this afternoon as well.

So, for me, I'm not sure I completely understand what the purpose of Bill 2 is when it's not actually achieving the outcome that the Conservative, the UCP, government is saying that it will. There's evidence to prove otherwise. What I see is that it's not about the economy in the context of investment into the province unless you want to acknowledge that it's at the expense of workers in this province, because that's what it's about. It's about eroding the labour codes. It's about changing what workers should be entitled to, which is a decent wage, compensation for their time, work-life balance with their family members.

It shouldn't be that workers are exploited for the benefit of an employer's dollar. It's just not the reality of how it is anymore. It shouldn't be that way. Workers should not have to – like, we had these fights way back in the day. During the Industrial Revolution people were put in cages and sent down into the mines, and they were exploited, and, you know, children were being used as child labour. We've seen all of this, and we are a much more sophisticated society than back then.

We have a responsibility to take care of each other in this province. One of our biggest arguments and one of our strongest strengths that we bring to this province is the fact that we are hard-working people who take care of our neighbours. If you're a hard-working person and you take care of your neighbour, then your employer should take care of you. It's just the way it should be.

Bill 2 just doesn't speak to that. Bill 2 is about taking advantage of people that maybe have disabilities and therefore can get paid less. Bill 2 is about the fact that if you're younger than 18, there is a loophole here where we can find a way to be able to take advantage of that. It is a bill that says that if you don't work so many days in a row, you don't get compensated at your pay. Bill 2 is about the fact that workers don't matter.

I mean, we have 400,000 Albertans who work overtime in this province. We all know our neighbours and our family members who deliberately take jobs because of overtime, because that's how people make their money. I have tons of my friends that love working on a Saturday and Sunday and working those 12-hour shifts because they get paid overtime for it, and they will ask for those shifts: in manufacturing, in our trades. Why shouldn't they be compensated for that? It doesn't make sense.

Why should an employer be able to say that their profit margin is more important, and where is the evidence to say that these changes are going to drive the economy? Where is the evidence? The evidence that I have says that in Ontario it's actually not doing what you're saying it's going to do, right? We talked about the hospitality industry. This was something that they specifically asked for. There was a major reason for this. The hospitality industry has had a negative 3 per cent decrease from 2018 to 2019 in their yearly review, quarter after quarter, and this bill was acclaimed on November 30, 2018, in Ontario. So the evidence doesn't exist.

I would love for the members opposite to stand up and show me where the evidence is that makes the rationale for this bill make sense, but we haven't heard it. We've heard lots of talking points, we've heard lots of political points about why this makes sense and that people have asked for it. Of course employers have asked for it. I mean, if you can find a way to undercut your expenses and make more money, of course you're going to try to do that. Like, that's just basic business sense. You find a way to work through your taxes. You find all those different things so that you bring more money home for yourself and your business. That's how businesses are successful, right? But should that be at the expense of workers? Definitely not.

Again, when we talk about this amendment, I would like to see the evidence. You want us to vote on behalf of Albertans in support of Bill 2, and you want to be able to say: well, Bill 2 is all about drawing investment to Alberta and to stimulate the economy. So show me the evidence. Show me where you have your . . .

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, Member.

Comments or questions under 29(2)(a)? The Member for Edmonton-South.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's always a pleasure to hear from my colleague from Edmonton-Manning. This is such an important bill. It's such an important bill, and that's why so many members of the opposition have gotten up today and yesterday to speak to this bill. It's something that we are so proud to be able to fight, because we know that it's picking the pockets of everyday Albertans, just as the member pointed out very clearly. And just as the member pointed out very clearly, this is a bill that attacks workers, attacks the 400,000 workers that do overtime work.

It's a bill that will go after young people, go after labour, go after tradespeople. Mr. Speaker, it becomes very clear that this government either does not understand what they are passing, or they don't care. If they did, they would get up in this House and defend this bill. The front bench would get up and defend the bill that they brought forward, or the backbench would get up and defend their minister, but they have not done that. They refuse to do that because, I believe, they think it's as bad as we say it is. And if they don't, they could get up and clarify that for us, but they refuse to because it becomes very clear that they know this will hurt ordinary Albertans. This will hurt families, and this will hurt the people who work the hardest here in our province. This will hurt our constituents.

7:40 a.m.

The government knows very well that they did not consult on this, or else they would have gotten up to speak on it. They know very well that Albertans will not support this if sunshine is brought to this bill, Mr. Speaker, or else they would get up to speak to it. They would get up and defend the legislation that they tried to hide under the cloak of darkness last night. But here we are, the sun is shining, and we are able to debate this legislation here in this House.

We know in the opposition that this is designed to pick the pockets of ordinary working Albertans. It's designed to hurt families, to take away their hard-earned pay, their hard-earned overtime, designed to make it so that students have to choose between whether they should go to school or get a 13 per cent raise. The Education minister should get up and explain why she's going to defend a bill that encourages students to drop out of school, Mr. Speaker.

This is a bill that is, frankly, shameful. If the front bench cared or if the backbench of the government cared, Mr. Speaker, then they would get up and defend this bill, but they refuse to. They know it is a bad bill, and that's why they won't speak. It's because they know that they have not put forward a bill that helps Albertans. They've put a bill forward that helps their wealthy donors, and that's what they're fighting for here when they don't speak. When they refuse to get up and talk, they know they're defending their wealthy donors and their sponsors. And that's fine. If that's the message the government wants to send to Albertans, that is absolutely fine, because we know the opposition will continue to stand up for the rights of working people. The opposition will continue to stand up to defend Albertans and defend their rights in this Assembly. When the government tries to pick their pockets, we will be here to tell them: no. We will be here to fight against that.

The government clearly has no defence or refuses to give one, and either of those is a condemnation of their position on this, Mr. Speaker. This bill is very clearly a bill that hurts families, and if the government disagreed with me, they would get up and say so themselves. But, very clearly, they are not interested in that. They're not interested in getting up. In fact, you'll hear on the cameras that they are actually laughing at the seriousness of this bill. They are laughing at how important this is for families. They know, because they are appeasing their wealthy donors, that this bill doesn't matter for Albertans because they don't care about Albertans. If that's the position they're wanting to take by not standing up in this Assembly, then that is the message Albertans will hear today. That is the message Albertans will hear because we know they're watching. We know that they are standing up with us and hearing what we are saying and pointing out these really important issues in this bill. That's why it needs to go back for public input. That's why it needs to go back for more consultation.

Really, clearly, what is happening here is that the Conservatives are trying to pick the pockets of Albertans, and if they aren't, then why won't they get up and speak to it? Mr. Speaker, if the Conservatives are not trying to attack families, then why won't they get up and defend it? This really, clearly shows that they either are intentionally trying to pick the pockets of Albertans or they don't know what they're voting on. I don't know which is worse, whether they are intentionally being harmful for families or they're actually being negligent about it. Either of those sounds terrible to me. I think that certainly Albertans expect better from their government. They expect better from their private members on the government side as well, and that's why our opposition here will continue to fight against this bill. We will continue to make sure that the important issues and the stories of everyday Albertans, the stories of our constituents, are told in this place, because those are the people that matter.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you once again for your brief comments, Member.

Anybody else wishing to speak to the amendment? The Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood. Go ahead, Member.

Member Irwin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm afraid I will likely not have the same energy as my colleague from Edmonton-South, but I will try. I think this is the first time I've been up for 24 hours straight in a long time, so here we go. Maybe the last time was when I was a teenager, and that's a good segue because I'd like to talk a little bit about the youth wage in particular and about the importance of this amendment, of not reading this bill a second time.

I've talked to this House a little bit before about the fact that I was a high school social studies teacher in rural Alberta, and I've had the opportunity to speak with young people, with students in my constituency about just how discriminatory this decision to cut youth wages from $15 to $13 an hour will be.

Now, some of my colleagues in this House have shared some really personal stories as well. They've talked about the fact that, you know, this is about equality and this is about fairness. I want to quote a few folks here. I'm a big fan of bringing in evidence and bringing in research.

An Hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Member Irwin: Yes. It's something that's important to me. So I'm going to share from a few sources here, and I'll table any of the ones that haven't been tabled yet.

The first one I want to speak to is a quote from the executive director of Public Interest Alberta. What he said was:

These changes will create a perverse incentive for employers to maximize profits by hiring youth instead of other workers because they can be paid less for doing the same work . . . This is clear discrimination against a demographic of workers who are not even able to express their opinion at the ballot box.

There are a few things to unpack in that quote there, but on this perverse incentive: again, we know that there will be employers who will choose to exploit younger workers. As one of my colleagues said earlier: what's the difference between someone who is 17 and 364 days old and someone who is 18 years old?

Why I also wanted to touch on this quote is the second piece there: "clear discrimination against a demographic of workers who are not even able to express their opinion at the ballot box." Well, these are young people who are working, who are in some cases supporting their families. My colleague from Edmonton-Whitemud talked about the fact that, again, we know – we've heard her own family's experience of a lot of young people who are supporting their families. What might be a small difference in wage means a huge amount to those families.

These young people aren't able to vote yet. They're going to be able to vote in a couple of years. I know I've got a few colleagues in here who are teachers as well, a high school social studies teacher, in fact. You know, if you've ever taught a group of teenagers, the power of an engaged group of teenagers is something to be seen. So I do wonder how this decision will carry out in a couple of years, once those teenagers are of voting age. I'd be curious to see the power of them at the ballot box.

The other thing that I wanted to point out – this is Joel French from Public Interest Alberta; I'll give him a shout-out – is the final quote. He says:

We can easily predict that this will cause a drop in employment for vulnerable groups of adult low wage earners, who tend to be young adults, women, and people of colour . . . These groups are already struggling in our economy, and the last thing they need is an attack on their employment.

My colleague from Edmonton-West Henday spoke about the fact that unfairly, probably inequitably affected by these changes are folks who are, you know, people of colour, from the POC community, young adults, women. I appreciated your comments around sort of an intersectional approach to this because we do have to recognize our own privilege in this House. It's sometimes hard to think about the experience of some other people who will be unfairly affected by these policies. I urge my colleagues across the floor to consider intersectionality in their approach, to consider the perspectives of others who may not have had the same lived experience as them.

The next thing I wanted to speak to – I’m going to continue on this youth train because, again, it’s something that’s important to me. My social studies teacher colleague there will know that we talk a lot about engaged citizenship, active, engaged citizenship. I’m going to be the voice for some young people. I know I’m not a superyoung person myself anymore, but they’re not here in this House right now. I’m going to quote from some young people in a moment.

7:50 a.m.

Before I do that, I want to give you a few more facts. The Alberta Federation of Labour estimates that there are approximately 35,609 workers in Alberta aged 15 to 17 who will be negatively affected. Thirty-five thousand: that’s a significant number. This is going to make life harder for a lot of young workers who are either saving for school, as I said earlier, or contributing to their household’s income. Now, the government has told us – I am still quoting the Alberta Federation of Labour here – that they are taking these steps to try to address the higher unemployment rates, the lower labour force participation that they point to in that age cohort of 15 to 24. But, again, this is a clearly discriminatory policy that tells young Albertans that the work that they do is worth less, is devalued, than that of other Albertans.

I want to talk a little bit about some of the – the Alberta Federation of Labour, actually, did some really good interjurisdictional comparisons to bring in, again, an evidence-based approach to this. I’m not saying that the members across the floor didn’t look at research and evidence, but I do question in some cases, especially when it comes to the youth wage here because the evidence is pretty clear. Now, there have been youth differentials proposed in a number of other jurisdictions as well, as I noted. One interesting one is actually in Denmark. One empirical study analyzed the impact of Denmark’s youth wage differential and found that the employment rate craters for young people once they graduate to the universal wage by about 33 per cent.

What happened in Denmark is basically that a youth minimum wage led to a lot poorer outcomes for workers aged 18 to 24. As those workers are entering adulthood, as they are, you know, in some cases potentially hoping to enter school or may be taking on family responsibilities, there is significant evidence from this study that shows that unemployment and job loss at this time in a worker’s life, that time of instability, create a scarring effect – that is what they say – which basically sets them up for failure for the rest of their lives, dramatically worsens their future employment prospects and their lifetime earnings. We’ve heard this argument that this is just a small amount of money, but again, looking at some of the research from around the world, it shows that it’s not a small change. The choices we’re making now in this House could be impacting a whole cohort of young earners in this province.

One of the things I said that I would do is give some research from both locally and around the world. But I think what’s more important here, because we don’t have anyone speaking out right now that is in this age cohort, is to hear from some youth. We have the value here in Edmonton of having the City of Edmonton Youth Council. If anyone has followed the City of Edmonton Youth Council’s work – I know my colleague from Edmonton-City Centre is nodding his head because he and I both know that they do incredible, incredible work. They’re a cohort of young folks who work closely with city council, who actually take on a lot of initiatives on their own, by their own devices. I’m actually going to be speaking to them on a panel this weekend. I look forward to hearing more from them about how they view this differentiated wage.

What I want to do is quote from an article they wrote in the Edmonton Journal – as I said, I will table this if it hasn’t been tabled yet – and then I’m going to add a little bit of my own flavour to it as well because, as I’ve said, I’ve heard from youth as well, and I want to share some of those stories. This one young person notes in this article that to devalue youth wages compared to the rest of Alberta’s population is to unfairly discriminate against young people in the workplace on a set of unfounded assumptions about their work ethic and qualifications purely correlated to their age.

Again, I think this age discrimination piece is a huge one. I’m actually still, believe it or not, a millennial. I’m what they call an elder millennial. [interjection] I know. I look a lot older. This short time in the Leg. has aged me. But one of the things that frustrates me to no end is when I hear these stereotypes about millennials being lazy and not working hard and not contributing to the economy and whatnot. I get very much the discrimination that these young people are feeling when they’re hearing that, “Oh, you don’t need that difference in the wage; you’re just going to waste it on frivolities,” whatever it might be.

Now, these young people go on to say that youth who do the same work as any other worker in the same position should not be placed under discriminatory payment as a result of their age. This policy in its current form does not consider the merits of individual workers or their living situations, and although it may have the potential to create increased employment opportunities, the jobs created would be less beneficial for the youth who need those opportunities the most.

That’s the one piece that I’m quite concerned about, our vulnerable youth. One of the members talked earlier this evening about vulnerable youth, whether it be, you know, youth from refugee immigrant families, whether it be LGBTQ youth. A lot of these youth don’t have the financial or social supports necessary to provide for themselves. As we said, a lot of these same youth are wanting to save up for education, whatever that might be, whether it’s a trades route, whether it’s university, so they’re having to balance a whole heck of a lot.

I was talking to somebody else who relayed the story of a young person who is also caring for their siblings. Basically, that child was a parent to two other children at a very young age. Again, you’re having to manage school. You’re having to manage planning for your future education. You’re having to manage family responsibilities. In some cases you’re having to, really, be one of the primary providers for your family’s household income, which is so much of a burden to bear, for sure.

Now, I’m just going to talk a little bit more about what the City of Edmonton Youth Council has to say on this. I talked a little bit earlier about the fact that, again, these are folks who are impacted by this policy that are not able to vote yet, and they point out: how is it fair that the perspectives of us under the age of 18 are not able to be heard during the election, during the voting process, yet the Premier didn’t reach out to us? Again, this is why I would urge the House to consider this amendment. Why not go back and consult more heavily with a lot of the youth across the province? Get a wide cross-section. Hear their lived experiences. Ask them questions. Talk to your constituents. Maybe you have. As the Member for Edmonton-South said, we just haven’t heard a lot of these stories from the members opposite. The lived experience of youth is valuable, and it can tell a lot of insights about the impact of this policy. Again, it’s beyond just the economic benefits. These are humans we’re talking about. These are Albertans although they may not be voters.

[The Speaker in the chair]

Now, as I said, the other thing that I’m concerned about – and we were chatting about this earlier as well – is the fact that some of these young people may be encouraged to drop out of school. We still have some very high dropout rates here in Alberta. We talked about that we've done some work to try to address those, but they're unfortunately not decreasing as rapidly as we would like. I do worry in particular – I've got some stats – that the dropout rates are actually highest in rural areas and small towns. Now . . .

The Speaker: Hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood, I'm sure that someone will be happy to provide you some additional moments to provide comments if you would like because, as we all know, we have Standing Order 29(2)(a) available.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre is rising.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise this morning in the House as the sun has risen and as have many other members of this House and made their way here to continue to support this debate. Indeed, to be here in the Chamber this morning – of course, we've had both Sunrise and Sunset for a few days here from our artist Mr. Alex Janvier, and now we got to experience them both in person here as well.

I've been appreciating the words from my colleague from Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood. She's had some good thoughts. She's been speaking a lot about youth. That makes sense, she, of course, having been involved in the education sector for some time. I think she's had many good conversations with youth. It's of great interest to me. I certainly have many young people that live and work within my constituency. I was thinking about the students.

8:00 a.m.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Point of order.

The Speaker: A point of order has been called.

Mr. Jason Nixon: The hon. member, I believe – and it has been a long evening, so I could stand to be corrected – moved the motion that we are debating and has spoken already on this motion.

The Speaker: I will confirm with the table.

Having said that, he was standing on 29(2)(a). As such . . .

Mr. Jason Nixon: I think that he should be allowed to continue, then.

The Speaker: . . . I concur with your position that he should be allowed to continue.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I recognize that the hon. Government House Leader has had a long evening himself. You know, it's understandable. At this point a few things are going to slide.

But as I was saying, you know, I do have a number of students. I spoke earlier about the kids in the hall bistro. I spoke about the Boyle Street Education Centre. I am also very fortunate to have Centre High located here in my constituency at the Boardwalk Market. Many young people are completing their high school education there and are themselves participating in the workforce, in fact participating in some excellent work training programs. Again, Mr. Speaker, I see no reason why those students should be paid a lower wage for doing the same work as others are doing at a higher wage.

Given that, my interest in that subject, I would love to hear more from the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood on that topic.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood has approximately three minutes if she would like to provide some additional comments.

Member Irwin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the Member for Edmonton-City Centre. Our ridings are neighbouring, so we share a lot of similar issues, and I've really appreciated getting to work with him and talk about some of our shared issues and shared opportunities.

I was just starting to say there that the school dropout rates are actually the highest in rural areas, in small towns. Having taught and been a vice-principal out in rural Alberta in small communities – Bawlf, Alberta, was where I spent most of my career – I know that a lot of those students would likely have not had to be too convinced to drop out of school if there was a higher wage. We did a lot of work to keep kids in school. We had the fortune of having a lot of really good work experience programs, RAP, registered apprenticeship programs, that really kept a lot of our students engaged in school. For some of them poverty was an issue, and I would worry very much about the lure of being able to drop out of school because of that higher wage. So I think it's a real issue. I will have to chat with some of my former colleagues out in rural Alberta, just to hear what they're hearing – right? – some of those teachers and counsellors who were working so hard to keep kids in school. Yeah. I think I've shared a lot on the youth piece.

The only other thing I wanted to mention was just on the OT, on the overtime, because I'd like to get that on the record, too. I mean, I grew up in Barrhead, Alberta, and my dad worked in oil and gas for about 40 years near a place called Swan Hills, Alberta. He worked a lot of overtime, and, you know, he sacrificed a lot of time away from the family. I would worry about the rollback because we know that oil and gas workers will be affected the most by this.

I can give other examples as well. I gave the example of a fellow I used to date in Forestburg back when I was dating fellows. He worked at the power plant, the coal-fired power plant out there, and same thing. Trying to get ahead, he put in a lot of overtime hours. I can't imagine the impact that that would have. He is now married with a few kids. Happy for him. Again, I can point to countless stories: my dad, him, and a lot of folks particularly out in rural Alberta, but not just in rural Alberta because I heard it at the doors in Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood, which is certainly not rural Alberta.

As I said, I just wanted to put that on the record as well. I've spoken a lot about youth and my concerns there. But on the overtime concerns I think that others of my colleagues have spoken a lot. I know that my colleague in Edmonton-West Henday spoke to his own history as a union worker with IBEW. So I will finish there.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Thank you.

We are back on the amendment. Is anyone wishing to speak to the amendment? I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View rising to debate.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and good morning. It is my pleasure to rise today and speak with respect to this bill and this amendment. You know, I think certainly the members on this side of the House and I think on all sides of the House are probably fairly familiar with this issue. I think there are probably a number of things that can be said about, as my hon. colleague from Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood was talking about, the sort of use of differential minimum wages was, of course, a regulation related to this piece of legislation. I think a lot of these changes are problematic in the sense that they hurt maybe not the most vulnerable in our society but those that are close.

[Mr. Hanson in the chair]

I think back over a number of years, and I had the opportunity in my last opportunity to speak to discuss some of the various and sundry jobs I worked over the course of my life, and certainly working for a number of years at a chain restaurant and working for a number of years at a bank, I'm familiar with what it's like to work for minimum wage, at or near. You know, it's really challenging. I think people sometimes forget the challenge. They talk about youth minimum wage, and I can remember someone saying at one point: oh, well, maybe at the minimum wage you can't achieve all your dreams. Well, the dreams that you're trying to achieve, generally, when you're working minimum wage are both shelter and food, which I think ought to be fairly achievable dreams.

There's a lot of stress and challenge that comes with that. Certainly, when you're young, you're maybe capable of more things than you are – at some point I can remember working a job and being in university and studying all night and being remarkably coherent the next day in a way that maybe isn't always the case anymore. But I still think that even at that age you deserve to be able to seek whatever it is you're seeking. I think it's not really the government's place to judge and to interfere and to consider what it is you are or aren't doing with your money.

I think that if we're saying equal pay for equal work, which is what we're saying here – honestly, if we go into the history of this, if we look back, very similar arguments to this were advanced at one point for why women ought to have a differential minimum wage, because it was only a secondary income and they could rely on their husbands, who were working real jobs. They didn't really need; they were just contributing to extra things in the household. They weren't having to pay for things. But that, of course, wasn't the case for all women then, as it isn't the case for all youth now. I think that when we look back at this decision from the perspective of history, we're going to have a similar reaction, much like we look back now and we say: "My goodness. How could they have thought that? Who could possibly have believed that a woman's work should be worth less, should have a lower minimum wage than a man? Who would have believed that that kind of discrimination was appropriate?"

I think, you know, in 10 or 20 years, or some of us right now, we're going to look back at this decision, and we're going to think exactly the same thing. At the end of the day, while youth may not vote, they are still persons, too, if you will. They still have needs and desires. They still have things that they want to achieve. I think that when we delve down into whether or not they're using their money appropriately, it's just overly paternalistic, and I don't think it's reasonable. I think they have just as much agency and just as much right to decide what it is that they want to pursue.

In a lot of cases it probably is education, and even if it isn't, even when it comes to education – I went to postsecondary for rather a long time. After graduating with a psychology degree, I went back and took a philosophy degree, and a lot of people may have suggested that that was not the best use of my funds. Ultimately it led me to law school and on this journey, and I don't regret any moment of it. I think that a youth, regardless of what they're choosing to do with their money, regardless of whether you think the philosophy degree they're taking is a worthwhile degree, deserves to make those decisions for themselves. They deserve to be treated as equal participants in society because they are doing the same work as everyone else.

8:10 a.m.

In fact, to suggest that someone a month before their 18th birthday isn't capable of performing a task as well or as adequately as someone a month after their 18th birthday I think is just a little bit absurd. I think the line is arbitrary, to say the least. Given my reliance on some of my younger colleagues with respect to technology, I suspect that there are a lot of people who are 16 or 17 years of age who are probably better able to do certain tasks than, say, someone of my age and experience. Those are a few of my thoughts on that.

I also think that at the end of the day, ensuring not just the minimum wage but a lot of protections in this bill gives people the ability to have some power in their working situation, the ability to hold their heads up high, the ability to make their way in the world. We talk, I think, a lot about ensuring social mobility and ensuring that people are able to do the best for themselves and are able to put themselves in the best situation. I actually think the best way to ensure that is to ensure that they have appropriate protections at work.

I certainly remember working for a number of years at a bank, that shall remain nameless. Ultimately this turned into a court case elsewhere, not here. There was a tendency to skirt those protections, to say: oh, well, you're not required to stay with a customer who stays late and only get paid until 4:30, but if you're not balanced, you're in trouble. There was usually half an hour to 40 minutes of work that needed to occur in order for that to happen, so if someone was still there after the doors closed and you had to help them until 20 after, you were staying until 5 and that's just the way it was, even though you only got paid until 4:30. People like me were able to push back against that, but not everyone was. There were some younger people who maybe didn't have parents in the same position that my parents were in, who would have been able to help them out if they had lost their job. There was one woman that I worked with who had two kids and she was a single mother. She needed that job. She lived paycheck to paycheck, and she wasn't able to stand up for her rights in that context.

That's why we have bodies like this, right? People say, "Oh, well, it's fine. Workers can just stand up for their rights," but the history of that has been that there has had to be legislative intervention. There was a long time where there were no occupational health and safety rules at all in this country and in others. As is often the case with things, when we know better, we do better, and we move forward. We provide more power to those who are the least empowered. I think, for a number of years, we moved in a very positive direction with that. We moved in a direction where those who had nothing and were trying to make their way in the world had enough rights that they were able to sort of make that transition, and they were able to move where they wanted with sufficient hard work.

But I think, I would say, arguably since the mid-80s we've kind of been sliding in the other direction. The wages of those who earn the least have been slipping relative to the wages of those who earn the most, significantly. I personally, philosophically, tend to pin it to this "greed is good" thing that happened in the 80s, which I think has been very destructive to society.

Legislatures the world over have stepped back for fear of interfering, but either way, when you're amending a law, it's a law. We have laws in place, bankruptcy laws to a certain degree – less so now in Canada, although still, I think, in places in the States – that tend to privilege corporations, that tend to privilege those who are able to contribute capital as opposed to those who are able to contribute their labour. In any event, the system doesn't run unregulated. I mean, that hasn't been the case for probably centuries. To say that one form of interference is good and beneficial and one isn't: I mean, yes, that's the case, but you suggest that there are classes of places in which we should interfere and in which we shouldn't. Basically, usually those classes are suggested to be interference which help those that are wealthiest, who have inherited their capital and have that capital to contribute, that they are beneficial and that those interferences that help those who don't have capital, who don't have inherited wealth, who only have their hard work and their dedication and their smarts to contribute – those regulations tend to be classed as that. I think that's really sad. I really do, because I think that working hard and your character and who you are moving forward is so much more important than what you've inherited, and that's why I think that some of these moves are so incredibly important.

I think that another thing that's worth talking about, again, is the importance of unions, what they do and how they impact. You know, certainly, I've mentioned this before, but I remember that when we studied various human rights cases in law school, it was interesting to discover that the names on those cases were not usually the names of the individuals. They were usually unions because it arose out of what's called a grievance, which is where the employee and the union go to arbitration, and then it usually goes to a judicial review and so on and so forth. But many of those cases arose, again, because those individuals said, "My rights are being violated, but I don't have the strength to stand up to my employer; I need this job because I need to feed my kids" or whatever else. So those employees were able to pool their collective resources. They were able to come together and say: none of us want our rights violated, and whatsoever you do to one of us, you do to all of us.

I don't know. To me, the best, in some ways, in human society is everyone coming together and saying: "If you violate the rights of one of us, you violate the rights of all of us. We're all going to stand up, we're all going to pool our resources together, and we're all going to fight that collectively." That is, by and large, a huge portion of the work that unions do, to enable those workers to come together and to collectively fight for those rights.

You know, we talk a lot about interest arbitration, and that usually has to do with pay and working conditions and various other things that are set up in the contract. But what I'm talking about here is grievance arbitration. That's essentially when an employee comes forward and says, "The thing that you did to me isn't fair" for whatever reason. Sometimes it's the employer, too, but often it's the employee.

We've seen huge advances. The B.C. firefighters' case is one of my favourites, and it talks about setting a standard which is unrelated to the work being done, so a standard which is unnecessary in order to complete the work but which unfairly discriminates against women. Essentially, women were excluded not because they couldn't do the work but because someone had set up a standard in order to get the job, but the standard was something that wasn't required in order to perform the job. Folks recognize overt discrimination in a way that they maybe don't recognize that kind of systemic discrimination.

[The Speaker in the chair]

I think that by ensuring that workers have the ability to come together and to vote democratically, not to have it imposed on them but to vote by majority, just like we vote by majority in this House – like, the members opposite are so fond of reminding us what the will of the majority was – saying that workers should be able to vote by majority and bring themselves together collectively, in order to achieve those ends, you know, it's really critical to ensure that individuals have that, because what it does, in my view, is that it raises the standard of living of us all.

Actually, what keeps springing to mind is: whatsoever you do to the least among us, you do unto me. I actually think that is a religious quote. You know, I feel like that's the way we should behave in society, and that is why I am in favour of this amendment.

Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

8:20 a.m.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available for brief questions or comments. I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview rising.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm very pleased to rise, and in a moment here I will direct my question to the Member for Calgary-Mountain View about her remarks on Bill 2. Now, her remarks: I appreciate the fact that they were very detailed. One of the areas that I was hoping the member could expand upon is what this bill is proposing to do for banked overtime pay and how that will impact workers in her riding but, as well, around the province. I know that this elimination of overtime pay for hours banked will have a significant impact on families. There are many families, especially in the energy sector, who rely on their overtime pay to make ends meet monthly. So I was hoping to hear from the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View her thoughts on this proposed change, what it would mean to her constituents and Albertans at large.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview for reminding me of that one as well. I had gone so poetic with respect to the rights of youth workers that I had almost forgotten this little piece. I think this is something that's going to make a huge difference in the lives of individuals. A lot of individuals will take overtime because they want to save towards goals, right? If you're working a lower wage job and you're trying to pay your rent and ensure there's food for your kids, it can be quite challenging. That can be a really tight situation.

I know that members of this House, especially on the other side, want to go on about the fact: you know, you worked hard, so you got ahead. As someone who's worked a low-wage job and also as someone who's gone to law school, I'm not denying that law school was difficult, but it's nothing compared to the continual stress of thinking: okay; I have enough to cover all of my bills, and I can put away $200 a month. You put away and put away and put away, and then your car breaks down, and you're just back to square one again. They're challenging circumstances – they're challenging circumstances – in which to live. I think a lot of people are in those circumstances, and overtime is what makes the difference to them.

You know, certainly, I've heard members on the other side say: well, this isn't that much money. Well, for someone who's living paycheque to paycheque, for someone who's trying to save up so that they can go back to school while still providing for their children, actually it's a lot of money. It's an enormous amount of money. Certainly, when I was back in school, one of my friends had gone back to school a little bit later, too. That's probably why we were friends. Gosh, I think he had his fifth child, actually, while we were in school, so he had a lot of people to provide for. He had a decent job but a job that was a manual labour job, and he often relied on overtime to be able to buy his textbooks. I don't think that that's unreasonable.

This notion of, "Oh, well, you can just choose which to do": it just isn't the case. I've certainly worked for employers who had policies that said that you absolutely must bank your overtime. You were not permitted to have it paid out, specifically to take advantage of a law like this. The employer would essentially force you to work overtime, and then they wouldn't give you the choice as to whether you wanted to take time off. In that particular job, because there were a limited number of us, every time someone had to take a day off because of this banked overtime, it was actually just harder on everyone else. I mean, really, you didn't get ahead at all.

I think this makes a huge difference for a lot of people, and I think that we in this House need to consider the circumstances of different people, different people across the province who may be from different backgrounds, who may have different circumstances than we do, and we need to consider the fact that this overtime money may mean an enormous amount to them.

I certainly know, for myself and a number of people that I've known over the course of my life, that this is the kind of money that would make an enormous difference. It's the kind of money that you can start to put towards something or just to deal with the fact that your car broke down unexpectedly. I mean, that happens, usually at the worst possible time.

The Speaker: Thank you for your comments, hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Good morning to some fresh faces here this morning. It's a pleasure to see you.

We are on debate of RA1. Is there anyone wishing to provide additional debate? I see the hon. the Leader of the Official Opposition.

Ms Notley: Why, thank you so much, Mr. Speaker. It is just a joy for me to be here this morning to speak about this issue. I think there is, you know, a lovely sort of – I won't call it irony. There's a different word. I'm kind of having that word-finding problem that exists with people over a certain age. But we're talking about the matter of overtime as we now go into whatever hour that we are now in debating the matter of overtime, so, you know, sweet irony, whatever it is. I'm glad to be here to be able to continue to talk about this issue.

You know, we talked a lot about this issue during the election campaign, but I will say that I think I have to take a certain amount of responsibility that we weren't as successful as I would have liked at really getting folks to understand what these changes would mean to the rights of many working Albertans to earn overtime. As a result of that, perhaps it was not an issue that was sufficiently debated, which, of course, is why we're spending so much time talking about it now, to make sure that everybody truly has the opportunity to think about and to internalize what the consequences of this particular set of changes would be to people's ability to earn overtime. That's, of course, why I'm rising to speak in favour of this amendment, which would in fact serve to delay passage of this bill until such time as we really could unpack what this particular set of amendments would do to people's ability to earn overtime in this province.

We've talked a lot over the last many hours about the nature of Alberta's workforce in terms of people who are, you know, lower wage workers, waged workers, those who are salaried workers, those who are small-business owners, those who are senior managers in larger corporate entities, whether they be private sector or public sector, and then, of course, those who are owners of much, much larger businesses. So we've talked a good deal about the nature of who is doing work in Alberta, and I think it's fair to say that in most cases we all share a very common characteristic, and that is that we all work very, very hard in Alberta. I think that's absolutely true.

I remember moving back here from British Columbia when I was about – let's see. My kids were about, maybe, one and a half and three, Mr. Speaker. I had been working as a lawyer in British Columbia for almost a decade before that and had managed to sort of orchestrate quite a nice little arrangement for myself there, where

I was able to maintain a good professional position with a very good career path, with lots of really interesting working opportunities, while at the same time actually only working part-time so that I could spend time with my children, who were at that time one and three.

8:30 a.m.

It really mattered to me to be able to have these kinds of flexible working arrangements that allowed me to, you know, maintain a foot in the door of my career so that I didn't do the thing that so many women often do, which is that you drop out of the workforce. Then you're struggling to get back into the workforce about 10 years later, and you find that your male colleagues have leapfrogged well past you in terms of your career path, and you're constantly scrambling to catch up. That's, quite frankly, the story that I think many, many experience when they drop completely out of the workforce or, conversely, take jobs with much lower levels of responsibility while caring for young kids. They find that they're starting from behind when they do get back into the workforce once their kids are a bit older.

I was very, very privileged, Mr. Speaker, when I was living in B.C., to have a job that allowed me to do the kinds of interesting things that I could while still working part-time. Indeed, one of the interesting things that I was privileged to be able to do, actually, was to advise the government of B.C. at the time on a range of changes to the health and safety legislation that they had that, interestingly, actually impacted on hours of work and all those kinds of things. It was amazing to be able to have that much agency while still working part-time and raising very young children.

Anyway, the reason I talk about that, as it relates to Alberta, is that when we moved to Alberta, I then set about to find the same kind of work here. You know, the upside was that I was repeatedly offered work by a range of very interesting and exciting employers where I could do the same kinds of fun things, but when I would say, "Great; I want to work part-time, and I still want to have benefits, and I want to have all these things," they looked at me like I was from Mars. They were just: "Well, no. If you're going to do this kind of exciting work, you're going to work 65 hours a week at least, and if you're not, then who are you, and why do you think you get to use your brain and do this job?" It was a bit of a shock to me.

It was an interesting process. It took me about a year to basically – interestingly, I was making fun last night of how it's very hard for individual employees to negotiate their own terms of employment. I suppose I was an exception to that rule because over the course of about a year I managed to negotiate a whole new contract for myself, within a collective agreement setting, to allow not only me but ultimately my future colleagues to work part-time and still do interesting work. But it took some time.

The reason I raise it is that there was an interesting culture that I discovered across all sectors of the Alberta economy because I was, you know, doing a lot of contract work here and there. That's what you want to do. The irony: you want to work part-time, so you take a bunch of part-time contracts and try to build full-time work or enough work, and ultimately you end up working about 1.5 jobs or two jobs while you're juggling all your different contracts. So I worked for a bunch of different people until we managed to finally find that lovely sort of part-time thing that allowed me to go back and spend quality time with my children, which, as you can imagine, was really my number one priority.

Through that process, you know, it became very clear to me: the different culture from B.C. to Alberta; how hard people here work, everybody. You know, the workers worked hard. The paid salaried staff, that I was seeking to be, worked hard. Managers worked hard.

Business owners worked hard. Everybody put in long hours, and the economy was highly productive. In fact, we often found and many people found that there was a shortage of people to fill jobs, in fact, because things were moving so fast at that time. The price of oil was quite high, and the province was also doing well, I think, because of unprecedented land sales and things really doing quite well in the natural gas sector at that point.

Anyway, that's our culture, and that's who we are as Albertans, and I think we should be proud of it. We should. I think it's a good thing. And if people choose to work overtime, then they should absolutely be paid more for it. If we choose to run our businesses and run our organizations and serve our public, if we happen to be in a nonprofit or public-sector setting, with that kind of energy and innovation and devotion, then that's what we should do. But the key is that we should be paid for it. I suspect – and I will admit that I haven't actually looked at it. I haven't had a chance to do a crossjurisdictional comparison because we're still sort of in the process of getting our resources set up over here at the offices of the old off op, so I haven't done as much crossjurisdictional comparison as I would like.

Anyway, we're working through that, but I suspect that it is the case that Albertans probably work more overtime than almost any other province because of that sort of cultural element to our workforce. Again, that's not a bad thing. That creates productivity. That's good. The key is that everyone should enjoy and share the benefits of that culture. Everyone should get the outcome that we are all seeking when we engage in our work life that way, and it shouldn't be a thing where just, you know, a certain group of people get the benefit of it and everybody else carries the burden of it.

Overtime is a concept where there is a premium paid at a certain point for hours that are worked beyond a certain number because it is understood that there are sacrifices that are made by people when they work beyond a certain number of hours in a given day or in a given week or in a given work cycle, however it's defined. There are sacrifices inherent in that choice which go beyond the normal sacrifice that is made when you work under that amount. It has to do with a number of things. It has to do with your health and safety. It has to do with your ability to maintain a healthy lifestyle and to ensure that you're getting the sleep that you need, that you're getting the right food that you need. [interjections] Exactly.

Mr. Speaker, I'm sure you're probably not being your best self – right? – in this 24-hour period. You've probably missed out on all your healthy food, not to mention your morning yoga class, and probably – I don't know. I'm assuming that the Speaker runs a solid 20 K every morning. These things don't happen when, you know, suddenly your work schedule is completely turned on its head and you discover that, no, you have to be in to work much earlier than you'd planned and you need to be at work for 16 hours rather than eight.

In a way, I kind of like that we're having this conversation in this setting because I think there's not a soul in this room that doesn't have some understanding of what it's like to have your schedule and your life disrupted by having to put in a lot more hours of work than you had planned. It's not just the Speaker's yoga class. I think there are many people here that missed out on their morning yoga class. Okay. Maybe not yoga. I'm going to say that this is probably not the profile of most yoga classes, the people in this room. [interjections] Oh, no, no. I stand corrected. Apparently, there is a whole yoga caucus in the UCP government. Namaste.

An Hon. Member: Namaste.

Ms Notley: You know of what I speak, then. It's hard to go through a day without that yoga.

But, seriously, even today we have staff who have worked for more than 14 hours. I'm not sure about our commissionaires and our sheriffs, what's happened with the hours that they've been putting in. I'm not sure whether they would be earning time and a half right now. I hope so. Certainly, I know that the salaried members here are not, but, you know, for some ridiculous reason not only did we sign up for this, but we campaigned and asked lots of people for this, so that's on us. I think that the people that work in and around the vicinity of these buildings: certainly, we need to make sure that they are compensated for the extra hours that they put in.

8:40 a.m.

With all of this, though, the point that I'm trying to make, in a very long-winded and not very articulate way, is that when you say to the person who is paying you, "In return for you paying me, I will give you an hour of my time and effort and attention and capacity and all those things," that bargain changes at a certain point when the length of time that you are delivering to that person reaches past a certain point. We're all human, and it's not actually in people's best interest to consistently work 12, 14 hours a day. The impact on your life outside of work: it's not a linear progression. The impact of that 12th hour away from home is much bigger than the impact of the fifth hour away from home. There. I think I finally found a way to make that case or clarify what it is I'm trying to say.

I say this, going back to my own experience when I was working so hard, as a mom of two small kids, to be able to spend time with them every day. I think there are many people in this room that understand what it's like if your work is such that you go home and you don't actually get to say good night to your kids and you go a whole 24-hour period and you don't see them at all because you've been at work for too long. You can only sustain that so many times before it creates a much bigger, negative impact on your life and on the life of your family. Above and beyond the issue of health and safety, which I think should speak for itself, there's also just the exponential impact on quality of life that arises from working beyond a certain number of hours. As a result of that, there should be a premium paid.

This is not, you know, groundbreaking stuff that I'm saying here. The concept of a premium for overtime work is not quite as old as the hills, but it's been around for some time. In a place like Alberta, where people work hard, play hard, as folks like to say, the concept of a premium for your overtime has been around for a very, very long time, and there are great swaths of our population who have made a tremendous success of their lives that way, whether by way of operating their own businesses and working very, very hard in order to get ahead that way or by way of working as an employee in certain sectors of our population and working very hard that way in order to gain that extra money and also the extra opportunity that can come with it.

Now, I remember at one point hearing someone – I can't remember who it was – try to justify this change to the overtime as somehow providing rights to workers and suggest that the poor waitress was really being held down by the obligation of her employer to pay overtime because she was compelled to be ejected from the workplace at a certain point, right when customers who were getting ready to pay great tips were walking through the door.

Well, I have to say that, I mean, I can only speak from my own experience and from the experience of – oh, I don't know – the 200 or so random waiters and waitresses that have come and talked to me over the course of the last couple of years when I've been out on the road and eating out. In many cases they would come and talk to me, and they'd sort of whisper, and they'd sort of look around, and they'd say: "You know, thank you so much for everything that you're doing. You're actually making my life so much better. I don't care what my boss says. This is exactly what I need." You know, it's not like I go out begging for people to come and say that to me. Quite the opposite. Typically when my day would end around 9 or 10 o'clock and we would actually go out some place to get a bit of food, we would kind of focus on just sort of winding down at the end of the day, but nonetheless people would often come and volunteer to me their gratitude for this. Even in restaurants that had subsequently gone on the record to rabidly oppose our changes to workplace laws, I would invariably run into the majority of their staff and have them say: yeah, well, the boss may say this, but the other 80 per cent of humans in this business are very grateful for what you've done.

And I will say, you know, that this is not just a theoretical thing. I mean, I've had a long and varied working life, I think it's fair to say. I joke around about how I've done practically every job in this building, but there are a few positions I haven't had yet. Mr. Speaker, just don't feel threatened or anything, also those at the table and the Sergeant-at-Arms. That's always struck me, that the uniforms are really cool. Lots of options.

I've had a fairly wide-ranging group of jobs over my time working since I first started working at the age of 15. In fact, my first job that actually lasted more than a few days was as a waitress when I was 15. In fact, that is the work that I did until I was about 21, 22. I worked at a number of different types of restaurants during that time, and I will say without question that I think that some of the hardest work that anyone will ever do in their life is work in the service industry, in the food services industry. I think it's incredibly hard work. I'll acknowledge that I was not the best waitress on the planet. Looking back, I marvel that I actually managed to maintain my job given the number of times I would flip a tray accidentally onto the laps of poor customers. This was not my forte. Nonetheless, I somehow managed to stay employed through that whole process. Maybe that's partially why I wasn't as successful with the tips as some, but nonetheless I did that all through high school.

Interestingly, you know, I started at the very beginning of grade 10, when I was 15, before I had a car or before I could drive. We lived about 25 clicks out of town, so my mom had to drive me into town for my shift and then come and pick me up when I was finished. Often I'd be working until about midnight, and I'd be working 10, 11, 12 hours on weekends and would definitely be working till 1 or 2 o'clock in the morning on weeknights when I was going to school. Once I got my driver's licence, that made things a little bit easier.

Certainly, the fact that I was 15 or 16 had no impact on the type of work that I was doing. I was, you know, working at exactly the same kind of job as the other waitresses, serving people food and all that kind of thing. Until I was 18, I couldn't serve liquor, but that had absolutely no impact on the number of customers that I would serve, the number of orders I would put through, the amount of dishes I would wash, the amount of salads that I would make, all that kind of stuff. I was fully a part of the team at all of the restaurants where I worked, beginning at the age of 15.

Certainly, you know, that tradition continues in my family. My son is washing dishes while working on his science degree at the U of A, and he'll also come home at about 2 o'clock in the morning and then go off to school the next day. Interestingly for him, standing and washing dishes, you know, if he actually has to work two shifts in a row, back to back, and if his shifts go more than about eight hours, his feet get so bad from standing that he's literally limping when he gets home. He limps up the stairs, and he limps for the next day.

8:50 a.m.

He's trying now to make sure that his shifts aren't scheduled back to back. He can't control when he ends up having to work a really, really long shift because customers come in at the very last minute, right before the restaurant is going to close, so he has to stick around. Then if he has to stand on his feet for 11 or 12 hours, he literally cannot walk, and he limps around. If you question this, ask anyone in our neighbourhood who watches him the next morning limping around while walking our dog. I have to explain what's going on with his feet to the neighbours.

Ms Hoffman: But with enough overtime maybe he can get orthotics.

Ms Notley: Well, if he gets paid the premium, yeah, he can get some orthotics, which is a whole other issue.

Anyway, this is real. What I will say is that in that experience it was never the case that, you know, you were wishing: jeez, I just wish I could get paid straight time so that I could stay that 12th hour at the workplace and get all those extra tips. The idea that that's what's happening in the world of people who are working in restaurants is nonsense, Mr. Speaker. It's just nonsense.

You know, I also had the experience a little bit later, when I was about – what was I? – I guess 19, of working at a restaurant that was isolated. It was on the north shore of Great Bear Lake. You had to fly in and fly out. We had very wealthy tourists from the U.S. fly in. They would stay for a week, and they would go fishing on Great Bear Lake in search of the biggest lake trout ever. At the time the lodge that I worked for actually held the record for the biggest lake trout ever caught. It was about 65 pounds. It was quite impressive. But that was not the job I had. I didn't get to be the guide that took the guests out fishing on the lake. I was one of the four waitresses that served them breakfast and supper.

It was very interesting. I still remember flying into the camp about a week before the guests were to arrive, and our job was to get the camp ready for the first guests. We flew in. We had to do two flights. We probably landed around 8 or 9 o'clock in the evening. We all got to work, and we just kept working and working and working. At a certain point I thought: "Gosh, you know, I'm really hungry. Why am I so hungry? It's, like, only 10 o'clock. I'm not usually hungry." Lo and behold, it was 5 o'clock in the morning, and the sun hadn't gone down because it was, you know, the last week of June or whatever it was. They just had us working until 5 or 6 o'clock in the morning, until we basically dropped off our feet from working so hard to get the camp ready.

Of course, we lived there. We couldn't leave. If we chose to leave before the camp was scheduled to close after two and a half months, we would have had to pay about two weeks' salary for the cost of the plane to get out, so we were sort of captured. We lived in this little, harshly plumbed cabin outside the lodge, and we generally worked about 12 hours a day, six and a half days a week. Interestingly, this was a long time ago – you know, I'm not that young – and the laws were different, so they could do that. In hindsight, I mean, we were genuinely sort of captured employees.

When I think back to the hours that we worked, it is quite something to me that we didn't get overtime. I will however say that if I'd been offered it, I would have taken it, and I will also say that under no circumstances was I given the opportunity to negotiate the terms and conditions of that employment. It was a great experience, but it was probably in violation of just a plethora of rules. I'm not saying that they were in violation then. I'm just saying that the rules that we have in place now would have required a very different set of working conditions than what we had, and I think that that is a good thing because when I think back to the situations we were put into, I don't think that they were particularly great for us at the time.

It's these kinds of things that we need to guard against as Albertans as we continue to do the thing that we do, where we all work very, very, very hard and we produce more and we have higher levels of productivity in the province of Alberta than any other part of the country. Even in the midst of this downturn we still have the highest earnings in the country, we still have the highest number of people working, the highest percentage of labour force participation in the country, and people earning the most. I think that that is because, in part, of this culture that we all have of working hard and working long.

I do not believe that we are going to encourage that or reward that fairly if we say: well, the folks that are employing these people that are working hard and working long will enjoy the benefit of their work and enjoy the benefit of those profits and that productivity, and what we're going to do is reach in and grab some of the benefits that should be going to all of us, and we're going to steal them out of their pockets and put them in someone else's pockets, and we're going to do this on the backs of those who have the least agency and the least ability to defend themselves.

It just really does go against the grain with respect to, you know, when you have to make changes, when you come up against challenges, when you have to shift the way you're doing things. I think that there's an element of that, for sure, in this province because we know that as much as everybody likes to make the sort of simplistic arguments – and I believe that the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford did a beautiful job last night of revealing their shortcomings – as much as people like to say, “You got elected; the price of oil dropped; therefore, all the things that happened as a result of the price of oil dropping are now your fault,” I think most people understand that that is not true.

I think, more to the point, people understand that our energy industry is going through a major, major restructuring, a major shift and that even when – and I say “when” with great optimism and hope – we get the matter of our ability to get our products to market resolved and we establish greater takeaway capacity in the longer term through pipelines and, hopefully, in the medium term through the wise reversal of this government's plan to cancel crude by rail, even when we get our takeaway capacity issues resolved, the nature and the structure of the energy industry are changing in a way that our economy also is going to have to change. What people do to earn money is also in the state of probably unprecedented change and evolution right now.

The key as we go through that is that we go through it together and that we make sure that everybody is doing their fair share to get through what is an economic shift and that we don't use the economic shift as an opportunity to suddenly rip away the framework that ensures that all Albertans can share in either prosperity or challenge together, the way we should. We should not build our economic future on the back of a principle of exploitation. Our economic future should be built on the foundation of people coming together to share both the upside and the downside, to share the upside and to share the risk, not putting the risk on the backs of those who can least afford it and shovelling the upside to a group of people who already, in many cases, are doing very, very well, blindly hoping that by moving all the upside to them, they will choose to invest more here.

9:00 a.m.

Honestly, as we heard when we had some of the conversation that we've been having around Bill 3, there's mounting evidence that that's just not the way it works. I do look forward as well to getting back to that conversation around Bill 3 because every time I turn around, more people are finding more really thoughtful, thoughtful studies, evidence, historical analysis, case study after case study after case study showing the likely failure and the missteps of this government as it relates to the corporate tax strategy as a means of creating long-term economic prosperity and sustainability in the province of Alberta. Anyway, that's Bill 3.

This is another piece to that. As I've said before, it's all about finding ways to maximize gifts to certain players within our economy with no guaranteed benefit in return but a clear guaranteed loss to other people in the economy. Workers will get less. That's just what it means. When you pay people at straight time for overtime instead of time and a half for overtime, it's very clear. It's black and white: workers will get less.

Ms Hoffman: How does that stimulate the economy?

Ms Notley: The Member for Edmonton-Glenora asks, “How does that stimulate the economy?” We've talked before. It's not helpful. You know, when you talk about small business – and members opposite are very passionate about talking about small business, and that's great. Small business is the backbone of our economy. I'm going to be doing an event later this morning with a number of wonderful small-business owners who contribute to the economy, who contribute to our community, who are dear friends. It is absolutely true that small business is the backbone of our economy. No question about that.

Now, I think I've lost my train. I started talking about small business. Where was I going there?

Ms Hoffman: Cutting straight time. Cutting overtime. Less money in the local economy.

Ms Notley: Oh, that's it. Yes, small business. Thank you. Thank you, Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Just guessing.

Ms Notley: One of the things about small business, though, that sometimes gets lost when the other side is talking about small business, is that small business actually, for the most part, requires money to be spent in their small business in Alberta by people who are here in Alberta. The reason small business is the backbone of our economy is that they're part of an internal and localized economic model that requires there to be money flowing within the local economic model. If you take money out of the local economic model, then there is less money to flow within it, and then small business doesn't do as well.

Basically, if you run a small business, you need the folks in your community that you rely on to use your small business to have the money to spend on your small business. If the folks in your community, if your neighbours find that they have $2,500 a month less in their family budget every 12 weeks, then guess what? They are not going to maybe feel that they can buy a new vehicle. They're not going to go to get their hair done. They're not going to go to one of these restaurants where all these theoretical happy waiters and waitresses are so pleased to be able to work long hours with no overtime so that you can get the tip that apparently they're not going to get now because everybody has less money. Anyway, they're not going to go there. They're not going to avail themselves of the small-business services as much as they would otherwise because they have less money. That's the thing about an economy that is built on the hard work of small-business owners: they are more susceptible to the loss of money in the economy.

We know, for sure, that many small businesses have also suffered as a result of the drop in the price of oil. You know, as drilling has gone down, as production has gone down, as employment within the oil and gas sector has gone down, a series of these rippling effects goes through the economy in many, many, many ways. We know that that is true. Many of these small businesses suffer. There's no question. I wish that there were ways to protect them more effectively, but that has already happened. But what we also know is that to then, you know, fire a bunch of public-sector workers, to roll back wages, to stop paying people overtime, and to take money out of people's pockets – in fact, the negative impact on small businesses will ripple even further, and the ripple will be stronger, and it will go farther. Austerity is rarely a path to economic growth. [interjections] Right. Oh, that's a good one. We certainly, certainly do not want to starve or strangle economic growth.

You know, when our government was first elected, we actually went off and sought advice. It's a thing that we did. We were very committed to sort of evidence-based decision-making. We sought advice from former governor of the Bank of Canada David Dodge. He talked to us about how to stimulate economic growth in the midst of the downturn that we were faced with. He talked, of course, about injecting quite a significant bump in investment into infrastructure to keep people employed and to keep that money circulating in the economy and all that kind of stuff. So we did that.

Just to be clear, I don't think there's a person in the room that would ever characterize David Dodge as some socialist lefty. I'm pretty sure David Dodge would not characterize David Dodge as a socialist lefty. He's just a guy who happens to believe in, you know, Keynesian economics. It's a long-time economic theory, and it's one that appears to have stood the test of time. For instance, where Keynesian economics are used, you tend to see economic growth. Where you see Reaganomics introduced, you tend to see economic . . .

Ms Hoffman: Contraction.

Ms Notley: . . . contraction. That's what history delivers to us, a picture of how these things work over time.

In any event, the rationale there for Mr. Dodge's recommendations was this idea that we need to keep money in the economy. This goes right back to this idea of making sure that folks can stay working and that their money can stay in the economy and continue to keep the economy working, and that is why things like telling people that they don't get to earn overtime anymore stymies the very plan and objectives that someone like David Dodge was talking to our government about pursuing.

You know, another reason why overtime is something that should be paid at a premium is because there are additional costs to working extra hours above and beyond. I've talked about the health and safety issues. I've talked about the consequences to lifestyle, but I forgot to talk about some of the costs. And it just occurred to me because, of course, I believe there are a few members of our caucus who just in the last 24 hours have incurred additional costs as a result of us staying later. Of course, it's a rare occurrence for us. We're fine. We all signed up for this. But for regular working people it's a much, much more difficult thing to manage. When you end up having to work overtime, what do you do? You have to pay for child care. When you're paying for child care that is unpredictable – so that person has to be on call to come in or to stay late to provide additional child care – that is outside of the regular hours that a person would normally work, guess what? That child care costs more. That child care comes at a premium, so presumably you should also be earning a premium in order to pay for that child care, which is now at a premium.

9:10 a.m.

Now, members opposite may or may not know that with the child care pilots that we introduced over the course of the last four years, one of the pilots, not one individual one but one of the things that we were piloting, was the cost and the ability for agencies to develop shift-based child care so that we could actually have high-quality, affordable, accessible child care centres with well-educated child care providers and properly designed early education programs on a shift basis so that kids were not disrupted so much when parents had to work shifts and because we have large sectors of our economy where women, in particular, will do shift work, yet they can't find child care that accommodates that. So we were looking at trying to, you know, find public-sector placements for these kinds of child care arrangements.

I was thinking in particular, of course, about, for instance, in health care. We know that many, many nurses work on 12-hour schedules, and they're expected to work overtime. Now, because they have a collective agreement, of course, they get a premium for working overtime. That's, again, the good thing about a union, which this bill is trying to discourage. Thankfully, the nurses do have a union, so they do have written into their contract that they get a premium when they have to work overtime. What they don't have is particularly high levels of predictability around when they work overtime. In theory, they have schedules, and in theory they're supposed to get two weeks' notice of their schedule, or maybe it's three weeks. I can't remember the contract offhand now. But in emergent or difficult circumstances the employer, that being the people of Alberta indirectly, can break those schedules and break those plans, and all they have to do is pay an additional premium if they do it.

I can tell you from my own personal work experience that at that point, really, the premium is not even what folks are looking for. All they really want is control over their life, and they're deeply frustrated when they are suddenly told that they don't have that. Nonetheless, it was through this experience of working with this particular workforce and understanding how difficult it is when you are employed in a job where you have a 24-hour work cycle and you only have limited control over when you work and when you don't work and overtime is a matter of course – how do we construct child care that supports those working people so that the kids can still receive good, high-quality child care while mom or dad is working shift work and working these long hours? What I think we've heard from the preliminary pilot reports, although members opposite probably have better access to that information than I do right now, is that it costs more to provide that kind of child care. It would then flow that that is why when you work overtime, you should also be paid a premium because it costs more to work overtime and to do your job.

Just that issue of child care is a perfect example of why this sort of arbitrary decision embedded in this bill to pick the pockets of these workers and pull back their overtime is so hard nosed and unfair, just simply unfair.

You know, Mr. Speaker, it really does just come down to this issue of fairness, and I think all of us were raised very early on with this idea of fairness, but we have different views of what fairness is. Obviously, our view of what fairness is is driven by our own experience. There's no question. I know there are lots of folks who run businesses who will say: "I worked so, so hard. I worked 70 hours. Things didn't go our way, and my business is struggling. It is not fair that it should struggle more because I have to pay my employees this wage which they believe is fair. But it's not fair anymore because I'm not earning as much money as I would've liked." I appreciate that's an absolutely legitimate perspective. Our vision of what is fair is driven by our own experience. There's no question.

But I think that overall, if you're going to define what is fair, what you need to do is look at who has decision-making authority and who generally does better and who generally has less decision-making, less agency, and who generally earns less. Fairness should be about providing some balance, not growing the imbalance between those two different groups of people, and this bill at its heart is about finding different ways to grow the imbalance between people in our workforces and in our economy.

That is why, again, this idea of stripping overtime from working people strikes me as just fundamentally unfair. As it is, we're stripping overtime from people to the tune of $2,500 every 12 weeks if you're one of the 400,000 people who work overtime, just to give you a bit of a sense of it. We're not making this number up. It's not a Rebel media site over here, okay? We actually did some research here, and we just went to the government of Alberta statistics and looked at: what is the average number of overtime hours worked by people who work overtime, and what is their average rate of pay? Then we looked at: what do they lose, then, if they go from time and a half to straight time? That is basically how we came up with this number of roughly $2,500 every 12 weeks. It's not rocket science.

Now, I will grant you, the numbers are a little bit – you know, it's a bit rough because what we do know is that those statistics around the number of people who work overtime and their average rate of pay includes unionized workers. We do know that this attack on overtime in Bill 2 won't apply to unionized workers. I mean, it will apply to some unionized workers because in some cases the union will have not bothered to negotiate this issue because they have perceived that it was already protected in employment standards, so not every unionized worker will be protected from the negative consequences of this pick-your-pockets bill, but some of them will be. When you look at the tools we used to come up with this number of $2,500 every 12 weeks, we do need to allow for the fact that those estimates are skewed a little bit by those folks who have union jobs, who will actually be protected from this pick-your-pocket legislation by virtue of their union contract. So I will acknowledge that.

That's the one place where our numbers are a little bit rough because we can't find the information about how to factor out those particular employees from the 400,000. But because we know that, generally speaking, union density in Alberta is quite low – it's only around about 20 per cent – and because we know that not every union worker will be protected from this pick-your-pockets bill because of the fact that, again, those people negotiating their contract were relying on the existence of generalized employment standards legislation and didn't want to burn negotiating capital by bargaining things that were already protected in basic legislation.

Just so you know, when people go: "Oh, I don't know what you're talking about. What are they talking about with this $2,500?" That's how we did it. It's a pretty simple calculation, folks. You can get your own staff to do it. Obviously, it's an up to, because it's an average number of hours. Some people will actually lose more than $2,500, and some people will lose less. Not every employer will convert all overtime to this banked overtime at straight time model. Some employers will just say: well, this is garbage. Many employers, I hope, actually, will say: "This is garbage. Why would I exploit or double-cross my employees? I already have a perfectly fine arrangement with them. My business model works on it. I understand the principle of overtime. I used to be a working person getting paid overtime at time and a half. I think it's the right thing to do, and I'm not going to take advantage of this loophole that this UCP government is inviting me to use." Obviously, not every employer will take advantage of this loophole. Not every employer will take advantage fully of this loophole. They might only take advantage of it partly. Again, that has to be factored into it.

But know this: there are over 400,000 Albertans who get overtime. This piece of legislation would facilitate up to an average of $2,500 every 12 weeks being taken from the pockets of working Albertans. That is what you are allowing or permitting to have happen to hard-working Albertans through the passage of this bill. You are inviting employers to take $2,500 every 12 weeks out of the pockets of working Albertans. That's pretty big. That's pretty big.

I know, as I've said before, there are many, many, many employers who will not do this. They will have entered into collective agreements that, frankly, pay better than time and a half. They will have respect for the relationships that they have with the hard-working people who are part of their business, and they will not take advantage of this. They will understand that the success of their business – small business, medium-sized business, large business – depends on the strong working partnership that they have with their employees. I know that there are many, many, many Alberta employers who will say just that.

But I also know that this government obviously was lobbied by some employers to give them this loophole so that they can drive through this loophole and take that $2,500 on average from each of their employees every 12 weeks. I don't know exactly who those employers are. I anticipate getting the report soon about who donated to what PACs and all that kind of stuff. That information is going to start coming out pretty soon, and it's going to be good fun to go through it and figure out who got what as a result of the PAC donation sweepstakes. Right now we don't know who that is, but what we do know is that there is a very strong – well, as I say, it's permissive, but it really reads like an invitation. We call it the act to pick your pockets. It's clearly an invitation to pick the pockets of working people to the tune of $2,500 every 12 weeks.

Yeah. It's a lot of money. It's a lot – a lot – of money. Back when I was talking about my time working as a waitress on the north shore of Great Bear Lake, I will tell you that $2,500 is pretty much how much I made the whole two months of working 12 hours a day, six and a half days a week. So it seems like a lot of money to me. Now, I realize I'm not as young as everybody here, but it does still seem like – I think that's a lot of money even in today's dollars, that $2,500 in 12 weeks, in three months. I think it will matter a lot.

I think it will impact people's ability to get child care. I think it will impact people's ability to buy local in terms of the kinds of things that people like to do with disposable income, you know, travelling around the province and supporting Alberta businesses in the summer through tourism, enjoying the benefits of small businesses in their communities, whether it's by way of, as I've said before, going to restaurants, those kinds of things, or going to their local hardware store and buying things that allow them to do home improvement. I know a lot of people do home improvement on a recreational basis. I wish one of those people were in my family, but they're not. I know that people do recreationally home improve, and that is a thing that actually drives the economy quite significantly.

In my case back in the day, when I had time, I would recreationally home improve, but I did it so badly that I spent three times as much as I should have because I would decide to do a project, do it wrong, and then have to go back and buy stuff to try it again. Typically by the third time I had managed to cobble together the most MacGyvered of not very successful home improvement projects, but in so doing, I was generating a lot of economic activity and GDP growth for folks in the home improvement sector.

Anyway, that's just me. I think other people are more efficient about that particular expenditure, but nonetheless that's the kind of thing that will go by the wayside when people find $2,500 less in their pocket every three months. And that's the kind of thing that will hurt local economies. Perhaps the multiplier effect won't be quite as large as it is when it's me spending that money, but it will still be, you know, relatively noticeable for folks.

Yeah. Those are our reasons why, of course, this bill, again, does not actually open Alberta for business. What it does is it threatens to close Alberta businesses while picking the pockets of hard-working Albertans who I think deserve to be rewarded at a premium for being part of a province that has and does work historically very, very hard and produces great amounts of things for the economy and that leads the country in terms of economic activity. Let's see. How are we doing? What time did I start talking? It must be getting close there. Anyhoo.

I think that for all these reasons, I would urge members of this House to give sober second thought to moving forward immediately on this pick-your-pocket labour bill. I think that, as I've said a few times, we all share the desire to grow our economy and to create jobs. I don't think it's just folks over here who are a little bit taken aback by the logic that we create jobs by paying people less. I honestly think that there must be some folks on that side of the House who are giving their head a little bit of a shake to this idea that job creation is a thing that happens when you roll back the wages of people and pay them less and that that as an economic strategy is, in fact, a fundamentally flawed economic strategy.

If you look at the successful economies around the world that emulate or include the characteristics that we in the province of Alberta, I assume, will always want to preserve, which are the characteristics of human rights recognition and respect, free speech, democratic rights, you know, the right to health care when you need it, the right to publicly funded and accessible education, the right to a certain quality of life, the right to safety in your community, all these things, we believe, are fundamental tenets of the communities within which we live, not only here in Alberta but across the country.

9:30 a.m.

When that's your starting point, then, of course, that should disqualify a number of economies in the world from us pursuing them or wanting to emulate them. I think our starting point should always be those characteristics, those qualities, and if you start with those criteria, what we are looking at, then, is trying to emulate economies that are sophisticated, innovative, diversified, leading-edge, high-tech, premised on high education, premised on equitable workforce participation, premised on strong social supports that allow all people to participate to their maximum ability within the workforce, those kinds of economies. That is the kind of economy we should be seeking to build in the province of Alberta, not an economy that is trying to compete with another economy that rejects some of those basic characteristics that I began by outlining, those characteristics of respect for human rights, those characteristics of access to health care when you need it, those characteristics of equal access to high-quality education on a public basis.

Those characteristics: if that's your starting point, then the economies that folks here seem to think we are competing with are not the economies that we're competing with. Or if we are, we're not going to be successful because, you know, they'll always be able to breach more rights than even the members in this House are prepared to breach. So it will not be a successful race to the bottom. They will always go lower faster than us. Why we would embark upon that race I don't know. I said last night that what we should be doing is mapping out a race to the top, not a race to the bottom. Bill 2 is about mapping out a race to the bottom.

You know, I notice we've had some students come in to watch the debate, and I just want to give them a bit of a wave there. Oh, they're all waving. That's really good. They look like they're around – I can't tell.

Ms Hoffman: Grade 6.

Ms Notley: Oh. Grade 6.

Ms Hoffman: That's my guess.

Ms Notley: I'd say maybe grade 6. That makes sense.

They're a couple of years away from getting that first job, but, boy, oh boy, I bet you – I mean, I'm certain we can't do audience participation because I know that's not appropriate for the House. But I'd love to do a poll of those students up there and ask them about when they start their first job and start working for eight or nine hours a day, potentially two years from now. As I said, I was 15 when I started working up to 12-hour shifts waiting on tables. I'm wondering if they think that they should be paid the same as the other people that they would be working with or whether they should be paid less because of how old they are. I want you to know that I think you should be paid the same amount for the work that you do, and it's unfortunate that some people don't agree with that, because I think that's unfair.

Anyway, it is hard to say because they cannot engage in this, so we will just all make guesses about where they all are. Maybe when you leave, you guys can have a conversation about this in your class, about what you think about fair wages for people who are under 18, not to in any way disrupt the current lesson plan. If there was something else planned, I apologize to those who had a different lesson plan. I can see my teacher friends starting to text me, telling me to stop doing that kind of stuff. Anyway, welcome to the Assembly, all of those kids up there.

[The Speaker in the chair]

Anyway, for all these reasons, as I've said before, we urge members opposite to delay on this bill, to reconsider it, to not read it a second time, to go back to the drawing board, to learn what the legislation itself says, to better inform themselves on the impact of the legislation so that they can understand fully that, in fact, this is a very aggressive grab at overtime for working people, that there is no voluntary nature to it, that there is no ability of working people to say yea or nay to whether or not they have their premium for overtime taken away from them, that any interpretation of the legislation that suggests that somehow people have a say in this in any meaningful way is an incorrect interpretation.

Both legal opinion and experience prove that to be the case. That is why we changed it in the first place, and that, of course, is why so many friends and insiders have lobbied for it to be changed back, and that is why it is being changed back. At the very least, I would urge members opposite that if they do proceed to move ahead with this bill, they be very strong and clear and acknowledge that what they are doing is passing a bill that will invite up to 400,000 employees in Alberta to receive overtime at straight time rather than at time and a half and that this is an intentional decision that folks here have made and to then at least be willing to be accountable for that decision to working people and their families and their employers and everybody else in this province that that is what is happening.

I think that when we embark upon these sorts of risky, race-to-the-bottom, back-to-the-future, 1980s Reaganomics-style economic plans, it is, of course, divisive because it's about growing inequality, not reducing it. It is polarizing. At the very least, I would hope that those who advocate for this kind of divisive, polarizing, equity-reducing strategy will in fact stand up and be accountable for it and acknowledge the consequences of the legislation and the consequences of the amendments that are being proposed here today; that is, that this is a full-frontal attack on the overtime of working people.

With that, I believe that I am going to end my comments because I have some other things that I have to do today. As much as I love talking here endlessly, there probably are other things people would like to see me do as well.

With that, I urge people to support our amendment, and I thank you for the opportunity to address the Assembly, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available for brief questions or comments if anyone would like to raise one. I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar rising under 29(2)(a).

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, I enjoyed every word, every minute of our leader's speech to this amendment. You know, one of the things that I wish she had the time to do is to go back and repeat the comments that she made before the class came in, because I think that, unfortunately, the class in the gallery missed what was probably the best part of the speech. Unfortunately, 29(2)(a) doesn't give us enough time to allow her to make those comments again, but I would encourage the class members here in the gallery to go back to Hansard, when it becomes available, and read it thoroughly because it will be the most valuable education that they'll get on the topic of labour and employment standards for a while.

9:40 a.m.

Mr. Speaker, it was with great interest that I listened to the member's experiences working at Great Bear Lake. She referenced a number of times in her speech the fact that she is not the youngest member in this House. It must have been fascinating to have worked in the Northwest Territories so shortly after the glaciers had receded from that part of Canada. I mean, I am pleased, really, that she managed to survive all of the mammoth attacks and the sabre-toothed tiger patrols that I'm sure she saw in those early times in the Northwest Territories, which just speaks to her tenacity, I guess, and unwillingness to bend in the face of significant, intimidating physical force. It's just really remarkable to think that so much has changed.

Of course, you know, we can expect that the area of the Northwest Territories is going to change even more significantly and at a much faster rate because the members opposite are so keen to not do anything on climate change. At least, we have one member with living history here who can tell us how much the north of Canada has changed because of the effects of human-induced climate change. Perhaps she can take a holiday at some point – I imagine we won't be legislating forever, Mr. Speaker, although I couldn't imagine what other things we could possibly do that would be better with our time – and perhaps she could go back to the shores of Great Bear Lake in the near future and tell us how much it has changed in the time since she was there. It's important, I think, to collect those personal stories about climate change and the impact on Canada's north. It's important oral history that we wouldn't get otherwise.

You know, Mr. Speaker, I can't recall if she touched on it before the class entered or not, but I think she mentioned in her speech something about the unfairness of paying students a wage that is $2 an hour less than people who are 18 years old. What the members opposite are doing is encouraging these young students to drop out of school early to make more money, which I'm sure is not what their parents want them to do, certainly not what their teachers want them to do. It's probably what the Minister of Education wants them to do; it'll save them money down the road. It's probably what the Finance minister wants them to do so that they can, you know, continue to shovel giant cheques into the backyards of the wealthiest in the province.

But, Mr. Speaker, I think the children there in the gallery wouldn't agree that these are the proper incentives that we need to provide our young people for education in this province. Certainly, the Member for Edmonton-Strathcona in her speech did talk about the value of education and promoting education, and I would encourage anyone listening to this debate who is thinking about postsecondary education or going back to high school to upgrade to do so because that is really the path to a prosperous future. You know, unfortunately, all that we have to do is to do those kinds of public encouragements for people to create incentives for education, because this government has taken away a financial incentive for public education.

With that, I will close my remarks.

The Speaker: Thank you to the hon. member.

I would obviously caution anyone that may be making remarks that might be perceived as a personal attack. You might govern yourself accordingly in the future.

Are there any others? We are on amendment RA1. I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise this morning to talk on the amendment to Bill 2, moved by the member, that the motion for second reading of Bill 2, An Act to Make Alberta Open for Business, be amended by deleting all of the words after "that" and substituting the following:

Bill 2, An Act to Make Alberta Open for Business, be not now read a second time because the Assembly is of the view that the bill will not draw investment to Alberta or stimulate the economy and that further input from the public is necessary.

We believe, Mr. Speaker, on this side of the House that further input is absolutely necessary from the public. We on this side have been standing up for hard-working Albertans. We made sure that Albertans had modern workplace laws that respected working people, set modern standards, and ensured that Albertans were treated fairly.

Mr. Speaker, after decades of inaction hard-working Albertans finally had the same rights and benefits as every other Canadian. We followed through on our promise to phase in a $15 minimum wage so that people didn't have to go from their jobs to the food bank. We made workplaces more family friendly. We introduced job-protecting leaves, improved maternity leave and compassionate care standards.

Mr. Speaker, we put a lot of time and effort into studying the impacts of the minimum wage. Unfortunately, Bill 2 at this point doesn't seem to have a lot of that studying and information to move forward. We know the work that we did on this side of the House put more dollars in the pockets of hard-working Albertans who live, work, and spend their money here. We pored over studies finding positive effects of raising minimum wage, like increased consumer spending, lower wage inequality, better health outcomes, with little negative impact on overall employment levels.

The government in the information that they've provided, I'm hoping that they had looked at the impact of this legislation on women, on consumer spending, on health, on poverty and so much more. I think that more information is needed to determine this before we move forward with Bill 2 because we know that most of the people, unfortunately, that are impacted by poverty and lower incomes and lack of correctly paid out overtime are women and women that are raising children. We know that families in this situation have higher rates of illness, limited housing availability, limited affordable child care abilities, Mr. Speaker, and the list just goes on.

I'd like to take a little bit of time here to talk about this youth, student wage differential. On this side of the House, Mr. Speaker, we believe that Albertans, young or old, deserve equal pay for equal work. Rolling back the minimum wage for young people demonstrates a lack of compassion and a lack of respect for young workers. The value of your work should depend on the effort and the skill that you put into it, not what year you were born.

If you would just indulge me a little bit, Mr. Speaker, I'd like to just talk a little bit about young parents and share a story if I will. A 14-year-old girl is living at home. It's, unfortunately, not a great place to be for her. In order for her to be successful in her education, she moves in with a friend and their family, but unfortunately, financially this young person had to continue with their education as well as get their first job. For many, a first job is an exciting time, as it was for this 14 year old, being able to purchase things that perhaps parents would have done but weren't able to because she was now living on her own. So 14 years old, working on her own, working minimum wage, going to school. This young person worked over the summer. They were able to save up a little money while contributing to the family that they stayed with and were able to purchase, you know, back-to-school clothes so that on their first day of grade 10 they could fit in with their new peer group.

School goes on. The job kind of stops. They're in a more stable living situation, and the second home that this child is living in is not stable either. Unfortunately, there's domestic violence. There are addictions. This child is struggling at school, and this child decides that perhaps a job would allow a little bit of an escape if you will, Mr. Speaker, from some of the things that are going on at home and also to provide some stable income to this child so that they can continue to have some school supplies, the basics, really, in order to further their education.

So this student now going into grade 12 finds that they have an unplanned pregnancy. This student is 16 years old, not living in the best of situations, now is facing an unplanned pregnancy. That part-time work now becomes: what do I do with my future, and where do I put that money? Going to school, struggling at home, unplanned pregnancy, and working part-time. The situation at this young girl's home didn't improve, so she moved out again but this time on her own, so that part-time employment meant paying for bills, transportation, food, and preparing for a new baby that was coming. Still in school . . .

9:50 a.m.

Ms Hoffman: Still 16.

Ms Goehring: . . . still 16, struggling with all of the things that come with being a young parent, this 16-year-old decides that they need more supports, so they start talking to the school counsellors. They're dealing with school, they're dealing with education, and they're dealing with growing a tiny human and how to just really get ahead in life at 16 years old, Mr. Speaker. This isn't an uncommon story. This is happening all across the world, and we're in a province right now that's looking at rolling back minimum wage for young people if they're still in school. Had this 16-year-old been dealing with this legislation, I would suggest that perhaps this young 16-year-old would maybe have dropped out of school, which would be absolutely detrimental for their future and their child's future.

Back to the 16-year-old: this young woman was in a school that also had about four or five other young parents that were also dealing with an unplanned pregnancy, Mr. Speaker. What this young woman did was that she went to her school counsellor and was able to create some sort of support group within the school because she knew that she needed support to be able to stay in school and work, and she wanted to offer that support to her peers who were also dealing with an unplanned pregnancy at 16 years old in high school.

This group came together, and they strategized about ways that they could support each other while working and going to school. In the time that they had at the school, they were able to bring in some nurses to talk about pregnancy and just being healthy as a mom. They were able to talk about the future and what that meant and how they could get through school and be successful in that, Mr. Speaker. So we move into the second semester of grade 12, and this young person is still working. She's still going to school, but unfortunately, because the baby was due in mid-spring, she dropped out of school, was now living in financial hardship, raising baby, trying to make sure that baby was taken care of, and then her home life was also not very stable. She was living in a home situation that wasn't healthy, that wasn't a best-case scenario. Again, this young person, working, tried to figure out the best way that she could move forward.

There's an organization called Terra, and it's in Edmonton, and it's an organization that works to support young parenting and pregnant teens. This young person reached out to this organization and said: "You know what? I want to stay in school. I want to be able to complete my grade 12 and create a future for my child." They were struggling, Mr. Speaker. This organization, Terra, was able to bring them back into school, into grade 12, and find extra supports for them to be able to continue with their education, to graduate high school. Now, this program, I have to say, is absolutely incredible. It supports young people, moms and dads, who are struggling with pregnancy, trying to make decisions on how to proceed with that pregnancy, and supporting young people where they're at to try and make them successful.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, youth that are dealing with an unplanned pregnancy have a higher rate of school dropout. They often don't continue with their education. They are in a situation where they need to take care of their family, their baby, and they end up working. So this is situation that we're making it that much more difficult for young people to stay in school and to continue working if we're looking at not having a fair wage for these young people.

This student, with supports, was able to graduate high school and to go on and work in Alberta and was able to get accepted into college, but part of that was the need to continue to work. Mr. Speaker, when a young person is going to school and trying to raise a family as well as get a postsecondary education, the employment options are limited. So this young person went into the service industry and was working as a waitress as well as a bartender, working as much as possible to try and make sure that ends were met for their young child, to afford daycare, tuition, all of those things that are so important in order to get ahead. This young person worked all through college bartending, waitressing, doing whatever they could to make sure that they were able to provide a better future for not just themselves as a young person but for their young child, who was also depending on them.

As a single mom this was really difficult, and there were times that, I'm sure, the server went home with not a lot of tips. It could have been a slow night. It was a university-type establishment, and the people that were coming into the establishment were students and really didn't have a lot of money. Tips weren't always that reliable. You know, it may have meant buying a pack of diapers and some baby food and maybe more than tuna that night for the mom to eat. Parents make sacrifices all the time when it comes to raising children. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that this mom made sure that her child was always a priority. Struggling with tip money, education, long nights: it was difficult. Just being committed to working and getting through to the end of that postsecondary was essential.

When we look at the proposed legislation here and the recommendations that they're making with that service wage differential, it's not okay, Mr. Speaker. Again, this is the same type of demographic that is mostly women, perhaps young moms, perhaps moms with several children, trying to do their best to get by.

Now, if you look at a server that might work a morning shift, Mr. Speaker, they're up super early. They're serving breakfast. We know that breakfast is probably one of the least expensive meals to have when you're out.

Ms Hoffman: And one of the toughest to serve.

Ms Goehring: One of the toughest to serve. Absolutely. It's tough and unfortunately probably not a big expense when it comes to their bill, so probably not a high tip. You're working hard, you're working early in the morning, you're struggling, and you're probably not making a lot of tips. Now, if you look at a server who perhaps is working at a nightclub in Calgary or Edmonton, their take-home for tips might be absolutely extraordinary. They might make a really good living on a weekend. But let's say that you're working somewhere in rural Alberta. Not a lot of people coming through your restaurant, and your tips aren't as reliable. It's not fair to say that everybody who's in the service industry is making a fair wage, an equal wage, in their tips. It's just something that you can't rely on, Mr. Speaker.

It's really disappointing that this is something that is moving forward. I would imagine that people in Alberta would like to have a say about that, and they would like to be able to express concern with how this bill is moving forward.

I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, if we go back to that young 14-year-old who found themselves working, first time, just to escape some not great situations in the home, found themselves pregnant at 16 years old, struggled through school, worked part-time to raise a baby, and ended up successfully in postsecondary. This young person continued to fight for their education and to make sure that their child was taken care of. I can tell you that the story does have a happy ending. This young person was able to enter into the field of social work and was successful in being able to work at the school that they had graduated from at 18 years old. They were able to stay an extra year in high school, which is essential.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Thank you to the hon. member for her comments. Of course, 29(2)(a) will be available; however, I am going to step away from the chair for a brief rest.

Speaker's Ruling Relevance

The Speaker: I just wanted to remind individuals – I hesitate, perhaps, because the conclusion of the story, which we may hear about under 29(2)(a), may in fact be people that we all know quite well here in the Chamber.

10:00 a.m.

But I just want to remind members as we proceed, with respect to relevance we all know that on page 628 of House of Commons Procedure and Practice it says, "Consequently every member, who addresses the house, should endeavour to confine [him- or herself] as closely as possible to the question under consideration." While it was a very compelling story and I'm glad that you shared it, and I'm certain that you were going to tie it to the amendment that's before the Assembly because we aren't on the main bill, we are just talking – and not "just"; it's very important – about an amendment that is before the House. I encourage all members as we continue the important and robust debate that we remain predominantly focused on the question before the House.

Debate Continued

The Speaker: Having said that, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-South rising with what I hope is a brief question or comment.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This one will be brief. I was so compelled by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs' comments that I really wanted to make sure that we could hear the rest of that story. If she could please finish that, I'm sure all members of this Assembly would be riveted to continue.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Member, and thank you, Mr. Speaker, Madam Speaker, for some direction.

I would argue that this story is speaking to this. It talks about the human side of what this legislation will impact. I do believe strongly that there are many more Albertans that would like to have a say in this moving forward, and I don't believe that their voices are represented or that they were consulted with in this.

So, Madam Speaker, to conclude my story, I think the previous Speaker had alluded to who this person might be. In fact, it was me. That was my story. Because of the support that I got and being able to work part-time and go to school, I was able to become successful in social work and continued to work.

As a social worker I've seen the impacts that the minimum wage has on families who are struggling and trying to get by, and I've seen the workers that work so hard, and they're working 18 hours a day, trying to make sure that ends meet for their family. They're not working, for the most part, because they love what they do. A lot of people are out there working overtime because they need to make sure that they're putting food on their table, that their families are taken care of. Just the basic minimum to provide for themselves and for their families is often what these hard-working Albertans are doing. To take that away, Madam Speaker, I think is detrimental to Albertans and to families. I think that what we're asking in this amendment is something that all members of this Legislature should seriously consider; the impacts of this on average working Albertans, and that absolutely more input is needed. I just struggle to believe that enough input was done from the public to hear their stories. So me sharing my story today is to put the human side to what is happening and the impacts of this legislation.

I would hate to see young people dropping out of school so that they can make a fair wage. I think that that is devastating to our future and to our young people. There are young people out there that need to work. They need to go to school, and they need to work. When they're faced with the option of making a minimum wage as opposed to staying in school, sometimes out of necessity for life, Madam Speaker, they need to work, so they're going to take the option of dropping out of school, perhaps with the intention to return. I know I hear that story over and over: you know, I'll go back; I'll be able to upgrade; I'll get my education at one point. Unfortunately, the success of that isn't very high. We know that once you enter the workforce on a full-time basis, it's very unlikely that you're going to go back and get your education because you are in a place of just survival. That's a story that's told over and over.

I just don't believe that young people have been consulted with on this, and I don't know that average working Albertans have had an opportunity to have their say on the impact of what this bill is proposing. So I think it's very, very important that all members in this Assembly support this amendment to delay this bill so that we allow more public consultation and we can hear from people that perhaps weren't consulted when this bill was brought forward in its current form.

I know that members of the government are hoping to just get this through, but I think it's to the detriment of Albertans and working people and families that so heavily rely on overtime and just fair workers' rights, Madam Speaker. It's something that our government took very seriously when we looked at legislation that hadn't been looked at in over 30 years. It was very sad to see that it had just been neglected so long. I'm proud of the work that we did and the progress that we made.

I think that this legislation is going backwards, Madam Speaker, and Albertans – we want to be leading the country in what we're doing to support our people, and we want to be taking steps forward to ensure that everything that we're doing is really in the best interests of moving our province forward, of building our economy. Unfortunately, I don't think that this bill, where it's at, is doing what it claims to do. I don't believe that it's going to be drawing investment to Alberta or stimulating the economy, as it's claiming. I think it's going to . . . [Ms Goehring's speaking time expired]

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. Before I begin my comments on Bill 2, I just want to commemorate the fact that 75 years ago today our brave Allied soldiers stormed the beaches of Normandy, freeing Europe from the tyranny of Nazism. I want to give thanks to all the brave men and women who served to liberate Europe from Fascism, certainly give thanks to those people and give thanks to all of the people who agreed, after World War II and the harsh economic and social conditions that preceded it in the Great Depression, that that should never happen again and engaged in a postwar, world-wide nation building effort, where people could rely on strong protections from government, you know, strong health care, strong public education, solid workers' rights, pension rights. It was the greatest advance for equality that the western world has seen in its history, and I'm so grateful for all of the people who engaged in that work to lift everybody up, to make sure that we live in peace. [applause]

I'm concerned, Madam Speaker, on that note, of course, that we see a very troubling rise in authoritarian politics in many places around the world, a troubling return to those very conditions that led to World War II. We've certainly been engaged in a number of jurisdictions in a sustained attack on that postwar consensus view of government and the economy, one that continues in some form here in this bill that's before the Assembly today certainly, rolling back workers' protections, something that has long been held in many jurisdictions to be fundamental to human rights and equality all around the developed world.

That's why I urge everybody who is thinking about what those brave men and women sacrificed on the beaches of Normandy and other places – you know, they gave their lives not just to rid the world of Nazi tyranny but to build a better life for the generations that came after them. They were able to do that, and I think we owe it to them to remember what they built and not take it away from the generations that come after us. That's why I'm speaking in favour of this amendment this morning, because this bill, as my colleagues here in the Official Opposition have mentioned time and again, rolls back important protections that workers in Alberta have enjoyed.

I want to take a few minutes and share my own personal experience. We mentioned earlier today the youth minimum wage that has been implemented by the members opposite, you know, the creation of a dropout bonus for young people, which I think is a perverse incentive to encourage people to drop out of high school early in order to get a 15 per cent raise. In a province like Alberta, where we have very low rates of high school completion, very low rates of people transitioning from high school on to postsecondary education of any kind, we need to create incentives to actually encourage people to stay in school, to finish their high school diplomas, and to go on to complete a postsecondary education of some sort so that they can get a good education that will allow them to be engaged citizens who can participate in the public life of this province and not only that but get the skills and training that they need to get good jobs, Madam Speaker.

It's shocking to me that the youth minimum wage creates a disincentive to high school completion and removes an important financial support for many young people that they rely upon to be able to pay for postsecondary education when they get that opportunity. You know, that will have a negative effect on the economy and the development of jobs in the province in the long term. I think there's no less disputed fact than that investment in people and their education is the best thing that any government can do to develop an economy, diversify an economy, and provide prosperity for future generations. I think the government should rethink this matter and certainly create incentives for people to complete high school and go on to postsecondary education.

On the matter of the youth employment wage the minister, the Member for Calgary-Varsity, says that it has been modelled on the youth employment wage that's set up in Ontario, so I quickly researched what Ontario has set up, and it's interesting, Madam Speaker. There are some very important differences, I think, between what the people of Ontario have chosen to do and what the members opposite have chosen to do with the youth minimum wage. The first is that the discrepancy between the student employment rate and the general minimum wage is something like 65 cents. A student will earn $13.35 – I can't remember the exact number, Madam Speaker, but the general minimum wage earner will earn $14. So it's a very narrow gap. What have we created here in Alberta? We've created a $2 gap. So I think it's particularly unfair. If you say that you're going to model a youth employment wage on what's been done in Ontario, I think it would only be fair to then have a narrow gap between those two minimum wages, like the one Ontario has.

The other thing, Madam Speaker, about the minimum wage in Ontario is that it's legislatively tied to inflation, so the Ford government has implemented a freeze. It will freeze the minimum wage at $14 an hour for the calendar year of 2019, but then on January 1, 2020, minimum wage earners in all classes in Ontario will get a cost-of-living increase, which is not something that the members opposite have proposed. Not only are they reducing the student wage by $2 an hour, but they're going to keep it there for a long time. I think that that's unfair as well because not only are we setting our students at a disadvantage now; we're setting them up for being further disadvantaged further into the future as the cost of living continues to rise, and minimum wage won't keep track with the cost of living. We're just setting our young people further and further behind, and I really don't think that that's fair.

Madam Speaker, we've had some very interesting stories about people's experiences earning minimum wage, and certainly I would like to share some of them. You know, it relates to the issue of overtime and why we don't think that this bill will generate investment in Alberta or stimulate the economy, which is why I think we should support this amendment. As a young person myself in the mid-90s I worked in a Kentucky Fried Chicken restaurant at minimum wage. I worked alongside people who were in many cases 10 or 20 years older than me, but we were doing the exact same work. My duties were the same as everybody else's in that restaurant. It didn't matter how old I was. We all were expected to carry our weight and carry out the same functions.

To think that I would have been paid $2 less an hour than my co-workers simply because I was under the age of 18 strikes me as really unfair, especially when you consider how poorly treated a lot of fast-food workers are, not by their employers but by customers. I had a number of significant negative experiences working in fast food, which I know, Madam Speaker, comes as a surprise to you because I'm nothing if not a charming and likeable individual. You know, when people walk into a fast-food restaurant – and this is certainly not the case for the vast majority of Albertans. The vast majority of Albertans treat each other with dignity and respect, but there is a small but significant enough number of people to have a negative impact on one's work experience, who think that because they're ordering in a fast-food restaurant from a person who's getting paid to serve them, they can treat them as if they're lesser people.

It was very discouraging for me and my co-workers to have to put up with abuse that was not warranted given the work that we were expected to do. You know, fast-food workers have to work under very trying conditions. They work in hot and greasy kitchens, trying to deliver the food as fast as they can. People get very upset if things go even slightly wrong and don't have a lot of understanding, Madam Speaker, for the people who are working behind the till and behind the counter. It's definitely my experience that some people feel that because they're engaged in purchasing that food, they have the right to take out their frustrations in inappropriate ways on the staff. That's not fair.

That's why I think it's only fair that we pay people a decent wage at minimum wage, because the working conditions that they endure are often difficult and often much less pleasant than a lot of other jobs, that I've certainly had, where people treat you better. Madam Speaker, I get better treatment in my role as a politician than I did working in a fast-food restaurant, which should tell you something about how people treat workers in fast-food restaurants. So I would encourage all Albertans to remind themselves that the people who are serving them in fast-food restaurants are trying their best, that they're getting paid very low wages, and, you know, a little bit of kindness and empathy would go a long way to making their work lives better. That's the issue of the youth employment wage, and I would certainly urge people to consider that, urge the members opposite to reconsider their thinking on this.

It was interesting. In the fast-food world I was forced to work unpaid overtime. It was never written down, but it was always expected. I had a list of duties that I had to complete before the end of my shift, and I was told how many hours I was going to get paid for that shift. If I didn't complete the duties within that time, I was still expected to complete those duties, but my pay ran out before I was able to complete them, Madam Speaker. Oddly enough – oddly enough – no one on the staff was able to complete their list of assigned duties before the pay ran out, which is weird, because either all of us must have been really lazy or our employers were not treating us fairly.

As a 16- and 17-year-old person, Madam Speaker – and this was in the pre-Internet age – I didn't have easy access to employment standards information. I didn't know that that was probably illegal, and in fact I don't even know if that was illegal at the time because I can't easily find out whether or not the employment standards that exist now existed at that time. To subject youth to these kinds of working conditions and expose them to unscrupulous employers and then pay them less and not compensate them fairly for their overtime, I think, is really unfair. When those workers are eligible for overtime, I think it's only fair that they get paid time and a half. Certainly, that's the case in every other jurisdiction in Canada.

10:20 a.m.

As the Member for Edmonton-Strathcona and all of my other colleagues have mentioned today, you know, the issue of time and a half is based on a very old work-life balance premise, that there are eight hours in a day for work, there are eight hours in a day for personal time, and there are eight hours in a day for sleep. I would do almost anything for eight hours of sleep at this point, but thankfully we have some caffeine here to keep us going.

The Deputy Speaker: But, hon. member, is the caffeine really enough?

Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm wondering if the hon. member can continue to talk about the value of overtime given that this is such an important piece of what's under consideration in Bill 2 and such a fundamental reason why this amendment has been proposed and, in fact, is very likely one of the reasons why the hon. member is in such dire need of caffeine, as are we all, because it is so important that overtime be paid to workers, particularly workers in the oil and gas sector. I wonder if the hon. member would like to continue his thoughts on overtime, his experience with overtime, and perhaps some of his experience on the doorstep in the previous election when this came up as well, and what happened when he talked to working people about the threat, the looming notion, that their overtime may be significantly altered or changed.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and I want to thank the Member for Lethbridge-West for the question. Certainly, prior to 2008 I was engaged in work in the private sector. I was a consultant in the oil and gas business. It was expected by my employer to regularly work overtime, and I was not allowed to get that paid out. The employer told me that I had to bank that overtime at 1 to 1 rates. I know that that's a common myth that the members opposite continue to spin, that employers and employees can voluntarily agree. You know, I was agreeing to either keep my job, or I was welcome to find something else. Oddly enough, everyone in that same industry had the same practice, so you couldn't find a place that was paying people time and a half or allowing them to bank it at time and a half, because that was the industry standard practice, to expect employees to bank their overtime at a 1 to 1 rate.

Madam Speaker, I think it took an incredible personal toll on me and my family. I spent many, many months away from home, living and working in camps in various places around Alberta, and, you know, I spent a lot of time away from my daughter, who was very young at the time. She was going to music lessons and ballet lessons and gymnastics and all of the things that we parents put our young kids through to develop them.

To think that somebody would now be able to at least be compensated fairly for that time away from their families and their children and given more money in their pockets to put towards things like hockey registration, soccer camps, those kinds of things, to take that away – I know the members opposite like to talk about the hockey dads and soccer moms who were, you know, punished under the carbon tax, but they don't think twice about punishing those same people with working overtime and not being paid fairly for it. I think it's grossly unfair to expect people who are working long hours far away from home, far away from their families, trying their best to get ahead and make a good life for their children and save enough for retirement – now that's going to be taken away, and that money is going to go directly into their employers' pockets.

It's not going to create jobs. It's not like my employer ever thought: well, because I don't have to pay this guy time and a half, I can hire more people. No, Madam Speaker. Of course, the hiring decisions were made independently of what the overtime rate was.

When I was working, there was a skills shortage. They couldn't hire enough people. You know, in those kinds of situations there should have been – free-market economics would tell you that because of a labour shortage, wages would go up, but they didn't in my case or in the cases of my fellow consultants. We were still beholden to the employer's interests and the industry standard practice of not paying people overtime and forcing them to bank it at a 1 to 1 rate. So I was very pleased that we made that change, that my colleagues in that field could actually see some light at the end of the tunnel.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other speakers to the amendment? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. [interjection] Yeah. Thanks for that, Member for Calgary-Buffalo. It's my honour to rise and speak to the amendment as proposed by my hon. colleague. I want to begin by saying how much I've appreciated hearing the thoughtful, people-focused discussion throughout the night and this morning.

I have to say to the Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs that her story – and I appreciate the way that she told it, too. We don't always, in these moments of 15 minutes, have an opportunity to really get to know the personal history and what drives each of us as servants of the public and what the lived experience is that drives us to see the world in which we do and to fight for the things, the values that we all share. I want to say to her, for her tremendous story about love and determination and perseverance, that thankfully she found herself in a situation where she was surrounded by people with those same things. She is here today fighting for other people who might be living those experiences or other parallel experiences. I found that really inspiring.

Another story I want to tell. In my visits to grade 6 classes the students ask often really astonishing questions. Usually I prepare for a media interview. I can usually anticipate most of the questions I'm going to get asked. I almost never anticipate the questions I'm going to get asked in grade 6 classes. One that I almost always get asked and many new members who will probably be visiting them is: did you always know that you wanted to have this job? And then

I get to talk about other jobs that I've had and other jobs I thought I might have. That's a really fun one.

But one that I remember as well was: what's one thing your government did that made you extra proud? And I just stopped and thought about it for a few seconds, and then I talked about the work we did to close the gap and to reduce child poverty in the province, reducing child poverty by half. Still much done, much more needs to be done to make sure that no child ever goes to school hungry, no child ever worries about how their parents are going to pay the rent, no child ever feels that they are pushed out of the safety that should be childhood at a time before they themselves are ready.

One of the things that I listed as a thing that helped, in my opinion and in much of the analysis I've seen written, is the tremendous determination that our Premier, the Member for Edmonton-Strathcona, the Leader of the Official Opposition, showed in fighting to raise the minimum wage significantly. Many in this House probably worked at a time when minimum wage was $5 an hour. When we came into government, it was about $10, and today it's $15 for everyone, something that I think is a trend that many jurisdictions in the world are aspiring to and are well on track to, but Alberta got there first. Alberta: I think many of us are known and proud of the fact that we're known as being enthusiastic and entrepreneurial and leaders in this province.

I think that that should apply for all folks in this province. I think that that should apply for the low-income earners as well, that they have an opportunity to receive fair compensation and to achieve great things doing the hard work that many do.

I appreciate that the Member for Calgary-McCall last night talked about – oh, here's one thing. I sometimes tell this story, you know. An economist, a social worker, and a lawyer walk into the peace lounge. They're all the Member for Calgary-McCall – right? – with his tremendous lived experience.

An Hon. Member: And a refugee.

Ms Hoffman: And a refugee and a minimum-wage worker. As the hon. member put himself through all of those degrees, he worked minimum wage. He worked minimum wage because it was available and because it was important work and because people would hire him into those positions. I think that it is something that should be recognized and honoured for what it was.

What I wanted to say about that is that when I was in a school, I was talking about closing the gap on child poverty in the class that we did there, and I mentioned the minimum wage. Bless grade 6 students. They think "minimum," and they know that in the curricular outcomes "minimum" and "maximum" are tied together, so we started talking about maximums in the world. One kid said to me, "Is there a maximum number of jobs?" I immediately challenged my minister of economic development. I said: "We want all the jobs we can possibly get in this province. We're going to fight until we have full employment. We're going to fight to make sure that we've got opportunities for everyone in this province to be fully employed." And he said: "No. I mean, is there a maximum number of jobs my mom can have? She already works three."

He wanted to know if his mom at some point would have an opportunity to be home, to come on a field trip with him, maybe visit this very place with him, and it broke my heart a little bit. So we talked a little bit about why his mom was doing what she was doing, to create a better world for him. If any of those jobs were in the service industry, what we're being asked to consider is rolling back his mom's pay, possibly causing her to work yet a fourth job. Out of the mouths of babes, right? Minimum and maximum. So when you cut the minimum, you put more pressure on the people who are currently working within that minimum to do more and for less.

Like many members, probably, in this House, I and, I know, many of our caucus members spent a period of time working in the service industry. When I was working in the service industry, some days I made good money, some days I made not good money, but almost every day I was asked to work extra because there was extra to be done. Again, as was mentioned by my colleague from Edmonton-Gold Bar, I did it. I did it, and I didn't ask about whether or not I should. I did it because the work needed to get done. I needed to get a paycheque.

I think that it's important that people who do that little bit extra get a little bit extra in their compensation. I think that's a fair practice. As our leader said when she was referencing working parents, I think about the idea of this young boy who asked me about the maximum number of jobs. His mom already had three. With the idea that if she was working late – and I'm sure she does many days – she would have to choose to either leave him unattended or pay for child care, I imagine that's a very difficult choice for many people. I think it would be more likely that he would be left unattended if that mom wasn't making a premium, if she wasn't making time and a half. If the money was that much tighter, he would probably be on his own. I don't think that's fair. I don't think that's fair to the kids of our province.

With regard to this bill and, in turn, the amendment that we're debating, another thing that I think is unfair and that I certainly don't think will do anything to support the economy – in fact, I think it'll be counter – is the provisions around general holiday pay. In fact, they actually seem quite mean and quite vengeful. I don't know who exactly the revenge is being sought out against, but I think they're mean, and I think they would be punishing. For example, general holiday pay is in many neighbouring jurisdictions, including Saskatchewan. I know that many members of this House feel a direct connection to Saskatchewan. It's also something that's in British Columbia, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec, P.E.I., Newfoundland and Labrador, the territories. All of these other jurisdictions acknowledge that if you're working on a holiday, you should get general holiday pay. It seems reasonable.

In this bill that we're considering, or that we're considering passing an amendment to which would mean that we don't consider it at this time, we are being asked to make Albertans work at a lesser standard of pay than everyone in these other jurisdictions: Saskatchewan, B.C., Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec, P.E.I., Newfoundland and Labrador, and the territories. To the Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster-Wainwright: I can't help but wonder how fair it may or not be – I would say: may not be – to employees on one side of the border, because it probably is which jurisdiction you're working in and not which jurisdiction you're actually a resident of, to not get their general holiday pay.

The fact that this change comes in on September 1, right before Labour Day, is, again, particularly mean, right before the day where we're supposed to celebrate the rights and the progress that the labour movement has been taking and making and the fact that we all have an opportunity to benefit. For that holiday, that is indeed intended to celebrate the people who are working that day, they're going to lose their general holiday pay.

I think that another change that's mean in this is the change around requiring somebody to work for 30 days to qualify for general holiday pay even if they're working on that holiday. Again, this is something that isn't the case in Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, or Quebec. This is something that we're going to forge new territory on. If you're hired as a seasonal employee, which I imagine many, many Albertans are – I know a lot of the places that are especially busy this time of year have short-term employment. I'm picturing garden centres. I'm picturing a number of different retailers during the month of December as people are preparing for Christmas. If you haven't worked 30 days, no general holiday pay even if you're working on Christmas. If you're a seasonal employee who's hired to work on Christmas but you haven't worked 30 days, your employer doesn't need to pay you. It does feel a little Scroogelike.

The other example that was mentioned is, you know, that Santa works in the mall on short-term contracts. If Santa ends up working in the mall on Christmas, no general holiday pay for Santa if Santa hasn't been there for 30 days, probably. Again, that is not exactly something that I would say is built on wanting to help people up. I'd say that it's built on hurting people who are serving us all by working on those general holidays or working in those time periods.

Another piece I want to mention is that I do believe wholeheartedly that this is going to be very good for stimulating the economy in one area, and that, I would say, is human rights and labour lawyers. I think they are going to be very busy fighting against what seems to be a human rights violation and, in my understanding, to be a violation of labour rights based on age discrimination. I think about some of the things that we've already seen go all the way to the highest levels of courts around discrimination based on age. Rather, I think the argument there was family status, but again the same argument applies if you're a family with somebody who is a minor. There was a ruling not that long ago, just in the last few years, that even condo boards or landlords can't discriminate based on age or family status. If we can apply it to living conditions, it seems like a not far correlation to draw it to working conditions.

I don't think many of us ran for this office because we wanted to create discriminatory conditions. I don't think many of us ran for office because we wanted to take money away from hard-working families on their general holidays. I don't think any of us ran because we really wanted to cut wages for that single mom who found herself in a very difficult situation. I imagine that probably, if she was told she could make $2 more – you can get a can of tuna plus a salad – if you drop out of school, that would have been a very, very difficult decision for that teen mom to have made.

For these reasons, I really want to express my gratitude to the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview for bringing forward this amendment. I think that saying clearly that it not be read “because the Assembly is of the view [it] will not draw investment to Alberta or stimulate the economy” and that further input is required from the public is fair and reasonable.

10:40 a.m.

Again, I know that many members opposite will talk about: well, we got elected, so we can do what we want. Jobs, the economy, and pipelines were, I think, a lot of the taglines I remember seeing. I observed and seem to have processed some of the messaging that came. None of those talked about jobs where we further discrimination or jobs where we are going to make sure that some of our most marginalized have fewer opportunities.

To that young man who asked me about the maximum number of jobs: I think that that's a totally fair question. I think that the right for children to have an opportunity to spend some time with the people who love them is a fair request from that young man. One of the best ways we can do that is by making sure that there is a fair and reasonable minimum wage, work conditions, and compensation conditions for things like general holiday pay.

One other piece I'll mention, and it is one of the stories that helped inspire the suite of changes that we brought in to bring Alberta's workplace legislation to be fair and in line with most other jurisdictions in our country. It was the story that we heard about Amanda Jensen, who, when she found out her child had cancer and needed some time off, in turn lost her job. Some people will say: shame on that employer; shame on that employer for firing somebody. But the truth is: shame on all of us for setting the conditions where that could have been possible.

The Deputy Speaker: Questions or comments under Standing Order 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It is always an honour to hear from my hon. colleague from Edmonton-Glenora. The words that she brought to us and to this debate were so important because, as she said, we have heard so much in the last 15 or so hours around lived experience and stories from members' constituents and colleagues and associates. It becomes very, very clear that Bill 2 really is the pick-your-pockets bill. It's really the bill that goes in and hurts families. It goes in to pick the pockets of hard-working Albertans.

We've heard many stories tonight. I encourage members – I know they were listening very closely the entire evening, Madam Speaker – to also look back at Hansard and the Blues, as they become available, because those stories are just a small number of the 400,000 employees who will be affected negatively by this bill, of the large number of workers who will be affected negatively by this bill.

We know it's going to be negative because this is a bill that attacks young people. It attacks labour. It attacks workers, and it takes away their vacation pay and banked overtime, and that's something that, Madam Speaker, is really just not what you do when Christmas rolls around. That's something that I think is really shameful. I think the members of the opposition have spent a great deal of time explaining over and over again why this will be so bad for families and why it will be so bad for workers.

But, Madam Speaker, we haven't heard a single thing from the government. Let me tell you that the silence is deafening. If the front bench cared about this bill and they thought it was a good bill, they would get up in this Assembly and defend it. They have chosen not to. If the backbench of the government thought that this was a good bill, they would get up in this Assembly and would defend their minister, defend this bill, but they decided not to.

What they have shown very clearly is that they either know that this is a bad bill or they haven't read the bill. Madam Speaker, I don't want either of those in my government front bench or in my government backbench, frankly. I think we should be held to a higher standard. We should know what we are voting on, and we should be willing to stand up and defend it, or we should be willing to stand up and oppose it. The government is not willing to do any of that, so they either know it's a terrible bill or they really just don't care. Both of those are bad for Albertans.

It's going to hurt our families, it's going to hurt our constituents, Madam Speaker, and it's something that, really, the opposition is dedicated to fighting against. We're here to make sure that the sunlight will shine on this bill and that people will know how this will hurt their families. They will know how the government is trying to appease their wealthy donors and friends and pick the pockets of families all across Alberta. If this government really cared about these workers, if this government really cared about these families, they would get up and speak to why their bill was strong and why their bill was going to encourage investment and economic growth and for families to succeed, but they won't.

I'm concerned that that's because they have no explanation. They actually don't have any reasons that this is a good bill. That would be something that's very concerning. It would be something that would mean that the members of the government either think that what they write is made of gold, or perhaps they really just don't understand the legislative process. This is democracy in action. Democracy demands that we talk about the issues we care about as legislators. We were sent here by our constituents to talk about the issues we care about.

Let me tell you, this is an issue that affects over 400,000 Albertans. It affects people in every single constituency that we were sent here to represent. It is going to affect families across the board; 400,000 workers means many, many more families. What that means is that this government needs to explain to those families why they are bringing in a bill that picks their pockets, why they are bringing in a bill that attacks workers, why they are bringing in a bill that hurts families around the general holiday seasons, Madam Speaker.

This government should have the moral fortitude to stand up and speak to it. But, really, we can see that the silence, again, is deafening. They refuse to stand up. They refuse to defend their own bill. This is something that is really unprecedented, that they've introduced a bill and decided: "Well, maybe it's not so good, so we just won't talk about it. We'll hope it'll go away, and we'll vote on it, and maybe that will work." But, Madam Speaker, let me tell you, the opposition will not let that happen. The opposition will continue to talk about why this bill picks the pockets of families, why this bill is bad for Albertans, and we will continue to fight against this affront to democracy that the government, front bench and backbench, appears to be complacent in.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the amendment?

The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I was very moved by the spirited representations from the hon. Member for Edmonton-South, my hon. colleague, especially given the fact that, you know, here's a guy who really is working overtime at this point.

It's important to draw attention to the fact that we are here to discuss this important amendment which, indeed, proposes that this bill is not read a second time on the grounds, Madam Speaker, that it will not draw investment to Alberta or stimulate the economy and that we do require some further input from the public. Speaking to this amendment gives the public an opportunity to engage in these conversations, to perhaps tune in to the Legislative Assembly and see their representatives hard at work doing what the people elected us to do, which is that when a bill proposes to affect people's daily lives, that bill ought to be appropriately scrutinized by legislators on all sides of the House.

No matter what party we were elected to, Madam Speaker, you know, the Westminster parliamentary system demands that we are here as individuals, that we represent our individual constituency, our individual communities. We've heard many people describe the vibrant neighbourhoods that make up their constituencies, the reasons why they came into public life. Now we are in a position where we are actually bringing that representation to life through our interventions, through proposing thoughtful amendments to legislation such as this amendment that I rise in favour of this morning.

You know, I think it's important that this amendment indicates that further public input is necessary. The reason for that, Madam Speaker, is that during the election campaign it was alleged that overtime was not going to be changed. The claim was made at the time that this would mean no changes whatsoever to people's banked overtime arrangements.

10:50 a.m.

People took great umbrage, as I recall, when the Member for Edmonton-Strathcona, the leader of the New Democratic Party, made an intervention about halfway through the campaign, saying, "Well, look, this will have a profound effect on people's bottom lines, on the ability to afford that new vehicle, perhaps the ability to afford many of the unexpected expenses that come up in daily life for homeowners, for others, for family members, and certainly in the oil and gas sector for people who had been through the historic downturn in the price of oil, people who had already been through potentially a number of very disruptive situations in terms of their family budget." Certainly, the proposal to make drastic changes to banked overtime such that thousands of dollars over a three- or four-month period might vaporize out of people's bank accounts was quite alarming to people. But at the time the answer, the rejoinder to that particular concern from the Member for Edmonton-Strathcona was: "No, no, no. Not to worry. Nothing to see here." So the public was told at that time that there would be no changes to their overtime arrangements. And now we see that further input from the public is in fact necessary because that claim was not then reflected in the reality of the actions that government undertook: not quite as Bill 1, but as soon as they could get to it, in Bill 2, Madam Speaker.

I remember being on the doorstep during that sort of 48-hour period when there was some back-and-forth on what would happen to people's overtime. I remember standing on a doorstep on the north side of Lethbridge, talking to a guy. It was a windy Saturday afternoon. He could barely keep his screen door open, the poor guy. It was gusting in at 100 kilometres an hour. It was one of those times where, after about an hour, you choose to go and knock on some doors in some apartments, not because it's minus 40 but because the wind is giving 'er that day. So I'm talking to this guy, and he actually comes out of his house because we were probably going to lose his screen door if he didn't. We were standing there, and my hair is flying up like Donald Trump's on a good day. Here was a fellow who had been in and out of service rig jobs and that kind of stuff. He had a pretty new pickup truck in his yard, and I said: "Oh, that's a new truck. Is that yours?" Yeah. Okay. And I said to him, "Have you heard about this overtime stuff?" And he said: "Yeah. And I tell you what: I will not be able to afford my truck payments if those guys do that, and that's why you can put a sign on this lawn."
